A NEW UNIVERSITY.

It Has a Spiritualistic Tendency.

A contemplated educational enterprise that possesses decidedly unique features and is of especial interest to Spiritualists above all others, is fore-shadowed in the following item of news published by the daily press:

St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 26.—A $1,000,000 university, modeled on lines absolutely new in educational methods, and a sociological colony where the "unique ideas" may be put into living practice, is the work which has been undertaken by Mrs. Charles F. Joy, wife of the former St. Louis congressman. Already Mrs. Joy has received much encouragement from leading educators of the country and she feels confident she will be able to raise the necessary endowment when the object of the institution becomes generally known. A site for the university has been offered to her between San Francisco and Santa Barbara, overlooking the ocean, and a tract of 20,000 acres in Arizona for the colony has been placed at her disposal.

Mrs. Joy has just returned from the east, where she went to consult educators and scientists in the interest of the institution. She is highly elated at the success of her trip and proposes to go east again soon. At the Southern hotel where she is a guest she talked at length concerning the aims of the university.

Will Prove Soul's Existence.

"A university in which the great trinity, mind, soul and body shall receive proper training, and which will be the road to a realization of my object. I have succeeded in interesting certain wealthy people, whom I met in California, and I think have laid the foundation for the building of the university."

"It will be the object to make the school a twentieth-century institution for the discovery of every power in nature available for the benefit of man. A truly scientific investigation will be made of so-called psychic phenomena, and it will seek the invention of mechanical instruments which will register psychophysical forces. One of the first great benefits to be derived from such an investigation will be the detection of fakirs and impostors, who too often hold forth in the field today, and the awarding of credit to those who merit the reward. I believe that in time, with the progress which must be made, this proof will be forthcoming."

Will Encourage the Cults.

"Aside from this branch of the school there will be a department for the encouragement of all curative and therapeutic agencies with reference to all modes, too many of which have been overlooked and kept under cover by the so-called established schools of medicine. In brief, I hope to procure recognition for whatever is deserving, no matter in what light it is held by the world today."

"Investigations will be made into osteopathy, vitopathy, psychurgy, electro-fathy, naturopathy, chromopathy (mind cure), maldopathy (mind cure), mind cure, thought cure and others that are still unrecognized and outside the temple of science to-day. The age of bigotry has passed and the world is willing to accept that which is meritorious. That is the foundation upon which the school will be founded."

"In the colony which it is my purpose to establish in connection with the university is not my purpose to teach economics as they are taught in the universities over the country. We shall not attempt to teach tariff or free trade, single tax or socialism, mutualism or individualism, as such, or to teach any theory as opposed to another, but to give each an chance to demonstrate its own efficacy, to give each its chance to 'make good,' to use the slang of the day."

Parents to Be Trained.

"In the colony each of the disciples will have unlimited opportunity in actual living to demonstrate the practical qualities of his theory. Homes will be established for aged teachers and others who have worn themselves out in the interest of humanity—not charitable institutions, but villas which they will earn and to which they may return when no longer able to partake actively in the world's work."

"There will also be a department in which the science of life will be taught. Not only the laws of being will be discussed but the laws of parentage and the duties and responsibilities of motherhood and fatherhood."

"I am not unmindful that it will cost money to found such an institution. It will require in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, but I have reached much encouragement, and I believe I can carry the movement through to success. I have seen President Hadley of Yale and other educators. I have told them my plans, have answered their questions and hope to get them interested in the work."

GERALD MASSEY.

His Views as Presented in His Published Book.

In his book, "The Historical Jesus, or the Mythical Christ," he says:

As a mental model the Christ was elaborated by whole races of men, and worked at continually like the Apollo of Greek sculpture. Various nations wrought at this ideal, which long continued repetition evoked from the human at last, as it did the Greek God from the marble. Egypt labored at the portrait for thousands of years before the Greeks added their finishing touches to the type of the ever youthful solar god.

It was Egypt that first made the statue alive with her own life, and humanized her ideal of the divine. Hers was the legend of supreme pity and self-sacrifice so often told of the canonical Christ. She related how the very god left the courts of heaven, and came down as a little child, the infant Horus, born of the virgin, through whom he took flesh, or descended into matter, crossed the earth as a substitute, descended into hades as the victor of the dead, their vicarious justifier and redeemer, the first fruits and leader of the resurrection into eternal life.

The Christian legends were first related of Horus, or Osiris, who was the embodiment of virtue, goodness, wisdom, truth and purity, who personated ideal perfection in each sphere of manifestation and every phase of power. This was the greatest hero that ever lived in the mind of man—not in the flesh—to influence with transforming force; the only hero to whom the mir-

VIBRATION CONSIDERED.

The Vibratory Action of the One Life, and Its Manifestations.

All life is one, and all that is is a manifestation of that One Life. Everywhere we see unity in diversity of operation. No form of life even in the most infinitesimal degree of manifestation is non-important, but is essential in the unification of the whole. Nothing occurring in the almost unthinkable operations of the One Life happens by chance, for all life is vibrating according to the immutable will of supreme wisdom and love.

We see constantly in action the dual relationship of life, such as the positive and negative, the magnetic and electric, attraction and repulsion, action and interaction and the influx and reflux forces of life. From this we apprehend the duality of the One Life with its law of correspondence in degree in the masculine and feminine sex as manifested in all the diversified forms of life, with its most perfect development in man and woman, these being the ultimatum of evolved life.

How to explain the action of the principle of life and to discover the basis of its operation is the endeavor of all true scientific minds, so infinite, complex, and stupendous are the ramifications of manifested life that the student of its laws starts back appalled and questions his ability to attain to anything like a clear understanding of its seemingly unfathomable mysteries; yet all that is, is open to discovery by the diligent searcher into Truth; there are no secrets in the Universal Life.

The sum total of all degrees of life exists in the constitution of man from the lowest vibration to the highest, and as man relates himself through knowledge and development, so will he learn the so-called secrets of divinity.

We are all students in the school of life, and the experience and the expanding consciousness of divinity within, grow into the understanding of that life.

According to the plane of our evolution so will our apprehension of life be. There is no power in the universe to hinder our partaking of the pure knowledge of life, but that which obscures our vision to attain ourselves to the necessary vibrations. The purer and more unselfish our motives, the higher will we attain in the degrees of life, and the greater will be our consciousness of that life.

Harmoniously attuned lives through the unfoldment of the interior vibrations are attuned only by the knowledge and practice of that which goes towards the well-being and perfection of the whole. All life is the resultant of the vibratory action and interaction of the One Life. Cohesion, expansion, energy, caused through the attractive and repulsive action of the magnetic and electric vibrations of life, are everywhere manifest.

All life is intelligent and conscious; intelligence and consciousness being graded according to the degree of its manifestation. Manifested life might be broadly divided into three great planes of consciousness; the sub-conscious, conscious and super-conscious. In each of these planes of consciousness the form of life is the specific action of the vibratory motion. The greater the consciousness of life, so is the vibratory action increased; i. e., when we relate ourselves to the super-conscious vibrations of life, so do we come in contact with the dynamic spiritual forces which make us potential masters.

Spiritual forces were termed by spiritual teachers in the past as like a purifying fire, this being due to the action of these vibrations to disintegrate and disrupt the lower vibrations of the life of those who were subject to its action. We being the highest expression of conscious life on this planet and related to our innermost self to the Deity, are capable of receiving the vibrations of the most powerful and dynamic forces of the One Life.

As we progress and evolve spiritually, so do we receive inner degrees of life from the interior consciousness of being, which brings us in contact with the inner vibratory action of life. Through aggregation and segregation, integration and disintegration, all life advances. There is no death or loss of anything in the highest sense of these expressions, because all life is evolutionary. The outward externalized form of manifestation is disintegrated by the action of the vibrations, but the essence of that form goes forward into another and higher mode of manifestation. Death is the cause of all evolution and is the greatest factor in the economy of nature, for by its action all life progresses.

Transmutation and regeneration are simply words expressive of the higher action of the vibrations, as we relate ourselves consciously to the higher vibratory action of life, so are our characteristics and energies transmuted accordingly. All life is a science, and is capable in all its manifestations of scientific explanation and demonstration. Spiritual development is scientific and operates according to immutable principles of life. True spiritual knowledge and scientific attainment are one, and there is no real quarrel between spiritual manifestation and scientific fact.

The scientist of the future will be a true Spiritualist in the highest understanding of the term, and the Spiritualist of the future will be a true scientist in the highest understanding of the value of true science. DAVID A. LEISK.

cles were natural because he was not human. The canonical Christ only needed a translator, not a creator; a transcriber of the sayings and a collector of the doings already ascribed to the mythical Christ—Gerald Massey.

When the god of gold has passed away, and human beings cease to pray to fabled deities by popes and priests, then human minds will be released from idol worship, and study the law of nature, and right conclusions draw in regard to life's unending chain. That's evolved within the human brain. Then creeds and priests will pass away before the light of a spiritual day. When the inner light will guide us all up the golden stairs, both great and small.

Then shall we go with mortals talk. To think that with mortals walk. If mortals would in harmony live, Then angels could this comfort give.

SPIRIT ARTISTS AT WORK.

Marvelous Pictures Made Under the Influence of Spirits.

Spirit pictures, or pictures made by living beings under the influence of spirits or some other outside influence, have been known for many years, but recent researches have brought new facts to light.

The theory of "precipitation" of which the Theosophists speak is set aside by students. That sounds too much like sleight-of-hand. In a book of Colonel Olcott's, "Old Diary Leaves," Madame Blavatsky, putting her hands on a piece of blotting-paper, brought forth on a piece of paper placed beneath both portraits and pictures. Foulque, in America, produced the same results. Paladino, an Italian medium in Warsaw, under scientific scrutiny produced lines of writing under strange conditions, as well as odd forms of sculpture, the latter from a distance.

The most celebrated of these subconscious artists, without doubt, is M. Victorien Sardou, the playwright. Two of his designs are very curious. One represents a house in the planet Venus; the other the animal quarters with the philosopher Zoroaster. All was surprising and unexpected in the phenomenon. Mr. Sardou said that he drew these pictures offhand.

Being almost unknown, he had written a comedy on Bernard Palissy. The Odéon refused it. Out of it grew a satirical romance. In this libel he made the earth a subject of disgust, and placed his ideal residence of young dramatic authors in the planet Jupiter.

Under the influence of the thoughts thus produced, M. Sardou penetrated into spirit space. He wished to do as others, and took a pencil between his fingers. Automatically his hand wrote "Bernard Palissy."

"Behold a pleasant enough writing-card," he said; "and a sign of gratitude."

He asked: "Where are you?" Palissy answered, "In Jupiter."

Sardou rubbed his hands in glee. "Marvelous! Aren't you going to tell me what goes on there?"

But to the great astonishment of the poet words did not flow from the pencil, or under his graver (for some of these designs have been engraved by him), but landscapes.

Such is the origin of those curious works which have so little connection with the usually inclusive manner of the dramatist. They are affected, without sustained interest, without plot, and as woven from the dream tissues of the unconscious. The designs are fanciful, irregular and without method. It opposes even the most elementary rules of art. The pencil rushes from end to end of the paper, without ever quitting it to return for a moment to the starting point.

All parts of the picture are thus started, continued and finished at the same time. The result is that at first appears a jumble of which the point is not in the least apparent till all is finished.

This rapid march was not peculiar to M. Sardou. The same lack of order, will and premeditated purpose is apparent in the work of all drawing mediums.

The most recent of spirit painters, M. Fernand Demoulin, follows the same method in his subconscious works. Normally he follows the rule of all painters.

There has been found on Lyon authentic information concerning a medium who still exercises his power. Fantasia flowers have been produced by him. Arabian ornaments and extraordinary fancies clothed in heavy robes, wandering over primitive landscapes, holding swords, agitating banners, or sustaining chivalric where hearts and eyes were multiplied. That remotely recalled Gustave Moreau, and Hindu or Persian pictures, but with a strange something of a ferocious and inexpert nature added.

The painter of these pictures is a simple wood-ranger, or guard. He is utterly ignorant of art. His works are semi-mechanic. He draws with his right hand. But this is so crippled that he cannot write. He is slightly palsied, also. He sees the line he must follow in the paper, but he has no idea of the finished effect. He simply follows the indication that comes to him till the picture is finished.

A beautiful series of shell-work, flowers and animated branches are credited to a prominent woman who lived in the early days of spiritualism.

The woman frequently saw these forms come toward her in the shadow. But she waited ten years before they reproduced themselves on paper. Every morning, pencil in hand, she waited for the spirit impulse. At last it came. Her patience was at length rewarded by their graceful arrangement of grape-like patterns.

October.

A scarlet flash against the green,
A spicy odor, breathing low;
A hazy shimmer, dimly seen,
A far blue mountain—asters glow.

Fruits, reeking with their juiced sweet,
Brave dahlias, burning by the wall,
With golden air, and golden wheat,
And golden sunshine gilding all.

The purple hills, rest calm and sure.
A hush is in the air unfurled.
A promise that shall ever endure,
Seems hanging o'er a listening world.

Oh! perfect earthly time of ours,
In you, a tithe of heaven is shown;
A golden trust, whose blessing showers
Our lives, while waiting for our own.

RACE DETERIORATION EVIDENT.

Something for Reformers in the Ranks of Spiritualism to Think About.

The question of "race suicide" raised by Mr. Roosevelt has received little serious scientific attention, for that attention is occupied rather with the problem of race deterioration.

The report of investigations made by a physician in the service of our health department into the physical conditions of children of the public schools, summarized by us on Wednesday, is of portentous significance. Out of about 14,000 children examined by Dr. Hovius, more than 8,000 were defective in health; in other words, they were physically below the standard of the normal bodily condition requisite for the duties of life and for the propagation of the strength of the race. Dr. Hovius reports 6,294, or nearly a half of these children, as "requiring medical attention."

Similar medical investigations have been made in England, and the result is that in Parliament and among the people there is now much anxious discussion of the race deterioration suggested by them. Two years ago Sir John Gorst described as "shocking," as "perfectly appalling," the result of a test examination of the Edinburgh school children. It disclosed the fact that "70 per cent. of them were actually diseased." In the same year the medical officer of the London School Board reported similar results of his examinations. "There are, so many feeble-minded children," he stated, "that it is impossible to count them in sixties or hundreds. These did not include imbeciles distinctively and lunatics, of whom 128 out of 456 examined were found to be in need of restraint. The number of persons in England and Wales classified as insane was 110,000 in that year; but the large class on the borderline of insanity, 'feeble-minded,' carried out the invariable duties of life and when left to their own resources could only be estimated, and the 'modest estimate' of a distinguished medical authority was 100,000.

The results of the medical examinations of young men who volunteered for the Boer war, however, had the most depressing effect on the public mind regarding the deterioration of the English race. For example, Mr. Arnold White reports that at Manchester 5,000 out of 11,000 were found to be "physically unfit to carry a rifle or to undergo the fatigue of discipline; and even of the 5,000 accepted only 1,200 had the muscular power and endurance required by the military authorities."

Of course, unfavorable conditions of life, crowding, insufficient nutrition and employment which prevented proper physical developments are largely responsible for such results. But, also, medical and surgical and sanitary science is now saving "weak" numbers of weak and defective lives which formerly were weeded out of the community.

The percentage of deaths of children under 5 years of age has been reduced greatly. Buds which would once have fallen off the tree in decay are saved; but the persistence and propagation of these defective buds is a serious matter.

What shall be the remedy? Left to itself, nature, under the Darwinian law, settles the matter by allowing only the fittest to survive. The pagan Greeks applied that law artificially to human beings. For generations, as a writer in the Westminster Review reminds us, they suppressed the congenitally idiot, the deformed, and in fact those who in infancy gave no promise of being able to take an adequate part in life. "And consequently formed a splendid, intellectual, handsome, clever race, to whom modern civilization and culture owe so much."

Christianity and all civilized modern sentiment of course forbid the removal of any such numbers of defective human race. The great effort of modern science and modern humanity is to save the weak and defective.

The remedy proposed by the Westminster Review is for the state to "assume the duties of parentage" when these are neglected or cannot be rightly performed, for the benefit of the whole community. So, naturally, a plan may be congruous with the spirit of that radical magazine, but it would involve a tyrannical socialistic organization of the state which would be far worse than the evil it was devised to remedy.

Incidentally, however, he presents some facts which are not to be overlooked. Instead of the form of "race suicide" about which Mr. Roosevelt is so fond of talking, he fears rather the form which consists in the propagation of the undesirable elements of the community. As he says: "Improvident marriages are most frequent among the people least qualified to rear their progeny, and in fact these very numbers of members to society. Then the doctor and the sanitarian step in to save these weak lives, with the results indicated in the medical examinations to which we have referred."

In England this subject of "race deterioration," as we have said, is now a foremost subject of anxious discussion, and as this country increases in population, more particularly in such crowded communities as New York, it must eventually receive like consideration.

The above is from the New York Sun, and illustrates an important fact that the race is deteriorating; if deteriorating physically it must also be deteriorating spiritually. Here is something for our speakers to give careful consideration.

SPIRITUALIST.

Man and Woman Together Constitute a Complete Being.

However generous men may be in their feelings towards women, in legislation and in every other thing, their ideas are all masculine and their efforts are all directed with masculine ideals. It is an impossibility of nature that it could be otherwise. Man alone can found a family. He has tried for thousands of years to achieve the former and has always failed. If he were less vain these failures would convince him of the errors of his ways. Man and woman only jointly constitute the complete being, and as physiologically so, in every other thing, man alone is incomplete and his efforts lead to incompleteness.

So long as the Republic of the United States denies representation to one-half of its people, it can regard it as worthy of preserving a remedy for social ills, or as being consistent in demanding that other governments live up to their promises, while it neglects the very promises which it is founded and exists to fulfill.

A CONTRAST.

Spirits Recommended According to Their Deeds.

On the night of October 14, at a sitting we received the following. First the medium sensed the presence of a male spirit, then the name, which was Peter Ziegler, then the description, which was, light complexion, smooth face, determined chin, broad shoulders; seemed to be heavy, weight about 200 pounds.

The Writing.

My dear child, for child you seem to me, you would be surprised if I should tell you that on earth I was rather small in stature and not very strong physically; but it seems that spiritually I was very strong, and that is why I am shown to you in that way.

Now I promise you that I will not tire you out, but I thought this a favorable opportunity for me to come. I was originally from Norfolk, Va., but left there when quite young to become a pioneer in the West. My father took up his abode in the village of Ohio, and I came to you in that way. I spent my declining years on the Pacific coast. I was rather of a rambler nature, and it sticks to me pretty well here. I do love to make voyages into the, to me, unknown realms; there is so much to see and learn.

Humanity has always been a passion with me; I say not, not was, for I never think of myself as dead, and always speak in the present tense.

I find I can do a great deal here, as well as I did on earth, for the upbuilding of the fallen. God has implanted into every human breast the desire for the unattainable. So many get discouraged in their first setting out, and think it not worth while seeking and not gaining, and so drift along seemingly indifferent; but if you can place the outer crust you will find the fire still burning, and perhaps a little breeze from you will fan the smouldering coals into flames. Don't get discouraged, no matter how dark the day, somewhere the sun is shining and for you there will be recompense. Believe me, all things work out for the good of those who earnestly seek it.

Knowledge is power, you have the knowledge, and power is being given to you. If you could see this side of the life you could see the bees diligently working. We are, of course, invisible to you, but being invisible does not keep us from helping you.

Unseen, our messengers bring rays of hope into many a sinking heart. I welcome you into the great secret of the universe. There is no death, what seems so is transition only, that is all. That is the secret which we are striving to reveal; may the Lord bless and comfort you. Amen. Good night.

Peter Ziegler.

On the night of October 15, following the night that we received the piece from Peter Ziegler, we received the following:

"First the medium saw a Roman soldier in armor, next he appeared as a old, decrepit man, weak and trembling, large frame, the brown skin clinging to his bones, perfectly naked, unworthy a name."

The Writing.

I was a common Roman soldier; I once killed a prince. I stole his armor, and thus disguised, I made sad havoc among the people. I despoiled the churches, I scorned all religion but that of the gods; I feared no one but Jove. I sneered at those that thought mortal to their victims. I was a war-bred, and all such things I thought worthy of my ears; many a woman have I slain while she begged for mercy. I laughed in my glee; war's alarm was the light of my life; battering rams were gifts from the gods; my sword was my sweetheart; and my goal, I said, I worshipped for its cunning; all this was my glory.

Now am a decrepit old man, shorn of my glory. I beg alms of those I slew in battle. The women and children in their innocent pleasure are so many demons come to torment me; my hand has lost its cunning. I have not now a rag to cover my nakedness, my armor turned to red hot coals and burned my back until it seemed that my flesh must drop off its bones. I am shown no mercy, for they say, "I shew no mercy."

Can it be that I have brought all this upon myself? Where is Jove that he delivers me? I cry aloud but no voice answers me.

I would that I could live my life over, I might do differently. But now, alas, it is too late. I must be recompensed for sins committed. Then may I receive pardon. Will you lend me aid? I beseech you to do it for the love of the God whom you serve. If the prayer of a tortured one can avail, will you pray him to bless you? I can now discern a feeble light coming my way. God grant it may grow brighter.

I now must go; my strength fails and I no longer can stay.

MY TREASURES COME MARCHING HOME.

Sometimes from over life's summits,
Sometimes o'er its tempestuous sea,
One by one my soul's belongings,
Come traveling home to me.

Sometimes from the cloudy lowlands,
Sometimes from the darkest night,
Come forth my soul's belongings,
All gleaming, pure and white.

Sometimes through the murky shadows,
My most precious gems appear,
And oft do my fiercest struggles,
Bring life's sweetest measures here.

Sometimes 'tis love's sweet message,
That comes o'er some sunny sea;
But it is my soul's belongings,
That the waves bring home to me.

And so from rose-bowers of beauty,
Comes a fragrance that is most sweet;
And yet from paths of plain duty,
Comes a lesson that is complete.

And whether from sunlit mountains,
Or o'er the billowy crested foam,
I rejoice when my soul's grand treasures,
One by one come marching home.

MANY MEN, MANY MINDS.

What Does Spiritualism Teach That Spiritualists Believe in Common?

There are mediums who are not Spiritualists, and there are Spiritualists who are not mediums. Spiritualism is something more than psychic research. It embraces all that is profitable to know of the past and all that may be learned of the future.

Advanced Spiritualists are dissenters to all that is bad and conformers to all that is good. If all could agree as to what is good, and all were disposed to do what is right, then harmony and agreement would be the result.

There are mediums and mediums. Some who understand to some extent the philosophy, resolve and impart correct and useful messages. Others who seem to vary—giving at one time uplifting thoughts, at another advice not profitable to follow. Then again one will seem to be simply a machine that dearspirits can use, just as a person would use a good machine without thought of the character of the inventor.

Dr. Peebles says there are but two classes of people, Spiritualists and materialists. But those calling themselves Spiritualists differ as widely as the sects. There are Christian and Infidel Spiritualists; some accepting what they consider good and understandable in the bible others repudiating the whole as harmful. Many profess to believe in reincarnation; others think it an absurd belief. I have frequently been asked if I believe in reincarnation? I neither believe nor disbelieve what I know nothing about. There is enough that we may reasonably know by proper research, without wasting time on what is questionable.

No differences of belief should cause inharmonious, but conduct inconsistent with spiritual philosophy.

Unchristlike Christians and unspiritual Spiritualists are damaging to the cause they profess to represent.

Bible record says that "when the sons of God came together, Satan came also among them." Can the oldest inhabitant tell us of a church, society, organization, or even a brotherhood, where all was harmony, agreement, and brotherly love?

It is difficult to separate the tares from the wheat. The pastor of a Baptist church in an eastern state many years ago attempted to do so. He said to one of the members one day, "Sister S., I want to know if you are a Baptist. I had rather preach to a church of forty genuine, than two hundred renegade Baptists."

Instead of answering yes, or no, the member addressed said to him, "You know, Mr. P., that church history informs us that seven varieties of Baptists, all agreeing that the Bible gives only immersion as baptism, differing on other points sufficient for separate societies. Now suppose we have in this church members from the seven, each differing on some points, but preferring to be in rather than out of a church. If all must accept what you consider Baptist doctrine, many of the pious, conscientious members will withdraw, and the more careless ones, willing to subscribe to anything for the sake of membership will remain, and others of that class will unite." He did not remain in that church long enough to effect his purpose.

Spiritualists have no lack of authority that all must accept, or be disowned by the righteous. Nor is it necessary. Enough can be satisfactorily known by each inquirer. The best way to recommend it to the world is to show by example that it promotes happiness, usefulness, growth and love. Not necessary for all to think alike. No one medium can represent all phases of Spiritualism. All are learners, not self-righteous ones. The more they know, the more they perceive there is to learn. The most simple demonstration is sometimes more convincing than elaborate discussion or labored instruction.

One number of The Progressive Thinker may be so full of rich and varied food, it would seem that nothing more need be said. But the appetite is only whetted for more.

Every sane person in the universe would accept Spiritualism if he could be made to understand the philosophy. Many seem to think it is a subject about which nothing can be known, and all who embrace that same are mentally unbalanced! Spiritualism is no more supernatural than human beings.

A GOLDEN TREASURE.

As reverently as one might press
An angel's robe, my hand is laid
Where snowy ribbon binds a tress
Of glorious hair, half curl, half braid,
That once adorned the dearest brow
With living light whose soft waves fell.

Where heaven's light is falling now,
And sprays of starry asphodel,
So near that saintly brow has lain
This shining tress, must have caught
Some echo from that voice that said,
Some mystic wave of olden thought.

It has, for when this lock I hold Against my brow, there seems to move Along each precious thread of gold
A dream of sacrificial love.

The sunshine o'er this human ray Falls tenderly, in hue so near
A careless eye might simply say,
The sunbeams merely thicken here.

The very substance seems to hide,
In blended brightness vanish quite,
Just as the brow it glorifies,
Was lost to me in heaven's light.

How sweet to dream the flowers I place
Against the sunshine of this hair,
Yield up their dainty souls to grace
Her saintly brow with lilies fair.

When o'er this tress, once part of her,
Love's longing lips are half consoled,
Some mystic thrill must softly stir
Its sister locks of living gold.

All powers beneficent be led
To kindly join me when I say:
All blessing rest on that bright head
Wherever it may shine to-day!

May every grace be hers; and part
In all the glory souls have met,
And towards that dear immortal heart
May every tide of sweetness rest.

SPIRITS IN A GRAVEYARD.

A Strange Story Comes From Niles, Mich., Detailing the Remarkable Events Occurring at Bertrand, and Which Are Ascribed to the Spirits.

The village of Bertrand, four miles south of Niles, Mich., is greatly excited over stories concerning apparitions that are alleged to be seen nightly hovering about the Bertrand church. There, say the people of the neighborhood, strange lights are seen in the evening and holy music is indistinctly heard. Many of the villagers are old French settlers and they believe implicitly that the shades of their ancestors at their Indian foes are to be seen weaving in and out between the headstones of the grave yard. In the Bertrand churchyard are the graves of two young lovers, Pierre and Rose. There also lies their murderer, Gray Eagle, the jealous Indian, who was a convert and therefore received Christian burial.

The story is told that Mr. Snyder and his wife, who after three years of stormy wedded life agreed to disagree, met at Bertrand to settle upon terms of divorce and that upon their arrival in the village Snyder suggested that they walk through the place of the dead and examine the almost historic inscriptions on the headstones. Within they found the grave of the "blanket squaw" wife of old Bertrand, the French settler, who gave his name to Niles' little suburb. Her headstone is in good condition, for her descendants have kept it proudly, and the epitaph, written in ancient and ungrammatical French by her husband, tells the world of her manifold virtues as a wife and woman. Soon the twilight changed into darkness, so the story runs, and the moon came up as the couple walked slowly among the graves. They turned to look at the stained glass windows of the church that they might see the effect upon it of the work of her husband. At the same moment and without a word being spoken their RELIGIOUS BELIEF.

LETTER FROM MOSES HULL.

Christian Salvation and Damnation.

Faith is a good thing in human nature and human affairs, but under religious perversions it is made a curse. It is no proof of a fact. Believing a thing does not make it true, because in some instances people believe things known to be entirely false. There is a great difference between believing and knowing, or faith and knowledge.

What we believe to be true to-day we may find to be error to-morrow. We have found many things we once firmly believed, are utterly false and unreal.

The dogma of salvation by grace and blood atonement, postulated upon baptism and faith in a crucified Savior and damnation in hell for all who do not accept this salvation, is distinctively Christian.

People believe things very readily when told they will be damned if they doubt, but the worst thing they ever believed is that they will be damned for not believing. They are temporarily damned in believing a lie.

A man may say he believes so and so, from fear and dread of punishment, but none know but himself whether he believes what he says he does. There has always been a large majority of Christians expressing doubts that they have this true faith; and well they may, for some believe things that others do not, until there is endless confusion and conflict in matters of religious faith. It is a riddle to determine what the true faith is—what is untrue—what kind and degree is subject to punishment.

Christians have disputed over their differences, but they are all wrong on all sides—wrong because the whole ground of controversy lies in the fields of error and ignorance—all fundamentally false. Christian salvation is a fraud.

What a convenient, pliable, flexible thing is the Holy Bible—like a musical instrument on which each performer plays his own tune. The reason people love it so much is that it proves whatever they wish—they are all accommodated—all find evidence in it to prove their views. A book admitting so many antagonistic conclusions and interpretations is no proof of the truth of anything.

It is a perplexing problem to determine what the gospel is, for we must believe or be damned. It is an unknown quantity. The gospel according to Matthew is unlike the gospel according to Mark. The gospel by Luke is widely different from the gospel by John. There are conflicting statements and irreconcilable differences in these several gospels.

Moreover, the gospel according to Methodism is not the same as the gospel according to Presbyterianism. The gospel according to Catholicism is far different from the gospel according to Unitarianism; and so on through all the isms of the Christian sects. Who can tell what to believe or disbelieve, while some believe what others deny and oppose? This is the best of evidence that there is no salvation in Christian faith.

We have come to the conclusion that this gospel which Christians say we must believe or be damned is a lie—trash and nonsense—a scarecrow set up to scare people into the churches—and people who believe it are dupes and fools. They damn themselves in believing such delusory fictions.

Christianity is likened to a vine or tree which produces every variety of nuts, all kinds of fruit, berries, cherries, pumpkins, melons, grapes, squashes, cucumbers, turnips, carrots, potatoes. This tree is a constrictor.

Millions of children have received irreparable damage upon their lives from cradle to the grave by the pernicious effects of the false teachings of an angry god and devil and punishment.

This tree is a monstrosity. Spiritualism meets the Christian gospel of salvation and damnation with denial, and proves it false. Knowledge, progression, true civilization advance as Christianity declines. It is passing away, and spirit prophets have predicted that, in the course of human events, it will become extinct as a controlling power and influence in this world.

NOT A SPIRITUALIST.

Make a Note of This—Anna Eva Fay Has Been Posing as a Spiritualist and Medium for Nearly a Quarter of a Century, and Hundreds of Spiritualists Have Regarded Her as Such—Now She Steps to the Front With a Majestic Air, and Claims She Has Never Been a Medium, or a Spiritualist—This Fact Presents Another Object Lesson.

"Am I a Spiritualist?" asked Anna Eva Fay at Crawford theater last afternoon. "Years ago I was so replied, and then I firmly believed I was on the right track, but I am thankful to say I have slightly swerved, and you may say very decidedly I am not a Spiritualist in the common acceptance of the term."

"Still when you recall that such men as William Crookes, Dr. Savage, Huxley, Henry Ward Beecher, and other, and less others have embraced that belief, it calls for some reflection."

"While practicing Spiritualism I found that I made the mistake of believing that I could recall spirits while in reality I only saw or read the mind of the person who made the inquiry. Mind reading, it plainly understood, does not extend beyond the grave. Create in your mind the picture of a living person and I can tell you where that person is. But if dead, then I or no one can."

A few winters ago Miss Fay was entertained in St. Petersburg, and among her acquaintances in the royal circle was Prince Schwabe, a confirmed Spiritualist. In his palace is set apart a luxuriously furnished apartment where the prince devotes much time conversing with departed souls. Miss Fay had the unusual distinction of being admitted to this room and, as she expressed it to a State Journal reporter, "she fairly made things hum." The prince was much amused, almost stupefied, at Miss Fay's remarkable work, but imagine his feelings when she declared it all to be "bosh."

"What is death?" continued Miss Fay in reply to a question. "It is a transition as tender and as beautiful as the birth of a little one. We find on the other side our friends who welcome us as a mother and father welcome the coming of the storm; and as our friends pass to the Great Beyond they prepare a place for us so that we may, when death claims us, pass into eternity, as one of the great planet Mars."

Miss Fay concludes her engagement in Topeka at the Crawford theater to-night. (This afternoon she appeared in a matinee—Topeka (Kansas) Journal.

Present Work and Projected Work and Travel.

Mrs. Hull and I are now sojourning in Lima, Ohio, at the residence of our old friends, C. W. and Eliza Chown. I know Mr. Chown's father, I presume before Mr. Chown was born. I first met him in 1852. He was then somewhat popular as an Adventist minister, and I was just beginning to preach. I liked Mr. Chown because he took a fatherly interest in me. I was "the boy preacher." From that time forward I had several glorious meetings with him.

I believe it was in 1883, that C. M. Chown and his beautiful young wife came to me at the Clinton camp and introduced themselves. After that I moved to Maquoketa, Iowa, and we became warm friends as ever his father and I were. That friendship was continued through all the vicissitudes from that day to this.

Mr. and Mrs. Chown have a daughter Pearl, whom I have known ever since she was born, and who is to be married on Nov. 1, the anniversary of her father and mother's wedding day, to a Mr. Homer Briggs, formerly of St. Paul, Minn. Mrs. Hull and I are here to give a little speech, and to say the words that will cause the world to recognize Mr. Briggs and Miss Chown as husband and wife.

Last night we held our first meeting here. We had a large and deeply interested audience. I talked on "Materialism and Spiritualism." I showed how Materialism, at present the only legitimate foe of Spiritualism, is to be met. Materialism is the easiest thing in the world to meet and defeat if one only knows how to do it.

Then I took up the subject of Telepathy, the thing that is now being used as the latest and most successful objection against Spiritualism. I asked the question, Is Telepathy celestial or is it mundane? I found that while there is a mundane telepathy, there is a telepathy which required more than this world afforded to explain. The audience seemed to enjoy this as it did Mrs. Hull's remarks afterwards, and wanted more, so it has been decided to have one or two more talks, on next Sunday, and, if a suitable place can be secured, possibly one or two meetings this week.

Mrs. Hull and I go home on Monday, Nov. 7, and expect to meet that "grand old man," Dr. James M. Peckham, in Whitewater, and hear his voice in our school, also that he will report faithfully what the school is doing.

Having induced Mr. Weaver, who is a born teacher, to take charge of the Bible class, I am going to have him persuade Mrs. Emma Owen to take the lead of the psychic class during the same time. Mrs. Hull and I have set about getting ready for our Southwestern trip. It is now our intention to leave our home Nov. 10, at 5 o'clock in the morning, and to lecture at Farmer City, Ill., that night and two or three days and night following. From there we will go to Chicago, to Wichita, Kans., and talk there from the 17th to and including the 20th, and from there to either St. Louis or Kansas City, or both and then on southwest, stopping at Fort Worth and Dallas, Texas, and other southwestern points.

At every place we go we shall labor to show the Spiritualists the utility of the only school the Spiritualists have in the world, and shall ask them to assist their own school, to become members of the association, and to attend at least its annual meetings, and to put such men and women in its offices as they may select.

If our meetings do not pay enough financially to defray our expenses and do something to assist the school, we shall soon find it out, and retrace our steps. If we find that all is going well with the school and with us we may extend our journey around, via California and Oregon, to Seattle and home by some of the northern routes. We start out with great hopes; if Spiritualists will co-operate with us our hopes will be realized and we and those among whom we labor will be glad we made the trip.

Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, our school secretary, is also on her way west, though on a different route. She is now in Kansas City, Mo. From there she works her way northwest, to Cripple Creek, and Grand Junction, Colo.; then perhaps through Salt Lake City to Seattle and Portland, and perhaps down the coast as far as Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal.

Thus it putting in time, talent and energy will make the school a success, the success of the school is assured. That being done the school will do more for the success of an enlightened Spiritualism than any other one thing in the world.

Reader, please do not think by what I have said that we are going out to talk the school and its needs all the time; we are not going to do that. Perhaps a five minutes' speech in each place where we go will be sufficient. Mr. Francis, you and your readers will hear from us often while on our way, and you will know of our success and of our non-success on our journey. Spiritualists, send your good thoughts and your dollar bills after us, and there is no doubt of the success of this journey.

SHE SEES STRANGE THINGS.

As Witnessed by Josephine Remington.

Ever since I can remember I have seen on a bright day, in the open air, what I call the powdered glass. Mr. Lee's description of the phenomenon is perfect. I have often wondered what it could be that I saw.

On a cloudy day I can see little globules, like tiny soap bubbles, not as large as the end of a lead pencil; these form chains or strings by joining, and then the chain will form into shapes, sometimes making letters of the alphabet, and sometimes symbols like crown, a star, or a ladder, and at times only fantastic shapes. These bubbles, as I call them, I also see by artificial light.

I also discern what looks like smoke to me, as near as I can describe it; never dense—just a little of it at a time. This comes close to my face, and I have to look as a person does who is trying to see something on the nose, it comes so close. This vapor assumes any shape, and is always of the same color, a light gray.

I have seen bunches of bubbles as large as a peck measure, each little globe seeming to touch its neighbor, and yet distinct as if made of glass, and transparent, with a tiny globe spotted with a visible right in the center of each one. This mass would float along over the backs of horses' while out riding. I never noticed them near any other animal.

Old Truths In New Dress.

BY HENRY MORRISON TEFFT, NORWICH, N. Y.

Architecture has been called "frozen music," the statue is the thought hardened into stone; the picture is the imagination of the artist painted upon canvas. Some one has quoted Rollin in his history as saying that "According to the observations of Cicero, Homer's works are rather pictures than poems, so perfectly does he paint life, and set the images of everything he undertakes, to describe before the eyes of the reader." The imagination transfigures words into pictures, fictions into reality, and men into gods and heroes. It is the ideal, not the real Washington that the nation reveres. It is the ideal, not the real Lincoln that we revere; we worship not the real but the ideal Christ.

Close inspection, and every day acquaintance reveals flaws in every human character. We praise without stint and censure without discrimination. Some people never assert anything in the positive degree; it is always in the superlative. If a man meets with their displeasure the lowest hell is not hot enough for his accommodation; if he meets with their approval the highest heaven does not furnish entertainment too good or too costly for his deserts.

Life is full of absurdities, contrasts and antagonisms. The son seldom follows the trade, profession, or business of the father. Lawyers when they have a case of their own in court, employ other counsel to try it. Doctors, when they or their family are sick look for some other physician to diagnose the case and prescribe the remedies. The men selected to teach oratory and rhetoric in schools are persons who cannot speak or write themselves.

The mechanic who builds a locomotive cannot be trusted to run one. The professors selected to inculcate the principles of Blackstone and Kent into the minds of young men, are incapable of making a practical application of a single one. The legislators selected to make our laws are totally unable to interpret, or construe or apply one after it is enacted. Ministers, like guide-boards, are often more proficient in directing others in the right direction than they are in making headway themselves.

The fact that a man is a member of a church neither mitigates or adds to his reputation among the people. It no longer allows him to gain a false standing in the community. It furnishes no balance on the credit side of the ledger. People deal with him with the same caution, and use all the safeguards that they do in dealing with men of the world.

I think it was Bill Nye who said he was always afraid of a man who expects to have so much forgiven him hereafter. Styles change; customs, laws and theologies change. The old way of redeeming a man was to show how vile and sinful he was by nature; not only that, but how vile and sinful the whole human family were and always had been.

What teacher would ever think of reforming a boy or girl by continually holding up before their minds how naturally mean they were and all their forefathers had been. We charge many things to God which are only attributable to the natural order of the universe and to the laws governing human action.

We would believe in the arbitrary interference of Providence in affairs of men if the floods would heed the prayer, or the famine stay its hand by supplication, or the earthquake cease to swallow up whole communities, on the petition of its victims. But none of these things ever happen. Nature will have her way; the elements never listen to the voice of entreaty.

Age, antiquity, superstition and ignorance, make customs and practices purely human, of divine origin. Marriage is a contract, not a sacrament. It is a human institution—entered into without the interposition of Divinity. Love is a more holy communion than bread and wine. "The friendship of a noble woman is life's holiest perfume."

There is a physical and a moral cowardice. Physical cowardice sometimes prevents a man from injuring his neighbor, and also may prevent him from defending his own person. Moral cowardice deprives a person of the ability to uphold and advocate what is right and also disdains him from attacking what is wrong.

What a different world this would be, if every one was honest, if each person would speak the truth, utter his own convictions, give voice to all his better thoughts and not be bound down by prejudice, tradition, precedent, public opinion and the fear of losing occupation, social standing, political influence, and all those things that we imagine make up for life and happiness.

Public opinion tyrannizes, overwhelms, destroys as well as creates, improves and exalts. It reaps where there has been nothing sown, it gathers where there has been nothing sown. It forces men to stultify themselves, smother their own convictions, and leaves to some future historian to tell the true tale of the present.

While we, individually, should be deeply impressed with the past and study the omens and signs of the present, our faces are necessarily set towards the future. We do not have to look backward, because we have already gathered its lessons and instructions as we marched along.

Prophecy very soon becomes history. Emerson says, "Speak what you think now, and to-morrow speak what to-morrow thinks in hard words, though it contradicts everything you said to-day." No one knows the effect of his life or what bearing it will have on the future. A casual remark made, a single sentence uttered either in some moment of sadness or grief, or a time of exaltation and glory, becomes a motto for a state, a watchword for an army, an inspiration to martyrs and heroes of all age.

"They utter but a thought, And it becomes a proverb for a state; They write a sentence in a serious mood, It is a saying for a hemisphere."

All great men have their hours of illumination, moments of ecstasy, times of inspiration when the spirit of truth seems to take full and complete possession of the mind and soul. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." So it is with moments of inspiration. No one knows from whence they come or whether they go.

Genius never works by calculation, or pre-arrangement. It is always sudden, instantaneous, impromptu. Its visions of brightness come as the lightning's flashes, often leaving a legacy of darkness and gloom. Every day we hear individuals pass their opinions upon matters of which they are blindly ignorant; condemn persons and principles that they are unable to appreciate or understand.

How patent other people's peculiarities are to us, but how oblivious we are to our own. The great mass of mankind float with the tide. They form their opinions from what they see others do and what they hear others say. But the majority are more apt to be wrong than the minority, else no reformation would ever take place, no invention would ever be adopted, no new principle in science, politics or religion would ever get a hearing.

Some one has said, "There is not a single great truth that has influenced mankind but has passed through a process of contempt and injustice before it was established upon a firm and lasting foundation of popular favor; the invention or discovery that one generation despised is turned to profitable account by the next; the scientific creed that is persecuted in one age forms an undoubted and essential part of the faith of the succeeding age."

Every new thought strikes the world with wonder and amazement. Every great prophet that time has produced has been considered an enemy to the well established order. Whoever speaks the truth, writes the truth, or acts the truth, will always be unpopular, whether in the neighborhood, state or nation. A pleasing falsehood is more palatable to the public taste than an unpleasant fact. To a close observer, many things that pass current in life, look incongruous. Near inspection often reveals flaws in the most perfect theory, belief or practice.

If all the petitions that are offered up each Sabbath from the pulpits throughout the land were heeded, natural laws would be made inoperative. There would be no need of physicians or hospitals for the sick, because all would be divinely healed. There would be no use for poor-houses, or institutions of charity, for all would be divinely fed. Wars would cease, and sin and iniquity and evil of all kinds would be arbitrarily wiped out and civilization and progress would come to a standstill. Knowledge advances by gradations. Hero worship and idol worship had to precede the worship of the true God. Astrology comes before astronomy; alchemy before chemistry; mythology before theology; and oral tradition existed long before history was written. The purpose of a nation can be read in her myths. There is a basis of fact in every legend, a moral taught in every fable, and a germ of truth in every adage, proverb, and saying that has come down to us through the ages.

It is only the outward form of civilization that decays, the soul, the spirit of it lives. No nation ever dies, her people perish, her temples moulder and decay, her literature may be destroyed, but the spirit of her institutions remains.

"Greece dead? She reigns in every poem written, in every art pursued, in every beauty treasured, in every liberty won." The evolution of the world does not proceed by chance. Each chapter has been written by some Omnipotent hand. A moral purpose runs like a thread of gold through every scene, act and circumstance that has been created, enacted or displayed. No life has been lived in vain. No belief has prevailed without a cause. Not even a grain of sand was created without a purpose.

"For every atom is a living thought, Dropped from the meditation of a God."

N. S. A. Convention.

Report of Committee on Resolutions.

Your Committee begs to report as follows:

Resolved, That the President and Board of Trustees of the N. S. A. be requested to compile papers on the phenomena, science, philosophy and religion of Spiritualism, and in so far as possible have the same published in tract or pamphlet form for missionary distribution, or to be placed on sale.

Resolved, That the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism have the attention of the learned people of the earth, and are being scientifically accepted as based upon fact, we hereby declare that we are proud to proclaim rapid progress in bringing this great fact and the resultant philosophy unto the world's people.

Resolved, That Spiritualism teaches that there is a Spiritual World filled with Spiritual beings and Spiritual things, and that we, by growing or evolving, spiritually may so come in touch with the Spiritual World as to be able to comprehend it as a real world, with everything in it as real and tangible to its inhabitants as earth and earthly things are to us.

Resolved, That we affirm Spiritualism to be a religion that conserves every possible soul good for earth life as well as for spirit life.

Resolved, That we urge Spiritualist Societies to make the practical application of spirit consolation to all who may be in distress or bereaved, and that physical help shall be given to the poor and needy, and that we are physically cared for, we may be then more readily spiritually helped.

Resolved, That the needs of educating young men and women who desire to enter the ministry of Spiritualism being apparent, and the public cause requiring culture, we appreciate the self-sacrifice and devotion of the faculty and officers of the Morris Pratt Institute, and urge the sustenance and patronage of that institution in order that it shall become fully competent to furnish all necessary educational possibilities.

Resolved, That we are opposed to what is known as capital punishment as being a relic of barbarism, and not in harmony with the spirit of progress which unifies this age.

Resolved, That all wars at this stage of human progress are immoral as well as destructive to the welfare of society, and that all international disputes should be settled by Boards of Arbitration, thus ushering in the era of Universal peace on earth and good will to man.

We also deplore the cultivation of the spirit of war among the youth of the land by the formation of Boys' Brigades, Military Parades, and other methods which glorify war and tend to perpetuate its barbarities.

Resolved, That the spread of truth depends in a measure on the intelligence and ability of its advocates and it is of the highest importance to our Cause to induce all Spiritualists to become students of the spiritual philosophy and well versed in the science of today, be it.

Resolved, That we recommend the incoming Board of Trustees to appoint an Educational Committee of five representative Spiritualists whose duty it shall be to lay out courses of reading and study for the home and local Lyceums and Associations.

Resolved, That as taxation without representation is admittedly unjust and that the higher interests of home and state require the equal co-operation of man and woman, we favor the enfranchisement of all citizens without distinction of sex.

Resolved, That we deplore the spirit of commercialism that often exists in our local societies. In order to destroy commercialism of speakers and mediums, we urge local societies to develop a self-sustaining basis instead of by door fees only with sensational displays upon the platform.

Resolved, That we deplore the fact that some reputable mediums advertise in the manner of the fortune teller, and in connection with the average faith who profess to combine so many wonders of psychic power. We urge the mediums to use some other columns of the papers. (Adopted.)

Fiction Precedes History.

Keightley, in his "Mythology of Ancient Greece and Italy," says: "Mythology may be regarded as the depository of the early religion of the people. It stands at the head of their history, for the early history of every people, with whom it is of domestic origin, is mythic, its first personages and actions are chiefly imaginary. It is only gradually the mist clears away, and real men and deeds, similar to those of later times, begin to appear. The mythic period is frequently of long duration, the stream of history having to run a considerable way, before it can completely work off the marvelous and the incredible."

Now does not that learned author accurately relate the facts pertaining to what are known as the Hebrew Scriptures? The student of history there finds an account of creation, told with great particularity, as if the author had personal knowledge, which we now know was borrowed from the very crude mythology of Babylonia. It was an "imaginary" production, written thousands of years before there was any knowledge of astronomy or geology, and scarcely of geography or zoology. The sciences were all unknown. "Some moral or physical truth, habitually in the garb of fiction," says Keightley, "usually accompanies the traditional narrative, but it is so enveloped, and penetrated by fiction that it can rarely be ascertained with certainty." And yet clerical quacks insist these Bible "fictions" are the inspired Word of God, and to-day are flooding the world with them, attempting to pass them on the uncultured as of divine origin.

All Will Rejoice.

As an unfailing index to the religious progress of the age now comes information that the Methodists of both the North and South, through the action of a joint committee, have revised their hymnal, and eliminated from the old collection all hymns relating to total depravity, and those which debase mankind, calling him a "vile worm of the dust, a child of iniquity, heir of perdition," etc.

The preachers who used to introduce their funeral discourses by singing for the delectation of mourners, whose dead were not church members—will hereafter have to draw on his memory and repeat his hymns line by line for the benefit of the choir. Watts' well known hymn will no longer be in frequent demand:

"Behold the aged sinner goes Laden with guilt and heavy woes, Down to the regions of the dead, With endless curses on his head,"

"Far in the deep where darkness dwells, There, in a land of deep despair, Justice has built an endless hell And laid her stores of vengeance there."

"Eternal plagues and heavy chains, Tormenting racks and fiery coals, And darts to inflict immortal pains, Dipt in the blood of damned souls."

In place of such lurid pictures of only half a century ago, others have been substituted among which is that Unitarian hymn—

"Nearer, My God, to Thee."

When such advances are noted of Methodists there is no sense in denying the churches are on the ascending grade. Let them come. All will give them the glad hand.

Recollections of Col. Ingersoll.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Colonel Ingersoll was a brave, able and eloquent fighter for freedom and truth. He was a strong, dominant and unique personality, and for more than a quarter of a century he was before the public a conspicuous and picturesque figure as a lawyer of brilliant powers and as a politician and powerful anti-Christian platform speaker.

As a wit, phrase-maker, word-painter, prose-poet and popular orator, and as an aggressive assailant of superstition, a representative of iconoclastic free thought, Ingersoll was never surpassed, if equaled. His originality was not in his ideas or arguments, but in his phraseology, which made commonplace thought appear striking and old conceptions, arguments and objections to look as if they were new. The views he expressed he stamped with his peculiar and positive individuality, which gave to them an Ingersollian aspect, showing that he had made them a part of his own intellectual breath and blood.

Ingersoll's mind was critical and destructive, and he demolished creeds in Voltairean style. He was more direct and epigrammatic than Paine, whose writings he so greatly admired.

He was the orator of the masses, and for them a conductor of ideas. People are generally moved through their emotions, and the man who is himself emotional and at the same time is a wit and an orator, as Ingersoll was, will ever have a direct influence on the masses which it is not possible for thinkers like John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer to exert. His thought did not have to percolate down through several intellectual strata before it could reach the people, even in a modified form.

Ingersoll was the eloquent platform orator of popular protest against partially outgrown religious beliefs, and the herald to the crowd of deep-rooted dissatisfaction with the written creeds of the churches. His lectures abounded in witticisms and homely but graphic illustrations and anecdotes. He arose ever and anon into genuine eloquence and sometimes was under the influence of a lyrical enthusiasm which entranced his audiences.

He loved nature and spoke of things. He thought in images and talked in word-pictures. He despised metaphysics. He kept always within the comprehension of the multitude and magnetized, as it were, with the ideas of mental freedom thousands who had neither the time nor the inclination to investigate for themselves any subject.

An oratorical idol of the multitude must be an indiscriminate assailant of what he opposes. He cannot have the judicial spirit or much sense of historic perspective. As an advocate Ingersoll was essentially ex-parte; as critic of the Bible he was of the class of Paine. One of his mistakes was in not considering sufficiently, in not realizing, perhaps, the advances made by those whose views he assailed. The dogmas may be in the written creeds, but they are not in the minds of the people. He would have done better work if he had assimilated evolution and applied it to the subject of religion. With a more sympathetic view of the past and with a more reconciliative and reconstructive spirit he would have appealed more successfully to thinkers, though he would not have interested so large a class. But he did his work in his own way, and for that work I feel grateful.

I first heard Colonel Ingersoll in the Cooper Institute, New York, during the Presidential campaign of 1868. The other speakers were Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, Chauncey M. Depew and Judge Van Wyck. Ingersoll spoke last, and when he began the audience was tired and hundreds rose to leave. The unknown orator's voice soon had the effect to make them return to their seats, or to remain standing, while the entire audience was held spellbound for half an hour or more by the orator's surprising powers of speech. What I most distinctly remember of the speech are some of the amusing comparisons and an apostrophe to Liberty, which led me to remark to a friend who was with me that the speaker must be a freethinker.

At that time I had not heard of Ingersoll, although he had served as Attorney General of Illinois and was somewhat known in that state as a political speaker. It was also known to his friends and associates, and to some extent to the people of his locality, that he was an "infidel." It was his refusal to give a pledge that he would keep religious discussions out of the campaign that prevented his nomination for governor by the Republican state convention held at Peoria in 1868.

These facts I did not learn until two years later. In 1870 I received a letter from Colonel Ingersoll saying that he wanted I should give a lecture or two in Peoria. Under arrangements made by him, aided by others, I gave several lectures at different times in Peoria, and at those times met in his own home the man who was to become the most renowned and popular free thought orator of his time.

I was impressed with Ingersoll's wonderful wit, pathos, sarcasm and Words of Encouragement and Wise Advice.

To the Editor:—It gives me pleasure to inform the readers of your valuable paper that the National Spiritualists Association starts out on its new year of effort and work for the cause of Spiritualism with good prospects and much encouragement. The recent convention held in Minneapolis has given new impetus to many of our people in different parts of the far West, to labor with greater zeal and to feel that Spiritualism and its organizations are worthy of every good thought and endeavor we can bring to them.

The action taken by this association at the convention in discountenancing anything that is fraudulent in mediumship, and in protecting the public from the frauds of the N. S. A., is well appreciated by all. Our pleasure is to notify the world officially that the Spiritual press was highly recognized at the convention for its valuable labors in the spiritual cause and for its grand assistance to the N. S. A., and a unanimous vote of thanks was passed to the editors and encouragement given to this organization.

It is still more important that we all keep our eyes to the front and maintain a dignified attitude towards our cause and the world; Spiritualism is worthy of the highest respect and its workers must show by their bearing that they not only love and respect their cause but that they also demand the same respect for their Spiritualism as the Christian world asks for its deification.

The attention of all mediums, speakers and societies is called to the effort made in different states to place or maintain such a high license on the practice of mediumship as to either greatly handicap our mediums in their work or to prevent them entirely from pursuing the calling bestowed upon them by the all-wise and just God.

It is requested that they can in resisting any further legislation on this matter in their respective localities, or in seeking to have such obnoxious and repressive laws repealed. "Commercial Mediumship" is one thing, but the effort to prevent honest and spiritual mediums from receiving a justly earned fee for their time and service for humanity is as gross as would be an effort to prevent a minister of the Gospel from receiving his salary for time and labor spent in the service of his church.

Our love and good will are extended to all mankind and especially to the toilers in our ranks—of the press, the platform or in more private ways; we are bound to them all by cords stronger than steel and finer than those of a silken web; the cords of a common purpose and of fraternity.

power of illustration by anecdote or figure of speech in common conversation. He only needed to be interested in the subject to be deeply interesting to all listeners. He talked in a way to hold the attention of everybody. He expressed emotion as well as thought. He talked of things and events, and avoided because he had no capacity or taste for abstractions. Paine, Voltaire, Buckle and Victor Hugo were mentioned by him more often perhaps than any other authors.

Evolution, as a theory, had not yet affected Ingersoll much. He could not accept Darwinism, he told me, because of the objection of the "missing links." He was occupied with the duties of his profession and the wonder is that he could make as much progress as he did outside of his vocation. He was fond of poetry, art and music. He was full of sympathy for the unfortunate. His devotion to his family was most marked, and Mrs. Ingersoll from the first impressed me as a very womanly woman, entirely worthy of such a husband. The daughters, then young children, were natural and interesting, and their father often turned to them and asked what they thought of a subject. All this was delightful in the Ingersoll home.

In later years I met Ingersoll both East and West, but not under circumstances which admitted of such full and free conversations as those of the '70s.

The lecture which brought Colonel Ingersoll before the general public as an eloquent champion of free thought is the one on Thomas Paine, which was delivered at the Paine celebration in Fairbury, Ill., January 30, 1871. I was present as one of the speakers, and gave my impressions of Ingersoll's effort in a letter to the Boston Investigator, as follows:

"Colonel Ingersoll, of Peoria, Ill., one of the most eloquent and popular orators of the West, delivered the finest address on Paine that I have ever heard. His oration was a carefully written production, replete with good sense and sparkling with brilliant thoughts, evincing thorough acquaintance with Paine's career and just appreciation of his character and services. The audience listened to Colonel Ingersoll with the closest attention, and the burst of applause which greeted his most radical utterances attested the satisfaction with which he was heard."

In a letter printed in the Boston Investigator dated May 28, 1872, I wrote:

"I spent a day recently at Peoria with Colonel Ingersoll and his family. I found him in excellent health and not in the least disturbed by the harangues from the pulpits or the replies which his oration on 'The Gods' has kept calling out from frightened theologians. He laughs good-naturedly over their impotent rage. * * * The fact is, Colonel Ingersoll is equal intellectually to about one hundred such men as are trying to answer him, if they could all be united into one, and if they will hold a convention or by some other means condense the combined result of all their reasonings and investigations into a pamphlet about the size of his oration, they will be entitled to his notice."

"Colonel Ingersoll, though full of business, finds time to give considerable attention to scientific and literary subjects. He is one of the most sociable of men and his house is always open to his friends. The Peorians are very proud of him and he is generally regarded by those who know him as the 'biggest man in the West.' Were he ambitious for office, he could have almost any position in the gift of the people of the state. But he would rather have a seat in his library than in Congress; he would rather give orations on 'Paine,' 'The Gods,' and 'Humboldt' than make political speeches, and he prefers to chat with his wife and play with his children and entertain friends rather than spend his time in caucuses and conventions or in wrangling about party politics."

This was written a third of a century ago, at the beginning of Ingersoll's career as a free thought advocate. Afterward he did effective service for the Republican party, and his appointment as Minister to Germany, which would have been acceptable to him, was intended, but religious influence was brought to bear against it, and was too strong to be disregarded. For political reasons Blaine, whom Ingersoll had brought before the country as the "plumed knight," it is said, used his influence against the appointment. But Ingersoll was large enough to remain silent in regard to ingratitude. It was the penalty of his independence. He preserved his self-respect, for which we admire him the more.

Ingersoll's personal virtues were of a sterling quality. He had so much natural goodness and joyousness that, dominated by his natural disposition, he lived a happy life and added to the happiness of those with whom he came in contact. He lived his own life. He helped the free world from superstition.

He certainly possessed many strong and noble qualities, and for these he will long be remembered. His orations and writings contain much elevated thought and abound in passages of remarkable rhetorical beauty which deserve a permanent place in American literature.

A SPIRIT PLAYMATE.

An Instance Related by Mattie McCaslin

The account given in the issue of October 21, of The Progressive Thinker about little Willis Miller and his spirit playmate, suggests to my memory similar experiences of my own little nephew. When about four years old he had a sweet little girl playmate who was stricken with diphtheria.

During her illness he fretted for her companionship, but finally comforted and amused himself trying to make a boat for Flossie.

His mother saw him fashioning it from a shingle with a dull knife he was allowed to play with, and then drive nails into it for masts. He at last came proudly to her carrying the little boat to which he had affixed a black sail.

A chill struck the mother's heart as she noticed the bit of black muslin. She said nothing, but the sensitive child caught her expression. His big blue eyes filled with tears and he faltered: "I couldn't find a white rag."

Then abandoning himself to grief, he sobbed himself to sleep in her lap. Next day little Flossie died, and they took her body to the old family burying ground in the country.

Robbie was told that Flossie had gone to her grandma's, where she had often prattled of going, to him. Then came days of weary waiting for her return; he grew pale and refused his food. But at last he came bounding from the play room, his eyes sparkling and his cheeks aflame.

"Mamma, mamma!" he called, "come quick, quick! Flossie has come back!" Catching her dress he pulled her to the play room.

"See there," he cried, trippingly, "Don't you see her in her pretty white dress? She nods and smiles to you—why, can't you see her?" he asked impatiently, as his mother shook her head.

From that day on, Robbie often had Flossie for a playmate. He would chatter away to her, answering and asking questions, acting exactly as though a living child were present; but if his mother or anyone came within sight, he would say reproachfully, "There, you scared Flossie away."

One day he ran up stairs to his mother's room, saying: "Mamma, Dr. Braun is in the parlor." She hurried down but saw no one. "Why, Robbie!" she said, turning indignantly to the child, "Why did you say he was here?" "Because he was here," declared Robbie. "He stood right there by the piano and I ran right off to tell you."

That evening she met the doctor at an entertainment. He came joyfully forward, grasped her hand and exclaimed: "I'm so glad to see you. I wanted to consult you so much regarding—" and he indicated a matter of mutual interest. "I tried hard to get up to see you this afternoon, but—"

"Did you not come?" she asked breathlessly.

"No, I could not get the time."

"What did you try the hardest to reach me, Doctor? Give me the exact hour and minute if you can."

The doctor promptly named the exact time that little Robbie had seen him. She then explained about the child's peculiar experience and his association with the invisible Flossie.

The doctor declared it was an indication of brain fever, and should by all means receive prompt treatment. He advised a complete change of surroundings, and association with other children.

This was done by means of an extended visit and a kindergarten school. Gradually red-cheeked earth children crowded out the little spirit playmate, and she ceased her visits, remaining to him only as a sweet child memory.

I have been sojourning in the country for some time and find the cause of Spiritualism by no means neglected by the people here, who live closer to nature than in cities. Seances are often held at farm houses with the best of results.

Several country people I have interviewed have prophetic dreams and visions that come true exactly as represented in some cases and in others are of an allegorical character. The symbols reproducing themselves in physical experiences. The poem I contribute was, as you see, suggested by Lincoln's favorite.

MATTIE MCCASLIN, St. Louis, Mo.

Why Should Not the Spirit of Mortal Be Proud?

Why should not the spirit of mortal be proud?

No longer the grave with the bier and the shroud,

Can hide the grand truth that our loved ones never died,

But live in the glory of heaven-born pride.

Not pride in the conquest of battle or wealth,

Or triumphs that rob life of beauty and health;

But pride in our part of the infinite plan

That glorifies life from the atom to man.

The forests may fade from our physical sight

But next year their fair foliage renews still more bright,

On the young, on the old, on the low and the high,

"Resurgam" is written—"I never shall die."

"The infant a mother attended and loved,

The mother that infant's affection who proved,

The husband that infant and mother who blest"

Unite in the new life of labor and rest.

The maid on whose cheek, on whose brow, in whose eye

Shone beauty of spirit that never will die;

While memories of arrogance, slander, self-praise,

Time's soft tender fingers will kindly erase.

The king and the peasant, the priest and the sage,

The rich man, the beggar, from age unto age,

Are only the parts of an infinite whole

Where justice deals out what belongs to each soul.

The wise and the foolish, the guilty and just,

The saint and the sinner—not "dust unto dust."

Will answer the questions or close the career

Of each in his part in hereafter or here.

The multitude comes and the multitude goes.

Its struggles and triumphs, its joys and its woes

Are treasured in laws of an infinite love

Whose sweet benedictions descend like a dove.

Far greater are we than our fathers could claim,

And greater our children and higher their aim;

For life upon earth must go forward, not back,

"March on," says Progression, who follows our track.

And greater and grander just out of our sight,

Is the fair land of promise whose exquisite light

Shines forth in its splendor to banish each cloud,

Then why should not the spirit of mortal be proud?

M

AN HONORABLE PEACE.

A Discourse Given Through the Lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, September 24, 1905.

"Blessed are the peace makers, for they shall be called the children of God."

"I came not to bring peace, but the sword." This is an epoch-making cycle. We are in the midst of culminations, culminations of things; in storms, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and great disturbances in mechanical forces; railway accidents, as they are called; the failure of memory among those appointed to important places; in positions temporarily filled by those unqualified to fill them, taking the place of skilled labor, because there is no recognition of the unions, the labor unions.

There are always causes, temporarily, for physical disasters as there are underlying (or spiritual causes) for the disturbances of the atmosphere of the earth. In the mental world, in human nature, there are causes for the physical results, and no doubt those deeper, underlying causes have preceded these material culminations.

Japan and Russia.

The greatest epoch-making event of the last many months must of course be considered the war in the Orient, between Japan and Russia, a war involving millions of money and thousands, we may say hundreds of thousands of lives.

Russia caused the war. We have from time to time foretold Russia's intention of gaining an outlet and inlet to the commerce of the Orient, and this war was the culmination of that intention and, therefore, she was the aggressor. Besides, Russia's internal policy was a policy of aggression. Imperialism owns no opposition, admits no disputes. Siberia is the fruitage of imperialism. The whole line of Russia's history is strewn with the victims who have attempted to advocate something besides imperialism.

Japan is the offspring of the new Orient; is the precursor of the New Day in the Orient. Japan has steadily adopted the newest methods. Japan understood the necessity of unity, concentration and persistence. There was no dissatisfied Japan behind the Japanese army; they were united.

We said eighteen months ago, and one year ago, that the great opportunity of the ages was for one nation or person who could see the solution of the Oriental war, who could arbitrate impartially, and we mentioned the President of the United States in connection with that solution, and said it was the opportunity of his life and of the ages. The naming of the Commissioners to arrange the terms of peace was undoubtedly due to the opportune intervention of the President of the United States. If it is a real peace, it is the greatest event in history, that in the midst of such a conflict, when although the Russians were conquered they did not admit defeat an armistice could be called, commissioners could be appointed and terms of peace arranged. Then the most singular part of the spectacle is, that within a few weeks, almost in a few days, from being a conquering nation Japan was nominally before the world as a defeated nation, and from being a conquered nation Russia was placed before the world as a conquering nation. If this is "diplomacy," we want it not. If it is the influence of the power behind all thrones and countries, the money power of the world, we want none of it. The "feelings" of Russia should not be hurt. They should not be humiliated before the world. They should not be made to pay any war indemnity! Since when in the history of national warfare has it been considered a greater humiliation than defeat to pay an indemnity? But it is an "honorable" peace for Russia.

The Republic of Russia.

Do you know what is behind it? THE REPUBLIC OF RUSSIA. Mark our words. Monsieur Witte has in mind the Republic of Russia. He knows the trend of affairs; he knows which way the tide is setting. There was no other excuse for the kind of peace that was arranged for, meaning an Independent Republic for Russia, and the Japanese peace.

Japan's greatest victory in all the arrangements and diplomacy is the attitude of the Japanese. A nation that was willing to waive financial consideration for the greater question of peace is the conqueror of all time. And Japan has won it; and Japan will day by day know it. There is a greater triumph for Japan than a war indemnity. She knows that the imperial power of Russia is henceforth curtailed and will soon be cut off; that the New Russia will rise from Siberia; not from the peasantry, but from the great intellectual class that has been waiting for a voice in the government, and has received small concessions during the progress of the war.

This is why Japan to-day blossoms out as the Lily of the Orient, more than if her flag was waving in Moscow; more than if all the soldiers of Russia had been slain. For Japan heard in the signs that were given during that conference of peace the great voice that cometh forth from the North; heard the crackling of the purifying fires that will purify the palaces and the titled aristocrats of their sins, heard the deep under-current of popular feeling and intelligence that will ultimately overthrow the greatest imperialism that ever existed.

Japan Above Fear and Above Pity.

Japan bides her time, with the Chinese railway, with no more encroachments on the border line, with China intact, with her spirit already in contact with the great Orient, that beside her is shoulder to shoulder moving forward. Do not have any pity for Japan. She is above fear, she has conquered through war and peace, and, therefore above pity.

It is a mistake to suppose that there is any dissatisfaction in Japan over the terms of peace. The disturbances that occurred, simultaneously almost with the termination of the peace arrangements, were wholly local. Because the Mikado knew, his counselors knew, and all the men of affairs knew, and the terms of peace were accepted. They understand the step forward that Russia is to take, and that Japan is taking. These are great events. Of course the Russian bonds have had something to do with this external arrangement. But there come periods of time when the monetary power does not govern the world. When a nation is ready for the great rebirth, all the Dives in hades cannot keep it back.

Mr. Lincoln said in a confidential letter to a dear friend, a United States senator during the war: "I have had more trouble with Wall Street than with the entire rebel army." That is always true. That is true in this instance; but Wall Street does not govern the uprising spirit of the new Russia. And Wall Street, and the Stock Exchange of London, and all the money centers in the world cannot govern the new spirit of the new Japan that is coming forth to blossom in the East. But there will be other struggles. The Prince of Peace said he came not to bring peace but the sword. We know there are terms of peace, as it is called, that are worse than war. We know that until justice forms the basis of every government on earth, there will be no permanent peace.

You cannot have a Court of International Arbitration unless it is made of angels, because every human court of arbitration would be measurably governed by the great financial propositions of the world. But the time is coming when there will be a court of International Arbitration; there will come a time when propositions for peace will be accepted. After the War of the Rebellion there was such a settlement at the Hague. When the Japanese had really conquered, even the Russians admitting it, there was a possibility of peace arrangements. Usually the calm comes after the storm, after the purifying fires. The lightning flashes, and the thunder that rolls along the sky are precursors of storm and not of peace. When the atmosphere is purified the peace comes.

If you will begin a nation in fraternal love, refusing any injustice to the original, or aboriginal inhabitants, refusing any encroachments upon their rights, refuse any act that can prevent their admission into brotherhood or fellowship with you and make equal and perfect human justice and right, based on that government, such a nation will never be overthrown by war. But at the present time there is no such nation on the Earth. Not even this boasted "land of freedom," this boasted Republic of the United States of America. You have the whole of the Indian massacres behind you; you have slavery as the background for your great civil war; you have lately the acquisition of territory, by war, in the far Orient. Then you ask for peace. But not until the nation is purged.

Great Financial Oppression.

You have now the greatest financial oppression that the world has ever known. You need it or you would not have it. You have entered into these steps of aggression or they would not come. The man who into these steps of aggression or they would not come. The man who will not follow his convictions for fear of the morrow does not deserve what the convictions might bring. Fear is the greatest oppressor of the human race. The Japanese were absolutely fearless, for they did not fear anything in this world nor the world to come.

Now that all this has come to you, and that this accomplishment stands before the world, let it not simply resolve itself into a political matter for the sake of another presidential term. But let it be allowed to stand out in all its beauty and wonderful accomplishment, as the next step toward the ideal. The great rehabilitation of the earth with the message of peace, educationally.

There are some people who want Russia to be thoroughly conquered. There are people who do not think they had quite enough of a whipping. Perhaps they belong to the birch rod class, who think because they were punished with the birch rod when boys, that the present generation ought to be. There is a strong argument in the birch rod; it appeals to a very large class of people. But if we are going to measure swords; if all our preparations for war are to continue; if the monsters of the deep and the monsters of the upper air are going to be called into existence for the sake of international wars, there will come a time, and it is not far distant, when no nation can afford to go to war, because it will mean annihilation. A successful airship of war sailing over cities, towns and fortifications could do more damage in five minutes than all the old line, laboring, battle ships ever accomplished in the world. And submarine monsters, that resemble nothing so much as the octopus, can do more harm to torpedo boats and torpedo boat destroyers now than was ever dreamed of in the world of maritime battles before. Man is becoming dangerous to himself, he is laying the foundation of absolute annihilation if he pursues the same policy in the future that he has in the past. Why, the experiments for protection are becoming dangerous. Torpedo boats and torpedo boat destroyers are often a destructive source of experiment. The explosions in the manufactories of deadly munitions of war are killing many.

The Culmination to Come.

No, you have not reached the culmination; the culmination will come when the intelligent people of every nation will know that the manufacture and the storing of weapons, implements and munitions of material warfare is greater danger than war itself to the spirit of peace, progress and fraternal love.

There are many more people on the earth to-day who accept the Great Commandment than ever before. There was a time when if anyone talked peace he was supposed to be a coward. There was a time when a man and his retainers made war upon the surrounding country, and went back to his castle in security with what he had gained. Marauding was honorable; highway robbery was a legitimate occupation. The seas were full, not only with the fabled Vikings, but those who swept over every sea to plunder every craft sailing the high seas. Depredations were common in daily life, and no man nor woman was safe excepting behind the strongest barred gates, and with the castle towers closed to the world.

Our battlements are far other than those! There are few places where women and children in this country cannot walk with safety, even after nightfall. And the great majority of human beings pass to and fro over the earth unmolested. All the highway robbers there are now are securely entrenched behind the battlements of legal verbiage, and there are only a few keen robbers, trained robbers who molest you on the plains or in the wilderness, those who hold you up without the process of law. Of course if you consent to the first you are a part of the plan, and until you adjudicate on public utilities being owned by the public you will have that kind of highway robbery to contend with. It rests in your hands, in your ballots. You are experiencing it every day. You know what it means to your great cost. Events are rushing you forward to the final decision. Will you follow in the wake of all past republics and go down under dictatorship into the mire, or will all these thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of people who know the way, who understand the light, who have the principle within—have the courage of their convictions and right it at the ballot box?

We know the end is not yet; that the great dawn of peace is not yet read to appear. Forth from the ark of human safety a dove has gone many times and returned without the olive branch. This great symbol, this allegory appeals to you to-day. Forth again and again fly the men, the doves, the messengers, but not until many days will they return bringing the true olive branch of peace, the real, perfect and divine peace. For one dove sees injustice; another dove sees inequalities; another dove sees the hand of labor fettered and fastened; another dove sees all the while this great human selfishness, this wonderful monster of the earth striving between the world and the people. But at last there will come a time when there will be an "Honorable Peace." When no nation shall hold its position or place because of any injustice by land or sea; when war shall not be the beginning and middle and ending of all nations; when there will be a nation valiant, full of energy, of divine and perfect life; working with hands and brains and hearts to the fulfillment of the perfect life of earth, a nation that will be ready for peace. It will come with the nations of the earth when the Orient shall yield its best; when Europe shall yield her best; when the new Asia and the new Africa shall be born, and when out of this western continent there shall come the flower of the finest minds, the loftiest hearts, the most perfect spiritual lives.

Spirit is first, then the body. You cannot have a perfect form until your spirit perfectly animates and pervades it. You cannot have perfect health until you have perfect conquest over mere desires and appetites. You cannot have a perfect mind until the mechanism of the brain is trained to obedience to the superior power of the spirit. So there will be no external form of government perfect on this planet until the spirit of man shall rule his mind, his desires, his appetites and conquer the brutal selfishness that makes him wish to be master of the physical world at any price.

All hail to those promised day when Justice and Wisdom and Love shall rule! When selfish striving and war shall cease, and man, taught in the higher school of God and spirit shall make way for the Primal Truth and its perfect sway.

TESTING MEDIUMS AT SEATTLE, WASH.

Will C. Hodge, who is lecturing there, writes: "The Spiritualists certainly have a most excellent society here, and I have never met a better class of people than are the Seattle Spiritualists. The fakir finds mighty poor sledding here, and the phenomenal medium who asks for endorsement must present an exhibition of his wares under strict test conditions. It is needless to say that but very few come to the scratch."

PHILOSOPHY OF OPTIMISM.

Some Thoughtful Words in Reference to Success.

A man said to me yesterday [as set forth in "To-Morrow"] "What is the sense of a philosophy, teaching to look on the bright side of a thing that has no bright side?" This state of a thing, is a pure assumption, for no trouble or disaster, but what at least an instructive lesson in it for some one. It is only the hopeful mind that achieves, and the courageous heart that overcomes obstacles. A pessimist seldom wins, and an optimist seldom loses.

You will observe that it is the man who has faith in himself and is self-reliant, who rises to the top; but the man who is timid and afraid of his own shadow, seldom fails to sink to the bottom, and is a dismal failure. The unconquerable spirit in Grant enabled him to say, "I will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer." "Thought is a psychic force that acts as a motor on the Nervous Organism." The degree of nervous activity depends upon the dynamic force of the mind; or to use plainer language, that as we think we become, and as we act one moment, we are disposed to act ensuing moments. Our thoughts seek the line of least resistance. Our thoughts and emotions act upon and through the nerves, and cut a path for similar, recurring thoughts and emotions.

The more we think the same thoughts, and feel the same passions and emotions, the deeper and better defined is the path in the nerves, through which the psychic or mind force flows.

Our habits, dispositions, and character are brought about by these channels or paths cut more or less deeply in our nervous organism. So if our uncontrolled environments bring us gloomy, despondent, thoughts, we are liable to grow pessimistic fault finders, grow weary dependents. From the darkest side of doubt and pessimism, come forth powers, degenerates, and suicides; leading to great mental suffering and physical wretchedness; and unless this is tempered with great timidity, tend to bring misery to others, by injustice, tyranny, vice and crime. The remedy for such pernicious nerve channels is cultivation of sweeter and more hopeful thoughts, nobler emotions, and higher ideals. It is by far safer to determine to cultivate joy and hope in our hearts, discerning beauty, cheer, grace and glory in the world—in the trees, flowers, grasses, birds, animals, people; and in all that is about us—and out of our gloom, viciousness and misery of existence. We can shape our thoughts as we like if we only desire and resolve to, and persistently keep at it day in and day out. We can make friends of all the world, and mold things to our wishes. Why should we think failure, when we can determine our own success. The successful person takes plenty of time for thought. He is patient and poised, and carefully looks the ground over, for weak and strong points, and adjusts himself to needed conditions. L. W. BILLINGLEY, Lincoln, Neb.

Review of Passing Events.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE, EDITOR-AT-LARGE, N. S. A.

Interesting to Flesh Eaters.

An item which has been widely circulated through the press should receive attention from those who patronize the city markets: "It has been decided that the meat of animals used for obtaining vaccine is not made unfit for food. The carcasses of many calves that have been vaccinated are sold in the London market, and their use as food effects a saving of many thousands of dollars annually."

Who has decided? The "scientists" and physicians who are engaged in the business of supplying "pure lymph" to the people afflicted by the small-pox goblin. How are these animals treated to obtain this material for vaccination? It used to be gathered from ulcers on the udder of cows that had been infected by unclean and diseased milkers, or the scars from the diseased feet of a horse, or it was taken from the pustule of the arm of a human subject.

Now, however, the production has become a great industry. One of the largest establishments keeps constantly from 100 to 150 young cows or heifers, in an immense stable where every detail of the process may be observed. The animal is first subjected to a dose of toxin, injected into its blood, to test it for tuberculosis. After recovery it is subject to the toxin of tetanus. After proving immune, it received the small-pox virus. After the raging fever, the udder develops a crop of pustules—ulcers—and when these are "ripe," the well-known "points" are dipped in the pus, or it is prepared with antiseptics and stored in hermetically sealed tubes. Although these are sold to the doctors at discount, the profit from a single sick cow is very large, especially if the small-pox scare can be worked on successful communities. It is to be inferred that since the establishment of these "laboratories" small-pox is constantly menacing some town or city, that this scheme of forcing diseases of cows, by letting loose the disease, is worked to limit.

What becomes of the tortured animals? They have been well fed, and after a few days in pasture are turned over to the market, and "eminent physicians" testify that the flesh is healthy food, and by so doing "save thousands of dollars," otherwise lost by keeping the animals a year or more in the laboratory. Do you think that the introduction of putrescent blood into the veins will purify? Do you think that this flesh which has been poisoned in every fibre, is pure, clean and wholesome food? Can you imagine how greed can reach a lower depth?

And this brings us to the consideration of the broader question of humane attention to the animal world to which by strongest ties we are allied. "But," you will say, "What has Spiritualism to do with this movement which has its own societies and prominent exponents?"

It has to do, because it is the religion of love, charity, sympathy, duty, to all, the lowest as well as highest; because it is doing of the things to be done and not of faith. Little sympathy for animal suffering is found in the Christian churches. When appeals have been made by the Humane Societies to the clergy once in a while apply the good teaching of the teaching of gentleness and kindness to the patient animals who are servants, and at last yield their lives, there was scarcely a response. Some of the most eminent divines returned the invitation with the startling answer written beneath—"Rats!"

The American Humane Association vainly attempted to have some lesson in kindness to animals introduced into the Sunday-school lesson leaves. The veteran worker in this cause, J. C. Mack, says: "Where, indeed, is a religious body whose aims are purely the fostering of humanitarianism and the spread of unfettered and unmodified truth? Where is the modern religion whose moral teaching can be summed up in the few words: 'Never be mean, never be false, never be cruel?' This is certainly not the teachings of churches yet, for as a matter of fact, in the so-called civilized countries of the world, every form of meanness, falsity and cruelty has official tolerance and often the support of the churches. If there were less said about faith, dogmas, and creeds, as methods of salvation, and more upon the simple and all too rare virtues of heartfelt kindness and sympathy, then, as Cowper says, 'Pity would be the friend of all friendless animals, and Justice would stand between every suffering creature and woe, and teach a tyrant mercy for his brute.'"

"We come to the time, instead of the culture of the church barbarism, dogmas and creeds, we have religious beliefs that teach truth, mercy and humanity."

Mr. Mack has been too confined in his investigations, for had he become acquainted with the teachings of Spiritualism, he would have cried aloud in exultation: "Bravo! I have found it!" Spiritualism is this sought-for religion which is a sublimation of philosophy: It has infinite charity and sympathy, based on the knowledge that from the lowest organism of the slime to the arch angel receiving the light of to us, infinite intelligence, there is unbroken succession, and the same law of love necessitating gentleness, and appreciation of duties and rights, reaches from the first to the last link of this chain of being.

"Never be mean, never be false, never be cruel!" This is a mandate of Spiritualism, and furthermore it commands: "Be true, be fearless in doing what is right to be done; hold to ideal existence and righteousness of spirit conduct."

A Comparison. Compare this belief with the teachings of a great religious-scientific school, as the University of Chicago. Recently I mentioned the great gift, and the inhuman uses to which it was in part applied. "Are you not too severe on these men who are in pursuit of sciences?" writes a valued friend. "I cannot believe animals are thus tortured!" My answer is the announcement made by President Harper: "We have not thought it wise to place any restrictions upon experimentation involving prolonged or severe pain." [See Animals' Rights, H. S. Salt, page 157.]

After this declaration it is not surprising that the following rows item should appear: "Chicago, Oct. 11.—Eight women students have entered a large male class in vivisection which will be taught this quarter in the University of Chicago."

They will experiment on dogs for which they pay 50 cents each; cats for which they pay 25 cents, as one of the instructors said: "on anything else they can get hold of." The class is an unusually large one and is obliged to go to the laboratory in two sections. Think of it! Is it not appalling to think of a young woman, with a helpless animal bound on the dissecting table, cutting through its quivering nerves? Would such a woman be recommended for a companion? Will such a woman, whose feelings have been destroyed by cruelty, feel the sympathy for the suffering, which is essential to a successful physician? Will anyone, knowing her history, confide a sick child to her care? Will not this egoistic devotion to science lead to experimentation on a child as well as an animal?

Accompanying the above item was another of a famous female physician—I will not say woman, for I do not wish to disgrace that word—who was famous for notoriety, and innate cruelty, featured the ureters of a score or more guinea pigs and rabbits. With some she performed this operation on one, on others on both ureters. They all died, some living for forty days or more. She reports that they drooped around, hid away in their cages, and manifested every symptom of distress and mortal sickness. Why should they not? The stoppage of the ureters in human beings produces unbearable pain. It is the same in animals, and death is sure to follow. This was well known before, yet this female Torquemada, in the name of science, instead of religion, proceeded to torture these helpless animals. The great scientific fact she discovered was that however carefully she performed the operation, pigs and rabbits died! Yet there is not in any medical journal one word of censure!

If this university were alone in its cruelty! Every university and college must follow its lead, and the students are taking the places of dead human subjects, to illustrate the various surgical operations, it being advocated that more practical experience can thus be gained. The learned professors seem to forget that the anatomy of animals differs so widely from that of man, that knowledge of their structure, applied to him, leads astray and is worse than useless. This is the testimony of the eminent English surgeon, Lawson Tait, and of all others who have studied the subject unprejudiced.

I do not think an apology is required for introducing this matter as related to Spiritualism. We believe in a system which has to deal with the affairs of this life as well as the next. We are living to live, not living to die. Hence, if, or can be, here and now, and it is our duty to make it for to-day, and not put it off until death. As Spiritualists we should be loving, kind, just, merciful, charitable, dutiful to all, from the least to the greatest, because we cannot be mean and cruel to even a dog, and not have it reflected on our character as intensely as though these unrighteous qualities were practiced on an angel.

Spiritualism is wrongly understood if it is supposed to stand for passively singing Beulah Land and the Sweet Bye-and-Bye. It is a cause militant against to whatever makes for the betterment of mankind, for knowledge, for morality, for spiritual excellence.

Straws Showing the Trend of Public Opinion. Spiritualists are not accustomed to being praised by the secular press, but the tide has turned, and some of the most influential journals now treat the subject with respect and consideration. If the action of the National Association regarding fraud, requires vindication, the following from the Port Huron Times is a valuable pointer, showing the direction of changing public sentiment:

"Spiritualism as a cult, or as a system of psychic philosophy based upon alleged facts demonstrating the continuity of life, may gain much from the action of the National Association of Spiritualists now in session at Minneapolis, Minn., in seeking to discredit fraudulent mediums. While believers in spiritual phenomena may be found among people of all classes and all religious affiliations, most of them are somewhat uncertain upon many points; while the large body of absolute unbelievers cite the operations of fraudulent mediums as discrediting all psychic phenomena. However, most of those who flippantly or sagely denounce as fraudulent or foolish all phenomena tending to demonstrate the continuity of life and a future life have never made any honest investigations for themselves, and are therefore ignorant of all features of the subject, and their jeers are entitled to but little consideration. That Spiritualism will ever become a strongly organized church with a fixed creed or declaration of beliefs may well be doubted. If there is anything to it, Spiritualism is a philosophy and not a religion. But in any case honest effort on the part of those who adhere to Spiritualism as a philosophical or religious belief to drive out of their ranks persons guilty of producing fraudulent phenomena will tend to elevate it in the opinion of the world at large."

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of responses, that it is impossible to give all the answers in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby descriptive, which of all things is least desirable. Correspondents often weary of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his turn at equal place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has been unusually large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

R. S. Bell, Washington: Q. A missionary returned from Burma, in a lecture on that country, said that he had been told that the teachings of Christ, but what he taught was so vulgar that he could not repeat it. He also said that pagans worship the idols for themselves and not as representatives, as usually understood. Is he correct?

A. This missionary is hopelessly blind to everything outside his Christian faith, or purposefully deceives. The view-point of different peoples varies, and the Burmans have good reasons for saying that the morality and customs of Christians are far from being irreplicable. There is no more reason for saying that the Burmans worship images, and not the beings whom they represent, than that the Greeks worshipped the statues of Apollo and Venus, or the Catholics the images of the Virgin, or Jesus, or the saints.

As for the morality taught by Christ, the Bagavat Gita is the undoubted source of the moral teachings of Christ, and is one of the most wonderful of all the so-called sacred books of the world.

Undoubtedly this missionary, were he from Japan would make a similar report of that country, as has been repeatedly done. Recent events, however, have opened the eyes of the Christian world, and demonstrated that other religions are equally capable of awakening the highest moral sense and producing the most exalted character.

Pagans are the Japanese, yet they have shown the most exalted courage, devotion, self-sacrifice, and in the glow of triumph a forbearance, magnanimity and honor which has no parallel in the history of the Christian world. It is as to talk of converting people of other religions to Christian faith, as the conversion of Christians to Brahmanism, Shintoism or Moslemism.

Physician: Q. When a person is in great suffering and hopeless, would it not be right and justifiable to give them an anesthetic and thus end their pain?

A. This question has been plausibly argued from both sides. It is not suggested by its being brought before the recent meeting of the American Humane Association at Philadelphia. Mrs. Ballington Booth was cited as having endeavored to have railroad companies carry with other appliances for the wounded, anesthetics to be administered to those pinned under the broken cars, or hopelessly injured. The association decided against the measure. Granting, however, that it is justifiable, who is to determine whether the anesthetic shall be given? It is instinctively felt that such power over life and death cannot be conferred on a human being over another.

Experienced physicians will recall cases they diagnosed as hopeless, where the patients were tortured with pain which for pity called some form of relief, and finally recovered. Had they been given the right to extinguish the lives of the sufferers, to do so would have been akin to murder.

There is no doubt that physicians give quieting doses of morphine, which renders the passage from pain to the next life, "a tranquil sleep." Still this is perhaps unintentional. Still cannot always correctly judge of the quantity of this drug the patient can resist.

There is no justification of anyone assuming the responsibility over the life and death of another, and hence such a suggestion is impractical. In an extreme case, as where a person was fastened beneath a car, and the faster almost reaching him, there being no possibility of rescue, instantaneous death would be merciful, and a kindness. Yet who would have the courage to become an executioner.

Novice: Q. Who are the Doukhobors, and what is their belief?

A. They are a religious sect, originating in Russia, where their fanaticism caused a great deal of trouble to the government, and what they regarded as persecution. The Canadian government offered them a free home in the Western region, and although better situated as to their material wants, they have brought all their superstition with them, as a result of their ignorance which is almost mental stupefaction.

It is said of these colonists that they are honest, industrious, and law-abiding, except at the periodical religious revivals, which take place about three times a year.

They believe, from Bible evidences, that it is wrong to use animals for work, yet they are obliged to keep stock on their farms, when revivals come they drive their animals away. They believe that all kinds of machinery are the invention of the devil, and work alone with their hands as Jesus taught.

When the religious crazes come on they eat only raw vegetables and grain, "just as God made it," and many are so overwhelmed with a sense of their sins they wander over the prairie, expecting to be fed by the ravens, and to meet Christ at his second coming. When they do this they discard all clothing, as they think God will be better pleased to meet them just as he made them.

Seventeen hundred men, women and children in a body marched into York town this year. Six hundred on another occasion, in mid-winter, marched toward Blinacross across the bleak and swept prairies. Centuries of persecution have made

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

Spruce Grove Farm.
Dearest Marah!—Weeks have flown by since I received your nice long letter and I am longing to hear from you again. I want to know about Mrs. Drury and the results of the meeting; about "Aunt Jane" and everybody you are interested in.

There has been little to break the monotony of my life. Father has been confined to the house with inflammation of the lungs for a good while and I have taken his place upon the farm as best I could, for we have had no money to pay hired help. I have taken the whole care of the stock and drawn up wood and cut corn and husked it, and gathered apples, in fact done everything that needed doing so far as my strength would permit. My hands are rough and red, and some mornings I am so lame and sore I can hardly move, but it soon wears off. I have left the farm but a few times since I wrote to you before.

I came home from Aunt Laura's with a bright vision of the future before me, but it has vanished as completely as a rainbow in a soap bubble. I see nothing before me now but years of toil and hardships, but I must do my duty. If I have got to be bound to the altar of sacrifice I will not go like a beast dragged to the slaughter, but like a woman true and brave. It has been clearly revealed to me that I must pity myself no more, that self pity is weakening to one's character and prevents all possible growth. I am sure I can grow strong and pure and kind and patient as the years go by, even if I do have to dig potatoes and milk cows.

After all, character is the main thing, for what would all the beautiful things I could say amount to unless I led a beautiful life? All this came to me the other day while I was feeding the chickens and for some reason I felt as if heaven was very near me.

When I came home I thought I knew a good deal about spiritual things, but I have made up my mind I know nothing. The physical phenomena we have seen so much of, I am weary of. I want something that will teach me how to live and be well and good and happy in the midst of trouble. I want to know how I can do good to others outside my own little family. I do not understand why I do not get more messages from the spirit world. Charlie thinks it is because I hurry so much of the time. I don't know what I would do without Charlie; he is my own comfort.

Almost every morning I am awakened by a voice speaking to me and I will copy for you some of the things I have heard the voice say: "Seek not afar for that which lies near at hand." "Within yourself lies the power to rise above every condition and shape your own environments. You will never have to learn one unnecessary lesson. Rejoice in every trial that tests your character and reveals to you a weakness or a fault. The spiritual is the real, therefore seek the spiritual first. You can not help humanity unless you understand it. One who has never been hungry cannot sympathize with a hungry man."

"Be yourself all you want others to be. Make yourself worthy of the best earth and heaven have to give. However humble your work, do it cheerfully, faithfully and well. Give unto others the respect and kindness you want them to give to you."

I think if I live up to what I have received already I shall be at least a good woman. One thing is certain: If I have got to have years of experience such as I have been having, I will try and get all the good out of it I can.

Last week I went to see Uncle Ezra for the first time for a good while. I found him quite feeble, but he was real pleased to see me and we had a long talk. He asked me a good many questions about my work and what I was going to do. "Out door work won't hurt ye if ye don't do too much," he said kindly. "You want grow strong and be well and happy out in the sunshine with the birds and woods and them stolid and unchangeably stubborn, and the density of their ignorance seems impenetrable to modern thought. As their fathers believed, so do they. They are opposed to all human laws, to courts, armies, war, to science and knowledge in general. The Canadian government has furnished them with schools but they will not permit their children to attend. They are ultra communists, holding everything in common. While having no priests, they follow like sheep self-appointed leaders, who by their preaching excite their fanaticism. Aside from the fanatical outbreaks, they lead the lives of gregarious animals, devoted to the welfare of each other, the members contributing to the wealth of the community. They use no spirituous liquors or tobacco, are vegetarians, and have no criminal laws. Vice is unknown.

They furnish a most interesting study of the inception of religion. It is probable that the people among whom Christianity had its origin, were even more ignorant, and hence fanatical than these Russian sects. Judging from the apocryphal writings, which have been preserved, it is impossible for the enlightened minds of the present to understand the brutal stupidity of the masses during the thousand years of what has been aptly termed the "Dark Ages." Every would-be leader claimed divine assistance, and the people were ready to follow, their fanaticism measured by the absurdity and folly of the doctrines taught.

hills, and ye will if ye don't worry and hurry; so don't do that, child, for if ye do 'twill shut the gate of heaven in ye face sure. Stop and look at the sunset and get its glory in your soul. Draw in great long breaths of the good pure air, and smell the spruces and the bracken; what do you call 'em, ferns? Get all the good ye can out of everything; 'tis all yours if you will take it. You've got all the time there is. If there don't seem to be time enough for ye to enjoy yourself, it's because ye think something is yer duty that ain't yer duty—that's all."

He then told me a story which I will write, for it is too good to be lost, so pass it on, please:

Years ago an old lady called by her acquaintances Aunt Betty Joe, lived on Swallow Hill and for a long distance everybody who was having sorrows and troubles went to see her, and came away looking brighter and happier, so it was no uncommon thing when some one seemed extra happy to hear his neighbor say, "I guess he has been to see Aunt Betty Joe."

One day the minister went to see her and asked her the secret of her success in helping people. "I believe you are doing more good than I am," he said, wistfully.

Aunt Betty Joe laughed and said, "I'm preaching them a more helpful gospel than you are; the gospel I preach is, 'Let Go.'"

When asked to explain, the old lady said, "When I was only a young girl I got married and went to live with my husband's parents on a large farm. In those days we had to make our butter and cheese, and spin yarn and weave our own cloth. Oh, there was lots of hard work to do. I was full of ambition and wanted to do a great deal, and my mother-in-law was very willing I should. The more I took upon myself to do, the more she thought I could, and it was not a great while before it was hurry, hurry from early until late. If I wanted to go anywhere or have any time by myself she was vexed, or I thought she was."

After a time I began to wear out under the constant strain. I grew thin and pale and felt tired, unhappy and discouraged all the time, but no one seemed to take any notice of it. I grew silent and morbid and the more I brooded over my condition the more miserable I grew, until I fancied that no one cared anything about me, and I wanted to die and get out of it all. It was duty here and duty there—I believe the name of the "skeleton in the closet" was Duty!

Just as things had got to this my husband's Aunt Emily came to make us a visit and she and I took a great liking to each other. One day when I was tired I could hardly move Aunt Emily came out into the kitchen and began to help me. Just then we heard a noise out doors and went to the door in season to see our chore boy Sam come rushing down the path holding onto a strap around the neck of a great calf. The boy was panting for breath, his clothes were torn, his face scratched and bloody and his hat and one boot gone. When he saw us he gasped out, "Help me; help me, quick!" Aunt Emily stepped out and cried, "Let go! let the critter go!"

When we came back to our work, she said to me, "Now, look here, Betty, you're in a worse scrape than that boy is, for you've got hold of a more unmanageable critter and the name you've given it is 'Duty,' so what I lead to you, I say to you 'Let Go.' The Bible says God is love, and love won't make you do things to hurt yourself more than anybody else. It ain't your duty to do other folks' work for 'em and humor 'em in their laziness and shiftness. The other night I heard you praying God to help you, but he won't ever help you out of any scrape you can get out of yourself just as well as not. You have a right to be healthy and happy, and you needn't feel obliged to ask anybody's permission, either. What would you think of Sam? If he should keep right hold of that calf all the time day and night and say he was doing his duty? He might say that if he didn't keep hold of the critter that it might get lost or drowned or some body, and so hang on and yell for help to come and help him do his duty. I guess as long as he could let go when he had a mind to, folks would let him holler quite a spell 'fore they paid much attention to him, and I guess God will let you holler quite a spell 'fore he pays any particular attention to you—so you just let go."

I took Aunt Emily's advice and lived it afterward. I had quite a tussle but I kept good-natured, and conquered in the end. Now, folks come to me full of trouble and grief and worry. I tell them to let go. Some people have their arms so full of disagreeable things that they can't see over the top of them nor around them; there is only one thing to do: Let go. Don't keep your mind so full of unpleasant thoughts there is no room for anything bright and beautiful to find lodgment there—let go the bad and uncomfortable ones.

If somebody says something mean about you, let it go, and by your words and deeds prove to them their mistake. Don't go through the world lugging about with you a load of jealousies, disappointments, grudges and all the rest of the doctrines taught sentments—let go. Don't trouble yourself about other people's affairs, or speech or conduct—let go. "Now, child," said Uncle Ezra, "Don't try to do too much. I once knew a woman who said she tried in her family for years to be manly, womanly, boy, dog, and all and an angel into the bargain, but she made a wretched mess out of it and one day the idea struck her that 'twas enough for one woman to be all a woman ought to be, so she let go of everything else and 'tended to the woman business, and the last I ever heard of her was to hear somebody say that if an angel ever was on earth that woman was one. So when ye get home don't forget Aunt Betty Joe and the gospel of 'Let Go!'"

There is no danger that I shall forget it, for I see too much need of applying it to my own case. Some one has sent me a lot of papers and tracts big and little. There are all sorts of isms and faiths and cure and mild cure and I don't know what, for I have not had time to find out, but I am going to let go of some thing and read them if they are worth it, for if there is anything better than I have already got I want it.

Later—Father asked me to-day to go to Uncle Ezra's to borrow a saw, and I was glad to go. I told Uncle Ezra about my new reading matter and asked him what he thought about it, for he has always read a good deal. In reply to my question he took a bottle from the table and asked me what was in it. I removed the cork and answered "peppermint essence."

"If I should put a label on it reading ginger, what would it be then?" he asked.

"Why peppermint essence, of course," said I.

"Then if I put another label on it, reading anoint, what would it be then?"

"I guess it would be the same old peppermint," said I, laughing, for I saw his meaning.

"I rather guess it would," said he, "and so truth is truth, and error is error, no matter what name you call 'em by. All the religions have more or less truth in 'em and they've done some good some good, so jess skip out everything that strikes you as being true and good and helpful and let the rest of 'em go. But remember, Marah, child, that Spiritualism covers the whole ground, and don't you get to thinking it don't. All that has to do with spiritual things, all that tends to boost folks up to be better, purer and nobler is Spiritualism. I tell ye, child," he said, with an energy that surprised me, "ye hain't half got it yet. The very name Spiritualism is something to live up to and it reaches from the highest heaven to the lowest hell, and is as broad as God's creation. The spiritual is the only part of anything that lasts forever." The Bible tells us that God is spirit, so all knowledge of God is Spiritualism. Don't forget what I'm saying to ye, Marah, girl, for they may be my last words to ye, and I want ye to live such a beautiful life and be so pure and noble and kind that everybody that knows ye will know that ye've got the very best religion that was ever preached or lived."

I came away and left him smiling and happy, and the next morning we heard that he was dead. Oh, Marah, I have lost one of the best friends I ever had. Did I say lost? I ought to be ashamed, for I know I have not lost him. Some day he will come and speak to me, and how glad I shall be to welcome him. Talk about it's being wicked to hold communion with the dead—why it is a most blessed privilege and it seems very strange to me that anyone can view it otherwise.

I got a letter from Mrs. Austin yesterday and it came like a burst of sunshine in a dark day. I will quote a little from her letter: "If you really want to work in the spiritual field your work will come to you as fast as you are capable of doing it. We often think ourselves capable long before we are. It seems to be natural to want to do something grand and beautiful, but if we attempt it before we are able, we come to grief. It is much better to occupy a lowly position and be called higher than to take a high place and have to come down. No one can be trusted with an important work who will not patiently and faithfully perform the lowly duties of life. We must always remember that the bottom round of the ladder is just as important and honorable as the top round."

I am trying to remember all the good that comes to me and build it into my character, and keep cheerful and happy, but is uphill work some days. Mother is calling me to come and drive the calves in and it will give me a fine chance to practice patience and self-control. Give my love to Aunt Helen and write soon.

Lovingly yours,
MARTHA WESTON.

New Light Cottage.
My Dear Martha!—I was very glad to get your letter and to know you are doing so well, for I feel that you are doing well whether you think you are or not. I can sympathize with you in your hardships and disappointments, not because I have had any such experiences but because I love you. Of course, I have my trials, and sometimes they seem very hard to me but I suppose that is because I know all about them. It seems to me troubles are like headaches; we know how hard are our own headaches and it is dreadful, but we can bear our neighbor's headache with heroic fortitude.

Aunt Jane is still with us, but I will go back to where I left off in my last letter.

The night John and I went to hear Mrs. Drury speak, the minister called Perhaps I have not told you that he is a young man just out of college. He is real nice looking and pleasant and agreeable in spite of his being so bigoted. Perhaps I would be just as narrow-minded as he is if I had had a church creed pounded into my head ever since I was born, the way he has—John says I would. We were almost ready to start when Mr. Dale got here and John told him where we were going and asked him to go with us. Mr. Dale seemed dumb with astonishment for a moment and then he said, sorrowfully, "I am very sorry, Mr. Wilder, that you and your sister have become so much interested in Spiritualism, for I am sure it will bring you no good, but will lead you far from the true way into sorrow and darkness. I thank you for your courtesies, but I cannot think of accepting it."

"Will you kindly tell me in plain words why you will not go with us?" said John, in his calm, pleasant voice.

Mr. Dale hesitated and then said haltingly, "Because I believe Spiritualism to be a doctrine of devils."

"Have you ever investigated it?" said John smilingly.

"I have not," was the brief answer.

"What would you think of a judge who would condemn a prisoner without giving him a trial or investigating the case at all?"

Mr. Dale looked helplessly at the floor, so as Aunt Jane says, I put in my ear and said in my sweetest tones, "Surely you are not afraid to go, Mr. Dale? If God has called you to do his work he is able to take care of you anywhere, and if he is a just God he wants you to be just also. We have been told by a lady who has known Mrs. Drury all her life, that she is one of the kindest, purest-minded, most lovable women she ever knew. I believe the Bible says that by their fruits ye shall know them. Isn't it barely possible you are unjust in your judgment? If I had a religion that was so shaky that I did not dare to listen to anything contrary to it, I would not consider it worth much."

Mr. Dale looked at me until I felt my cheeks burn like fire, and then he turned to John and said, "If you will loan me an overcoat I will go with you."

He went. The hall was beautifully trimmed with autumn leaves, ferns and sunflowers and was well lighted. Mrs. Drury took a Bible and read most impressively that chapter beginning, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not love (she read it love, not charity), I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." She then remarked that most people seem to think that Spiritualism and Christianity are at swords' points, but it is a wrong idea, for Modern Spiritualism and the teachings of Jesus Christ when rightly understood, are practically the same.

There were about a hundred persons in the hall—a large number for the size of the place—and they all seemed surprised at her statement, which she proceeded to prove. I do wish you could have been there and heard her, for she was just grand. She said the Christ performed a three-fold mission. First, he taught right thinking and right living; second, he healed the sick by spirit power; third, he proved beyond all doubt a life beyond death and spirit communion.

REGRETS.

It is really true, beloved, that you live—The one whom my soul hath ever loved the best, O, take me to your heart again, and there forgive; Lean my head once more upon your breast.

Can you not see, dear one, how you've missed, How I regret I ever gave you pain? Even then, you were the first and best; O, Love! Could you but come to me again!

Can you not see from your grand height where sorrow, Pain and death, waited your pure soul; Can you not give some promise to me, darling, If you have found that blessed life the while?

Can you not come to me, my own beloved? Can you forgive the thoughtless words I said? Can you not say that you love and miss me as I miss you?

And O, my darling, say you are not dead; Do you hear my sigh, and feel my anguish, Mourning for the joys forever fled? I close my eyes, fold my hands, and languish For the whisper, low, beloved, "There are no dead."

And were you with me, dearest, now as when I gave your true brave heart such pain, Would you take me in your arms as then, Pledging forgiveness o'er and o'er again?

I would be more tender to you, I was so dull; And life had much I found was hard to bear. I could not know, I did not understand, how you loved my soul, How your love was lightning every care.

Bend low, my own, from those joys supernatural, Kiss my cheek, and wreath with hope my brow; O, tell me, is my life with thee Eternal, And will I love you, dearest, then as now?

N. S. A. CONVENTION.

Report of Committee on Delegates' Reports.

To the Officers and Delegates of the National Spiritualists' Association in Convention Assembled:

Your Committee has received for consideration fifty-three reports of chartered societies, and has been able to report that the majority of them are in good standing, and that the entire membership, as many of the chartered societies have not sent in reports. Examination of the various reports show that, though many societies make no attempt to comply with the requirements of the Constitution and By-Laws, there is a marked improvement in the character of the reports received. This is especially true of the financial reports, and many of them have come in response to personal letters sent by the Secretary of the N. S. A.

LOCAL SOCIETIES.

The returns from the various local societies have, as in previous years, the same lack of system in furnishing the information required by the N. S. A. The lack of financial statements makes the reports only partially completed, and it is impossible for our Committee to give a correct statement to you as to the condition of the local societies. We would recommend that the care for the societies already chartered with a view to strengthening them be regarded as more important by the Missionaries than the organization of the new ones. Special attention should be given to this matter in connection with Missionary work. We would suggest that provisions be made for Missionary work in states not organized into State Associations with a view to completing a State organization in such states that will affiliate with the N. S. A.

STATE ASSOCIATIONS.

Out of twenty chartered State Associations, seventeen have filed reports. We desire to commend especially those who have made careful statements, not only of their State Association, but of all their subordinate societies. We would recommend that all states make special efforts to file a full report of the strength of their Associations. The State Associations reporting are as follows:

Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, Texas, Oregon, Massachusetts, Montana, Kansas, Washington, Michigan, Connecticut, Ohio, New York, California.

We would suggest to the representatives of the State Associations that they examine the report of the State Association, which, in the opinion of your Committee, comes up to the requirements of the Constitution and By-Laws.

Your Committee again calls your attention to the three different plans of organization. The misunderstanding that grows out of such a condition, creates confusion in the election of delegates to the National Association. Several State Associations have individual membership and subordinate associations. Some are only represented as subordinate societies.

CAMP MEETING ASSOCIATIONS.

Only two Camp Meeting Associations have reported. The Mississippi Valley Spiritualists' Association, and Compuence, Conn. This shows that the interest in the N. S. A. and the Camp Meetings seems to be waning. For many years ago nearly every Camp Meeting assigned a day to the N. S. A. The fact that only two Camp Meetings have reported does not indicate that the Camp Meetings that have not reported did not set apart a time for the discussion of the needs of the N. S. A. We recommend that the incoming Board make special effort to ask the officers of the Camp Meetings to have at least one day set apart during their session for the N. S. A. work.

THE LYCEUM.

The Lyceum work will be represented by Mr. John W. Ring, as all the reports of Lyceums have been turned over to him.

EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

The Morris Pratt Institute of White-water, Wis., the only school chartered by the N. S. A., and in fact the only one of its kind under the management of Spiritualists, has filed a report. As this will come up under Educational Work, no recommendation is needed, except that every effort be made to maintain it financially, it being a most important factor in the progress of Spiritualism.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

It is impossible to give a complete report of the financial standing of the chartered societies, as so many reports furnish no such statement. The total receipts furnished from all local Associations are as follows:

Gross Income.	Gross Disb.	Balance.
$7707.68	$7382.78	$544.90
$459.27	$378.03	$54.24
$1166.95	$1081.30	$901.32

State Associations.

Every delegate knows that these figures in no wise represent the financial statement of all societies connected with the N. S. A., and your Committee recommends that all societies be requested to have their complete reports in the hands of the N. S. A. Secretary at least ten days before the Annual Convention, in order that the statistics may be compiled as far as possible in advance of the Convention.

We recommend that the condition of all societies chartered by the N. S. A. be looked into, and where a society does not hold regular meetings for a year, it should not be represented by proxy in the National Convention.

It has been suggested by several delegates that the auditing of the books be done prior to the Convention. Many of those who serve on committees feel that they are deprived of the privilege of being present at the business sessions, on account of the excessive committee work. If some arrangement could be made whereby the books could be audited for a few days so that every delegate could be present at the business sessions, your Committee thinks it would be most satisfactory.

Your Committee finds among their reports many small societies who are not able to employ a regular speaker, and we would recommend to such societies that they conduct meetings under Hudson Tuttle's "Lyceum Guide," the Progressive Lyceum, published by Mr. Ring, and other suitable books and papers, so as to keep their members together during the year. An interesting and instructive service could be prepared in this way.

Owing to the fact that when the reports of Officers, Missionaries, Special Agents, and Committees are often changed when they come up for action in the Convention, your Committee recommends that no reports be published prior to their official presentations at the Convention. Until that time they are not the property of the public, and no report should be published which afterwards might be changed in Convention. Respectfully submitted,

M. E. Cadwallader,
Chairman.

HISTORIAN'S ANNUAL REPORT.

To the Spiritualist Assembly, Convened at Minneapolis—Greetings!

I have not the time to tell you the words. The work of the history has been seriously hindered by my severe illness. (I was expected to pass the Great Divide and my physician limited my stay on earth to December), and several accidents following, each of which prostrated me for several weeks, and seriously impaired the working capacity of brain and nerves; but my interest in the history of the movement, and my desire to faithfully represent it to coming generations, has not abated, but my misfortunes intensified the interest and determination to do the work thoroughly, and see it in print before I change my robes for the eternal feast of love, truth and reason. It requires much reading, research and correspondence to obtain and verify data, and it better go slowly, than hastily arranged, without verified and unverified counts that might prove defective and give it the reputation of unreliability. I am now in better condition for effective work than I have been before since April, 1904, and in view of my period of blindness, and all that followed, I might say, better than before in years.

If no other misfortune overtakes me I anticipate having a volume ready for the printer before the end of July, 1906. I have some excellent helpers, who have prepared special sketches of important work and workers, that may go in, in a body, as they are carefully composed. Among them is a sketch of Emma Rood Tuttle, by Hudson, and one of J. Frank Baxter, by his lifelong friend, Florence Sampson, who also kindly loaned me a sketch of Jonathan Edwards, from whose ideas I have drawn some of my material. I have also drawn a sketch of a man, who was drawn in life, in a dark room, in 15 minutes. Much that is called sleight-of-hand is not sleight-of-hand. One to perform sleight-of-hand must have his hands free to start with. He cannot do anything without having his hands free. The performances of Maurice F. Raymond I believe are done by spirit power. Maurice is a medium.

Very many people will believe manifestations that read the Bible, who would not believe the same thing done now. I will mention two similar cases. Paul and Silas, bound in chains and in prison, sang and prayed. An angel came, took them by hand, and raised them up, when their chains fell off. The angel then led them out. As they came to the gate it opened of itself. The angel led them a distance from the prison and left them there. Some years ago the Davenport Brothers were giving cabinet manifestations in Oswego, this state. The town authorities arrested them and put them in jail, claiming they were obtaining money under false pretenses. The jailer to make sure of his prisoners, bought a hump and padlock and put it on their cell. When the jailer came next morning he found both the boys sitting on the front steps of the jail. Examining the locks, both were found to be broken from the night before. Red House, N. Y. A. H. FRANK.

MANIFESTATIONS.

Similarity of a Modern and a Bible Instance.

To the Editor:—I think you are doing more than any other man to advance the cause of Spiritualism. You give more reading matter for the money. I have read No. 830 which gives much of what was given through Mrs. Maynard. I attended many of her circles at her father-in-law's house in Buffalo, before she was married. It was there that the life-size portrait of Pinky was given. It was drawn in life, in a dark room, in 15 minutes. Much that is called sleight-of-hand is not sleight-of-hand. One to perform sleight-of-hand must have his hands free to start with. He cannot do anything without having his hands free. The performances of Maurice F. Raymond I believe are done by spirit power. BEAUTIFUL WEDDING

With Ceremony in Accordance With Spiritualistic Faith Unites the Lives of Miss Pearl Chown and Mr. Homer Briggs.

As set forth in the Times-Democrat, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Chown, 29 Public Square, Lima, Ohio, at 5:30 o'clock Wednesday evening, occurred the marriage of their daughter, Miss Pearl Chown, to Mr. Homer T. Briggs, formerly of St. Paul, Minn. The wedding was a Spiritualistic marriage, the first ever held in this city, the ceremony being performed by Rev. Moses Hull, a minister of the Spiritualistic faith, who was summoned here from Whitewater, Wis., to officiate. He was assisted by Mrs. Hull, an inspirational medium, who, at the close of the Spiritualistic ceremony, recited a beautiful poem, inspired at the moment for the occasion. One hundred guests were present.

The home was decorated with smilax and holly leaves, roses and chrysanthemums. Aisle of palms through which the bride and groom entered unattended, led to a bower of green arranged in the doors connecting the parlors. Here they were met by the officiating minister. Preceding the wedding march played by Prof. Clint Richmond, Miss Effie Longworth of Delphos sang in a sweet soprano voice, "O Promise Me." The bride, who is a beautiful girl, was gowned in white crepe de chine over tulle, and wore a veil of tulle, which was fastened to her hair with rose buds. Her flowers were white chrysanthemums and her only ornament, a diamond bracelet, a gift of the groom.

Rev. Mr. Hull before performing the formal ceremony of the marriage, addressed the assemblage with the following:

"Ladies and Gentlemen:—You are here as the guests of the couple standing before us. Mr. Homer Briggs and Miss Pearl Chown, who are here by their invitation to witness the ratification of a marriage which has taken place in their own hearts.

"Marriage is natural; it exists everywhere, in the mineral, the vegetable and the animal kingdom alike. It exists in the animal kingdom from the tiniest insect or the lowest reptile up to the highest expression of life in man and woman.

"Marriage has two great objects; the first is companionship, co-operation, assistance and love for each other under all circumstances; the other is the perpetuation of the race. No license can be issued by the state, or words that can be said by a minister can make this couple any more man and wife than they are now. All we can do here is to ratify and advertise a union which already exists between them.

"Ask this couple no questions, as all answers between them belong to themselves—not to the public; and when asked and answered perhaps take entire satisfaction. I never ask a question to promise to obey the authority of master and slave but that of equal partners; it is a relation of interdependence, where each is under the same obligation as the other.

"Now, I know these here assembled, does any of you know any reason why the marriage of this couple should not be here and now ratified? Hearing no reply, we will now proceed."

Turning to the couple, the speaker said, "You will now signify to these friends your marriage, and your desire to hereafter be known as husband and wife by joining your right hands. May your hearts and lives ever be as closely and as thoroughly united as your hands are now joined."

Then, handing Mr. Briggs a gold ring, Rev. Hull said, "Signify to these friends, to Miss Chown, in the presence of these witnesses, the endowment of all you have and all you are upon her by placing this ring upon her finger; and Miss Chown, you will signify in the presence of these friends the presentation of all you have and all you are by permitting him to place this ring upon your finger."

"May your lives and your love be as pure and as untarnished as the gold in the ring which is presented and received, and as endless as the ring."

"And now, by the authority of this license, and by the authority vested in me as a minister of the gospel, I pronounce the ratification of your marriage complete. You are husband and wife."

"Before the benediction, or congratulations, I will ask Mrs. Hull to give us a short improvisation."

Mrs. Hull responded with the following:

"It was said in days of old, There was an archer with bow of gold, He never missed his aim when he sent his dart."

It always went to some tender heart, But was always bound up with Hy-men's bands.

We are told this archer in modern days, Is known to have some curious ways, Not long since he put Pearl in his dart, And it went direct to a young man's heart.

He smiled—as if in magic spell, He said, 'I will guard this dear Pearl well,' And placed it close to his throbbing breast,

Where he hoped this Pearl will henceforth rest. We wish them joy through future years—May their marriage tour be through the spheres.

May heaven grant this priceless boon, Eternally be their honeymoon."

Benediction.

"Heaven bless this couple in all the ups and downs of their lives now and here, as they travel the journey of life, be it long or short; may they be more and more to each other, and whom love has joined together let no discord part asunder."

Following the congratulations of the one hundred guests, who also offered best wishes to Mr. and Mrs. Chown, this day being the twenty-sixth anniversary of their marriage, were seated at three long tables and an elaborate wedding dinner served.

The bridal table was beautifully decorated, the color scheme here, as well as on the other tables, being yellow and white chrysanthemums and yellow candles with yellow shades, assisted in carrying out the artistic idea. The gifts were many and formed an array of silver, cut glass and china. Mr. and Mrs. Briggs left Thursday evening for a trip to Europe. November 15 will be at home to friends at 27 1/2 Public Square. Mr. Briggs recently came to this city from St. Paul, and has made many friends, who will offer congratulations upon winning a bride of so many charming qualities.

INFINITE GOOD.

As Illustrated and Defined by J. W. Nigh

Should we think of God as life, And thus the mind perplex? Is not it better far that we Leave out the thought of sex?

If we conceive that God is good, And perfect as can be, How can we reconcile the thought That God is only life?

For he is only half the force Of the creative power, As it to us is manifest In every fleeting hour.

How can God be, as concerned In mind of mortal man? In view of that stupendous whole, The universal plan.

If God is seen in all there is On land, in sea, in air, Dwells in sunshine and in cloud, In all that's bright and fair;

If God is all, and infinite, In flower, in leaf, in tree, Dwells with those in bondage, As well as with the free;

Is in the depths of darkness, Of superb starry space, In wondrous beauty 'round us, In depths of love-lit eyes;

The world so full of beauty That all may have a share, It fills our souls with gladness, For God is everywhere!

Is heard in rippling laughter Of happy childish glee! That thrills the world about us— And gives God's love to thee!

Is felt in gentle tenderness, In joy, in grief, in tears, In words and deeds of kindness, That drive away our fears.

God's voice is in the thunder, In songs of happy birds, In deepest tones about us, And softly spoken words.

In the all-pervading cosmos, Time's every passing hour Is filled with the kindly presence Of the loving power.

We look around us everywhere And see God's charming grace, Beauty dwells on every side, It fills the whole of space.

'Tis seen in the silent sky, 'Tis heard in every sound, 'Tis felt in every pulsing throbbing In all the world around.

We cannot look upon a face And fall to see the joy That God so kind and loving gives To every girl and boy.

God is grace and loveliness, Happiness and health, Gladness, peace and purity, The universe of wealth.

God is spirit, force and power, In love, and light, and life, God is all that's everywhere, And with us day and night.

None can be outside the law; All of land and sea, Are a part of that vast whole, Eternally to be.

In the glorious sunshine, In the glorious storm, God dwells throughout the universe, In every living form!

Great Spirit of life and love! The all-pervading whole! Through which we got the light above And each a living soul.

Everything that God has made, Is making every day, Is perfect in its every part, As light's effulgent ray!

Spirit can but perfect be, As light from love divine; The many faults that come to thee Are only faults of thine.

All would be of beatific form, The body, as the soul, Did spirit power the laws of life Have absolute control.

The energizing force of law Through love brings life to be; But perfect work can only come Through perfect harmony.

We cannot feel that God is he: For loveliness and grace, And kindness seem to pervade The whole of cosmic space.

The infinite is everywhere, In the distant star, In the atom at our feet, And knoweth all we are.

Is there naught but law and love In all that we behold? On every side—below—above— Is mystery untold.

Man hath taught us to believe That many things are so, But all man's wisdom may deceive, So little does he know!

Man gives to God the sex his own, His concept so elate, That God must be a monster He Since only He is great!

There's supreme wisdom in the way The universe hath light, It shineth for eternal day, But shadow maketh night.

Thus throughout the universe Is light eternal shed, But still 'tis dark, so small's the spark Within man's little head.

Perhaps some day 'twill break away And clear his mental sides! And make him feel, here is the real, The heavenly paradise.

God fills the universe with love, Law and light for all, The infinite is Supreme Good! Fear not that faded fall.

All Christian Wars.

The great majority of the wars of the last fifty years have been waged by Christian nations against non-Christian. In all of these the ministers and zealots of the Christian churches have vehemently simulated the war passion. We see to-day how the Russian priests bless the rum, consecrate every engine of destruction, and even carry miracle-working relics, crosses, and the host itself into the battlefield. I say it is a truly awful thought that an archbishop should write the savage cannibal that God "made battles, too," that a leading statesman on a Sunday afternoon should cite with approval to his people such sickening blasphemy—Frederic Harrison.

REINCARNATION.

As Viewed From a Theosophical Standpoint.

It would be interesting, did time permit, to follow the evolution of life and form upward from the seemingly insensate mineral through the vegetable and animal kingdoms to mankind. A unique little poem recently appeared which describes a portion of the long journey, the first and last lines of its first verse being as follows:

"When you were a tadpole and I was a fish

For I loved you even then."

Reincarnation has been widely known and believed in, although the prevalent impression is that it comes from the Hindus.

Pythagoras, one of the famous philosophers of ancient Greece, taught reincarnation, and said he remembered his past lives. Virgil teaches it in his poems. It was known to Goethe, and the Druids that he met knew of it. It was also known in Ireland and Austria, and is a fact established by the Israelites. They did not hold, however, that everyone was reborn, but that their prophets came back many times. Paracelsus, Boehme and Swedenborg believed it in later times, and Schopenhauer, Hegel, Herd, and Schopenhauer the same idea. Wagner makes frequent mention of it in "Parsifal," and Tennyson and Browning speak of it in their poems.

To man especially belongs the higher expression of the mind, or thought. When a man is indulging in an exhibition of uncontrolled anger, jealousy, or any other passion, he is doing precisely what animals do; and the way to prove he is a man, and hence more highly evolved than they are, is to develop his thinking faculties and learn to control his passions.

It is by means of reincarnation that the evolving soul climbs slowly up from the state of the savage, but one move from the animal, to the condition in which he is found in the highest states of civilization. Theosophy tells us that the limit is not yet reached, but that he must be more glorious than we are now able to conceive of are still before us.

It is always the same soul, one must believe, which comes back time after time to learn the lessons set for it, but a different side of that soul is manifested each time. Thus it comes about that man is dual in nature, as it were. And it lies with each individual to gratify the instincts of the lower nature, or personality, or to subdue that lower nature by means of the higher self, which ever seeks to express the wisdom and love of its Creator.

In order that the evolving soul, although itself sexless, may personally experience all the possibilities of human life, it sometimes takes the male and at other times the female form. Or, to illustrate, it is stated that a soul which in its last life manifested in the male form as a famous artist, was reincarnated as a woman noted for the beautiful embroidery she created with her needle, thus indicating that no faculty gained is ever lost, but may express itself differently in different lives. There are certain laws governing the change from sex to sex.

In reincarnation, it would seem, is found the satisfactory solution to the different ideas in ethics which are to be seen in different people. Conscience, we are told, is the memory of painful experiences. When we find a man who is scrupulously honest in money matters, for instance, but absolutely selfish in every detail of life, it may indicate that painful experiences in past lives have taught that the mental wisdom of honesty, but his experiences have yet come to teach that further spiritual development involves thoughtful consideration for the interests of others.

And again, there is always the idea of beginning a new day, as it were, with each new life. The man who dies apparently a failure in the prime of life will, in the next incarnation, be born on earth life and the next one, meditate over the unfortunate results of his life, and this meditation will manifest itself in the coming life by a better understanding of what life is in its more ideal aspects.

Following physical life about twenty years are spent in the astral world. Sixty years build into the mental bodies qualities which entitle them to hundreds of years on the mental plane—which is the next plane reach in the cycle of reincarnation—while others, as the unevolved savages for instance, linger there for only a short time and again return to physical life.

THOROUGH TEST CONDITIONS

As Applied to the Great Medium, Madame d'Esperance.

As showing the character of the test conditions, says the Two Worlds, which have at times been adopted in circles for materializations, the following note from a little pamphlet, by the medium herself, Madame d'Esperance, will be of interest:

"The personal tests which were adopted at each seance," says Madame d'Esperance, "varied from time to time, but a fresh idea was mooted. The one, however, which was considered simplest, and best for all purposes, was a closely fitting dress, fastened at the back. In addition to the ordinary fastenings the opening was sewn over with thread, and across the thread a word was written which left marks in certain positions on the crossed threads. The dress was closely braided, and the plaits sewn together, the thread being also marked. Black bands were sewn on my wrists. In addition to these a tape was passed round my waist and knotted, the knots being sewn over with thread and marked. The ends of the tape were passed through a staple in the floor, and then held by the person sitting nearest. Six inches were allowed as playground, to provide against any discomfort, but it was not possible to move more than six inches in any direction without drawing the tape held by the sitters, and thereby announcing the fact. These tests were devised by Mr. Aksakof and myself, and we flattered ourselves that we left nothing to be desired. A materialization, which was photographed, actually occurred under these conditions.

ASPIRATION AND INSPIRATION.

Spirit Message Given by Automatic Writing.

All aspirations draw their corresponding inspirations and have their own lines or grooves and movements on the planes of their rated degrees of intelligence.

All sent-out thoughts and desires are accompanied by the light of their degree of intelligence and spirituality. These are supplemented by corresponding returns of thought and light of their own kind. This light, in its action and effects is similar to the light thrown upon a photographer's camera during concentration for a picture. It makes the impression upon the chemical substances of the soul like marked shadows, which, when the camera is removed, the electric click of thought impacts makes the thought record along all lines of thought output and exchange. This record all intelligent spirits can read as if it were a printed book, but the shades reflected on the soul by said light are, in substance, what determines the life experiences of mortals, which experiences continue to be after states of earth life, because they are soul conditions and affect the indwelling spirit in their ratio of purity or otherwise. When a pretentious aspiration is sent out by an individual who meditates how by fair speech, a foul purpose can be launched and pressed forward, it draws or attracts a pale murky light that settles on the soul, the soul becomes a prohibitive force against the soul's freedom of action on higher thought lines. This, in most cases, results in retrograde motion on vibratory lines, instead of promotion.

It is high time that mankind learn themselves and learn that the laws of man's constitution are the laws of God, and that it is man's duty therefore to learn and obey these laws.

O that mortals would "wake from their mental drowsiness" and make strong effort for true self-improvement. Mental and moral activity and interaction are necessary to soul unfoldment and growth in the right way, otherwise the soul and spirit are shut in behind purely worldly and selfish measures, which, when taken, are the against individual selfhood. It is the sin which cannot be forgiven neither on earth nor in the worlds, immortal, because individual self has made the record and results are there, either in a luminous soul and glorified spirit, or in a sickly soul and dwarfed spirit form, and no one can be assigned when they enter the immortal states, otherwise the individual would be a mere puppet, and their true status would be lost.

Nature's rules are that each human soul shall contribute its quota or proportional share of active dynamics, thus force activity to the operations of the manufacture of cosmic products, apart from each one's individual needs for mental and general support, and improvement. When this is done, commensurate with intelligence, power, or talents, it makes bare places along the lines of their assigned activities in nature's and world's drama, which are also marked in each one's personal aura and the record thus made is strictly each one's own and cannot be shifted to another nor exchanged.

Vibration and force are co-active. Law and love are the source from which all force springs and is active in and through vibrations. For these reasons desire and thought are of such importance as to purity or otherwise. When pure they are transformed into wings for man's ascension to spiritual heights. When impure they become the crude weights of retention amid the crude and inharmonious earth conditions. These are the greatest pleasures that for which the records of earth's people is, let your aspirations be pure, and adhere to rules of right, then will you have the strong help of holy angels and a rich reward in heaven when your earthly duties are finished.

October 30, 1902, this spirit message came to me: Mark this, that all mortals are amenable to Supreme Rule for this reason: because the laws of the universe are the same in all worlds, there is too much misapprehension of justice. Therefore all wrongs committed are righted in the immortal worlds by the powers that are not misled by appearances and cunning speech. Absolute justice is meted to all in accord with each one's own life record. None can escape, none can atone for another in any final settlement, but each must settle his own account with the law.

Finally, it is good for a world to live alone. The lower world has tried it for a great many thousand years and every experiment has been a failure; every government and civilization of the past has ended in ruins. At last the two worlds are understandingly united. According to intelligent reports the upper world has not been an unblemished success while it cringed along so lonely and alone. Now that both have the mutual advantage, and the value of a mutual intelligence and wisdom, it is reasonably anticipated that a good approach to stability will be made.

All things come to those that enjoy labor and are willing to wait.

Reincarnation or Transmigration—Which?

Anthropoids are descendant from man, not man from anthropoids. This is admittedly true. Is it not also a plausible hypothesis to infer that anthropoid forms are utilized for evolutionary purposes by infant human souls now coming into incarnation? This avenue offers "the channel of the least resistance." I know it is argued by some ill-informed theosophers that the gateway between the human and the animal kingdoms is closed, etc., but, giving credence to the statements of some modern students and trained seers, to the contrary, would it not be a reasonable conclusion to reach that, in her undulating economy, would utilize these vehicles for the youthful ego in his early incarnations? Who can give a satisfactory psychological explanation of the "indwelling entity" that animated beautiful Jim Key, the educated horse that was on exhibition at the White City? Was this a case of man becoming horse or horse becoming man?

WHAT IS RELIGION?

Clara Watson and Channing Severance Think Religion Is Poison.

If they mean religion as it was, they are right. Jesus found ancient theology was poison, and he advanced it from vengeance to peace. It was again promoted to love. Now, Nature is God. Duly is at last a profitable thought and a tangible fact.

Religion ever having been man's relation to his theology, partook, first, of the venom of its source. Through all the theological changes religion has kept equal pace; until the present religion, which is man's relation to Nature, is a "thing of beauty and a joy forever." It is strength when all other sources of happiness fail. Not only the Spiritualists, but all the world need it. All of the spirit world need it, equally and benign influence equally with the mortal world. It is a never failing power.

Sublime wisdom will not assert independence of Nature, for such assertion would exhibit a lack of fundamental understanding in the universe. To sever our connection with Mother Nature would be a courting of weakness. Channing says, "These Spiritualists who are so anxious to make a religion out of this which is nothing but a fact in Nature." The science of logic says, all truths are facts, though all facts are not necessarily truths. The "if true is nothing but a fact in Nature," implies that Brother Severance thinks it cannot be a religion because it is nothing but a fact. Better minds than his or mine, would call that poor logic. He further says, "Let Spiritualism live or die on its own merits." This is a clear assertion that he would rather see Spiritualism die than live "other than by following his individual leadership. His sincerity is unquestionable.

Clara says, "There seems no way to keep the pure white garments of Spiritualism unsoiled, because of the idiosyncrasies and pranks of humanity." Were this statement made to an unbiased jury, it might require considerable investigation to learn who entertained the idiosyncrasies, and who pranked the pranks.

She further says, "Many of us do not see our way out of our difficulties, at least not until human nature is more nearly perfect than it is today." It is well for Spiritualists that the far, profound, and clear-sightedness of the N. S. A. labors in no such doleful and despondent notes.

She still further calls down the N. S. A. for its suggestion to try to discriminate between commercialism and religion, and says, "As though commercialism didn't enter religion." A hesitancy to believe that there is a line between church and state, Catholic or Protestant, ever failed to distinguish between religion and commercialism. Money always has been and still is required in support and cultivation of a public, organized religion; that religion and business are one and the same is too absurd to be considered for a moment seriously. Clara is too sensible to expect that to be taken for pure gold.

"There is not a member of the N. S. A. who would contend that the honest worker is not worthy of his hire."

Where mediumship is worked to aid board-of-trade gambling and still other worse forms of wickedness, the N. S. A. can be relied upon to discontinue it. Channing says, "Of all the rational, clear-headed, and common-sense writers for your columns, who accept a belief in Spiritualism, Clara Watson takes the lead and holds it. She always presents sensible thoughts and does so in language both direct and plain." This is truly a beautiful compliment, and still does not tell one-half of her virtues.

The difficulty with Channing is, he doesn't see when she is joking. It is not good for man to live alone. It makes him envious, narrow, and crochety, savage, lacking in self-control and extremely dangerous as a leader. It is not good for a family to live alone. It needs contact with other families to prevent its becoming unpleasantly individualized. It is not good for a nation to live alone. Without intercommunication with other nations it could not become a world power.

Finally, it is good for a world to live alone. The lower world has tried it for a great many thousand years and every experiment has been a failure; every government and civilization of the past has ended in ruins. At last the two worlds are understandingly united. According to intelligent reports the upper world has not been an unblemished success while it cringed along so lonely and alone. A COMMUNICATION

From a Lady Old in the Experiences of Life in the Spirit Realms, Who Was Attracted to a Medium in Process of Development, in Elkhart, Ind.

I am an old lady. I mean old in my experiences in the life beyond the tomb. I came here this afternoon to tell you what this beautiful life over here what you children of earth-plane call "heaven." You were always taught to think of the death as a horror; while it is the most pleasurable event that can ever happen to mankind. It is the gateway to everlasting life and happiness, and all who enter the spiritual realms are forevermore in the eternal presence of the Infinite Spiritual Intelligence that rules this planetary system and also other systems. Your own life must necessarily be your own, and others' their own; by that I mean you and each of earth's children must be your own saviors. There is no mediator as the men of cloth say, but all are answerable for their own deeds done in the fleshly body.

There is a never ending eternity over the River of Life, as I call the river of so-called death, for we never need to pass through another transition in this world of spirits, but live on and on, definitely, never ceasing life. Think of it, never ending.

When you children of the earth-plane come over to the spirit side of life you will all go to your respective places of abode as you are fitted for that particular place of habitation. I mean, if your life here on the earth plane is good, you will be fitted to enter a more joyous sphere of existence than if your life was not good; and so it behooves you children of the earth plane to live as good as you know how to live, in order to be better fitted for the life beyond the tomb.

You do not have to get down on your knees and beg and pray to another person to save you. No, never, but just do unto others as you would want others to do unto you, in all things, and let the old idea of a saving blood of Jesus get banished from your mind, for Jesus was a perfect man but he did not intend for men and women and children to bow down to him. Oh, no, he simply showed the children of earth-plane how to live simple, pure and holy life, and never intended they should call him savior. He is over in spirit life now teaching the very same principles which he taught while on the earth-plane, and will always teach those same principles for the principle he teaches is Love, Love for all regardless of sex or nationality or color. They are all one in nature, the life force or principle in the negro is the same life force or principle in the Caucasian, or Indian, or even in the animals of the brute creation, or plant or mineral productions. All come from the great fountain-head of the Infinite Intelligence.

SEES VISION OF DAUGHTER.

She is Wide Awake When the Spirit of Her Daughter Appears to Her, and Converses With Her.

Springfield, Mass., Nov. 4.—Mrs. L. M. Nelson, mother of Miss Grace Nelson who was killed in a recent wreck on the Worcester and Southbridge Street Railway Company's line near Hammerock Station, made the startling statement on Nov. 4, that at the time of the accident, her daughter appeared to her in a vision and that they talked together. At the time Mrs. Nelson was visiting her mother, Mrs. Horne, at the old homestead in Charlton.

It was about 2:30 in the morning, Mrs. Nelson is sure she was awake at the time and is also sure that she saw and heard her daughter. Within a few minutes after the vision had faded away Mrs. Nelson was called to the telephone and informed that her daughter had been killed.

PEANUT PREACHING.

Some Pertinent Comments in Relation Thereeto.

Here is a sample of "Peanut Preaching." The dominie was lucky to pick out a peanut that had a kernel in it. We have already found several empty or had ones in a handful. Now, had he chosen a chestnut (just the thing for them) he might have had exemptions when you break open a hard shell. He might have found a living or gaudium within it that could crawl and kick (and I wager he would not put it out of sight as he did the peanut), and from this he might have explained, "that you don't always get what you are cracked about," in other words, what looks like a nut to a mind that is cracked and narrow, is nothing else but a measly worm or canker that is hidden under a beautiful glossy pretense, just as are the ministerial lies that are heralded every Sunday from every pulpit you can find a preacher in. But this teacher knew better than to choose a chestnut. He did not want to run any risk. He chose a peanut, thereby avoiding any "living" truths that he might bite into. He states that there are many things in the Bible that the most learned divines don't understand. Well, that doesn't hinder them from pretending that they do, and trying to force their puerile conceptions on others. A preacher might not understand how Jehovah engineered the job of killing "all the animals" "three times" in succession, when the ten plagues were sent on Pharaoh, and as a sort of grand climax wound up the engagement by drowning Pharaoh's entire army in the Red Sea, including the horses, though the poor beasts had already been killed three times in the other plagues. The preacher might not understand why this, neither might he understand why two "inspired" writers should give two different and distinct lineages of Christ's forefathers. St. Matthew says (1st chapter) that Joseph was the son of Jacob in line of descent, and St. Luke says (3rd chapter) that Joseph was the son of Heli. To mix up the line a little better, St. Matthew at the end of the lineage he gives, says that Christ had no earthly father at all, but was of divine origin. But the Bible being of divine "inspiration," a little "trifle" like this must not be noticed, and is not worth bothering about. You must take it "for granted," and God will fix up all such little mistakes for him.

All you have to do is to "crunch a peanut, and believe."

HONEST INVESTIGATOR.

MRS. CLARA WATSON.

She Frees Her Mind Concerning Several Matters in Particular.

To the Editor:—My subscription expired with the last number of The Progressive Thinker, and in renewing I want first, to congratulate you on your enterprise in sending out a superior paper every week. I do not know of an uninteresting number since you launched your paper on the sea of Journalism. I want to "go for" Sargis for mixing me up with religion, as he does in his fine article in a late issue. I quote: "Mrs. Clara Watson scores religion with a force that is almost religious in itself." While I admire Sargis' writings and agree with much of the sentiment expressed, yet I am above quoted statements, and certainly at sea—wise of the mark, and I here resent the "aspiration" cast upon my name.

Now, hearken, Sir Sargis. I simply told the truth and stated facts about religion, and do you not know that it is not the province of religion to speak the truth or relate facts? "Religious force" is not expended in this way. The work of religion is to cover up facts and to keep truth from the people, or in other words keep people in ignorance upon nature's sublime truth; and this is why Spiritualism can not rightly be classed religion, for its work is to present facts and truths that all the world may learn.

The mission of religion is to blind and blunt the reasoning powers, and that of Spiritualism is to open the understanding and set the torch of reason high on the pedestal of human life. Religion fetters the intellect and dwarfs the spiritual nature; while Spiritualism is an educator and expands the spiritual perceptions. Religion makes faith, and belief in man-made creeds and dogmas paramount; and Spiritualism makes character—works, deeds, motives, the all-important factor.

Talk about things, or ideas that Spiritualists hold in common, or upon which all can agree. It seems the strangest thing to me that all intelligent Spiritualists cannot discern between religion, with all its priestly toggeries of robes and rubbish, its senseless rituals, its useless forms of worship, with its gaudy splendor, with all its immense material wealth and display; its pomp and vain glory; with its poverty of spiritual riches; with its dictatorial and authoritative methods—it seems passing strange that all this cannot be distinguished from spiritual upliftment and attainment, and a betterment of humanity in all degrees of life, which constitute Spiritualism. It seems strange to me that the N. S. A. cannot see that Spiritualism does not need all the paraphernalia of churchcraft with its immense cost entailed upon it.

But whether are we drifting? "Church" doctrine is in the air. The N. S. A. seems holding the reins, and already its "dictatorship" begins mildly to be manifest in its "recommendations" that churches be established with stated or long term "pastors." Why not leave that matter to localities and Spiritualists interested there? Why should the N. S. A. assume to make the Spiritualists of Jamestown think they want a church and a settled pastor instead of a society, a synagogue, a mosque, or a place where they can hear the best from all? Don't the great mass of Spiritualists know better what they want than the little handful that constitute the National body?

All efforts at long term speakers have not proved successful. I know of one society in a near-by place where a four years' effort of one speaker was not considered a success by the society, and their "pastor" was one considered in the front ranks too; and that church has returned to the old way of monthly speakers. And by the way, Brother Moses is happy with an even thousand from the N. S. A. for his school, and writes a nice report of the late convention in which he gives the highest praise as a speaker to a visiting Universalist minister, and said, his fine speech "set me to longing more than ever for an educated ministry in our ranks." What a pity Spiritualism has no educated speakers. What a pity the convention had no one but an "ignoramus" to send over to that Universalist convention in exchange for the efforts of Mr. Rose, the Universalist. What a pity some of the graduates of the Morris Pratt School was not available. Now in closing these rambling

WAR AND PROGRESS.

BY HENRY MORRISON TEFFT, NORWICH, N. Y.

All progress comes out of need, want, dissatisfaction and unrest. Civilization moves on by reason of this universal desire for something different and better. Carlyle names as "the three great elements of civilization, Gunpowder, Printing and the Protestant Religion." Some one has said that, "The bayonet has carried civilization as far as ever did the Bible." But a bayonet is the weakest argument and the poorest weapon that can be brought to bear in the support of a government. "The last argument of kings" were the words that Louis XIV had inscribed upon a cannon.

Those countries that are the most intelligent, the most christian, maintain the greatest armies and the most powerful navies. While war seems to follow along the lines of progress and national advancement, it does not follow along the lines of justice and righteousness. Every dollar spent in armies and navies is thrown away and brings no adequate return. War takes away, not only the substance of a nation, but robs it of the youth and vigor of its manhood. "War is hell." It blinds, daddens and paralyzes the sensibilities of a people.

Starr King claimed that "When Rome fell she had more troops and fortifications than in the height of her republican supremacy, but she had lost her real and invisible strength, that of temperance, hardihood, valor, moral soundness; * * * No individual ever takes warning from the experience of others that have been shipwrecked on the very course he is pursuing. No nation ever views with alarm the growth of those very sentiments, ideas and conditions, within its own borders, that have overthrown other and quite as flourishing governments."

No war from a moral standpoint is justifiable except in self-defense, or in behalf of some universal and elemental or primal principle of liberty and justice, that is being overthrown or subverted. But neither religion or morals is any guide to progress. The revolutionary war was begun for the purpose of resisting unjust taxation, not for independence. The war of the rebellion was commenced to save the Union, not for the freedom of the slave, but in the end both purposes were accomplished. Taxation in time becomes confiscation; diplomacy has been known to degenerate into duplicity and who can say at what point treason becomes patriotism?

"Treason doth never prosper; what's the reason? Why, if it prosper, none dare call it treason."

The magnitude of translation sometimes turns infamy into glory. "One to destroy is murder by the law. And gibbets keep the lifted hand in awe; To murder thousands takes a specious name, War's glorious art, and gives immortal fame."

We may abhor war but it clears the path for progress. It is claimed that the crusades were the first blows struck to the feudal system and they paved the way for the reformation. Commerce civilizes more people than churches, books and teachers. The railway is a greater missionary than the preacher. Unless man's intuition is a lie, and his struggle for the betterment of his condition a delusion, then every belief, however mistaken, that has taken hold of any considerable class of mankind, and every system of government, however cruel and oppressive, that has been adopted by any clan, tribe or nation, must have been in the interest of progress and must have been a necessary step in the evolution of the world.

If a man is true to nature he cannot be false to history or mankind. Instinct was a guide and teacher before ever reason, intelligence or learning were born. We cannot view questions alike. Where one man sees only words another sees thoughts, poetry, eloquence. Where one man sees only the common place, another sees beauty, grandeur, sublimity. Where one man hears only sounds another listens to symphonies, oratorios and inspiring music. War to one man is progress, manifest destiny and the spread of wider knowledge and greater liberty, while to another it means devastation, demoralization and ruin.

The hand on the dial of time never moves backward. Truth lives; by fire, by sword or by persuasion she conquers. There has always been, as if appointed by Providence, a Napoleon, a Washington, a Lincoln at the very time, place and age in which such a man was needed. It is doubtful if either of these men would have answered for any other emergency, only the one in which he was placed.

thoughts may I inquire if the convention adopted the "Diamond Rule" recommended by President Barrett, "Do all for others?" and will some one explain that rule? If we are to do all for others, can we do anything for ourselves, and if we do nothing for ourselves will we be in shape to do anything for others?

THE CAUSE AT CANTON, OHIO.

The Excellent Work of the President of the State Association.

We have had with us for the past week the president of the O. S. O. Mr. F. D. Dunakin, and his brother from Kansas, O. P. Dunakin, who, by the way, is a physical medium of considerable note for trumpet and partial materializations. Their meetings and circles have been well patronized, and all who have attended them are assured that our brothers are touching and demonstrating the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism from a truthful standpoint.

The lecturer, Mr. F. D. Dunakin, teaches philosophical Spiritualism on one evening, and on the next this philosophy is actually demonstrated by his brother showing to the investigator and researcher that the excellent demonstration, to stay a day or two, and then to Martin's Ferry to fill an engagement at that place. They expect to make a tour of the state in the interest of the O. S. A. and the cause in general, and we trust that great good will result from their labors, for Spiritualism to-day demands good, clean, honest, workers who not only teach the philosophy, but also actually demonstrate that teaching by showing the people the phenomenal part, thus changing their faith into actual knowledge.

We hope to have our brothers back with us again at some time in the near future for the people of Canton are actually "hungering and thirsting" after such work as our brothers have given to us.

The harvest is great, but the true, honest laborers are very few, such as who are fully able to voice the sentiments of the angel world, and demonstrate the same by honest, truthful materializations.

We all support you in your honest effort to eradicate from the cause the hands of the trickster, and to place our glorious religion again on an honest foundation, that it may ever move on as the years roll by, promulgating and teaching the grandest truths that were ever given to mankind. DR. BENJAMIN LINT. Canton, Ohio.

No great cause ever came into the world without an advocate. No truth ever lies; no great man was ever extinguished; kill him and he comes to life again; you bury him, and his resurrection is sure. The Jews buried Christ, but he rose again and became the prophet for all time, all ages and all people. Who cares who the judges were that tried Emmet, that condemned Socrates or that passed sentence upon Galileo. The fame of their victims grows brighter as the years roll on, but the names of the judges are forgotten and all that remains of their history is the record of their infamy.

All great movements in history have been more or less determined by battle. Our own country was born out of war. But in a certain address delivered in a western state the speaker said: "When history is written as it should be written, and as it will one day be written, it will be discovered that the great events of national progress have not been the battles and the campaigns, the spread of territory and the growth of resources, but rather the development of the great ideas that lie fundamental to our national existence. Then it will be written, not: In such and such a year the Americans won such and such a battle; not: In such and such a decade these elements of national prosperity were discovered; but it will be written: In this or that year the American people laid hold upon, grasped hard and made a part of their national thinking and of their national program, this or that great truth."

Strange things are constantly happening. What is miraculous at one time is commonplace in another. What is wonderful to-day excites no curiosity to-morrow. What once existed only as a sentiment, a feeling, a desire, in time becomes a reality, a living force. If it was a fact, as is claimed, that the presence of Napoleon upon the battle-field was equal to 40,000 soldiers; if it was true that Mary, Queen of Scots, had more reason to fear the prayers of John Knox than an army of 10,000 men, then we must believe that there is something in this world stronger than physical strength and brute force.

We frequently voice great truths without knowing from whence they come. The expression such and such things "are in the air" is often used, but how little we understand the philosophy of the remark. Mind acts upon mind, thought upon thought. The anti-slavery sentiment, at some time and some place, was only a single voice, but it multiplied and grew in power and influence, then it began to be proclaimed from the platform, the press, and the pulpit; it increased in volume and force until its presence was made known in the fire of musketry, the bursting shell and the roaring cannon, and finally in a voice that was heard around the whole world, it demanded "Unconditional surrender" at Appomattox.

Events move rapidly when we come to compare what we call time with eternity; our view with God's view. It is only a short distance from an Indian trail to a public highway—from a savage war-whoop to the whistle of a steam engine. The dream of the people to-day is for a universal peace. Will it ever be realized? An editorial writer in one of our daily papers says, "The time is undoubtedly coming when the decision of international disputes will be left not to the force of arms but to the decision of cool-headed judgment and calm, common sense. * * * The gun and the sword are less and less, year by year, the elements of settlement. Every element is making for the elimination of force and for the advancement of arbitration. It is not probably a far cry to the time when a resort to arms will be regarded as a barbaric thing—when the armed soldier will be but a relic of a bygone age, preserved as a memorial of a force and power that showed the one time potency of a feudal age."

This is truly optimistic in view of the mighty preparations that the nations of the earth are now everywhere making for war. But is there not as much light in the world as darkness? As much life as death? As much joy as sorrow? As much hope as despair? Who can answer? Who can say but what good and evil hold equal sway and balance each other? No one knows what the ultimate destiny of man is.

All material matter, after it has reached a certain point, goes back again into the crucible of nature and is reinvigorated, remodeled and again passes through the stages of youth, age, decay and death. Is this true of civilization and life? Is there no possible ideal for men to attain? Is there no time when the barbarian element, and the desire for revenge and punishment, inherent in his nature, will be eliminated and peace, and love, and justice, hold full sway therein?

And as I note how nobly nature's form Under the war's red rain, I deem it true That He who made earthquake and the storm Perchance made battle, too."

Winans at Decatur, Illinois.

A Statement Made by Those Present, Followed by a Lucid Explanation by Mr. Joel Richardson, Who Shows How the Trick Is Done.

IN WINANS' DEFENSE.

To the Editor:—Having been a reader of The Progressive Thinker for some years, and an ardent admirer of the great philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism, I have watched and studied the different phases of manifestations through many different mediums, and have come to a very decided conclusion, that we have not as yet arrived at a definite understanding of the ways and methods of spirit intelligences in their creation of materialized forms, and their clothing thereof, and I have some time, interest in the Court of Inquiry, but have discerned the spirit of unfairness in which said court has dealt with C. E. Winans; for this court, as all others, cannot give a just verdict without hearing the testimony from both sides, and considering the same without prejudice or partiality; therefore I desire to state, uncollected only by a sense of justice, that I have known C. E. Winans for a number of years, and witnessing his manifestations in different places and under various conditions, he has always come into our own home, and bringing nothing with him, or having no opportunity to get any help outside the spirit forces, and his manifestations were satisfactory to the receivers of the same; hence we could not say these people were not capable of judging what they saw.

But after reading so much against the probability of the genuineness of his manifestations, a number of our best investigators decided to invite him to come to our city again, and submit to whatever test conditions they might consider satisfactory, and to this proposition he most readily gave assent. So the 26th of September was the date on which this test was carried out. The undersigned committee placed a black cloth on the floor, seating Mr. Winans in the center of the same, sewing him fast to the chair, filling his hands with oatmeal, and placing his feet in a pan of flour, placing seals on all the doors and windows. The music for the occasion was produced from a small Swiss box not larger than 4 by 6 inches.

In a very few minutes after all was in readiness, forms began to come forth from the room in which the medium was secured, to be recognized by their friends and proving their identity to them, many of them dematerializing out side the cabinet in full view, some 15 or more appearing during the evening. At the conclusion the medium was found in the same condition as he was placed in, with no marks of flour on the black cloth, everything being satisfactory. He gave another seance on the 28th, with equally as satisfactory results. Hoping to see this published, I thought due C. E. Winans, we remain yours for truth.

MRS. INDIA HILL, MR. FRANKLIN M. HILL, MRS. ORA PROCK, MRS. CHAS. PROCK, MRS. E. D. ENGWEILER, MRS. NELLIE TAY, HAY. Decatur, Ill.

THE OTHER SIDE PRESENTED.

Mr. Joel Richardson, of Hayesville, Iowa, a Prominent Spiritualist and Held in High Esteem by All, Has Had Some Exceptionally Interesting Experiences With Winans, and Which Will Make a Deep Impression on Those Who Have Not Lost the Ability to Reflect on Any Important Question.

To the Editor:—I am requested to write something in reply to the testimonial of Mrs. Hill and others in favor of C. E. Winans as a materializing medium; but I do not feel that in doing so I will bring any credit to myself or convince Mrs. India Hill or any one of Mr. Winans' friends that he would perpetrate a fraud on them. I sympathize, however, with the signers of the testimonial, for I at one time would have written just such a testimonial myself, and would have had no trouble in getting twenty of the neighbors to sign it with me. When I had witnessed six or eight of his seances I would have sworn them to be genuine; but after keeping him in my home a month or more my eyes were opened to the fact that he was practicing premeditated and prearranged fraud.

I notice in the testimonial that the committee placed him, under certain test conditions, which happen to be precisely the same conditions we imposed (at his suggestion). And here let me ask the committee: Did he not suggest, sewing him in his chair, tell you how and where to put the stitches? also to put meal in his hands, and his feet in flour? and did he not have his socks on while his feet were in the flour? Did he not furnish the thread or require a certain kind used in sewing him into his chair?

I refer to these things because they furnished the clue that betrayed him, and enabled us to perform the same tricks in the same way.

Mr. Editor: I do not know how the phenomena were produced at Mr. Winans' seances today, I only know how he produced them a number of years ago; but his requiring the same test conditions now that he did then, is an inference at least that he is still practicing some of his old tricks.

And here let me give some of the proofs of fraud while he was with us. He furnished the thread, a spool of coarse black linen thread with which to sew him in his chair, but on one occasion Mrs. Richardson had misplaced the thread and could not find it when it was needed. She asked him if other thread would not do. "No," he said, "I don't think it will," but when she showed him a spool of black cotton thread, he said to her, "I don't think it will do, but after the seance, when we went in to cut the threads and help him out of his chair, Mrs. R. saved the threads with which he was then sewed, and also picked up from the floor beside him another bunch and went (taking a number of us with her) into another room, and we examined the two sewings and found them identical in every respect, except

WHITWORTH'S OBSERVATIONS.

"My Fellow Workmen, Who Desire Only Righteous Government, How Like You the Outlook—a Powerful Church Seeking to Break Down the Public Schools and Get a Clutch on the Government; and a Low Down, Gambling, Dive-keeping Saloon Boss Elected to the U. S. Senate?"

Pa, what is religion? The rule of right living, my son. Of course, Pa, there can't be only one right living?

Correct, my boy. That which is right must be built on the solid foundation of truth; hence can not be twisted either this way or that in the slightest particular. But, say, Pa, what a lot of different religions there is; some of 'em as savage as a cat, and some as a couple of strange cats an' dogs!

Mistaken, my son. There is a large number of differing organizations that hold themselves up under the name of religion, with little more than the name to show for it.

In largest degree these so-called religious churches are founded on priest-made creeds and ceremonial formalities, set up for the sole purpose of de-luding people into blind obedience to the dogmas set forth as coming direct from God.

It has been so all through the world's history; growing out of the pitiful fact that the chief bulk of men do not trouble themselves to think, leaving it to sharp-witted, unprincipled rascals for the most part to do their thinking for them.

And in every case of this religious domination a sleek chap, who saw it would be a good thing to ride on top of fool fellows' shoulders, so as to get luxurious living without the hard work of earning it by honest labor, has had a message from heaven, appointing him a chosen prophet of God, to tell the people just what the mighty ruler of the universe desired his earthly children to do, and that they must implicitly obey that great prophet, as if in obedience to this great ruler himself.

You can see, my dear boy, the terrible power this gave into the hands of heartless scoundrels who looked on the toiling masses of the people as a mere no-account mob, who could be plundered at will.

Leaving the earlier grades of imposture, I will come to one of the most successful—Mahomet; a common mule-driver, a number of hundred years ago, who got his regulation message from Allah—God—in a dream, and was duly appointed prophet, to be his mouth-piece to the children of men.

And straightway a bible, called the Koran, was duly concocted as a guide to the faithful; showing how they could gain everlasting bliss in paradise, along with tenderloin women called "Houris," and thus dodge a fate of endless woe awaiting all those who did not believe in the dictum set forth by the prophet, Mahomet.

To-day there are hundreds of millions of such devoted believers in this bald-faced humbuggery, that they would treat to pieces any one who dared to say the sacred prophet was a mere loafer who set up a scheme to steal a fat living from those who earned it.

In our day we have the contemptible tramp, Joe Smith, who had the same old, old message from heaven to establish the only real, pure religion—Mormonism.

But, leaving these impostors to one side, my son; even passing by the latest message from heaven—rascal Dowie, the second-hand Elijah—I will call your attention, my boy, to the direful effects of this fraudulent business of men setting themselves up to be the special Rulers of God, whom everybody must obey on pain of eternity in the raging fire of a bottomless pit.

A history of what is termed the "Dark Ages of Europe" shows the awful depth of ignorance, brutal tyranny of the church in conjunction with kingly despots; robbery, torture and murder by wholesale which filled the land with crime and misery unnumbered.

As it has ever been, priestcraft joined with kingscraft to rule and plunder the people and the damnable work everlastingly carried on in the name of God!

Inevitably, as a means to hold millions of people in quiet subjection to this double role of infernal despotism, the mass of the people were systematically held down to the dark night of ignorance. To accomplish this the schools were kept within the tight clutch of the church; the priests being the teachers, to instill into young minds the earliest infancy that the chief and most paramount learning they required was to obey the church in all the priest taught as vital to their well-being in this world, as only salvation in the next.

And now, my boy, this matter becomes vital to every lover of liberty of conscience in this free land; for the same dominant priestcraft which steeped Europe in blood and rapine in the dark ages is busy in determined endeavor to subject the people of our loved country to the same ignorant, superstitious domination.

From their earliest foothold here there has been determined effort to break down our grandest establishment, the free public schools, which gives to every child, rich and poor, the same golden opportunity of learning all of useful knowledge that can be acquired.

It is fatal to that church's dominances. It can only flourish on the bed-rock of stolid ignorance, and its ceaseless aim is to get as full control as possible of children's mind training, as the only sure means of molding the priest-crammed scholars into superstitious obedience to the dictates of the church.

Then behind this is a second sinister aim; to secure a preponderating share in the people's government.

A recent utterance of a foremost leader in that church, one Archbishop Moeller, of Cincinnati, in publicly nominating Gov. Herrick for President of the United States, is a warning note of deep significance.

MATERIALIZATION

"What I Know of Astute, material minds of that church, have noted the pitiable weakness of Gov. Herrick in lending himself to the complete control of such a low, depraved creature as Boss Cox, and the conclusion came to us that if they can materially help such a small fry politician as this tenderloin boosted banker to the high office of President, he would be a tool they could use to the fullest limit of his official influence.

My fellow workmen, who desire only righteous government, how like you the outlook?—a powerful church seeking to break down the public schools and get a clutch on the government; and a low down gambling, dive-keeping saloon boss elected to the U. S. Senate."

Pagan Thanksgiving.

There is a lot of truth in the following remarks by the Chicago Chronicle: Pagan Thanksgiving is a proclamation and Thanksgiving proclamation in general as they have appeared in the past. It would be a profitable exercise if the reverential gentlemen of the sacred profession would sit "in the silence" and meditate upon the subject so lucidly presented by the secular Chronicle. It would open up a new vision of the truth of things, and would overturn some of their cherished beliefs.

"President Roosevelt's Thanksgiving proclamation, while the verbiage is more historical and argumentative than usual, presents the same general features as all similar proclamations for the last century or two—and all of them are un-Christian in their sentiment and theology.

"They all proceed on the theory that the acts of Divine Providence are to be classed as good and bad or as kind and unkind and that the blessing is due only for the kindly acts, the others being passed over in silence. If the real sense and meaning of all the Thanksgiving proclamations that have ever been made were given it would be somewhat as follows:

"Our Heavenly Father during the past year has been in various moods. During the greater part of the time he has been cross and severe. We have met with many losses and disappointments and suffered much sickness, bereavement and persecution. The weather has been disagreeable, old age has been creeping on us and some terrible disasters on land and sea have occurred.

"It is fitting at this time of the year that the mantle of charity should be drawn over all these painful dispensations of providence. We should for the time at least forgive and forget them. We cannot possibly approve of or justify them, but we can for the sake of peace and present enjoyment ignore them.

"On the approaching Thanksgiving let us confine our thoughts to the kindly and agreeable things that our Heavenly Father has done during the past year. Our crops have been good, our business prosperous and our health for the most part good. We have not known war, famine or pestilence. The earth is beautiful, the sky is glorious, friendship and love are precious and the hope of heaven is left us. Let us devote one day to unfeigned gratitude and praise for these mercies.

"This may seem a shocking travesty to President Roosevelt and other authors of Thanksgiving proclamations and probably they will be still more shocked if we should attempt to give some idea of the sentiment which should run through every such proclamation, for it should be somewhat as follows:

"Our Heavenly Father during the past year has been what he has been every year and from all eternity—infinite good. It would be impious for us to distinguish between the different acts of his providence and to say that one was any more gentle, loving and kind than any other. If at times we have been miserable it is altogether because we have misunderstood and doubted him and repudiated his guidance in the affairs of our lives.

"God is love, and although some of his providences have been painful and some enjoyable all of them have been infinitely wise and loving, and if we ought to thank him any more for one thing than another it is for his gentle guidance and his fatherly corrections.

"Let us devote one entire day to praising God for all that he is and for everything that he does. Let us assemble in our temples, let us recount all his wonderful works and let us sing until the very angels hear us the praises of our God. Let the language of every heart be:

"Thou that hast given so much to me Give one thing more—a grateful heart; Not thankful when it pleaseth me, As if thy mercy had spare days, But such a heart whose pulse shall be The praise."

"If such a proclamation would shock any Christian it would be because he does not know his bible and has been badly taught. These sentiments are precisely the sentiments of his religion, and by the same token the average Thanksgiving proclamation is unadulterated paganism."

Populations and Religions.

Hammond's Modern Atlas of the World, just from the press, gives the earth's population as 1,697,000,000. Divided into: Buddhists480,000,000 Brahmins220,000,000 Mohammedans220,000,000 Protestants170,000,000 Greek Catholics170,000,000 Roman Catholics270,000,000 Heathen140,000,000 Copts, Armenians, Melchites, 7,000,000 Of course Spiritualists, Agnostics, Atheists and all forms of heresy are counted as Protestants, greatly swelling the number of the latter.

The Great Questions Answered.

"When shall spring visit the moldering urn? When shall day dawn on the night of the grave?"

In all preceding ages the above inquiries agitated the thinking world; but the sphinx remained silent. The old philosophers deduced the idea of an immortal life from various natural phenomena. Their conclusions were crude and quite unsatisfactory. Almost universally those who adopted the faith believed the material body laid aside at death would be reanimated when time should end, and then would revel in endless bliss, else writhe in agony in an unending place of torment. The Christian system taught the resurrection of the body. They seem to have had no conception of existence independent of gross materiality. Their story of the bodily resurrection of Jesus, and his eating, drinking, fishing and teaching after that resurrection; and, finally, his bodily ascension to heaven, with promise of return in "like manner," leaves no possibility of doubt as to the kind of body which they supposed would survive the tomb.

Zoroaster taught a bodily resurrection. Babylonians, Assyrians, Arabians, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Greeks and Italians, all contemplated an Elysium as a final home for the blest of re-animated humanity.

The Columbian Orator, an American school book of a hundred years ago, contains an Extract from a Sermon on the Day of Judgment," pages 97-8, which gives a faithful view of what our recent Christian ancestors taught in regard to "the children of the resurrection," the absolute belief prevailing at the advent of Spiritualism. The field is so rich, it is difficult to gain an idea from a brief extract. The good preacher had dwelt with much force on the sound of the great trumpet which all in their graves shall hear and come forth, then—

"The living shall start and be changed, and the dead rise at the sound. The dust that was once alive, and formed a human body, whether it flies in the air, or in the ocean, or vegetates on earth, shall hear the new-creating fiat. Wherever the fragments of the human frame are scattered, this all-penetrating call shall reach and speak them into life. . . . Now methinks I see, I hear, the earth heaving, charnel houses rattling, tombs bursting, graves opening. Now the nations under ground begin to stir. There is a noise and a snaking among the dry bones. The dust is all alive and in motion. The globe breaks and trembles, as with an earthquake, while this vast army is working its way through, and bursting into life. The ruins of human bodies are scattered far and wide, and have passed through many, and surprising transformations. A limb in one country, and another in another; here the head, there the trunk, and an ocean rolling between. At the sound of the trumpet, they shall all be collected, wherever scattered, all properly sorted and united, however they were confused, atom to its fellow atom, bone to its fellow bone. The air is darkened with fragments of bodies, flying from country to country, to meet and join their proper parts.

But enough of Christian teaching. The tiny raps, first fully recognized at Hydesville, N. Y., some fifty-seven years ago, changed all past conceptions of the immortal life. Instead of a heaven just above the clouds, it was located here, and now, and all about us. There is no resurrection, because there is no death. The body laid aside at what we wrongly call death, is but the worn out and cast off habiliments of the real, genuine, living body; a body, so far as we know not subject to disease, decay or death.

With no rest in the grave, no grand general judgment day, no hell of sulphurous flame, no devils or damned spirits, we can all sing joyfully, in the adapted words of Beattie, a Scottish poet of an earlier age.

"Darkness and doubt have now flown away, No longer we roam in conjecture forlorn, So breaks on the traveler, faint and astray, The bright and the balmy effulgence of morn. See Truth, Love and Mercy, in triumph descending, And Nature, all glowing in Time's primal bloom! On the cold cheek of Death smiles and roses are blending, For heavenly mortal n'er sleeps in the tomb."

The Wherefore of a Fact. Race suicide seems to distress civilians; even the President of the United States has called attention to it, while statistics show an absolute decrease from year to year since the civil war, of birth. So marked is this decrease it seems alarming.

The causes for this condition are very apparent. Fifty years ago teachers in our public schools were mostly males. So, too, were the clerics in stores. The learned professions were wholly monopolized by the sterner sex. Now not only the school room, but the bar, the pulpit and the medical profession are, to some extent, worthily filled by women. We find them everywhere. They are our short-hand reporters, type-writers, accountants, cashiers in the stores, assistants in banks, and trusty clerks in law offices. Go into the court houses, and every department of public business seems managed by ladies acting as clerks. They have engaged in business and in commerce. Educated women serve as captains on ship board.

In every department where they have engaged they have done more trusty than men. Soon they will be found in our legislative halls, may all places on the judicial bench, and if not made governors and presidents it will not be for want of qualification.

Now all these employments and motherhood are incompatible. Cease educating the girls, and drive them back to menial servitude, else be content with a smaller population and a better.

Alma to Increase Church Going.

"A vigorous campaign has been planned by the rector and vestry of St. James' Episcopal Church, for the purpose of teaching the people in the vicinity of the church the habit of church going."

"This unique plan was disclosed yesterday by the Rev. Dr. Stone, who at the services in the morning called for thirty volunteers to make a house to house canvass in the neighborhood of St. James' Church, with a view to inducing the people to become members of the church.

"A circular will be sent to everybody in the district, explaining why they should attend church, and visit by the rector's committee will follow and every effort be made to persuade them to become communicants of the church."

The fact is, people are thinking now-a-days, and do not care to be dictated to as to the relation of their souls to an Episcopal, a Catholic or a Protestant God. The law that used to give men's souls into the keeping of some priest or minister is inoperative now, because the human mind has outgrown it.

The church jumped from congregational singing to the rendering of classic music, violins, cornets, harps, cellos, etc., and increased their attendance for a time, but now that falls them.

Perhaps they might make a difference by presenting some proof of their claims of the immortality of the soul. This is a day and age of rationalism, and people want evidence, demonstration of the genuineness of any and all claims.

The world has changed some in the last century and the church must keep pace or go down.

Spiritualism fattens upon the heresy and heretics of all religions. A heretic is a thinker and a progressive being or he would still be in the church, groping about in credal darkness.

We advise them to secure up some proof. That is the food needed for the hungry minds of today.

The Work of the Lyceum. It may be accepted as a fact that in many instances belief and reason hold a close relationship; but it must also be admitted that it is a mistake to think that all our beliefs are the result of reasoning. Reasoning may produce belief, but it is by no means the only thing that can and does have this effect.

Is it not a fact, within the knowledge of all, that children in Sunday-schools are taught to believe, as a matter of course, what is told them concerning the bible and its doctrines? Its dogmas, as interpreted by the church, are instilled into their receptive minds, and believed with a faith that is mostly invulnerable to reason. The lessons of the Sunday-school are rock-bound, riveted, unquestioned in the child mind. They are overcome only by a painful course of evolution—a mental revolution.

This constitutes a strong reason why Spiritualists should organize children's lyceums, to teach children truths that are in accord with principles of science, in harmony with nature and highest conceptions of God. A limb in one country, and another in another; here the head, there the trunk, and an ocean rolling between. At the sound of the trumpet, they shall all be collected, wherever scattered, all properly sorted and united, however they were confused, atom to its fellow atom, bone to its fellow bone. The air is darkened with fragments of bodies, flying from country to country, to meet and join their proper parts.

But enough of Christian teaching. The tiny raps, first fully recognized at Hydesville, N. Y., some fifty-seven years ago, changed all past conceptions of the immortal life. Instead of a heaven just above the clouds, it was located here, and now, and all about us. There is no resurrection, because there is no death. The body laid aside at what we wrongly call death, is but the worn out and cast off habiliments of the real, genuine, living body; a body, so far as we know not subject to disease, decay or death.

With no rest in the grave, no grand general judgment day, no hell of sulphurous flame, no devils or damned spirits, we can all sing joyfully, in the adapted words of Beattie, a Scottish poet of an earlier age.

"Darkness and doubt have now flown away, No longer we roam in conjecture forlorn, So breaks on the traveler, faint and astray, The bright and the balmy effulgence of morn. See Truth, Love and Mercy, in triumph descending, And Nature, all glowing in Time's primal bloom! On the cold cheek of Death smiles and roses are blending, For heavenly mortal n'er sleeps in the tomb."

The Wherefore of a Fact. Race suicide seems to distress civilians; even the President of the United States has called attention to it, while statistics show an absolute decrease from year to year since the civil war, of birth. So marked is this decrease it seems alarming.

The causes for this condition are very apparent. Fifty years ago teachers in our public schools were mostly males. So, too, were the clerics in stores. The learned professions were wholly monopolized by the sterner sex. Now not only the school room, but the bar, the pulpit and the medical profession are, to some extent, worthily filled by women. We find them everywhere. They are our short-hand reporters, type-writers, accountants, cashiers in the stores, assistants in banks, and trusty clerks in law offices. Go into the court houses, and every department of public business seems managed by ladies acting as clerks. They have engaged in business and in commerce. Educated women serve as captains on ship board.

In every department where they have engaged they have done more trusty than men. Soon they will be found in our legislative halls, may all places on the judicial bench, and if not made governors and presidents it will not be for want of qualification.

Now all these employments and motherhood are incompatible. Cease educating the girls, and drive them back to menial servitude, else be content with a smaller population and a better.

A Remarkable Incident.

The following, illustrating Spirit Power to a marked degree, is given by Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, Lecturer and Platform Test Medium. It will be read with deep interest.

A GRAND AND BEAUTIFUL DEATH.

Illustrating the Comprehensive Fact That Spiritualism Can Redeem the World From the Bondage of Ignorance and Superstition—A Startling Vision and a Soul-Elevating Discourse by Georgia Gladys Cooley.

Miss Lydia Riedel passed into the spirit life from her earth home in Chicago, Sunday, October 22, at about 8:45 p. m., at the age of 23 years.

The young lady was unknown to and unheard of by the writer until she appeared at a public meeting some thirty minutes after she had left the mortal form.

After concluding the lecture of the evening I passed under the control of Mayflower. She had been giving messages somewhere near an hour when she said: "Here is a beautiful girl who has just passed from the body," going into details of death, home surroundings, describing friends and imitating the moans of the mother, which will never be forgotten by myself.

The older guide then stepped forward saying: "This young spirit is beautiful, and quite ready to go. She has made three attempts to leave the earth plane, but was held back by the depressing thought force of the grieving ones at home." He then asked that all present, mortals and spirits, concentrate on the young girl with the thought of freedom and liberation.

A vision then presented itself to the medium, showing a large number of spirit forms forming a circle around the girl. Following this a small group of spirits appeared. A young man stepped from the group saying, "Come!" He then took the form in his arms and bore it away, the two passing out of the hall through a west window. A perfect sense of peace prevailed, and after a few words of explanation the meeting closed.

The next morning a young man called at my home, asking if I could officiate at a funeral on the morrow. He was invited in, and in almost an instant the same beautiful girl appeared, saying, "Brother, I'm with you. It was so hard for you all to let me go, especially poor mother, but I'm all right. Brother Fred (I believe this was the name she called) came and took me away and I have felt happy ever since."

On calling at the home the next day everything and everybody seemed familiar, probably from the impressions left on the brain by the vision of the night before.

New York the Great Idol Factory.

The Bangkok Times, of Siam India, says:

"Probably the only idol factory in the world is now located in the city of New York, where the idols of all countries are reproduced and new ones manufactured. India gets the largest shipment; but from some countries even further east comes an ever increasing demand. The average foreign shipment varies from a couple of hundred to a thousand images every thirty days. By far the largest number of idols are made of plaster, coated, oiled and polished to resemble old bronze."

Idols of plaster, wood and stone are not the most injurious object of worship manufactured in the great American metropolis. That fictitious character of priestly priests, represented to have said, Matt. 10:34, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword," was no God, or son of a God if he ever said any such thing, and yet he is worshipped as such. The assertion is an ecclesiastical fabrication, as must have been the character who is represented to have given utterance to such a barbarous thought.

WILLIE'S DREAM.

I had such a beautiful dream last night, A dream I shall never forget; Such beautiful angels beamed into my sight, Their faces are haunting me yet. The one in the center I thought that I knew. She called me her own Willie dear; She kissed and caressed me as mother used to. When she was so sickly down here. But her cheeks were fair, and my mother's were pale; Her hands were strong—my mother's were weak; Oh, do they in heaven grow rugged and hale, And are they permitted to speak?

She came down beside me, took hold of my hand, And led me away to a place With flowers surrounded, so fragrant and grand. Their sweetest time cannot efface. She called it her mansion in soul-land above. And said that she built it with deeds; Its brightness and beauty, the outgrowth of love. The flowers were kindnesses' seeds. She said she was waiting for sister and me, And working to keep our souls pure, For soon shall our spirits be perfectly free. And go on our heavenly tour. It may be but dreaming, but somehow I feel That that was my mother's own face, And unto my spirit she wished to reveal Her spirit, her home and its place.

I know she is living and loving me still, Because she was good, true and kind; And life is eternal and time does not kill The love of a dear mother mind. DR. T. WILKINS.

She raised her eyes and dropped a tear; She pondered on the words she read; "Ah, that is not the dearest face I need. To be forgotten when we are dead. But while we breathe, and to them give Our days, our nights, our being—Oh! To be forgotten while we live; That is the bitterness of woe!"—Lloyd Milfin.

"The Truth Seeker Collection of Poems and Reminiscences for the Use of Librarians." Price 25 cents.

Instead of the old accustomed crepe on the door, a beautiful cluster of flowers tied by white ribbon, met my gaze.

There was no darkened house, and as I entered the parlor—a room filled with flowers—I beheld the form of a beautiful young girl clad in a robe of white lying on a canopy casket of the same color, almost leading one to believe she had just returned from a walk on a summer's afternoon, and had thrown herself on a couch to rest and had fallen to sleep.

Yes, sleep had come to that outward form, but dear Lydia herself having awakened into new realizations of life was present to console mother, father, sisters, brothers and friends.

This young girl had been convinced of Spiritualism some four years ago, and began to develop mediumship soon thereafter, being able to comfort many sorrowing souls before she left for her higher life.

Her circle, as they termed it, was present and sang her favorite song, which was followed by the funeral sermon. Six young men as pall bearers, and as many young ladies clad in white, as flower bearers, presented a beautiful and touching scene as they gathered around the casket to look for the last time upon the deserted form of one they loved so well.

The doors were then closed, only the family aid writer remaining, and as I stood there and watched each member of that family bid farewell to the shell that had held their pearl, I thought to myself, Give me spiritualism against all other religions in the world combined, for it is the only one that stands by us in the real and substantial manner when we need it most.

A very large number of friends were present, the rooms and hallways being crowded, and many were obliged to linger on the lawn during the services. The expression of love was also beautifully manifested by the numerous floral offerings. Indeed, this dear young girl left many friends on earth but no doubt was welcomed by as many in her new home.

Lydia, dear, you have gone and left us, Still we know you'll linger near, And you'll bring sweet joy and comfort To the ones you still hold dear.

Grand scenes and pleasures greet you, And we know you're free from pain. Go on, dear one, in your progress For we're sure we'll meet again. GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY.

TO THE SPIRITUALIST PRESS.

An Explanation From the N. S. A. Office.

As secretary of the N. S. A. I deem it my duty to take notice through your valuable paper of two statements recently made in certain publications concerning the action of the late annual convention in Minneapolis. One is, that delegates who were not Spiritualists, but pronounced Theosophists or writers in New Thought, were seated to represent societies of the N. S. A. I cannot believe that this is true, inasmuch as I had access to the credential list before it went to the committee, and I know that no names but those of prominent Spiritualists from various sections were on that list.

Of course the list can be only partly made up before it goes to the credential committee as many societies do not send the credentials or name their delegates till convention opens, though requested to do so, but as the credential committee was made up of well known and pronounced Spiritualists with Mr. H. W. Richardson, president of the New York State Association as chairman, I feel certain that none but Spiritualists were admitted to the privilege of the floor. Besides, the question comes up at every convention of allowing none but members of some Spiritualistic society to be seated as delegates or proxies, and is tacitly adhered to.

The other matter is that of annual reports being printed in the papers before convention. I do not understand why the committee on reports should have stated that such reports are likely to be altered at convention, hence should not be printed till after that meeting. Such a statement is absurd. The reports are handed to the reading clerk by the N. S. A. secretary, except the Lyceum report and that of Missionary Sprague—these are submitted by the titles making them. They are all read in open convention just as they were written. No one attempts to alter them in any manner. There is no possibility of their being changed, nor does the convention ever order any change in them.

These reports are absolutely given to the public as first made by the officers of the N. S. A. How could any alteration, for instance, be made in the financial reports of a secretary and treasurer without garbling the books and confusing the auditing committee. For one, I protest against such a statement going before the public. I have always felt that the annual reports of the officers of a national convention belong first to the assembled delegates of that organization, and afterwards to the public, and I am glad to conform to the ruling in that matter, but I feel that if the only reason a committee can find for recommending such a course is that reports are apt to be altered, it is a flimsy and poor one because it is utterly untrue.

SPIRITUAL PHENOMENA

Discussed by W. J. Erwood, President of the Wisconsin State Association—Proof of Future Life Can Best Be Rested on Spiritualistic Evidences.

A fair sized audience assembled in G. A. R. Hall Oct. 29, at Eau Claire, Wis., to hear the lecture given by W. J. Erwood, president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, who was there in the interest of that association and of organized Spiritualism. The closest attention was accorded the speaker throughout, and much interest in the remarks made was evinced by those present.

The subject under consideration was "Men of Science and Spiritualism." The speaker began by reviewing the attitude held by the average man or woman who have never studied the question of psychic phenomena, either because they lacked the opportunity, or because they allowed their prejudice to deter them from so doing. Mr. Erwood said in part:

"The time-worn argument against Spiritualism which says that a belief in the phenomena thereof is 'prima facie evidence of insanity' has become so threadbare that it will no longer hold as being worthy of consideration at all, and the world is beginning to realize that Spiritualism has a foundation that is more than a mere figment of imagination. Permit me to say that if the Spiritualist be insane for believing in spiritual phenomena, then there is not a man, woman or child who believes in church and bible who is not insane—for there is not one of these individuals who thoroughly believes in the principles of their religion, and especially in the bible which to them is the outward expression of God's word, who does not believe in spiritual phenomena in some form or other. In short, no one can be a sincere and consistent believer in the bible of the world who does not believe in the close relationship of the two phases of life—the material and the spiritual."

It is strange that the world—at least a portion of the theological world, should be so greatly opposed to Spiritualism as seems to be the case, when it—Spiritualism—is doing the very thing that they talk of so much in the theological world—i. e., proving the continuity of life. In fact theology cannot prove that man lives after the change called death, but by a demonstration of spiritual phenomena, by a direct reference to such phenomena. Therefore without spiritual phenomena we are lost as far as a reasonable proof of a continued life is concerned. It is not enough to say that "such phenomena used to occur in accord with the will of God;" we must have some of these phenomena in the present day. The water which gushed from the rock which Moses smote will not quench my thirst to-day—I must have water to drink now. So also must we have phenomena in this day and age.

"Some of the brightest minds of the age are turning their attention to the study of Spiritualism, with the result that many of the leaders of the scientific and professional world are avowing their belief in the genuineness of spiritual or psychic phenomena. Among these are scientists, physicians, lawyers and ministers—men who have been trained to think—to weigh evidence and to make comparisons. Of all men who should study Spiritualism in my estimation the minister is the first; in other words the minister who stands in his pulpit and talks of immortality and the continuity of life without being able to say 'I know that man lives after the change called death,' is ill fitted for the work of bringing consolation to the sorrowing ones who look upon the mantle of death that has fallen upon some well loved friend."

"You, who are prone to call the Spiritualist weak-minded because he proclaims a belief in a continuity of life where do you stand as regards proof of that fact of immortality or life beyond death? You may say you believe man lives on—do you know that he does. You say you have the records to prove it."

Pagan Thanksgiving: There is a lot of truth in the following remarks by the Chicago Chronicle anent President Roosevelt's Thanksgiving proclamation and Thanksgiving proclamations in general as they have appeared in the past. It would be a profitable exercise if the reverent gentlemen of the sacred profession would sit "in the silence" and meditate upon the subject so lucidly presented by the secular Chronicle. It would open up a new vision of the truth of things, and would overturn some of their cherished beliefs.

"President Roosevelt's Thanksgiving proclamation, while the verbiage is more historical and argumentative than usual, presents the same general features as all similar proclamations for the last century or two—all of them are un-Christian in their sentiment and theology.

"They all proceed on the theory that the acts of Divine Providence are to be classed as good and bad as kind and unkind and that Thanksgiving is due only for the kindly acts, the others being passed over in silence. If the real sense and meaning of all the Thanksgiving proclamations that have ever been made were given it would be somewhat as follows:

"Our Heavenly Father during the past year has been in various moods. During the greater part of the time he has been cross and severe. We have met with many losses and disappointments and suffered much sickness, bereavement and persecution. The weather has been disagreeable, old age has been creeping on us and some terrible disasters on land and sea have occurred.

"It is fitting at this time of the year that the mantle of charity should be drawn over all these painful dispensations of providence. We should for the time at least forgive and forget them. We cannot possibly approve of or justify them, but we can for the sake of peace and present enjoyment ignore them.

"On the approaching Thanksgiving let us confine our thoughts to the kindly and agreeable things that our Heavenly Father has done during the past year. Our crops have been good, our business prosperous and our health for the most part good. We have not known war, famine or pestilence. The earth is beautiful, the sky is glorious, friendship and love are precious and the hope of heaven is left us. Let us devote one day to unfeigned gratitude and praise for these mercies.

"This may seem a shocking travesty to President Roosevelt and other authors of Thanksgiving proclamations and probably they will be still more shocked if we should attempt to give some idea of the sentiment which should run through every such proclamation, for it should be somewhat as follows:

"Our Heavenly Father during the past year has been what he has been every year and from all eternity—infinite good. It would be impious for us to distinguish between the different acts of his providence and to say that one was any more gentle, loving and kind than any other. If at times we have been miserable it is altogether because we have misunderstood and doubted him and repudiated his guidance in the affairs of our lives.

"God is love, and although some of his providences have been painful and some enjoyable all of them have been infinitely wise and loving, and if we ought to thank him any more for one thing than another it is for his gentle guidance and his fatherly corrections.

"Let us devote our entire day to praising God for all that he is and for everything that he does. Let us assemble in our temples, let us recount all his wonderful works and let us sing until the very angels hear us the praises of our God. Let the language of every heart be:

"Thou that hast given so much to me Give one thing more—a grateful heart; Not thankful when it pleases me, As if thy mercy had spare days, But such a heart whose pulse shall be The praise."

"If such a proclamation would shock any Christian it would be because he does not know his Bible and has been badly taught. These sentiments are precisely the sentiments of his religion, and by the same token the average Thanksgiving proclamation is unadulterated paganism."

Populations and Religions. Hammond's Modern Atlas of the World, just from the press, gives the earth's population as 1,607,000,000. Divided into:

Buddhists . . . 450,000,000
Brahmins . . . 230,000,000
Mohammedans . . . 220,000,000
Protestants . . . 170,000,000
Greek Catholics . . . 110,000,000
Roman Catholics . . . 270,000,000
Heathen . . . 140,000,000
Copts, Armenians, Melchites, 7,000,000
Of course Spiritualists, Agnostics, Atheists and all forms of heresy are counted as Protestants, greatly swelling the number of the latter.

The Great Questions Answered.

"When shall spring visit the moldering urn?
When shall day dawn on the night of the grave?"

In all preceding ages the above inquiries agitated the thinking world; but the sphinx remained silent. The old philosophers deduced the idea of an immortal life from various natural phenomena. Their conclusions were crude and quite unsatisfactory. Almost universally those who adopted the faith believed the material body laid aside at death would be reanimated when time should end, and then would reveal in endless bliss, else written in agony in an unending place of torment. The Christian system taught the resurrection of the body. They seem to have had no conception of existence independent of gross materiality. Their story of the bodily resurrection of Jesus, and his eating, drinking, fishing and teaching after that resurrection; and, finally, his bodily ascension to heaven, with promise of return in "like manner," leaves no possibility of doubt as to the kind of body which they supposed would survive the tomb.

Zoroaster taught a bodily resurrection. Babylonians, Assyrians, Arabians, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Greeks and Italians, all contemplated an Elysium as a final home for the blest of re-animated humanity.

The Columbian Orator, an American school book of a hundred years ago, contains an Extract from a Sermon on the Day of Judgment," pages 97-8, which gives a faithful view of what our recent Christian ancestors taught in regard to "the children of the resurrection," the absolute belief prevailing at the advent of Spiritualism. The field is so rich, it is difficult to gain an idea from a brief extract. The good preacher had dwelt with much force on the sound of the great trumpet which all in their graves shall hear and come forth, then—

"The living shall start and be changed, and the dead rise at the sound. The dust that was once alive and formed a human body, whether it flies in the air, floats in the ocean, or vegetates on earth, shall hear the new-creating fiat. Wherever the fragments of the human frame are scattered, this all-penetrating call shall reach and speak them into life. * * * Now methinks I see, I hear, the earth heaving, charnel houses rattling, tombs bursting, graves opening. Now the nations under ground begin to stir. There is a noise and a snaking among the dry bones. The dust is all alive and in motion. The gloche breaks and trembles, as with an earthquake, while this vast army is working its way through, and bursting into life. The ruins of human bodies are scattered far and wide, and have passed through many, and surprising transformations. A limb in one country, and another in another; here the head, there the trunk, and an ocean lying between. At the sound of the trumpet they shall all be collected, wherever scattered, all properly sorted and united, however they were confused, atom to its fellow atom, bone to its fellow bone. The air is darkened with fragments of bodies, flying from country to country, to meet and join their proper parts."

But enough of Christian teaching. The tiny raps, first fully recognized at Hydesville, N. Y., some fifty-seven years ago, changed all past conceptions of the immortal life. Instead of a heaven just above the clouds, it was located here and now, and all about us. There is no resurrection, because there is no death. The body, laid aside at what we wrongly call death, is but the worn out and cast off habiliments of the real, genuine, living body; a body, so far as we know not subject to disease, decay or death.

With no rest in the grave, no grand general judgment day, no hell of sulphurous flame, no devil or damned spirits, we can all sing joyfully, in the adapted words of Beattie, a Scottish poet of an earlier age:

"Darkness and doubt have now flown away,
No longer we roam in conjecture forlorn,
So break on the traveler, faint and stray,
The bright and the balmy effluence of morn.
See Truth, Love and Mercy, in triumph descending,
And Nature, all glowing in Time's primal bloom!
On the cold cheek of Death smiles and away,
For beauty immortal n'er sleeps in the tomb."

The Wherefore of a Fact. Race suicide seems to distress civilians; even the President of the United States has called attention to it, while statistics show an absolute decrease from year to year since the civil war, of birth. So marked is this decrease it seems alarming.

The causes for this condition are very apparent. Fifty years ago teachers in our public schools were mostly males. So, too, were the clerks in stores. Alma to Increase Church Going.

"A vigorous campaign has been planned by the rector and vestry of St. James' Episcopal Church, for the purpose of teaching the people in the vicinity of the church the habit of church going."

"This unique plan was disclosed yesterday by the Rev. Dr. Stone, who at the services in the morning called for thirty volunteers to make a house to house canvass in the neighborhood of St. James' Church, with a view to inducing the people to become members of the church."

"A circular will be sent to everybody in the district, explaining why they should attend church. A visit by the rector's committee will follow and every effort be made to persuade them to become communicants of the church."

—Chicago Examiner.

The fact is, people are thinking now-a-days, and do not care to be dictated to as to the relation of their souls to an Episcopal, a Catholic or a Protestant God. The law that used to give men's souls into the keeping of some priest or minister is inoperative now, because the human mind has outgrown it.

The church jumped from congregational singing to the rendering of classic music, violins, cornets, harps, cellos, etc., and increased their attendance for a time, but now that falls them.

Perhaps they might make a difference by presenting some proof of their claims of the immortality of the soul. This is a day and age of rationalism, and people want evidence, demonstration of the genuineness of any and all claims.

The world has changed some in the last century and the church must keep pace or go down.

Spiritualism fattens upon the heresy and heretics of all religions. A heretic is a thinker and a progressive being or he would still be in the church, groping along in creedal darkness.

We advise them to scare up some proof. That is the food needed for the hungry minds of today.

The Work of the Lyceum. It may be accepted as a fact that in many instances belief and reason hold a close relationship; but it must also be admitted that it is a mistake to think that all our beliefs are the result of reasoning. Reasoning may produce belief, but it is by no means the only thing that can and does have this effect.

In fact more people believe without reason, without investigation, without reflection, by far, than those who do exercise their faculties and base their beliefs upon their careful consideration and judgment.

Is it not a fact, within the knowledge of all, that children in Sunday-schools are taught to believe, as a matter of course, what is told them concerning the bible and its doctrines? Its dogmas, as interpreted by the church, are instilled into their receptive minds, and believed with a faith that is mostly invulnerable to reason. The lessons of the Sunday-school are rock-bound, riveted, unquestioned in the child mind. They are overcome only by a painful course of evolution—a mental revolution.

This constitutes a strong reason why Spiritualists should organize children's lyceums, to teach children truths that are in accord with principles of science, in harmony with nature and highest conceptions of moral sense; to train them to think, to reason; to expand their minds and develop along ethical lines, rather than cramp their minds in the fetters of unreasonable and unethical beliefs.

It is a matter of great importance to the coming manhood and womanhood, as well as to the cause of Spiritualism, that the minds of children shall be trained to reason, to think, with freedom from the bias of early-instilled, false dogmatic beliefs, and their mental powers firmly based upon the sure foundation of truth, reason, and ethical principle.

And for these reasons The Progressive Thinker second and commends the efforts of Mr. John W. Ring, National Superintendent of Lyceum Work, and all of his coadjutors and helpers, in their most commendable work.

Sunday is Not the Sabbath. We rest from weariness after toil. It would be a gross misnomer to talk of weariness before the task is begun. That would be laziness. The Babylonian Sabattu, which the alleged Jews stole, and claim the day was in commemoration of God's rest from weariness after six days of severe labor, followed that toil. The word Sabbath means rest.

The preachers demand observance of their Sunday, because the laborer needs rest; but they have transposed the order of things, and made that which belongs after, do service before, as Sunday is the beginning of the week instead of its close, as was the Sabbath.

And then they want their Sunday regarded as a sacred day, falsely pretending God set it aside as a day of worship. Every preacher knows he falsifies when he quotes the command, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy," and applies it to Sunday. If that commandment was from God, then the preacher and churchman disregard the law of God. They claim, however, the day was changed under the new dispensation. By whom was the change made? Sunday was dedicated to the sun, by the Roman emperor, Constantine, in the year 321, while yet a pagan, a worshiper of that sun, not in honor of Jesus, or of the church.

The decree of a Roman emperor is made paramount to a law of God? How is that consistency? They who believe God is God, and superior to any earthly monarch, and accept the Bible for authority, should observe the last day of the week as a day of rest, instead of the first day; but, seriously, is any day too good to do right? And are not all days too good to do wrong?

THE BITTERNESS OF WOE. She raised her eyes and dropped a tear; She pondered on the words she read; "Ah, that is not the deepest fear—'To be forgotten when we are dead.' But while we breathe, and to them give Our days, our nights, our being—Oh! to be forgotten while we live, That is the bitterness of woe!"

A Remarkable Incident.

The following, illustrating Spirit Power to a marked degree, is given by Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, Lecturer and Platform Test Medium. It will be read with deep interest.

A GRAND AND BEAUTIFUL DEATH.

Illustrating the Comprehensive Fact That Spiritualism Can Redeem the World From the Bondage of Ignorance and Superstition—A Startling Vision and a Soul-Elevating Discourse by Georgia Gladys Cooley.

Miss Lydia Riedel passed into the spirit life from her earth home in Chicago, Sunday, October 22, at about 8:45 p. m., at the age of 23 years.

The young lady was unknown to and unheard of by the writer until she appeared at a public meeting some thirty minutes after she had left the mortal form.

After concluding the lecture of the evening I passed under the control of Mayflower. She had been giving messages somewhere near an hour when she said: "Here is a beautiful girl who has just passed from the body," going into details of death, home surroundings, describing friends and imitating the moans of the mother, which will never be forgotten by myself.

The older guide then stepped forward saying: "This young spirit is beautiful, and quite ready to go. She has made three attempts to leave the earth plane, but was held back by the depressing thought force of the grieving ones at home." He then asked that all present, mortals and spirits, concentrate on the young girl with the thought of freedom and liberation.

A vision then presented itself to the medium, showing a large number of spirit forms forming a circle around the girl. Following this a small group of spirits appeared. A young man stepped from the group saying, "Come!" He then took the form in his arms and bore it away, the two passing out of the hall through a west window. A perfect sense of peace prevailed, and after a few words of explanation the meeting closed.

The next morning a young man called at my home, asking if I could of-ficiate at a funeral on the morrow. He was invited in, and in almost an instant the same beautiful girl appeared, saying, "Brother, I'm with you. It was so hard for you all to let me go, especially poor mother, but I'm all right. Brother Fred (I believe this was the name she called) came and took me away and I have felt happy ever since."

On calling at the home the next day everything and everybody seemed familiar, probably from the impressions left on the brain by the vision of the night before.

New York, the Great Idol Factory. The Bangkok Times, of Siam India, says:

"Probably the only idol factory in the world is now located in the city of New York, where the idols of all countries are reproduced and new ones manufactured. India gets the largest shipment; but from some countries even further east comes an ever increasing demand. The average foreign shipment varies from a couple of hundred to a thousand images every thirty days. By far the largest number of idols are made of plaster, coated, oiled and polished to resemble old bronze."

Idols of plaster, wood and stone are not the most injurious object of worship manufactured in the great American metropolis. That fictitious character of priestly brains, represented to have said, Matt. 10:34, "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword," was no God, or son of a God if he ever said any such thing, and yet he is worshipped as such. The assertion is an ecclesiastical fabrication, as must have been the character who is represented to have given utterance to such a barbarous thought.

WILLIE'S DREAM. I had such a beautiful dream last night, A dream I shall never forget; Such beautiful angels beamed into my sight, Their faces are haunting me yet.

The one in the center I thought that I knew, She called me her own Willie dear; She kissed and caressed me as mother used to.

When she was so sickly down here, But her cheeks were fair, and my mother's were pale, Her hands were strong—my mother's were weak;

Oh, do they in heaven grow rugged and hale, And are they permitted to speak? She came down beside me, took hold of my hand;

And led me away to a place With flowers surrounded, so fragrant and grand, Their sweetness time cannot efface.

She called it her mansion in soul-land above, And said that she built it with deeds; Its brightness and beauty, the outgrowth of love.

The flowers were kindnesses seeds. She said she was waiting for sister and me, And working to keep our souls pure, For soon shall our spirits be perfectly free.

And go on our heavenly tour. It may be but dreaming, but somehow I feel That that was my mother's own face, And unto my spirit she wished to reveal Her spirit, her home and its place.

I know she is living and loving me still, Because she was good, true and kind; And life is eternal and time does not kill. The love of a dear mother mind.

SPRITUAL PHENOMENA

Discussed by W. J. Erwood, President of the Wisconsin State Association—Proof of Future Life Can Best Be Reached on Spiritualistic Evidence.

A fair sized audience assembled in G. A. R. Hall Oct. 22, at Eau Claire, Wis., to hear the lecture given by Will J. Erwood, president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, who was there in the interest of that association and of organized Spiritualism. The closest attention was accorded the speaker throughout, and much interest in the remarks made was evinced by those present.

The subject under consideration was "Men of Science and Spiritualism." The speaker began by reviewing the attitude held by the average man or woman who have never studied the question of psychic phenomena, either because they lacked the opportunity, or because they allowed their prejudice to deter them from so doing. Mr. Erwood said in part:

"The time-worn argument against Spiritualism which says that a belief in the phenomena thereof is 'prima facie evidence of insanity' has become so threadbare that it will no longer hold as being worthy of consideration at all, and the world is beginning to realize that Spiritualism has a foundation that is more than a mere figment of imagination. Permit me to say that if the Spiritualist be insane for believing in spiritual phenomena, then there is not a man, woman or child who believes in church and bible who is not insane—for there is not one of these individuals who thoroughly believes in the principles of their religion, and especially in the Bible which to them is the outward expression of God's word, who does not believe in spiritual phenomena in some form or other. In short, no one can be a sincere and consistent believer in the bibles of the world who does not believe in the close relationship of the two phases of life—the material and the spiritual.

"It is strange that the world—at least a portion of the theological world, should be so greatly opposed to Spiritualism as seems to be the case, when it is Spiritualism—is doing the very thing that they talk of so much in the theological world—i. e., proving the continuity of life. In fact theology cannot prove that man lives after the change called death, but by a demonstration of spiritual phenomena—or by a direct reference to such phenomena. Therefore without spiritual phenomena we are left as far as a reasonable proof of a continued life is concerned. It is not enough to say that 'such phenomena used to occur in accord with the will of God;' we must have some of these phenomena in the present day. The water which gushed from the rock which Moses smote will not quench my thirst to-day—I must have water to drink now. So we must have phenomena in this day and age.

"Some of the brightest minds of the age are turning their attention to the study of Spiritualism, with the result that many of the leaders of the scientific and professional world are avowing their belief in the genuineness of spiritual or psychic phenomena. Among these are scientists, physicians, lawyers and ministers—men who have been trained to think—to weigh evidence and to make comparisons. Of all men who should study Spiritualism in my estimation the minister is the first; in other words the minister who stands in his pulpit and talks of immortality and the continuity of life without being able to say 'I know that man lives after the change called death,' is ill fitted for the work of bringing consolation to the sorrowing ones who look upon the mantle of death that has fallen upon some well loved friend.

"You, who are prone to call the Spiritualist weak-minded because he proclaims a belief in a continuity of life—whereas you stand as regards proof of that fact of immortality or life beyond death? You may say you believe man lives on—do you know that he does? You say you have the records to prove

TO THE SPIRITUALIST PRESS.

An Explanation From the N. S. A. Office.

As secretary of the N. S. A. I deem it my duty to take notice through your valuable paper of two statements recently made in certain publications concerning the action of the late annual convention in Minneapolis. One is, that delegates who were not Spiritualists, but pronounced Theosophists or workers in New Thought movements, were seated to represent societies of the N. S. A. I cannot believe that this is true, inasmuch as I had access to the credential list before it went to the committee, and I know that no names but those of prominent Spiritualists from various sections were on that list. Of course the list can be only partly made up before it goes to the credential committee as many societies do not send the credentials or name their delegates till convention opens, though requested to do so, but as the credential committee was made up of well known and pronounced Spiritualists with Mr. H. W. Richardson, president of the New York State Association as chairman, I feel certain that none but Spiritualists were admitted to the privilege of the floor. Besides, the question comes up at every convention of allowing none but members of some Spiritualistic society to be seated as delegates or proxies, and is tacitly adhered to.

The other matter is that of annual reports being printed in the papers before convention. I do not understand why the committee on reports should have stated that such reports are likely to be altered at convention, hence should not be printed till after that meeting. Such a statement is absurd. The reports are handed to the reading clerk by the N. S. A. secretary, except the Lyceum reports, and that of Missionary Sprague—these are submitted by the parties making them. They are all read in open convention just as they were written. No one attempts to alter them in any manner. There is no possibility of their being changed, nor does the convention ever order any change in them.

These reports are absolutely given to the public as first made by the officers of the N. S. A. How could any alteration, for instance, be made in the financial reports of secretary and treasurer without garbling the books and confusing the auditing committee. For one, I protest against such a statement going before the public. I have always felt that the annual reports of the officers of a national convention belong first to the assembled delegates of that organization, and afterwards to the public, and I am glad to conform to the ruling in that matter, but I feel that if the only reason a committee can find for recommending such a course is that reports are apt to be altered, it is a flimsy and poor one because it is utterly untrue.

it, and that you will not accept hearsay evidence, and yet the very records upon which you base your conclusions are as much hearsay evidence as anything we have to offer—may more so. Every witness that you rely upon has for centuries been in the great beyond, while some of the very best witnesses we have to offer are still upon this material plane of life—in the full possession of their senses and faculties. They can be put on the stand, and their evidence is second to none."

The speaker then dwelt at length upon the relative value of the different classes of witnesses, and the various phases of phenomena as a proof that man lived after death. He did not deny that there were charlatans and fakirs who had faked their nefarious wares upon a too credulous public. This fact he deprecated, saying: "This is no part of Spiritualism; Spiritualism is bringing you a religious Spiritualism backed up by ethical teachings as fine as those of any similar body in the world, and by phenomena that are living, genuine spiritual phenomena of the present day."

He then quoted from many of the world's leading scientists and clergymen and others of note who had investigated Spiritualism, and had announced their conviction that there were genuine phenomena which proved beyond a doubt there was "continuity of existence after death." Among those whose names were mentioned, and from whose works and utterances quotations were made, were: Alfred Russel Wallace, Prof. Wm. Crookes, J. H. Pichte, Dr. Robert Chambers, Prof. Challa, Prof. Hare, Minot J. Savage, Dr. R. Heber Newton, Camille Flammarion, Wm. T. Stead, Victorien Sardou and many others.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their question, and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE—No attention will be given to any letters, or to any name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requiring private answers, and while I freely give what ever information I am able to give, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Will W. Charlton: Q. We have been sitting in a circle with a medium we feel sure is perfectly honest, not a professional and does not take pay. The spirit friends come freely, and profess to see everything readily in the dark, yet when I pulled out of my pocket a picture, they could not tell what it was. Why? If a medium is able to see a light on a materialization, or entranced medium, is it dangerous to the medium?

A. It has been many times observed that the spirit, while communicating, at least, appeared to require the eyes of the medium or of some member of the circle to discern objects. In other cases there was perfect lucidity. The matter would not be explained by charging the medium with dishonesty, for that was above suspicion, and tested in other manner. In the case above stated there must be misunderstanding on one side or the other. When such occurs it is better to carefully go over the ground again, and have the communicating medium explain the causes of disagreement or failure. The shock of a light suddenly turned on might be the death of fraud; it would scarcely kill a genuine medium. The shock to the genuine would come less from the light, than from the nervous tension, or expectancy of the present. It is like the discharge of lightning after a prolonged tension of the clouds, and other means of testing mediums should be employed. Usually a flash of light dazzles the eye, and thus it becomes untrustworthy, and its evidence, under such conditions, must be taken with allowance.

W. H. Dague: Q. How explain the mediumship of O. T. On the night of August 15, when the whaling bark "Hull" was cruising about seventy miles west of Pribilof Island in the Bering Sea, Mate Pease and the men on deck were thunderstruck by the appearance of a great city immediately ahead. There was the shore line, rising above the water, and only a desolate expanse of water. The mate called Capt. Fisher and he looked upon the scene and was bewildered. There was no accounting for the wonderful sight. This city seemed as real as San Francisco seems to a vessel anchored in the channel near Goat Island.

When daylight came, the spectacle faded away and in all directions was only the heaving bosom of the cold sea, with no land in sight and no great city within thousands of miles.

A. There is in our present knowledge only an explanation that has plausibility, that of it is produced by reflection and refraction, or both, of light passing through strata of different density and refractive index. It is called mirage, and although this theory is accepted and is undoubtedly true, the details of these wonderful reflections and refractions have not been mastered. From similar appearances in Alaska, the story became current that there was a city locked in the North. It must have required, not only many reflections to bring a city thousands of miles distant into view. Such atmospheric conditions must be rare, and hence this phenomenon is, except in favored localities, seldom witnessed. The frozen regions of the North, and the torrid plains of the South are favorable, furnishing strata of air of wide difference of temperature and density.

The reflection from a city might be cast a long distance—hundreds of miles—and thrown from the surface of a cloud stratum in a different direction, at last to appear as a mirage so far from the object that the connection therewith seems incredible, yet there has been so many recorded that the statement must be accepted as fact.

Joseph Singer: Q. Are the stories about "Atlantis" true? Do the spirits give a truthful description of that sunken continent?

A. The foundation of the stories given by "spirits" is the pleasing myth of a lost continent. Exaggerated little has been added by way of ornament or fancy. The myth of an island or islands off the pillars of Hercules, of remote antiquity, and the sinking of this land has been supposed to have given rise to the story of the deluge. Again this continent is supposed to have been located east of the Gulf of Mexico, and the islands of that section to be the tops of its mountains. Such a continent does not answer the description, being far away. A bold dreamer it would require to think the whole Atlantic was a stretch of land. The arguments in favor of the existence of such a continent are without exception dependent on mythical traditions, which have no more authority than fables. There is one objection and one only we can here make, and that is, the configuration of the oceans and continents, in the main, was determined by forces in the earth's crust when the earliest igneous rocks were forming by the cooling of the molten surface. There has been no marked change in the Atlantic ocean, since the projection of the Appalachians. As the crust contracts the tendency is for the floor of the ocean to sink, or the ocean to grow deeper, and

A Charmingly Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

For an hour she held her audience in attentive silence. As I listened she seemed to build a most beautiful structure before which all other religions paled into insignificance—a structure pure, grand and lofty and over it waved a pure white banner inscribed with golden letters, "Spiritualism." It seemed to me the gates of heaven were open and its radiance filled my soul and into the glorious structure before me angel hosts, starry-eyed and white-robed, glided to and fro, and my ears caught strains of heavenly music borne from angelic choirs singing as of old, "Peace on earth, good will to men," "The truth shall make you free."

After she had finished her sermon, she gave some fine spirit messages. The last one she gave was to me and I was most pleased. She said a spirit stood beside me, and she described my father better than I could. She said the message that came was, "Tell Dickie to be patient and do her best and some day she will find out what she wants to know." I know it was my father for he always called me Dickie when we were alone, but no one in the hall but John and myself knew it.

Coming home we scarcely spoke except to make a few remarks about the weather. When we had left Mr. Dale at his own door, John said, "That man has got all the grief his mill will grind for a while."

Two days after this, Mr. Dale called upon us. Aunt Jane was helping mother in the kitchen and I had just got the parlor set to rights. All the morning—it was then half-past ten—we had heard the sound of sawing and a noise that suggested the tearing apart of boards in the Shadow Room. Mother said every time the noise came, Aunt Jane would start and grow pale. From the night that I wrote to you about when the lights went out, up to this time, not a word had been said to Aunt Jane about her room. She had grown thin and nervous, but her face wore a look of sullen determination and she kept her own counsel.

Just after Mr. Dale's arrival there came up a violent shower which drove John into the house and he and I entertained our caller. We were in the sitting room and were talking about music and Mr. Dale had just said that his favorite hymn was "Shall We Meet Beyond the River?" when there came a most startling knock upon the parlor door. We all started and I got up and threw open the door and looked in, but seeing nothing unusual, I stepped back, and the door closed with a bang.

Mother, who had just come in from the kitchen, exclaimed, "Marah Weston, don't you know better than to leave a window open in such a shower as this? Go and put it down at once."

I knew there was no window open, but before I could speak, John said, "I will go." As soon as he had stepped through the door it slammed after him, and I felt uneasy. John was gone several minutes and then we heard him call, "Come in here, all who are out there." We went into the room and John pointed to the wall behind the door and there hung an oil painting of a beautiful girl dressed in white and with white roses in her hair.

I instantly exclaimed, "Oh, John, that is the girl I saw in the Shadow Room that night!"

The instant I had spoken the picture vanished and there came a long drawn sob as if from a heart that was breaking from grief and despair. Then a stranger thing happened. My banjo which was lying upon the table in the middle of the room, suddenly rose from the table to about the height of an ordinary person and began to play, "Shall We Meet Beyond the River." There were four large windows in the room, but the curtains were down and the room was not very light. We all watched the banjo in amazed silence for a few minutes, and then Mr. Dale said, "Cannot we have some more light?"

"Certainly," said John, "we will have all the light we can get."

He pulled up the shades but before he was done the sun broke through the clouds and the room was flooded with its radiance. I could have shouted with joy at the sight of it. The banjo kept right on playing. Evidently the performer did not need darkness in which the mountain chains to grow higher. Geology records depressions of limited areas, but never by sudden catastrophe or cataclysm. Nature does not call on such revolutionary changes. The rise and fall of continents is usually too slow to be measured during the life of a human generation. It causes no disturbance, no overwhelming flood or devastation. The deepest portion of the Atlantic is over the place where the Atlantis went down. This ocean has been compared to a deep valley, which has been growing deeper from the incomprehensibly remote time when the algeeney mountains appeared above the black waters of the boiling sea.

Hence it will be inferred that a "vast spirit world" in this life might have been a writer of fiction which would have been taken at its real value, and that as having no more reality than the story of Jack and the Beanstalk.

to manifest. Mr. Dale watched the instrument intently as it swayed to and fro a few feet from the table, and then he stepped up and grabbed it, whereupon it arose until within a few inches of the ceiling; it then floated about the room still playing "Shall We Meet Beyond the River."

Soon another instrument unknown and unseen by us joined in and the two blended in perfect harmony. The unseen instrument seemed to us to be some sort of a wind instrument, and the music was soft, sweet and clear, and we agreed that it was the most heavenly melody we ever heard. After the tune had been played through by both instruments, the banjo was laid upon the table and all was quiet. Mother and Aunt Jane had stood in the door during the time the two instruments had played, so there were five witnesses to the phenomenon.

As we left the room John said, "Well, Mr. Dale, what do you think about what we have just seen and heard?"

Mr. Dale shook his head and said slowly, "It must have been done either by the spirits of those departed, or else it is the devil's work."

"What object could the devil have in coming here and playing, 'Shall We Meet Beyond the River' for us?" asked John.

"I do not know unless it is to deceive us and lead us astray that we may be lost," was the reluctant reply.

Answer me truly, Mr. Dale, would you if you could prevent, allow any person to come into this family who would lead us into doing that which would wreck our health and ruin us physically?"

"Most certainly not."

"Would you if you could possibly prevent it allow anyone to come in here who would work our financial ruin?"

"Of course I would not. How can you ask?" said Mr. Dale, in some surprise.

John smiled, but his tone was solemn as he said, "and yet you think God would permit a being to come in here to deceive us and work our everlasting ruin? O, Mr. Dale, what sort of a God have you got? How can you worship a God who falls beneath your ideas of perfect manhood? Who in his dealings with humanity falls beneath your level?"

Mr. Dale grew very white and looked so troubled that I felt a great feeling of sympathy for him, and I said gently: "Please, Mr. Dale, do not be offended at us. We have exalted ideas of God, and don't you think it is unkind to accuse him of letting the devil come to deceive us when he would not let a parent come to comfort or counsel a loved child?"

Just at this moment the kitchen door burst open and the neighbor we call Uncle Jack called out, "Hullo, Wilder, neighbor Feynno's hogs are in 'your garden sass, every brasted critter of 'em!" and so ended our scene.

Mr. Dale went away, but he came back and spent the evening with us. He asked me to tell him what I meant about seeing the girl of the portrait in the Shadow Room, and John and I told him the whole story so far as we knew it. After Mr. Dale had gone I said to John, "The minister seems to be very fond of you."

John answered in the oldest tone, "Yes, he is very fond of me and he loves mother and Aunt Jane and the dog and cat, and canary bird."

When I asked him what he meant when he went away singing, "Love, me, love my dog." It is a little thing, I love, but it bothers me to have John make fun of Mr. Dale.

The next day mother and I were alone in the kitchen, making sweet pickles, and mother gave her opinion regarding the strange happenings here, for the first time. She said, "There is no use trying to get out of it any other way; there has been a 'drift' of some sort committed in this house sometime, and those who did the deed are here in spirit form and it looks very much as if they are atoning for their sins, but I cannot understand it, Marah. I feel very sorry for the poor spirits, and I would gladly help them to get away from here into a realm of peace and happiness, and if I feel this way surely those who have passed to 'realms' of light must feel even more so, and if they do, why do they not come and help them?"

"Perhaps they do come, and help them," said I, "I suppose they will have to gain heaven in about the same way that I went from the primary school into the high school; and then perhaps they will not be helped. Some people will do just as they are in the habit of doing, even if it does make them thoroughly uncomfortable."

Sometime after this John said, one night that the next morning he would have to go to Bolton on business, and if mother and I wanted to go with him and visit Aunt Paty, who lives there, we might go. We were much pleased, so early the next morning we started for a twenty-five mile drive. As we did not intend to come back until the next day, we got Uncle Jack to come and do the chores and stay with Aunt Jane.

When we got to Bolton we found the man John wanted to see had gone away for a week, and Aunt Paty's grand-children were sick with scarlet fever, and as there was no one else in the place we cared to visit we rested the horse and stayed in home. We came home slowly, for John is always afraid he will hurt the horse, and it was after ten when we drove into our yard. It was a dark night, and the lantern John always carries was tied under the buggy, and when we got to the barn, mother and I took it and went in with John while he took care of the horse, John had a key to the kitchen door, which he always keeps and he unlocked the door and I pushed it open, and stepped in quickly and caught my feet in something and fell my whole length upon the floor.

Mother was right behind me, and when she stepped through the door there was a splash and a crash which made her scream. This frightened John, and he sprang into the room with the lantern and caught his foot as I had done, and fell his length upon the floor, and the lantern flew out of his hand and went rolling across the room. John is a large man and the house jarred with the force of his fall, and mother thought some one had knocked him down, and screamed wildly, at which there came a terrible howl from Pete, which, as it was discovered afterwards, so frightened our cat Ruf, that he leaped for the shelf over the table where Aunt Jane had put a pail of milk to sour, and the pail and several small articles came crashing to the floor.

Just as Pete howled and the lantern was rolling across the floor, Uncle Jack came out of the kitchen bedroom where he was sleeping.

"O, Lord," he cried in a high and shaky voice, "it is the devil sure! O, Lord help me find the paper!"

"Hold on," shouted John, "it isn't the devil, it's me"—but Uncle Jack was too scared to hear a statement of facts and there is no knowing what might have happened, but the entry door burst open and Aunt Jane appeared carrying a lighted lamp. She had on a pink night wrapper and her gray hair fell about her face and her eyes looked wild with terror, and right behind her was the minister! Yes, Mr. Dale himself, minus coat, vest and shoes stood with a lamp in his hand in the open doorway. The two entered the room and the welcome light revealed a strange state of affairs. Uncle Jack in a decided undress suit was hopping about the room imploring the Lord to help him; poor mother, dripping with water, was still standing by the door, and John and I with our feet entangled in twine, lay sprawling upon the floor.

When we had restored ourselves and the room to order, and got a good fire burning, Aunt Jane and John entered into mutual explanations. It seemed that it had been one of our days at New Light Cottage. Uncle Jack had spent the afternoon in the house with Aunt Jane, talking over old times, when they went to school together in a log school-house, or at least that was what they set out to do, but the doors refused to stay shut, and Pete kept staring at nothing and howling, and there were raps everywhere. Uncle Jack got "all roused up," as he said, and finally Aunt Jane told him about the Shadow Room and asked him to go up there.

Just at this time Mr. Dale appeared, and after he had witnessed the doings in the kitchen, all three went up to the Shadow Room where they saw the shadows and the darkness and also distinctly heard the wailing of a babe.

When they entered the room the bottom drawer of the bureau was open. Aunt Jane declared she had left it closed, and went and shut it, but she had not much more than left it before it was open again. This was repeated several times. Uncle Jack said he knew there was trickery somewhere, an assertion Aunt Jane resented, Mr. Dale told us, so she and Mr. Dale came down stairs and Uncle Jack spent the rest of the afternoon hunting for concealed wires and doors. What anyone's object could be in playing tricks upon us month after month, he did not try to tell. So strongly did the idea of trickery take possession of Uncle Jack's brain that after the chores were done he begged leave to rig up the kitchen in a way that would catch the offenders if they passed through the kitchen, as he insisted they must, as he fastened cords across the floor before the door and windows and arranged a bucket of water over the door so its contents would be spilled upon whoever entered. It worked a little slowly, but well, as mother can testify.

Uncle Jack, to use his own language, "felt pretty sheepish, about the way the affair turned out, but we all took it as a joke, and all had a good laugh except mother, and it was nothing but the new feather in her bonnet that allied her. The water took every bit of the curl out of it, and it doesn't make a woman feel quite like a 'saint' to have her feathers spoiled, does it?"

"Moses!" exclaimed Uncle Jack the next morning, "I never believed in ghosts and I won't believe in 'em!" He glared about him defiantly, but as no one offered any objections to his disbelief, he softened and added: "I'm mighty glad the old woman wasn't up here with me—she'd been scared half to death—besides, she believes things."

The more I associate with our domestic animals the more I see how much they are like human beings. I was down to the barn the other day with John and we were talking about it. "Do you want an illustration?" said John, and he took a sheep, he keeps tied and tried to lead him across the barn floor, but the minute John began to pull one way the sheep began to pull the other, and it seemed he would rather choke to death than to give up and go. Then John went behind the sheep and began to pull him backward and immediately the sheep went forward, and in that manner crossed the floor.

"There is much talk about will," said John, and we hear that this one and that one has a strong will, when the fact is it is not will, but won't. I have given the matter some serious thought, and have about made up my mind that stubbornness and obstinacy are purely animal, and it is no credit to a human being to display them. Will is born of desire, and a strong desire means a strong will. If a man's desire is strong enough, his will is unconquerable, he recognizes no obstacles, nor hardships, heat and cold, light and darkness all serve his purpose for within himself is a mighty impelling force that leads him on to victory. Nine times out of ten when a person says he can't he does not really want to. If a person could accomplish something for the sake of a sum of money, he could do the same thing for nothing if he wanted to.

"Circumstances may tend to drag a man down, but they cannot do it unless he lets them. A man may root with hogs if he wants to, but if he wants to get away from them badly enough, no hog pen fence ever built will stop him. We are constantly hearing people say plainly that they do as well as they know how, when there is not a day passes that they do not do something that they know better than to do; and more than that, it is not enough to do as well as we know how, unless we try hard to know how."

Now I call John quite a preacher, don't you?

When we went in to supper we found Mr. Dale waiting for us. Aunt Jane told me he was in the sitting-room, and remarked in her dryest tone, "I wonder whose soul he is so concerned about—yours or mine?"

I think it was real mean in Aunt Jane to say that. Mr. Dale is a very nice young man and I wish you could be acquainted with him. Martha, for I know you would like him. Before he left us that evening he came out into the kitchen for a drink of water just as I came to let Ruf out, so we stopped and talked by ourselves a little while. He asked me if I would not attend the Sunday services at his church.

"Perhaps you think me bigoted and narrow-minded, but truly, Miss Marah, I have been a changed man since the night I listened to Mrs. Drury in the hall at Steelville. What she gave under the name of Spiritualism was grand and beautiful, yes, and helpful and ennobling. It is just what the world needs and fills a long felt want. I am searching for the light," he said, with great earnestness, "and as it comes to me I shall follow it wherever it may lead, and you, Miss Marah, can be a great help to me; you will not refuse, will you?"

There was something in his tone and manner so appealing that I felt go over me a great wave of sympathy and kindness, and I gave him my hand as I answered, "Indeed I will not."

He was ready to go away, but he held my hand as if he never wanted to let go of it, so I think he must have sensed the kindness I gave him.

To-morrow I am going to hear him preach and John is going with me. He gave a long low whistle when I asked him to go—I don't see what makes him act so queer; you don't blame me any for going, do you, Martha?

Now I must go and get my dress ready to wear. I wish I was fair like you, so I could wear blue and look nicely. Mr. Dale is very fond of blue and I like it. Give my love to all the family and write soon.

Lovingly yours,

MARAH WESTON.

OPPOSED TO PRIESTCRAFT.

And Believes in Calling a Spade a Spade.

I am old, but I still believe in calling a spade a spade.

Does not Spiritualism embrace all of the human race, from a demon to a seraph; from a sinner to a saint?

Why are the gifted parishes trying to establish a priesthood and eliminate the publicans and harlots? Is their game any more or less than that of the trickster and necromancer?

If we ever get on to an honest spiritual basis, can we do it without including the whole? Can a seraph or demon, saint or sinner, be other than what they are by heredity? Or shall some look up and say, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are?"

The beauty of Spiritualism is its democracy. It is not a theocracy; it must stay with the whole outfit or abrogate its mission.

The churches and priesthoods have said, "We are holier than thou." This to my mind is what causes uneasiness among the Falmes, Jeffersons, Ingersolls and Lincolns on the other side. They know progression is the fiat of God and nature.

How would an Ingersoll or Lincoln appear as a little narrow sectarian apostle of divine healing?

The human spirit functions on every plane, and a Maurice F. Raymond is more interesting to me than any Reverend D. D. I have ever seen or expect to see.

Mediums are like evangelists in the orthodox churches; while they remain honest and simple, the spirit of truth, love, and a sound mind gives them influence for good. They are indeed spiritually minded; but when they get ambitious and seek glory and "shakers for themselves," they are still spiritual, but truth and humility are gone. I do not wonder that there is a fight between them and the Reverend.

The Progressive Thinker.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 33.

CHICAGO, ILL., NOV. 25, 1905.

NO. 835

INDICATIONS OF PROGRESS.

A Broad Platform of Principle, Wide and Deep.

To the Editor:—I have been reading The Progressive Thinker about twelve months, and many times my emotions have been stirred deeply by the generous sentiments published from talented writers of your liberal paper. There are numerous voices of distinction between the masculine and feminine utterances without the signatures being attached. There are many congenial spirits among the writers, and some very liberal souls, while the mass are antagonistic to old orthodox teachings and principles.

There is a great change since I was a boy, for freedom of speech, by a person against old systems and dominant churches brought to a certain degree, and it is yet dangerous to do so, but not so bad as formerly. I have often thought how narrow-minded some people must be that in the future life, when the trials, sorrows, persecutions, and disappointments of earth life are over, are those individuals who belong to church, believe in the atonement, and are baptized.

They have been teaching that morality will not count in the day of judgment. More and liberal people believe that true and noble character is the only genuine test in this life, and in the continued existence beyond the earth plane.

Such people do not think much about poor struggling humanity, for an existence on this lower sphere, who never have a chance to hear about the spiritual religion that Jesus taught in his purity, love and forgiveness.

There are millions of persons who profess the religion of the Nazarene, but it does not change their natures, or remove their selfishness, prejudices, hatred, or evil tendencies toward their fellow beings, who think differently from them, about the future state of existence.

That class of people cannot comprehend Spiritualism, that takes in all suffering humanity, whether good or bad, giving hope and cheer to them, not only in this life, but the one to come, in the hereafter.

When I read your correspondence on the various topics of life and death, I am edified in mind and spirit, and realize that there is no red tape policy in it, as exists in religious and secular papers. The general discussion on religious topics, and numerous other subjects of interest to all the people in common, must cause your interested readers to grow in liberal ideas, and advance in morals, noble manhood and womanhood.

There is nothing that suits my sentiments better than a broad platform of principles, wide and deep enough to take in all of the tribes of every clime under the sun, of men, women and children. Such are the thoughts of liberal spirits. What a glorious creed was that of Thomas Paine! "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion."

Let us reflect often what that courageous man did in the Revolution of our country, to aid our patriotic forefathers, in their perils and struggles for liberty and independence! Then, think what great services he rendered the people of France in the Revolution to obtain more freedom, and a republic!

Surely, our people are progressing slowly in liberal thought, when they allow his bust to be placed in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

Robert G. Ingersoll, a soul which nature endowed with great physical and mental abilities to combat the old system of error, ignorance and superstition, and whose name will yet be honored far and wide by all progressive people. Truly he was the friend of man. He loved his fellow-men, and his eloquence aroused many thinking minds to learn and see that popery and priestcraft kept mankind in bondage and ignorance.

One of Ingersoll's utterances impressed me forcibly. It was, "Next to everlasting life is everlasting death, an eternity of peace."

Time is a great modifier of human events, and the world is surely advancing and progressing, notwithstanding the corruption in our government, and other nations and our reformers as Paine, Ingersoll and others that we read about in history had to suffer persecution, and receive the scorn and contempt of Christendom, for exposing the errors, and cruelties that come from religious beliefs, and dogmas of church and state.

When I was a boy I read Fox's Book of Martyrs, and have since read the history of the Reformation, and the long and cruel religious wars, so full of savagery and torture, that it filled my thoughts with terrors of the awful destruction of life and property caused by the beliefs of the people who were followers of popes and priests. They thought they were doing God's service, and it made savages of them.

In every emergency of the world's history, leaders have been raised up by the invisible powers, to lead mankind out of their degradation, corruption and despotism, to greater light, wisdom and freedom, but when they reach a certain degree of enlightenment, intelligence and education, they often retrograde, and go back to semi-barbarism. But truth will yet prevail. Human nature is so fickle, that it is like the wind, that we cannot tell whither it cometh or goeth. One of the prophets has compared the wicked to the troubled sea, casting up mire and dirt. The history of the human races has been filled with poverty, want, suffering, destruction, rivers of blood, and oceans of blood; all caused by the evil development of human nature.

And with all the horrors of the awful past events, in human existence, there have been sunshine and showers, fruitful crops of all kinds of fruits, grains, and every kind of delicious foods for man and beast, to sustain life on this mundane sphere.

And amidst all the blessings that love, friendship, virtue, honor, fame, industry and good works can produce for the human kind, the destructive elements are all around them, constantly taking out, every minute, from this ever-changing sphere a small per cent less than are being born into it. Thus humanity is coming and going as numerous as the mortals transferred to immortality.

Mankind have been getting a wonderful experience in this world, from the lowest to the highest, from the best to the worst, and were it not that humanity can receive messages from the spirit world, all would be mystery and doubt. The angels talked with the an-

THE DEVIL, DEVILRY, EVIL.

Some Psychological Research Rhyme on an Important Subject.

A leading divine of Chicago recently threw a bombshell into a ministers' meeting by declaring the devil of theology a myth. In the discussion that ensued he proved from Scripture that the devil idea was neither Jewish nor Christian, but from the heathens. A good many of the ministers agreed with him as to the facts, but thought that Satan should be retained as a convenient "ray head and bloody bones" to scare people.

In the same strain of alarm Alfred J. Hough writes in the Jamestown (N. Y.) Journal the following poetic query:

A Poem of the Devil.

Men don't believe in a devil now, as their fathers used to do; They've forced the door of the broadest creed to let his majesty through. There isn't a print of his cloven foot or a fiery dart from his bow To be found in earth or air to-day, for the world has voted it so.

But who is mixing the fatal draught that pales heart and brain, And loads the bier of each passing year with ten hundred thousand slain? Who blights the bloom of the land to-day with the fiery breath of hell? If the devil isn't, and never was, won't somebody rise and tell?

Who dogs the steps of the tolling saint and digs the pits for his feet? Who sows the tares on the fields of time, wherever Gods sows his wheat?

The devil is voted not to be, and, of course, he must be true. But who is doing the kind of work that the devil alone should do?

We are told that he does not go about as a ruling horror now; But whom should hold responsible for the everlasting row? To be heard in home, in church and state to the earth's remotest bound, If the devil, by a unanimous vote, is nowhere to be found?

Won't somebody step to the front forth with and make his bow and show How the frauds and crimes of a single day spring up? We want to know. The devil was wholly voted out, and, of course, the devil's gone.

But simple people would like to know who carries his business on.

Response.

The following response is made to "The Poem of the Devil" by Rev. James M. Allen, speaker for the Psychological Research Society of this city:

"His ignorance, my worthy friend, and wilfulness" twin brother, That scatter blight o'er all the land and freely feelings smother; 'Tis love of self, the devil is, and not a being at all, That gave to man his "primal curse" that caused his "Eden fall."

'Tis appetite and lust, my friend, that ranges in the breast, That fills the earth with wretchedness and keeps the earth oppressed; That fills the brain to-day, That blights our dreams to-day, That wrecks our homes and, fills our graves and sweeps life's bliss away.

'Tis fashion's power and custom's reign that prostrate in the dust Our aspirations for the true, the noble and the just;

That makes of man and woman both a creature base and low With soul dwarfed and shriv'led and pinched it can't much lower go.

'Tis competition's blasting wind that brings dismay and woe, When man "co-operates" he'll have abundance here below.

'Tis strife of trade, 'tis greed for gold, that gives the devil form, That antagonizes man with man, creating earth's hellstorm.

'Tis bigotry, with dripping knife all red with human gore, From when comes persecutive strife, and whence the devil's roar.

This "devilish" would fain embrace mankind within its claws, And fill us from its horrid breath with creeds the soul abhors.

'Tis this, and this, the devil is called (sometimes without the "D"). The devil is dead, but "evil" yet spreads o'er earth on sea to sea.

Yet evil must die as light from on high extends from pole to pole; In reason's ray it shall pass away, and good triumphant roll.

'Tis undeveloped good within, too weak to manifest, By education, heritage and 'vironment suppressed—

'Tis mind unbalanced, thro' God's law of cause-effect-condition, That gives us sin, and there's no flaw from planting to fruition.

The devil is dead, theology swoons—"will soon the 'bucket' kick, As reason's might let in the light, the reaction will be quick;

And man set free from "devils," will will grow to angelhood, And peace and love from heaven above blend all in brotherhood.

clients, as well as now. The more knowledge that man can attain, the more he sees how little he knows of what there is to know of the past, present and future. Oh! if we could only pierce the veil, and behold the beauties and glories of that great future! The time is not long when we shall see and know for ourselves the divine plan.

HARMONY.

Sweet Harmony, thou word divine, I love thy heavenly sound, And would that thou didst reign supreme, To earth's remotest bound.

This world is ruled in harmony, A paradise would be, If every discord were but changed To love and harmony.

True love, attraction, harmony, A trinity divine, And happy is the family Encompassed by this shrine.

Two joined by true affinity In body, spirit and soul, What can disturb their harmony While endless ages roll?

SOMETHING ABOUT THE SUPERNATURAL.

Can Christianity Cease to Be a Religion, Yet Become a Moral Standard?—The Views of the Editor of the New York Sun.

A friend in Brooklyn kindly sends to us a letter of advice as to the matter of the religious correspondence in The Sun, writing to us not for publication, but simply for private suggestion.

His point is that we should "make some effort to direct it, with the view of showing that of the present needs of intelligent society the least need of anything in the world is of a supernatural religion." "After having given the subject a great deal of thought," he, for himself, "has come to the conviction, between 40 and 70, that dogma is dead and only needs to be decently interred, and that the conduct of life must now be put on purely scientific grounds—nothing sacred, not even a deity."

What shall be the moral standard for this conduct of life? Our friend says for the Christian religion, but "the precepts and principles of the Christian religion with myth and miracle eliminated and only its moral code in all its severity upheld." But Christianity is no longer a religion if its "myth and miracle" are eliminated; it is brought down into the category of a merely human moral philosophy.

Once it is put in that place Christianity becomes a debatable and a disputable philosophy. It may be and is treated as a pure idealism impossible of realization as a practical standard for the conduct of life. It may be said that even with the awful force of a revealed supernatural source as a religion, Christianity is not actually being obeyed in Christendom after nearly two thousand years of preaching and experience. How could more be expected of it if Christianity should become a merely human system of philosophy?

A nation of another religion is now fighting a Christian nation. Is Russia exemplifying in this war a higher and purer moral standard than that of Buddhist or Shintoist Japan? Is Christian Russia more than Japan exemplifying the essential doctrine and principle of Christianity—which Mr. Goldwin Smith celebrates as its sole original and surviving teaching—the beautiful conception of the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man?"

Moreover, if we should follow the advice of our Brooklyn friend, deny to Christianity a supernatural origin and dismiss as myths and superstitions the miracles on which it is founded as a religion, we should be treating it as a gigantic imposture. No moral philosophy thus tainted could be received as the highest and purest standard for the conduct of life.

That is, Christianity cannot be separated from the supernaturalism to which it lays claim without subjecting it to infinite moral degradation. It is as much as moral progress for the conduct of life is full ethical obedience to the teachings of Jesus possible. They hold up an ideal standard—an object for religious worship, not a mere rule of conduct, according to the conception of our Brooklyn adviser. In the Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come" implies the existence of a deity, he would expunge from consideration as "purely mythical." "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

Our Brooklyn friend says that "dogma is dead and only needs to be decently interred"—that dogma among the rest of the United States there are about thirty millions of communists of Christian churches founded on that dogma—men and women who still believe in Christianity as a religion and therefore in its supernatural origin.

POSSESSION.

I own you not, I have you not, 'Till seemingly I own— Until myself I have forgot, And angel good and true, No lingering claim of selfishness, Must I keep in my breast, If I would have the power to bless, And be among the blest!

God has selected a new race— To crown the present man; Within our souls is that high grace, That perfects this grand plan: It bids us live in love supreme, And dream and work upon the dream, And win this higher plane.

What was as poetry of the past, Must be abiding act, The beauty in our living cast, Flower out in lovely fact; For souls to souls are in love, And naught of kindness mis, And how the angels live above, Becomes our human bliss.

O heart of love, I look on you, And feel the flush of love, That while I might have been so true, Such frailty to me came; To love sincerely—that is wise, And soon would earth's wrong; And lovers looking from love's eyes— Would find their lives a rose.

SORROWS.

As you sit and ponder lonely, Of your own misfortunes only, And in pity for yourself you drop a tear,

Just remember that your troubles, Are but small, transparent bubbles, Someone else is having troubles more severe;

Someone else who smiling hails you, As some devil blue assails you, Someone else who seems with cares to trod,

At misfortunes may be joking, While his soul is slowly choking From the achings deep within a broken heart.

So extend your hand in greeting, For the hours of life are fleeting And return the pleasant smile with one more cheer;

Think a little less of sorrow, For the sun will shine to-morrow, If it shouldn't, why, with smiles it can't be drear.

PESSIMISM AND OPTIMISM

Pessimism Analyzed, Defined, and Expounded, by Wm. Henry Burr.

The basis of Christianity is pessimism of the most diabolical kind. At the age of nineteen, frightened at a picture of hell by the revivalist, Jacob Knapp, I "got religion." A year later I joined the Presbyterian church. The advent of Spiritualism in 1848 emancipated me, and after ten years of church membership I became a skeptic and an optimist. My optimism lasted about forty years, and now I am a pessimist, and regard pessimism as an outcome of all mental philosophy.

The word pessimism is not found in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary. On Noah Webster defines a pessimist as "One who complains of everything as being for the worst; opposed to optimism, and adds in parenthesis "Rare." This definition is repeated in the unabridged edition of 1864, omitting the word "rare," but the word "pessimism" in the unabridged is still so rare as not to be indexed.

The word is derived from the Latin: malus, bad; peior, worse; pessimus, worst; and it is defined in the Century Dictionary as "(1) The doctrine that this world is the worst world possible; (2) the tendency to exaggerate in thought the evils of life, or to look only on the dark side; a melancholy or depressing spirit or view of life."

The first definition is absurd. Who can know that "this world is the worst world possible"? Nor is the second definition a good one. Pessimism is simply the doctrine that the sorrows of life exceed its joys.

The high priest of pessimistic philosophy was Arthur Schopenhauer, who died in 1860, aged 72 years. His first exposition of it was published in 1818, but the book attracted little notice until after his death; nor did the author attain notoriety until the last decade of his life. His renown has increased greatly, while the metaphysical philosophy of Hegel, to which he was violently opposed, has largely lost its hold, and appears to be subsiding.

The pessimistic philosophy, though now little more than a generation old as a distinctive system, is traceable to remote antiquity. "Life in its entirety," says the Roman savant Seneca, "is lamentable. No one would accept it were not received in ignorance of what it is." "Natura," says Pliny, "invention," says Pliny, "is brevity of life. No mortal is happy, for even if there is no other cause for discontent, there is at least fear of possible misfortune."

But long before the time of these Romans we have the doctrine recorded in the book of Ecclesiastes, as follows: "Vain is the toil and the sweat of the labor which he taketh under the sun? * * * That which is crooked cannot be made straight, and that which is wanting cannot be numbered. * * * In much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow. * * *

As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth to me, and why was I then more wise? * * * That which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; * * * as one dieth so dieth the other. * * * All go to one place."

In modern times the doctrine is well expressed by the poet Pope: "Man never is, but always to be blest," also by Dryden, an earlier poet:

"When I consider life, 'tis all a cheat, Yet, fooled with hope, men treasure the deceit; Trust on, and think to-morrow will repay, To-morrow's false as 'tis the present day."

But a more forcible statement of it is by Voltaire, to-wit:

"Happiness is a dream; only pain is real. I have thought so for eighty-four years, and I know no better plan than to resign myself to the inevitable and to reflect that flies are born to be devoured by spiders, and man to be consumed by care."

Pessimists maintain that happiness consists chiefly, if not entirely, in the absence of pain. For this reason, they are not so much concerned with the attainment of happiness as they are with the avoidance of pain. Schopenhauer refused to admit that a being more intelligent than man could exist, either here or on any other planet, for, with enlarged intelligence, he would consider life to be too deplorable to be supported for a single moment. We enter life fully persuaded that it is a curse, and that the end is easy to make our acquaintance with it, but experience tells us know that it is a will-o'-the-wisp, which is only visible afar, while, on the other hand, suffering and pain have a persistent reality. Happiness is mostly negative—pain is positive; happiness is transient, pain is constant.

Pessimism, Schopenhauer takes, and gives nothing in return. But when more closely examined it transforms itself into a consolation, which, if relatively restricted, is none the less valuable. It shields us from manifold deceptions, and by showing that each joy is an illusion, leaves pleasure where it found it, simply including it in a larger trust, while, in greater relief it shines more brightly than before. It emphasizes the possibility of triumphing over misery through a subjugation of the selfish propensities. In that way peace may be attained, or, at least, the burden of life much diminished.

Von Hartman, a later pessimistic philosopher, looked forward to the vision of joy, hope, when the human race would become intelligent enough and virtuous enough to remove itself from the face of the earth.

Between optimism and pessimism the astute philosopher, Lester F. Ward, of Washington, D. C., champions "meliorism," another word not found in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, but derived from the Latin word melior, meaning better. Its first use may be traced to the novelist George Eliot, who called herself a meliorist. Prof. Ward defines meliorism to be "humanitarianism minus all sentiment." He further says:

"Pain in and of itself is evil—the only evil. Yet, viewed in the light of science, it is good, if there be any good, for it is the sole guarantee of life itself. This then is the origin of evil and for ever closes the great debate, while at the same time it furnishes the ultimate answer to pessimism, asceticism, orientalism and all the isms that bewail the sufferings of the world."

Prof. Ward closes his chapter in his "Psychic Factors" with an acknowledgment of the preeminent service rendered by Schopenhauer, especially in his "satz von Grunde" (Law of Causation) and his "Willenslehre" (Will theory). STEALING OUR THUNDER.

Revivalists Accepting the Proofs Offered by Spiritualism.

The revival season has again returned, but with very little if any of its old-time vigor, excitement and interest. We have in the city of Fort Wayne two evangelists at present who are making strenuous efforts to create the intense religious enthusiasm which formerly characterized revivals. For some reason or other, people do not enthrall themselves as they once did. The "mourners' bench," the fear of a "brimstone hell," etc., seem to be things of the past, and no longer attract attention. All kinds of schemes are resorted to to draw the crowds, but with very little success. Not a few still attend these revival meetings, but seemingly for the purpose of killing time, spending an evening, hearing the music or meeting a sweetheart, rather than because of any real interest felt in them in a religious way.

The "Higher Criticism," evolution, education and free thought have rendered the old time orthodox revival a relic of theological ignorance. It is, however, somewhat refreshing to us Spiritualists to observe with what eagerness our present day evangelists are seeking to prove the existence of a future life, with the hope evidently, of restoring to the church the wanted interest in its rival, convinced as they are now becoming, that the failure of the church heretofore to furnish any present day evidence of a future existence, is the cause of the decline of its power and influence.

The Rev. Arthur J. Smith, one of the evangelists conducting meetings in Fort Wayne, preached last evening (Nov. 10) on the subject, "Does Death End All?" taking for his text Job 14:14, "If a man die, shall he live again?" His proofs that man survives the tomb were:

First, because of the statements of scripture.

Second, because of the teachings of Jesus Christ.

Third, because of the vast capacities of the soul.

Fourth, because of the law of progress in the universe.

Fifth, because of the price paid for his redemption.

Sixth, because of the joy of the angels over the salvation of lost souls.

Seventh, because it is the universal belief of mankind, and the world's greatest psychologists believe it.—Hodgeson of Cambridge, Hyslop of Columbia, and James of Harvard.

It will be observed that his seventh and last proof, the most important and convincing of all, is that afforded by the Spiritualistic investigators, Messrs. Hodgson, Hyslop and James, whom he denominated "psychologists."

It would never in the world to call them "Spiritualists" or to accept their proof, they offer as the proof of the existence of the soul, the evidence of the delirium of the gods. Love divests us of all alienation from each other, and fills our vacant hearts with overflowing sympathy," so wrote the inspired philosopher Plato.

"Love is the valued treasure of the fortunate and desired by the unhappy (therefore unhappy because they possess not love) the parent of grace, of gentleness, of delicacy, a cherisher of all that is good, but guileless as to evil; in labor and in fear, in longings of the affections or in soarings of the reason or best pilot, confederate, supporter and savior, ornament and governor of all things, human and divine; the best of all things, the most divine, the best of all who live, who have, who are, who follow with songs of exaltation uniting in the divine harmony with which love forever soothes the mind of men and gods."

The one great harmonious chord sounded by all philosophers and teachers of all time has been just this: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Of all who have ever lived, in preaching this doctrine Spiritualists have been foremost, for they "hold the truth." Is it not strange, then, that so often the passion of hate holds sway among those who preach the glorious gospel of love?

Surely there is here a great mistake. Surely man has missed his way. The sweetest angels of the world have carried the praises of love in melodious tones and men have listened, charmed, for awhile, to go away and nourish their old hatred against some foe.

There is beauty all around When there's love at home; There is joy in every sound When there's love at home.

How true the grand old song, yet how often men fail to realize love even in that innermost recess of their being—home.

But why hate? That is the question. There is no time for the development of such unholy passion. The whole of life may well be consumed in the endeavor to build the stately palace of the joys. Well may men spend their time in gathering the roses of love and removing the thorns of hate from their lives.

A writer in The Animals' Friend uses the bee as a beautiful illustration of what should be the loving task and un-failing pleasure of man.

Said a little wandering maiden To a bee with honey laden: "Bee, at all the flowers you work, Yet in some do poison lurk."

"That I know, my little maiden," Said the bee with honey laden, "But the poison I forsake, And the honey only take."

"Cunning bee, with honey laden, That is right," replied the maiden; "So will I, from all I meet, Only draw the good and sweet."

How simple are the greatest lessons of life, and yet how difficult they appear to those who do not wish to learn them. It seems so much more natural to have one's own way, to impose one's own thoughts upon others, whether they will have them or not; but when one learns that others have rights, and when one strives to meet the wishes of others so far as possible, one of the greatest of all lessons has been learned.

We do not wish to gird at any, but would ask all who are

Power of Early Teaching.

It may be supposed that beliefs that were acquired so easily as children acquire them passively as truth beyond question, would be just as easily cast off and abandoned; but the reverse is the fact."Suggestion" is a mighty power in the formation of beliefs, more especially when exercised upon the plastic minds of children. Young children are prone to believe everything they are told; and whatever is constantly repeated in their homes, by their associates, and especially by their teachers, becomes their settled convictions of truth.
And these beliefs, thus acquired, thrust into the mind without reasoning, accepted as real truths, are the most difficult of all beliefs to eradicate.
Comparatively, as they were accepted without reasoning, they are least amenable to reasoning, and hardest to overcome.They are ingrained, become a substantial part of the mental make-up, and are most tenacious in their hold on life and thought. The life is governed by them.In view of these things, how plainly evident is the importance of right teachings to children; that their minds may not be infected with dogmatic errors, immoral beliefs, perverted conceptions of sacred truth, and all the brood of anti-theistic theological mor-tosities taught in the ordinary schools conducted under orthodox auspices.How tenacious these false beliefs, how far-reaching and powerful their influence, how exceedingly difficult to counteract and eradicate, may be plainly seen in the effect of the teaching given in Roman Catholic schools, where children's minds are infected with the virus of Romish superstitions and false-ties. Their minds are molded and shaped into the Romish pattern, well-nigh invulnerable to reason, free thought and common sense in religion —enslaved to the church of Rome and its priests.Spiritualism wants no such teaching for its children; its lyceums train the young to be thinkers, fearless investigators, broad and expansive, independent and progressive, unafraid of truth, and open to reason—free in thought and mind.Were Spiritualists awake to the importance of this work, lyceums would spring up on every hand, and Spiritualism would become strong where it is now weak, and there would be an accretion of vital strength to our cause that would add greatly to our numbers and influence.

Friends, think on these things.

Instructive Geological Facts.

The largest mass of pure rock salt in the world lies under the province of Galicia, Hungary. It is known to be 550 miles long, 20 broad, and 20 feet in thickness.—Exchange.Can the reader grasp the eternity of time required to produce that deposit of salt?First, every particle of salt on this globe came from the wearing away of the primary rock with which it was intermingled. It was borne along by rivers until it reached sea or ocean. By some mighty convulsion a continent was upheaved from the bed of the ocean, in which was a basin longer and wider than the body of salt now existing. The depth of that sea was great enough, so that when the water was evaporated 20 feet in thickness of salt remained as a residuum. Then that plain was again submerged, and whatever depth of debris now covers that body of salt was lifted up by slow deposits carried into the ocean by rivers.
And then again an upheaval, the production of yet more salt, a shining truth from age to age forming soil, in which condition it is now found. Can anyone conceive of such wonderful results without thinking of countless millions of years?

All Point in the Same Direction.

Now the American Bible Society reports itself in a hole. It is the first time in twenty-five years. For the last four years it has drawn upon its surplus at the rate of $30,000 a year. But legacies have fallen off; donations have waned; the life membership fees are abridged; and the churches have ceased to be generous with their contributions. It is well, and the people should be wiser. The horrible records of a barbarian are imposed on the world as the Voice of God; should have no place in our literature, other than as the mythology of an uncultured people whose savage ways should be forgotten.

Socrates a Spiritualist.

Socrates, the Athenian philosopher, whose fame will endure so long as history is read, entertained views in common with Spiritualists of to-day; and more, the evidence is conclusive, he was clairaudient, and in frequent communication with spirits. The fact is as well authenticated as any other event in history. He designated the spirits as Voices, and gave heed to their counsels as superior beings directing him for his good. The populace mistook those communications for the voice of an unknown god.Socrates was born 469 years before our era. Like all brave men who dare entertain an honest thought and give expression to it, he had bitter, unrelenting enemies. They pursued him to his grave. He was indicted for not worshipping those gods the city of Athens had set up, and for introducing new deities—the latter were the Voices he heard—and that he had corrupted the youth by his teaching.The offences charged against Socrates are, in effect, identical with the charges made against modern Spiritualists. Thanks to the fathers of Protestantism, and, still later, to the Revolutionary heroes of our own America, the power of religious bigotry to punish with death those who do not adopt the dominant religion, else we, too, would suffer the fate of Socrates.We have consulted Plato, a student of Socrates, who wrote very fully of the events ending in the master drinking the poisoned cup, and of his noble words and action until he was cold in death. We have read Xenophon's Memorabilia of Socrates, with incidents in his life, trial and execution, and compared their with other classical authors who wrote on the subject with Grote's History of Greece, Vol. 3, Chap. 68. We draw upon the latter for a condensed account of those Voices. We would render the word "Voices" into our own vernacular by substituting spirit communications."Socrates had been accustomed from childhood, to hear a divine voice, interfering at moments when he was about to act, in the way of restraint. Such prophetic warning was wont to come to him frequently, not only on great occasions, but even on small ones, intercepting what he was about to say or do.
Later writers speak of this as the demon or genius of Socrates. He, himself, does not personify it, but treats it merely as a 'divine sign, a prophetic or supernatural voice.' He was accustomed not only to obey it implicitly, but to speak of it publicly and familiarly to his friends, and even to his enemies.
It always forbade him to enter on public life, and when the indictment was hanging over him it forbade his taking any thought for a prepared defense. So completely did Socrates mark with consciousness this voice in his mouth when he felt no check, he assumed the turning he was about to make was the right one. Though his persistence on the subject was sincere, and his obedience constant—yet he never dwelt upon it as anything grand or awful, or entailing him to peculiar deference; but spoke of it often in his usual strain of familiar playfulness. To his friends generally it seems to have constituted one of his titles to reverence, though neither Plato nor Xenophon scruples to talk of it in that jesting way which to us, at least, the fact was well known.
To his enemies and to the Athenian public, it appeared an offensive heresy; an impious innovation on the orthodox creed, and a desertion of the recognized gods of Athens. . . .The restraining voice began when Socrates was a child, and continued to the end of his life. It became an established persuasion long before his philosophical habits began. Though the secular work of inspiration belonged exclusively to him, there were other ways in which he believed himself to have received the special mandates of the gods, not simply checking him when about to take a wrong turn, but spurring him on, directing, and peremptorily acting from him a positive course of procedure."It is very evident, in view of modern revelation, this Voice, which was so communicative to Socrates, so watchful of his action, and so careful in directing his movements, were the invisible spirits, the disembodied mortalities, who ever with him. He mistook them for gods, just as churchmen to-day repulse them and credit their doings to the Infinite. Prayers, claimed to have been answered by God, have been responded to by the loved ones who are ever near, and ever ready to lend a helping hand in the hour of need. Socrates was the author of the expression: "The proper study of mankind is man."But Socrates was condemned and condemned to drink the fatal cup, to gratify the ignorance and the bigotry of that distant age.Plato records the fact in his Phaedo, when his friend Crito inquired of Socrates if he had any directions to give in regard to his burial, he replied:
"Bury me in any way you like, but be sure you get hold of me, and that I don't run away from you." This of itself showed the wise old sage had a correct idea of the spirit, that it could not be confined by walls, nor be buried in the tomb.

"The Dog Shall Bear Him Company."

"Public Opinion," in a late issue, has an interesting article headed "Spiritualism Among Animals." It gives observations of H. Rider Haggard in regard to his dog, that seem only explainable on the theory that the dog communicated with his master after death.Other cases, reported by well known scientists, are cited which seem incapable of explanation on any other hypothesis than the survival of the animal after the death of the body.
Dogs and horses are frequently seen by clairvoyants. Those who want Bible confirmation that animals see spirits have only to open to and read Numbers 22:23 to 36; whilst in Revelation accounts are given of "white horses" and "black horses" being seen by the revelator in heaven. Man's contracted vision cannot comprehend all there is of life.

Ingersoll Said It.

This is a world of progress—a world of change. There is perpetual death and perpetual birth. By the grave of the old forever stands youth and joy.
And when an old religion dies, a better one is born. When we find out an assertion is a falsehood, a shining truth takes its place, and we need not fear the destruction of the false. The more false we destroy, the more room there will be for the true.

Glad of the Advance.

Said a suburban daily, in a leading editorial the other day
"That the influence of the church throughout Christendom has broadened and become a dominating influence for the good of humanity is unquestionably true, and churchmen and the clergy may take the fact as cause for congratula-tion."All know and are glad to witness this broadening of Christendom, and are thankful for every humanitarian advance. The farther the church gets away from the Bible teaching the greater the hope.At the very threshold of all our churches we are met with the declaration of Jesus, Matt. 10:34—"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword."Look at the bloody footprints of Christianity through all the centuries and that damnable declaration has been verified. Wars the most stupendous have masked every step of its progress;
The late war between Christian Russia and Pagan Japan illustrates all history.
Had Russia been faithful to its agreement and evacuated Manchuria that war would not have occurred.And then that awful doctrine of HATE which is still bearing fruit, the crop even enlarging, Luke 14:26—"If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.""Hate," then, is an indispensable feature of Christianity. To eliminate it from the creed would be to destroy the basic feature of the faith.Add to this the words of the Master, "Believe or be damned," and we have in a nutshell the tap root of the great tree representing the dominant religion as it has been. Every remove from that fabled tree, bearing such pernicious fruit, every branch and every leaf laden with hate, as seen by the recent and continuous massacre of Jews in Russia, must be hailed with delight by every lover of humanity.We beg the reader not to misunderstand us. The members of all churches are better than their creeds. They are infinitely better than the Bible they adore as the word of God. The clergy have extracted many good things out of the book, and in suppressing its barbarian violence, and futile attempts to give its onerous features a different meaning from that the writers or speakers intended, they have made the thoughtless believe it has merits, which the facts do not warrant.

FROM A PROMINENT CALIFORNIAN

"What Does Spiritualism Teach That Spiritualists Believe in Common?"From my own observation Spiritualists uniformly agree upon the few subjoined propositions:

1. The immortality and power of spirit to return and manifest after the death of the body, WITHOUT RE-GARD TO PREVIOUS CONDITION OF RELIGIOUS FAITH OR MORALITY, GOOD OR BAD.
2. Spirit control depends largely upon environment and conditions, as the camera requires the film to develop the imprint of the picture, and retain its impress.
3. Spirit need not of necessity be freed from its body to be able to control or influence, in a measure, or completely, that of another.
4. Evil tendencies, thoughts and actions are reactionary, and as surely as the good, bring deserved reward.
5. Heaven and hell are conditions which ourselves and others make for us, here and hereafter.
6. All human life is progressing, both here and hereafter; that though one may at times through stress of circumstances apparently retrograde, there are none who may not be redeemed.
7. Heaven and hell are conditions, and not places of future abode. In the hereafter, the one is idle joy and unconcerned bliss for the good; the other teeming with fire and brimstone for the wicked, as formerly taught by orthodox religionists.

These seem to me to be a fundamental basis that meets all Spiritualists' belief. What further I may believe or disbelieve, not herein included, however.

THE GOOD TIME COMING.

A Modern Sermon in Touch With This Progressive Age—Believe in the Better Day; Work for It, Pray for It, Be Fit for It—It Dawns Every Day—Every Breath Brings It Nearer.Humanity has always believed in the coming of the kingdom of God. It has always looked for a day when discords should cease, when the will of the all loving Lord of all should be the law for all. It has never at heart believed that oppression, injustice, and the suffering that springs from selfishness and sin were ever irretrievable. Deep in us is there is the conviction that there is in this world a power that works for righteousness, for peace, for higher forms of living, and that happiness is but harmony with that power.At some time every man sees the vision of the better times coming. No matter how dark to-day may be to-morrow dawns brighter, with some ancient word rights some old abuse gone forever, some tyrant dead, and some new and fairer, holier things begun. To the normal heart each day seems to bring at least a little lift in the great life of this world. The past proves it. The dreams of our fathers have come true, better things than they even
dared to hope have been accomplished.
An honest review of history is a decided antidote for pessimism.NO LONGER CAN WE BE CON-TENT TO BELIEVE THAT THE UNIVERSE IS THE PLAYTHING OF THE DEVIL OR HOLD A DOUBT AS TO THE ULTIMATE ISSUE OF THE CONFLICT OF THE AGES.To a world steeped in the cynicism that said the gods are dead and hope is but folly; Jesus came with the good news of a great Father in us all loving and working for the good of all. He has taught the ages the eternal and unconquerable might of the good. He was the apostle of hope; hungry hearts turned to him and he fed them with happiness.He did not talk of better things in some other world, of a good time coming in the day when the good news of this world. The past proves it. The dreams of our fathers have come true,
better things than they even
dared to hope have been accomplished.
An honest review of history is a decided antidote for pessimism.But to men then and to men to-day there come times, many and often, when we most of all need to be assured that this is a right world; that this kingdom of the good, where right, truth, justice and mercy reign is coming and is becoming more and more effective right here. It may seem as though God had forgotten, as though justice and mercy had fallen. In that time of struggle we are helpless, who are hopeless.
They are invincible, who cling to the assurance of the reign of righteousness, who see the good being wrought out ofthe seeming ill and the peace coming from the storm.Men learning to read the record of nature have found there the endorsement of the message of the great teacher; she shows the long process of all things working together for good, to bring in the reign of the best. Consider the lilies; their perfection is the product of the ages. If God so clothe the grass of the field, shall he not much more you? The hand of love that fashions a flower with so much care in order that it might minister to man will not move with less skill where the making of man is concerned.The trouble full often is that we are looking for that coming golden age to consist in golden things; the good time coming means to many but more meat and drink, clothes, furniture, and follies. But golden streets do not make a golden age; warehouses of parlor suits do not make one single home.
There will be plenty of every good thing when the wrongs within are righted, when the old greed, malice, and bitterness are gone. New hearts make the new age.Yet the new heart and the new age shall be ours if we but believe in its possibility. Faith in its coming brings it. Believe in the better day, work, pray for it, be fit for it. It dawns every day; every breath brings it nearer.
This is the good news, that man moves into the light.

THE GOLDEN RULE

If some dark night an angel should awake
Me from my slumbers, and should bid me takeFirm hold upon the lever that controls
The destiny of struggling human souls,
And bid me rectify the world's mistakes—Blot out all cruelty and sore heart-aches—Reform this foolish world from pole to pole—I should not don a surplice, cowl, nor stole.But I'd call the little children unto me,
And in all its loving grand simplicity
Would make the long-neglected Golden RuleTheir code of life at home, in church, or school—
No form nor shape of cruelty could I surviveIf the Golden Rule should suddenly revive—
No poverty, oppression, stay on earth
When the Golden Rule controls our acts from birth.CORA M. W. GREENLEAF

The Whole World Aglow.

Spirit Return is Agitating the Whole World, as evidenced by the appearance of Dr. I. K. Funk before Many Ministers of the Presbyterian Church, who Attentively heard his remarks in reference to his experience in connection with Spiritualism and Psychic force. Dr. Funk has investigated Spiritualism for many years. As Author of "The Widow's Mite," he created a decided sensation and did a most excellent work for Spiritualism. The fact is the Whole World is aglow with magnificent results flowing from Spirit Return independent of any "ism." The following will be read with deep interest.Dr. Isaac K. Funk has been telling ghost stories again. Last week he told a number of Presbyterian ministers some of the psychic experiences that have come under his observation since "The Widow's Mite" appeared.
And allied to Dr. Funk's "ghost stories" are some peculiar psychic cases that are vouched for by Bishop Fallows of Chicago and Mrs. Lavilla Nelson of Boston.This is the chief ghost story Dr. Funk told the ministers:
"I had this from a physician of high standing in this city, who is the editor of a medical paper and whose word could not be doubted. I was very careful, and investigated closely on this point.

Calls on His Friend.

"The physician was alone in Florida
when he was attacked with paralysis.
The disease progressed and finally he became unconscious. After a very few moments he again became perfectly conscious and felt himself to be wholly free from pain. He wondered if death had come to him. Thoughts of a friend a thousand miles away came into his mind, with a sudden desire to see that friend. In a few moments he was in the friend's house, and heard what the family were saying and saw what they were doing. He spoke to the friend twice, but failed to attract his attention. Finally the friend glanced up, and rising, stepped forward, saying with great astonishment, 'Why, doctor, are you here? I thought you in Florida.' As he stepped forward the physician said he felt recalled. A friend's approach. After some strange experiences the physician heard a voice, which asked him in deep tones, 'If he felt his work on earth was done. It was for him to decide whether or not he should go back.' He considered and finally made up his mind that his work on earth was not done, and he immediately found himself in his bed-chamber, looking down on what was apparently his own corpse as it lay on the bed on which he had lain.By a supreme effort of will he placed himself on the bed and was resolved into his own being, in an unconscious state, from which he awoke to find that for a whole night he had been apparently unconscious.The curious part of it was that he wrote at once to his friend describing his experience in part. A day or two afterward—and the friend was a thousand miles away, mind you—he got a letter from the friend, in which the friend said that he had seen the physician in his room, but that he had disappeared on approach. The two letters passed on the way, so there was no chance of pre-information. Later the two gentlemen wrote other letters to each other, and the smallest details the incidents which the physician had seen in his friend's home and the words he had heard.There is no question of the truth of this. How is it to be explained except that the spirit exists independent of the body, and can at times make itself manifest to the physical sense of another in a form like its own known to occupy space in the flesh. A sufficiently large number of experiences of the kind would scientifically make certain that we also have spiritual bodies of which our physical bodies are but the coarse shadows. It might show that each ego has the power, when both physical and spiritual conditions are favorable, to crystallize individual atoms about each ego in harmony with some divine law of crystallization not now recognized by science."The Chicago University Case.
Dr. Funk's other stories were about a lost gold pin and a share in an estate.
The latter was obtained through a medium's efforts. The pin story was of a man connected with the University of Chicago, who sent him a small envelope containing a question to be asked of a deceased friend—and he did not give the name of the friend or state the question. He requested that the letter be given to a certain well known psychic. Before I took it to the psychic, said Dr. Funk, "I put my own seal on the envelope, a unique seal it was, and I don't if another like it exists. I put the letter on the psychic's table, in plain sight, and sat where I could see it every moment.""This is a question from one whose name is Hesperia—Mother Hesperia—and it tells about a pearl pin, a gold pin, that is lost; is from a man in the West, and asks about this pin. Mother Hesperia speaks of her daughter," said the psychic.
"I found afterward," said Dr. Funk,
"that the envelope had been so marked that it could not have been opened without being detected. I sent the letter back to Chicago and the gentleman wrote to tell me that the question was about a pin lost by a daughter of a late friend by name of Hesperia."Dr. Funk said he could not give any explanation of the incident which would satisfy himself. He was sure there was no fraud.In a summary of his beliefs Dr. Funk said:
"After much and careful investigation over a period of years I think I am within bounds in saying that nine-tenths of what passes as psychic phenomena is fraudulent—coinc

HOW CAN GOD BE RECONCILED TO MAN?

A Discourse Delivered Through the Lips of Mrs. Gora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, October 8, 1905.

If the lesson of life which has not been learned, could be learned by all, then we would never need any more sermons. People are impatient to go, or impatient to stay, or impatient to do something that they are not doing; yet never content to take the next step, to receive the next lesson.

Our subject of to-day is the burden of the world. Among the Brahmins the Perfect God is not worshipped; the Infinite Brahman is not praised. Praise does not affect Him; He knows all; every thing is good with Brahman. But the Brahmins worship Siva almost, more than Vishnu, who is the interpreter of good, because Siva is supposed to be the shadow, the Nemesis that does them harm, that which is revengeful, that which visits affliction upon the earth.

In substance all nations and religions are endeavoring to worship God in order to reconcile God to man. They want God to be good to them; they want God to be kind to them; they do not want to be exposed to the storm; they do not want any pain; they do not want any affliction. In other words, worship is propitiatory. To propitiate Siva the Brahmins journey to various shrines and altars, make offerings and the most pronounced sacrifices of the flesh.

Ahrimanes, the god of darkness among the Persians was more worshiped than Ormuzd latterly, but not at first; the ancient Persians worshipped the God of light, and set the fires perpetually burning in symbol of the sun, of the Lord of Life and Light, and never descended into the shadow worship; latterly, however, they have forgotten, and the shadow is worshipped.

The Satan of the Old Testament was more feared than God was loved. The God of wrath was more to the ancient Hebrew worshippers than all the sunshine of His love and the promises of the prophets. Who shall say that the offerings and the blood-stained records of the history of Christian nations has not been a tribute to the wrath instead of the love of God. The Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule and promises of loving-kindness are swallowed up in the fear of Hades. The whole array of sacrificial rites and of the atonement are, it seems, to make "God reconciled to man." There was no other way that man could get away from his sin and his violation of God's law. The wrath of God, of Jehovah, was emphasized in the Jewish law, and in order to make Christianity as acceptable as the former law, its founders caused their disciples to introduce the sacrificial idea as being the principal idea. Now these people saw that something must be done to propitiate this wrath, this anger, so built up a system of metaphysics which is very difficult for the intelligent mind to follow: God must sacrifice himself, so He takes upon Himself a human life and then sacrifices it to reconcile Himself to Himself. We protest! The spirit of every religion has been reversed, has been perverted.

God's thunders do not roll along the sky to frighten mankind. Those earthquakes, that are the safety valves of the pent up forces of nature, do not shock and open up the earth to swallow people because they are wicked. The devastating flames do not spread across the prairies consuming property and persons as a punishment. Floods are not sent to particular places to wipe out particular towns as a penalty for wrong doing. The great lesson of the universe, as we stated in last Sunday's discourse, is not that the universe is going to be adjusted to you; but you are going to be adjusted to the universe.

What man thinks God is doing to him he is doing to himself and to his fellows. What man considers as attributes of God in wrath and judgment are the imperfect human passions applied to the Infinite. God does not need to be reconciled to His universe or to His children. It is a very weak-minded parent who is offended at the imperfections of a child. Although many parents are angry with their children, that is not an exhibition of the divine hatred of the Creator by any means. When parents punish their children in anger they know it, and are ashamed of it. So it hurts the parents more than it does the child.

The truth is, God, being omnipresent, omnipotent, the "Infinite Good," Brahman, the "All-Wise" of the Hindus, the vast and wonderful "Jehovah" of Egypt and of Jerusalem, the "Father" of Jesus, the Great Father, the Divine Parent God is never in need of reconciliation; He does not require that we shall bend the knee to Him, as a king. There is no divine wish or desire to receive tributes, flattery and praises such as you give to an earthly monarch.

When people want favors from the Deity they adjust their religion along the gauge of their human desires. They want Him to stop this thunder and that death to please them, and frantically human beings run hither and thither praying that this or that life may be spared, that the great law of disintegration shall be set aside in their favor; they cannot stand it to have their friends pass from human sight. They think God is doing something to them when they do; they think it is a special enactment against them. They think if they pray and offer tributes they can turn this force aside from themselves. As the Yogis are said to do in the East; after secret and sacred orders of men who torture their flesh, let their nails grow into their hands and feet, and other things to crucify the body; to please whom? This god whom they fear.

The sacrifices among the Jews had two meanings. The meaning that was manifest was, that it was to appease God's wrath. And God did not want any mean treasures, the products of the earth were considered too cheaply, so did not suffice, but the choice lambs, the costliest of the herds, those things that were worth something, that cost something. Now the original meaning of this ancient law was—the original spiritual meaning—that if you are so selfish that it is hard to part with your valued possessions, with one-tenth of your physical possessions for your spiritual welfare, it is good for you to give them up. Of course priestcraft and church craft made an exterior matter of it, a very favorable method to build up the temple and the power of the church. But the original meaning of "sacrifice" was to give of something that was valuable. A great many people give their old clothes to the poor; few there are who give their new clothes to the poor. It is no sacrifice for you to give away the things you do not want. But the taking of the garment from your own shoulders when it is cold and giving it to some one who needs it. That's the way!

The truth is, God, the Infinite is not cold, is not hungry; you know that He does not require this for himself. What there is that is commanded in the ancient Hebrew law, in the light of that which is called sacrifice, was not to please God, but to benefit mankind, to cultivate a spirit of less selfishness in humanity. It is good for a child to devote a certain number of hours of each day to some needful labor, because play is not work to the child. No matter how tired children become in play, that is pleasure. Of course the man who invented a swing for his boys that would pump enough water for the stock on the farm if it was used as much as the boys would naturally use a swing, made a mistake, for as soon as the boys realized that they were pumping water when they were swinging it seemed like work and they soon tired of it. That plan of the father was a sacrifice of self-indulgence. All that was meant in the ancient sacrifices was the overcoming of this wish to always pursue one's personal, individual pleasure; so it was thought well to have certain days appointed for that kind of sacrifice. It was also thought well to take a rest from the manifold labors on certain days, because manifold labors bring physical fatigue as well as indulgence. It was also thought well that a certain percentage of one's gains be given for this purpose as a tribute, not to God, not because God needs it, not because God is angry if it is not given, but because that which is given in the right spirit, a true offering for a good purpose benefits the giver.

Now the whole scheme of the religious working of the world has been to endeavor to teach people that God is to be reconciled to mankind in some way or other, and this dernier resort of sacrificial offering, and the supreme sacrifice of "His only begotten son" was supposed to take away the burdens from the world. Of course, there is no more selfish idea conceivable than this; for you to rid yourself of your sins and their consequences by the death of another, for you to rid yourself of your responsibility by another taking it, while it is well to "bear one another's burdens" however—and that this is done for you and you have nothing to do is one of the most degrading conditions one can imagine.

The spirit of fear has been appealed to: God is angry with you and you must do something to appease that anger; you must do something to reconcile God to you. If you are terribly wicked He is going to punish you forever (and even if you are not wicked according to human standards) just because you have not done anything to appease Him. That which is brought out in the world by this teaching is, the effect upon the human mind and human morals. Agnosticism has taken people away from that thought; liberal churches have taken them away from it, science and philosophy have kept pace. But what with the studying of the "laws of nature" to contravene theology there are very few students of the great religious forces of the universe. Just as soon as people begin to study they think they have no religion; they forget their relations with the infinite. When they outgrow their fear of God they think they have nothing to do with the infinite. But the more and more the potential knowledge, the more and more complete and perfect the recognition of God; who knows all, who recognizes the human conditions, who understands the human weaknesses, and who has placed before man to be overcome, and understood not only the difficulties of the universe, with its invulnerable laws, but the spiritual universe with the invulnerable forces of spirit.

When you can command the earthquake; when the lightnings shall do your bidding; when the great forces of the earth shall yield to the volition of man will be, not when God has set aside any of the so-called laws, but when you have entered into the divine possession, through spiritual laws of those powers that are yours, then you can command the sea and it will be still, then the lightnings will not only be your message and burden-bearers, but will transport you anywhere to any kingdom by the volition of man. The great forces of nature are not fashioned to be reconciled to you, but for you to grow to understand them.

God is not angry with that which works in you when a moral precept or principle is not heeded. It is not the wrath of God; but it is the unavoidable, inevitable edict that when the principles that are enduring and right are not heeded there must be a reaction, there must come that which will produce an awakening. The nemesis of human existence is not a vengeful Deity. Siva, Ahrimanes and Satan are not lurking there in every corner to do you harm, to condemn, to punish you; but the Satan of human selfishness, the Satan of human greed, the Satan of human hatred, the Satan of human aggrandizing of self is the one that is there, and this inevitably brings its result. Therefore, that which is called "penalty" is simply a natural sequence of events. Now that steam (referring to the blowing off of steam from a boiler near by) which must escape is not doing that just to punish you. Nor is the engineer down below doing it to annoy you, he is doing it as a matter of safety, because there is more steam than he needs to use, (but in winter there will not be, perhaps, enough warmth in the room.) So when the safety-valves of nature are doing similar things they are not doing them because God wishes to punish you. When great moral upheavals come, like that over there in the Orient. That was not sent because God was angry with Russia or Japan, but because human greed, human pride had reached the limit and needed a safety valve, and that great explosion prevented other and greater disasters.

That which occurs in human lives and for which, you say, human beings are not responsible is, nevertheless, a part of the human being's practice and lesson. If humanity were not partners in the great propositions of eternity, if the human soul did not carry immortality like unto the Infinite, there would be no moral questions to consider. The beast does not sin, but dies. Everything in nature passes away from the existence of organic life to disintegration. The truth is: human beings suffer in exact proportion to their responsibilities. That pain which you suffer ignorantly is hard to bear, but that which you suffer knowingly is a great deal more bitter.

You say: "I know I ought not to over-eat and over-drink, and overdo anything physically;" you have had experience. There was a wise provision of nature in pain; when you know you ought not to do a thing and do it, do you want the pain to stop? do you want some Christian Scientist to come around and tell you you have no body, no pain? Christian science is an anesthetic, just as some doctors do not cure the disease, but give you morphine and cocaine to stop the pain. So ultimately Christian science affords very few cures. Ultimately Christian science is simply a moral anesthetic, it tries to stop the pain without curing the disease. There are other intellectual ways that are just as ineffectual.

The truth is, pain is simply that which gives nature's alarm. Those mechanical safety-valves out there (steam fire engines) when there is too much steam makes considerable noise. So when there is too much pressure on any nerve you are notified that the body is not in a good condition. There are pains that mean that you are to remove the cause: overworking, over-eating, over-doing of something else, and nature wishes you to know what it is, and if you do not heed it you wonder why your bodies wear out. Now the body is made for use, it is not made to last forever. Any human being who tells you of any chemical or other process by which this one human body, this physical organism can live forever on the planet is simply telling you a fiction. People have been trying to do it from the beginning of the earth. The life they do live forever is the life of the spirit. That which does forever renew itself is spirit. That which never dies is spirit. The thing that can die will never be resurrected, nor can it be made to live forever.

So when you are praying God to be kind to you, remember God's loving-kindness never is withdrawn. When you are praying God that this or that particular affliction shall pass from you, you may wish that it did not occur; you may feel that you do not want it to come, but even as the "Son of man," whom the Christians revered as God, if the record is true, prayed in vain for that "cup to pass" from him. Nevertheless, ah! there was the triumph, there the victory: "Not my will but Thine be done." He had arrived, you have not. He saw the human part of the disgrace; all that would come if he was physically sacrificed; how his followers would be afraid, how they would hide away and betray him; he saw the great calamity that would come to his people. But, "not my way" if this is the way, if this great human cruelty must come let it come. "Thy will be done." "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." Martyrs, saints, heroes everywhere express that law. "Do not protect me from bodily harm, do not shield me through fear, you must not have fear for me." Pray God to have fearlessness. The tempest rushes in, the elements expend their fury on all, some there may be whose physical existence may pass and others may not. Nature is not thinking about that.

Why! in this common humanity you do not suppose that God is picking you out, and you and you, to visit this affliction upon you for anything you have done. That He is doing it for the purpose of visiting an affliction upon you. The great lessons of human life are here to be learned, and you are here to learn them. You cannot learn them by rote from some other person's experience. You might say this baby does not need to learn to walk if the father and mother can. That is exactly what you think in morals and in other ways. As though anybody's feet would ever be able to bear that body but just the little limbs and feet that were made for the purpose of carrying it. Otherwise there would be a weakening and deforming of that child that he might never climb a hill for the purpose of gazing down. But the glory is in the climbing; the glory is in the thing that is to be overcome. Did not God know? Did not the great plan of the universe include it? Is not your special life included in that plan? Just when you find that your path holds the same experiences as every other life you will not intelligently cry out against it; you will not in a cowardly way try to avoid it; nor ask to have it made especially smooth because of the many thorns and briars that are there. You put a child on a smooth path and if there are any briars around that child will find them; it wants to find them, it does not want to go on the smooth path, it would rather go over there and conquer them and fight the briars for the sake of the North Pole! Mark Antony would have won more victories in the end but for the ease and luxury that lured him because of his passion for Cleopatra.

Even the Agnostic gets up his foolish plea of competition: "If I was God I would have happiness everywhere." The truth is, people want to find happiness. They expect to find happiness with such luxury as money can bring within their reach. When they tire of that they want to climb the Rocky Mountains, the Alps, they want to brave the haunts of wild beasts, they want something to do; to endure the perils of the land and sea; why? For human victory. So in the moral realm: Tell a boy he shall not do this and he must not do that, there is great danger in that direction, but he is certain to try it. That is not where the killing comes in; the victory is when he finds how futile and foolish a thing it is to expect happiness in that direction. The great victories of the world are not won before people are tempted, but afterwards.

"God being reconciled to man" is the most foolish subterfuge of the selfish human race. "I want salvation" they say, "even at the expense of this great sacrificial offering that has been given to make my way to heaven possible. I will try to have others follow, but if they will not I am going up to heaven in spite of it. I am going to be saved." There is no greater selfishness in the world than this. It is the monopolist's triumph, it is the millionaire's triumph, it is the triumph of the trusts. You want to be saved no matter what else shall fail. Now you do not want to be saved unless your wife, your children, your family, your particular friends are too, and you strain every point of your theology, if you have any theology, to take them across that little bridge of salvation in safety. Sometimes, with the Roman Catholics it is prayers after death. Sometimes, with the Protestants it is the death-bed repentance. Sometimes it is what the loving mother has done; sometimes, when one passes out in a state of coma, you think Christ may have touched that one at the last moment.

Do not deceive yourselves, all these people are going to be saved; but they are not to be saved in that way. They are going to know every step that they take in the "overcoming." They are going to take it painfully and hard at first; just as all must do who are conscious of imperfections and seek to overcome them. There is no victory, you are not reconciled to yourselves in any other way. God's love includes all, but He will not grow for you, He will not be a man or woman for you, He will not do this for you, but He will provide the way and you are to grow. The grain, the wheat is there, the sunshine and storm and wind will bring the harvest; the great knowledge of God's love. In the shadow as in the light, in the storm as in the calm, and it is not required that you be especially transported in any way to be near Him.

If you want the way to be clear between you and God, find the godward window of your soul; find the pathway that makes your life luminous with the knowledge of His Presence. We do not wonder that you do not find God when you are seeking Mammon. We do not wonder that you are not aware of this inward presence when you are seeking selfish pleasure. You would not want to feel that God is making you do an ignoble thing. You want to feel that it is the shadow of the senses, it is the imperfection of your manifestation in the human state, and that this thing or that thing you will, by and by overcome, and then know the real Presence, the Divine Personality.

How wonderful it is, instead of God needing to be reconciled, that it is man that is unreconciled. He was confronted with the natural elements and was afraid of the thunder and lightning and all the forces of nature. But man becomes reconciled to nature when he understands her laws. Man will be reconciled to God and to His wonderful and perfect ways, not by any artificial or external processes of making God reconciled to man, but by receiving by the visions and powers of the spirit, the knowledge of God's love that everywhere is made manifest in all the rulings of the universe.

When man is as eager to study the spiritual forces of the universe as he is the material; when he seeks to understand these, as he does in material ways, that such knowledge is for his benefit and enlightenment, he will not blind his spiritual vision; he will not close the avenues of spiritual light, but, knowing, he will say, I am more and more reconciled to the works and will of God. Thus the more I understand my own spirit, and this great open message between the two worlds, this power of knowing that beyond death there is life, and life all the while, eternally the more am I in accord with the eternal will. This has done more to lift the cloud of dissatisfaction and unrest from the human race than all other things put together, and it will do more; since death and all the horrors that have been depicted after death are swallowed up in the great victory of the knowledge of the soul and of God's eternal love.

JAPAN AND RUSSIA COMPARED.

The Superstition and Ignorance That Prevails in the latter.

Ever since Japan was made known to the Western world the Christian has had his eye upon her. But the lady of the chrysanthemum was not even inclined to flirt with him. It is true that at the commencement of her acquaintance with this fair-spoken Western male she thought his advances truly platonic; but that was her mistake.

Japan, dainty and clever, though small, has a will of her own, and when she found that the Christian meant to have her for his very own, she objected, and the platonic comradeship ended in the hyperite from the West being suddenly ejected—or, at least, as much of him as there was left.

But this Christian, who thinks himself the only good man on God's earth, and who plumes himself upon holding "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," is a pertinacious fellow in his way, and rebuff only makes him more determined to win by wile or war the object upon which he has set his mind. So from time to time he has ferried himself to the golden isle of the East, and by playing upon her good nature and open-mindedness has gained a hearing for himself, and is now chuckling complacently at the idea of adding Japan as another trophy to his harem.

The godly men of England are desirous of making Japan Christian. Why? Will she be the better for becoming Christianized? Heaven help her, no! Will her men become more honorable and her women more virtuous by an access of Christianity? Let the world judge from the results of the spread of that religion during the past two thousand years.

Heaven Japan. Christian Russia! What a contrast. In every sense the heathen rises superior to the Christian. In hygiene, in medical skill, in common-sense, in tactics, in courage, in brain and body, eye, in all but the drivel of superstition the Jap rises immeasurably superior to the Russian.

It may be urged that Russia is not a fair sample of Christianity. Indeed! No nation is more Christian. The priest or at least the church stands supreme in that land of darkness. Miracles abound, sacred pictures and images confront the traveler wherever he turns. The priest blesses the soldier, and the blessed soldier goes straight away and loses the blessed battle. The priest blesses the waters of the Neva, fawns over the latest child of the Czar, makes his way to the front in a church on wheels, and generally looms like a pillar of cloud wherever the Russian people turn. If Christianity has not a hold on Russia, where can it be said to have a resting place? Yet here, where the church has had its supreme opportunity, untrammelled by reason, education, scientific advancement, culture, it has proved the most miserable fiasco; has supported the horrors of Siberia, has employed the brutal knout of the Cossack, has left ignorance to befall and superstition to mislead the people. If ever the Christian religion has had an opportunity it has been in Russia, and if ever it has failed to rise to an opportunity it has been in that vast empire. Spain, Italy, France, Germany, can all tell the same story, and if England would face the facts it would join in the chorus.

Japan is the country which can help the West out of the quagmire of superstition into which it has fallen. The rising sun of the East is the one power which can dispel the miasmatic vapors of superstition clinging around these Western faiths. She can do this because her faith is simple, her facts are legion. Her ethics are high, her knowledge wide. She lives in the light of the broader world of spirit, and recognizes the truth of the continuity of life, but all the time bends her energies to the unfoldment of the best in this life.

If this be so, and we claim it is, then Christianity can teach her nothing, and we would say to the bishops and clergy so anxious for her conversion, "Turn your eyes towards home; make England first as good as you wish the world to be, you will find that task big enough; but for Japan, the simple, the honorable, in the name of heaven let her alone."—The Two Worlds.

THE NEW PATRIOT.

Who is the patriot? he who lights
The torch of war from hill to hill?
Or he who kindles on the heights
The beacon of a world's good will?

Who is the patriot? he who nails
A flag to some defiant pole?
Or he who follows dangerous trails,
And guides a people to its goal?

Who is the patriot? he who sends
A boastful challenge o'er the sea?
Or he who sows the earth with friends,
And reaps world-wide fraternity?

Who is the patriot? It is he Who knows no boundary, race, or creed,
Whose nation is humanity,
Whose countrymen all souls that need;

Whose first allegiance is owed
To the fair land that gave him birth,
Yet serves among the doubting crowd
The broader interests of earth.

The soil that bred the pioneers
He loves and guards, yet loves the more
That larger land without frontiers,
Whose wider seas without a shore.

If duty calls, the first to die
On fields of honor and of fame,
But readier, where the vanquished lie,
To heal the wounded, raise the lame.

Who is the patriot? Only he Whose business is the general good,
Whose keenest sword is sympathy,
Whose dearest flag is brotherhood.

REMARKABLE INVENTION

AN INSTRUMENT THAT RESTORES EYESIGHT.

Spectacles Can Be Abandoned.
This instrument is in the form of a pocket battery, which the inventors have patented and which they call "Actina," a word which is its trade mark and owned by them.

In the treatment of eye diseases the inventors of "Actina" claim there is no need for cutting or drugging the eye for any form of disease, cataracts, pterygiums and other abnormal growths can be removed by the use of the new and more humane method. If this is a fact, there will be no need to go blind or to wear spectacles. "Actina" has been tested in hundreds of cases and has effected marvelous cures. Go confident are the inventors that this device is an article of great merit that they give an absolutely free trial. They want every one interested to make a thorough investigation and a personal test of the "Actina." As it is sent on trial postpaid, any person can give it this test.

They have a book of 100 pages—a complete dictionary of diseases—which tells all about "Actina," the diseases it will cure, what others think of it, what marvelous cures it has effected, and all about the responsibility of its owners, and it is sent absolutely free upon request. This book should be in the library of every family. Address: "New York and London Electric Association, Dept. 342R, 925 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing would require the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby terse. Correspondents often weary of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his turn, and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be published. If the request is made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give what ever information I am able, the extraordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Mrs. D. L. Stephenson: Q. How are we to reconcile the conflicting statements made by spirits in regard to the use of tobacco, as in some communications it is claimed to be a hindrance to progress, while the spirit of Ingersoll claiming to be very advanced speaks of using a cigar in spirit life?

A. Such communications tax our forbearance to the utmost, and expose the cause to reproachful sneers. Ingersoll extolled tobacco in this life in eloquent words, but he has not found his favorite brand of cigars in the spirit realm. A spirit making this claim, may perhaps be the great orator, yet none should be deceived, for great communications signed by great names, are driven which had been written in this life would have disgraced their authors. Tobacco is a narcotic, which like all its class may soothe the nerves, or taken in excess produce vital disturbance and even death. Its limited use may not be representative of spiritual progress, but surely it cannot be helpful. Excessive use causes physical and spiritual degeneration.

GOT MESSAGE FROM JOHN BROWN

Crowd at Seance Was Also Greeted by the Late Benjamin Franklin.

For two solid hours, last night, a troupe of spirits helped entertain an audience at the Lyceum theater. The spirit band was part of the entertainment furnished by Prof. Henry J. Arnold, a Spiritualist.

Among the present were John Brown and Ben Franklin. Ordinarily one ought not to call the distinguished printer by so familiar a cognomen. But he himself used the same title in his communications last night. Franklin was quite familiar with the crowd. He wrote on the back of a calling card, frantically stating that he was glad to be in their midst.

"I am pleased to see so many of you here," he wrote. "Because it gives me an opportunity to communicate with you."

John Brown was less conventional in his communication from the spirit world. He chose the slate method and wrote:

"My soul still goes marching on, John Brown."

Arnold would not let any other spirit than John Brown write on the slate. When Benjamin Franklin wanted to deal off a message, he had to use the back of a calling card.

Arnold had promised a variety of new Spiritualistic doings. His promises drew out a crowd that had to be turned away in droves from the doors of the theater. One side of the audience was treated to the usual cabinet, banjo, cymbals, bells, knotted rope and table-lifting performance. Such as they were, Arnold did them as well as anybody, but when his audience began to demand his promised "materialization," the demonstrator proved the noisy ones and asked would they please keep quiet. Thus admonished, the audience suffered him to conclude his show.

Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, Monday, Nov. 13.

Fools and their money are easily parted; the adage is well exemplified when people go to such "shows" under the expectation of beholding an exhibition of spiritual phenomena or anything more than legerdemain, and sleight of hand tricks pretending to be duplicates of the tests given by spiritual mediums. Gullible Spiritualists are easily duped, and more so, by the gullible people who are satisfied to pay their money to behold such exhibitions as above described, under the belief that they are beholding either real spirit phenomena or a sleight-of-hand exact duplicate thereof.

The whole performance was simply trickery, and not the same as the work done through genuine mediums—whose work is done without tricks and without deception.

"Religious and Theological Works of Thomas Paine," contains his celebrated "Age of Reason," and a number of letters and discourses on religious and theological subjects. Cloth binding, 600 pages. Price $1.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

Spruce Grove Farm. My Dear Marah—It seems a long time since I got your letter, but the winter has passed more quickly than any other of my life, probably because I have had more to occupy my mind. I never before realized how much depends upon one's mental condition. The discomforts of life have been no less than usual this winter, but I have hardly noticed them. I do not know but I think the less people have to think about the more they magnify the few trials and troubles they have.

After Uncle Ezra passed to spirit life it was found he had left me all his little property. I was never so surprised in my life. It seemed his sister had been enough of her own and there were no other relatives. As soon as the money was put in my hands I went with father to see Mrs. Lee, and paid off the mortgage on our farm. I dreaded meeting her, but I would not allow myself to be a coward, and I am very glad I did not. I was shocked at her appearance. Her hair had grown white, and her form thin, and her face showed unmistakable traces of suffering. She came and kissed me and was real pleased to see me.

After the business was done she said, "Now I have you here with me I cannot let you go away until I have talked with you a little while." Father said he would have to stay in the village for two hours and would call for me on his way home and drove away.

As soon as we were alone Mrs. Lee said, "Oh, Martha, I have been longing to see you for months, but I did not dare send for you," and she began to sob pitifully. I went and put my arms about her and tried to comfort her, and after a little time she grew quiet and poured into my ears the story of her troubles. It seemed that Clifton had taken to drink and bad company, and his mother had been obliged to raise large sums of money to pay some of his debts. It was a sad story and I did not wonder the poor mother was broken-hearted. After she had told me this, we talked about spirit return, and the result was I promised to come again in a week and hold a private seance.

Mother was so pleased about the lifting of the mortgage that she was real cheerful for some time and did not mention the devil once. I wonder why it is that people who are all out of fix with themselves and everybody else have so much more trouble with the devil than those who are cheerful and happy. I had always thought that Mother could not enjoy herself unless she was miserable, but I found I had misjudged her. She was in such a comfortable frame of mind that she offered no objections to my going to see Mrs. Lee and staying over-night.

I found ten ladies assembled in Mrs. Lee's parlor, and they all greeted me kindly, although I had never met them before. I had not the least idea what I ought to say or do, but I asked for some music and three of the ladies sang and played. Then I got up knowing that something was required of me, and how I wished I had asked Mrs. Austin how she conducted her meetings. I felt weak and helpless and I could not think of a thing to say. Just then I glanced at Mrs. Lee and at sight of her sorrowful face there swept over me a strong feeling of tenderness and sympathy. Then I saw standing beside her the same spirit Clifton had recognized as his father that night he and I said good-bye. Then I forgot myself entirely, and as soon as I had lost sight of self I was all right. They said I talked for an hour, but I did not realize it. I knew in the time of it that I was giving messages, and I knew what I said, but it all passed from me like a dream afterward, and yet I was fully conscious that if I wanted to stop or refuse to say anything I could, but I did not want to.

The ladies gathered about me after it was over and expressed their satisfaction and pleasure, and one dear old lady kissed me and said, "God, bless you, child, and help you to keep on in this good work. You have brought me the only hope and comfort I have had for years," and she went away sobbing.

I find that when I am stirred with a feeling of tenderness and sympathy for them I can always do good work as a medium, but otherwise I cannot. It is among the aged, the unfortunate, hopeless and heart-broken that I do my best work. Every time I enter the seance room I involuntarily search my own soul to see if it is free from jealousy, greed, envy and all unkindness. I want to be so pure and kind and true that angels can and will come to me and use me for the good of humanity.

My meetings have been steadily growing, for each one who has attended has wanted to bring a friend and Mrs. Lee has not wanted to exclude any one, and the last few weeks the rooms have been crowded. Mother knows that I stay over one night with Mrs. Lee every week, but as she has asked me no questions I have told her nothing more. I told Father and Charlie all about the meetings. Charlie is pleased, but father groans sometimes, and shakes his head and mutters, "I dunno, I dunno," and then again he acts real pleased. Some of the time he seems to be a firm believer in Spiritualism, and then through force of habit, I think, falls back into the old way of thinking until something happens to rouse him out of it.

I believe Charlie is himself a medium. Several times this winter I have seen forms standing near him and he has looked so tangible I had no idea they were spirits until they vanished. One day this winter Charlie was sick with sore throat and seemed quite feverish and toward night he grew worse. We were in the midst of a big storm. The wind blew furiously and the snow was drifted over the top of the garden gate, and there was not a sign of a road anywhere. I took care of Charlie through the night, and about midnight he seemed so much worse I grew frightened. Then I remembered words spoken to me by one "unseen" some years ago: "Call to me in time of trouble. Love will answer to its name," and I called with all my soul and being; and yes, standing there by my brother's bedside with the tears streaming down my cheeks I prayed for help, not aloud, but mentally, until it seemed to me my cry must penetrate the farthest realm of existence.

After a few minutes I grew calm and sat down near the bed and waited but it was not long before the door opened and there floated into the room a lovely female figure clothed in pure white of some soft gauzy material. Her hair and eyes were black as night, and her lips were red as blood. She was dressed in "Peace, peace," and for the first time I understood the meaning of the phrase, "The peace that passes understanding."

The spirit floated to the bed and bent over Charlie. She did not touch him, but she looked at him intently. She then turned to the little table at the head of the bed upon which was standing a glass about half full of cold water. She passed her hands over the glass, then turned and glanced at Charlie, and vanished from my sight. At that moment Charlie awoke from his fevered mutterings and said, "Water, water."

I had always brought him perfectly fresh water, but this time I felt that I must give him what was in the glass. He drank it all and immediately went to sleep and in a little while he became quiet and slept peacefully until morning. When he awoke I went to him and he smiled and said, "I am better; I shall get well now. Poor little sis, how tired you look," and I went to my room and cried for joy and thankfulness.

At the next meeting I told this incident, and it got abroad and caused a good many remarks. Some said one thing and some another but so far as I know no one accused me of lying.

When I went into the next meeting I saw the pastor of the church among the number gathered. But at first I felt a little disconcerted, but it soon passed away. I said to myself, "I know that I am giving to those who come here something as pure, uplifting, comforting and helpful as anything this minister gives his people, and I will go ahead and pay no more attention to him than to anyone else. Mrs. Lee said afterward that I gave him a message from his spirit wife, and that he made no attempt to conceal his tears or to deny the truth of the message. The minister stayed until Mrs. Lee and I were alone, and then we three had a long talk. He said he had not been satisfied with his church career for many years, that it seemed narrow, cruel and selfish to him, and it seemed blasphemous to accuse God of doing things that the better class of humanity at the present time would shrink in horror from doing."

"I know the dead do return to us," he said, "for I have twice seen my wife since I laid her body in the grave, and once she spoke to me words of warning that saved me from disaster. I am not happy in my present position, and I do not know what to do. There has been a great deal of silly twaddle, fraud and disorderly conduct in the ranks of Spiritualism. Oh, I know what you want to say that there has been just as much in every religious denomination, but begging your pardon, Miss Weston, I have never known but very few pronounced Spiritualists who have always led perfectly upright lives."

"Pardon me, sir," I said, "how many church members have you known who have always led perfectly clean, wholesome lives?"

The minister was silent, and Mrs. Lee said gently, "It seems to me that human nature is the same the world over. I have grown into the belief that from the cradle to the grave all are subject to the same temptations, in different forms perhaps. Within each human being from the palace to the hovel, from the throne to the gutter lies all the possibilities of perfect manhood and womanhood of saintliness and crime, of holiness and degradation. I know that I have no right to look with scorn upon the vile wretch of the slums, for within myself lies undeveloped all that has permitted her to be what she is. I tell you, my friends," and Mrs. Lee's voice had such a ring of pain in it I felt my heart throb, "when we know the truth we know that erring humanity sins only through ignorance, and we ought to feel pity instead of contempt, and tenderness instead of aversion and disgust. We may subscribe to any creed or all creeds, but they will not help us from temptation, nor from sin."

And their results. If we desire to do wrong we will, and believe and disbelieve will not prevent us. The saviors of humanity are those who awaken within the soul a desire to do right and then point the way."

The minister extended a hand to Mrs. Lee and said honestly, "You have preached a better sermon than I ever did, and I thank you." Then turning to me he said, "If you will pardon me, Miss Weston, I will say that I think your people in general make a great mistake in being so aggressive. There is something in human nature that resents a hostile attack. It is no credit to anyone to tear down a building, unless he can construct a better one to take the place of it. In my opinion it is much better to construct the new one first and make it so much more beautiful and every way desirable than those who occupy the old will leave it of their own accord and demolish it themselves."

This made me think what you wrote about Mrs. Drury's sermon. No one likes to hear his hopes, opinions ridiculed, and I have made up my mind that hereafter I will give to everyone the respect I want given to me.

The minister went on: "Some of the most sacred memories of my life cluster around the Bible. I have seen the white head of my father bend over the pages which afforded him the only hope he had of a future life; I have seen the thin, toll-worn hands of my sainted mother clasp the book eagerly and heard her read as best she could through falling tears such words as 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee,' 'As thy day is so shall thy strength be,' 'God is our refuge and strength, a present help in time of trouble,' and those words helped her bear the heavy burdens of life and comforted her in hours of trial and affliction. I tell you, child, he said, and his voice trembled, 'I know as well as anyone that there is indecency, absurdity and error in the Bible. It is not an infallible book by any means—but the word of God is in it also and it shows the way of life and peace to those who love it, and remember that love will win where ridicule and witicism will fail.'"

I was very much astonished at the man's words, but I felt that he had spoken truthfully, and I told him so and thanked him.

A few days after this a man drove rapidly into our yard and said he had come to get Miss Weston. He handed me a note and it was from Mrs. Lee. It was with a trembling hand she wrote: "Clifton has come home. He is dying and wants to see you before he goes. Come quickly, Martha, and pray God and the angel world to give you strength and light, for you will need both."

I changed my dress as quickly as possible and gave Mrs. Lee's note to mother, and went with the man who had been sent for me. I found Clifton propped up with pillows and gasping for breath. A chill went over me as I entered the room, and for the first time I sensed the precepts of Death. Clifton looked imploringly at me, and I went up to him and took his hands in mine. "Oh, Martha," he said gaspingly, "I am so glad you have come; you will forgive me, will you not?"

"I have nothing to forgive, it is you who have suffered," I said.

He shuddered and exclaimed: "Suffered! O God! Talk about hell—I have been in it, or it has been in me for months and months."

"Hush, dear," said his mother, "do not tire yourself. You will see things more clearly by and by."

"Lift me up—bring more pillows—there—now come closely to me, both of you. Do not interrupt me, but listen for I can not, will not die until I have told my story."

He spoke with a strength and determination that surprised me. Turning his lustrous eyes upon his mother, he said, "You remember that I came home just before my father died and took care of him two nights. The night before he passed away he told me that there were valuable papers in the upper drawer of the secretary and he wanted I should look out for them after his death. When I came to examine the papers I found that one was a will in which he had left to his sister Susan and her heirs the sum of three thousand dollars. There arose in me a feeling of anger and resentment. I had never liked my aunt nor her sons, and I wanted the money for my own use. Suddenly I remembered that father said that no one but himself knew anything about the papers. I noticed the name of the lawyer who drew up the will, and remembered that he had died but a short time before, and without stopping to consider I yielded to a spirit temptation and put the will in the fire."

After the funeral I went back to my studies feeling guilty and uneasy, and continually arguing to myself that I had done right. One day my room mate told me about a woman near by who had told him many remarkable things regarding his past and present, and he advised me to go to see her. That night I went and found a Spiritualist medium. She told me that the spirit of one recently passed out came to me, and she described my father accurately. She said the spirit called me 'son,' and seemed to be distressed about something. I had done, that he held in his hands a folded paper and she could read the words 'last will and testament of.' For God's sake stop," I shouted and I threw a handful of coin into the woman's lap, grabbed my hat and rushed out into the street. I was terribly frightened and from that time on I could not think of anything too bad to say about a medium, not because I believed all mediums to be bad, but because I was so afraid my sin would be discovered that I could not bear to have anyone I knew have anything to do with one.

"When I got acquainted with you, Martha, through having to go to your home on business connected with the farm, I was struck with admiration of your innocence and purity, and I felt that if I could win your love you would be faithful to me through good and ill, through storm and calm. Oh, Martha, I thought you would prove a savior to save me from myself, but when I found that you were a believer in Spiritualism and yourself a medium—I paused and a look of pain passed over his face as he exclaimed, 'If suffering can atone for sin, surely I have atoned for some of mine. Can you, Martha, imagine my horror, remorse and consternation when you told me that my father stood beside me with a folded paper in his hands? I was desperate. Instead of doing as my father wanted and hoped I would do, I did the reverse and now—O, my father, my father, would to God you had never given existence to such a son.'"

The words were an agonized cry. Mrs. Lee was sobbing brokenly. I knew the time had come for me to speak.

"Clifton," I said gently, "your father is bending over you now, and upon his face is a look of infinite tenderness, and I catch the words 'my poor little boy.' You have nothing to fear from your father, Clifton, for it is with loving arms he will receive your freed spirit."

A look of peace passed over the face of the dying man and he closed his eyes for a few minutes and all was still. There came a light knock at the door, and I arose and admitted the clergyman I have previously mentioned. He pressed my hand without a word and went over and stood beside Mrs. Lee. She gave him a look of loving gratitude, which was returned by one of sympathy and tenderness.

I was very glad for the poor woman needs some one to love her and help her bear her grief. After several moments Clifton opened his eyes and said feebly, "Mother, Martha, where are you? It is so dark I cannot see you, but I can see that I am going out into the darkness. O mother, forgive me for the suffering I have brought you; I might have been a comfort to you, I might have been loved and respected, but now—Martha, child, I am glad now that heaven in its mercy shielded you and saved your pure young life from my possession. With my passion and exacting selfishness I would have crushed you like a fragile flower. I thank God that I have been saved from that slip."

For a little longer we sat in silence and then the dying man half sprang from his pillows and his face lighted and he cried joyously, "Father, O, father!" and fell back upon his pillow.

The minister bent over and closed the eyes that would nevermore look on earthly scenes, and dropping upon his knees prayed such a prayer as I never heard before.

While the minister prayed I saw a semi-luminous cloud form over the body of the dead man, and so intent was I in watching that Mrs. Lee took me by the hand, before I noticed she had arisen to leave the room.

Now as I look back and view my association with Mr. Lee I know that I did not love him. Aunt Laura spoke the truth when she said, "The mind that is sensitive enough to receive impressions from spirits out of the flesh will receive impressions and suggestions from spirits in the flesh, and must be very careful to do nothing hastily, but listen carefully to the guiding voice within." I always felt a doubt about its being right for me to marry Mr. Lee, and I now know that when I feel a doubt about any thing's being right, it is not right. The doubt is the testimony of my own spirit to the fact that it is wrong.

I have just had a letter from Aunt Laura saying that she is confining next month to make us a visit, and I am so glad. She says that she expects John—I mean Mr. Wilder—will come here and take her to visit you. We shall be very glad to see him, but I cannot imagine why Aunt Laura should ask him to take such a long drive when she has always been on the cars before. I hope the mystery of the Shadow Room has been solved before this. Be sure and write all about it. Lovingly yours,

MARTHA WESTON.

You may have had experience with pen or with the hoe, Or plod, like you are doing now, a hundred years ago. You may have had experience at bar or on the bench. Where'll you be, kind neighbor, a hundred years hence? Moral: Birth and death are inevitable, with a short strut between; but the two extreme ends of eternity man is too busy to think about."

"Science and a Future Life."

As Reviewed by a Prominent Lawyer.

Prof. James H. Hyslop's recent work, "Science and a Future Life," is one of the most valuable acquisitions to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared in late years. It is scientific in its method, and in its logical deductions, and in its sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found.

The work is based upon the facts established by the investigations of the Psychical Research Society of the phenomena obtained through the mediumship of Mrs. Piper, who, however, Spiritualists well know is but one of a class of mediums for spiritistic phenomena the world over.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the professor's book is its discussion of the telepathic hypothesis as an explanation of the Piper phenomena. That hypothesis is carefully weighed in the balance of reason and found altogether wanting.

"Telepathy as we know it," remarks the professor, "if we know it scientifically at all, is generally and perhaps always limited, in its access to other men's minds, to the present mental states." This is all that we have even ostensibly as evidence for. But such telepathy does not even approximate an explanation of the Piper and similar cases.

The professor goes farther and suggests that many a Spiritualist has long suspected, that telepathy instead of being incompatible with the spiritistic theory is really in harmony with it and one of its methods of communication. "Telepathy may be the very process by which the disincarnate, if it exists, communicates with the living. If thought produces vibration in the ether or other media between mind and mind, whether living or deceased, it will only be a question of the kind of facts supernaturally obtained to determine whether the telepathy is between living minds only or between the living and the dead." And, as said at another page, "The acceptance of telepathy between living minds establishes a possibility of communication with a supernatural world." * * * and hence the telepathist is precisely the man to admit the possibility of spirit communication with the living."

Finding the telepathic theory thus inadequate, and ruling out the supposition of fraud, of secondary personality, of coincidence, etc., as explanatory of mediumistic phenomena, the professor naturally falls back upon the "spiritistic hypothesis" as being "the best working hypothesis of rationality that can be claimed for spiritistic agency." "Others," continues the professor, "may think it is absolutely proved, but I shall not claim so much nor place myself where further inquiry and knowledge might embarrass a retreat, though I think that most intelligent men will agree that no other hypothesis presents half the credentials of rationality that can be claimed for spiritistic agency. We may hesitate to adopt it in the face of perplexities which are certainly striking and apparently incompatible with what we find many people expecting from spirits. We may wish to know more before committing ourselves to so important a belief, but this cautiousness is not a confession of conflict with the admission that the most rational explanation at present is the spiritistic. Our primary duty is to accept the hypothesis that best explains the fact and then to abandon it when facts are discovered that disprove or discredit it. I shall certainly not cling to the spiritistic theory any longer than the facts justify, but I shall not cherish it because it is not respectable when it is the most rational conception in the field."

Brave words and true to the scientific spirit, but Spiritualists who have a broader and fuller knowledge of the phenomena, and who know that no other hypothesis can ever explain the phenomena, have no fear that further investigation and discovery of fact will result in the displacement of the spiritistic hypothesis by any other—not at least so long as logic is logic and common sense and reason sway and govern the human mind. A fact once established is always a fact, and communication with spirits is established in the consciousness of the true Spiritualist by a long line of experience and can no more be shaken from his consciousness than can the consciousness of his communication with mortals and the external world be wrested therefrom.

Prof. Hyslop treats ably of the "Conditions of Communication" and sympathetically appreciates the difficulties which naturally should be expected to surround such a subject. His attitude in this respect is all the more commendable in view of the usual uncompromising and unreasoned position taken by both the scientific and non-scientific skeptics toward the phenomena. An interesting feature of the book also is that relating to the so-called triviality of the messages purporting to come from spirits. The professor denies that the messages are universally trivial, and excuses such triviality as he finds on the score of necessity for purposes of identification; and, curiously enough, demonstrates the necessity of resort to trivial circumstances to prove identity even in earth life, by engaging an intelligent and earned man to establish his identity to a friend who did not know who was communicating through means of the telegraph; in which case the communicator necessarily sought trivial circumstances by which to prove his identity in almost exact analogy to communicating spirits.

Not the least important is that section of the book which deals with the ethical import of a belief in, or better still, a knowledge of, a continued personal existence after death; and Spiritualists owe the professor a debt of deepest gratitude for placing before the public so profound and forcible a presentation of the importance of such belief and investigation. A brief quotation from this discussion must suffice. The professor observes:

"Our duties may lie, as I think they do, right in the present environment, but this does not prevent them from being as much determined by the future life, if it be a fact, as they are determined by to-morrow or next year. We cannot draw an absolute line of distinction to indicate when morality ceases to command, if we continue to exist and to retain our identity beyond the limits of bodily existence. Our physical duties may lapse but our moral never, except with annihilation. The very essence of moral law in our physical life is that which looks farthest ahead. The man who lives only for to-day is irrational and may be a criminal. He does not look to the morrow is at least imprudent; and yet the talk about our morality being determined by the present may as well apply to the present hour or minute as to the whole of the present life. Indeed it is in a measure true that we have duties referring only to the present moment or hour and that do not extend beyond the moment. But there are also duties that have to keep an outlook on the future of the present life and to reckon with the lapse of time while conditions remain the same. The highest prudence and the highest virtues are connected with the prevision of the future. It is therefore only by awaiting the proof of a future life to make it actually imperative to take it into the scope of our moral law. The retention of personal identity after death implies the same moral nature and would carry with it the same conception of virtue and vice with such a being as we would find in its intellectual qualities. We are, of course, not to live only for that future, but to apply the moral law in the present so that its effects will not conflict with the larger outlook that the cosmos may provide."

While Spiritualism can and will, if necessary, do its work in the world without the recognition of scientific method and of scientific beliefs, it is well that such men and institutions should know and acknowledge the truth which it contains; and Professor Hyslop's work comes as a substantial recognition and as a most valuable aid to the cause for which the Spiritualist has for so many years so conspicuously and bravely stood alone. It is many and fair, able and convincing, and should be read by those who know and those who wish to know, as also by all who take any interest whatever in the subject.

STATUE OF DEVIL.

Herman Menz, Avowed Infidel, Responsible for This Peculiar Action—Says "Old Nick" Is His Friend and Denounces Bible as a Pack of Lies—Infidel Shocks Church People—Some Think Statue to Satan Should Not Be Allowed to Stand.

Home non est Creatio, Evolutio; Deus non Fecit Hominem, Sed Homo Fecit Deos.

This Latin inscription is on the base of the monument to Satan, unveiled in Detroit this morning. Translated into English it reads: "Man is not created, but is developed. God did not make man, but man did make the gods."

Residents in the vicinity of Stanton and McGraw avenues, who are astounded at a remarkable stone structure in front of the residence of Herman Menz, a contracting stone mason, at 308 Stanton avenue, to-day.

Church-going people living in the neighborhood are particularly scandalized. Murmurs of indignation are freely voiced, and corrective measures are being taken to remove the monument.

People in the neighborhood knew that Menz was erecting something, but had no idea what it was until the canvas was thrown off this morning, when many threw up their hands in horror.

During the summer meetings in Tent Evangel, Menz petitioned the common council to either prohibit religious services in tents or else make them pay license "like any other hump show." He claims the sound of religious singing affects his nerves.

Menz is an infidel of the most pronounced type. He is serious about the matter, and avers that his monument will stand.

Asked as to why he put up such a sacrilegious structure, he said: "Isn't it as good as anything else in the way of an ornament? Would you have me put the statue of a saint up there?"

"He is my friend," declared the old man, pointing to the statue. "He spoke the first and last truth."

Doesn't Believe Bible. "I do not believe a word in the bible. It is a pack of lies from beginning to end, but Old Nick tells the truth."

"They tell you if you disbelieve one word of the bible you are damned. I disbelieve them and I will go to him," he continued, again pointing to the statue.

"Didn't God tell Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden that they would die if they ate from the tree of knowledge? Didn't Satan come and tell them they would not die, and didn't he tell the truth?" asked the infidel, waxing warmer in defending his unusual action.

"But why do you erect a monument to Satan?" again asked the reporter.

"Don't the devil rule the world?" he replied.

"But I don't really believe there is a devil," he went on. "I am a believer in the Darwinian theory as far as man is concerned. He was born of nature and to nature I will return."

"If there are such animals as God and the devil I would prefer to go to the devil."

The monument is quite an elaborate affair, about 14 feet in height from its foundation to its crown. Satan is shown in a crouching posture behind a pulpit. His infernal majesty is looking over the landscape with a fensish glare, with his horns protruding from the side of his head. Carved in the stone directly in front is the big, ugly fork with which he is supposed to prod sinners in his fire.

The structure is built on the lot line alongside of the Menz home, and from his elevated position Old Nick has a commanding view of the surrounding streets and houses.

Best Site in City.

"This is the best site in the city for that monument," said Menz. "He can see everything going on in all directions."

Around the neck of the statue, when it was unveiled, was a ribbon of United States flags.

"Why is that there?" Menz was asked.

"Because it is a Yankee devil," he replied with a twinkle in his eye.

"How much did it cost you to build the whole thing?" he was asked.

"I put the base and everything else

Thanksgiving Thoughts.

Canto I.
I am thankful, truly thankful, when the merciful law,
I have labor and warm clothing to protect me to and fro,
And have comfort where I labor, and a bed where I can rest,
And a bite to eat, and friendship; yes I do feel greatly blest.

I am thankful for the kindness that the world has shown to me;
I am thankful that true justice has from prison kept me free;
I am thankful I am healthy and with little ache or pain;
I am thankful I am thankful, and shall thankful ever remain.

I am thankful for the spankings that my mother offered me;
I am thankful I obeyed her and from spankings oft went free;
I can feel those mother kisses that will warm my heart to-day;
And I know her loving bosom never heaved for me in vain.

It should be a pleasant duty for each little mortal man,
To dispel the awful heartaches of his fellows when he can;
He should ever be quite thankful he is able to perform
Some good deed for fellow-mortals with a heart forever warm.

He should sweeten all the echoes of his true and honest words;
And be thankful to possess them, and attune them to mankind;
He should smother down no goodness for the fear of coming-want,
But be thankful for the blessing 'e'en through hunger's very haunt.

Canto II.
When the howling winds of winter blow the snow and fearful hail,
Let us all be truly thankful that such weather cannot last;
Let us raise our husky voices, not to rave and roar and curse,
But to say that we are thankful that the weather is no worse.

When the meat trust raises prices and the price goes up on silk,
Let us all be truly thankful for our rags and bread and milk;
For the evolving process only comes when people learn
That a few are not their owners and then make a sudden turn.

Let us hail each day with gladness and hold high and noble aims;
Let us be the real brother that the Christian brother claims;
Let us make each day thanksgiving in full meaning of the day,
And the world will be made better by our having passed this way.

Let us also be quite thankful for a sacred day of thought;
For a day of retrospection o'er the past and what it brought.
Let us each give thanks to others who are friends and helpers here,
And no God of love will chide us when we find another sphere.

Let the Christians worship turkeys, and the turkeys worship them;
Let each sing to the Jehovah of a Royal Diadem,
But the thoughtful should keep thinking Ere he passes from the mortal to the spheres beyond the blue.

E'en the turkeys should be thankful that the Christians love them so up except the statue of the devil, but I had to have that carved."

"How much did that cost you?"

"It was a labor of love and one of my friends did it," he said.

Beneath the monument Menz has a glorified workshop where he does stone cutting, while overhead leading to the statue itself the structure is laid out something similar to the Hurib memorial at the water works, only not so much an extensive or expensive scale.

"Next spring the monument will be more attractive," said Menz, "about 200 turkeys will be placed and I will have the whole thing decorated with flowers."

While the neighbors and passersby gaped in wonder at the remarkable piece of architecture this morning, none of them molested it and the old man said he was not afraid of being bothered. He said, however, that school boys pestered him a little to-day.

"The old women are the only ones saying anything about it," he said.

This peculiar man was born in Germany but has lived in Detroit 21 years. He says his parents were infidels before him and that his wife and two daughters, who live with him, have the same belief.

He says he built the house he lives in with his own hands. It bears some striking reminders of his old characteristics, being decorated on the outside with fierce looking lions' heads and images of strange beings.

On the lot adjoining the house, Menz, who speaks with a strong German accent, has planted cabbage and other garden stuff. He was hard at work hoeing when the reporter called this morning.

"Do you think you will ever change your belief?" he was asked.

"No, never. I know I am right and I will die the way I feel now," he said.

Asked if he had been prosperous all his life, he replied in the negative, saying that he had lost large sums in the upper peninsula years ago. He appears contented with his lot now and takes extreme pleasure in his monument, which he says is an ornament to the neighborhood.

It was his intention to unveil the statue last Sunday and a party of his friends was there to assist him in the ceremony, but on account of the rain the function was postponed until this morning and there were no ceremonies.

A Boy and the Lord's Supper.

When about three years old, Edward Potter attended, for the first time, a communion service. With childish curiosity he inquired why the table was set, and was informed that it was the Lord's supper. During the service he fell asleep. When he awoke he immediately glanced toward the table. "Mamma," he said, "has the Lord had his supper yet?"—Boston Herald.

The man who overestimates the foolishness of others is himself the biggest fool concerned.—Selon Merriman.

That they set a day for feasting and for sacrificial show;
And the fattest and the plumpest should be thankful to the core,
For while others give some pleasure they can give just so much more.

But I'd hate to be a turkey in this mighty Christian land,
Where the preachers read the bible with a hatchet close at hand;
Where a day is named for people to be thankful once a year,
And to kill the fatted turkeys when as gifts they may appear.

Canto III.—From Turkey Heaven.
Oh, beheaded, lifeless body,
Since we parted, you and I,
I have found a land where turkeys for the Christians never die.

I have found a land where Saviors are a useless sort of thing,
And the greedy earthly Christians have conditions that they bring.
It is not the ax that severed you and I that Justice finds,
But the Christian who will murder for upliftment of the minds.

I just winked my eye up at him, As my head lay on the sod,
To remind him I would meet him, At the throne of Nature's God.
And I now can wink down at him, And can thank him for the blow,
That released my humble spirit Ere my rightful time to go.

I have naught myself against him, And shall always wish him well,
But must warn him 'gainst the horrors Of his own projected hell.
While he builds the hells for sinners And for self the mansions bright,
There are many sins in spirit that on earth ne'er come to light.

There are few remaining spotless When examined at the bar,
And though preacher or his hearers, All are measured as they are.
Though the hatchet of a preacher Fell upon my mortal flesh,
It did not bend my spirit.

Though my form he made a wreck, Yes, I'll watch for him a little,
'Round the doorway and the gate, And I'll wink down there upon him As he wrestles with Old Fate.

No, I've nothing laid against him, Though I laid it for the earth,
For old Nature has no measure, Only people's own true worth.

Now, good Christians, keep on thanking me, As the birds of all the land,
But remember there's a future, Where true Justice makes demand.

I deceived none with long sermons While upon the earthly plane,
I oppressed not any being, Nor exalted them in vain.

It is true I knew no bible, And no Savior who helped me,
And perhaps I should be thanked, On their hospitality.

As a living being, Nature Chose to fashion me a fowl,
And perhaps I should be thanked, That I wasn't made an owl.

My earth form was rendered useful For the appetite of man,
And who knows but he is highest In the evolving plan.

TO YOU.

You do not love me? Well, then, perhaps It is because you do not know me. If you could stand beside me this day And, looking in upon my brain Read the lofty sentiments and grand

That forever formulate themselves Into messages of love and hope, and praise

That flash like living fire along the wires Of my being for every living thing, You would understand and love me.

If you could sit beside me to-day As I ponder the words of the world, And, turning the tablets of my heart Read thereon the sorrow, the sadness, the indescribable sadness I feel

For the oppressed and suffering millions, See how the pains of each man, woman and child

In the great slave markets of the world Pierce my heart and leave their traces there,

How their woes become my burdens, How the tragedies of their pitiful lives Like tumultuous waves of o'ershadow me,

How the cry of the little children Rings through the corridors of my soul And reverberates from peak to peak,

From crag to crag, and up, and the valleys Of the perdition where I struggled with the strugglers

In a fierce contest for existence, If you could so read, you would at least not hate me.

Or if you could look back along the way I've come, See the awful nights of pain and anguish,

The Calvary I've climbed, the Gethsemane known, The storms I've buffeted and battles fought,

See the suns that have set behind mountains of despair, The flowers that have faded and fallen from my hand,

The unmarked graves where lie my buried hopes, The wrecks and ruins of the castles I have built,

The seas where my ships have gone down, The conflagration in which my joys were consumed,

You would know me better, and would pity me.

Again, if you could stand beside me to-day And look with me, out over the landscapes of Nature, See, as I do, the suns rising out of the East, and the stars of the East, To light a glorious and eternal day, The flowers bursting into beauty and bloom,

The resurrection morn of my buried hopes, The peaceful ports where my ships lie anchored, The glittering castles that tower above the ruins of my former ones,

NATURE OR GOD.

Some Reflections Thereon, in Connection With Points of Light.

To the Editor:—In a recent issue of your paper, T. P. Lee of Lakeport, Cal., describes radiating points of light (life entities) which he sees in the atmosphere and asks who has a similar sense of sight. I have often observed these innumerable, radiating, scintillating points or mists of light, surrounding not only myself but everybody and everything. These tiny mists of light are everywhere; the air is filled with them, but until I read the article I had never heard of anyone else seeing them, and like him, I had no idea what they were until I was enlightened by the spirit helpers. They tell me these tiny, and to most persons invisible, points of continually waving, changing, twinkling, scintillating light are life, or the source from whence originates all individualized life.

This is what they declare is Nature or God, omnipresent, everpresent, which is that infinite, incomprehensible, subtle, powerful something which the finite mind of man has never been able to grasp or define. This is the source of that so-called Invisible Presence, Infinite Intelligence, All Power, or wonderful presence which we have been taught to designate as the Creator of all things, sometimes called the Great Over-soul; of which man as well as everything else is a part.

We say so-called invisible, because, to most of earth's children this is an invisible quantity, while to others there is nothing invisible about it.

These same spirit helpers declare that Nature and God are one and the same thing; saying that what most people call nature is only the effect or manifestation thereof. They say that it is the proper understanding of and the proper use, not abuse of that indwelling Nature within ourselves which enable us to distinguish between right and wrong, and according as we ourselves cultivate our own individual nature by our daily lives for high or low purposes will we ourselves establish our own destiny, and whether that destiny leads us to happiness or misery depends entirely upon ourselves, each human soul being responsible for its own conditions and consequences.

Therefore all are responsible to their own souls for whatever they draw to or thrust from themselves. Life being made up of thoughts, words and acts, it naturally follows that each one is personally responsible for the same.

The highest manifestation of Nature being mankind, therefore when we behold the sunshine and the shower; The mighty stream or tiny rill; The opening bud or blooming flower; The mountain peak or lowly hill; The dawn of day or twilight hour; The stream from which we drink our fill;

The ocean depths, or skies which tower 'O'er peacelike landscapes. E'en our will.

Dame Nature guides by our soul's power.

This is only the manifestation of Nature or God, but the God principle remains unexplored. That invisible, incomprehensible, inconceivable, non-understandable something which we are unable to grasp, fathom or explain, Nature and its principles when understood by man, then will God be understood.

Thus it is that Nature's laws and God's laws are one and the same thing. The life germ within every living thing is the God principle or the Nature principle, for God is life and life is Nature within.

Thus Nature's laws are the laws of the universe, not only is this true, but Nature's laws are formed, not created, the universe.

Thus we find that by properly combining or uniting these life entities or radiating points of light according to Nature's laws in regard thereto, all things are formed and endowed with life.

Therefore we can see why it is that Nature's laws must invariably be complied with in order not only to form all things but to propagate all things. Hence we can easily understand how death, so-called, is only an event in life, or a broader expression and higher extension of the life germ or God principle within.

If we accept this version of the question we can readily understand how it is that God is all and in all; also how God forms all things and how nothing can be formed without him—or rather, it would be more appropriate.

Instead of Spiritualists calling their societies churches, and trying to ape the creeds and dogmas that have been the curse of the human race for centuries, and instead of a few trying to formulate a code of laws whereby they think to rule some, and exempt others from existing laws, it seems to me that Naturalists would be a more honest name and would fit them much better.

For my part I want neither church, creed nor dogma attached to my Spiritualism. The name as it is suits me quite well enough, but if we get where we are ashamed to own the name of Spiritualist, for pity's sake let us adopt some intelligent name. Instead of trying to stand forth before the world as some creed-bound, hampered sect, let us utilize our means, energy and time in declaring to earth's people the great truths and underlying principles of Spiritualism by teaching them the superiority of Spiritualism over any and all creeds known to earth.

Dr. Henry Slade.

The Truth About Him, by One Who Knows.

I have known Dr. Henry Slade for forty years. My acquaintance began in the year 1865, when he was practicing medicine in East Saginaw and went to New York for a course in the hospitals. At this time I was not a Spiritualist, but had done some investigating. Two or three days before I left Saginaw for New York, I was in Dr. Volland's office, whose home was in Ann Arbor. He was not practicing medicine at East Saginaw, being engaged in the manufacture of brick at that time. He said to me: "I wish you could see my wife," and went on to tell me how she was suffering from the nature of her disease. I gave him a prescription for her.

While in New York I one day started to find Dr. Slade's residence which was at that time on Thirty-fifth street, where he was paying three hundred dollars a month rent. Having made a mistake in the street car, I had to walk quite a distance. On reaching his house I inquired of Mr. Simmons, at that time his manager, for Dr. Slade, and was told that I could not see him that evening, as he was dressing for an entertainment. He was to receive Mr. Shepard, a great musical medium, who had just returned from Europe where he had played before all the courts of the old world.

I asked the privilege of resting a short time, and while doing so Dr. Slade came through the room on his way to the parlor, dressed in Indian attire and controlled by his Indian guide.

He spoke to me, saying, "I have seen you before; I know you."

I replied that it was not true or possible that he knew me.

He said: "Yes, I saw you in Dr. Volland's office in East Saginaw, Mich.," and gave the day and hour. "You prescribed for my squaw," was his next remark, "enjoy the evening, and stay with my child. He needs your magnetism, your life, and you can do him great good."

I did stay and heard some of the most remarkable music of my life, through the instrument and medium Sheppard, who was said to be controlled by the masters of the art.

At time for retiring I went with Dr. Slade to his room, located on third floor. On passing through the hall, which was dimly lighted, he would catch hold of me, and trembling all over he would beg me not to let them get hold of him. He would cling to me like a frightened child and say, "Don't let them catch me; don't let them get hold of me." In all my experience as a medical man, and I have examined thousands, I have never met so sensitive, so easily affected, so psychic a subject.

After retiring, when he was sound asleep, the chairs and table and other furniture, would move around the room. The covers on the bed were repeatedly taken from the bed and tossed upon the floor. Spirit hands would touch both of us and loud raps would come on the bedstead, walls and furniture.

During the night he woke under control and talked to me several times, and in the early morning he awoke under Indian control and told me to now go and leave his medium, as he had lots of work for him to do that day.

Many years after this he came to Detroit where I was living at that time and called at my office. He wanted a large table to use in his room at the hotel, and I sent my son out to a nearby furniture store to borrow one for him.

In the evening I called to see him socially, with others, and soon there were raps coming on the walls and furniture. He offered to try and get something for us. Said he did not know as he could get anything but would like to try. We took two clean slates with a bit of pencil between them, held them under the table, closed, and soon there was the sound of writing. When finished there was a loud rap and upon opening them there was a communication from my friends in spirit life with all the personal peculiarities of penmanship and thought. Then we held the slates high up, nearly level with our shoulders, between Dr. Slade and myself, and secured the same results. Some time after this he was again under test conditions received a communication from his grandfather, my father, concerning his last gift to him, made while on his deathbed.

In every case of slate-writing with Dr. Slade that I ever witnessed, the so-called expose of Dr. Lankaster would have been impossible, and in every case Slade himself alone, unaided by some force invisible and outside of himself, could not have produced these things.

This was the last that I saw of Dr. Slade until about six years ago, when some friends of mine found him in a hotel in Kalamazoo, Mich., partially paralyzed, and a victim to both liquor and morphine. I took him into my sanitarium and did all I could for him. Built up his poor wrecked nervous system and improved his health greatly, but he was very restless under the restraint of sanitarium life, and after a few months he left and was under the care of others who tried to have him go back to his old work.

After a time, about a year, I received an inquiry from the N. S. A. as to what I would take Dr. Slade for the rest of his life. I offered to take him and care for him at just one-half the usual price, or in other words I offered to take him or anyone else that the National was assisting and care for them at half price, thus giving almost an amount equal to the amount given by the society. This pledge I also made through the Spiritualist press and is still good.

I sent my house physician, Dr. Woodruff, to Grand Rapids, and

Our New Postoffice.

It is a delusion, a confusion and a snare! And there is a kick on all sides in reference to it.

All second-class matter is delivered at the chutes in Dearborn street, where each bag of mail is dropped about ten feet, striking the bottom of the shaft with more or less force according to its weight; then it is thrown one "hopper" and carried to another story where it is subjected to another drop of about ten feet. Here the operators take the sack in charge and deliver it to the "throwers." If in its transition from the basement to the floor above it should happen that any part of the sack or mail matter protrudes over the hopper, the part thus exposed is caught between the machinery and the whole thing is ground into an unrecognizable mass, and in consequence the papers thus mutilated never reach their destination. Where there are several large packages in one sack, it matters not how securely they are tied, or how carefully and firmly wrapped, they are sure to be more or less damaged by the baggage-smashing methods employed in the handling of this class of mail matter. The Regan Printing House, one of the largest in the city, says:

"We have been in the printing business for more than twenty-five years and are free to confess that during the last three weeks we have had more complaints in regard to this matter than we have had during the quarter of a century it has been our pleasure and privilege to cater to the publisher's wants. In view of the conditions stated above, we are bending our best efforts to obviate as far as possible the liability of the packages of mail matter that go out from our institution to break open, by the exercise of more ordinary care in our mailing department, but we fear, that until the present conditions are changed or modified at the postoffice, we cannot successfully cope against the wholesale slaughter of mail matter."

Complaints without number have been made to the postoffice department, and no doubt the evil will be remedied soon. In the mean time those who do not receive the paper, should send us a postal card at once, giving date and number desired, and the missing copy will be supplied at once.

Sage Brush Philosophy Aimed at Mr. Cleveland.

Sage Brush Philosophy, edited by "Bill Barlow," and published at Douglas, Wyoming, devotes several pages of its November issue to the discussion of Mr. Cleveland's recent article on woman suffrage. The whole thing is characteristically original and funny and the closing paragraphs are well worth quoting. They are as follows:

"Anent the benefits of woman suffrage, they may be summed up in the statement that she purifies politics. Though an enthusiastic partisan, she simply will not vote for a notoriously dishonest or immoral man if she knows it. Every convention is largely dominated by this fact—the possibility of influencing the vote is always considered when selecting nominees—the which means better men, and cleaner and more honest methods of nomination. But it is not because of this fact that we of Wyoming favor woman suffrage—rather upon the broad platform of right and justice to one who is our mortal if not our physical equal. Woman has outgrown the child's protection of the serf. She can vote and still be sweetheart, wife and mother. We shelve theory twenty-five years ago, and have been up against the real thing since. We know.

"Give her the ballot, you down-east ducks. Never mind, Grover; he's got a grouch, and is over-age, anyway."

A Step Forward in Catholicism.

News from Rome says Pope Pius X. has just issued an order to bishops all over the world, to compel all candidates for holy orders to pass an examination, and learn of their fitness to discharge holy duties. This is an innovation and would portend hope did we not know the "fitness" desired is ability to compete with Protestant divines. The curriculum of all denominations to fit for the ministry is very limited. Science, real knowledge, is not a requirement for a priest. Indeed, most of the schools where the clerics are educated are known as seminaries, that is, in fact schools of instruction. Theological seminaries teach theology, Biblical literature, ecclesiastical history, and little else. Its mission is to make half-educated preachers, of which there are quite too many already.

Joan of Arc and the Voices.

Last week we gave the readers a brief account of spirit voices heard by Socrates more than 400 years before our era. But these were not the only spirit voices which the historians have related, and which possess absorbing interest when viewed in the light of modern revelations.

The story of Joan of Arc is a wonderful confirmation of spirit intercourse with mortals. She was born at Domremy, France, in 1412. Uneducated, save in domestic duties, when about thirteen years of age she saw a flashing light, and heard an unearthly voice bidding her to be modest and diligent in her religious duties.

A war was pending between England and France, and the former were everywhere victorious. King Charles seemed powerless in the contest. He had not yet been crowned, and the throne was nearly lost to him.

When but fifteen years of age the "voices" told Joan to go and fight for the Dauphin, promising her she should be victor. She donned male attire, with much difficulty reached the prince, told him her simple story, was interviewed and opposed by the priests; but she was finally given command of the French army, first telling the king aside of a circumstance he supposed only known to himself.

The priests demanded a miracle to prove she was inspired. She replied: "I have not come to Polters to work signs or miracles. My sign will be the raising of the siege of Orleans. Give me men-of-arms, few or many, and I will lead them to victory."

Joan told where a sword was concealed in the cathedral, and demanded it for service. It was found as described and was given to her.

Every word of that wonderful history is replete with interest, and deserves a careful reading, but our purpose is only to relate the simple fact that "voices," similar to those which directed Socrates, guided Joan, and led her on to victory. The English were subdued, Charles was crowned at Rheims, July 17, 1429. While leading her forces to Orleans, she was captured, and at first successful, but having a bridge to cross, and remaining in the rear to cover a retreat, if necessary, the gates were suddenly closed before her, and she was captured by the enemy. The poor girl was sold to John of Luxembourg, for 16,000 francs. A prisoner for a time; then, at the instigation of Cardinal Winchester, she was charged with being a witch and a sorceress, and on the order of the Vicar of the Inquisition, was removed to Rouen. With threats of torture she firmly adhered to her account of the "voices." Placed in the tower, watched by her keepers, severely ill, and subjected to all manner of indignities, Joan declared an angel visited her to strengthen her in the night.

Placed on a cart, accompanied by priests, and surrounded by an English guard of 800 who were armed with sword and lance, Joan was conveyed to the scaffold, on which a throne was placed for the Cardinal. She was then exhorted to recant all she had said about the voices and of angels. But she earnestly rejected their demands.

With the stake before her, the fagots piled around, the torch ready to light the flame, the guards waiting to bind her to the stake, and damnable priests on either hand, and her life by burning contingent on her answer, she declared:

"THOUGH YOU SHOULD TEAR OFF MY LIMBS, AND PLUCK MY SOUL FROM MY BODY, I WOULD SAY NOTHING ELSE THAN I HAVE ALREADY TOLD YOU."

Brave girl! Noble words! She voiced the wishes of the immortals. On May 30, 1431, Joan of Arc was burned at the stake, in obedience to Bible teaching, a command of "the Lord": "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

Most 600 years have gone by and the Pope of Rome has canonized Joan of Arc as a saint! No act of priest or pope can efface the infamy justly due the church for its crimes against humanity and the spirit world.

Prayer Was of No Avail.

Was not that a test of prayer, the protracted war between Russia and Japan? On the one side was a powerful Christian nation, dominating one-fifth of the world's domain. Her wealth and resources seemed unlimited. Her population was more than three times greater than that of Japan. In the field and on ship-board religious services were carried on, and appeals through chaplains were made to the Supreme God in the beginning and during every battle.

Opposed to these forces supposed to be aided by God, was a nation of diminutive people just emerging from barbarism. They had no chaplains, worshiped no God, loved Buddha and adored their ancestors. They met their godly enemies in deadly strife, both on land and on sea, and were uniformly victorious. If God responded to the prayers of their enemies and aided in the strife he, too, suffered numberless defeats.

Our own opinion is, the invisible powers took no more interest in the strife than they would had the combatants been denizens of an ant-hill. If, however, assistance came from without the adored ancestors of the Japs were more than a match for the feeble aid rendered the Russ.

Is It a Religious Trust?

A general conference of the various Christian denominations of Protestants, to the number of thirty, is in session in New York as we write, their ostensible purpose to unify, and bring all together in a common cause.

If the motive is to elevate humanity, to establish better morals, a purer faith, greater good, and break down the barriers which superstition has erected to divide the people into clans to antagonize each other, then The Progressive Thinker will cheerfully extend to them the glad hand. If, on the contrary, it is the purpose to reanimate and strengthen obsolete and worn-out creeds, to increase sectarian intolerance, to revive the feuds of a former generation against those whom they brand as heretics; then we earnestly view their movement as a sort of trust to magnify their own importance, to build up creeds at the expense of the general good, to revive the doctrine of hate so forcibly taught by the master, and so cruelly practiced before the church was divided. In division the church has prospered, intelligence has advanced, the humble have been secured in their rights. Enthrone any sect, or any combination of sects, liberty wanes, and is finally paralyzed. "Power corrupts whatever it touches."

Psalmody.

A psalmody convention of the United Presbyterian church has been in session in Chicago recently. This particular branch of Presbyterianism is addicted to the singing of metrical versions of the Psalms, in religious services. In their "metrical" arrangement they are very queer compositions, not to say, oftentimes positively ridiculous. But to the devout worshippers they are regarded as having a sanctity closely alongside the bible itself.

At the convention the Rev. W. A. Patterson severely criticised the famous hymn: "Lead, Kindly Light." As good a reply as we have seen in print is the following from the Chicago Chronicle, which is especially commendable from a Christian point of view:

If the psalmody convention of the United Presbyterian church now in session here has nothing better to do than to ridicule and denounce Cardinal Newman's celebrated hymn, "Lead, Kindly Light," it would better adjourn at once before it brings itself into universal contempt.

One of the criteria given of an inspired composition is that "it finds me," and this hymn has "found" more human hearts than almost any other that has ever been written. Though written by a man who afterwards became a Roman Catholic, the hymn is so simple, so reasonable, so expected to make it popular among some Protestants—it is found in every Protestant hymn book and in every Protestant heart. No modern hymnbook would be complete without it. Yet this is the hymn of which Rev. W. A. Patterson in delivering the address of the convention said: "It might mean, to the Christian, Pantheist or Buddhist."

In the invidious sense in which it was made this remark is absolutely false, but in a commendatory sense it is finely true. The very soul of all religion is dependence on God and particularly a sense of the divine providence and leadership. This sublime and comforting article of the Christian faith underlies the faith of the Pantheist, the Buddhist and the Mohammedan and is the foundation stone of every religion that is worthy of the name.

This is no disparagement to it. On the contrary, it is its greatest praise. It is really inspiring when one sings a psalm of David, and feels that universal humanity and—if the stars are inhabited—then the whole stellar universe is ready to sing a joyful "amen" to it. That is singing that is worth while.

The animus of Mr. Patterson's criticism lies in the fact that he and his people believe that Christian psalmody should be confined to metrical versions of the psalms of David. This is of itself an extremely illogical principle, inasmuch as they do not believe in confining modern prayers, sermons, poetry and history to those of the scriptures, but even on their own ground the hymn "Lead, Kindly Light," is especially defensible. It is a highly poetical development of the main idea of the twenty-first psalm of David which says: "He leadeth me in the still waters—He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness."

A Christian minister who could complain of such a hymn as this reminds us of the saying of Artemus Ward that there are some people so bent on kicking that rather than make no complaint at all they would complain that an angel's tail was too long for his body.

If Newman's hymn is liable to any criticism at all it is on the ground of its pessimism. Any Christian who feels that this world is a pitchy dark place in which he is far from home and stumbling over "fens and crags" is for the time being, at least, entirely destitute of the spirit of the Christian religion.

Loaded for Witches.

In witchcraft lore silver seems to have been accredited with great power to dispense evil spirits. In an old book on the subject one reads of a "valiant Souldier who had skill in Necromancy," and who always used "silver bullets to shoot away the witches." The evidences of such superstition are brought directly to the modern eye through the discovery made by a Pennsylvania farmer.

Mr. Vedderman is interested in curios, and purchased recently an old musket at a farmhouse sale. From its appearance the weapon antedates the revolution. It was in a deplorable state of rust, and in cleaning it the new owner discovered that it was loaded.

He carefully withdrew the charge, and to his surprise found it consisted of two silver shillings, dated 1781, tightly wadded with leaves of a Bible of ancient print. Beneath the coins was a small lock of hair and a piece of paper containing an illegible quotation. The gunpowder was coarse and undoubtedly of colonial manufacture. The whole looks very much like a charmed charge collected to demolish some world lady of the broomstick—Philadelphia Record.

Truly this rusty old smooth-bore musket is a fit symbol of the class of doctors of divinity and lesser clerical folk who pose as demolishers of Spiritualism, being loaded to the muzzle with antique bible attics, covered with cobwebs of superstition spun by the brains of the church fathers.

One difference is the bible ammunition is dangerous to use for such purpose—as it shoots both ways, and demolishes those who aim to demolish Spiritualism.

Destined to Perdition.

Some fellow in Washington claims he has statistics to show we have 21,018,170 swearing men in the United States. Had he pursued his inquiries further doubtless he would have found these victims of profanity, with scarcely an exception, are in sympathy with the popular religious faith and, sad to relate, they become acquainted with the curse words that come from the churches, the preachers' literature, and playing all that vile vocabulary in common use. It is a pleasure to know Spiritualists have eliminated all that class of expletives from use as vulgar jargon.

The Japs Are Spiritualists.

The following press dispatch from Japan shows clearly the victorious power of the Sunrise Kingdom are Spiritualists. If not, why do they worship their ancestors? Certain they would not do so did they not believe such ancestors have a continued existence and take cognizance of their doings:

Tokio, Nov. 24.—The Mikado, followed by premier, ministers and other court dignitaries, started in state this morning for Ise temple to offer thanks to his ancestors for the successful termination of the war and restoration of peace.

Every expansion of intelligence has proved of advantage to society. Gutzkow says: "People wish to be settled. Only as they are unsettled is there any hope for them."—Emerson.

The Isle of the Puritans.

Those who have visited the "shore" coast lying between Boston and Salem, most likely have heard the weird "voices" about the mystical island called "The Isle of the Puritans." A territory, not real, but shadowy and mysterious, it is not always visible, and but few have ever seen it. Only those whose souls are attuned to spiritual things, being made pure in the furnace of affliction, and quenching in heavenly resignation, have ever beheld it. It is most frequently seen in distinct greenness a few miles off the headland of Nahant. Fashionable people who visit this resort, absorbed in the sordid and selfish cares of the world, have ridden up and down the beach, trying in vain to get a glimpse of it.

There are various opinions concerning the inhabitants of this island. As it is near Salem, some think it is the dwelling place of souls of victims of the witchcraft. Others regard it as the place where the persecutors of these unfortunate people are doomed to remain, ever in sight of the place of their wrong doing. But the most prevalent opinion is, that here dwell for some good and pure motive the purest souls of the Puritans.

Many are the ghostly stories related about this mysterious isle. Fishermen and others sailing on the bay, in the mist of the morning or the twilight of evening, have heard bells tolling, as if from bellfries, and waited to them on the swell of the billows. Shadowy pinnaces have suddenly darted from some headland and as suddenly disappearing when they reach some sunlit shore. Just before they sink they appear as an ancient looking vessel, and on the bow was distinctly seen the form of Martha Umberfield.

Very few have ever seen the island. But it is believed one visited it during his life. Sumnerfield when on earth went there easily, possibly because of his highly spiritual nature and tentative sympathy with the dead.

When on his flight he often rowed far out into the bay to quiet his overworked nerves. One day while floating quietly in the still water, his hand on the tiller, the mysterious isle suddenly appeared before him. Beautiful emerald turf rising to mountains. From bellfries floated songs heard only in Paradise. As his boat with careless prow touched the shore, many voices greeted him. One taking him by the hand as he stepped from the boat, said, "Of the earth, but henceforth thou art not quite earthly. Of life, but thou shalt see and hear more than the living."

"Now the boundaries of earthly things vanish," said Sumnerfield; "I who was a Methodist, and a Methodist no more. You who were Puritans, are Puritans no more. Yet even this is not the supreme change, for that must be until the flesh has fallen from the spirit. This land is a symbol showing what earth might be were men worthy. This is not heaven, but a different heaven! But we have left it, willingly, for angelic is our mission."

"What is your name?" asked Sumnerfield.

"I was Henry Vane. He of whom men said, he went to his death like a king. For strong and lovely spirits walked beside me, as they have always walked by the side of those who for the sake of truth have gone to the stake and scaffold."

"That is the land of my labors," said Sumnerfield, pointing to the low green American shore, as it lay opposite them.

"That is the land of my refuge," replied one of the Puritans. "My name was Edward Kelley. I was my name in good faith to the death warrant of Charles. Well do I remember the red hills of New Haven, and the cave where I found shelter. Pursuers often came over the plain that skirted the base of the cliff, but always went away disappointed. We watched their ships as they sailed away, and it led our thoughts to dwell on England that had driven us into the desert, and to wings that are ever ascending and descending between this world and the gates of pearly whiteness."

They turned and went up a turf slope, and entered what seemed to be a village. Sumnerfield says nothing more of it in his letters, than that the houses were of ancient architecture, gabled and with latticed windows. Many people came out to meet them. Men with halos of light on their brows, not actual light, but of glorified expression. Women of saintly beauty, and children lovely as the cherubs of Raphael.

"Do you see that tabernacle?" said one, "the image of one in which my father lived, and his earthly life of sorrow and gladness. Often it was closed, the windows broken, and its dilapidated appearance an object for wicked laughter. But a silent but terrible witness of the tyranny that oppressed us. Well do I remember one Sabbath in summer, a holy peace filled the air, from which seemed only kind and loving thoughts could flow. But a band of drunken soldiers surrounded our home, forced an entrance, and commanded my mother to tell where they could find my father. She did not reply, only bowed her head over the family Bible which she was reading, never to be raised until in saintly beauty it stood among the blessed in heaven. My sister and I fled from the terrible scene, and heard brutal laughter and oaths from an upper room, and a voice saying, 'Lord receive my spirit.' When we returned at night, with other weepers, we found blood and gray hairs every place. And on the steps of the sanctuary, which he had often gone into the divine presence, lay our father dead."

"Some of us," said another, "found refuge in an early death. Others fled through storms, over the sea that lies before us. I stood on the deck of the Mayflower when it anchored off the New England coast, then bolsterous with winter. The wind drove the snow in our faces. Dusky forms flitted through the West door, and funeral hymns were heard among the pines, to which we replied with songs of cheer. It was a long fast of want, cold and sickness, that we kept that winter, and when spring came, flowers blossomed above more than half of our number. I with many others bore the seeds of death that bloomed early."

"Let us go inward," said a venerable man, with serene, triumphant eyes, addressing Sumnerfield. They walked forward, the mortal and the immortal, but what the young man saw he never told anyone. In his letters he alludes to "mysterious revelations beyond the power of language to portray, and sights it was not lawful to describe." This was all apparently he dared say of his strange voyage, and allowed his most intimate friends to think he regarded it as a delirium or dream; and in silent patience he waited until an early death bore him away to witness the reality of that mysterious visit.

the room was entirely her own, but Luke's wife told her she could retain it, else, started out for board some place else. But upon submission, she was forced to submit. Not very strong at first, she grew rapidly. She spent most of her time from home and was often seen at night rowing far out into the bay. Her treatment by Luke and his wife came to be generally discussed and excited great indignation. And as Luke had been elected deacon, they thought his character should be cleared of such conduct.

One day it was rumored that Martha had disappeared. Many were engaged searching for her, when it was reported she had been last seen in a boat rowing out toward the ocean. It was an autumn night. The black clouds in the sky gave promise of a heavy storm.

"What does this mean?" asked the minister of Luke Umberfield.

"God only knows, for she is innocent, but I will find her, if she is to be found." And springing into a boat and taking his son with him, he started out in the dark waters of the bay. An old fisherman who stood by leaped into the boat with them and the frail bark went out reeling, tossing and tumbling amid the fierce billows and was soon lost to sight.

Many hours later the watchers in the Umberfield home were surprised by the appearance of the fisherman who stumbled into the house, and fell on the floor unconscious, from fright and exposure. Being revived he said the Umberfields went down, but the boat floated ashore. Just before they sank they appeared as an ancient looking vessel, and on the bow was distinctly seen the form of Martha Umberfield.

THE OPINION OF A PROMINENT LECTURER.

He Critically Examines the Present Condition of Our Cause, and Asks Some Important Questions—The Fraudulent Weaver of Lace—An Earnest Plea for a Step in Advance.

In the Progressive Thinker for Nov. 28 is an article from the pen of Dr. G. B. Warner, reviewing Dr. Funk's latest message upon the subject of Spiritualism. Both the item under consideration, and Dr. Warner's article are thoughtful-provokers. Personally, I am glad the crisis is coming, and that the gauntlet has been thrown down; it means that somewhere in the not very far distant future the people who call themselves Spiritualists will get their eyes open and make a stand as a body for the genuine spiritual phenomena in preference to all of that which is palmed off as the genuine.

There is a strange defect somewhere when men like Dr. Warner cannot give their voice for more thorough and scientific phenomena without being defamed and denounced as "Fraud Hunter"—having applied to them even more appropriate titles. I find myself wondering what there is about the simulated phenomena that holds people so thoroughly in their thrall that they can not see when a man is striving for the betterment of the cause, and that most people who are interested in Spiritualism claim to have an absorbing love for it.

It would seem to me the great trouble is that many who have espoused the belief in the conscious continuity of life, and the possible communion of the denizens of both expressions of life, have been so carried away with a contemplation of the phenomena of spirit return, and consequently of the channels through which such phenomena may come that they capitulate entirely—giving up all the powers of reason and everything concomitant thereto.

Repeatedly Spiritualists revile and ridicule our so-called more orthodox brethren because of their statement that "they would not attempt to reason on religion"; at the same time the ridiculers are in the same position exactly. The man who will not reason upon spiritual phenomena and mediums, seeking to find the exact truth, is in my estimation as thoroughly and blindly orthodox as the most devout believer in the extra rib story.

Why should we not question mediumship? Why should we not question the intelligences that come to us purporting to be some one of our departed friends? Why should we not demand proof that the person posing as a medium is actually a medium, and not the victim of peripatetic chills, or worse still, a dealer in and dispenser of grise pains and filthy words?

Are we as Spiritualists to become so dogmatic that we will exorcise the man or woman who would dare question the infallibility of those individuals who hold the same relationship to Spiritualists as do the priests and preachers of all other denominations? If this keeps on there can be no other thing than the thimble-race and rack for the male-factors who question our media. I would question a medium as quickly as I would any other common individual. I would question exorcise men as quickly as I would incarnate men. Why should I not?

Now, here is the question I want answered: How many of us have some little understanding of the delicate conditions required for the production of spiritual phenomena can really believe that, say materialization and physical phenomena, and all other phenomena for that matter, can be produced night after night irrespective of the physical and mental condition of medium and audience? How many of us believe that the medium can hold two and three seances a day and have forms and manifestations galore at each session? I rise to a point of information—will someone explain how all this is done? Is it genuine? Can it be genuine? Is it reasonable to expect that anyone shall have sittings on the spirit world to give things that can be brought forth in forty different seances the same night, the same hour and almost the same moment?

Let it be written large, Brother Francis, that I am a believer in phenomena, genuine spiritual phenomena; but let it go down just as large that, I most thoroughly believe that a very large percentage of the people who are presented to the public is made of whole cloth, and not always of one piece either, for I distinctly saw the seam in one piece of lace woven (?) in a seance some time since; evidently the spirit (?) was not able to weave the lace all in one piece so he sewed two pieces together to make it large enough.

What is the outcome? The Spiritualists will take to the study of phenomena and mediumship in a thoroughly scientific way, and will thus delve to the very bottom, or top as the case may be, and be able to say to the world we have at last found untainted phenomena. Brother Francis, the simulator of phenomena—the man or woman who deceives the public with our most sacred relationships is lower than a forger, more cruel than a thief! Aye, the person who would trifle with our heart longings in relation to our departed friends is a ghoul of the basest type.

Either, I say the Spiritualists must take hold of this matter in a systematic, scientific, consistent manner, or, otherwise Spiritualism will eventually become a thing of the past. I am too optimistic to believe that the latter will be the case. Surely the bright intellects that enabled the masses to escape the thrall of the superstitions of the ages will come to the rescue, and will emancipate them from this other slavery.

Let it be written large, Brother Francis, that I am a believer in phenomena, genuine spiritual phenomena; but let it go down just as large that, I most thoroughly believe that a very large percentage of the people who are presented to the public is made of whole cloth, and not always of one piece either, for I distinctly saw the seam in one piece of lace woven (?) in a seance some time since; evidently the spirit (?) was not able to weave the lace all in one piece so he sewed two pieces together to make it large enough.

What is the outcome? The Spiritualists will take to the study of phenomena and mediumship in a thoroughly scientific way, and will thus delve to the very bottom, or top as the case may be, and be able to say to the world we have at last found untainted phenomena. Brother Francis, the simulator of phenomena—the man or woman who deceives the public with our most sacred relationships is lower than a forger, more cruel than a thief! Aye, the person who would trifle with our heart longings in relation to our departed friends is a ghoul of the basest type.

Either, I say the Spiritualists must take hold of this matter in a systematic, scientific, consistent manner, or, otherwise Spiritualism will eventually become a thing of the past. I am too optimistic to believe that the latter will be the case. Surely the bright intellects that enabled the masses to escape the thrall of the superstitions of the ages will come to the rescue, and will emancipate them from this other slavery.

Dr. Isaac K. Funk.

Dr. I. K. Funk is a typical investigator of Spiritualism, and a man of broad, liberal views, although he does not claim to be a Spiritualist. His work, "THE WIDOW'S MITE," is a vivid and comprehensive portrait of the true character of the man, and as we judge the work, it exhibits a LEARNING OF THE AUTHOR TOWARDS AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF THE TRUTHS OF SPIRITUALISM.

The Doctor is a typical investigator, from the simple fact that he examines the phenomena with the eyes of a scientist, and with the calmness of a philosopher, his only aim being to arrive at the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

To overcome that "stupendous inhibition," as he calls it, which separates this world from the realm of the unknown is the earnest endeavor of the Rev. Dr. Isaac K. Funk. Once he was interested in prohibition of spirits, and now he seeks to overcome the long existing prejudice against having man in touch with the hereafter while yet resident on earth.

It must not be understood that the Rev. Dr. Funk is himself a Spiritualist, for at present he calls himself merely an investigator of the psychic phenomena which have come under his notice. He goes to seances in order to learn as much as he may of the region of the next phase. He talked this last week to the Presbyterian ministers on the relation of the wraiths and specters to theology, and in a few days he will do as much, if not more, for the Congregationalists. The Federation of the Disembodied knows no creed.

If Spiritualism can make good its assertion that its priests are actually in communication with the persons who have passed beyond the veil, the Rev. Dr. Isaac Funk will be very glad. Then, perhaps, too, the way will be opened for the theological seminaries to give more definite instruction to the candidates for orders as to the kind of a future state they will be justified in preaching to their congregations. At the present time, even the Rev. Dr. Funk does not know about it, much as he would like to make it the subject of an entertaining brochure. Whether the world beyond is modeled after the plans of Jonathan Edwards or has a more peaceful outlook, the psychological researchers of even the most advanced investigators have not been able to determine. Information of this character would tend to make many persons who are at present rather uncertain about their status more thoughtful in their conduct, and then again it might not. In the language of the Mexican philosopher, "Quien sabe."

Sees Great Possibilities.

There are possibilities in Spiritualism, if it really does attain reliable information about the state of the unknown, thinks Dr. Funk, although he is no avowed believer in the cult. Suppose, for instance, that men should find out that they really have the power to communicate with each other by thought waves. They might save tolls, stifle a telephone monopoly or two and send messages from brain to brain for thousands of miles. If all that might be so of the undiscovered mental forces be true, one sitting in his office could lift a spiritual can until an inhabitant of Mars could mentally sight his visual. Such inquiries as "Is Mars inhabited," and "Have you a canal scandal," or "Is there a Funnerville on your sphere," could be answered off-hand by any well informed Martian.

Although all kinds of problems pervade the consciousness of the Rev. Dr. Isaac K. Funk, he is never worried by them. He attends to his business by day and studies spirits at night. When he is not working or studying he is playing a four-some on the Parkway links, Brooklyn, with St. Andrew and other bogies. The Rev. Dr. Funk likes golf as physical exercise, for it adds zest to life just as his effort to find out what Mrs. Pepper knows about the realms beyond is spice to his intellectual digestion.

Altogether a kindly man is he, and even the most timid shade need have no fear in his presence. The youngest and most inexperienced spook finds in him a sympathetic listener. Psychics speak to him in confidence; visitors from other worlds do not hesitate to ask his advice through the proper mediumistic channels, and even Presbyterians are sitting for instruction at his feet.

Searcher for Thirty Years.

The Rev. Dr. Isaac Kaufman Funk has been engaged in spirit trapping for at least three decades. He was born sixty-six years ago in Ohio, where the inhabitants seek office and other material things. His Alma mater is Wittenberg University, which was named from the city where dwelt an eminent German theologian who hurled an inkstand at what he thought was the embodied devil. After preaching for a few years, the Rev. Dr. Funk became an editor and founded several magazines and compiled a dictionary. Probably he numbers among his acquaintances more eccentric persons than any man in the United States. He knows scientists, mediums, clairvoyants, table rappers, slate writers and Spiritualistic handy men of all descriptions.

One medium in whose revelations the Society for Psychical Research was much interested was Mrs. Piper, and Dr. Funk, who is several learned societies in himself, has selected Mrs. May S. Pepper of Aurora Grata Cathedral, Brooklyn.

"Once for all," said the Rev. Dr. Funk, when I saw him last week, "I wish to say that I am not in any sense a Spiritualist and I do not think that the truth of Spiritualism has been demonstrated."

"I think none the less that there is much about the world unseen which should be investigated. It has only been in recent years that it has been possible to get the attention of men of science to these interesting phenomena. I would not have anybody over credulous and would warn all who seek truth along the lines of Spiritualism to take good care that they are not imposed upon, yet at the same time I think that it is an error equally grave to be too materialistic. It is in line with the mental attitude of the man who declined to hear anything about meteors, saying that it had been demonstrated to his satisfaction that there were no stones in the sky. When the Edison phonograph was shown before the French Academy a savant rushed forward, seized the operator by the collar and exclaimed, 'We will not be the dupes of a ventriloquist!'"

An Unanswered Question.

"Will Spiritualism ever be proved? Who can tell? That is a question which must be determined by scientists, and by them alone, for the mediums themselves are not capable of conducting such an investigation. Those who really have gifts often do not understand their own powers. Some of the best equipped minds in the world, however, are giving this subject their earnest attention. I might mention Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir William Crookes, of England; Professor Barrett, of Dublin, and the Hon. Arthur Balfour, the British Premier. Alfred Russel Wallace indeed is committed to the Spiritualistic hypothesis. The study of these phenomena has reached such a stage that an eminent scientist exclaimed that we were seeing a new science in the making. There are enough of ascertained facts to convince us that this subject is worthy of thorough examination."

"Will you explain, Doctor," I inquired, "what good there is in this new science?"

Dr. Funk paused for a moment and looked intently out of the window.

"Such a question as that, he said, might have been asked fifty years ago about magnetism or electricity. It might be asked now about radium. Let us first gather all the ascertainable facts and then perhaps we may judge. With the investigation of the nature of radium it is found that numerous uses for it are developing. Is that not true?"

Searching for Truth.

"Will Spiritualism," I inquired, "if it has any real basis, be of any assistance to the theologian; to a Presbyterian minister, for instance?"

"Just now," said the Doctor, "I am not interested in it from that point of view, but I am studying entirely from the scientific side."

"If there is a communication between the two worlds," I asked, "why is it that the spirit messages are of such a trivial nature?"

"That," was the reply, "is easily explained. The spirits which communicate through mediums were foolish when in this life, and after they have passed out they remained so for a time at least. That is why some of them come back, and prompted largely by curiosity or by the wish to minister to their own inclinations and passions, make themselves known in seances. Perhaps in a thousand years or so they may undergo a change. A transformation in the nature of any one cannot take place all at once."

"You refer to a communication which was given by a spirit in a seance last Sunday night in Mount Vernon. The spirit warned somebody to tell mother not to stand too much on her feet because she was too heavy. Perhaps that spirit in life thought only of the material things, ing but the truth. Besides, he is genial gentleman; nothing pretentious, arrogant or haughty in his make-up. He is one that any medium would feel in an instant AT HOME WITH. He is a cultured gentleman—an author, a publisher in one of the leading firms of New York, founder of the Literary Digest, editor-in-chief of the Standard Dictionary, and famous as an IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATOR OF PSYCHIC PHENOMENA.

Mrs. May Pepper, the great medium, endorses his methods in every particular. We cordially invite him to continue his investigations, for we know that, in his only aim being to arrive at the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

"You refer to a communication which was given by a spirit in a seance last Sunday night in Mount Vernon. The spirit warned somebody to tell mother not to stand too much on her feet because she was too heavy. Perhaps that spirit in life thought only of the material things, and what was spoken therefore could not be of any more importance than thoughts that were being entertained in life.

"However, there is a wide difference in mediums. I have gone to seances which were attended by persons of refinement and culture, and the language used by the mediums was of the most exalted kind. The communications from the spirits themselves were about the conditions in which they lived. They described life as it was on their plane, talked of their surroundings and of those whom they knew, and even spoke of going to school and attending lectures. They knew each other as by some subtle instinct, and it would be only natural that those who on earth were given to the material would not be able to recognize those who age departed in the spirit life, as they were in existence here, to higher standards.

"There are many persons, both connected with the Christian churches and out of them, who will not accept anything which they cannot reach with their five senses. Yet every year we are finding out things about this world of which we never knew before. New forces are constantly developing and we are discovering that which is so subtle that it escaped the understanding of our ancestors. Take, for instance, the discovery that there is an ether which transmits waves of light, and now Sir William Crookes tells of a still more subtle fluid. Is it unreasonable to believe that thought waves may not travel through some means of which we know little or nothing. A mother dreams that her son is in trouble and though he be a thousand miles away it will be found that her belief concerning him is true.

"It is not improbable that we may yet communicate with one another sitting in our chairs, though separated by great distances. None would have believed a few years ago that the wireless telegraph could have been effectively used. Yet now we have messages without wires. There are those even now who seem to be able to transmit and to locate waves of thought.

"Spiritualism teaches that this world has planes which we cannot discern by the material senses. It teaches that the earth itself is in a vortex. The spirits have a plane of their own, just as mortals have. Here we know little except the material—the earth and the ocean—yet it may be that there are other oceans, of which we know nothing. I give this only as what the Spiritualists think, for as yet nothing has been proven concerning this unseen world.

"There Are Many Mansions."

"The Scripture records say that 'In my father's house there are many mansions.' Can there be communication, then, between this spirit plane and the world known to the material sense? Are we at present prevented from the knowledge of this other life by some stupendous inhibition? The human race may not yet be sufficiently developed to understand these things, which are so subtle that they escape the ordinary sense. Suppose that the knowledge of the uses of electricity were suddenly made to some savage race. It might by the use of this powerful agent, of which it knew nothing, soon destroy itself. As the human race improves mentally and spiritually the time may come when it will learn much concerning the life beyond, and possibly will be able to communicate with those who are part of it. Such a knowledge would demonstrate without question that the soul is immortal. We would be scientifically sure of an existence beyond the grave.

"Now, do not understand me to say that spirit communion with us through our five senses does actually take place. But what I do maintain is that it is not entirely absurd that it should take place. And I say to those who believe the Scriptures that the presumption is in favor of such communication, not against it."

As to the form which spirits may have in another life the Rev. Dr. Funk could give no details. He cited the case, however, of a man who left his own body in a dream, called upon a friend a thousand miles away and then returned to his own form, which he saw lying on a bed in a trance. He said that he himself had confirmed the truth of this occurrence, for the man who was visited had written to his caller, asking why he had so ungenerously departed into thin air. The figure which had been seen corresponded in every respect with the real body, Tale Undoubtedly True.

"There is no question of the truth of this," said Dr. Funk. "How is it to be explained except that the spirit exists independent of the body and can at times make itself manifest to the physical sense of another in a form like it was known to occupy in the flesh. A sufficiently large number of experiences of the kind would scientifically make certain that we also have spiritual bodies of which our physical bodies are but the coarse shadows. It might show that each ego has the power, when both spiritual and physical conditions are favorable, to crystallize individual atoms about each ego in harmony with some divine law of crystallization not now recognized by science."

Dr. Funk was asked how manifestations of the presence of spirits in the surrounding planes might be obtained and if truly reliable mediums were available.

"It is difficult," he replied, "to tell from one's acquaintance with mediums as to how much truth there is to be derived from their experiences. After much careful investigation over a period of years I think I am within bounds in saying that nine-tenths of what passes as psychic phenomena is fraudulent, and that coincidence, telepathy and clairvoyance would explain some of the remaining tenth. The balance of that tenth to great scientists gives pause.

"There is so much of fraud that it is difficult to find out what is true and what is false," he continued with emphasis. "There is the dark room, the distance between the medium and the persons who witness the seance, the difficulty of touching anything. Such conditions give opportunities for fraud. Then, again, it is difficult to tell what the power is which these mediums, so-called, possess. They may have no communication with spirits whatever, but they mistake the manifestations of their own subliminal consciousness for the promptings of spirits. What the medium himself may be sure is a direct communication from spirits may be nothing more or less than clairvoyance."

"There are undoubtedly persons so endowed that they can read without the aid of the vision of the eyes. Molly Fancher, in her old age and practically blind, could read pages from a book which you held in your hand without ever having seen it. There are persons who accomplish what appear to be feats in communication with alleged spirits who have merely hypnotized themselves from one personality into another. Many such instances are on record. You will remember the woman mentioned by a French scientist, who was greatly troubled with indigestion. She was hypnotized and became another personality and was thus cured of her malady. On resuming her original personality the indigestion returned."

Concerning Mrs. Pepper Dr. Funk said that he has as yet reached no definite conclusions, but he felt sure that in none of the tests which she had undertaken for him had she ever misled him.

"Perhaps she may have fooled others," added he, "but she never fooled me. Mrs. Pepper is undoubtedly a psychic of unusual power, but just what that power is I am not able definitely to tell. That she has such gifts, however, there can be no doubt. In the tests to which I have subjected her every possible precaution was taken to prevent deception. Letters which she was to read without opening were written on sensitized paper so that had they been opened the admission of the light would have produced a discoloration which would have demonstrated that the letter had been tampered with. Black paper was also used on the inside of the envelope, so that there could have been no means of deciphering the contents by holding the missive to the light. I have seen some manifestations of her power which incline me to believe that she has clairvoyant ability—that she is actually able to read what is within a sealed letter, just as Molly Fancher did. Recently I received a letter from a man in Chicago which he asked me to send to Mrs. Pepper. I did not myself know the contents of it. The letter was placed on the table at one of the services held by Mrs. Pepper. 'She picked it up and asked who it was who had left it. I told her that I had placed it there.'

Giving Excellent Test.

"But you yourself do not know what it contains," said Mrs. Pepper. She then said that the pearl necklace concerning which a person whose name she mentioned was disturbed had not been stolen, but was lost. On opening the letter she found that she had given the name and address correctly and knew the whole contents of the communication. It would have been impossible for her to have opened that letter, owing to the means which had been used to prevent such a thing.

"Another case of unusual interest was brought to my attention. A boy at the age of two years had lost his mother and his father wandered away. He had reached the age of twenty-nine years when he attended one of Mrs. Pepper's meetings and sent in a communication to his mother asking the address of his father. Mrs. Pepper gave an address in London to which he wrote. The firm there answered that Mr. had been there three years before, but had left his employment to go to Glasgow. The young man sent a letter to his father in Glasgow, to which he received a reply. I investigated this case myself, and I am thoroughly convinced that there was no collusion.

"There are many facts which lead me to believe that there is a faculty of the human soul which enables it to communicate at great distances without the use of the ordinary senses. It is for the scientist to investigate these psychic phenomena and to ascertain if Spiritualism can prove itself."—New York Herald.

THEOSOPHISTS IN ERROR.

The Experiments of Col. De Rochas Taken as a Text for Some Critical Thought.

The Annals of Psychical Science for July, 1895, publishes what Mr. Stead calls the most startling and amazing paper published in a long time, describing experiments by Colonel De Rochas in France, who, by mesmerizing a girl at the suggestion of Mrs. Besant, was able to throw her into a trance and induce her to recall all the events not only of her present life to the earliest infancy, but her life in previous reincarnations, before she entered her mother's womb, in her present incarnation. The curious thing is that, whereas Theosophists have publicly taught that it takes 1,000 years between one incarnation and another (Mr. Sinnett in Esoteric Buddhism, distinctly said that none returned under 1,200 years. Pray, on what authority?). Here we have a French girl describing her experiences in two incarnations during the past century—the last being as the wife of a French fisherman in Brittany, and previous to that as a man in the time of Louis XVIII.

Thus, if this be true, we find the teachings of theosophy about the period between one incarnation and another entirely disproven, being the height of wickedness because the people of the times of ancient Rome in the days of Nero were going to be reincarnated.

As a matter of fact, if Col. De Rochas' experiments are at all reliable, the spirits of the time of Nero have been reincarnated hundreds of times since, and have had time to forget all their wicked habits of 2,000 years ago.

Again it would lead us to suppose that the supply of disembodied souls is infinitely smaller than would be the case if we assume that we wait 2,000 years on the other side digesting our earthly experiences in "Nirvana." Supposing there are 1,500 millions of human beings on this globe and they reincarnate as fast as they pass out, the supply would necessarily be only a thousandth part of what it would be if we have to wait 1,000 years on the other side.

Again other questions are raised. If the people on the earth 1,000 years ago only numbered 100 millions, and to-day number 1,500 millions, obviously a fresh supply of spirit is constantly being evolved (presumably from the animal world, from our domesticated animals, dogs, horses, cows, etc.) who take their turn at being incarnated as human beings, thus gaining new and more progressive spiritual experiences and making greater spiritual growth.

All this seems quite reasonable and consistent with the philosophy of life which teaches that we are here like school children to learn a lesson and progress onward and when we have advanced sufficiently we pass upward as Spiritualism teaches, and do so without return and pass through another earth experience, but our places are taken by spirits from the lower animals whereas, if we fail to learn our lesson, we have to come back to school again.

One startling and puzzling conclusion seems to be that there is no sex in spirit life, because the reincarnated, at present a girl, describes her life as formerly a man and may have been alternately man and woman.

Notwithstanding this, it would be contrary to all the teachings of Spiritualism and contrary to all human aspirations to suppose there is not a female as well as a male element in the spirit world, and that the ultimate union of male and female spirits forms the highest happiness attainable and that the beautiful doctrine of soul affinities is a veritable truth.

This may be quite consistent with the teaching that spirits progressing from the lower animals into man, pass alternately through male and female earthly bodies so as the better to develop the male and female elements of character which are needed to make a perfect man, a man who combines the intellectual power, wisdom and will of man with the tenderness and love of a woman.

I merely offer these as speculations. If, because spirits pass through earth experiences alternately as man and woman, we are to come back as men and women in the spirit world, then we should have to reject most of the spirit messages and teachings of the last fifty years. Of course, if we can be supremely happy without calling ourselves men and women, being all alike, it matters little, since we can't wish for anything higher than to be happy. Our present lives as men and women are based entirely on our earth experiences as human beings. If, therefore, God made man in His own image, we shall continue to feel pretty much as we do now, simply realizing our highest expectations and aspirations one step at a time.

Some time ago I mentioned to a leading Theosophist at Point Loma, home-stand the fact that spirit messages through a medium confirmed much of their teaching; that I had a book entitled "Eon and Eon," describing the various life experiences of two male and female spirits (now dwelling in the higher spheres) in their various incarnations upon earth, and amongst others they lived in the time of the Mesopotamians, and described their life there. This was apropos of the fact that Mrs. Tingley believes thoroughly in Atlantis, and continual references are

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style is necessarily terse and descriptive, which of all things is to be deplored. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space available, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letter will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Eliza Jane Snodgrass. Q. Many years ago, when I first began to see spirit forms, a great many who came were colored, but now only one in a while does one appear. Why is this?

A. The correspondent furnishes the key to this mystery by saying that at one time her family owned slaves. Her clairvoyance or spirit seeing began soon after the close of the war. It is probable that there were many more spirits of negroes than whites.

If one should visit a city where nine-tenths of the population were colored, he would expect to meet a great many more than whites.

Madam L.—Q. Where can I obtain What is Spiritualism?

A. This is published by the National Spiritualists Association for missionary work. It is sent, with several other valuable tracts to those who request them for distribution. They are furnished without cost, but postage will be enclosed, and such a small writer feels it a privilege to give in support of the publishing fund. Address Mary T. Longley, Secretary, 600 Pennsylvania Avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

G. W. Goodman. Q. Will you please give me an opinion as to God's likeness. I have read that we were made in the image of God, and believing as I do, that God is universal spirit, I am puzzled. As universal spirit manifests in different forms, birds, animals, flowers, etc., how could the likeness be confined just to man?

A. Questions of God, his character and the mutual relations of man and God have been constantly sent to this department, showing the intense interest the subject awakens in the minds of all. It has been since man first began, in reason, on the procession of generations of mortal systems, revolving in the orbit of aether never satisfied, and the gods evolved by the various systems of religion, to the thinker seem impossible from their human character and limitations. The materialist discards all these dogmatic beliefs, and rests on "matter and its potentialities." That word "potentiality," "force," "energy," means all that is called spirit. It covers the unknown, the infinite borderland beyond matter.

It appears strange to me that the scientist standing on the headland of this earth and with telescope looking out into the abysses of space at the countless millions of stellar systems, revolving in orbits which are absolutely adjusted to mathematical laws, can see nothing but matter.

Strange that the biologist when he beholds the evolution of life from protoplasm through the endless series of living forms to man, can see only the changing expressions of matter.

Material scientists take as their fundamental axiom the existence of matter.

Is it not even a more fundamental axiom that there is also mind?

Is it not transparently clear that there is a Cosmic Mind?

Then man alone is not in God's likeness, but every world and sun, and every form of life are his expression.

But this subject is too vast for answer in this limited space. For nearly my whole life has its consideration taken a portion of my time. The study and inspiration of these years has crystallized into a book of about 300 pages entitled "The Evolution of the God-idea." This idea begins with the fear of the savage for the invisible forces of nature and is traced through its evolution in India, Egypt, Greece, Rome, Judea, Christianity, to its last final phase, of spiritual science, the Cosmic Mind. Feeling that it was as complete as I could hope to make it, by the inspiration received, I am arranging for its publication.

A Minister: Q. At a seance, the mediums of a cousin and mine, developing mediumship, spirit said through her that an uncle was dead. Not feeling sure, I went to another cousin's also developing, and the spirit of my son came and assured me it was true. I at once wrote to this uncle, and he replied that he was in feeble health and had been extremely ill, and had just passed and made to him of the argument of evil spirits. I had so much confidence, it was a comfort to me, but how can this be justified and explained?

A. When belief becomes blind credulity, and the spirits are taken as infallible authority, it requires a rude shock to cause it to change. It has come into the experience of almost every Spiritualist. The lesson first has to be learned that the spirits have limitations to their knowledge, only a little broader than our own. They are not infallible, or all-knowing. When they find other measures fail, they resort to the heroic statement.

Sometimes, however, a suggestion is made by a member of the circle, which overcomes all others, and having established itself, of course is repeated.

Thus in regard to the death of a certain person. When the question is asked, the spirit may not know, but have means of knowing except as it has come into the experience of almost every Spiritualist. The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

New Light Cottage.

My Dear Martha:—You will be surprised to learn that our family has nearly doubled since I wrote last, but it is a fact. One day mother looked out of the window and exclaimed, "Goodness!" It was very appropriate, for much goodness has been required of her ever since. Aunt Jane then went and looked out and exclaimed, "Gracious!" This was also appropriate for graciousness was required for the occasion. These two unusual exclamations brought John and me to the window, but our remarks will not look well on the pages of history—yet they were right to the point. What we saw was this: A sled drawn by a large black ox in thills, upon the sled a quantity of hay and two boxes. Upon one box sat a tall, thin man with long white hair and beard. He wore a very large coat that saw its best days long before, and a stove-pipe hat, and he carried a long whip which he flourished occasionally by way of encouraging his beast. On the other box sat a young girl. She wore a dark print dress, an old blue hood and a red plaid shawl. The stage turnout drew up to the front door and John went out to meet our guests.

After some minutes of suspense John came in and said: "The man says his name is Abraham Freewill Smith and he is cousin to Aunt Jane and as he reckons it, third cousin to me through you, mother. Mr. Smith has buried his wife and been burned out of house and home, and he and his daughter and this one ox alone are left to tell the story and the Lord told him to come to us and we would take him in."

"What did you tell him, John?" asked mother.

"I told him if the Lord said we would take him in, we would, of course, and—"

At that moment Mr. Smith came in, bringing one of the boxes which he placed in a chair. He then went to Aunt Jane and kissed her upon the cheek. "Scripture saith, greet one another with a holy kiss," he said and turned to mother. Aunt Jane wiped her cheek with the corner of her apron but I did not stop to see what mother did, for I had to fix the kitchen fire, after which I peered through the door. "You have not greeted me with a holy kiss," said John, but Mr. Smith did not hear.

"Daughter," he cried, "why do you wait without the gate? Enter and receive the blessing."

The girl came timidly in and taking her by the hand, Mr. Smith said, "Cousin Helen, dear Cousin Jane, this is the child of my old age, Diadema Seraphena Victoria, which means that if she lives in accordance with the blessed Word she may sometime be a victorious seraph crowned with a diadem."

The young lady thus introduced, flushed, hung her head and trembled visibly. A look of tenderness softened Aunt Jane's face and she took the poor girl in her arms and kissed her. It was a glimpse into Aunt Jane's soul I never had before, and it surprised me.

Mother took the girl into the kitchen and introduced her to me. At first she was so timid she hardly dared move or speak and she seemed painfully conscious of her style of dress. After I had taken her to her room, which is a little one opening out of mine, I got her to talk.

She told me about her mother and cried so I could hardly keep from crying with her. She said her father would not let her braid her hair or have any trimming on her clothes or wear anything really pretty because it was wicked. It made me think of your experience, Martha. She said she could not say or do anything to please the Lord even when she tried her best. I asked her how she knew, and she said she didn't know only what her father told her, and he said she was very weak and sinful and if she did not repent, the Lord would destroy her.

"Sometimes wish he would and have done with it," she said with consideration.

Even if an untruthful spirit makes the communication, it evidences spirit return, and the investigator should always give a wide margin for the difficulties in the way of absolute correctness. He should be grateful for the true, and not magnify the errors.

able spirit; "I don't see what there has to be such an awful God for."

"There isn't, only in people's imagination," I said.

The girl stared at me in surprise. "The Bible says 'God is love,'" I added. She shook her head. "Perhaps it does not mean what you think it does—the best things don't according to father," she added vaguely.

I repeated our conversation to mother and she said, sadly, "The poor victim—the poor little victim," and by that name she passes into our family history.

That night after our guests were safely in bed, we talked over the situation. John said, "I am real glad of the ox to put with one of mine. It is an ill wind that blows no good—but as for Father Abraham, I don't know as I know. I need a hired man, but whether a prophet can be induced to work or not remains to be seen."

"Try him, John, for the sake of the poor victim, if for no other reason," said Aunt Jane earnestly.

"Yes, John, for the victim's sake," said mother.

"All right, if you women can stand it I guess I can," said John cheerfully, and so the thing was settled for a time indefinitely.

Mr. Smith had not been in the house an hour before he informed us that the end of the world is at hand. He said the Lord would surely come upon the seventeenth day of April and he urged us to be ready to meet him. He said God had plainly declared that at the time of the end the wise should understand.

"Do you understand?" said I.

"Certainly; there is not a prophecy in the whole Bible that I cannot explain to you," he said decidedly.

The next morning Mr. Smith began where he left off the night before. He used the Bible to prove everything he said, which was a good deal. He described the Judge upon his great white throne and the awful terror and despair of the wicked and the rejoicing of the saints, until the victim went from the room sobbing, and I wanted to shake the man.

In sheer desperation mother came to the rescue. "A man of your ability and intelligence must surely be fond of reading," she said insinuatingly. "I suppose you noticed at once that we have a fair supply of books. What sort of reading do you like best?"

"Well," said Mr. Smith, after a little hesitation, "I can usually get quite a little comfort out of a real pious story that is very sad."

"Most pious stories are very sad," said mother, "but I do not have one handy, so I will offer you this," and she handed him Fox's Book of Martyrs which we found in the house. It proved a happy hit, for it seemed to afford him great satisfaction ever since, and yet Mr. Smith seems to be a real kind man and will sit up all night with a sick animal. How queer some persons are! I wonder if I am queer.

In less than a week after the Smiths came, mother got a letter from her father's sister Ann, asking if she might come and stay a few months with us and get rested. Mother had never seen Aunt Ann but once, and knew little about her except that she was engaged in some sort of missionary work somewhere, but she wrote her to come and stay as long as she could be contented. There was but one unoccupied room in the house beside the guest chamber, which mother declared she would not give to anyone who was to be a member of her family, and that one opened out of the Shadow Room.

Aunt Jane said she was not going to have any missionary woman a trapezoid through her room, so John locked and bolted the door between the two rooms and cut a new door opening into the hall and we made the room ready for Aunt Ann.

She came at the time appointed and we like her real well. She is past middle age. Her hair is white as snow and soft and fluffy. Her face has a strong and determined look and a calm, kind and happy one as well. Her keen gray eyes seem to look straight through everybody and everything and arrive at a correct conclusion. Her speech is plain and forceful but always pleasant. I think her a very fine specimen of womanhood. She makes me think of a rock upon the hillside which no storm nor tempest can move. I do not admit woman weak, wobbly women. I think a woman ought to be as brave and self-reliant as a man and I know she can be and still be lovable and womanly, and John thinks just as I do about it.

When Aunt Ann came down to breakfast the third morning after her arrival she said to mother, "Do you understand the meaning of the spiritual man's affections you have in this house?"

"No; we only know they exist and have ever since we came here," said mother. "What have you seen?"

"I have seen that locked and bolted door open and close and shadowy figures pass in and out," she answered calmly.

"Are you accustomed to such sights?" asked John, with some curiosity.

"No, I cannot say that I am accustomed to such things, but I have seen too many to feel either alarm or surprise," was the cheerful answer.

Mr. Smith had by this time dropped of his breakfast and began to quote Bible excitedly. He said such manifestations were among the signs that were to precede the coming of the Lord, and God had plainly warned the world against that terrible principle of Satan known as Spiritualism, which the Rev. Father saw coming out of the mouth of the dragon in the shape of a frog.

"If it looked like a frog," I cannot for the life of me see how he knew it was Spiritualism," said I.

The prophet looked at me with evident displeasure, and said sternly, "Very likely you do not; the deep things of God appear as foolishness to the carnal mind, but the wise comprehend all mysteries."

After the man had gone to his work John said to Aunt Ann, "I wonder if the mind of man is capable of conceiving any theory that cannot be proved by the Bible?"

"It never did," was the brief reply.

One day shortly after this Aunt Jane said to Mr. Smith, "Abraham, your daughter will have to have new clothes before she can attend school this spring, and it is time the material was brought, so we women can be at work upon it."

"My daughter will have no need of clothing or school, for upon the seventeenth day of next month at the midnight hour the world will be startled from its slumbers by the solemn cry, 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him,' and all who are ready will enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb, and I trust my daughter will be one of the chosen few. God's bride will need only her pure-white robe of righteousness," was the impressive reply.

"What's that you've got in your mouth?" said Aunt Jane sharply. "A pretty bride you'll make with the tobacco juice drizzling down your white robe—perhaps you think the Lord will be proud of you! I can tell you that you better take the money you waste on that vile stuff and get your poor child some decent clothing; but if you won't do it some one else will buy it for her."

Mr. Smith stared after the retreating figure of his cousin in evident dismay. A week later John said, "I wonder what has come over Father Abraham? He has not used any tobacco for a week, and when I spoke to him about it he said it had been revealed to him that tobacco was filthy and God had commanded his people to put away from them all filthiness, therefore it should pass his lips no more."

Aunt Jane stared fixedly at the wall as if trying to read something on the other side of it. Aunt Ann said decidedly: "Abraham-Smith as living up to all the light he has. Honestly and sincerely command respect wherever they are found. The fact that what Mr. Smith considers to be wisdom seems to us little less than lunacy does not lessen our obligation to be patient and kind and respectful. If we will not treat the opinions of others with respect, we have no right to demand respect for our own."

I felt quite anxious to know what Aunt Ann would think of Mr. Dale. We all think so much of him; I hoped she would like him and she did. He is a strong, pure-minded, honest young man, but he has not found himself yet—when he does the world will hear from him," was the remark she made regarding him.

Mr. Dale comes here often and ever since Aunt Ann came, for he is as much interested in her accounts of city missionary work as I am. Neither Mr. Dale nor I ever heard before of such destitution, suffering, brutality and sin as Aunt Ann has told us about.

When I went to the depot to meet Aunt Ann I saw Mrs. Drury for a few minutes. She was on her way to meet with a charitable society of some sort which she told me is composed entirely of church members with the single exception of herself. "Thus far they have treated me with kindness and respect and yet they all know what I am," she said, smiling.

I asked her if the Spiritualists as a whole were given to doing charitable work. There was a touch of sadness in her tone as she replied, "As far as I know they are not—I am sorry to have to say it, for it is my earnest desire to see them take a prominent place among those who devote at least a portion of their time, talent, strength and means, to the betterment of humanity. The true way to help another is to teach him how to help himself, and of all people the Spiritualists ought to be the best able to do this. But you know, it is easier to preach two religions than to practice one."

Mrs. Drury's remarks made a strong impression upon my mind, which has deepened as I have listened to Aunt Ann's conversation. I feel a strong desire to make of myself the very best sort of woman it is possible to make out of the material I have to work with. I want to get where I can help others and then help them. When I get where I know myself I can help others to know themselves. I want to feed the hungry, rescue the perishing, care for the dying and show them all the way of life and do it for humanity's sake under the name of Spiritualism. I will let others preach the beautiful and helpful things and I will practice them.

I know you and Mrs. Drury can do both, but I will not try to do but one, but I will try and do that one real well.

Aunt Ann said to Mr. Dale one day, "A theory is of no use unless you use it. If it works good it is good."

He made some remark about the great wickedness of the people among whom she worked.

"Yes, but back of the wickedness is ignorance," she said. "They know not what they do. They are conceived and born and reared in gross ignorance. From their birth to their death they in their home lives see nothing, hear nothing, know nothing but what we call sin; the very air they breathe is polluted with it, and every suggestion they receive tends to wickedness. It is actually expected and required of them to be wicked. I tell you there is not one of us present who under the same conditions would not be the same as they are. All the possibilities of wickedness developed in them lie undeveloped in us—all the good developed in us lies undeveloped in them. Sin is only the result of ignorance—remove the cause and a cure is wrought. Evil disappears correspondingly with the development of good. This is the doctrine taught by Christ, but his professed followers have always ignored it. In place of the 'glad tidings' he told them to proclaim, they have substituted the saddest tidings ever given to the world. We who have had the benefits of an education however faulty, who have always received suggestions of purity, nobility and honesty, who have had more or less goodness expected and required of us cannot estimate how great the debt we owe to such things, neither can we comprehend a life devoid of their help. O that those who profess to know the way of life might receive a baptism of divine love—the love that is long suffering, merciful, kind and tender."

We were silent for a little while, and then mother said, "Of all the religions, what one do you consider the best adapted to human needs?"

"In the broadest sense of the word and strictly speaking," said Aunt Ann, "there is but one religion, never has been and never can be. If it rested with me to name that one I would name it Spiritualism."

We all stared at her, too surprised to speak. She sprang to her feet and confronted us. I never saw her look so strong and commanding before. Mr. Dale said she seemed clothed in majesty.

"Yes," she said earnestly, "the one religion the world needs may appropriately be called Spiritualism. By that name I do not mean simply the knowledge that the so-called dead return and communicate with the living, although this truth is of vital importance. I do not mean that every individual who possesses this knowledge and who knows that immortality does not depend upon a belief in any person or thing shall call himself a Spiritualist and immediately go to work to break in pieces and destroy everything held sacred by others, and ridicule and abuse others who, perhaps just as honest as himself, do not see as he does, 'Tut I mean instead 'a knowledge of spirit and spiritual things. I would teach man that he is a spiritual being now and the necessity for spiritual development and understanding the law governing it. Spirituality means growth, progress, knowledge, power, happiness, peace, purity, goodness. It means everything that makes life desirable and is the real rather than the material. I would teach man that his future destiny rests entirely in his own hands, and as he sows so shall he reap. I would teach him that his body is the temple of the living God and must be cherished and well cared for, and the cleaner and stronger the body the better divinity can express itself through that body. All this is Spiritualism, but a person has to be educated to a certain point before he can understand all this. Some so-called educated persons have no more spirituality than a barrel of pork. All reformations begin with the inner life of the individual, and the first step to be taken is to awaken in the individual a desire to be something better than he is; but it is useless to preach to a starving man, the only religion he can appreciate is the religion of good deeds."

Letter From Tacoma, Washington.

I write you a few lines to let the friends throughout the country know what we are doing in far away Tacoma. I have been here now almost one year and still working away. I believe the good work is going on nicely here, but now it seems to look much brighter, and the future seems already cast its benign influence upon us.

The Occult Band of Harmony of which I am the pastor, is doing well, and their influence is being felt more and more with each succeeding meeting. The lectures that the dear teachers give us are indeed food for thought such as seldom our good luck to hear. It is indeed inspiring to look into the faces and see therein the expression of intelligence that is shown; then we sometimes hear people say the intelligent and thinking part of humanity is not looking for such things.

I find that if we furnish the thinking people something to think about they are apt to be present and look into the truth of what is being said. I am in sympathy with all, but with the higher teaching in particular. Let us have the very best, then we will have the power to draw the best people to us to listen to the grand words of comfort and consolation the angels have for us. I would like to hear from some good medium who would like to take up the work here.

Mrs. Grace Williams passed to spirit life at the age of 33 years, Oct. 30, at Tacoma, Wash., after one year of suffering, she leaves a husband and two sons and two daughters. He was forty years a Spiritualist. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Dickey.

Mr. Young S. Hughes passed to spirit life at the age of 32 years, at Tacoma, Wash., Nov. 10. He leaves wife, one son and two daughters. He was forty years a Spiritualist. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Dickey, also being a soldier was in touch with that.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 33.

CHICAGO, ILL., DEC. 9, 1905.

NO. 837

AN EXCELLENT PORTRAYAL.

Illustrating the Beauty, Grandeur and Value of Pure Spiritualism.

"What is Spiritualism?" It is revelation; it is knowledge derived from spiritual sources. Spiritualism is the stepping stone to that divine and innermost light whereof spirit and its knowledge stands revealed to you.

Spiritualism forms an atmosphere to produce its own manifestations; it is a wonderful system of philosophy and religion. Spiritualism is of untold value to man and brings him in accord with the infinite laws of progression.

Twenty years ago I was led to visit Onset Bay and there Spiritualism was revealed to me, unsought. It changed the tenor of my life; it held me in my home and taught me my duties to others and made me of more value as a human being; it unfolded me spiritually and resurrected the divine in my nature.

Had it not been for Spiritualism I should have drifted through life a superficial woman living in the external only. Had it not been for Spiritualism I could not have borne up under the burdens and griefs an earthly existence brought to me; and still, had it not been for Spiritualism I would not have been called upon to undergo many of them. But to-day, standing upon a firmer basis, I feel no regret for the burdens and the bitter tears; I could not afford to have lost the discipline each trial brought. Spiritualism has proven to me that true happiness consists in doing one's duty to our fellow-men. It is a great lesson to learn and I cannot portray the blessing the faith has been to me. Within the haze surrounding the Spiritualism which came to me, I always see the faces of W. J. Colville, Cora Richmond, Clegg Wright and Mrs. Longley; they were the teachers who gave forth the spiritual pabulum I craved during my early investigations and they have made their impress on my life for all time.

"What does spiritualism teach that Spiritualists believe in common?" I have met with many who believe in common that our religion simply exists in order to cater to their incessant demand for knowledge concerning the moves they want to make in their daily lives. Shall they marry again? Will certain ventures bring them much money and how can they best attract a sweetheart or a lover? These are questions hundreds of Spiritualists make use of the faith to answer; they relegate it to the fortune-telling plane but never ponder on its divinity or the stupendous revelation it has brought to the world or its great value in showing men the path of progression. But the true Spiritualist is interested in the power which lies beyond the manifestation; he aspires to learn from Spiritualism the psychic laws.

Dr. Caird speaks of organization but some of us have had enough of superficial organization in the past. It is not what we make of Spiritualism, but what it is. Organization on the mortal side has no power to affect the workings of spirit on the spiritual plane. Spirit is continually manifesting among every class of mortals; it does not belong solely to Spiritualism. Some of our spiritual societies ARE WHITED SEPULCHRES; their leader wishes to pose as a successful president of a successful society and aims to put the most sensational medium on the platform without regard for his genuineness. What attention is drawn to his unworthiness, the president says, "Never mind; he is a big fake but he draws a crowd."

There is to-day in Boston a man of the above order; a fine lecturer, yet he stoops to the level of the charlatan and reads folded ballots by trickery. He creates a sensation and fills the Spiritualistic halls by his blindfold trick and is eagerly sought by spiritual societies. To organize to protect fraud is criminal; in such a case it is better to quit organizing and let spirit do its work, unaided from the mortal side.

"What does Spiritualism teach?" What does it not teach? It teaches how the kingdom of the spirit works for the purpose of expressing its greatest power to suffering mortals. It comes straight home to our individual lives and teaches us divine mercy and charity to all. It teaches us through spiritual aspirations to overcome influences of an adverse order. It teaches us to attain the psychic condition for soul development and unfolds the nobler qualities—unselfishness; a desire to do good by helping the fallen. It is constant and living pressure toward the unfolding of the spirit within and we are more able to transport our thoughts, our lives, our aspirations toward divine knowledge and goodness. True Spiritualism sheds the white light of spirit over its followers and illumines the path toward progression. It teaches us how to free the powers of the spirit for expression in the natural world, and shows us that it is not our clothes nor our bodies that make humanity but it is the thought, the spirit which lies concealed in our hearts and minds; it is thought, feelings, affections, aspirations, hopes and spirituality which constitutes the real man and woman here on earth. Its rays penetrate to the light of the world; its rays penetrate to the very darkened corner of the universe, speaking the word of cheer to the despairing mortal, bidding him look up higher, teaching him how to evolve the best elements in his nature and make the most of the blessings and gifts which are his natural heritage.

WHEN YOU WENT HOME.

Where did you go, I wonder,
Home to that beautiful shore;
In the sunny, gladsome springtime,
Or when summer days were o'er?
Was it when leaves were falling,
And the brook sang soft and low;
Or when fields and sleeping blossoms
Were covered with robes of snow?

Within the early morning,
When bird-sons filled the air;
Was it then your soul went outward,
To those golden shores and fair?
Perchance the stars of evening,
Hung low in the crimson west;
When you passed the silent portal
And entered eternal rest.

Did you see angel faces
In those far lands on earth?
Faces familiar, yet holy,
With the light of spirit birth;
Were hands held out in greeting
From across death's narrow sea;
Did they whisper words of comfort,
As you whispered out to me?

SOUTHERN CASSADAGA.

W. F. Peck Writes His Appreciation of the Camp.

The season is here when "The frost is on the pumpkin and the fender's in the shock," and delightful, bracing, invigorating the days are, too. The year in our northern clime would not be complete without this crowning season of harvest, this ripening, mellowing period when Nature sums up her months of steady labor in teeming fields and overflowing granaries. When she celebrates her achievements by filling the air with wine and the blood with tingling electricity.

But, alas, there is a fly in the amber of our delight, a spot upon the sun of our rejoicing; these white mornings, hazy noons and yellow evenings are ominous of greater changes to come. For months Old Sol has been stealing his way toward the Southland so slowly and quietly that only the shortening days, lengthening nights and falling leaves gave indication of his going. We know that he has gone on his annual visit to his Antarctic subjects and that already away up in the trackless wastes of the Northland Old Boreas is marshalling his fierce battalions for a descent upon us and that soon his icy breath will sweep every stream and cover field and town with snowy fetters.

Months must pass before the Lord of Day shall return to rescue us from our frosty chains and drive the invader from the land and we must either resign ourselves to our icy bondage or follow the example of the sun and go south—36 hours behind the panting iron horse will carry us from January to June; six months of latitude in a day and a half of time.

On the narrow peninsula, shaped and pointed like prophetic finger to the lowest latitudes covered by Old Glory in this continent lies the Promised Land, a spot selected by the angels on which to erect a spiritual Mecca, a refuge not only from the frosts of winter, but from the coldness of dogmatic theology and barren creeds. The Southern Cassadaga camp grounds, situated on beautiful Lake Couchy and near to the little village of Lake Helen, Florida, is that chosen and favored spot. To this haven each winter increasing throngs wend their way to enjoy together the good things provided for bodily and soul comfort. Here the balsamic odor of the pine fills the air with healing, while the perfume of the rose, the glint of the golden orange and the song of the mocking-bird unite to satisfy every natural sense.

To these attractions of nature are added all the social delights obtainable anywhere. The people whether resident in hotel, lodging-houses or in the many lovely cottages are as one great family, gathering together daily and nightly for lectures, séances, dances, card parties, concerts, theatricals, etc., almost without limit. Those who find sport in depriving other creatures of life, have, in the chain of lakes stretching away to the St. John's river, a vast number of the finny tribe and not a few alligators to practice on. Excursions to Orange City, Blue Springs, Deland, Stetson's Groves, Fonce de Leoni, Fountain of Youth and other points of interest are of almost daily occurrence.

On the way to Lake Helen from the North are many places of interest which the tourist may visit without extra railroad fare. Quaint old St. Augustine, oldest town in the United States, Daytona, the Beautiful, Smyrna with its wonderful beach and striking history, while, if the visitor has the time and means, he is in easy reach of the Florida Keys, Cuba, Porto Rico and the Bahamas.

Living at the camp is as cheap or cheaper than at home, while reduced rates by rail and steamer bring the cost of the journey down to a very moderate figure.

The attendance each year is increasing rapidly and new cottages are constantly being erected. Although the regular program of meetings does not begin until the first Sunday in February, yet many people spend the entire winter in this delightful community and enjoy every hour of the time.

All the indications point to a record-breaking attendance during the present season. Those who wish to go by rail can learn all particulars as to routes, rates, etc., at your nearest railroad office. Those who prefer to go by ocean steamer should address H. A. Budington, 91 Sherman street, Springfield, Mass.

SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHS.

An Experienced Photographer Gives His Views.

To the Editor:—Will you through the medium of The Progressive Thinker, allow me to ask, Have any of your readers copies of genuine spirit photographs? Now and then I come across an advertisement of photographers who say they can take the spirit with the sitters or from old photos.

When in England, I was often in company of Mr. A. Glendenning, the late J. Trall Taylor, J. Hay Taylor, Dr. Hall Edwards and several others, all of us practical photographers and intensely interested in phenomena, and all anxious to get some evidence, but although we had at our disposal some of the foremost mediums, Mrs. J. J. Moore, Miss F. Mrs. Thompson, Mrs. Gray and others, yet we never obtained a single spirit photograph out of hundreds of trials.

Hundreds of faked photos have passed through my hands, and since I have been so-called spirit photos, and have been assured that they are genuine; but, alas! my professional eye detected the double printing at once. And I am afraid that I have spoiled the faith of some (previous to this) believers in Spiritualism.

Now, if there are any genuine, let us have the evidence.

EXPERIENCE.

It is the Most Successful of All Teachers.

Sunday, October 29, 1905, a spirit came into my presence and spoke as follows:

Earth's people are being tutored at present by that most successful of all teachers—Experience. In common with nature's science, human science has its unfoldment and solvent. It is said by some of the world's students, that creation rests upon and is propelled in accordance with the numerical calculus of the cosmos and its laws concerning spirit and substance. These are worthy eyes in progression toward gaining a true knowledge of universe, creation, but, be it borne in mind that in the study of natural and human science, the intelligence back of it all and coursing through it all, is not of it, but is supremely above and beyond it.

Intelligence per se does not originate in numbers, but numbers are used by the intelligence to make manifest its purposes. Intelligence does not originate the human mind or brain, and its system auxiliaries, but they serve as receivers of intelligence and again as transmitters to so increase knowledge by which works are launched and propelled onward for man's and world's improvement.

Therefore, to become the recipient and custodian of large shares of spiritual intelligence, it is necessary to be pure in heart, prayerful and faithful in the performance of all duties that lay claim to our strength and time in their specific domain of public and private usefulness.

There is a marked difference of many degrees between the present day influx of general intelligence from spirits in the outward immortals worlds to the minds and spirits of this mundane sphere. True spiritual intelligence requires special preparation by the recipient to thus come in rapport with the higher vital currents which establish vibratory connections and maintain them so that the influx of such special spiritual intelligence becomes possible.

Such higher truths when received and dispensed become a world blessing and a strength to all minds, because by hearing these higher truths thought is stirred and the minds are agitated so that vibratory attachments can be made by which process the higher raising of the individual, also the masses, is accomplished.

Various special spiritual manifestations are levers for the world's upliftment.

It is a grand privilege, enjoyed by great numbers, viz: to see the forms and hear the voices of ministering spirits, as it is your present and frequently enjoyed privilege; but all the intelligence so imparted belongs to the world and to all the people for their blessings in many ways.

We behold with joy the awakening of the truly scientific consciousness of humanity; the cognizance of the worth and utility of all nature's substance in its degrees of service to mankind is pleasing to us who labor for these results. Gradually men's minds are opened to spiritually behold and discern the co-operative necessity of spirit and matter or spirit and substance; the latter word embraces all crude and refined matter molded by spirit in accord with nature's rules, for world's and man's improvement.

Perceive the point, thought or sense activities for the mere gratifying of hunger and appetites only is not a co-operative process of the spirit and intelligence that distinguishes the man from the beast, but is rated as on the beast level, because it is the instinctive intelligence contained in the matter of their composition, which is very different in quality from the divine intelligence which is the true heritage of all human souls.

To all who pursue life's journey in the light of instinctive intelligence only, immortality is a sealed book. They have no sense development that can receive or comprehend life's true import. They are therefore the truly poor who have need of the world's pity, patience and help to change their mental and general status. In this consists the reconstruction of worlds, governments and general man or of culture for humanity's true improvement.

Commercialism vs. Covetousness. Commercialism in Spiritualist societies and mediums seems to have been under consideration at the late N. S. A. convention; and this condition appears to be a matter assailing the interests of orthodox churches. The commercialism under consideration appears to be what Jesus called covetousness. There is a need for churches—including the Spiritualists—of their ministers and mediums to have proper remuneration for services; but a covetous spirit that seeks to get wealth possessed by others without giving an adequate equivalent, would seem entitled to be called vicious, selfish commercialism. This latter should be condemned in all who may so apply their acts, whether Spiritualists, Christians or Pagans. Such covetousness is the severe condemnation of Jesus; and no doubt equally so of the spirits to-day using mediums for human good. All good works must have an unselfish basis in order to achieve lasting results.—Banner of Light.

NOTHING LOST.

There's nothing lost, why so much care
To save the trifles we prepare?
There's nothing new that can be said,
Nothing alive that can be dead.

Life is life forevermore,
Talk not of death as heretofore;
There is no death, is now well known,
The Reaper reaps what has been sown.

There is no Time, apart from Life,
Whatever theories are life;
Apart from things, there is no space,
For every thing there is a place.

Does Nature ever falsify?
Who ever caught her in a lie?
Her promises she does not break,
Nor does she ever make mistake!

BRIGHT POINTS OF LIGHT.

Further Particulars in Reference to Them.

To the Editor:—It is pleasing to learn that quite a number of persons can and do see those bright points, life germs, or life entities, that are constantly in motion in the atmosphere and described by many on pages of Oct. 14. The more evidence there is brought to bear upon the subject, the more likely will the scientific minds of the thinking world be made to investigate in that direction, and try to prove the correctness or falsity of this living, surging sea of life around about us; for many affirmative replies surely shows that there is no imagination and there must be some truth for the statement.

It is a subject that one dislikes to mention, save to some close friend, for fear of being ridiculed or laughed at by others. When a little sympathy and confidence are exhibited, then people are more willing to tell that which seems to be peculiar to themselves.

If these bright points of light are more talked about and the attention of the people drawn in that direction, more evidence will be had of their existence.

Mrs. Carlyle Petersen is one who describes them fully in The Progressive Thinker of Oct. 28. She says, "They are the spirit life entities or life germs of all things that exist upon this earth; and there can be no life without them."

Since my letter appeared in The Progressive Thinker of Oct. 14 I have received some personal letters telling about these bright points. F. M. Katzung, of Pasadena, Cal., writes: "In Chicago, in the park across the street from The Progressive Thinker office, I noticed that these points of light were less in number, slower in motion, and their trail of light shorter, and not so bright as in Los Angeles or here. The Rosicrucians and other mystic cults of by-gone years knew these points of 'light' or 'life' as the elements of 'fire' to which they gave the name of 'Salamander' and claimed that by the control of them they produced some of their occult feats."

Dr. Agnes Willeaux-Brackett of San Francisco, Cal., writes how she came first to see these bright points: "I was quite young when I first remember seeing them. It was during a heavy snow storm. I was looking through a window at the great big thick falling snowflakes, and admiring their many forms, when I became conscious of seeing those lights. It certainly was a most beautiful sight, and I wondered what it was I saw. Since then I have always seen them at will; in the dark as well as in the light, and of late with my eyes closed, I have been able to tell a few of my friends just how to look to see the bright shining lights, but I find that only a few can see them, however."

I have been told by the spirit side of life that these bright points are magnetic life, and supported by the magnetism of the earth and the magnetism of the sun.

THE OPTIMIST.

The Optimist is he who looks on life—
With eyes of love on all that he can see;
He knows of sorrow, sickness, toil and strife;
He knows how cruel time to some must be;
He knows of knavery and lies and sin;
He knows of cheats who flourish in the grin;
He knows how easy 'tis the game to win—
Who trickily consents the course to run—
And yet he keeps the shining inward light,
That somehow says with hope, "our life is right!"

'Tis right to-day in showing mighty plan—
That works from good to good and then works on;
It from the germ did dream to bring a man—
With noble promise of a better one;
There is to be a new uprising race;
The chosen of the higher type we know,
Embodying each virtue, strength and grace—
That man as man in triumph seeks to show;
And so he keeps the path of joy and light,
And still believes as man that life is right!

Of all the possibilities of bliss—
In what below us with the worlds above,
The present unto us is best in this—
'Tis the training ground of all we love;
We must take steps to gain the good we seek,
We must have time ourselves, in power to find;
We must outgrow the foolish, vain and proud,
And come by youth to man's expanded mind,
And so the heart of love in this doth rest,
This life of ours so far for us is best!

The Optimist works with the ages old,
He is a worker for the time to come;
By such grand hope his fortune has been told,
And earth arranged as our abiding home;
He is a part of this the up and ward race,
The onward movement of the tidal tides,
He hears great nature conquest proudly preach,
And sets it in his life as poet rhymes;
And working with a new inspired might,
He feels the best is best, and life is right!

There are destroyers out on all the seas,
And soldiers fighting on each field of wrong,
The Optimist hears battle on the breeze,
And takes it to his heart as Love's own song;
In quiet ways without a fear or fret,
He follows on the flag that goes before;
On distant mountain heights the signal set,
Gives him his aim and keeps him evermore;
But in his follow he has all daylight,
And in the world, for life to him is right!

Who knows the secret source of all in all,
Yet present is so clear for eyes to ken,
And courage, truth, and love, we noble call.

FROM ANDERSON, IND.

Illustrating the Good Work Going on There.

Possibly a word from this section of the vineyard may be of interest to some of your readers. The Madison Avenue Association of Spiritualists is in a healthy condition, and enters upon its thirteenth year with good prospects. We have always begun our lecture season the first Sunday evening in September, and continue until June, holding services every Sunday evening.

Brother J. N. Smith of this city has been our regular speaker for the past eight years with the exception of a few brief intervals when we have employed foreign talent. Brother Smith, who is an Englishman, and who began his work some years before he came to America, is a trance speaker. His lectures are of a scientific character, and highly instructive to those who are advanced in the philosophy of Spiritualism. In all these years he has served our society without pay. He absolutely declines any compensation whatever. Brother Smith promised his guides years ago that he would give his services to the grand cause of Spiritualism gratuitously. It is purely a labor of love for the cause of truth. He is a mechanic, being employed as an engineer in an iron mill. There have been times when he forfeited a day's wages in order to fill his appointment in our temple. This is certainly a rare instance, where we find a man so truly devoted to a cause that he cheerfully gives it his services without pay.

Robert H. Bragdon is the present president; Sylvester Louisa, secretary, and Mrs. A. Hoover, treasurer.

The Ladies' Aid Society, a valuable auxiliary of the temple society, has been running for the past twelve years, meetings being every week during the entire period with the exception of the summer season. The society is practically out of debt with $100 or more in the bank, earned and placed there by the workers of the Aid. Among the active workers may be named Mrs. Louisa, Mrs. Simpson, Mrs. Hoover and Mrs. Wert, the latter having served the Aid society as president for several years.

Ours is one of the few temples built and dedicated to the cause of Spiritualism. We have had our share of persecutions and petty troubles in the past, but we are going along quite harmoniously. For December Mrs. Crossfield of Muncie, will assist Brother Smith with the services. This lady drew full houses during her engagement in October.

For several years in the past we had a young ladies' auxiliary—the Joan of Arc Club. The president, who served for a year at a time was Joan of the club. The young ladies gave entertainments from time to time and realized considerable sums of money for the benefit of the temple.

Unfortunately a number of Spiritualist families have removed to other localities. Among the latest to go was C. A. Gaines and his family. They live now in San Jose, California. They will be sadly missed in our entertainments the present winter.

We have had a mid-winter mass-meeting every winter for a number of years, and one is being planned for the coming winter. We have, moreover, observed the anniversary of the advent of Modern Spiritualism regularly for the past twelve years. Our motto is to live within our means and keep mortgages off our temple property. An effort is to be made to revive a good many well-meaning Spiritualists, and once more get them into the harness as of old. We have more Spiritualists in the city than ever before but many of them seem to care little for lectures.

J. A. WERTZ.

And look for them to be in men as men,
Then brave and strong a man performs his part,
And has in hope a friend to make him blest;

He keeps his vision to the growing light,
And holds somehow that life in Right is right!

WILLIAM BRUNTON.

Child Labor. "At least two million children under sixteen years of age in the United States are employed for wages, most of whom ought to be in school, but laws lack uniformity in different states, and many of them are only crude beginnings at legislation. Nearly all are poorly enforced."

The above is an authorized statement of the national child-labor committee. The condition is more appalling than most people realize. These little toilers become dwarfed, diseased and imbecile automatons. Their greatest joy is when they early pass to the great beyond. Child-life is unknown to them. Green fields, flowers, trees, birds, sunshine, are parts of the fairy world and unrealized in their world of toil. Such dwarfed soul egos are sent to spirit life untimely, and there abide their only prospect for love, home, education and freedom. Thank God for the angels of mercy and for true Christian spirits in the soul-land. When, oh when, will there be Christian charity under the sun for the earth-dwellers? Answer, O human souls!—Banner of Light.

ONE DAY.

I live back in the sixties
With the shades who went away,
And whom I hope to meet again
One day.

In all the glorious panoply
Which will their forms array,
The blue they wore and fought for
One day.

I will hear again their voices,
I will hear the breezes play,
And the drums will beat rejoicingly
One day.

When I shall join my company—
There's one to lead the way—
Under the Stars we love so,
One day.

I will see "Old Glory" shining!
I will hear the reveille!
And the battle will be over
One day.

Oh, I long so for the meeting!
It isn't far away!
And I'll meet a tender greeting
One day.

PHYSICAL PHENOMENA.

The Work of Spirits Who Belong to the Lower Conditions of Spirit Life.

It is a little amusing to see the different correspondents quarrel over the reliability of various materializing mediums, some claiming that they get genuine manifestations while others declare that they give only fraud. Now both are correct, and there should be no dispute between them. The spirits who produce physical phenomena belong to the lower conditions of spirit life, and most assuredly do those who are able to produce materialization. The higher class of spirits who have become more refined and etherealized cannot handle unrefined material things, such as can be seen by the ordinary human eye—only those who are very near the earth condition can do so, therefore materialization and other physical phenomena, such as handling moving gross material bodies without physical contact can only be performed by those who have just gone over and those who have but very little spirituality and are yet upon the earth plane.

Scientific research has shown that people who were very spiritual-minded have been able to materialize as well as seen by the ordinary human eye just as they were leaving the human body; and while they are hovering between the physical and the spiritual condition, but never afterwards.

As we are compelled to rely upon those spirits of a low moral and gross spiritual nature for all of our physical phenomena, we should expect fraud where fraud is possible, and we should not fool away any time with physical mediums except under fraud-proof conditions; for all spirits who produce this class of phenomena will give you fraud as often as the genuine when it is possible to do so.

When we get to the genuine physical phenomena we must not think that the medium is fraud-proof or when we get fraud we must not think that the medium gives no genuine, for all give both. Materializing mediums are often forced while in an unconscious condition to present themselves to a credulous audience as materialized spirits, by their materializing control, even when the medium might be averse to such a practice, but no medium is proposed to practicing fraud who will in his normal condition carry around tatters for the express purpose of deceiving his audience.

After understanding what class of spirits produce the physical phenomena, and becoming familiar with that universal law of life attracts like, and birds of a feather flock together, we will not be surprised at the amount of fraud practiced by the physical mediums and their controls. Neither will we look upon the fraud thus practiced as so disastrous to Spiritualism, as we will all understand that it all occurs according to natural law, which we all should understand, and that the ill effect of such fraud is the result of our ignorance and the lack of proper caution. All this will be remedied when the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism are separated and the phenomena relegated to a branch of science and the philosophy only held as a religion.

PAST AND FUTURE.

Tell me, daisies, are you dreaming,
There half-hidden in the grass,
Of a life you lived before this?
Do the hours now lonely pass?

You look up to me as pleading
For a recognition there,
In life's long and lonely journey
Have we met before, somewhere?

Does a soul dwell in your beauty
Who to mine is closer kin,
Who in some other life incarnate
Lived in form less free from sin?

You from lips may once have spoken
Lying in another sphere,
And again thy silent brethren
May return to give us cheer.

Far back beyond the cycling seasons
You may have another known,
A fuller joy of life's expression
Than beside a wall of stone!

Let no ruthless hand destroy thee!
May we guard with jealous care
Thy little life, and all around thee,
Nestling 'neath the terrace there.

We shall closely cover o'er thee,
When the wintry winds will blow,
Mercy's mantle to protect thee
From the chilling cold and snow.

Loving hearts may thrill with gladness
When the springtime warmth and rain
Lifts the veil that hides earth's sadness
And the daisies bloom again.

And who can say thy petals plead
Only dumb through all the years,
And that dewdrops do not glisten
A kindred tie to human tears.

THAT'S THE USE.

A soul we have to mar or mould
To God's most perfect plan,
We strive for years not without fears
To make a perfect man.
Though by and by the body dies
The soul it never can.
So that's the use.

To make our souls more like pure gold,
So when we pass away
We find our soul in rapture rolls
And filled with love for pay,
So by and by, if we but try,
We'll reach that brighter day—
So that's the use.

If love we crave, then love will come,
A love so fondly true
For eyes that shine, we strive, we climb,
And sing with Cupid's crew,
Though by and by we up and die,
True love will take us through—
So that's the use.

Then care we naught for social place,
But hope at last to shine,
And spend our time to some account
With those on the same line.
Though by and by we up and die,
We're filled with trust divine—
So that's the use.

MRS. DELANA S. DRAKE.

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to Spirit Life.

One of the pioneer Spiritualists in the state of Maine, mother of Mrs. Mary Drake Jennie and grandmother of the well-known Coy and Jennie Coy of Monson, Maine, has taken leave of earth. Her husband, Elhanan Drake, with whom she lived most happily for forty-six years, passed to the higher life one year and ten months ago. Both of them were ardent Spiritualists, and were never weary to proclaim the truths of their religion to the world. At the time this devoted woman embraced Spiritualism, she stood alone, and bitter persecution followed her acceptance of the then unpopular faith. She lived to convert many to her own sunny philosophy, and to see all social ostracism and persecution disappear.

Mrs. Drake was the mother of nine children, two of whom preceded her by many years in their entrance upon the life of the Soul. Five devoted daughters, two stalwart sons, and eight loving grandchildren survive her. She had been ill for more than a year, and at the last, submitted to a most painful operation, which her doctors said, would take only a matter of saving her life. It did no good, and on Sunday Nov. 5, just as the winter's twilight was softly settling down upon the Monson hills, her spirit took its flight. All of the seven surviving children were by her bedside as she took leave of earth. Her only expression for several days prior to her transition was, "Oh, I am so tired!" and on Sunday Nov. 5, her lips she entered into that realm of peace, where she has found that rest which her physical suffering denied her here.

DARK SEANCES.

An Answer to a Reverend Opposer of Spiritualism.

There seems to be a disposition upon the part of some Spiritualists to condemn dark seances. There is no doubt whatever that seances of every description are far more satisfactory, less liable to be fraudulent and suspect, so to to be, when given in the light, but this fact does not prove that all seances given in the dark are therefore fraudulent. There are no phenomena in Spiritualism better established than those appearing in trumpet seances which are usually held in the dark because more successfully than held then in the light for some reason not yet known.

However true it may be that "men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil," the darkness itself should not in reason be held accountable or share in the general condemnation. Darkness per se, is just as natural and just as important in the economy of nature as light, and every whit as respectable, pure and praiseworthy.

A prominent Presbyterian clergyman in a sermon against Spiritualism spoke as follows:

"When any person invites you to the investigation of any phenomena and begins by turning down the lights on you, you may be right there. It is prima facie evidence of fraud. It is precisely the same as tying a bandage over your eyes."

But this utterance will hardly bear logical analysis. If the phenomena were intended to be investigated by the light, why would the investigator be asked to turn down the lights? It is precisely the same as tying a bandage over your eyes. But if the phenomena are intended to be investigated by the light, why would the investigator be asked to turn down the lights? It is precisely the same as tying a bandage over your eyes.

What, by the way, is the object of a dark seance? Is it for the purpose of seeing phenomena? By no manner of means. Although lights are occasionally seen in these seances, their sole object is for the hearing of whatever may be heard by the ear, and to determine whether or not that intelligence was in the possession of and emanated from the medium or any other embodied person present. Our critics seem to display a peculiar tendency to get the phenomena intended for the ear confounded with those intended for the eye.

Again, our reverend friend remarks: "Spiritualists tell you that spirit voices speak through trumpets or sing songs. They invite you to investigate the truth of this for yourself. And the first thing they do is to shut off all possibility of your ascertaining the truth by turning out the light." Neither will this utterance bear close scrutiny. Is it, I ask in all candor, a fair statement in the first place, of the facts in the case? Is it necessarily true that turning out the light shuts off all possibility of ascertaining the truth? What right has the reverend gentleman to rule out as incompetent, evidence received by the ear, even though it be received in the dark? What difference does it make when the sense of hearing is appealed to for the proof of the reality of the phenomena presented, whether it be in the light or in the dark, except that in the latter the hearing is more acute? The fact that it is necessary for some reason or other, that what we hear from the invisible sources must be heard by the ear, or is better heard in the dark, is no evidence at all, "prima facie" or otherwise, that a dark seance is a fraud. There is not a court in the world that would dare convict upon such evidence as that, unless it would be an orthodox ecclesiastical court similar to the one that tried and convicted Michael Servetus.

Again the reverend gentleman asks: "And now how are you going to investigate it? You cannot see with your eyes." No, nor can we hear with our eyes. Does the reverend gentleman mean to imply that the only investigator about man's anatomy is his eyes? Does he mean to insinuate that no dependence is to be placed upon the sense of hearing? Is it not a fact that the sense of hearing is less liable to be deceived than the sense of vision? Are auditory illusions as common as optical illusions? Does the judge of the court charge the jury to bring in a verdict in accord with the evidence seen or heard? Evidently the latter. So the circle of investigators hear the evidence and almost invariably are enabled to return a verdict before leaving their seats so overwhelming is the evidence imparted to their sense of hearing.

Let him that hath ears to hear, let him hear the voices of his loved departed and converse with them upon matters self-evidently unknown to the medium and his associate sitters, and that settles it. He does not need the sense of vision to confirm or corroborate the glorious truth that he has been in communication with the so-called dead. Some of the most convincing, satisfactory, incontrovertible proofs of a future life I have ever received, came to me while sitting in a dark trumpet seance. As long as I cannot get the same or similar proofs in the light I am willing to accept them in the dark.

TO A LITTLE BOY.

I will not wish that wealth with all its
May be for you some day;
I will not wish that in the large affairs
Of nations you may sway;
I will not wish that you may rise to claim
The decent pride which follows well-won fame.

I wish for you the splendid strength of heart
That he must have whose fate
It is to play a common, toilsome part,
Unmolested by the great,
Yet close it with the brave wish in his breast:
To serve mankind where he may serve the best.

SOME COGENT THOUGHTS

In Relation to Heaven and Happiness.

You don't have to pass over to get into heaven. You realize your greater worth here as long as you can hold on to the first plane. It will be quite nice when all find their own down here in this seed world.

I fancy you are having many a good laugh all to yourself to see how you manage and spin your religious-philosophicscientific college equipment.
I am far enough progressed to see the folly of living to be happy. I think those who live for happiness are all of men the most miserable.
Spiritualism will hold its own. There are plenty of wise men and women on the right side of it.

True Blessedness

An Address Delivered by Mrs. Helen L. P. Russegue, at Minneapolis, Minn., at the Convention of the National Spiritualists' Association.

It has been told us that there is something in life greater than happiness—it is blessedness. It is well to contemplate what blessedness implies, and to, if possible, trace to its source the uplift that it may bring to the world, if we pursue the thought of conduct that leads us into that clearer realm.

There are always laws that enlighten and overshadow action. There are foundations and summits from which and to which we must climb. We believe, yea, we know, that in human life the aspiration that leads us to loftier heights than those to which we already attain are the principles that carry us closer to the great ark of God, and if we stop to contemplate that thought, that the great love that is in humanity is but the pulsing of that great heart of divinity. It is the voice of the infinite that sounds in and through human souls. It is the love of a man or a woman that tells how close he is to the divine spirit. It is the rejoicing of the human soul that brings to us happiness, and the satisfaction of having done well the duties assigned to us is what brings to human consciousness true blessedness.

Dogma and creed are passing away, and the pure warm blood of religious and spiritual life is coursing through human veins, and is causing the heart-throb of humanity to become more real, and there is one life, one truth, one spirit, that pervades the universe that belongs to the lower and to the higher; the one not unfolded as the other, but there it abides.

Dogma has misled the race. It has created disbelievers, or it has inspired a degree of both. It has fettered aspiration, enchainned intelligence, and thrown the confines of bigotry and superstition about human thought. Until its fetters are broken, until the idols are shattered, until human thought and reason are emancipated, the souls of men can not grow in wisdom.

In the retrospect we see what the church life of man has accomplished, and it becomes the prospect for the eternal to-morrow.

In the world the man who has seen and made himself acquainted with the higher truths—who has come into the closest relationship with human needs, is the man who has ascended highest upon the ladder of progress; his heart is the one that beats responsive to human needs; his thought is the revelation that brings him within the rights of human sympathy, and all these are but the attributes and the spiritual unfolding that belong to humanity.

Dogma has stood as an accuser. It has blasphemed God and it has denied to man the glory of his presence, save through the instrumentality of its chosen channels. Once, when plague and pestilence beset the land it was deemed the curse of the almighty, but intelligence and reason have asserted their supremacy and we have discovered that what we have heretofore deemed God's punishment was our ignorance, and we have discovered that when we have established better sanitation and made the conditions of human life purer and sweeter the world is better and God is nearer.

The spiritual nature of man stands fettered by creeds. The knowledge that men believed in God was but the shadow of that truth that he is in every human life, that brings God home, that imprints him upon human intelligence. It may rob him of the personality that caused men to build for him a throne and make for him a heaven, but it has brought him in contact with human consciousness and men stand up and look within. Why? Because the spiritual nature of man has apprehended his presence and has comprehended his love.

All religion is that power which helps, enriches and nourishes life, the power that reigns in us; that good to the human race is the result of a just interpretation of what that good implies. Religion is the power that uplifts thought, exalts thought, that ennobles human nature, and religion is but the output of reason and love. It is the foundation of charity, the tie that holds human races together, the power that wields an influence over mankind and brings to human consciousness the fatherhood of God. But what has that to do with our interpretation of religion? What has that to do with the interpretation that Spiritualism has placed upon religion?

Spiritualism interprets religion as the highest expression of the spirit of man, but you tell me that Spiritualism implies that the door is open between heaven and earth, and that the angels are passing to and fro and communication is established between men in the body and men out of the body material; but is that all that Spiritualism implies? By no means; it is but one of its testimonies, but one of its evidences.

Spiritualism not only encourages, but demands of those who accept it a higher uplifting nature; a higher unfolding truth; a richer, sublimer, more blessed life. Your standards of living become spiritual. Your relation to each other commands you to be spiritual to those who are upon the same earth plane you are on—not only to those who are upon the same level that you are on, but to the lowest in life as well as to the highest and show to all the spirit of the brother or sister that binds you to the angelic world.

Spiritualism is telling its story over all the earth. It is bringing to the world a new revelation. It is evolving the capacities of the human mind. It is unfolding to the world a different creed, the voice of aspiration, and it is expressing to the consciousness of man the sweet reward of comprehending true blessedness.

Spiritualism is God-nature, and according to the interpretation of today, it is omniscient. There is no religious form or belief that can imply all there is of truth any more than there is in the expression of one phase of the series of law that binds you to the infinite.

The unit of life is God. Every particle of matter, every human body, every spirit, every individual, it matters not who or what he or she may be; every blossom or leaf, every grain of sand, every drop of water, every globule of air and every star, are all required to make God in his expression. He has written himself upon everything that is, and his voice is heard throughout the universe.

Spiritualism by no means denies the infinite presence. Spiritualism does not say I do not believe in the bible, I do not believe in religion, I do not believe in death, or I have all there is of knowledge; but it does say I do not believe in THE God, but IN God.

The Spiritualist believes in death as the inspiration that brings him to the door of truth. He believes in the bible, in the great bible that God has written, in writing, for his God is still writing his spirit upon and into everything that is.

Spiritualism, in its modern phase of manifestation teaches us that it matters not how the communications received may vary; it matters not how different the expressions may be that are given from the other life, there is one enlightening basic principle that it gives; one definite truth which it proves, that man continues to live, unfolding the possibilities of his life, enlarging his capacity of knowledge and wisdom of all things when he drops the earth life for the spiritual which overles and underlies his nature; it gives assurance of the fact of greater unfoldment, of larger usefulness, of greater glory in the world to come, and it never tells the story of death. It has inspired man and woman to know that man can not die.

The Christian church has only faith upon which to build its hope of eternal life, in a life to come. It has faith in immortality, but the knowledge of immortality is secured only by the religion of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism has only come as a fulfilling spirit, fulfilling the law, answering the prayer of the past ages, the wonderful revelator that tells us the story of life after death; that life on this world but prepares us for a greater world to come, for a larger life beyond. Spiritualism comes to tell the story that we are still bound by ties that time nor change can alter. It proves to us that there is a continuity of life, and does away with the thought that there is such a thing as completed creation. It takes away from human thought the idea that the world has been made in six or seven days. The world is not yet finished. It is now in a process of moving on, a process of evolution. It has not finished its commission any more than the will of man, nor will he be done until the great idea of scientific energy has acquired all there is to be acquired of this and of the other worlds.

No man is so ignorant in spirit as he who believes he has reached the summit of wisdom, for he has never gone beyond the mountain top. There are greater heights and a more clarified sunlight to reach. You have never reached the highest summit. There is always something beyond your vision of yesterday. The world is growing larger; religion is sweeter; humanity is more loving; life is fairer simply because we are learning more of the spirit of human nature. We are learning how to respond to the great needs of the world.

Time and again we hear of cities that have been razed to the ground by sickness or disease, and we find that the cause of this disease can usually be traced to some error of mankind, and we hasten to supply the needs of the afflicted people and overcome the error. It is not the belief in his God or your God, or a God of any kind, that he resorts to to come to your aid; but he hastens to supply your needs, for it is the expression of the God within; it is the God in your own souls that is bringing you into diviner touch with human souls.

Spiritualism has something more than this. It teaches you of all the conditions of life, however undeveloped they may be; however sinful they may have appeared, it teaches you to seek the causes that have induced these conditions. Sin is undeveloped good. Evil is disease, and Spiritualism commands its believers to seek the causes of these conditions.

You do not hesitate for a moment if a man is mentally disordered to attribute this to disease of the brain. When he is morally disordered, what then? You know that his brain is not in harmony with that which is best, highest and truest in his nature, but is he at fault because the light has not entered into the dark places?

When you consider that inheritance, ignorance and environment, all contribute to the moral, mental and spiritual conditions to which humanity are subject, then it is time that you should enter into a careful investigation of the causes of disorders of any and all kinds.

The scientists have learned in their investigations, that sin is transmittable as well as virtue. We are told of a criminal, one engulfed in the lowest of crimes, from whom was born a child, and from her child and her children's children two hundred and eighty-six were finally accounted as generating from this woman, and all tending to evil.

What is the remedy? Seek to unfold that which is of the highest type. Purify thought, that the highest spirit of mankind may assert itself and the supremacy of the race to loftier standards will be the result.

Suppress evil. When you go into a home of sickness and sin, when you have visited the criminal, the morally insane as well as the physically disordered, remember you are not to condemn; if you are a Spiritualist seek not the evil, but the good, the true, the beautiful, the holy, the God love that is fettered in that soul and help him so that the light may shine forth and glorify that person.

Spiritualism also teaches that there is no attribute of divinity which man has not the right to possess. That there is no wisdom or truth in divinity that should be denied to his reason or to the careful investigation of his intellect. Spiritualism teaches you that the dividing line between God and man is so close that whatever is of truth, it is expressing itself to the understanding of the human mind as the revelation of God which is within the human soul.

But the phenomena is that which puzzles the world. They forget that man in the life to come is as he is in this life. They scoff at chicanery and pagism, and wonder that the ascended spirit should refer to the earlier conditions of life; but the diversity of the manifestations from the other side of life but proves the perpetuity or continuity of life beyond the grave, and that every attribute of human nature, is carried with you into the other life, for we are only laying aside our outer garments when we cross the threshold from the mortal to the immortal. The religion of Spiritualism is the religion of growth. It is a religion that can always remain the same. It is a religion which tells you that ignorance is the cross upon which to crucify sin, and that glory, truth and knowledge is the child that stands in your doorway beckoning you to loftier heights and holier wisdom.

Spiritualism does not teach of human depravity. It does not teach you of injustice; it teaches you of a better condition of human life; it teaches you to respect and honor the rights of man everywhere, and the rights of woman too. It comes to tell you that heaven is here in your souls and that hell is of your making. It comes to tell you that there is no escape, that there is no possibility of wandering away from your own consciousness, and the results of your earth life. You are carrying yourself step by step up the heights. You are responsible to yourself, and to God for what you are and for what you make yourself. You cannot shirk your responsibilities, so be men and women, true to the highest mandates of your spiritual nature. Live upon higher levels. Look to higher and holier realms of action and of conduct. Seek that which is of the best and you will find that the happiness of righteous living embraces a life of blessedness.

THE ANGEL MESSAGE.

So Considered From the Standpoint of Wm. Strong, Hamilton, Canada.

The most perfect instrument rendering absolute obedience to divine law can get the highest inspiration.

Every shortcoming or deviation reduces the power of the medium. There is no absolutely perfect instrument. The command has been given through the Great Master of the ages, "Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father in Heaven is perfect."

Absolute perfection belongs only to the infinite. Spiritualism in all its phases will become more and more a subject for the people. Its chief instrument, the unseen forces, are touching earth's vibrations, and putting on, more or less, earth conditions that the people of earth may be redeemed. These standards again before me a life-size statue, the figure I see is that of the poet and dramatist, Shakespeare, standing in front of the great theaters in London, the index finger ever pointing to the marble scroll on which are the memorable words, "There is no darkness but ignorance."

Knowledge of God, knowledge of the mission of Jesus to earth, knowledge of the brotherly relationship of the whole race, knowledge of the laws of nature, the key to all knowledge, this is the great emancipating power, and this is in harmony with the truth of the ages. All truth must harmonize. Truth can not contradict itself.

Jesus said: "Ye shall know the truth, as the same shall make you free." "What ye know not now, ye shall know hereafter." This is the "hereafter," and the knowledge is coming as quickly as the people can accept it. Again there is whispered the words, "Give them the little things."

When we look at truth and error, side by side, we can see the difference. "So ye shall know the truth," says the Lord, "as the same shall make you free." "What ye know not now, ye shall know hereafter." This is the "hereafter," and the knowledge is coming as quickly as the people can accept it. Again there is whispered the words, "Give them the little things."

All the forces of nature are polarized. The elements of nature are all powerful in their sphere. Oxygen and hydrogen in combination, one to eight, with a spark of electricity, are omnipotent to make water.

The man who understands the elements of nature (so far as discovered they are 72) and their affinities in all the apparently countless adjustments possible, can again astonish the world and become a subject for the people's worship.

And after all, is not each man a God in embryo?

A being with infinite powers of unfoldment is simply limitless in his thought forces, and in his wonder-making achievements.

Now, just a word on dematerialization. Reverse the polarity and the water returns to its original elements.

Why?

On the principle that action and reaction are equal.

"Have dominion" are the words spoken to the primitive man.

Obedience to this command and knowledge of natural law places in man's hand the true power of a king. Disobedience and darkness have kept man weak and consequently a slave to every passion and prejudice—a subject for superstition and worship of false gods.

Knowledge is the hope of the race. If I have transgressed the divine command, and have given you anything that is not little, it is not so intended, for truly I am keeping the great things back from the people, knowing that they are not yet ready for them. The man who has come into line with Divine law has truly touched the fountain of knowledge.

Man's thought was made so free, Professed far to rise.

To lift all mists from off the earth, Sweep cobwebs from the skies.

THE CELESTIAL CITY.

Some Reflections as to Our Progress Towards the Same.

I have been reading the article entitled "The Celestial City," in No. 830 of The Progressive Thinker. From the initials given, I inferred that it is one of the editor's articles, brought to light again and renewed from the long ago.

Such sentiments are spiritual and elevating to all persons who have the right mental attitude to receive them, and practice such noble deeds and actions in their lives.

I have been acquainted with some of those "Aunties," like Aunt Martha, who were attentive to the sick and afflicted in the midst.

She was truly a noble woman and hero, and there are thousands of such grand people in every generation.

They sacrifice their lives for the good of others.

My mother was like those dear creatures in many respects, as she spent days and nights ministering to the needs of suffering mortals.

I realized when I was a boy that mother was earning a ticket that would take her through every station on the spiritual railway to the Celestial City, and I have desired to so live and act as to reach the same destination.

My thoughts go out in love to all persons who are doing good for suffering humanity everywhere. Words of cheer, with a helping hand to all discouraged souls who may be suffering in mind and body, will have a reward to all persons so acting and doing.

On account of bodily affliction for many years, I have considered myself one of the humble creatures of creation.

I draw a pension from our great government for gunshot wound and resulting disease. Our nation is good and kind to the veterans who have helped to save and preserve the Union of States in times of its greatest perils.

The soldiers of all our wars for freedom and independence have been treated with honor and grateful remembrance by the American people.

Soldiers' homes have been built, and furnished with every convenience and comfort necessary, for the old, decrepit and afflicted heroes of our wars, and when they die, there are beautiful cemeteries in which their bodies are buried.

What a blessed privilege it has been to live in glory and generation.

It has been a time of stirring events, and much progress has been made in science and government.

Everywhere, the people are becoming awakened, and aroused to seek higher living and action, and I hope the time is not far distant when honesty and morality will prevail in all governmental affairs; also among mankind generally.

This world would be more like paradise, if the people were more kind and loving in their dispositions toward each other.

All true Spiritualists would rejoice if the ranks of Spiritualism could be purified, so that fakes, frauds and impostors could not live or flourish in its sacred cause.

What we need is pure and undefiled mediums, with earnest and sincere people, seeking to know the whole truth about our immortal principles.

All persons who love Spiritualism, should expose and battle against spiritual phenomena in public, without they are sure it is genuine.

In times of distress, sickness and death, spirit come to all true believers in the principle of immortality, as ministering angels to soothe their feelings of anguish and sorrow while struggling for existence. They cheer all aspiring souls with the hope of reaching the blessed state of peace, love and righteousness now and hereafter in the eternal future.

The genuine spiritual philosophy calms the mind, and creates cheering thoughts, under all emergencies of life and trying circumstances.

All should unite with the pure and good in our sacred cause, and depart from these mediums or persons who are making money by dishonest methods. Give the people the true philosophy without the fraud phenomena, and the glorious cause will prosper under the banner of truth.

The fall and winter campaign has commenced in earnest, and it is interesting to read the progressive ideas of so many talented correspondents.

The twelve-page issue of The Progressive Thinker, October 21, will be remembered as a wonderful document, as it contained thrilling thoughts and startling facts. There is so much excellent reading in The Progressive Thinker that it takes considerable time to read it thoroughly and digest all of the important principles discussed and analyzed. I wish that thousands and millions of readers could be added to its subscription list every year.

It is a difficult task to get the common people to read and study spiritual things of a high order. In many communities the citizens are generally or what is called worldly-minded people.

Most individuals of our day read stories and fiction, and give but little attention to history and stubborn facts.

We are glad that we have aroused interest sufficient in the Chesterfield camp to bring forth a statement for its officers. In order that our readers may thoroughly understand what led to this controversy, we republish the articles by Messrs. L. O. Hull and W. Now, in conclusion, permit me to state that our camp-meetings are regarded by some of the wisest and best men and women in our ranks, and if the public cannot go there and find genuine mediumship—and nothing else—God's name where can we go for it? I hope to see the camp-meeting "Mecca" of Spiritualism, where we make yearly pilgrimages to commune with our loved ones, knowing in our hearts, that there at least we shall find genuine mediumship pure and unfilied.

Saul and the Witch of Endor.

A third article in the series relating to spirit intercourse as anciently related, was contemplated, founded on the Bible account in I. Samuel 28, but as the facts are accessible to everyone, and are frequently recounted by our platform speakers, we have thought best to pass it, premising that susceptible persons in all ages seem to have been able to communicate in some manner with the immortals. There is scarcely a family that has not a list of "ghost stories" connected in some manner with such family. Churchmen very frequently credited the appearance of such visitors to the Devil, and the ancients called them demons, or, if serviceable to life or limb they were credited to God.

The Witch of Endor is a plausible story in the light of present knowledge. The spirit of persecution was rampant then as now, and the same command: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," seems to have been in force. That the story was of comparatively remote origin there can be no question. Some very learned scholars who have had opportunities of investigation but few possess, are of the opinion there is not a chapter in the Bible which was written prior to the 8th century of our era, and they marshal a large array of facts to support of their claim; but whether Samuel was written twelve hundred years before the beginning of our era, or a thousand years after, the fact as there related of spirit intercourse with mortals, and the return of Samuel from a long silent grave to give desired information to King Saul, agreeing so closely with well authenticated cases in modern experience, makes it more than probable the story had a foundation, in some particulars, at least, in a real occurrence.

Necromancy, from the Greek nekros, dead, and manteia, divination, was the art of revealing future events by means of pretended communication with the dead. Its practice seems coeval with history. In modern times it has been treated as an imposture; but was it really a fraud? We incline to the opinion that there were sensitive persons in all the past as now, who were susceptible influences from without, that possibly, there were fraudulent pretenders, but the system may have had a truthful foundation.

Modern science, with modern education and research, joined with modern spirit revelations, have illuminated all history, and given us new ideas of antiquated thought and action; while they, in turn, contribute their share in interpreting and making intelligible many otherwise obscure recent events.

Scholarship Not Wanted.

Prof. Hinckley G. Mitchell has long filled the Old Testament chair in the Boston University School of Theology, under the supervision of the Methodist Episcopal church. An advanced scholar, he made himself familiar with the subject he was teaching. The learned Doctor published a very instructive book entitled "The World Before Abraham." Of course he found evidences of man's occupation of the earth thousands of years before creation; that populous cities and an advanced civilization antedated that fabulous narration. He only related that which the spade and shovel have revealed to us, and which sophistry cannot deny. He did not hesitate to tell the truth as he learned it.

The Washington General Conference in session, referred the application of Prof. Mitchell for reappointment for another term of five years, to the Board of Bishops. They were unanimous in rejecting the Doctor, because of his repudiating the early narratives in Genesis, declaring his position "unwarmed and objectionable," and having a tendency to invalidate the authority of other portions of sacred scripture." President Huntington, ex-President Warren, and Dean Perrin urged the retention of Dr. Mitchell. They affirmed he was loyal to the deity of Jesus and to evangelical doctrines generally; they referred to his high standing as a teacher, and claimed the trustees, faculty and students by an overwhelming majority sustained him. But he was dismissed, and others were charged with his duties.

The doctrine of the fall of man and total depravity, with the need of a Savior to restore the race to its primal condition, is based on that portion of the Testament literature which Dr. Mitchell repudiates. With "One link between the great chain of destroyed," so they determined to save that broken link to retain the whole.

How it is possible for Dr. Mitchell, or any other person of common sense to deny Jesus is more than we can comprehend. The whole story of his parentage by any other personage than Joseph, is based on a dream. His divine parentage was not recognized by his mother, and is a physiological impossibility. His position can only be accounted for on the proposition, that the Doctor, like thousands of other learned men, has given no thought to the subject. His childhood teaching has probably never been called in question.

What Will Be the Result?

An interchurch conference on federation, representing twenty-four religious bodies and numbering among its members 600 delegates, began its sessions Nov. 15, in Carnegie Hall, New York City. The chairman, J. Cleveland Cady, in his opening address said: "Today we stand on the threshold of what is greatly hoped will be the beginning of an era of brotherly co-operation and of a united effort for righteousness in which the church of God will put forth its mighty strength."

The past history of "the church of God" is not entirely of a character to inspire great confidence that its "mighty strength" will be used solely for "righteousness," in the ethical meaning of the word.

Persecutions because of variant dogmatic beliefs; bloodshed and slaughter; dungeon and stake; prison and confiscation, these have marked the highway of past church history.

Today a remnant of the olden pious savagery is manifest in the outcome of Sunday laws and other machinery for the persecution of both Christian and non-Christian people, who do not come up to the standard of "righteousness" that accords with churchly ideas of the orthodox stamp. Witness the petty and disgraceful persecuting prosecutions of Seventh-Day Christians, who in obedience to their conscientious convictions of bible teachings, keep Saturday as their holy day of rest and worship, and regard Sunday as a day for secular work.

For this obedience to their conscientious religious convictions, they have been haled into court, arraigned as malefactors and criminals, branded as breakers of the laws of the land and of "righteousness," and subjected to fines and imprisonment, under the investigation and "mighty strength" of "the church of God."

This is one sample of present-day persecution—for righteousness' sake as viewed from the standpoint of orthodox bigotry.

When the now disintegrated integers that comprise "the church of God" shall have become consolidated into one machine, there is reason to fear that its vaunted "mighty strength" will not always be used with due regard for human freedom of thought, belief and action; that it will gradually "put on the screws" to coerce people into the observance of the lines of life and conduct that coincide with the views of the priestly expounders who do the religious thinking for their flocks.

However, the growing spirit of liberality that characterizes the age is against them, and sooner or later they will fall in any such undertaking. The "mighty strength" of the church cannot overcome the great principle of human freedom, and persecution finally dies of its own meanness.

There is a strong probability that one especial item of the "effort for righteousness" which "the church of God" will put forth its "mighty strength" to accomplish, will be the "God-in-the-Constitution" principle, on which the seat of certain religious leaders is based. That this would in principle contravene the established principle of our government to keep church and state separate, does not weigh so much as a hair, in the estimation of those who seek to accomplish their purpose to foist "God" and the "Lord Jesus Christ" into the Constitution. Church federation on liberal and humanitarian lines will be welcomed and a blessing to the world; but for proscription and persecuting purposes, it can only be a curse.

Cause for Tears.

Two weeks ago we published from Hammond's Atlas of the World, the populations of the earth, as classified by geographers. There has just come under our observation a classification made by the London Missionary Society which increases the number of "heathen" from 140,000,000 to 856,000,000, more than half the population of the globe. To make this large number all Buddhists, 460 millions of them, are rated as heathen; as are all Brahmins, 220 millions; all Mohammedans, 170 millions.

What a frightful showing! Nearly 2,000 years of continuous effort, with the wealth and the power of the civilized world, aided by the dungeon, the gibbet, the stake, and the torture chamber, to which may be added a hell of sulphurous flame, sustained by an angry God and his immaculate Son. But gloomier still, there are only 380 millions all told of Christians, as given by the Missionary Society, divided into 190 millions Roman Catholics; 84 millions Greek Catholics; and 116 millions Protestants.

More than one half of the reputed Christians in all countries are unbelievers, which include Spiritualists, Agnostics, Infidels, Jews and the Indifferent. This reduces the number of Christians, one-half of whom are infants, to 190 millions.

Great God! Is this the reward for all the toll, the sacrifices, the cruelty, the sectarian abuse, and sacrifice of liberty and life for 2,000 years? Let us weep. Prayers so long and unsuccessfully employed avail nothing.

Fraudulent Bible Armor.

A Philadelphia book dealer keeps a stock of pocket Bibles with bullet holes and knife cuts in them. These are fine things to show when telling stories of close calls. The book dealer makes the holes himself.—Bx.

All have listened to accounts of hairbreadth escapes of soldiers whose pocket Bibles, given by fond mothers on going out from the paternal roof, received the ball or bayonet thrust designed for the possessor of the book. These cases were so frequent in wartime many a soldier placed this fetish over his heart to receive or ward off the deadly missile. Possibly some lives were saved by the device, but would not any blank book of equal size and thickness be as good a protection as the Bible?

As our industry will do more to produce cheerfulness; suppress evil humors, and retrieve our affairs, than a month's mourning.—Aeon.

What Means the Present Great Search for a Satisfactory Religion?

A Vivid Portrayal of Present Conditions, Illustrating the Search for a Suitable Religion to Fit One's Aspirations—A Practical Illustration of the Idiosyncrasies of the Human Mind—Spirit Return the Only Demand of the Rational Mind.

"One of the most amazing things in New York to me," said a woman who came here from the state, "is the hunt for a religion which is going on all the time among a certain section of the population."

"I came to New York two or three years ago with such a variety of hayseed clinging to me as grows in an inland city of some 175,000 inhabitants. We had a great many people there who had quietly shed all church connections and no longer accepted the miraculous in revealed religion. They seemed to get along quite comfortably without any religion at all, and to feel no necessity of searching the remote corners of the world to find some new faith which should satisfy their souls."

"The first of the religion seekers whom I encountered in New York was a woman who was preaching a new and refined variety of Mohammedanism. I went to see her on business, and she began immediately to try to convert me."

"The new religion, according to her, was fitted and destined to unite the Christian and Mohammedan worlds. Christians would accept it because it was not Mohammedanism. Mohammedans would accept it because it was not Christianity. It had been promulgated, I gathered, by a Mohammedan reformer and prophet whom she called 'The Master.' The Master was at that time languishing in jail somewhere in the Sultan's dominions."

"I gazed at the woman. She seemed to be sane. There was nothing to distinguish her from any educated woman in the upper walks of life. Her home furnished evidence of wealth and refinement."

"And yet she was stark, staring, plumb crazy on that subject, and her husband too, and they were spending a great part of their time and substance in endeavors to proselyte. It was a new phenomenon to me, and I couldn't make it out."

"Next I encountered a woman I used to know in our home town. When I first knew her she was teaching a Bible class in an evangelical Sunday school. She went over to the Unitarians, but that didn't satisfy her, and when the Christian Scientists arose she joined them."

"Soon she went back on Mrs. Eddy, and I heard of her in connection with a schism, a group of scientists who retained the principles, but repudiated the founder. After a while she got out with them, too, and as our little town afforded no further variety she was left stranded without a church."

"But here I found her living in a club-house, high priestess and manager of a club, composed of so many different kinds of religionists that it made me dizzy. I went there to a lecture one night. It was all about colors."

"A woman stood up and displayed color maps or diagrams of different people's souls. She had a map of President Roosevelt's soul and of Miss Alice Roosevelt's. There was a great deal of red in the President's, I remember. That was the strenuousity."

"She could tell you how to diagram your own soul and other people's at $5 a lesson. She had her business cards there for distribution. She prophesied, too, and taught how to prophesy."

"This was just after the President was elected, and she prophesied that night that he was going to be shot and have a long and painful recovery from his wound before he was inaugurated. And there were two parlors full of apparently cultivated and intelligent persons, men and women, who listened to this stuff with the greatest attention."

"I met my friend the other day and asked her how it was that the shooting never came off. She said they had held the President and saved him from harm."

"How did you hold him?" said I.

"We held him in our minds for safety, health and peace," said she. "We met daily till the period of danger was past and held him and warded off the danger. Don't you know that the mind is the greatest power in the universe?"

"I met one woman in New York whom I admired extremely. She was an artist of power and talent and had worked her own way up amid great difficulties."

"She was a little, fragile, delicate, poetic creature, who looked like a pre-Raphaelite picture. The wind might have blown her away. It was a pleasure to me to visit her lovely studio and listen to her talk of art and the celebrated people whom she had met here and abroad."

"One day our talk went into the philosophy of life held by each of us. Now, my own philosophy of the progress of the race is a very simple and practical one. It is summed up in one word—environment. I believe that the only way to modify heredity and improve mankind is by environment. I haven't any religion, but I am interested in every movement in the world that makes for better environment, and I help them along when I can."

"To my astonishment I found that this little, gentle, delicate, cultivated, artistic creature cared nothing about any of these things. She took no interest in tenement house laws or school reforms. She remained unimpressed by statistics showing the infant death rate of the slums."

"These people, she said, had all of life and its enjoyments, that they were capable of appreciating. If they were capable of properly using more they would have more."

"Every soul, she thought, had passed through many earthly existences, and each time it was born it deliberately chose the body and environment it was to go into, because it needed the experiences to be gained in just that stage of existence. So, of course, it was getting just what it needed and wanted, and there was no reason for interfering with it."

"This naturally knocked in the head the whole modern scheme of social betterment. Never mind the environment. Just take care that your own precious soul is getting all it can out of life, so that it can be born higher up next time. In fact, it referred the whole matter back to the souls in the astral, considering the matter of their next reincarnation."

"The higher souls, she thought, acquired in time the power consciously to leave the body and travel the astral. She thought her own soul took little journeys of this kind at times, but she was not sufficiently advanced to remember where she had been after she woke up."

"She lived in hopes of acquiring this power. Her life was completely bound up in this hope. Toward all practical plans for amelioration of economic conditions she was hardhearted as a stone."

"I confess I left her presence with a revulsion toward the old fashioned religions. They at least inculcate humanity. I never want to see her again."

"I have found this invariably the state of mind of devotees of Oriental religions. I knew a woman once who had inherited a fortune. She did a lot of good with her money."

"She helped a training school for orphan boys. She furnished a lodging house for working girls. She paid a district nurse to work in the slums."

"Her house and her time were at the service of every useful movement. Then a wandering Orientalist, who wore a turban and a toga, got hold of her."

"She was converted, and gave over her whole time and money to propaganda, with the wandering Swami as propagandist. The last I heard of her she had gone to Europe and was devoting her fortune to establishing a branch of her new religion in a country there. She has completely severed her life from all her old friends and associations."

"I know two sisters in New York who have established a business of their own, bright, up to date, successful women. Yet they are quite insane over the teachings of another dusky Swami."

"They are paying him money regularly for enlightenment on the ways and habitat of the soul, and they seem to hate and despise any sort of work for the poor. They even resent the presence of the immigrant and negro children in the public schools."

"I wonder if the women who flock to the classes of these Oriental teachers know how the latter talk about American women behind their backs? But the thing that puzzles me is this: Is it necessary for a religion to get along so comfortably without any at all. The survival of primitive superstitions is a curious thing."

The above from the New York Sun is certainly a vivid portrayal of present conditions. Spirit Return has within it the necessary qualities to satisfy the human mind. One can make a religion or a philosophy out of it. It alone will finally redeem the world from the deleterious effects of religions' hash.

CREMATION OF A NOTED ACTOR.

His Brilliant Career Outlined—He Was an Excellent Medium and Converted With Those in the Higher Spheres—He Was an Intimate Friend of President Lincoln.

The readers of The Progressive Thinker must remember well the very interesting articles that have frequently appeared in its columns from the pen of E. W. Hulburd, Descanso, Cal., a man giving us spirit communications from glowing and other distinguished personages, through that very superior medium, Justin Hulburd, who, said to say, has just put off the sandals of mortality to walk over the evergreen shores of a deathless existence.

Arriving in California about ten days since, and arranging to soon go up into the mountains to spend some time at Descanso in the calm sunny residence of the Hulburds, I was shocked last evening to hear of the sudden death of this Justin Hulburd, whose stage name was Justin Robinson. This morning I accompanied his remains from the undertaker's establishment to the railway station, where his body was to be borne to Los Angeles for cremation.

The San Diego Evening Tribune says, in speaking of this event: "The theatrical world has lost one of its best known celebrities, and San Diego county one of its best known characters. Members of the profession, and to the theatrical world, Mr. Hulburd was known under the name of Justin Robinson, a name which he had assumed for stage purposes. Though a number of years have passed since he has appeared behind the footlights, his name is still remembered by the older members of the theatrical profession; in fact up to the time of his retirement in 1879, he was considered one of the foremost actors on the American stage."

Mr. Hulburd came from Scotland when but five years of age, and he adopted the stage as his profession when but ten years of age, commencing his profession with dancing and eluding, but later he took up the phase of impersonating characters. From this he grew and graduated into some of the greatest companies in America. For years he was the leading support of such distinguished actors as Edwin Forrest, the two Booths, Barrett, and Joseph Jefferson. Jefferson and himself were the very warmest friends, for they were both outspoken Spiritualists. Later he was started at the head of a theatrical company of his own, and though unassuming, was one of the most successful of American actors.

Retiring from the stage, measurably because of his health, he came to California, and for the past twenty years has been a resident of Descanso, with his cousin, E. W. Hulburd. Justin was acquainted with the most eminent actors of this country and Europe.

During the Civil War, Mr. Hulburd gave up the stage to become a private spy for President Lincoln. Many were the cabinet reports that came to Lincoln's ears from Justin. Stanton, the secretary of War, was exceedingly fond of him. His remarkable powers as an actor stood him in good stead when a spy, and helped him out of many tight places. President Lincoln esteemed his services very highly. He was during all the early years of his life, up to forty, dwarfed in stature, being only four feet and two inches high. But after forty, his growth renewed, and before his death his height had increased fourteen inches. This while astonishing his friends, was rationally accounted for by his mediumship. There are many cases on record of the elongation of the human form. If given the conditions, I know of no limit to spirit power.

In connection with the above, it is well known to intelligent Spiritualists that the wonderful acts wrought by spirits—that the human organization has been elongated; that keys, manuscripts, divining rods, head-dresses of Egyptians, ancient Roman manuscripts, Babylonian cylinders have been brought through the air long distances by spirit power, and that human forms, as in the case of D. D. Home, E. C. Dunn, and others, have been made to float in the atmosphere. A case of this kind is recorded in the "Acts of the Apostles," where, while Philip, the evangelist, was on his way to Gaza, one of the frontier towns of Palestine, about fifty miles southwest of Jerusalem, "the Spirit of the Lord caught him up," and transported him to Azotus, otherwise Ashdod, which lies on the sea-coast, at least five and twenty miles distant from Gaza. No sectarian truthfulness of this narrative. And yet, when scientists and eminent scholars testify to similar occurrence, transpiring today, churchmen doubt or deny them.

Indeed, an alleged fact has to be two or three thousand years old, and biblically recorded before it is got through the thick skin of the sectarian bias.

After the Civil War, Justin Hulburd returned to the stage and essayed more important positions than before. He was what has been termed an easy, natural actor, greatly admired for his career and for moral integrity. He has been for many years an impressionable, insipid, and uninspired medium. He had at the time of his transition communications and spiritual essays from distinguished actors, and others now in spirit life, which he intended to soon publish in book form. It is to be hoped that his earnest and royal-souled cousin E. W. Hulburd, will soon put this pure volume in print, for the edification and advancement of spiritual truth.

I am requested to deliver a funeral address appropriate to his great life work. This address will, as desired by his cousin and friends, be delivered in the Spiritualist Temple, San Diego, Cal.

A Poor Excuse Better Than None.

The editor of the Christian Advocate, a Methodist organ, gives as a reason for introducing Christianity into China: "Because we believe our religion to be immeasurably purer, loftier, better adapted to man's needs than theirs, and that our institutions—so far as they are effected by religion—are far superior to theirs; therefore we wish to teach them, being assured when they shall have accepted Christianity they will thank us for our sacrifices in their behalf."

The robber undoubtedly thinks he can make a better use of his neighbor's money than he, hence the reason he demands it. Every criminal, of every character, justifies himself for the crime he is about to commit.

It would seem the better way to set the unbeliever a good example, and let him be his own judge whether our religion is better than his, and leave him to exercise his own choice in their selection. We all think a republican system of government greatly superior to a monarchy; but should we send missionaries into any country on a proselyting expedition, but now infidels, they would meet with experiences similar to the Christian missionaries in China. We well remember the treatment, temperate lecturers and anti-slavery agitators met with in our own

Strategy, My Boy.

A very successful device has been projected to secure the attention of parishioners during pulpit exercises. It consists in placing a clock in the rear, and just above the head of the dominie. By this ingenious arrangement every eye is turned towards the speaker throughout the discourse, however long protracted.

Suggestive.

Say the daily papers: "Ninety per cent of farmers have farmers for fathers; forty-two per cent of bankers, forty-one per cent of lawyers, and thirty per cent of physicians continue the work their fathers began; but only eight per cent of the ministers spring from clerical stock." There must be a reason for not perpetuating the clerics.

AN IMPORTANT SUBJECT.

The Cultivation of True Mediumship.

Since the publication of our last article on the above subject we have received many letters from different parts of the States asking for further information. These letters we have personally replied to and have had grateful acknowledgements of help received.

By request of a lady reader of The Progressive Thinker and with the editor's permission, we will further elucidate the subject of mediumship.

True mediums, like poets, are born, not made, and much time and needless expense would be saved if the discovery was made at the beginning what likelihood anyone had of developing.

We are sorry to state that many mediums keep people on a string, just like the medical fraternity, and pull that string whenever they want a few dollars. We have recently heard of two ladies sitting in a circle formed by a medium for over eighteen months and having received absolutely no results in return. Wasted time and money, and disappointment received by two trusting souls.

Truly one requires to be wise when investigating the subject of mediumship.

We will tell you one particular reason why a developing circle formed by a commercial medium is bad, and it is this: These circles are usually formed to make money out of the sitters, and they are galled into the belief that by sitting in such a circle they will receive development. Again, no attention is paid to the necessity of not altering the condition of the circle, but now infidels are continually admitted, providing they paid the necessary fee.

A circle to be properly formed must have only congenial sitters, and no new elements should be admitted until the spirit guides give permission. Money should not enter in consideration at all. All mediums are not developing mediums; therefore those who set themselves out for this particular class of work and have associated with them the right spirit assistants, are capable of helping people to unfold. If mediums are specialists on other lines of work, then they have not the force or the spirit assistance for developing.

The ignorance displayed by spirits and psychics about developing work is to be deplored. There are spirit chieftains on the other side of life who are particularly instructed and adapted to the work of development, but being specialists they stick to their class of work. Do we expect also that these spirit chieftains are at the beck and call of every person who desires to develop mediumship because they have paid so much to the medium? If spirits are from the condition of a person's organic structure that they are unqualified for mediumship, they are not likely to waste their precious time over trying to develop them.

Special psychically endowed people have been chosen from among humanity during this present era, to demonstrate to the world the power of spirit. Such have the aid and co-operation of spirit chieftains to help in their unfoldment whether they sit in a circle or not. When we have such whole-souled thinkers as Prof. Henry Frank, Ellis Wheeler Wilcox and Prof. Henry O. Walters, "Salvatore," writing men, the large percentage of unreluctant mediums, we see the need for instruction.

Over and over again we meet people who desire to develop mediumship to make a business of it. They are attracted by the possibility of utilizing the gifts of the spirit for commercial purposes. Be warned, ye who would desecrate and drag

EXPLAINS HIS VIEWS.

The Problem of Obsession—A Rejoinder

To the Editor:—I am sure you will permit me through your hospitable columns to set myself straight, if possible, with our venerable friend, Dr. J. M. Peebles, who first met me in London in my childhood during 1877 (28 years ago), the year in which I first appeared before a public audience. Dr. Peebles kindly described me as "mediculous and arrogant," and I think I may fairly say I have remained so ever since, and am the same to-day.

Now as to the quotation from a lecture of mine delivered inspirationally in Washington, D. C., October 1, and reported in The Progressive Thinker, November 4. Dr. Peebles has inaccurately made one serious false inference when he imagines that the phrase, "victims of their own stupidity," referred to himself or to any of the distinguished literary men and women whom he enumerates, and from whom he says I have had opportunities to learn important lessons regarding "dika phenomena."

These erudite men and women, many of whose contributions to literature are valuable and standard, may entertain certain views which I cannot fully share, but it would be the height of arrogance and impudence on my part to class them with the poor sensitives to whom reference is made in the lecture under consideration.

When Dr. Peebles sent me a copy of his work on "Spirit Obsession," I wrote a review of it which appeared in several papers, and for that review I received from him an extremely kind and cordial letter thanking me for the fair treatment I had accorded his book in contrast with vituperative criticisms which other reviewers had heaped upon it.

Let me state my views briefly and succinctly as I can on this moot question which is discussed pro and con wherever I encounter Spiritualists or investigators of psychic phenomena in these highly controversial days. I am thoroughly convinced that we are continually surrounded by hosts of entities ordinarily unseen by mortal eyes, and that these entities include individual spiritual beings of practically the same varieties of disposition and attainment as we find incarnate in the world to-day. But as two very well-known Spiritualist workers, J. J. More of England, and W. H. Terry of Australia, continue to insist, there must be some "point of contact" between observer and observed, or there could be no obsession. It is surely not a denial of any palpable facts to declare that means can be taken to prevent their occurrence or recurrence, and it is precisely on the question of what causes and how they may be prevented and vanquished, that a real controversy wages. I am only one out of a large and ever-enlarging number of inquiring people who advocate cultivation of self-reliance, and find a good use for mental therapeutic practices.

In Dr. Peebles' own book on "Obsession" we find a number of excellent counsels which, if fully heeded, would prevent such distressing and alarming conditions as the fervid author most graphically describes. I am not taking the attitude of Dr. Herbert Parkyn, who said in his periodical, "Suggestion," a few months ago when alluding to Dr. Peebles' book and theory, that Dr. Peebles' "unpleasant and even painful" paid due attention to moral and physical hygiene we should none of us believe in the existence of disorderly spirits, but I do maintain, and so does Dr. Peebles, that unwholesome states of mind, body, and surroundings are most favorable to what Swedenborg calls "an influence from the hells," while the exact reverse can induce from the heavens, and is invited and promoted by living outwardly as well as inwardly in states of harmony with nature.

Judging from the many kindly references to me and to my work in "The Pilgrim's Scintillations," in your issue dated Nov. 25, I feel convinced that our venerable brother will accept my explanation as to the cause of the paragraph he correctly quoted, but incorrectly judged so far as their intended application was concerned. The "poor victims of their own stupidity who complain of the mismanagement of the universe" is a phrase intended to apply only to chronic pessimists who, in place of seeking to improve conditions, are perpetually brooding over them and finding fault with the order of things which it is beyond their power to change.

I am sure that we can all agree that there is some need for exercising reasonable caution and discretion in the "development of mediumship, and that it is never desirable to be a weak tool in the hands of any medium who might surround us. The intelligences who have inspired me and guided my work since my infancy, positively declare that the greatest of all dangers is the cultivation of a submissive and slavish disposition on the part of sensitives, who are not wilfully immoral but often lacking in all that commonly may be called "backbone." Such was the ground taken by Emma Hardinge Britten and by scores of other earnest and faithful Spiritualists whose eloquent, inspired and inspiring words I heard and read in the good old days to which Dr. Peebles has made reference, though beyond thirty years' my experience with public work does not extend.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond was the first Spiritual speaker whom I ever heard, and through her instrumentality the doctrine of obsession has never been advocated.

When Miss S. C. Clarke and I had a newspaper till re obsession a few years ago she used to print the somewhat "dishonest," vituperative, and loving "obsessions," and maintained her position well by claiming that friends who have passed over as well as those yet on earth, may exercise undue solicitude and seek to over-influence the lives of those in whose well-being they take a sincere, though often a mistaken regard. In all cases I am unflinchingly certain of my ground when I daringly reaffirm my old position that further development of individual reason and conscience is our only truly efficient safeguard.

Spirit Rapport In the Light of Science

A Discourse Delivered by Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, before the Society of Psychic Forces, Chicago, Ill.

The subject that I offer for your thought is one that lies at the very foundation of all religious ideas; and yet who has not at times felt its presence and power?

We may not ignore the fact that men and women are, at times, more than their normal or natural powers would indicate. They sense a power that moves them to action or speech, beyond themselves. A new life or vigor takes possession and makes the deed or the speech notable. Is it some reserve force within ourselves, that the occasion brought forth—some new bursting leaf of the Tree of Life, throwing out its living green? If it were so, if it were simply an evolutionary action of our own nature, as some would think, then why does it not remain with us ever after as the usual life?

The tree, under the influence of a passing shower puts forth leaves; it is the natural evolution of its season; but from that time the tree shows its leaves, they do not return to the germ state, leaving the tree a barren trunk!

Why then does the passing of the moment's power in man, return the man to the old common-place thought? "This true, we are often conscious of power within ourselves that we do not use, of thoughts matured, that we do not express; but when we do use them they do not startle us, though they may be a surprise to our friends; we know what we could do and for that reason we were not surprised; but when the golden moment comes, we are as much lifted as were our neighbors in its display of power. Now I ask, does not this fact prove the power not our own? So it seems to me, and so it has seemed to men of all Ages, of all Philosophies, of all Religions, and these have said it is extraneous power. These have felt that not of themselves, though for the moment in themselves, was "the fire-divine," and so, as I have said, it became to man the institutes of faith and moved man to a religion.

But how can these things be? What is it that can make Lowell say that he "liked to read his own poems, because he knew they were not his," sinks to the subordinate place, as we propound the question: How can it be?

Science, busy with physical structure, tells us of brain-cells; of the long line and network of nerves; tells us that the intellect is built by reason by reason of sensation;—i. e.—because these nerves feel things; for even sight is a feeling, and all its motions—i. e.—thinkings, produce material changes in the brain; but this does not tell us of the living power unseen that puts its hand of thought upon our brow; comes in rapport with us, and so inspires! Hence we find everywhere the expression of belief in the divine, or "Over-Soul" as Emerson names it, a belief that deepens into a faith, at last, and by our prophet-priests are wrought out the creeds of religion.

It is the Unseen Life that men worship; it is the Unseen to whom they ascribe "the golden moments" of our lives; but it does not tell us aught substantial in regard to the Unseen selfhood, or of the how of its work, only as we accept the constant word of Spiritualism, and name it the Spirit-World!

Perhaps never in the history of mankind have these questions of the soul pressed upon us with greater force than now, and Faith is compelled to look about itself, to put its reasoning power to its utmost use, or else be driven from its place as the leader of the world in its upward march of human thought.

Materialistic science, in its close examination of Life-growths, of evolutions, has seemed to prove the relationship of Species to Species, until man himself is pronounced "an aggregation of Nature's protoplasm," and the human brain but the inheritance of the millenniums of birth and death of lower organisms; or where there is ground for faith in the Over-Soul; or, where, for the faith-word, "Inspiration?"

To this I answer: Material-Science has never yet, in its examination of structure, made analysis of Life, of what is called "the soul of things, only the Seer has told us of this!

It is as much the "Unseen" as is the "God" of devout reverence and faith. Yet should we call it "the Unseen?" I told you that even sight is in itself a "feeling," and as feeling is recognized by science, so then, are the felt sensations of the soul, not sights of the soul? If so, then is it not the so-called "Unseen World of Soul" that has moved the world of man to worship, and the Seers to Faith?

I said that Material Science never yet analyzed the Soul—take note of this—here is a man in the full flush of health; full of manly power of mind, perfect in organism; a stroke and he is dead! The anatomist lays bare the inner walls of the brain, and finds no break in its beautiful machinery; but can he by any possible application of Galvanic Electricity, by any Chemistry, give to that brain the faculty of thought? It is impossible! "The Thinker" is gone; it is only the workshop that he has overhauled; and yet it is Electro-Magnetism," we say, that is the "material" of every physical thing that exists. This material force (or forces) is not enough to account for life, for soul in anything; there must be another force, analogous, it may be, but still different, and this force, if it is a force, must be, like the material forces of Nature, Omnipresent, universal, all-pervading, for it is manifest everywhere in organized Life! It is in the humblest flower, as surely as in the man. It is immanent in the universe, as electricity is immanent.

Perhaps some of you will say that this thought leads to Pantheism. That it has done so is proven by the fact that many of the most profound philosophers of the past were pantheists. Notably I would instance Spinoza, who was declared by his Jewish compeers (for he was by birth a Jew), an Apostate, and when he had sought refuge from their persecution in the lawful protection of the Christian Catholic Church, he was excommunicated from that communion as a heretic! "God immanent in all life" was to the Church as obnoxious as it had been to the Synagogue, and yet both Church and Synagogue teach the Divine Omnipresence! But why make it a question of Theism in any sense? Why did his contemporaries pronounce him "The God-mad-man?" I answer, man names all things that he perceives.

This force of mind in us and felt out of us, has been named "the Odic Force." Some men have said it was a sixth sense, the odic sense, and this word "Odic" is derived from that root-word of the Sanscrit tongue, "Od," which was at one time the only name of the race for what we now call God!

Considering God as a personal Being, the designating of this "Immanence" as universal force, was thought by both Jew and Christian, Atheistic, although Spinoza ever declared himself a Theist.

But now let us look a little at Nature in her development of species, as well as in her evolution of species; look at Nature in her world-building.

Science says "All matter is but electrical debris," says that space is filled with fluent electrical force; the dark cold void outside of worlds is occupied by electric ether, and it is only when a current is broken, says Prof. Miner, that we have light!!

But, admitting that this is so in the material world, or universe of worlds, we see, do we not, that organism is developed, the higher may be differentiated, may be an aggregation, but we do not call a world Star-Dust; neither do we ascribe personality to a lower species than man.

Why then should we be troubled at the suggestion of "Odic-force" as Life-substance, immanent? Why need we fear for a God, any more than we fear for man, or for a world, in this so-called Pantheism? We need not fear if we are bold enough to carry the thought of Life-immanence to its legitimate, its scientific conclusion, on the contrary, we will find our Theism firmly established, and our faith in personal Being of God, scientific.

Even that Brahmin priest that we know as Abraham, who is called "The Father of the Faithful," only knew God by the name of "El," that is, The Power of Force! Do not be afraid of names, in our definitions, for these names only mark the steps of man's knowledge; not the facts of nature.

One of our recent writers says: "Man is the grandest revelation of God," and another, "The human soul is the mirror in which we see God," and if this is true, then in our own personality, is not the personality of the divine being and becoming established? We as Spiritualists—we to whom the gates of death have been opened, so that we know of the divine immanence, as the innumerable host of our own human race, need not be afraid of "scientific methods," as we enter the domain of mind, of life, any more than in the domain of physics; in fact, we invite them. More than this, our age demands them, nor will be content until the Religionist, the Idealist, the Spiritualist, uses them!

Not all at once is ethereal matter sufficiently organized to become the home and workshop of personality; and may we not therefore conceive of Life-substance as being like materiality, immanent in space?

If Abraham only knew of God as a living, mental "Force," immanent; and Moses, while realizing a personality, yet had for it no name, while he proclaimed his divine law, are we compelled to call them unscientific, because they did not like Jesus recognize that God was a spirit?

The immanence of this Living Substance does not deny personality.

any more than we, as we assert the unity of human nature, should be called pantheists, and so be charged with not believing in human personality. But now we approach another difficulty, and that is, the discerning by the seers of the ages of this living substance, or odic substance of the universe. But why a difficulty? Do not some men see some things in the material world that others do not? Did not the lightning flash in mid-heavens before Franklin? Yes, but it was Franklin with his life and key, who gave to the world the knowledge of the oneness, the unity, of the lightning's flash, and the spark from the Leyden jar!

And so, too, men have felt, rather than otherwise, that something, not seen, enveloped the human body, and they named this unseen something "magnetic fluid." You have seen pictures by the dozen in our medical almanacs, of the human form surrounded by what was meant to represent this magnetic fluid; but has science gone any further in its discoveries? I answer, yes! Only recently in one of our philosophical journals there was a statement of one of our scientists, M. DePays, that he was examining with his microscope the nerve points of the body, when he noticed that from these points, he observed "an air-like substance," in its fluidity and constant motion; but of a silvery hue, and that they in their lines of light responded to the action of the brain, in its exercise of thought! To be sure, he was experimenting with a living man, but the fact that these silvery lines responded to thought expression, proves that sensation is not confined to the flesh. And we can see the scientific basis for a belief in the inspiration of thought from without the man, for let these "fluid lines" of substance touch each other, and the line to the brain is complete; just as when the telegrapher closes the circuit and is at once in connection with Boston, New York, or London. But as I said, men have different degrees of perception; some men see things that others do not: some men hear things that others do not; this clear sight, clear hearing, are every-day experiences; and is it strange then, that there have been seers and prophets, in all ages of the world, just as our histories, sacred and profane, tell us—men and women who have anticipated this man with his microscope?

Because we cannot see the atoms of air, do we attempt to deny what the microscope and spectroscope have demonstrated, that even air is in atoms or particles? Yet we might do so with as much reason as to deny Odic Substance, because we have not seen it!

But what of "God," in this new light of discovery? This question shows just what is the real matter with people; they are afraid of God; that God will be dethroned, and all their trust in a living power destroyed, but I answer: Because we find electricity immanent in physics, do we deny that organism exists? The individuality of things does not destroy our faith in the electrical immanence, and I boldly declare that the personality of the divine soul, does not destroy the divine immanence; and, too, I accept the word of the ancient seer, who declares, "God dwells in light;" this substance of Od. Neither do I deny the word of Jesus, that greatest of Hebrew seers, that "a spirit comes to man, and leads him into all truth," in other words, comes in rapport and inspires him!

Silently as the falling dew, there rests upon the man the magnetic line, and his life is moved by it, and yet that man may be as unconscious of extraneous power as the floweret is unconscious of the dew; but this fact of unconsciousness does not change this other fact of spirit rapport, this other fact of inspiration, nor prevent its taking effect. It is the inflow of thought, that comes to us, and constitutes our inspiration—the character of it is determined by its effect upon our minds, and it is this character of the communication, not its methods, that makes the difference between a Paul and an Edison, a Jesus and a Mahomet, a Socrates and a Patrick Henry, while the one method we have found, in the "silvery lines" revealed by the microscope!

As Spiritualists, we are not troubled about "God," that unknown and unknowable One; we know that as Jesus said, the communication comes from those who have lived our life, and passed up higher—from a spirit—and now as I close I would ask, have we not scientific basis for our faith in God, that personification of the mighty host of those who have "passed on"? We, no less than others, look for the inspiration that comes to us from beyond the veil, and we, better than others, know God, for we understand the great force divine, that watches over us, to aid us in our lives here and now! Science, too, is ours, in this, our faith—a faith of ages born, but it is born, and we live in it!

So we sing with Whittier:

"All souls that struggle and aspire;
All hearts of prayer, by it are lit,
And dim or clear; its tongues of fire,
On dusky tribes and centuries, sit;
Nor bounds, nor clime, nor creed, God knowest;
Wide as our needs, the favors fall;
The white wings of the Holy Ghost Stoop, unseen, o'er the heads of all!"

We sing with Longfellow:

"When the hours of day are numbered,
And the voices of the night
Wake the better soul that slumbered,
To a holy, calm delight;
With slow and noiseless footsteps
Come my messengers, divine;
Take the vacant chair beside me,
Lay a gentle hand in mine!
Uttered not, yet comprehended,
Is the spirit's voiceless prayer:
Soft rebuke, with blessing ended,
Breathed to me through lips of air!"

We sing with Gannett:

"I hear it often in the dark;
I hear it in the light:—
Where is that voice that comes to me
With such a quiet might?
It seems but echo of my thought,
And yet behind the stars;
It seems a heart-beat in a hush,
And yet the planet jars!
O, may it be that far within My inmost soul there lies
A spirit sky, that opens wide,
These voices of surprise!"

It is a grand thing, that men have believed in inspired ones of the long ago; but it is an infinitely grander thing to realize for ourselves, spirit rapport; and a personal communion; and it is just this, that Spiritualism stands for and demonstrates by its mediums, as surely as De Pays by his microscope!

BOOK REVIEWS.

Mister Bill. A Novel. By Albert E. Lyons. Richard G. Budge, Publisher, Boston, Mass. $1.50.

A strong and very vigorous story, expostory of the problem of capital and labor, from the mental standpoint. It is worthy of careful perusal, and is of deep interest, from beginning to the end. Mister Bill is a strong and manly character.

Song and Sermon. By Elizabeth Lowe Watson.

The friends of Elizabeth Lowe Watson, and they are many, will be glad to know that she has published a volume of her poems, followed with a collection of her lectures and addresses; all of which are well worthy of preservation in this tasty book form. The price is $1 postpaid, and orders can be sent to her at Pacific Grove, Cal.

Man Limitless. By Floyd B. Wilson.

"I know I have the right to draw from the universal all I would to fulfill my upward, noble longing of my soul; and I know I shall receive, if I harmonize myself with the throbbing vibrations of infinite force. The harmonizing, however, is my task, my responsibility, and my joy." Such is the brave faith exhibited throughout the essays comprising this truly uplifting volume. It is especially interesting to students in the "new thought," and it is richly suggestive.

Mental Healing. By Leander Edmund Whipple. The Metaphysical Publishing Co., New York. Cloth, $1.50.

As well stated by the author, metaphysics appeals to spiritual faculty rather than to animal impulse. It speaks through intelligent understanding of the principles of being, to the spiritual intelligence of the human soul. * * * Hypnotism is a mental influence based upon overpowering the animal will. Metaphysical healing is a mental act based upon spiritual intelligence.

"Mental Healing" is a standard exposition of the principles implied in its title.

"Spiritual Songs for the Use of Churches, Campmeetings and Other Spiritual Gatherings." By Mattie M. Still. Price 10 cents.

DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

There is Room for Diversity of Views as to Its Meaning.

Professor J. S. Loveland, in The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 4, gives us his definition of religion, to-wit: "The mental and emotional attitude of intelligent human beings toward the invisible." "Invisible" is a vague term. Total darkness is invisible, likewise electricity, magnetism, and heat. Forster Spencer would have substituted "the unknowable."

Mr. Loveland adds: "This definition makes all men religious." Indeed? Then why qualify it by restricting the mental and emotional feeling to "intelligent beings"? Millions of the earth's inhabitants have but little intelligence. How intelligent is the feticid worship, who fears and hogs his idol?

I have long held that religion is an undefinable word, save that in its last analysis it is superstition. Old Noah Webster in defining it, declared that the practice of moral duties alone was not religion. Goodrich, who revised and enlarged Webster's Dictionary, gives the definition of God as an object of worship, love, and obedience; right feelings toward God, as rightly apprehended; piety." But the reviser omitted Noah Webster's declaration that morality alone is not religion.

The derivation of the word is undecipherable. "Elther from religious, to gather or collect again, to thorough or over again in reading, in speech, or thought; religious; revering the gods, pious, religious; or from religio, to bind back, to bind fast." So says Webster's Unabridged.

"The religion of humanity" was first enunciated by Thomas Paine, and is now the standard of the Unitarians. But according to Noah Webster humanity alone is not religion; and do not the great body of our religious teachers still hold that the practice of moral duties alone is not religion? And why say "religion of humanity?" Is not humanity alone sufficient?

There are perhaps almost as many diverse definitions of religion as there are thinkers. But not very long ago there appeared in The Progressive Thinker a communication from J. C. Smith of Topeka, Kans., in which he gave this definition of religion, Capitalized: "HUMAN EFFORT TO OBTAIN DIVINE FAVOR." This I accept as a very good one. Mr. Smith was president of the spiritual organization in Washington, D. C., in 1874, and I heard him say on the platform of the society that religion is an evil. He "got religion" in his youth, and so did I. He joined the Baptist church and I the Presbyterian church. I was sprinkled and he was ducked. He is now almost 88 years of age, and I am 88.

The late Samuel P. Putnam, who was once a preacher, published a pamphlet entitled "Religion a Curse," and are there not many ex-reverends who coincide with that postulate, even in the ranks of Spiritualism?

WM. HENRY BURR.

ABOUT THE CAUSE OF LIFE.

Some of the Latest Reflections Thereon

There is at least one distinguished man of science in England (as set forth in the Chicago Examiner) who has not, apparently, been deeply impressed with the experiments of young Mr. Burke, nor with the validity of the latter's alleged "radioloes." It is the British botanist, Wager, who, in his recent address to his section of the British Association, expressed the rather startling opinion—that is, startling to the laboratory-bred physiologists—that the phenomena of life cannot be explained by mere chemistry and physics.

Life's Process Unique.

Wager manifestly believes that the process of life is unique; that the process of life cannot be reduced to the same terms as all the other phenomena of existence, and hence that the causes of the thing called "living matter" are quite beyond the power of human comprehension.

Now this view of living matter is very old and very popular. It was the commonplace view of physiologists themselves not so very long ago. These early gropers believed life was produced, or was dependent upon, what they called a "vital principle." This term was an excellent quality of sand into which to thrust the head when all other resources failed.

Early Theories Abandoned.

In recent years, however, the "vital principle" theory has suffered serious damage that very few men who know what is going on are to fall back upon it, especially in a public address. To fall back upon it is to the minds of many, a confession that he who does fall back upon it is just a little too far behind the times to know precisely what he is talking about, or so far ahead that nobody but himself knows what he is talking about.

It is not to be suspected that the British botanist in question belongs to the first mentioned class. He certainly must know whereof he speaks, and hence it is to be assumed that he is on the track of some treatment of the fact which will open up a hitherto undreamed technique, and enable us actually to pounce upon the "unknowable" in its lair and have it for our own!

For, if the phenomena of life—and all of them—are not purely chemico-physical in their nature, all the results of all the research of the past fifty years are mere gossamer, to be blown away by a breath.

Idea is Alluring.

Alluring as this promise may seem, it is not, however, probable that the Wagerian theory will gain much currency with the initiates of the laboratory in England, Germany or any other sublimary place. The notion that life is not unique; that its phenomena are, without exception, due to physical and chemical reactions; that when the complexity of those reactions are more clearly understood the last remnant of mystery will disappear, and that life will then be seen only as a phase of that universal process everywhere going on and every where continuous—this notion is so solidly grounded in the minds of those who really do know what is going on that there is very little danger of its being uprooted by anybody.

Since Flügler, the immortal German, first suggested that life could be explained by the continuous building up and breaking down of highly complex molecules, which differ from other molecules only in their complexity, every step taken in the chemistry of the body has been a step away from the ancient idea that life is a thing unique.

Old Opinions Stick.

Old opinions stick in the stream of intellectual progress, like old stumps in the new channel of a river; but the water finally uproots them and washes them away to oblivion. Men no longer believe that the sun turns around the earth. That is to say, most men do not. Astronomers now have no such notion.

And if there are still a few eminent zoologists and botanists who have their own doubts as to the validity of the mechanical theory of life, it is probably due to the fact that they have already arrived at the good old age which in-rites retirement from the living, wide awake world to the sweet repose they have so faithfully earned.

Wager's address was delivered in South Africa. Perhaps when he again grows accustomed to the English fog he will settle back into the old groove.

"Active," a Wonderful Discovery That Cures Afflictions of the Eye and Ear Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need of cutting, drugging or probing the eye for the cure of most forms of disease, for a new system of treating afflictions of the eye has been discovered.

There is no risk or expense in this new method, as hundreds of people have been cured of long-standing eye diseases, including cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye they state, termed the cure of the eye.

Mr. A. O. T. Pennington, specialist agent Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co., Kansas City, Mo., writes: "Having used Active for several years, I cheerfully recommend it for the cure of eye and throat affections. I cured my mother, of cataracts."

Susan Cardwell, Lincoln, Kan., writes: "I am 70 years old. I was so blind I could only move about by touch. After using Active I can now thread a needle without glasses."

Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kan., writes: "My honest opinion of Active is that it is one of the most marvelous discoveries of the age. It cured my eyes, and cured my wife of asthma."

Hundreds of other testimonials can be sent on application. Active is purely a home treatment and self-cure. It is not a drug, and is sent on trial postpaid. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clarity is sacrificed to brevity. The style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. The name will be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the courtesy of the correspondents is expected.

Geo. W. Goodman: Q. What were the conditions which caused the halo around the head of Christ?

A. The "halo" or "glory" was placed around the head, or the whole figure, not only of Christ, but artists and writers, but around the head of the virgin mother, and of the God-men in general of the ancient world. Recently this halo glory and aureole have been explained by supposing that they are representations of the spiritual emanations surrounding the individual. They, however, originally had no such significance. They are symbols of that most ancient faith, the phallic worship, and to the present devotees have lost their meaning. As the cross was the symbol of the creative principle, the halo or aureole was of the female. Both date to a period vastly beyond historic time.

The Christian artists, when they painted Christ symbolized his godly character by the halo or glory which had been used for that purpose by the pagan world. Nothing new was added thereto, but as time passed the origin and meaning were lost.

In some representations of Christ and the Virgin, of the Middle Ages, the symbolism is so suggestive of its phallic origin that the least observant cannot fail to understand. At other times it is reduced to this line encircling the head. In all cases the meaning remains the same.

The atmosphere seen by clairvoyants around individuals has no relation, whatever, to this symbolism, which was conceived in an age of barbarous ignorance. There is no portrait of Christ. These that are claimed for him are ideals of artists and their model was the Greek sun-god, Apollo. Stop to think of it, Christ must have been a Jew, and the fixed characteristics of that race must have appeared. He is represented as a blue-eyed Greek—never as a Jew.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Marion Crystal Town, aged 5 years, 11 months and 26 days, youngest daughter of Royal A. and Clara B. Town, passed to the Great Beyond, October 21, 1909, after a lingering illness of that dreadful disease diphtheria.

ROYAL A. TOWN.

Montpelier, Ind.

On Wednesday evening, Nov. 15, Mary Seoder passed to higher life. From her last day at home, 38, South Colington avenue, took place from the residence of his brother, Mr. Louis E. Broom, 424 South Patterson Park avenue, Baltimore, Md., Nov. 20. The services were conducted by Mrs. Bledsoe, speaker of the First Spiritualist church. She delivered a eulogy on the life of Mr. Broom. The Sunday-school Lyceum of the First Spiritualist church sent a floral design of a broken circle, composed of white roses. A cluster of chrysanthemums and roses was received from the choir of the church.

My wife, Emma Pfeiffer, passed to the higher life, November 23. The cremation of the body took place in Indianapolis, the next Sunday.

ARTHUR PFEIFFER.

Passed to spirit life, Nov. 24, at his home in Washington, D. C., Daniel K. Price, aged 71. Mr. Price was a veteran soldier, and the husband of Mrs. May Price, the medium, whose writings have frequently appeared in The Progressive Thinker. Funeral services were appropriately conducted by Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, and by the Grand Army Post comrades.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charmingly Interesting Narrative.

"I wish, Aunt Ann, you would tell us some of your experience, for it cannot fail to be helpful to us. I hardly think you jumped into your present mental and spiritual condition," said mother, laughingly.

"I have attained my present position through hard experience, sorrow and suffering," said Aunt Ann. "When I was a young woman I gave no thought to spiritual things. I supposed I had a soul because I had been told so but I never took the trouble to try and locate it. At one blow I lost my husband, who was my idol, and my two babies—all. Almost immediately after this my beautiful home dissolved in flame and smoke and the lawyer my husband had trusted left the country with all my money and I, homeless, penniless and grief-stricken, faced the world alone. Worn out with weeping and mourning, tired of the world and everything in it—I myself in particular—I went as a last resort to a clergyman. He told me I must say 'Thy Will, O God, not mine, be done,' and as I did not seem to have any voice in my own affairs I said what I was told to. He offered me his church as a patient and a physician offered his patient a pill, and I, like the patient without a question as to the contents of the pill, swallowed it. I regarded the minister very much as the patient regards his physician and thought that in some mysterious way the pill would cure all my troubles, but it did not work well.

"Instead of getting well I grew steadily worse. Then I began to inquire into the nature of the dose I had taken and the more I inquired the sicker I grew. When I analyzed that creed I shrank from it with horror. I saw that if the creed was true, God was a fiend and my husband not only lost to me but enduring the tortures of hell. I rebelled against that creed. I told the minister there might be such a God—I did not know—but if there were I would not call him god or worship him, but I would stand alone in the strength of my womanhood and let him Geyour me with his wrath if he chose to. The minister thought me crazy, and I think I would have been in a short time if something had not happened.

"I went to bed one night as hopeless and wretched as mortal well could be, and worn out with my blind raving I lay calm and quiet for once. It was a warm night and the room was flooded with the light of the moon. Suddenly there came three distinct knocks upon the head of my bed. The bed was drawn out into the middle of the room so I could not lay the raps to a rat in the wall. I got up and looked about the room but I found no living creature, and the door was locked as I had left it upon retiring. I again lay down, but in a few minutes the knocks came again. Again I repeated my useless investigations, and lay down, and again the knocks were repeated.

"The next day when I was thinking over the strange occurrence it suddenly came to me that I had heard and read about 'Rochester rappings' and of a new law that had been born, whose adherents held communion with the dead by means of raps. I had never given more than an impatient thought or two to the subject before, but now I was full of interest. What if it were true after all? What if it had come to me, and my loved and lost were really calling to me? O the eagerness with which I questioned, the feverishness with which I waited to see if the knocks would come again, and the joy with which I received them and found that intelligence was there.

"This was the beginning. To tell it all would require days, but little by little I was led to a knowledge of the priceless truth the dead are not dead but alive. No one can attach more importance to this truth and to whatever phenomena proves it than I do, but it is a great mistake to think, as some appear to do, that it is all of Spiritualism. The unseen rappers told me they were my mother and my husband, and I have never for one moment doubted it. I asked them if I should leave the church and they told me to use my own judgment, to learn to rely upon myself.

I left the church. They told me that I had a work to do and in doing it I would find peace and happiness, but they would not tell me what the work was to be. Following their instructions I found the work I have been engaged in so many years. I soon found out that in order to be sustained in my work I would be obliged to unite with some church, and so I chose the most liberal one I could find. I did not just like it, but as long as the only way I could reach suffering humanity was to do it under the name of some religious denomination, I sacrificed my personal feelings for the sake of those I wished to help. However, I have never made any attempt to conceal the precious truth that is mine, and wherever I have thought advisable I have declared it boldly.

As Aunt Ann was silent, Mr. Dale spoke, his face eager and bright. "It comes to me that if we give to the world something of real value it will recognize it and receive it. If we prove to the world that our particularism has in it the power to uplift humanity, the world will be compelled to acknowledge it. When the world sees that under our teachings the wretched are made happy, the sick whole, the vile clean, the degraded noble, it will have to acknowledge that we have got something worth having. I believe that if by my daily life I prove myself to be a man of sterling character who will not be tempted from my integrity by gold, personal preference, or self-gratification in any form, that those with whom I associate will recognize the facts and receive me for what I really am, a man of worth regardless of the fact I attach to myself."

Aunt Jane looked at the speaker admiringly and said, "You are on the right road. Keep steadily on and test your beliefs to its fullest extent. Success is yours."

"There's something I want to say," I exclaimed impetuously. "There is liberty, brothers and sisters," said John, and his tone and manner imitated so exactly that of Deacon Jones when he leads the prayer meeting that they all laughed, but I was not to be extinguished, so I told them of my absorbing idea which I have already revealed to you, Martha. They all gave me for once their undivided attention, and when I had finished, Aunt Ann said, "Hold that idea earnestly and determinedly long enough, my dear child, and you will succeed. This desire you express is the voice of your own spirit calling to you, and it recognizes the work it can best undertake and its ability to accomplish it. Trust to the guidance of your own soul and have no fear, for the way will appear as soon as you are prepared to enter it."

Now I am wondering how long it will be before I am ready, and what I can do to hasten my development. I am also anxious to know what Mr. Dale is going to do. I feel sure he will leave the church. I want him to live up to the highest and best, and yet I cannot bear to think of his leaving this place. Sometimes I feel that I do not understand myself any better than I do others. I am a stranger in my own house, so to speak. I wonder if others ever feel in that way. Do you Martha?

I heard Aunt Ann say that she never found herself until she lost herself, and I could not imagine what she meant, but now I think I begin to understand. John has just come in and told us that he has business which calls him over your way, and he expects to make you a call. I asked him if I might go with him and he said, "No, not this time," and when I asked him why, he said he "felt in his bones I better stay at home." I cannot understand it, for he has always let me go with him before unless there was a real reason why. I went to Aunt Ann with my complaint and she said, "You better accept the edict of the 'bones' as a decree of Providence," so I suppose I shall have to. I will send this letter by John, and please write soon and tell me how you like my brother.

Lovingly yours,

MARAH WESTON.

P. S.—Do not think I am angry with John because he will not let me go with him, for I am not. He is just as good and kind as he can be.

Spruce Grove Farm.

My Dear Marah:—I have been having new surprises lately which I am sure you will be interested in. One day when I was watching Charlie as he was slowly crossing the room with his crutches I felt suddenly as if some one had pushed me from a room that was dark and dismal into one that was light and beautiful, and moved by a sudden impulse I exclaimed, "Oh, Charlie, I believe you can get well; that you will throw those crutches aside and walk."

The dear boy looked at me in surprise, but he was no more surprised than I was, for the two doctors we had employed said he must always walk with crutches and I had not thought of questioning their judgment.

Again it came to me still more forcibly, and I said, and not a shadow of a doubt clouding my vision. "It is true, Charlie, you are going to be well and run and leap; I feel it—I know it. It comes to me what to do, and I am going to do it now."

A look came upon the sweet, patient face of my darling such as I never saw there before, and he exclaimed joyfully, "You are right, Martha—I feel it, too," and his eyes filled with tears. I put on my wraps and went to the stable and harnessed Jerry and in a few minutes I was on my way to town where I obtained the articles which in the moment of revelation I learned that I must use.

Right here I want to state that our hopes are to be realized, for already Charlie can stand erect and bear his weight evenly upon both feet. He is full of hope and courage. One would hardly know the boy. He has gained in flesh, and his appetite is good, and he takes a lively interest in all our affairs. Mother was very skeptical at first, and made a good many contemptuous remarks, but now she says perhaps the Lord did reveal to me what to do in answer to her prayers. A messenger from the realms of light once told me not to permit myself to be disturbed by anything but to accept whatever comes to me as being a part of my education. He said the right persons, conditions and things will come to me as I used them and can make use of them, therefore to receive everything without resentment and know that within myself lies the power to transform the apparent ill into good. I am just beginning to understand this and how very important it is that my earnest desires are good, pure and unselfish.

One day when things were unusually trying it came to me that what makes some persons—usually women—so gloomy, exacting, critical and fretful, is because of the narrowness of their lives. Life and activity go together, and stagnation means disease and death. A person who stays in one atmosphere all the time and thinks only of self and things pertaining to self must inevitably become dwarfed, morbid and unhealthy. This came to me like a revelation, and when I get a truth I always want to put it in practice, and I got this one at work after a while, and the result was that father and mother went away for a week's visit and Charlie and I looked forward to a delightful time keeping house by ourselves.

The next day after they went away, while I was helping Charlie with his lessons I was surprised to hear the door open and a middle-aged woman walk into the room. She was a large, well-built woman with keen gray eyes and a sad, stern face. Her manner was forbidding and her dress severely plain. She looked about her and in a commanding tone of voice exclaimed: "Peace be unto this house."

"Thank you," I said, "the spirit of peace is here."

She looked at me critically. "What ails that boy?" she asked.

"He has been lame for a long time."

"What is he lame for? Don't you know the prayer of faith will heal the sick?"

"I have heard so."

"Well, if you know it, why isn't he healed?"

"I do not know who will furnish the faith."

The woman's face darkened. "You are a very pert miss, and it is evident to one of my enlightened understanding that you are far from a knowledge of the truth," she said. "Where is the head of this house?"

"If you mean either, of my parents, they are both away upon a visit," I said.

"Well, I am an evangelist and am about looking after the spiritual welfare of this community. Do you attend church regularly, miss?"

"No, madam."

"Why not?"

"I am not specially interested in churches farther than to wish them good."

The woman looked at me from head to foot and said scornfully, "Not specially interested in churches, indeed! What are you specially interested in, pray?"

"Just at the present moment in obeying St. Paul's injunction to 'study to be quiet and mind my own business,'" I answered calmly and turned to Charlie.

For a full minute the woman was silent, then she produced from her pocket a notebook and pencil, and stepped in front of me and began again: "If you are not interested in churches, I suppose you have a religious belief of some sort?"

"I suppose I have."

"Then why don't you tell what it is?" I looked at the woman and said soberly, "I do not consider that you have any right to enter my home unbidden and subject me to a rigid cross examination regarding my personal affairs, but I am not ashamed of my religion—I am a Spiritualist."

The woman stepped back and regarded me with unfeigned dismay, but it was only for a moment then she burst out boldly, "A young woman like you whom God has made fair and pleasant to look upon, stand there and tell me in one brief sentence that you have departed from the faith, trampled under foot everything holy and sacred, and gone over to Satan to work his will and your own damnation!"

"I have told you nothing of that sort," I said. "Your ideas are far from the truth."

"They are not!" she answered angrily; "I guess I know what the Bible says about such as you—you are on the straight road to hell and there is no going in you," and she gathered her skirts about her and without another glance at me, walked out of the house and down the path to the gate; but she was destined to go no farther.

For some reason, perhaps because she was too high-headed, she slipped and fell. Charlie saw her fall and cried out, and I ran to her rescue. From her moaning with pain and unable to rise.

Luckily a neighbor was passing by, and he stopped and helped me get her into the house. He then drove on and sent his wife to help while he went to get a doctor. The doctor came and found a broken bone.

After he and my neighbor had gone I sat down and looked at the situation squarely in the face and I confess I did not feel pleased with it. I had a halo on I am sure it got dreadfully askew. I went out-doors and drew some long breaths, then I took myself in hand.

"Martha Janet Weston," I said to myself, "you are in for a new experience now. You have preached some beautiful theories during the past few months, and now you have a chance to practice them and see if they work beautifully. What is to do, accept it, as you have been instructed how to, and remember that as far as your patient is concerned, the cause you love is on trial."

I found my patient anything but patient. I saw plainly that she regarded me with distrust, but I was genuinely sorry for her and treated her as tenderly as if she had been Charlie. The afternoon of the third day she was with me I found her sobbing and she looked feverish and ill, but to my anxious inquiries she only said, "There is nothing that you or anyone else can do for me, only to let me alone; so go away and shut the door."

I obeyed her, for I did not know what else I could do.

The room I gave the stranger opens out of our living room, and as soon as I had closed the door upon her I went about my housework. A few minutes later Charlie admitted a man who had asked at the door to see Miss Weston. Physically he was a fine specimen of manhood, but notwithstanding he impressed me as being small and insignificant. He was very well dressed, and I saw plainly that he wished to impress with the idea that he was an individual of vast importance. He told me that he had often heard of me, that he had called upon a business matter, but one that fell within my line of work, but he must see me alone.

"There is no one present but my brother, and you can have nothing to say to me that will not be proper for my brother to hear," I replied.

"It is not a question of propriety but of advisability. The matter I wish to see you about is of too vital importance to me to be discussed before a third party," he said pompously.

I drew myself within myself, closed my eyes and in the silence listened. "No, no," came the warning voice of my own soul. I then said, "I will hold myself responsible for my brother. If you will not trust him you shall not trust me."

The man sat in sullen silence for a few minutes, and then blurted out, "A woman is the most obstinate creature God ever made—a mule and a hog are nowhere."

"Thank you," I said, laughing.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Weston, but women are the torment of my life," and he moved uneasily.

"Then," I said serenely, "I would consider them unnecessary to my existence and well being and leave them severely alone."

He got up and walked to the window. After gazing upon the beauty of an opposite snowdrift for a short time, he came back and resuming his seat, said, "Well, I suppose there is nothing for me to do but risk it, so here goes: You are a Spiritualist medium and pretend to give messages from the dead. My wife believes in such bosh and has been talking about coming to see you for several weeks. I have promised her that she may come to-morrow, but I thought I would come first and give you a few pointers," and he paused and laughed uneasily.

"Well," I said.

"Well it is like this: My wife has said that if you can tell her mother's name—the old lady is dead, you understand—that she will believe any message you tell her comes from her mother. The old lady's name was Zenobia McFarley, a name you would not be likely to guess, so don't forget it. My wife has taken it into her head that she must visit her sister living in — and for certain important reasons of my own I do not want her to go. When my wife gets here to-morrow, I want you to tell her that her mother says she must not go, but stay quietly at home; then give her the old lady's name and the case is settled—see?"

"I can see what you want me to do, but I shall not do it."

A look of surprise passed over the man's face. "Oh, come now," he said eagerly, "don't go back on your trade, and he held five dollars toward me. (To be continued.)

SPIRITUALISTS, ATTENTION!

Something About the Tricks of Illusion and Legerdemain, That Are Worthy of Careful Consideration.

Tricks of illusion and legerdemain are all right in their place as diversions, but are entirely out of place in the spiritual science. Spiritualism is a grand and beautiful science, a celestial truth, and its followers should use every effort to prevent its name from being SMIRCHED AND DISGRACED by the practice of fraud. A bogus test or fraudulent manifestation of any sort is of NO VALUE WHATSOEVER to the Spiritualist or investigator, but an insult to them and to their ARISEN FRIENDS.

The book, "Mysteries of the Seance," written by a life-long Spiritualist and investigator, and endorsed and heartily recommended by the most able of our leading Spiritualists, will post you as to the methods of tricksters in producing every phase of bogus manifestations, and will enable you to detect and expose the fraud. The author has received hundreds of grateful letters from those who have had their eyes opened to the truth and who have thus been able to expose and drive out of the work many who had been doing a flourishing business among the gullible.

THE CHURCHES' BRUTALITY CONSIDERED.

A Master Mind, the Eminent Goldwin Smith, Steps to the Front in the New York Sun, and Presents a Vivid Portraiture of the Churches as They Exist Today.

This anxious gathering of the churches shows that they believe a religious crisis is at hand. It is a social crisis also. Though the idea of God and a future state may not have been very distinct or always present, who can doubt that they with conscience, the authority of which depends upon them, have had a general influence; that they have reconciled people in general to the inequalities of the human lot? Social science in the end may take their place. But there seems not unlikely to be a perilous interregnum. Do we not already see an increase of intensity in the struggle for the wealth and pleasures of this world?

It is difficult to get true statistics of churchgoing, still more difficult to learn how much of it is religious, how much is social. That a good deal of it is social appears certain. In the case of the State Church of England not a little of it, probably is political. I think I have even known a church to be built or restored from political motives by avowed skeptics. The State Church is torn by parties which would break it up were not the ecclesiastical polity maintained by a Parliament full of dissenters and unbelievers. In all the churches, and in those of the clergy, are men who are most highly educated, there are searchers of heart, heresy trials, struggles to draw the teeth of the old creeds, such as the Westminster Confession. Even in the Anglican Church free criticism of the bible has been gaining ground and high churchmen write such books as "Lux Mundi."

Anglicans are struggling to get rid of the Athanasian Creed, though only in paradoxical and denunciatory form does it differ from the other creeds. The Moslem account of the creation and the fall of man may be said to have been generally abandoned by the clergy. Christianity was in its origin a moral, not a dogmatic revelation. In its great manifesto, the Sermon on the Mount, there is not a word of dogma. Nor is there anything really dogmatic in the Epistles of St. Paul, though dogma of rather a portentous kind has been derived from them. His fire is passionate love of the character of the Founder with fervid faith in the new morality. Dogma makes its first appearance in the Fourth Gospel, which is proved by other signs to be the work of a Palestinian but of an Alexandrian Jew.

New comers Hellenistic theology with its metaphysical theories about the nature of deity its Logos, its Homo-ousians and Homo-ousians, its Trinitarian orthodoxy and Arian heresies, its Decrees of Ecumenical Councils regulating theological fancies and making profession of them a condition of Christian membership as well as a test of Christian faith. Then the Church having been identified with the State, and that State being the Byzantine despotism, orthodoxy becomes loyalty and heresy becomes treason. State persecution is the natural result. Presently we have Popes investigating the Norman to the conquest of England and Ireland in the interest of the faith. Innocent III. excommunicating the Aborigines, the Inquisition with its autos-da-fé, religious wars, Jesuitism, the St. Bartholomew, the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and the Dragonnades follow in due course.

The reformation, where it prevailed, got rid of Papal despotism, of superstition, of asceticism, of thaumaturgy, of saint worship and presently of persecution. But it did not get rid of dogma. It rather fell back on dogma as a pledge of stability and security in place of the authority of the Church. It kept religious belief subject to political authority. That principle has been less practiced in all. The political influences of that hour are not very strong warrants for averting and universal truth. Mutual toleration and charity there may at once be to any great extent, and they are priceless. But of reunion there seems to be little hope. The fact is, going back from Alexandria, Nice, Constantinople, Rome, Geneva, Augsburg, Zurich and Canterbury, to the hillside in Galilee and the moral revelation proclaimed there. But at all events tests may at once be relaxed, and those who are elected angels should be equipped to do so. Spiritual guides may be set at liberty to speak the truth.

A music artist whom Prof. von Bergmann, the famous surgeon, introduced to a recent meeting of the Berlin Medical Society, is puzzling the wise and learned who comprise that erudite body of Berliners by complete mastery of his muscles. Without apparent effort he drew up his abdominal organs from their proper position, leaving a cavity in their place. Then he pressed them down until his abdomen became globular. Then he divided them into two sections, right and left, with a hot wire between them. He can make the muscles of any part of his body tremble and shake like jelly. He is able to stop his pulse beating, and can move his heart about as he wishes.

What exactly the powers are that he puts into motion to bring about these singular results remained a mystery, even after his heart had been examined by Roentgen apparatus.

ARCHDEACON COLLEY'S SPIRITUALISM.

The Leamington Chronicle of England, Gives Some More Remarkable Statements of the Eminent Divine in Reference to Spiritualism.

Archdeacon Colley, rector of Stockton, preaching at Stockton Church on Sunday, and speaking at the Albert Hall, Leamington, on Monday, made special reference to the coming of the spirit of his son, Lieutenant C. Colley, R. F. A., to India, and also made some more remarkable statements relative to his belief in Spiritualism. After referring to certain providential and "by no means hallucinatory" interventions on his son's behalf and for his protection while serving in Natal, Mr. Colley was a boy, the Archdeacon went on to say:

"These, now, from the pulpit, I make mention of in your presence to strengthen the conviction of my people—my parishioners—relative to the fact of what I, their rector, have taught, and shall always teach, touching the Church of England, and essentially Christian teaching of modern Spiritualism, insisting on the fact—the scientific fact—with proof positive—audible, visible, prehensible, and tangible—of angelic ministrations and the ever-acting love of the departed that still reaches down to us here, now, as in Bible times, from beyond the grave, for our succor in moments of danger, help in life's daily difficulties, and comfort in sorrow and distress."

In attesting the possibility and glory of the life of the departed, Mr. Colley, in those of the clergy, are most highly educated, there are searchers of heart, heresy trials, struggles to draw the teeth of the old creeds, such as the Westminster Confession. Even in the Anglican Church free criticism of the bible has been gaining ground and high churchmen write such books as "Lux Mundi."

EDITOR-AT-LARGE N. S. A.

Report for the Quarter Commencing Sept. 1, and Ending Dec. 1, 1905.

To the Executive Board of the National Spiritualists Association—Respected Sirs:—I have the pleasure to report to you the work I have done in the field assigned me, for the past three months, by way of contributions to the secular and spiritual press.

Review of "Passing Events": Thomas Olman Todd's History of the Rochester Knockings—George Allen Bacon—Ways of the Evangelist—An Object Lesson. In Banner of Light and The Progressive Thinker.

Reply to Taylor's sermon. Discussed. Question of Immortality. Discussed. Furnished by request of Mr. Clark Whitmore for Chattanooga paper.

The Death of Henry Slade. Banner of Light and The Progressive Thinker. Review of Passing Events: Thoughts on Mediumship, by E. W. Wallis—About Angels. The Sunflower.

Reply to "Chronology" in Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle. (This article was refused by the editor who had written the abusive and wholly unjust editorial. A copy was furnished the Sunflower, and copies of that paper circulated as an antidote, by interested Spiritualists.)

An Excommunicated Medium. Reply to editorial in The Watchman. In the Sunflower.

An answer to Henry Frank. Banner of Light. (In a lecture before the Psychological Society of Los Angeles, Cal., Mr. Frank went out of his way to assail Spiritualism. My reply was based on a report of the lecture furnished by the Hon. R. A. Dague. Mr. Frank responded in the Banner of Light, denying the truthfulness of the report. The matter became of more moment because Mr. Frank has been called to the platform of at least one leading Spiritualist convention, and he is, in consequence, erroneously inclined to that cause. It thus became necessary for Mr. Dague to be called in evidence.)

Second reply to Henry Frank—Testimony of Hon. R. A. Dague. Banner of Light.

The new year opens full of promise. The success of the Minneapolis convention, the high stand taken regarding fraud, and the work planned for missionaries, speakers, mediums, and the laymen, indicate that Spiritualism is entering on the practical doing of the work.

Assigning to me the duties of this office for another year is an unexpected honor. I had hoped another might be appointed better qualified, and able to not only lead in the old lines, but strike out into new fields. The choice made by the N. S. A. of money, which might otherwise have been given to other benevolent enterprises, and if officers are elected as they were at the last National convention, when the election occurred about supper-time on the last night of the convention, when everybody was hungry and tired, and when the officers and entire board were appointed and voted upon, it is a matter of some importance.

I earnestly call the attention of delegates and of all Spiritualists to the fact that the success of my work rests with them in a great measure. They must supply the material and furnish the occasion. Whenever they find it possible to publish articles in their local papers, on this subject, or attacks are made, they should make their wants known, giving such information as they think will be of service in preparing the desired articles or replies.

I am, respectfully,

ONE

One were we in soul and heart,
He was dearer than a brother,
Death has wrung our hands apart,
Yet we have each other.

When the day dawns to rest,
He, with sad eyes slowly turning
To the gold and purple west,
Feels my spirit's yearning.

When the summer falls a-swoon,
And the leaves grow sere and crisp,
'Neath the burning glare of noon,
Still he hears my whisper.

In the raging wind, he hears my cry,
In the breakers' rolling thunder—
All death's chill between us passed,
Tears us not asunder.

SUN I lean upon his breast,
That true heart so sweetly pressing:
On his hours of sad unrest,
Falls my voiceless blessing.

One were we in soul and heart,
He was dearer than a brother,
Death has wrung our hands apart,
Yet we have each other.

BEATRICE ST. GEORGE.

no less a task than to master the whole universe, to control the whole of nature. He wants to arrive at the point where nature's laws will have no influence over him—where he will be able to get beyond them all. He will be master of the whole universe, internal and external.

Raja Yoga proposes to start from the internal world, and through that control the whole, both internal and external. As each science has its own method, so Raja Yoga. Certain relations as to food are necessary. We must use that food which brings us the purest mind; says the Swami Vivekananda. "Those who want to make rapid progress, if they can live on milk alone for some months will find it a great advantage. But for those who want only a little practice for every day business sort of life, let them not eat too much, but otherwise they may eat whatever they please. For those who want to make faster progress a strict diet is absolutely necessary. As the organization becomes finer, at first you will find that the least thing throws you out of balance. One bit of food more or less will disturb the whole system until you get perfect control and then you will be able to eat whatever you like."

Eight Mystic Steps to Perfection.

Raja Yoga is divided into eight steps. The first is Yama, including nonkilling, truthfulness, nonstealing, continence, and non-receiving of gifts. Next is Niyama, including cleanliness, contentment, mortification, study, and self-reverence to God. Then comes Asana, or posture; Pratyahara, or making the mind introspective; Dhyana, or concentration; and Samadhi, or superconsciousness. The Yama and Niyama are moral trainings. Without these as the basis no practice of Yoga will succeed, says the Swami. As these practices become established the Yogi will begin to realize the fruits of his practice. Without these it never will bear fruit. A Yogi must not think of injuring anyone through thought, word or deed, and this applies not only to man, but to all animals.

The next step is posture, a series of exercises designed to bring the body to be gone through every day until certain higher states are reached. Nerve currents will have to be displaced and given a new channel. New sorts of vibrations will begin; the whole constitution will have to be re-modelled, as it were. But the mind must be kept in a state of calm, the spinal column, so that the one thing necessary for the posture is to hold the spinal column free, sitting erect, holding the three parts: the chest, neck and head, in a straight line. The whole weight of the body be supported by the ribs, and then you have an easy, natural posture, with the spine straight.

"You must practice at least twice every day," says the Swami. "The early morning and the early evening are the two points of calmness. Your body will have a like tendency to become calm at those times. Make it a rule not to do anything but what is necessary for the day. If you do this the sheer force of hunger will break your laziness."

In India they teach children never to eat until they have practiced and worshiped, and it becomes natural for them after a time. A boy will not feel hungry until after he has bathed and practiced.

Pray for Knowledge and Light.

Those who cannot have a room set apart can practice where they like; sit in a straight posture, and the first thing to do is to send a silent prayer to the system. Let all beings be happy; let all beings be peaceful; let all beings be blissful.

The next thing is to think of your own body and see that it is strong and healthy; it is the best instrument you have. Throw away all weakness; tell your body that it is strong; tell your mind that it is strong; and have an unbounded faith and hope in yourself.

The next step is Pranayama, or the control of prana or vital force. The first step in this is to control the motion of the lungs. The first lesson in this is just to breathe in the measured way, in and out, and then to make elaborate exercises are gradually introduced.

The first effect of the practice will be that the heart will become calm and the mind will become clear.

The next step is Samadhi, or the state of superconsciousness. This is the highest state of existence. The animal has the happiness in the senses, the man in his intellect, and God in spiritual contemplation. It is only the soul that has attained to this contemplative state that the world has become really beautiful.

When the power of Dhyana has been so much intensified as to be able to reject the external part of perception and remain meditating only on the internal part, the mind, that state is called Samadhi, the superconscious state, and when the mind reaches that higher state then the knowledge beyond reasoning comes to him, metaphysical knowledge, beyond all physical knowledge, transcendental knowledge.

The art of using moderate abilities to advantage wins praise, and often acquires more reputation than real brilliancy. Rochefoucauld.

THE TEMPLE FUND.

Suggestions for Ways and Means to Accomplish the Work.

Having been requested by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Geo. W. Kates, to write an article and suggest ways and means, I submit to your readers:

1. That persons interested incorporate as the National Spiritualists Temple Association, under the N. S. A.

2. Capital stock to be $50,000 or more, divided in shares of $5, $10 or $25 each.

3. That the management be vested in a board of twelve or more members, selected by the stockholders, that stockholders holding one or more shares of stock and not for one share of stock and that no one shall act on this board who does not hold at least $100 worth of stock.

This board to select the officers from among their members and make rules regarding the loaning of funds for building purposes.

4. The rule under which members of this board are selected shall not be changed except by unanimous consent of all stockholders, or unless those dissenting have had the money returned to them which they invested in stock under the above rules and regulations.

5. No one holding any office or serving on the board or in any other capacity shall receive any compensation for such services, but clerical work may be engaged if needed for such labor as the officers are unable to do personally.

In making arrangements to collect any considerable amount of money for building purposes, the board so necessary that the investor be assured that his money shall be handled by competent, honest and business-like persons, who have handled money and financial enterprises successfully for themselves or others, so they will have experience in dealing with this problem.

6. A very rule under which $100 invested has a financial interest which will make him more guarded in handling the funds; it will also give confidence to the smaller investors.

I believe such an association managed by the ablest financiers in our land would receive the confidence of well-to-do persons, and to carry out their will, so they would leave considerable money to the Temple Fund.

Asking persons to donate certain sums annually and leaving the funds for the N. S. A. to manage, will deprive the N. S. A. of money, which might otherwise be given to other benevolent enterprises, and if officers are elected as they were at the last National convention, when the election occurred about supper-time on the last night of the convention, when everybody was hungry and tired, and when the officers and entire board were appointed and voted upon, it is a matter of some importance.

I earnestly call the attention of delegates and of all Spiritualists to the fact that the success of my work rests with them in a great measure. CRITICAL SUGGESTIONS

On the Manner of Conducting Spiritualist Societies.

Much has been written about the manner of conducting Spiritualist societies. While all true Spiritualists will agree that the phenomena are indispensable—that without it there would be no Spiritualism, we are not all of one opinion as to the proper time and place to witness it. I do not believe that the platform is the proper place for it at the close of a lecture.

An evening especially set apart for the platform test service is much the better way. The effect of an able course is frequently destroyed by the efforts of some half-developed test medium.

And another erroneous idea is that we must have a test medium to draw a crowd for the lecturer. If that be true, then you have employed the wrong lecturer. The right man or woman will soon or later be able to draw an audience of satisfactory proportions, provided there is no door fee. And this ten cent door fee will kill any society sooner or later! The plan is entirely wrong. The family in limited circumstances is required to contribute equally with other families in good circumstances. All should pay in proportion to their means. To offer a ten-cent attraction and fill the house with a rabble on Sunday evening is a serious mistake, especially when you have a lecturer announced.

There should be a time for phenomena, and a time for intellectual effort. Let each have its proper place in the work.

But whatever we do, let us forever abolish the door fee on Sunday evening. So long as this door fee is charged we are placed in the category of the cheap vaudeville shows, and the public so regards us. In a word, we lose the respect of the public, and gain little or nothing in the end. Our Christian Science neighbors have had good audiences every Sunday without either lecture or phenomena. There are enough Spiritualists in most of the towns and cities to compose an audience of good proportions if they would only attend. But just why they do not is a problem yet to be solved. J. A. WERTZ, Anderson, Ind.

FLIGHT OF DOVES.

To flowering fields, O ye beautiful doves!
Where the wild rose, breathes of his many loves;
The music of harpers is heard in the breeze,
The wail-piper will's note in the whistling trees.

Your eyes beam with love as you trail through the sky,
The angels are watching as you pass them by;
Mingling of voices like music from heaven,
Float through the ether, with fond echoes given.

Sweet cooling doves, with your soft fluttering wings,
Fly back to us, darlings, you bear nesting things;
So near the celestial abodes did you sing,
That a perfume of glory backward you bring!

O beautiful doves! Entrancing the heart,
Did you tarry in Heaven's most radiant part,
Laden with wisdom, supernally true,
With your lips like pink rose leaves melting in dew?

lines will disappear; with this calm thought calmness will come over the face. Next beautiful voice will come. These signs will come after a few months' practice.

The next step is called Pratyahara, which means gathering toward, checking the outgoing powers of the mind, freeing it from the thrall of the senses. This means a long step toward freedom, and until it has been taken the Yogi considers the man a mere machine.

The first lesson is to sit for some time and let the mind run on. "Each day," Vivekananda, the expert declares, "you will find the mind's vagaries becoming less and less violent; that is, it is becoming calmer. In the first few months you will find that the mind has a thousand thoughts; later on you will find it has toned down to perhaps 700, and after a few more months it will have fewer and fewer, until at last it will be under perfect control. It is a long work, but to do it is a day."

First Spiritual Church

Established in Brooklyn, N. Y.—An Earnest Invitation Extended to the Clergymen of Greater New York, and a Memorial to the Public.

The First Spiritual Church of Brooklyn, New York, to all other churches, of every faith and denomination, and to every lover of religious liberty throughout our country, hereby sends its greeting, and presents this memorial for their earnest consideration:

First.—That among the great incentives to migration to this country, by our forefathers and mothers was the desire to escape religious persecution, by here making homes; and here establishing a government, the conception of which should be the absolute freedom of religious faith; freedom in form of worship; freedom in the expression of opinion; the right of all to rationally exercise the faculties and powers bestowed upon them, without intimidation, fear or restraint, so long as the rights of others are not invaded.

Second.—That to that end the constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for redress of grievances."

Third.—The constitution of the State of New York provides, as follows: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind; and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his religious beliefs; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be construed as to excuse any act of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state."

The constitution of this state also provides that every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press.

Fourth.—That this church was incorporated under the religious corporation laws of the State of New York on the 24th day of January, 1904. Its objects and purposes are declared in its charter to be: "Religious, Spiritual, Benevolent, Educational." It enunciated its principles and the scope of its work as follows:

"We claim for mankind, universal brotherhood.

"That man is, and ever has been, conscious of the existence of an All-Pervading Power, which brought him into being, and involved in which is the destiny of his race.

"That immortality and future happiness are the hope of all men; and that the religious and moral law have ever been predicated upon varying conceptions of the nature and character of Deity, and the uncertain evidence of immortality.

"We believe that that which is good and true in all religions should be sustained by all possible available knowledge; and that neither dogmatical creeds should stifle legitimate investigation into spiritual truth—the manifestation of spiritual powers, nor the promulgation of a religion incorporating all that is essentially true in those respects.

"We believe that the time is ripe for incorporating into the religious truth-desiring religious organizations, an acceptance of the fact of spiritual communication between the physical and spiritual worlds; and in the absence of such acceptance, that wherever practicable, religious organizations should be formed which shall recognize such communion.

"We believe that the basis upon which we shall build, all essential truth, whether incorporated or not in other religions of mankind; and declare it to be our purpose to ascertain and make known what is true, especially, of that which pertains to the spiritual nature of man; his psychic powers and possibilities; his relations to the spiritual world; and to encourage the judicious cultivation of spiritual gifts.

"We claim that truth is divine and sacred, and absolutely authoritative to the souls that apprehend it; yet, that while one may aid another in the perception of truth and duty, no one can determine for another what is truth or duty; hence, that each individual must believe and act on his or her own responsibility in all things.

"That freedom is the birthright of every soul, and is an indispensable condition to the highest progress, purity and perfection; but that true freedom is neither anarchy nor license, and implies wholesome restraint from infringing upon the rights of freedom and welfare of others."

Fifth.—That, being thus organized, this church commenced its work October 1, 1904, holding two sessions each Sunday; the afternoon services consisting of music, lectures by distinguished persons upon religious, scientific and educational subjects; including the treatment of mental and physical ailments under the laws of suggestion, by eminent physicians and alienists.

The Sunday evening services are opened by singing a hymn by the congregation, with organ accompaniment, followed by a prayer by the pastor; a solo; reading from the Scriptures; a sermon; a solo; and then follows the receiving and transmission of messages from the spiritual world to numbers of the audience, through the instrumentality of the woman pastor, who is a wonderful psychic and seeress. The services are then closed with singing and benediction.

Letters containing questions to deceased persons, written, sealed and placed upon her desk by their strangers to the seeress—these letters, without address, and without the name of the writer—are answered; the contents of the letters are stated; the names and relations of spirits present, to strangers in the audience, are correctly stated, and communications from these spirits given; these communications almost invariably, by reason of their character, show a knowledge of existing conditions in the lives, relations and affairs of the recipients, beyond the possible knowledge of the medium when in her normal condition.

Messages of comfort, encouragement, advice and cheer, invariably received by the discouraged and sorrowing, while words of warning and reproof are often given to erring ones in the audience.

Strangers to the seeress, approaching her, are at times, called by their names, and to their utter amazement, through her lips, are given the names of the angels of the dead. Children lost to their parents, and friends lost to each other, through the ministrations of angels have been restored to each other.

The doctrine of Christian fellowship; of purity, pure lives and good deeds, is invariably preached from the pulpit of this church, and no improper message has been given by the seeress since her ministrations commenced.

Sixth.—The attendance at our services rapidly increased; the substantiality of our messages attracted wide attention; the members and friends of the church were congratulating themselves that their work was rapidly meeting and rolling back the tides of infidelity, atheism and agnosticism; at least in this city, when we were maliciously and falsely assailed by enemies, through whose instrumentality we were accomplishing such results.

These attacks began to appear in the pages of newspapers, who delight to fill their pages with sensational articles, seize the opportunity; publish distorted, unfair, and, in many instances, absolutely false reports concerning what has transpired at our meetings. The enemy who holds the relation of pastor to this church, has been maliciously assailed; the manifestations which have occurred through her psychic powers, have been publicly ascribed to fraudulent acts; and irresponsible persons have been permitted the use of local newspapers for defaming her life and destroying her usefulness.

To this end the railings of a convicted criminal have been published against her while the testimony of honorable persons in her favor has been refused. An irresponsible mountebank, who has fattened on the proceeds of his own deceptions, and others, are according to the certain local newspapers, to assist her in her infidelity; to charge her with fraud, and pronounce her supporters dupes to her duplicity. Added to these outrages, the United States mails are used by her enemies to transmit annoying circulars, and in this manner violence against her person is threatened by anonymous writers, unless she desists from her work as pastor of this church.

We lay this statement of our grievances before the world, asking thereon the impartial judgment of all fair-minded persons. Some of our friends have sought to answer these assaults and charges through the medium of the press, which have published them; but they have often been refused, very frequently garbled, and in that condition published; and in some instances they have been so changed as to actually reverse the language of the writers.

Our minister has no interest in our door collections; our seats are free to all who have not forfeited the right to enter by their own misconduct. We ask for ourselves, to peacefully assemble; to conduct our services according to our views of duty. It is our right to believe, as we do, that Deity is most acceptably worshipped and served, by good deeds, pure hearts, and the use of those gifts which are conferred by Jesus, his apostles, and disciples. We promise nothing except an opportunity to quietly listen to and observe what is said and transpires.

Finally—We ask all those who read this memorial and believe and feel that the treatment to which we have been subjected, as hereinbefore set forth, has been unfair and unjust, and should be rebuked, irrespective of religious belief, to send to Dr. John C. Wyman, 365 State Street, or to the Rev. May S. Pepper, 258 Monroe Street, Brooklyn, or to any other member of our church, their names and addresses.

In conclusion, we invite all clergymen in our municipality to meet Mrs. Pepper, our officers and friends, in the near future, that they may witness and judge for themselves the source or sources of the powers manifested through her instrumentality.

Those desiring to accept this opportunity may signify their acceptance, by writing to that effect to Dr. John C. Wyman, 365 State Street, Brooklyn, Secretary of the church. When a sufficient number shall have signified their acceptance to warrant the expense, a time and place will be designated—probably a Saturday afternoon, between the hours of three and six—in the latter part of December or early part of January, for the place of meeting, and those accepting will be duly informed of the same. Cordially yours,

BOOK REVIEW.

The Element of Ethics, Founded on the Natural Laws of Mind as Revealed by Human Conduct. Being a Scientific Exposition of Ethical Science Founded on the Psychic Forces of Man as Physical Science is Founded on Physical Forces. By E. J. Schellhaus, M. D.

The title well explains the purpose of this book of 149 pages. We gather that it is a condensation of a much more ambitious design, which has been given by the writer by highest inspiration.

The author says: "It is unique in character; its pages contain matter nowhere else to be found in the range of scientific literature." It is true that never before has there been an attempt to establish ethics on the new psychological revelations.

"Ethics," says the author, "is the science of right conduct, having its place in the domain of the natural law of man's being." This makes a broad distinction between the old, preconceived ideas of morality and the new. It was not obedience to natural law, but to the undefined and undefinable notions of God, that constituted moral conduct.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION WHICH MUST BE ANSWERED.

Is the National Spiritualists Association a Christian Denomination?

The above question is addressed to the president and officers of the N. S. A.; to the Spiritualist press, and to the Spiritualists of the United States as a whole. It was suggested by two important facts which have just come to the knowledge of the writer.

1. In The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 25, is an article from Pendleton, Oregon, giving an account of the visit of Dr. R. E. Coon and wife to that place. They are represented as being missionaries of the N. S. A., and of course able and authorized to explain its character and principles to the world, and its relations to the various organizations of the same. They are supposed to be able to do this work, and sufficiently honest to do it correctly. Of them, the writers say, "We were also very glad to hear from him that the Hon. H. D. Barrett is, like himself, a Bible Spiritualist, and that at last our people are recognized as Christians." Here are three distinct assertions. (1) Dr. R. E. Coon, missionary of the N. S. A., is a "Bible Spiritualist." (2) H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., is also a "Bible Spiritualist." (3) "Our people are recognized as Christians."

Will Dr. Coon please tell us when and where we were "recognized as Christians," and who made that recognition? What Spiritualist or organization of Spiritualists ever sought for such recognition? Will the directors of the N. S. A. endorse these teachings and assertions of Dr. Coon, and keep him in the field as an authorized expounder of Spiritualism? We shall see. Has Dr. Coon been authorized by President Barrett to proclaim him as a Bible Spiritualist and Christian? Thousands of Spiritualists want to know.

2. The second fact is, that, unless my eyes deceived me, I have seen a statement of President Barrett that Spiritualism is a Christian denomination! Hence, it does not seem so strange that Dr. Coon should make the statements attributed to him. He is the appointed agent of President Barrett and the directors of the N. S. A. Now, do these directors assume to be "Christians," "Bible Spiritualists," and that the N. S. A. is a "Christian denomination"? Have they commissioned Dr. Coon as a Christian missionary to preach Bible Spiritualism? Will they continue to employ him now that the fact is published that that is the character of his teachings? We want to know.

Of course, no really liberal-minded person would make any objection to Dr. Coon, or anyone else, being Bible Spiritualists or Christians. Personally that is their unquestioned right. But that is quite a different thing from posing as agents of the N. S. A., and proclaiming its president a "Bible Spiritualist," and that Spiritualists were "recognized as Christians."

It has been evident to me for some years past that a secret purpose existed to convert the National Organization into a sect. Step by step that purpose has been pushed, from the adoption of the Creed till now. That Creed was confessedly adopted for the purpose of securing railroad rebates. But it was necessary that the Creed should be that of a religious body, and after working over the subject for some years the conclusion seems to have been reached that there can be no pretense of religion except the Christian; as it would not answer to profess the Mohammedan or any other foreign form of religion.

The workers along this line have not been able to formulate a defini-

A QUESTION.

Are Religious and Political Variations Necessary for Progress?

From the standpoint of our view in regard to the necessities of human life we would answer that they are needed. In making this assertion we are supported by the modern thought of the world; and it has arrived at this conclusion through a mighty struggle with the powers of darkness, and the light has triumphed, and the fact is being more and more recognized and conceded that if human life is to make a permanent advancement in a religious or political or social manner there must be a variety of opinions expressed on the best methods to be adopted for human advancement.

The more enlightened the races and nations of the world become, the more fully is recognized that great truth that there can be in positive "essentials" unity, in non-essentials liberty, and in all things charity. The variations of thought will make it a debatable question, but are the essentials what we demand for liberty of thought, and only by mutual recognition of the right to liberty of thought and action can there be normal progress. But those of the present time who are living mentally and spiritually in what is designated as the dark ages of the human history, and who are the essentialists, will come the demand for liberty of thought, and only by mutual recognition of the right to liberty of thought and action can there be normal progress.

THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Communication From One of the Teachers.

I feel that many of the readers of The Progressive Thinker are in sympathy with the idea that institutions of learning of the right kind, with able and well equipped teachers, can be made most efficient aids in the spread of any great truth as well as in the growth of individual souls. All such readers of this article, I assume, are interested in Morris Pratt Institute, and will read with interest any word coming from one of its inmates.

This is the fourth year of its existence. Though it is a healthy child, with rich red blood in its body, still it has not yet become strong enough to walk alone. It still needs assistance. I am happy to say, however, that with twenty-five or even twenty paying students in full term attendance it would be self-sustaining, provided it is managed with wisdom and economy.

In no way can one help the school more than by coming as a student or inducing others to come and take its courses of study. It was founded and its work was prepared especially for the benefit of the public and private advocates of Spiritualism, and all progressive thought.

Very many of the active speakers and writers need two years at such an institution as this for the improvement of themselves and their work.

The National Spiritualists' Association, which met in Minneapolis in October, 1904, voted $1000 towards freeing it from debt. Officers, teachers and students join in hearty thanks for the much-needed aid. To me personally it brought great relief, for it makes me feel like a convicted criminal to meet men on the street whom I owe and am unable to pay. It is almost a crime to go in debt under such circumstances.

I desire to say a word individually to the delegates of the National Association who voted for this donation. I wish to take you by the hand and say heaven bless you. I wish you to know that the teachers in this institution and the students also are determined that the work they do here shall be of such a quality as to richly merit this beautiful donation.

By your act you have identified yourselves with education in general and with this school in particular. I extend to you a hearty invitation to join the Morris Pratt Institute Association and help in its management. Please write for a catalogue and a copy of its newly formed constitution and by-laws, so that by their study you may have a better idea of what the school is and what it may be. If possible visit our classes and see our work.

Mr. and Mrs. Sprague have just paid us a visit. We were glad when they came, and sorry when they went. Forunately they were here every Sunday, and held two services. The evening meeting called out a larger audience than I have ever seen in the building, and we never had a service which gave better satisfaction. Both Mr. and Mrs. Sprague did noble work. I heard nothing but praise from those who attended. If what they did here is a sample of their work in general I can understand why the National keeps them in the field.

Miss Chaffee, who has been here either as student or teacher since the beginning of the school, has gone to Indiana to fit herself for higher work in the pedagogic field. She carries with her the hearts of all who knew her, both teachers and students. She is a good teacher, a faithful student, an earnest worker in the cause of truth and a sincere friend to this school and its inmates.

We have with us Mrs. Emma J. Owen, who is student, teacher, and Assistant Secretary. She takes Mrs. Hull's class in the Psychic Department, has Sunday class in Bible Spiritualism, a class daily in Arithmetic and shares with me in the Sunday services.

Mrs. Niver is still with us as teacher of Oratory, and is doing the same most excellent work as last year.

The students are making commendable progress, and represent the states of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Wisconsin, Oregon and Washington.

The spirit of harmony and good feeling pervades the building.

Mrs. Niver is still with us as teacher of Oratory, and is doing the same most excellent work as last year.

tion of religion which would cover the ground of all forms, and hence, have been compelled to plant themselves on the Christian form. They have been talking about "other denominations" for a long time, but at last President Barrett comes out flat-footed and proclaims Spiritualism a "Christian Denomination," and one of its agents announces that he is a "Bible Spiritualist," and that we are recognized as Christians!

In conclusion, I press the question, will the Spiritualist press endorse the assumption that we are a Christian denomination? I think I can give the answer of The Progressive Thinker, for in the same paper from which I have quoted, in an editorial I read, "At the very threshold of all our churches we are met with the declaration of Jesus, Matt. 10:34: 'Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword. Look at the bloody footprints of Christianity through all the centuries and that damnable declaration has been verified. Wars the most stupendous have marked every step of its progress.'"

"And then that awful doctrine of HATE which is still bearing fruit, the crop even enlarging, Luke 14:26—'If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' Hate, then, is an indispensable feature of Christianity. To eliminate it from the creed would be to destroy the basic feature of the faith."

If the other members of the Spiritualist press will give as emphatic an answer as has The Progressive Thinker, it will show Brother Barrett and his fellow Bible Christian Spiritualists that they have yet a big work to do before the Christian churches will recognize the N. S. A. as a "Christian denomination."

Brothers of the press, speak out. Let the people know where you stand. This is no time for dodging, or for covering up your real ideas. The Spiritualist and the general public have a right to know where you stand. Without going into a lengthy definition of Spiritualism, you can clearly say whether it is Christianity, or whether you are a "Bible Spiritualist." On behalf of thousands I demand a categorical answer.

And lastly, I appeal to the old veterans in the work to give their answer. I can't name them all, but will mention a few. There is Lyman C. Howe, Prof. Lockwood, Clegg Wright, Juliet Severance, and others. Dr. Peebles might admit he was a Bible Spiritualist, but I am sure he would agree with me that the great body of Spiritualists are not Christians.

Will Brother Howe and others consent to have Spiritualism programmed as a "Christian denomination"? Will they stifle their convictions for half-face rates on the railroads? That is what the Creed was gotten up for in the first place.

I denounce the entire pretense of Christianity as including Spiritualism. In the vigor of manhood I renounced the honors and wealth which the most advanced position in the church held out before me and urged upon me. I accepted poverty, the loss of friends as well as position for Spiritualism. For over fifty years, with the great majority of the Spiritualist lecturers and writers I have expounded the falsity and monstrosity of Christianity. And now with but two years between me and 90, if the Spiritualists, in their organized capacity, clothe themselves with the blood-stained, filthy garments of Christianity and Bible teaching, I will take up the fight anew, and end my earthly career proclaiming that Spiritualism which is "the Science and Philosophy of Life."

MRS. LOIE F. PRIOR.

She Captivates Her Large Audiences at Melbourne, Australia.

At the Bijou Theatre during September, Mrs. Prior's lectures have drawn great audiences, men and women alike listening with rapt attention to the high spiritual teaching of this gifted speaker. People who say that even in the Higher Spiritualism "there is no such comprehensive scheme embracing religious philosophy and science as in Theosophy," should attend lectures of Mrs. Prior's, and read the works of men in our ranks like Sir W. Crookes, Dr. A. Russell Wallace, A. J. Davis, Myers, and many others, and they will find that Spiritualism presents a religion soul-satisfying as that given by the Christ or Buddha, for it represents the very heart of the teachings of these illumined sons of humanity. As a specimen of the exalted teaching given by Mrs. Prior, we give a verbatim report of her address, "Ye Must Be Born Again." This was preceded by the reading of Sir Edwin Arnold's "She and He," familiar to most Spiritualists, but whose length precludes quotation. But a shorter poem, Walt Whitman's "Carol of Death," a great favorite of Mrs. Prior's, and typical of that great modern spiritual seer's inspired verse, and which formed the prologue to her lecture, entitled "Beyond the Horizon," is given below:

Come lovely and soothing death,
Undulate round the world, serenely arriving, arriving,
In the day, in the night, in all, to each,
Sooner or later delicate death.

Praise be the fathomless universe,
For life and joy, and for objects and knowledge, love,
And for love, sweet love—but praise!
Praise knowledge, praise love, praise!
For the sure-enwinding arms of cool-enfolding death.

Dark mother always gliding near with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?

Then I chant it for thee, I glorify thee above all,
I bring thee a song that when thou must indeed come, come unfeathered, untrammelled—
Approach strong deliverance,
When it is so, when thou hast taken them I joyously sing the dead,
Lost in the loving floating ocean of thee,
Laved in the flood of thy bliss O death.

From me to thee glad serenades,
Dances for thee I propose saluting thee, adornments and feastings for thee,
And the sights of the open landscape and the high-spread sky are fitting—
And life and the fields, and the huge and thoughtful night.

The night in silence under many a star,
The ocean shore and the husky whispering and creaking I adore thee,
And the soul turning to thee O vast and well-veiled death,
And the body gratefully nestling close to thee.

Over the tree-tops I float thee a song,
Over the rising and sinking waves,
Over the myriads of fields and the prairies wide,
Over the dense-pack'd cities all and the teeming hives and ways,
I float this carol with joy, with joy to thee O death.

Animals Have Reflective Capacity.
 Prof. Geo. H. Howison, head of the department of philosophy at the University of California, started his class in ethics a few days ago by declaring animals have reflective capacity which qualifies them to be classed as reasoning creatures corresponding to man's intelligence, the latter being assumed to be immortal.

The religion of Buddha was cited by Prof. Howison as an example of recognition given by a great religious teacher to the lower animals. Regarding the intelligence of animals, Prof. Howison said, as reported by a press dispatch:

"Animals have intellect, as do men. The difference in intellect consists in the difference in the hindrance to the intellectual capacity. Increased intelligence means increased control—perfect control. Do animals reflect as man does? Undoubtedly they do. If they reflect, then they have intelligence. Once admitted they have intelligence, you must admit they are to exist eternally just as much as you are to exist eternally. Are animals capable of overcoming the hindrance to their intellectual faculty? I answer yes."

Admitted the brute creation have souls and an immortal life, then, read Genesis 11:3—

"Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you."

Who, in his sober senses, believes God ever told Noah, or any other man, any such thing? The declaration savors of the demand of sacrifice of the best of the flocks and herds to God, he getting the aroma and the priests, who professed to voice the will of God, getting the flesh.

Established that our domestic animals have immortality with us, then the habit of flesh eating will only remove from cannibalism—will gradually disappear.

Coal in the Arctic Regions.
 One of the things the Zeigler Arctic Expedition reports to have discovered in the far North is coal mines. It is a most cheerful find for that section of the world.—Exchange.

Does not this discovery of itself demonstrate that the polar regions, now seemingly covered with everlasting ice, were formerly within the tropics? Some persons who wish it to appear God created everything as it now exists, making a general denial of scientific revelations of the great antiquity of the earth, have attempted to convert the proposition that there has been a changed polarity; but the above, with numberless other facts, all pointing in the same direction, should silence all controversy on the subject.

The only remaining question: Was that change produced by some mighty convulsion, such as would follow the addition of an immense weight from without to one side of the planet, thus throwing it out of balance, perhaps by the accumulation of ice at the poles sufficient to overbalance the equatorial region. We incline to the opinion this change has occurred, possibly many times, and in all probability will be repeated in the future. Nothing is stable but eternity. Even spirit is subject to change.

Change in Diagnosis.
 The Kansas City Star relates the following fact:

"In Abilene last week the doctors came very nearly making a mistake. When they found the patient had no money they changed their diagnosis from appendicitis, and instead of an operation they gave him three pills. The patient is now at work."

Many a valuable life would be saved if the surgeons could know there was not a big fee awaiting them for a needless operation. Two dollars would probably be a physician's charge for a visit to a person suffering from severe colic pains, with relief, while $200 is deemed a reasonable charge for the removal of the appendix. When surgeons are so plenty and generous reward for services are so seldom, why should not an occasional sufferer surrender his life to supply the doctor with spending money? Thus writes an old physician who is greatly disgusted because of the frequency of these surgical operations for appendicitis.

A Retort in Kind.

Wm. T. Stead, Esq., editor of the London Review of Reviews, has gained the reputation of being the champion of "the under dog in the fight." He had long witnessed the attacks of churchmen on the great thinkers of the age, and their classification of opponents with atheism. A Rev. Dr. Torrey, in a discourse alleged that infidelity and immorality are Siamese twins. Mr. Stead, by letter, inquired whether he included Darwin, Huxley, Morley and Bradlaugh, who were known infidels, as immoral men. Here the fun commenced.

Torrey dodged the issue, and made a bitter attack on the character of Thomas Paine and Col. Ingersoll.

We need not follow the defense of these men by the Review of Reviews. One sentence struck us as very just:

"It is perfectly legitimate to denounce false doctrine and to pillory its teachers, BUT IS IT RIGHT TO LIE ABOUT THEM?"

Then Editor Stead wants to know how Mr. Torrey, and churchmen generally, would be pleased if Moslems and Free thinkers were to revive the charges made against Jesus:

"1. That Jesus was a man of uncertain parentage, brought up in a disreputable neighborhood, was without honor in his own country, and wandered abroad without visible means of subsistence, or even a place in which to lay his head."

"2. That he was known to have held communication with the Devil in the wilderness, and was popularly believed to have cast out devils by his intimacy with Beelzebub, the prince of devils."

"3. That he was a wine-bibber and a glutton in his personal habits; that he paid little regard to the Sabbath day, or to the washing of hands; and that he publicly avowed a preference for publicans and harlots to the orthodox and respectable Pharisees, and the scribes learned in the holy law of God."

"4. That he was constantly in the company of publicans and sinners, and did not refuse the affection of loose women, one of whom made a public scene by a shameless demonstration of her love."

"5. That his affectionate relations with these women gave rise, in the profane history of later times, to grave imputations upon his character, and led some of his followers to omit from the gospels the story of his refusal to condemn a woman taken in the very act of adultery."

"6. That he constantly spoke evil of the constituted authorities in the church; and on one occasion he created a public riot by attacking vested interests in the temple, and made himself so intolerable a nuisance in Jerusalem, that the constituted authorities were obliged to arrest him and send him to trial."

"7. That he was tried three times: 1, before the Sanhedrin; 2, before Herod, and 3, before Pilate; and by their judicial verdict confirmed with enthusiastic unanimity by the populace, he was executed as a blasphemer against God's holy law, and for treason against the Roman empire."

Mr. Stead said this statement will grate horribly upon devout readers, and this is why he prints it; because it will enable them to feel somewhat the vexation they cause when they lie about Paine and Ingersoll.

Why Not Be Honest?

If all who secretly indorse the teachings of Spiritualism would step to the front and frankly admit they hold views in common with us and are determined to act in the future in harmony with their convictions, what a mighty revolution would follow! The churches, with their rotten, worm-eaten and worthless creeds, would soon go into bankruptcy. The preachers would be compelled to seek some worthy vocation to gain means of support, and all the world would be a gainder because of the change. The morals of the community would be greatly advanced. So long as people are taught the lie, they will pay the debts they owe in consideration of belief in him, so long will vice abound.

There are multitudes of zealous believers who decline acting with Spiritualists, and who shrink from being known, because of Mrs. Grundy. Lowell well expressed the truth when he wrote:

"They are slaves who fear to speak for the fallen and the weak; They are slaves who will not choose Hatred, scoffing, and abuse. Rather than in silence shrink From the truth they needs must think; They are slaves who dare not be In the right with two or three."

Figures Don't Lie.

That is a terrible showing, as gained from official statistics, and related by Judge Ladd of California, in closing a series of articles in the Truth Seeker, entitled "Christian Civilization." He says:

"The statistics of 1885 show the religious belief of the world's criminals. In the 60 American state prisons there were 41,335 Christians; 108 Jews, one infidel. In the English prisons, 145,383 Christians, and 379 of no belief. In the French prisons, 19,355 Christians, 12 Jews, 54 Mohammedans, and not a single infidel. In the prisons of Canada, of the 1,615 inmates, 55 per cent were Catholics, 45 per cent Protestants. In the American prisons there were 2,008 clergymen."

A HUMANE PETITION.

And How It Was Received by the Governor of Vermont.

Chicago, Dec. 5, 1905.

To the Honorable O. J. Bell,

Governor of Vermont,
 Dear Sir:—The Spiritualists of Chicago, while joining with their fellow citizens of every faith in expressions of pleasure over your visit to our city, yet would ask and entreat you to use your prerogative of executive clemency by commuting the death penalty about to be inflicted in your state upon Mrs. Mary Rogers to imprisonment for the term of her natural life.

We would urge upon your attention that capital punishment is a relic of the barbaric ages when man was dominated by a thirst for revenge and law was written by brute force, and that that practice is opposed to the enlightenment of this generation; that a wrong already done can not be righted by the doing of another similar and more horrible one; that the right to live is the most sacred gift vouchsafed to mortals and that no one other than Infinite Intelligence, the source of its bestowal, should limit its duration or destroy its exercise by every son and daughter of earth.

We would remind you that we are only re-emphasizing the plea that you temper justice with mercy made to you earlier in this case by the Spiritualists of the United States through the headquarters of their National Association, at Washington, D. C.

Spare us this brutal shock to the finer nature of millions of your fellow-countrymen and prevent a blot, which can never be erased from the history of your noble state.

We are with respect,
 The Chicago Spiritualists' League,
 By its Executive Board: George B. Warner, M. A. Cross, W. B. Aitken, C. Kirchner, C. A. Burgess, Mrs. Laura G. Fiken, Mrs. Wm. Hilbert, H. F. Arnold, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, J. H. Randall, A. G. Cleveland, Mrs. R. S. Ray, John A. Toren.

The Chicago Tribune of December 6, after mentioning receipt of the above and one other similar petition by Governor Bell, quotes him as saying: "I have received several other communications regarding the same matter and they shall all go into the waste basket with those that I have received previously. What puzzles me is why this great interest on the part of Illinois people in the transaction of the affairs of Vermont."

The boorish brusqueness of Governor Bell's language indicates that he believes the people of Vermont are a special order of creation, wholly distinct from the great family of humanity—that he fails to sense that a wrong done to one, though the most unfortunate, is a wrong done to all the eighty millions of our people.

Never mind! the time is not far at the longest when he will find himself in the political scrap heap of "has-beens."

Psychic Developments.

The Chicago Chronicle administers a richly merited rebuke to certain scientists, in a well-considered editorial article. It would be well for the class mentioned to take the lesson to heart and profit thereby. They would appear much wiser before the intelligent thinking world, than they do at present. Says the Chronicle:

Considering the advance which psychic phenomena it is singular to deny that some men of scientific standing continue to lump all such phenomena together and to stigmatize them as fraudulent without exception. Thus a British scientist places himself on record as denying the authenticity of telepathy and similar phenomena, although he holds in high esteem, in everything else, he would only scoff at me, and say, "Oh, nonsense, Anna! It is all bosh!"

Finally when the Doctor came to the city I urged him to go with me, and he being so positive that there was nothing in it, said, "Well, to please you I will go on one condition—that you will let me fix the slates myself."

I agreed, and the slates were bought and four screws used, one at each corner, also a rubber hinge (as a non-conductor to electricity) as he said. Without my knowledge he carried a screwdriver in his pocket to use in opening the slates. After we had reached the hotel, he said to me: "Now, Anna, if any of your ghosts can write in those slates, I'll pay the bill for the seance, and will be a Spiritualist the rest of my days."

We had been sitting about ten or fifteen minutes conversing when to our utter amazement, a large chair sitting across the room started slowly to rise, and kept moving faster and faster until it reached the ceiling, and then came down gradually to the floor. Then the Doctor said to me, "There is standing by your side a young man who says, 'take one of those slates on the table and hold it under the table.' He wishes to send you a message."

I followed his directions, when we all three heard distinctly the writing going on, even to crossing the 'i's and dotting the 't's. Then came a loud rap."

The Doctor said, "Your message is done." I drew out the slate and this is the message (from my own brother who had passed away at the age of 21, when I was but 9 years old):

"My Darling Sister:—I come to you as though you were behind prison bars. Were you to have your freedom, you would have the power to convince the world that we do live and love those we have left behind us. Keep on in investigations. You are destined to be a great teacher. Father, mother and all the loved ones who are with me, send greetings. I am your loving brother, Walter Kimball Willson."

Now, Henry Slade did not even know my name or my brother's who had been gone so long.

He Is Simply Ignorant.

"The man who denies the Phenomena of Spiritualism to-day is not entitled to be called a skeptic; he is simply ignorant; and it would be a hopeless task to attempt to enlighten him."—T. J. Hudson, "Law of Psychic Phenomena," p. 206.

AN UNBELIEVER CONVERTED.

Seance With Dr. Henry Slade at Bay City, Mich.

I do not wish to lose a single copy of your valuable paper. I am reading "The Light Among the Hills," and am delighted with it. I also wish to say a few words in regard to our arisen brother, Dr. Henry Slade. A finer medium never lived on earth, excepting Jesus of old. I still have in my possession two slates containing a message from my brother-in-law, written about nineteen years ago under conditions that nothing but the one who wrote it could have written it.

It was at a sitting my father-in-law, Henry Laraway of East Saginaw, Mich., (now passed on) and myself had with Henry Slade at Bay City, Mich., at the leading hotel, Frazier House, in broad daylight, at 2 p. m.

I had tried to convince my father of the truth of spirit return many times, but although he held me in high esteem in everything else, he would only scoff at me, and say, "Oh, nonsense, Anna! It is all bosh!"

Finally when the Doctor came to the city I urged him to go with me, and he being so positive that there was nothing in it, said, "Well, to please you I will go on one condition—that you will let me fix the slates myself."

I agreed, and the slates were bought and four screws used, one at each corner, also a rubber hinge (as a non-conductor to electricity) as he said. To Societies and All Connected With the N. S. A.
 Official announcement of the transition of Brother S. D. Dye of Los Angeles, Cal., has but recently been received at this office. The passage of spirit life of this esteemed friend and co-worker, leaves a vacancy on the board of trustees of the N. S. A. Already many Spiritualists from the West have been named as candidates for the office. The N. S. A. constitution, Art. V, Sec. 9, declares that a vacancy upon the board must be filled by the remaining trustees by ballot. As the will be no meeting of the board until May next there can be no balloting for the successor to Brother Dye until that occasion.

Spirit Points Out Hidden Mine

Ghost of Dead Miner Tells His Grandson, W. E. Bartlett of Wenatchee, How to Locate Lode Rich in Mineral.
 Following Directions Through Medium, Two Men Find Claim Discovered by D. E. Ingels in '56—Treasure-Studded Quartz Fills Lode and Wealth Beyond Dreams is in Sight—Story Well Vouched For.

To the Editor:—The clipping herewith, from the Times, Seattle, Wash., just received from my brother at Seattle, covers a very remarkable case, the truth of which I can vouch for in every particular, as Mr. Ingels has time and again spoken to me about this lost mine through the lips of his daughter and medium during the last few years. This will be wonderful news to the people of Washington, Oregon and Idaho, who have known about it ever since Mr. Ingels was shot.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
 Wenatchee, Wash.—Bringing a bottle filled with almost pure gold, taken from a lode long hidden in mountain fastnesses, not far from here, W. E. Bartlett and M. C. Black, both well-known business men are back after a perilous trip to the Cascades. Theirs, however, was labor richly rewarded, though the story is so interwoven with Spiritualism and romance that it is well incredible.

Bartlett is the grandson of D. E. Ingels, a miner of the early '50's in these parts, who was murdered in the hills by his partner. The Bartlett family are Spiritualists and Bartlett declares his dead and murdered grandfather sent word to him to find the lost mine and he would be independent for life.

Directions From the Dead.
 Bartlett, who is the proprietor of the Pacific House here, swears positively that he received specific directions from the spirit of his grandfather how to proceed to the lost mine. Moreover, he was told to select M. C. Black, a second-hand dealer here, to accompany him. The men will not tell of the location of their find, but say it cannot be reached save by making an extremely dangerous trip and one with hard ship, especially at this time of the year when the mountains are firmly in winter's grasp. In the spring they will return and develop their find.

In a rough and mountainous section, they say, they found a gray quartz ledge, literally filled with precious metal. Small pieces were broken off, pounded up in a frying pan which they had with them and the gold panned out by the men's fingers and placed in a bottle. Should the ledge prove as rich as the samples, a man could make a

Reveal Burial Place.
 In this connection it might be added that the man D. E. Ingels was shot down by his companion, Jack Knot, at a place just above where the town of Cashmere now stands. He was not instantly killed, but was brought down the river near the present site of Wenatchee. He lived about twenty-four hours after being shot and his remains were interred two and a half miles up the Columbia river. When the family had made diligent search for the body and supposed it had been buried in Southern Oregon. Not until last summer was the resting place finally revealed by a medium. Mr. Bartlett came here as directed and found parties who had known the grandfather and knew of the circumstances of his death and the place of burial.—Seattle (Wash.) Times.

AN INTERESTING PUZZLE.

And It Comes Under the Ghostly Order.

The Bradford (England) Daily Telegraph had an interesting paragraph upon a puzzle of the so-called ghostly order which awaits solution at Knareborough. An old house, known to tourists as the Old Manor House, has, during the residence of the present occupant, Mr. A. W. Howes, been restored.

In the course of the alterations the skeleton of a woman was found buried at the foot of the staircase. Mr. Howes disclaims all beliefs in ghosts, but he says there is something about the building which cannot be explained away. Formerly he and his wife occupied the blue bed room, where stands an old oak bedstead on which Oliver Cromwell once rested. During the night sounds of footsteps are heard on the landing, and Mr. Howes says, it is impossible to keep the door of this room closed. "We have locked it, and put a chair against it," he says, "and in the morning we have found it open. There are no draughts to account for it, and since we have moved out of this room the footsteps have still been heard. On one occasion they were accompanied by a bump against the door of our present room."

Mr. Howes is very jocular on the subject of his ghost, and says that neither he nor his family are alarmed, or indeed believe in the supernatural, but after an experience of fifteen years of the house they are still at a loss to account for the sounds. "We used to say it was Oliver's ghost," he remarks, "but now we say it is the woman whose skull we keep on the staircase." We hope the Psychical Research Society will make some investigation of this Knareborough "ghost."—The Two Worlds.

"CANADA A BACK NUMBER."

A special dispatch to the Chicago American says:
 Ottawa, Ont., Dec. 6.—Canadians are thoroughly enraged over the caustic criticisms of the Dominion by Sarah Bernhardt. The French actress is here after a tour of the province, where she has been, following an interview to which they objected.

This is what she is reported to have said, the cause of the trouble:
 "I love Canada, but understand nothing about your people. You have English Canadians, Irish-Canadians, French-Canadians, Quebec-Canadians, and you tell me why you call yourselves French! You people! Why, you have hardly a drop of French blood in your veins!"

"You have a fine country, but that is all. Agriculture has gone ahead, but the rest has stood still. You have no painters; you have no students; you have no sculptors; you have no poets; you have no men. You are stagnant in twenty-five years, but backward."

And to express that opinion, Bernhardt made a gesture which conveyed all her contempt. And then she added: "You owe to the clergy that progress backwards, which makes your country look like Turkey."

The Argument and Conclusion.

Or Proofs of Man's Endowment and Continued Existence After the Death of the Body, Based Upon Facts of Evolution, Heredity, and the Dual Nature of Mind.

Spiritualism has probably never encountered an abler critic or examiner than Thomson J. Hudson, who, while endeavoring to disprove its claims, gave, to my mind, the strongest scientific proof ever yet adduced in its favor; for in arguing for the continued existence of the human soul after the death of the body, he unwittingly establishes in a scientific manner all that the spiritualist can ask, viz., a philosophy that makes clear the possibility of communion and return after death.

I accept Mr. Hudson's theory of the duality of mind, because it accords with facts; and as he accepts the phenomena of the seance as genuine, evidencing the activity and powers of the soul, I shall only claim the inevitable bearings of his argument, without disputing his well-founded basis.

I am a Spiritualist because Spiritualism is supported by the new psychology, by spirit communion, and by the facts of evolution. Mr. Hudson was a deep thinker and distinguished writer, but by no means free of orthodox bias, which plainly influenced his thought and judgment, and made him by so much less a freethinker. Nevertheless great honor is due him for the new philosophy of mind, which alone accounts for all the facts and phenomena pertaining to Modern Spiritualism, and fully satisfies enlightened reason, and must be credited to his inquiring mind, however much assisted by others. But it is my indefeasible right to think, weigh, and pass judgment upon his arguments and deductions; and I shall endeavor to do so in a logical and reasoning way, seeking only a conception of truth, fairly deducible from the facts and premises he so ably presents and uses for his purpose. But I must think that he built better than he thought; and as he accepted the facts and discoveries set forth by Darwin, Haeckel, Romanes, and others of evolutionary school, but criticised them for abruptly halting as they came to the protoplasmic base of organic life, refusing to follow the law of heredity farther, and thus failing to find the Divine ancestor of man; just so I must criticize him for his failure to apprehend the logical sequence of his discovered facts and arguments.

Darwin did a great work in discovering the descent of man from the monera; and Hudson did little less in accepting Darwin's facts and applying to the monera the same law of heredity as Darwin finds accompanying the descent of man, which makes the monera inherit his powers and attributes from an ancestor that can be none other than the Creator or Divine energy immanent in Nature and everywhere in the universe.

As man is indebted to his ancestors, near and remote, for his powers of mind and body, so the monera must be indebted for his heritage agreeable with the constancy of Nature's laws; and this primary ancestor of life must be God, and man the ultimate conception of the Divine mind; and this is what the theory of evolution declares. I say theory, but it has come to be more, the accepted philosophy of scientific minds the world over, abundantly verified by investigation, observation and experiment.

Now what is evolution, and what does it teach? Evolution means progressive change and unfolding of possibilities and potentialities resident in matter, structure, and being; as, e. g., the probable evolution of protoplasm from conglomerate slime, the evolution of the flower and fruit from the bud, or the animal from the egg.

Now, clearly, all physical life must have been somewhere in time conceived and evolved from something of a physical or material nature. The same must be true of mind or soul life; it, too, must have been conceived sometime and evolved from something of mind or soul character; and the remotest ancestor of each must be mind and matter, both of which are indestructible and co-existent entities, and co-extensive with the universe.

I think this point must be accepted as incontrovertible; and it obliges us to go back in time anterior to the cytochrome to find the most primitive beginning, or foundation of organized physical and soul life on this planet. We must indeed visit the atomic realm with microscope, retort, laboratory implements, and chemical knowledge, and acquaint ourselves with atomic characters, affinities, and evolutionary forces, here, also, observable and as indubitably basic and purposeful as found in subsequent assemblages of matter in more advanced forms.

It has been said that life is motion, and so it is: for there can be no life without motion; the very atoms are in perpetual vibration, altogether engaged in the initiative or rudimentary stage of evolution; and so the rocks and the mud are alive, and the springing clod attests its importance; while atoms, worlds, and universes are in ceaseless activity, propelled by Divine love manifest in affinities constantly choosing partners and engaging continuously in the wondrous work of Creation;

Love came with vested wings of light,
On wisdom's mission sent,
And drove the darkness into night,
And through the chaos went,
Arousing all the forces there,
And bidding them awake,
And, each allotted, active share,
In evolution take.

Love spoke and breathed into the clay
Immortal life of God;
And, as the sun commands the day
And wakens up the sod,
So it invigorates the soul
And life of every kind Throughout the grand stupendous whole,
And moves subjective mind.

Yes, the atoms are alive; and, influenced by light, heat, and electricity, effect changes, integrations and disintegrations, combinations and dissolutions in successive and ever increasing complexities looking toward higher intent, and eventuating, finally, in organization.

That the atoms possess life and the power of selection and creation, may be demonstrated by experiment; for example, with sulphuric acid and the several bases, baryta, strontia, potassa, soda, lime, magnesia, and ammonia, thus named in order of their respective affinities, exercise choice in natural selection, combinations and dissolutions; baryta separating sulphuric acid from its compounds with all the other substances named, because having a greater affinity for the first named and least for the last mentioned ammonia. Thus all the simple elements and their compounds possess individuality and inherent force which makes them indispensable in the evolutionary life and work of creation. They compose the bed of higher delivery, and are legitimately ancestral.

To further illustrate: Hydrogen and oxygen unite in definite proportions to form water; carbon and oxygen to form carbonic acid. Both these compounds, thus created, are essential elements, since neither vegetable nor animal life can exist without them. Thus simple elements unite by force of affinity, and new entities are formed, which, again, may associate with others, forming integrations, divorcements and unions in ceaseless activities; and all the time making way for more advanced sequels, and as surely getting ready for the coming man.

The earth having emerged from its fiery cradle and wrapped itself in congealed and hardened vestment, wavy, seamed, and cracked by the surging sea within, responsive to the all-pervading energy, solar and chemical, continues its travel; while the waters roll, tumble and foam in great ocean beds, and rocks are corroded, washed, and ground into mud and slime by the action of waves, wind and tide, for millions of years, evolving conditions and getting ready for the germinal conception and birth of organic life in vital beds of basic protoplasm; and the wonderful moneron appears, the honored progenitor and remotest ancestor of man, who, thus conceived in the womb of Mother Earth, comes up from the dust, or from the mind and matter, by gradient steps, at length a born child of the Infinite.

Monads ushered into being,
Prophecy of higher life,
Coming with the forces turning Evolution wheels of strife,
Through successive rolling ages,
Making way for coming man,
For philosopher and sage,
As the mystic river can.

Having now summarily considered the forces in control on our planet anterior to the existence of organic life up to the advent of the moneron, we may next inquire after it, and learn what we may of its constitution and possessions. Having found its positive ancestor among the atoms to be none other than the Divine energy, or All-mind; and that it is a germ of the same, which, in the gestatory period of evolution, comes to be man, we may find increased interest to know of its powers, attributes and destiny.

It is unanimously agreed by scientific minds schooled in Biology that man has inherited his faculties and attributes of mind from the lower animals, near and remote. This being the case the potentialities of manhood must reside in the lowest forms of animal life; and of the mind of the moneron is a germ of the Infinite Mind, and therefore ancestor of the human mind, then the attributes of both must be the same in kind; and to this corollary all learned biologists substantially agree; and it is also agreed that the transmission of attributes is governed by the law of heredity, and that all creatures have come into possession of both mind and body organs and faculties by inheritance. This being true, all inheritance must be traceable back to the Infinite cause of all being, the one ancestor of all life we call God; and to know the development of any gradient is to know its place or station in evolutionary descent. The moneron, being the first station, will have the most rudimentary embryonic possessions, the mere germinal beginning of the highest ultimatum of mind and body. The right of the monera to these findings, comprising the animal instincts, is unquestioned; and that they are the endowment of an ancestor must be as true as that the faculties of man are inherited; which constitutes him a child of the Infinite parent, possessed of powers and attributes which, sufficiently enlarged and extended, would make him a god. And here the brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God is expressed in one common heritage, which must be as everlasting as its source is eternal.

And, now, to continue the argument for the continued existence of the human soul in ever brightening realms, we may examine its powers and adaptations in the light of Hudson's New Psychology, which makes possible a most rational explanation of all psychic phenomena; and its correctness alone makes intelligible man's conscious journey beyond the tomb. Mr. Hudson in all three of his excellent books makes it clear and satisfactory to my intelligence that man possesses a dual mind, a brain mind and a soul mind, which he designates as objective and subjective. And he shows conclusively that the objective mind is the function of a physical organ, the brain; and therefore must perish with the physical body to which it belongs; while the subjective mind is that of the soul, endowed with Godlike powers that adapt it to another and more advanced life than this; the objective serving only the necessities of a material existence in a preparatory school, as it were, for the growth and development of the subjective mind, soul, or spirit for its more extended and higher life, the two normally acting synchronously for the welfare of both. As Paul would put it, "the one is a natural body and the other a spiritual body."

But how demonstrate these averments? Well, firstly, we may know that we have a mind and body; and that the mind we associate in thought with the brain belongs to the body, and like it must and does rest or sleep for recuperative purpose, and that it may be paralyzed with anesthetics, or its action inhibited by hypnotism; and that during the time of these imposed states the vital functions continue undisturbed, which could not be if dependent upon the brain mind; and, too, during these times, psychical phenomena, foreign to the normal state, are often witnessed, attesting the existence of another mind control differing from that of the brain mind, an all-pervading mind presiding over the vital functions and even on which the brain and all other organs of the body depend for life and strength, making it the most important by far of the two minds.

And it is learned, too, that the brain mind is not even essential to life; for life with the subjective mind existed on this planet untold ages before a brain was formed. And, too, the brain has been removed by scientific experimenters from different animals, as of birds, frogs, and reptiles, and still the animal lived and manifested instinctive traits, showing that the instinctive powers do not belong to the brain mind, and must, therefore, be associated with the soul-mind.

And it is further ascertained that in the ontogenetic or embryonic history of man, as in the phylogenetic history of the race, there is a time in the beginning when the embryonic man is without organs, even, and for quite an interval without a brain; showing that the soul or subjective mind, even precedes organization, and is the first born; and creator of the objective body; and being a segmentation, vital spark of the Divine mind, is the reason why its creative power is manifest thus at the very threshold of organic being; and, as with the germinal beginning of man, so also with the primordial beginning of the human race, the human soul is first, and out of its heterogeneous vital material at hand, in its own mystic way, it deftly constructs the form of its conception, the objective or physical man.

The soul, then, is the builder and proprietor of its own house, which is used only during its short stay in a material world, and then dissolves back to dust from when it came, because no longer of service. But what of the soul's destiny when its house of clay is abandoned? This is the great question, an old one, and ever recurring one: "If a man die, shall he live again?" In making answer we may succeed best, I think, by acquainting ourselves with the life forces, equipment, and adaptations of the soul; and to do this we may find in Thomson J. Hudson our most worthy and able assistant; for his claim, I believe, as to the powers of the soul, remains unquestioned. In his "Divine Pedigree of Man," after establishing the fact of the duality of mind, and showing the objective mind to be the function of the brain, and the subjective mind to be the function or capacity of the soul, he proceeds to investigate and learn of its possessions; and he tells us of powers distinctly its own, and which are of no use in this life, but are perfectly adapted to a life in a more sublimated sphere, the heaven of which it dreams. He names these faculties "Intuition, Memory, Telekinesis, Telepathy, and Natural Emotions," the last Pope seems to have denominated universal love. It is the altruistic instinct, the other-regarding, the opposite of selfishness.

Now, these faculties duly comprehended and questioned, will, I think, afford the most conclusive evidence of a future life, and explain psychic phenomena, otherwise unaccountable and most often occurring at spiritual seances and in hypnotic and abnormal states.

Let us notice telepathy first: What is it? It is that power by which one subjective mind or soul communicates with another, and may do so all unbeknown to the objective mind of the individual engaged. And so the psychic or medium may dish up, as it were, from the subjective mind of the sitter, or member of a circle knowledge of things there stored and astonish the audience with communications the source of which neither the medium nor any one else may understand, but believe to come from friends passed on. Mr. Hudson would thus account for all spirit communications without foreign control. But be it observed that he labors at great length, and most ably indeed, to show that this faculty has no advantageous use in this life, but is perfectly adapted to answer the wants of the soul beyond; which fact he argues, is the best possible proof of the soul's continued existence; and, mind you, with Mr. Hudson's accorded faculties, of which more anon.

Mr. Hudson likewise discovers telekinesis energy as belonging to the soul, without use or adaptation here, but indispensable in the realm of spirit life. And what is telekinesis? It is that energy of the soul-mind by which it levitates ponderable substances and controls matter. Now, this power of subjective mind has been so frequently and clearly demonstrated as that it is no longer disputed as being an attribute of the human soul. And what is it for? But one answer can in reason be given, viz: Without useful purpose here, it must be a part of the soul's equipment for use in "that home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

And a subjective memory is discovered, not belonging to the brain mind; for when the latter is inhibited by hypnosis, trance or, otherwise, then the subjective mind's power to relate anything ever read, heard or learned, with perfect exactness is most convincing, as memories are related long since forgotten by the objective mind. And this wonderful possession can be none other than the treasure-house of the soul, where its gathered riches are safely kept to be realized and constitute its wealth in the beyond, where more than bread is required for its happiness and expansion. This attribute differs from recollection which is a faculty of the brain and dies with this organ, serving only a material existence. The soul memory ensures a continued knowledge of our individuality, and that of our relatives and friends, and all acquaintances, as well as of all things whatsoever.

And now, lastly, the Emotions, or Universal love, may receive our attention. It is the altruistic instinct, the all-regarding sentiment, most clearly expressed in the second commandment: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Like the Infinite Love, its domain is the Universe, and it will accompany the soul wherever knowledge makes way; and, with sweet memories, happiness may be rendered complete and heaven, indeed, realized.

Thus in a summary manner I have partially reviewed Mr. Hudson, and might stop here but for the fact that I find him engaged against Spiritualism, and strangely in dispute with himself; for his proofs of a future life are certainly, to my mind, the strongest philosophical support anywhere to be found for the claims of this modern religious cult. And how? Clearly and briefly, as I have shown, his great and most successful effort has been in proving the subjective mind or soul the descendant of God, not subject to death, but equipped with all the attributes and powers essential to a continued existence in the realm of its dream. And, as the soul at the death of the body is simply released and advanced in uninterrupted possession of its earth-born powers, I must ask, in the name of sense, what is there to make impossible the same communication as he avers often occurs here? If, as he declares, and as I believe, subjective minds can and do communicate with one another here, and death is only transition, in which there is no derangement or interruption of the powers of the soul, how escape, in all fairness, the admission that spirits may and do communicate with mortals here? To simplify: If A's subjective mind can communicate with B's subjective mind here, as he avers, and A dies tomorrow, why may he not continue in full possession of its powers? Either this or Mr. Hudson's psychology must come to naught.

If telekinesis is a divinely inherited attribute of the soul, by which it levitates and controls things here, at times, then this attribute must as surely be retained; and spirits passed on may return, materialize, manipulate chairs, tables, violins, and other furniture at will, as is done under test conditions, as often witnessed at intelligent gatherings. I have myself received written communications on inside folded slates, without pencil, in my own house, in noon-day light, with but two of us, myself and the medium, sitting at a table, our hands joined together, with slate underneath, and in such position as to make trickery impossible. I have witnessed innumerable manifestations of the subjective mind's power, and must agree that it requires far less sacrifice of reason and judgment to believe than disbelieve in psychic phenomena and its import confirmatory of human hopes. Nor do I think Mr. Hudson altogether so skeptical as he would seem in his first two publications; for in his last book, "The Divine Pedigree of Man," Page 372, speaking of telekinesis as evidencing the divinity of the soul and its adaptation to another existence, the continuation of this, he says: "This power, whether it emanates from spirits of the dead or spirits of the living, is clearly a spiritual or mental force or energy. It is an energy that moves and controls matter independently of physical organism; for it endows inert ponderable substances with apparent intelligence. That is to say, it not only causes ponderable bodies to move, but to answer questions intelligently by prescribed movements. It emanates therefore, from some intelligence and is controlled by volition. That intelligence is the subjective mind of man. Embodied or disembodied, it is the mind of a human soul."

Mr. Hudson's analysis of Spiritualism was evidently very far from satisfactory to himself, for in his book, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena," Page 206, he says: "Neither will I undertake to say that the spirits of the dead do not and cannot communicate with the living. I do not know." He finds "no valid evidence" in spiritual phenomena supportive of the claims of Spiritualism; and, yet his philosophy of mind brings to light the very ways and means abundantly significant, and even declarative for the claims he argues against; for in all three of his books he very ably shows man possessed of soul endowed with the special faculties all-sufficient for disembodied spirit communication and materialization; and at no time positive but that the spirits of the dead do and may return or communicate; and showing, as he does, the ability of subjective minds or souls to communicate in this life; and claiming that death rather increases their power than otherwise, it seems almost incredible but that he must have been conscious of the plain import and logical necessity of his philosophy.

But all honor to the man for such fruitful inquiry and penetrating research as has given to the world much of new and advanced thought, and to man a mind other than the brain mind, "a segmentation of the Infinite Mind" wherewith we may tread our way in the Father's kingdom, and ours by inheritance forever, in that we are the children of God.

I cannot close the argument without inviting attention to visitations from those dead from accident or violence. For example, a daughter takes leave of the mother and boards a railway train for a visit, and is suddenly killed in a wreck. As suddenly her objective life is ended, and she at once appears to and is recognized by the mother in a vision at the time of the accident, and the twin hold converse as naturally as if nothing had happened, and the mother knows she saw and conversed with her daughter before she knew of the accident.

I know Mr. Hudson would call this a case of subjective projection, the power to do which he accredits to the subjective mind. Very well; and it is stronger, he says, at such time; indeed, he says its strength increases as the hold upon objective life diminishes. Then it must be in this case, as in innumerable other and similar cases, the thread of objective life completely cut, the spirit is freed, and at once avails itself of its possession and goes naturally to its mother, clothed in a way to make itself known.

The power to do so is essentially admitted in the accredited attributes of the human soul. And the full possession of ways and means certainly argues the possibility of their use; and as innumerable occurrences, as narrated, are on record, do not the facts, in all fairness, declare for the soul's continued existence and possibility of return? If not, why not, and how account for the facts?

Premonitions, presentiments, visions, and telepathic communications are of frequent report, by which means catastrophes have been averted, individuals visited and instructed, as was Peter, as though by some invisible guardianship. Communications from the dead, descriptive of the way and manner of their departure, or expressive of some desire, seem actually to occur, just as might be expected if our present and future states are related as claimed by all believers in a continued existence for man, which must truly be, unless man is deceived by his hopes and intuitions.

And now I am tempted to give one more argument by interrogation, and in rebuke of the many always pointing the way to heaven, but never seeing the way back. If one goes either to a far country or to a near one, does he take the roadway up after him, as it were. And as surely as he goes may he not also return? What kind of logic is it that allows one a roadway to Washington, London, or Rome, but no way by which to return? Convince me that the departed cannot return, and you as surely convince me that death ends all. And do not you of the Christian faith believe that Christ returned, and that Moses and Elias materialized and made themselves seen upon the "Mount of Transfiguration"? And do you reject the many spiritual visions narrated in the book of your faith? Consistency in argument is reason, without which, aside from instinct, we can believe nothing.

And now in conclusion I must say that I am a Spiritualist because all the facts and discoveries of scientific men, and of honest inquiry, conducted for the sole purpose of arriving at the truth, make comprehensive and logically necessary the possibility and fact of spiritual communication and return. And this is the one fundamental and unanimous belief among Spiritualists. No sectarianism dwarfs reason, feeds selfishness, or hinders the soul in its upward flight. Freedom of thought and freedom of wing are the cherished rights, freely conceded to all. I am a Spiritualist because Spiritualism is broad and inspiring in its conceptions, and would give light and hope to all mankind, and lift up the downtrodden into a freer and nobler life, and reveal to the eye of man a realm of infinite progress, love and beauty stretching away, on and on, through a universe of kindred worlds and spirit homes, where ever increasing light and happiness forever welcome his advance,—

In Love and Truth that's everywhere

Where enlightened spirits dwell,
And broad and deep as human thought,
And inspiration tell;
And boundless as intelligence
That numbers all the stars,
And rules the planets, every one,
Our earth the same as Mars,
And finds God's children, worshipful,
On worlds that roll in space
Around the many suns that warm,
Each one a thinking race.

Ah, yes, we'll soon be over there,

Where love and justice reign
And make a paradise world
Above material plain,
For such as build their hopes upon
The wealth that cannot fade,
When once 'tis gathered fairly in,
And one's possession made
Of truth and righteousness and light,
As claim the highest goal,
And better make the future state
Of every living soul.

In dreams I see the boundless realm,
With pearly gates ajar,
And glorious light that never dims,
So that no night is there;

And fountains clear as crystal feed
The tree of life that grows,
And bears forever fruit for all,
Who, laying down their oars,
And going from the world of dust,
In spirit form, into
The higher sphere, may feast and grow,
And live as angels do.

Eye Glasses Not Necessary.

Eye Sight can be Strengthened, and all Forms of Diseased Eyes Cured without Cutting or Drugging.

That the eyes can be strengthened so that eye glasses can be dispensed with in the great majority of cases, has been proven beyond a doubt, by the testimony of thousands of people who have been cured by this wonderful "Actina" instrument called "Actina." Actina also cures sore and granulated lids, Glaucoma, Iritis, etc., also removes Cataracts and Myopia without cutting or drugging. Over seventy thousand of the Actina have been sold, and the instrument is not an experiment but an absolute fact. The following letters are but samples of those that are received daily:

Mrs. M. E. Champney, 242 West 184th St. New York City, writes: "The 'Actina' cured my eyes after the doctors said there was no cure outside an operation. I have been entirely well for over four months, and can see to read and sew as well as before. I am honestly recommending 'Actina' to all afflicted eyes."

Emily Kray, 1202 Calumet Street, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, writes: "The 'Actina' I purchased from you a year ago saved my brother's eyes. My brother was near-sighted, wore numerous eye and six glasses, and now he can go to school and do all his work and study without glasses."

E. R. Holdbrook, Deputy County Clerk, Fairfax, Va., writes: "I have used the 'Actina' for several years, and it has cured my eyes. I have been cured of my eyes, and I can see to read and sew as well as before. I am honestly recommending 'Actina' to all afflicted eyes."

Actina is not a drug or lotion, but a small pointed battery, which can be used by old and young with perfect safety. It is not dangerous to do any harm with Actina. Every member of a family can use the one Actina for any form of disease of the eye, ear, or throat. The instrument will last for years, and is always ready for use. Actina is sent on trial postpaid.

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers; Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows the freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is not intended to be a platform for the expression of views, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine, and that it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be subject to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and sometimes to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be sent into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR LETTERS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

We desire the work, "MORAL EDUCATION," by Prof. Joseph Rodas Buchanan. Who has a copy?

L. Wilcox writes: "The first of a series of socials to be held at the home of Ada Zazelle, Nov. 27, was very largely attended. A splendid musical program was rendered and test by Mrs. Zazelle pleased all. A bounteous lunch was served and dancing enjoyed by all. Next social, Dec. 18. Something unique."

Harry J. Moore is lecturing for the First Society of Spiritualists of Seattle, Wash., at present. Any societies or individuals, within a reasonable distance from Seattle, wishing to employ the services of a speaker and message medium for week evening meetings during December can reach him there. Address all letters and telegrams to him at 1021 East Pine street, Seattle, Wash., until further notice.

L. W. BILLINGSLEY, A PROMINENT LAWYER OF LINCOLN, NEB., WRITES: "YOUR PAPER I PRIZE VERY MUCH AS IT IS BROAD, LIBERAL, PUNGENT AND PROGRESSIVE. IT IS A GREAT THOUGHT STIMULATOR."

The Hudson (Iowa) Record says: "Mrs. G. A. Cowen's Spiritualistic demonstration in the Bert Hall building last Saturday evening was very well attended. The medium made some wonderful readings and her audience was well entertained. Mrs. Cowen will be in Reinbeck, Dec. 9, will receive a period of Wednesday and at Marble Rock, Dec. 11, at Opera House."

Louisa Kirby, a test medium, is open for engagement. Societies desiring her services, address her at No. 113 Upton avenue, Battle Creek, Mich.

Rose Bushnell Donnelly writes from Sumnerland, Cal.: "The glorious folds of The Progressive Thinker contain priceless gems every issue. I was in Chicago when it was born, and subscribed for it. 'May its shadow never grow less.'"

J. W. Boyd, of the National Home, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "I have been a reader of your very valuable and instructive paper for several years. I am now reading for the second time the Occult Life of Jesus of Nazareth. It is one of the most interesting proofs I ever read in my life."

C. H. Figures writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The Poverty Social given by the children of the Berea Baptist Church, 1849 Superior street, Cleveland, Ohio, Nov. 25, was a success. We cleared $30. Many were in poverty's attire, and the spirit of poverty was carried out, as there was not a too bountiful supply of Coney Island sandwiches provided. Mrs. M. S. Howard carried off first ladies' prize; Mr. John Morton, first gentlemen's prize; Little Elsie Howard, first boy's prize; Master Joe Smith, first boy's prize; Quadenfeld and his boy musicians, Mr. Butts, Mr. Herder and Mrs. Figures gave us an abundance of good music. Mrs. Florence Barber, the very efficient guardian, having charge of the program, was fully equal to the occasion, and the children trained by her gave an exhibition of plain and fancy tag drilling, that elicited much applause. Mrs. Barber and the children are now planning an elaborate Christmas entertainment for the afternoon of December 24, and we can assure the friends that there will be no scarcity of refreshments that day. The exercises will begin at 2 p. m., and all friends to be present are cordially invited to meet with us. The Lyceum has planned to hold a social entertainment once a month during the entire winter, with a change of program each time; proceeds are devoted to current expenses of Lyceum."

Theodore Simpson, an active Spiritualist of Vancouver, B. C., writes: "I enclose you $5, my own renewal, and four new subscribers. I would very much like to see The Progressive Thinker enlarged to a 12-page paper, but wonder how you could find enough interesting matter to fill so much space; indeed I often wonder how you can fill the 8-page paper every week with so much very interesting reading. I enjoy reading the paper very much. I am 67 years old, and all that are dear to me are on the other side, and the teachings of Spiritualism give me more comfort than anything else in the world."

AS A GENERAL RULE, IN THIS OFFICE WE PAY NO ATTENTION TO ANONYMOUS COMMUNICATIONS. THE NAME AND ADDRESS OF THE WRITER SHOULD ACCOMPANY ALL MATTER, OF WHATEVER KIND, SENT TO THIS OFFICE.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Eugenia Roubie writes from Watertown, N. Y.: "Our thanksgiving service was a fitting conclusion to Mrs. Coffman's recent engagement. A nice audience braved the very cold weather to learn more of this broadism. Mrs. Coffman seemed more capable than ever under the inspiration of her helpers and reached nearly every one present with a comforting word. Our secretary and treasurer's books show a receipt for expenses to date (including a deficit from previous months) besides the neat surplus of $50 to help meet future expenses. Our membership roll shows a greater number of active members than is usual with us, and our audiences compel an admission of greater interest. We have every reason to be grateful for the opportunity of having Mrs. Coffman to help us when we needed her instead of grieving over her departure and we feel to congratulate every society that may be fortunate enough to procure her services."

Mrs. Squire writes: "Church of All Souls is having good success. Dr. Cooper gave fine tests last Sunday. He renders fine music on the harp. Everybody welcome. Come and learn God's ways of life Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. 220 Western avenue, near Van Buren."

Mrs. E. D. King writes: "We had with us at Girard, Mich., Mr. E. W. Sprague and wife for three services, and had large audiences. As far as we know, all were well pleased."

Correspondent writes from Missoula, Montana: "Among the many social gatherings in Missoula, there is one that deserves special mention, because of its twofold prominence, namely, spiritual and social. The occasion will long be remembered by those present as one of the happy incidents in life when we are allowed the privilege of coming in touch with our loved ones who have gone before. Those honored with invitations to the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. Doll and Mrs. Lincoln, were Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Booth and Mrs. Herberich, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Booth and Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Roberts, and Mrs. J. Held who is one of the best spiritual mediums of our day and who by her wonderful mediumistic powers brought together some of the long departed in sweet communion with their living friends. Mrs. Lincoln termed our gathering a 'spiritual jubilee,' a very appropriate name, but the writer would be glad to know stronger language to express the joy of every soul as they gathered round the table laden with the many delicious dishes prepared by Mrs. Lincoln and Mrs. Doll, and listened to the words of grace from Mrs. Held. The guests departed at a late hour after thanking their hosts and hostesses for the pleasant hours so soon passed at their home on November 30, Thanksgiving Day."

Mrs. Clarisse Mullins of Chicago, writes: "I wish to say to the friends that I deeply regret not being able to present to see them. Straightening out Mr. Mullins' business is taking every moment of my time. I wish to express my gratitude for their loving thoughts. The waves of loving thoughts have helped to strengthen me from day to day. Friends, I have an object in view to work for. My object is to eventually build a home (not an institution), where such people as Lucinda B. Chandler, Mrs. H. Raikie, Elsie Hornbeck and others may have a real home, so I shall ask for the strengthening thought of the dear friends to help me in carrying out a work that may have a beginning toward a home for the homeless. I hope within a couple of months to be able to again meet the friends at my home as well as at different social gatherings."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "The Rising Sun Mission had for its speaker Sunday afternoon, Dec. 3, Sister Briggs, a very able and eloquent speaker. The services were unusually impressive. Sister Andrews and her guides gave some convincing messages. Bro. Elmo from the South Side, paid us a short visit and reported 'All's well.' Our audiences always include visitors from the North and South Side societies and we welcomed them at the close of the services, and a large number remained for the evening. We welcome the return from Mrs. Figures gave us an abundance of good music. Mrs. Florence Barber, the very efficient guardian, having charge of the program, was fully equal to the occasion, and the children trained by her gave an exhibition of plain and fancy tag drilling, that elicited much applause. Mrs. Barber and the children are now planning an elaborate Christmas entertainment for the afternoon of December 24, and we can assure the friends that there will be no scarcity of refreshments that day. The exercises will begin at 2 p. m., and all friends to be present are cordially invited to meet with us. The Lyceum has planned to hold a social entertainment once a month during the entire winter, with a change of program each time; proceeds are devoted to current expenses of Lyceum."

Theresa Simpson, an active Spiritualist of Vancouver, B. C., writes: "I enclose you $5, my own renewal, and four new subscribers. I would very much like to see The Progressive Thinker enlarged to a 12-page paper, but wonder how you could find enough interesting matter to fill so much space; indeed I often wonder how you can fill the 8-page paper every week with so much very interesting reading. I enjoy reading the paper very much. I am 67 years old, and all that are dear to me are on the other side, and the teachings of Spiritualism give me more comfort than anything else in the world."

H. F. Arnold writes: "The regular monthly meeting of the Chicago Spiritualists League was held in Handel Hall Saturday evening, Dec. 2. The speaker of the evening, Hon. Chas. Hughes, delivered a brief but thoughtful address upon the subject of Love. Mrs. A. W. B. was an old-time worker in the field, gave a number of messages. She was followed by Mr. Chas. Thompson, a rising young medium of the Rising Sun Mission. On Saturday evening, Dec. 16, at 8 o'clock sharp, in Room 417, Handel Hall building, occurs the annual business meeting of the league. This meeting is of the utmost importance to every league member, as officers for the ensuing year will be elected. Upon the result of the ballot depends the policy to be pursued by the executive board for another term. Don't criticize, but turn out and vote your convictions. If you are entitled to a vote, be present."

When my feet have grown too weary, Further on to tread their way, When my spirit waits the bidding— To be severed from its clay, I shall need some hand to guide me O'er the dark and flowing tide— Will some spirit come to meet me, When I reach the river side? Will you leave your home in glory From the spirit world above, And on angel wings float o'er me, Guarding me with ceaseless love? And all through the darkening valley, Shall I find one to meet me, Come and be my angel guide? I know my immortal spirit, Death can never take away, And I know 'twill join their angels, At the closing of the day. Hark! I hear sweet heavenly music, 'Tis an angel whispering, 'Come, I am here to meet you, brother, I have come to guide you home.' J. W. TRAVIS.

Maggie Henry writes: "A large audience assembled, both afternoon and evening, at (old 77) Spiritual Mission chapel. In the evening our speaker, Prof. F. M. Stoller, whose lectures are always instructive and interesting to the audience, recited a poem before the lecture entitled 'Hallowed Ground.' It was highly appreciated. We always have a number of visiting mediums who give spirit messages, as well as our regular medium, Madame Lucile De Loux, and your correspondent, and of speaker either answers personal questions or gives readings by psychometry or clairvoyant vision. All are welcome at our meetings."

Miss Olive Rice writes: "Dr. J. M. Temple is in Jersey City, N. J., building up a fine interest in Spiritualism."

Mrs. H. L. Bigelow, president of the First Spiritual Union of San Jose, Cal., writes: "The First Spiritual Union is having very interesting meetings. Sister Nettie P. Rice, Sunday minister, served the society every Sunday evening to the satisfaction of all, and the enlightenment of many investigators. The morning conference is well attended. J. Murray, vice-president, in the chair. The Lyceum is progressing finely under the leadership of Miss Merle Muntz, a young lady of fifteen years, and Miss Linda Zink, pianist, and a younger both of whom possess both natural and mediumistic talent, and we are truly thankful to have them with us, and cheerful workers in the cause of Spiritualism. Several new members are joining the society, and we expect with them to have added strength and interest. Mrs. A. Shaw frequently gives messages. The friends of Thomas, who died in the city of San Jose, are making preparations to celebrate the anniversary of his birth in a fitting manner."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "One of the best lectures of the season was listened to by the Hyde Park Occult Society on Dec. 3. Dr. C. S. Tisdale, a deep student in occultism, gave us fine thoughts in regard to the Hermetic Constitution of Man. Everyone was well pleased with his lecture. He is to lecture on Dec. 10, and again on January 14. Mrs. Adams on account of sickness, not being present, messages were given by Mrs. O. B. Wilson, especially to strangers, and all recognized. On the 17th we have Prof. Kershaw to speak for us. He is a genuine Hindu, and of the many so-called and advertised, he has failed to fail only beside himself, and that one in attendance at the University. He is certainly a highly educated man and worthy of good patronage. Don't fail to come and hear him. Mrs. E. J. Hanson will be with us on Dec. 24; Dr. J. H. Randall, Dec. 31, and Dr. B. W. Warner, January 7. Social dances on every Thursday."

E. W. Sprague and wife are in Pittsburgh, Pa., serving the First Spiritualist Church the Sunday and Tuesday evening of the month of December. They will be in Washington, D. C., the Sundays and Mondays of January; they will hold meetings in places not too far from these cities on the other week day evenings of these two months. Parties wishing their services, please write them at once. Their address for December is as follows: No. 219 Oakland avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa. They have open dates for camp-meeting engagements the coming season."

E. R. Kidd writes from Canton, Ohio: "Since writing a notice of Mrs. Nina D. Challen's return to our city, and which was published in The Progressive Thinker, I wish to say for the benefit of her many friends that she will on or about December 20 return to her home in Toledo for two or three weeks, after which she will return to Canton for a period of two or three months. Since Mrs. Challen's return she has done an excellent work here and in Massillon, thereby adding, through her mediumship, a number to our ranks."

Montgomery Hollinshead writes from South Bend, Ind.: "Your premium book has been received. It is a grand work, and I wish I possessed the persuasive influence to place one in every progressive mind in this country."

Will C. Hodge is again in California after a long and successful engagement in his tenth state. His address now is No. 1373 tenth avenue, East Oakland, Cal.

The Church of Psychical Research holds services every Sunday evening, at 8 o'clock in the Athenaeum Parlors, 9th and Locust streets, Kansas City, Mo. Rev. G. C. Stephens, pastor. Residence, No. 8108 East 14th street. Phone Home 1525 East.

Dr. J. M. Peebles writes from San Diego, Cal.: "I thought I came to San Diego largely to rest and enjoy the warm climate. I am pressed right into the work. The first thing, a grand reception, and then the Rev. Mr. Simpson, a Seventh-Day Adventist preacher, delivered two savage sermons against Spiritualism. With others, I heard them, and I was urged to reply. This did last Sunday evening to a packed house. His injustice to Spiritualism aroused my old debating combative nature, and I am afraid that I was most too severe upon this sect, and their Bible dogmas. At the conclusion of my lecture, Mr. Thomas, a prominent citizen of the city, arose and moved that the lecture be published, and Col. Dryden seconded the motion. It was carried unanimously; and so I see no way of avoiding writing the lecture out in full."

W. H. Andrews writes from Washington, D. C.: "In reply to Alfred H. Saunders' inquiry in No. 337, I desire to submit the following: I recently sat for spirit pictures before W. M. Keeler, No. 1343 Roanoke street, this city, and obtained a correct picture of my father as he appeared at 86 years of age, when the transition came. The last picture he had taken was at El Dorado, Kan., when his age was about 65 years."

TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, December 17, 1935: "The Law of Right."

Gem of Thought:—To read the meaning of it all, To know the reason why; Then we can shed the tears that fall, Can bear the heaving sigh.

So learn life's lessons one by one, And grasp the Law of Right; Just trust and toil till day is done, And Faith has grown to Slight.

PROPHECIES IN DREAM LAND.

Spirits Often Induce Prophetic Dreams or Visions, Which Reveal Certain Facts That Should Be Known.

"Tit-Bits" sets forth that some of the strangest stories in the annals of crime are those which tell of the part dreams have played in the discovery of criminals.

One spring day in 1830, a farm laborer, when passing a lonely mountain in the Sutherlandshire, saw in the waters of a deep pool, a dark vision, which proved to be that of a well-known peddler who had mysteriously vanished about a month earlier. The body bore marks of violence, the pockets were empty, and it was clear that the poor fellow had been brutally murdered and robbed—but by whom? That was a mystery which for many weeks could not be solved.

One night, however, Kenneth Fraser, a tailor's assistant, saw in a dream the cottage of a man named Hugh Macleod, and heard a voice say in Gaelic, "The peddler's pack is lying in a cairn of stones in a hole near the house." He told the story of his singular dream to the authorities, who accompanied him to Macleod's house; and there, sure enough, beneath a heap of stones, the murdered man's property was found. Macleod was arrested, confessed, and was executed.

Another very remarkable story is told of a tragedy in Ireland. One evening two strangers presented themselves at a wayside inn near Portland, and after taking refreshments, continued their journey in the direction of Cardiff. The incident was commonplace enough, but it led to startling developments, for in the wayfarers the landlady of the inn recognized two men of whom she had dreamed a very strange dream the night before. In her dream she had seen one of them kill the other with a coward's blow from behind, rifle the pockets of the dead man, and stealthily hide him beneath a hedge. So impressed was her husband when this dream was told him that he made his way to the spot indicated and there discovered the body of a buried man. The assassin was pursued and arrested, and at the ensuing trial was sentenced to death.

There has seldom been a more mysterious crime than the murder of Mr. Stocken a London stallholder, a great many years ago; and the mystery would have remained unsolved to this day had it not been for the intervention of Mrs. Greenwood, who came forward with the statement that the murdered man appeared to her in a dream and conducted her to a house in Thames street, where one of his assassins was to be found; while in another dream Stockden appeared and showed her a likeness of the man. On the strength of this dream clue the man indicated was arrested, and not only confessed his guilt, but betrayed his accomplices—three criminals being brought to the scaffold as the result of these visions of the night.

Some years ago a Mrs. Rutherford dreamed that her husband, a relative, Leslie, was about to be murdered by a man whom she clearly saw. She immediately set out on a visit to Lady Leslie and asked permission to sleep in the lady's room. In the middle of the night Mrs. Rutherford heard some one trying to open the bed-room door. She raised an alarm and flung open the door, when Lady Leslie's two sons rushed out and a moment had seized the man of the dream.

The following story is, perhaps, the strangest of all. One night the Rev. Herbert Powys, a Church of England clergyman, dreamed that the daughter of one of his parishioners had gone out into the darkness to meet her lover, who, at the time was waiting for her in a secluded spot and spending the time in digging a grave for her. Jumping out of bed, Mr. Powys rushed to the place indicated in his dream and arrived there just as the man had hurled the girl to the ground by the side of the open grave and was about to kill her with his spade.

FRANCE TAKES STEP IN ADVANCE.

It Has Been Divorced From the Domination of the Infamous Catholic Clergy.

Word comes from Paris that on December 6, the senate, after a long debate, adopted the bill for the separation of church and state by a vote of 181 against 102. The vote was announced amid enthusiastic scenes and cries of "Long live the republic!" and "Long live liberty!" The bill passed the chamber of deputies last June. This is the final parliamentary stage of the bill, which will be promulgated in the Official Journal to-morrow, when it will become effective immediately. The council of state will devote three months to the framing of the administrative details of the new regime.

French Clergy to Accept.

The action of the vatican regarding the law has not yet been definitely announced. The French Clergy, while opposing the measure, appear to be disposed to conform to the new system. The fundamental principles of the bill assure entire liberty of conscience respecting religion, with restrictions concerning the exercise of religion which are intended to preserve public order.

In the future the state will be entirely free from connection with all religious sects.

History of the Concordat.

The passage of the bill marks the culmination of the strained relations which have long existed between the French government and the vatican. It sweeps away a system which dates from 1801, when the famous concordat was signed by Pius VII. and Napoleon. This gave religion a governmental status, the churches being government property, with a clergy paid by the state, and the entire church administration being under the direction of a member of the president's cabinet. The next year Napoleon's wars and negotiations under the concordat and terminated the authority of the concordat itself.

THE N. S. A. CONVENTION.

A Delegate Voices Commendation of Its Members and Officers.

As the days pass by, I turn my thoughts back to some of the fault-finders who have had so much to say against the N. S. A. I had to a great extent begun to believe that only old members and especial favorites of the leaders of that great body would ever be recognized to make or second a motion, or speak upon any subject under discussion, and that new members or delegates would be ignored completely. For several years I held to the determination that some day I would attend one of the conventions, not as a delegate, but simply as a spectator, to see for myself whether the conditions were such as had been pictured to me. A part of that determination was carried out during the last convention in Minneapolis.

I attended that convention, but not as a spectator. There was a delegate from the First Spiritualist Religious Association of Clackamas county, Oregon, and I want to say right here, in all my life never was in company of a like number of people anywhere that could excel in appearance and intelligence, the convention of Spiritualists for the year 1935. Further, not a preacher or public speaker anywhere in the world but would have been glad of the chance to deliver an address to that body of representative Spiritualists, except for their prejudice against Spiritualism.

I found out some things regarding the complaints against the N. S. A., as well as those who had so many complaints to make.

First, that those who are kicking against the N. S. A. are opposed to organized effort, for fear they cannot room at will holding independent meetings, if the N. S. A. should ever succeed in getting laws passed that would protect ordained workers for Spiritualism from "license" and persecution.

Second, that their statement that only leaders of their various sects could gain recognition on the floor of the convention was not true. I came home from that convention firmly convinced that no person was ignored by the chair at any time, and that no favoritism was shown to any one. I am glad, very proud of the fact that I was a member of the National Spiritualist Convention of 1935, and I hope to be able to attend the coming convention of 1936 in the city of Chicago. May peace and happiness ever come to those I met there in the Minneapolis convention.

I especially send my best thought to Sister Dye of Los Angeles, who now has one more tie of love in the realm of spirit. I had in highest esteem the memory of Brother Dye who now lives in the realm of truth, freed from cares and toils of this material world.

Through the passing of Brother Dye, the N. S. A. is deprived of the voice and body presence of our brother, yet his presence will be felt in future deliberations in the coming conventions of the association, the love so well and labored so earnestly make its efforts in behalf of Spiritualism successful.

His passing was so unexpected, yet quickly he entered the higher conditions free from lingering illness and from the higher conditions his spirit will yet give many kind thoughts and grand inspirations leading to higher realizations of spiritual unfoldment. Those to whom he has endeared himself. Truly we can say of him, "Though gone, he will come again."

And now for the coming convention of 1936. May its deliberations be harmonious, its labor love, its object truth, its precepts justice and fellowship, and then we shall see it crowned with success.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

As Viewed by John Burroughs, the Naturalist and Author.

John Burroughs, naturalist and author, in a recent interview in the New York Times, declared himself unequivocally in favor of equal suffrage. "Do you find women or men most responsive and appreciative of the best influences in literature?" he was asked. "Women are, in the main," he answered. "And to my mind this talk of women not being able to vote intelligently is idle. So far as it is possible to forecast, it will be a distinct benefit to us as a nation when women are enfranchised. There is no reason on earth why they should not have the privilege of the ballot. It would create in them an interest in public questions, and by so doing, by broadening their horizons, would make them better wives and mothers, without in the least destroying their femininity. And the day is surely coming, in my opinion, very near at hand, when equal suffrage will be a rule rather than an exception."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. Ann E. Winton, aged 71 years and 7 months, beloved mother of Belle Winton, passed to spirit life, Dec. 4, 1935. Funeral services were held at the Winton home, 7108 Stewart avenue, Englewood, Dec. 6, conducted by Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor of the Church of the Soul, of which organization Mrs. Winton was an old member. The remains were cremated. T. W.

Judge James W. Underhill, an eminent attorney-at-law and a pronounced Spiritualist, passed to the higher life at his home in this city, Nov. 13, 1935. He was high up in Masonry and had been a man of affairs for many years in electric railroads and other improvements. His father was a Spiritualist and believer in the communistic socialism of Robert Dale Owen, the great Scotch philanthropist. A few years before he died he gave $3,000 toward building a Spiritual temple in that city, provided the people would help. The project failed. He spent many winters at Lake Helen, Fla. I am proud to have been his friend. He was 86 years old. C. H. MATHEWS, Canton, Ohio.

Passed to the higher life, Vesta E. Carr, aged 26 years. He was born in Kane, Ill., and passed out while in the home of John Carr, his brother, in Kansas City, Mo. Funeral services were held Dec. 5, at the home. Rev. G. C. Stephens, minister of the Psychic Research Church, officiated. Comfort was given by her guide, and a fitting eulogy rendered.

Alfred C. Wyman passed to spirit life Friday, Dec. 8, at his home, No. 1650 Dewey Court, Chicago. He was a kind, loving and devoted husband and father, and respected by all for his many noble qualities. Mrs. Wyman, his wife, is a splendid medium and the and her lovely daughter, will feel his genial spirit presence in the future. Dr. Rusk, the celebrated liberal minister, officiated at the funeral. His remarks were spiritual, soul-elevating and inspiring.

MRS. JAMES H. WHITE.

Wife of One of Port Huron's Most Prominent Citizens Has Passed Away.

Mrs. Bethea H. White, wife of James H. White, died at the family home on Water street, just before midnight Sunday. Mrs. White had been a sufferer from cancer for many years and several months ago submitted to an operation in the hope of arresting the progress of the disease. She never fully recovered from the operation and gradually failed until the end, much of the time for a few days before her death being unconscious.

Mrs. White was born at Wolcott, N. Y., July 22, 1828, and was 67 years of age at death. She was the daughter of Nathaniel W. Tompkins. She married Mr. White September 2, 1869, at Wolcott, and immediately came to Port Huron with her husband and has ever since lived at the old homestead on Water street.

Mrs. White was possessed of a most amiable disposition and all who were fortunate enough to be numbered among her friends held her in the highest esteem. While she led a rather retired life, her many acts of kindness and charity among those with whom she came in contact endeared her to all.

A funeral service will be held at the residence at 7:30 o'clock Wednesday evening, conducted by M. A. Root of Bay City. The remains will be taken to Detroit for cremation Thursday morning.—Port Huron (Mich.) Daily Times.

Anniversary Party.

Fully seventy-five friends gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Aber, Kansas City, Mo., on the evening of Nov. 15 to help celebrate the 44th anniversary of Mr. Aber's birth. Although the pretty home of Mr. Aber is quite commodious, the many friends soon filled the rooms to overflowing. The most good feeling and fellowship existed and the genial host and hostess exerted themselves to make all have an enjoyable time.

Mr. Aber was the recipient of many valuable and useful gifts presented by friends who have long appreciated his faithful services in the cause of Spiritualism. Among the number was a beautiful watch fob presented by the members of his developing class. The presentation speech was made by Dr. Schellhorn, who very appropriately referred to Mr. Aber's long and valuable services to humanity in his work as a medium through whom our spirit loved ones are enabled to communicate with us.

For twenty-five years Mr. Aber has been a strong help to our cause. As a materializing medium none have ever shown a more ready and willing spirit to help humanity than he, and the prevailing thought with all present was that the forces allow him to continue in the good work for another twenty-five years.

Music was furnished by a stringed orchestra, and throughout the evening beautiful music prevailed, which harmonized the already pleasant conditions that existed.

Refreshments were sation, with conversation, cards and dance. At late hour the joy of the departed, heartily wished here, how pen many more such annual breaker continued success through maker who as such trinity of.

CLAUFLAW'S PENALTY.

In the M. in the Regions of Colorado.

My letter last week to the friends, from the mountains, was so lengthy, that I apologize at the outset of this, and promise with the first sentence that it will not be as long.

I left off with my entrance into Cripple Creek. I cannot tell just how that city impressed me. The rumblings of old troubles are still felt, rather than heard. The psychological wave that still hovers over the place makes one feel that he would be safer in other regions if the contending armies should put into action all one feels. In other words there is yet all the undercurrent of the strike, which I am told is not settled, but hanging over the place still and affecting business in every way. The once busy place is very quiet so far as business and enterprise goes.

I met here Rev. Mrs. Bryan of Los Angeles, Cal., who is doing good work on the Spiritualist platform. I held no independent meeting, on account of not being able to secure a hall during my stay in the city, but took part in Mrs. Bryan's regular meeting, and met many earnest workers in the cause.

From Cripple Creek my next stop was Leadville, the city on the peaks. Here I was made at home by that noble woman, Mrs. L. Agnes Moulton, and had the help and support of the good people of the town. I

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all answers in this most condensed form, and often brevity, is perhaps sacrificed to the desired brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby ascriptive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Marcus Boyd: Q. Is the world growing more criminal and sinful, as is constantly represented by the pulpit and the press?

A. Every now and then we hear the wall of some preacher, that the world is getting worse and worse every day, crime more rampant, religion less and less, until there will be a general wind-up in moral bankruptcy and universal crime. Andrew D. White in the Atlantic, shows what the state of public morals was in 1757, less than 167 years ago. Witches were unquestionably believed to exist, and torture for religious purposes, to force belief and save souls, was vigorously practiced. The four-page folio in which is recorded the horrible cruelties of the executioner and the prices paid him for the same may be seen in the library of Cornell University.

The following are a few examples of the fiendish cruelty of punishment for offenses many of which would now not be thought crimes, and for others which possibly might receive a sentence to the work house. The prices paid the executioner would scarcely engage the most brutal men in our present civilization.

For tearing asunder with four horses.....	26
For quartering.....	4
For beheading and burning.....	26
For strangling and burning.....	5
For heaping the pile of wood and kindling.....	4
For breaking a man alive on the wheel.....	4
For setting up the wheel with the body twisted in it.....	52
For cutting off a hand or sundry fingers, and for beheading.....	3
For burning with a hot iron.....	26
For beheading and placing the head upon a pike.....	26
For beheading, twisting the body in the wheel, and placing the head upon a pike.....	5
For tearing a criminal before his execution with red-hot pliers, each tearing of the flesh.....	26
For tearing a tongue or hand to the gallow.....	1
For the first grade of torture.....	1
For the second grade of torture.....	2

There is a streak of mercy in the last item, for the price includes "setting the limbs afterwards, with salt or lime." It is indeed worthy to know that after a man whose crime might be no more than being "irreligious," had been pulled until his joints parted, on the rack, or on the wheel, he could have the broken parts set, and saved for two thalers and a few pence over!

And yet there are those, even in high places, who consider mankind is growing worse! Is not this example alone sufficient to forever put this question at rest?

Many Correspondents: Q. Where can copies of "The History of the Rochester Knockings" be obtained?

A. There have been several inquiries for this book from the press of Thomas Olman Todd, Sunderland, England, who is also its author. It is an octavo, bound in red muslin with embossed side. A small consignment has been sent to me, which I will mail for sixty cents per copy.

As this book answers all the slanderous defamations that have been circulated by the opponents of Spiritualism, it is of deep interest to Spiritualists, and forms a foundation chapter in the history of the cause.

H. E. Pitkin: Q. Did Emma Hardinge Britten commit more than one volume of American Spiritualism? Edw. D. D. by Dickens, was not completed by him when in the physical form, but was completed from the spirit through a medium. Some say, who have read it, no mark of distinction in the book is the least observable between Dickens in the flesh and Dickens in the spirit. What do you think?

A. Perhaps "Nineteenth Century Miracles," by Emma Hardinge Britten, may be taken as a second volume of her American Spiritualism. The two books are not however connectedly written.

It is true that "Edwin D. D." was completed as above stated. If "internal evidence" is of value the case is proved, for the narrative runs smoothly to its termination, and it would not be an easy task for the critic to tell

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

I felt as if I had been struck a sharp blow, and I drew back instantly. "You do not know me," I said, "you do not understand."

"Oh, well," he said, interrupting me, "we will call it ten dollars, if you say so."

I sprang to my feet, my pulses throbbed and my cheeks burned like fire. I felt a sense of suffocation and of helplessness. I had never had such an experience before, and I could not seem to get hold of any words with which to express myself. What I wanted to express seemed too great for my brain and my voice. The man arose and took out his pocketbook, and the act broke the spell that was upon me. I knew that it was impossible to make the human animal before me sense spiritual things, but I had got to make him understand one thing, so I said, "Put up your money, sir, for not one penny of it will I touch. I would no more do the thing you ask me to, than I would set fire to my home or murder my brother or commit any other crime."

The man stared at me in a dazed way for a moment and then he burst out into a boisterous laugh. "Well, you are a fine actress for one of your age and experience," he exclaimed, "but you cannot fool an old fox like me. I know you work for money, the same as we all do, but I dare say you need all you get, and he glanced contemptuously around the room. "I admire your cunning, Miss Weston, as much as I do your rosy cheeks, and I now make you my final offer which is twenty-five dollars—the price of a price to pay."

My friends often laugh at me because I so often say "I know that if I need help I shall get it, and if I call and do not get it I know I do not need it. I am sufficient unto myself." My words came to me with great force. I called for help, and it came in almost unexpected form.

After uttering the words, "It is appy ways ad price to pay," there came a knock at the door. The door opened, and a man came in, and he said, "The man who was with you, he is here, and he is waiting for you."

The man did it a wonder, share our feeling. He stared at me, and I stared at him. He said, "Who—how—what did that?"

"You can judge for yourself," I said calmly.

The three knocks were repeated, and an Advent hymn book lying in plain sight upon the table came flying through the air and struck the man plump on the chest.

"What in the Devil's name!" he exclaimed, and he sprang toward the door. With his hand on the latch he paused, seeing Charlie and myself so unperturbed seemed to partially restore him, but his face was ashen white and his voice was shaky when he said: "I'll be— I know what this sort of thing, Miss Weston?"

"I am quite familiar with such manifestations," I replied.

"Then tell me what it means," he commanded.

"In this instance it means that you are going to know that there is a power though unseen that will protect a helpless girl; it means that you are to know that there are some things to be considered which money does not influence. I tell you that the sin you have committed which you are afraid your wife will discover if she visits her sister where the man, Dickens left off and the spirit, Dickens began it. It is a forgery, the world of literature furnishes no parallel instance of successful imitation.

Daniel Runyon: Q. A Methodist minister asserted that Robert Ingersoll ("Bob," he called him) recanted on his death bed, and advised his children to turn to the religion of their mother. Is he correct?

A. This is in every particular incorrect, or in stronger language what Ingersoll called an "orthodox lie." It is useless, however, as far as the preachers are concerned, to refute it. It is good stock in trade, like Paine's death-bed agony.

Mrs. Ingersoll was in full accord with her husband, and his children idolized him. Their domestic life was ideal. Stricken down as he was he had no opportunity to recant, even had he been disposed.

History furnishes not a single example of a great thinker renouncing his belief for the sake of the world.

It is late in the day for the continuance of such childish aspersions of character, as though there was value in human testimony as evidence for or against a principle.

If Newton had on his death-bed, said he no longer believed in his doctrine of gravitation, would it have had the least effect on his demonstrations? It would have been said with pity, that he became weak by disease and was not responsible.

Galileo, weakened by imprisonment, and in fear of torture, said his writings affirming that the earth revolved around the sun, was false. Did it change the revolution of the solar system?

Fortunately the great-hearted, strong-minded Ingersoll left nothing in his conduct for his friends to apologize for. He was hated by the clergy, as no man has been hated since Paine, and for a similar cause. They dared not meet or openly oppose him. They have taken revenge, after his death, in falsifying his good name.

ter will shortly be made known not only to her but to the public. I can also tell you—"but he did not wait to be told any more."

After the man had gone I sat down and literally cried for joy. Charlie came and hugged me, which proved he was as glad as I was. It was with a feeling of alarm that I suddenly recollected my patient. I found her lying quietly with closed eyes and tightly compressed lips. I laid my hand upon her hot forehead and she shivered. I began to apologize for my long absence, but she interrupted me with, "Yes, yes, I know all about it—I have heard everything, but I want to be alone, so go away and leave me."

I was genuinely distressed. But you must need something," I expostulated. "If you are neglected in this way you will surely be ill and—"

"No, I will not," she said impatiently. "Don't get scared, for there is nothing the matter with me but cussedness, so go away and let me have it out. When I want you I will call you."

Greatly perplexed, I left my strange patient and went about my work. Late in the evening she called to me and when I went to her she caught my wrist in a firm grasp and looking in my face, said: "I told you that you were going straight to hell and that there was no good in you. It was a lie. Will you forgive me?"

"I have nothing to forgive," I said gently.

"Yes, you have. I thought I was speaking truthfully, but I knew nothing about the matter and I had no right to make a statement about a matter of which I knew nothing—no one has. You knew I was your enemy; what made you take me in and treat me as if I were your best friend?" she said sharply.

I hesitated, and then I replied, "Christ told us to love our enemies, to bless those that curse us, and do good to those that misuse us." Her eyelids quivered and she moved restlessly for a moment, then with a groan she exclaimed, "I have held those words as a theory all my life, but I never put them in practice once, but you—a Spiritualist—O God! what does it mean? O give me light that I may know the truth," and she turned away from me, sobbing.

I was deeply touched and moved by one of those swift impulses which cause me to do things which surprise myself, but which I never have had cause to regret. I bent over and kissed the woman and said, "The Light will come to you—I know it will. Do not feel so badly, I beg of you—we all make mistakes even when we try to do our best."

The strong frame of the woman shook convulsively. "Go away, child, I can't bear any more now," she said brokenly.

When father and mother got home they were much surprised to find me acting as nurse to a stranger, and mother was much displeased. "A pretty performance, I should think!" she exclaimed. "Why on earth didn't you make one of the neighbors take her? Just as like as not she's poorer'n Job's turkey and we'll never get a cent for all the bother."

"I quoted quite a lot of Bible I had laid in store for the occasion, and it worked fairly well, for after listening to it with due respect she assumed a martyr-like look of resignation and said simply, 'Well, she's here and I've got to put up with it, I s'pose; but you've got to take care of her—I shan't.'"

My mother is a good woman and means to do right, but she and I never see alike. What she calls light seems to me mostly darkness, and she thinks the same of mine.

One night after this I heard my patient call to me softly. I got up from the lounge where I took my rest during my position as nurse, and went to her.

"Lie down beside me and listen," she whispered, and I obeyed her. For a moment there was silence, unbroken save for the ticking of the clock in the next room then there came a sound of music seemingly from afar off. Nearer and clearer and stronger it came until the room was filled with heavenly melody. Currents of cool air fragrant with the odor of violets were wafted to us from some unseen source, and little wisps of light floated about the room. I experienced such a sense of exquisite pleasure as I never had before. It was so pure, so exalted and uplifting in its influence that I felt as if all things in the way of spiritual attainments were possible to me and that "nothing things present nor things to come" shall prevent my soul from gaining the height it seeks.

When it was over my companion said, "This is all so new and strange to me that I cannot grasp its meaning in a day—perhaps it will take years, but it will come to me sometime. I shall go away from here a wiser and better woman, with a higher sense of God and humanity than I ever had before. I can never be the same again and what ever I do I will treat everyone with kindness and courtesy."

As soon as she was able to walk a little she insisted that I should take her to the station and I did so. She bid me family good-bye courteously, but did not mention her indebtedness. At the train she clasped me closely in her arms and kissed me, but did not say a word and I have not seen or heard from her since.

When I got back home I found father sawing wood at a furious rate, and I knew that meant that mother was expressing her mind regarding my strange patient at an equally furious rate. I was not mistaken.

As soon as possible Charlie slipped an envelope into my hand and whispered, "That woman gave it to me and said I was to let no one but you see it." I opened the envelope and found fifty dollars in money, and a slip of paper upon which was written "For the best girl in all the world."

I gave the money and the paper to mother, and silence reigned for some time after—a silence that for me was full of laughter and rejoicing. I cannot help wondering if I shall know any more about this strange woman who so abruptly entered and passed out of my life. Father has made many inquiries, but she may have dropped from the skies for all he can learn to the contrary.

Since writing the above I have had the pleasure of reading your letter and getting acquainted with your brother. It was raining when he came and it continued to rain until the streams overflowed and bridges were swept away. Mr. Wilder did not seem to fret any over his enforced stay and we all enjoyed his visit. You want to know how I like him, and I will tell you plainly that I think him the nicest young man I ever met, and he is also very good looking. He did not seem like a stranger at first, probably because you have written so much about him. I wonder if it is because we as a family are out of the ordinary in some way that we have so many experiences that are out of the ordinary? or is it only in seeming and others have just such experiences and because we do not know we think they never have them.

I think I will send this letter over by your brother, so good-bye.

Lovingly yours,

MARTHA WESTON.

New Light Cottage.

My Dear Martha:—So many things have happened since John went over to see you—I honestly believe he did go to see you, for neither mother nor I can make out that he had any business that way that could not easily have been done by writing—that I shall have to write you a long letter to tell all I want to.

As you will remember, he began to rain the day John left home and it kept raining until the great snow-drifts near the house had almost disappeared, and the meadow was turned into a fair-sized pond with only the top of the willow bushes showing above the water. Obeying the decree of Providence—I suppose—the sheep got out that afternoon and went scampering across the fields and our prophet had to go after them. It was nearly dark when he got back to the house, and the first remark he made was, "If Scripture did not say that the world would no more be destroyed by water, but speedily by fire, I would fear another deluge, for all the streams have overflowed and destruction is abroad in the land; and the Lord has revealed to me, his servant, that many lives will be lost in the morning."

The words made little impression upon us for we had become accustomed to direful prophecies; but mother, who was thinking of John, asked anxiously, "Do you think any bridges have been swept away?"

"I know not how many, cousin; the footbridge across Davis creek is down on this side and the middle support is nearly gone by this time, I'm thinking."

For a moment after Mr. Smith ceased speaking it seemed to me that I had been turned into stone. Two evenings before, Mr. Dale had whispered to me when he said good night, that he wished to speak to me alone upon a matter of importance and that he would call this very evening, and I had been wondering ever since.

As Mr. Smith spoke, a terrible certainty forced itself upon me. I knew Mr. Dale always came to our house by way of the foot-bridge unless the snow was very deep, and he was probably on his way at that very moment. In an instant it was revealed to me that I loved Vernon Dale, and he was on his way to tell me of his love for me. I had never really prayed in my life, but in that moment I sent up a wild cry for help, and I shall never forget what prayer is—I learned then.

Without a word to anyone I rushed out of the house and, down the path to the barn where stood John's blooded colts, Donder and Blitzen. I knew they were only partly broken to the harness, but Blitzen had been saddled a few times and I now led him out of his stall. My blood seemed on fire and my nerves like steel. The colt took in his bits without trouble, and I fastened John's saddle upon him, for I did not dare use my own, and before the astonished creature had made up his mind about me, I was on his back and was over speedily away. It was growing dark rapidly and great masses of purple clouds driven by a strong wind were moving across the western sky. I took the main road, for I knew that if I succeeded in guiding Blitzen through the fields to the foot-bridge the roaring of the waters would drown my voice and if through the gathering darkness Mr. Dale saw me at all he might misinterpret my actions and be swept away before my eyes.

The mud and melting snow that flew from Blitzen's flying feet soon wet me through and the rush and roar of the elements greeted me upon each hand, but I gave little thought to anything but low to intercept Vernon Dale before he reached the fatal bridge. When I reached the cross-roads I saw near the top of the hill a lantern being borne briskly along and I recalled with a throb of pain what a very energetic walker Mr. Dale is. Would I ever be able to catch up with him?

"O, Blitzen! Blitzen!" I cried aloud in my agony of mind, and I believe the noble creature understood, for with a snort and bound he plunged into the cross-road and struggled bravely up the steep path through the mud and rushing water, over stones and cakes of ice, slipping a little now and then, but never stumbling, on, on to the top of the hill. There I saw the lantern was fast nearing the bridge.

"On, Blitzen!" I cried to the panting colt, and on we flew across the water-soaked turf of the fields at a most reckless pace. We gained upon the swinging lantern, but I feared we might be too late.

I shouted with all my strength, but my voice was lost in the roar of the waters.

"Oh heaven help me!" I cried, "and stop that man!"

Mr. Dale, who was then within a few feet of the bridge, paused and turned about. He afterward said that he felt as if some one had grasped him and turned him around. I shouted for joy when I saw the light remaining stationary. He did not hear me but he did see the white stripe in Blitzen's face as he came rushing toward him. Opposite the astonished man I halted the panting colt. Mr. Dale lifted his lantern until the light fell upon my face.

"O, Mr. Dale," I sobbed, "our end of the bridge is down and you were going to certain death."

Mr. Dale's face showed ashen white under the lantern's flickering light, and for a moment he stared at me dumbly, then dropping his lantern he cried, "Marah!" and in another moment I was clasped tightly in his arms. A little later Mr. Dale and I walked down the hill arm in arm with Blitzen leading quietly behind us. Soon after we entered the main road we were met by Pete who after leaping wildly about me for a few minutes rushed frantically up the road barking in a most excited way.

"They are out searching for you, Marah," said Mr. Dale, "and Pete is telling them that he has found you," and sure enough, as we came around the turn by the big pine we were met by mother, Aunt Ann and Mr. Smith, all carrying lanterns. After the two men had taken care of Blitzen we all met in the sitting room and Mr. Dale and I told our story, after which every body shook hands with Mr. Dale and hugged me, and mother and Aunt Ann cried, and the victim sobbed aloud, and Aunt Jane wanted to fix some boneless tea and hot bricks and put me to bed lest I had "taken my death of cold," and Father Abraham offered prayer that the two young beings who had plighted their troth under such trying circumstances might not be separated in the day of final separation so soon to come.

When John got home I told him what happened during his absence. He listened with rigid attention. When I had finished he arose and went to the window and gazed fixedly at the sky for a minute, then he came to where I was standing and took me in his arms and kissed me upon both cheeks, then turned and left the room without a word. I watched him disappear with a feeling of surprise and disappointment. Why didn't John speak to me? I said, "Do you know, Aunt Ann?"

"He did not trust himself. Don't you know, Marah, that a man does not like to betray weakness, especially before women. And yet," she added thoughtfully, "there are many men who will get angry at trifles and use violent and abusive language without seeming to think that they are displaying a most objectionable form of weakness, who would think themselves disgraced if they were seen shedding a few tears. However these remarks do not apply to John Wilder, for he has certainly learned that saving grace, self-control, without which manhood and womanhood appear weak, dwarfed and imperfect."

Aunt Ann's words set me to thinking as her words usually do and I can see as I never did before how I am not really strong until I can rise above irritability, envy, jealousy, pettiness and every form of meanness. I do not say rise above displaying these qualities—although that would be a good deal—but rise above possessing them. What is in a person's nature is bound to show itself sooner or later, so the secret of never displaying any quality is not to possess that quality. Now I am just going to attend to Marah Weston's case and the undesirable qualities I discover in her are bound to go.

A HARD PROBLEM.

An Impartial Consideration of the Fraud Question.

To the Editor:—Anyone who is now, and has been in the past, reading the Spiritualistic press can see that the fraud question is a problem just as hard today as it ever has been in times gone by. What has been, and what has not been cast into the kettle of Spiritualism would be a problem hard to solve. There are some who wish to save about everything thrown in, while there are others who would just about turn the whole kettle full over; and in the splashing and struggling that is going on there is a great deal of scum thrown off, and some fat goes into the fire.

That there are frauds of the grossest kind being constantly perpetrated upon the gullible public there is no room for dispute; but that all is fraud that may be proclaimed as fraud is a matter which may safely be questioned.

I am one who does not believe that simply crossing the river of physical death makes bright and truthful angels of us all at once. And I believe that many of the manifestations of the spirits as there are by mortals; and I have no doubt at all that many who have been caught red-handed in the act of producing fraudulent manifestations are many times genuine mediums, and no doubt started out at first with genuine manifestations, but through weakness of their natures, and the overwhelming force of environments, they fell to simulating that which they failed to produce as genuine. That weak spot in their natures attracted a class of spirits that were right at home in such work, and they lend a helping hand for the immediate exorcism of it; while the consequences, they have not got far enough along to take them into consideration.

Jesus of Nazareth was crucified; and he would be again were he living in the flesh to-day. He probably would not be taken out and nailed to the cross, but he would be beaten down in some way, and he would be crucified in some way. When he was crucified, he was crucified for the truth to mankind. Let a medium be ever so pure and his life ever so correct, and his manifestations ever so startling, and let him be ever so earnest at heart, and when he goes out to proclaim the truth to the world there are forces which will arise and will endeavor to crush him down on the spirit side as well as on the mortal side; and it will take a very strong band on both sides, and very careful guarding to keep him from being either crushed or smothered in some way.

I always have a feeling of sympathy go out towards the medium who is blamed to be exposed. Not that I would for a moment try to uphold them in any fraud; but the question is, have the expositors properly understood the case? May not the expositors be the worst kind of frauds themselves, who simply have it in their hearts to break down the medium at any cost, and let the end, as they feel, justify the means. Of course there can be no fixed rule to go by. All genuine mediums should be ready to grant reasonable test conditions whenever they go before the public; and the public should be satisfied when reasonable conditions are granted; then the nature of the manifestations and the subject matter of the mediums given, whether considered from a plain common-sense standpoint, should govern the final conclusions to a great extent.

In conclusion I will say, let the kettle boil, and go on with the skimming, but skim with care.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE IS FOR GOOD.

Ex-Congressman Shafroth Replies to Cleveland.

Ex-Congressman John F. Shafroth has replied at length to the article by Ex-President Cleveland in the Ladies' Home Journal, entitled, "Would Woman Suffrage Be Unwise?" In his reply Mr. Shafroth has given a very detailed and every theory of Mr. Cleveland and denied about every statement that he made of so-called facts.

In replying to Mr. Cleveland's assertion that "even if every woman should exercise the right of suffrage, the votes of the thoughtful and conscientious would be weighed by those of the disreputable, the ignorant, the thoughtless, the purchased and the coerced," Mr. Shafroth says:

"In that declaration the assumption is made either that the bad and ignorant women are in the majority, or that the good women will vote, both of which I most emphatically deny.

"Who are these women whom many seem to fear will have a corrupting influence on elections if given the right to vote? They are our mothers, our wives and our daughters. Is there a man in high or low life, in moral or degraded position, who believes his mother, wife or daughter would be more corrupt than he in exercising the elective franchise?"

"Woman's influence has always been for good, and in no sphere has this been better demonstrated than in politics. The election polls since the advent of woman suffrage in Colorado, with the exception of a few in the low part of the cities, have been transformed into respectable places of meeting as dry goods stores or public halls. As a general rule the rowdy element, which was once wont to assemble at and remain around the polls all day, is wanting.

"The precinct caucuses for primaries are usually held at the residences of the most respectable people. The entire influence of the presence of women has greatly improved the tone of political conventions."

"This influence has been felt most, perhaps, in the character of nominations made by each political party. Many men, after denouncing a candidate as dishonest and immoral before his nomination, support him at the election because they believe that they must have a consistent party record in order to get subsequent recognition from their party. Women have no political records to keep consistent.

"To such an extent is the moral influence of women felt that if an immoral candidate is nominated, the argument is immediately used that the women will not support him, and he is generally defeated for nomination, or his name is not presented to the convention.

"Woman's presence in politics has introduced an independent element which compels better nominations and better officials."

Where cavilling begins reason ceases. Thus argument is wasted.—Anon.

IMPRESSIVE WORDS TO SPIRITUALISTS.

"Hunting Is Murder in the Name of Sport," Says Lady Florence Dixie in the Chicago Tribune.—Will Presidents, Ex. or Otherwise, Please Take Notice?

Sport is horrible. I say it adventurously. I speak with the matured knowledge of one who has seen and taken part in numbers of forms thereof in many and varied parts of the world. I can handle gun and rifle as well and as efficiently as most sporting folk, and few women and not many men have had experience of a title of the shooting and hunting in which I have been engaged both at home and during travels and expeditions in far away lands.

Many a keen sportsman, searching his heart, will acknowledge that at times a feeling of self-reproach has shot through him as he stood by the dying victim of his skill. I know that it has ever confronted me as I have bent over my fallen game, the result of, alas! too good a shot. I have seen the terror-stricken eye of the red deer, dark, full of tears, glaring at me with mute reproach as it sobbed its life away, and that same look I have seen in the eyes of the glorious orbed guanaco of Patagonia, the timid, gentle gazelle, the graceful and beautiful koodoo, springbok, of South Africa, seemingly, as it were, reproaching me for my thoughtlessly taking the life I could never bring back. So, too, I have witnessed the angry, defiant glare of the wild beast's fading sight as death, fast coming, deprived him of the power to wreak his vengeance on the human aggressor before him. The memory of these scenes brings a measure of remorse to me. On the contrary, it haunts me with a huge reproach, and I faint had never done those deeds of skill—and cruelty.

It is a remnant of barbarism in man's nature that he should take pleasure in displaying his skill on living animals. Deer stalking is no doubt a healthful and exhilarating exercise, requiring endurance, stamina, a clear sight, and a steady hand. Yet the last act in a successful stalk is, if we come to think about it, disgusting and horrible. In close proximity to us we see a lordly animal, happy, peaceful, and enjoying fully the gifts of life. We draw a trigger, and we do not miss, he is wounded or killed. Happy indeed, if it be the latter. More often than not it is the former, and then, if limbs are not broken, a fierce tracking ensues, resulting sometimes in its loss, and, as a consequence, many an hour of torture ere death.

I wonder how many sportsmen who tramp turnips after partridges and hares, and who have a very quiet, unpretentious gray and brown birds. Both manifest the same characteristic affection for their young. It is a touching sight, when coming unexpectedly upon a covey, to watch the frantic efforts of the cock and hen to simulate being badly wounded, so as to draw attention from their brood. It is a piteous sight to see a wounded grouse or partridge striving to escape somebeater, who, with uplifted stick, pursues the poor, helpless, stricken animal, striking it amidst the laughter and evident amusement of his fellow-beaters. It is a most trivial incident, no doubt, and yet, who can know and have studied the habits of these birds, their instinctive eagerness to be together, their sharp cry and outstretched necks, when separated and calling for re-union, can guess and feel what the agony of terror must be to a wounded bird situated as I have described, which, when caught, he is taken to his beating heart, brains scattered, or its breast pinched tightly till it dies of suffocation.

What more revolting sight does anyone anywhere see than at a covert shoot, where driven before beaters into the laws of death, thousands of tame, hand reared pheasants are literally mowed down by the rows of guns awaiting the shot. Let us water, some "warm corner" in one of the "shoots." Falling pheasants, hardly risen from the ground, meet our view. Some fall dead, others dying, others legged, some winged. On one side we see disheveled heaps of struggling feathers—pheasants striving to wriggle back to life, while on the other, the birds have been peaceful and happy. Now arises the piteous sight of the wounded rabbit or the more child-like, human cry of terrified agony from the maimed and timid hare, striving, alas! in vain, to escape from the army of noise beaters advancing their way, whose shouts must add to the pandemonium of horror which surrounds their last dying moments.

What more aggravated form of torture is to be found than cursing with greyhounds, the awful terror of the hare depicting itself in the laid back ears, convulsive doubles, and wild, staring eyes, which seem almost to burst from their sockets in the agony of tension which that piteous struggle for life entails? And what sadder sight is there to be found in the records of the hunted than that of a dead beat fox, worn out, with lolling tongue, heaving sides, dragged brush, with the bay of the nearing pack growling every moment more distinct, struggling on, searching for safety in his desperate, dodging now here, now there, surrounded by a hostile herd, the fendish tallyho sounding in his ears, the cracking of whips which warn him against any further attempt to escape? Then the hounds rush in. For one brief moment he turns at bay—cuno? The next all is worry, worry, as the poor, weary, but gallant Tod is torn limb from limb, disemboweled, and reduced to a shapeless mass of bloody fur. A fitting death it is, indeed, following as a sequel on the hunted torture which the poor creature has suffered from find to finish.

None but those who have indulged largely in sport in its many and varied branches can realize the holocaust of animal suffering that is day after day offered up on its altar.

Savagery still dominates us in a great degree. A higher education and civilization will teach us to despise amusements which are purchased at the expense of suffering to animals. Youth and relaxation and pleasure in feats of skill and endurance and physical adroitness without the aid of blood and torture to make us skilled sons and daughters of the chase and the field. In our national schools, both high and low, kindness and our duty to animals should form part of the curriculum, and every effort that science and investigation can command should be put forth to secure for such as must be killed a speedy, painless and merciful end. The custom is a barbarous one; the pleasure derived therefrom is only such as a heart rendered callous by suffering often witnessed and rarely realized can indulge in. The day must dawn when that savage instinct will be Weird Tale Told by New Author, Mrs. Farless.—Writer of "The Sin of Saint Desmond," Received Power After Her Soul Visited Heaven; She Declares, Angel Promised Her Time and Power—Writes Three Books of 120,000 Words Each in Little More Than Year.

A new woman writer has appeared in the local field. She is Mrs. Amy Cameron Farless, whose first book, "The Sin of Saint Desmond," has just been published by the Richard G. Badger Company of Boston.

The story is a Western romance, with the scenes laid in Los Angeles and San Diego. Two of the leading characters are drawn from life—Mansfield Desmond, the hero, in whom can be recognized a well-known local educator, and Ed Norton, the Arizona, for whom a well-known character of this city was the original.

The dedication is "to the memory of a little white cat," and thereby hangs the tale as weird and wonderful as any of Marie Corelli's imaginative flights. The little white cat was the bed of sickness upon which the author lay between life and death three days during an illness in August, 1904. She had only received a common education, and before that time had never written a line in her life; immediately afterward she began to write, and, since then, in a little over a year, has produced three novels of 120,000 words each.

The new power came to her, she says, while her soul was absent from her body, and guided by angels through heavenly spheres. That Mrs. Farless earnestly believes her soul really left her body and journeyed in heaven, holding converse with the angels, there is little doubt. She tells of the experience with shining eyes and tones of convincing intensity.

"I saw my soul leave my body," she said. "It was in the form of a white egg, but it rose higher and higher till it took the form of a wide silver veil and I was within the veil with angels guiding me on either side. They took me to heaven and I saw the throne of God and wonderful, wonderful sights. Back on earth I could see my own body lying still in death on that little white cat I begged to stay in heaven, but the angels said:

"Go back to earth and life, thy allotted time, and power will be granted you."

"And I came back. I take it that the words of the angel meant that I should be given the power to write, something I had always wanted to do, but never could. I have been wonderfully guided in everything else."

W. C. Morrow, the San Francisco critic, gave Mrs. Farless high praise, after reading the manuscripts of two latter books. He says she had the true fire of genius.—Los Angeles Examiner.

APPARITION OF LADY BURTON.

Seen to Pass by About the Time of Her Death, Illustrating the Fact That Spirit Survives the Death of the Body.

An esteemed correspondent, says the Harbinger of Light, Australia, sends us the following incident, which is chiefly noteworthy as showing how even intelligent people are quite ready to assert that they do not regard "apparitions" as an illumination from the other world. In Mr. Justin McCarthy's exceedingly interesting book, published in 1903, entitled "Portraits of the Sixties," which embrace the leading representatives of that period in politics, letters, arts, science and social life, persons known by the author—the following is notable as bearing upon spiritualistic phenomena:

"I cannot refrain from introducing here some mention of a curious incident which recalls the melancholy surroundings in the memory of Lady Burton. My son and daughter and I were walking one day on the King's road in Brighton when the figure of a lady passed silently by. I did not see her face and she passed very quickly, but my daughter suddenly stopped and surprised us with the news that Lady Burton had just gone by. Then she related to us the story of her death, which she said she had read in a book. She said that she had seen the lady, and that she had been very much surprised to find that she was still alive. She said that she had seen the lady, and that she had been very much surprised to find that she was still alive. She said that she had seen the lady, and that she had been very much surprised to find that she was still alive."

"These reasons prevented us from following the lady, who soon passed out of sight. My daughter declared that the woman who had passed us was so strikingly like Lady Burton that any body might have been deceived by the resemblance. On our way home we bought an evening paper, and the first thing we saw on opening it was the sad news of Lady Burton's death. I do not want to attach to the story any of the peculiar significance which might have made it of special interest to the members of the society engaged in spiritual research. I do not regard it as an illumination from the spiritual world. It was a strange coincidence, and nothing more, but the coincidence was strange indeed and as such is worth a record in these pages.

"We had not at the time heard of Lady Burton's illness, and our only feeling of wonder was that she should have been in Brighton just then without our having heard of it, and that she should have passed us without any sign of recognition."

"The reader will well understand our feelings when we opened the paper which told the story of her death."

Some eradicated and men will cease to come and to find pleasure in destroying our glorious animal life.

NO DECEPTION THERE.

Daley Has an Invisible Playmate, by the name of Mabel, and also a Pet, a Spirit Bird.

The following [in the Harbinger of Light, Melbourne, Australia] is a true account of a little child not yet three years of age given to the undersigned by her father:

Daley was in the habit of playing by herself, not seeming to enjoy the company of her two elder sisters, two and four years older than herself, rather choosing a (to us) invisible playmate. She would have her party as it were and Mabel would be her chief and only guest ("Don't you see her, daddy or mummy?" she would ask). The stranger part of it is that she would believe she has never heard the name of Mabel mentioned, and how she came to call her guest by that name is a mystery to them. As far as they know they never had a member of the family by that name or knew any friend or near acquaintance who ever lost a "Mabel," consequently they think the child is bedeviled by evil spirits, and would like by some means to learn if that can be proved. She also had an invisible pet bird at times and would ask daily to look at it, and she would hitch her little shoulder up as if she were carrying a bird in reality, and when asked where the pretty bird was she would invariably point up to the sky. Another strange part of it is that when the arrival of a new sister was known by her she never mentioned again her pretty bird or played with her invisible playmate Mabel, but was excessively fond of her new sister, to whom her parents gave the name of Mabel. I enclose a picture of Daley, thinking it may be of some assistance should you think it worth while to test her mediumistic qualities.

UNIQUE EXPERIENCE.

Beautiful Phenomenal Manifestations of Spirit Power.

To the Editor:—Noticing a number of accounts regarding "Bright Points of Light," I will write you as briefly as I can be condensed of an experience I had on the 6th of September.

I had greatly overtaxed my physical strength and in consequence went to bed suffering from a severe pain in the head, and feeling very much exhausted. I seemed near fainting, when with great will power I begged my spirit mother to relieve me from the pain; but I had no more than done so, before I regretted having called on her to remove what I thought I had brought upon myself, so I mentally recalled it.

But imagine my surprise when in less than ten minutes my pains perceptibly grew less, and in a short time I was free from all pains, the like of which I had never experienced before, and of course I left no room for doubt that I owed my release from pain to the loved spirit mother, for which I offered my grateful thanks, and when I awoke I began sensing spirits from all around me; but feeling weakened and a little nervous, and lying with my eyes closed, I requested the loved ones not to materialize in the dark.

But getting out of patience with my cowardice, I resolutely opened my eyes, when I began seeing points of light all over my room, which grew rapidly more and larger, and assuming almost every imaginable shape, and hues of the rainbow. Then I closed my eyes but in a few seconds I saw them just as bright as when my eyes were open, and the glorious pyrotechnical display, the grandest I ever beheld, lasted about two hours, and the whole time was as influence sweeter than I can describe pervaded the room, and it gradually ceased, after having given me indeed a soul feast as I do not think any one can have greater.

THE WIZARD CORNETIST.

He Relates His Experiences in Spiritualism.

If I live till the 22nd of next January I will 75 years old. My grandfather Snow, who brought me most of the way up, was so strict a Presbyterian he would not allow me to whistle on Sunday.

Well, they spread it so on so thick that it soured on me, and it caused me to think. Hearing them talk over infant damnation, I thought if I were God I could make a better job. So when I heard of the Fox girls, that struck me right, would go often over to Uncle Rubin's to spend the evening, and we would all sit round the old-fashioned fireplace and tell stories. We were one evening telling ghost stories, which were common long before the railings. I said to my cousin Emily, "Now if you die first, you come back and won't be afraid of it. I die first I will come back, and tell you."

She joined the church and was baptized in a creek and there was ice on it, so she caught cold and soon died.

Well, just before Mr. Jones of the Religious-Philosophical Journal was assassinated he took me to a séance, Maud Lord, medium. My cousin Emily came and put her arm around my neck, hugged me hard, and said her name was Emily, and that she came to fulfill that promise she made. There were three others came and gave their names in full. I told that to my grandmother, and she was much pleased.

Soon after, my grandmother passed over. The Civil War had now come on. I went to New York to be there some time. So I thought to look into this more, and no one knew me there, and I did not give my name to anyone, and I was alone, so went to a news stand and got the Banner of Light, found Dr. Slade's address. I went in. Mr. Simmons was in the office. I said, "I want to see the Doctor." I did not give my name or the name of anyone. I went to his room. He asked me if I

Personal Habits and Aims.—By J. M. Peebles, M. D.

With greetings and the excuse that "I have no time these busy, busy days to write things pretty and flowery, but I write them and speak them fresh from my soul," Dr. J. M. Peebles sent us the following very beautiful letter:

"It is becoming a common remark among English-speaking people that 'persons are as old as they think themselves to be.' Undoubtedly, there is much in that—deep, earnest thought, which, when combined with purpose and fervid will-power, tends to promote health, and also to the prolongation of human life.

"Though on the borderland of my 85th year, I feel as though I had but just begun to live to see—to compare, and to act wisely my part in the great drama of life. The future, seen in optimistic vision, is golden with hopes and satisfactory realizations. Truth must conquer in the end. Personally, I am so busily engaged in such reform work as temperance, hygiene, anti-vaccination, anti-vivisection, anti-war, for territorial aggrandizement, that I have no time to think of personal sickness or that morbid, peevish, pessimistic laziness so often attendant upon octogenarian life. These October days of falling leaves, lengthening evenings, and sunset—pointing toward the ending of life in the flesh are my happiest years, years that give me much of heaven here and now.

"And why? "Because I am a vegetarian. For nearly forty years I have partaken of no animal flesh, fish or fowl. The birds that sing and the herds that crop the tender grass are my brothers on a lower yet conscious and generous plane of existence and I shrink from the murderous practice of cannibalism in any form. And I wonder how any thinking, reasoning man can deliberately eat the perishing flesh of animals—eat the long dead, salted and barreled corpse of a pig! Wisely did the inspired Moses forbid the eating of flesh and the often trichina-infested carcasses of the grunting hog. I am glad to say authoritatively that the market statistics show that animal flesh eating is rapidly declining in America, especially among the better educated and more cultured classes.

"In the pulpit days of India—the days of Jesus and the Sankarri, our Aryan ancestors abstained from flesh-eating. Both birds and animals then had faith in man. Now in all countries, especially the so-called enlightened countries, moved by fear, they flee from the approach of man; and just so long as men eat animal flesh, every Sunday, and we expect great things from the killing of one man is murder, the killing of thousands in war constitutes murder upon a gigantic scale, and the flesh eating Christian nations are the warring nations of the world.

"Considering my lengthened years, I am often interrogated as to my personal habits. I have no secrets to tell.

"The question is a fair one. While obeying Nature's laws, which are God's laws—while ignoring all flesh-eating, I rigidly abstain also from tobacco, tea, coffee, liquor stimulants of all kinds and drastic drugs. These latter, in my opinion as a physician, kill more readily every year than they cure. Chastity and purity and bodily cleanliness and uplifting thoughts prolong life. I retire early at night, sleeping with my window open. Rising early in the morning, I take a lively walk, practicing in the meanwhile, deep breathing. Half an hour's sleep soon after the noonday meal, and I am ready to find refreshment. If I fall asleep in church, it is because the sermon is dull, and I sleep more profitably than the preaching. I do not mourn over bygone times or 'what might have been'; its mistakes, bringing their discipline, were stepping-stones to the higher. No failures shamed me. The grasses are green. On the rim of falling tear-drops, diamonds glitter. God is good!

"Extending my hand across the wide Atlantic, and clasping in spirit the hands of those present, I breathe the glad greetings of peace and good-will, closing with the poet's words:

"If I can live To make some pale face brighter, and to give A second lustre to some tear-dimmed eye, Or e'en impart One throb of comfort to an aching heart, Or cheer some way-worn soul in passing by;

If I can lend A strong arm to the fallen, or defend The right against a single envious strain, My life, though bare Perhaps of much that seemeth dear and fair To us on earth, will not have been in vain."

—London Herald of Health.

wanted a sitting. I told him I did, so we sat down at a large table and just as the sun was shining in the room. He held a slate at the corner of the table, one thumb on top of table, fingers under, the other hand in mine. I heard writing, then a few taps. Slade said, "It is done."

I looked at the slate, there was a message, my father's name in full and just as he always signed it. Slade said, "Do you know who this is?" I said, "That is my father."

Now no one in New York knew me. Slade said, "You take the slate." So I took it in my left hand and held it on top of my head, with the other hand held together, the two wrists were hinged with good advice, and if I had done as he told me I would have saved about four thousand dollars, of which I had a part in my pocket at the time. I had about 35 sittings with him. My father said to me that he could read most of my thoughts; this he said audibly right behind my head.

One day when the sun was shining in the room, Slade was on one side of the table and I on the other, a hand came out between me and the table; Slade was several feet from me on the other side of the table. It looked just as natural as any hand, the fingers moved, it was in such a position Slade could not possibly see it. Now, I thought to myself, I'll see if he can read my mind, so I asked him many questions that he could answer by the motion of the hand on mine. He did answer everyone correctly. There was nothing but the hand and it felt as solid as any hand I ever shook. After about two or three minutes it seemed to dissolve in mine. When I told Mr. Slade he said he never had anything like it before.

I went and got slates of my own and STILL MOVING AHEAD.

Such is the State of the Cause in Ashtabula, Ohio.

The Ashtabula Psychic Research Society is still moving forward in the good cause of Spiritualism. Our society opened its meetings on Sept. 12, with John W. Ring of Galveston, Texas, and it was our privilege to have him with us on two other dates. The weather prevented a large attendance, but the attendance was fairly good. We were highly pleased to be able to secure the services of this grand worker. His addresses were very instructive and the beautiful thoughts presented, all tinged with rhythmic beauty, will not only nourish our better natures, but will linger in our souls for ever. This young, earnest and energetic worker should have the support and encouragement of every society wherever he may chance to go; his inspiration is of a very high order and his work goes to show that he not only believes in being good, but also in doing good.

On Sept. 28, we had Mr. and Mrs. Kates with us for one evening. It is not for me to extol those worthy, well-known workers, and I will simply say that we had a good, profitable meeting, one that will be remembered pleasantly and profitably by us all.

On Nov. 25, W. Pope of Cleveland, served us, and the sweetness of his utterances and the high ideals presented were not only an inspiration to us all, but a benediction as well. Now in the autumn, the fairest season of life, his faculties well preserved, he comes to us as an example showing us what we may attain, and how we may attain true happiness, which is the birthright of every living soul. May good angels bless and guide our good Brother Pope as he scatters seeds of kindness on earth.

On Sept. 24, D. A. Herrick spoke both afternoon and evening. We were favored with a good, generous attendance, and the speaker was not only interesting but of a very profitable nature. Our Brother Herrick grows sweeter with age. He has endeared himself to the people of Ashtabula. His kind words and sweet utterances have softened the sorrow of many here in our city, where he has of late been afflicted with a passive mental state, and he has grown very popular. Our society has engaged him for the entire month of December. The opening service was held in the city hall last Sunday evening. A fine audience greeted him, and really he seemed at his best. We are looking for good results from our long winter meetings, two lectures every Sunday, and we expect to see some each week for the benefit of the society, all of which combine to help the good cause along. We are now arranging to have Fred D. Dunakin of Cecil, Ohio, our state president, to be with us the month of January. He stands in the front as an earnest, efficient worker, and we expect a great good to result from our efforts here in Ashtabula.

Oh, no! Spiritualism is not declining—nothing of an immortal nature can ever die with good workers and willing helpers, aided by such progressive ideas as come to us every week in "The Progressive Thinker." I think the outlook for our beautiful truth is certainly encouraging. I fully agree with the sentiment expressed. The Progressive Thinker is certainly branching out into new fields, new pastures, and is surely entering unexplored territory, bringing to the surface new food for thought and creating new life and activity all along the line. I would like to wonder if we as Spiritualists comprehend the enormity of the task involved in the production of such a paper as The Progressive Thinker; and now the question comes, do we appreciate it?

JOHN WALLACE.

Ashtabula, Ohio.

The results were the same. One time he gave me his accordion. I held it by the side you call it, and it played "Home, Sweet Home."

I was sometimes lifted in my chair one foot from the floor. The chairs would move around in the room in broad daylight. One time the large table rose up over our heads as high as we could reach. The brush came from the shell and brushed my clothes. Owosso took my watch out of my pocket but I held on to it. I was afraid he would make it buzz as he had Dr. Slade's, so Mr. Simmons had told me, and that he had injured it, his friend wanted to hear it buzz and it was his as much as it was the Doctor's.

This took place just before he went to England and Germany. I sold him a sealskin overcoat which he wore around the world. My father and grandmother talked as plain as anyone can in the flesh. I talked to my grandmother as natural as I ever did. I saw her, even to a mole on her cheek, in dress just as while living. My cousin Jane, in a materialized form and held up her parasol. Dr. Slade was at one corner of the table and Emily at the other, in front. My cousin Jane Cleveland came. I went to school to her when young. I liked her very much. She married a teacher of a high school in Nashville, Tenn., and died there.

I went after that to Boston and then went and had a few sittings with Dr. Watkins. I asked him if he would use slates that I would bring; he said "yes," so I said nothing to anyone and went about ten blocks away and got two large slates, four screws and a driver, put a small piece of pencil inside and screwed them together in the store; then I went to Watkins. He took hold of them on one side and I on the other, standing up. I heard the writing, then took the slates myself, unscrewed them, and there was written an answer to the question I had written inside at the store before going to Dr. Watkins. Now if I cannot believe my senses in these cases, I cannot in any other case.

Since being here in Burbank my daughter was playing in the Christian church and to please her mother-in-law she played cornet in the choir, so when I came I played violin to make it pleasant all around. So they invited me into the bible class. They asked me questions about the Lord coming back after he had been laid away. In the grave and appearing to different ones and the leader said we must take it on faith. They wanted my opinion on the subject. I said, "My grandmother was a good Presbyterian and brought me up to tell the truth, and I do not remember of ever telling her a wrong story. Since my grandmother passed away she came and conversed with me as natural as when in life; her voice was natural and I saw her as plain as I see you now, and I have had others come also."

Now if I cannot believe my senses in this case, I cannot in any other. Well, the preacher soon called a conference, and they decided not to have any in the choir that did not belong to the church. Well, that led me, my daughter and several others to get out of the choir, and some to leave the church, and I have not been to it but once since. I could tell more of such experiences, but I think this will do for the present. I am known as the wizard cornetist through the East, because I could play one higher than any other. Haverly's manager put that on the bills without asking about it.

THE STORY OF JEHOVAH.

A Comprehensive View Thereof as Found in Holy Writ.

If Christian readers would critically examine the holy book they present as the inspired "Word of God," and fully comprehend what is taught, it is not probable they would cease to claim it is inerrant? else admit themselves idol worshippers?

Will the reader take the Old Testament in hand, and kindly read for himself, unaided by priestly sophistry, what is clearly taught in regard to the Hebrew Jahvah, every time occurring where the translators used "Lord," save four times, when it is rendered "Jehovah." It may be well to mention, in passing, the Hebrew Elohim is uniformly translated God, though it is a plural noun, and should have been rendered Gods, to agree with the original.

Open to Exodus 25: The first nine verses are devoted to instructions how to build the tabernacle, otherwise tent, in which, verse 8, "I (the Lord) may dwell." Instead of the boundless universe for a dwelling and filling every part of it with his presence, he wanted a tent in which to reside!

The next fourteen verses give instructions how to make an ark, he, the Lord, was to occupy. The word ark signifies a box or chest. It was to be adorned with two cherubs of beaten gold with outstretched wings. Above the cherubs was to be placed a mercy seat. Then, verse 22:

"And there I (the Lord, otherwise Jehovah or Jahvah) will meet with thee from above the mercy seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel."

Now we have the direction of the Lord how the ark, alias box and appendages, were to be built, let us pass to chapter 37, where an account is given of its building.

This ark, on the cover of which were the cherubs, doubtless suggested to Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet, his "peeping stone" which placed in his hat enabled him to translate the inscriptions on his pretended gold plates, from which the Mormon Bible.

When new, or vexatious questions arose Moses visited the Lord who was seated between the cherubs on the mercy seat, and inquired of him what he should do in the premises. Numbers 9:8 is an illustration of this communing with Jehovah:

"And Moses said unto them, 'Stand still, and I will see what the Lord will command concerning you.'"

It is not necessary to detain the reader with an account of the war propensities of this Lord, Jehovah or Jahvah, with his instructions to "smite every made with a two-edged sword," and "thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth." This command to exterminate the people of Palestine, extended to the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites the Hivites and the Jebusites, the latter occupying the city since known as Jerusalem. See Deuteronomy 20: 13, 16, 17. Beautiful women among the captives desired, were saved on special occasions, one tenth of whom were the Lord's share, whom the priests claimed as his representatives.

"So Jehovah smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings; he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded."—Joshua 10:40.

But don't leave this subject yet. The best is to follow:

Chapter 4 of I. Samuel relates how Israel went out against the Philistines, and were smitten by them. Having implicit trust in this Lord who dwelt in the ark, so on the direction of the elders, they brought forth "the Lord of hosts which dwelleth between the cherubims," verse 8. "And when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout, so the earth rang again." Verse 10. "And the Philistines fought, and Israel was smitten," and "the ark of the Lord was taken." This Jehovah, "the Lord," fell into the hands of the Philistines. "The glory departed from Israel, because the ark of the Lord was taken."

Chapter 5, I. Samuel, tells the sympathetic reader that the Philistines removed the ark of God, carrying it to Ashdod, and set it up in the house of Dagon, and by his side.

Dagon was the Philistine's fish god, having the head of a man, and the tail of a fish; but he was no match for Jahvah, trusting to the truthfulness of the inspired penman, for he says, verse 3:

"When they [the Philistines] arose early on the morrow, behold Dagon was fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord. And they took Dagon, and set him in his place again." The next morning Dagon was found again fallen to the ground, with his head, and hands cut off, only the stump remaining.

Then the ark of God was removed to Gath, but the Lord smote the men of the city with emoroids. Removed from Gath to Ekron "the ark of God" frightened the people, so they determined to send his belligerent majesty, the Lord, in a box, to his own place, so he should not slay the people.

Seven months, according to chapter 6, I. Samuel, the ark of the Lord remained with the Philistines, then it was thought advisable to return this captured ark in a box to Israel with presents. So they made a new cart, put jewels of gold in a coffer, tied two milch cows to the cart, shutting up their calves at home; then they laid the ark of the Lord on the cart. The kine took a straight line for the camp of Joshua, lowing as they went, turning neither to the right nor left until they came into the field of Joshua, where there was a great stone.

"And the Lord smote the men of Bethshemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, fifty thousand and three score and ten men; and the people lamented because the Lord had smitten many of the people with a great slaughter."

Thus far we have followed the Bible account of the ark of the Lord. Unlike the God we adore, whose home is everywhere, this Jehovah of the Jews, who dwelt in a box, was carried on the shoulders of men from camp to camp, was hauled over the country by cows, and was noted as a successful warrior God, who boasted, Joshua 22:13—

"I have given you [Israel] a land for which you have labored, and ye built me, and ye dwell therein; the vineyards and olive yards which ye planted not, ye eat." He should have boasted in the same breath, that he had slaughtered "all that breathed," but after all his powers failed him:

"The Lord was with Judah; and he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." Judges 1:19.

This is why the Jews were limited to the fastnesses of the Libanian mountains, never in possession of the coast, because the people there were able to successfully resist the thieving marauders who usurped the uplands.

Christians, we again beg of you to drop this feeble, fighting and turbulent Jew God, Jahvah, out of your liturgy, your hymns and your sacred books, and embrace Infinite Intelligence, Eternal Goodness, and Limitless Power, and adopt a God worthy the progressive age in which we live. The Progressive Thinker will join you in adoration of such a God, but the heathen idol God, never.

Next week we will cite Bible authority to prove this Jew Lord came from Egypt; then we shall show he has a brother whose name appeared on the monument as his equal; that he became a murderer; his name was of faced, and he became generally hated, and it is probable he is now doing service as his Satanic majesty, the Devil!

A Merry Christmas.

While we may not hold the accepted Christian idea of Christmas, we can join with them in the ideal of making it a day of good cheer, good wishes, and kindly beneficence manifested in helpful ways.

Kind thoughts expressed in words or in gifts that incite good feeling and gladness of heart, work happy results in the mentality of both giver and receiver. Their tendency is toward the betterment of humanity in happiness and goodness.

We have no fear that the mythical Santa Claus will work harm to any child—however implicitly believed to be a veritable reality. Much of the happiness of children comes from the natural element of wonder in their mental faculties, and Santa Claus, though a mythical personage, excites both their wonder and their love.

Much of a child's child-life is spent in Wonderland—much of child happiness is found in that realm in which it is child nature to roam. The sober realities of prosy earth-life will soon enough crowd out the happy thoughts that pertain to the Wonder World of childhood.

Let the children have their Santa Claus—with all the good things thereto pertaining.

For the old children—grown to womanhood and manhood, Christmas may also come as a benediction, in mutual well-wishing and in mental and spiritual helpfulness.

While the children are made happy with toys, playthings, and the various things that delight the child heart, older people may be made happy with other expressions of kind feeling and good will.

Just for instance: How many a friend might be made glad every week during a whole year, with a gift of a year's subscription for The Progressive Thinker. Is it not worth thinking of? And if you would wish to make Santa Claus' beneficence still more valuable, there are the premium books at slight additional expense.

The soul feast of good things embodied in The Progressive Thinker and the premium books cannot be excelled or equaled elsewhere at the same cost.

What is Love?

Humanity is governed by thought, action and feeling. The combination constitutes the creative force or divine principle. Either may be exercised for a negative or positive effect—that is, materially or spiritually.

The materiality of thought is impregnated with action in selfishness; of feeling is hate.

The spirituality of thought is reason; of action—humanity; of feeling is sympathy.

The materiality or animalism of the creative force is lust; and the spirituality thereof is love.

Victory for Spiritualists!

WORDS OF APPRECIATION.

Mrs. Maud Chesbro in a Court of Justice Establishes an Important Precedent That Will Be Received With Applause by All Spiritualists.

To the Editor:—Your favor of the 1st inst. is at hand. The encouraging words you have sent have warmed hearts during our contest in the courts for four years to obtain for mediums who are THE MINISTERS OF SPIRITUALISM EQUAL RIGHTS BEFORE THE LAW WITH THE MINISTERS OF OTHER SYSTEMS OF RELIGIOUS TEACHING.

The substantial proof of the interest you share in this is shown by your voluntary donation of twenty-five dollars to apply on expense incurred in securing this final decision of Judge Austin in the Police Court of this city, who ruled that PRIVATE BUSINESS READINGS FORM A PART OF THE SERVICE in the performance of our duty to the religious organization of which we are pastors. For this kind and generous consideration there are no words that can express our united personal thanks. This will prove to be seed sown in good ground which will return, though after many days, many fold.

Again we thank you and remain as ever, your friends,

G. B. AND MRS. MAUD CHESBRO.

Trouble Brewing In Iowa.

DO SPIRITUALISTS

NEED A LICENSE?

Question Brought Before City Government of Davenport, Iowa.—Mrs. Sarah J. Henderson and Mrs. Kittie Gifford Are Asked to Explain Their Work.

Whether or not the ordinance which states that clairvoyants and people practicing a like profession must secure a license includes Spiritualists, is the question that is confronting the city officers and the police department at the present time.

The question arose when Mrs. Sarah J. Henderson, who resides in the South Putnam block at Second and Brady streets, invited Mrs. Kittie Gifford, a well-known Spiritualist of Clinton, to Davenport to aid her in the work here.

The police department was notified a few days ago that a meeting was to be held at Mrs. Henderson's rooms and sent an officer there to make an investigation.

The result was that Mrs. Henderson and her companions were asked to come to the chief's office the next morning to explain the details of the work. Nothing was done at that time but the matter was further taken up by the police department and the case was to have come up this morning. In the meantime Mrs. Henderson and Mrs. Gifford had engaged Attorney C. H. Murphy to represent them and as Mr. Murphy was busy at the court house the case was postponed until a week from to-day. The chief states that in the meantime the matter will be investigated and legal advice will be secured to see whether the work carried on by the two women comes under the ban when they have no license.

The ordinance, which it is thought Mrs. Henderson and Mrs. Gifford have violated, provides that clairvoyants, mediums, fortune tellers, etc., must procure a license of the city clerk, at a cost of $10 for one day, $25 for one week, $50 for one month, or $100 for one year.

The ordinance does not name Spiritualists, specifically, but it is claimed that it is so broad that the letter of the ordinance includes them.

The police state that as near as can be ascertained the women were holding a reading for which a charge is usually made, and that this is what is included in the ordinance.

Ladies Talk.

Mrs. Henderson and Mrs. Gifford were seen this morning in regard to the question and denied emphatically that their work was in any way similar to that of fortune telling or clairvoyance. They stated that there could be no possible construction of the ordinance that would include them and were firm in their statement that they considered their occupation the same as that of any other scientific movement that was conducted in the city.

Mrs. Gifford stated that she had a license the same as any clergyman, and that she was authorized to perform marriages, preach, or do any kind of religious work that a clergyman had the power to do. She stated also that the work that she carried on was nothing more than a spiritual work of this kind, and that it was as far from fortune telling, and the like as any religious movement in the city.

In support of her statement, Mrs. Gifford produced her certificate from the Rising Sun Spiritual Mission of Chicago, one of the largest institutions of its kind in the west.

She stated also that she was a member of Golden Rule Spiritual Society, the Ladies' Union, which is a like institution, the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists Society, the Philosophical Spiritual Society of Clinton, the Band of Silent Aid, the Philanthropic Society of Chicago, and the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Rising Sun Spiritualistic Society of Chicago.

Mrs. Gifford stated that she had been connected with all of these institutions in an active way, and that never had her work been regarded as anything but a religious movement.

She closed her remarks by emphasizing the statement that she did not deal in love affairs by anything of a like nature and did not consider her work anything of a fortune-telling character.

Mrs. Henderson had much the same to say in regard to her work, and stated that as evidence that she had been recognized in the Spiritualistic movement throughout the country, she had been admitted to membership in the National Spiritualistic Association, the Mississippi Valley Spiritualistic Association and the Ladies' Auxiliary.

The case is one that will be watched with interest, as it is one that will establish a precedent not only in Davenport, but throughout other cities in the state as to how far as can be ascertained, the question has never arisen before.—The Times.

It Ought to Have a Million Circulation.

We shall publish some time in January of the coming year a most remarkable paper, grouping together exceptionally important matter that should have a world-wide circulation. We will lead off with that remarkable letter by Colonel Ingersoll on THE DEVIL That will be followed by a most extraordinary article by Baron Harden Hickey, illustrating the "Parallels Between BUDDHIST AND CHRISTIAN Stories, and Showing how Buddhism Was Transported to the West."

It is rich in facts and incidents, and it alone will be worth one dollar to every reflective mind.

Mrs. M. T. Longley, the efficient secretary of the N. S. A., under the control of Spirit John Pierpont, will have something especially interesting to say of the BRIGHT AND DARK SPHERES OF SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, another of the leading lights in promoting the grand truths of Spiritualism, will discuss this question—"A NAME TO CONJURE WITH," illustrating the prevalence of fakes in the Spiritual and Industrial Fields of Thought and Work.

This special edition will be valuable throughout, and should be read by every Spiritualist in the land.

We published one edition of The Progressive Thinker that reached 150,000. Another edition, 60,000.

No other Spiritualist paper on earth has reached the altitude of THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. This edition will be a MISSIONARY TO ILLUMINATE THE WORLD.

No order received for less than ten copies. Stamps will be acceptable.

A Precocious and Godless Child.

To abridge an abridged account of the wonderful boy Odin Adolph Thomas, six years old, of 172 West 72d Street, New York, as related in a late issue of the New York World, is what we set down to do; but it seems impossible. He seems a child of nature. He has never heard of God; has never been taught a prayer; does not believe in Santa Claus; does not read fairy stories; never tasted cooked food; does as he pleases; lifts 50 pounds with either hand; visits the morgue with his father, views hundreds of dead bodies, is not shocked, but expresses great sorrow. His first toy was a human skull.

The boy is an athlete, could swing on horizontal bars when ten months old, reads fluently; operates a typewriter; was never the subject of corporal punishment but once, and then did not cry, but philosophized: "Some things are something, most things are nothing."

Odin is an inventor, and it would seem a very successful one in a small way. He is reported to be well-built, but slender; fair-haired and blue-eyed; impulsive; strong in his loves and hates, generous to a fault, and keenly alive to new impressions.

Reared as this child has been, and born of parents who had brains enough to guide him, there is hardly a doubt the unseen forces have the boy somewhat in their keeping. His future will be brilliant as has been his past. The world should keep an eye on him, for he will teach it many a useful lesson.

A Gem From Ingersoll.

"Sacred are the lips from which has issued only truth. Over all wealth, above any station, superior to the noble, the robbed and crowned, rises the sincere man. Happy is he who neither loves nor hates, who neither blesses nor curses the person who wears no mask."

SOME TRENCANT THOUGHTS.

Spirits Not Guided by Earthly Time In Communications—Unexpected Visitation Said to Be Due to Absence of Measurement by Days and Hours in Other Realm.

To the person endeavoring [as set forth in the Record-Examiner] to satisfy himself regarding the truth of the phenomena of modern spiritualism, there is ever one great stumbling-block, and that is expressed by the word conditions.

Knowing himself to be open-minded, unprejudiced and earnestly desirous of knowledge, he cannot understand, until after much—very much—experience, why he cannot have the proofs in the way that he assumes such should be given. He is ever puzzled by the fact that when he does receive anything it is so entirely different from that which he had mentally formulated and expected that he at times will not only doubt the phenomena, but doubt himself, to say nothing of doubting the medium, in connection with whom the phenomena may have occurred.

Herein is where the seeker so often errs, and condemns that which he does not understand, to the detriment of himself and to the prejudice of his spirit friends, who are endeavoring as best they can under the natural laws that govern the manifestations to give proof to him in this life of the individual existence and ability to be known from the realm of spirit life.

If everything occurred as I might anticipate, then I should question the truth of that given. But in actual phenomena, in real spirit work of proof among mortals, I am inclined to accept, from the experience that I have had, the proposition that it is ever the unexpected that are the real proofs.

There is so much to be considered in this that from the standpoint of a mortal it is quite difficult to present what one has learned of the laws that govern in the realm of occultism. Still such laws do exist and spirits must do their work under such laws just the same as we work in this life.

Forget Element of Time.

I have learned that the spirit condition of life is more intense than mortal life; and that the element of time, as we know and measure time, is soon forgotten. In the spirit realm it is not used. Events are the marks by which eternity is measured in that realm. Consequently in communications where earthly time is given to satisfy a query of the mortal, it is rare that the time given for a future occurrence is accurate.

I am sure this is understandable when we stop to think of the basis of measurement of time in earth life. It is wholly based on the revolution of the earth upon its axis, making for us day and night, which divisions are again emphatically divided into hours and minutes; in addition to the journey of the earth around the sun, which is divided by days, weeks and months; each revolution added to those recorded before making our data of years. This, so important with us in our daily planning, is of no influence in the spirit realm. It does not exist. Therefore it is not reasonable to expect accuracy of earthly time in spirit communications.

It is true there are some spirits who seem to make a special study of this mortal measurement in relation to events in their own realm, and give astonishingly accurate prophecies marked by earthly time, but these are rare. In some life we know an astronomer who does a similar thing, but the mass of humanity are not astronomers—not by any means, nor are the mass of spirits.

My experience is that those in spirit life remember their earth conditions, their sorrow and despair, when some dear one dies, and under that emotional memory are over-eager to be known to the dear ones left behind, and so seek out of accurate statements provided they can find the way that will satisfy the seeker, even in a small degree, that they will still live, are still themselves and live more intensely than ever.

Attitude of the Doubter.

But the man who can only comprehend a material fact—the doubting Thomases—cannot understand how intangible beings can possibly make themselves known, and any evidence that will be tangible to the five recognized material senses.

I will take his own material basis and see how far I can use that in presenting the thoughts I wish to express. It is several decades since physiologists became aware of a force generated by the mere action of living. That is to say, that a recognized force that can be proved by scientific instruments does emanate from the human body. The same emanates from all forms of animal life. I am sure this will not be disputed by anyone in this day.

In later days it has been proved by the use of sensitive photographic plates, and otherwise, that this force called animal magnetism also gives light strong enough to produce evident material results.

This human force surrounds all human bodies as an aura, or personal atmosphere. In theosophy that is so well known that sensitives of that cult will assert that they can diagnose the temperament of the individual by the color of the aura, as seen by the sensitive. The same assertion is made by some spirit mediums.

Sees a Connecting Link.

Now I have it proved to my understanding that this aura is the connecting link between earth conditions and the realm of spirit. That into this spirit enters and so know of our acts and work as we do in this life. This aura is a spirit house while in earth life, into which we receive our spirit friends, this being true, it is well that we know it, and endeavor in every way to keep our spirit-house clean, that our friends may love to be with us.

Physiologists also assert that of the hundreds of millions in earth life at one time, there are no two alike. This we are sure is true. Hence, as no two are alike, there must be just that relative difference in the force emanating from each body. Consequently that marvelous battery—the human body—presents for the use of spirits just as many variants of force as there are bodies upon earth. Further, no human body is precisely the same for any two seconds of time.

It is this force that is used by spirits in their manifestations, and this does account for all of the varying phases of mediumship; all of the variations of conditions, and why manifestations are never exactly duplicated.

Bearing this knowledge in mind, the seeker after proofs of immortality outside of his own organism will be more patient in his search and more careful in accusing others of wrong-doing.

ERNEST HARDY.

"Science and the Future Life." By James H. Hyslop. Is one of the most valuable acquisition to the literature of Modern Spiritualism that has appeared of late years. It is scientific in its method, profound in its logic, and above all sympathetic to the truth whatever it may be and wherever it may be found. Price, cloth, $1.50. 10 cents postage extra.

Surging Ahead!

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is Surging Ahead! Its weekly receipts are large, and it was never in a more favorable financial condition than at present. It has been crowned with sixteen years of unparalleled prosperity. It is the Head Light of a Pure Spiritualism and Honest Mediumship! It is the STANDARD BEARER OF TRUTH. Its editor is in close touch with the spirit world, and the higher denizens thereof are in harmony with its work. It is a breezy paper, a stirring paper, a paper that makes vibrations wherever it goes, a paper that is never in the rut, never standing still, but ever on the ascending plane; ever dispensing the higher thought. When one important movement ends another opens, and its readers ask, "What next?" Yes, what next? It will come like a meteor, and will, perhaps, dazzle you with a meteoric display. LOOK OUT FOR THE "SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL!" It will astonish you as never before! It will be educational. It will give your mind new vibrations. It will teach you something of the mysteries of the Dark Cabinet, and show some of the rank deception carried on there in the name of "Spirit Return," one of the grandest truths that ever came to the world.

WHAT I WANT FOR CHRISTMAS.

Trenchant Remarks by That Prince of Orators, Colonel Ingersoll.

If I had the power to produce exactly what I want for next Christmas, I would have all the kings and emperors resign and allow the people to govern themselves.

I would have all the nobility drop their titles and give their lands back to the people.

I would have the Pope throw away his tiara, take off his sacred vestments, and admit that he is not acting for God—is not infallible—but is just an ordinary Italian.

I would have all the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, priests and clergymen admit they know nothing about theology, nothing about hell or heaven, nothing about the destiny of the human race, nothing about devils or ghosts, gods or angels.

I would have them tell all their "flocks" to think for themselves, to be manly men and womanly women, and to do all in their power to increase the sum of human happiness.

I would have all the professors in colleges, all the teachers in schools of every kind, including those in Sunday schools, agree that they would teach only what they know, that they would not palm off guesses as demonstrated truths.

I would like to see all the politicians changed to statesmen, and men who make their country great and free—to men who care more for public good than private gain—men who long to be of use.

I would like to see all the editors of papers and magazines agree to print the truth and nothing but the truth, to avoid all slander and misrepresentation, and to let the private affairs of the people alone.

I would like to see the millionaires unite and form a trust for the public good and prohibition both abolished.

I would like to see a fair division of profits between capital and labor, so that the toiler could save enough to mingle a little June with the December of his life.

I would like to see an international court established in which to settle disputes between nations, so that armies could be disbanded and the great navies allowed to rust and rot in perfect peace.

I would like to see the whole world free—free from injustice—free from superstition.

This will do for next Christmas. The following Christmas I may want more.

SATAN.

Methinks I hear an angel's voice Come whispering through the air; It bids me write, and then rejoice And to the world declare, That if we wish to do our best To Christianize the world We might commence on Satan first, Who once from heaven was hurled.

If he was once an angel bright, And God so loved him then, It does not seem to be just right To banish him like men, And keep him out so long a time To wander through the earth, And charge him up with every crime From eternity

General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy to be inserted in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in no case will they be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE. that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It would not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE 'ARIOUS' SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

We desire the work, "MORAL EDUCATION," by Prof. Joseph Rodas Buchanan. Who has a copy?

R. Mitchell writes: "The Spiritualistic Church of the Student's of Nature, at Van Buren Hall, was well attended last Sunday evening, Mrs. M. Schumacher, the pastor, taking her subject 'Elijah took the mantle and wrapped it together,' spiritualizing this text brought out its spiritual meaning. Dr. L. C. Koehler, the assistant, with Sister McIntyre, Sister T. Malchikie, gave us beautiful demonstrations of spirit return, which was healing to the many sorrowing hearts."

The Vermont State Spiritualist Association will hold its next annual convention at Grand Army Hall, Montpelier, Vt., Friday, Saturday and Sunday, January 12, 13 and 14, 1906. The management have been fortunate in securing for the entire meeting W. J. Colville. Our well-known state speakers, Alonzo F. Hubbard, Mrs. Abbie Rossett, Mrs. Pauline, Mrs. E. I. Chapman, and others are all invited and it is expected they will be present. Mrs. E. I. Chapman, one of the best test mediums on our platform, will be present the entire meeting and give spirit messages at the different sessions of a convention. During the convention, test seances will be held by Mrs. Chapman, consisting of giving names and minute description of our friends passed to spirit life, proving to all, even the most doubtful, the great truth of immortality. To these seances a small admission fee will be charged to help defray expenses. The sessions of the convention will be interspersed with good music in charge of Mrs. Ella Royce, Mrs. Julia Allen, Orestes, and others. The management at the Montpelier House, $1.50 per day, two in a room; $2 per day, one in a room. Teams cared for at livery stable, rear of Montpelier House, 75c per day; single feed, 25c. S. N. Gould, Randolph, Vt., president; Don H. Chapman, Cambridge, Vt., chairman of board of managers; Miss Anna Leonard, East Calais, Vt., secretary.

Dec. 31 will be a gala evening at the Independent Church of Truth, corner 47th street and Grand Boulevard, as several good mediums will assist Mrs. Cooley in giving messages that evening, and several ten-minute speeches will be given by eloquent speakers. All come and enjoy a spiritual New Year's eve.

Mrs. Amanda Coffman writes: "December finds me in Buffalo, N. Y., serving the first Spiritual church. This is my second engagement here. I found the society in a prosperous condition owing to the good work of Prof. Lockwood and the Rev. B. F. Austin. The local mediums have very kindly offered their assistance at all services during my two months' stay, and harmony prevails. Meetings are largely attended. Sunday evenings people are turned away, many standing during the whole service. I will answer calls for funerals within a reasonable distance from Buffalo. Friends may address me until Feb. 1, at No. 204 York street, Buffalo, N. Y."

Mrs. E. Frame writes: "At our conference meeting at Hopkins Hall, Sunday afternoon, the description of our future homes and how built was so clearly explained by our pastor, Mr. Jeffery Burdland, aided by her spirit guides, that we feel that all present must have been greatly benefited in the glorious truths spoken to us. In the evening we were greatly comforted by the assurance of the great joy brought to our spirit friends to be able to bring tidings of peace and good will to all. This assurance was given to us in answer to the question, 'Are our spirit friends benefited by returning to us?'"

E. R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "The election of officers will be held at the home of Mrs. M. A. Price, 612 5th street N. W. Mr. Walter P. Williams was the speaker for the Temple League, Sunday, Dec. 3; Mrs. Ripple was the message bearer. Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates who are serving the First Spiritual Church in Washington, D. C., for the months of November and December, are open for engagements after the 31st. Address 702 H street N. W."

Mrs. H. S. Slosson, the well known medium, has removed from 10 South Elizabeth street to 381 Park avenue, near Kedzie avenue. Telephone Ogden 443 "Parkside."

AS A GENERAL RULE, IN THIS OFFICE WE PAY NO ATTENTION TO ANONYMOUS COMMUNICATIONS. THE NAME AND ADDRESS OF THE WRITER SHOULD ACCOMPANY ALL MATTER, OF WHATEVER KIND, SENT TO THIS OFFICE.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for current issue should reach this office no later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

The Bazaar of the Church of the Soul conducted by the Band of Harmony last Thursday (Dec. 7) was a great success. Phil particulars will be given in the next report of the Band of Harmony. The bazaar was a success in every way. The luncheon served was excellent, and too much credit cannot be given to the refreshment committee.

V. L. Capwell writes from 106 Walnut street, Dorrance, Pa.: "I am deeply interested in the discussion of 'Points of Light' as observed by a number of your readers. I have always seen them in various forms, until my eyes were opened by spirit truth. I shall be pleased to correspond with anyone interested along this line, as I believe it is ground work upon which much of mesmeric phenomena rests. This subject alone is worth many times the cost of your splendid paper."

Dr. Adam Clark, a profound linguist, historian, and Biblical scholar, one of the leading authorities among Methodist clergymen after having investigated Spiritualism, says: "I believe there is a supernatural and spiritual world in which human spirits both good and bad live in a state of consciousness. I believe that any of these spirits may, according to the order of God in the law of their place of residence, have intercourse with this world and be visible to mortals. What do Methodists think about this opinion of their great authority on Biblical exegesis?"

Mrs. N. C. Selbrede writes from Billings, Mont.: "Mr. Harry Moore and Mrs. Eva McCoy have served the First Spiritual Church of Billings for the past two months, and made a great many converts through their earnest efforts. Each the grand and noble truths of Spiritualism. Mr. Moore will now serve the First Spiritual Society of Seattle for the coming three months, and return to Billings on his way east next spring, while Mrs. McCoy will remain with the Billings society until the New Year and as much longer as we can prevail on her to stay with us."

D. Sibert writes from Oakland, Cal.: "There is a man here who is dealing in these twenty-four hours tricks to imitate the phenomena of mediumship, at a dollar a piece. I met him the other day and he said he was exposing Spiritualism and when I asked for his meaning I soon found out that it was the same old fraud that that firm in Chicago was working a few years ago when you showed it up in The Progressive Thinker."

Mrs. H. L. Lichtig writes: "The Sunflower Club held one of the most interesting business meetings, Dec. 12, since its inception. One of the most important matters to be acted upon was the starting of a children's lyceum. A committee was appointed to visit the different Spiritual societies in the city and make a report on the cooperation in this matter; Mrs. A. W. Bloom and Mrs. Dr. Webb to visit the North Side societies; Mrs. J. Stander Adams and Mrs. J. R. Francis to visit the societies of the West Side; Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig and Mrs. O. B. Wilson the societies of the South Side. Mrs. Lichtig was appointed superintendent of the lyceum work and Mrs. Jennie Adams, assistant superintendent."

W. J. Elmo writes: "Truth seekers are having a feast in the way of good lectures, tests and messages at the Spiritual Alliance meetings, Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue, corner Cottage Grove avenue. The winter's program is first-class. Mrs. Elmo is enjoying good health and giving lectures, tests and messages at each afternoon and evening meeting. Professor Kershaw, a talented Hindu gentleman of Bombay, India, and late of the Oriental College of St. Petersburg, Russia, professor and instructor to Ph. D. class, will be with us every Sunday afternoon this month and every meeting next month. Prof. E. M. Snarey, an inspirational speaker will be with us on Dec. 17, in the evening. He is a grand medium and a worthy worker for our cause. You should hear him. Services at 3 and 8 o'clock sharp. Good music, plenty of tests and messages."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "The subject that was handled by Dr. C. S. Tisdale before the Hyde Park Occult Society last Sunday evening, 'The Crowned Glory of Man,' was fine and held his audience with intense interest to the last. He is to be with us again on January 14, and perhaps for a number of Sundays to come. His subject for January 14, will be 'The Origin of Man.' Mrs. E. J. Hanson will be with us on Dec. 24. She always gives a good service. Mrs. B. B. Wilson gave messages and all were recognized. Our society feels very proud to know that one who has developed so as to give us messages, is doing so well. Dances every Thursday night. On Dec. 27, an election of officers for the year will be held. All members are requested to be present. On January 3 we hold our third anniversary banquet. Members are allowed to invite one or more of their friends."

Theresa Doane writes from Berkeley, Cal.: "Of late one sees a good deal about Henry Slade in the papers. Why should this be? Are Spiritualists like others, and not value their mediums until they have passed over? There are to-day living other mediums, good ones, who are struggling along trying to exist. They will some day pass out; then they, too, perhaps will be in the papers. My boy once said: 'If people had any good things to say of each other, they should not wait until they were gone but say it now, and while they were with us.' Our mediums should be surrounded with our love, and they should be provided for all ways. This one step, in my opinion would help the cause of Spiritualism very much. Our mediums give us the proof of immortality by enabling our dear ones to come to us, and prove they are not dead."

Mrs. Laura G. Fisen sends the following: "The City of Light Assembly at Lily Dale, N. Y., will hold its sessions next season from July 13 to Sept. 2. Arrangements have been made for the ablest speakers, finest singers, and best music they have ever had, and it promises to be a most successful season. There will be a special Woman's Peace, Temperance, Labor, and Young People's Day. Some of the ablest orators in the country will be heard. Special low excursion rates have also been arranged for with the railroads."

The Veteran Spiritualists of Chicago will hold a Social Reunion and Camp-Fire at Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue, corner Cottage Grove avenue, Wednesday, January 16, 1906. The program of music, personal experiences, reminiscences, messages and fun will open at 2 p. m., and taps sound at midnight. Old-time workers, as guests of honor will be entertained by the later Volunteers in our ranks. No door fee or collection will be taken. Contributions of substantial eatables are solicited—coffee, sugar, bread and meat are as desirable as cake. Refreshments without cost to the guests will be served from 5:30 to 7 p. m. Come! You cannot afford to miss this occasion. Take Cottage Grove avenue cars, or any route that transfers to the 35th street cars. Send program to this hall by force 3 p. m. Mrs. O. B. Wilson, No. 6 47th street, chairman of general committee.

E. L. Cranston writes from Long Beach, Cal.: "We have held meetings in Odd Fellows' hall every Sunday night since August 1. Hon. W. T. Hutchins, an ex-Congressional minister of Springfield, Mass., has been our speaker most of the time. His beliefs, and some other things, are plain. Our Spiritualism on a foundation which will build in our lives a more noble man and womanhood. That the religion which is to make an impression on the twentieth century mentality, means something more than mere pinning our faith on ancient traditions. It will mean striking out of the materialism that hamper the body as well as the soul in order it may have a fit temple to dwell in. It means more than to merely visit our departed friends and ask for a business pointer or two; it means building up a great system of thought and action which shall make men and women more and happier and show a high standard of good conduct to those who are ignorantly condemning us."

Mrs. F. E. Bonney writes from Cincinnati, Ohio: "The Cincinnati society has been enjoying the ministrations of Mrs. Elizabeth Schaus of Toledo, Ohio, since the first of October, and hoped to retain her services through the winter; but for various reasons, it has become necessary for her to return to Toledo. The present society reluctantly granted leave of absence, with the expressed desire that it may be made possible for her to return soon. Mrs. Schaus has made many warm friends here who love and honor her for faithful work and unselfish devotion to the cause of Spiritualism. We are glad to note that the Cincinnati society work is recognized wherever she goes. Her lectures are replete with thought and characterized by a spiritual earnestness and power that makes strong appeal to all earnest souls who are seeking the truth."

The ladies of the club ask the cooperation of every Spiritualist in Chicago in this work. Too long have we been feeding the adults on tests and allowing the poor children to go hungry for knowledge. The children of the workers are going to look out for the children now. Chicago, the second city in the United States, wants the largest and best lyceum, and we want every Spiritualist's child in this city and all their neighbor's children they can induce to come with them to test with us in this work. We hope to have arrangements made for the children to begin our work with the new year.

Tuesday, Dec. 26, from 2 to 5 p. m., the club gives another of its famous tea parties. This may be the last one for some time, so everybody come and bring your friends."

Captain Geo. W. Walrand of Denver, Colo., one of the oldest workers for the cause of Spiritualism, is just recovering from a very serious attack of nervous, mental and physical prostration with heart failure complications. The trouble was brought on through overwork and increased brain strain. We are glad he is likely again to resume his personal duties, for he has been an earnest, zealous and conscientious worker for forty years or more.

Mrs. Minnie Lambert, who received great benefit from the psychic clinic, writes: "Dear friends, we should all stand together in the beautiful belief that our loved ones can return and communicate with us, and that there is a future life before us where we can go on doing good. Let us do our best to help each other and to learn all we can. I know our dear ones can make their presence known to us, for I have lost my sister with me, we died two years ago. I have also seen a brother, who passed on twenty-one years ago."

Aaron Snick writes from Decatur, Ill.: "We have with us this month the old and well tried lecturer and test medium Frank T. Ripley, who is filling our hall with some of our best citizens. His lectures under control of his guides are fine, and his tests are marvelous. Bro. Ripley comes here under the auspices of the Spiritual Science Society of Decatur. It is the first time our co-worker has been in this part of the state, and I can assure you that we are highly pleased to have been able to secure the services of such an able and fearless worker in the cause of truth."

Carl Carpenter writes from Tustin, Mich.: "Today, the 90th birthday of Mrs. Eliza Carpenter, was appropriately remembered by a family reunion held at the home of her husband, Mr. E. J. Brady. All of Mrs. Carpenter's living children were present, besides a goodly number of grand children, great-grand children and neighbors. Those from a distance were Mr. Carl Carpenter and daughter, of Benzonia, Mich., and Mrs. Isaac Smith, Bristol, Mich. Mrs. Carpenter has been a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker from the first issue up to the present time. After a bounteous repast the guests made the time pass joyously by singing, and listening to instrumental music."

Mr. Elmo writes: "Members and visiting truth seekers of the Spiritual Alliance church, 3514 Vincennes avenue, in Vincennes Hall, are enjoying the grand lessons given by Prof. N. Kershaw of Bombay, India, in lectures every Sunday at 3 p. m. He has been engaged for two months. Dr. Geo. B. Warne will speak Sunday evening, Dec. 24, at 8 o'clock. Mrs. May Elmo will give messages. Services every Sunday at 3 and 8 p. m. sharp."

Mrs. Penny writes from Saginaw, Mich.: "Dec. 3, it was the privilege of the Spiritual Alliance to listen to the Minnie Sharlow of Detroit. The K. P. Hall was crowded. Mrs. Sharlow is a noble worker for the cause of Spiritualism. Her tests were most satisfactory, and we are looking forward to the month of January when she will be with us again and we feel she will accomplish much good for the cause."

TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, December 24, 1905: "On Earth, Peace."

Gem of Thought:
We long for pain and woe to cease,
For joy to fill each breast;
But we long to hope that peace,
That sought for long and rest?
True, pain will be till law is known Obedient and given place;
And joy will come when we have grown in grace.
In Knowledge and in Grace.
In Love, pray do you little part,
The giver of cheer and mirth;
Make glad today some lonely heart,
"Twill help bring 'Peace on Earth.'"

The following IMPORTANT item, clipped from Four Track News for December, contains some important information. "There is a very peculiar coincidence associated with the concurrent election of five new members to the Hall of Fame and the action of the Inter-church Conference on Federation, notwithstanding the fact that they were in no way connected. An examination of the records of the Hall of Fame shows that fifteen out of the thirty-four names now enrolled there are those of active Unitarians, while the Federation by its recent action has barred the Unitarians from its meetings. That any one sect should furnish nearly half the members of the Hall of Fame, and that sect, one numbering about 100,000 members, as against others numbering 1,600,000, 4,600,000, 6,000,000, and 9,200,000 is a historical fact worth the consideration of all who are interested in the world's affairs, and in the light of this condition it is a singular thing that a great body of progressive Christians should bar those of another particular faith from its assemblies."

A. Haeger writes: "Sunday evening, Dec. 10, Spiritual Temple Light and Truth, 370 Wabasha avenue, was filled with an appreciative audience, which had come to witness the christening of a child by our pastor, Mr. Th. Loh. We had the pleasure of having Mr. Wm. Arnold with us, who favored us with an address; also gave a few tests. Miss O. J. H. of the Instrumental Music vocal selection, which received merited applause, followed with tests given by Mrs. C. Gantner. Tuesday evening, December 26, at 7 o'clock, the children of the Sunday-school of Temple Light and Truth will celebrate Christmas with instrumental and vocal selections. Tests will be given by various mediums. We will also have a good speaker and all will be made welcome."

Minnie Sharlow, 11 Porter street, Detroit, Mich., wishes to announce that she has the months of February and April open, and would be pleased to hear from any society in need of a lecturer and test medium.

C. H. Freedman writes from Minneapolis, Minn., as follows, speaking very approvingly of the work done there by Mrs. Virginia Bryant and Mrs. Jaquet. The two prominent mediums, and the genuine in Spiritualism, and showing the difference between the two: 'I am so glad to know two of the prominent workers gave the nerve to publicly show now so much of this so-called phenomena is produced. It appeals to me as a move in the right direction, as well as a grand and much-needed missionary work. Mrs. Virginia Bryant and Mrs. Jaquet gave one of their exposures in Richmond Hall Sunday evening, which was both instructive and entertaining, the only regret being that it could not be witnessed by the entire community. It seems to me no true Spiritualist who has the good of the cause at heart, could but feel obliged to the reader for verification. She made no mistakes, and I think no one questioned the genuineness of her readings. There was no door fee, but a collection was taken, and I understood that over $15 were taken at one collection."

Apparently, the Buffalo Society is doing well, and on the rising tide of interest and success, I hope it may continue to grow until it is a recognized power in the land, respected and honored as a leading representation of the best public opinion.

Mrs. Dr. Matteson has done a great, good work for the cause in Buffalo, not only in the state and National associations as well, but her medical practice keeps her very busy, and, for variety, the medical rings get her arrested every little while which furnishes her amusement, and then an opportunity to unmask and expose their "true inwardness" while her patients are usually glad to testify in her favor. Some three months ago they tried it again; I think this was the first time they have had her before the grand jury, but never convicted. Her medicines are now on the market as "proprietary remedies," but she does not abate her work with her patients.

I am home again ready to answer calls for lectures, camps or funerals.

Notes and News from the Southern Cassadaga.

Having been appointed camp scribe, I hope to be able to give some glimpses of camp life in the South that will more closely unite the North and the South and impress people with the fact that we make a visit to the Southern Cassadaga Camp.

Husband and I sailed from New York on the good steamer Comanche, via the Clyde line, on Tuesday, Nov. 28, and arrived here the following Saturday. By some it was thought to be a rough voyage, but never having been seasick, we experienced no inconvenience. We found the camp more beautiful than ever, with several new cottages and several others in process of construction. Mrs. Carrie Pratt's cottage built upon a lot purchased from Mrs. Huff, is a great addition, for the cottage and its surroundings reflected in the water gave a most beautiful picture worth looking at. Mrs. Pratt has just moved in, and has for a companion, Mrs. Nellie Nutting of Lily Dale, who is comparatively well now, the southern climate having worked wonders for her health.

Hotel Cassadaga has several guests. It has been brightened up during the past season, and there will be no empty rooms a little later on.

The dining-room purchased by Mrs. Lloyd and Sherman, has several boarders who are being served bountifully by the hostess.

The Spencer House is also being patronized by the cottagers who praise the quality and abundance of the food, and kinds of pastry at reasonable rates.

LYMAN C. HOWE'S NOTES.

Mrs. Betha White—Funeral Services—Buffalo—Mrs. Amanda Coffman—Mrs. Chase—Mrs. Dr. Matteson's Work.

On Wednesday, Dec. 6, I met Hon. James H. White at his beautiful home on Water street, Port Huron, Mich., to join in celebrating the spiritual birth of Mrs. Betha H. White, according to her life-long faith in Spiritualism. Melvin A. Root of Bay City, paid a tender tribute to her memory, and introduced the services with exquisite music by Prof. Hudson—musical associate of James G. Clark and the Hutchinsons—and the atmosphere of the home was opulent with the spirit that for so many years had impressed her sweet, pure character upon all its appointments; and the union of words was tangible and sustaining. Bro. White, in tearful tenderness, accepted the ordeal in a hopeful, confident spirit, assured of the superior life awaiting all who grope in the shadows of sense. We accompanied the body to Detroit, where it was cremated according to her expressed wish, after some sweet music by Prof. Hudson, and other farewell services in loving memory of the beautiful character of this noble woman and representative Spiritualist. This world is better for her having lived, and the spirit world is now richer and more attractive for the presence of her royal personality.

Returning via Grand Trunk to Buffalo, and too late to connect for Frecola Saturday night, I found a welcome at the hospitable home of Mrs. Dr. Matteson, where I remained until Monday, and attended the church services corner of Jersey and Prospect streets, where Amanda Coffman is doing a splendid work, and the children of the lyceum are thriving under the direction of Mrs. Dillon, and her assistants. I joined in the conference where adults discussed the issues of life and the problem of immortality, in a free and easy way, and of course we settled all doubtful questions in the profoundest manner.

The morning audience was not large—not more than one-fourth as many as I had in Pittsburgh—but the discourse by Mrs. Coffman's guides, deserved a full house. In the evening the house was packed to the doors; all available standing room was taken. A fine orchestra charmed us with its sweet music. Mrs. Chase gave trance utterances and psychic readings which appeared to be accepted as correct, and quite startling. One man failed to answer to his name and the message. After repeating it several times she sprang forward and rushed down the aisle, elbowing her way through the crowd, and never stopped until she found the man at the extreme end of the room at the door. I was told that he looked affrighted, acknowledged the test, and his name, and said he was so absorbed in thought that he forgot his name!

After Mrs. Chase retired, Mrs. Coffman was blindfolded, apparently so thoroughly as to make it impossible for her to see anything with physical eyes, and a large number of questions and names were collected and placed upon the stand before her.

With wonderful readiness and accuracy she gave responses, and then with a dash at the pile of questions she selected the correct answer, as described, and handed the reader for verification. She made no mistakes, and I think no one questioned the genuineness of her readings. There was no door fee, but a collection was taken, and I understood that over $15 were taken at one collection."

The Spencer House is also being patronized by the cottagers who praise the quality and abundance of the food, and kinds of pastry at reasonable rates.

Brigham Hall is ready for occupancy, and no doubt will soon have its quota of guests. There are now 111 people on the grounds, and the cottages outside the gate, and it is now several weeks before camp opening. Many new visitors are with us. Among them Dr. D. Bodfield and wife of Cleveland, Ohio. The Doctor is a well-known practitioner there. Also Mrs. Black, widow of the late Thomas Black of Cleveland, and former president of the Ohio State Association, and well known among the Spiritualists of that state. Mrs. Fisher and Mrs. Goss of Ravenna, Ohio, are located at the Phillbrook cottage.

B. T. Cummings and wife, and H. H. Cummings and wife of Springfield, Mass., are late arrivals. Mrs. E. T. Cummings is well known in Spiritualistic circles as a life writer and a great worker for the cause of Spiritualism.

Hon. Alonzo Hubbard and wife, of Vermont, and Mrs. Laura Holt, one of the trustees of the New York State Association, residing at West Potosdam, N. Y., are expected soon and will occupy rooms in the Apartment House.

Charles W. Hains, M. D., formerly physician for five years for Camp Lake Brady, Ohio, and a graduate of Cleveland Homeopathic College of 1883, passed the Florida medical examination Nov. 28, 1905, and is legally registered as a practitioner in this state. He has with him a very excellent helper in the person of E. O. Shively who is an experienced nurse and has worked for years with the Doctors, and was in camp with him with headquarters at Hotel Cassadaga. There is a movement being inaugurated to establish a fine sanitarium near the camp, of which Dr. Hains will have charge.

Mrs. J. D. Bartholomew has been quite ill for a few days, but is better now.

Mrs. J. F. Norman, professional decorator and painter, from Rochester, Ohio, occupies the Beckwith cottage, and is doing work at Lake Helen village. Mrs. A. Kelsey of Sandusky, Ohio, is also an occupant of the Beckwith cottage.

Mrs. Sarah Davis of Watertown, N. Y., and Mrs. S. C. Stull of Rochester, N. Y., are making their home at Hotel Cassadaga. Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood are guests there until the completion of Prospect Cottage on the hill. Mr. Greenwood has also the plan for a fine house which will be begun as soon as their cottage is completed.

People who desire valuable sites for building camp, do better than to secure one on the hillside.

A Norman and wife of Lily Dale, decline themselves well pleased with the climate and the people.

Florida fruits are abundant, good oranges, two dozen for 25 cents; tangerines, mangelines, 15 cents per dozen. Lettuce, young onions, radishes, turnips and some peas are to be had for moderate prices.

The Bond mills are being rebuilt and will be better than ever, as in addition to the former departments there will be a window casing, sand and door factory.

Resolution of Condolence and Respect.

Whereas the angel of Death has entered the band of trustees of the National Spiritualists Association and some of our loved ones, and brother and co-worker, Steven D. Dye, of Los Angeles, Cal., to the immortal world, and whereas we feel that in the earthly loss of Brother Dye, our cause has been called upon to part with an older veteran and staunch worker for humanity, be it therefore,

Resolved, That the National Spiritualists Association recognize and accept that while the spirit world rejoices at the advent of this friend and brother, our mortal ranks are weakened by his departure, and our national workers saddened by his loss. We pay our tribute of respect to his memory and extend to his bereaved wife and kinpeople our expressions of sympathy and condolence, with the assurance that Brother Dye will continue to be on guard as their comrade and helper, and the friend of all humanity.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life, at Columbus, Ohio, Dec. 8, Susan Carding, age 61, who after a long and painful illness, is at last free, and all rejoice with her.

Mrs. Carding was a retiring nature, but a sweet, loving woman. To know her was to love her. Her husband, Steven Carding, preceded her two years. They were both strong Spiritualists, and Mr. Carding a great worker for it. He was on the board of trustees, at the Sixth Street Church at the time of his death, where he is greatly missed. Two sons survive them: one of whom is a very prominent business man here. The funeral was held at the home Sunday afternoon, the writer officiating.

ELIZABETH HARLOW.

Passed to spirit life from Galien, Mich., Nov. 23, 1905, my father, John Spencer Ingles, in his 72nd year.

He had been a life-long Spiritualist, possessing a remarkable healing power, which he unselfishly used for the benefit of humanity.

The esteem in which he was held by the community was attested by the large concourse of friends who attended his funeral, which was under the auspices of the I. O. O. F. Dr. Denlow, of South Bend, Ind., spoke eloquently on the occasion.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is sacrificed to brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes briefly assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always abundant, and hence there is a delay. Every one here, or wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request is made, the correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

To this list probably sixty, more or less, new denominations have been started by restless, ambitious and selfish innovators since the publication of the Bible text. It may mean only interpretation, is sufficient to the sprouting of a new branch from the old theological stem. When a tree is diseased and dying, it is noticeable that new growths rapidly appear, sprouting spring up at the roots and suckers grow from the limbs. There is the appearance of vigorous growth, but it is only apparent. The roots are dead.

The membership of these denominations are, of course, only estimates, and in many instances are far from correct. Thus the Catholics which lead by eight millions, are nearer twice that number. As is well known the Catholic population of this country is one of the twelve millions, and every child born to a Catholic family is a Catholic. Nearly a million immigrants are yearly landed on our shores, nine-tenths of whom belong to that church.

The number of Spiritualists is taken from the census report, and how it was arrived at is one of the mysteries of the census taker. It may mean only those enrolled in organizations, and even then would be far less than the real number. An exceedingly small minority are members of associations.

Granting, however, the correctness of this statement that there are twenty-seven millions enrolled in the eighty millions of the population, there remains fifty-three millions outside any form of sect, subject to conversion, and it would seem that the home field furnished the most profitable place for missionary effort.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

The seventeenth of April was the day fixed for the end of the world, and as the time drew near Mr. Smith talked of little else from morning until night. I asked Aunt Ann if she thought he really believed it.

"I believe he thinks he believes it, but that he really thought how terrible such a belief is, I do not believe," she replied.

"This delusion will have to have its run, like a fever or any similar disease, and after it is over there will come a reaction and then it may be possible to show him how narrow, cruel and unjust his present belief is. A great many of the foolish, reckless and unreasonable actions and beliefs indulged in by mortals are traceable to the law of reaction, and I am wondering what opposite extreme Mr. Smith will run to."

The victim had the hardest time of any of us, for she was afraid her father might be right. She would start and tremble at every unusual sound, or if anyone made a sudden exclamation of fear or surprise. She would scream with terror in her sleep, dreaming that the world was enveloped in flames. We all pitied the poor girl and tried to keep her mind upon other subjects as much as possible, but the terror seemed to be ever lurking near even in her happiest moments.

One day I told the victim about you, Martha, and the experience you had when your brother was a baby, and the knowledge that the time had been set for a final conflagration several times before and passed without so much as a wrinkle appearing on the sky, seemed to comfort her more than anything else.

The 17th of April was a beautiful day. All nature thrilled with life and happiness, and it was a real joy to live and work. Toward evening it grew unusually warm for the time of year, and great billows of masses of clouds golden-edged rolled majestically across the western sky. Aunt Ann, who is very sensitive to Nature's moods and tensions, said to me when we were putting away the supper dishes, "if we do not get a thunder storm before morning I shall be greatly mistaken." A little later John came in and made the same remark.

After the day's work was done Mr. Smith, dressed in a new suit of clothes, walked into the sitting-room where we were all gathered. He wore a high and mighty look, and there was an unusual glitter in his restless blue eyes. The victim looked at her parent and her face quivered, "O, father, where are you going?" she asked excitedly.

"To the room our friends allotted me, there, to await the coming of my glorious king," was the swift reply.

The man gazed at his daughter at-tively for a moment, but his face did not soften, then turning to us he said, "My friends, mercy fingers even at this late hour, and whoever will may enter the Ark and be saved. O, my friends, I implore you to accept salvation now, without a moment's delay, that a few hours hence you may welcome your Lord with joy, otherwise you will call upon the rocks and mountains to hide you from his presence."

Something in the deep, solemn tones of the speaker sent a thrill through me, and I, for the first time, comprehended how a person thrown into an element of religious excitement might be led to accept something entirely contrary to his knowledge and judgment. We were more than probable. But to depend on its being the truth, or not, is what is puzzling me, as well as hundreds of others.

A. Regarded as a work of pure fiction "The Occult Life of Jesus" would be regarded, if on any other theme, one of the most remarkable literary productions. There are in the spirit world many great masters of this style of writing, and it cannot be denied that possibly this "Occult Life" is their work. And again it may be true in every line, and yet as a history have no authority. History rests on evidence, the records of the times, and these records must agree, or the historian is compelled to compare and accept the most probable.

Thus if a manuscript was found for which was claimed an antiquity of 2,000 years, which gave a story covering a period presented by other historians, conflicting in essential points, and without corroborative evidence of any writer of the times, critics would at once declare it unauthoritative.

"The Occult Life" always runs along the line of probability. It gives no incident that is impossible. It may have been written by spirits having direct knowledge, and yet it cannot be quoted as authority.

Jacob Fulmer: Q. Is sugar a healthful article of diet? Is it not poisonous from methods of refining?

A. Pure sugar is a concentrated food and in large quantities might be productive of indigestion. As generally used it is the least objectionable of the pure foods. Practically, refined sugar, whether from corn or beet, is pure. In the refining process, the impurities are all extracted, the last being separated by filtration. No harmful chemical is used in working the juice at any point. The raw or unrefined sugars have more or less impurities but none harmful.

Glucose which is substituted for sugar in many processes, especially in candies, often carries with it traces of sulphuric acid, used in its conversion from the starch in corn, and it seems difficult to free it from this small part, which makes it poisonous. Otherwise glucose is a food, one stage nearer being digested than sugar.

all silent, and seeing he was to meet with no response from us he turned to his child and said, "Scripture saith come ye out from among them, and be ye separate." It is the last call of mercy that lingers for thee; wilt thou come with me, daughter?

"Come," he added in a commanding voice.

"Oh, I can't—I can't," wailed the victim.

"Let the child alone," said Aunt Jane, angrily; "I guess if the Lord wants her he can find her where she is."

As the bedroom door closed behind the man we heard him exclaim, "Deserted by my own, forsaken and alone—O, God, I come to thee!"

I was much disturbed and I saw another and Mr. Dale, who had just come in, shared my feelings, and as for the victim, she had thrown herself upon the lounge and was sobbing violently.

"We must lead our own lives, and learn our own lessons," said Aunt Ann calmly. "Do not be disturbed, this will soon be over."

"If the Day of Judgment was come, I want to be found doing the work that would need doing most if it was some other day," said John, and he went to his desk and began to take down papers and account books.

"O, wisdom, thy name is John," said Aunt Ann, laughing, "and I follow thy example, and she produced the basket of mending. Mother got some skeins of yarn and gave them to me and said with a smile, 'Mr. Dale, will help you wind them, and in a few minutes we all were as busy as could be. Even the victim partially forgot her terror while learning how to darn her own stockings."

Toward midnight the air grew so hot and close mother opened a window, and shortly after, Aunt Jane exclaimed, "What's that?"

I looked up in season to see an odd looking white object glide past the open window.

"Night-birds flying by, most likely," said Aunt Ann.

"More likely it's ghosts," said Aunt Jane stoutly then she started and flushed. She had forgotten herself.

Aunt Jane spoke quietly: "I make it a rule never to place any occurrence among the so-called supernatural unless I am sure it belongs there. A great many honest and well-meaning persons show a deplorable tendency to accept everything which they cannot easily account for as spiritual manifestations because they have been forced to accept some things as such."

"And their credulity has done much toward encouraging fraud, and disgusting honest people generally," said Mr. Dale.

At that moment Pete, who had been lying asleep by the stove suddenly sprang to his feet, bristled for a moment and then with a most unearthly howl leaped for John, nearly upsetting him.

"Something is in the wind or Pete would not act like that, for he certainly is not afraid of man or beast," said John, as he stroked the head of the trembling dog.

Shortly after, Mr. Smith appeared among us, looking wild-eyed and haggard.

"Look!" exclaimed Mr. Dale, and he pointed to a peculiar shadow lying upon the bare floor where the lamplight was shining brightly. We all knew there had been no shadow there a few minutes before, and none of us had changed our position, besides it was a very black, strange-looking shadow, looking like nothing any of us had ever seen before.

Speaking about it afterward we all agreed that however ridiculous the idea might seem to others, that mysterious shadow lying there upon the floor tried our nerves more than anything else of an occult nature that ever came to us.

"What can it be?" asked mother, and her voice sounded strangely.

"Coming events, perhaps," said John. "It is the last sign before his coming," said our prophet solemnly, and he pointed his long bony forefinger at the clock, which told us it wanted but a moment of midnight.

"This clock may be a little slow," said John, but the words were barely spoken when there came a gust of cold air rushing into the room, extinguishing the light instantly.

John stumbled toward the window to close it. The room filled with a blaze of lightning followed by a heavy crash.

For one wild instant I thought Mr. Smith was right. Both mother and I clutched Mr. Dale, who put a protecting arm about each of us. The victim threw her arms around Aunt Jane and shrieked wildly with terror, but the most marked effect was produced upon Mr. Smith.

Instead of welcoming his Lord with a shout of joy as he had always told us he would, he shrieked: "He has come, he has come! Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?" Again the room filled with a sheet of flame, followed instantly by a terrific crash of thunder which shook the house to its foundation.

The next day we found that the lightning struck a tall tree but a little way from the house, but we did not know it at the time.

Down on his knees went Father Abraham: "O Lord, let it pass for this time; O, stay thy hand and spare thy servant for this once. Be merciful to thy child, O God, and withhold thy wrath."

We heard him cry, for his voice rose above the roar of the elements. At last John succeeded in re-lighting the lamp; he then went to Mr. Smith and laid a firm hand upon his arm and said cheerily, "Come, come, man, brace up—this is only a thunder shower and we have already seen the worst of it."

Mr. Smith staggered at his feet and after gazing about him for a moment went to his room without a word. He arose and went about his work as usual the next morning, but our most earnest persuasions failed to get him to touch food or enter the house during the entire day.

"I wish I could know what is being evolved in Father Abraham's mind to-day," said Aunt Ann to me. "I have made human nature my chief study for forty years, but it still remains an unsolved riddle, and yet the solution lies within myself."

Quite late in the evening Mr. Smith came in and asked mother for some food which she gladly gave him. After he had eaten he came into the sitting-room with his hat in one hand and a fair-sized bundle in the other. He looked about wistfully and asked "Where is my daughter?"

"She is in bed and sound asleep," I replied.

"It is well with the maid—disturb her not," and he drew a long breath. Then looking about the little family group, he said haltingly, "My friends, it has come to my knowledge this day that over yonder hill a family is dangerously ill with that dread disease small-pox, and God has revealed to me his servant that it is my duty to go and minister unto them. The town has tried in vain to furnish them with a nurse and they are suffering and dying alone. I have not many more years to live. I look back over a wasted life. I will give what is left of it to these young people who are so sorely smitten and who through my aid may perchance live and do what I have failed to do. The Master has said that whoever loses his life for his sake shall find it, and it may be that the life I now give to him I shall sometime, somewhere find and having found it may never have farther cause to grieve over past mistakes."

"This day, while I labored in the field, I heard my mother's voice call, 'Abraham, my son, even as she used to call in days long past. Looking up I beheld a glorious vision of her who bore me, and for one brief instant looked upon her face, and then the clouds that enveloped her concealed her from my sight. What this vision may mean I know not, but all the year has gone from me. I am a poor ignorant creature, but such as I may give myself to my fellow creatures in the Master's name. Cousin Jane, I will give my child to you, and I pray God that she may prove a strength and comfort to you in your old age, and however you deal with her I know she will no more be the victim of a haunting terror."

"As for you, my other friends, I thank you for the kindness and patience you have given me, and I know you will always think kindly of me. You will behold my face no more—good-bye."

We women were all crying when he finished speaking, and John sat staring fixedly at the door, and the man had passed out into the darkness before we fully realized it.

John was the first to recover. He rushed out into the road and called, and so did Aunt Jane and mother, but Mr. Smith paid no heed, and so he passed out of our lives into the darkness of that April night a gray, gaunt, solitary figure trudging bravely on over field and hill on his errand of mercy.

They said he met his death without a sign of fear, and we trust that the mother who was so faithful to him has claimed her son and led him into joy and peace.

Your letter saying that Aunt Laura is ready to come to us has just arrived, and as John will go after her to-morrow, I will send this letter by him.

Lovingly yours,

MARAH WESTON.

Spruce Grove Farm.

My Dear Marah:—A few mornings after your brother left us, the food having subsided, mother got up looking ill. She had a burning spot upon each cheek and a vacant look in her eyes, and moved about in a wholly preoccupied way. She did not complain as she usually does when she is not feeling well, so I watched her and said nothing. I noticed she would pick up her Bible every few minutes and read a few words, after which she would stare into vacancy for a while.

I had to drive to town that day and when I got home about dark father said to me: "I don't see what ails your mother that makes her act so queer. She put some salt into the teapot to-night and went down cellar to get some butter and brought up the wash tub instead."

The next day things were no better, and after mother had carried the tea-kettle to the table in place of a flatiron, I went and put my arms around her and begged her to tell me what was troubling her. After a good deal of coaxing on my part and a good many tears on hers, she finally disclosed her secret. It seems that while lying awake in the night she had seen her sister Susan and her brother James standing beside the bed looking at her.

"The moon was shining so bright I could see real plain," she said, "and I saw 'em just as plain as I would have seen you and Charlie. I know I wasn't asleep, for I was thinking how your old blue dress could be fixed over to look most as good as new, and as I wasn't a thinkin' of 'em it wasn't my imagination that made 'em there and—and I feel dreadfully queer about it."

The next day Aunt Laura came, and to my great surprise and delight Mrs. Austin was with her. Mrs. Austin did not intend to stay but a few hours, but I coaxed her to stay over the next day which was Sunday—her first unengaged Sunday for nearly a year, she told me. She went with me to Mrs. Lee's in the afternoon and took my place as speaker and medium, and it did seem good to sit in the audience and listen. She is just grand, Marah, and so kind and lovable that everyone is attracted to her. I do hope I may some day get up where she is, even if I have to make my way through years of trial and pain.

When Mrs. Austin was giving the messages she told me that an elderly man stood beside me, and she described Uncle Ezra accurately. She said he gave me this message: "A candle will give just as much light in a tin candle stick as in any other, but keep the tin bright and shiny."

It was Uncle Ezra and no mistake and how glad I was, not only to hear from him, but to know that he came so closely into my life that he knew what I had never told anyone; that I was troubled and annoyed because of the poverty-struck appearance of the only room where I can receive those who seek me regarding spiritual matters.

When we got home from meeting, we found father had cut himself badly while splitting kindling wood, so I must take his place at house and barn again. Late in the evening mother was taken very ill and Mrs. Austin stayed three days and took almost the entire care of her. After she had gone away I heard mother say to father, "That Mrs. Austin is a real good woman. I liked her first rate."

"She is a Spiritualist," said father, and there was a ring of triumph in his tone.

Mother hesitated for a moment, and then said stoutly, "I didn't know it, but I don't care if she is—she's a good woman anyway."

"You would find good in 'em all if you knew 'em," said father.

Mother is about the house now and calls herself well, but she has changed much. I never saw her so quiet and patient before. I have a feeling that something is going to happen. There is ever with me an invisible presence, not an individual but—Something. I believe the day is coming when I shall be able to translate such feelings as easily as I now read this writing, but at present I am groping.

Aunt Laura and I are having a nice time together just as we always do. Mother said to me to-day, "It seems to me you ought to belong to your Aunt Laura—you're a good deal more like her than you are like me." Aunt Laura and I have known this to be a fact for a good many years.

Well, your brother has come and gone, and Aunt Laura with him, but that invisible something still remains. It seems each day to grow more and more tangible, but yet I cannot define it. I thought I would finish this letter and send it over by Mr. Wilder, but for some reason I could not. Mr. Wilder and I went to Uncle Ezra's old place the afternoon he was here. The sun was low in the west when we reached the top of the hill and the windows of their little sitting room, now silent and empty, were a blaze of dazzling light.

As we went up the path to the front door Mr. Wilder exclaimed, "Why, there is someone in the house—see!" I looked up quickly and there at the window looking out at us stood Aunt Lydia. She had on her white cap and spectacles and her white collar with the deep lace, and looked just as she did when I bid her good-bye after her brother's funeral, only happier. I found the door locked and we waited for a minute or two and then hearing nothing I concluded that for some reason she had gone to the back door to meet us. We found the back door fastened upon the outside, and we stood regarding each other questioningly. I was greatly puzzled.

"I cannot understand it at all," I said, "it was certainly Aunt Lydia who stood at that window, and as she is still in the flesh she must be in this house somewhere. I cannot understand why she should be here, how she got into the house, nor why she should not come to greet us. There must be something wrong somewhere."

"I will open the door and we will go in and see if we can learn anything," said John—I mean Mr. Wilder. He removed the fastenings and threw open the door and we entered the kitchen. There was dust everywhere but not a trace of life. We opened the door into the sitting room and as we stepped in two mice scampered across the floor. Spiders had woven webs across the front door, also the door leading to the chamber. We looked at all the windows and found them fastened.

As we stood in the middle of the floor silent and perplexed, I heard Uncle Ezra's voice say, "I'm glad it's over; Marthy, child, be glad."

"Uncle Ezra," I cried, "I am glad, so glad to have you speak to me!"

For some time after we silently waited and then made our way home through the early twilight. The next morning a neighbor called and informed us that Aunt Lydia had been found dead in her bed the morning before. Just think of it, Marah! and yet people will scoff and refuse to believe such things. "I am very glad your brother was with me and saw Aunt Lydia as plainly as I did, but 'forty persons had seen her, forty who had not, would refuse to believe."

To this list probably sixty, more or less, new denominations have been started by restless, ambitious and selfish innovators since its publication. A single Bible text, or different interpretation, is sufficient to the sprouting of a new branch from the old theological stem. When a tree is diseased and dying, it is noticeable that new growths rapidly appear, sprouting up at the roots and suckers grow from the limbs. There is the appearance of vigorous growth, but it is only apparent. The roots are dead.

The membership of these denominations are, of course, only estimates, and in many instances from correct. Thus the Catholics which lead by eight millions, are nearer twice that number. As is well known the Catholic population of this country is quite twelve millions, and every child born to a Catholic family is a Catholic. Nearly a million immigrants are yearly landed on our shores, nine tenths of whom belong to that church.

The number of Spiritualists is taken from the census report, and how it is arrived at is one of the mysteries of census taking. It may mean only those enrolled in organizations, and even then would be far less than the real number. The exceedingly small minority are members of associations.

Granting, however, the correctness of this statement that there are twenty-seven millions enrolled, of the eighty millions of the population, there remains fifty-three millions outside any form of sect, subject to conversion, and it would seem that the home field furnished the most profitable place for missionary effort.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

The seventeenth of April was the day fixed for the end of the world, and as the time drew near Mr. Smith talked of little else from morning until night. I asked Aunt Ann if she thought he really believed it.

"I believe he thinks he believes it, but that he has really thought how terrible such a belief is, I do not believe," she replied.

"This delusion will have to have its run, like a fever or any similar disease, and after it is over there will come a reaction and then it may be possible to show him how narrow, cruel and unjust his present belief is. A great many of the foolish, reckless and unreasonable actions and beliefs indulged in by mortals are traceable to the law of reaction, and I am wondering what opposite extreme Mr. Smith will run to."

The victim had the hardest time of any of us, for she was afraid her father might be right. She would start and tremble at every unusual sound, or if anyone made a sudden exclamation of fear or surprise. She would scream with terror in her sleep, dreaming that the world was enveloped in flames. We all pitied the poor girl and tried to keep her mind upon other subjects as much as possible, but the terror seemed to be ever lurking near even in her happiest moments.

One day I told the victim about you, Martha, and the experience you had when your brother was a baby, and the knowledge that the time had been set for a final conflagration several times before and passed without so much as a wrinkle appearing on the sky, seemed to comfort her more than anything else.

The 17th of April was a beautiful day. All nature thrilled with life and happiness, and it was a real joy to live and work. Toward evening it grew unusually warm for the time of year, and great billowy masses of clouds golden-edged rolled majestically across the western sky. Aunt Ann, who is very sensitive to Nature's moods and tensions, said to me when we were putting away the supper dishes, "If we do not get a thunder storm before morning I shall be greatly mistaken." A little later John came in and made the same remark.

After the day's work was done Mr. Smith, dressed in a new suit of clothes, walked into the sitting-room where we were all gathered. He wore a high and mighty look, and there was an unusual glimmer in his restless black eyes. The victim looked at her parent and her face quivered, "O, father, where are you going?" she asked excitedly.

"To the room our friends allotted me, there, to await the coming of my glorious king," was the swift reply. The man gazed at his daughter attentively for a moment, but his face did not soften, then turning to us he said, "My friends, mercy lingers even at this late hour, and whoever will may enter the Ark and be saved. O, my friends, I implore you to accept salvation now, without a moment's delay, that a few hours hence you may welcome your Lord with joy, otherwise you will call upon the rocks and mountains to hide you from his presence."

Something in the deep, solemn tones of the speaker sent a thrill through me, and I, for the first time, comprehended how a person thrown into an element of religious excitement might be led to accept something entirely contrary to his knowledge and judgment. We were more than probable. But to depend on the being the truth, or not, is what is puzzling me, as well as hundreds of others.

A. Regarded as a work of pure fiction "The Occult Life of Jesus" would be regarded, if on any other theme, one of the most remarkable literary productions. There are in the spirit world many great masters of the style of writing, and it cannot be denied that possibly this "Occult Life" is their work. And again it may be true in every line, and yet as a history have no authority. History rests on evidence, the records of the times, and these records must agree, or the historian is compelled to compare and accept the most probable.

Thus if a manuscript was found for which was claimed an antiquity of 2,000 years, which gave a story covering a period presented by other historians, conflicting in essential points, and without corroborative evidence of any writer of the times, critics would at once declare it unauthoritative.

"The Occult Life" always runs along the line of probability. It gives no incident that is impossible. It may have been written by spirits having direct knowledge, and yet it cannot be quoted as authority.

Jacob Fulmer: Q. Is sugar a healthy article of diet? Is it not poisonous from methods of refining?

A. Pure sugar is a concentrated food, and in large quantities might be productive of indigestion. As generally used it is the least objectionable of the pure foods. Practically, refined sugar, whether from corn or beets, is pure. In the refining process, the impurities are all extracted, the last being separated by filtration. No harmful chemical is used in working the juice at any point. The raw or unrefined sugars have more or less impurities but none harmful.

Glucose which is substituted for sugar in many processes, especially in candies, often carries with it traces of sulphuric acid, used in its conversion from the starch in corn, and it seems difficult to free it from this small part, which makes it poisonous. Otherwise glucose is a food, two stages nearer being a healthy sugar.

all silent, and seeing he was to meet with no response from us he turned to his child and said, "Scripture saith come ye out from among them and be ye separate." It is the last call of mercy that lingers for thee; wilt thou come with me, daughter?

"Come," he added in a commanding voice.

"Oh, I can't—I can't," wailed the victim.

"Let the child alone," said Aunt Jane, angrily. "I guess if the Lord wants her he can find her where she is."

As the bedroom door closed behind the man we heard him exclaim, "Deserted by my own, forsaken and alone—O, God, I come to thee!"

I was much disturbed and I saw another and Mr. Dale, who had just come in, shared my feelings, and as for the victim, she had thrown herself upon the lounge and was sobbing violently.

"We must lead our own lives, and learn our own lessons," said Aunt Ann calmly. "Do not be disturbed, this will soon be over."

"If the Day of Judgment was come, I want to be found doing the work that would need doing most if it was some other day," said John, and he went to his desk and began to take down papers and account books.

"O, wisdom, thy name is John," said Aunt Ann, laughing, "and I follow thy example, and she produced the basket of mending. Mother got some skeins of yarn and gave them to me and said with a smile, 'Mr. Dale, will help you wind them, and in a few minutes we all were as busy as could be. Even the victim partially forgot her terror while learning how to darn her own stockings."

Toward midnight the air grew so hot and close mother opened a window, and shortly after, Aunt Jane exclaimed, "What's that?"

I looked up in season to see an odd looking white object glide past the open window.

"Night-birds flying by, most likely," said Aunt Ann.

"More likely its ghosts," said Aunt Jane stoutly then she started and flushed. She had forgotten herself.

Aunt Jane spoke quietly, "I make it a rule never to place any occurrence among the so-called supernatural unless I am sure it belongs there. A great many honest and well-meaning persons show a deplorable tendency to accept everything which they cannot easily account for as spiritual manifestations because they have been forced to accept some things as such."

"And their credulity has done much toward encouraging fraud, and disgusting honest people generally," said Mr. Dale.

At that moment Pete, who had been lying asleep by the stove suddenly sprang to his feet, bristled for a moment and then with a most unearthly howl leaped for John, nearly upsetting him.

"Something is in the wind or Pete would not act like that, for he certainly is not afraid of man or beast," said John, as he stroked the head of the trembling dog.

Shortly after, Mr. Smith appeared among us, looking wild-eyed and haggard.

"Look!" exclaimed Mr. Dale, and he pointed to a peculiar shadow lying upon the bare floor where the lamp-light was shining brightly. We all knew there had been no shadow there a few minutes before, and none of us had changed our position, besides it was a very black, strange-looking shadow, looking like nothing any of us had ever seen before.

Speaking out after that we all agreed that however ridiculous the idea might seem to others, that mysterious shadow lying there upon the floor tried our nerves more than anything else of an occult nature that ever came to us.

"What can it be?" asked mother, and her voice sounded strangely.

"Coming events, perhaps," said John.

"It is the last sign before His coming," said our prophet solemnly, and he pointed his long bony forefinger at the clock, which told us it wanted but a moment of midnight.

"This clock may be a little slow," said John, but the words were barely spoken when there came a gust of cold air rushing into the room, extinguishing the light instantly.

John stumbled toward the window to close it. The room filled with a blaze of lightning followed by a heavy crash.

For one wild instant I thought Mr. Smith was right. Both mother and I clutched Mr. Dale, who put a protecting arm about each of us. The victim threw her arms around Aunt Jane and shrieked wildly with terror, but the most marked effect was produced upon Mr. Smith.

Instead of welcoming his Lord with a shout of joy as he had always told us he would, he shrieked, "He has come, he has come! Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?" Again the room filled with a sheet of flame, followed instantly by a terrific crash of thunder which shook the house to its foundation.

The next day we found that the lightning struck a tall tree but a little way from the house, but we did not know it at the time.

Down on his knees went Father Abraham: "O Lord, let it pass for this time; O, stay thy hand and spare thy servant for this once. Be merciful to thy child, O God, and withhold thy wrath."

We heard him cry, for his voice rose above the roar of the elements.

At last John succeeded in relighting the lamp; he then went to Mr. Smith and laid a firm hand upon his arm and said cheerily, "Come, come, man, brace up—this is only a thunder shower and we have already seen the worst of it."

Mr. Smith staggered to his feet and after gazing about him for a moment went to his room without a word. He arose and went about his work as usual the next morning, but our most earnest persuasions failed to get him to touch food or enter the house during the entire day.

"I wish I could know what is being evolved in Father Abraham's mind to-day," said Aunt Ann to me. "I have made human nature my chief study for forty years, but it still remains an unsolved riddle, and yet the solution lies within myself."

Quite late in the evening Mr. Smith came in and asked mother for some food which she gladly gave him. After he had eaten he came into the sitting-room with his hat in one hand and a fair-sized bundle in the other. He looked about wistfully and asked "Where is my daughter?"

"She is in bed and sound asleep," I replied.

"It is well with the maid—disturb her not," and he drew a long breath. Then looking about the little family group, he said haltingly, "My friends, it has come to my knowledge this day that over yonder hill a family is dangerously ill with that dread disease small-pox, and God has revealed to me his servant that it is my duty to go and minister unto them. Looking up I beheld a glorious vision of her who bore me, and for one brief instant looked upon her face, and then the clouds that enveloped her concealed her from my sight. What this vision may mean I know not, but all the fear has gone from me. I am a door-significant creature, but such as I am I give myself to my fellow creatures in the Master's name. Cousin Jane, I will give my child to you, and I pray God that she may prove a strength and comfort to you in your old age, and however you deal with her I know she will no more be the victim of a haunting terror."

"As for you, my other friends, I thank you for the kindness and patience you have given me, and I know you will always think kindly of me. You will behold my face no more—good-bye."

We women were all crying when he finished speaking, and John sat staring fixedly at the door, and the man had passed out into the darkness before we fully realized it.

John was the first to recover. He rushed out into the road and called, and so did Aunt Jane and mother, but Mr. Smith paid no heed, and so he passed out of our lives into the darkness of that April night a gray, gaunt, solitary figure trudging bravely on over field and hill on his errand of mercy.

They said he met his death without a sign of fear, and we trust that the mother who was so faithful to him has claimed her son and led him into joy and peace.

Your letter saying that Aunt Laura is ready to come to us has just arrived, and as John will go after her to-morrow, I will send this letter by him.

Lovingly yours,

MARAH WESTON.

Spruce Grove Farm.

My Dear Marah:—A few mornings after your brother left us, the flood having subsided, mother got up looking ill. She had a burning spot upon each cheek and a vacant look in her eyes, and moved about in a wholly preoccupied way. She did not complain as she usually does when she is not feeling well, so I watched her and said nothing. I noticed she would pick up her Bible every few minutes and read a few words, after which she would stare into vacancy for a while.

I had to drive to town that day and when I got home about six o'clock I found to me: "I don't see what your mother that makes her act so queer."

She put some salt into the teapot to-night and went down cellar to get some butter and brought up the wash tub instead."

The next day things were no better, and after mother had carried the tea-kettle to the table in place of a flat-iron, I went and put my arms around her and begged her to tell me what was troubling her. After a good deal of coaxing on my part and a good many tears on hers, she finally disclosed her secret. It seems that while lying awake in the night she had seen her sister Susan and her brother James standing beside the bed looking at her.

"The moon was shining so bright I could see real plain," she said, "and I saw 'em just as plain as I would have seen you and Charlie. I know I wasn't asleep, for I was thinking how your old blue dress could be fixed over to look most as good as new, and as I wasn't thinking of 'em it wasn't my imagination that made 'em there and—and I feel dreadfully queer about it."

The next day Aunt Laura came, and to my great surprise and delight Mrs. Austin was with her. Mrs. Austin did not intend to stay but a few hours, but I coaxed her to stay over the next day which was Sunday—her first unengaged Sunday for nearly a year, she told me.

She went with me to Mr. Lee's in the afternoon and took my place as speaker and medium, and it did seem good to sit in the audience and listen. She is just grand, Marah, and so kind and lovable that everyone is attracted to her. I do hope I may some day get up where she is, even if I have to make my way through years of trial and pain.

When Mrs. Austin was giving the messages she told me that an elderly man stood beside me, and she described Uncle Ezra accurately. She said he gave me this message: "A candle will give just as much light in a tin candle stick as in any other, but keep the tin bright and shiny."

It was Uncle Ezra and no mistake and how glad I was, not only to hear from him, but to know that he came so closely into my life that he knew what I had never told anyone; that I was troubled and annoyed because of the poverty-stricken appearance of the only room where I can receive those who seek me regarding spiritual matters.

When we got home from meeting, we found father had cut, himself badly while splitting kindling wood, so I must take his place at house and barn again. Late in the evening mother was taken very ill and Mrs. Austin stayed three days and took almost the entire care of her. After she had gone away I heard mother say to father, "That Mrs. Austin is a real good woman. I liked her first rate."

"She is a Spiritualist," said father, and there was a ring of triumph in his tone.

Mother hesitated for a moment, and then said stoutly, "I didn't know it, but I don't care if she is—she's a good woman anyway."

"You would find good in 'em all if you knew 'em," said father.

Mother is about the house now and calls herself well, but she has changed much. I never saw her so quiet and patient before. I have a feeling that something is going to happen. There is ever with me an invisible presence, not an individual but—Something. I believe the day is coming when I shall be able to translate such feelings as easily as I now read this writing, but at present I am groping.

Aunt Laura and I are having a nice time together just as we always do. Mother said to me to-day, "It seems to me you ought to belong to your Aunt Laura—you're a good deal more like her than you are like me." Aunt Laura and I have known this to be a fact for a good many years.

Well, your brother has come and gone, and Aunt Laura with him, but that invisible something still remains. It seems each day to grow more and more tangible, but yet I cannot define it. I thought I would finish this letter and send it over by Mr. Wilder, but for some reason I could not. Mr. Wilder and I went to Uncle Ezra's old place the afternoon he was here. The sun was low in the west when we reached the top of the hill and the windows of their little sitting room, now silent and empty, were a blaze of dazzling light.

As we went up the path to the front door Mr. Wilder exclaimed, "Why, there is someone in the house—see!" I looked up quickly and there at the window looking out at us stood Aunt Lydia. She had on her white cap and spectacles and her white collar with the deep lace, and looked just as she did when I bid her good-bye after her brother's funeral, only happier. I found the door locked and we waited for a minute or two and then hearing nothing I concluded that for some reason she had gone to the back door to meet us. We found the back door fastened upon the outside, and we stood regarding each other questioningly. I was greatly puzzled.

"I cannot understand it at all," I said, "It was certainly Aunt Lydia who stood at that window, and as she is still in the flesh she must be in this house somewhere. I cannot understand why she should be here; how she got into the house, nor why she should not come to greet us. There must be something wrong somewhere."

"I will open the door and we will go in and see if we can learn anything," said John—I mean Mr. Wilder. He removed the fastenings and threw open the door and we entered the kitchen. There was dust everywhere but not a trace of life. We opened the door into the sitting room and as we stepped in two mice scampered across the floor. Spiders had woven webs across the front door, also the door leading to the chamber. We looked at all the windows and found them fastened.

As we stood in the middle of the floor silent and perplexed, I heard Uncle Ezra's voice say, "I'm glad it's over; Marthy, child, be glad."

"Uncle Ezra," I cried, "I am glad; so glad to have you speak to me!"

For some time after we silently waited and then made our way home through the early twilight. The next morning a neighbor called and informed us that Aunt Lydia had been found dead in her bed the morning before. Just think of it, Marah! and yet people will scoff and refuse to believe such things. I am very glad your brother was with me and saw Aunt Lydia as plainly as I did, but if forty persons had seen her, forty who had not, would refuse to believe.

Highly Important Question.

Is the God of the Old Testament the God of the Universe?

There are to-day a very few people who disclaim a belief in the existence of a Supreme Being, First Cause or God.

There are fewer still who do not recognize the continuity of the soul, not merely because it is taught by all religionists, but because it is a scientific fact though not so frequently thought of.

Science teaches that the form of matter can and does change under certain conditions; but that its destruction is absolute. Matter is neither created nor destroyed. It is neither annihilated nor deconstructed. If we can think of it at all, it is by far the easier to think of its perpetuity. Nothing in Nature can, or will be destroyed.

I mention this at this time, as many believe that if the God of the Old Testament is not the God of the Universe, then we are lost, we can have no soul; but this is a mistaken and dangerous position.

"All truth is precious if not divine. And what dilates the powers must needs refine."

Millions of people have maintained that the Bible is the word of God. The sacred book of God, or that its pages have been so inspired. Their fathers before them for generations believed and taught it, and the fear of making an investigation into its sacred truths became an inherent quality in their nature.

The phantom superstition has scared many a truth-finder from the fertile fields of investigation, but—

"No soul can soar too loftily whose aim is God-given truth and brother love of man."

So let us in all honesty and candor ask again this question: Is the God of the Old Testament the God of the Universe? Can there be any mistake about it? Could Moses and associates have been politically inclined, or have been these various means of affrighting or persuading the people into their power for their own betterment and aggrandizement. I do not assert this, but ask these questions of your honest self.

"Doubts are the stepping-stones of truth. Truth is the torch of civilization."

It seems to me that this God is responsible for such truth as exists, that there is nothing in truth that should frighten Him or man, and not being thus frightened, He does not hesitate to welcome the agency by which it is revealed. Let us be liberal and reasonable.

It seems to me we should here be reminded that the God of the Universe should be omnipotent, omniscient, infinite, immeasurable, unchangeable, everlasting and occupying all things, all space, all time. If therefore, "must necessarily be incomprehensible and inconceivable, and without physical form."

Does it not appear to your reason that such an element or principle could neither walk, talk, see, feel, smell or hear; would have no passion, jealousy, wrath, pleasure, hatred or pain? Does space, time, life, force or other element?

Yet there are so many instances recorded in the Old Testament pointing to the idea of God's finite qualities and faculties, saying nothing of the evidence in support of the charge of his ignorance of the laws of nature, including astronomy, chemistry and geology, to say nothing of his partiality, injustice, inhumanity, his recognition of slavery and the prostitution of women, that I am almost compelled to exclaim in the words of that able American orator, "An honest God is the noblest work of man."

I do not desire to call this great American people an ignorant people, for they are not, but in this busy bustling world only a few are favored with the time and patience to review these old works of the dead. They much prefer to allow others to read for them and tell them the essence of their reading, and thus it has been, that this people have believed so many unthinkable and untenable doctrines. For the benefit of that class, however, I will be pleased to follow in a short and concise manner the facts relating to our subject, making a short analysis of each material statement as we go, and leave the reader to judge for himself, which is a privilege given to man by the Goddess of Liberty, which is certainly the handmaiden of the God of the Universe.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters."

In the first place God did not create the earth, as we have pointed out by the fact recognized by all scientists of earth, that matter (element) cannot be destroyed, which fact accounts for its continuity in one form or another, and this being the case it could have no beginning and therefore never was created. We cannot conceive of a beginning if we cannot conceive of an ending. If it was without form and void, it could not be in any sense physical. It must have been, if void, nothing, and yet darkness was upon the face of the deep, there was no deep, there was nothing. The spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. So God had a spirit and it moved, which is evidence that it was of a finite nature or it could not have moved. Again, the "face of the waters" means that the waters must have taken on form before the spirit of God moved, or how could there be a face, a surface?

God said, "let there be light and there was light." If God said it, he certainly had vocal organs like or similar to the rest of us. If he said it, whom did he say it to? Not a living thing yet created.

If he said it to the creative force of light, who managed it for him to bring about such a result?

"God saw the light, that it was good, and God divided the light from darkness."

Now that seems stranger still that he should see the light. Then he must have eyes; too, "that it was good" points to the fact that it was an experiment with him, and he had to see if he could see the light. If he had not known he contained, "And God divided the light from darkness," "And God said, let there be a firmament." The waters were then divided, the firmament then appeared, which he called Heaven. So I take it from the 6, 7 and 8 verses that this marked the creation of heaven as well as earth. It says further "that he called the heaven and the dry land earth." Who was present when he was naming the results of these first two days of his labor?

God said, "Let the earth bring forth grass, herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit, after his kind." Wherefore can a fruit tree bring forth fruit after his kind when such a thing as "kind" never existed? After his kind means, like and in the manner of his ancestry or predecessor. Ancestry or predecessors did not exist.

Commencing with the 14th verse we come to a momentous question, that of creating the Universe, which is known as the abiding place of God himself. If God created the universe, space, what and where was the former place of his domicile?

Now then he proceeds to place lights in the firmament to divide the day and night, and for signs, seasons, days and years and to give light to the earth.

He makes two great lights, the greater to rule the day and the lesser to rule the night. We will all admit the greatness of the sun, but not near so great as Sirius or Arcturus which is alleged to be 70 times its size. And certainly the person who wrote that part stating that the moon is a light, never stopped to think, because he didn't know that the moon is no light at all, but reflects its borrowed light from the sun.

This work constituted his labors of the fourth day, excepting that he finished up the manufacture of the universe. He made the stars also. God saw that this was all good—that's strange, this admits his fallibility. It might have been otherwise, as we will observe when he makes man, woman and animal life. He had to drown his own estimation.

But to that which is before us, stop and think what it means to say "he made the stars also." Does this not put the making of the stars in subordination to that of the creating of the earth? It is simply ridiculous when we think that this earth is only a bit of cosmic dust, or a drop in the ocean of this vast uncomprehensible universe, when there are thousands, yes, doubtless millions of not only suns and planets, but systems like our own, and so far as being placed there for signs, etc., there are millions that never cast a ray of light upon this earth because of their great distances and many others like our own good planet, that are non-luminous. Do these statements not indicate that the creator is being truth in the light of modern astronomy and common sense?

God not only made all the moving creatures that were in the water and the fowls of the air, all the beasts of the field and so forth, but God said let us make man in our own image.

Does this not signify that there were more than one person present? Who are we? And then God created man in his own image (the word own is an interpolation). Does God look like man? Is God a man?

Male and female he created them, in the 27th verse, first chapter of Genesis, but after he put man in the garden of Eden, he found that it was not good for man to be alone, it was then after he considered that he made him a help-mate, and this is the first female, and a peculiar feature about this creature, it was the first instance in which God required any raw material. He had been in the habit of creating something from nothing. But he put Adam to sleep and extracted one of his ribs. And again Adam had just been created, it could not have been long, when God called upon him to name all the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air and Adam did name them all; what a wonderful work is man? I say it could not have been long after Adam's creation, because at this time he was in peaceful possession of all his bones, as Eve was yet uncreated.

Now among other things that God did was to create man, and among them was a "tree of knowledge." I will not relate the story, as every child is familiar therewith, but the "tree of knowledge" is the tree of good and evil and therefore God made the evil if it ever existed. He made the talking serpent if the story is true. He made the woman who handed the fruit to the God-made weak-minded man, and I am grateful that the many daughters who while surrounded by more temptations have not so easily succumbed. But this serpent which played such a villainous part, must have been a member of the esoteric circle of intelligence, because God said "that if they eat of this fruit, they would surely die," but the serpent not only contradicted God in that respect, but said, "Your eyes shall be opened and ye shall be as Gods knowing good and evil."

Mark you, the serpent was right. They did not die at that time, but Adam and Eve became wise and the eyes of their intelligence opened and they became aware of the fact that they were naked, and thus started the first man-made war on earth. They constituted aprons of fig leaves.

Now again, if the serpent was right, who were the Gods spoken of by it? Could there have been any other God aside from this Creator who believed the heaven a firmament and that the earth was flat? And that the stars were mere specks of light for signs for the earth? Could there have been any other God who saw them and welcomed the invention of powerful telescopes to discern them?

"And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking . . . and they hid themselves . . . and God called . . . where art thou? . . . and God said, 'I was afraid because I was naked and I hid myself.'"

The voice and the walking of this God surely points to the fact that the gentleman who wrote it believed he was a man like unto himself, and he further lost sight of the fact that God is omnipresent, or God would not have inquired, Where art thou? This writer surely did not believe that God knew, or thought, or certainly he would not have asked Adam this question.

Wherefore should a man be accused for not seeing the light, especially when the only woman in the world was present and she gave him the fruit, and this was from the tree of both good and evil, and he partook of the good part, from the evidence adduced. As it seemed to immediately teach him morality. But we mustn't lose sight of the serpent, either; God cursed him by telling him that "upon his belly he must go, and dust thou shalt eat all of thy life."

"As a matter-of-fact serpents do not eat dust, but have the power to charm and captivate the beautiful songster that ushers in the day with melodious strains at our bed-room window; and if the serpent was not already on a 'firmament,' he must, at that time, have

STORY OF THE GODS.

A Brief Review of the Gods, Ancient and Modern.

"I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt."—Hosea 12:6.

Here is Biblical proof that Jahveh

(Yahweh, using the Saxon Y in place of our modern J, and the v sound where we use u), rendered by the King James translators, very incorrectly, Jehovah, came from Egypt. He was Osiris, the supreme god of the Egyptians, and a brother of Typhon, once one of the favorite gods of Egypt to whom sacrifices were made. He made war on his elder brother, whom he killed, cut into twelve pieces, and scattered the remains along the Nile. Isis, the beloved wife of Osiris, recovered all the fragments save one. Their son Horus made war on Typhon, his uncle, and defeated him in battle. He—Typhon—was captured and confined in a prison of darkness under the earth.

Many learned persons are sincere in the conviction that this Isis, who was worshipped as the Queen of Heaven, to whom prayers were directed, was none other than the Madonna, the mother of Jesus; that her son Horus, identical with the Roman Bacchus, one of whose names was Jes, became the Catholic

Jesus, and that Typhon is the Christian Devil. And the "war in heaven" we have heard so much about, was the mythical war between these Egyptian myths, Osiris and Typhon. Isis had a sister, Nephtys, and she is believed to be the other scriptural Mary.

No one can know when these events occurred, for myths have a habit of concealing their family records. We find all the junior gods, Horus among them, was born on the 25th of December, when the sun, which was worshipped as a god, commenced his return to our northern skies. The good

Milton, who seemed so familiar with

... He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth:

When he speaks he lies; he is the speaker of his own, for he is a liar and the father of it."

In mentioning the Devil as a "mur-derer," it is clearly apparent Typhon, who killed Osiris, was the personage

Jesus had in mind.

Jehovah, who was found in a box, chest, or ark last week, whose commands Moses voiced, is clearly proved to have come from Egypt. After Isis recovered the remains of Osiris he was resurrected and became the Judge of the dead.

Again we wish to impress on the reader the fact, wherever the translators found the Hebrew word Elohim in the Old Testament they rendered it

God. It is a plural noun, and in every case should have been rendered Gods.

And wherever they found Jahveh they rendered it Lord, save in four places it appeared as Jehovah. Where we find

God connected with "should" have been rendered Jehovah Gods or Jahveh

Gods. As Typhon, under the name

Devil, was worshipped by the Jews, to whom altars were erected, on which sacrifices, even of the sons and daughters were made; and Horus the son of Osiris, who was deified in the Hebrew pantheon, as was the mother who designated the Queen of Heaven, are we not justified in the violent presumption that this Horus, who was the Eternal

Son of God, without a beginning, as Catholics claim, was the Jesus who came to this earth, the Son of God, who was deified in the Hebrew

pantheon, as was the mother who de-

The Special Thought Channel a Veritable Crucible of Reason

LOOK OUT, or some of your previously formed opinions may be completely wrecked, or badly disabled or crimped, as you survey the SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL and the ideas floating thereon, which will be given the rear of the advancing column, and birth by leading minds in a few weeks.
The Progressive Thinker is widely of proper spiritual brain nourishment.
BRANCHING OUT into new fields, into new pastures, into new environments, THOUGHT CHANNEL.

CAN YOU SUPPLY THE OMISSIONS?

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at
— some time ago. A short time before Christmas the [giving name] cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. One lady got her a nice white hat; another made her a white dress; another provided her with a pair of white shoes;
another with a pair of white stockings;
and others with scarf, fan and doll.
These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the head of —. When inquiry was made, the spirit said she took them to her spirit home.
A few weeks after Christmas, — who is a materializing medium, homes-requested —, who is a spirit

In the Crucible of Reason.

For special reasons the above communication is not published in full, leaving the readers and mediums to supply the omissions. It will be a pleasant recreation for them to try to give the missing links. Who is the medium? Who is the spirit photographer? Finally the letter will be given in full to the world with the names of the medium and spirit photographer, etc. The discussion that will arise will throw a flood of light upon the dark cabinet manifestations; in fact, the Crucible of Reason will scintillate with the opinions of prominent Spiritualists, and much will be given that will startle Spiritualists in every nook and corner of the United States as never before. Now is the time to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker, and keep step with the advancing column.

An Important Announcement.

It Ought to Have a Million Circulation.

We shall publish some time in January of the coming year a most remarkable paper, grouping together exceptionally important matter that should have a world-wide circulation. We will lead off with that remarkable lecture by Colonel Ingersoll on THE DEVIL. That will be followed by a most extraordinary article by Baron Harden Hickey, illustrating the "Parallels Between BUDDHIST AND CHRIS-TIAN Stories, and Showing how Buddhism Was Transported to the West."
It is rich in facts and incidents, and it alone will be worth one dollar to every reflective mind.
Mrs. M. T. Longley, the efficient secretary of the N. S. A., under the control of Spirit John Pierpont, will have something especially interesting to say of the BRIGHT AND DARK SPHERES OF SPIRIT LIFE.
Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, another

Richard Hodgson.

From Boston comes the regretful news that Richard Hodgson, one of the most noted and foremost authorities in the world on psychical research, died suddenly of heart disease, the evening of December 20, while playing handball at the Union Boat Club. He was 50 years old. He will be greatly missed by his co-laborers of the Society for Psychical Research.

ANOTHER OBJECT LESSON.

Presented to Spiritualists for Their Careful and Candid Consideration.

When Truth is brought to Light, it is exposed to the world. When an Error is discovered, it, too, is exposed. When a Crime is unearthed, that also is exposed. When deception is practiced under the head of Spirit Return, that, too, is exposed. All these exposures of the Truth, of Error, of Deception or Fraud, are strictly legitimate, making the Good and the Bad publicly known, and thus enabling Spiritualists to realize exactly their own status before the world.
The good and the bad determine the exact quality or condition of any sect, cult, club or society.
They will advance just in proportion as the good predominates; but if the bad has the ascendancy, then the retrograding process goes on. In Spiritualism the absolute truth predominates, hence it is advancing, but would do so far more rapidly if no deception were practiced in the ranks.
Read carefully the lesson of the exposure of S.
W. Fallis, in taking what purported to be "spirit pictures," one of the most heartless, cruel decep-tions ever practiced on hearts lacerated by the loss of friends.

There comes a time in connection with every movement when, in order to advance, strenuous systematic exertion becomes an absolute necessity. In all departments of life, in every club, cult, society, sect or political party—in the secular world as well as the religious, in municipal affairs as well as that of state and national, THIS RULE HOLDS GOOD.

Even the staid old Catholic church, weighed down by wealth, superstition, intolerance, ignorance and bigotry, is making an effort to shake off some of the incubus that has rested upon it for ages.

Everywhere there is a SPIRIT OF UNREST, a strenuous seeking for something higher and better.

The religious sects everywhere are vibrating with more advanced thought, with more liberal views and a more enlightened conception of the providence of God. Everywhere there is dissatisfaction impressively manifested with the existing state of things.

ALL THE AFFAIRS OF LIFE ARE BEING SHAKEN UP, critically and systematically examined, and serious defects pointed out.

Laws are being changed, improved or abolished altogether.

Political parties—cumbersome in the extreme—have become less arrogant and binding, two exceptionally important offices in New York and Boston being filled by Independents.

Religious catechisms and codes of belief are being modified or changed.

The Devil is no longer considered a fallen angel or the antagonist of God.

NOTHING IN CIVIL OR RELIGIOUS LIFE IS ABSOLUTELY PERFECT, hence this prevalent unrest, this nervous vibration, this tension of mind in the efforts to realize something better, are manifested in Spiritualism as well as in every other movement.

FOR FORTY YEARS THERE HAVE BEEN FLAGRANT ABUSES IN OUR RANKS, A SPECIES OF GRAFT, SUBTLY CULTIVATED UNDER THE BENIGN CLOAK OF SPIRIT RETURN.

The Wedding Process has penetrated every nook and corner of our country, in every department of life.

THE PAPER (SPIRITUALIST OR SECULAR) WHICH LETS THIS WEDDING PROCESS GO ON IN SI-LENCE WILL SUFFER FROM A SORT OF BLIGHT OR MILDOW, OR FINANCIAL DEPRESSION, OR DUL-NESS THAT DOESN'T SUIT THE MASSES.

There are religious sects, insurance companies, clubs, cults, and political bosses who can not stand the thorough wedding process so active in the world to-day in every department of life, hence they decry bitterly against it.

See what the wedding process has revealed in Philadelphia—a rottenness in municipal affairs that is appalling!

If the Catholic church would allow the wedding process to prevail, there would be nothing left of it but a grim-ing skeleton.

The National Government is trying to weed out poisonous adulteration, just as The Progressive Thinker is trying to weed out the fraudulent adulteration in the ranks of Spiritualism.

The federal control of foods, drugs and liquors for the purpose of securing their purity is provided for in a comprehensive bill to be introduced in the senate at an early date by Senator Hepburn of Idaho. Jurisdiction of the government over these articles is declared in the measure when they become articles of interstate or foreign commerce, and a penalty of a maximum fine of 500 and one year's imprisonment is provided for violators of the regulations set forth.

It is made unlawful to sell or manufacture any article of food, drugs, medicine or liquors which is adulterated or misbranded, or which contains any poisonous or deleterious substance.

You can now fully realize that EV-ERYWHERE the wedding process is going on. Every secular paper in the land is actively at work in that direction.

EVERY MAGAZINE, RELIGIOUS OR SECULAR, HAS TREACHERANT AR-TICLES ON THE SUBJECT.

The very air is pulsating with thoughts of reform. In Spiritualism
The Progressive Thinker leads in the wedding process, and consequently it prosperes.

Take for example the case of Mr. S.
W. Fallis, the eminent and widely known "spirit photographer." For many years in this city he has been carrying on his work of MOST CRUEL, HEARTLESS DECEPTION.

He is a subtle artist in his special line of deception, a master mechanic in his imitation of the genuine; in fact he is as skillful in his particular line of trickery as the counterfeiters in imitating our legal currency.

The harvest he has reaped from the innocent gullibles year after year has been large, ill-gotten gains that darkened his spiritual nature, and made him an object of pity.

But the evolution of spiritual forces is at work in the wedding process, and finally a halt was called on Mr. Fallis.
Mrs. Reed, a lady on the North Side, greatly desired a spirit picture of her little daughter. Fallis obtained what purported to be her child—not exactly like her when on earth, as she "had changed in spirit life," he said. Finally the lady fully realized that she had been duped—most cruelly deceived, as the picture of "her child" was soon discovered to be AN EXACT COPY OF A CHILD ACTRESS, which is frequently seen on photographs.

Indignant at the gross deception practiced on her she had Mr. Fallis arrested. She had paid him SIX DOL-LARS for the flagrant deception, dollars earned by herself at hard labor, and she naturally rebelled at having a child actress copied on a photo as her angel child, and sold to her for six dollars.

The trial came off. It was a most pitiable spectacle, enough to make the angels weep, to see this aged man, after long years of heartless deception, stand before the Police Judge and try to vindicate himself.

The "spirit photographer" testified under oath before Justice Caverly that he did not offer to produce faces and forms of disembodied mortals, but only sold "Phenomenal Pictures." His angelic groups were known to be first arranged upon a black curtain in his rear room and the sensitized plate exposed before it. Earnest mediums and laymen have sung the praises of his marvelous hand of control. He himself
HOWLED FURIOUSLY AND MALIG-NANTLY AGAINST THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER, AND RESENTED EVERY EXPOSURE OF TRICKERY OR DECEPTION AS PRACTICED AMONG SOME MEDIUMS, BECAUSE IT IN-JURED THE SACRED TRUTH OF OUR CAUSE. HIS ZEAL AGAINST "FRAUD HUNTING" WAS ONLY DISTANCED BY THE FEAR OF HIS OWN DETECTION. HE WANTED
ALL COUNTERFEITERS OF THE PHENOMENA OF SPIRIT RETURN TO HAVE UNLIMITED LICENSE.

But the "spirit" picture was there, standing out in bold relief, and it was an exact copy of the child actress. But the judge was sympathetic; he pitied the old gray-headed man of subtle trickery and deception, and gave him to understand that his practices must be abandoned at once, or the doors of the penitentiary would open for him.
He told him to pay back to the lady his ill-gotten gains, six dollars, go home and take down his misleading sign, and stop this nefarious business at once. If he commences the deception again, as the judge intimates, the doors of the penitentiary will open for him.

Russia and the Jew--What of the Outcome? Suggestion, Magnetism and Spiritual Healing.

A Lecture by Georgla Gladys Cooley, Chicago, Nov. 26, 1905.

"These people knew that the spirits of their loved ones hovered over them, and their ancestors whom they honor as living, only passed to another stage of life called 'death.' These people pray to their ancestors, the so-called dead. It is better to pray to a human God who can help you in time of trouble, than to an inhuman God who is deaf to all your entreaties."

Israel Zangwill, on a visit to the United States some time ago, made several addresses, in the course of which he coined the following epigram:

1. "The Jews had no country of their own. They could not possess the land of their fathers in reality, so they made a portable Palestine. They carried it wherever they went. This was a spiritual country. It could not be assailed by their oppressors."

2. "There have been two conceptions of the Jew. One, that he lends money and wears a black cap. The other, that he deals in old clothes. The truth is, Jews have been everywhere. They have been everything except Pope of Rome, and they have come near to that."

3. "If they dealt in old clothes, it was because papal decrees forbade them trading in anything else but old clothes and old iron."

4. "The Jews have been scattered to the four winds among all the nations of earth. They have been of immense service to every country that has harbored them."

5. "Col. Roosevelt told me that the Jews of his regiment were among his bravest soldiers."

6. "Jews not only furnished money for Columbus' expedition, but his first lieutenant was a Jew."

Selfishness as a God.

To the one who desires to live by the side of the road and be a friend to man there is no nation, no country; the entire world is their field of action and all people their brothers and sisters.

It is time that the Christian race began to realize this fact and know that the good of the nation served all. We suffer from our wrongs. We enjoy the good that we do, and no personal God or Savior can intercede so that our sins may be washed as white as snow with any human blood.

To-day there are many in this country who are stirred in sympathy, pity, and indignation at what is going on in the other side of the world, and it is time that a Christian land forbade all forms of slavery and did away with all forms of cruelty; yet, as long as selfishness as the God of any nation, although they call themselves Christian, we will have cruelty and oppression on all sides.

Jews and Thanksgiving.

The Jews to-day all over this free country are celebrating their Thanksgiving; celebrating the love they hold in their hearts for the freedom they have in a free land. To-day the synagogues are thronged with worshippers, and to-day there are prayers going up from hundreds of hearts and souls for the suffering humanity in a distant country.

Russia as a Nation.

Russia has been considered a Christian country by Christian people, yet you all know what they have done in the past years, and you all know what is being done at the present time. The crucifixion of the far past seems not to be a lesson for them, and their teacher of Calvary whom they claim to worship, appears to be far in the distance at the present time.

They must have forgotten their leader and they must have forgotten the picture which has been stamped on the entire civilized world, the man on the cross, the one who died to save all others. This is only child's talk, for the sacrifice of one life will never be sufficient to wash away the sins of the entire world or from one individual.

This grand, old soul came into the world to teach and sow the seed of righteousness; to give to the world what had never been given before--the Golden Rule; to impress upon the minds of the people that in doing good they received their happiness, and in doing wrong they likewise received their penalty.

The Christians of to-day are persecuting the Jews while in reality their Savior was a Jew, born of a Jewish mother. How they can reconcile themselves to this we cannot understand. Neither can we understand how they can persecute a race from which their Master sprung.

That the Jews have been of assistance to the world as the world as well as Russia; that they are people of ability and have many learned ones among them, and that there are true fathers and mothers in this race, the world can not deny. They are entitled to all the privileges of any other human being, and still the hand of oppression is upon them in Christian Russia. Even in your own country, it seems in every land, the hand of oppression is over them.

How would you feel if while walking upon the street to your daily labor you were accosted by some one who demanded your life? Would not your whole being rise up in indignation? Even in your weakness of numbers you would fight long and hard for your rights and the rights of those who were dear to you.

Now, when the whole American continent is filled with thanksgiving, what a sad time it must be for those far away? What have they to be thankful for? What have they to send out prayers to God for? Let us feel the importance of our duty as men and women at such a time and extend a hand of sympathy to these oppressed people.

It is not enough that we send money to assist them, but with the gold also send our prayers that the hand of oppression may be lifted and these people find the true Jerusalem, know again sweet Palestine, and be a race among others that are honored and respected.

Heaven is For All.

It is said that God is no respecter of persons and has not chosen any elect. This brings the thought to the human race that man is created equal, all having the same opportunities in this life, which is a school of experience from which we are to learn our way to a higher life when we are done with this earth and all its lessons. There we will meet Jew and Gentile, heathen and Christian; prince and pauper, and king and subject. There we will have no opportunity to use a bribe, but be sent to the position to which we have earned for ourselves and to none other.

It is there we will learn the true meaning of equality, if we fail to learn the result? She was thrown in the street, and flogged, then deported and is now serving in Siberia.

Again, perhaps you will remember about the man who saw the angel who told him they were using their influence on the Czar to rest in peace--for all would soon be well. When he told this he was thrown into prison, and when he still continued to tell of his wonderful vision, he was marched off to Siberia.

Heavy is the head that wears a crown; heavy is the heart through which and all other lives until they have overcome the tendency of wrong and do good.

We will not predict another war for Russia, but we will predict many more internal disturbances and many more severe lessons for these people until the door of freedom opens for every oppressed soul in all her lands, and clouds of darkness raised from over her people.

The Jews Grow Stronger.

This will be a blow that will strengthen the Jews as a race; will cause them to grow stronger and will hold them in greater respect and love in the minds of others in the world. This will be the means of giving the many oppressed a chance to desert the old lands and seek quarters in the new. The Jew then will be the man of America and other countries, and we will see more faces of this race than ever before.

It will be a lesson taught; it will cause them to look into their own conditions deeper and stronger than they have ever looked before. It will create a more intense longing for a place they can call their own.

They have longed for this, but an effort will be made to obtain such a place, and the thought centered on the object will be the means of such a place being secured. It is true they still long for Palestine for their Jerusalem, and can you blame them?

Where is there a better land, a sweeter and dearer place in all the world for an American than America? Has not the Jew the same heart-beat? Has not the Jew the same desires and the same longings for a Jerusalem of his own? We cannot see that the Jew will have their own sweet Jerusalem, but there will be other lands and other places where they can lay the cornerstone of love and energy and build for themselves a new Jerusalem, and in this new Jerusalem will be new hopes, new opportunities, new love and better lives. This race should take new hope and hold onto it and demand their own.

It is not right that they should have one place they could call theirs. From our standpoint the Jews have made a mistake. While it is well for all nations to stick together, we feel that if the Jews had married and intermarried into other races it would have been better for them.

Many would say they would have been lost by absorption, also that a Gentile married a Jew they did not have the respect of either race. That would have been overcome, as time heals all wounds and prejudices.

Prejudice and Love.

England favors our great United States because it has much interest in this free land. She does not want to go to war with this country; there is too much at stake; so it is with the race question, where they marry and intermarry, they cut down the hand of prejudice, and the hand of love creeps in and the hand of progress is bound to follow.

Thus we say to the Gentile, if the man you love is a Jew waste no time in considering the religious question; waste no time in looking back on racial pedigree; look for the love and take him as your partner in life. We will say to the Jew that if the woman you love is a Gentile waste no time in considering the religious question; waste no time in looking back on racial pedigree; look for the love and take her as your partner in life.

Look at the strength of the American race! Look what they have married into! The American child has the blood of all nationalities in its veins. When the time comes when we will be no question about nationality the world will be happier and we will have better conditions on this earth plane.

God never said, "Gentile, look not down on a Jew." All these are man-made laws; laws based on prejudice and bloodshed, when the world was in ignorance and the spiritual could not prompt man as it prompts him now.

The Word Love.

All importance must be placed on the word Love. From the time a child is old enough to hear and understand that word, its true meaning should be taught.

This reminds me of a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox:

All the uniforms were blue, all the swords were bright and new,
When the regiment went marching down the street.
All the men were hale and strong as they proudly moved along,
Through the cheers that drowned the music of their feet.

Oh! the music of the feet keeping time to drums that beat and thrum,
Oh! the splendor and the glitter of the sight,
As with swords and rifles new and in uniforms of blue,
The regiment went marching to the fight.

The Remarkable Change.

When the regiment came back all the guns and swords were black,
And the uniforms had faded out to grey,
And the faces of the men who marched through that street again Seemed like the faces of the dead who seek their way;

For the dead who lose their way cannot look more wan and gray
Oh! the sorrow and the pity of the sight,
Oh! the weary lagging feet out of step with drums that beat,
As the regiment comes marching from the fight.

How true that story is! How many have heard the bitter tones of returning drums, and how you looked in vain for those that did not return. How your soul goes out in prayer, that sometime, somewhere you may meet them again!

Aye, when Love rules there will be no more war. When Love rules there will be no more regiments returning from the fight. Then we can understand and realize our power and feel there is a true God, and we will see more of God in our fellow-beings. Then let us try to bring about better conditions that will bring this to the world. Let

SPIRITUAL HEALING.

There seems to be a great gulf between the thought of those members of the medical profession who recognize suggestion as a potent therapeutic agent and that of spiritual healers generally. Both physician and healer depend upon the power of mind, and each acknowledges that cures are made by the other.

But they approach the subject from opposite points of view, and unquestionably touch different emotional chords in their patients, even if their methods are otherwise identical. But are they identical? The physician declares that all mental healing involves at least a slight degree of hypnosis. The spiritual healer, of whatever school, emphatically denies that he employs hypnotic methods, and talks about the word "the Spirit" in a way that makes the ordinary physician smile with contempt at his superstitious ignorance. Yet the difference can hardly be one of mere terminology, for the two classes of practitioners approach their patients differently, deal with them differently, and evidently seek to produce the desired results by different methods.

Dr. Peterson, a recognized authority on the hypnotic treatment of disease, has made the statement that the best results are often obtained with the slightest degrees of hypnosis. He says that practitioners are often in such a hurry to produce results that they strain delicate chords and do harm in the end. Now, here it would seem that we are coming, if not upon common ground, at least within speaking distance of one another.

To begin with, we need a definition of hypnosis. Etymologically, it means sleep. Some hypnotists declare that it is of the same nature as ordinary sleep. You may sleep, cannot, or talk, or be handled without waking, neither can he be made to eat a tallow candle, nor be blistered with a cold iron. Some call music hypnotic in its influence, and all the recognized schools of science, I think, would call the soul science which follows the New Thought cult, a form of hypnotic auto-hypnosis. They would also call communion with the Divine Spirit auto-hypnosis, unless they gave it the less dignified name of superstition. This only proves that the word "hypnosis" is made to stand for various mental and emotional states. If it is to be so used, we need other terms to distinguish its various secondary meanings. Suffice it here to say that this is not the popular conception of the word, just where the line should be drawn between hypnotic phenomena and those which should be ascribed to mental phenomena of all kinds are more accurately classified as "the word."

The suggestive therapist usually gives his suggestions orally, depending upon the emotions; or the purposes awakened in the patient's mind by the suggestion, which makes him necessary to cure his disease. Much stress is also laid by this school upon the response made directly by the physical organs to a suggested course of action on their part. Sometimes, however, these practitioners "speak the word" in silence, still calling their work "suggestion." The Society for Psychological Research published some years ago a good testimony to prove that horses can be cured of warts by suggestion. It has also been proved that when a new patient is brought into a hospital the pulse motions of other patients lying near are liable to be influenced by the patient's condition of mind. Is this suggestion? Does it not look more like magnetism?

But what is magnetism? How can the giver of silent suggestions prove that his influence does not come from his magnetism? He usually attributes his power to his conviction, his expectant attention, and his benevolent kindness, which wins his patient's confidence. But are not these qualities just as conspicuous in a good magnetic healer or osteopathist or a successful masseur? And what are these three qualities but faith, hope and love expressed on the personal plane? Faith and hope may be called "will power," but it is hard to see how actual healing can be accomplished without at least a spark of that warm, magnetic quality without which all suggestion is "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

Now, it is to faith, hope and love that spiritual healers attribute all their power. Mr. Colville has well said that one may give a spiritual treatment while repeating "I am healed," just as well as while repeating any other words. For the power that heals does not reside in the words. The spiritual healer is conscious of a glorious force flowing through him, as it were a light enveloping both himself and his patient, in which he feels that the soul of the patient is being quickened and brought to the power of itself and its divine prerogative. Or, it may seem like musical vibrations to which the patient responds, coming thus into harmony with the divine nature within him, and with his environment and his fellow men in consequence. There are many ways in which his act may be interpreted, and the power of his act may be interpreted in many ways, but the power that heals does not reside in the words. General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish to distinctly understand that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy to be inserted in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do this they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this section must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES.—Of your poems sent to this office, for they will be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

We desire the work, "MORAL EDUCATION," by Prof. Joseph Rodas Buchanan. Who has a copy?

On account of Christmas falling on Monday, and the closing of the press-room on that day, we are compelled to go to press several days earlier than is customary, and many items and other matter will have to be omitted, reaching this office too late for insertion in this issue.

Mrs. Cooley writes: "Don't forget the New Year's eve services at the Independent Church of Truth, corner 47th and Grand Boulevard. Ten-minute speeches by Dr. H. A. Cross, Georgia Gladys Cooley and others. Messages by Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig, Mrs. Belle Weakley, Mrs. Cooley and several other message bearers. A gala time is anticipated. Don't fail to be with us."

Mrs. L. D. Provorse writes: "There is a gleam in every thought expressed on the pages of that welcome visitor, The Progressive Thinker, which comes to our home weekly. How eagerly we await its coming, and just as eagerly devour its contents, wishing for more."

Mrs. L. Hecker writes from Oil City, Pa.: "Elizabeth J. Demorest, Pittsburg, Pa., and her co-workers, Mr. Geo. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Kellogg, Mrs. Kirkpatrick, Mr. and Mrs. Hoadley and Mr. Jones, and many others, have just closed a very successful three months' Spiritual rally in our city, which is bound to result in much good for Spiritualism. Our best wishes go with Mrs. Demorest to her next field of labor."

Mrs. Virginia Bryan, the lecturer and best medium, passed through the city last week on her way to Payne, Ohio. She will return to this city in a few days, and will deliver a series of lectures in the city and surrounding towns.

Mrs. M. S. Hoopes writes: "Prof. F. E. Loner is lecturing to appreciative audiences each Sunday and Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, at 239 Lincoln avenue. Good music and messages at each meeting and a good will to all. Come and help us. Lincoln avenue car stops in front of the door. A few doors north of Larabee street."

A. M. Sheppard writes from Findlay, Ohio, speaking well of the meetings held there by Mr. and Mrs. Macneil. Mrs. Macneil is clairvoyant and clairaudient. The church regrets their departure.

A. D. Jacoby writes from Elkhart, Ind.: "Our little society is progressing nicely. We have added three or four new members last month, and we hope to do some good work this coming year. There are four or five beginning to develop mediumistic powers who have only been sitting on the fence, and now we have something to be thankful for, hoping all will be well with The Progressive Thinker, for it is the only paper printed in Chicago that we are interested in."

Gustave Williams writes: "Last Sunday, Dec. 17, as usual the North Star Spiritual Union had its Hall, 1545 Milwaukee avenue, filled to its utmost capacity with true seekers and investigators, and many took home a new thought, which may bear fruit in future days. The subject, 'Can Mediumship Be Bought?' was masterfully handled by Dr. P. M. Esser. He proved that mediumship can only be developed by living up to the golden rule, and under circumstances can be bought or sold as merchandise. Sister Letzger made a good impression by giving some very touching remarks, as to being just and true to your fellow men. Sister Dean followed, giving spirit communications, which were well taken and recognized, followed by Sister Letzger, who with her usual rapidness had a message for each one from their respective loved ones in the spirit side of life. Sister Letzger, who is with the society, will be pleased to meet her friends at the above hall every Sunday evening."

A. F. M. writes: "Discouraging recently with an old gentleman on occultic topics, and finding him well posted spiritually on many subjects appertaining to our cause, I asked him why he didn't write for our papers. His reply was: 'I didn't know enough about Spiritualism to write for the public. All I know is about myself, and I don't know how to find that out. Thanks to Spiritualism, however, for that much.' It seems he got hold of the right end of Spiritualism; for that is the whole thing in a nut shell."

AS A GENERAL RULE, IN THIS OFFICE WE PAY NO ATTENTION TO ANONYMOUS COMMUNICATIONS. THE NAME AND ADDRESS OF THE WRITER SHOULD ACCOMPANY ALL MATTER, OF WHATEVER KIND, SENT TO THIS OFFICE.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS, WITH SERIAL NUMBER, NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

J. C. Barnes writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "The Progressive Spiritualist Church here is flourishing with increasing congregations every Sunday evening. We each Sunday have an impressive discourse of Rev. Anna Thronsen, and the many telling messages from spirit friends whom she sees and hears. Mr. Thronsen is a great help as a soloist, having few equals as a singer, and still fewer in appearance, and as a gentleman. The society is fortunate in the accession of so brilliant a family, including Miss Dorothy Thronsen, their 12-year-old daughter, youngest and last mentioned, though not the least in the attractive trio of workers for the cause they so dearly love; she is clairaudient and clairvoyant, and has given many meetings and leads in the drills at our lyceum, with grace and agreeable expression. Our lyceum meets in G. A. R. Hall, No. 222 East Maryland street, at 2 p. m., and immediately after the lyceum we have conference, when we often have a feast of reason and a flow of eloquent utterance. At 7:30 p. m., after which messages are given very satisfactorily. The society meets every Wednesday evening in the spacious parlors of Mrs. Sarah Ziegler, 139 South Noble street, where social converse is cultivated and often short talks by the pastor, Mrs. Thronsen, followed by messages. Mrs. Ziegler deserves great credit for her generosity in opening her home for the Ladies' Aid Society on Tuesday afternoons and the public on Wednesday evenings as well as for her tireless energy in all good work promotive of the church's interests. Our president, Mr. C. S. Allen, deserves more than a complimentary mention for his indefatigable work as an organizer and great assistant in bringing the church to its present efficient state."

Mrs. Dr. S. K. Henderson writes from Davenport, Iowa: "The Spiritualists of Davenport, Rock Island and Moline have determined to become more and more united in a fraternal society. We meet every Friday evening at 8 o'clock, 321-323 South Putnam Building, Davenport. We are all interested in the lectures of our speaker, Prof. W. H. Watson, president of the German-English College, member of the Psychological Society, Paris, France, and author of 'Juggernaut,' 'Christian Science Exposed,' and 'The Spiritual Healing and Developing Circles.'"

Ferd C. Suber writes: "Sunday afternoon, Dec. 17, the Rising Sun Mission listened to Mr. Geo. J. Drews, an earnest advocate of vegetarianism. He related the remarkable experience of having left his body on several occasions, and saw the world from the inside, while away from his body, and encountered while away. His remarks were interesting indeed. Sister Hamilton Gill gave some wonderful proofs of the continuity of life. Dr. L. Rowell, our speaker for the evening, was called out of the city in the afternoon, and many were disappointed by his absence, but Sister Brigg's illness was so serious that it was a relief to the situation. An interesting feature of the service was the christening of the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Taylor by Sister Briggs. The ceremony was most impressive. Sister Kirchner and Bro. Chas. A. Thompson gave satisfactory messages at a number. Our worthy president called attention to the application blanks, with our creed printed on the inside, and mentioned our bazaar to be held in May, 1906, in our Temple on Oakley boulevard. Dec. 31, Dr. J. MacFarland is our speaker. He is a veteran in the ranks of Modern Spiritualism. Our choir is rehearsing some new and beautiful selections to add to their repertoire, and other vocal and instrumental talent has been secured for the evening, which bids fair to be the most successful one yet held by the Mission."

Georgia Gladys Cooley is engaged to serve the Baltimore (Md.) society for the month of May and June, 1906. She has the month of July and the first week of August open. Societies desiring her services as lecturer and message bearer for that time can address her at 567 E. 52nd street, Chicago, Ill.

At Appleton Hall, No. 9 Appleton street, the First Spiritualists Ladies Aid Society meets every Friday. On the evening of Friday, Dec. 29, Mr. Albert P. Blinn, of Norwich, Conn., will give a benefit for this society. Mr. Blinn is a very able speaker and a large attendance is expected. Come and swell the numbers.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—The Massachusetts Association of Spiritualists will hold its annual meeting in Berkeley Hall Annex, 4 Berkeley street, Boston, on Tuesday, Jan. 2, 1906, at 10:30 a. m. Members only will be admitted to the meeting. George A. Fuller, President; Carrie L. Hatch, Secretary.

After S. Miller writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "On Dec. 6, 1905, the People's Church held their annual members' meeting, at the residence of their pastor, Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie. The main duty of this meeting was the election of officers for the ensuing year. The retiring board was re-elected to office with but few exceptions although the officers were in some instances changed to other duties. Mrs. Gillespie was unanimously elected to again act as speaker for the society. The present board consists of J. Shaw Gillespie, president; Archibald McKenzie, vice-president; E. W. Briggs, treasurer; W. S. Miller, secretary; Ethel Poole, assistant secretary. Directors, H. H. Nichols, Mrs. G. J. Prall, Louis Roethe, Mrs. C. M. O'Brien and Mrs. Millie Ward. The church is prosperous and growing and at present, standing room is at a premium. Should the attendance keep on increasing, it will be necessary to find larger and more commodious quarters. The public is cordially invited to attend our meetings and are assured of a hearty welcome."

Mrs. Lily LeSueur writes from Dallas, Texas: "The Truth Seeker's Society of Spiritualists here, is having very interesting meetings. The membership is steadily increasing, and the interest grows, and we feel much encouraged. The ladies planned for Mrs. Kayner a very delightful surprise on her birthday, Dec. 14, at the pleasant home of Mr. and Mrs. Morris. Mrs. Kayner was presented with a folding writing desk, and other useful articles. A dainty lunch was served and a pleasant time was enjoyed by all. Moses and Mattie Hull paid us a short visit on their way to El Paso, and Sunday evening, Dec. 17, a large and appreciative audience greeted them, and Moses gave one of his highly interesting discourses, proving spirit return by many quotations from the Bible, interspersed with humorous anecdotes. We listened for two hours and then were sorry the meeting closed. The church was closed for Monday, and we were much disappointed that Moses could not give two more lectures that were advertised for Monday."

Watch meeting, New Year's eve, Dec. 31, at Spiritual Alliance Church, corner Huron and 31st Vincennes avenue. After regular services, watch meeting and test and message circle. Mediums are invited to take part. A number will be there to assist Mrs. Elmo, Coffey and Luach will be served free. Prof. F. M. Sharenberger will speak at 8 p. m. Prof. N. Kershaw at 3 p. m. Come early and stay late.

G. Hill writes: "The Golden Rule Spiritualist Society holds meetings every Sunday at O'Donnell's College Hall, South Paulina street, between Washington Blvd. and Park avenue. Good speakers and mediums always in attendance at these services. Open door. All welcome. On Sunday evening, Dec. 31, our speaker will be Prof. F. M. Sharenberger, president of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association. The service will conclude with a continued service to watch the passing of the old and the birth of the new year. Prominent mediums will be present to interpret the watchers. All cordially invited. Silver offering at the door for this occasion."

TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, December 31, 1905: "Tomorrow."

Gem of Thought:

To-morrow I'll do some kindly deed,
To-morrow I'll speak the word;
To-morrow I'll meet the world's dire need,
To-morrow I shall be heard.

To-morrow too busy, wait I must,
To-morrow no chance to speak;
To-morrow, like me, the world can wait,
To-morrow I've grown so weak.

To-morrow I repeat just what I've given,
To-morrow I see,—alas,
To-morrow I find my path or heaven,
To-morrow I cannot pass.

The Sunday Globe, Tampa, Fla., says: "The science, philosophy, religion and practical utility of Modern Spiritualism will be presented by Rev. J. Madison Allen, at 7:30 p. m., each Sunday, at Odd Fellows' Hall, Basile Building, Franklin street. Prof. Allen is an able and eloquent speaker, of national reputation, an inspirational speaker upon topics of special interest to thoughtful people. Admission free. Cordial invitation to all. Come and learn what Spiritualism and spirit mediumship really are, and their value to mankind."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "The lecture delivered at the Hyde Park Oculist Society hall, Dec. 17, by Prof. N. Kershaw, on 'Health,' was grand and instructive. He is very talented and deserves special mention and good addresses followed by Dr. C. A. Burgess and Mr. E. Dirkes. Messages were all good and recognized. Mrs. C. B. Wilson visited for the first time, and was very much interested in the work of the society. Our society holds an election of officers on Dec. 27. All members are particularly requested to be present. Mrs. E. J. Hanson speaks for us on the 24th, and Dr. J. H. Randall on the 31st. Dr. Geo. B. Wane, for the first Sunday in January, and Dr. C. S. Tisdale for the remainder of the month of January, and perhaps February. In spite of the weather last Thursday night the attendance at our dance was much larger. We have secured two young ladies for musicians—one a pianist and the other a violinist. Such talent in that line has not been had in the hall for some time. It seemed to give new energy to the merry-makers, and all had a good time. Every Thursday night, everyone welcome. Dancing commences at 9 o'clock. Sunday evening services promptly at 8 o'clock."

A. Booth writes from Rockford, Ill.: "We have had Mr. H. M. French with us all of the month of December, and he stays like year out. We are still holding forth and making an encounter to see that there is a great deal of good to be derived from embracing the Truths of our philosophy. We are hoping and expecting that the New Year will open up bright for the S. S. S."

Mrs. Frances Wheeler, a prominent lecturer, writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "Having now become reconciled to my new surroundings, I thought it might be of some benefit to my many friends whom I cannot reach personally to know something of my work in a new field. I find many workers here, and although I have not yet had the privilege of meeting all of them, I believe they are all doing a good work, according to their methods. I held my first public meeting on the 10th of Tuesday in the undertaking room of Cornell & Clement, of Syracuse, N. Y., for the purpose of giving a message from spirit land, telling him that all was well with his departed wife, Mrs. Underhill went over to the other side Monday from her home in the Florence flats. Tuesday her funeral was held. 'Twas such a funeral as Spiritualists hold. No minister was there, only a friend of the departed woman, Mrs. Carrie Faulkner read a poem written by herself, and another, the work of Mrs. Underhill. She also referred to the manuscript left by the dead woman. These told of Mrs. Underhill's experiences under inspiration. Mr. Underhill said Wednesday that some day they may be published in book form. The speaker told also of the future of Mrs. Underhill on that 'other side.'"

Mr. Underhill is a very well known Spiritualist. He told Wednesday how the message came to him from his wife. "Mrs. Olmstead, a friend of Mr. Underhill's who had taken care of her in her illness, was impressed yesterday by my wife's father, who has been dead about four years," said Mr. Underhill. "The message came to her from my wife's father first. 'Ann Eliza is here with us in our home' and then a long pause, and she next, 'Tell Alfred I am so peaceful.' It is peaceful indeed."

Surging Ahead!

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is Surging Ahead! Its weekly receipts are large, and it was never in a more favorable financial condition than at present. It has been crowned with sixteen years of unparalleled prosperity. It is the Head Light of a Pure Spiritualism and Honest Mediumship! It is the STANDARD BEARER OF TRUTH. Its editor is in close touch with the spirit world, and the higher denizens thereof are in harmony with its work. It is a breezy paper, a stirring paper, a paper that makes vibrations wherever it goes, a paper that is never in the rut, never standing still, but ever on the ascending plane; ever dispensing the higher thought. When one important movement ends another opens, and its readers ask, "What next?" Yes, what next? It will come like a meteor, and will, perhaps, dazzle you with a meteoric display. LOOK OUT FOR THE "SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL!" It will astonish you as never before! It will be educational. It will give your mind new vibrations. It will teach you something of the mysteries of the Dark Cabinet, and show some of the rank deception carried on there in the name of "Spirit Return," one of the grandest truths that ever came to the world.

day afternoon and evening. They left Dallas in the evening, and all wished them God speed."

THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

A Fine Spiritual Sermon Delivered From an Orthodox Pulpit.

The "Cheltenham Chronicle" of England, gives a report of a fine spiritual sermon by the Lord Bishop of Gloucester, delivered on the previous Sunday. He took as his text the twenty-third verse of the twelfth chapter of Hebrews, and said:

"The writer of this Epistle realizes what a high position lies between the living and the dead. With him unseen things are realities. No festival helps us to realize this more than that of 'All Saints,' when our thoughts are drawn to the great company of saints who have passed into the silent land, and we see the force of that clause in our Creed, 'I believe in the communion of saints.' The spirit of the great socialists of the 19th century, and of which I have given your readers some extracts; but there is no Christianity in it. When the latter is effected, which it must be at no distant day, the ideas of Robert Owen (the socialist of 1771, born in New Lanark, Scotland), will be accepted generally as a solution of the great social questions now agitating the Christianized world. He was only 100 years in advance of his time; but his practical lessons will not be lost to the world."

Hon. J. S. Loveland, in 833 expresses my view of the case exactly. Spiritualism and Christianity are (though they cannot be) compatible; this through lack of ignorance, and in the face of their own 'sacred history,' preserved carefully for 2,000 years.

Christianity, so-called, is evidently on the wane, notwithstanding the many missionaries, and the immense sums of money constantly expended in propaganda. Also the great wars, waged by Christian countries, have always been sanctioned and promoted by Christian clergymen, who invariably accompanied the army in their incursions to foreign countries.

Now that France has set the example, it is our duty, more than ever, to demand the entire disassociation of church and state. The abolition of chaplains in the army and navy, as a useless appendage, should be petitioned for earnestly by the people. In short, the guarantees of the federal constitution should be strictly observed. This we earnestly demand.

P. S.—As Washington said, "This is in no sense a Christian country."

LETTER OF EXPLANATION.

It is Our Duty to Demand the Entire Disassociation of Church and State.

To the Editor:—In my notice of the transition of Judge James W. Underhill of Canton, Ohio, I did not say that his father was a "believer in the socialism of Robert Dale Owen." LAKE HELEN, FLORIDA.

Camp-Meeting Begins February 6, and Closes March 18.

White and cold with snow and ice are New England and the North! Green with tropical leaves and bright with oranges and flowers is Florida. The contrast is very pleasant to the tourist who comes to the sunny climate. The roses are in bloom and soon the jasmine will glow with golden glory from the balconies of the camp cottages.

The mocking birds will sing in the pines and magnolias and wake the laggard sleeper with greetings from the house-tops—charming land of summer, in winter!

The hotel is filling up with guests. Housekeepers are chattering, cooking and rattling the dishes in the Apartment House. Still there is room for more.

The store is stocked with groceries, and the ice wagon makes frequent visits.

The gasoline pump is throwing pure water into the cottages. The weather is delightful, so say all who come.

The carpenters are busy and new cottages are projected. The lumber dealers are prodded by the impatient people.

New-comers and old-comers are taking the finished cottages.

Sunday afternoon meetings are held in the Auditorium and Mr. Colby holds circles Sunday nights.

Card parties in the pavilion Monday nights, and dances Saturday nights.

A large water tank, high up among the pines will supply water to the "Glen's" village and drive, if needed.

The Band company are rebuilding their crate factory, and the new depot is rising over the ashes of the old one.

The bicycle path is finished—men and women, bring your bicycles. A trip to Deland is exhilarating.

There are three regular doctors on the grounds, but little for them to do. Mrs. Pratt has begun housekeeping in her pretty cottage on the Huff peninsula. Very desirable building lots are for sale on the Huff farm.

J. Clegg Wright and wife intend to open early in January, their cottage on Picturesque Park.

The Thatchers are due, and a large cottage is to be erected by them. The Rose Garden is soon to be materialized.

A number of mediums have arrived and more are coming.

My excursion for January will sail from New York City, January 5 and 12. I shall personally conduct the last one. Those who prefer to go up the St. Johns river from Jacksonville, will join me for that route. Write me for low prices, etc., enclosing four cents in stamps for postage on folders, etc.

APPRECIATIVE WORDS.

"Song and Sermon," by Elizabeth Lowe Watson.

For forty years, if I mistake not, Mrs. E. L. Watson has been a prominent worker for the higher Spiritualism in the United States. Her "Song and Sermon," attended her at school and elsewhere, and at thirteen she became a trance speaker, beginning in her fourteenth year her public work on the rostrum; and an inspirational speaker she remains to this day.

I have ever regarded Mrs. Watson as one of the most valuable and successful spiritual workers for these reasons:

1. Because she is an honest, earnest, simple-minded evangel of truth and right.

2. Because she labors to make humanity purer and better.

3. Because on most levels among Spiritualists her head is level, her mind practical common-sense enabling her to steer clear of the vagaries and delusions into which some of our public teachers fall.

Her labors have been principally devoted to the edification and uplifting of humanity, morally and spiritually. Her work has been largely on the sociological plane, the relation of the human beings to each other in this world, the rounding out and perfecting of character, the elevation of the race in the domain of ethics, the strengthening of the moral instincts and aptitudes. Morality is the true touchstone of character.

Without it all our material wealth, all our intellectual power, count as nothing in the sight of the angel world; and seeing how largely Mrs. Watson's labors have been devoted to the guidance and furtherance of the moral sentiments, my soul goes out in thankfulness to her thereto.

Mrs. Watson, as a rule, concluded her lectures with an inspirational message in the volume she has just published, "Song and Sermon," are contained a few of the many of these poems, together with some of her lectures in full, and selections from others. It is imbued with the spirit of the woman, with her broad-mindedness and catholicity of thought, the nobility and true worth of her character, and the large humanitarianism that has dominated her life-work. The book merits a wide circulation. Price, $1 postpaid. It can be obtained from Mrs. Watson, Box 482, Pacific Grove, Monterey County, California.

Our Redeemers.

It is not the gods who save us, it is our mothers. It is not our priests who redeem us; it is our maidens. A youth sits on the rock by the sea, and his white hands tremble in his. The music of a distant bell, mingled with the hum of the wild bee, is wafted from the shore on the wing of the evening twilight, fragrant with the breath of the Hawthorn and the clover. The dew gleams on the rock's fringes of fern and moss, and the light of the blue-bell and the white star behind the ocean's vastness, and far off in the sky's immensity the stars come forth in the awfulness and the silence. Through a rift in a mass of vapor gleams the silver splendor of the moon, and the million ripples of the ocean dance from where the waters murmur on the beach away to the line where they kiss the stars on the horizon's rim. And the moonlight reveals on the rock, like two angels in a holy dream, the youth and the maiden, the brown hair mingled with the golden tresses, the eyes lit with a gleam of joy above the joy of the earth, and two bosoms heaving with excess of bliss, as bosoms did before man had sinned and the gates of Eden were closed. That youth can never, on manhood's prime or in life's decay, sink so low as he might have done had he never been a guest at the divine festival of Love. He can not live in the depths of the valley who has

SELF-GOVERNMENT ILLUSTRATED.

The School City, Its Plan and Its Success, as Related by The Outlook.

In some of the public schools of Boston there is to be established this institution known as the School City. It is a form of self-government, which has been used in some of the schools of New York City, Philadelphia, and other places.

It was originally founded by Wilson L. Gill in 1897. The trial was made in a disorderly school of a thousand pupils or more in the suburbs of New York. The students were so unruly as to require the presence of policemen in the playgrounds. Within a week or two the pupils were organized as a city, with the right and responsibility of self-governing themselves, the school became orderly and law-abiding. The boys were willing to obey laws in the making of which they had a share. In other places good results have been attained.

In one school near Philadelphia the standard of dress was so low that if any boy wore a linen collar to school it was sure to be torn off. The boys had registered under assumed names, so that in case of arrest they would not appear in police courts under their true names.

When the School City was organized, the boys came to the principal and confessed the rule, and asked to be put in their right names. Truly, conduct was improved, and better manners, and improved scholarship followed. The students maintained their higher standards to the end of the school year last spring.

The almost immediate transformation brought about in the individual boys and girls by the endowment of responsibility involved in the plan has many illustrations.

One boy from the slums who was careless, mischievous, and fond of playing truant was elected a "member of the City Council."

The teacher felt the choice of this little rascal rendered the republic hopeless, but the children in this, as in many another case, reformed a bad boy by putting him in a position of trust.

As this lad said when praised by his teacher for becoming a little gentleman, "You know they expect so much from a member of the City Council."

Some of the decisions of the school courts are remarkably appropriate. One pupil, guilty of swearing in the school-yard and on the streets, was sentenced to ostracism for ten days; he was not to speak to anyone at recess during the time, and public opinion enforced the order of the court.

Trial by their peers on full evidence appeals to the children as just and fair, and they manifest a surprising interest for judicial procedure as well as for the child who displays some qualities that their elders would do well to cultivate. No private bill or special legislation has any chance in a School City.

There is no graft in the School City, no boodle in the Council, no understanding between the police and wardens. The children have passed and enforced ordinances prohibiting the shooting of peas, the disfigurement of buildings, the making of any noise in the neighborhood of libraries or other places where people may be disturbed by it. Fattening hogs and slaughtering butchery who would deem it a disgrace to "peach" on fellow-students come to regard it as a civic duty to give evidence to their fellow-students concerning offenders against the laws of the republic.

In a school which has a School City the whole discipline is in the hands of the children. They elect a Mayor and Council. The teachers are present at the meetings of the Council, they retain ultimate authority, but, if tactful, they seldom have to exercise it.

The children frame a charter, which may be revoked by the teachers, as a city's charter may be revoked by the Legislature. The plan has been adopted in thirty-three schools in Philadelphia, a considerable number in New York, Syracuse, Worcester, Minneapolis, and in schools in Cuba.

The United States Government has asked Mr. Gill to organize the School City in the Philippines as soon as proper arrangements can be made.

Playgrounds and school gardens can be conducted by a similar method of self-government. Parks in some western cities have thus been turned over to the care of the boys.

President Roosevelt has commended "the teaching of civics by the admirable plan originated by Wilson L. Gill in the School City as a form of student government. From a similar institution has awarded the plan the highest distinction in its power; and many eminent men, including President Elliott, of Harvard, have approved of it.

As Dr. Frank Parsons writes, "If I am ever a boy again, I hope I may go to school where they have that system. It is believed that one generation of boys thus trained to self-government under conditions free from commercialism would, when they became men, banish political corruption and civic apathy."

DEATH.

As Viewed from the Standpoint of J. W. Veasley, of New Philadelphia, Ohio.

What is this phantom we call Death, That all men fear and dread so much, That blasts us with its withering breath, And chills us with its icy touch?

All men agree with one accord, It is the parting of the soul, The loosing of the silver cord, The breaking of the golden bowl.

But how it is, or why it is, We do not know, that we must own, And reason frankly answers "Nix." A riddle that is all unknown.

Was it decreed that man should die, When he was made of manly dust? When he was formed by the Most High, In His own image, perfect, just?

Or is he like all nature "round, A time to bud and bloom and fruit, Then fade and die, sink in the ground, And in it rot, as does the brute?

This may be true of matter gross, But never can be of the mind; 'Tis not made of earthy dross, But essence of immortal kind.

That which we love'd in one that's gone, Which gave expression to the face, Which shone through eyes sweet as the dawn, Which charmed us with its love and grace,

Tell me not that this is dead, Or that it can forever die!

SPIRIT MESSAGES.

The following are a few of the messages from the spirit world received at the Church of Truth, 400 Grand Boulevard Hall, 47th street and Grand Boulevard, Chicago, Illinois, through the mediumship of Georgia Gladys Cooley:

1st. A spirit by the name of John Walters comes here and goes to the young man there, saying, "You have your struggles, but you did right."

A picture of a bridge now appears before me, followed by an appearance of twilight. I see a man walking towards the bridge, he looks around and turns back to walk away. He seems restless and sad, he looks about him; it's not dark enough. It now grows darker and the man reappears; this time walking upon the bridge until he reached about the middle of it, and there he stands looking at the water for a few moments, then he raises his head and looks about him as though to see if anyone was near and then plunges downward to meet his death by drowning. He says, "It was premeditated, as I went three evenings to the place before I found that no one was passing. Yes, I am a suicide and I am sorry for it."

Going to the lady next to the young man, he said, "please give me a kind thought occasionally, as it will help me."

The lady declared the message was correct in every instance.

2nd. The spirit of a young man now appears to me, he has a face and light brown hair, and a strong body. He calls the name of Clark. A soldier appears with him. I now see a picture of a prison. I see the name Andersonville. I see all signs of war life and a young man beating a drum.

I again hear the name of Clark—Ed. Clark—and the spirit goes to this gentleman, saying: "I was not killed in war, but injured on the head while trying, with several others, to escape—died from concussion of the brain. You lost me and could not tell my folks where I was."

The gentleman receiving the message said that he and the young man were in the same company and thrown into Andersonville prison and afterward removed to another place. He never saw his friend after the day they were separated by removal, and he returned, but he never inquired of Ed's whereabouts, and all he could tell me was, I lost track of him the day we were removed from prison.

3rd. A gentleman comes now who has not been long in spirit life. He seems very weak—description of him follows. He says to the lady saying, "Forgive me, I treated you badly, I was much opposed to Spiritualism, and often insulted you on account of your sympathy in that direction. It seemed I looked for opportunities to find fault—but I am sorry and want to say that you were right and I was wrong."

This gentleman brings a brother's influence, but we see he was a brother through law only.

The lady arose to her feet saying, "Every word is correct, and my brother-in-law's description fits my brother-in-law perfectly. He has just recently died."

4th. A spirit comes to this gentleman, saying: "I am Brother William, and I want you to know that I am looking after your boy who has my name. Don't worry about him—he will come out all right. He and I have been together a few months, and if they don't manage just as you think they ought to, let them alone. They will not save much money, but love and happiness is ahead of that anyway."

The gentleman said the name was correct, and he fully understood the purpose of the entire message.

5th. A spirit comes calling the name of James Gleason—pointing to a gentleman, saying, "I am the stranger who saved your little son's life, and I am helping that same boy now. He now pictures a body of water—looks like a lake, and I see a boy sitting on something that looks like a stick or a pier. I see other boys, but they run away as though in some kind of play. The boy, left alone, falls or jumps into the water, and I see this man go to the assistance—seems a hard pull, but he saves him."

The gentleman answered, "Yes," and asked the privilege of saying a few words, as follows:

"Twenty years ago my little son went fishing with some other boys. They fished awhile and the other boys went off to play, my son remaining to fish. Some fellow began pulling on his line and as did my son pulled also, but he was pulled into the water. He was going down for the last time, when a man who was passing went to his rescue. After getting the body out of the water they worked over him several hours, but he was unable to be sent home. Every word is true, and I am sure this woman could not have known anything about it."

These messages and many others were given to entire strangers, among which were skeptics and people who had listened to meetings of this nature for the first time. If this is not a proof of spirit return, what is it?

The body only has been shed, The soul, immortal, lives for aye. Oh tell us, ye countless dead, Who live somewhere, we do not know;

Oh tell us whether ye have fled, And how ye live—in bliss or woe? And tell us of your new domain, "It's azure skies and golden sands;" And whether death is loss or gain, And of the house not made with hands.

And tell us, do ye ever return To greet us mortals here below? And do ye ever desire or yearn To visit scenes of long ago?

But all seem hushed forevermore, No one responds to sigh or tear, No echoes from the far off shore, No sign or token comes to cheer.

And if it were not for the hope, That springs exultant in the breast, We could not with life's battles cope, And death would end all we love best.

If death ends all then life's a stain, A blot upon creation's face, And naught that's in it to attain Is worth a struggle in its race.

But we believe 'tis but a change, A passing to another state, A mere transitory interchange, In which our life does not abate.

But when the angel dead shall stand, One foot on land and one on sea, And issue forth the great command, "Time was, but Time no more shall be,"

And when the earth's in ruin hurled, And all its elements dissolved, This mystery, old as the world, This secret deep, will then be solved;

PREDICTS TIME OF HER DEATH.

Mrs. Sarah J. Harper Starr, the Well-Known Bellevue Woman, Was a Psychical Wonder—Deep Believer in the Occult—Her Action at Wedding in Refusing to "Serve and Obey" Causes Church to make Change in Marriage Ritual.

Mrs. Sarah Harper Starr, of Bellevue, who was buried today in the family mausoleum at Zellerbach, Pa., was a lifelong personal friend of Mrs. Lucy Webb Hayes, wife of President Rutherford B. Hayes. The two women were classmates in a Cincinnati College. There were three women in a class with 60 men, the three showing superior aptitude for Greek and Hebrew and the languages generally. The intimacy with Lucy Webb was continued up to the death of Mrs. Hayes.

Mrs. Starr's marriage in Cincinnati on May 22, 1849, is of historical importance in ecclesiastical circles. Miss Harper was 16 years of age, and had been studying in college with a view to a missionary life in foreign lands. Dr. Starr, a young physician, was 25 years of age, and the couple decided to wed. Miss Harper had ideas of her own on the question of the word "obey" in the ritual of the church, and decided that for her it should be eliminated. She found a friend in the shape of the Rev. Maxwell Laddie, assistant pastor of Morris Chapel, Cincinnati, who promised to omit the word during the ceremony. This omission did not pass unnoticed, and as early as the wedding supper the young bride was obliged to meet the reproachful looks of friends.

A large church wedding such as hers had been was an innovation in those days. Tongues began to wag, friends were inconsiderate enough to say the marriage was invalid and at the next meeting of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, held in Cincinnati, the clergyman who had omitted the word "obey" was expelled. Finally the question became general and later, when decisive action was taken the sentence "serve and obey" was ordered stricken out of the matrimonial ritual of the discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Methodist Protestant Church took the same action later.

Mrs. Starr and the husband abandoned their idea of a missionary career owing to ill-health. Their first child, a boy, won the prize in a baby show held in Cincinnati in the 60s, and was later wanted by the army as a servant on an insane act of revenge against the mother.

Mrs. Starr is said to have been a psychical medium to her friends. Dreams, visions and presentiments have come to her all her life. She foretold her own death last week by simply announcing "Father is come."

A few months ago she sent her son to Kansas, "because Aunt Carrie will be dead before you can reach her."

The "Aunt Carrie" had just visited Mrs. Starr and was in the best of health as far as any knew. But the dream was true.

Mrs. Starr never made a business venture or an important move of any kind until the revelation came to her by a dream or vision.

Some of her experiences were most remarkable and many of these will be embodied in a history of her life soon to be published. In her early years she had a sister who died at the age of 19 years. This sister, Mrs. Starr believed, in a state of trance visited heaven. On her return to earth she vainly tried to describe the glories of the place; they also foretold the coming time of her own demise.

Mrs. Starr always trusted implicitly to divine intervention in the case of evil or danger. She told more than once of one strange experience.

Dr. Starr, with his young wife and babe, were covering a journey of 100 miles in their carriage. They traveled at the rate of thirty miles a day and halted for night at any inn on the road. On one of these hostleries they were distrustful, but decided to risk it on the homeward journey. Suddenly when within a few miles of the tavern their horse stood still and began to tremble. Perspiration failed. The animal lay down in the road, sweating profusely. There was no help. Night was coming on. The doctor and his wife decided to leave the beast and struggle to the nearest farm house. Here they were entertained for the night. The couple learned later that murder and robbery had been contemplated at the lonely tavern further along.—Pittsburg (Pa.) Chronicle.

DAY BY DAY.

I heard a voice at evening softly say, "Breat not thy yesterday into tomorrow, Nor load this week with last week's load of sorrow."

Lift all thy burdens as they come, nor try To weight the present with the by and by. One step and then another, take thy way—

Live day by day. Live day by day. Though autumn leaves are withering round thy way, Walk in the sunshine. It is all for thee.

Push straight ahead as long as thou canst see. Dread not the winter whither thou mayest go; But, when it comes, be thankful for the snow.

Onward and upward. Look and smile and pray—

Live day by day. Live day by day. The path before thee doth not lead astray; Do thy duty. It must surely be, The Christ is in the one that's close to thee.

Onward, still onward, with a sunny smile, Till step by step shall end in mile by mile. 'Til do my best, unto my conscience say—

Live day by day. Live day by day. Why art thou bounding toward the backward way? One summit and another thou shalt mount. Why stop at every round the space to count?

The past mistakes if thou must still remember? Watch not the ashes of the dying ember. Kindle thy hope. Put all thy fears away—

Live day by day. —Julia Harris May.

WIDELY DIFFERING.

Christianity Versus Spiritualism.

"Christianity and Spiritualism are synonymous and identical. They must stand or fall together. In no possible way does Spiritualism antagonize Christianity."

These statements and arguments are made by Dr. J. M. Peebles in his book on "Obsession." It is impossible to verify words, such as, "they deny; and they charge it with fraud, delusion, witchcraft, work of the devil. It denies the basic doctrines of Christianity, such as blood atonement by a crucified savior, pardon of sins, salvation by faith, damnation in hell fire, god worship."

The difference between Spiritualism and any of the old religions is more pronounced than any one of them with another.

"Christian Spiritualism" is a misnomer—a counterfeit. A "Christian Spiritualist" is a contradiction. An abnormal condition—a false attitude.

Christianity and Spiritualism bear no relation or affiliation. No two things are more opposite. One is based on faith; the other on knowledge. In one we are inspired and expect to believe; in the other we are told to believe and so on or be damned. One threatens vengeance, dire and curses deep and strong on all who do not believe and accept. The other neither threatens nor inflicts any penalty whatever upon anyone who reads or accepts.

To place Spiritualism on a par with Christianity puts it in a false attitude and sinks it to the level of superstition. Its demonstrated facts, destroy the basis of all false creeds. It contains no lies or chimeras. It is not a religion, as such, as based on theology and Theism. It demonstrates a future life for all humanity, gives knowledge of spirit existence, spirit return and communion and the location and employment of the spirit—world—which Christianity does not and cannot do.

Christianity, as a religion, is not. The former based on faith, has been shown to be false; in a thousand points by proofs as strong as facts can make them. Spiritualism, per se, is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth; based on knowledge, fact, science, and correct philosophy. Anything known to be false or untrue or unreal is not Spiritualism.

Christianism is divided and subdivided into hundreds of warring sects (Unitive, exclusive, selfish, independent sects—the inevitable effects and products of the ego, the spirit of self, and the ego's desires and ambitions, and the ego's belief, and the ego's thought, and the ego's action, and the ego's result.)

It was founded on a creed of murder; it brings not peace but the sword of war; it has been propagated by force and bears the stains of blood upon its history.

No nation or body of people were ever made better mentally or morally by being Christianized. Let the world judge from history's pages—the effects of that bloody religion throughout the Christian Era. The spirit of hate, an insupportable nature, a basic principle of the faith. "If any man come to me and hate not his father, mother, wife, children, sisters, brothers and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." "Thus saith the Lord."

In one way Christianity may be true—that is true to itself, true to its false ideal, its abominable doctrines, its bad principles, its pernicious effects and fruits. It is a solemn farce, an empty show, a delusion, a curse.

The difference between Christianity and Spiritualism is just the difference between truth and error. They never have stood together and cannot fall together. They have stood in antagonism from the Hydesville revelations and Rochester rappings to the present time.

Christianity is evidently a cunning and disintegrating. Spiritualism, on the other hand, is a unifying and a constructive. It has spread from the old religious systems can be counted by the millions. It gives to mortals the most complete satisfaction and happiness attainable on earth.

PER ARDUA AD ASTRA.

Have faith to see beyond the little hour, Have trust in good, tho' evil sits in power, Be brave to smile thro' white wrong lips of pain, Know that efforts are not made in vain.

Strong angel hands shall help you to lift up Pure wine of life within the hyssop cup. For we are girt about with witnesses, To warn and counsel, comfort, guide and bless.

Clear eyes of wisdom shall mark out our goal; Swift messengers sustain the faltering soul. And heaven's own palm shall heal our ancient scars. We only rise "through struggle to the stars!"

From every wound of life a rose shall grow, For every tear-drop, a white lotus bloom, Each kindly deed shall live a gem divine, And our best idols find a doleful shrine.

Our pious prayers change to sweet harmony, And for our fetters—soul forever free! Hope on. Have courage, knowing God is just. Our spirits rise beyond this clinging dust.

And wonder such could fret them for an hour! Have faith, and claim your heritage of power. Though trials, woes and shipwreck life mars We rise at last—"through struggle to the stars!"

A MAN-MADE WORK.

A Jewish Rabbi's View of the Bible.

Babbi Samuel Hirschberg, at the Temple Emanuel El, in Milwaukee, in speaking of the Bible, is reported to have said: "It is unquestionably the work of a number of literary men written at different times. It is a progressive work and the moral and ethical in the work and the narrative part is more primitive than that prompted by the thought of a more advanced age. I do not doubt that there are parts of it which come direct from Moses but the evidence is strong that it was written by many authors."

It is a man-made work. True, it is inspired just as all truth is inspired. But only that part of it which is true can claim inspiration and there is equal inspiration in truth outside of the bible.

The utterance of such sentiments by such a man is conclusive evidence that the religious world is progressing in a very satisfactory manner. When the bible is read in the light of common sense, it becomes a book of great value to the world. With the history, biography, poetry and philosophy, it is a formation of the religions of the various tribes and peoples to which reference is made in its pages. Besides, it shows pretty clearly how much the world had, at those periods, advanced from a state of savagery. But who were the authors? It is asking too much. We have no evidence whatever, except the poorest kind of hearsay testimony, from extremely doubtful human sources, that the bible is the inspired word of God. We know nothing of the authors of the bible, except the inspiration of the bible, except what poor, weak, fallible, superstitious men have told us.

The Rabbi is entirely right when he says that there is just as much inspiration in the truth which is found outside of the bible, as there is in the truth which is found inside of the bible. The inspiration has been confined to no particular book, nationality, age or belief. It was in the beginning, and will continue forever. Of course, as mankind become more proficient in their knowledge of the contents and better understood, our relations to that power will become more intimate. There is really nothing in the entire bible which shows any high order of inspiration. Its authors must have looked through a glass darkly and it must have been a very dark glass.

If we want to get a conception of Infinite Power, let us upon a clear night go out and look up into the starry, gleeful heavens, and contemplate the vast universe which surrounds us. And while the countless millions of suns, planets and satellites revolve in their orbits, let us sing together, certainly they will harmoniously travel in their several orbits, giving reliable and continuous evidence of the goodness and greatness of that Power.

Look out upon the woodlands and the plains, upon the lakes and the rivers, upon the oceans and the continents of the surface of the earth, and behold the matchless beauty and grandeur of the works of creative power. There is beauty and excellence everywhere to the incarnate soul which is in rapport with the soul of the universe.

Ponder upon Infinite Power when surrounded with the golden sunshine, or the fearful glory of the storm. Witness it in the opening of the petals of the flower, or in the upheaving of a continent. Let us meditate upon the power, as made manifest to us through all of its vast manifestation, and feel as we must feel, that we are in the hands of an overruling Providence that has had a grand purpose in the creation of man as well as everything else which constitutes the boundless universe.

The omnipotence and all-wise language of this power needs no translator in order to communicate with the sensitive and responsive soul. It speaks in tones which cannot be misunderstood, that life in its multifarious forms has been given for a wise and glorious purpose; and that the glorious death of the individual will ever continue in the line of progress. Such an Infinite Power is worthy of our most profound worship. It gives us a more exalted idea of our own being and makes us willingly bear the tribulations which we are compelled to bear in our pilgrimage here upon this earth.

We are not in need of ancient inspiration to teach us the greatness, goodness and wisdom of Infinite Power. That inspiration comes to us every moment that we live. It is continuous, consistent and convincing. To the appreciative soul it is all and all.

The world in a religious point of view, is rapidly moving on to much higher ideals than it has had in the past. The fetters of ignorance and intolerance are being broken and the incarnate soul is being released from the cruel bondage of superstition. And religious freedom will not be complete, until the acceptance of the glorious philosophy of Spiritualism by the children of men.

CARL C. POPE.

THE REASON IS GIVEN.

Why Carl Schurz Left Rome.

In his "Reminiscence of a Long Life," being published in McClure's Magazine, Carl Schurz tells why he left the papal church—being born in that religion. He says:

"What was most repugnant to me was the claim of the church to be not merely the only true church, but also the only saving one, and that there was absolutely no hope of salvation outside of its pale, but only damnation and eternal hell fire. That Socrates and Plato, that all the virtuous men, among the heathen, that even my old friend, Jew Aaron, nay, that even the newborn babe, if it happened to die unbaptized, must forever burn in unquenchable fire—yes, that I, too, were I so much as to harbor the slightest doubt concerning their terrible fate, must also be cast among the eternally lost—against such ideas rebelled not only my reason, but my innermost instinct of justice. These teachings seemed to me so directly to contradict the most essential attributes of the all-just deity, that they only served to make me suspicious of all other tenets of the creed."

A MODERN SEERESS.

In Whom the Prophetic Gift is Remarkably Developed.

An interesting account has just been published, in German, of the visions and trance utterances of a remarkable medium, and in a book written by her and entitled "My Spiritual Vision into the Future."

These visions include several relating to public events which have already been realized, and others which have not yet come to pass. Among the former are predictions of the return and liberation of Dreyfus, the burning of ocean liners in New York harbor, a colliery disaster in Bohemia, and the eruption at Martinique. Other predictions, not yet verified, are: A disastrous storm and high tide at Swinemunde, on the Baltic, the destruction of Labach by an earthquake, the fall of a railway bridge at Glasgow, an accident to a train between Cassel and Cosen, the discovery of a wonderful curative spring at Berlin, future attempts to reach the North Pole by balloons and airships, the crossing of the Atlantic in three days and a night (about 1950) in one day, by airships moved and lighted by electricity, and other forecasts of future discoveries.

Some of the predictions will be received with great satisfaction in Germany, for that country is playing the prominent part in the future history. It will become three and a half times its present size, and the Kaiser of that day (a Hohenzollern) will reside in Rome. There will again be three German Emperors in one year, as in 1888; the seeress had already predicted in 1888 that both the Emperor William I and his son would die in 1888. Among other predictions of a less definite nature are a general war, followed by universal peace and by the union of nations. There is to be a world-reformer, another King at Jerusalem, and a new era of earthly happiness.

These prophecies are mostly given from notes of her descriptions of visions during trance; that is to say, she would speak while entranced, and describe in an ejaculatory manner what she saw. The account given by Frau Gertrude of her own life is simple, unaffected and interesting. Her mother, who died when she herself was about eleven years old, seems to have had a prophetic gift, for she described her own funeral. The mother's form was seen by the medium when she was eighteen, and she saw a scene not unfrequently had visions of persons, or of events about to happen. At one time she saw herself walking in a pouring rain, along a street (not then built) of a town two hundred miles away; this came true fourteen years later.

In 1895 she attended a séance for the first time, and was suddenly controlled usually by spirits of a high order, but for a short time she was occasionally influenced by those of a lower grade; this experience was not without its value, as it convinced her that the personalities manifesting were really distinct individuals.

At the approach of the trance condition she can usually see and describe spirit forms while normally conscious; then as she passes into the next phase she is unable to remember afterwards the scenes she has described. There is also a state of trance in which prophecies are uttered through her organs of speech, or are described as visions. Medical advice has also been given through her mediumship.

The explanation she gives is that in trance her higher or transcendent consciousness wanders through space, in symbolic form and in a limited degree, that which it has been able to perceive. She has also had visions of the spirit forms of living persons.

A curious experience is related, showing that a pigeon was in the room, and that it was suddenly controlled by a spirit form which was visible to the medium, and presumably also to the pigeon.

THE DAY THAT FATHER DIED.

We've had our share of trials, dear, And somehow lived it through; For blackest midnight darkness must Give place to sliver of day.

But I think that never sorrow Was to our hearts allied, So closely as that day, Richard, The day that father died.

It was the Sabbath, and all day The snow came slowly down; Weaving a warm, soft rain for us, The branches bare and brown.

You sat beside that aged form, With fatherly, trembling hands, and gave place to sliver of day. Though not unknown, it seemed as if You ne'er before knew death.

No prayer burst from those pallid lips, No pious fragments fell; He knew the hand that led us here, Could lead elsewhere as well.

And dumb to sense, life's later years, Its care, and joy, and woe; You were to him the little boy, He loved so long ago.

Ah! Richard, could I but have gazed Once more upon that face, Ere in the glad, sweet summer land, He found a better place.

It seems as if I almost knew, Through many miles away, A strange, deep sadness filled my soul, I wept with you that day.

Within the peaceful churchyard fair, They laid him low to rest, Beside the one whose loving care, For him was dearest, best.

Not far away across the hills Their first new home was made; And there you roamed a happy child, Beneath the maple's shade.

Dear Richard, no one knew like him, How thick the shadows lay, Upon our lives, and yet so oft Foretold a brighter way.

And when my sad heart aches anew, With bitter, wild unrest, Again I

That Startling Fact Again.

Readers of The Progressive Thinker desire more information regarding the discovery mentioned in these columns September 23, wherein it was stated in substance: "Learned critics have found some 600 old French words in the original Greek of the Pauline Epistles."

Mrs. Straub is correct in showing that the "old French" is really a modern language, a conglomerate of other tongues, as is our English. But the fact remains that the original Greek of the Pauline Epistles is interspersed with French words Grecianized, and used to supply the want of terms to express ideas, for which the writer seemed to have been unable to find a proper Greek equivalent.

It is well known the New Testament, in its Greek costume, cannot be read intelligibly by a merely classical Greek scholar without extraneous aid, it is so intermingled with other tongues. This was formerly explained on the hypothesis that it was written at Alexandria, in Egypt, where the Greek had been badly corrupted, without suspicion that modern languages had been drawn upon to produce the impurity.

Learned scholars have maintained the geography of the New Testament betrays the fact that it was written since the so-called Crusades, in the 12th century. Others have insisted the collection of booklets had no existence prior to the beginning of the 15th century. They claim the work was the production of cloistered monks, in various monasteries, and that every earlier reference to the Gospels, or the Epistles, was a priestly forgery. Even the General Councils, as that of Nice, and that of Laodicea, etc., are believed to have had no other than a purely ecclesiastical origin. The Council of Trent, convened in 1545, to thwart the Protestant Reformation led by Luther, declared what books were canonical: Had this task been performed in earlier centuries, why repeated at Trent?

Martin Luther, born in 1483, never saw a New Testament until he was twenty-one years of age, though he was educated for the priesthood. This shows the book was not generally accessible until after 1504. The account of earlier translations, and of printed copies being in existence long before are ruses to mislead.

Until within recent years the Roman Catholics interdicted the reading of the New Testament, one of their clergy at least, declaring in his pulpit: "We know how the book was written, and do not wish to place it in the hands of the people to lead them to destruction."

Some scholars claim the New Testament was originally written in Latin, and was first translated into bastard Greek with the revival of learning. This seems plausible, and will account for the French words in the Epistles both before and after the Council of Trent. In 1538, translated the Latin Vulgate into Greek. Why did she do this if a Greek copy was already extant?

The Pauline Epistles are older than the Gospels, whether canonical or apocryphal. Many believe all of them were attempts of monks to make real the character Paul is alleged to have seen in his vision when represented as a man of letters. Certain it is, each Gospel writer drew on his imagination to round out the character Jesus which Paul first described, only agreeing in narrations first made by Paul, all else is discrepant.

The Progressive Thinker does not purpose to raise an issue on this question, being content to state the facts as the author knows them.

Just as we concluded this article a letter from what known "literary detective," as Col. Ingersoll designated Wm. Henry Burr, Esq., of Washington, came to hand, in which he wrote:

"The Rev. John Black, in 1822, found many professed Greek words in the Gospels which were derived from the Latin. The monkish writers had not yet mastered the Greek."

This raises another question: Was the College of Sorbonne, at Paris, contributor to this great ecclesiastical fraud?

Egyptian Thought Reflected in Christianity.

While reviewing the Gods and Devils of ancient systems of religion from which the Christian system was derived, it may be well to direct attention to the Egyptian, as related by Rev. Geo. Rawlinson, for twenty-one years professor of ancient history in Oxford University, as given by him in "The Religions of the Ancient World," from which we copy, slightly abridging, but adding nothing. We commence at page 26 in the edition before us, omitting less important features as we advance:

"The external manifestation of religion in Egypt was magnificent and splendid. Nowhere did religious ceremonial occupy a larger part in the life of a people. In each city and town, one or more grand structures appeared themselves above the rest of the buildings, enriched with all that Egyptian art could supply of painted and sculptured decoration, dedicated to the honor and bearing the name of some divinity. The image of the great God of the place occupied the central shrine, accompanied in most instances by two or three contemplative gods or goddesses. Around were the chambers of the priests, and further off, court after court, some pillared, some colonnaded, and all more or less adorned with sculpture and painting, the entrance to them lying through long avenues of sphinxes or obelisks, which conducted to the propylaea, two gigantic towers flanking the doorway. A perpetual ceremonial of the richest kind went on within the temple walls; scores of priests, with shaven heads and clean white linen garments, crowded the courts and corridors; long processions made their way up or down the sphinx avenues; incense floated in the air; strains of music resounded without pause; hundreds of victims were sacrificed; everywhere a holiday crowd, in bright array, cheerful and happy, bore its part in the festival, and made the courts resound with their joyous acclamations. The worship was conducted by means of rhythmic litanies or hymns, in which prayer and praise were blended, the latter predominating. Ceremony followed ceremony. The calendar was crowded with festivals, and a week rarely passed without the performance of some special rite, some annual observance, having its own peculiar attractions."

The reader, if not otherwise instructed, had sphinxes, gods and goddesses, and victims for sacrifice been omitted, would have supposed some great Catholic Cathedral, with its music, priests and litanies were being described. The harmony is more complete in view of the fact, the lesser gods and goddesses, of Egypt and Rome were converted into saints in the Christian system, to appear as such in the Roman calendar. But we continue this terrible tale-telling quotation:

"Belief in a future life was a main principle of the Egyptian religion. * * * With their belief in a future life, and their opinions regarding the fate of good and bad souls, were bound up in the closest way their arrangements with respect to dead bodies, and their careful and elaborate preparation of tombs. * * * The thought of death, of judgment, of a sentence to happiness or misery according to the life led on earth, was familiar to the ordinary Egyptian. His theological notions were confused and fantastical; but he had a strong and abiding conviction that his fate after death would depend on his conduct during his life on earth, and especially on his observance of the moral law and performance of his various duties."

Then Prof. Rawlinson quotes with approval from Birch's "Egypt from the Earliest Times":

"The Egyptian enjoyed all the pleasures of existence, and delighted more in the arts of peace than war. In his religious belief the idea of a future state, * * * was ever present to his mind, and his long life was one preparation for death—to be devoted, or pious to the gods, obedient to the wishes of his sovereign, affectionate toward his wife and children, were the maxims inculcated for his domestic or inner life. Beyond that circle his duties to mankind were comprised in giving bread to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, aid to the weak and old, and the like. On his exercise of good works he rested his hopes of passing the ordeal of the future and great judgment, and reaching the Elysian fields, and Pools of Peace of the Egyptian paradise."

Passing the quotation which Prof. R. made from Birch, we have his own words again:

"Below the popular mythology there lay concealed from general view, but open to the educated, a theological system which was not far removed from 'natural theology.' The real essential unity of the divine nature was taught and insisted on. The sacred texts spoke of a single being, the sole producer of all things in heaven and earth, himself not produced by any; 'the only true living God, self-originated,' who exists from the beginning, 'who has made all things, but was not himself made.' This being seems never to have been represented by any material, even in symbolic form. It is thought he had no name, or if he had it must have been a name to pronounce or write it. Even Ammon, the 'concealed God,' was a mere external shadow of this mysterious and unapproachable deity. He was a pure spirit, perfect in every respect, all wise, all mighty, supremely, perfectly good."

It must be apparent to the reader it was not this God the Jews carried out of Egypt with them; but it was that inferior god who had a tent constructed to live in, and a box in which to be secured. Again Prof. Rawlinson:

"Those who grasped this great truth understood clearly the many gods of the popular mythology were mere names, personified attributes of the one true Deity, or parts of the nature he had created, considered as informed and inspired by him. * * * No educated priest certainly, probably no educated layman, conceived of the popular gods as really separate and distinct beings."

Passing Prof. R.'s narration about the murder of Osiris by his brother Typhon, and of the latter's bad odor in consequence, we come to his lame attempt to controvert the statement of "the learned Cudworth of the 17th century," who asserted the Egyptians held to a Trinity of Gods to which may be traced the origin of Trinitarianism. He says Mosheim disproved Cudworth's position. But later authors who have given special attention to the subject, confirm Cudworth's statement. This article is already too long, else we could cite several authors on the subject. It would be quite too much to expect an ecclesiastical occupying the responsible position in the English church filled by Prof. R., to surrender the whole system of Christianity and its origin to Egyptian gods.

The dove and cross figure largely in the old Egyptian literature, as appear on monuments, and in mural inscriptions. And here we find the idea of the "second birth," as also salvation by faith in Osiris, and in his resurrection. Some scholars can do humanity no greater service than to compile from the abundance of Egyptian literature now extant, a voluminous work on Egyptian thought and religion reflected in Christianity. Churchmen would stand aghast at the exact resemblances in the two systems. The probability is, the faith of the Nile was transported to Rome during or soon after the reign of the Ptolemies, and, with some additions from the Grecian cult, it was somewhat remodeled, to reappear as Roman Catholicism. But few changes were needed to adapt the old religion so as to represent the new, the most prominent of which, as already mentioned, was to canonize the minor gods, and transfer them to the calendar of saints.

About the Koran.

The Koran, of Mohammed is a work concerning which little is specifically known by English speaking people in general, although it comprises the sacred scriptures accepted and believed by the millions of Mohammedan people of the earth.

Perhaps no account ever written contains more information, in so brief a space about the Koran, than the following:

In Arabic the word "Koran" means "that which ought to be read." The Koran is divided into 114 chapters called suras, a word meaning really "row," "order," "series." In manuscripts these chapters are not numbered, but bear titles, sometimes derived from the subject matter, but usually from the first important work.

Some chapters have two or more names because of differences in the manuscripts followed. Each chapter is divided into smaller portions, called verses by non-Moslems, but in Arabic known as "ayat," signs or wonders. The entire book again is divided into sixty equal portions, called "ahzab," each subdivided into four equal parts; or into thirty parts called "ajza," each consisting of two "ahzab," and again divided into four. All the chapters except the ninth begin with the bismillah: "In the name of the most merciful God."

Twenty-nine begin with certain letters of the alphabet, which are believed to be the peculiar marks of the Koran and to conceal several profound mysteries, the understanding of which, the more intelligent confess, has not been communicated to any mortal, their prophet only excepted.

According to Moslem tradition, the Archangel Gabriel paid 24,000 visits to earth, while revealing to Mohammed the wishes of the Creator. Some few chapters were delivered entire, but the greater part was revealed piecemeal and written down at the prophet's dictation by Zaid, his secretary. The first revelation, it is generally agreed, came in the first five verses of the nineteenth sura. After the passages had been written down they were published to the prophet's followers, several of whom took copies, while most learned them by heart, and the originals were then placed in a chest, in no particular order. For this reason it is uncertain when many of the passages were revealed.

Abu Bekr, Mohammed's first successor, collected the originals, which were on plain leaves and skins and had copies made by Zaid from the dictation of those who had committed the passages to memory; he further placed the suras in the order still followed, putting the longest at the head of the book.

The Koran compiled in the Qur'anic dialect and suppressed the versions made by Abu Bekr.

Ritualism.

Rev. Dr. Dillingham, vicar of Hexton, England, is making a vigorous effort to get rid of ritualism in the Church of England. In a late address he said:

"It should be known, every person in the Protestant Episcopal church, at his consecration, TAKES AN OATH to preserve the church along the lines it was founded."

That church was founded along the lines of Roman Catholicism. Its supremacy was transferred from the Pope, at Rome, to the reigning King in England. Its ritual, in Latin, was translated into English. These are cardinal features which distinguish the two sects. Each member surrenders his right to private judgment to the church, and voluntarily, by oath, becomes a slave for life.

Struggle as they may to revise, amend, or abrogate that ritual, they are met with that oath and are silenced. Creeds and rituals are but the warp and the woof of the same web, and are difficult to separate.

The Progressive Thinker

on a Great Tidal Wave.

The Curtain Soon to Rise on the Dark Cabinet and Its Contents.

Never before in the whole history of Spiritualism has there been such an upheaval in our ranks as now. Never before has the attention of Spiritualists been directed towards The Progressive Thinker to such a great extent as at present. They look to it as the great exponent of a living vital truth. They know it is the only Spiritualist paper on earth today that dares lift the curtain on the frauds that infest our ranks, and show our people the difference between Legerdemain Spiritualism and that which is genuine. From the North, South, East and West subscriptions are pouring in, and from all sides comes the cry: "Give us light on the dark cabinet with its artificial toggery, its legerdemain, its lightning change artist, its ghostly wigs, beards, illuminated gowns, etc."

That is just what we propose to do. So send in your subscriptions at once. The Tidal Wave is on. Keep it in the ascendancy. TRUTH PROMOTES a cause; ERROR INJURES it, or totally destroys it. One Brother living at Ft. Worth, Texas, sends in one hundred and eighty yearly subscribers; another, H. E. Russeque of Hartford, Ct., sends eight; others too numerous to mention, send in from two to five, and all combined make a vital Tidal Wave. Remember, the Curtain is SOON TO RISE on the Dark Cabinet, disclosing its contents, whether of truth or falsehood.

The Curtain Will Soon Rise

On a New Scene.

Can You, Spirit or Mortal, Supply All the Omissions?

Your attention is invited to the following: Your intuition may enable you to supply the omissions. We, however, will supply the same when the Curtain Rises, which will be in the course of two or three weeks, and then you will see a vibration all along the line as never before:

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at _____ some time ago. A short time before Christmas the [giving name] cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. One lady got her a nice white hat; another made her a white dress; another provided her with a pair of white shoes; another with a pair of white stockings; and others with scarf, fan and doll. These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the cabinet. When inquiry was made, the spirit said she took them to her _____ photographer, to take her photograph while entranced in the cabinet in the dark. She seated herself in the cabinet, the camera pulled a little to one side, the camera placed in position, the room made dark, and the photograph was taken. To one end in front of _____ stands _____ the spirit messenger, clothed in her Christmas presents of earthly clothing.

A few weeks after Christmas, _____ who is a materializing medium, requested _____ who is a spirit

I send you the photograph; also a photograph of myself and spirit wife and son, and also one of myself and spirit _____ who controls the materialization, and the face and head of _____ and others, supposed to be relatives whom I do not recognize.

This demonstration proves to me that spirits can be photographed and that they can take solid to their spirit homes.

Dean Clarke.

Many of our readers will be pained to learn that this veteran worker, whose arms and hands for five years have been crippled with what is commonly known as "shaking palsy," by a recent accident has greatly added to his misfortunes an inguinal hernia on the right side. This has increased his nervous debility till he is much more helpless than before. He is now in the hospital, New Dorchester, Mass. Send him sympathy and good cheer.

Life Here and Hereafter.

Most Spiritualists would say that Dr. Poleson, H. Swift, pastor of the Austin Methodist Episcopal church, preached pretty good Spiritualist ideas in a recent sermon on the theme, "The Life of the Eternal World—What Does It Mean to Be Saved or Lost?" In part he said:

"Our former discussions have established the fact that the ego is a spiritual personality, sustaining the same relation to the body that the harp sustains to the harp, as Dr. John Fiske has shown in his discussion of the correlation of forces. This, taken with other conclusions reached, shows that the soul is not touched by the catastrophe that we call death."

"Death does not end all. The soul survives because it is a spiritual entity. That means that the life of the eternal world will be a continuation of the life here. We shall be ten minutes after death what we were ten minutes before death. We shall have after death all the powers of thought, memory, reason, judgment and love that we have before death. Immortality means the perpetuation of personal identity. We are not able to get away from our past here and we shall not be able to get away from our past, over yonder."

The Young Men's Christian Association of Pittsburgh has closed its doors against actors as members. They fear contamination, and possibly the awakening of an ambition among their members for the stage. It is said the Association in other cities give a cordial welcome to actors, feeling they are benefited. It is a pleasure to note the fact that Rev. Dr. Young, a Presbyterian clergyman of the Smoky City, M. C. A. because he is such, to join his church circle, where he will be welcome. We love to record such evidence of a liberal mind on the part of the clergy. It betokens a man better than his narrow creed.

The More Burned the Better.

Rev. M. W. Stryker, president of Hamilton College, Binghamton, N. Y., in a late sermon gave it as his opinion there are too many churches in this country. He maintained it would be better if many of them were burned, and suggested 5,000 could be disposed of advantageously in that way. Of course the dominion would suppress an equal number of reverends to match the destruction of the pulpits.

The Progressive Thinker is of the opinion 100,000 churches could be destroyed without prejudice to good morals, and the same number of sky-pilots could be profitably discredited, and compelled to labor for support in fields of productive industry.

He Is Simply Ignorant.

OUR CHILDREN IN THE BEYOND.

Illustrating Their Great Happiness and Pleasure, as Expressed in Light, London.

I am deeply interested in the subject of communications from children on the other side to their friends here, because for four years I have been getting messages from my little son of twelve, and his chief characteristic is their simple childishness, while they give striking evidence that the life of children in the Beyond is in all material respect, precisely like ours here.

My little son freely and joyously describes the pretty house he lives in, his pony, his canary—which requires no cruel cage, but, as he says, 'sits on my head or shoulder and sings, or else flies behind me,'—his school, the church he attends, his cricket and other games; the beautiful river on which he has his own little boat (named after a brother), his pleasures, picnics, and companions—several of whom I had never heard of until he told me where they lived and passed over, after which I had the registers officially examined, and found his statements about them were all correct—the mountain he often climbs with a friend, the view from it, and the christening of it "after mother."

He speaks also of the clothes he wears as being exactly like those of a boy of twelve would wear here, and was much amused at my disappointment on hearing that he was not robed in a white tunic, bordered with silver, and a wreath upon his curls! His naïve reply, "Why, mother, think how all the other boys would laugh at me!" was a revelation, showing that the conditions on the other side are practically identical with those here, even to such little trials (no doubt necessary to children's and grown-ups' development there as here) of being quizzed and laughed at!

He has also shown me, and it was a shock at first, that sorrow, as a purifier, is not unknown over there. His description of his intense grief at first finding himself parted from me, and his passionate childish remorse at every little hasty word of grief he had ever given me, are both beautiful and pathetic. A lovely being whom he calls "Love," and sometimes "my teacher," he describes as having gradually brought him comfort, whilst she promised him, for a year, that I should "talk to him again" ere long—a promise richly fulfilled; and he now says he is so happy that he would not return, as he wished to do at first.

I could fill many pages thus, the communication between us being now practically perfect and the happiness of my life. I only wish to add for the guidance of other parents, that his deepest grief was my grief. For over a year he never failed to ask me at the close of each conversation, "Mother, tell me—are you glad yet that God called me here?" It was a long time before I could answer, "Yes, for your sake I am." The day I made that reply his little heart seemed overflowing with joy, and he wrote, "You have today put the crown on my happiness."

I should be glad if you would publish letters from any other parents who have had like communications. Surely, if such is the simple, consoling, natural life of our children in the Beyond, it should be known. It was to me an awful thought once, that my happy, romping little boy had suddenly become an angel, forced to stand by my side, and I venture to believe that many another mother will sympathize with me. Small wonder that the "human boy" upon this side has no desire for the heaven which is, apparently, to cut him off from every boy-pleasure he now loves! Would it not be wiser to so instruct our children that they should look forward to the new world with pleasure, instead of with a perfectly natural distaste, shaded allow me to say) by far wiser and older folks than they?

I fancy there are hundreds who, in their hearts, have felt a thrill of amused sympathy with the little girl who said to her mother, at the end of an interminable Sunday of prayers and hymns, which she was told was just how her mother in heaven would be spent. Oh, mother, when I die and go to heaven, if I'm very good all the week, will I be allowed to go on Saturday afternoons and play with the little devils?"

There is nothing in this naïve remark to shock anyone. To the sensible and thinking mind it can only convey one feeling—that there is something terribly wrong in our religious teaching to children. I do not doubt it. I would say read "Gates Ajar"—that beautiful, daring little book published many years ago, when the world was hardly ready for it.

Is there anything wicked in a child enjoying its simple pleasures and speaking of them? If that life is so natural the quicker we learn to know it the better. There are many folks who have said to me, "Oh, if I thought it was like that I would live differently and look forward to going there."

That it is not yet given to us all to find our happiness beyond in praising God with hurls, is surely no sign that we are lost souls! Someone said: "You can praise God by making a pudding of sweeping a floor clean, better, often than by hours in church." Why, then, should the simple shedding of an outer shell alter us one iota? It is not our bodies that think, and feel, and love, and enjoy—it is ourselves: so nothing can be altered till we ourselves alter. That a heaven somewhat resembling the one preached in our pulpits, and taught in our Sunday schools, does exist for those who have arrived at that state of perfection which demands joys we could not at present conceive or appreciate, I feel certain. But if we look around at our relations, acquaintances, and, above all, our children, we shall, I think, be justified in asking: Who is ready for that far-off Nirvana where all self is lost and merged into God, and where the soul, "like the dewdrop," to use Sir Edwin Arnold's beautiful words, "slips into the shining sea?"

THE PROPHECY FULFILLED.

Four Sisters Lie Dead After One Makes Prophecy.

Florentine Meuret, a spinster, aged sixty-three, was the only daughter in a family of seven daughters, and for years claimed possession of a mysterious power of clairvoyance that gave her the standing of a prophetess with her three aged sisters with whom she lived in a humble little frame cottage at 425 Chestnut street.

For years the four sisters had prayed that they might die together. Florentine predicted their death, recently. One week ago one sister passed away. To-day the bodies of the other sisters, lying side by side in three coffins in the parlor of the humble cottage near the lake, seem to be evidence that the prediction of the prophetess was come true.

Two weeks ago Florentine gave the solemn prediction that she and her three sisters would die soon at the same time. Four days later Jane, a sister spinster, aged sixty-nine, fell ill of pneumonia. She died last Thursday night and was buried last Saturday.

Florentine and the other sisters, Madeline, widow of a man named Quiloz, aged 70, and Marian, a spinster, aged 72, began to pine away and all three soon fell ill of pneumonia.

Madeline died at 8 o'clock Tuesday morning. Christmas was her birthday. At 5 o'clock Tuesday afternoon Florentine died without knowing of the death of Madeline. Marian, who was quite feeble, died at 1 o'clock yesterday morning, not knowing that Madeline and Florentine were no longer living.

Another sister Genevieve, aged 78, who is blind, is dying in Kossuth county, Iowa. Margaret, another sister, is old and feeble, and not expected to live long at her home in Ohio. These two married two brothers named Dieter—Chicago Examiner.

PRESENTMENTS IN ANIMALS.

A Japanese Dog Knew When His Master Passed to Spirit Life.

The Revue Spirituelle contains some instances, furnished by Baron Joseph de Kromhelf, of presentments felt by animals. Among these, one relates to the death of William Tell, a Swiss hero, in 1901, which was immediately known to his Newfoundland dog, at his home some miles away. On the occasion of the eruption of Mont Pelee, in Martinique, the cattle were in a state of agitation two weeks before the catastrophe, the snakes left the mountain, and the birds ceased to sing.

M. de Kromhelf gives an instance known to himself, in which an officer, before leaving for the Japanese war, confided his dog to a brother officer, who was to retain it in case of his death. Three months afterwards, without apparent cause, the dog began howl fearfully, and would not be reassured. The day and hour were carefully noted, in the belief that it was an evil omen. News was afterwards received that the dog's late owner had been killed in a skirmish on the very day on which the dog began to howl.

Another incident, also from the writer's own locality, related to a priest of the Greek church, who had given his little grand-daughter, aged six, a heifer for a Christmas present. This animal for a little while had been under his governance on their walks, like a dog. When the child fell ill, and had to take to her bed, the heifer began to low day and night without ceasing, refusing all food, and visibly wasting away. No reason for this could be discovered, but the animal died on the day following the interment of its young mistress, and the interment was found lying on the floor of the room in which she had died.

Reference is also made, in the same review, to cases in which the forms of animals, recently passed away, have been seen by their former owners, either in another part of the house or in a foreign country.—Light, London.

SPIRITS AS SLEUTHS.

Berlin Police Use Mediums in Difficult Cases—Trance Reveals Abductor and Missing Girl.

Berlin, Dec. 23.—The Berlin police are certainly not bigoted. They avail themselves of every scientific novelty and have no objection even to occultism if it serves their purpose. Dr. Egbert Muller says they are in close touch with Spiritualists and when any great crime is committed where no clew to the perpetrator is discoverable recourse is had to Spiritualists. Leaders of the sect are visited, negotiations begun for the services of a good clairvoyant, woman preferred, and a seance is arranged. The detectives in charge of the case, together with the police psychologists, listen to the utterances of the medium, all of which are carefully noted down and every indication given at the seance is vigorously followed.

A former director of the Berlin detective department, Dr. Von Meer-scheidt, had an important case recently in which a woman had been murdered under mysterious circumstances. The medium employed could only say that if the dead women were asked she could tell all about it.

Afraid of Public Ridicule.

Meerscheidt construed this into a command to hold a seance at the grave of the murdered woman and would have carried through this strange procedure had he not been afraid of public ridicule.

Success has not attended the police efforts to exact information from mediums except in one case; a girl had unaccountably disappeared from one of the most respectable quarters of Berlin and the disreputable had recourse to a medium, a nervous anaemic woman, who saw in a trance the abduction of the missing girl and described minutely the place where she was detained. She further described the person implicated as a fair-haired man with a red cravat.

Men with red cravats had a bad time for a few days, but finally the criminal was discovered. He actually wore a red cravat at the time he carried off the girl. When the girl was discovered her place of concealment corresponded to the place described by the medium. This case convinced the police there was something in clairvoyance.—Special Telegram to the Chicago Chronicle.

ANGEL WHISPERS.

Carrying Messages of Love to Those Who Passed On Before.

"As the last rays of the setting sun were shedding their golden radiance through the room, with a last loving look of farewell to those he was leaving, and on his countenance a rapturous welcome to his heavenly attendants, he said, 'the angels are whispering for me to come,' and was borne away to that city whose gates are never closed."

"The angels are whispering to him. Look, George, how sweetly he smiles in his sleep. You say the old saying is true, that when a baby smiles in its sleep, the angels are whispering to it? I am sure it can be only good angels, and good thoughts that they would whisper to our baby. He is such a dear. Is not God good to give us such a treasure?"

"Think him good for giving me two treasures, with a fond smile at the wife and mother as she hung over the cradle of her first born."

And truly, any child, if they could realize where their lot in life was cast, would have been glad to have been placed in such a comfortable and harmonious home, and with such loving parents as George Kendall and his young wife.

Little Robert was a fine child, and had entwined himself very closely about the hearts of his parents during the few months of his existence, and as he grew older he developed traits that rendered him an object of interest to those outside of the family circle. He was pronounced a remarkably interesting child by everyone who saw him. Among the little infantile graces that he exhibited was the habit of cooing and apparently playing with some one while lying awake in his cradle. Frequently his mother would hear him, and hastening to his side, would find him with eyes sparkling and hands outstretched, talking in baby language to some one invisible to the mother. In almost a frenzy of fear, she would snatch him to her arms; "It seems so uncanny," she would say in relating it to her husband. "I declare, I looked before I thought to see who he was talking with. When I learned to talk, he was often heard talking with himself, apparently as well satisfied as though he received an answer."

The hearts of his parents were bound up in him, no other child coming to them to share their love. The mother especially, was inclined to love him much, she would have shielded him from all contact with everything unpleasant, if possible. The idea of death and all pertaining to it being repugnant to her, she resolved that he should be kept in ignorance of the fact that death came to each and all, as long as possible, so that he was about four years old before the idea of death ever found lodgment in his mind.

At that time a young cousin accompanied by his mother, came to visit them, and during the visit was taken sick and died. When it was found there were no hopes of the child's recovery, the first thought of Mrs. Kendall was, that Robert must be kept from all knowledge of the sad fate of his cousin, and he was instructed to see that he did not hear the sick room; but in some way he escaped from the girl and found his way to the room where his little cousin lay dying. The group around the bedside, intent on watching the little sufferer, did not notice him, and, knowing he would be quiet, until just as the weeping mother laid her boy's lifeless form back on the bed, Robert exclaimed, "good-bye, Willie, good-bye," and rushing to his astonished mother, he excitedly asked, "where is Willie going with the lady, and with his nightgown on? Why didn't he get dressed?"

Hurriedly the mother hid him from the room, and questioned him as to what he meant, when he declared that "Willie got right out of bed, and a beautiful lady with a splendid white dress on, took him by the hand, and they went straight up, Mamma, they surely did, and Willie waved his hand to me and said 'good-bye,' and I said 'good-bye.' Where did he go, Mamma?"

The mother, thinking that he would have to become acquainted with death sometime, tried as gently as possible, to explain that Willie had gone to heaven, and he would never see him again, but he could not understand it at all.

"Why can't he come back?" He'll want to see us and play with me, and he will come back, I know he will."

He was not allowed to see the dead body of his cousin before it was taken to his home for burial, but one day, a few weeks later, he came in from play exclaiming, "Mamma, Mamma, Willie has come back; he played with me a little, but he couldn't stop long, he had to go to his mamma."

In vain his mother tried to make him understand that when one had gone to heaven they could not come back; he knew that Willie had come back, for he saw him and played with him.

"Why can't they come, mamma?" Does God lock the door and let them out? I shouldn't think that would be very nice of God. Don't you suppose Aunt Nellie wants to see Willie? What harm would it do for him to come back and see her? I should think God would want him to go to see her, so she wouldn't be so lonesome."

About two years later, a neighbor died, and thinking it the best way to make him realize what death was, his mother told him he might go with her to the funeral. At the close his mother took him up to look at the dead body, asking him "if he would like to see Mrs. Brown."

She had told him before they left home that Mrs. Brown was dead, and would be buried over in the cemetery, the purpose and use of which had been explained to him before, but never to his understanding. He looked, apparently unconcerned, at the silent form in the coffin, greatly to the relief of his anxious mother, who had dreaded the shock the first sight of a dead body might be to him.

"Mamma," he asked on the way home, "who was in the box?" "That was Mrs. Brown, dear."

"Why, no, mamma; Mrs. Brown was not in the box; she stood right beside of it."

"Robert," said his mother, "Mrs. Brown is dead, and her spirit has gone to heaven, and they have gone to the cemetery to bury it."

"I don't know what dead is, mamma. I don't know who was in the box; it looked some like Mrs. Brown, but it wasn't her, for while the minister was talking she was standing right beside of it. I saw her hand on his head, but when she folks went up to look in the box, she stood right up beside it, and when we came up she smiled just as she always does when I go over to her house."

Again the mother tried to explain why death was. Suddenly Robert exclaimed, "Mamma, I'll tell you what dead means. It means when you can't see them. I can see them, but you can't. Don't you suppose there is something the matter with your eyes, so you can't see them? You can't see Willie when he comes, but I can, and I can see him every day since the cars run over her, and I can see grandma when she comes, but you can't."

"How do you know it's grandma? You never saw her; she died before you came to live with us."

"I don't know how I know; maybe she told me when I was a little baby, and she rocked me to sleep, but I know she is my mamma. You know that I didn't have the toothache so bad; I couldn't go to sleep, and I tried not to cry and keep you awake, for you was tired, and grandma came and put her hand on the side of my face, and was so cool and nice, that I went right to sleep, and when I woke up in the morning my toothache was well."

"Well, my son, perhaps you can see things that I can't, but I do not know why it is that I can't see them if you do."

"You say it's heaven where they are, mamma, and perhaps it's because it's better than here, while since I came, so my eyes are better than yours. It has been so long since you came I suppose your eyes have got dull so you can't see heavenly folks; don't you suppose that's it?"

"Maybe it is; but if I were you I wouldn't tell anybody about seeing things, for if other people do not see them, they might think you was telling a wrong story."

"Well, I'm not, for I certainly see them." Mrs. Kendall was greatly troubled over the peculiarities of her boy, and frequently consulted her husband on the best method of dealing with him. "Just leave him alone," said the matter-of-fact father, "he is a little dreamy and imaginative, but he will get over it when he goes to school and associates with other children; do not talk to him about it, but try and fill his mind so full of other things that he will not be imagining things; let him play with the neighbors' children all you can; he will come out all right."

Mrs. Kendall followed her husband's advice, and busied herself with keeping his mind employed, and in a short time his school life began, and amid its excitements and enjoyments, his psychic experiences grew farther and farther apart, although they did not entirely leave him. He was quite a little later, though he early learned not to speak of the peculiar things that happened to him.

He was very popular among his schoolmates, of a cheerful, happy disposition, always ready for fun or frolic, but always kind and helpful to the unfortunate, or to those among his playmates who were afflicted, or not so well equipped for the battle of life as himself, and he could never be persuaded to do anything that he thought was wrong. Upon one occasion a few of the boys were planning an expedition to a neighboring farm to get some apples, and he refused to go.

"Just leave him alone," said the matter-of-fact father, "he is a little dreamy and imaginative, but he will get over it when he goes to school and associates with other children; do not talk to him about it, but try and fill his mind so full of other things that he will not be imagining things; let him play with the neighbors' children all you can; he will come out all right."

"Oh, it ain't stealing to take apples," said the boys; "we wouldn't take his melons or anything like that, but he's got oceans of apples, and he just as lief we had them as not."

"Well, then, let's go and ask him for them."

"It wouldn't be half the fun; come on, it's all right."

Robert wavered. It didn't look very bad to take apples, especially when Mr. Smith had so many, but he had taken but a few steps when he turned abruptly, and saying, "I'm not going; they won't let me, he started for home. The mother told her mother about it, and said that as he started to go, somebody took hold of his hand and drew him right around so that he just could not go. "I didn't see anybody, but I felt them turn me around just as plain, and I think it was grandma, but I could not see her."

You do not see so many as you used to, do you?" asked his mother.

"No, I don't. I don't know why. I suppose they have got acquainted with more folks in heaven and have more to do than when they first went, same as I have more to do now I am bigger and go to school, than I had when I was little."

As the years passed, and he grew more and more engrossed with his studies, the memory, even, of his peculiar experience seemed to fade from his mind, and when he became a man and entered upon the cares and responsibilities of business life, he rarely, if ever, thought of the spirit friends who had accompanied him through the years of his younger life. He carried with him all through his life the same spirit of integrity, right-dealing and justice that characterized him in his youth; he was always successful in his business, as well as strictly just and honorable. He married happily, and was blessed with loving and obedient children. In time he was called upon to part with his beloved parents, and also with two beautiful daughters, which was a severe blow to him. At the age of sixty, he retired from business, and prepared to spend the remaining years of his life in quietness and peace with his wife and his two remaining children, a son and daughter, both living at home and devoted to their parents.

One day, about a year after he had ceased to take any active part in business life, he was talking with an old acquaintance, who congratulated him upon being able to spend the last years of his life surrounded by such a lovely and affectionate family.

"Yes, they are all a father could wish; but there is always an ache in my heart when I think of my two beloved daughters who were taken away from me. You know it is natural to think we love best those we have lost, but I do so long for my girls, I would give anything if I could see them once more, and know it is well with them."

"Why don't you try to hear from them?" asked the friend.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that I lost a boy twenty-five years ago (just a baby) and that I can communicate with him now, and he is grown, and he assures me that he is happy and usefully employed and his life is fuller than it ever could have been here."

"Spiritualism; is there where you get it?"

"It is through Spiritualism, which I consider the greatest blessing that has ever been vouchsafed to mortals."

"Well, I could accept it, be it called Spiritualism, or by whatever name it might be called, if it would help me to hear from my dear ones that I have seen laid in the grave."

A long conversation followed upon the experience of the friend, and they parted with the assurance on the part of Mr. Kendall that he would look into the matter.

That night he found his mind filled with the new ideas that had been presented to him by his friend; he tried to read and comprehend the things that all in vain; his thoughts were continually going over the wonderful experiences he had heard, and he was conscious of a strong feeling that it was all reasonable; passage after passage of scripture occurred to him, all treating of the ministry of angels; he seemed to have no arguments to meet them; indeed he did not want any. He felt as though he had found something for which he had been looking all his life; he had thought his life was filled with all that was choicest, but now he felt as though he had missed something that might have added greatly to his happiness and usefulness. At length he retired to his bed, but he could not sleep; his mind was unnaturally active and filled with snatches of long-forgotten events. Long after his wife slept, he arose, and going to the window, drew the curtain and gazed upon the scene without, the moon flooding the spacious grounds with its soft luminosity.

"Is it possible that the spirits of our loved ones are ever around us watching over us, and we in our absorption and blindness do not heed them? How comforting to think they are not afar off from us, but near us and loving us as ever."

Soothed and quieted with the new truth which he seemed to have accepted with the trusting faith of a child, he seated himself in an easy chair and gave himself up to an ecstasy of love and longing for his spirit friends, from which he was aroused by an almost imperceptible touch upon his forehead, and to his utmost soul there came these words, "Look up and believe," and gradually before him appeared a form, bright and luminous, and instantly he recognized the form of the guardian angel of his childhood, he spoke the old familiar name "Grandma," and rolling in upon his mind in mighty waves came the memory of his old experiences. It all came back to him. He remembered how his grandma used to come to him and care for him, how he and his cousin Willie and little Nellie, and how the forms of neighbors who had died had appeared to him. It seemed as though he could remember every incident of those long ago days. One after another they passed through his mind with a vividness that startled him. So distinctly he remembered every detail of looks and dress of those angelic forms who had been the companions of his childhood.

At length, calming himself from the tumult of emotion into which he had been thrown, reason began to assert itself, and he asked himself the question, "Why, if his grandma could appear to him, might not his father and mother and his dear lost girls come as well?"

Almost before he was conscious of the thought, came the answer, "they are all here; some time you shall see them, rest now," and as the chimes of the clock told the hour of three, he sought his bed, and slept long and soundly, and a new feeling that a new life had dawned for him.

Thinking over the experiences of the past night, he knew that in response to his ardent wish, the veil between the two conditions of life had been drawn aside; he knew that the dear ones that had passed from his mortal sight were around him and loving him as ever; he received the assurance that his father and mother had become filled with the cares and responsibilities of life, before his eyes had become so accustomed to material things as to be unable to discern spiritual, he had seen them; he remembered the childish remark he had made about his mother's eyes being dimmed to spiritual things because she had been from heaven so long, and he thought, "as I am drawing nearer the close of my earthly life, and nearer the beginning of my heavenly one, my vision is becoming stronger. I am nearing the other shore, and am beginning to see the gates that await me. It is all right and all passing. I am nearing either end of the voyage of life, ought to see the beckoning hands of friends clearer than those in mid ocean, far from either shore."

It would be too long a story to relate how he explained to his wondering wife and children the revelation that had come to him, how although at first with all the ideas that had been inculcated into their minds, through respect to their father they were led to study and investigate the subject, which investigation speedily revealed to them the truth, that "the gates of heaven swung outward as well as inward."

They soon learned that they could communicate with their loved ones who had passed the portals of immortality, and they gladly availed themselves of the privilege. The whole family, guided and led by the psychically gifted husband and father, became avowed partisans of the new thought and threw all their influence toward the spread of the gospel of spirit return. From the eventful night upon which he had felt the awakening of those powers so long dormant, Mr. Kendall devoted much time to the development of the psychic sense that had always been his heritage, with the result that he became not only able to see his own friends and acquaintances, but also to see the friends of others, and to be conversant with the medium of communication through whom many of his acquaintances received convincing proof of the continued existence of those friends whom they had long mourned as dead.

Ten peaceful, happy years glided by before the white-robed angel of death came to him, but although at first with all the ideas that had been inculcated into their minds, through respect to their father they were led to study and investigate the subject, which investigation speedily revealed to them the truth, that "the gates of heaven swung outward as well as inward."

They soon learned that they could communicate with their loved ones who had passed the portals of immortality, and they gladly availed themselves of the privilege. The whole family, guided and led by the psychically gifted husband and father, became avowed partisans of the new thought and threw all their influence toward the spread of the gospel of spirit return. From the eventful night upon which he had felt the awakening of those powers so long dormant, Mr. Kendall devoted much time to the development of the psychic sense that had always been his heritage, with the result that he became not only able to see his own friends and acquaintances, but also to see the friends of others, and to be conversant with the medium of communication through whom many of his acquaintances received convincing proof of the continued existence of those friends whom they had long mourned as dead.

Ten peaceful, happy years glided by before the white-robed angel of death came to him, but although at first with all the ideas that had been inculcated into their minds, through respect to their father they were led to study and investigate the subject, which investigation speedily revealed to them the truth, that "the gates of heaven swung outward as well as inward."

ST. PAUL A FRENCHMAN.

The New Testament Not Ancient.

The late Prof. Edwin Johnson, in a paper to be read at a book published in 1892, by Rev. John Black of Scotland, in which he argued that the received text of the Greek Testament is a servile translation of an earlier Greek version, which is lost! And the Scotch author, like Bishop Marsh before him, claims that Codex Bezae, in Greek and Latin, is incomparably more respectable than the modern MSS., which were made use of by the Complutensians, or by Erasmus. He further says that Codex Bezae may be older than the Codex Vaticanus, which first came to light in 1475.

In regard to the judgment of Bishop Marsh (1757-1839), I quote as follows: "If it is asked, To which of these is preference due? answer, to the Codex Bezae, for the Codex Vaticanus has accents and marks which were added by the person who wrote the MS. itself."

To prove the postulate of the Rev. John Black that the received Greek text is a servile translation from an earlier Latin version of the New Testament, he submits a table of Greek words which are manifestly derived from the Latin.

Two or three years ago I gave a list of 31 of these words in The Progressive Thinker. "The greater number of the above words," says the author, "might have been expressed in Greek."

Prof. Edwin Johnson, in his "Pauline Epistles," says of the Codex Bezae: "It is the work of a French Benedictine, ignorant of Greek, and so poor a Latinist that in one instance, at least, he has coined a Latin word out of the French."

In answer to my inquiry about the French-Latin word, he said it was "sollicitudo," from the French "sollicit," the proper Latin word is "sollicitudo" or "curis."

In regard to the Greek of the Pauline Epistles, Prof. Johnson said in a letter heretofore quoted in The Progressive Thinker: "There are many French words Grecized in the Pauline Epistles. They are so numerous we must infer that the author of the original Greek from which the Epistles have been rendered into modern European languages was a Frenchman with an imperfect knowledge of classical Greek. To thoroughly ventilate this subject requires the services of a scholar, and I am not a scholar. I read Frenchman, whose only ambition should be to gain the truth. It will be found that modern European languages have been drawn upon, not only in the composition of the New Testament, but I find traces of them in the Septuagint sufficient to raise a doubt as to its ancient origin."

Some competent French student has performed the task, and has found about 600 Greek words in the Pauline Epistles borrowed from the old French language. This is fulfilled Prof. Johnson's affirmation that the Apostle Paul was a Frenchman.

WM. HENRY BURR.

Friends in the spirit world. He would have known it had been a long while since your wife or your son, or whoever it might be, had received a word of affection from you. I shall be glad to take any message to them you may wish to send. Don't you think it might make them happier to get a loving word from you? He jokingly told me that he was sure of a star and it seemed to light up the dark, dirty old room all around him. He smiled at Susie and said "Would you like to come with me and play in a lovely land of sunshine and flowers?"

Susie's poor little wizened face puckered up into a smile and she nodded her head, for she did not know how to say no to a real Fairy Prince. Then the Prince, who was only a little taller than Susie herself put his arm round Susie and she felt herself rising up with him through the roof and past all the black, smoky old chimney-pots. They went so fast Susie could not tell how far they had gone, but she felt herself in a green field with a lot of little boys and girls all dancing in a great circle round and round a big mound of flowers upon which a little girl about Susie's size and dressed like a queen was sitting. She had a crown of flowers on her head and all the children were singing songs to her as they danced.

"Oh, my!" cried Susie, "ain't it just scrumptious for her! What are they making her queen for?"

"Because it is her birthday," said the Fairy Prince, "and so she is queen of the day. When it is your birthday you would be the queen if you were here, you know."

"Give some of them to me; I shall see her, your wife was one of our best friends for many years; we mourned truly for her when she passed away, and I know that I shall see her; I believe she will be one to meet and welcome me when I gain the other side. She will ask for you. What message can I bring her from you?"

With tears streaming down his face, the pastor took the hand of his friend, and exclaimed, "Oh, Mr. Kendall, do you truly believe that if you meet my wife she will remember the scenes of earth life, and will want a message from me?"

"I am sure of it. I know that memory and love outlive the grave and what is called death. I know that she is waiting to receive a loving word from you."

"Oh, my dear lost Julia! If it be true, tell her how I have missed her; that I love her as of old and will be faithful to her until death. I am living in hopes of a reunion when this life is over."

"I will tell her, and shall I say more? Shall I tell her that every night before retiring to rest, you will give a few moments to silence and to thoughts of her; that in those moments you will wait for a sign of her loving, living presence?"

"I promise her and you I will do as you ask; and if from her heavenly home, she can send to me thought that I can sense, I will work and wait with renewed courage."

This is the day for which we have been waiting," he said, one beautiful, bright morning in May, as his family gathered around his bedside. "To-night I shall be in Paradise. I want no good-byes," he said, "my tears shed, the parting time will be so short. It may be years of time, but it will be but a moment of eternity."

During the day he called the names of one after another, who were waiting for him, and asked for the last messages to the spirit friends.

"Tell my girls how their mother longs to see them," said his wife, "and that I shall soon be with them."

"Tell them how we miss them," said the son and daughter, "that we are trying to improve our minds, that they may meet us when we are released."

As the day passed on, a stranger might have thought his mind wandering, but they knew that he was greeting those long gone before.

"Father and mother are here," he said; "and the dear girls—can you not see them, Mary?" At another time, with uplifted hand, he cried, "Don't you hear the music? The door must be open. I can hear it so plain."

As the last rays of the setting sun were shedding their golden radiance through the room, with a last loving look of farewell to those he was leaving, and on his countenance, a rapturous welcome to his heavenly attendants, he said "the angels are whispering for me to come," and was borne away to that city whose gates are never closed.

The coward sneaks to death; the brave live on—Amen.

SUSIE'S PRINCE.

And Her First and Last Journeys to Fairy-Land.

She was only a poor little ragged child, who was born in a London slum, amongst very poor people. Some of them used to drink and fight and swear, and the poor little girl used to run away and hide herself then, for she was afraid of being beaten when her parents got drunk and began to quarrel. She was eight years old, but so small she might have been only five except for the old, old look in her poor, thin, pale, little face.

She was not a strong child, and had been in the hospital twice because her bones were so soft and her muscles so weak that her legs grew twisted, and she could not walk. When she was in the hospital some one told her a story of a fairy prince and a princess and all the beautiful things that are in Fairy Land where people are never sick and where they can have every wish granted to them.

This little girl, whose name was Susie, used to help her mother work and to mind the little tots who were smaller than Susie was, and she used to even have to carry about a big baby which was much too heavy for her, so that very soon Susie's legs began to bend again, and her back to do the same, and then the doctor said Susie must lie down on her back till it got straight again.

That worried Susie's mother very much because she had only one room and it was very small and Susie lying on her back was in everyone's way. Susie could not get into the hospital again, because she was not so very ill as some other children were, and there was no bed to spare for Susie, so she was told she must stay at home till there was room for her in the hospital.

Poor little Susie used very often to cry as she lay in bed, or crept up and down the long, dark dirty stair. Sometimes Susie's mother would think it would be well if the Lord would take Susie away to heaven, for she had four other children and did not always know how to feed them all, and Susie's father was sometimes out of work and sometimes he would spend his wages on drink, when he had work, and then the father and mother would quarrel and fight and cry Susie.

Susie used to think so often of that beautiful fairy story which was the only one she knew, and wonder if heaven was like Fairy Land. She hoped it was, but she was not sure because the cure who used to call and see her sometimes, and a lady who also came, both said a great deal about heaven and the angels and a God who knew all the bad things you did without your telling Him, but they never said there were any fairies there, and Susie thought she would like the fairies best, because they would play with her.

She was not surprised then, when one night she saw what she thought was the Fairy Prince himself. He had on a pale blue dress and a little blue cap, and his dress was sparkling with tiny points of light like dewdrops all over it. He had blue eyes too, and fair golden brown hair, just like the Fairy Prince in the picture. He carried a little light in his hand and when he came up the stairs it seemed to light up the dark, dirty old room all around him. He smiled at Susie and said "Would you like to come with me and play in a lovely land of sunshine and flowers?"

Susie's poor little wizened face puckered up into a smile and she nodded her head, for she did not know how to say no to a real Fairy Prince. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of HUDSON TUTTLE. Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often in a hurried manner. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby less attractive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

James Kavanaugh: Q. Is Dr. Funk a Spiritualist?

A. He has not identified himself with the organic movement, and retains his position in his church. He has stated to reporters that he is not, and holds his position as tentative, awaiting further facts.

Those who have read "The Widow's Mile" will ask: If the facts that are recorded by Dr. Funk are not sufficient to convince him, how many more will it require?

A tentative position is desirable, and the method of science, yet there comes a time when it is affected rather than wisdom. A farmer may plant a field with corn, and when asked, "Do you expect to harvest corn?" reply, "I do not know. I hold a tentative position. I do not pretend to know until harvest time." He gathers corn, but when asked if he expects to gather corn from the same seed next year, replies, "I do not know. I hold a tentative position till the harvest time." If he went on from year to year, never acknowledging that he was sure corn planted would bring a harvest of corn, would not there be a doubt of his sanity?

Science is something more than a record of facts. It has keenest intuition and prophetic vision. It rises from facts, generalizes, and while it may in the beginning hold itself ready to accept the balance of facts, after a time it generalizes a theory, and when newly observed facts continue to support it, considers the demonstration complete.

Dr. Funk has remained neutral, continuing with reasonable perseverance his researches. We presume that he pursues this course to keep more in touch with the churches. This appears to be delusive. Even church members admire direct and outspoken opinions.

Spiritualists would take Dr. Funk's "lowly mite," as of greater authority than the facts there recorded had absolutely made him a convert.

We should be thankful for what he has done, and admire the moral courage he has shown, in pursuing a course, which calls for heroic sacrifice of his dearest associations, and estranges his lifetime associates.

Those who make carping criticisms appear to have no comprehension of Dr. Funk's position, and the intensity of that honesty of purpose and love of truth, which must actuate him, when for the beliefs of a life time, he substitutes a vitally distinct, and apparently opposing, system.

J. R. Munson: Q. Why did not Robert Ingersoll leave a greater and more lasting influence?

A. The answer is simply that he gave nothing new, and was in his criticism of theology one hundred years behind the times. He repeated the ideas of Voltaire, Volney, Hume, and Paine, and went over the same ground they had occupied. Eloquent, imaginative, magnetic, and capable of charming his hearers by incomparable word pictures; of keenest wit and biting sarcasm, of breathless flights of rhetoric, of saying the most common thoughts in a way that made them new, he captivated his audience, yet he left no lasting effect.

When Paine attacked the theology of his age, it was an accepted faith by laity and leaders. The higher criticism was unknown. The Bible was infallible and the only authority, and hence there was relevancy in pointing out its errors, and inconsistencies.

Since that day the churches have advanced, yet the leaders have almost if not quite reached the position taken by Paine. They smile at the simplicity of the ignorant following, the laggards yet believe in a literal interpretation of the Bible, and in the sacredness of dogmatic belief.

There are a host of members who have not kept up in the march, yet at the front are massive columns, who take the Bible in the light of the "Higher Criticism," which really means as any other book, for the light and truth there is in it as decided by reason. These leaders may be in a minority, but they lead and direct, and the main body follows. They have withdrawn their active forces from their fortresses and defensive trenches attacked by Hume and Paine, which are now occupied by the incompetent and ignorant who remain by force of intellectual inertia.

The great advanced army, he did shine in none of his coruscating lectures the least indication of having studied Comparative Religion, the only method by which a correct understanding can be gained. He was a lawyer, who read the works of Paine, Hume, and their class, and gathered up their well-worn weapons, assailed the lingering remnant in the half-forsaken defense lines.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

"I was sadly perplexed and knew not what course to pursue. That evening while I was making my usual call in this town. Mrs. Grove started, looked at me searchingly and said in a voice that trembled with excitement, 'Oh, sir, please tell me your name, for I had given strict orders that my given name should never be mentioned in her presence.'"

"Moved by some irresistible impulse, I cried, 'Lola, don't you know me?' She gave one wild agonized cry, and fell forward fainting. Restored from her faint, she fell into violent weeping. All my assurances of love and friendship seemed to increase her agitation, so I ceased and sat beside her silent and sad. After a while she grew calm and lay for some time in thoughtful silence, then she said feebly, 'Christopher, I have but a few hours longer to live. You are the only man on earth I ever loved. I cannot die until I have told you all, even though I know you will turn from me with horror and loathing.'"

"The story she told explains the mystery of this room as much as such a history can explain the phenomena we have witnessed to-night. Mrs. Fox was a proud and ambitious woman, and when she learned that I was the son of a convict she at once decided that her daughter should see me no more. Poor Lola begged and wept and prayed, but in vain, the proud heart of the mother would not yield. Later Mrs. Fox was confronted by a difficulty she had not calculated upon, but she was a woman of resources and she soon conceived a plan which she proceeded to execute with daring and ability. She had this room finished, probably as we now see it, and here she brought her daughter and kept her for many months. She did not fear her neighbors, for there was but one family near, and she took care to have little to do with them. She gave out word in the village store that Lola had gone to visit an aunt in a distant city. The only person Mrs. Fox trusted besides her husband was Doctor — a man of wealth and influence, but by many feared and disliked for being unscrupulous."

"Poor Lola sought in vain for means to 'escape' or communicate with me. The doctor was very kind and gentle with her; patient during the weeks of her confinement, but she never trusted or liked him. The infant was puny and fretful and the doctor gave her some syrup to quiet it, warning her to be careful not to give it more than a certain amount."

"One day Mrs. Fox went to her daughter and said, 'Lola, you are now able to be about the house as usual, and matters cannot go on in this way any longer. We are in hourly danger of detection. Dr. — loves you and wants to make you his wife, which you ought to feel to be a great honor. Under the circumstances you can do nothing but accept. He will take your baby to a distant state and put it where it will be well cared for. He will plan and execute everything—you have only to obey.'"

"Mother and daughter had a tempestuous interview, but at last driven to desperation Lola exclaimed, 'Give me one day more—only one day and then I will do what you bid me,' and to this entreaty Mrs. Fox yielded. Left to herself the sleeping laggards? The fundamentals of their faith he did not touch, and his keenest arrow fell harmless on the errors, and inconsistencies."

Since that day the churches have advanced, yet the leaders have almost if not quite reached the position taken by Paine. They smile at the simplicity of the ignorant following, the laggards yet believe in a literal interpretation of the Bible, and in the sacredness of dogmatic belief."

There are a host of members who have not kept up in the march, yet at the front are massive columns, who take the Bible in the light of the "Higher Criticism," which really means as any other book, for the light and truth there is in it as decided by reason. self the tortured girl evolved a plan of her own. The babe which had cost her so much Lola loved with all a young mother's devotion. The thought of marrying a man she despised was hideous and repellant, but to give up her infant to go she knew not where, to endure she knew not what, was maddening."

"After all was quiet for the night, Lola proceeded to execute her plan. She poured out the fatal dose of syrup the doctor had warned her against and gave it to the infant. Then she got some concealed sleeping powders which she was supposed to have taken weeks before and administered them to herself, after which she lay down upon the bed with the babe clasped across her breast, and praying God to have mercy on her soul she went to sleep."

"Mrs. Fox found sleep impossible that night. Restless, tortured, fighting with her love for her child and her love of self which she named pride, her bed at last became unendurable, and she sought the open air. The wind was moaning in the spruces and she fancied it bore to her from their darksome depths the wailing of a babe. She looked up at her daughter's window and saw a faint light glowing there. A dark shadow seemed to hover near the window. Filled with a nameless terror, the self-accused woman flew to her daughter's room."

"Mrs. Fox was a woman of ability and execution. One glance at the stand beside her daughter's bed revealed to her the truth and she immediately resorted to vigorous measures which soon restored Lola to consciousness. The infant she made no attempt to revive. Doctor — was sent for and the situation explained to him, but he made no comments."

"Then a new difficulty arose. Mr. Fox refused to have the dead baby buried upon the farm. Entreaties, arguments, and threats were of no avail—the obstinate man declared he would never have another minute's peace if the child was laid in the ground. Mrs. Fox with equal obstinacy refused to have the babe buried in the cellar. At last the doctor hit upon a plan that seemed a way out of the difficulty. He placed the tiny body of the infant in a small wooden box which he covered with lead. He then carefully removed a floor board near where the stove then stood and placed the little casket beneath the opening. The work was soon concluded and with the remark, 'A few coats of paint will cover all our sins,' he turned his attention to the distracted Lola."

"A week later they were married, and for ten years the poor woman was the legalized victim of his base cruelty; then she fled from him in an hour of desperation and found liberty if not peace. What her life was after she left her husband, I did not inquire. I have never known a minute's real comfort since I found I had murdered my baby," she said to me. "My terrible crime has ever been present with me, and from it I have found no escape—indeed, I have ceased to try."

"I gave her my love and sympathy freely, and tried to prove to her that whatever she had done she was still my beloved Lola of the days-long past."

The stranger paused, and after a few minutes' silence, turned to Mrs. Drury and said, 'Lady, I infer that you are a medium, and for the help you have given me to-night I am very grateful. I can understand how Mrs. Fox and her son-in-law, who have not been out of their bodies many years, may be compelled by some law of nature to haunt this room at times, but I cannot understand how Lola, who has been free from her body for many years, can still be bound here—can you tell me?'"

"You have heard the saying," replied Mrs. Drury, "The ruling passion is strong in death? and I am told this is equally true after death until it has been outgrown. When we leave the flesh we take our mental condition with us, and it often is as hard to outgrow it there as it is here. The fact the poor woman had ceased to try to free herself from her sorrows probably explains much. Whether in the flesh or out of it, we can never progress until we entertain a strong desire to do so, and not only that, we must accept conditions we cannot change, and resolutely determine to make the best of them. We must learn to let alone the past with its griefs, mistakes and sins, and press bravely onward, striving with all our strength and ability to atone for the past by making the present as bright and beautiful as we wish the past had been. Here and hereafter, in this world or any other we build our future out of the present."

As Mrs. Drury ceased to speak, there came again that long-drawn, sobbing moan.

"Sir," said John, addressing Mr. Hall, "if you have any request to make of us I hope you will not hesitate to express it, for we are your friends and will be glad to serve you in any way we can."

"God bless you for your sympathy and kindness," was the fervent reply. "I would like—there is one thing—He paused and looked at Mrs. Drury appealingly."

"You would like to have a portion of the floor removed and the remains of the infant recovered and buried, would you not?" she asked gently.

"Indeed I would," he answered. John and Mr. Dale started for the tool room at once, and later we all fled down the stairs into the kitchen taking with us the lead covered box. While the men were gathering the necessary implements, we women put on our outdoor wraps. Aunt Anna wrapped a small black shawl securely about the rude casket and I went to my room and cut two pure white roses from my bush and brought them to adorn it."

When we were ready the stranger took the precious dust in his trembling arms and in a broken voice said: "It is mine—I will carry it."

In the same order that we ascended the stairway to the Shadow Room we now in perfect silence wended our way across the field, down the sheep path through the pasture to the balsam grove by the little pond where the lilacs and cat-tails grow. Beside Mr. Hall stood a dark-robed female figure, plainly seen by Mrs. Drury and myself, but not by the others."

Never shall I forget that silent journey. The air was fragrant with innumerable green things growing, and the frogs were piping merrily among the lily pads. Far down among the spruces where Mrs. Fox fancied she heard an infant wailing, an owl was hooting lustily, and away on the hill side a young lamb was bleating, and over all poured the glorious moonlight. Under the shadow of a fir balsam the two young men followed a little grave and the stranger laid within it his burden. The dirt and turf were carefully replaced as we stood silently around, and then Mr. Dale removed his hat and leaning upon his spade offered an earnest prayer. From an "orthodox" point of view it was a very strange prayer, and I feel sure if any of his brother clergymen had heard it he would now be on trial for heresy."

The next day Mr. Hall left us. John carried him to the station and saw him aboard the train. His last words to John were: "I have but a little while longer to remain and when I have passed into the Beyond I will return to you and in some way make myself known."

So far as I know the manifestations have ceased in the Shadow Room."

When I think over the history of that room given to us by the stranger, think of the strange experiences we have had in this house, of the stranger's visit and the occurrences of that eventful night, it all seems to me like some weird romance born of a vivid imagination. Just think of it! This lonely farm up here on the hillside surrounded by hills, forests and streams, where the winter winds go shrieking past, hurrying before them, blinding clouds of snow, where the summer rains descend, and the white mist trails up the streams and through the woodlands, where the flowers bloom and the birds sing joyously, and everything seems to be in harmony with God—oh, the mysteries by which we are surrounded, and how very little we know regarding the real lives of our fellow creatures!"

I wrote to you that Mr. Dale and I hoped to be married this summer, but when we spoke to mother about it she said "No" very decidedly. "You are both young, and waiting will be a good discipline for you," she said in explanation. "Mr. Dale has not fully decided what he wants to do or be, and as for you, Marah, you must have a thorough knowledge of housekeeping and a good practical knowledge of your own physical being and the laws of health before I shall give my consent to your marriage. I have not considered myself negligent regarding this part of your education, but I now feel that much more is required of me."

Aunt Ann said, "Your mother is right, Marah. Permanent health and happiness you cannot hope for unless you understand the laws which govern your own being. Your body must be cared for as well as your soul. A good husband is worth waiting for, and if you get a bad one the time you have to live with him will be long enough."

I am not going to get a bad husband, and Aunt Ann knows it, but I am not such a "silly" that I fail to see that mother and Aunt Ann are right. I am going to send this letter right along. I am just as happy as I can be. You are going to have a surprise, Marah, so watch out. Lovingly yours,

MARAH WESTON.

Spruce Grove Farm.

My Dear Elsie:—One week ago today John Wilder put his matched bay to day a two-seated carriage, and in company with him and Marah Weston and Vernon Dale I came to my Mother Silas' home. John's swift young horses do not make much of the journey my brothers always thought so tedious. It seems strange to think how they never visited each other, but since during twenty years, and yet they were fond of each other; they simply thought they had got to stay at home, and truly our lives are just as broad or narrow as our ideas. I wish you could have seen Marah when we drove into her yard. The first remark she made was a triumphant, "There, I knew you were coming!" And sure enough she had an abundant dinner waiting for us.

The next day was Sunday, and we saw in the local paper that Mrs. Drury was to speak in the next town—a new thing—and we at once decided to go. I found a woman to stay with Silas, poor man, and Marah's new niece, who, by the way, is just as bright and sweet as she can be. We took Charlie with us and the robins that sung on the topmost boughs of the maples, that lined the road for miles were not happier than he. I believe it is as natural to be happy as it is to breathe, and that every creature living in harmony with nature's laws will be happy.

I do not know whether Mrs. Drury called it she preached a sermon or delivered a lecture, but at the conclusion of the meeting such remarks as "If that is what you call Spiritualism, I want more of it"; "I was never so surprised in my life"; "Why, this is just grand," etc. I think all who listened to her must have felt a purifying, strengthening and uplifting power touch their souls, and that higher ideals and more exalted aspirations must be the result. Marah persuaded Mrs. Drury to come home with us and take the train from here. It was a happy party of us that started for home that afternoon. At the top of a long hill John drew up his horses that they might rest and we might enjoy the beauty of the scenery Mrs. Drury pointed to a hill just beyond us at the right hand and said, "When I passed over this road before, my companion told me about a little old cobbler who lives upon that hill somewhere. This cobbler according to his neighbors has 'queer spells' when he claims to be controlled by the spirit of a physician once considered very wise, and I have always felt a very strong desire to investigate the case."

"Opportunity knocks at our door but once," quoted John, as he turned the horses into the crossroad leading up the hill designated by Mrs. Drury. "Why, John, you don't know where to go!" exclaimed Marah. "I know enough to keep in the road, was the laughing rejoinder. "This road is 'narrow' enough to 'lead to endless glory,' said Marah, glancing up the hill before us. "All roads lead there if we choose to make them," said Mrs. Drury, "but some are more circuitous than others, and some cost us more pain and trouble than others."

"Heresy! heresy!" exclaimed Mr. Dale, holding up his hands in feigned horror. So laughing and chatting we made our way ever up, up between rows of willow bushes interspersed with stately maples, scraggly apple trees and paper birches gleaming white in the sunlight. A stream of crystal water came leaping down its steep and rocky bed, crossing the road at frequent intervals and filling the air with its delightful melody no suggestive of soft music beds and peace and rest. As we gained the summit of the hill the scene that greeted us was so wild, grand and beautiful that although accustomed to mountain scenery we all exclaimed with delight. "I can never look upon a scene like this," said Marah, "without feeling impressed that those who dwell among the mountains ought to be strong, brave, steadfast, pure and noble."

"Ought to be, truly," said Mrs. Drury, thoughtfully regarding a ruined farm house near the road, "but man often gets woefully out of tune with nature, and hence his miseries."

We found the house we sought without difficulty. A slovenly, sullen-looking woman appeared in answer to John's knock at the open door. "Yes, the cobbler still lives here, but he's havin' one of his tantrums," she informed us. "What sort of a tantrum?" inquired John, gravely. "One of them spells when he pertends the spirit of a doctor by some hook or crook gets inside him," was the sullen answer.

A man with a pipe in his mouth slouched into sight. "Oh, come now, Nancy Jane," he said good humoredly, "there's something takes holt of the old man an' ye know it. If 'tain't the doctor, what does make his little squeaky voice sound like that? That voice ain't his, anyway."

The voice that came to us through the open window was deep and strong and possessed a richness rarely heard. "Can we go in and see this man?" asked John. "I don't care—he ain't none of my folks," said the woman snappishly, "but if I'd know'd I'd got a hull meetin' house full of folks a comin' I'd 'ave slicked up."

She conducted us into a fair-sized room with a low, dingy ceiling. The floor was bare and much worn, the windows cobwebbed and curtainless and the furniture old and battered. On a home-made lounge covered with faded and ragged print lay the misshapen figure of an elderly man who from his boyhood had been confined to crutches and suffered much. Poor, uneducated, lacking almost everything that is commonly thought necessary to one's happiness, he had managed to support himself after a fashion by mending boots and shoes.

"We looked upon the unconscious man before us with a feeling akin to awe. His worn face was deathly white, but it was pure, gentle and refined, proving that the spirit within us is capable of rising above every condition, circumstances and environment, and sing its song of victory. Our unwilling hostess cleared several chairs of their accumulation of cheap literature and ragged garments, and bade us be seated. As soon as we were settled in the man upon the sofa struggled to a sitting posture and exclaimed: "So you have come at last! It is well. God be in no respecter of persons, and Destiny may drive a four-in-hand or a donkey. Here you are—seven of you, and five of you are earnestly seeking for a way to help humanity upward."

The Curtain Rises!

And Reveals the True Character of a Prominent Indian.

This Hart-Harvey has been a prominent materializing medium in Indiana, and in great demand there. All the spirits that ever came out of his cabinet were of the bogus kind. He has deceived many with his legerdemain practice. Gradually the curtain is rising on the Dark Cabinet, and revealing the contents.

To the Editor:—The stand you take in fighting all bogus mediums encourages me to send you a clipping from a Larned paper, telling of W. E. Harvey, his genuine name, W. E. Hart, of Richmond, Ind., at whose seances I have been in Larned. I had enough of them in one sitting. The clipping shows the character of the medium. I have seen notices in your paper of materializing mediums. I have attended their circles and regarded them as genuine, but afterward found that the manifestations consisted of the medium dressed in "toggery."

"MEDIUM" IN TROUBLE.

W. E. Harvey, the Spiritualist, Who

Stirred Larned Up a Year Ago,

Under Arrest in Indiana.

The Topeka State Journal of Monday of this week contained the following account of the trials and tribulations of one W. E. Harvey, or Hart as his real name seems to be, the "spirit medium" who, in company with another man whom he induced as his younger brother, and later on, held for several weeks, off and on in Larned about a year ago, and aroused big interest in the "trumpet" and "materializing" seances which he conducted at some of the best homes in Larned. The seances aroused big interest here at the time, and was the principal topic of discussion for weeks. They were attended by many of the leading business and intellectual people of the town and county, and baffled all effort to detect fraud or mechanical manipulation. As the result of Harvey's visit here many people became firm believers in Spiritualism, and the following account of the "medium's" exposure will be a joy to a large number of people who believed in Harvey and defended him against those who exposed him and denounced his seances as frauds. The articles from the Journal are as follows:

A story of almost brutal imposition upon the faith of two women in Spiritualism, entailing the desertion of one for her husband and family, and the deceiving of both, comes to light in an account of W. E. Hart, alias W. E. Harvey, at Richmond, Ind., on Saturday, for whom the Topeka federal officers have been hunting ever since his indictment at Wichita last September on the technical charge of using the mails in aid of a scheme to defraud.

There were two chief victims, Mrs. M. A. Price of Greenup, Ill., and Mrs. B. S. Rexroad of Hutchinson, Kans. The Kansas woman suffered far for her worst. Not only did Hart "work" her for a sum over $400, but on two different occasions did he cause her to leave her husband. Mrs. Price is the loser of about $150. Hart borrowed considerable money in Hutchinson and Larned besides, which it is said he has not yet paid back. His operations in other towns have not been so successful. Unfortunately for Hart, Mrs. Price's son is a United States postoffice inspector, and it was through his interference that an end was put to Hart's career.

Hart is supposed to hail somewhere from Indiana. He passes as a "spiritual medium." He went to Greenup, Ill., about one year ago and started to give "seances." He took quite a hold on the town and one of his clients was Mrs. Price, a widow about 67 years of age. Hart is thirty years old, dresses well, and in general makes a good appearance. He "made up" to Mrs. Price and before long was playing the part of a wooer. In fact he ingratiated himself into her confidence to such an extent that when he got ready to leave Greenup, he succeeded in borrowing $90 with which he said he wanted to go to Hutchinson, Kans., and hold meetings. He wrote letters to Mrs. Price after leaving and his missives were very tender, beginning usually with words like "Dearest" and "sweetheart."

At Hutchinson the faces still seemed to be with him, for he informed her that he had "the town by the ears." He gained patronage from some of the very best citizens there. Among the visitors at his meetings was Mrs. Rexroad. She is about 30 years old and has a husband and family. That was during last June and July. About three years ago a nine-year-old daughter of Mrs. Rexroad had died, and the whole family, especially the mother, was heart-broken.

Meantime Hart was writing regularly to Mrs. Price and telling her that her "guide," which he claimed to be her father, was still appearing regularly to him, and telling him that everything was all right, that the "guide" was advising that she spend money for land in Oklahoma. Incidentally Hart got small loans, also claimed to be seconded and endorsed by the "guide." Mrs. Price did not buy Oklahoma land because about this time her son, a post-office inspector, became acquainted with Hart's machinations.

The younger Price's real suspicions became aroused, however, when Hart wrote his mother a letter saying that he was sick and needed money to pay his doctor's bill, and that he needed a new suit of clothes, the old ones being shabby and worn out, and unit to give seances in the living "guide" in the shape of the son, began to interfere very seriously at this point with the "guide," alleged to be his grandfather.

Hart's business at Hutchinson was prospering, however. Mrs. Rexroad gained great faith in him. He secured from her a little silver cup, a keepsake belonging to the dead child. A few days afterward, Hart had a daughter, and he told her that her father had appeared to him as her "guide." This report drew Mrs. Rexroad's entire attention, for her heart had all but been broken over the little girl's death.

"Your child's spirit tells me," said Hart to Mrs. Rexroad one day, "for you leave your husband and family and run away with me. Get all the money you can and come."

The woman did not hesitate, but went with him. The pair got as far as Wichita when they were intercepted by officers at the husband's investigation, and were brought back to Hutchinson. The woman pleaded penitence and her husband took her back into his home. The officers told Hart that if he would pay the costs that the case would be dropped.

He turned again to Mrs. Price for help and succeeded. He wrote to her that he needed $500 immediately to pay for a fine which had been imposed upon him by enemies to their faith. He got the money, and in that way was released by the Hutchinson officials.

But he had not yet relaxed his hold over Mrs. Rexroad. Again he induced her to run away with him. This time she managed to get $400, which she gave him, and together they were supposed to have gone to Nebraska. That was the last of them both so far as Hutchinson was concerned. Mrs. Rexroad did not return and her husband got a divorce. It is not known where she is now. The federal officers supposed that Hart deserted her as soon as her money was spent. The telegraphic advices from Richmond, Ind., where he was arrested Saturday, do not say whether she was with him. He will have to face a charge of using the mails in a scheme to defraud, before the federal court. The indictment was drawn against him at Wichita. In September made the charge in the special instance of Mrs. Price. His letters to her make the evidence. Mrs. Rexroad does not come into the case.—The Tiller and Toller, Larned, Kansas, Nov. 17, 1905.

A NEGATIVE ANSWER.

Is Spiritualism a Christian Denomination?

My old-time friend and co-worker, J. S. Loveland, in The Progressive Thinker, Dec. 16, asks an important question suggested by a statement by Dr. Coon that the president of the N. S. A. was a Bible Spiritualist, and that "Spiritualism is recognized as a Christian denomination." As to Mr. Barrett's belief I can not answer, but a friend of mine, a Theosophist, told me in private he perfectly agreed with his tenets.

Spiritualism is not a Christian denomination. Christianity is based upon the doctrine of a full and complete state of pristine purity, and his chance of redemption through the merits of an immaculately conceived and crucified savior. This is his future happiness depended upon his belief in, and acceptance of this atonement. Is not that a fact?

Spiritualism is exactly antipodal. It claims man is a natural evolution from all below him, and constantly evolving to higher conditions. That his status in the future life is the natural fruit of his life here. That there is no way of escape from the result of his acts. That he makes his own heaven or hell by his life, not by the acceptance of any creed. That every soul must stand on its own feet and pay its own bills. That progress is a law of nature and continuous.

Spiritualism comes as a result of the growing intelligence of the people, to prove the continuity of life; and its mission is to de-throne Gods and enthroned man, to develop mankind from a state of enslavement to a system of universal freedom. To go away with every form of credulism and establish a universal brotherhood.

Anything short of this is abortive and unworthy the aim of an intelligent Spiritualist.

SPIRITUALISTS, ATTENTION!

Something About the Tricks of Illusion and Legerdemain, That Are Worthy of Careful Consideration.

Tricks of illusion and legerdemain are all right in their place as diversions, but are entirely out of place in the spiritual science. Spiritualism is a grand and beautiful science, a celestial truth, and its followers should use every effort to prevent its name from being SMIRCHED AND DISGRACED by the practice of fraud. A bogus test or fraudulent manifestation of any sort is the mark of a low-down Spiritualist, and no Spiritualist or investigator, but an impostor, should attempt to do this. The book, "Mysteries of the Seance," written by a life-long Spiritualist and investigator, and endorsed and heartily recommended by the most able of our leading Spiritualists, will post you as to the methods of tricksters in producing what is called "tricks of the seance," and will enable you to detect and expose the fraud. The author has received hundreds of grateful letters from those who have had their eyes opened to the truth and who have thus been able to expose and drive out of the work many who had been doing a flourishing business among the gullible. The marvelous disclosures made in this book are positively startling and seem incredible, but every statement can be proven. Price 25 cents, or 6 copies for $1.50, postpaid. EXPLANATORY.

An Address by Mrs. Helen Stuart-Richings, Before the First Spiritual Association of Philadelphia, Sunday Evening, Dec. 17, 1905.

"My earnest wish is that real Spiritualism—Spiritualism that is not afraid to go on its knees to the Infinite, Spiritualism that acknowledges that we are only finite, and that the Infinite holds us in an everlasting clasp of love, Spiritualism that recognizes the existence of another world that intermingles and interblends its forces with this, Spiritualism that not only teaches spirit communion but makes that truth a powerful factor in the daily life; for purity, for truth, for righteousness,—may be promulgated throughout the world. And so long as I am left in this world, it is my firm purpose to be one of the promulgators."

As bearing upon what I shall say in an attitude of night, I will read the poem, "The Kings," by L. I. Guiney. (Poem read.) I do not stand before you tonight, friends, as an apostle of an apologist. There is a wide difference between an apology and an explanation. I owe no man an apology for anything I shall read to-night, neither man, nor body of men. I owe an explanation, however, and I am prepared to make one. I am going to present my own case, and you are to be judge and jury. I may not be a good pleader. I may not be able to present my case as well as some other might do, but of one thing I am sure, and of one thing you may rest assured, I shall speak the truth as I know it, and the truth only.

I BECAME A SPIRITUALIST.

I went upon the Spiritualist rostrum as an exponent of Spiritualism. I left behind me a profession in which, I had made a fair mark. I did not enter on spiritual work as a means of making money, for I let a larger means behind me. I became a Spiritualist through absolute conviction of its truth, and I entered upon the ministry of Spiritualism because filled with a strong desire that the world, as much of the world as my feeble utterance might reach, should know of the truth that had lifted me up and set my feet upon a rock.

TOO LOOSE IN OUR METHODS.

Gradually I came to feel strongly, and the feeling grew more and more strong, that we were, as a body, too loose in our methods of action, too indeterminate in our attitude before a critical world. We had not up to that time clearly defined our own position. We had no set of principles. We had nothing definite beyond the mere fact of belief, and we were in spirit communion. I found myself in pupils to-day, that had been occupied yesterday by those who taught directly opposite principles, ideas absolutely contrary to those that, with the very sweat of my soul, I was trying to advance in the world. I ministered in pupils where I was called to do the same effort. To-day, with my heart in my mouth, would be treated with contempt, made a subject for a sneer. Some Spiritualists believed in the Infinite, overruling Power, that my old-fashioned and beloved parents taught me to call God, believed in God. I still believe in God, and I have been the same rostrum, in the same pulpits from which I have uttered my belief, the God idea ridiculed, and I have said to myself, "What am I teaching? I have supposed that this I have taught was Spiritualism, but here are other men and women, as honest evidently as I, as sincere of purpose evidently as I, whose effort is to utterly destroy what I endeavor to build up. Either they are preaching Spiritualism, or they are not. Either I am preaching Spiritualism, or I am not. If what they are preaching is Spiritualism, then I am not preaching Spiritualism."

People asked me again and again, "What do you Spiritualists believe, beyond the teaching that spirits can communicate with man? What beyond that do you believe? What ideas do you entertain about God? What ideas do you entertain about Jesus of Nazareth? Where do you stand on this question, and on that?" I finally found myself only reply to each individual self, for I really do not know what the Spiritualists, as a body, do believe.

Through a sense of the insufficiency of my efforts to stem the tide of what I felt was a destructive power at the root of Spiritualism, I finally became, shall I say discouraged? Perhaps that is the word, I know no better, but I finally felt that my efforts were powerless that I was beating against a stone wall. What the best thing I could do would be to retire from the conflict, at least until the organization defined its position so that I should know at last whether I believed with it, or did not. So, with nothing but the purest intention, and with a sore heart, I withdrew from the organization.

WHAT IS AN ORGANIZATION?

Is it not a body of men and women banded together to advance a certain idea or principle, to set of ideas or principles? We cannot therefore condemn the organization with the principles, while they are allied.

I left the organization, but I carried my Spiritualism with me. At no time, at no place, to no human being under God's shining sun, have I ever, by word or look or act, renounced Spiritualism. I simply declined to be called a Spiritualist until I would know where I stood. I acted upon the right that we claimed when our forefathers came to this country, freedom and liberty of conscience. I withdrew from a body that was not acting in accordance with my ideal of Spiritualism, a body that rushed into the spiritual press of that stood before the world in an attitude that invited criticism because of the different and conflicting teachings advanced from its platforms and pulpits.

EXPERIENCES AT CHATTANOOGA.

I had taken the first steps towards severing myself from the organization by cancelling dates I had taken with certain societies and camp associations when the war broke out, and the soldiers were massed in camps at various points throughout the country. I determined, so far as might lie in my power, to be of some use to my fellow-men somewhere, and I felt that a way would be opened to my earnestness. I went to Chattanooga in the hope that such a way would open there, my desire being, if possible, to carry my Spiritualism—the Spiritualism that some who are sitting here to-night, have heard me utter in this city years ago, and have applauded, thereby putting the seal of their approval upon it,—to the young men going into battle. I went to Chattanooga. I had scarcely arrived when there appeared in the Daily Times a few lines announcing my presence in the city, and stating that I would not doubt be heard shortly upon the spiritual rostrum in Chattanooga. The party taking this liberty with my name, without any consultation with me, probably, quite naturally assumed that as I had been speaking on spiritual rostrums, and for spiritual societies throughout the country for years, I would be ready to do it at a moment's notice, anywhere and at any time.

I will be perfect frank with you, friends, and tell you that it annoyed me. It annoyed me, as it always does, to have an outsider dabble in my affairs without authorization from me. I do not know whether it belongs particularly to my Scotch blood, or to some other and perhaps deeper-lying cause, but I never have enjoyed people meddling in my affairs, and assuming that they know all about my affairs, and I did not like it that anybody should rush into print and state what I was likely to do; and this incident was peculiarly annoying coming close upon the heels of my renunciation of my position in the organization of Spiritualism, so, I came into print, and I went to Chattanooga with a line in the Daily Times saying I was not open to any such engagement, for I was no longer a Spiritualist.

NOT DROPPING HER SPIRITUALISM.

When a man joins an organization he takes its name, and prior to his joining he is supposed to have mentally accepted a principle, or a set of principles, that cause him to join that organization. The having of the principle comes first; the joining of the organization comes second, and these two things are not to be confounded, any more than you confound Spiritualism and the organization that is formed to promulgate it. They are allied, but they are not to be confounded. It is true, had I been perhaps a little more on my guard against possible animosity, enmity, malice, ill-will, revenge for fancied slight, or something of that character, I might not have used just that language. I might have said, "I have withdrawn from the organization of Spiritualists," and, in that way, let it be plainly seen that I was not dropping my Spiritualism because I did not choose any longer to be called a Spiritualist.

This thought coming in upon me with great force after those words of mine were in print, I made arrangements with the Rev. H. H. of the Unitarian church of Chattanooga, for the use of his pulpit the following Sunday night, and announced in the same paper that I had published these two cards I have just referred to, a lecture on "Why I Am Not a Spiritualist." In this lecture I determined to lay the matter to rest by telling the Spiritualists that there could be no shadow of doubt as to where I stood; that I was not laying down my allegiance to what I understood as Spiritualism, but that I was laying down the title of Spiritualist until it should be more clearly defined; until, in a word, I should give utterance to the words of the Spiritualist minister to statements in regard to the Infinite good we call God, one day, only to find some one else along the next, as an ordained Spiritualist minister also, and knock all I had said into a cocked hat. I delivered this discourse to an audience that filled the church to the doors.

But, Spiritualists, there was the best of justice, the breadth, the liberality that Spiritualists boast themselves upon possessing? Where was the spirit of brotherly love, that Spiritualists claim to possess in a larger measure than any other organization before the world to-day? Where was it?

The Spiritualist heads were counted that night, and a city that had turned out for me on previous occasions as many as from three to five hundred, turned out that night the large number of thirteen! Where, I ask again, were the Spiritualists' boasted liberality? Suppose, for the sake of argument, that I had renounced Spiritualism. Where was the liberality of the Spiritualists that had turned out day after day to hear me when I called myself a Spiritualist, and now declined to listen when I explained a change of base? If I carried a sore heart before that meeting, friends, I can tell you I carried a much sorer one. I was disappointed, and I dream of the animals back of this silent, cold shoulder that was presented to me. Still I did not dream, no never did it enter my mind—that any one would assail me because of what I have just related—my position, my announcement in the paper, and my sermon afterwards. If those persons who immediately rushed into the spiritual press of the country, with the announcement that I had gone back on Spiritualism, had been honorable, upright, real Spiritualists, they would have first come to hear what I had to say. They did not. If the only reason for their coming was the announcement that I had renounced Spiritualism, sowing the idea broadcast over the land, that I was a renegade, an apostate, had been generous enough—no, let us leave generosity out of the question, there is no room for it here—they were just simply that, and nothing more. They would have first heard what I had to say, and, having heard it, they could not have done what they did, for in that pulpit, on that occasion, to a full church I said, "I do not renounce Spiritualism. My Spiritualism is a part of my life, as it has been for years and more, and I fold it all the closer to my heart that I see what seems to me, on the part of others, a lax attitude toward it. It has hurt me to the very core of my being to see how Spiritualism has been made a by-word, through the action largely of those claiming to represent it as teachers." I stood in that pulpit and denounced, not Spiritualism, but the attitude of some Spiritualists toward that which I felt every true Spiritualist held sacred.

The war still goes on, as I might say in parentheses, friends. You only have to read the spiritual papers (and you who do not buy them and read them, please remember, you are back to back to the door, and we will be very glad to sell them) to find that the war is still on, although a set of principles have at last been defined. You will find that there is one class calling themselves Spiritualists, who sneer at prayer, at God, at the idea of there being any God in the universe outside of "me" with a capital "M." Then you will find others who reverence the Infinite Wisdom, and are willing you should call it by any name you choose. Reverencing that which no name that either you or I may give, will define but is felt as a Power to which puny man may look up, and to which, in his darkest hours, he finds one name at least to apply, that comforts him, "Our Father." Once a fact, always a fact. Who that is not a liar from the inside out could ever stand up anywhere and say, "I know that the spirits can communicate with us; I have had it proven to me; it is a fact," and then turn around and renounce it? You cannot renounce that which you never dreamed of such a thing as renouncing the truth that I have found in Spiritualism.

It was the year, as we have already noted, of the war. After delivering this lecture I obtained an interview with Major-General Brooks, then in charge of Camp Thomas, in Chickamauga Park, and laid the object of my desire before him, in such a way, as to secure the coveted permit. I was appointed, and served, as chaplain-at-large in Camp Thomas throughout the summer of 1898, my work being to "minister to the soldiers on any place, at any time, and as I should see fit." What I found was that the situation was in Camp Thomas, I decided to interpret the words, "to minister," according to my own sweet fancy. I found so many men in that camp suffering bodily, so many sick, that instead of confining my ministrations to their minds, to their spiritual natures, I put my hands to their physical ailments, rolled up my sleeves, tied on an apron, and went among the men to serve them as a nurse. Of course, it was all voluntary, both my work as chaplain, and my work as nurse. I never received one single penny for it, nor did I wish it. I was only glad that I had the opportunity to work where work was needed.

My reward came in the joy that was mine when I could tell a dying boy, "Yes, it is true. You live after this, for I have heard from those who have passed over the bounds. It is true. Be of good cheer. You are not going into the darkness of night. You are going into the light. You are going where love is. You are going where your friends are."

So, not to dwell on these passages too long—they are a little painful, I admit, it was my blessed privilege to be with "the boys" all summer; to speak words of comfort; to eat bread and butter it, and to go among them with calves' foot jelly and all the other delicacies known to the wise nurses that were continually sending these supplies out from Chattanooga. Indeed we were receiving from all over the country, in barrels and boxes, all sorts of good things for those who were beginning to get well enough to eat, recuperating from typhoid fever and other dreadful scourges, and it was part of my work to assist in distributing these among them. I was able, with the assistance of other good ladies, to organize a little Flower Mission in the city of Chattanooga, and on Lookout Mountain, and the members of it, gathered from their homes, and from the woods or from Lookout Mountain's sides, or begged from friends or purchased from the florists, flowers in abundance, so that every day the hospital were supplied with fresh blossoms. You think this is a little thing? It was. But if you had seen a pale-faced, thin, sick boy, as I have done, with a fresh bouquet was laid on the pillow of some poor sick boy or man, it would help you to realize the power there may be in "little things."

One day a gray-haired man, old enough to have been in the Civil War, picked out at my bidding from a tray of little bouquets, and handed me one, saying, "the one he liked best," and holding it up, said, with tears running down his face, "This reminds me of my mother's backyard." I tell you, friends, even the blossoms have their message, and deliver it with sweet grace.

All this summer was happy. Why, friends, I do not think I ever in all my life spent so happy a summer, and yet one spent with so much that was sad. Happy, because with all my soul, I was trying to be of help. That was the secret of it, and I know it. Happy, and yet at the same time sad because of the sorrow and suffering about me. While I was busy in this way during the long, hot summer months,—when a doctor would step up to me, tap me on the shoulder, and say, "Little woman, get a sunbunnet or hat, or you will have sunstroke," and I would answer, "Oh, doctor, I have no time for hats or bonnets."

While these things were taking place, Oh, the pity or the friend that would stop to think of all I felt was being denounced as a "renegade." Tongues were busy disseminating a falsehood against me. So runs the tangled web of life, so run the threads of good and evil, inextricably interwoven! And it was years, yes, years, before I learned the difference between the good and the evil. I did not know that this falsehood had been disseminated through the spiritual papers, until less than a year ago. I did not know until a few months ago that I had simply withdrawn from the external organization of Spiritualists, and I had not withdrawn until I had come, if it ever came, when they would so define their position that I might know once for all, whether I could conscientiously preach what the organization stands for, or not. And in the interim the minds of the Spiritualists throughout the country were being poisoned against me.

Up to this point, had I done anything deserving the loss of confidence of the Spiritualist public? Some of you may say, "I would not have done that if I had been wiser. I think I made a mistake. I do not regret our mistakes, but when they are mistakes honestly made, we never apologize for them. Such mistakes, made with integrity of purpose, made for the best, made with the desire to do the highest that one is capable of seeing, are falls towards God's throne. Maybe it was a mistake. Maybe I should have taken the logical research, it is impossible to have knowledge of the time when the spiritual nature of the human animal first began to be made manifest. It certainly must have been there in embryo, or it would not have developed, proving the fact that it has an instinctive quality. Its growth up to the present proves also that it has had the benefit of the advantages of education; if it had not it would have perished in the embryonic stage of its existence, and human life would have remained on the animal plane of its being."

With a lot of the experience that has been showing the impossibility, efforts are being made to prove that human life has no spiritual or religious quality to distinguish it from the animal, but the evidence is too strong, to be successfully refuted, establishing the truth of the fact that human life does possess that distinctive quality, through the ages, and in the development of a higher type of manifestation. Because that power has been crude in its illustrations does not prove that it does not exist. It has made itself manifest in the religious organizations of the world, which have not always been up to the standard of the best, but have simply because life has not had the time through the process of education to grow up to that higher plane of expression. That it will advance beyond the present gradations of its life is a certainty proven by what has been attained, and the popular religious systems of the present with their universal theories instead of facts as the foundation, will pass away, being replaced by that which is superior, on which to rest the structure of religious life; being as much ahead of the present as that is superior to the manifestations displayed by the savage races of the world, which they undertake to illustrate the religious nature of life.

That the spiritual nature exists we know, because we see its workings; and we also know that however perfect may be the investigations and calculations made regarding the time since our planet passed from the gaseous to the molten and then to the solid, and when life in its lowest form first appeared, and when human life first appeared. All these do not open to our understanding facts regarding those forces which are superior to that faculty which can only catch a glimpse even of the truth regarding the physical development of life here.

That we must enter into another and superior realm of our being is evident. That there are those who have opened the portals and been able in a measure to comprehend the truth as it is illustrated on that higher plane, we know. Both the ancient and modern world has had and do have those that are thus spiritually gifted, and who have been able to start new religious systems, that break away from existing forms, and externalize the spiritual faculty and make it more acceptable to those who have outgrown the old forms.

The religious systems of the world have been necessary as a means for the spiritual unfoldment of the human race, in the time long gone by. The religious principle in life which without them would have remained in obscurity, and the fact that they were called into existence proves that they were needed as one of the factors in the normal growth of human life, as much as the mechanical, artistic or medical faculty.

That the educational work of the past, while undoubtedly it was the best that could be given under the then existing grade of development has been by the light produced by the higher unfoldment of the spiritual nature proven to be based on false premises. To eliminate those false theories in regard to life and its destiny, time will be needed, but it will be accomplished and the religious world will more clearly comprehend the truth in regard to the needs of the spiritual nature of human life.

Of all the distinctly human powers, the spiritual were the last that made their appearance above the chaotic world of primitive conditions. They were the highest type of life's manifestations, they must, according to the law of progress, be superseded by all of the other forces which had to prepare the way for the triumphal entry upon life's panorama of those elements of being that cannot be weighed in the material balance or graded according to the laws of physics.

The primitive human idea was that all of the forces of life that could not be grasped from the plane of physical being were beyond the realm where operated nature's laws; but as life advances further toward the plane of perfection it is seen that the spiritual forces of life are the more refined of nature's powers, and the phrase supernatural is removed from the vocabulary, and the realm of the mysterious passes away.

The higher development of the spiritual powers of life brings the physical and astral planes of life into more accord; the division lines which have formerly been an impassable and incomprehensible barrier, will cease to exist, and while the superiority of the astral plane will be an admitted fact, there will be more who will be able to hold while here in earth life, intelligent communion with those who have passed to that higher plane of being. Clairvoyant sight will be more fully developed, and all of the faculties which are necessary for a more perfect communion be enlarged by a more scientific truthful development of religion.

HAWAII ONCE IN THE MOON.

Professor Pickering Accounts For Peculiarities of the Pacific.

Professor W. H. Pickering of Harvard University, the noted astronomer, makes the interesting statement that, although he had never seen the volcanoes of the Hawaiian Islands previous to his recent trip there, he recognized in them old familiar friends. He says he met their ancestors from afar, as it were, through a telescope, and that they are similar to those of the moon; that is, those of the engulfment variety.

While in Honolulu Professor Pickering delivered a lecture, in which he advanced the theory that the moon was originally a part of the earth and was thrown off and that the Hawaiian Islands were about the center of this lunar gossamer. The space that was left when the moon material was thrown off was in the Pacific Ocean. The large volcanoes of Mauna Loa and Kilauea on the island of Hawaii, and Haleakala on Maui, were, Professor Pickering stated, in many ways exactly like those he had observed through a telescope on the moon.

THE SPIRITUAL NATURE.

Is It Instinctive or Educational—Which?

The evidences produced in human life by the manifestations of the spiritual nature point very plainly to the fact that it is both instinctive and educational. In the evolution of life from its lowest types to the present plane, based upon the facts of biological research, it is impossible to have knowledge of the time when the spiritual nature of the human animal first began to be made manifest. It certainly must have been there in embryo, or it would not have developed, proving the fact that it has an instinctive quality. Its growth up to the present proves also that it has had the benefit of the advantages of education; if it had not it would have perished in the embryonic stage of its existence, and human life would have remained on the animal plane of its being."

A WEIRD NARRATIVE.

It Comes From LeSueur, Minn., and Even If Fiction It Illustrates the Fact That Occult Thoughts Are Prevailing at the Present Time to a Great Extent.

About a year ago Jay Bray of Wheatley was in Minneapolis one day, and happened to pass near some auction rooms and was drawn by curiosity to go inside and see what was being sold. It was second-hand furniture and there was one piece, a splendid black walnut center table, that took his fancy very much. When it was put up on the bidding seemed very slow, which surprised him, and he started himself after a while at 50 cents. No one raised him and to his great surprise it was knocked down to him at that price. He was afraid there might be something the matter with it that he had not discovered, but the closest search revealed nothing. He took it home and it had not been there long till he found out why the old-timers among the bidders at the auction had let it alone.

It was haunted! Every night the spirit of an Indian chief, to judge by the splendor of furs and the towering head plumes, used to come and kneel down by the table and lean his forehead against one of the huge ornamentally carved legs that supported it. Bray could not stand this and, without disclosing his reason for disposing of it, sold it to the banker, Charles Otterbein, for $50. Shortly after this Otterbein gave it away as a wedding present to some relatives, and they, in their turn, soon disposed of it to a neighbor, who soon sold it to Otis Plankie of Menton.

Plankie was no more fortunate than the former owners of the table in regard to the Indian's visits, but he differed from them in not being at all troubled in his mind over it. He had never believed in ghosts before and now that he was compelled by the visits of the chief's spirit to believe in them he did not care at all whether they visited him or not. He used to sit up and try to visit with the chief when he came as usual at the midnight hour and used to shoot and throw things through the impenetrable shade that appeared to the sense of sight only to indicate that there was something there, but all that happened was that the chief's shadow would insensibly fade away and vanish.

Plankie soon began to feel sorry for the old fellow and wonder what it was that troubled him so and, giving his mind to this inquiry, soon discovered by turning the table round every day and also tipping it over, first on one side and then another, and by standing on its top, that the chief was not interested in any other part of it than one particular leg and this leg seemed to have a flaw or knotty place near the center where the wood was thickest and heaviest.

Wondering if there might not be something concealed beneath the surface that had got on the Indian's nerves in the time long gone by, Plankie cut the leg of the table off and carefully split it into slivers, looking to see what he might find.

Near the center of the leg and in what, according to the growth rings, must have been one side of a very old tree, he discovered a rounded ridge in the walnut wood, a stone arrow head, with a broken portion of the arrow to which it had belonged still attached, and meshed about the arrow and driven into the tree by its force was a tangle of jet black hair, such as might well have been found on the head of some beautiful Indian princess of the long ago.

Plankie placed the articles on the top of a small alcohol stove, so arranged that he could see fire to the fluid with an electric spark, and then waited the following night the chief came as the clock was striking twelve, and as soon as he had come he began to play with the alcohol burning and waited to see what would occur. The old chief stood calmly by, weird and awful to delicate nerves in the ghastly blue light of the burning alcohol, till the last vestige of the hair had vanished away in smoke and then he, too, floated up slowly toward the ceiling and was gone. He had never come again and Plankie had the leg of the table mended for $2, so that it is as good as ever.—Chicago Chronicle.

Letter From Mrs. D. M. Davidson.

We left home (Detroit, Mich.) on October 18, stopping at the following cities: Logansport, Ind.; Danville, Ill.; Vincennes, Ind.; and Joplin, Mo., as well as many smaller ones, and I am happy to say that my course is only represented in the following two cities, Joplin, Mo., and Topeka, Kans., where we are at the present writing.

Where are our missionaries? Only think so many poor souls starving for the light and truth and no food or help hand extended. Surely the Spiritualists of to-day ought to wake up to this great need.

In Joplin, Mo., there was a fine society, just started, and doing good work. We had the pleasure of listening to Dr. Brown, followed by Mrs. Paul who gave several good tests. But our week at Topeka has been very enjoyable. Here we had a large society presided over by Judge J. S. Ensminger, the genial, whole-souled secretary. Services every Sunday evening. The speaker, Mrs. Bessie Bellman of Howard, Kansas, is an honor to our cause. She was followed by Mrs. Inez Wagner of Topeka, who read and asked questions, unfolded, and gave a single mistake, and on Wednesday evening we (Mr. Davidson accompanying me) went to the home of Mrs. Wagner where we were treated to a very fine trumpet service. I spent Friday afternoon with the Ladies Auxiliary, which proved a very enjoyable time.

I shall ever carry with me sweet memories of the First Spiritual Church of Topeka, Kansas, and the hearty welcome extended to strangers.

Cremation Versus Burial.
It is a distinct evidence of progress, and a loosening of the hold of old-time orthodox ideas, that the subject of cremation of the dead is receiving careful and favorable attention in the columns of the daily press.

Among these may be mentioned the Chicago Chronicle, which publishes a well-considered editorial article in which it says that it is a matter for congratulation that the cremation of the dead is steadily, even if slowly, growing in favor, because it is distinctly a triumph of reason over sentiment.

The Chronicle goes on to say that in one sense we are indebted for the practice of burying the dead to Christianity.
Burial was, of course, the first method of disposing of dead bodies, but after the belief in a future life became universal in Greece and Rome at the close of the fifth century before Christ cremation came into vogue, probably from the notion that it aided in the spiritualization of the dead. This practice would have continued uninterruptedly to the present time but for the advent of Christianity and the doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

This shows how little human reason amounts to when human sentiment interferes. The idea was, of course, that cremation would interfere in some way with the resurrection, though it is hard to see how it could do so any more effectually than the decay of the body in the grave would, and the very scriptures on which the doctrine of the resurrection was based discouraged the idea of an identical resurrection.

In the fifteenth chapter of Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, which treats of the resurrection, and which is probably the sublimest chapter in the Bible, the apostle says: "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die," and he proceeds to illustrate in several ways the fact that the resurrection body is neither identical with nor exactly like the body that is buried. Yet the Christian sentiment has regard to the resurrection of the body absolutely put an end to cremation.

Modern chemistry has corroborated Paul's teachings by showing that as the same matter may belong successively to several different human bodies the exact reproduction of all of them is impossible, and this corroborates what he said. People are not so much opposed to cremation as they were, and though there is a powerful Christian sentiment arrayed against it there is a constant growth of sentiment in favor of it.

The first crematory to be built in this country was built by Dr. F. Julius Le Moine, at Washington, Pa., in 1876, and the first body cremated in it was that of Baron De Palen. Great was the horror expressed at that cremation, but the experience of 1900 showed that there were twenty crematories in this country and that 13,000 bodies had been cremated in them, though only 14,000 had been cremated in the whole of Europe in the same time. The crematory at Graceland is in constant use and the bodies incinerated there are generally those of the most intelligent and enlightened people that die in Chicago.

Cremation is an admirable practice, but it does not go quite far enough. Every crematory has an "urn hall," in which the ashes of the dead are kept as in a safe deposit vault. This is almost revolting. The ashes should be buried in the ground unless, as sometimes happens, a request has been made that they be given to the lake or sprinkled under the elms or the rose bushes of the cemetery near in vegetable ground.
The sanitary merits of cremation are much insisted upon, but it has another advantage which one would not antecipate expect. It is the universal testimony that it is less trying to the feelings of survivors than burial in the ground is. Then let us all be cremated.

More Truth Than Poetry.
The Bible, like a harp of a thousand strings,
On which a thousand varying tunes are played,
Has given birth to a thousand warring sects,
With a thousand jarring, clashing,
wordless creeds;
Each mother from the discordant, sacred, sacred,
To prove it is right and all the rest are wrong.

Beam and Mote.

The Beam in Their Eye, Scarcely a Mote in Ours.

Churchmen seem to delight in reciting the exploits of fake mediums, at the same time conveying the idea that all are frauds, and that Spiritualism is based on imposture. Their happiest moments appear to be those spent in endeavoring to weaken and destroy the only evidence yet furnished that man is immortal. All before the knowledge they imparted was hope, which inspired belief. Outside of spirit revelation there is no proof, and but little on which to base hope.

Cupidity has governed the race in all ages, and will until truth is recognized to be superior to falsehood, virtue superior to vice, and honesty, in every relation of life greatly preferable to dishonesty.

If fraud and deception has in any manner characterized our media, a condition all greatly deplore, we will offset our tricksters by those claiming to be more holy than we. Not a drop of blood has been shed in the propagation of Spiritualism. The penitents are not filled with our advocates;
neither has the gallows borne fruit whose germs were planted in our council chambers. The agonized groans of those writhing in flames, and horrified by the exultant jeers of the frenzied populace, for not believing our teaching, has never offended Heaven.
No plottings have been laid to overthrow governments, or dismember empires in our interest. Instead of laboring to enslave the people, to suppress knowledge, and encourage ignorance, and its twin sister, Superstition, ours has been the opposite. We have sought to liberate those who have been tied back to ideas which had their birth in barbarism, and which has corrupted all the fountains of life, and which have made courts of justice shambles in which the bravest and best were victimized.

Not a century has gone by since there were more than two hundred crimes which Christian governments punished with death. And it was not the Christian clergy, nor church votaries who led in terminating these damnable offenses; but it was the outgrowth of those whom "the chosen of the Lord" designated blasphemers, in-fideles and atheists. Who dares deny this avowment?

For the detection of our assailants we invite attention to an extract from Moshelm's Ecclesiastical History, showing facts in the early annals of those who find so much to condemn with us.
Instead of one section there are scores and scores of them equally virulent.
We quote the closing sentence of section 2, chapter 3, part 2, of century 4, and the whole of section 3 which follows.

It may be well to state by way of pa-rentesis, that Moshelm was born in Germany in 1694, and died while Chancellor of the University of Göttingen, in 1755. He was a very voluminous church historian, numerous volumes falling from his versatile pen. Cham-

The Art of Printing vs. Christianity.
The art of printing by movable type was introduced into England by Caxton, in 1476. Violent opposition was made to the new device for spreading knowledge by the clergy, as was the case on the continent. It was denounced as the black art, and a device of the devil. When the first book came from the English press the Bishop of London, in a convocation of his clergy, is reported to have said:

"If we do not destroy the dangerous invention, it will one day destroy us."
Because of its preserving and transmitting to later generations a correct history of the church with its bloody crimes, the infamous device to suppress knowledge, protract its power, and subordinate all classes to its deadly rule, it is very apparent the lament of the desponding Bishop had cause for his gloomy prediction. Knowledge and slavery are incompatible. In ante-bel-lum days the southern slave, so called, he learned the north star was a guide to freedom, and set out in search of liberty.
And so soon as the mentally enslaved shall learn through the press the frauds of the church, so soon will religious emancipation follow. It is inevitable, and the press is the evangel that is breaking the gyves that bind us.

The Press With Open Eyes.
One difference between Christians and heathens is that the heathen do not kill each other in religious riots.—
Washington Post.

These constant reminders by the secular press of the belligerent character of Christians, show the attention of the thinking world is turned to the past as well the present history of the dominant religion. Assuming to be vice-gerents of God, and acting in the interest of the war God Jehovah, they have made war on every people who opposed their usurpations. The conquests for the cross have all been made on the field of war. The history of the Crusades, during which millions went down in blood, gives frightful examples.
The determination to convert the German tribes to the faith, during which slaughter the entire population of full three millions, if they would not submit to his rule is a sanguinary illustration of what occurred everywhere.

To read recent ecclesiastical historians one would suppose only peaceful methods had been used to diffuse Christianity; that it had been the subject of persecution, and that heathen were the aggressors. Truthful history, not priest-written, tells a different tale.

Blessings on Them.
There is one religious sect who are regardful of the teachings of the Master, "to give all they have to the poor," so as to ensure eternal reward. They are Russians, and are known as Douk-hobors. There is a branch of them in Manitoba. They have an annual custom of giving all they have to the poor, even their clothing, and starting off naked in mid-winter in pursuit of Jesus. They are faithful to principle, and however foolish their act they believe well of us, for they strictly observe the instructions of the alleged founder of their faith.

bers, in his Cyclopaedia, designates Moshelm's theological works as exhibiting "great learning, fullness and accuracy."
This learned author says:

"The brevity we have proposed to observe in this history, prevents our entering into an ample detail of the dismal effects which arose from the progress and the baneful influence of superstition now become universal."

"This, indeed, among other unhappy effects, opened a wide door to the en-less frauds of those odious impostors, who were so far destitute of all principle, as to enrich themselves by the ignorance and errors of the people. Rumors were artfully spread abroad of prodigies and miracles to be seen in certain places—a rich man practiced by the heathen priests—and the design of these reports was to draw the popular, in multitudes, to these places, and to impose upon their credulity. These stratagems were generally successful; for the ignorance and slowness of apprehension of the people, to whom everything that new and singular appears miraculous, rendered them easily the dupes of this abominable artifice.
Nor was this all; certain tombs were falsely given out as the sepulchers of saints and confessors; the list of the saints was augmented with fictitious names, and even robbers were converted into martyrs. Some buried the bones of dead men in certain retired places, and then affirmed, that they were divinely admonished, by a dream, that the body of some friend of God lay there. Many, especially of the monks, traveled through the different provinces, and not only sold with the most flagrant impudence, their fictitious relics, but also deceived the eyes of the multitude with ludicrous combats with evil spirits or gnomes. A whole volume would be requisite to contain an enumeration of the various frauds which artful knaves practiced, with success, to delude the ignorant, when true religion was almost entirely superseded by horrid superstition."

We imagine, while the Protestant reader will readily concede the representations made by the German scholar are unquestionably truthful, yet he will claim it was of Roman Catholicism and its iniquitous acts of whom Moshelm was writing. Until 1520 there was no Protestantism, and Christianity during all its forming stage, until less than four hundred years ago, was the creature of that infamous conclave of priests and pope. Every forgery of gospels, epistles, or history; every victim shut up in dungeons, tortured on the rack or broken on the wheel, burned at the stake or buried alive; and every war waged to propagate the faith where millions went down in blood, was in aid of the faith, shared in alike by Catholics and Protestants. The money received from the sale of criminal indulgences, which caused Luther's revolt, passed into the common treasury of the church. The church revered the Bible itself was first found in the hands of these forgers and assassins, and Protestants received it from their hands. For ages the wealth of the world was wasted in propagating this ecclesiastical tyranny; its priests living in luxury and vice, subsisting on the products of money wrested from ignorance and the hands of the poor, with threats of endless damnation if the attend was withheld.

Such being the case, instead of condemning Spiritualists because a few shameless frauds have intruded themselves into our ranks, they should give in our effort to get rid of them while struggling with the TRUTH, and place it on an enduring base.

Russian Superstitions.
A curious illustration of the superstitious notions held by Russians, is found in a paper recently read before the Geographical Society in Berlin by Professor Vinogradoff. The savant said many of these had got such a hold on the people that even some who had gone through a university course find it difficult to shake off all belief in them.

In the government of Kostroma, when a person is seriously ill, he or she is anointed with honey. If flies settle on the honey it is a sign of recovery.

If the honey turns black the patient is doomed to die. Great leaves placed in a patient's armpits indicate recovery, if they remain fresh, or a fatal issue if they fade quickly.

If a dog will eat a piece of bacon with which a sick man has been rubbed he will surely get better.

Dying man is given choice morsels of food to eat, and is asked by his friends to convey their greetings to those who have departed before. The door of the sick-room is then opened, so that Death may enter. A basin of water is placed with a towel on the window sill, as "the soul will be taking a bath." Candles are lit before all sacred images to prevent the devil from snatching the soul away. The corpse is clad in garments with felt boots.

If a person awakes from a trance it is believed that he or she has actually died and has returned only to cause the death of other living creatures, and should therefore be severely beaten with church keys.

The lecturer declared that he had known cases where persons had been killed in this manner after waking from a trance. Trees and shrubs may be planted on a grave, but not an aspen, on which Judas Iscariot is supposed to have hanged himself, nor any trees with needle-shaped leaves.

The Difference Between Paul and Jesus.

Throughout the Gospels Jesus is represented as making war on riches, and in promising heavenly favors to the poor.

"Thou lackest one thing yet," said he to the inquirer who represented himself as otherwise faultless, "Sell all thou hast and give it to the poor."
Lazarus' only virtue, for which he was promised a place in Abraham's bosom, was his extreme poverty, subsisting on the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table.

Paul lauded ignorance. In the clearest and most pointed language he maintained the absolute necessity of extreme ignorance to attain celestial wisdom. He rejoiced in the power of God to destroy the wisdom of the wise, bringing to nothing the understanding of the prudent, and purposely choosing the foolish things of this world to confound the wise. See I. Cor. 1:27. Of himself he said, II. Corinthians 11:23,
"I speak as a fool, and modern learning is confirming the estimate he placed on himself."

Poverty and ignorance go hand in hand, and the less we have of either the better for the race.

THE MEDIUM BAILEY.

Holding Important Circles in Australia to Further Elucidate His Wonderful Powers—He is Working Under the Auspices of T. W. Stanford, and Great Results Are Anticipated:

To the Editor:—By the last mail Mr.
T. W. Stanford of Melbourne, Australia, writes me that, the general publication of those Examiner articles on Spiritism and Dr. Jordan, have put NEW LIFE INTO THE CAUSE, and given rise to much controversy in that country. The Sydney Times has a representative in Melbourne who has become a member of the Stanford circles with Mr. Bailey, the medium, who will report each sitting for his paper, and which will no doubt be an accurate presentation of the same. He says:

"THE INTEREST IS SURPRISING.
I have re-engaged Bailey, his power having returned, and now have a circle of twenty-five persons, all deeply interested in the phenomena, BOTH PHYSI-CAL AND MENTAL. Though we have not had three sittings (once a week), the results are excellent."

Letters of inquiry are reaching him in great numbers from all the colonies, and he is sending out great quantities of literature to meet the demands.

Professor Jordan having expressed a willingness to have psychology lectured at the university, Mr. Stanford will put forth his best efforts for the early attainment of that object.

ONE WOMAN'S VIEW.
Christian Spiritualism, or of Any Other Name.

Christian Astronomy, Christian chemistry, Christian sunshine, or any other shine. Such a prefix seems a little misleading, but changes nothing.
Truth is truth, and facts are facts, all the same.

Spiritualism is coeval with humanity, call it Christian or heathen. It has always existed and always will exist. A person's opinion of it affects only the one who cherishes the opinion. It is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, however differently or by what name people may represent it. Its founder was the same as the founder of humanity.
It will cease when humanity ceases.

Humanity at the present time is composed of human beings in various stages of development, good, bad and indifferent. Spiritualism embraces all, just as humanity does. Men have always differed in opinion upon various points, and doubtless always will. Variety is the spice of life; let them differ, but do not quarrel about it.

Every man but Spiritualism has a personal founder. The disciples were first called Christians at Antioch. Who called them Christians then, and why?
Not the disciples, but the outsiders, to stigmatize them because they were followers of that disturber of the peace called Christ. Later, when they began to divide up into sects and churches, they were distinguished by the names of the local leaders, somewhat as Christians are to-day.

Spiritualism is named for no man or body of men. It belongs to all time and space. Discovered by every person into whose consciousness it enters.
Known for a certainty by the experienced, or by those whose reason tells them that the manifestations could be produced by nothing else—that the communications received could not be given from any other source than what they purported to be. Spiritualism is not dependent upon believers or followers; accepted or rejected it is Spiritualism still, and cannot be destroyed.
A principle enduring.

Calling a man a Spiritualist, a Christian or an infidel, does not make him one, nor does it change or injure the individual so called. There are too many believers in Spiritualism who are not called Spiritualists. All who are receptive and desirous can be taught the truths and realize the freedom and happiness afforded.

COMPARE THEM.
Spiritualism, Religion and Legerdemain
From the Standpoint of H. E.
Pomeroy.

Take Spiritualism, religion and legerdemain, and compare them, which is nearest scientific and which the most satisfying to the mind. There are too many Spiritualists who can spend an evening with Kellar, see miracles performed equal to any levitation or materialization, and know all the time that the artist is honest because he tells his audience at the commencement, "This is deception; you could do as well as I if you only knew how."

Will a dark seance or a religious pow-wow leave as good feeling?
Can a person think it over afterward and not feel sold? A rogue will not give his game away; a professional prestidigitator says, "It is my game and I play for pay." Are the reverends of any denomination more honest?

This is not written as criticism, but for comparison. It is by comparison that we come to know the truth in many cases.

Hudson Tuttle, in The Progressive Thinker of Dec. 23, speaks of Margaret Coe as a healer, in terms that carry conviction to the mind. He is a true
"Spiritualist" of the highest order.
He says the key to her success is her wonderful magnetism; thinks her spiritually endowed. So do I—endowed by the "spirit of truth and love"—the comforter. "No commercialism," he says.
I think she must be a follower of the Christ.

Does she have any trouble with fraudulent mediums?

Is she fit to ride at half-past?
I believe she has the very kind of Spiritualism that honest people desire and that cannot be counterfeited. I would give more to spend an evening with her than I would of even Dr. Dogma.

Write and an inquiry.

Spinoza, one of the most learned philosophers of the 17th century, who devoted his whole life to study and literary research, born in 1632, was pronounced a "God-intoxicated man," because he believed God was an ever-present reality, and everything was due to his immediate interference.

There are persons in our day who ascribe all the operations of natural law to the immediate agency of the Divine.
Every wind, every cloud and storm, all the forces of nature and even the development of a human being, are attributed to the direct interference of God-intoxicated apply to them? And would spirit-intoxicated be a just designation of those who seem to imagine all our blessings come from good spirits, and all our curses from evil spirits?

A. LEAH UNDERHILL.

One of the Original Fox Sisters, at Hydesville, N. Y., Expresses Her Opinion in Reference to Materializations.

At the same time I think that the cause of Spiritualism would be at this day further advanced in general acceptance, if cabinets, and with them the phenomena called materialization and transfiguration, had never been introduced.
For, however genuine, as well as impressive, may be the manifestations of the presence and action of the spirits which may have occurred in the employment of them, they afford opportunities for deception which dishonest mediums are but too ready to avail themselves of, and then when exposure comes (and it is generally Spiritualists who are the most earnest in detecting and punishing the infamy of such deception), they are at once trumpeted all over the land, and more harm is done to the progress of the cause than all the good ever resulting from the genuine phenomena themselves. No such exposures ever occurred in all our long and varied experience, though never have mediums been subjected to more jealous and severe investigations; and there are few of the more modern phenomena which have not occurred through our mediumship.—A. Leah Underhill in "The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism," Page 413.

The Curtain Will Rise.

Week after next the Curtain will rise on a new scene in connection with a white hat, a white dress, a pair of white shoes, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll. Can a spirit transfer the same to his spirit home, first dematerializing them, and wearing them there, and then materialize them again at will to wear them on earth. This subject will be fully considered, and light thrown on the mysteries of the dark cabinet, from which so many questionable "messages" appear, dressed in false wigs, false whiskers, earthly made illuminated dresses and other tog-gery. Spiritualists all along the line are becoming more interested than ever in the investigations being carried on through the leadership of The Progressive Thinker, and the end is not yet. The following omissions will be supplied, showing who the medium is, through whom such wonderful materializations and dematerializations are given.

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration

of spirit power took place at some time ago. A short time before Christmas the [giving name]
cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. One lady got her a nice white hat; another
made her a white dress; another provided her with a pair of white shoes;
another with a pair of white stockings;
and others with scarf, fan and doll.
These articles were presented to her
for a Christmas present and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the seance room. When inquiry was made,
the spirit said she took them to her
spirit home.

A Pointed Objection.

Count Tolstoy says one time he published the Sermon on the Mount for the use of the Russian peasantry. Before placing it in the hands of those for whom it was prepared, he had to get the Censor's consent. To that end a copy was placed in the hands of that functionary. When it came back the passage, "Take no thought of the morrow," was obliterated. Tolstoy applied to the priest who was officiating as Censor, and represented that the direction was by Jesus himself, was a part of the Bible, and as sacred as any other part of it.

"Oh, yes," replied the priest, "but what peasant ever gets that far in the Bible? Nine-tenths of them stop at Genesis. Now, you see, Count, if the peasant took that advice seriously Russia would become bankrupt. The peasant would live only for the day, he would save nothing; it would be impossible to collect taxes; the army would starve; the government could not pay its employees; indeed, we should be in a state of chaos. Really, I cannot let that verse go unblatantly."

Was not the priest Censor correct?

PRESIDENT ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

He Rescued a Pig From the Mire to Prevent Its Suffering.

To the Editor:—I have felt lonely for a long time when wondering if I were the only one who thought of the cruelty to our fellow creatures practiced by our presidents, and thereby setting a bad example to the coming generation; but since Lady Florence Dix has the courage to bring the fact to notice and vividly portray the suffering they inflict, I feel that I am not entirely alone when thinking of such wantonly cruelty.

The "good book" tells us that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the notice of our heavenly Father.

What a contrast between our present rulers and our honored and beloved Lincoln who manifested the God or good within, when he willingly risked solving his good clothes by extricating a pig from the mire to save it from suffer-right side clothed in a long, white garment."

so that I can do without glasses. I very seldom use my spectacles now, and can study up to eleven o'clock in the afternoon without any strain.

Actina is not a drug or lotion, but a small perfect safety, which can be used by old and young with perfect safety. It is not a medicine, nor any harm with Actina. Every member of a General Survey.

The Spiritualistic Field—Its Workers, Its Work, and General Progress, the World Over.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can best be subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that the Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine. You must make speed equal to about four words per minute. That is, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper. Please bear this in mind.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and sometimes to two lines, as occasion may require.

TAKE DUE NOTICE.—That all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. If not, it will not do so. Secretary of Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

KEEP COPIES OF YOUR POEMS sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

THIS GENERAL SURVEY DEPARTMENT IS ONLY INTENDED TO CHRONICLE THE ENGAGEMENTS AND WORK OF SPEAKERS AND MEDIUMS. A REPORT OF WHAT THE VARIOUS SPEAKERS SAY WILL NOT BE PUBLISHED, AS WE HAVE NOT SPACE SUFFICIENT FOR THAT PURPOSE.

We desire the work, "MORAL EDUCATION," by Prof. Joseph R. Buchanan. Who has a copy?

Dora C. Crosby, state secretary, writes: "The Iowa State Convention will hold its annual meeting in Des Moines, Jan. 18 to 21, inclusive. Nearly all the speakers and mediums secured for this convention are new to the Iowa annual gatherings, and we believe Spiritualists will be especially attracted to the work of the morning of the 18th. There is work in the vineyard, and all are under obligations to come and do your share. We do not want any shirkers in Iowa."

A. Haeger writes: "At the Temple Light and Truth, Sunday, Dec. 31, we had with us the mediums, Mr. Wm. Arnold, Mrs. Binz, Mrs. Korbus and Mrs. Gantner. Our pastor, Mrs. Th. Loh, gave us a lecture in German, and Mr. Arnold favored the evening with a lecture in English, followed by Mrs. Korbus in German. Mrs. Binz and Mrs. Gantner gave tests, all recognized. Mr. Arnold gave us a demonstration of his gift, under test conditions—Independent writing and music; messages written by spirits were recognized, and those who had come went home happy for they knew they had spent one of the most beautiful evenings of the year."

C. F. Sullivan writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "Our chosen work is progressing very nicely notwithstanding some discouraging circumstances by way of ill health on the part of both the matron and manager, but we are now somewhat better and hope soon to be in our usual health. We have recently taken another child into the home. The children are all developing beautifully—are rosy, healthy and happy as the day is long. We anticipate for the future a group of young men and women fully indoctrinated in the principles of our beautiful harmonious philosophy, ready to spread the light of Spiritualism for spiritual purposes, and we hope to put forward the work of gathering up outcast children in which work they will be better equipped than we are. Our greatest regret is our lack of help and ability to take more children; but we have faith to believe that the power over us and those in spirit who are helping under Him will yet open the way for us to accomplish more. Anniversary exercises will be held in Massachusetts Hall, Wednesday, March 28, 1906, afternoon and evening."

The president of the First Spiritual Church of Baltimore, Md., writes: "We believe in the immortality of the soul, and the continued identity of the individual after the change called death. We believe that the exchange of intelligence between the spirits of the so-called dead and human beings on earth is scientifically proven. We believe in the moral responsibility of the individual; and that, in accordance with his thoughts and deeds, peace or suffering comes to him by the natural operation of changeless spiritual laws. We believe that the door of reformation is never closed, but that the pathway of progression lies eternally unobstructed before every human soul."

G. W. Nutting writes from Brockton, Mass.: "At the annual meeting of the People's Progressive Spiritual Association held Monday evening, Jan. 1, 1906, the following officers were elected: Mrs. Annie Bosworth, vice-president; Chas. E. Allen, recording secretary; Chas. E. Allen; recording secretary, Geo. W. Nutting; treasurer, Mrs. Josie Harding; trustees for three years, J. B. Hastings. The association will hold a fair in aid of its building fund, in Massachusetts Hall, April 5, 6 and 7, 1906. Mrs. M. Pearsall writes from Des Moines, Iowa: "The premium books received, for which I thank you. They are truly a Christmas present. I now have two more nice books to add to my little library. I have all the premium books and prize them very highly."

Dr. G. W. Brown writes: "I am glad to report new life has been infused into the Psychic Society of Rockford, Ill. The promise for the New Year is indeed cheering. At its session on the evening of Dec. 31, there was a good attendance, persons coming from Belvidere, Peconia, and Janesville, Wis. Mrs. E. J. Hanson, of 76 Highland, Chicago, a very earnest, argumentative and logical inspirational speaker, from a text furnished by the audience, entertained and instructed the audience, in a clear, distinct voice for near an hour. At the close the large audience, by a unanimous standing vote, invited her to remain another week, and to return to us at her early convenience. Eight new members were received into the society, who were beautifully addressed by Mrs. Hanson, after which they received welcome and the glad hand from the old members. I was much pleased to find The Progressive Thinker has so many patrons in Rockford, and I am assured its list will be considerably enlarged during the next few weeks. Success to it, and to its enterprising publisher. The paper is worthy a million readers. I heard some of its patrons express a wish it was annually indexed, for the convenience of those who preserve files for binding, as it would be well if more adopted this method of preserving it. What a valuable heirloom it would be to transmit to later generations!"

A. B. Gaston of Meadville, Pa., writes: "The Spiritualists of this city have recently organized and would like to correspond with speakers and mediums who may pass this way this winter."

Prof. W. M. Lockwood, the widely known physicist, experimentalist and student in natural philosophy and psychology, delivered a lecture for the New Thought Spiritual Society of Grand Rapids, Mich., in the Holland Unitarian Church, corner East Bridge and North Tonia streets, during the month of January, 1906. In addition to his Sunday discourses, he will give mid-week lectures upon the X-ray, demonstrating principles of clairvoyance, a lecture upon the relation of Atmospheres of Health, illustrated by a full set of Prof. Crookes' Scale Vacuum Tubes, also a lecture upon the spectra and variation of Life Principles manifest in plasmas, bioplasmas and mammalian varieties of existence, illustrated by the spectra of a set of Geissler's vacuum tubes. All of Prof. Lockwood's lectures are exceedingly interesting, elevating and instructive. Make a note of this: Prof. Lockwood is the only speaker on the public rostrum in this country who establishes the spiritual philosophy upon nature and her psychic processes, and demonstrates it. He not only affirms that continuity of life is a fact in cosmic process, but he demonstrates the communication between the two spheres of existence is the same as on the earth plane—viz., by symbols of sign and symbols of sound. He is the only speaker who employs scientific apparatus to demonstrate the underlying principles of Spiritualism, and in this field of work is called "The Peer of the American Rostrom."

One of the closing events of the year just past was the Spiritual watch meeting at the home of J. I. Mills on East Main street, Elwood, Ind., where there were more than one hundred guests in attendance. The guests assembled early in the evening and remained until the New Year was proclaimed by the usual blowing of whistles and ringing of bells. During the evening, Mrs. Mills gave a number of positive tests, all of which were recognized and J. M. Markley made an interesting speech after which he presented Mrs. Mills the license which declares her a spiritual minister. Mrs. Mills, in her response, showed her appreciation. Hugh Donnelly, a popular reader, entertained in a most pleasing manner. At the arrival of the year 1906 the guests departed for their several homes, wishing each and all a happy New Year.

Dr. Beverly writes: "Over 100 remained at the service and witnessed the passing out of the old year, and the coming in of the bright new year, represented by a little girl of six years, dressed in white, who wished all a happy new year, and sang two verses of a new year song. The new attractions at Arlington Hall, 31st street and Indiana avenue, are drawing a large number of people who enjoy a live meeting, where they can find honest demonstrations of the power of the spirit, for many are hungering for spiritual food which every true medium so freely gives forth to the multitude. Our society has no indebtedness, and has never solicited such a prosperous condition as now, we invite all willing workers to come and help. We appreciate the services of The Progressive Thinker and will soon send you a large number of new subscribers, for this work of purification will go on, for we are living in testing times. All the staff shall be consumed, while the wheat is scattered upon the heart soil that is waiting for the truth."

Gustave Williams writes: "Sunday, December 24, our meeting was well attended, quite a number little folks being present, and as is customary with the North Star Spiritual Union, Santa Claus paid his annual visit, distributing presents to all. We had a literary program for the evening. Sister Letzger gave beautiful messages. We have the good fortune in securing Mrs. Letzger as our medium. We earnestly invite all co-workers and every one to visit us. All mediums and speakers are cordially invited. All will be recognized and made welcome at our hall, 1545 Milwaukee avenue."

TOPIC FOR THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.

Sunday, January 14: "What Dood Does It Do?"

Gen of Thought:
What good does it do? Is asked again.
How much does it give of joy or pain?
Is your thought and word and deed
each day
To cheer and help along life's way?

Facts are good for minds that move in doubt,
Cheer for the heart hedged with gloom about;
But Love is the best for every soul,
Love's a part of the infinite Whole.
—J. W. R.

J. W. Gill writes: "The circles held at the residence of Mrs. Hamilton Gill, 522 West Monroe street, on Sunday and Thursday evenings, have shown a large attendance and ever increasing interest in all that relates to Spiritualism. The remarkable tests given by her spirit controls 'Nannie' and 'Minnie' have taken away the bitterness of death and proved beyond a doubt that those passed on are not in some far away heaven, although invisible to mortal eyes, are ever near them, ready to help guide and console. At one of these meetings a spirit giving the name 'Edith' told her aunt she possessed some hair belonging to this spirit that had been cut off her head after she had been buried some twelve years, the spirit giving the name 'Helen' came to her mother and told about her niece Bessie having swallowed a penny and was to undergo an operation and that it would prove successful and that Bessie would not pass over. Both ladies acknowledged that those present in the circle that above messages were correct."

Ferd C. Suhrer writes: "Sunday afternoon, Dec. 31, the congregation of the Rising Sun Mission had the pleasure of listening to a few words from Bro. Underwood, an inspirational speaker quite out of the ordinary. Sisters Andrews and Weaver added their valuable services by giving messages. A larger number than usual remained for lunch and the watch night service in the evening, among whom were several from Austin, Oak Park and other suburbs. In the evening our speaker was Dr. J. MacFarland, already popular on the Spiritualistic platform. The message to be given was 'The Future of the Human Race.' The speaker secured the Doctor as regular speaker. The services continued on and Sisters Dill, Andrews, Kirchner and Brother Thompson brought cheer and sunshine to many aching, saddened hearts with their spirit messages. Our full choir was in attendance and rendered some very impressive and beautiful selections. At midnight, at the request of President Kirchner, all bowed our heads in silent prayer for about five minutes. The ladies of the congregation had thoughtfully provided a lunch of hot coffee and sandwiches which was served in the ante-rooms. The ladies of the Mission always mix their love and magnetism in what they do and its influence for good is always felt. The Rising Sun Mission never held a more successful and encouraging service. Its officers and members have every reason to feel thankful for the bright and promising future that stretches before it in 1906. The eloquent Hon. Charles Hughes will deliver an address for us Sunday evening, Jan. 14. Visitors are invited to all our services. Those who will be benefited by a visit to the Mission, 378 S. Western avenue, afternoons at 3 and evenings at 8."

Julius Wagner writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "The last Sunday in the old year was celebrated with tests and a fine lecture by Mrs. Bristol, at the Grand Army Hall, West Diamond street, afternoon and evening. Mrs. Bristol's conference was a most interesting and successful one. The evening was spent in speaking and tests. A little girl of eleven years old, gave some splendid tests under control. Your humble servant gave a few delineations, reading from the head and face. All enjoyed the evening's program."

Rev. P. M. Esser writes: "As my engagement with the North Star Spiritual Union has expired with the year 1905, I hereby announce to Spiritualistic societies and the general public, that my services in the capacity as minister, dealer and lecturer of the spiritual doctrine, if needed, will be answered promptly and reasonably."

W. F. Schumacher writes: "The Spiritualistic Church Students of Nature held its last service at Van Buren opera house, which was well attended. The Hephzibah Order, an auxiliary of the Students of Nature, performed in oriental costumes. They magnificently gave for the benefit of the sick, which made a deep impression on the audience. Mrs. M. Schumacher, the pastor, will continue to serve this society at its new hall, 461 W. North avenue, corner Robey street and Milwaukee avenue. Good mediums will be present at all our services."

W. J. Elmo writes: "The watch meeting held at Vincennes Hall, 3514 Vincennes avenue, by the Spiritual Alliance church, will long be remembered as a banner meeting. The attendance was large, and Prof. F. M. Scharnberger let the guide handle the discourse, 'Biblical Spiritualism,' which was enjoyed by all. He is a splendid lecturer. Address him for engagements at No. 3187 Cottage Street, Chicago. J. K. Hill, well known to all, was with us, and as at his best. He gave names and tests, showing he was not alone in the work. Mrs. Elmo let her guide, Blue Bell, who is a favorite with all, give some convincing messages. As our regular service was over and was making ready for watch service, Mr. Ewert, president of Hyde Park Society, 319 S. 55th street, came in with his members and attendants of their church. Then Mrs. Burland and her society, of Hopkins Hall, 53rd street, came, followed by Prof. Stoller and society, of 77 31st street, comprising the four societies. There were plenty of messages from the other side, and 1906 was brought forth with much joy and happiness. Vincennes Hall was blessed with a good spiritual influence and a large attendance, and will continue to have good meetings at 3 and 8 p. m., every Sunday. Mrs. May Elmo, pastor and test medium. Visiting mediums are always welcome. Test sessions every Wednesday evening. Hall and residence, same number."

Correspondent writes: "Sunday evening, Dec. 31, was indeed a grand evening for the Independent Church of 'Truth,' corner 47th street and Grand Blvd. The hall was filled with a most intelligent audience, and the short talks by Dr. H. A. Cross, H. C. Smith, David Drulliner and Mr. West were most enthusiastically received, creating an excellent condition for the psychics who followed: Mrs. Henrietta Lichtig, Mrs. Cowen, Mrs. Myers and George Gladys Cooley, all of whom did excellent work reaching many seekers after truth with their spirit messages."

Joyful indeed were those seventeen children who were entertained at a Christmas dinner party by Meredith B. Little of Glen Falls, N. Y. The young guests were brought from needy homes and the entertainment prepared for them by their generous host opened their eyes with surprise and appreciation for the good things set before them. The dining-room was decorated in true holiday style with Christmas greens and the favors were bunches of carnations. The feast was most abundant and appetizing. There was a big roast turkey, a chicken pot pie, and vegetable plente; ice cream and other dainties followed. After dinner the

A GREAT TIDAL WAVE

THE CURTAIN, SOON TO RISE ON THE DARK CABINET AND ITS CONTENTS.

Never before in the whole history of Spiritualism has there been such an upheaval in our ranks as now. Never before has the attention of Spiritualists been directed towards The Progressive Thinker to such a great extent as at present. They look to it as the great exponent of a living vital truth. They know it is the only Spiritualist paper on earth today that dares lift the curtain on the frauds that infest our ranks, and show our people the difference between Legerdemain Spiritualism and that which is genuine. From the North, South, East and West subscriptions are pouring in, and from all sides comes the cry: "Give us light on the dark cabinet with its artificial toggery, its legerdemain, its lightning change artist, its ghostly wigs, beards, illuminated gowns, etc."

That is just what we propose to do. So send in your subscriptions at once. The Tidal Wave is on. Keep it in the ascendency. TRUTH PROMOTES a cause; ERROR INJURES it, or totally destroys it. One Brother living at Ft. Worth, Texas, sends in one hundred and eighty yearly subscribers; another, H. E. Russegue of Hartford, Ct., sends eight; others too numerous to mention; send in from two to five, and all combined make a vital Tidal Wave. Remember, the Curtain is SOON TO RISE on the Dark Cabinet, disclosing its contents, whether of truth or falsehood.

undeniable evidence of spirit return. The beautiful solos by Mrs. Pierce were grand and appropriate to the occasion, and brought forth a most hearty applause. This beautiful singer will be present at all future meetings. While there had been no attempt to hold a watch meeting, the program was so interesting and varied that it was after eleven o'clock before the large audience seemed dismissed. All seemed to be enjoying their pleasure in having been present. Thus ended the last meeting of the year with a general good feeling toward all.

THE N. S. A. MISSIONARIES GOING SOUTH.—E. W. Sprague and wife are serving the Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., the Sundays and Mondays of January, 1906. They will answer calls to hold meetings in other places within two hundred miles of Washington, remaining one week each evening of the month. They expect to leave Washington the last of January for a trip through the South. Individuals or societies wishing their services will please address them as follows: No. 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Minnie Lambert writes: "Thanks for the good The Progressive Thinker has done for me. It has been a great help. Mrs. A. Averill, of Lynn, Mass., has a fine piece in this week's Progressive Thinker, entitled 'Angels Whispering.'"

Mrs. Lily LeSueur writes from Dallas, Texas: "Sunday evening, Dec. 31, the Truth Seekers' Society of Spiritualists of this city held a very interesting meeting. Mrs. Isa Wilson Kaynor, pastor, gave a grand discourse appropriate to the occasion of the old year passing away and the coming in of the new year. Prophecies for the coming year were given of deep import. At the close of the discourse the messages given by Mrs. Kaynor were in every instance correct and satisfactory. The young folks have appealed to Mrs. Kaynor to assist them in starting a series of evening meetings of some kind; the first one may be a box party, then closing with a social hop. All members of the society and their friends are cordially invited to assist the young people in this venture to make it a success. We had a very pleasant social evening, and as the ladies had provided refreshments, a large lunch was served with coffee, at midnight, and the old year was watched out and the new year coming in amid the din of cannon and fire works. Many plans were discussed for the future welfare of the society, and a happy new year's greeting to all for 1906."

F. H. Morrill writes from Philadelphia: "The Helen Stuart-Richings has lectured the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia during December to interested and increasing audiences, and has given great satisfaction. Considerable has been said in the past about Mrs. Richings having renounced Spiritualism, and on Sunday evening, December 17, she explained her position and said that although she retired from active work on the Spiritualist platform for a few years, she never renounced the cause and claims to have always been a Spiritualist since first being convinced of its truth. At the close of the meeting one of our veterans in the association, Capt. F. J. Koffer, thanked Mrs. Richings for her word of explanation, and moved that she be fully endorsed. The motion was seconded and carried unanimously by a rising vote. Another member moved that the secretary be requested to communicate these facts to the spiritual press, which motion was also seconded and carried."

Joyful indeed were those seventeen children who were entertained at a Christmas dinner party by Meredith B. Little of Glen Falls, N. Y. The young guests were brought from needy homes and the entertainment prepared for them by their generous host opened their eyes with surprise and appreciation for the good things set before them. The dining-room was decorated in true holiday style with Christmas greens and the favors were bunches of carnations. The feast was most abundant and appetizing. There was a big roast turkey, a chicken pot pie, and vegetable plente; ice cream and other dainties followed. After dinner the delighted children were ushered into another room where substantial gifts awaited each little one. The girls received dressed dolls and each boy was made happy with a jumper suit. Two books, a pound of candy, a pound of nuts, an apple, an orange and a banana also appeared to gladden the heart of each youngster. Mr. Little is a Spiritualist and a profound thinker along occult lines.

B. F. Graves writes: "Pennville, Jay county, Indiana, and neighborhood, are early a strong locally in Spiritualism, earnest and steadfast adherents. Many of them came direct from the Quaker society. These martyrs are now on the spirit side of life, but were the nucleus around which grew our present strong spiritual organization. Friends themselves, once persecutors at Salem, Mass., here the inaugurators and leaders in Spiritualism and liberal views and works. The Spiritualists have a substantial hall, named West Grove, where the true philosophy is preached by both home and outside talent to way-faring men and women. We have some good mediums in all phases: Mrs. Nora Bowman, a rapping, clairaudient, clairvoyant and personalizing medium; holds one or two circles a week, alternating between home of Dr. Jones and Col. Bowman. Her seances are largely attended and give marked satisfaction, and are given free, without price; not free, figuratively speaking, as is the religion of Jesus, but 'actually free' for the benefit of the association, and the preservation of the cause is the saving light of Modern Spiritualism."

Henrietta L. Lichtig writes: "The regular business meeting of the Illinois Sunflower Club, is held Tuesday, Jan. 9, at 2 p. m., in Lincoln Hall, Fraternity Building, 70 East Adams street. The election of officers for the ensuing year will be an important feature of the meeting. Let all members be present."

Mary B. Hill writes: "A progressive seance party will be given under the auspices of the Band of Harmony, Jan. 11, 1906, at the home of Mrs. Garner, 467 Farwell avenue, Rogers Park. Take Clark street limits car to barn; there get on Evanston car; get off at Pratt avenue; walk one block west to Central avenue, then one block north. Eight prizes are to be given. Score cards 25 cents. Afternoon session to begin at 8 o'clock. Evening session at 8. Each person brings a lunch."

Eva L. Stewart writes: "Dr. J. H. Randall gave one of his most spiritual talks at the Hyde Park Occult Society hall on the last Sunday of the old year. He was at his best and did great justice to the subject. After the exercises of the evening about fifteen of us went to the watch meeting at Vincennes Hall, where we found many more and all had a good time, watching the old year out and the new year in. Those who received messages were well pleased. We are contemplating starting a developing class soon. Don't forget we have a very pleasant social time at our Thursday evening dances. On January 14, Dr. C. S. Tidale of Missouri commences his course of lectures, Sunday evenings, and his class on Sunday afternoons, promptly at 2 o'clock."

T. J. McFeron writes: "The First Spiritual Society of San Diego, Cal., has just closed a very successful and profitable engagement with that 'venerable pilgrim,' Dr. J. M. Peebles, who occupies the lecture room in the First Spiritual Temple during the month of December, and all who have been fortunate enough to hear the Doctor in his truly soul-inspiring, uplifting talks, can realize what a treat we have had. He goes from here to-morrow to Desano, for a few weeks' visit, after which we hope to have the Doctor with us again for a season. We have an engagement with Moses and Mattie Hull for the month of January, and are anticipating a royal good time during their stay with us."

Mrs. Bullene, the well known lecturer, is now lying sick in a hospital at Denver, Colo. We trust her sickness will be of short duration, and that she will soon be able to resume her work.

SPIRIT CONTROL AN ADJUNCT IN SURGERY.—Dr. H. A. Cross writes: "I have, within the past few days, performed an act of surgery for a nervous medium while she was under the control of an Indian spirit. The spirit took control of the medium for the express purpose of having the operation performed upon the medium painlessly. It was pre-arranged with the spirit, and was entirely successful in every particular, the medium not knowing that the operation had been performed until recovering from the control, and then upon being informed of the fact, expressed pleasing surprise and satisfaction."

James L. Dow writes from Manhattan, Kansas: "Marian Allen, a graduate of the Kansas State Agricultural College, and one of our most popular girls, as well as being an enthusiastic Spiritualist, was married to Thomas Warner Buel, Jr., who is also a graduate of the same college. They were married on January 1, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Flora M. Allen. The rooms were beautifully decorated. A substantial and elegant repast was served to the large crowd, there being sixty-two invited guests present, and all had a most enjoyable time; the press of the winter, and at the morning of the future home will be at Roanoke, Texas, at which place The Progressive Thinker will be sent to them."

Maggie Henry writes: "On New Year's eve, at Spiritual Mission Chapel (Old 77) we had very fine meetings. In the evening we had a very full house. Harmony reigned supreme and brought forth some very interesting and instructive answers to the questions asked by the audience. Our speaker, Prof. F. M. Stoller was at his best. At the beginning of 1907 we hope he will still be at Old 77. His lecture was followed by very convincing proof of spirit return by Madame Lucile DeLoux, and our speaker and your correspondent."

Louise Austin, secretary, writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "The First Spiritual Society of St. Joseph held its first meeting on the evening of Dec. 31, at the morning meeting devoted to business, we elected three new officers. The present officers are: J. O. Stevens, president; W. C. Jessup, vice-president; Louise Austin, secretary; Mrs. W. J. McDaniel, treasurer. W. F. Peck of St. Louis, Mo., was with us two Sundays in December, the 17th and 24th, and he will return the month of January. This is his first visit to St. Joseph, but we sincerely hope not his last. He is an able speaker. We know he will do much good. Dr. W. O. Knowles will lecture for us during February. He has never been with us before, but from the reputation he has as a lecturer and test medium, we feel we have a great treat in store. W. C. Jessup deserves great praise for the work he is doing here. This is the fourth winter he has spent in St. Joseph and the people know how to appreciate genuine manifestations such as he gives. Other mediums who deserve much credit for their work are Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Turner. They are trance mediums and are doing a good work. Mrs. Turner is a trance medium, but does not public work, as she has not fully developed that phase. Her manifestations are exceedingly good."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

The Good Work Being Done by Mrs. E. H. Messersmith.

To the Editor:—A New Year's dinner and entertainment was given by Mrs. E. H. Messersmith, who is at the head of one of the most popular Spiritualistic associations in this city, and its members, in the chapel of the Unique Building, 180 William street, to about fifty of Rochester's worthy little children.

It was because of the thoughtfulness and personal efforts of Mrs. Messersmith, that enthusiasm was aroused among the members, interesting themselves as usual in the welfare and happiness of less fortunate humanity, that fifty little needy children were fed and entertained by the association, and that the affair was such a success, each one entering into the work heart and soul as only a good Spiritualist, one living his spirituality, could, lending his or her aid and assistance for the good cause.

A committee of five, Mrs. Messersmith, Mrs. Geminder, Miss Sherman, Mrs. Coville and Miss Benjamin, all of Rochester, were appointed to arrange for an arrangement committee. Great credit is due all the members and those who assisted, especially to Mr. J. C. Geminder and wife, who donated the use of their hall and home for whatever good could be done.

The dinner was served at one o'clock. The tables were artistically decorated with flowers and carnations. There was an abundance of fruit and everything to complete a turkey dinner. The children enjoyed themselves in games after the dinner was over, and when they departed for their homes each child was presented with a bag of assorted nuts and candy, a bag of buttered popcorn and a pair of warm mittens, and was sent on its way rejoicing. The affair was a grand success.

As a co-worker and member of the association, because of the great respect and appreciation I have for our leader, Mrs. Messersmith, and the good work she is doing in our city, I am induced to say that she is one of the most soulful Spiritualist mediums we have in our city.

ALICE BENJAMIN.

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to Spirit Life.

News has just reached me this morning of the sudden death of Mr. B. Frank Schmidt of Indianapolis, Indiana, who had dropped dead in Colorado, having gone there on a business trip.

Mr. Schmidt was well and favorably known through the entire state of Indiana, being one of the labor commissioners of that state. He always took an active part in all reform work, for his heart was set on bettering the conditions of humanity. He was a man of wealth and had great ideals and had planned many things which he expected soon to put into execution, thereby benefitting mankind.

He was a staunch Spiritualist, having been president of the Indianapolis society for at least a dozen of years, and never failed to do his part in assisting the cause.

He spent most of his life in Indianapolis, and was one of a firm known as the Central Chair Co. He leaves two sisters and a young son and daughter, who will greatly miss their loving brother and devoted father.

His heart was set on bettering the conditions of humanity. He was a man of wealth and had great ideals and had planned many things which he expected soon to put into execution, thereby benefitting mankind.

Only a span of time when we'll meet with our loved ones there, Once more to clasp their hands and kiss their faces fair. He's done waiting here, they'll now walk side by side. Unite once again this loving group and bride. GEORGIA GLADYS COOLEY.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby as terse, which of all things is to be deplored. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one must wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

John T. Dow: Q. Does mind or spirit make the body? Or does the body make the mind or spirit?

Regular thought seems to favor the former, but everything in Nature, as we can see, seems to favor the latter. Man is born with a certain form of physical body and brain, over which his mind could have had no control.

That form decides the character of his mind. Then, just in proportion as disease, old age, or removal of brain tissue place, the mind disappears, and cannot be discovered.

If ancient and Modern Spiritualism is not true, have we the slightest proof or indication that the mind or spirit has any existence after the body is dead?

A. Mr. Dow presents one of the most difficult problems of spiritual science. Materialists constantly appeal to the seeming dependence of the mind on the body, and thereby attempt to prove that without the physical structure there can be no independent intelligence. To evade the force of this argument, the doctrine of pre-existence, and reincarnation were invented. The spirit was and is an eternal entity, taking on a garb of flesh.

The new science of spiritualism, however, or it falls at the threshold. The doctrine of evolution, that is the growth of higher from lower types, carries the development of living forms to man, and it is the promise of spiritual science to carry that evolution through man to spirit. Through man individualized spirit is attained—a form, or organization, from spiritual substance, capable of relating itself to the material after the death of the physical body. This body may be compared to the scaffolding by which a structure is reared—essential support until complete, but then thrown away.

Will the earth life body and spirit exist mutually related and dependent after their separation? Is it possible? The weakening of the body seems to be reflected on the spirit, and the suspension of its functions, the going out of its light. But it must be taken into consideration that while connected with the body the spirit has no other means of manifestation than through its organism. It sees with the bodily eyes, hears through the auditory nerves, and evolves its thoughts through the cell-action of the brain. If we were talking with a friend through a telephone, and the wire was partially broken, or the transmitting instrument was disordered, and only unintelligible utterances came to us, or there was no response, would we not think that the failure was on the part of the apparatus, rather than loss of intelligence on our friend's? Is not the spirit with a disordered body in a similar manner deprived of all means of manifesting itself? When freed from that body, it is the heir to spiritual means, and freed from this dependency.

Yet even with this almost absolute dependency, there are numerous instances where the spirit seems to rise above its physical limitations and gives expression to its spiritual nature, as a foregleam and prophecy.

Old age does not always bring senility. Humboldt at 90 years finished "The Cosmos," the greatest scientific work, and more far-reaching in its influence ever undertaken. He pleasantly remarked to his friends during his last hours that his body had nearly failed him, but his mind was unimpaired.

Sir Isaac Newton was one of the smallest, and most puny infants, and was only reared by the most careful nursing, and while fettered by the ailments of the body, his mind arose above it as a master.

It is impossible in the limited space of this column to more than state the theory advanced by Spiritualism, without attempting demonstration. This has been essayed on different lines of argument in "Psychic Science," and "The Arcana of Spiritualism."

As ancient and Modern Spiritualism contain all the facts, the phenomena and conclusions, of the spiritual realm, there is no evidence of spirit existence more than they furnish. Spirit existence cannot be proven by material science. The more this is studied by itself, the farther its student is drifted away from spirit. Yet, when nature is studied as a whole and not dissected into parts, it will be found that the physical necessities that of the spirit. As an engineer must not only understand the structure of the engine, but of the steam and heat; the electrician of the dynamo, and of the nature of the electric current, to comprehend man, or life in any of its lower forms of individualization, the spirit must be taken into consideration with the physical form.

G. W. Goodman: Q. I have noticed that many that pray and a reverent attitude are necessary in the evolution of the spirit. In the dictionary, prayer means a form of worship or to beg of

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

He continued in the deep, rich voice he had been told "warn his":

"You did not not know that minds superior to your own impressed you to come to me to-day. As you laughed and chatted along the narrow way you never thought you were coming to meet suggestions that will shape your future destiny. As for you," and he stretched a thin, blue-veined hand toward Mrs. Drury, "you are doing well; you have already learned to sink self out of sight in the good of the whole. Let no love of ease delay these; let no siren song allure thee; let no storm nor tempest stay thee—onward forevermore."

"As for you," he indicated Marah and the two young men, "stop your praying and go to work. When you have lived all you have already prayed for and got, will be the time to seek for more. Decide at once what you want to be and do, then be it and do it. Look about you. There is not a department in life where strong, earnest souls are not needed. Choose as you will, but choose and act. Here is a family sick, weak, suffering. They send for a physician, a blind leader of the blind, and he fills their stomachs with poisonous drugs, and goes his way, and the last condition of that family is worse than the first. What does that family need to restore them to health and usefulness? They need to know themselves. They need sunlight, pure air and pure water in abundance, pure food properly prepared and eaten and an object and aim in life worthy of an immortal spirit."

Turning to Vernon Dale he continued: "The Bible describes death and the devil as man's enemies and the last to be destroyed. The only devil that ever existed is the devil of Ignorance, and the only death there is that moral and spiritual death which is the result of ignorance. Go if you will, young man, and show your fellow beings the Way of Life; but first be sure you are in it yourself. Remember that your body is the temple of the living God, and must be treated accordingly. Speak, but speak with authority and take heed that no man despise you."

Then turning to John Wilder he said: "Young man, the world has need of such as you. You are a good farmer, but others can do as well, so leave it unto others, and do the work none but yourself can do. Know that you can do and be all you have sensed in your most exalted moments. Injustice sits in high places, men are ruled by greed and bought with gold; wealth flaunts itself in the faces of starving wretches; the suffering and helpless cry for aid; innocence pleads for protection and womanhood for recognition. Why halt ye between two opinions? Arise in the strength of your noble young manhood—dare and do and be."

He then looked at Martha steadily, some power. While aspire means to aim at higher things or personal spiritual effort. Do they really mean the latter?

Also, are there any spirit forces that want to be worshipped? I read an article by a leading writer to the effect that to receive from spirit sources weakened the spirit of the instrument. I take from this that resistance to an inspiration is necessary in order to become strong in spirit.

Would you kindly give your opinion of the above through The Progressive Thinker and greatly oblige a subscriber?

A. Routine prayer may be a form of worship, and really is the greater part of the ceremony of the Protestant religion. It is a part of the ritual and read or reiterated without thought, has no meaning or influence. It is simply a rite of superstition.

Prayer is aspiration, and although it may not influence the unchangeable forces of Nature, it has a wonderful strengthening power on its maker. While spirits may not demand prayer, our earnest desire for their presence and assistance may bring them to us from creation's verge. And here is the explanation of answer to prayer, not by a God to whom the appeal is made, but by harmonizing the giver with the subject, the spiritual forces which work in ways not comprehended by a gross view of the world. When we consider human and spiritual beings as loved by an ocean of attenuated substance—thought ether—elastic and attenuated beyond comprehension, and that each being is a vortex of vibrations, we can understand how from an intensely wrought mind vibrant thoughts go forth, and although they strike an infinite number of individuals who are not sensitive to them, they find others in mortal bodies or spiritual.

And as harps attuned set each other in vibration, and move those thus receptive to answer their appeals. Whether inspiration from spirit weakens or strengthens the recipient, depends entirely on the manner of its reception. A medium may become as a pen in the hands of a writer, unchanged by what it writes. But inspiration received by an earnest soul, lifts that soul to the level of the communicant and gives it supernatural strength and courage. Such a soul does not yield personality to receive, or surrender its selfhood.

and I felt my pulses throb. Perhaps I never realized so fully before how very dear the girl is to me. At last he spoke and his voice was sweet and tender. "CHILD, Destiny has you in her balance, but she will not find you wanting. With in yourself lies a power you little dream of now. Listen to the God within, and know all things are yours."

"As for the rest of you, each has a work, but you will find it without any of my assistance. Go in peace—good-bye—go," and he pointed to the open door.

The next forenoon we gathered as if by pre-arranged plan in the living room where Marah is now mistress. For a little while we sat in silence and then Mrs. Drury said, "Mr. Dale, have you decided what God you will serve?"

"I have decided in what way I will serve the one God, by serving my fellow beings," he answered cheerfully. "I resigned my position as pastor some time ago and next Sunday I preach my farewell sermon. I desire greatly to go to the city and take up the work Aunt Ann is so much interested in. I can see that in order to do this work successfully I must be able to speak with authority. The message that came to me yesterday was for me, for my soul recognized and claimed it for its own. I shall take a full course in a medical college and get all the good possible from it, and then when I teach people to know themselves and the laws of health they will not despise me."

"Good!" said Mrs. Drury, "it is your turn now Miss Marah."

"I shall enter a hospital and come out a trained nurse," was the brief but decided reply.

"Then you will be ready to take your place beside the physician both in your home and elsewhere—I understand. And you, Mr. Wilder?"

"I will do what all my life I have wanted to do—study law."

Marah sat a little apart from the rest of us during this conversation. Mrs. Drury looked toward her wistfully, but did not speak, so I said, "It is your turn to speak now, Marah." She arose and went to the window and gazed steadily out for a moment and then turned and faced us. The sun broke through the clouds and enveloped her in a flood of light and changed the wavy brown hair into a halo of glory. She spoke slowly and distinctly. "In times of peril when the strong and brave rush to battle there to do and die, some are left at home to tend the sick and helpless, and destiny has assigned to me this portion. She is testing me but I shall stand the test. Whatever comes to me I will be worthy of the best. I will faithfully and cheerfully perform the labor that falls to me, however humble it may be, and while I am doing little things I will try and make myself capable and worthy of doing great things. I know I can rise superior to every condition and circumstance. Spirit is the creative force, so within myself lies the power to command and create. I will waste no time nor strength in railing at destiny, but will create one for myself. I will accept the conditions forced upon me without a murmur, and compel them to serve my purpose. I will live one day at a time, knowing that as I build my present so shall my future be."

When Marah ceased, Mrs. Drury turned to her and said: "Onward, for a glorious future. Shall atone for present ways, And for every tear and heartache Shall arise a song of praise. Onward, for I see it written By the hand of Love divine, 'Peace shall fold thee in her mantle, Joy for thee a garland twine.'"

I am going to stay with Martha while you are at the encampments, Elsie, for you will not need me, and she does, and my brother wants me with him. It is very hard for Silas to have to remain quiet while Martha works so hard both indoors and out. Write to us all about the meetings.

Lovingly your friend and sister, LAURA GRAY.

Dear Mrs. Austin:—Auntie says I may add a little to the letter she has written to you and tell about my own good fortune. Yesterday was one of my days, as Uncle Ezra used to say, when it not only rained but poured. In the morning I got a letter from the town where we went to hear Mrs. Drury speak, asking me to come there and hold meetings every other Sunday for a time indefinite. In the evening one of the wealthiest and most respected men in our town called in company with his wife and asked me if I would hold meetings in our town every two weeks if he would provide a suitable place? So I am not to be shut away from the work I love, after all. In place of the one small door that closed in my face, two larger ones have opened and I have got all I can do. Can you guess how pleased and grateful I am?

Yesterday afternoon, as I was ironing in the kitchen, who should walk in but my former patient, Miss Lane, of whom I have told you. I was real glad to see her and did not try to conceal it. She looks happier, gentler and more refined than she did the first time I saw her, but she is just as odd as ever. She told me all about herself and family, and then informed me that she had come to get Charlie.

"I will take him home with me and give him a good education, physical training and every other advantage he is fitted to improve," she said. "You are playing aunt to another woman's girl, and I will play aunt to another woman's boy."

I called Charlie and told him what Miss Lane said, and when he found his great desire to learn music would be gratified he was nearly wild with delight. Mrs. Drury, thinks as you do, that through music Charlie will develop into a fine medium.

Miss Lane will return next week and take Charlie home with her. "If I loved my brother less I could not give him up, but love seeks not its own pleasure but another's good. My little Elsie is just the dearest baby and I hope I shall live to see her a healthy, happy and noble woman. I shall try and be myself all I want her to be. Be sure and make me a visit when you come back from the camp-meeting."

Always your loving friend, MARTHA WESTON.

New Light Cottage. Mrs. Drury—Dear Sister Worker:—I have just received your letter inquiring about the Weston family, and I am pleased to be able to give you the information you desire. I am here at New Light Cottage in company with Mrs. Helen Weston, "Aunt Ann," and a dozen children from the crowded tenement houses and their caretakers. John Wilder gave his farm to his sister Marah as a wedding present, and it has been used every summer since for the benefit of little children and invalids among the city's destitute.

Donder and Blitzen, now as lazy as they are fat, carry many eager little ones from the station to the farm, and contribute greatly to their enjoyment while they are here.

Vernon Dale and Marah Weston followed the course they mapped out for themselves the last day you were with them. As soon as Mr. Dale graduated from the medical school he and Marah were married and settled with Mrs. Weston and "Aunt Ann" in the city. A large and flourishing Spiritualist society has through their efforts been formed there. They have a nice hall of their own where they hold meetings every Sunday and once during the week. One night in the week Mr. Dale gathers in the hall a large class of youths and instructs them in physiology and the laws of health, purity and morality; and the next evening Marah has a class of girls to whom she gives similar instruction. Mr. Dale spends his working hours performing the duties of a physician and the amount of good he accomplishes can scarcely be overestimated.

Every Sunday Mr. Dale speaks in the hall to a large and intelligent audience who never seem to tire of him. Upon the wall back of the platform he occupies, there is inscribed in large letters so that all who enter the hall door may read:

SPIRITUALISM. HOPE FOR ALL.

"Behold I bring unto you glad tidings of great joy."

Charlie Weston is their musician and grand, and in either position he is grand. Marah is at times a fine medium, but she cannot depend upon herself, for there are weeks and sometimes months that the power is not hers, and then without warning it will come to her with almost overwhelming force. She is a fine woman and untiring in her efforts to do good.

John Wilder was called to a western state immediately after leaving the law school. His father left him property considered worthless which about this time was discovered to be valuable. It took him several years to get his affairs in the West settled, then he returned to his old home, arriving there just after Silas Weston's death. Shortly after, he and Marah were married and went to the town of Eldon to live. Mr. Wilder practices law. He is as fine a specimen of manhood as it has ever been my good fortune to meet. He is strong, fearless and bold. No helpless creature ever appeals to him in vain. Injustice and suffering arouse him to action at once. It makes no difference how unpopular a cause may be, it is enough for him to know it is right. Although strong and brave, he is as tender and gentle as a woman, as many a homeless and persecuted dumb animal has occasion to know as well as ill-treated women and children.

The Spiritualists in that town have a fine building where they hold their meetings and John and Marah are their speakers, and Marah, their medium. The Sunday Mrs. Wilder speaks in the Spiritualist hall, Marah occupies the pulpit of the church, where she gives good satisfaction as a preacher. Marah is the mother of two fine children, which with her husband, the niece of her adoption and Aunt Laura, make up her family, and a good family it is, I assure you. It is one of the greatest pleasures of my life to visit them.

A little while every summer the family return to Spruce Grove Farm and there I expect to join them next week. Marah declares that she cannot do her work if she is entirely deprived of the companionship and inspiration of the spruces, where, as she says, she goes to be alone with her own soul and listen to the voice of God.

While talking with Marah a few weeks ago she said, "My private work as a medium lies almost wholly among the wealthy and so-called fashionable class. I never intended or wanted it to be so, but it has been forced upon me, so I have accepted it. I sometimes think that they need me more than the poor. I learned long ago that material things, no matter what form they bear, cannot bring abiding happiness, and lace and diamonds often cover breaking hearts. The church has tried for several years to persuade John and me to become its members, but it is useless for anyone to think of such a thing. We are Spiritualists and we shall always call ourselves so, and whatever we do for the betterment of humanity we shall do under that name. Words to me, and he spoke the truth. Spiritualism does cover the whole ground—the entire realm of existence. It has been the Light in the midst of darkness through all the ages. It is the life of all religions—remove it and they would crumble to nothing. It furnishes the only proof of immortality ever given to the world. It reveals to man himself—spirit, God—and thus places at his command love, peace, joy, health, success and power limited only by his mental capacity. It reveals to our consciousness a mighty transforming power, and creates a new heaven and a new earth. It rends the veil that obscures our physical vision and restores to us our loved again. It walks triumphant through the death chamber and sings its song of victory by the open grave. It rolls away the rock of Ignorance, and bids Truth arise in all its strength and beauty. It is grand, pure, noble, beautiful uplifting."

At the close of Marah's remarks, Laura Gray said "Such talk as that always finds me in the 'amen corner,'" and I am sure you and I are to be found with her. I have traveled east and west, north and south proclaiming genuine "glad tidings" to all and I have made many friends and acquaintances, but the name Martha Weston stands out distinctly among them all.

I have never received anything but good through Spiritualism, and I am fully convinced that if others do it is because they fail to comprehend it. If it is in a person to receive evil he will receive it or imagine he does wherever he may be. I feel willing in my soul a song of thanksgiving for every pain and grief and hardship that has brought me into closer communion with the spirit world. The way grows brighter and more joyous all the while. You and I are getting along in years, sister, and we shall soon be "over there," but the watchword will still be "Onward." Realm on realm forever opens when the toils of earth are done—new hopes, new joys, new victories—Oh! it is glorious! We will clasp hands there, sister, and be glad together.

Sincerely yours in the cause of Truth. ELSIE AUSTIN. (The End.)

The Three Kingdoms. God made man free agent, which means free thinker as well. I avail myself of that prerogative, and I venture into a broad field of speculation concerning the existence of universal things, and how I conceive the same to be made into three kingdoms. I care little whether my views in that line are true or contradictory to all established theories and doctrines, I express them as they present themselves to my mind, and take pleasure to submit the same to free-thinkers as suggestions, and as mental food to digest.

To present my views on that grand subject worthy of a better pen, I take my stand upon the rock of solid science, believing that it is a physical foundation whereupon to establish a new doctrine pertaining to spirit and matter, in accord with the modern philosophy of realism.

According to my views the three kingdoms may be defined in order as follows: The physical kingdom. The metaphysical kingdom. The spiritual kingdom.

The physical kingdom comprises all the cosmic bodies that gravitate and revolve about central suns throughout the cosmos; such are, in our solar system, the planets, including our earth, satellites, asteroids, comets, and nebulae; all that class of celestial bodies are not sources of light, but reflect the light they receive from the central suns. They all pertain to the physical-terrestrial kingdom.

The metaphysical kingdom comprises our sun and all the suns domineering in the center of all systems throughout the cosmos—those blazing orbs are sources of light by which the planets, in their respective orbits, are illumined and vivified. Where that continued stream of light comes from remains to be explained.

The spiritual kingdom, the human eye cannot see, nor the imagination conceive about the infinity of the empyreum which encompasses and pervades the inferior kingdoms. It is the abode of high spiritual potencies, where the Supreme Being manifests his presence more intensely throughout the kingdoms.

From these first definitions of the three kingdoms it must be perceived and borne in mind that the difference existing between spirit and matter consists in degree—degree of sublimation. Therefore matter and spirit are co-relative and co-existing—that one proceeds from the other by evolution and involution which goes on forever.

To be more explicit: From gross state matter transcends to ultimate essence, or the physical atom which is the fundamental principle of all forms in the physical-terrestrial kingdom. This physical atom transcends higher into the metaphysical atom which is the fundamental principle of all forms in the helio-metaphysical kingdom, or all suns. This metaphysical atom transcends still higher and sublimates into infinity, or the Supreme Being which by virtue of its infinite essence of sublimation, and its infinite rapidity of motion is present everywhere at the same instant, and he vivifies all kingdoms—He is the soul of the universe.

And upon this trinity of atomic principles rests the existence of all things spiritual and material.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and this style becomes thereby as terse, which of course is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given to anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected.

John T. Dow: Q. Does mind or spirit make the body? Or does the body make the mind or spirit?

Popular thought seems to favor the former, but everything in Nature, so far as we can see, seems to favor the latter. Man is born with a certain form of physical body and brain, over which his mind could have had no control.

That form decides the character of his mind. Then, just in proportion as disease, old age, or removal of brain takes place, the mind disappears, and cannot be discovered.

If ancient and Modern Spiritualism is not true, have we the slightest proof or indication that the mind or spirit has any existence after the body is dead?

A. Mr. Dow presents one of the most difficult problems of spiritual science. Materialists constantly appeal to the seeming dependence of the mind on the body, and thereby attempt to prove that without the physical structure there can be no independent intelligence.

To evade the force of this argument, the doctrine of pre-existence, and reincarnation were invented. The spirit was and is an eternal entity, taking on a garb of flesh.

The new science of spirit must answer, or it fails at the threshold. The doctrine of evolution, that is the growth of higher from lower types, carries the development of living forms to man, and it is the promise of spiritual science to carry that evolution through man to spirit.

Through man individualized spirit is attained—a form, or organization, from spiritual substance capable of retaining its quality after the death of the physical body. This body is compared to the scaffolding of a structure to be reared—essential support until complete, but then this scaffolding will fall.

Will the earth life body and spirit then be mutually related and dependent that their separation appears impossible. The meaning of the body seems to be reflected on the spirit, and the suspension of its functions, the going out of its light. But it must be taken into consideration that while connected with the body the spirit has no other means of manifestation than through its organism. It sees with the bodily eyes, hears through the auditory nerves, and even thinks through the collection of the brain. If we were talking with a friend through a telephone, and the wire was partially broken, or the transmitting instrument was disordered, and only unintelligible utterances came to us, or there was no response, would we not think that the failure was on the part of the apparatus, rather than of intelligence in our friend? Is not the spirit with a disordered body in a similar manner deprived of all means of manifesting itself? When freed from that body, it is the heir to spiritual means, and freed from this dependency.

Yet even with this almost absolute dependency, there are numerous instances where the spirit seemingly rises above its physical limitations and gives expression to its spiritual nature, as a foregleam and prophecy.

Old age does not always bring senility. Humboldt at 90 years finished The Cosmos, the greatest scientific work, and more far-reaching in its influence ever undertaken. He pleasantly remarked to his friends during his last hours that his body had nearly failed him, but his mind was unimpaired.

Sir Isaac Newton was one of the smallest, and most puny infants, and was only reared by the most careful nursing, and while fettered by the ailments of the body, his mind arose above it as a master.

It is impossible in the limited space of this column to more than state the advanced Spiritualism, without attempting demonstration. This has been essayed on different lines of argument in Psychic Science, and The Arcana of Spiritualism.

As ancient and Modern Spiritualism contain all the facts, the phenomena and conclusions, of the spiritual domain, there can be no evidence of spirit existence more than they furnish. Spirit existence cannot be proven by material science. The more this is studied by itself, the farther its student is drifted away from spirit. Yet, when nature is studied as a whole and not dissected into parts, it will be found that correct and perfect understanding of the physical necessities that of the spiritual. An engineer must not only understand the structure of the engine, but of the steam and heat; the electrician of the dynamo, and of the nature of the electric current, to comprehend man, or life in any of its lower forms of individualization, the spirit must be taken into consideration with the physical form.

G. W. Goodman: Q. I have noticed that many writers including spiritualists agree that prayer and reverent spirit are necessary in the evolution of the spirit. In the dictionary, prayer means a form of worship or to beg of

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming and Interesting Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

He continued in the deep, rich voice he had been told "wasn't hisn". "You did not know that minds superior to your own impressed you to come to me to-day. As you laughed and chatted along the narrow way you never thought you were coming to meet suggestions that will shape your future destiny. As for you," and he stretched a thin, blue-veined hand toward Mrs. Drury, "you are doing well; you have already learned to sink self out of sight in the good of the whole. Let no love of ease delay thee; let no siren song allure thee; let no storm nor tempest stay thee—onward forevermore."

"As for you," he indicated Marah and the two young men, "stop your praying and go to work. When you have lived all you have already prayed for and got, will be the time to seek for more. Decide at once what you want to be and do, then be it and do it. Look about you. There is not a department in life where straggling, earnest souls are not needed. Choose as you will, but choose and act. Here is a family sick, weak, suffering. They send for a physician, a blind leader of the blind, and he fills their stomachs with poisonous drugs, and goes his way, and the last condition of that family is worse than the first. What does that family need to restore them to health and usefulness? They need to know themselves. They need sunlight, pure air and pure water in abundance, pure food properly prepared and eaten and an object and aim in life worthy of an immortal spirit."

Turning to Vernon Dale he continued: "The Bible describes death and the devil as man's enemies and the last to be destroyed. The only devil that ever existed is the devil of ignorance, and the only death there is that is moral and spiritual death which is the result of ignorance. Go if you will, young man, and show your fellow beings the Way of Life; but first be sure you are in it yourself. Remember that your body is the temple of the living God, and must be treated accordingly. Speak, but speak with authority and take heed that no man despise you."

Then turning to John Wilder he said: "Young man, the world has need of such as you. You are a good farmer, but others can do as well, so leave it unto others, and do the work none but yourself can do. Know that you can do and be all you have sinned in your most exalted moments. Injustice sits in high places, men are ruled by greed and bought with gold; wealth flaunts itself in the faces of starving wretches; the suffering and helpless cry for aid; innocence pleads for protection and justice for recognition. Why halt ye between two opinions? Arise in the strength of your noble young manhood—dare and do and be."

He then looked at Martha steadily, some power. While aspire means to aim at higher things or personal spiritual effort. Do they really mean the latter?

Also, are there any spirit forces that want to be worshipped? I read an article by a leading writer to the effect that to receive from spirit sources weakened the spirit of the instrument. I take from this that resistance to all inspiration is necessary in order to become strong in spirit.

Would you kindly give your opinion of the above through The Progressive Thinker and greatly oblige a subscriber?

A. Routine prayer may be a form of worship, and really is the greater part of the ceremony of the Protestant religion. It is a part of the ritual and read or reiterated without thought, has no meaning or influence. It is simply a rite of superstition.

Prayer is aspiration, and although it may not influence the unchangeable forces of Nature, it has a wonderful strengthening power on its maker. While spirits may not demand prayer, our earnest desire for their presence and assistance may bring them to us from creation's verge. And here is the explanation of answer to prayer, not by a God to whom the appeal is made, but by harmonizing the giver with the subtle spiritual forces which work in ways not comprehended by a gross view of the world. When we consider human and spiritual beings as laved by an ocean of attenuated substance—thought ether—elastic and attenuated beyond comprehension, and that each being is a vortex of vibrations, we can understand how from an intensely wrought mind vibrant thoughts go forth, and although they strike an infinite number of individuals who are not sensitive to them, they find others in mortal bodies or spiritual.

And as harp attuned set each other in vibration, and move those thus receptive, to answer their appeals.

Whether inspiration from spirit weakens or strengthens the recipient, depends entirely on the manner of its reception. A medium may become as a pen in the hands of a writer, unchanged by what it writes. But inspiration received by an earnest soul, lifts that soul to the level of the communicant, and gives it supernatural strength and courage. Such a soul does not yield personality to receive, or surrender its selfhood.

and I felt my pulses throb. Perhaps I never realized so fully before how very dear the girl is to me. At last he spoke and his voice was sweet and tender, "Child, destiny has you in her balances, but she will not find you wanting. Within yourself lies a power you little dream of now. Listen to the God within and know all things are yours."

"As for the rest of you, each has a work, but you will find it without any of my assistance. Go in peace—good-bye—go," and he pointed to the open door.

The next forenoon we gathered as if by pre-arranged plan in the living room where Martha is now mistress. For a little while we sat in silence and then Mrs. Drury said, "Mr. Dale, have you decided what God you will serve?"

"I have decided in what way I will serve the one God, by serving my fellow beings," he answered cheerfully. "I resigned my position as pastor some time ago and next Sunday I preach my farewell sermon. I desire greatly to go to the city and take up the work Aunt Ann is so much interested in. I can see that in order to do this work successfully I must be able to speak with authority. The message that came to me yesterday was for me, for my soul recognized and claimed it for its own. I shall take a full course in a medical college and get all the good possible from it, and then when I teach people to know themselves and the laws of health they will not despise me."

"Good!" said Mrs. Drury, "It is your turn now Miss Marah."

"I shall enter a hospital and come out a trained nurse," was the brief but decided reply.

"Then you will be ready to take your place beside the physician both in your home and elsewhere—I understand. And you, Mr. Wilder?"

"I will do what all my life I have wanted to do—study law."

Martha sat a little apart from the rest of us during this conversation. Mrs. Drury looked toward her wistfully, but did not speak, so I said, "It is your turn to speak now, Martha." She arose and went to the window and gazed steadily out for a moment and then turned and faced us. The sun broke through the clouds and enveloped her in a flood of light and changed the wavy brown hair into a halo of glory. She spoke slowly and distinctly. "In times of peril when the strong and brave rush to battle there to do and die, some are left at home to tend the sick and helpless, and destiny has assigned to me this portion. She is testing me but I shall stand the test. Whatever comes to me I will be worthy of the best. I will faithfully and cheerfully perform the labor that falls to me, however humble it may be, and while I am doing little things I will try and make myself capable and worthy of doing great things. I know I can rise superior to every condition and circumstance. Spirit is the creative force, so within myself lies the power to command and create. I will waste no time nor strength in railing at destiny, but will create one for myself. I will accept the conditions forced upon me without a murmur, and compel them to serve my purpose. I will live one day at a time, knowing that as I build my present so shall my future be."

When Martha ceased, Mrs. Drury turned to her and said:

"Onward, for a glorious future Shall atone for present ways, And for every tear and heartache Shall arise a song of praise. Onward, for I see it written By the hand of Love divine, 'Peace shall fold thee in her mantle, Joy for thee a garland twine.'"

I am going to stay with Martha while you are at the encampments, Elsie, for you will not need me, and she does, and her brother wants me with him. It is very hard for Silas to have to remain quiet while Martha works so hard both indoors and out. Write to us all about the meetings.

Lovingly your friend and sister, LAURA GRAY.

Dear Mrs. Austin:—Auntie says I may add a little to the letter she has written to you and tell about my own good fortune. Yesterday was one of my days, as Uncle Ezra used to say, when it not only rained but poured.

In the morning I got a letter from the town where we went to hear Mrs. Drury speak, asking me to come there and hold meetings every other Sunday for a time indefinite. In the evening one of the wealthiest and most respected men in our town called in company with his wife and asked me if I would hold meetings in our town every two weeks if he would provide a suitable place? So I am not to be shut away from the work I love, after all. In place of the one small door that closed in my face, two larger ones have opened and I have got all I can do. Can you guess how pleased and grateful I am?

Yesterday afternoon, as I was ironing in the kitchen, who should walk in but my former patient, Miss Lane, of whom I have told you. I was real glad to see her and did not try to conceal it. She looks happier, gentler and more refined than she did the first time I saw her, but she is just as old as ever. She told me all about herself and family, and then informed me that she had come to get Charlie.

"I will take him home with me and give him a good education, physical training and every other advantage he is fitted to improve," she said. "You are playing out to another woman's girl, and I will play right to another woman's boy."

I called Charlie and told him what Miss Lane said, and when he found his great desire to learn music would be gratified he was nearly wild with delight. Mrs. Drury thinks as you do, that through music Charlie will develop into a fine medium.

Miss Lane will return next week and take Charlie home with her. "If I loved my brother less I could not give him up, but love seeks not its own pleasure but another's good. My little Elsie is just the dearest baby and I hope I shall live to see her a healthy, happy and noble woman. I shall try and be myself all I want her to be. Be sure and make me a visit when you come back from the camp-meeting."

Always your loving friend, MARTHA WESTON.

New Light Cottage.

Mrs. Drury:—Dear Sister Worker—I have just received your letter inquiring about the Weston family, and I am pleased to be able to give you the information you desire. I am here at New Light Cottage in company with Mrs. Helen Weston, "Aunt Ann," and a dozen children from the crowded tenement houses and their care-takers. John Wilder gave this farm to his sister Marah as a wedding present, and it has been used every summer since for the benefit of little children and invalids among the city's destitute.

Donder and Blitzen, now as lazy as they are fat, carry many eager little ones from the station to the farm, and contribute greatly to their enjoyment while they are here.

Vernon Dale and Marah Weston followed the course they mapped out for themselves the last day you were with them. As soon as Mr. Dale graduated from the medical school he and Marah were married and settled with Mrs. Weston and "Aunt Ann" in the city. A large and flourishing Spiritualist society has through their efforts been formed there. They have a nice hall of their own where they hold meetings every Sunday and once during the week. One night in the week Mr. Dale gathers in the hall a large class of youths and instructs them in physiology and the laws of health, purity and morality; and the next evening Marah has a class of girls to whom she gives similar instruction. Mr. Dale spends his working hours performing the duties of a physician and the amount of good he accomplishes can scarcely be overestimated.

Every Sunday Mr. Dale speaks in the hall to a large and intelligent audience who never seem to tire of him. Upon the wall back of the platform he occupies, there is inscribed in large letters so that all who enter the hall door may read:

SPIRITUALISM. HOPE FOR ALL. "Behold I bring unto you glad tidings of great joy."

Charlie Weston is their musician and medium, and in either position he is grand. Marah is at times a fine medium, but she cannot depend upon herself, for there are weeks and sometimes months that the power is not hers, and then without warning it will come to her with almost overwhelming force. She is a fine woman and untiring in her efforts to do good.

John Wilder was called to a western state immediately after leaving the law school. His father left him property considered worthless which about this time was discovered to be valuable. It took him several years to get his affairs in the West settled, then he returned to his old home, arriving there just after Silas Weston's death. Shortly after, he and Marah were married and went to the town of Eldon to live. Mr. Wilder practices law. He is as fine a specimen of manhood as it has ever been my good fortune to meet. He's strong, fearless and bold. No helpless creature ever appeals to him in vain. Injustice and suffering arouse him to action at once. It makes no difference how unpopular a cause may be, it is enough for him to know it is right. Although strong and brave, he is as tender and gentle as a woman, as many a homeless and persecuted dumb animal has occasion to know as well as ill-treated women and children.

The Spiritualists in that town have a fine building where they hold their meetings and John and Marah are their speakers, and Marah, their medium. The Sunday Mrs. Wilder speaks in the Spiritualist hall, Martha occupies the pulpit of the church, where she gives good satisfaction as a preacher. Marah is the mother of two fine children, which with her husband, the niece of her adoption, "Aunt Laura," make up her family, and a good family it is, I assure you. It is one of the greatest pleasures of my life to visit them.

A little while every summer the family return to Spruce Grove Farm and there I expect to join them next week. Marah declares that she cannot do her work if she is entirely deprived of the companionship and inspiration of the spruces, where, as she says, she goes to be alone with her own soul and listen to the voice of God.

While talking with Martha a few weeks ago she said, "My private work as a medium lies almost wholly among the wealthy and so-called fashionable class. I never intended or wanted it to be so, but it has been forced upon me, so I have accepted it. I sometimes think that they need me more than they

"I often recall Uncle Ezra's last poor. I learned long ago that material things, no matter what form they bear, cannot bring abiding happiness, and lace and diamonds often cover breaking hearts. The church has tried for several years to persuade John and me to become its members, but it is useless for anyone to think of such a thing. We are Spiritualists and we shall always call ourselves so, and whatever we do for the betterment of humanity we shall do under that name. Words to me, and he spoke the truth. Spiritualism does cover the whole ground—the entire realm of existence. It has been the Light in the midst of darkness through all the ages. It is the life of all religions—remove it and they would crumble to nothing. It furnishes the only proof of immortality ever given to the world. It reveals to man himself—spirit, God—and thus places at his command love, peace, joy, health, success and power limited only by his mental capacity. It reveals to our consciousness a mighty transforming power, and creates a new heaven and a new earth. It tends the veil that obscures our physical vision and restores to us our loved again. It walks triumphant through the death chamber and sings its song of victory by the open grave. It rolls away the rock of ignorance, and bids Truth arise in all its strength and beauty. It is grand, pure, noble, beautiful uplifting."

At the close of Martha's remarks, Laura Gray said "Such talk as that always finds me in the 'amen corner,' and I am sure you and I are to be found with her. I have traveled east and west, north and south proclaiming genuine 'glad tidings' to all and I have made many friends and acquaintances, but the name Martha Weston stands out distinctly among them all."

I have never received anything but good through Spiritualism, and I am fully convinced that if others do it is because they fail to comprehend it. If it is in a person to receive evil he will receive it or imagine he does wherever he may be. I feel willing up in my soul a song of thanksgiving for every pain and grief and hardship that has brought me into closer communion with the spirit world. The way grows brighter and more joyous all the while. You and I are getting along in years, sister, and we shall soon be "over there," but the watchword will still be "Onward." Realm on realm forever opens when the toils of earth are done—new hopes, new joys, new victories—Oh it is glorious! We will clasp hands there, sister, and be glad together.

Sincerely yours in the cause of Truth, ELSIE AUSTIN.

The Three Kingdoms.

God made man free agent, which means free thinker as well. I avail myself of that prerogative, and venture into a broad field of speculation concerning the existence of universal things, and how I conceive the same to be made into three kingdoms. I care little whether my views in that line are true or contradictory to all established theories and doctrines; I express them as they present themselves to my mind, and take pleasure in submitting the same to free-thinkers as suggestions, and as mental food to digest.

To present my views on that grand subject worthy of a better pen, I take my stand upon the rock of physical science, believing that it is a solid foundation whereupon to establish a new doctrine pertaining to spirit and matter, in accord with the modern philosophy of realism.

According to my views the three kingdoms may be defined in order as follows:

The physical kingdom. The metaphysical kingdom. The spiritual kingdom.

The physical kingdom comprises all the cosmic bodies that gravitate and revolve about central suns throughout the cosmos; such are, in our solar system, the planets, including our earth, satellites, asteroids, comets, and nebulae; all that class of celestial bodies are not sources of light, but reflect the light they receive from the central suns. They all pertain to the physical-terrestrial kingdom.

The metaphysical kingdom comprises our sun and all the suns dotting the center of all systems throughout the cosmos—those blazing orbs are sources of light by which the planets, in their respective dominion, are illumined and vivified. Where that continued stream of light comes from remains to be explained.

The spiritual kingdom, the human eye cannot see, nor the imagination conceive about the infinity of the ethereal which encompasses and pervades the inferior kingdoms. It is the abode of high spiritual potencies, where the Supreme Being manifests his presence more intensely throughout the kingdoms.

From these first definitions of the three kingdoms it must be perceived and borne in mind that the difference existing between spirit and matter consists in degree—degree of sublimation. Therefore matter and spirit are co-relative and co-existing—that one proceeds from the other by evolution and involution which goes on forever.

To be more explicit: From gross state matter transcends to ultimate essence, or the physical atom which is the fundamental principle of all forms in the physico-terrestrial kingdom. This physical atom transcends higher into the metaphysical atom which is the fundamental principle of all forms in the helio-metaphysical kingdom, or all suns. This metaphysical atom transcends still higher and sublimates into infinity, or the Supreme Being which by virtue of his infinite essence of sublimation, and his infinite rapidity of motion is present everywhere at the same instant, and he vivifies all kingdoms—He is the soul of the universe.

And upon this trinity of atomic principles rests the existence of all things spiritual and material.

For further development about what precedes let us view the firmament in its own aspect.

hunted up that question for years. I wanted to understand what that barbarian meant. (Laughter.) I finally found that in the intellectual era in which he lived people believed in incubi and succubi, incubi were male angels, succubi were female angels. The female angels sometimes tempted priests, and the male angels above all things were attracted by the

Col. Ingersoll on "The Devil."

and so Paul said: "Keep your head covered on account of the angels." (Great laughter and applause.) He was what they call an inspired man. He got his information from God.

So we are told in Jude that Michael, the archangel, contended with the Devil about the body of Moses. We are told in Peter to be sober and vigilant, "the cause your adversary, the Devil, as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour."

Are people devoured by personifications? Do myths eat anybody? Has an allegory an appetite? (Laughter.)

So in Ephesians we are warned not to give place to devils, and in James it is said if you resist the Devil he will flee from you; and in 1st John we are told that he that committeth sin is of the Devil for the reason that the Devil sinneth from the beginning; and we are also told that "for this purpose was the Son of God manifested, that he might destroy the works of the Devil, and if you

TAKE THE DEVIL AWAY

then there is no excuse for Christ's living; none whatever.

So in Revelations, the insinuation of all books, insinuation that would be the diary of an asylum. (Laughter.) I know of no book in the world as utterly, as profoundly, as grotesquely idiotic as the Book of Revelations; and in that book

THE COLONEL WAXES ELOQUENT.

I find the following intellectual passage: "And there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels and prevailed not. Neither was their place found any more in heaven."

"And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth and his devils with him."

Yes, sir, they got them out, and the writer says, "Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea, for the Devil is come down to you, having great wrath."

From this it would appear that the Devil once lived in heaven, raised a rebellion, was defeated and cast out, and the inspired writer congratulates the citizens of heaven that they are rid of him, and commiserates the people of the earth that they have him.

In the 9th chapter of Revelations is the following:

"And I saw an angel come down from heaven having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand."

"And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him into a thousand years; and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more."

It is hard to understand how anybody could be confined in a pit without a bottom. I don't know. (Great laughter and applause.) But this criticism was probably put into my mind by the Devil. (Renewed laughter.)

We are further told that in a thousand years the Devil should be loosed out of prison, and then the Devil should be cast "into the lake of fire and brimstone where the beast and the false prophets are, and shall be tormented day and night forever."

Now think of it. In the light of the passages that I have read we can clearly see what the writers of the New Testament believed about this there creature called the existence of God, of Christ, they teach the existence of the Devil; and if the Devil does not exist, if little devils do not enter into the bodies of men, the New Testament may be inspired, but it is not true. (Laughter.)

The early Christians prayed that Christ was divine because he cast out devils. The casting out of devils was his casting out devils authenticated his message, and among the people of that time that was the best evidence they could have. They were believers in devils, and what man is considered great depends upon the people who do the considering. You let a sleight-of-hand performer, suppose one could, along with Charles Darwin, have appeared before a tribe in Central Africa, and suppose Mr. Darwin explained and supposed Mr. Darwin explained the survival of the fittest, or natural selection—suppose he had, and thereupon the sleight-of-hand performer got up, swallowed a guinea pig, pulled it out of the back of the neck of one of the audience, fried some eggs in his hat, shot a card across the room and made the seven of diamonds stick to the door, who would these gentlemen have thought to be the greater man? (Laughter.)

If you want to stand high with barbarians you have got to do the things barbarians admire, and two thousand years ago there was nothing they admired so much as casting out devils. They said to the poor ignorant "divine" "This man is God. He has cast out devils." And the evidence they offered was harder to believe than the thing they tried to prove by their evidence. It was like the man who said he saw a grizzly bear floating down the river.

"Well," a man said, "my good friend, grizzlies don't float." "Ah, but," said, "there was an iron crank in this one." (Laughter.)

Of course I do not blame the authors of the gospel—not at all. They lived in a superstitious age and at a time when

RUMOR WAS THE HISTORIAN;

and when gospel corrected the "proof," at a time when people believed everything except facts. Natural enough. The apostles like their fellows believed

JUST THINK, NOW.

In miracles and in magic, and credulity was a virtue. The Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, of New York, denounces the apostles as worthless cravens. He is an orthodox Christian. I do not agree with him. I think they were very good men. I do not believe that any one of them ever tried to reform Jerusalem on the Parkhurst plan. (Laughter.) I do not believe that one of them would have tried to have indicted and imprisoned the woman to whom Christ said, "Go and sin no more." (Applause.) I admit that they honestly believed in devils. They were credulous, superstitious; and there is one little story in the New Testament that perfectly illustrates my meaning. It is in the 6th chapter of John.

"Now, there is at Jerusalem, by the sheep market, a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue, Bethesda, having five porches. That one phrase shows that the gospel of John was not written in Hebrew. Never. 'There was a pool which was called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda.' Nobody would write now, no American, and say there was a place called in the English language Bethesda."

And this place "had five porches." In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water. "For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water: Whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had."

And a certain man there was which had an infirmity thirty and eight years. When Jesus saw him he knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he said unto him: "Wilt thou be made whole?" The impotent man answered him: "Sir, I have no man when the water is troubled to put me into the pool; but while I am coming another steppeth down before me."

Jesus said unto him: "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." And immediately the man was made whole. "Immediately the man was made whole."

Now, does any sensible man believe this story? Was the water of Bethesda troubled by an angel? Where did the angel come from? Where do angels live? Did the angel put medicine in the water—just enough to cure one? Did he put in different medicines of different diseases, or did he have a medicine like those that are patented, now and cure one disease just as well as another? (Laughter and applause.) Or, instead of medicine, did he put just enough miracle in the water to cure one no matter what he had?

Was that water troubled by an angel? Possible water apostles and theologians call angels a scientist knows as carbonic acid gas, possibly.

John does not say the people thought the water was troubled by an angel, but he says it was. He does not say the people thought that the first one that got in after the troubling was cured; he says he was. Now of such a man worth? Let us have some sense.

WHAT IS THE EVIDENCE

I had an old friend once; he was sick and his wife sent for me to come and see him, and I went. He was a little out of his mind—not on everything. I had a talk with him and he said unto him: "Now, since I have been sick I have made a discovery"—and this story of the water put me in mind of it. Says I, "What? What is the discovery?"

MAKING A TELLING POINT.

"Well, what is your discovery?" "Well," says he, "you just dig a hole in the ground about three feet deep and put in the joint of a stove-pipe; and let two men and two women take hold of the ends and turn as fast as they can from right to left and butter will come out in pound chunks." (Great laughter.)

Yes; and he says: "Turn the other way and it is cheese." (Continued laughter.) Well I told him just as soon as he got well I would go in with him. (Renewed laughter.)

Again I say that if the Devil does not exist the gospels are not inspired. If devils do not exist Christ was either an impostor, or the New Testament does not correctly give what he said or what he pretended to believe. There is no escape. If devils do not exist, if the Devil is not a fact, the fall of man is a mistake. If the Devil does not exist the atonement becomes an absurdity. If the Devil does not exist hell becomes only an ignorant dream of revenge. There is no other way.

Now, what have Christians taught? We know what the Testament has taught. What have Christians taught? All the fathers of the Church have lived in devils. All the saints won their crowns by overcoming devils. All the popes and cardinals believed in devils, and what time they could spare from fighting devils was put in killing honest men. But they believed in devils and they proved the existence of the Devil by the New Testament; and they knew that hell was the Devil and his angels. The founders of all the Protestant churches, the makers of all the orthodox creeds, all the leading theologians, Protestant theologians from Luther to the present president of Princeton College, were and are firm believers in the Devil; and all the commentators believed in the Devil as firmly as they did in God. We know it.

Only a few years ago a friend of mine in England sent me some pictures. It seems that they were renovating a church, a church made sacred by the ashes of Shakespeare, and in taking off the whitewash they found the pictures upon the walls that had been admired by intelligent Christians of three hundred years ago, and they took photographs of them and this friend sent me a set of photographs or pictures that adorned the church where they worshiped God the father and God the son, the lover of the human race, and those pictures showed the mercy of God.

I will just describe one. On the left hand was a cemetery, people going out of their graves; little devils grabbing them by the heels; and then over the other side there was a big iron cauldron full of people, just like a bunch of asparagus; and then there was a little asparagus; and then there was a little to give a draft, and the flames were coming out between the heads and the hands; and just below there was a monster with a wide mouth and teeth with the points set towards the throat, so if they got in there once they couldn't get out; and they were driving a regular Indian file procession, driving them with whips into that burning furnace. And over the other side there was something like a scaffold or long beam breaced on the bottom, and iron hoops, and a set of poor sinners hanging by the tongues and heads just going for their naked backs. Oh! it was a beautiful scene! (Great laughter.)

Then just on the top, you know, above, there was a little glimpse of heaven. There was a row of the redeemed, the gentlemen that had been washed in the blood of the lamb (Renewed laughter). The gentlemen whose rescuers had all been charged to the Devil. Yes, there they were, saved. They were happy; mouths were joy stretched from ear to ear, as they looked upon the victims of God's loving justice! (Great applause.) That is what the church believed about devils.

Why, of course, under the scheme of salvation the Devil was a necessity. Somebody had to be responsible for the thorns and thistles; somebody had to father the mistakes of God.

For centuries the church taught that man was totally depraved, that he was by nature the child of the Devil, and the new born babes were tenanted with unclean spirits. How do I know?

As late as the middle of the 16th century every infant that was baptized was by that ceremony freed from a devil. When the holy water was applied by the priest, they said: "I command thee, thou unclean spirit, in the name of the father, the son and holy ghost, that thou come out and depart from this infant, whom our Lord Jesus Christ has vouchsafed to call to his holy baptism to be made a member of his body and of his holy congregation."

At that time the fathers, the theologians, the commentators agreed that unbaptized children went to hell, even those born dead; and these same fathers, theologians and commentators looking up with clasped hands said, "God is Love."

These babes were pure as pity's tears, innocent as their mothers' loving smiles, and yet the makers of our creeds believed and taught that leering, unclean fiends inhabited their dimpled flesh. Oh, the unsearchable riches of Christianity! (Laughter.)

For many centuries the church filled the world with devils, with malicious spirits that caused storm and tempest, disease, accident and death; that filled the night with visions of despair, with prophecies that drove the dreamers mad. These devils

ASSUMED A THOUSAND FORMS, countless disguises, in their efforts to capture souls and destroy the church. They even deceived the wisest and the best. Sometimes they made priests forget their vows. They said: "I am in passion's fire; and cunningly entrapped and smothered the innocent and good. They even assumed the likeness of a priest and then got profane and went cursing and swearing through the streets, just to bring disgrace upon the church. There was one time that the Devil assumed the likeness of a good bishop, a pure and holy man, and in that likeness he allowed himself to be taken from the room of a beautiful widow, at night—yes, sir (great laughter)—just to bring disgrace on that bishop; and with such nicety he imitated the bishop that lots of people who knew the bishop, when they saw the Devil, were satisfied that it was the bishop. (Renewed and great laughter.)

And the people didn't know any better until there was a church trial, and then they found that it was the Devil and that the bishop was a good, pure, and holy man. (Great laughter.)

So these devils gave to witches and wizards supernatural powers and told them the secrets of the future. At that time people believed in the New Testament. They thought they knew it was inspired, and many who so thought became insane.

No man has genius enough to describe the AGONIES THAT HAVE BEEN INFLECTED, upon innocent men and women because of this belief. Oh, how it has darkened the mind and hardened the heart! It made the universe a madhouse presided over by an insane God. Think! Why should a merciful God allow his children, his innocent, ignorant children, to be the victims of devil? Why would a decent God allow his wisest to believe in devils and by reason of that belief to persecute, torture and burn their fellow men? Think! But Christians did not think. They did not ask these questions.

They believed the Bible. They had perfect confidence in the words of Christ.

Now the orthodox ostrich thrusts its head into the sand, and many of the clergy are ashamed to say that they believed in devils. The belief has become ignorant and vulgar. It is a belief that should only be in the brain of the savage, one that has just crawled out of the cave and pushed his tangled hair back from his forehead to catch a glimpse of the sun or to hunt for a snake. That is the kind of brain in which the Devil should lurk.

DEVIL OF DANEGELD TREASURE.

They are ashamed of the lake of fire and brimstone. It is too savage. At the same time they hate to give up the inspiration of the Bible, and so they give new meanings to inspired words, and now some of them say that these devils are personifications of evil.

If the devils were personifications, what were the angels? Was the angel who told Joseph who the father of Christ was, a personification of news? Was the holy ghost only a personification of the father? Was the virgin only a personification of the mother, and was the sacred babe only a personification? Let us be honest. Were the angels who rolled the stones from the sepulcher personifications? Were the angels of the Old Testament shadows, bodiless personifications? If the angels of the Bible are real angels the devils are real devils. Let us be honest with ourselves and with each other. Let us give to the Bible its obvious meaning. Let us admit that the writers believed what they wrote. We have no right to change or avoid their meanings. Faint preachers sully their own souls when they change what the writers of the Bible believed to be facts to allegories, poems or myths. It is impossible for any man who believes in the inspiration of the Bible to explain away the Devil. If the Bible is true the Devil exists, and there is no escape from this. The Devil does not exist the Bible is not true, and there is no escape from this.

Of course I know that the Devil is an impossibility.

AN IDIOTIC CONTRADICTION. I know that. I know that the being described as the Devil in the Bible is an utterly impossible being.

Let me give you one instance. This devil is the enemy of God, and God is his, and God doesn't love him either. He tells us to love our enemies, but he doesn't like him. (Laughter.)

Now, why should this devil, in another world, torment sinners, who are his friends? He tells us to love our enemies? Now, just think about it.

If the Devil is a personification, so is hell, and all these horrors fade into dreams.

Any clergyman who can read the Bible and then say that devils are personifications is himself a personification of stupidity or hypocrisy.

Does any intelligent man whose brain has not been deformed by superstition believe in the existence of the Devil? Let us see.

What evidence have we that he exists? Where does this Devil live when he is home? What does he do for a livelihood? What does he eat? If he doesn't eat he cannot think. Thought is a form of force. You cannot create force; you have got to borrow it. We borrow it from what we breathe and from what we eat and drink. How does this devil move from place to place—walk or fly, or has he invented some machine? What object has he in life? What is his idea of success? According to the Bible he knows he is to be defeated, knows that the end is eternal failure, knows that every step he takes leads to the infinite catastrophe. Why does he act as he does?

CARVING AT CORBEIL.

Where does this Devil come from? About how large is an average devil? (Laughter)—what? complexion what shape?

Was there ever anything more puerile and idiotic found lodged in the human mind? A Devil!

Our fathers thought that everything in this world came from some other realm; that all ideas of right and wrong came from above; that conscience kind of dropped from the clouds; that the darkness

WAS FILLED WITH IMPS, that came from purgation, and the day with angels that came from heaven, and that souls had been breathed into men by Jeddah. (That is not my philosophy.) What then is in this world that lives and breathes was produced here. Life was not imported, and thought and mind not an exotic. Of this planet man is a native. This world is his mother. The maker did not descend from the heavens. The maker was and is here. Matter and force in their countless forms, affinities and repulsions formed the living, breathing world.

How can we account for devils? Is it possible that creep into the bodies of men and women and swine? Do they stay in the stomach; brain, heart, or liver? Are these devils immortal or do they multiply and die? Were they all created at the same time? Did they come from a single pair?

If they are subject to death what becomes of them after death? Do they go to some other world? Are they annihilated, or can they get to heaven by believing in Christ? I don't know; I don't know. (Great laughter.)

But one thing I do know. In the brain of science

DEVILS HAVE NEVER LIVED. In the brain of science you will find no goblins, ghosts, wraiths or imps, no witches or spooks. In the brain of sciences the supernatural does not exist. No man of science or sense in the whole world believes in devils any more than he does in mermaids, vampires, gorgons, hydras, naiads, dryads, nymphs, fairies or anthropophagi—any more than he does in the fountain of youth, the philosopher's stone, perpetual motion or flat money. (Sensation.)

There is the same difference between religion and science that there is between a mad horse and a university, between a fortune teller and a mathematician, between emotion and philosophy, between guess and demonstration.

I am delighted that the devils have gone. I am delighted that with them they took the miracles of Christ. The devils have carried away "Our Lord." They have taken away the INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE, and they have left us in the darkness of nature without the consolation of hell.

Think! Let me ask the clergy a few questions: How did your devil, who was an angel of light, come to sin? There was no other devil to tempt him. He was in perfectly good society, in the company of God, all of his associates were perfect. How did he fall? Think about it! Nothing to mislead him then? How did he fall? He knew that God was infinite, and yet he waged war against him. More than that; he induced one-third of the angels to enlist under his flag. He knew he could not succeed.

Why was God so unpopular? What an administration—one-third of the angels went into the rebellion, joined the Devil. How were they so wicked? According to the Christians these angels were spirits. They never had been corrupted by flesh; by the passion of love. No saloons in heaven, no gambling houses and no race track (laughter); nothing calculated to "stain the heart of an angel. No living to make, no trading to do, no manufacturing, no temptation of Christ.

short weight. How did they fall? I don't know; I don't know. (Great laughter.)

Why did God create these angels, knowing that they would rebel? Why did infinite wisdom

SOW THE SEEDS OF DISCORD in heaven, knowing that he would cast them into the lake of fire, knowing that for them he would create an eternal prison whose dungeons would echo for ever with the shrieks and shrieks of endless pain? Why did he do it?

How foolish is infinite wisdom! Wonderful! How malicious is infinite mercy, and how revengeful is boundless love!

Again I say no sensible man in all the world believes in devils.

Why does God allow these devils to enjoy themselves at the expense of his ignorant children? Why does he allow them to leave their prisons? Does he give them furloughs or tickets of leave? Why don't he keep them away from us? Does he want his children misled and corrupted so that he can have the pleasure of damning their poor souls?

I don't know. Some of the preachers who have answered me say that I am fighting a man of straw; that they have advanced; that they are thinking and that I am behind the times. Well, what am I fighting?

I am fighting the supernatural; I am fighting the dogma of inspiration, the belief in devils, the atonement, salvation by faith, the forgiveness of sins and the savagery of eternal pain. I am fighting the monstrous and absurd.

THE CRUEL AND INFAMOUS, and yet ministers say in this they do not believe the things that I fight, that I am fighting with a man of straw. In this they do not seem to me that they are quite candid.

But who is this man of straw? Let me tell you? A man of straw is their master. In every orthodox pulpit stands this man of straw; he stands before the preacher, stands with a club called a creed in his upraised hand, and the shadow of his club falls athwart the open Bible, falls upon the preacher's brain and darkens the light of his reason and compels him to betray himself.

The man of straw rules every sectarian school and college, every orthodox church. The man of straw is the censor who passes on every sermon. Now and then—not often—some minister puts a little sense into his discourse, tries to take a forward step; down comes the club and the man of straw

FROM HOGARTH'S RARE SHOW, demands an explanation, a retraction. If the minister meekly takes it back, good. If he does not, he is brought to book. That is the work of the man of straw. This man of straw

PUT THE PLASTER OF SILENCE, on the lips of Prof. Briggs, and he was forced to leave the church or remain dumb. The man of straw closed the mouth of Prof. Smith and he has not opened it since. The man of straw would not allow the Presbyterian creed to be changed, and yet there is not an intelligent man on the earth who believes the Presbyterian creed. (Ap-

Great Revivals Are of the Past.

A prominent evangelist and one of the most conservative of them, says an exchange, predicts in the very near future we shall experience a great revival of religion in this country. He thinks a tidal wave of religious enthusiasm will sweep over the land, carrying people back to the faith and fervor of their fathers. In this case the wish is probably father to the thought and that is about all there is to it.

All the signs of the times seem to point in the other direction. In the first place revivals of religion are never coincident with periods of great prosperity. Material prosperity is more apt to make the average man self-reliant and arrogant instead of humble and dependent upon some higher power. In the second place, there is no getting away from the fact that the people of this age are absolutely disinclined to a belief in the supernatural. The churches increase in membership but even the membership of the churches fail to take seriously the fundamental doctrines of their creeds. They look upon the organization not as saving agencies but as organizations for the accomplishment of good deeds, as helps socially—as beneficent influences, but not as essential to what is embraced under the term salvation.

If we are going to have a revival of religion in this country the material notions with which this generation is quite thoroughly imbued must be swept away. Religion must once more become the vital thing it used to be in men's minds. It is not too much to say that the old idea of hell as a place of actual torment will have to be rehabilitated.

It is conceivable to be sure that here and there, under the leadership of men possessing a personal magnetism akin to hypnotic power, considerable enthusiasm may be aroused temporarily. But this sort of thing would not be a revival of religion in the real sense of that term. A revival of religion to amount to anything must be a return to the old beliefs. Doubt will have to be banished absolutely. No ifs and ands, nor perhaps can be admitted if religion is to be the vital thing it once was. We doubt very much whether this can ever come about. Christianity has been too general and too widely read. The intellect has to be convinced nowadays. An appeal to sentiment and to the emotions will not suffice.

Of course it would be foolish to say that a revival of religion of the old type is an impossibility. If men could get away from material things to a degree, if for example conditions should come about that would make it impossible for men to aspire to worldly conquests, then indeed, might the thoughts of the masses be turned to things which are not of this world. But to-day the whole trend is in the other direction. The ambition of the average person is to lay up treasures upon earth, and a little thought is given to the things, then to the enjoyment of the passing hours in a material sense. The opportunities and devices for satisfying such ambitions are without limit and easily accessible.

Spurious Books.

Moshelm was well informed regarding the infamous devices ever employed by Catholics, to found their internal system of religious slavery. The wonder is how he could place trust in anything coming through their villainously corrupt hands. In his Ecclesiastical History, Century 3, part 2, chapter 3, section xi, in continuation of the preceding section wherein he said the church's object was "victory rather than truth," he said:

"This disingenuous and vicious method of surprising their adversaries by artifice, and striking them down, as it were, by other disagreeable effects, A GREAT NUMBER OF BOOKS, which were falsely attributed to certain great men, in order to give these spurious productions more credit and weight."

"False in one thing, false in all." Is a legal maxim borrowed from the Latin, which the law student meets with so soon as he can under the law of evidence. It will be repeated by the judge in charging the jury. If the question comes up during the trial. It is a true ism which cannot be controverted. Applied to the frauds and the forgeries by Catholics, in the propagation of their faith, then where is Christianity whose whole system is built on fraud and money-comb with fraud and falsehood? What book coming to us through their hands can we receive with confidence that it is genuine? Was Paul, was Augustine, was Josephus, was Tacitus, was Amalricus, among the "great number of books" to which he referred as spurious?

The Point Not Well Taken.

A correspondent of the Truth Seeker, says:

"There are to-day in existence New Testament manuscripts undisputedly written in the fourth century, such as the Codex Vaticanus. The French language did not exist at that time, and as nearly 1,000 years had to elapse before anything like French came into being, how can anyone say 'the author of the original Greek [of Paul's Epistles] was a Frenchman'?"

The fact that manuscript copies of the New Testament have been in the Vatican since the fourth century, or that the Codex Vaticanus was written that early, is not an "indisputable fact." On the contrary learned scholars who have given years of laborious research to the subject, insist with all the earnestness they can command, that the evidence is almost conclusive that Paul's Epistles, the oldest of the New Testament books, were not written earlier than the 10th century, and, probably, not before the Crusades.

The same authority which reports the Codex Vaticanus on file in the Vatican, will exhibit to the inquirer the swaddling clothes in which the infant Jesus was wrapped; the milk of his mother; the bones of his grandmother Anna; the identical cross on which Jesus was crucified; the tunic he wore; a phial of the chrism with which he was anointed or made a christ—that is the anointed. Even the manger in which Jesus was alleged to have been born, was exhibited by a church in Rome, with thousands of other pretended relics of the "Master." Moshelm, sec. 11, chap. 3, century 3, part 2, says of early Christians:

"They were desirous of surpassing all others in piety, looked upon it as laudable to advance the cause of piety by artifice and fraud."

That method has been observed by Catholicism through all the centuries down to the present. The Progressive Thinker takes no stock in any statement, book, or relic of any sort exhibited in the Vatican or elsewhere, whose genuineness is only authenticated by Roman Catholic authority. A church built by violence, whose every act to extend its faith is marked by blood; that resorted to every crime to establish and perpetrate its power; the bulls of whose Pope have been principally used to retard the advance of knowledge and prevent the extension of social, religious and political freedom, have no rights an honest man should respect; and books coming through their hands, or exhibited by them as just objects of suspicion. They are doubly so when first found in the old cloisters, where lazy monks, subsisting by beggary, held sway for centuries.

Of the Codex Vaticanus, "The American Cyclopaedia," Vol. XI, p. 138, says: "Its early history is not known, but it appears in the first catalogue of the Vatican library in 1475." That is the era of the great ecclesiastical forgeries. Josephus, Eusebius, Tacitus, Amalricus, and a multitude of books of lesser note, came to light at that time. It was pretended they were found in the old monasteries, generally a fragment here, another there. They were all necessary to place Roman Catholicism on an enduring basis, and they were doubtless made to order as needed. Some of these, as Josephus' works, received interpolations after coming from the hands of the forgers, the originals not being in all respects satisfactory.

Very Considerate.

A writer in a late issue of "Public Opinion," deploring the tendency of even children to call in question certain portions of the "Holy Scriptures." He ascribes this to the teaching of science in the public schools, and of accounting for everything heretofore esteemed miraculous as the workings of natural law. He mentions the virgin-birth of Jesus as a painful cause of stumbling.

We own to great admiration for the writer's proposed method of preventing this "stumbling." He says:

"It is of the greatest importance that we win such minds to faith in the supernatural; but to do that we must not make prominent these elements in the Bible narrative not surely established as historical."

Good enough. Pass over very slightly all the great Munchausens found in the dear old book, and when the reader comes to Matthew 1:20, and reads that an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, "Fear not to take Mary," etc., for reasons that follow, remember it was a "dream," and is not therefore historical, hence it may be passed over as unimportant.

Now that very writer, had he been questioned on the subject, would have said, the book was inspired of God, therefore inerrant; and yet he doesn't want intelligent children to notice it. Dr. Adam Clark, in his Commentaries on John 3:11, says:

"The reading of this story [of the woman taken in adultery] was industriously avoided in the lessons recited out of the Gospels, in the public service of the churches; as if Jesus' saying 'I do not condemn thee,' had given too much countenance to women guilty of that crime. . . . This whole story, from verse 1 to 11 inclusive, came, in length of time to be left out of some MSS. though in the greater part it is still remaining."

Dr. Clark, in the same connection, says:

"It was the habit to write over this narrative, 'Not to be read.' And thus our 'dear brothers in Christ' manage to escape obnoxious Bible teaching. Is it not wiser to declare the fact that the whole collection of books known as the Bible, were written by clergies, monks in an age of barbarism; that translators, copyists, etc., have vainly labored for centuries to reform it, and yet the footprints of the fraudulent authors, not withstanding occasional attempts at piety, are visible on every page?"

If anyone says that consciousness cannot exist except in the relation of cause and effect with certain organic molecules, I must ask him how he knows that. And if he says that it can, I must ask him the same question—Mushy.

Review of Passing Events.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE, EDITOR-AT-LARGE, N. S. A.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, on Mediums.

This popular writer has come out boldly and bravely in advocacy of Spiritualism. What she says of mediums has great significance:

"I believe it is a sin against the Holy Ghost in every human being (for the original meaning of that phrase is holy spirit) to make a business of mediumship. The moment the ability to communicate with the disembodied is turned to financial account or to the material matters of men for a money consideration the medium loses her connection with the higher worlds of spirits and places herself in touch with the lower worlds; with those who passed from earth unawakened, and who therefore occupy an earth-bound position and are unworthy of our confidence, as they would have been before they left the earthly tenement."

There have been two sides to this question almost from the advent of Spiritualism. On one side it is urged that as a gift from the spirit world, the means of communication should be opened without price. Freely received, freely given. The apostles of the new gospel like those of the old should not measure their services by the rules of trade. On the other, the laborer is worthy of his wages. The medium gives his time for which he should receive reward.

Whichever view he received, it is certain that commercial mediumship has brought far more disgrace on Spiritualism than any other cause. The entire fraud element thrives because of its financial support. There would be nothing of the kind to humiliate the believer, were mediumship free. The best and most wonderful mediums belong to private life and soon recompense other than that freely given.

The most reliable mediums find it impossible to predicate what they will receive, and often their seances are failures. It is not just to exact a fee for a sitting without results, although this may be justified by saying the hour's time has the same value whether communications are received or not.

The effect of commercialism is to bring half-developed and unreliable mediums before the public. They find profit, and are almost forced by the insatiable demand, to supplement the little they do by spirit aid, by fraud and trickery. The public demand what may well be called "impossible manifestations," and are satisfied with none other. The fakir can produce phenomena the genuine medium fails in receiving, and thus attracts the greater patronage. The genuine is overshadowed by the rank growth of deception.

It is a difficult question to answer, yet it may be taken for granted that the highest plane of mediumship, is reached by those who exercise their powers only at the solicitation of friends, and not publicly for fees. The most wonderful results have been obtained by societies or individuals, subsidizing mediums, and fostering a normal development.

The most astounding and convincing messages and phenomena have been received within the sacred circle of the home, through the medium of a never known as such to the outside public.

This should be a suggestion to those who have the welfare of the cause at heart. It may not be a "sin against the Holy Ghost," for such sin is undefinable and has never been defined, to accept pay for the services of a revelator of spirit friends, yet the act is not in harmony with spiritual laws, which demand devotion of self and every gift. And here never was the saying "give and you shall receive," more applicable. The medium who has the power to give, will assuredly receive from those to whom he brings assurance of the coming and communion of spirit friends, will never regret that he does so above commercial considerations.

The Crafty Crafts.

The "Third House," as the "Christian Lobby" at Washington, is called, under the direction of Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, has come to grief. It will not stand a "fair deal." Few there are who know the tremendous influence this "Christian Lobby" wields over legislation. Its work has been more insidious than that of the Jesuits. Really it is the Jesuit branch of Protestantism. This lobby supported and furnished money by bigots the country over, has sent out tons of literature, consisting of copies of the Bible, and other religious tracts, explaining the work of the Lobby in having "moral legislation" passed by Congress. This "moral legislation" consists in forcing Sundays laws, "God in the Constitution, and every enactment favoring the churches on the attention of Congress. The Lobby keeps careful watch and introduces its bigoted measures at unguarded moments, by the lobby gathered from the churches, forces the attention of senators and representatives.

MURDER THREATENED.

"Whom the Gods Would Destroy They First Make Mad."

An incident of significant import happened at the meeting of the Chicago Spiritualists' League, at Handel's Hall, Saturday evening, January 6, which we wish to bring to the attention of The Progressive Thinker's world-wide family of readers. During the inaugural address of the president for 1906, Dr. C. A. Burgess, he read and commented upon the following letter received by him after his election in December:

"Chicago, Jan. 2, 1906.
"Dr. Burgess:—We understand that you have been elected president of the Chicago Spiritualists' League, and we also understand that the object of the League is to interfere and run out of Chicago all mediums who do not belong to the League, or work in accord with it. We belong to no meeting, and are not making our living by the aid of our gifted friends, and do NOT WANT TO BE INTERFERED WITH. Just a word of advice, Mr. Burgess: IF YOU STIR UP ANY MUSS, LOOK OUT FOR A PIECE OF LEAD UNDER THE FIRST RIB OF LEFT SIDE; SO BE CAREFUL."

The president then introduced the first speaker of the evening, Dr. Warner, the first vice-president of the body, who prefaced his remarks with congratulations that Dr. Burgess was being so soon made acquainted with the perquisites of his office, stating that he himself was familiar with such experiences and announcing that word to him that very afternoon that a Chicago materializing medium had boasted that a man of her family had taken an "oath to give even with Dr. Warner."

These straws show that the object of a certain element of physical mediums extends no further than the MAKING

The literature boasting of what the "Christian Lobby" has done, and intends to do, has been scattered through the mails by the ton. That would not be any one's business but the leaders of the movement, if they paid postage like other citizens. But the "Christian Lobby" does not. It claims the franking privilege, and has defrauded the government, of no one can know how much. Crafts, the Reverend, used the frank of a member of Congress, a compliant member, and Postmaster-General Cortelyou has called him to account, and the Washington Post says it will be a "severe blow" to the "Christian Lobby."

For a common citizen to use a "franked" envelope is punished as a crime; we will see how Rev. Crafts will be dealt with for violating the law unnumbered times. Will some one inform the public who the member of Congress who has become partner in this crime defrauding the government of thousands of dollars of postage? He is the guilty one, for Crafts must have sinned ignorantly! He could not have known that it was criminal to thus defraud! He is a "reformer," whose sole aim is to keep people from sinning, by laws he would have enacted. He preaches and prays that the worldlings may become as righteous as he is. He labors for the salvation of sinners, and sends out his literature, under a frank, for that purpose. As the Washington Post remarks, we "wish he were doing this to the heathen in distant and inaccessible lands—say Darkest Africa or the Solomon Islands."

An English Divine in Trouble.

Archdeacon Collier, rector of Stockton, Warwickshire, England, is in trouble. He has been investigating Spiritualism for thirty years and was early convinced of its truth. His convictions grew stronger and stronger until he could not keep them longer to himself. He prepared a paper on "Spiritualism and its Relations to the After Life," to read before the Church Congress, but the reverend assembly turned him down. He therefore engaged a hall and gave his address to a very large audience, two bishops and at least fifteen clergymen coming out to hear him.

Thirty years' experience with the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism had made the subject clear as day to the archdeacon, and he did not consider that to read before the Church Congress, but the reverend assembly turned him down. He therefore engaged a hall and gave his address to a very large audience, two bishops and at least fifteen clergymen coming out to hear him.

It is said by those who understood the lecture, that it was an excellent specimen of spiritual literature, and it will be published for distribution. Now comes an important question: What will be done to the archdeacon? With his strong church leaning and implicit trust in the Bible to which he adhered as his sacred "manifestation," he is scarcely broad enough for Spiritualism, while he is too liberal for the church.

Can Spirits Pass to Other Globes.

The answer must be given by spirits themselves, and its value depends absolutely on their testimony. Most conclusively it has received a negative as well as affirmative reply. The following from a spiritual source reconciles this apparent contradiction.

"Can spirits traverse the space between distant globes? This depends on their degree of refinement. While there are those pure and ethereal, others are gross and unrefined. The sensualist and depraved in many instances are so gross that gravity chains them to the earth as it does man. They are denser than the spirit ether, hence have weight and cannot arise from the earth's surface more than man can do. Others less gross can only arise to the First Sphere, while the more purified are able to pass through the universal spirit ether visiting other spheres and worlds. The degree of purity or spirituality determines whether or no the spirit shall be chained to earth, or allowed freedom to go impelled by its desire."

OF A LIVING and the attainment of an undeserved and fleeting notoriety. They thrive by deception and intimidation. Nerve and impudence are their entire capital.

The desirable ones on spirit side of life make use as instruments of those WHO CARRY MURDER IN THEIR HEARTS AND THE GAIN OF ROBBERY IN THEIR POCKETS. THUGGERY AND SPIRITUALITY are not companionable.

During 1905 the official board of the Chicago League asked many physical mediums of the city if it withstood the test of three seances under test conditions to be mutually agreed upon. Not a single materializing medium responded favorably and fearlessly. Who of them will undertake to duplicate Florence Cook's conditions for the English Scientists?

IT IS IDLE TO THINK THAT ANY METHOD OF "CAN" THROTTLE THE AWAKENED INTELLIGENCE OF SPIRITUALISTS' ALL OVER THE LAND. THEY ARE DETERMINED THAT WHATEVER IS GENUINE SHALL BE UPHOLD, BUT THIS FRAUDULENT MUST GO.

Reputable mediums for phenomena can see the handwriting upon the wall, and will retire before Doug Tracy's growing demand for reality which will never be satisfied with simulation and pretense. The harvest is determined by the character and quality of the seed.

Spirit Communications Were Necessarily Deferred.

The great minds of the preceding and the present generation, which have reflected such lasting lustre on our literature, the Huxleys, the Darwins, the Spencers, the Tyndalls, the Millers and the Drapers, and nearly all the great inventors with scarcely an exception, who were and are independent thinkers, stood aloof from the church, and repudiated its dogmas. Had they come upon the stage of action 400 years earlier and proclaimed the same great truths they have, every one of them would have been charged with heresy, and would have met the fate of a Bruno and a Servetus. As the estates of condemned heretics swelled the coffers of the church, adding largely to its wealth, it is stated as a fact that charges of infidelity were frequently made against the rich for the sole purpose of increasing the revenue of ecclesiastics. The darkness of the Middle Ages was greatly protracted, because the intellect of the times was sacrificed on the altar of religious bigotry.

No wonder the spirit world kept aloof when they saw their instruments, as Joan of Arc, writhing in flames, because she had obeyed their behests, so deferred their great work in revealing the future life until the people were free to receive them. And it was in free America, wrested from kingcraft and priestcraft, where they first thought it prudent to demonstrate to the race the truths of spirit return.

The Opinion of a Scholar.

How far from the truth was Prof. Goldwin Smith, of Montreal, when he wrote: "The mighty and supreme Jesus, who was to transfigure all humanity with his divine wit and grace—this Jesus has flown. To my mind this act has no terror. I believe the Legend of Jesus was made by many minds working under a great religious impulse—one man adding a parable, another an exhortation, another a miracle story. And so Jesus represents for us, not a man, but the aspiration of many hearts."

The progress from deepest ignorance to highest enlightenment is a progress from entire unconsciousness of law to the conviction that law is universal and inevitable.—Spencer.

A. LEAH UNDERHILL.

One of the Original Fox Sisters, at Hydesville, N. Y., Expresses Her Opinion in Reference to Materializations.

At the same time I think that the cause of Spiritualism would be at this day further advanced in general acceptance, if cabinets, and with them the phenomena called materialization and transfiguration, had never been introduced. For, however genuine, as well as impressive, may be the manifestations of the presence and action of the spirits which may have occurred in the employment of them, they afford opportunities for deception which dishonest mediums are but too ready to avail themselves of, and then when exposure comes (and it is generally Spiritualists who are the most earnest in detecting and punishing the infamy of such deception), they are at once trumpeted all over the land, and more harm is done to the progress of the cause than all the good ever resulting from the genuine phenomena themselves. No such exposures ever occurred in all our long and varied experience, though never have mediums been subjected to more jealous and severe investigations; and there are few of the more modern phenomena which have not occurred through our mediumship.—A. Leah Underhill in "The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism."

The Curtain Will Rise.

Next week the Curtain will surely rise on a new scene in connection with a white hat, a white dress, a pair of white shoes, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll. Can a spirit transfer the same to his spirit home, first dematerializing them, and wearing them there, and then materialize them again at will to wear them on earth. This subject will be fully considered, and light thrown on the mysteries of the dark cabinet, from which so many questionable "spirits" appear, dressed in false wigs, false whiskers, earthly made illuminated dresses and other togery. Spiritualists all along the line are becoming more interested than ever in the investigations being carried on through the leadership of The Progressive Thinker, and the end is not yet. The following omissions will be supplied, showing who the medium is, through whom such wonderful materializations and dematerializations are given.

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at — some time ago. A short time before Christmas [the giving name] cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. One lady got her a nice white hat; another made her a white dress; another provided her with a pair of white shoes; another with a pair of white stockings; and others with scarf, fan and doll. These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the seance room. When inquiry was made, the spirit said she took them to her spirit home.

A few weeks after Christmas, —, who is a materializing medium, requested —, who is a spirit photographer, to take her photograph while entranced in the cabinet in the dark. She seated herself in the cabinet, the curtain pulled a little to one side, the camera placed in position, the room made dark, and the photograph was taken. To one end in front of — stands —, the spirit messenger, clothed in her Christmas presents of earthly clothing. I send you the photograph; also a photograph of myself and spirit wife and son, and also one of myself and spirit —, who controls the materialization, and the face and head of — and others, supposed to be relatives whom I do not recognize. This demonstration proves to me that spirits can be photographed and that they can take solids to their spirit homes.

CHRISTIAN OR BUDDHIST?

They Run in Identical Channels

Baron Harden Hickey Describes Parallels Between Buddhist and Christian Stories.—Singular Coincidences and Analogies.—Was Christ an Essene? How Buddhism Was Transported to the West.

To the Editor of the New York Herald:—I think it my duty to state that it is far from my intention to make an attack on the doctrines of Christ as they are expounded by a large number of honest, conscientious men. Still less is it my desire to criticize or disparage the sublime teachings of the son of Mary, to whom I am happy to pay the tribute of my profound respect. My object is solely to show the countless analogies existing between the Buddhist and Christian legends—analogies so striking that they forcibly prove to an impartial mind that a common origin must necessarily be given to the teachings of Sakya-Muni and those of Jesus.

To resume the spirit of these lines, I may say that I consider the New Testament certainly of Indian origin! This, I think, can easily be proven by the numerous points of resemblance between the lives and doctrines of the founders of the Buddhist and Christian religions, coincidences which are certainly not the result of mere chance or accident.

The conclusion which every honest inquirer is then forced to is that one account must necessarily be a copy of the other, and since the Buddhist biographer, living long before the birth of Christ, could not have borrowed from the Christian one, the plain inference is that the early creed-mongers of Alexandria were guilty of an act of plagiarism. The parallels in the lives and histories of the two sages are clearly drawn, and I summarize some of them.

THE GENEALOGIES.

The genealogies of both are carefully traced from their respective ancestral kings (Mahasammata and David down to their fathers, Buddhadasa and Joseph), who, on the other hand, according to both legends, were not their real fathers. Both virgins (Maya and Mary), who were to become their mothers, were greeted previously by the angels and deities.

The conception by the Holy Ghost announced by Gabriel corresponds with the dream of Maya of a white elephant from heaven entering her side.

The wise men from the East came to offer frankincense and myrror; so at the birth of Buddha gods and devas, princes and Brahmins came with presents.

As Herod was afraid of the child, so king Bimbisara made inquiries from his ministers to search the land and find whether anyone lived who, by his superiority would become famous.

THE TEMPTATION OF BUDDHA AND CHRIST.

The Simeon of the bible corresponds with the Brahman Asita, an aged man who came down from the Himalayas to see the thirty-two marks and the eighty signs of the Buddha.

The presentation in the temple of Jesus is similar to the request made to the father of Buddha by the elders of the Sakya race, that the child be taken solemnly to the temple, which was done with great pomp.

In his twelfth year Jesus was found discoursing with the teachers, with the teachers, as the father of Buddha found the Holy Son in the wood surrounded by the wise of ages past, both hearing and asking them questions. The forty days' fast in the wilderness is common to both teachers, as also the temptations by the devil and the temptation by Mara, and the host. Then the angels ministered to both. In the stream Narajana and Jesus were baptized in the river Jordan. The heavens opening and the voice from heaven proclaiming the teacher are to be found in the Buddhist Scriptures.

The Sermon on the Mount begins with blessings; so, too, in the Lalita Vistara of Buddha. The Buddha preached from the heights of a mountain, as the Buddha preached from a high hill situated in the neighborhood of Rayagriha, the Buddhist Capernaum. The first disciples were followers of John the Baptist; so, in the Buddhist legend, the followers of the Brahman Rudraksa. The first number of disciples in both accounts was five, then in both the number increases to sixty, seventy, and eighty. In the Buddhist books it said that Buddha asked them not to go two by two, in order that information might be spread wider, but afterward allowed them to go two by two to be a comfort one to another.

Both teachers were regarded by some as God, by others as sent by the deity. Both performed wonders—healing the sick, feeding the hungry, etc.

The walking upon the waters and the declaration of death some time before are common.

MORE PARALLELS.

We can continue these parallels further: Thus the woman from the crowd called him blessed. The Samaritan woman at the well and the Chundata woman. The courtesan Magdalena and the courtesan Amhapal, both converted by the teachers. The rich man who came to Buddha by night and Nicodemus.

The triumphal entry into Jerusalem and the triumphal entry into Rajagrh.

Jesus said to Peter: "Move away," as Buddha to his disciple Upawana. The missionary command, "Go and preach," was given by both.

In the Buddhist legend we have the traitor Judas, the same as Judas in the Christian legend. Wonders and miracles, etc., occurred at the death of both the sages. We have also the parting of the garments and the strife for the relics, and before their death both masters put a similar question: "Which among you can accuse me of a sin?" said Christ, and Buddha: "In me there is no vestige of selfishness, nor of envy, nor of covetousness, nor of desire."

Prof. Scardel of the University of Leipzig, instances in his work, "Das Evangelium von Jesus," fifty-one analogies, all distinctly pointing to Buddhism rather than Christianity as the original source. The probability is that Buddhist legends were carried over by the Essenes and others into Palestine, and were made use of by the evangelists to adorn the Gospel narrative.

Prof. Deul, too, in his "Romantic Legends," cites many singular coincidences. Dr. Hubbe Schielden, in his work entitled "Jesus ein Buddhist," quotes in all some hundred parallels.

Indeed the abundance of the materials for the argument in favor of the formal harmony of the Christian and Buddhist traditions is so great that I must limit myself to a few more typical examples.

BUDDHA THE SAVIOR.

Just as the Buddha was pointed out as the physician, savior, and deliverer—the deliverer from the bonds of infancy—the deliverer from sin, death, the devil and hell—even so were the disciples and his followers called the "Children of God," and according to some authorities, as sons or children of Buddha.

It is also remarkable that the formula "Follow me!" is especially stated in the Buddhist accounts to have been the usual one in calling the disciples. And as in the Gospel of John, Jesus is supposed to say, "My kingdom is not of this world," so also the saying attributed to the Buddha reads, "I know indeed, that a kingdom is appointed for me, but it is not a worldly kingdom which I seek."

Surprising, too, is the striking similarity apparent in both accounts of even the usual changes of phraseology at the introduction and conclusion of the preaching. Thus these phrases occur over and over again: "At this time," or "Again at that time," "Verily I say unto you," "Yet again: "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear the word."

THE BAPTISM OF BUDDHA AND CHRIST.

In order that it might be fulfilled, "as he spoken," these expressions occur once but frequently throughout the narratives, we are compelled to conclude from the resemblance that the evangelists living there must have had before them the sacred scripture of the Buddhists. Like Luke, Abhinisarama Mulla concludes the first period of the Master's life with the words: "So the child waxed and increased in strength." Similarly to the many poetical resemblances are to be remarked such as the chief hymns, such as the songs of the heavenly host at the birth, and the announcement to Mary by the angel Gabriel, which should be compared with the Gathas recited by the Brahmins at the interpretation of the corresponding vision of the mother of Buddha.

Similarly the many poetical interpolations in Luke all bear a like character in style and sound, and carry the impress of the Mahayana writings of the Buddhist Gathas.

INCONSISTENCIES IN THE GOSPEL.

When we find in a short sentence in the Gospel of Mark (1. 13) the history of the temptation, we know directly that it is an extract from other poetical pieces.

Now it is there stated: "And he was with wild beasts." Indeed, anything similar to this is not found in the other Gospels, which might have served as a coincidence, but only in exposition of the Buddhist accounts. Nor does this correspond with the other words which Matthew also has: "The angels ministered unto him." These ministrations relating to the temptations in the wilderness occupy three full chapters in the "Lalita Vistara."

That the Christian Gospels bear so close a likeness to the Buddhist may be in addition to the fact entirely due to similar conditions, owing to the origin of both in the East, but on closer examination the harmony here is but merely in the many symbolical words, but the correspondence of entire narratives is so general that the theory of underground coincidences cannot be entertained. Thus it is related of the Buddha that he has compared himself to the sower who sowed the seed of faith on the fields of the hearts of men.

Again, one of the older disciples came to the Buddha and presented himself before him as the prodigal son, by whom he was regarded as the loving father, and after he had come back again to him he was installed with much expense in the place as the son and heir of the house.

One of the most striking incidents in the account in the Gospel of John 12. 13, of the one "born blind," when placed in comparison with the detailed parallel passage in the Saddharma pundarika. In this sutra the idea ascribed to the master who healed the people (the blind people of the world) is that (this man) is presented as an example to everyone on account of his sinful condition in a former life. In the Indian phase of thought the idea of a rebirth in bodily form is a fundamental idea, but in the Gospel of John the question of sin in one life being the consequence of sin in a previous life stands unique and unsupported. This case arouses the suspicion that sufficient circumstantial evidence was not used by the Gospel writer in his borrowing.

A totally similar impress is contained in all three synoptic Gospels, where Jesus said that the secrets of the doctrine of the Word are hidden from the hot people, but are known only to the disciples. The motive for this teaching is clear in the Buddhist Scriptures, while it is an enigma in the Gospels, for the Buddha distinguishes between the esoteric circle of the disciples (the Bhikkhus) and the esoteric followers of the Word (the Upasakas).

THE VIRGIN AND THE HOLY CHILD.

It can hardly be possible that Jesus also should have in like manner made a distinction between his disciples, but at any rate, it is highly improbable that it should have spontaneously arisen in the Gospel. Again, in the Buddhist account the words occur, "of the sun, which shines for the good and the evil; of the rain, which falls for the just and unjust; the mustard seed serves as the simile for littleness, and the words, 'Perishable is the city built of sand, which cannot maintain itself.' It may also be stated that here the comparison in Matthew is incorrect about the foolish man who built his house on sand. Houses are well known to stand strong on a good foundation of sand, but the Buddhist cry of sand is something quite different.

COMPARING THE DOCTRINES.

Proceeding now to the comparison of the doctrines taught by Jesus and Buddha, we cannot here take credit to ourselves for an independent and critical examination of the text, so as to affirm what was and what was not the pure, original Christianity and the primitive teachings of the Buddha. We might certainly assume that at all events the highest moral and spiritual ideas in both religions are identical, and that the teachings proceed from the masters themselves. And we might leave it undecided as to how far either the masters themselves, or first the disciples, and later on the dogmatic theologians, have mixed up and confounded the esoteric fundamental ideas of the pure word with exoteric speculation and superstition. But it is easy to point out that the fundamental ideas of both teachers were the same.

The ultimate goal which Jesus pointed out to his disciples to strive for was the life eternal. As the absolute existence, only the all-one, the unchangeable, can be eternal, because without form and without shape. No material body, no difference and peculiarity of form can be everlasting, for what is formed necessarily yields to time, and must once again decay. Each appearance can be only relative and changeable. If thus we attain to perfection and desire the life and the full satisfaction we must be delivered from our present world and all other worlds of form. Eternal peace and unchanging happiness can only mean an absolute existence. This is precisely the idea of the Buddhist goal of perfection, which is Nirvana.

And even the outward working and visible form of this striving is in Buddhism just the same as is the doctrine of Jesus. Love and compassion for every fellow-creature, and not merely for mankind, but for all nature generally. Such is the essential character of the doctrine of Buddha, and the carrying out of this fundamental idea the success is more complete, better and more general in Buddhist countries than in Christian lands with their European civilization.

I must also remark before going further another striking similarity between the two religions. Buddhism, like Christianity, is founded on a trinity. In fact, the idea of the trinity seems common to nearly all religions. In Buddhism it consists of Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha—Buddha, the law and the assembly of the faithful, corresponding to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

How did Buddhism reach the West? We now come to the question. How did Buddhism reach the West? Arthur Lillie has exhausted this subject. By the early Phoenicians the commerce of the East was carried across Arabia from the port of Gerrha in the Persian Gulf. It was then shipped on the Red Sea and carried up the Acanth Gulf on its road to Tyre. That some of the commodities must have come from India is proved from the fact cited by Herodotus that cassia and cinnamon were among them, which articles could not be found nearer than Ceylon or the Malabar coast. To reach Tyre these goods had to pass close to the harbors of the Essenes, near the Dead Sea. The Phoenicians were in contact with India at least as nearly as the time of Solomon; but Alexander's expedition gave a great spur to the intercourse between India and the West. Bactria and Persia were in the hands of the Seleucid dynasty until 175 B.C.

HOW DID BUDDHISM REACH THE WEST?

This brought Antiochus the Great into the field to restore the authority of the Greeks. According to Polybius, he led his army into India and renewed his alliance with Sophaganes, king of that country. As the Asoka edicts were inscribed on rocks some six years after Antiochus came to the throne this is certainly an allusion to the Constantinian era.

In the meantime the building of Alexandria had given a powerful impetus to the intercourse with India by sea. Alexander had designated it to be the capital of his vast empire and the bridge between India and the West. This project was ably carried out after his death by his lieutenant, the first Ptolemy. Under his wise government, and that of his successor Alexander, soon became the first commercial city of the world. Of more importance, even was his large tolerance of creeds, whether Egyptian, or Grecian, or Jewish. In the year 208 B.C. Ptolemy Evergetes was on the throne. He conquered Abyssinia and a greater part of Asia, including Syria, Phoenicia, Babylonia, Persia and Media. His conquests extended to Bactria and he had a large fleet on the Red Sea. This placed him in contact with India from two different directions.

He married the daughter of Magas, King of Cyrene. Macedonia was ruled by Antigone at this particular date.

INDIAN ROCK INSCRIPTIONS.

This brings us to the celebrated rock inscriptions of King Asoka, surnamed Devanampiya, the beloved of the devas, or spirits. They have set at rest forever the question whether Buddhism was propagated westward from India. On the Girnar rock in Gujarat the name of Antiochus (the Great) occurs four times. This is one passage: "And, moreover, within the dominions of Antiochus, the Greek king, of which Antiochus' generals are the rulers, everywhere Piyadasi's (Asoka's) double system of medical aid is established, both medical aid for men and medical aid for animals, together with medicaments of all sorts, which are suitable for men and suitable for animals."

This is the second inscription: "And the Greek king, beside, by whom the four Greek kings, Ptolemaios, and was in this vicinity that convents of monks practicing rites precisely like those of the Buddhists existed in large numbers in the days of Philip (300 B.C.). It may also be mentioned that Nagasena, a Buddhist, had a discussion with Menander in the capital of Syria (200 B.C.)."

But even if no Buddhist came to the West, without doubt Buddhism did. For about this time there arose in Alexandria a teaching called "Gnosticism." This word is the Greek equivalent of "Buddhism," in Sanskrit, and it simply means interior or spiritual knowledge.

Pliny says the Buddhist missionaries had settled themselves in the shores of the Dead Sea ages before his time. "per seculum milia." Josephus (verse 13) corroborates Pliny as to the Essenes being descendants of these missionaries. Magasthenes says that the Jews were an Indian sect called Kalmi, and their theology resembled that of the Indians.

We may here remark the analogy between Judea and Ayodha (Oude), Palestine and Pali, and Stanland, the land of Pali.

C. S. Sotherton, in a lecture before the American Philological Society, remarks that legends and archaeological remains prove that 'Ireland, like every other nation, has been the recipient of propagandists of Siddhartha Buddha.'"

Bonhommer says: "Into Egypt and the East went Herodotus, Thales, Parmenides, Empedocles, Orpheus, and Pythagoras—called Yavanacharya by the Indians—to in struct themselves in natural philosophy and theology. Through-out the whole Western American continent, south of the United States, exist traditions of a visit, centuries past, by one or more white-bearded men, dressed unlike the natives, in long robes, who taught them religious precepts and the arts with which they were acquainted when the Spanish brigands and adventurers landed in America. It is known to scholars that the Chinese were acquainted with the continent of America in the fifth century of the Christian era."

Let us now look at a few of the coincidences found in ancient America and hear what scholars have to say about them.

The walls of the Tibetan temple look toward the four quarters of heaven, and each side is painted with a particular color—the north side with green, the south side with yellow, the east side with white and the west side with red. The sacred palace of the Toltec priest-king Quetzacoatl in Mexico was similarly arranged and decorated.

exandria were due to Buddhist missionaries who visited Egypt within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great. In this he has been supported by the philosophers of the caliber of Schelling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan, in his work, "Les Langues Semitiques," also sees traces of this Buddhist propaganda in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeldt, Mutter, Bohlen Kling, all admit the Buddhist influence. Colerbrooke says a striking similarity between the Buddhist philosophy and that of the Pythagoreans.

Dean Milman was convinced that the Therapeutics sprung from the "contemplative and indolent fraternities" of India. I could easily multiply citations of this sort, but I think it unnecessary.

ESSENES AND THERAPEUTS.

Assisted by Philo let us draw some more points of contact between the Therapeut and Buddhist monks:

Enforced vegetarianism, community of goods, rigid abstinence from carnal intercourse, also a high standard of purity were common to both the Buddhist and the Therapeutics.

Neither community allowed the use of wine.

Both were strongly opposed to the blood sacrifice of the old priesthoods, etc.

From Josephus we get some additional facts relative to these mystics: Enforced vegetarianism was one of the main principles of the Essenes as well as of the Buddhists. They refused to go to Jerusalem to the temple sacrifices at the risk of being stoned. The Essenes had a "Sanhedrin of Justices" like the Buddhist Sangha. Excommunication in both was the chief punishment. This was altogether foreign to the lower Mosaicism, which allowed no Jew to escape the obligations of the Jewish law. The Essenes, like the Buddhists, forbade slavery, war, revenge, avarice, hatred, worldly longings, etc.

THE NAZARENES.

Before proceeding further we must consider the term Nazarene or Nazareth. Christ, in the inscription on the cross, was called the "Nazarene" (or Nazareth), Luke 19:31. The Church of Jerusalem was called the Church of the Nazarenes or Nazareth. It is the only name for Christians mentioned in the Acts. The followers of John the Baptist were called Nazareth or Nazareth and they still exist and are called Nazareth in this day.

The Essenes according to Epiphanius, were called Nazareth or Nazareth. Now we find that John the Baptist was a Nazarene or Essene. He used the rite of baptism, which was peculiar to the Essenes. He ordered a partition of clothing and necessities. He abstained from wine and "soft raiment." He strongly assailed the Pharisees and Sadducees; that is, all Israel except the Essenes. They rejected his baptism and accused him of demonology, the favorite instigation of anti-mystical Israel against mystical Israel. Moreover, the Baptist is said to have reached the eighth or crowning Essene state of spiritual advancement, the spirit and power of Elias.

Another point is of the highest importance—the scene of his ministry was the stony wilderness, the air mountain region that stretches from Jerusalem to the Quarantania Mountain and from the Quarantania to En Gedi. Now this, according to Philo and Elder, was the very spot where the bulk of the Essenes was to be found. Their numbers in the day, the very commencement of the Christian era, were enormous. Josephus fixes their numbers at 4,000. We learn of John, that his followers were multitudes, in fact, a whole "people prepared for the Lord." We now come to the adult Jesus. The first prominent fact of his life is his baptism by John the Essene. The full meaning of this may be learned from Josephus.

JESUS AN ESSENE.

"To one that aims at entering their sect, admission is not immediate, but he remains a whole year outside it, and is subjected to their rule of life, being invested with an ax, the girdle of the sect, and a white garment. Provided, that over this space of time he has given proof of his perseverance he approaches nearer to their course of life and partakes of the holier waters of cleansing, but he is not admitted to their community of life. Following the proof of his strength of control, his moral conduct is tested for two years more, and when he has made clear his worthiness he is thus admitted to be one of their number. But before he touches the common meal he pledges himself, in oath to make one shudder; first that he will reverence the Divine Being, and secondly, that he will abide in justice unto men, and will injure no one, either of his own accord or by command, but will always detect the iniquitous and strive on the side of the righteous."

Now if, as is widely believed, the chief object of Christ's mission was to establish forever the Mosaicism of the bloody altar and combat the main teachings of Asketes, or mystic, which postulates the principles of the malignity of matter, why did he go to an Askete, or Essene, to be baptized? Whether or not Christ belonged to mystical Israel, and had the same origin, Philo, writing to Hephæstion, describes them as follows:

"The Therapeutae, a sect similar to the Essenes, with whom you are acquainted, number many among them whose lives are truly exemplary. Their customs are scattered about the region bordering on the further shores of the lake Mareotis. The members of either sex live a single and ascetic life, spending their time in fasting and contemplation, in prayer and reading. They believe themselves favored with divine illumination—an inner light. They assemble on Sabbath for worship and listen to mystical discourses on the traditional lore which they say has been handed down in secret among themselves."

BUDDHISM IN AMERICA.

Let us now look at a few of the coincidences found in ancient America and hear what scholars have to say about them.

THE WALLS OF THE TIBETAN TEMPLE.

The walls of the Tibetan temple look toward the four quarters of heaven, and each side is painted with a particular color—the north side with green, the south side with yellow, the east side with white and the west side with red. The sacred palace of the Toltec priest-king Quetzacoatl in Mexico was similarly arranged and decorated.

came from the vicinity of Alexandria. This, I think, is important. It is in Asia the elephant is the usual symbol of the Buddha; in Yucatan this animal, which is not native of either of the Americas, is a frequent symbol.

"The ancient edifices of Chichen, in Central America," says Spence Hardy, "bear striking resemblance to the temples of India."

"In India," says Squier, "are found almost the exact counterparts of the religious structures of Central America, analogies furnishing the strongest support of the hypothesis which places the origin of the American semi-civilization in South Asia."

The great temple of Palenque, Yucatan, corresponds exactly in its principal details to that of Boro-Budor, in Java. The two planets, Rague and Ceta, the head and tail of the dragon so often spoken of in Buddha scriptures, are drawn in full length upon the western facade of the palace at Uxmal.

History tells us that upon the robes of Wikipochocha (American for Hwishi-Bhikshu) there were symbolic crosses, Schlagentweit states that similar crosses may be seen upon the curtains of the windows of the Buddhist monasteries in Tibet.

Humboldt says that "Tibet and Mexico present very remarkable traits of connection in their ecclesiastical hierarchy, in the number of their religious fraternities, and in the extreme austerity of their penances and in the order of their religious possessions."

The high priest of Mexico bore the title of "Tay-Sacca, the Man of Sakya; Tay meaning 'man,' Sacca having no meaning in the language, being merely the term which they applied to a monk. Other significant terms are Zaccatana, the place of Sakya, Zaccatepec, the mountain of Sakya."

Vining thinks that Gautama, the name of the Central American state, is merely a corruption of Gautama-than, the place of Gautama. I might cite many more examples showing the early influx of Buddhism into America, but these I think will suffice.

STATE OF ISRAEL AT CHRIST'S BIRTH.

Leander divided Israel at the date of Christ into three sections:

First—Phariseism, the "dead theology of the letter."

Second—Sadduceism, "debasing of the spiritual life into worldliness."

Third—Essenism, Israel mystical—"a commingling of Judaism with the old Oriental theosophy."

The Essenes pursued an alliance with the upper world, the mystical union, or Yoga of India. The Therapeutae and the Essenes followed the same rules, and had the same origin. Philo, writing to Hephæstion, describes them as follows:

"The Therapeutae, a sect similar to the Essenes, with whom you are acquainted, number many among them whose lives are truly exemplary. Their customs are scattered about the region bordering on the further shores of the lake Mareotis. They believe themselves favored with divine illumination—an inner light. They assemble on Sabbath for worship and listen to mystical discourses on the traditional lore which they say has been handed down in secret among themselves."

The most subtle thinker of the modern English church, the late Dean Milman, boldly maintained that the philosophy and rites of the Therapeutics of Alexandria were due to Buddhist missionaries who visited Egypt within two generations of the time of Alexander the Great. In this he has been supported by the philosophers of the caliber of Schelling and Schopenhauer, and the great Sanscrit authority, Lassen. Renan, in his work, "Les Langues Semitiques," also sees traces of this Buddhist propaganda in Palestine before the Christian era. Hilgenfeldt, Mutter, Bohlen Kling, all admit the Buddhist influence. BUDDHISM NOT PLAGIARISM.

I have already shown in my parallelism between the lives of Christ and Buddha that the latter had no his baptism, fasting, and temptation.

We see, therefore, that the seed of Eastern wisdom had been transported to Greece, Egypt, and Palestine many years before the advent of Christ, and this confirms what I said at the commencement—that the New Testament compiled by another hand into the present gospel according to Matthew.

A QUESTION OF DATES.

As to the question of dates of composition of the canonical Gospels, the following are received as the most probable: Matthew later than 70 A. C., Mark before 70 A. C., Luke and John later than 100 A. C. But with all this, the synoptical question is still merely formal, and by no means has the complete answer been given, for the main difficulty in this problem assuredly lies in the two points of view wherein this is finally connected with the Buddhist problem—namely:

Since it is clear that so much is mere matter of tradition as regards the supposed original notes of Matthew, and as frequent coincidences occur in the Gospels, it is not possible that they were derived from Buddhist sources? In reply to the first question, we have amply shown in the first part of this lecture the spread of the Buddhist doctrines to the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. It is not doubted that the present day Indian religious ideas, and indeed more particularly those of Buddhism, reached and were even propagated as far as Egypt, Asia Minor, and Palestine, long before the Christian era.

From what has been gathered about the intercourse between India and the West there is sufficient evidence to establish this point. One has only to reflect carefully about the missionary zeal of the Buddhists, whose existence was due to the very cosmopolitanism of their faith and to the missionary commission handed down by their Master from the earliest age, in order to find it wholly inconceivable that only traders and envoys of princes, but not missionaries, should have availed themselves of the strongly built ships and the inhabited highways which served many years before the advent of Christ between India and Ceylon and the Roman Empire.

SUMMING IT UP.

But if the seed of Eastern wisdom had been transported to the West many years before the advent of Christ

The Eternal Struggles of Science.

The Real Savior of the World.

A Fresno, Cal., Judge, J. W. North, delivered a lecture which ought to be read by every person in the United States. It is strikingly interesting, and cannot fail to make a deep impression on every reader's mind. The facts given show the world at one time shrouded in the gloom of superstition and ignorance, and cruel in the extreme against those who wished to take a step in advance. The importance of this lecture cannot be overestimated. It alone is worth a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker.

In attempting on this occasion to call your attention to science, and to some incidents in its history, I can touch only upon a few points, and leave you to look into them more at leisure for yourselves. The field is illimitably broad; we can only glance at it.

Let us first inquire, what is science? The best answer I can give, is that it is knowledge—systematized knowledge—not guesswork, not mythology, not legend or tradition, but knowledge based on evidence. If all the facts concerning any given subject are collected and methodically arranged, the knowledge we get from them is called the science of that subject.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF SCIENCE.

Science is as broad as the universe, as far-reaching as the telescope, as minute as the objects revealed by the microscope. It takes account of the earth on which we live, its size, its form, its motion, its climate, its productions. It takes note of its forests and its flowers, its strata and its hidden treasures; its infinite variety of animal life, from the invisible insect to the behemoth, from the humming-bird to the eagle, from the tiny fish that inhabit the smaller streams to the monsters of the deep.

Science also reads the heavens, tracing the planets in their orbits and the stars in their courses. It uses them in determining and dividing the time, and by teaching the navigator his latitude and longitude it guides him through unknown seas, and leads him safely to his destined haven. We may say of it, and without irreverence, what the Psalmist said in addressing the Deity: "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me and thy right hand shall hold me."

Science guides the commerce of the world and every civilized industry; it superintends the building of our ships and railroads, our telegraph and telephone lines; it furnishes us with the indispensable friction match, also with the illuminating gas and the electric light; it gives us protection from lightning, and informs us of coming storms days before their arrival.

It enables nations to converse together over mountains, across deserts and under oceans, as though they were assembled in a social circle; it enables us to read the world's doings of yesterday before we sit down to our breakfast tables.

Coming down to man, it furnishes minute knowledge of the wonderful structure of the human body, and the still more wonderful structure of the mind. It affords protection from disease, and relief from suffering. It guides in the construction of our homes, in the preparation of our clothing, of the food we eat, of the wine we drink, and the very air we breathe.

Science makes the difference between savage and civilized life; between the Indians of our mountains and the statesmen who compose our government. It guides every step in the progress of civilization.

THE ORIGIN OF KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRUTH.

The origin of science cannot be fixed with certainty. Long centuries before our era, wise and thoughtful men were earnestly seeking truth, and notwithstanding numerous mistakes, they caught glimpses of some truths that have stood the test of time, and have come down to us through the ages, forming a part of the science of our day.

At the commencement of the Christian era, science scarcely existed, even in name. The ideas of Pythagoras, asserting the globular form of the earth and its revolution, had survived but to meet the earnest hostility of the early Christian fathers. Exaggerated ideas of the "Books of Moses" had early taken possession of the leading minds of the church, and there seemed no limit to the claim set up for them. Deeming these books to contain not only the unadulterated truth, but all truth, everything outside of them, or opposed to them, must be necessarily false. This unfortunate position dominated the entire church, and, of course, presented an insurmountable obstacle to the progressive learning. Science and civilization have been retarded many hundreds of years by this absurd folly of really good, but mistaken men.

Tertullian (A. D. 200) held that the "Books of Moses" were "not only all truth, but that all truth was contained in them."

Lactantius, more than a century later in referring to "the heretical doctrine of the globular form of the earth and its revolution," says "it is possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the crops and trees on the other side of the earth hang downward."

RELIGION AGAINST SCIENCE.

St. Augustine, about the year 400, says: "It is impossible there should be inhabitants on the other side of the earth, since there is no such race mentioned in Scripture among the descendants of Adam." And then he adds, what he evidently thinks a complete refutation of the idea: "In the day of judgment, men on the other side of the earth could not see the Lord descending through the air."

At this period, the whole influence of the church was brought to bear to rebuke or frown down everything that savored of science. The most eminent bishops spoke contemptuously, saying that they did "not trouble themselves with such things." The lesser lights dealt in absurd denunciations.

A HEATHEN DOCTRINE.

Cosmas, early in the sixth century, published his "Christian Topography," the great object of which was—as he declares—"to denounce the false and heathen doctrine of the rotundity of the earth, and to show that the tabernacle in the wilderness is the pattern or model of the universe." The earth, he says, "is a rectangular plane, four hundred days' journey east and west, and exactly half that distance north and south. It is surrounded by mountains, which the sky rests. The heavens come down to the earth on all four sides, like the walls of a room. All below the firmament is the world, and the story above is heaven, and below the earth's surface is hell. Midway in the rectilinear earth surface below lies the inhabited globe, encompassed by ocean. Beyond ocean, bordering on the edge, is the unvisited terrestrial paradise. Here, too, on a barren and thorny soil, without the walls of paradise, dwell men from the fall to the deluge. The ark floated the survivors across the great ocean basin to this better land which we inhabit. This oblong plane lies a little tilted to the south, so that the rivers, like the Tigris and Euphrates, running south, run rapidly, while those running north, like the Nile, run more slowly, because they have to run up hill."

CHRISTIANITY DID NOT PROMOTE KNOWLEDGE.

These were the opinions of the Christian Church for more than a thousand years, and were all based on the Bible. During thirteen hundred years Christendom furnished to the world no astronomer nor chemist. The Mohammedans were far in advance of the Christians in both of these studies.

As time advanced, the hostility of the church to science became intensified. At the beginning of the fifth century the growing power of Rome had taken from Alexandria its pre-eminence as a seat of learning, and left it but secondary to the home of the Caesars. The Greek school of philosophy had dwindled to small dimensions, and was mainly represented by Hypatia, (the daughter of Theon, the mathematician) whose beauty, learning and eloquence drew to her academy the learned and the elite of the city.

Cyril, the most influential and aggressive, as well as the most violent and unscrupulous of the Christian fathers, was then Bishop of Alexandria. The great popularity of Hypatia was an obstacle in the way, as well as an annoyance to him. The result was that a Christian mob—usually called Cyril's mob—of many monks, seized Hypatia and dragged her from her carriage one morning, as she was riding to her Academy, stripped her of her clothing, took her to church, and Peter the Reader, struck her on the head with a club, killing her.

The Christian mob then cut her body into pieces, scraped the flesh from her bones with shells, and burned her piece-meal.

This was St. Cyril's method of extinguishing the light of science, and of promoting the cause of Christianity, in the early part of the fifth century. And though no one seems to have questioned Cyril's guilt, in this brutal murder of a woman noted for her virtue, as well as for her intellectual attainments, the Christian church never called him to account for the infamous deed, but on the contrary, enrolled him among her saints, and he is known today only as "Saint Cyril."

This policy of suppressing science by murder continued to be the policy of the church for more than twelve hundred years, and is suspended now only because it has not the power to practice it.

THE INQUISITION.

The Catholic church, though suspending the working of the Inquisition for want of power, has retained, and now, from 1875 to this day, a crowd of defenders has arisen, advocating the re-establishment of the Inquisition. If any doubt it, let them read the article in the Encyclopedia Britannica, or the recent encyclical letter of the pope, read from all the Catholic pulpits in America, by order of Cardinal Gibbons. This letter sounds like a cry of rage, and a warning that a flash has been reared in Rome to the martyr, Bruno, on the spot where he was burned in 1600 for teaching some of the commonly accepted facts of science of the present time.

When the forces of Victor Emanuel entered Rome in 1870 the pope and the Vatican were driven into the Vatican, and shall we hear now come forth to establish their throne in America? And shall we hear no note of remonstrance from our statesmen? Not one word against setting up a hierarchy, a government by priesthood?

LEARNING SUPPRESSED.

But to return from this reference to our own time, let us follow the treatment of science.

We have seen how its light was extinguished in Alexandria by the infamous murder of Hypatia; after which no one dared to enter the field. We must also know that both Rome and Constantinople were at the time controlled by the same power, which was hostile to all scientific research. At the commencement of the sixth century there was but one prominent seat of learning in all Christendom where science was permitted to be taught; and even that was not continued long. In 529 the Christian Emperor Justinian ordered the schools of philosophy of Athens, and the night of "the dark ages" closed down on what was then known as the Christian world; the night of a thousand years, in which the church ruled both temporarily and spiritually; a church that claims to be the light of the world; and yet this period was the darkest that our era has known.

If it be now asked what produced the dark ages, history gives us the answer. If it be asked, what continued the dark ages for a thousand years, or what influence sought to prevent the revival of learning at the end of these thousand years, we receive from history the same unequivocal answer. It was in each and every case mainly the Christian church.

ROGER BACON.

During this long night of darkness, the perille "Christian Topography" of Cosmas continued to be the doctrine of the church, and the treatment of students of science remained unchanged. A single instance will be sufficient to illustrate both.

In the thirteenth century Roger Bacon, of England, spending some years in France, devoted himself somewhat to the study of chemistry, a science then unknown. But the first advances towards it were condemned by the church. Though he had received his degree of Doctor of Theology, his experimental studies were denounced by the ignorant priests as magic and the black arts, and his orthodoxy was at once questioned. Having returned to Oxford and commenced lecturing there, his lectures were interrupted, and he was placed under supervision at Paris, where for ten years he was prohibited from writing anything that might be published. A Franciscan monk himself, after his return to England, he denounced "the ignorance and vices of the clergy and monks, and generally the insufficiency of the existing studies," for which his works were condemned by a general of the order, who afterwards became pope, and Bacon was thrown into prison, where he remained for fourteen years, dying two years later. Such was the penalty that Christianity, inflicted for the study of science in the thirteenth century.

COPERNICUS CONDEMNED.

In 1507, Copernicus, a modest priest and learned Prussian, away off on the confines of Hungary, had completed a book on "The Revolutions of the Heavenly Bodies." Knowing the hostility of the church to any such teaching, he waited thirty-six years before daring to publish his work. After that length of time, being urged to it by a Cardinal, he ventured to give it to the world. Such was the great work that was the foundation of our Copernican system of astronomy. Mark the reception that was given it by the Christian church. On the day that the first copy of his great work was brought to him, moist from the press, he died, and thus escaped the personal vengeance of the church; but his work was condemned and burned, so far as his persecutors could accomplish it.

PROTESTANTISM AS BAD.

Here we come to the time of Luther, Calvin and other reformers. Does any one hope that they will be found more favorable to science than their antagonists? Vain hope. Historians tell us that they were even more bitter than the Catholics in their denunciation of science. Luther called Copernicus a fool, and thought he had answered him by effectually saying that "Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, which he would not have done if the sun did not move."

Galileo, some eighty years later, revised and taught the theories of Copernicus, and having constructed a telescope, made many valuable discoveries. For this he was accused of "impiousness, heresy, blasphemy, and atheism." Do we not here see where the clergy of our time learn to call every man an infidel or atheist, who is in advance of their feeble old notions of truth? He was summoned before the "Holy Inquisition, under the accusation of having taught that the earth moves around the sun, a doctrine utterly contrary to the Scriptures." He was compelled to retract his "heresy," and for sixteen years the church had rest; but in 1632 he published his book entitled "The System of the World," which sustained the theory of Copernicus. He was again brought before the Inquisition, and though he again retracted, he was thrust into prison, and treated with remorseless severity for the remaining ten years of his life.

But by following to the end the story of Galileo, we have passed, by a few years, the tragic events connected with the fate of his contemporary.

GIORDANO BRUNO.

Giordano Bruno was born at Nola, Italy, about the year 1548. In his fifteenth year, the historian tells us, he entered the order of the Dominicans, at Nola, and in 1574 he was sent to the convent of San Matteo, where he remained for three years. He traveled two years in England, and traveled extensively through the chief cities and seats of learning in Europe, everywhere lecturing, writing and publishing the burning words that stirred to their depths the ancient prejudices of medieval ignorance, and brought upon his head the terrible malignity of the church.

In 1593 he accepted an invitation to Venice; he was there arrested, taken to Rome, and imprisoned for seven years. This long imprisonment, failing to crush the brave spirit of Bruno, on the 8th of February, 1600, he was excommunicated, and on the 17th of that month was burned at the stake.

DEADLY HYPOCRISY.

It was on the demand of the "spiritual authorities" that he was removed from Venice to Rome, and imprisoned by the Inquisition. The special charge against him was that he taught the plurality of worlds, a doctrine repugnant to the whole tenor of Scripture, and inimical to revealed religion, especially as regards the plan of salvation. He was then handed over to the secular power, to be punished "as mercifully as possible, and without the shedding of blood." This was the horrible and hypocritical treatment of a victim to be burned at the stake.

But mark the sublime fortitude of this calm man as he received his sentence, only saying, "Perhaps it is with greater fear that you pass the sentence upon me than I receive it."

When, at the stake, the flames enveloped and consumed the shrinking flesh, he stood calm, grand, uttering no murmur of complaint, no cry of agony, apparently unconscious of physical suffering, the embodiment of sublime exaltation and conscious triumph.

SCIENCE'S MARTYR HONORED.

This event transpired two hundred and eighty-nine years ago. As the anniversary came round, on the 17th of last February, a statue of Bruno was set upon a high pedestal in Rome, upon the very spot where he was burned. The pope and Cardinals had stormed and raved to prevent it, but the people of that city had voted overwhelmingly in favor of it. The free churches of Europe, Great Britain and America had contributed to procure it, and a Roman Senator delivered an oration on the occasion, in which he told the assembled thousands, that "a movement is the day inaugurated more fatal to the papacy than even the loss of the temporal power." In the meantime, Bruno, retired to the Vatican, not showing his face in Rome for three days. But the Pope has revived his courage sufficiently to revile Bruno with all the ancient malignity; and the Protestant church has never abandoned its attitude of earnest, though diluted, hostility to science.

And while we mark the extreme hostility of the church to all true science, let us notice the instruction that even the Protestant church, of the period, furnished for her obedient children.

In 1712 Dr. Wolfgang Franz, a professor of theology at Wittenberg, the university that Luther attended, and long after Luther's time, published his "Sacred History of Animals," in which he describes dragons with three ranges of teeth, and finally adds, "The largest of these is the Devil's Throat Book, which is 'Designed for students of theology, and ministers of the Word,' and it is said 'To have had much influence on thought for 100 years.'"

THE CHURCH AGAINST NEWTON.

Sir Isaac Newton, who lived from 1642 to 1727, the most distinguished scientist of his time, was restrained from publishing important truths, for many years, through fear of the church. In 1680 he wrote a letter to his friend, Mr. Locke, the distinguished philosopher. It gave an account of two notable corruptions of the text of scripture, and invalidated two passages in favor of the Trinity; for Sir Isaac wrote much on theology, as well as science.

At first he was anxious to have his letter published, but fearing to publish in Protestant England, he asked Mr. Locke, who was then going to Holland, to get it translated into French, and published on the continent. As Locke did not go to Holland, he sent the letter to Mr. Le Clerc, who fearing to get it published in French was having it translated into Latin, when Sir Isaac interfered and stopped the publication entirely.

This letter was never published until twenty-seven years after Sir Isaac's death, and sixty-four years after it was written. So fearful was the greatest scientist of the age of the church, in Protestant England, that he dare not publish what he knew to be true.

PRIESTLY NOT ORTHODOX.

Joseph Priestly, a liberal minister of England, and a distinguished scientist, deserves more than a passing notice in this list of persecuted men of learning. A man of gentle and kindly spirit, but a remarkable scholar, he became so distinguished as a man of science that in 1773 he was about to be appointed to accompany the celebrated Captain Cook on his expedition to Otaheite to observe the transit of Venus; but the government of Great Britain was shocked at the idea of giving a man a position who was not orthodox, and he was rejected.

In 1774 he made several valuable discoveries in science, among which was that of oxygen, the basis of all life and of combustion; but he was not orthodox, and his very discoveries were enough to condemn him in the minds of the enemies of science. So, a few years later, in 1791, while he was quietly attending to his duties at home, the mob wanted a victim and they sought him out, burned his house and his chapel and destroyed his valuable manuscripts that represented the earnest labor of many years. Three years after this terrible exhibition of orthodox malignity, this gentle, peaceful man gathered the fragments of his manuscripts, and with his family in 1794 left England and came to the quiet little town of Northumberland in the interior of Pennsylvania, where he spent the remaining years of his life in peace.

AFTER MANY YEARS.

But when the centennial anniversary of the discovery of oxygen came round the world had learned the value of this quiet, modest man. On that day, in 1874—only fifteen years ago—learned scientists of Europe, Great Britain and America were seen wending their way to the quiet little village, on the banks of the Susquehanna, there to place flowers on the grave of the world's benefactor, and to pay their devotions at the shrine of this recent victim of religious hate.

But let us turn from these sad scenes of cruel wrong, and melancholy fate, to a bright picture, before which even ignorance and orthodoxy were powerless.

Benjamin Franklin, our great patriot, statesman, scientist and philosopher, happily lived at a time when his patriotism, statesmanship and usefulness compelled him to forget that he was an infidel, and to remember only the great services he had rendered to mankind.

DEVILS AND WITCHCRAFT.

As one of these Doctors, Franklin, in 1762, discovered that simple electricity, which pervades the atmosphere, was the cause of thunder and lightning, that had for so long terrified mankind. Saint Jerome, as well as the other Christian fathers, maintained that the air was full of devils, that caused the lightning, wind and hail, basing their theory on the prophecies of Isaiah, and the Epistle to the Ephesians. Saint Augustine maintained the same view, as did Luther, and the later reformers. Even the celebrated Increase S. Smith, President of Harvard University, and the other leading ministers of New England, as firmly believed in "devils that caused the hail and lightning," as they believed in witches, and they believed with John Wesley that "we might as well give up the Bible as to give up our belief in witchcraft."

But Doctor Franklin, with his simple kite and key, demolished the theology of ages, and took from the clergy a large share of their stock of terrors with which they had been accustomed to alarm mankind. He also showed the people how, by a simple iron rod, he could ward off the lightning and save property to the value of millions. Here the old theory of devils in the air was adhered to, the tall steeples were struck by lightning and many churches were destroyed. If the "heretical rod" was adopted, the priest had to admit that an "infidel's remedy" was better than that presented by the saints of the common sense.

Doctor Franklin had only to smile and look on, and wait to see how long it would take ministers to adopt common sense, in place of "absurd mythology, when their interests were on the side of common sense." The result showed that it took some of the most prominent of them from ten to sixteen years, and some from twenty to twenty-five years.

THE HERETICAL ROD.

The first rod put up in England was ten years after Franklin's discovery. In Austria and Italy they waited much longer. At length they waited to prove in favor of it. The free churches of Europe, as the people called it, and several that had been repeatedly struck and badly damaged were thus placed out of danger.

But some hesitated to adopt the "infidel's remedy," and these were instructed by some severe calamities. Among others, was the case of the church at Brescia, in Venice. Seventeen years after Franklin's discovery, the Republic of Venice had stored in the vaults of this church, over 200,000 pounds of powder, and had provided no lightning rod. A storm came, the church was struck, and the powder in the vaults exploded. One-sixth of the entire city was destroyed, and 3,000 persons were killed. The result was that their theology gave way, and the churches obtained Franklin's remedy. Science and theology became reconciled in the precise way they always have been, viz., by theology abandoning its foibles and accepting the lesson of science.

HUMBOLDT WAS PERSECUTED.

Humboldt, the illustrious German savant and traveler, had the good fortune, like Franklin, to live at a period when his services to mankind could protect him, in some measure, from religious hostility. And yet even this great man, who had crossed the mountains of South America, and the desolate plains of Siberia in search of knowledge for the human race, says in a letter to a friend, "The ministers would have driven him from Paris if it had not been that the king was his friend."

The French priests who objected to common table forks because no such instruments were mentioned in Scripture; and the Scotchman who objected to the common fanning mill as an ungodly implement, because "it created a wind when the Lord willed a calm," need only be mentioned as illustrations of the religious ideas of the time.

I have but to name one instance more and I have done:

So recently as 1846—less than fifty years ago—Doctor Simpson of Edinburgh, Scotland, one of the most learned physicians of his time, invented or discovered chloroform, and used it to relieve suffering in his medical and surgical practice. One would naturally suppose that so great a blessing would be hailed with joy even by bigots. Far otherwise. The ministers of the Scotch church raised a serious objection, and one of the bitterest controversies of our time ensued.

ORTHODOXY AGAINST MEDICINE.

Doctor Simpson had used this anesthetic impartially, to relieve the sufferings of women as well as men; and at times when the ministers feared he was relieving them of a part of the original sin of Adam, they were not willing that men should be relieved; but women must suffer the full penalty originally inflicted on Eve.

Incredible as it now seems, these men were thoroughly in earnest, and doubtless thoroughly sincere; and they fought Doctor Simpson with all their energy.

The great Doctor Chalmers, more enlightened than his brethren, took the part of Doctor Simpson, but even his great influence was not likely to turn the scale. At length a happy thought occurred to Doctor Simpson, and he told the ministers that he was simply following the method of the Creator, that when God had made man and wished to perform the surgical operation of taking a rib from his side with which to make a woman, he put him to sleep. "This," said the doctor, "is precisely what I am doing. I am only following the example of my Maker." The ministers could not bring anything to bear upon that, and so the victory was gained for Doctor Simpson and chloroform.

That such an instance of ministerial bigotry could have occurred in our day, is simply inexplicable. But such has been the contest of ages, and such the hostility shown to science through the whole history of the Christian church.

For nearly sixteen hundred years the church has fought science and never gained a victory; science has won in every contest. The only way to be driven backward into civilization, step by step, step by step, but always backwards. Will it never turn round, open its eyes, and welcome the glowing dawn? The future will determine.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Emma F. Jay Bullene: Q. I wish to learn your thought concerning the spirit leaving the physical body, or "soul travel" as it is termed. My reason tells me that it is not true that the spirit leaves the body until the final change, else our philosophy of death is defective, as time is consumed for transition of all the vital forces that compose the ethereal body. Neither is it necessary for the spirit to leave the body to visit or investigate distant points and conditions. If I visit any distant locality, I experience the sensation of travel, but I do not seem to have any vision or the operations of clairvoyance.

A. The genius of this brilliant thinker has answered her own question, and with her answer all the communications I have received perfectly accord. The spirit and body are so intimately connected and mutually related that it is separated from the body at death in the deepest trance, which resembles death so closely as often to be mistaken therefore, the spirit holds fast to the vital organs, while its spiritual faculties become free and in a measure like to those of a decarnate spirit. It is thus enabled to exercise in part those faculties untrammelled by physical conditions, and hold intercourse with those in the higher realm. But it is ever bound to its physical form, and does not withdraw from it. Should it do so for one instant, the door would be closed by the organic changes against its return.

Nor is this leaving the body necessary for the keen perception of spirit life. The intensity of impressions received in this state is so vivid they become objective realities, and to visit distant scenes does not require going in the sense that word implies. Space has not the meaning it has to mortals, and a spirit may be present, although really far away. It may be connected by a wireless telegraph which will vibrate with the vibrations of the senses would perceive, and to the more refined which mortals cannot understand.

Hence it is that those who perceive but do not understand, receiving impressions which are similar in character to those received when directly present, are deceived, and are finally persuaded that they have departed from the physical form. The unfolded psychic power is a wonderful revelation, but we should guard against error by the careful study of its limitations.

James Brunt: Q. Was not the "Salem" burning of witches the last of its kind in the United States?

A. The Salem burning was not quite the last to be held in this country. The "Winning of the West, an instance is given as late as 1779. It occurred at Kaskaskia, a French settlement on the Mississippi, after it came into possession of Americans. The negro slaves owned by these colonists were fresh from Africa and practiced voodooism. The "Crows" were the "Crows" of the "Crows" and "poisoning" given an "A" came, the negroes were accused of trying to bewitch and poison the whites. Several were seized and two were found guilty. One of these was hanged, the other was sentenced "to be chained to a post at the water side, and there to be burnt alive and his ashes scattered." The two were "after making" "honorable fine," at the door of the Catholic church, immediately met their fate.

The Salem tragedy occurred in 1692, 67 years previously. It was an outgrowth of Protestantism rigidly accepting the Bible; the other of Catholicism. Both gave sanction to the belief in witchcraft, long after increasing knowledge had shown the childishness of such superstitious notions. The sincerity with which all classes, during the Middle Ages, believed in witchcraft, forms of itself a wonderful psychological study. From king to beggar, priest, lawyer, doctor, judge, statesman firmly believed in the existence of witches. Laws were enacted most cruel, and mercilessly enforced. Down rules for the discovery of sorcerers. James VI. wrote a book on the subject with his royal hand. Three thousand persons were executed for this crime during the rule of the Long Parliament.

The punishment was death, usually by fire, and various estimates place the number who thus died in Europe during these ages at upwards of a million, at from one to three millions. All this misery, pain, and vassalage of mind came from a few texts in the Bible, mainly from one: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

No one knows what the word translated witch means. The writer without doubt meant the so-called "prophets" of sorcery, those of whom the Jewish prophets were jealous, or claim Jehovah was. There was not the least difference between the prophets of the Jews and the Hittites, Canaanites, etc., but to a Jew those of other tribes were sorcerers who went after strange gods.

If the Bible remained unquestioned, witches would yet be burned. It is the thing to do for those who believe it. Its instructions and commands are as explicit and imperative as three hundred years ago. Why did the people stop burning witches? Because they had grown away from cruelty; because they had learned by other means that such beings could not exist.

And to elect in direct antagonism with the Bible, the most orthodox of justice or lawyer would laugh a case of witchcraft out of court.

A. (1) 5 West 51st street New York City. (2) 60 Wall street, New York City. (3) Lakeside, New Jersey (Residence).

H. B. Hall: Q. How near can we come to the exact date of the birth of Christ? December 25 has been accepted by the Christian church, but I find no reliable information as to any certain date.

AN IMPRESSIVE LECTURE

Scintillates With Grand Truths

It should stir every soul with high and elevated emotions! It imparts important truths, beautiful truths, inspiring truths, truths with which every Spiritualist should be familiar. John Pierpont, the poet and philosopher, was the controlling spirit, and Mrs. Mary T. Longley, of Washington, the gifted medium through whom he gave his description of "Bright and Dark Spheres of Spirit Life." It is worthy of being read and re-read by every Spiritualist in the Land.

The subject selected for our consideration this hour is of wide scope: "The Bright and Dark Spheres of Spirit Life." Human spheres are many and varied, for human personalities and temperaments are many and varied. Human beings create their own spheres, and these may be bright or dark according to the tendencies, desires, aspirations, and dispositions of those who create them. This I believe is understood by thinkers.

THE DIFFERENT SPHERES.
We know that the artist creates his sphere of art and imagery, that the scientist creates his sphere of science, that the musician creates his sphere of harmony, and his soul, flowing with all that is sweet and melodious, sends out scintillations of light which are beautiful to himself and to those who can comprehend them.

All of us, in whatever sphere of thought and occupation we may be, create our environment of like nature, the thought itself being the motor power which sends out such vibrations as produce harmony or discord, whichever predominates; yet I judge that our friend who suggested the subject desires to know the surroundings, conditions, localities and life, or mode of life of spirit intelligences—those who have passed from earth through the change called death.

THE SPIRIT WORLDS.
Speaking perhaps after the manner of many seers and messengers, I may say that we can liken spirit worlds to spheres or zones of light, of more or less density or etherealization; that these zones or belts, composed of matter more or less sublimated, are worlds; they are localities in space which are peopled by human intelligences who once lived on this planet.

There is also spirit planet, analogous to this planet physically, which is peopled by intelligences who have passed beyond. The spirit planet is a world in itself of beauty, of verdure, of activity, and it is peopled by intelligences who have developed out of the lower states of carnality and of those conditions which are more or less connected with selfishness, for they have become not only students but teachers, helpers to others, elevating themselves in thought and study not only by pursuing methods of gaining knowledge but through their desire and effort to benefit and bless other souls.

THE ZONES AND SPHERES.
There are these zones which we call spheres that are akin to that particular globe called the spirit planet. These spheres are also peopled by intelligences who go about doing good, who are seeking self-improvement not only for their own environment and growth but to fit them the better to become guides and teachers and general helpers to souls in need.

There are conditions or planes of spirit life which are not as bright and beautiful as those mentioned. These lower planes so-called are composed of more earthy, material elements, created by sordid conditions of humanity, by substance that is largely of the physical emanations of mankind. These lower planes are peopled by undeveloped souls, crude intelligences, those who cling to carnal things, whose minds are not elevated to a conception of higher spirituality, whose longings and tendencies are for the gratification of the birthday of the sun-gods of antiquity, and as such was accepted by the Christians. So far from there being any reliable foundation as to the day of his birth, the year is hopelessly uncertain, being conjectured by various authors like Asher, Eusebius, and St. Luke, from 5 years before until 10 years after the present era.

This greatest and most important event in the history of the world had no record at the time, and seemingly did not awaken attention until so long after it had passed that it became a matter of hearsay and tradition.

G. S. Klock: Q. It has been said, electricity is the universal power—is this true? How is electricity produced? It is also taught that spirits produce their manifestations by the same—is this a fact?

A. No one informed in electrical science would claim that electricity is the universal power. It is only one form of power or energy, and a stronger claim might be made for heat. Electricity is always produced by the conversion of energy. The engine, or water wheel by means of the dynamo, have their force converted into the electric current. This is true in batteries, where chemical changes are dependent on. The energy employed in tearing the metals from their ores appears in the electrical currents when these metals are converted back to the ore-like state.

It has been given out as an explanation that spirits produce electricity to produce their manifestations, yet this is an assertion without the least truthfulness. Electricity is never detected when these phenomena take place. It is just as rational to say they use heat, or water. Simply because electricity is mysterious and not well understood, it is seized by pretenders to knowledge and made a cannon and to explain all. Spirits have no more control of electricity, or use for such control, than they have over water or air.

desires which belong largely to the physical sensation, whose aims have been selfish and whose general tendencies have been to immerse the entire mind in the thought and effort to gain personal aggrandizement, power and wealth. These individuals have, not created for themselves, either on the mortal side or since entering the spirit realm, environments or a spiritual body that belong to higher conditions, therefore they are filled with the sordid elements which bear the individual downward. They are where they belong. They have not gravitated into the purer and rarer conditions and elements of ethereal life, and are of the earth, earthy.

EMANATIONS OF DARKNESS.
The sordid man—he who has been selfishly grasping all that which he calls his own, heaping them up for his own pleasure regardless of the comfort and rights of his fellow-beings—sends out the emanations of darkness which create for him a sphere of unpleasantness when he passes from the physical form. These emanations from his mentality and his physical body, are crude, are weighed with that element which is strongly material or animal; it belongs to the lower sphere and its twilight is of a murky, smoky character. There are thousands of human souls who dwell in this dismal atmosphere after passing from the mortal form. They have created it for themselves. These individuals were more or less vicious in some direction, careless of the rights of others, self-seeking, covetous, spiritual things. Their bodies in spirit are malformed because they have not been supplied with proper nutrition and elements for symmetrical upbuilding; their surroundings are stunted and barren in scenery and growth, for beauty is not their spiritual portion, never having contributed to their growth and the appearance of these surroundings.

THE SOUL EARNS WHAT IT FINDS.
Every soul gravitates exactly to the place where it belongs in passing from the mortal, and it has earned just what it finds as we have often said before. Now, then, we do not see that every individual of earth who is obliged to tread the byways and slums of mortality finds a crude, unlovely state or sphere on passing from the physical. That is not true. Many a soul has the white light of progress in its breast, that is obliged to grope in ignorance and with misery along the darkened ways of life, and that ill of progress finds a stimulus in the outreaching impulse and aspiration of heart and mind for something higher and better than it possibly can know on earth, and when that soul is released from the mortal there shines around it a certain light, dim perhaps, but silvery in its radiance, which denotes the emanation of the spirit itself. Such a being has sufficient impetus within to spur it beyond these darkened conditions called spheres of spirit life, into a purer environment and state than it ever knew before, where it is taken in charge by caretakers—wise, gentle, loving and kindly ministering beings and cared for in the little school room, guided tenderly along till its budding impulses and faculties reach out and grasp greater knowledge, and understanding and experience in life and become by and by able to care for and go on by itself.

A BEAUTIFUL SPIRIT HOME.
On the other hand, there are souls high in worldly power or placed in very comfortable positions on this mortal side, reaching out through various avenues of avarice and ambition or some other sentiment and form, to gain that which they desire for self alone, although they have beautiful in appearance to the external eye they may be, how ever richly owned or appareled, how ever favored by fortune, have not been creating the material to build for themselves a beautiful spiritual home or to create a special spirituelle sphere of harmony and of brightness, therefore they may find themselves in darkened conditions when they pass from earth because they have not supplied the material for anything better; and they may be to grope amidst the shadows for some time before their inner life is quickened to responsive action, to the harmonies and vibrations, the teachings, the callings and the aspirations of the more beautiful spheres and localities of immortality.

WHERE EACH SOUL GRAVITATES.
Each soul or being in creating its own conditions must of necessity gravitate to localities that correspond with the internal state, therefore those who have consciously and willfully done wrong and have had intelligence enough to know that they have done wrong, will gravitate to just that state and locality that corresponds with the deeds and with the general vibration and influence of that willful wrong doing. But there is always in the human breast a hidden power, and a power which left to itself, or which receiving proper nourishment, makes ever for right doing, and however much the human being may be engulfed in darkness or be incited by the crystallization of selfishness, that principle and impulse remains, and some time in the future, which perhaps may be almost an eternity to mortal comprehension, it may be within a brief period of time, some magnetic cord shall be struck within the breast that will set vibrations of that principle in motion and enable it to grow into outward expression little by little as the mind or consciousness awakens to the fact of its own wrong doing, of its inherent powers to overcome the evil, to atone for that which has been committed and to reach out and grow to higher things.

DARK PLANES OF SPIRIT LIFE.
One can hardly describe to mortal comprehension that quiet and appearance of life and existence which may call the dark planes of spirit consciousness. It is something that cannot be depicted in external form. We can only use similes and comparisons with which you are familiar and the conditions of what we may call the dark spheres vary according to the conceptions of life, according to the conditions and the qualities of human individuals, consequently these spheres are likened to a person thrown into a den of writhing serpents and his contortions and miseries would really correspond, physically, to the contortions and miseries of mind of one individual or many who may be in certain states of darkness and of discomfort outside the mortal form.

SCENES OF DESOLATION.
One might depict a person cast upon a barren spot where flowers were unknown and verdure scarce, where clouds overhung the scene and where little children of beauty and innocence were not known. The loneliness of the human being thus left to his fate for the time would correspond to the condition of some human beings who are enveloped by the mental darkness which they have created for themselves, and which they have created and which surrounds them like a pall. And so we might continue in depicting scenes and states in which human beings may find themselves, of unhappiness and of loneliness of environment, scenery, and the mental unrest in correspondence.

That these are unhappy states goes without saying, and our friends might ask, why do not missionary societies, ministering spirits of higher spheres, communicate with, encourage and help these unfortunate, and we answer, ministering spirits are always at work to befriend, teach and direct the inner growth of those who are unhappy in the spirit world, but you cannot reach any person who is in some measure prepared to receive you.

AN IMPRESSIVE STATEMENT.
A blind man cannot see the light, though you flash it at him ever so clearly.

Man will not hear your strains of music though you sound them to his outward ear with sweetest chords, and he who is beset with these emanations and magnetic forces, which his own selfishness or cruelty have sent forth and surrounded him with, can not receive the emanations for his advantage until he begins to grope outward for release, and then, when he begins to speak, or to stretch forth his hands, and cry of the spirit for light, for strength, which he throws out—the pulsating cord from within will be come attached to something just outside of that mental state of unrest and will be touched upon by spirit ministrations and bear to himself a vibration of helpfulness which will reach him in strength, comfort and relief. But he must work out his own salvation.

We can give strength and magnetic force and counsel and guidance by showing individuals how they can grow by their own efforts, how they can work and accomplish much if they will, but just as long as the desire is to do nothing, the divine spark of kinship with the infinite, with all that is beautiful in life, will sometime be felt, and it is through this with the help of the ministering spirits that the individual who is in darkness may begin to reach the light.

DIVINE SPARK OF KINSHIP.
However, as I have said before, this impulse and principle within which makes toward right doing, which is really the divine spark of kinship with the infinite, with all that is beautiful in life, will sometime be felt, and it is through this with the help of the ministering spirits that the individual who is in darkness may begin to reach the light.

Now, then, the spheres of darkness, so to speak, are countless because each individual has created his own sphere. It is made of the emanations of the magnetic forces, the strong, positive vibrations of thought and energy, baleful if they are toward human beings, and these spheres are as strong and hard as adamant to the contemplation of the spirit.

SAD PORTRAYAL OF CONDITIONS.
Just as your walls here, fashioned by the hand of man, may be as firm and close as steel can make them, and the prisoner may be held within them by bolts and bars which he cannot break, so the walls or spheres created by these baleful emanations of thought and impulse, a cruel, vindictive, or extremely selfish person, are like the walls of steel, they cannot be overcome, but there is always some passage-way to them as to the dungeon cell, which may be opened as the door when bolts and bars are withdrawn, and this passage-way can only be found by the individual seeking honesty and sincerity to undo the bolts and bars which so overcome the evil created—to wish for better things, to reach out and grow and receive with welcome the helping hand that is extended to benefit and bless.

THE BRIGHTER SPHERES.
The brighter spheres of spirit life are, then, contrary to those which you call dark. They are created by the individual who is surrounded by an emanation of light, and this individual is attracted to the locality in space, if we may so term it, that is analogous to the condition of the soul and cultivated in grace and beauty of thought and spirit, is kindly, sympathetic, genial, a lover of justice, a friend of humanity desiring to bless and uplift others and at the same time to improve self and its environments, he will gravitate by the ethereal nature of his spirit, from which he has built up a world of refined emotions, and a world that is also refined and composed of ethereal substance. Now this world will correspond with his own sweet thoughts, his high aspirations, his desires to bless humanity, his love of peace and harmony, and he will find himself surrounded by an atmosphere of calm and sweetest peace, and his companionships will be harmonious souls who would dwell in unity together. He will love the philosophies of life and seek to study them that he may know of the conditions of the universe, the why and wherefore of being, the cause and origin of things and gain a knowledge of humanity itself, its different phases and conditions.

The scenery surrounding him will be beautiful, landscapes bright and clear, sparkling streams and verdant groves, sweet and beautiful imagery fill his soul with artistic design and will find its correspondence in the external environments and beatitudes of life whether he has gone, and so this individual will find that he is a sphere of brightness.

THE HIGHER REALMS OF LIGHT.
In those higher realms where ministering spirits dwell and find their impetus and their power for progressing in good works, the spheres are light, and we mean this literally—ALL IS LIGHT. The individual beings emanate a light which flows forth from countenance and form and even garment, for every garment is fashioned by these individvals from magnetic forces and from the elements gathered from atmosphere and flower and field, and even into these garments are the scintillations of magnetic light from the individual and the locality itself, and as they move THEY SCINTILLATE LIGHT.

Man (or humanity) is filled with magnetic force and electrical impulse, and these in like are imparted to all things they come in contact with. The very flowers themselves flash forth beautiful light, "and there is light there." So these things of the brighter spheres of beauty and of sweetness of the spirit dwell in unison, and the melodies of their own natures help largely to create the music of the spheres.

SPHERES BLEND IN HARMONY.
Spheres blend in harmony, because each individual gravitating to these localities is in accord with the others and the perfect blending of their spheres helps to create the wonderful zone or belt of life which they inhabit as a spiritual world. THERE IS NO DARKNESS THERE. Yet there are seasons when the individuals may take their magnetic repose even as you mortals find your hours of slumber here. A rose, for example, falls upon the atmosphere and enwrap all things with a beauty of its own; a calm or hush that is absorbed by the individuals creates repose, and yet not unconsciousness. The individual is not insensible to his surroundings, but in that hour of silence and of beauty his soul reaches out through his own environment and embodiment into still higher states of conscious power, when he comes into spiritual contact with beings of more exalted realms. And thus these people grow in spirit. This advance in the conception of life, they realize that progress is the attribute of humanity and they are marching onward, ever onward to higher fields of exploration, grander scenes of art, and more glorious realms of personal achievement.

Yet such as they are never unmindful of the unhappy beings who dwell in lower states; their magnetic influence reaches forth, and it is for these influence and power, with the personal influence and effort of these ministering beings, that in time reach into the darkened state, into the very citadel of life itself of the unhappy beings, and steal within that pent-up hidden consciousness of right doing and of effort which must be aroused in order to bring the individual into better conditions.

A MORAL POLICE FORCE.
Now, then, there is, so to speak, a moral police force in the spirit world. There is no such guardianship or forceful power as shown in the physical conditions with the police force of nations or of communities on earth, yet your systems of restraint are necessary until humanity grows to higher conceptions of life; but the manner of exercise of moral restraint on the other side, so to speak, is that which flows forth through magnetic emanations of sympathy and love into the lives of the unhappy and distressed in order to reach them with a stimulating power to work out their own salvation for their own advancement. These are necessary elements in life conditions, spheres, environments, call them what you will, if it alters not, but the fact must be impressed upon humanity that every individual right here and now who is possessed of reason and intelligence who is neither a liar nor an imbecile, must and does CARRY OUT HIS OWN CONDITION OF SPIRIT.

THE WILLFULLY SELFISH.
But, as we have said before, it is not always those who are trodden down in the slums and have become creatures of circumstance through ignorance, deprivation and various conditions over which they have no control who are in the lowest state of the spirit world, because very often in just such human beings the spark of divinity is aglow and only needs the breath of spiritual magnetism and sympathy to fan it into such a light as will enable it to burst forth in a brief time and give the individual its needed power.

These, as we have said, are taken in charge and benefited and blessed, but it is only the willfully selfish and those who are morally unreclaimed, who, having no desire to do better even if they know they are doing wrong and that they can do better, who will, and the darkened conditions of their worlds because they make them for themselves.

You will say, then, do we understand there are no dark localities in the other world? Only just what a human being creates around himself by his emanations, and we can say in a sense, yes, since an individual who has sent out an emanation of light, even to the exercise of his higher qualities and moral sensibilities will not find himself in any darkened state, and since one who is willfully doing wrong and injuring himself and his fellow beings will find nothing but a darkened state when he passes from the mortal. At the same time there are localities that correspond, as we have said, to these conditions and spheres belonging to the individual, and each one will gravitate to that to which he essentially belongs.

IT RESTS WITH THE INDIVIDUAL.
It seems to me I need not prolong this talk upon the subject, for one can readily see that it rests with himself whether he is in a state of intense misery and suffering of both mind and spirit body when he enters the other life, or is in a condition of happiness and spiritual strength, envied by beautiful forms and scenes and in harmony with sweet companionships. It rests with his own aspirations, his thoughts, his efforts, and his daily duties whether these may be expressed and cultivated or whether it will be shown to him when his earthly eyes are closed in the silent sleep of death that he has formed for himself the particular sphere and the special condition and has gravitated himself to the special locality to which these belong because of that vibratory force which his own nature generates and which belongs to himself alone.

SLAVES TO PERVERTED APPETITES.
Perhaps it may be well for me to add here that of course it may be understood that in sending out these emanations the drunkard who persistently dwells in that state of intoxication and of slavish obedience to a carnal appetite, will of necessity assume the darkened and suffering conditions of the individual who passes from earth the unhappiness, and the dismal surroundings which they alone could create. And also with others who are slaves to perverted appetites, passions, desires, that belong to carnality alone. These things must of necessity produce only within the individual, even though he be intellectual in mentality the low rate of vibration that belongs to the earth, earthy, or to the sordid influence of life, and therefore these are the dark conditions of the spirit that mean torments, restlessness, uneasiness; that

Suggestive Experiences

An Open Letter From Dr. I. K. Funk to Hudson Tuttle.

The truth is what every Spiritualist desires, and in seeking it he frequently is brought in contact with unpleasant incidents. Such has been the case with Dr. I. K. Funk, a prominent investigator, who narrates his experiences in the investigation of Spiritualism, resulting in disagreeable contradictions by different mediums. The lesson imparted by Dr. Funk is one every Spiritualist should calmly consider. His experience is that of hundreds, and should set our people to thinking.

My Dear Mr. Tuttle:—I have read with interest your reply in "The Progressive Thinker," January 6th, to the question as to whether I am a Spiritualist.

Now permit me, with equal candor and friendliness, to reply to your reply. I should despise myself if I for the reasons you apologetically suggest, or for any other reasons, pretended falsely to hold a belief or a lack of a belief. Sincerely to my mind is the spiritual column of character.

Christ when he sought to give his disciples the supreme comfort said that he would pray the Father to send them another comforter that he might abide with them forever, even the SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

No man has the right to hide what he has under a pint cup or a bushel. We are to speak the truth as we understand it, though the heavens fall, but the heavens have never fallen for that reason, and it is quite certain that they never will. Five men of truth under Sodom and Gomorrah would have been sufficient to have kept that whole region from sinking; yes, an entire continent, for truth is belted to the engine of omnipotence. No, friend Tuttle, I won't think or act as I like to please my old associates in the church or out of it. True enough, much of what passes for church beliefs are ossified "have-beens."

As to your parable of the farmer and the field of corn, let me put it differently. If you and I were neighbor farmers and we both planted corn each year, and the first year we gathered corn, but the second year we gathered oats from our seed corn, and the third year we gathered wheat, now if the fourth year some one would ask what we expected the best to be and you should say "Corn," and I should say "I don't know," would I not have as good right to doubt your "sanity" as you to doubt mine?

You have been candid and friendly. Let me be equally candid and friendly in telling you some things that keep me from becoming what is usually understood to be a Spiritualist.

FIRST CLASS OF HINDRANCES: Through one of the best mediums I ever met I was told that the spirit of Theodore Parker had described with a certain thing. This was explicit; it seemed to be a harvest of corn from corn seed. Three days after I was with another equally famous medium whom I believed, and still do believe to be honest. Theodore Parker reported himself as present, but denied all knowledge of the previous interview, saying that he was not there, and he said nothing of the kind. Since then I have had "Theodore Parker" at a dozen sances through different mediums, and have not yet been able to get him to recognize any previous interview that I have had with him. What are we to do when what seems to be the same seed corn produces oats and rye and wheat?

This is not exceptional, but is typical of a multitude of experiences that I have had. Will you, friend Tuttle, give me a satisfactory explanation on which I can build a sure logical faith? Never once in a clearly marked way—wholly free from the possibility of collusion—have I in an interview with a second medium had described with anything approaching exactness, a previous interview. Either these intelligences are not what they claim to be, or there are on the spirit side some tremendous inhibitions or elements of confusion which we do not understand—as is quite believable—or mediums in the present state of imperfect mediumistic development make scientific certainty exceedingly difficult.

SECOND CLASS OF HINDRANCES: I have sought in many ways and very often in vain to bring harmony out of the personal experiences of spirits in the spirit land. I do not think that I have been unreasonably exacting. I have been willing to admit much to personal equation on both sides of the death line to the "laws" governing communication between the two worlds.

Now an illustration or two: Through one medium of remarkable power and, to my mind of unqualified honesty, a spirit described to me with great particularity his trip to the planet Mars. He described the inhabitants, their civilization, far in advance of ours; the fauna, the flora with great particularity all this from personal observation. Some time afterwards, through another medium equally credible, another spirit told me of his trip to Mars, telling me that he found it wholly UNINHABITED AND PRACTICALLY DESERTED. I inquired of both the spirit and the medium.

His reply was: "I cannot help what he said. I am telling you what I know." Some spirits assure me that there are an abundance of animals and flowers and trees galore on all the spirit planets connected with the earth; others tell me there are none. Some tell me they have there hospitals, and schools, and churches, and others the reverse. Some tell me no one in the spirit realm believes in what we here call God; others that He is preached in and believed in far more there than here. The following is a case that is illustrative of many other experiences which I have had. I inquired of a spirit concerning Mr. S., a friend from whom I had and I knew well, but from whom I had not heard for years. He assured me not heard of "passed over," and that the man had "passed over," and

CRIME TO PASS AWAY.

A Remarkable Article From an Eminent Italian Professor—Thoughts Worthwhile of the Careful Consideration of Spiritualists.

It is most difficult to prophesy of the future, particularly on a matter which is near to one; for the prophet is not known in his own country. I certainly never would have assumed the responsibility of delineating the outline of the future criminal world even in the broadest lines had not the ideas of my school been accepted in various parts of the civilized world, such as Australia and England, where a number of my suggestions have inaugurated striking reforms. The indications from these are clear and strong, and I am indebted to them, particularly to Dr. Coghlan, who has made the criminology of Australia especially meritorious. Thanks to him and the Australian government, which does not have the narrowness of many European governments, I could get a copy of the Australian criminal portfolio and in this way make a study of criminology in every period.

From the material submitted to me came the evidence that crimes in Australia are diminishing both in number and in gravity. How can this marked decrease of crime be explained, with all the statistics elsewhere being in contradiction? For even in Germany, one of the most advanced of European nations, the number of crimes steadily increasing, sees the number of reformed criminals nearly doubled.

The signal diminution in Australia may be explained on the ground of its social reforms, for even the proletarian there stands better economically than an official in Europe. Another reason lies in the scattering of the people in isolated villages, where the influence of the pastor, who is little predisposed to crime; and, finally, is the continual, uninterrupted warfare that was waged against the corruption of the young.

In 1898, 12,964 children were admitted into houses of correction, and all destitute or orphaned children were given over to private families at the expense of the government over $5,000,000. This is, about twenty times more than is expended for the same purpose in Italy, which has seven times the population of Australia. The same zeal and the same fiery war is now being engaged against alcoholism, which explains for us the significant decrease in the number of criminal classes.

Similar measures are being adopted in London and in Genoa, where the Salvation army, the child colonies, Dr. Barnardo's houses, ragged schools, etc., have worked real wonders in protecting children from being involved in lives of crime.

I believe now that, without self-exaltation, I may venture to state that if the ideas of my school were adopted and the social and economical reforms simultaneously accepted—which modern societies can no longer repudiate—the number of criminal classes, especially the opportunistic criminal types, which are created out of conditions, would speedily diminish in numbers. Also the congenital criminals, whose nature impels them to transgression, would be reduced.

Civilization every day creates new stimuli or instruments which impel to crime, or at least lead to it. The bicycle, the automobile, the telegraph, the photograph, the press; all advances in culture, but all also progenitors of fresh evil-doing. I recall now only the bicycle, which became an epidemic; the kidnapping of minors by the auto; the betrayals and deceptions carried on by the telegraph and telephone; the extortions and calumnies of the press; the prostitution of photography, which in its latest form in the kinetoscope seduces to crime through a refinement of deception and falsification. All new acquisitions of technique are new forms of intoxication which are no less peridious than alcohol. But an enlightening government will look to the instruments of crime for the means also of its destruction and will find them. The bicycle, the telegraph, the telephone, and the photograph can be most useful in the detection of the criminal. Finally, anthropology and anthropometry in their revelations on criminal features furnish new instruments in fighting the army of criminals.

All cannot be done in a day. A series of reforms is needed, and the penal system and the administration of justice must have a fresh coinage. Homes for destitute and orphaned children, which are now the exception, must be made the rule. Reform houses must be installed, and side by side with these will come the reformation of prisons proper. There must be sweeping reforms in the jury systems, so that there will be at least a partially technical jury. For a long time the punishment and trial of criminals were a species of entertainment to which the people were bidden. These customs have been much mollified to-day, but certain sensational cases still remain for a selection of show which interests the people without awakening in general the slightest feeling of pity. This in its essence is not much different from the attitude of the middle ages, and the danger remains that this sensationalism may spur on the degenerate to win notoriety through crime. When all opportunity for satisfying lust for sensation shall have been abolished much will have been gained for humanity and good. Further than this, many judges and attorneys, who now feel themselves pledged to inflict some punishment for the crime, will find another way, and transform the social revenge into a healing process which will be far more efficacious than punishment.

Some Plain Truths.

As Presented by Harrison D. Barrett, Relative to Important Matters.

The N. S. A. as an organization does not require either apology or defense from its friends. Some of the acts of its officials are open to criticism, and certain views may occasionally require definition. Whenever information is sought every member of the N. S. A. board of trustees is perfectly willing to defend his every honest conviction, to explain every seeming incongruity, and to give logical reasons for the propositions he sets forth. No man is infallible. Mistakes are often made in perfect sincerity of purpose and purity of motive by the most intelligent men and women on earth. Every honest man, however, should be willing to correct his mistake, when it is pointed out to him, and ought to be broad enough in his thought to be grateful for the criticism that revealed to him his error.

I am quite sure that every official of the N. S. A. has shaped his course, both as an officer and as an individual Spiritualist in harmony with the idea expressed in the preceding sentence.

Holding this thought in mind, I come before the readers of The Progressive Thinker, not to defend any member of the present board of trustees, nor to apologize for my brothers and sisters in office for what they have done or left undone. They have, one and all, acted according to the dictates of their consciences in their endeavors to promote the welfare of our cause, and have labored with singleness of heart for its advancement. They believe in brotherhood, and are faithfully endeavoring to do all in their power to bring about a higher, better and truer religion.

They do not expect that their convictions, however deep and sincere, will escape criticism, or that all Spiritualists will agree with their views. As officials representing a great movement, as individuals unselfishly seeking the good of their religion, they are entitled to courteous consideration on the part of their opponents, and should not be made the targets for falsehood, vilification and abuse on the part of those who occupy our platforms, or have the opportunity of reaching the public in other ways.

The foregoing paragraphs have been called forth by the repeated attacks that have been made upon the members of the board of trustees of the N. S. A. by certain speakers, also by the violence with which those self-same speakers have assailed our noblest and best ministers and mediums now before the public. One of these—a man—at least he uses a man's body—has said repeatedly of late:

"Three-fourths of the speakers and mediums on the Spiritualist platform to-day are absolutely devoid of principle, and should be 'doing time' in the penitentiary!"

This man has attained some prominence in our ranks and has repeatedly sought recognition at the hands of the very people whom he so cruelly and wantonly assails. MEASURED MAN FOR MAN, WOMAN FOR WOMAN, SPEAKER FOR SPEAKER, THE WORKERS UPON THE ROSTRUM OF SPIRITUALISM ARE AS MORAL, AS CLEAN, AS SPIRITUAL, AS TRUE, AS PROGRESSIVE, AND AS HONEST AS ANY OTHER CLASS UPON THE FACE OF THIS EARTH. THEY ARE THE PEERS OF ANY SIMILAR BODY OF RELIGIONISTS OR REFORMERS IN AMERICA OR IN EUROPE.

I denounce this wicked attack upon my brethren as the basest of calumnies, worthy only of a mental perversity and moral degeneracy!

Again I quote from this most "spiritual (?) " speaker:

"The officers of the N. S. A. go about the country, clad in fine broadcloth, costly gloves and elegant patent leathers, yet do nothing for Spiritualism, and their expenses are always paid out of the treasury of the N. S. A."

Let me say here that the above quotation may not be verbatim. It conveys the idea I wish to present to your readers. Every word of this man's statement is MALICIOUSLY FALSE. The officers of the N. S. A. are not now, nor have they ever been, traveling about the country at the expense of the association. None of them can afford broadcloth, kid gloves, and patent leathers, because fake mediums often indulge in these luxuries, and frequently add a setting of diamonds to further dazzle the eyes of those who behold them.

At the present time, not a member of the board of trustees is traveling over the country either as a speaker or as a missionary. The president, having no lecture engagements, has been doing ordinary manual labor at his home. The vice-president is attending to his duties as an instructor in a medical college. The secretary is at her official desk in Washington, D. C. The treasurer is hard at work in behalf of the great business he has established by years of industry. One trustee is an overworked clerk in the Agricultural Department in the same city. Another is at work for his church in St. Louis, of which he has been pastor for seven or eight years. Another is as busy as a man can be with his manufacturing plant, while the other member of the board is spending the winter quietly in Florida.

There would be no necessity for referring to these outrageous remarks in your columns, if only the well-informed Spiritualists heard them. All intelligent, spiritual minded people will at once put the stamp of their disapproval upon these villainous attacks. There are many, however, who may not know the facts in the case, and may, therefore, be led by these vilifiers of their peers, to believe that there may be some truth in them. For the benefit of such as these, I have ventured to offer these paragraphs to your readers. Some great writer once said that even the Devil refused to receive a slanderer in hell! He had to stay outside of both the abode of bliss and that of torture. The "old Adam" in me almost inclines me to feel that such a fate for the slanderers of our worthy speakers, our honest mediums, and the officials of the N. S. A. would be only just. Our platform is a broad one, and honest men and women who have a worthy thought for their fellow-men are always welcome there. It is too much to hope that some day the renegade, the apostate, the criminal, the counterfeit mediums, and the slanderer will not be invited to represent our cause? Let all people remember that the views of all of our workers are open to criticism; but let them also remember that there is a hiatus as wide as the universe between honest criticism and falsehood; between a frank comparison of ideas and downright mendacity, and between decency and indecency.

Yours for Truth and Justice,
HARRISON D. BARRETT.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM.

Much Good Budding Has Been Done in the Spiritual Orchard.

Reading The Progressive Thinker No. 839, the article headed, Obstructions to Spiritualism, was of a character to interest me greatly. The writer states that "he has learned by first learning, that the greater part of what passes under the name of Spiritualism is error."

It is generally conceded that there is much of error presented under that name, just as there is by all organizations of whatever name, Christian or secular.

Now, I ask, is this error all produced by frauds? Are not honest mediums presenting error exactly as they receive it from the spirit world? Spirits are not all perfect. We are, as human beings, all imperfect, full of error. When a spirit leaves the form, these errors and imperfections are retained, not left with the form vacated. They are not made perfect or honest in the twinkling of an eye, by the change. As well might all criminals be looked upon as honest men as soon as released from prison.

It would seem by the reading of this article that the writer has in mind the teachings and philosophy as well as the phenomena of Spiritualism. As to frauds practiced in the presentation of the phenomena, I consider them as imposture and deceit rather than error.

Now I will speak of the illustration presented, which appears to have reference more to the teachings, than the phenomena.

He says, "In a cluster of cherry trees of seventy or eighty that grew up hit or miss as seedlings, there were found only two or three of any practical value, while all the others were worthless."

He continues, "In an orchard where all the trees had been budded with choice varieties every tree was of great value," and asks, "Why this difference?"

If a horticulturist takes those worthless trees in hand, buds them all from those found valuable, they will in time all prove valuable.

"They are all good people," speaking of Spiritualists in general, I suppose, "yet very few are they which produce good fruit."

It is then asked, "Whose fault is this?" His answer is, "Those who are at the head of the national organizations, and have charge in the management of the cause of Spiritualism."

I ask: Have not these heads of the national and state organizations done all that could be asked of them, working early and late, so far as finances would admit to buy this vast orchard, Spiritualism, using their own best fruit to be obtained, largely from the "spirit realms," and the great increase in valuable fruit, now produced in all parts of the country can be shown as results of their work? It is true there is a great amount of budding yet to be done, but it cannot all be accomplished at once. A cherry tree, after being budded, requires two or three years to produce any but the natural fruit.

The spiritual orchard is producing much valuable fruit from the budding which has already matured, and the buds set later, will also if not killed by drought.

This Spiritualist Orchard covers an immense area, and a large number are employed (more needed), some planting the seed, others budding as needed. I here refer to the missionaries sent out by both National and State Associations. The Progressive Thinker is also unceasing in its labors in this orchard, visiting every part of it weekly, placing buds where most good can be attained, trimming off the sprouts and dead limbs, collecting the most desirable buds for the workers' use.

This process is working wonders, and must result sooner or later in an increase of quality, and a great improvement in the quality of that produced.

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS.

Spiritualists, Apply Auto-Suggestion Freely and Daily, and Aspire to Reach a Higher Spiritual Plane

To those who have already broken their New Year (as set forth in the Chicago Daily Journal) resolutions; to those who have not; to those who have no faith in resolutions and consequently never make them; to all who are conscious of faults they desire to correct; weaknesses they struggle to overcome, conditions of life they long to change, these words are addressed.

NEVER DOUBT THE EFFICACY OF A DEFINITE DETERMINATION TO IMPROVE. NO GOOD RESOLVE HAS EVER GONE FOR NAUGHT—OR EVER WILL. NO STRIVING FOR THE BETTERMENT OF SELF, NO EXERCISE OF THE WILL, NO DIRECTION OF ADVANCEMENT, CAN BE LOST.

There is a potency in such action of the mind so marvelous that when, some day, we realize the law back of it all our keenest regret will be that we were so slow in appropriating our good; that our efforts were so scattered—so few and far between. For this is the chief reason our excellent resolutions fail, or seem to fail, of their purpose.

The New Year resolution is uncertain in effect because it is a New Year resolution; because it is made every year instead of every day. There can be no doubt that if such exertion of the will were made daily instead of yearly, and if it were made with full understanding, the results would be immediate and indisputable.

This is a subject concerning which I have the most intense convictions. It is clear to me that there is no factor more potent in the evolution of the race than that the conscious action of the human mind should be directed to the better of human conditions.

In the light of latter day scientific knowledge concerning the power of thought, the New Year resolution, or the daily resolution, assumes a new and striking significance.

We see such endeavor of the mind not merely as an indefinite action which may or may not have effect, but as the working of human will with divine law in such harmonious relation that the result is absolutely certain.

For there is a divine law back of our human striving for betterment, and when we recognize this law, intelligently co-operating with the forces of evolution, we can not help improving and growing.

The trouble with so many of our fine intentions is our hap-hazard fashion of sending them forth. We are uncertain whether they will bear fruit or not. We doubt our own ability to be true to them. Underneath all our strivings there is this doubt of ourselves—this fear that we are not strong enough to reach such high ideals.

THIS IS OUR GREAT ERROR. WE ARE STRONG IF WE WOULD ONLY APPROPRIATE OUR STRENGTH. IT IS FOLLY TO DECLARE WE ARE UNABLE TO OVERCOME OUR FAULTS.

It is ignorance to go on, day after day, year after year, permitting ourselves to be handicapped by numerous deficiencies, when, by the right sort of effort—concentrated effort, made daily instead of yearly—we could rid ourselves of such incumbrance and be free to live a happier, stronger, more useful life.

The soul has within it the power to conquer and to progress. Man has the strength, if he would only use it. There is no excuse for his indifference and failure.

Now that the enlightened world understands the power of suggestion, it is more and more clearly seen that there is no limit to what man may accomplish if he will.

In the significance of the new psychology a good reason is seen for the suggestion for improvement. In other words, it is an impression made voluntarily upon his own mind by the individual desiring to better his character or his life conditions. Such suggestion, if repeatedly given, cannot fail to have effect. It is a law.

When human beings intelligently recognize this law, there will be no longer any futile strivings for self-development. All efforts will be made with understandings and will bear abundant fruit. To those who are inclined to be discouraged in their struggle to advance, let me say this:

Do not make negative resolutions or suggestions. Be positive. Be assured of success. Say, "I am able to conquer. I am strong." I have within me the power to be what I will to be. This year, this day, I shall be braver, kinder, more controlled, more loving, more generous, more charitable. I am in the way of happiness and success."

Make these statements every day. Let every morning be your time for the renewing of your purposes, the establishing of higher estimates and standards.

Resolutions? They are your salvation. Persist in them and you will conquer.

GRUMBAGH WILL CASE.

It Will Be Contested by the Heirs.

Formal contest of the will of the late James T. Grumbagh, of Leroy, has begun in the courts of McLean county, Ill., at Bloomington. The decedent was a successful banker and pronounced Spiritualist. A legal battle royal will undoubtedly result. Ex-Governor Fifer and other able attorneys will defend the provisions of the will. Local sentiment among the testator's old neighbors and friends is reported hostile to this attack upon his last testament. Spiritualists everywhere will be interested in the outcome. The benefits can only directly accrue to our cause in Leroy but the attack is based upon the theory that a Spiritualist is disqualified by his faith from making a legal disposition of his property after death.

A Bloomington paper says: "The 1100 acres of land, Leroy property and personal effects after providing for the life sentence of the widow and the payment of the small bequests, the largest of which was $41,000 was left in trust to Owen, Coffey, Horne, Bonnett and West, for the founding of a Spiritualist church and a public library."

Was Not Competent.

The following clause is a direct charge made in the bill as to the mental condition of James T. Grumbagh: "Four complainants further represent that the said James T. Grumbagh, at the time of executing the said instrument in writing purporting to be his last will and testament, was of advanced age, past seventy years, afflicted

WHY I BECAME A SPIRITUALIST.

A Young Man Relates His Experience in Spiritualism.

For several years my grandmother was interested in Spiritualism and nearly every night would go to one of our near neighbors who was also a Spiritualist, for the purpose of talking over some of the wonderful things that they had seen and read concerning the phenomena.

Scarcely a day passed without a word from her to my parents among these lines. Naturally we ridiculed and tried to make her see that she was wrong, but she would always say that before our death we all would be strong believers in the phenomena called Spiritualism.

Time went on and we paid no attention to her arguments and beliefs. Last year my grandmother passed to spirit life. We all took it very hard and became anxious, as near from her, if it was a possible thing.

She was taken away in June and in the following August my father was persuaded to go to Lily Dale to obtain slates, writing.

He brought the slates in this town and went there to Mr. Keeler's. After sitting with him a few moments the medium told him that the friends asked for in the questions were there and ready to write.

Great was his surprise to hear the pencil moving between the slates which he held, and greater yet was it on opening them to find the words, "I was writing a letter from his mother, grandfather and great uncle."

We compared the handwriting with some that was done in this life, and anyone could readily see that it was identical.

My father's uncle that wrote was not asked for, nor thought of, but nevertheless his message was there written in red across the other writing so as not to interfere. No red pencil was placed by human hands between the slates, to his knowledge, and he was not there to be humbugged.

In one of the three letters we received from our spirit friends was a request that we should come and see the slates that they might try to communicate with us there.

This we did and after sitting a few minutes we discovered that I had mediumistic power that wanted development. After sitting this way a while I got so I could write automatically and beautiful were the messages we got.

One of our family was still skeptical, but soon became a thorough convert owing to the following incident: A stand belonging to us became missing and none of us could find where our deceased friends had taken it. After consulting them at a sitting we learned that while on earth one of our spirit friends had loaned it to a neighbor over six years ago. We went to this neighbor and found it just as they had said. This strengthened the belief of all of us, and we were progressing nicely, when some evil spirits rushed in and changed everything about.

This we could not understand and it annoyed us very much; practically it turned us away from the right path for several weeks. Finally I decided to go to Lily Dale to see if I could get some advice that would help me to free myself of these earth-bound spirits.

I received some advice that helped me very much, and manifestations came easier and more satisfactory.

Our belief aroused much curiosity in the minds of others, and a cross interest came to us to hear from their departed friends.

Those who came in faith received beautiful results, but some came for the purpose of amusement and to have something to sneer at afterwards.

One night I asked my Sunday-school teacher to come and sit with us. She did so and became so interested that the following night she came again with her husband.

After sitting several times with these people I became strong enough to materialize their little boy, and he was able to write to them through me. Some of us could see much plainer than others, and while some of us saw faces and figures, others could only see forms, but I am still striving to develop sufficiently so that we all can see plainly.

I am only in my eighteenth year, so you see that I haven't had sufficient time to develop owing to my schooling. But now that I have graduated and have more time to devote to this cause, I trust the readers will wish me success in developing a good gift.

Grumbagh was possessed of an insane delusion as to the natural objects of his bounty and the object upon which he attempted by the said alleged will to confer his bounty; that he was insane upon certain religious subjects; and that this insanity, delusion and unsoundness of mind directly affected and controlled the distribution of his property and rendered him wholly incapable of making any just and proper division or distribution of his estate, and that such insanity, delusion and unsoundness of mind continued until the time of his death.

Our complainants further represent that owing to his impaired mind, and also to his highly excited feelings in matters pertaining to Spiritualism, the said James T. Grumbagh was very liable to be unduly influenced by designing persons, to make such a disposition of his property as he actually did in the said instrument in writing, so that although his mind had become so impaired as to incapacitate him to make a will, this idea of making these bequests to build and maintain a Spiritualist church and library and leaving his nearest kin unprotected, remained fixed in his mind; and that the said James T. Grumbagh, at the time of the execution of said instrument of writing under improper restraint and undue influence from the undue acts and fraudulent practices of these designing persons.

A Story of Kisses.

Illustrating the Brotherhood of Man.

The merit of Christianity as a system, and the value of "bellef," as a factor, and not in any creed or intellectual equivalent for feeling, but in the feeling itself.

"Faith" is either a function of fact, or it is of folly; when manifestly it is not faith at all, but credulity—a vastly different matter.

The real faith is not dependent at all upon that symbol or form of statement which produces it. The value of the message has no necessary connection with the moral merit of the messenger.

Christianity is the power it is, and has been, and will continue to be, because it more nearly expresses abstract truth than any other expression known to mankind. It is capable, by the beauty and nobility of its sublime myths, of attracting more minds than the myths of all other religions combined.

It may not be literally true, but so marvelous is the fascination of the story that even those who might be disposed to discredit it, if they allowed themselves to think, will deliberately decline investigation, fearful that their ideal might be shattered.

The ideal may be a mirage in life's desert; but never yet was there a mirage without a reality somewhere beyond the visible horizon.

Faith is feeling focused. It is a complete subordination of sense to a higher, compeller, universal sentiment, to whose actual sequence emotion becomes the equivalent of knowledge, where all things are made new.

This, in substance, was what I had to say in reply to a request for my opinion as to the truth of the Christian religion.

A large party, chiefly composed of young people, had gathered in the library at Stone, a country seat on the Hudson, for the holidays, and, as such matters happen, the conversation had taken an unexpected turn; it came about naturally enough, though in a rather peculiar way. One of the guests was a Captain Clay Havisham, recently retired on account of wounds received in action with the rebels. Mrs. Andros' cook was a colored woman, and in her younger days had been a slave in the Havisham family, somewhere in Kentucky. When "Auntie" found that her "young man" was in the house, she, of course, wanted to see him.

The Captain's recollections of the old woman, who had been his nurse in childhood, were very vivid. He begged that she might be sent for. Mrs. Andros called a servant, and a few moments after Chloe appeared in the great front hall, shaking all over "like a bowl full of jelly," and her broad black face beaming with joy.

Whether the Captain's unforgotten action made him forgetful, or that he was proud to seem to hide his real feelings, at all events he left the sliding doors wide open, and in full view of us all he threw his arms around Aunt Chloe, and kissed her on the cheek.

That was all we witnessed of the interview. Mrs. Andros rose and softly closed the doors; but what we had seen was quite enough for comment of one sort or another. "What a sight!" they were too high bred to make these things so very openly, but I overheard one young woman—a Miss Rotherhyte, from Boston—remark in a whisper: "Strange, what an effect heredity and early education have upon certain minds!" while my cousin, Manny, Andros, said, in plain terms and a trifle louder, that "it was just disgusting."

My aunt, Mrs. Andros, tactfully and quietly turned the current of thought into a different channel, and, so diverted, the stream broadened out into the full tide of discussion.

Among so large a number, of course, there were many shades of opinion. One of the men was a "gentle," another a "strong" type, and the latter, Miss Rotherhyte, with a free flow of language and not a little ability, upheld the cause of what she considered "orthodoxy," or what she called the brotherhood of man.

This sort of thing is amusing to me, and yet there is a sadness about it. Inquiry and argument and opinion are all so entirely futile on the lines that the whole world seems united in holding as the only possible method of approaching truth.

Almost all had something to say; but Maggie Chalmers, a sweet, pretty girl, daughter, by the way, of an agnostic gentleman, sat quietly, with her little sister Mary in her arms, both listening, but never saying a word.

"Come now, Maggie," said Cousin Nan, vivaciously, "you are such a pious little thing, you ought to know more than the rest of us; haven't you anything to say?"

Miss Chalmers smiled and shook her head. "No," she answered, "I have nothing to say. I have no views at all, only—I try always to receive Christ as a little child."

In the silence that followed the door opened, Captain Havisham came in, and in a moment the library "buzzed and banged and clacked" again.

It was at this point that I was challenged, with the result I have given,—a result which gave rise to not a little further discussion. Mr. Chalmers, trying to draw me into an argument, while Miss Rotherhyte was very severe in her condemnation of my use of the word "myth," which she characterized as "positively infidel."

I hardly like to use the expression, "pearls before swine," or to seem to say, "Stand aside! I am not a little thing," but I cannot help it. It was solely through a feeling of the hopelessness of words in such a company that I said no more.

Finding that I refused to "give up my fort of silence to a woman," Miss Rotherhyte turned her attention to Captain Havisham.

"What do I think? Well, I can hardly say that I have thought much on the subject either way." Was he a Christian? Well, yes, he thought he was; not a member of any church, but he attended services, "more," said he frankly, "because my mother likes to have me than for any special fancy of my own. I think religion is, well, just love; that's about it."

The Captain spoke hesitatingly, and with sort of indifference, as if the subject were either beyond him, or had little interest to him. He seemed to be almost dumb. But a remark of Mr. Chalmers drew him out.

"What do I think?" said he, brightening instantly. "What do I think of the doctrine that all things are made new? Why, that's true. I know it's true because something happened to me once."

The Captain stopped suddenly, blushing like a girl.

"Oh! you must tell us what it was."

"A story! Is it a story?"

"No," said the Captain. "I won't call it a story, and it isn't. I was in the Indian country when the Nez Percés went off the reservation, on the war path as they say."

waters of Little Butte river, a couple of hundred miles off. My chief could spare me only one squad. When we started there were just thirty-two—all told. I was the only commissioned officer along; but O'Tool, my first sergeant, was an old Indian fighter. Besides, we didn't expect to run across any hostiles; we felt sure they were further down the valley. We did run across 'em, for all that—hundreds on their knees, yelling and whooping. There was only one thing to do. We rode for the timber, and there made a stand—cut trees and piled rocks. This made a fair enough fort; but, to show how hot the firing was, by night they had killed the last of the horses, though this bit of matter so much—we used their bodies to help make a breast-work.

"They kept us there for two whole days, charging up the hill every now and then, and we firing back with our repeating carbines."

"This was my first brush with the rebels," I asked O'Tool what he thought; whether we were likely to pull through, and when he said we'd be in kingdom come inside of forty-eight hours, and Gray Wolf, the Arapahoe scout, thought so too, I may as well own up to being scared. Being scared or not, I loaded and emptied my Remington just the same. That's one merit to West Point; it trains a man not to feel afraid, or if he is afraid, to show it.

It comes to about the same thing. "Well, so it went. Two whole days those red devils kept it up. By the second night hardly one wasn't hit, some badly, and a dozen either killed or out of the fight."

"The worst of it was our canteens were empty. We had enough to eat, but for nearly two whole days not a drop of water. Besides, that, hardly one of us had any sleep. The first night we had a little rest now and then, but this second the reds kept it right along."

"They knew we must be getting short of ammunition and pretty well used up, and when they saw that, they came nearly full when they charged again. This time Gray Wolf gave up. He wouldn't touch his piece, but sat on the ground—wrapped his blanket about him, and sat there, rocking back and forth, and singing his death song."

"I kicked and cursed him for a coward; but he wouldn't budge. The savages swarmed up the slope, and I thought, sure enough, our time had come. It gets to be a bit creepy, you know, when you begin to think about keeping a charge of your revolver for your own brains."

That was what we did—"O'Tool and I agreed to shoot one another rather than fall alive into the hands of the reds. The last survivors did that in the Peterman affair, why not we?"

"But, when we had given up all hope, not a hundred rounds left. Just up the morning the firing and yells let up for a minute, and then, way down off the valley, we heard a bugle, only two or three notes, but that was enough."

"Every man went wild at once and shouted, 'hurrah hurrah!' with all their might."

"I blow your horn, Wentz," said I to our little Dutch bugler; "blow all you're worth. Let 'em know we're alive."

"The little chap had been shot in the thigh, so he couldn't get on his feet, but he was plucky clear through. He grabbed his bugle, puffed his cheeks and rolled over on his back. My! how he did blow!"

"Back came 'oot, 'oot, tooty to tooty," and a minute or two after we caught sight of a guidon fluttering, and the sun, just creeping up, on the sabres."

"The reds were quick, Jove, but it was fun to see the devils scrambling for their ponies. We laughed till the tears ran down our cheeks—laughed and cried together."

"Swigert's troops charged the reds, but I don't know, or that I hope of, the 12th Colorado Cavalry, rode right up the slope. Glad to talk about being glad. By Jove, if you ever saw glad men we were that."

"O'Tool, who always said he hated niggers, just made for the first trooper that climbed over—a big, black, grimy, grinning Congo buck, and hugged and kissed him, blubbering like a baby. The rest all did the same—among 'em, there was Scott Moran, classmate of mine at the academy; why, when he took a commission in a black regiment, I thought he'd disgraced himself."

"I didn't think so when he rode up the hill that morning, and I never have thought so since. I tell you there's nothing but a thing of that kind to knock your prejudice out of a man."

"That's what I mean by all things being made new. I've heard people talk about the brotherhood of man, but I've felt it."—Hudson Genone, in The Open Court.

GONE HOME.

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to Spirit Life.

Without a moment's warning, on Dec. 28, the Angel of Life touched the brow of B. Frank Schmid, of Indianapolis, Ind., and he went to meet the loved ones that had preceded him. When such as he goes the world seems so empty and cold, we can hardly rally enough to say, "It is well."

Mr. Schmid was one of the most prominent business men of his city, and is mourned not only by the family left, but by the whole city. He leaves a daughter, and two sisters; besides these a host of friends, especially among the poor where his hand has been filled with the substantial and his heart with sympathy.

He was a staunch Spiritualist, and had given time, money and energy for its support in that city. For fourteen years being the president of the First Society there, Spiritualism in that city owes more to him than to any other individual. The cause has lost a great support.

The funeral was held at his home, 1740 Capitol avenue, January 2, where amid a bower of most exquisite flowers the body rested. It was a most touching scene when the laboring man came in a body to take the last look at his face—black and white, with tears streaming down their cheeks.

Mr. Schmid had been an employer for years, being one of the firm of the Central Chair Co. He had also served three terms on the State Board of Labor Commission, and through his efforts Indiana received the Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

He had settled more strikes than any other commissioner of the state. Thus these men realized they had lost a great and just friend.

When tragedies like this occur, then it is we can feel and test the power of Spiritualism. It is the only light to help us through the darkness. He came with his face all radiant with the understanding of life immortal, and wife, child, father and mother to meet him. Our loss is his gain. We shall miss him but he will come to us again."

Elizabeth Harlow, officiated at the funeral.

UNCLE SAM'S FREE SCHOOL.

Some Pertinent Reflections in Regard to the Same.

The public free school, by our dear Uncle Sam—

The one institution devoid of all sham, With pro bono publico over its door, Is servant alike to the rich and the poor.

The great foster father of every born race, And guardian mother of broadest free grace;

I gathers the children (whatever their lot) And rears them together, with parental thought;

No social distinctions prevail—as a rule,— The high-born and lowly touch elbows at school;

The president's son, and the common bootblack, The clochopper's boy and the swartly "Polack."

Are on the same plane—as a fraternal band, And taught to obey every law of our land;

With temperance instruction, the mothers have brought; While mercy, and purity, likewise are taught;

To which every pupil is carefully trained: An ethical standard is thereby maintained

For citizenship, that is clean, through and through;— That builds a Republic, both loyal and true;

With reverence awe for our banner unfurled, The symbol of freedom, flung out to the world!

The public free school is the hope of our race, No other provision can fill its high place;

The growth of our country depends on its sway;— Defend it we must, from invaders to-day.

Who seek to supplant it, by fraudulent While secretly holding sectarian aim:— With hope of obtaining the future control

By pow'r they may gain, through parochial school! Arouse, then, ye freemen, and straight— To ward off the foe from unworthy greed;

Remember that vigilance ever will be The price we must pay for our true liberty!

That strong declaration our fathers proclaimed, Is still our protection, if strictly maintained:

No sect of religion shall congress promote With appropriations of money—by vote;

Hence, adding a sect, in its church, or its school, Is open transgression of government rules!

And favors to any, then all could demand, And where would our public school system then stand?

Our proud old Republic will soon cease to be, If cults of religion are perfectly free To use their great liberty here as a tool

To back and demolish dear Uncle Sam's school! That system, so wise, and so broad in its scope, Must guard no amensities (?) from priest, king, or pope!

INTELLIGENCE THE GOAL OF DREAM.

'Twas many, many years ago, We found ourselves one day, to be Aboard the tug of Know-It-All,

And sailing on the Great Smart Sea. Our noble tug sailed grandly on, She had an ever gallant crew.

No breaker dared to show its head Along our stately line of view. Smart Sea kept calm from day to day, And seemed to wear a placid face;

Our tug of Know-It-All steamed on, To find for us a landing place. At last a craft came in our view, By name, just dim Uncertainty,

That led into the Sea of Doubt, Where many, many seemed to be. Our tug now needing some repairs, We anchored 'long the shore,

We thought while waiting there, for her, We might as well explore, And sail the wondrous Sea of Doubt,

With surging billows, mountain high, Ensuring to its bosom cold, Wherein it seemed that all must die.

But in the face of all these woes, Our wonder pressed us ever on; What cared we for those angry waves?

APPARITIONS AND OTHER PHANTASMS.

These Read by L. W. Billingsley, Attorney, to New Psychology Club of Lincoln, Nebraska.

In pursuing our investigations in the psychical field, it is more difficult to give us a satisfactory demonstration of the existence of the phenomena of apparitions and phantasms of all kinds than in the material world. We know that if you add two apples—not six apples; that if you add a part of oxygen to a part of hydrogen we ever have water; that the watermelon can demonstrate that the watermelon is a watermelon, and so on as to other truths as to concrete things. In these matters we use one or more of our sensory faculties, with our reasoning faculties, through and by the objective mind.

But even as to matters relating to the physical world, we find the minds of some in what we call a high state of development—while others are dull, stupid and obtuse, but little above brutes.

A fisherman seeing a red, glowing sunset, may only have aroused in him an idea of better conditions of the coming day, and its effect on his catch; while in the mind of a poet or philosopher, indelible beauties would be unfolded and profound truths would be manifested. Lord Bacon truly said: "Nothing can be known with certainty without appeal to facts." In appealing to facts we make use of inductive reasoning, from particular facts to general conclusions; frame certain hypotheses, postulate theories, in appealing to facts.

Reason Finds Three or More Great Pitfalls in arriving at the truth. First is inaccurate observation. Second, insufficient verification. Third, the tendency of the human mind to generalize and conclude from an insufficient number of facts.

Now when we consider this subject of phantasms we enter a field for deep speculation and conjecture, in assigning causes for apparitions from different points of view. The conclusions arrived at are chiefly from three points of view. One given by psychologists is that apparitions and other phantasms are illusions and delusions arising out of man's subjective or subconscious mind. A second view is given by a school of philosophers is that they are materialized thought, made up of man's mental and he is not conscious of the etheric matter. A third view is that apparitions are spirits of the dead, or even living—materialized with some substance so, as to be visible to sensitive sight, or to clairvoyant sight—and termed by some as spirit sight. This latter view is that held by the cult called "Spiritualists."

The second view is held by some of the cult called "Theosophists." As to the first theory, Thomson Jay Hudson is probably one of the ablest exponents. Yet he considers the subject with much caution.

Apparitions or ghost stories, have terrified third people in all ages, and have led to a vast amount of speculation. The London Society for Psychical Research.

has patiently investigated the subject in a scientific way, and has collected many facts, but has not classified them as to any definite hypotheses or theory, save in a tentative way. At any rate, they do not dogmatize—only suggest a certain line of thought and investigation.

Many cases are recorded where phantasms have been seen by more than one person at a time, and by persons seemingly in a normal state of mind. The phenomena of so-called spirit photography amply demonstrate the fact that visions can be created of such tangible character that they can be caught and imprinted on the photographic plate.

This has been done so often that it is now generally held as a demonstrated truth. Pictures of the sitters' dead friends have been taken repeatedly, where the perfect likeness of the deceased was unmistakable. This Mr. Hudson readily admits in his work, "Law of Psychic Phenomena," page 288, though he is a foe to both Theosophy and Spiritualism. However, he denies that these pictures have their origin in the spirit world. Mr. Hudson, after very strong talk of full proofs and correct rules of logic, and evidence to prove every premise in reasoning—quite glibly gives this on page 287 of his work called "Law of Psychic Phenomena."

It seems to be well authenticated that the subjective personality of man possesses the power to create phantasms or visions, which in many instances are visible to the subjective minds of others. "Every vision perceived by one in telepathic rapport with another must be presumed to be created by the one or the other."

By a few premises laid down by Mr. Hudson he makes the following conclusions:

1. That the power to create phantasms resides and is inherent in the subjective mind, or personality of man.

2. That the power becomes greater as the body approaches nearer to the condition of death; that is, as the subjective or hypnoid condition becomes deeper, and the subjective personality in consequence becomes stronger in its sphere of activity.

3. That at the hour of death, or when the functions of the body are entirely suspended, the power is greatest—hence ghosts.

Mr. Hudson after all his great talk of care and fairness in reasoning jumps at conclusions with remarkable ease. This seems to be fairly true, from the vast amount of recorded phenomena, ghosts, gosses, the greatest longevity, persistence, power and purpose of those who have died violent death. However, there are many authenticated accounts of ghosts of persons who have died at a good old age, and in due course of nature.

This seems to be generally true, that phantasms of the Dead are of those who have died under circumstances of great mental stress or emotion; those who die peaceful and quiet seldom projected as a phantasm upon the living objective world.

The record says of a vast number of cases where men and women have been murdered, have an intense longing to acquaint the world with the manner of their "taking off." The result is often a haunted house where people's nerves are shocked nightly with realistic reproduction of the tragedy. This ghost, walking sometimes runs for years, but seldom only for a few months.

This has been verified time and again, that two persons while living have agreed that whichever passed away first should reappear as a ghost, and so on after the hour of death; and the agreement is repeatedly carried out with startling fidelity. Phantasms seldom have any general intelligence—ghosts only have an idea of purpose. At least that is the rule laid down by De Quatrefe in his volume on "Posthumous Humanity," wherein he says, "The shade only talks about his personal predilections, and remains deaf to every question outside the limits it has prescribed for itself." Hamlet's father's ghost is a case in point—his taking off in the garden by wife and brother.

Ghosts never reappear at the place where a building that has been haunted is destroyed. Theosophy claims that these are simply astral bodies of the departed. This endeavor to verify by a vast record of facts, also by clairvoyant sight, and by the teachings and affirmations of their mahatmas and adepts. All of which, outside of the domain of facts, does not admit of scientific demonstration, and hence has little credence outside of that cult. Spiritualists of course believe that ghosts, apparitions and phantasms of all kinds are caused by the spirits generally of the departed—materialized or clothed in vestment of astral and etheric matter, appearing much like the persons died before they passed out. These phantasms readily dissolve their vestments with the spirits remaining intact.

Spiritualists Have a Vast Record of Phenomena to sustain their theory—and then, too, they have phenomena theorems of daily occurrence over the world. Their phenomena at many scenes, divested of all theory—of the workings of either invisible forces, or entities as enormous, such as levitation, moving ponderable bodies without contact, improvised loud speech, music, poetry, singing, by three and four entities at the same time, questions by spectators with prompt intelligent answers from invisible entities—and giving correct intelligence of doings of those far away, return and contrivances of future events—are certainly hard to account for save on theory of Spiritualists.

Even Mr. Hudson, though denying the theory of Spiritualists, admits their phenomena in these words "The man who denies the phenomena of Spiritualism to-day, is not entitled to be called a skeptic, he is simply ignorant; and it would be hopeless to attempt to enlighten him. Some people deny spirit phenomena and refuse to investigate."

One other matter I here desire to speak of while on the subject of ghosts or apparitions, though hardly germane to the subject of this evening's discussion—that is, the Thought Atmosphere that invests habitations. In moving into a strange house or room, some sensitive persons are apparently influenced by the mental make-up of those who previously occupied the premises. If the former residents were afflicted by a great sorrow or affliction, a depressed, sad feeling would unusually come upon the later occupant, so strong that relief could only come by moving out of the habitation—no ghost would be seen, but the depressing mental state would be felt all the same. Of course, where the new occupant had full knowledge of the prior sad scenes, then the new occupant would be affected more or less by the suggestion of such afflictions—but cases are numerous where the later occupant had no knowledge of the former occupancy, and yet would have the mental affliction akin to that borne by the former occupants.

If the former occupants were merry, or optimistic, or artistic, or of strong mentality, or had any other strong characteristic, their character atmosphere would remain and affect later sensitive occupants. The character of the former occupants of habitations probably affects more or less, either perceptibly or unnoticeably, all who afterwards dwell there—of course often by suggestion—and of course only slightly affect the dull and obtuse minds.

Thought essence, thought elements, and thought forms infect all habitations, all assemblies of persons, all business places, places of worship, all clothing worn, in short wherever thought penetrates, in hot or cold, bad or otherwise. All of you have been chilled by the cold, selfish, ill mannered, sadness or villainous of a place—or you have been toned up and cheered by the kindness, love and sympathy thought atmosphere of places, even before a word is spoken or a look exchanged. All of us each day are by our thoughts adding to the great storehouse of good or evil.

GLORIES IN HER CONVERSION.

A Letter From Springfield, Mo.

To the Editor:—This city boasts of between three and four thousand Spiritualists. Think of it, and I dare say not more than one in forty can be induced to read a bona fide Spiritualist paper, but if some one were to come to our city with his wonderful advertisement of the great things he can do, these same Spiritualists will run over each other to get there first to throw their money away on him; then turn directly around and say: "For pity sake, there should be some way provided whereby people can know whom to patronize."

I often think that experience is a good teacher only when its lessons are heeded, and if these same people would subscribe for and read the only real Spiritualist paper printed so far as I know, that is The Progressive Thinker, they could easily know whom to patronize.

I read several other Spiritualist papers but none of them give me all the full like The Progressive Thinker, because it discusses all sides of questions and sets PEOPLE TO THINKING AS NEVER BEFORE.

The fact is, I am so rejoiced at my own emancipation from the thralldom and slavery of creeds and superstitious teaching called, or rather mis-called, religious teaching, that I often wish with my heart that every person on earth could listen to the same beautiful, blessed words of instruction from the angels that I so often receive. If the world received the same instructions in regard to life and the consequences resultant from wrong-doing that my guardian angels explain to me, I know people would realize the inexcusable error and churches to save them from sinning, and if they fully realized that no power on earth nor any place else could possibly release them from the responsibility of their own acts, they would look well to their lives, and seek for every possible means at all times and places to say and do the right.

What a different race of people we would have then.

Surely this blessed light of truth must illuminate the minds of all earth's people ere long.

CHAPTER I.

In the Unseen.

She had been talking of dying only the evening before, with a friend, and had described her own sensations after a long illness when she had been at the point of death. "I suppose," she said, "that I was as nearly gone as any one ever was to come back again. There was no pain in it, only a sense of sinking down, down—through the bed as if nothing could hold me or give me support enough—but no pain."

And then they had spoken of another friend in the same circumstances, who also had come back from the very verge, and who described her sensations as those of one floating upon a summer sea without pain or suffering, in a lovely nook of the Mediterranean, blue as the sky. These soft and soothing images of the passage which all men dread had been talked over with low voices, yet with smiles and a grateful sense that "the warm precincts of the cheerful day" were once more familiar to both. And very cheerfully she went to rest that night, talking of what was to be done on the morrow, and fell asleep sweetly in her little room, with its shaded light and curtained window, and little pictures on the dim walls. All was quiet in the house; soft breathing of the sleepers, soft murmuring of the spring wind outside, a wintry moon very clear and full in the skies, a little town all hushed and quiet, everything lying defenseless, unconscious, in the safe keeping of God.

How soon she woke no one can tell. She woke and lay quite still, half roused, half hushed, in that soft languor that attends a happy waking. She was happy always, in the peace of a heart that was humble and faithful and pure, but yet had been used to wake to a consciousness of little pains and troubles, such as even to her meekness were sometimes hard to bear. But on this morning there were none of these. She lay in a kind of hush of happiness and ease, not caring to make any further movement, lingering over the sweet sensation of that waking. She had no desire to move nor to break the spell of the silence and peace. It was still very early, she supposed, and it might be hours yet before the dawn came to call her. It might even be that she should sleep again. She had no wish to move, she lay at such luxurious ease and calm.

But by and by, as she came to full possession of her waking senses, it appeared to her that there was some change in the atmosphere, in the scene. There began to steal into the air about her, the soft dawn of a summer morning, the lovely blueness of the first opening of daylight before the sun. It could not be the light of the moon, which she had seen before she went to bed; and all was so still, that it could not be the bustling, wintry day which comes at that time of the year late, to find the world awake before it. This was different; it was like the summer dawn, a soft suffusion of light growing every moment. And by and by it occurred to her that she was not in the little room where she had lain down. There were no dim walls or roof, her little pictures were all gone, the curtains at her window.

The discovery gave her no uneasiness in that delightful calm. She lay still to think of it all, to wonder, yet undisturbed. It half amused her that these things should be changed, but did not rouse her yet with any shock of alteration. The light grew fuller and fuller round, growing into day, clearing her eyes from the sweet mist of the first waking. Then she raised herself upon her arm. She was not in her room, she was in no scene she knew. Indeed it was scarcely a scene at all, nothing but light, so soft and lovely, that it soothed and caressed her eyes.

She thought all at once of a summer morning when she was a child, when she had woken in the deep night which yet was day, early, so early that the birds were scarcely astir, and had risen up with a delicious sense of dawning and of being all alone in the mystery of the sunrise, in the unawakened world which lay at her feet to be explored, as if she were Eve just entering upon Eden. It was curious how all those childish sensations, long forgotten, came back to her as she found herself so unexpectedly out of her sleep in the open air and light. In the recollection of that lovely hour, with a smile at herself, so different as she now knew herself to be, she moved to rise and look a little more closely about her, and see where she was.

When I call her a little Pilgrim, I do not mean that she was a child; on the contrary, she was not even young. She was little by nature, with as little flesh and blood as was consistent with mortal life; and she was one of those who are always little for love. The tongue found diminutives for her, the heart kept her in a perpetual youth: She was so modest and so gentle, that she always came last, so long as there was anyone whom she could put before her. But this little body, and the soul which was not little, and the heart which was big and great, had known all the round of sorrows that fill a woman's life, without knowing any of its warmer blessings. She had nursed the sick, she had entertained the weary, she had consoled the dying. "She had gone about the world, which had no prize or recompense for her, with a smile. Her little presence had been always bright. She was not clever; you might have said she had no mind at all; but so wise and right and tender a heart, that it was as good as genius. This is to let you know what this little Pilgrim had been."

She rose up, and it was strange how like she felt to the child she remembered in that still summer morning so many years ago. Her little body, which had been worn and racked with pain, felt as light and untroubled as itself as then. She took her first step forward with the same sense of pleasure, yet of awe, suppressed delight and daring and wild adventure, yet perfect safety. But then the recollection of the little room in which she had fallen asleep came quickly, strangely over her, confusing her mind. "I must be dreaming, I suppose," she said to herself, regretfully; for it was all so sweet that she wished it to be true.

Her movement called her attention to herself, and she found that she was dressed, not in her night-dress, as she had lain down, but in a dress she did not know. She paused for a moment to look at it, and wonder. She had never seen it before; she did not make out how it was made, or what stuff it was, but it fell so pleasantly about her, it was so soft and light, that in her confused state she abandoned that subject with only an additional sense of pleasure. And now the atmosphere became more distinct to her. She saw that under her feet was a greenness as of close velvet turf, both cool and warm, cool and soft to touch, but with no damp in it, as might have been at that early hour, and with flowers showing here and there.

She stood looking round her, not able to identify the landscape because she was still confused a little, and then walked softly on, all the time afraid lest she should awake and lose the sweetness of it all, and the sense of rest and happiness. She felt so light, so airy, as if she could skim across the field like any child; it was bliss enough to breathe and move, with every organ so free. After more than fifty years of hard service in the world, to feel like this, even in a dream! She smiled to herself at her own pleasure; and then once more, yet more potently, there came back upon her the appearance of her room in which she had fallen asleep.

How had she got from there to here? Had she been carried away in her sleep, or was it only a dream, and would she by and by find herself between the four dim walls again? Then this shadow of recollection faded away once more, and she moved forward, walking in a soft rapture over the delicious turf. Presently she came to a little mound, upon which she paused to look about her. Every moment she saw a little farther; blue hills far away, extending in long, sweet distance, an indefinite landscape, but fair and vast, so that there could be seen no end to it, not even the line of the horizon—save at one side, where there seemed to be a great shadowy gateway, and something dim beyond.

She turned from the brightness to look at this, and when she had looked for some time, she saw, what pleased her still more, though she had been so happy before, people coming in. They were too far off for her to see clearly, but many came, each part, one figure only at a time. To watch them amused her in the delightful leisure of her mind. Who were they? she wondered; but no doubt soon some of them would come this way, and she would see. Then suddenly she seemed to hear, as if in answer to her question, some one say, "Those who are coming in are the people who have died on earth."

"Died!" she said to herself aloud, with a wondering sense of the inappropriateness of the word which almost came the length of laughter. In this sweet air, with such a sense of life about, to suggest such an idea was almost ludicrous. She was so occupied with this, that she did not look round to see who the speaker might be. She thought it over, amused, but with some new confusion of the mind. Then she said, "Perhaps I have died too," with a laugh to herself at the absurdity of the thought.

"Yes," said the other voice, echoing that gentle laugh of hers, "you have died too."

She turned around, and saw another standing by her, a woman, younger and fairer, and more stately than herself, but of so sweet a countenance that her little Pilgrim felt no shyness, but recognized a friend at once. She was more occupied looking at this new face, and feeling herself at once so much happier (though she had been so happy before) in finding a companion who would tell her what everything was, than in considering what these words might mean. But just then once more the recollection of the four walls, with their little pictures hanging, and the window with its curtains drawn, seemed to come round her for a moment, so that her whole soul was in a confusion. And as this vision slowly faded away (though she could not tell which was the vision, the darkened room or this lovely light), her attention came back to the words at which she had laughed, and at which the other had laughed as she repeated them. Died?—was it possible that this could be the meaning of it all?

"Died?" she said, looking with wonder in her companion's face, who smiled back to her. "But do you mean—you cannot mean—I have never been so well; I am so strong; I have no trouble—anywhere; I am full of life."

The other nodded her beautiful head with a more beautiful smile, and the little Pilgrim burst out in a great cry of joy, and said:

"Is this all? Is it over?—is it all over? Is it possible that this can be all?"

"Were you afraid of it?" the other said.

There was a little agitation for the moment in her heart. She was so glad, so relieved and thankful, that it took away her breath. She could not get over the wonder of it.

"To think one should look forward to it so long, and wonder, and be even unhappy trying to divine what it will be—and this all!"

"Ah, but the angel was very gentle with you," said the young woman; "you were so tender and warm, that he only smiled and took you sleeping. There are other ways. But it is always wonderful to think it is over, as you say."

The little Pilgrim could do nothing but talk of it, as one does after a very great event. "Are you sure, quite sure, it is so?" she said. "It would be dreadful to find it only a dream, to go to sleep again, and wake up—there—"

This thought troubled her for a moment. The vision of the bedchamber came back; but this time she felt it was only a vision. "Were you afraid, too?" she said, in a low voice.

"I never thought of it at all," the beautiful stranger said; "I did not think it would come to me. But I was very sorry for the others to whom it came, and grudged that they should lose the beautiful earth, and life, and all that was so sweet."

"My dear!" cried the Pilgrim, as if she had never died, "oh, but this is far sweeter! And the heart is so light, and it is happiness only to breathe. Is it heaven here? It must be heaven."

"I do not know if it is heaven. We have so many things to learn. They cannot tell you everything at once," said the beautiful lady. I have seen some of the people I was sorry for, and when I told them, we laughed—as you and I laughed just now—for pleasure."

"That makes me think," said the little Pilgrim; "if I have died, as you say—which is so strange, and me so living—if I have died, they will have found it out. The house will be all dark, and they will be breaking their hearts. Oh, how could I forget them in my selfishness, and be happy! I so light-hearted, while they—"

She sat down hastily, and covered her face with her hands and wept. The other looked at her for a moment, then kissed her for comfort, and cried too. The two happy creatures sat there weeping together, thinking of those they had left behind, with an exquisite grief which was not unhappiness, which was sweet with love and pity. "And, oh," said the little Pilgrim, "what can we do to tell them not to grieve? Can you not send? cannot you speak? cannot one go to tell them?"

The heavenly stranger shook her head.

"It is not well, they all say. Sometimes one has been permitted; but they do not know you," she said, with a pitiful look in her sweet eyes. "My mother told me that her heart was so sick for me, she was allowed to go; and she went and stood by me, and spoke to me, and I did not know her. She came back so sad and sorry, that she took her at once to our Father; and there, you know, she found that it was all well. All is well when you are there."

"Ah," said the little Pilgrim, "I have been thinking of other things. Of how happy I was, and of them; but never of the Father,—just as if I had not died."

The other smiled upon her with a wonderful smile.

"Do you think he will be offended—our Father—as if he were one of us?" she said.

And then the little Pilgrim, in her sudden grief to have forgotten him, became conscious of a new rapture unexplainable in words. She felt his understanding to envelop her little spirit, with a soft and clear penetration, and that nothing she did or said could ever be misconceived more. "Will you take me to him?" she said, trembling yet glad, clasping her hands. And once again the other shook her head.

"They will take us both when it is time," she said; "we do not go at our own will. But I have seen our Brother—"

"Oh, take me to him!" the little Pilgrim cried. "Let me see his face! I have so many things to say to him. I want to ask him—Oh, take me to where I can see his face!"

And then once again the heavenly lady smiled.

"I have seen him," she said. "He is always about—now here, now there. He will come and see you, perhaps when you are not thinking. But when he pleases, We do not think here of what we will—"

SPECIAL THOUGHT CHANNEL. SYMPOSIUM.

The Question Before Spiritualists is this: Can a Spirit dematerialize a white dress, a white hat, a pair of white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, and convey them to her home in spirit life, and then at will materialize them, and bring them back to earth?

Letter From a Washington Spiritualist.

To the Editor:—A fine demonstration of spirit power took place at Mrs. M. A. Keeler's some time ago. A short time before Christmas Clara Collingwood, Mrs. Keeler's cabinet messenger, expressed a wish for a full outfit of earthly clothing. ONE LADY GOT HER A NICE WHITE HAT; ANOTHER MADE HER A WHITE DRESS; ANOTHER PROVIDED HER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE SHOES; ANOTHER WITH A PAIR OF WHITE STOCKINGS; AND OTHERS WITH SCARF, FAN AND DOLL. These articles were presented to her for a Christmas present, and were taken away somewhere by the spirit messenger, not one of them being left in the seance room. When inquiry was made, Clara said she took them to her spirit home.

A few weeks after Christmas, Mrs. Keeler, who is a materializing medium, requested her husband, Dr. Wm.

Keeler, who is a spirit photographer, to take her photograph while entranced in the cabinet in the dark. She seated herself in the cabinet, the curtains pulled a little to one side, the camera placed in position, the room made dark, and the photograph was taken. To one side, and in front of Mrs. Keeler, stands Clara Collingwood, the spirit messenger, clothed in her Christmas presents of earthly clothing. I send you the photograph; also a photograph of myself and spirit wife and son, and also one of myself and Spirit Dr. Holland, who controls the materializations, and the face and head of Clara and others supposed to be relatives, and whom I do not recognize.

This demonstration proves to me that spirits can be photographed and that they can take solids to their spirit homes. RUFUS SUMERLIN, Washington, D. C.

THE ABOVE LETTER SPEAKS FOR ITSELF. WHETHER THE MATERIAL GARMENTS OF EARTH CAN BE TRANSPORTED TO SPIRIT LIFE, AND THEN BE RE-MATERIALIZED, AND WORN BY A MORTAL, IS A QUESTION THAT THOSE ONLY WHO CONTRIBUTE TO THIS SYMPOSIUM, MUST DECIDE. HOWEVER, WE DESIRE TO SPEAK OF THE GROSS DECEPTION PRACTICED IN THIS CITY, CARRIED ON BY MATERIALIZING MEDIUMS. THE DECEPTION HAS BEEN BY MATERIALIZING MEDIUMS. MOUNTAIN HIGH. THE FRAUD PRACTICED HAS BEEN OF THE MOST CRUEL, HEARTLESS KIND. THE ACTORS MUST BE CLASSED WITH THE THIEF, WITH THE HOLD-UP MAN, WITH THE VILLAIN

EVA A. CASSELL.

She is an Excellent Medium, and From Her Standpoint Gives Her Views In Reference to the Possibility of Transferring to Spirit Life a White Dress, Shoes, Etc., and Wearing Them There at Leisure, Then Transferring Them Back to Earth.

It seems hardly possible that there are those among us who would believe such preposterous statements. I know that I have my opinion of a person who would believe such arrant folly; they must have reached and gone far beyond that period which Prof. Osler says is the age when a man has outlived his usefulness and should be chloroformed.

There are hundreds of these old fellows hanging round the cabinet, who, incapacitated by second childhood and defective eyesight, persist in declaring every "medium" genuine, even when the latter has been proven a fraud. THEY ARE THE WORST ENEMIES TO OUR CAUSE AND THEIR FAMILIES OUGHT TO PUT THEM UNDER GUARDIANSHIP INSTEAD OF ALLOWING THEM TO FOOL AWAY A WHOLE DOLLAR AT A MATERIALIZING SEANCE.

"A white hat, a white dress, white shoes, white stockings, a scarf, fan and doll, were taken into the cabinet, and at the close of the seance not one of the articles were found—they had been taken by the control to her spirit home."

Phew! I should hate awfully to be held in such estimation and rated in such proportion by any spirit control that it should deem me mentally fitted to believe such palpable trickery! He must believe me a fool—the son of long ears, of he with the braying voice. But where did the white articles of clothing go to? To the spirit world? Go to, thou prince of "dead seances; thou willing dupe of the trickster." I will tell you where they went. They were passed out of the cabinet into the hands of the "manager," and he, in turn, passed them to two confederates who posed as sitters in the circle. Yes, sir, in the darkness and while the circle were howling out the strains of "Sweet Spirit, Hear My Prayer," in order to drown the noise made at the cabinet, the white clothing was passed out to the manager.

That they were not found in the cabinet is no proof that they were taken to the spirit world.

A few weeks after, the medium was photographed and standing beside her the control, clothed in the same white articles of raiment.

Stupendous! Marvelous! I believed at one time that there might be some thing in spirit photography; but at Onset Bay one day I saw a crowd of people in front of Carr's, the photographer. I stepped up to look at the photographs in the windows and one of my friends said to me: "Just look here—here is your figure, natural as can be, posing as a spirit beside this lady who has been photographed."

Sure enough, it was I beyond doubt, and not only I but other people at Onset who were at that moment alive—pictured as "spirits" beside the persons photographed.

I rushed into Carr's studio. He smiled at my excitement, saying, "I mean to expose these bogus spirit photographers as it is a trick; so I took your photograph and some other ladies' photographs and transferred them to plates which I later used in taking some person's pictures, with the result that I have produced the same spirit pictures 'materialized' by these fraudulent gentry. It is easily done. Sure enough, when he showed me the modus operandi I saw that it was a PALPABLE TRICK, and I went to say to the credulous, when you go to get a spirit picture taken, take your own plate along and get your chum to keep an eye on it; then you will see how many spirit faces will appear on the picture." I doubt if there is such a thing as genuine spirit photography. Anyhow, it did not take the "spirit artists" long to decide which was their best move, after Carr had filled his windows with "spirit" photographs. They stole silently from the Onset precincts and deemed it mighty "bad medicine" in future to invade its domain.

How we laughed as we saw them disappear on their way.

"This demonstrates to me that the spirits can take solids to the spirit world," says this much-befogged teller of great stories. But facts would not bear out his statement. DOES HE PRETEND TO SAY THAT HIS MORTAL BODY COULD BE CARRIED INTO THE SPIRIT WORLD? IT IS SOLID MATTER, LIKE HATS, DOLLS AND DRESSES, AND IF THE LATTER IS TAKEN THERE, SO ALSO MAY MORTAL BODIES. White hats, stockings and white shoes—yes, and white elephants, too—one is as feasible as the other!

Spiritualists believe that there are no literal fires (solid) in the spiritual world, but only their counterpart. Hell is a condemning conscience and heaven a state of harmony surrounding the soul—all these psychic qualities, together with spirit, are ethereal and, essentially, and naught but psychic qualities of a like nature can exist there. Hats, shoes and dolls are too grossly organized to be taken to the spiritual realm: Their spiritual counterpart might exist there, in ghostly, effervescent state, but as for the solid, material objects themselves—impossible.

Matter belongs to the earth; it can EXIST NOWHERE ELSE. Spiritual law in the spiritual world utterly repudiates the statement that earthly toggery may exist there—THIS PSYCHIC LAW FORBIDS IT. The law of correspondence effectually relegates every form of matter to the earthly plane where it belongs and affirms that SPIRITUAL QUALITIES ONLY, SHALL EXIST IN A SPIRITUAL WORLD.

Vain are assertions of the hoodwinked to the contrary—eternal principles of the psychic domain have settled the subject for all time. Any so-called deviation from this rule is the result of deception and trickery, and any person who believes it has closed the avenues of his being to COMMON SENSE AND REASON, AND MUST PRACTICALLY BELIEVE THAT IF HATS, DRESSES AND DOLLS CAN BE TAKEN TO THE SPIRIT WORLD, SO ALSO CAN STOVES, FURNITURE, HOUSES, WHOLE VILLAGES IN FACT—AND THE EARTH ITSELF FOR THAT MATTER, THUS SETTING ASIDE THE IMMUTABLE LAWS WHICH GOVERN IT.

The Mediums' Home School and "Silver Chain" Developing Circle.

To the Editor:—Permit us to state to your many readers that it is now nearly ten years since the angel world first communicated to their plan and scope for a Mediums' Home School and "Silver Chain" Developing Circle (a circle-at-large). During these ten years many obstacles have retarded the more complete materialization of the plan and scope suggested, yet we are glad to announce that these obstacles are now successfully overcome, and the work is happily going forward. The object of this Home School and circle-at-large is to promote spiritual, intellectual, physical and social welfare and progress of the students and members, and others whom its influence may be able to reach, giving spiritual culture and mediumistic unfoldment and special prominence, with a view to a more complete realization of the grand truths of our philosophy, science and religion, thus building up and cultivating better mediumistic conditions and encouraging mutual helpfulness in the spirit of fraternal kindness. The present status of our cause demands earnest effort along these lines.

We must raise our standard, and qualify our spiritual representatives in the field (those who may need our aid) to more properly represent our cause in the arena of public thought and advancement, to present our claims logically and forcefully before the contending armies of organized superstition, intolerance and oppression. Our "foes" must be met on the battlefield of the mind, and our "army" must be equipped with pure and irresistible logic and demonstration, if the battle is won.

In the establishment of a mediums' home and school we shall secure conditions by means of which we can extend the hand of helpfulness to those struggling for the attainments that shall fit them for service in the great field of progress.

A vast deal of mediumistic aptitude goes to waste all over the land for want of a little guidance and co-operation. In supplying this guidance and in kindly co-operating with those who are aspiring to advance in mediumship and spiritual culture, the mutual co-operation of many great and fertile opportunities to advance its claims.

True education in spiritual science breathes a higher significance into the experiences of life, and furnishes the mind with nobler reflections and purer aims. Every sincere and progressive medium and co-operator with the spirit world, in advancing the spiritual welfare of mankind, becomes a radiating energy, and beneficent light, spreading its countless rays in all directions. His (or her) enlightened thought, touching some congenial mind in his associations at home or abroad, is woven telepathically into the very substance of that kindred soul, and affects, more or less permanently, its course in life—changing the less spiritual ideas and purposes to those of greater spiritual power and usefulness to mankind. And this individual may, in turn, help scores of others out of their limitations of thought and mental bondage, up to a higher and broader plane, where life's shadows are beneath their feet, instead of above and around them, and where the dignity of human nature can assert itself in every relation of life.

Thus will the intellectual and spiritual heaven do its work; thus may we enable the angel world to express itself more fully and more truly in its communication to mortals, and practically establish, by mutual co-operation, the gospel of Peace on Earth! To carry forward this work as it deserves, and as the angel world designed, in its message to us ten years ago, requires more co-operation and support from the general Spiritualist public than we have had in the past. Nevertheless, we have confidence in those advanced minds in spirit life, who originated this movement, that they will find ways and means to sustain and advance it as time passes. We would be glad, however, to hear from all who feel an interest, either as students or benefactors. Address, with stamp for reply: Mediums' Home School, 651 South Grant street, Springfield, Mo. J. THE DAYLIGHT DIES.

A fading gleam of color shines—Between the dull cloud's broken gray. A purple pall, in misty lines Shrugs the soft passing of the day; A single star blooms in the West, Pale blossoms of those garden skies, And with this flower upon her breast The Daylight dies.

Brief day! And yet thy fleeting hours Seemed an eternity to me. While still another sighed to see The last rays of thy setting sun: Souls have been born and Death hath reaped— Oh, union sweet! Oh, broken ties! The page is turned, the book is closed, The daylight dies.

Trees and Plants Have Eyes.

Full fifty years ago a labored article went the rounds of the press claiming vegetable life is immortal; that it was sensitive to injury, and suffered pain when wounded or destroyed.

Prof. Haberlandt, of the University of Graz, Austria, who has acquired world-wide celebrity by his researches in plant life, now announces he has discovered the whole vegetable world has organs of vision. They are located in the leaf, near the stem, and are useful in adjusting themselves to light.

Who has not observed the intelligence of the climbing vine in its efforts to reach some object to which it desires to cling? Remove that object and the direction of the ascending vine will be found changed the next day. We have noticed this frequently, and wondered how it was possible the brainless and eyeless thing took cognizance of the removal of the object it was ambitious to reach.

Prof. H. declares these eyes, whether on plant or tree, have eyelashes to shield the organ from injury, closing down to shut out an excess of light, or to ward off injury by rain or dust. He claims the eyes are larger in highly developed, rapid growing and in tropical plants than in those of slower growth.

Animal, vegetable and even mineral life seem closely interlinked, and each is somewhat dependent on its fellow for existence. The writer has observed in caverns semblance of vines creeping along the wall which was in fact a part of the rock, with stentorian and angry pushing themselves forward as if endowed with life. And had they eyes? And shall we meet them "over there"? Who knows?

As Dryden Viewed Sectarians.

Chancing the other day to open to Dryden's "Religio Laici," and reading his preface to the poem of that name, we were astonished to find his bitter expressions against sectarians, which we copy:

"Thus sectaries, we may see, were born with teeth, well-mouthed sectaries, from that infantancy; and if spiritual pride, venom, violence, contempt of superiors, and slander, had been the marks of orthodox belief; the presbytery and the rest of our schismatics, which are their spawn, were always the most visible Church in the Christian world."

Dryden was born in England in 1631, and died in 1700. Here is another quotation from that preface too true to lose:

"Wherever that discipline [Calvinism] was planted and embraced, rebellion, civil war, and misery attended it. And how, indeed, should it happen otherwise? For the sectaries, the people of God, which it is the interest of their preachers to tell them are, and it is to their interest to so believe. After that they cannot dip into the Bible but one text or other will turn up for their purpose. If they are under persecution, as they call it, then that is a mark of their election. If they flourish, then God works miracles for their deliverance, and the saints are to possess the earth."

There has been no change, unless for the worse, with "sectaries" since Dryden's time.

Naughty Tell-Tale Ruins.

A late press dispatch from London says:

"Arthur Evans, the famous archaeologist, who has been for years in Greece, making excavations in the ruins of the palace of Minos, at Gnosso, and the remnants of a small sanctuary which gives evident proof that the cross was worshipped in some parts of the world 2,000 years before Jesus."

Remnants of a building at least 3,000 years old, have revealed a series of chambers in which many articles of domestic life have been found. In a small subterranean chamber Evans found the furniture of a small chamber, and encased in a wall of the room a marble cross of the form now used in Catholic churches. Several small statues in earthenware stood at the foot of the cross, surrounded by many votive offerings. One of the statues represented a goddess, and two others her servants.

The cross was used as a religious emblem many centuries before our era. It appears on all the ancient obelisks in Egypt. The Spaniards found it in Peru, and in Central America on their first arrival. The wonder has been and is, how it became known by the ancient civilizations in this country.

The Past Lies Before Us.

Very different is the habit of modern Christian nations from that of the ancient Romans, or, in fact, from that of any government of antiquity respecting religious toleration of conflicting ideas.

We quote from Mosheim's "Historical Commentaries on the State of Christianity," Vol. 1, p. 14:

"This diversity of gods, and of religious worship, was never known to generate animosity, or kindle the flames of war between nations, except in one solitary instance of the Egyptians; and considerable doubt may be entertained whether even in this case a difference of religion alone was the cause of strife. Each nation readily conceded to others the right of forming their own opinions, and judging for themselves, in matters of religious concern; and left them, both in the choice of their deities, and their mode of worshipping them, to be guided by whatever principles they might think proper to adopt."

How very different became the practice so soon as the dominant religion was adopted! Wars for the propagation of the faith became general. A heathen had no rights a Christian should respect; and all were heathen who did not accept the story of the dream-begotten God, who was born of a virgin, and yet was eternal with his infinite Father. Nation after nation was overwhelmed by invading Christian armies and subordinated to the cross. Only those whose attention has been directed to this subject, and whose researches in history have been along those lines can have any just conception of this frightful wrong. Creeds, formulated in monasteries by cloistered monks, were forced on nations by the sword, and at the cannon's mouth. Whole districts were depopulated; the inhabitants, men, women and children going down in blood, that the banner of the cross should wave over a land of desolation.

One extract from numerous pages in the same direction, from "Alberger's Antiquity of Christianity," pages 19, 20, shall illustrate our point. We quote:

"Prussia, invulnerable to the secret machinations of the Holy See, and ungated by the ferocity of the military apostles of Christ, had resisted the proffers of salvation and heaven with such resolute heroism, that it threw Pope Honorius (about 1220) into such a paroxysm of rage that he publicly called Christendom to arms, in order to proselyte by military force the obstinate Pagans. A calamitous war ensued. The Pagans determined to exhaust the resources of defense; the Christians, the means of subjugation. The arts of destruction were mutually applied with consummate skill; towns were swept from existence; communities massacred; blood flowed in reeking torrents. Pagans accepted death rather than baptism; and all the havoc and horrors of which war is pregnant were protracted in their most terrific forms for fifty-six years. The carnage of the fierce conflict was so enormous that, at length, it had so nearly depopulated the Prussian territory and extinguished the prospect of victory against the army and resources of united Christendom that they concluded to accept the gospel rather than total extinction."

"Livonia Courland and Semagalia, not having perceived the superiority of the Gospel to Paganism, by the example, teaching and logic of the missionary monks, the Pope resolved to quicken their superstitions, by the application of a military crusade. The order of Sacred Sword Bearer (see Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 14, p. 724), was hence formed under his instructions, and the army of Christ, so organized, entered the domains of the idolaters and covered them with carnage and death. Berthold, the military bishop, at the head of the saints, perished in hand fighting the Pagans to make them believe in Jesus. For a hundred years this war was waged with unmitigated ferocity. The heavier armament and greater military resources of the Sacred Sword Bearers, at length, convinced the obstinate Pagans that resistance to the demands of the Pope and the gospel would inevitably involve their nationality in extinction; and, listening to the counsels of prudence rather than of pride and patriotism, they consented to believe in Jesus and be baptized."

"The duke of Lithuania, being oppressed by the Teutonic Knights, and proffered a crown by the Pope, if he would believe the gospel, yielded to the admonitions of danger and interest. But no sooner had he been relieved from fear of the one, and endowed with the gift of the other, than he fell from grace. Having, in the meantime, however, prudently made himself too formidable to be convinced of his error by any warlike demonstration, he permitted to indulge his Pagan proclivities without molestation; but in the successive vicissitudes of 150 years, his kingdom becoming weakened by dissension and bad policy, and harassed by the Teutonic Knights, consented through papal overtures to become Christians, to prevent the consummation of a coalition in process of negotiation between the Teutonic Knights and the Sacred Sword Bearer, for the utter extinction of their race and nationality."

"Although the monks imposed on their Pagan converts the easy task of submitting to baptism, and of substituting in their devotions the names of the Christian deities for those of the Pagan mythology, yet even in this accommodated form, they received Christianity with a shudder, coldly professed its creed, and reluctantly disguised their Pagan piety."

It has been urged we have nothing to do with the past; that the future is before us, and that that we should guard with care. Such objectors forget that we learn of the future by that which we learn of the past. It is a maxim, "History repeats itself." Restore the successors of all the tyrants of the Christian ages to power, and every excess the former were guilty of will be repeated with even greater violence; for they will allow none to survive the question of their authority."

Hate Is Not Love.

Is not "the Christ principle of love" a misnomer? The clergy claim Jesus was the prince of peace, and endow him with all the noble virtues; but there is the "Inerrant Bible" that relates a different tale.

"I came not to send peace, but a sword," is not the language of a peace maker, and yet, Matthew 10:34, reports Jesus as using these words followed by—

"For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; and a man's foes shall be of his own household. He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me."

And as for the love Jesus taught, it was the very opposite. Open to Luke 14:26 and read—

"If any man come to me, and HATE not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."
