PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THIS work is the result of many years' study of the History, Antiquities, and Prophecies, respecting the principal nations recorded in the Bible; namely, the Hebrews, Israelites, and Jews, the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Egyptians, the Medes and Persians, the Grecians and Romans, the Saracens and Turks.

It was originally suggested, by the frequent interruptions and embarrassments experienced by the author in his Historical Researches, from the imperfection and discordance of the Chronological systems of the Jews, Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Lloyd, Marsham, Newton, Jackson, &c. which he found utterly insufficient to adjust and harmonise the leading dates of Sacred and Profane History; all of them differing from each other, more or less, in the principles upon which they were founded, and in the application of these principles; sometimes adjusting Sacred by Profane Chronology, sometimes the reverse, without any settled rule or standard.

Finding it impossible to extract from these systems any uniform scheme which could render Sacred History consistent with itself, and with the great range of Profane History connected therewith, he endeavoured to trace the subject to its original sources, and to explore the most ancient records, chronicles, and fragments still extant, and the earliest Historians and Chronologers; namely, the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew Texts; the Vatican and Alexandrine Greek Versions; the works of Josephus, Theophilus, Eusebius, Syncellus, Abulfaragi, and Eutychius; the Greek and Latin Historians, Herodotus, Xenophon, Diodorus Siculus, Ctesias, Justin, &c.; the fragments of Sanchoniatho, Berosus, and Manetho, respecting the Phœnician, Chaldean, and Egyptian antiquities, and the Hindu records published in the Asiatic Researches.

His first attempt was to examine carefully the principles upon which the reigning systems were built, in order to seek a solid foundation for a general system. This led him into a minute investigation of the evidences for and against the longer and shorter computations of the Patriarchal generations from Adam to Abraham, found in the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew Texts, in the Greek Version, and in Josephus; and the result was, a conviction of the untenableness of the shorter computation, which he discovered to have been first fabricated by the Jews, about the time of the publication of the Seder Olam Rabba, their great system of Chronology, in A.D. 130.

His next attempt was to retrieve the genuine Chronology of Josephus, many of whose leading dates had been adulterated by his early editors, in order to make them correspond with the Jewish system, which unfortunately was too soon adopted by several of the primitive Christian writers. And at length, by repeated trials, amidst the mass of spurious dates that pervade his works at present, he found a few genuine ones, which led to the discovery of his original system ; a system which he flatters himself is now established by a connected chain of analytical and synthetical argument, shewing the conformity of the general outline, with the particular periods that compose it, in detail ; and also, by its agreement with that of the first Christian Chronologer, Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, in A.D. 168, according to the representation of Abulfaragi, the celebrated Armenian annalist. And the rectified era of the Creation, B.C. 5411, furnished by both conjointly, forms the basis of the present system ; which, if it be found just in its principles, and correct in its construction, will, he trusts, reconcile Sacred and Profane Chronology together more satisfactorily than any that has been hitherto submitted to the inspection of the learned.

The usual arrangement of the received systems of Chronology seemed also to require emendation. Those of Petavius, Usher, Prideaux, &c. exhibit an intermixture of Sacred and Profane History, a variety of controversial discussions, and of elaborate digressions, which tend to render their works prolix and perplexing to readers who might wish to confine their attention to one branch of Chronology at a time, and to acquire a clear and connected view of Sacred by itself, and of the several branches of Profane by themselves. He has therefore treated of each branch separately. To simplify the subject still more, he has thrown into a copious Introduction matters merely of a controversial nature, as far as could be effected ; and has there discussed the present state of Chronology, the evidences for and against the shorter Hebrew and longer Greek computations, the defects of the reigning systems, and the rectification of those of Josephus and Theophilus.

As a previous Apparatus necessary for Chronological computation, he has annexed to the Introduction, Elements of Technical Chronology, explaining the usual measures of time, days, weeks, months, years, &c. employed by different nations; a correcter standard of reigns and generations founded upon extensive observation of their mean lengths; the principal eclipses noticed in history, which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem; the leading epochs, eras, and periods, used in Sacred and Profane Chronology, and the principles upon which they are adjusted; a new translation and correction of the Chronicle engraved on the Arundelian or Parian marbles, and a discovery of two different principles of computation employed therein; a vindication of the admirable Canon, incorrectly supposed to have been originally framed by Ptolomy, &c.

To this Apparatus of Technical Chronology, it was found necessary to add a Geographical Apparatus, in order to remedy the imperfection or incorrectness of the explanations of Sacred Geography given by Wells, Cellarius, Reland, &c. in several material points; such as the universality and course of the deluge; the passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites; their stations or encampments in the deserts of Arabia Petraea, from the time of their exode from Egypt, till their arrival in the land of Canaan; according to Bishop Clayton's Map and explanation; a more correct Map of the city of Jerusalem, and its environs, &c. with a variety of miscellaneous remarks on subjects of importance, which had been originally inserted in the body of the work, but are now detached from thence, not to interrupt the reader's attention from the main course of the argument.

Sacred Chronology, which forms the first and most important branch, and furnishes the standard, by reference to which all the rest have been adjusted, is divided into distinct periods of time, reaching from the Creation of the World to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Under each period, is given a general outline of the history, and of the principal Chronological prophecies, respecting the descent and advents of CHRIST, from the original promise given to our first parents, and afterwards more distinctly and circumstantially revealed to succeeding prophets, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Balaam, Nathan, David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, &c. until their last and fullest revelation by OUR LORD and his Apostles. Indeed, to delineate the outline of the grand prophetic period of 2300 days, foretold by the Prophet Daniel, which includes the fortunes of the Jewish Church, (and of the Christian also), from Nehemiah's reformation of the Jewish polity, to its final restoration at the end of the desolation; intimated likewise in several other prophecies yet unfulfilled; was the author's chief motive for devoting so much of his time and attention to these studies.

Of Profane Chronology, the Assyrian, from its remote antiquity, and early connection with Holy Writ, first solicits attention. In this the author acknowledges his obligations to the works of the learned Mr. Jackson, for the sagacious distinction between the first and second Belus, of whom the former seems to have been the Nimrod of Scripture, and the Ninus of the Greeks, who founded the Assyrian empire; and between the second Belus and the second Ninus, of Ctesias, and Justin, the refounder of the Assyrian monarchy. He is also indebted to Dr. Gillies, in his recent History of the World, from Alexander to Augustus, for a judicious correction of the received Assyrian Chronology, by reducing the number of kings from Ninus II. to Sardanapalus, and the duration of their reigns, to nearly half the amount of each found in the extravagant list of Ctesias. A reduction warranted by the surer authorities of Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and more conformable to SCRIPTURE. And the Scriptural dynasty of the Assyrian kings is explained and adjusted to that of the Babylonian kings, by means of Ptolomy's Canon; while the erroneous supposition is exposed, of a double capture of Nineveh, unskillfully adopted from Ctesias, by modern Chronologers, Petavius, Usher, &c.

The Chaldean, or Babylonian Chronology, which follows the Assyrian in the order of time, is here rectified, by a careful comparison of the varying accounts of Sacred and Profane History, now attempted to be reconciled and adjusted to each other, chiefly by the help of Ptolomy's Canon; in which a slight error, of two years in defect, in the short reigns of Ilverodamus and Nericassolassar, or the Evilmerodach and Belshazzar of Scripture, is compensated by an equal and opposite error of two years in excess, committed in the reign of Cyrus: and by this simple rectification of the Canon, joined to that fortunate discovery of Jackson, that the death of Belshazzar preceded the capture of Babylon, by Cyrus, no less than seventeen years, this perplexed and intricate period is, he trusts, more clearly explained, and upon surer grounds, than has been hitherto effected.

In the Median and Persian Chronology, which follows next in order, the transition of empire from the Medes to the Persians, is shewn, not, according to the relation of Herodotus, by the dethronement of Astyages, by his grandson, Cyrus the Great, but by peaceable inheritance; the crown naturally descending from Cyaxares, the son and successor of Astyages, who is called "Darius the Mede," by Scripture, in defect of issue male, to his nephew and son-in-law, Cyrus; and this, he trusts, is satisfactorily proved from the joint testimony of Daniel, Æschylus, and Xenophon; and the intricate and perplexed Median Chronology of Herodotus, is also adjusted, by means of the celebrated Eclipse of Thales, which now appears to have happened B.C. 603, rather than in any other of the years that have been assigned by Historians and Chronologers.

The birth of Cyrus, and his succession to the thrones of Persia, Media, and Babylon, form the leading dates, by reference to which the whole scheme of Sacred and Profane Chronology is regulated. They are here determined from the Chronology of Eclipses, and the foregoing rectification of Ptolomy's Canon. And the seventy years of the Babylonian Captivity, counted from the first invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, until the return of the Jews, in consequence of the decree of Cyrus, after the reduction of Babylon, are here determined, he hopes, with a precision that will preclude further controversy on this much contested subject.

is introduced, on account of the conquest of the kingdom of Lydia by Cyrus; and it is here adjusted by means of the Eclipse of Thales; an astronomical character of the highest importance indeed, which serves to connect the Babylonian, Median, Lydian, Scythian, Egyptian, and Grecian Chronology.

To the Persian, succeeded the Macedonian, or Grecian dynasty, when Alexander the Great conquered "Darius the Persian," or Codomannus, at the decisive battle of Arbela. The Chronology of this period is of great consequence to the elucidation of Daniel's famous prophecy of the seventy weeks, by shewing that "the fourth king," from the time of its commencement, who was "far richer" than his predecessors, was no other than the last Darius, whose immense wealth, and the spoils taken by Alexander, are recorded by the Greek and Latin Historians.

The Macedo-Grecian was succeeded, in the east, by the Parthian, and by the Persian dynasties, in continuation. The two last are usually confounded together, by the Greek and Latin classic authors, because they equally maintained the balance of power against the formidable Roman Empire in the west. Their chronology is extremely embarrassed.

These were succeeded by the Saracen, and by the Turkish dynasties, in continuation. The rise, conquests, and persecutions of these fierce and bigotted fanatics, under the symbolical representation of locusts, during the fifth and sixth trumpets, or first and second woes, are described in the Apocalypse.

The Egyptian Chronology, which has been hitherto considered as inexplicable, will here, it is hoped, receive considerable light from a careful comparison of the original records and fragments still extant ; and the old Egyptian Chronicle, the mutilated dynasties of Manetho, recorded by Josephus, Julius Africanus, and Eusebius ; the imperfect list of Theban, or Egyptian kings, furnished by Eratosthenes, and the complete list of Egyptian kings formed by Syncellus, from documents subsisting in his age, by their combined evidence, have enabled him, he trusts, to fill up, with a considerable degree of probability, the correct, but scanty outline of the Egyptian Chronology of Herodotus, in perfect conformity with SCRIPTURE ; and to detect the falsity of the system ostentatiously obtruded on the world as the genuine system of Herodotus, in the voluminous French translation and notes of Larcher, whose Canon of Egyptian Chronology, he conceives, is equally repugnant to Herodotus, to Egyptian History, and to HOLY WRIT ; furnishing but one correct date from beginning to end ; namely, the accession of Sethon, Priest of Vulcan, B.C. 713.

Such is a brief sketch of a work, the composition of which has engrossed the author's attention for many years ; and he now submits it to the Public, with an humble hope, that it will prove not unacceptable to the learned, nor unprofitable to younger students, not only in Sacred, but also in Profane Literature.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE public approbation of this work, evinced by the sale of the first edition, and the encreasing demand for it, have encouraged the Author to prepare a new and more perfect edition; in the first Volume of which, the following alterations, corrections, and improvements have been made.

1. A new arrangement of the branches of Chronology: the Technical now preceding the Historical, in its proper order.

2. In the review of the leading systems of Historical Chronology, the Irish system of Gildas Coemhain, in the year A.D. 1072, nearly agreeing with Scaliger's, is introduced; forming an honourable proof of the ancient and scientific literature of Ireland, before its connexion with England.

3. The era of the Hegira, or flight of Mahomet from Mecca, A.D. 622, so useful and necessary in reading the Oriental Historians, is now inserted from Playfair's Chronology, with some material corrections, and in an improved form.

4. An amended description of Paradise, or the Garden of Eden, in which its most probable site is shewn, not to have been in Babylonia, as before supposed, but in Armenia; somewhere in the vicinity of the present heads or springs of the Euphrates and Tigris.

5. Noah's Prophecy of the fortunes of the three primitive families of his sons, Gen. ix. 20—27, more correctly explained than before, according to the learned Mr. Faber, who has ably exposed the insufficiency of the received interpretation.

6. A more critical explanation of that venerable geographical chart of Moses, Gen. x. chiefly from Faber.

7. The route pursued by the three primitive families, in their migration from the original settlement in Armenia, along the course of the Euphrates, to Shinar, according to Mr. Penn's ingenious explanation; and the universal confusion of tongues at Babel.

8. A correction and enlargement of the former account of the Pyramids of Egypt, collected from the recent discoveries of Davison, Belzoni, Caviglia, &c., recorded in the Quarterly Review, in which they are proved to have been designed for sepulchral monuments, not water temples consecrated to the Nile, as supposed before.

9. To the received accounts of Jerusalem, and its environs, from Sandys, Maundrell, &c. are now added some interesting observations of that universal and intelligent traveller, Dr. Clarke, from actual observation, and upon strong historical ground; questioning the validity of the supposed sites of the Holy Sepulchre, and of the Mount of Corruption; and conjecturing that the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea is rather to be sought in the sepulchral caves at the base of the latter; which he conceives to be the true Mount Sion, from the Greek inscription, ΤΗC ΑΓΙΑC CΙΩΝ, “Of the Holy Sion,” found thereon. And that Mount Olivet is the true Mount of Corruption, whereon Solomon built temples to Baal Peor, Moloch, and Ashtoreth, from the curious discovery of a conical cavern on the middle top of the Mount, unnoticed by former travellers.

10. A critical explanation of St. Paul’s voyage from Cæsarea to Puteoli, and proof that the island of Melite, on which he was shipwrecked, was not the island of Malta, as generally supposed, but Meleda, in the Adriatic Gulph, from the learned and ingenious Dissertation of Dr. Falconer, the physician, of Bath.

Notwithstanding all the Author’s anxiety and assiduity to correct mistakes, and to procure fuller and correcter information; yet, in a work of such variety and compass, he cannot pretend to perfection, nor to guard against those errors and failures, incident to human nature, and to advanced age; in which the wisest are apt to “slumber and sleep,” even in the most important and earnest pursuits, if long protracted.

Quæ parum cavit natura humana, Aliquando dormitans opere in longo.

TECHNICAL CHRONOLOGY.

CHRONOLOGY is the regulation and preservation of facts.

STOIC.

I. ELEMENTS

TECHNICAL CHRONOLOGY.

CHRONOLOGY in general, or “the Computation of Times,” (as the original implies) may be divided into two species, Technical and Historical.

Technical Chronology is the art of computing the several measures of time, natural or instituted, used by historians to record facts, in their Fasti, Calendars, or Chronicles. And these are, Days, Weeks, Months, Years, Generations, Reigns, Eclipses, Canons, and Cycles. This species is founded in Astronomy and the course of Nature; and therefore admits of proof derived from the known laws of motion in the Mundane System, and the doctrine of Probabilities.

Historical Chronology is the art of computing, adjusting, and verifying the whole range of dates furnished by historians, according to certain cardinal Epochs, Eras, and Periods of time, so as to reduce the whole, if possible, to one entire uniform and consistent system; in which sacred and profane history shall be brought to harmonize or correspond with each other.

This is a much more difficult process than the former; because the data afforded by sacred and profane history, in general, are frequently obscure, imperfect, mutilated, or corrupted in process of time, or length of ages, either by decay, accident, or design. The restriction, therefore, “if possible,” is necessary, because the subject does not admit of rigid demonstration, but only of an approximation to truth, more or less near, according to the nature of the data, the correctness of the principles, and the skill with which they are applied.

Technical Chronology, as forming the basis of Historical, requires that its several Measures of Time should be previously explained. And a critical explanation of these will contribute much to the right understanding and illustration of sacred and profane classic authors.

Before we consider these measures, it will be necessary to explain the various modes of used in different nations.

Originally, Numbers were expressed by their names at full length. Thus, the venerable Registry of the Antediluvian Patriarchs, Gen. v. 18, “And Jared lived two and sixty years, and a hundred years, and begat Enoch: and Jared lived after he begat Enoch, eight hundred years, and begat sons and daughters: and all the days of Jared were two and sixty years, and nine hundred years, and he died.” Here, according to the original, the order of Notation is in an ascending series, Units, Tens, Hundreds, &c. contrary to the modern European mode. The same prevailed also among the ancient Greeks; the expedition against Troy was undertaken, τρεις και δεκατου ετους, “the three and tenth year of the reign of Menestheus,” according to the primitive notation of the Parian Chronicle; which was also adopted in our language, “the thirteenth,” fourteenth, &c.

The first numeral characters, or symbols, were the letters of the alphabet, in the order of succession. Thus, the several stanzas of the 119th Psalm, were marked by the Hebrew letters, Aleph 1, Beth 2, Gimel 3, &c. This was probably the most ancient mode.

The first improvement in alphabetical notation, was the Decimal division, or arrangement: the first nine letters expressing the digits, 1, 2, 3, &c., the tenth, 10, the eleventh, 20, the twelfth, 30, &c.

The next was raising the value of the numeral letters in a decuple proportion, by accents, or marks, attached to the letters; thus, א̇ denoted 1000; and sometimes the word at length, אֶלֶף; the plural אֶלְפִים, denoted 2000, אֶלְפִים ג̇, 3000, &c.

This was followed by arbitrary marks, or symbols, for particular numbers, as among the Greeks, Ϡ, for 900, &c.

The last and grandest improvement, was the rejection of numeral letters, and introduction of specific symbols, in the nine digits, 1, 2, 3, &c.; and the cypher, 0, raising their value in a decuple progression, 10, 100, 1000, &c.

For simplicity, variety, and compass, this surely may rank among the noblest discoveries of human sagacity; if we attribute it thereto, and not rather to THE FATHER OF LIGHTS, the original Author of language, oral and written; from whom ultimately proceed "every good gift, and every perfect grace." And most justly did Abulfaragi eulogize the Indian discoverers, as Fodina Sapientiæ, "a pit of wisdom!"—How it was possible indeed for the Ancients to carry on such long arithmetical computations, as we find in the Bible, Herodotus, Manetho, Josephus, &c., by the help of such awkward, complicated, and embarrassed a mode of Notation as by numeral letters, is not easy to be conceived at the present day by those who are accustomed to the facility and dispatch of the Indian symbols. Their arithmetic must necessarily have been a species of algebraic calculation, such as we find in the problems of Diophantus, about the commencement of the Christian Era; and such as must have been used before him, by Hipparchus and Archimedes.

The following Table, XXI, exhibits the various numeral characters, and modes of Notation, employed by different nations. It will be found fuller, and more correct, than that of Beverege, which he calls Aurea Tabella, from its great utility in ancient numeration, p. 279, &c.

I. VULGAR NOTATION.

Of the several columns composing this Table, the first on the left hand represents the usual mode of reckoning, as far as one hundred thousand; the succeeding columns represent the Indian, which was the parent of our Notation, the Hebrew, Samaritan, Syriac, Arabic, the Greek, both by small letters and uncials, and the Roman. Our digits are evidently derived from the Indian, though with considerable variation in some. The cypher 0 was an improvement upon the Indian point, as being more conspicuous or legible, which we owe to the Arabian Astronomers.

II. INDIAN.

The characters here exhibited are such as occur in the writing of the principal Geographers, Astronomers, and Chronologers of the East. Thus, Ulug Bey, that learned Persian prince, who flourished about A. D. 1440, represents the Greek Epoch as longer than the Arabian, by $\text{כ} \text{ף} \cdot \text{v} \cdot \text{ו}$ or 340700 days. See Beverege Chron. p. 291.

III. HEBREW. IV. SAMARITAN.

The Hebrew column is expressed in the Chaldee alphabet, which was introduced after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish Captivity, and perhaps by Ezra the Scribe. The primitive Hebrew character, such as it appears on ancient shekels, differed considerably from the Chaldee; and was the prototype, evidently, of the rude Samaritan character, which it greatly surpassed in symmetry and elegance. See the collection of sacred shekels, in the Apparatus prefixed to the first volume of the London Polyglott Bible, that noblest specimen of the Typographic art, as well as the most useful; p. 38.

In the primitive Hebrew notation, Iod י denoted 10; whence by composition, יא 10 + 1 = 11, יב 10 + 2 = 12, &c. Instead of יה, 10 + 5 = 15, the Jews, to avoid profaning the sacred name IAH, substituted יז, 9 + 6 = 15. Here was a remarkable deviation from the most ancient mode, corresponding to our's, of placing the number 10 before the digits; and the same prevails in the higher numbers, יקא 100 + 1 = 101; יקב, 102, &c. יאא, 401, יאב, 402, &c. יתק 400 + 100 = 500; יתת 400 + 400 = 800; יתתק 400 + 400 + 100 = 900.

The Jews afterwards expressed the five centenary numbers after 400 by the five final letters of the Chaldee alphabet, Caph כ, 500; Mem מ, 600, &c.

To express thousands, the letters begin again, either with marks over them, or their value determined by their place in the decimal progression: as, יתתל^{||}, 1000 + 400 + 30 = 1430; יהרמב, 5000 + 400 + 40 + 2 = 5442.

V. SYRIAC.

The Syriac alphabet, agreeing with the Hebrew and Samaritan, in the number and order of its letters, the mode of notation is the same, with some slight variations. Thus, 1. The number 15, is expressed by the numerals 10 and 5; because the Hebrew name of God, IAH, was not used in Syriac. 2. The number 20, is expressed by a double Caph, the initial and final; yet so as that the final Caph is removed in the succeeding 21, 22, &c. and the proper literal digit is substituted. The same reduplication prevails in the number 50 and 70, 500 and 700. The value of the digits is also raised, in the decimal scale, by a point over the letter, raising the tens to hundreds; and the hundreds to thousands, by a point under the letter. Myriads, by a horizontal stroke under the letter.

VI. ARABIC.

The Arabic alphabet at present in use, differs widely from the primitive Arabic, or Cufic alphabet, in the number and order of its letters. The change was made by Ibn Mocla, in the tenth century.

The Cufic corresponded with the Syriac, from which it was evidently derived. The present alphabet is miserably deranged, both in the number and order of the letters, several new ones being added thereto; while the old ones, notwithstanding their dislocation, retain their primitive values in the Syriac or Hebrew alphabet, thus incontestibly demonstrating their common descent from the primæval alphabet; as will appear more plainly from their names and powers.

Arabic Numerals.

Alif, 1; Be, 2; Ta, 400; Tha, 500; Gim, 3; Hha, 8; Cha, 600; Dal, 4; Dhsal, 700; Re, 200; Za, 7; Sin, 60; Shin, 300; Sad, 90; Dad, 800; Ta, 9; Da, 900; Ain, 70; Gain, 1000; Fe, 80; Kaf, 100; Kef, 20; Lam, 30; Mim, 40; Nun, 50; Wau, 6; He, 5; Ie, or Ya, 10.

Hence it appears, that of these twenty-eight letters, only the two first, corresponding to Aleph and Beth, retain their proper place and value. The third letter, Ta, corresponding to Thau, the last of the Hebrew alphabet, still retains its primitive value; while the tenth Hebrew letter, Iod, is here thrust down to the last place, in Ie, or Ya, still retaining its primitive value, 10; and so on of the rest of the primitive letters.

In the column of Arabic numerals, I have only set down the first of the three complicated forms of the Arabic letters, at the beginning, middle, and end of words; but the three forms are used indiscriminately, which tends to create great confusion and embarrassment in their notation; of which Beverege furnishes some curious and involved specimens, remarkably resembling the algebraic notation; in one of which, a large number is made up of the following parts: $400 + 60 + 2 \times 1000 \times 1000$:

+ $\overline{30 + 5} \times 1000$: + 900 + 90 + 6 = 462,035,996 ; as I found out by decyphering the original, p. 326.

VII. VIII. GREEK.

The Greek alphabet was originally derived from the Phœnician, or Syriac ; and retains the names and powers of the letters, with some slight variation. To preserve the analogy of notation, three additional symbols were introduced, in the seventh column, to supply the place of certain Syriac letters wanting in the Greek alphabet. 1. Επισημον Bav, “the symbol Bav,” ς , to supply the place of Vau, 6. 2. Κοππα, the symbol ζ , 90, corresponding to the Syriac Koph, reversed. 3. Σαν Πι, or the symbol ϑ , 900 ; derived from the Samaritan Tsade reversed ; and so denominated, perhaps, from the letter San, or Sigma reversed, including the letter Pi. This former symbol, ζ , is sometimes represented differently, β , 90.

As far as 100, the Hebrew and Greek letters correspond in their values : above it, the Greek got one step in advance. Resh in Hebrew, and Sigma in Greek, denote 200.

To denote thousands, &c. the letters recur again, and their values are determined by their place. Thus, $\rho\beta\varsigma$, signifies 196 ; $\beta\vartheta\kappa\gamma\frac{\alpha}{\beta}$, 2923 $\frac{1}{2}$. The last instance strongly resembles the algebraic notation of fractions.

The eighth column represents the more ancient and simple mode of Notation, by Uncial, or Capital letters ; such as is employed in the Parian Chronicle Marbles ; of which a specimen is given hereafter.

In that Inscription there are only six letters employed, with their combinations.

I = 1.	From the ancient $\text{I}\zeta$, for $\text{E}\iota\zeta$, “one.”
II = 5.	From $\text{Π}\epsilon\nu\tau\epsilon$, “five.”
Δ = 10.	From $\text{Δ}\epsilon\kappa\alpha$, “ten.”
H = 100.	From the ancient aspirate H, in HEKATON ; afterwards written, $\text{E}\kappa\alpha\tau\omicron\nu$, “a hundred.”
X = 1000.	From $\text{Χ}\iota\lambda\iota\alpha$, “a thousand.”

The use of the aspirate H, marks the antiquity of the notation. Thus, the most ancient Greeks wrote, PHOME, Rhyme ; but afterwards, when the aspirate letter was abolished, $\text{P}\omega\mu\eta$, Rome ; substituting the aspirate mark. And in the celebrated Amyclean Inscription, supposed to have been written 146 years before the destruction of Troy, alternately backwards and forwards, "like the plowing of oxen," (βουστροφηδον) the first word is so written, ΜΗΝΑΙΑ: Mhenalia. See Astle's Origin of Writing, p. 67, and 232, first edit.

That the letter H could not be intended for the Greek Eta, as in after times, which Astle imagined, writing the word Μηενάλια, is evident from this, that the place of Eta, throughout the inscription, is supplied by two Epsilons; as in ΜΑΤΕΕΡ, for Ματηρ. The same is observable in the preceding word, ΡΗΜΕ, where the Omicron likewise is used for Omega.

The figure of this aspirate H, was probably borrowed from the Hebrew aspirate Hheth, which, upon ancient shekels, was written \square . See the Apparatus of the Polyglott Bible, cited before. Astle has also given a figure of the Greek aspirate in an oblique position, thus, \diamond , which strongly resembles the Hebrew.

To express multiplication by 5, in the Parian inscription, the multiplicand is placed in the midst of an imperfect II. Thus, II^{\prime} , 50; $\text{II}^{\prime\prime}$, 500, &c.

IX. ROMAN.

From the Greek uncial notation, in the eighth column, was derived the Roman, but with some variations. Their numeral letters were:

I = 1; V = 5; X = 10; L = 50; C = 100; D = 500; M = 1000; which are not so easily to be explained; the learned being much divided how to account for the numeral powers of V, X, L, and D. The general analogy, however, between both methods, is obvious: thus, the age of Homer, $\text{II}^{\prime}\text{H}\Delta\Delta\Delta\Delta\text{III}$, resembles the Roman arrangement, DCXXXIII.

Receding, however, from the Greek notation, a larger number is diminished by prefixing a smaller: thus, IV 5-1 = 4; XC, 100-10 = 90; XXC, 100-20 = 80.

The number 500, was originally expressed by placing a C reversed after I, thus: IϞ: which, being written corruptly, was probably changed into D. And, in like manner, the number 1000, anciently written CIϞ, was changed into ∞, and perhaps M.

By annexing more reversed C's, the number 500 was increased tenfold, IϞϞ, 5000; IϞϞϞ, 50,000; which again were doubled, by prefixing as many; CCIϞϞ, 10,000; CCCIϞϞϞ, 100,000.

And to express 300,000, these last characters are thrice repeated by Cicero, pro Roscio. Pliny relates, that the famous Egyptian labyrinth in the Heroopolitan nome, or district, was first made IIIMDC, 3600 years before his time, 36, 13. Beverege, by an easy mistake, for nomo, substituting homo, has transferred it to the creation of the first man. P. 300.

Sometimes the numeral letters are raised to thousands by a horizontal stroke, \bar{I} , 1000 ; \bar{V} , 5000 ; \bar{X} , 10,000, &c.

DAYS.

The earliest measure of Time on record, is the Day. In that most ancient and venerable account of the Creation, by Moses, the process is marked by the operations of each day. The “evening and the morning were the first day,” &c. Gen. i. 5. &c.

Here the word “day” denotes the Civil or Calendar day of 24 hours, including “the evening,” or natural night, and “the morning,” or natural day ; while the sun is either below or above the horizon of any place, in the course of the earth’s diurnal rotation, between two successive appulses of the same meridian to the sun : corresponding, therefore, to a solar day in Astronomy*.

It is remarkable, that the “evening,” or natural night, precedes the “morning,” or natural day, in the Mosaic account. Hence the Hebrew compound, ערב־בקר, “Evening-morning,” is used by the prophet Daniel, to denote a civil day, in his famous chronological prophecy of the 2300 days, Dan. viii. 14. And also the Greek compound, νυκθημερον, to denote the same. And hence Hesiod, the eldest of the Greek poets that have reached us, represents the occultation of the Pleiades as lasting νυκτας τε και ηματα τεσσαρακοντα, “forty nights and days,” i. e. calendar days. And following the primæval order, the ancient Gauls and Germans counted times and seasons by the number of nights, not of days ; as we learn from Cæsar and Tacitus : a usage still retained by their descendants ; for in old French, anuit signifies “to-day ;” and in English, sevensnight, fortnight, “seven days,” “fourteen days.” Thus is sacred history verified by primitive tradition,

* Naturalis dies est tempus ab oriente sole ad solis occasum ; cujus contrarium tempus est nox, ab occasu solis usque ad exortum. Civilis autem dies vocatur, quod fit uno cœli circumactu, quo dies verus et nox continetur. Censorinus de die nat. c. 23.

By an apparent incongruity, Keil, and other Astronomers, call the time from sun-rise to sun-set, the artificial day. Lect. 28.

The natural day consisted of twelve hours, which are variable in all places but the equator, according to the seasons of the year; and equal, or of the mean length, only at the vernal and autumnal equinoxes: being longer in the summer half-year, and shorter in the winter. “Are there not twelve hours in the day?” saith our Lord, appealing to this ancient and long-established division, as a matter of public notoriety. John ix. 11. And among the Heathen nations, the same division prevailed. “What!” said M. Crassus to king Deiotarus, “What do you mean? Your twelfth hour is now at hand, and are you proceeding to build a city?”

The first hour of the day began at sun-rise; the sixth hour ended at mid-day, or noon; the seventh hour began at noon; and the twelfth ended at sun-set. In like manner, the first hour of the night began at sun-set; the sixth ended at midnight; and the twelfth ended at sun-rise.

Thus Pliny recommended, that apples, in autumn, should not be gathered ante horam primam, “before the end of the first hour;” or till they have had an hour’s sun upon them, to dry up the dew. Nat. Hist. xv. 18.

He also says, speaking of a place under the tropic of Cancer, on the day of the summer solstice, sextâ horâ, umbrae in totum absumuntur, “at the sixth hour the shadows totally vanish;” for the sun being then vertical, in the meridian, objects cast no shadows. Nat. Hist. vi. 34.

And so, Macrobius remarks, that the civil day of the Romans, a sexta noctis hora oriri, “began from the sixth hour of the night,” or from midnight. Saturnal. l. 3.

Prudentius reckoned that at the ninth hour, three quarters of the day were elapsed, and only one quarter remained.

Nona submissum rotat hora solem,

Partibus vix dum tribus evolutis;

Quarta devexo superest in axe,

Portio lucis.—Hymn VIII. p. 34. Ed. Elzevir.

In the parable of the labourers hired to work in the vineyard, the last, hired “at the eleventh hour,” worked only “one hour,” till “the evening,” or sun-set, when they were paid their wages.

* Nec dierum numerum ut nos, sed noctium computant; sic constituunt, sic condicunt: Nox ducere diem videtur.—Tacitus, Germ. 11.

Matt. xx. 1—12. They worked therefore during the twelfth hour.

That the twelfth hour ended at sun-set, we learn from a law of Solon: ὁ ἡλιος ἐπὶ τῶν ὄρων, ἐσχατὴ ὥρα ἐστὼ. “Let the sun, setting upon the mountains, be the last hour :” and this was copied in the laws of the twelve tables at Rome, “Solis occasus suprema tempestas esto.”

These instances (chiefly selected from Dr. Townson's works, vol. I. 263—269) are decisive to prove that the Ancients cited hours from their endings, rather than their beginnings; which Townson has not sufficiently marked, in the ambiguous phrase, “the first hour of the day was an hour after the sun rose; and the twelfth was when it set.” Vol. i. p. 233. And this is the usage of the Moderns also. “At one of the clock,” signifies an hour after mid-day, or midnight, &c. or at the end of the first hour after, &c. For removing this ambiguity, I am indebted to Archdeacon Churton's valuable communications.

The last hour of the day is denoted by a peculiar phrase, Luke xxiii. 54. Καὶ ἡμέρα ἦν παρασκευή, καὶ σαββατον ἐπεφώσκε. The rescinded translation: “And it was preparation day [Friday] and the sabbath was going to dawn;” i. e. at the dawn of night, or evening twilight, p. 113, was founded on West's erroneous account of the limits of the sabbath day, “from the first appearance of the stars on Friday, to their reappearance on Saturday :” Resurrection, p. 85, which is unsupported by Jewish authorities, and contrary to the law,—“from evening unto evening ye shall hallow your sabbath,” Levit. xxiii. 32. The true spirit indeed of ἐπεφώσκε is given in our public translation, “drew on,” or approached; but the same literal expression, in the same sense, is found in a Syriac quotation, of Asseman's Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. i. p. 213, “On the Sabbath, at the eleventh hour, as the first day of the week was beginning to shine;” here the eleventh hour corresponds to our fifth hour after noon, when the last hour began; or as paraphrased by Asseman, Sabbato exeunte, Dominicâ ineunte, “as Saturday was ending, and Sunday beginning.” Here the Chaldee and Syriac verb, nahar, illuxit, properly denotes the morning twilight, or “break of day,” 2 Sam. ii. 32; but is transferred to the moon at full, rising a little before sun-set, in consequence of the refractive power of the atmosphere, which elevates the luminaries above the horizon; so that the moon sometimes appears to rise in the East, before the sun sets in the West. But the moon was then actually about the full, namely, on the day of the crucifixion. This application of the verb, επεφωσκε, (which is the exact rendering of nahar) to “the *full moon, shining with superior splendour, in the serene and warm climates of Syria and Palestine †, entirely removes the impropriety of the former rendering; and by a usual Syriasm, not more just than beautiful, correctly expresses the time, when “the moon,” that rules the night, “was beginning to shine,” shortly before sun-set, or commencement of the sabbath-day.

The natural day was at first divided into three parts, Morning, Noon, and Evening. David mentions these as hours or times of prayer. Ps. lv. 17. And Homer notices them also: Ἦως, η Δειλη, η μεσον ἡμαρ, “morning, or evening, or mid-day.” Iliad 21. 111.

The natural night also was originally divided into three parts, or watches: Ps. lxxiii. 6; and xc. 4. The first, or beginning of watches, is mentioned Lament. ii. 19; the middle watch, Judg. vii. 19; and the morning watch, Exod. xiv. 24. And to these Homer seems to allude:

Ἀστρα δὲ δὴ προβεβηκε, παρῳχηκεν δὲ πλεων νυξ,
 Των δυο μοιραων, τριτατη δ' ετι μοιρα λελειπται.

“The stars are now far advanced, and more than two parts of the night are passed: a third part only is still left.”

Herodotus also mentions the second watch of the night, IX. 50; as does Livy, VII. 35; with this observation, that it was the fittest for surprizing the enemy in their camp, “when oppressed with the deepest sleep ‡.” And Xenophon mentions the

* Lucentemque globum Lunæ.—Virgil.

“The nights at this season, are transcendently beautiful. The clearness of the heavens, the serenity of the air, and the soft tranquillity in which Nature reposes, contribute to harmonize the mind, and produce the most calm and delightful sensations. The moon too, in these climates, displays far greater radiance than in Europe; the smallest print is legible by her light. And in the moon’s absence, her function is not ill supplied by the brightness of the milky way, and by that glorious planet Venus, which here appears like a little moon, and glitters with so refulgent a lustre, as to cast a shade from trees, buildings, and other objects; making full amends for the short stay and abrupt departure of the crepusculum, or twilight”—in the torrid zone near the equator.

N. B. Venus, “the evening star,” who is also Lucifer, “the morning star,” becomes the harbinger either of night or of day, when the sun is depressed only ten degrees below the western, or eastern horizon, respectively.

last watch, (or the third, according to Hutchinson,) which he thus accurately describes, Anab. IV. p. 250.

“But when it was about the last watch, and there remained only so much of the night as would enable them to cross the plain *in the dusk, then rising according to orders, they set out and arrived at the mountain along with the day.”

Afterwards, the strictness of military discipline among the Greeks and Romans, introduced an additional night-watch. Thus Arrian mentions an attack made by the Barbarians on Alexander's camp, “when it was now about the fourth watch,” v. 24, 2. The Romans also copied it; and from them the Jews in our Saviour's time. The second and third watches are mentioned Luke xii. 38; and the fourth watch of the night, Matt. xiv. 25; and the four are mentioned together, by our Lord, and described by the terms, Οψε, “the late watch,” μεσονυκτιου, “the midnight,” αλεκτοροφωνιας, “the cock-crowing,” and πρωι, “the early.” Mark xiii. 35. A double cock-crowing, indeed, is noticed by Mark, xiv. 30, where the other Evangelists mention only a single cock-crowing; Matt. xxvi. 34; Luke xxii. 34; John xiii. 38. But this is easily reconciled; the second, or principal, was that which they meant: thus Juvenal notices the second:

Quod tamen ad Galli cantum facit ille secundi,
Proximus ante diem caupo sciet. Sat. 9.

Which also was meant by Horace:

Sub Galli cantum consultor ubi ostia pulsat. Sat. 1.

The precise beginning and ending of each of the four watches, is thus determined.

1. Οψε, “the late,” began at sun-set, and ended with the third hour of the night, including the evening dawn, or twilight. It was also called οψια ωρα, even-tide, Mark xi. 11; or simply οψια, evening, John xx. 19, &c.

2. Μεσονυκτιου, “the midnight,” lasted from the third hour till midnight.

3. Αλεκτοροφωνιας, “the cock crowing,” lasted from midnight till the third hour after, or the ninth hour of the night. It included the two cock-crowings, with the second, or principal of which, it ended.

* Suidas renders σκοταιους, the word here used, by ετι σκοτιας ουσης, “while it was still dusk ;” as the phrase should be rendered, John xx. 1.

4. Πρωι, "the early," lasted from the ninth to the twelfth hour of the night, or sun-rise, including the morning dawn, or twilight. It was also called πρωια, morning, or morning-tide; ὥρα being understood. John xviii. 28, &c *.

The Jews reckoned two evenings: the former began at the ninth hour of the natural day, or third after noon; the latter began at sun-set, and was called ἑσπερα, evening, Acts iv. 3. The former, προς ἑσπεραν, "towards evening," Luke xxiv. 29. The same usage prevailed among the Greeks. Thus Xenophon calls the former evening, Δειλη; and the latter, Οψε. Compare Anab. p. 75 and 126, Hutchinson.

The phrase οψιας γενομενης, "when it was evening," sometimes ambiguously expressed both evenings, as in Matthew's account of the signal miracle of the loaves and fishes. Where the former was meant, when the miracle began, Matt. xiv. 15, as determined by Luke, ἡμερα ηρξατο κλινειν, "the day (or sun) began to decline," ix. 12. The latter evening was meant, when our Lord dismissed the multitude, Matt. xiv. 23; as ascertained by John, explaining the equivalent phrase, ὡς δε οψια εγενετο, "when it was evening," by the subsequent circumstance, in the next verse, και σκοτια ηδη εγεγονει, "And it had been already dusk." John vi. 16, 17.

By the Law of Moses, the Paschal Lamb was required to be sacrificed בין הערבים, "Between the evenings," Exod. xii. 6; Numb. ix. 3; and elsewhere. "At even, at the going down of the sun," including both, Deut. xvi. 6. And Josephus has well explained it, Θουοσι μεν, απο εννατης ὥρας ἕως ἑνδεκατης, "The Jews sacrifice [the passover] from the ninth hour until the eleventh." Bell. Jud. 6, 9, 3, p. 1291. "CHRIST, our Pass-over," therefore critically fulfilled the Law, when he expired about the ninth hour, Matt. xxvii. 46, and was taken down from the cross, at the first evening, Mark xv. 42—45, and was interred before the second evening, or sun-set, Luke xxiii. 54. For so it behoved Him "to fulfil all righteousness," ceremonial as well as moral!

The inconveniences resulting from a variable beginning of the civil day, earlier or later, according to the different seasons of the year, induced several ancient nations, the Egyptians, (according to Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. ii. c. 77.) the Ausonians, the most ancient inhabitants of Italy, the Roman Pontifices, Hipparchus, the Grecian astronomer, and the Chinese astronomers of Cathai and Oighur, &c. to reckon their civil day from midnight to midnight, as from a fixed, invariable point; and this usage has been adopted by most of the modern nations of Europe.

* Among the Romans, a public officer called Accensus, or Crier, used to proclaim the third hour, noon, and the ninth hour, as we learn from Varro: and still, the Mahometan Imans, or priests, proclaim day-break, noon, the first evening, twilight, and cock-crowing, from the minarets of their mosques.

The morning twilight, day-break, or dawn, is described with still greater variety of expression, but with a propriety and consistency not usually noticed, and totally lost in our public translation, by the four evangelists; in their accounts of the departure of the Galilean women from their respective habitations, in order to visit the holy sepulchre on Easter day, that auspicious day of our Lord's "rising," or resurrection, (as the Saxon word implies) which was called a "high day" in the Jewish ritual, (John xix. 31.) as being the second or principal day of the Paschal week, on which the wave sheaf, or first-fruits of the barley harvest was offered, Levit. xxiii. 10, 11; whence our Lord himself was figuratively styled "the first-fruits" of the spiritual harvest of the resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 20. In opposition, perhaps, to this truly "high day" in a double sense, the first Sunday after Easter is styled in our almanacks, Low Sunday.

1. Matthew represents the time of the women's departure, Οψε σαββατων, τη επιφωσκουση εις μιαν σαββατων. "Late after the Sabbath, at the dawning on the first day of the week." Matt. xxviii. 1.

Οψε σαββατων is a phrase signifying "a good while after the sabbath-day had expired, at the evening twilight, on our Saturday;" i. e. when the natural night was now far advanced. Philostratus uses the same phrase, Οψε Τρωικω, to denote, "Long after the Trojan [times.]" This was necessary, to appropriate the ensuing dawn to the morning, rather than to the evening. Luke xxiii. 54.—Τη επιφωσκουση, "at the dawning;" here the expression is elliptical, put for συν τη έω επιφωσκουση, "along with the dawning morn;" corresponding to ύπανγαζουσης έω, ύποφαινουσης έω, ύπο πρωτην έω, &c.

Ημος δ' ουτ' αρ' πω ήως, ει δ' αμφιλυκη νυξ.

"When it was not yet morn, but still twilight night."

Iliad, VII. 433.

2. Mark expresses it differently:

Διαγενομενου σαββατου, λιαν πρωι της μιας σαββατων.

“After the sabbath-day was thoroughly past, very early on the first day of the week.” Mark xvi. 1, 2.

Here the phrase, διαγενομενου σαββατου, is explanatory of Matthew's οψε σαββατων; the particle δια, in composition, being intensive, or heightening the signification of the simple verb γινομαι, as in διαγινωσκω, “to know thoroughly.” Acts xxiii. 15. Πρωι included the whole time of “the early watch;” and to mark the dawn, Mark adds λιαν, “very,” which is put elliptically for εννυχον λιαν, by Mark himself, i. 35, “very far in the night.”

3. John expresses the precise time of the πρωι, or “early watch,” differently from Mark:

Τη μια των σαββατων, πρωι, σκοτιας επι ουσης. “On the first day of the week, early, while it was still dusk,” John xx. 1. This is a more definite expression than Mark's. Σκοτια should not be rendered “dark,” as in our translation, which is rather the rendering of σκοτος, of which σκοτια is a diminutive. The whole phrase corresponds to Homer's

Πρωι, ὑπ' ηοι, οἱ συν τευχεσι θωρηχθεντες.

“Early, about morn, they, armed with their weapons.”

where ὑπ' ηοι seems to be a contraction of ὑποφωσκουσης ἔω, sublucente Aurora, as more fully expressed by Aristotle, ὑποφωσκουσης ἔω, και ηδη πρωι, “While morn was dawning from beneath, and it was now early.”

4. Luke expresses it differently from the rest by an elegant and scientific phrase:

Τη μια των σαββατων, ορθρου βαθος. “On the first day of the week, while the rising [sun] was deep [sunk beneath the horizon.]” Luke xxiv. 1.

The morning twilight begins as soon as the sun arrives within 18 degrees below the horizon, for then the smallest stars disappear. This phrase also is used by the best classic writers: Aristophanes, Thucydides, Aristides, &c., use it; and Plato explains it, Η ου πρωι επι εστιν; πανυ μεν ουν—ορθρος βαθος. “Is it not yet early?—Surely it is—the rising [sun] is deep.” Crito, p. 32*.

5. The accurate Mark alone records the time of the women's

* From this variety of phraseology, yet harmony of time, the reader may judge whether the Evangelists were skilled, or not, in the niceties of the Greek language, as used by the oldest and purest classic authors.

arrival at the sepulchre, ανατειλαντος του ηλιου, “after sunrise.” Mark xvi. 2. N. B. The verbs expressing their departure are aorists, ηλθον, ελθουσαι, &c. signifying the act of “going ;” the verbs expressive of arrival are the present tense, ερχεται, intimating the act of “coming.” Only one or the other of these acts is expressed by the evangelists, and our public translation has unfortunately confounded them together: Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 1; and put “coming” for “going.”

WEEKS.

This primæval measure of time, instituted as a memorial of the work of creation in six days, and of the ensuing sabbath, or day of “rest,” Gen. ii. 2, 3, was used by the CREATOR himself, in his denunciation of the deluge, Gen. vii. 8. It was twice employed by Noah in the ark, Gen. viii. 10—12; and Jacob’s marriage-feast lasted a week, Gen. xxix. 7.

Τας δ’ ἐβδομας, ὁ σεμνος ἐβδομαγετας
 Αναξ Ἀπολλων εἰλετ’.

“The weeks, the venerable author of the week, King Apollo appointed.” Æschylus.

It was therefore universally observed by Noah’s descendants during the prevalence of the Patriarchal religion; but when mankind degenerated, and sunk into idolatry, the primitive institution was neglected, and at length lost. And the days of the week were dedicated by the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Syrians, &c. to the heavenly host, the sun, moon, and planets.

Hence the Israelites, during their residence in Egypt, became infected with the idolatry of the country, and omitted, either voluntarily, or by compulsion, the observance of the Sabbath, until it was revived in the desert, sanctioned by the miracle of the manna, which was intermitted on the Sabbath-day, and solemnly re-enacted on mount Sinai, and made one of the laws of the Decalogue, and its violation punished with death. Exod. xvi. 23—30; xx. 8; Numb. xv. 35. In order that it might be “a sign between God and his people,” Ezek. xx. 20; and a mark of separation from the idolatrous Gentiles, who universally violated it, as we learn from the following exceptions in a curious passage of Julian the apostate:—Ποιον εθνος εστι, προς των θεων, εξω του, “ου προσκυνησεις θεοις ετεροις,” και του, “μνησθητι των σαββατων,” ὁ μη τας αλλας οιεται χρηναι φυλαττει εντολας;” “What nation is there, by the gods, who do not think, that except the first commandment, Thou shalt not worship other gods, and the fourth, Remember the Sabbath, they ought to observe the other commandments of the decalogue?"

The Egyptians, we are told by Dio Cassius, led the way in consecrating the days of the week to the seven planets, and they were followed by the Greeks, Romans, Hindus, Goths, Germans, and Saxons. And the following Pythian oracle, prescribing the worship of these false gods on their respective days, is preserved by Eusebius :—

Κληζειν Ἑρμην, ἠδ' Ἡελιον κατα ταυτα,
 Ἡμερη Ἡελιου, Μηνην δ' ὅτε της δε παρειη
 Ἡμερη, ἠδε Κρονον, ἠδ' εζειης Αφροδιτην.

“ Invoke Mercury ; and the Sun in like manner,
 On Sunday ; and the Moon, when her day comes ;
 And Saturn also ; and Venus, in succession.”

Hence the Gentiles dropped the observance of a seventh day of rest. The Greeks observed the Decads, or tenth days ; the Romans, Nundinæ, the ninth days, &c.

Some astronomers and chronologers have imagined that the week was a natural measure of time, furnished by the four principal phases or quarters of the moon, which last each about a week ; but it was unquestionably derived from the divine institution at the creation, handed down by primitive tradition. This is evident from the word Sabbat, or Sabbata, denoting a week among the Syrians, Arabians, Christian Persians, and Ethiopians ; as in the following ancient Syriac calendar, expressed in the Chaldee alphabet* :—

חד־שבתא	-	One of the Sabbath, or Week	-	Sunday.
תרו־שבתא	-	Two of the Sabbath	- - -	Monday.
תלת־שבתא	-	Three of the Sabbath	- - -	Tuesday.
ארבעא־שבתא	-	Four of the Sabbath	- - -	Wednesday.
חמשא־שבתא	-	Five of the Sabbath	- - -	Thursday.
ערי־שבתא	-	Eve of the Sabbath	- - -	Friday.
שבתא	-	The Sabbath	- - - - -	Saturday.

* This calendar is taken from Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, translated by Marsh, Vol. I. p. 136.

The derivation of the Syriac numerals from the Hebrew is obvious : חד, is from the Hebrew, אחד, one, by elision of the first letter ; תרו, from the Hebrew, שנים, two ; by substitution of kindred letters, or letters of the same organ ; תלת from שלוש, three, by the same ; ארבעא, from ארבע, four, by affixing the emphatic article א ; which corresponds to the prefix ה, the, in Hebrew ; חמשא, from חמש, five, by the

The high antiquity of this calendar is evinced by the use of the cardinal numbers, one, two, three, &c. instead of the ordinals, first, second, third, &c. following the Hebrew idiom; as in the account of the creation, where we read in the original, “One day,” which the Septuagint retains, calling it, ἡμέρα μία. It is remarkable that all the evangelists follow the Syriac calendar, both in the word σαββατα, used for “a week,” and also in retaining the cardinal number μία σαββατων, “one of the week,” to express the day of the resurrection. Matt. xxviii. 1; Mark xvi. 2; Luke xxiv. 1; John xx. 1. Afterwards Mark adopts the usual phrase, πρώτη σαββατων, “the first of the week,” Mark xvi. 9; where he uses the singular σαββατον for a week; and so does Luke, as Νηστευω δις του σαββατου, “I fast twice in the week.” Luke xviii. 12.

The Syriac name for Friday, or the sixth day of the week, is also adopted by Mark, who renders it προσαββατον, “sabbath- eve,” xv. 42; corresponding to παρασκευη, “preparation-day;” Matt. xxvii. 62; Mark xv. 42; Luke xxiii. 54; John xix. 31. And Josephus also conforms to this usage, except that he uses σαββατα, in the singular sense, for the sabbath-day, in his account of a decree of Augustus, exempting the Jews of Asia and Cyrene from secular services, εν σαββασι, η τη προ ταυτης παρασκευη, απο της ωρας εννατης. “On the sabbath-day, or on the preparation-day before it, from the ninth hour.” Antiq. 16, 7, 2. The first three evangelists also use the plural σαββατα, to denote the sabbath-day; Matt. xii. 5—11; Mark i. 21; and ii. 23; Luke iv. 16, &c. Whereas John, to avoid ambiguity, appropriates the singular σαββατον to the sabbath-day, and the plural σαββατα to the week; John v. 9—16; vii. 22, &c. xx. 1.

And here we may incidentally remark, that there is not a more prolific source of confusion and embarrassment in Ancient Chronology, than the substitution of the cardinal numbers, one, two, three, for the ordinals, first, second, third, &c. which frequently occurs in the sacred and profane historians. Thus Noah was six hundred years old when the deluge began, Gen. vii. 6; and same; ער, from ערב, evening, by elision of the last letter; and שבתא, from השבת, the sabbath, or rest.

The divinities in the Saxon mythology, from which our names of the days of the week are derived, were the Sun; the Moon; Tuisco, a warlike divinity; Odin, or Woden, who was the same as the Hermes, or Thoth, of the Grecians and Egyptians, and the Budha of the Hindus; Thor, the Thunderer, or Jove; Freyja, his wife; and Sater, Saturn.

presently after, in his six hundredth year : confounding complete and current years. And the dispute whether A.D. 1800, or A.D. 1801, was the first of the nineteenth century, should be decided in favour of the latter ; the former being in reality the last of the eighteenth century ; which is usually, but improperly called, the year one thousand eight hundred, complete ; whereas it is really the one thousandth, eight hundredth ; as in Latin, Anno Domini, Millesimo, Octingentesimo.

There is also another and a prevailing error, arising from mistranslation of the current phrases, μεθ' ἡμερας οκτω, μετα τρεις ἡμερας, &c. usually rendered, “ after eight days,” “ after three days,” &c. but which ought to be rendered “ eight days after,” “ three days after,” as in other places, μετα τινας ἡμερας, μετ' ου πολλας ἡμερας, which are correctly rendered “ some days after,” “ not many days after,” in our English Bible, Acts xv. 36 ; Luke xv. 13, the extreme days being included. Such phrases seem to be elliptical, and the ellipsis is supplied, Luke ix. 28, speaking of our Lord's transfiguration, μετα τους λογους τουτους, ὡσει ἡμεραι οκτω. After these sayings, about “ eight days,” or rather about the eighth day, counted inclusively ; for in the parallel passages, Matt. xvii. 1 ; Mark ix. 2 ; there are only “ six days,” counted exclusively, or omitting the extremes.

Thus, circumcision is prescribed, Gen. xvii. 11, when the child is “ eight days old ;” but in Levit. xxii. 3. “ on the eighth day.” And JESUS accordingly was circumcised, ὅτε ἐπλησθησαν ἡμεραι οκτω, “ when eight days were accomplished,” Luke ii. 21 ; whereas, John the Baptist, τη ογδοη ἡμερα, “ on the eighth day.” And the last, which was the constant usage, explains the meaning of the former.

And this critically reconciles our Lord's resurrection, μετα τρεις ἡμερας, “ three days after,” according to Matt. xxvii. 63 ; Mark viii. 31 ; with his resurrection, τη τριτη ἡμερα, “ on the third day,” according to Matt. xvi. 21 ; Luke ix. 22 ; and according to fact : for our Lord was crucified on Good Friday, about the third hour ; and he rose before sunrise, πρωι, early, on Sunday ; so that the interval, though extending through three calendar days current, did not in reality, amount to two entire days, or forty-eight hours.

This phraseology is frequent among the most correct classic writers : Josephus uses the phrase μετα ετη δυο, “ two years after.” Bell. Jud. 1, 13, 1, as equivalent to δευτερω ετει, “ in the second year,” relating the same transaction, Ant. 14, 13, 3.

Theophrastus says of the Egyptian thorn, ὅταν δε κοπη, μετα τριτον ετος, ευθεις αναβεβλαστηκεν, “when it is cut down, it sprouts again the third year after ;” which Pliny, N. H. 13, 9, renders, “cæsa, anno tertio resurgit.”

Demosthenes uses the phrase μεθ' ἡμερας δυο, in the sense of “two days after.” Mid.

Cicero also adopts it: speaking to Antony of the Ides of March, on which Cæsar was assassinated, he says: Neque te illo die, neque postero vidi—post diem tertium veni in Ædem Telluris. “I neither saw you that day [the Ides of March, in the Senate] nor the next, [the 17th before the Calends of April]—The third day after [the 16th before the Calends of April] I came into the temple of Tellus.” Philippic. 2, 35.

Some learned Commentators, Beza, Grotius, Campbell, Newcome, render such phrases, “within eight days,” “within three days ;” which certainly conveys the meaning, but not the literal translation, of the preposition μετα, “after.”

In memory of the primæval week of Creation, revived among the Jews, after their departure from Egypt, their principal festivals, the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles, lasted a week each. And it is remarkable, that from the earliest times, sacrifices were offered by sevens. Thus, in the patriarch Job's days, “seven bullocks and seven rams were offered up for a burnt offering” of atonement, by the Divine command. Job xlii. 8.—The Chaldean diviner, Balaam, built seven altars, and prepared seven bullocks and seven rams. Numb. xxiii. 1. And the Cumæan Sibyl, who came from Chaldea, or Babylonia, gives the same directions to Æneas, that Balaam did to Balak :

Nunc grege de intacto, septem mactare juvencos
Præstiterit, totidem lectas, de more, bidentes.

“It will be better now to sacrifice seven bullocks,
And seven sheep, culled from the spotless herd,
According to custom.” ÆN. vi. 38.

And when the Ark was brought home by David, the Levites offered seven bullocks and seven rams. 1 Chron. xv. 26. And hence we may account for the peculiar sanctity of the seventh day, among the older Heathen writers, even after the institution of the Sabbath fell into disuse, and was lost among them. Thus Hesiod styles it: Ἐβδομη, ιερον ἡμαρ, “the seventh, a holy day.” And Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, speaking of the seventh day, says, ἦν παντες ονομαζουσι. “Which all name,” or distinguish: “but most,” adds he, “are ignorant of the reason why.”

Instead of Saturday, the last day of the week, and the patriarchal and Jewish sabbath, the Christian world has adopted Sunday, the first day of the week, in memory of the new creation, or resurrection of OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, in a glorified body, on that day; which was also the day on which he made his successive manifestations of himself to his disciples after his resurrection, and the day of the first-fruits of the Christian Church on Whitsunday, thence consecrated to religious worship, and called the Lord's day in the Apostolic age; Acts ii. 41; xx. 7; 1 Cor. x. 16; xi. 20; xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10; consequently, the change must have been sanctioned and authorized by HIM, who was "LORD even of the Sabbath."

Deviating from the usage of both Jews and Christians, Mahomet instituted Friday as "the day of the assembly" for public worship, either in memory of his first entry into Medina on that day, or because on Friday God finished the work of creation, as the Mahometan doctors allege; Sale's Koran, chap. LXII. p. 451; or, rather, the artful policy of the Arabian impostor retained the ancient idolatrous usage of his countrymen the Arabs, who worshipped the planet Venus, which they called Chobar, on that day.

MONTHS.

The Month is a measure of time originally derived from the Moon, Ecclus. xliii. 8., in almost every nation and language. Among the Hebrews, יָרֵחַ, Iarah, signified both the moon at full, and the month; compare Job xxxi. 26. with xxix. 2. חֹדֶשׁ, Hhadash, the moon at new, and the month; compare Numb. x. 10; Psal. lxxxix. 3. with 1 Sam. xx. 5; Ezek. xlvi. 1; Numb. xxviii. 11, &c. Among the Greeks, Μηνυ, the month, is evidently related to Μηνη, the moon; and from Μηνη, according to Varro and Macrobius, was derived the Latin Mensis, a month. In like manner, the Saxon Monat, and our Month, are evidently derived from the Moon.

The Civil, or Calendar month, originally consisted of 30 days; in which time a lunation was supposed to be finished. Thus, during the deluge, Noah counted five months equivalent to 150 days, at 30 days to one month. And such was its fixed length among the Babylonians, Egyptians, Persians, and Grecians. Hence Hesiod called the last day of the month τριηκὰδα, "the thirtieth;" and so did the astronomer Thales; and his contemporary, Cleobulus, another of the seven sages, put forth a riddle, representing the year as divided into twelve months, of thirty days and nights each.

Εἰς ὁ πατήρ· παῖδες δὲ δωδεκά· τῶ δὲ ἑκάστῳ
 Παῖδες τρηκόντα, διανδιχα εἶδος ἐχουσαι·
 Αἱ μὲν λευκαὶ εἰσιν ἰδριν, αἱ δ' αὐτὲ μελαιναί·
 Ἀθάνατοι δὲ τε οὐσαι, ἀποφθινυθουσιν ἑκάστοι.

“ The father is one; the sons, twelve; to each belong
 Thirty daughters; half of them white, the other, black:
 And though immortal, yet they perish all.”

And Tatius, in his commentary on Aratus, reckoned that the full moon fell on the fifteenth day, or middle of the month. Geminus also, that great astronomer, about B. C. 240, assigns, as a “proof that the Greeks counted the days accurately according to the moon’s age, that solar eclipses happen on the thirtieth day, when the moon is in conjunction with the sun, and both in the same part of the heavens: and lunar eclipses, on the night, tending to the middle of the month.” See the Original, Petav. Vol. III. p. 19.

These instances are sufficient to shew the prevailing opinion among the ancients, that a lunation, or synodical month, lasted thirty days.

But, afterwards, it was found, by more accurate observations, that the length of a lunation was only $29\frac{1}{2}$ days. Whence the thirtieth day, which Hesiod called ενη, “old,” was named by Solon, ενη και νεα, “old and new;” one half of it pertaining to the old month, the other half to the new; and to avoid the fraction, they counted the months alternately, 29 and 30 days.

The months originally had no appropriate names, but were distinguished by their order of succession; the first month, the second month, &c.: a custom which is still preserved among the Chinese and Japanese. But in process of time, the months, like the days of the week, came to be designated by the names of tutelar gods, heroes, characters of the seasons, or other local circumstances of different countries, to the great confusion and embarrassment of ancient calendars, when compared together.

The following Table will furnish a comparative view of the correspondences of the months of the principal ancient nations, reduced as nearly as may be to the common standard of the Julian year. Assuming the vernal equinox to have happened on March 25, it includes the most eventful period of Grecian History, from the invasion of Xerxes, to the conquest of Persia, by Alexander the Great.

I. HEBREW MONTHS.

The Hebrew months were originally distinguished by their numeral order: thus, the Deluge began in the second month, and came to its height in the seventh month, at the end of 150 days, Gen. vii. 11—24; viii. 4; and decreased until the tenth month, when the tops of the mountains were seen, viii. 5.

Afterwards they acquired distinct names: thus, Moses named the first month of the year Abib, Exod. xii. 2; xiii. 4; signifying "Green," from the green ears of corn at that season; for it began about the vernal equinox. The second month was named Zif, signifying in Chaldee, "Glory," or "Splendour;" in which the foundation of Solomon's temple was laid, 1 Kings vi. 1. The seventh month was styled Ethanim, which is interpreted "Harvests," by the Syriac version, 1 Kings viii. 2. The eighth month, Bul; from "the fall" of the leaf, 1 Kings viii. 2.

Besides these names, given before the Babylonian Captivity, there were others after. The first month was also called Nisan, signifying "flight;" because in that month the Israelites were thrust out of Egypt, Ex. xii. 39. The third month, Sivan, signifying, "a bramble," Esth. iii. 7; Nehem. ii. 1. The sixth month, Ælul, signifying "mourning;" probably because it was the time of preparation for the great day of atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month, Neh. vi. 15. The ninth month was called Chisleu, signifying "chilled;" when the cold weather sets in, and fires are lighted, Zech. vii. 1; Jer. xxxvi. 22. The tenth month was called Tebeth, signifying "miry," Esth. ii. 16. The eleventh, Shebet, signifying a "staff," or a "sceptre," Zech. i. 7. And the twelfth, Adar, signifying a "magnificent mantle," probably from the profusion of flowers and plants with which the earth then begins to be cloathed in warm climates, Ezra vi. 15; Esther iii. 7. It is said to be a Syriac term, 2 Mac. xvi. 36.

II. SYRIAN MONTHS.

These are the same as the Hebrew, and nearly agreed in their names, after the Babylonian Captivity.

III. ATTIC MONTHS.

It is of great importance to the right understanding of the classic authors, Herodotus, Thucydides, Demosthenes, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Xenophon, Arrian, &c. to determine the true order of the Attic months, and their relation to the Julian, and to the seasons of the year: and the more so, because the schemes of Gaza, Scaliger, and Potter, are incorrect. The rectified order of *Petavius, which he verified from the first classical authorities, and Beveridge and Spanheim adopted, is given in Table I.

The first month of the Attic year was called Hecatombæon, from the "Hecatombs," or multitude of sacrifices then offered. It began about the summer solstice, according to Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Dionysius Hal. The third month, Boedromion, or "the Auxiliary," from the victory of Theseus over the Amazons, at that season, was about the autumnal equinox; for Plutarch relates, that there was an eclipse of the moon on the 15th of Boedromion, eleven days before the famous battle of Arbela. But this eclipse happened, by calculation, Sept. 20, B.C. 331, afternoon, 10 hours, total. And Ptolomy relates, that according to an astronomical observation of Timochares, the new moon of Anthesterion was on the 22d of January, in the 47th year of the first Calippic period. But Suidas says, that Anthesterion was the eighth month, and derives it from ανθος, "a flower:" it corresponded, therefore, in part with the Hebrew

* The only difference between the lists of Scaliger and Petavius, is in the months Mæmacterion and Pyanepsion; which the former transposes; and this, on the authority of Plutarch in Demosthenes, who reckons the three months, Metageitnion, Boedromion, Pyanepsion, in succession. And it also must be acknowledged, that at the end of Ptolomy's Magn. Construc. Selden found a MS. table of Attic months, exactly the same as Scaliger's. See Selden, Tom. 2. p. 1489.

But, on the other hand, Petavius remarks, that Aristotle, in two places of his History of Animals, reckons Boedromion and Mæmacterion in immediate succession; and proves, that Mæmacterion began about the autumnal equinox; and, 2. that although Plutarch reckoned Pyanepsion after Boedromion, yet it was not immediately after; for that there was a month between them, namely, Mæmacterion. This may be collected from the context: for Plutarch states, that "the affairs of Greece soon went to ruin: they lost the battle of Crano in the month Metageitnion; a Macedonian Garrison entered Munychia in Boedromion; and Demosthenes lost his life in Pyanepsion." But between the last two events intervened the return of Antipater and Craterus to Athens; the flight of Demosthenes and his party before their arrival; the pursuit of the exiles; the apprehension and execution of Hyperides, Aristonicus, and Himeræus; and the detection of Demosthenes in the sanctuary of Neptune in Calauria; all which might well have occupied the intermediate month Mæmacterion.

See Petav. Vol. I. Lib. 1. Cap. 9, 10, 11. p. 12—15.

month Adar; of whose name it seems to have been a translation. And these three months determine the whole series.

The Attic month was divided into three decads; the days of the first two decads were reckoned progressively, πρωτη ἰσταμενου, “first of the beginning,” δευτερα ἰσταμενου, “second of the beginning,” &c. πρωτη μεσουντος, “first of the middle,” δευτερα μεσουντος, “second of the middle,” &c.; but by a singular variation, introduced by Solon, the days of the last decad were counted in a retrograde order from the end of the month, the 21st being called δεκατη φθινοντος, “tenth of the waning,” εννατη φθινοντος, “ninth of the waning,” &c.: and this mode was adopted also in the Roman and Arabian calendars.

IV. MACEDONIAN MONTHS.

V. SYRO-MACEDONIAN MONTHS.

These two differ only in the anticipation of a month, earlier in the former than in the latter. The cause of it, we are told by Plutarch, in his life of Alexander, was this: When that prince was going to attack the Persians at the river Granicus, he was warned that it was unlawful for the Macedonians to make war in the month Dæsius. In order, therefore, to remove the scruples of his army, with that presence of mind for which he was so remarkable, he immediately ordered that the preceding month, Artemisius, should be repeated, and substituted for Dæsius; and that Dæsius should be postponed till the following month. And in compliment to the Macedonian conqueror, this new order was adopted after the battle of Arbela, which decided the fate of the Persian empire.

This change, however, not being universally adopted, was productive of confusion; some reckoning by the new order, others adhering to the old. Thus Plutarch makes the month Lous, correspond to the Attic Hecatombæon; retaining the old; and also Galen, Ptolomy, &c. Whereas Josephus refers the same month, Lous, to the fifth Hebrew month Ab, which corresponds to Metageitnion, the month after Hecatombæon: and he uniformly adheres to the Syro-Macedonian months throughout his works*; and is followed by Eusebius, Epiphanius, Evagrius, Bede, and the ecclesiastical writers in general.

* Josephus reckons that Xanthicus corresponded to the first Hebrew month, Nisan. Ant. 1, 5, 3, &c.

VI. ROMAN MONTHS.

In the time of Romulus, there were ten months with names, and two without names, in the Roman Calendar; of which the first was Martius, in honour of the god Mars, beginning about the vernal equinox. His successor, Numa, named the two intercalary anonymous months, Januarius, in honour of Janus, the god of time, which he made the first of the year, beginning about the winter solstice; and the second, Februarius, from februo, to purify; because in that month purifications of the people, and lustrations, were customary.

It is remarkable that the Roman Calendar retained the primæval names of the months, longer than any of the Oriental nations, except the Chinese: Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December; denoting their numeral places reckoned from the vernal equinox, as in the Hebrew.

The Roman Month was divided into three unequal parts, the first days of which were called Calends, Nones, and Ides. The Calends were so called from καλεω, because the appearance of the new moon was then “called,” or proclaimed, by the public crier, on the first day of the month. The Nones were the “ninth” day from the Ides; which were so called from ειδος, the “appearance” of the full moon. In the four months of March, May, July, and October, the Nones fell on the seventh day of the month, and consequently the Ides on the fifteenth; but in the Artemisius, to the second, Iar. Ant. 8, 3, 1.

Lous, to the fifth, Ab. Compare Bell. Jud. 6, 3, 5. with Ant. 10, 8, 5; Jer. lii. 12.

Gorpiæus, to the sixth, Ælul. Bell. Jud. 6, 8, 4.

Hyperberetæus, to the seventh, Tisri. Ant. 8, 4, 1.

Dius, to the eighth, Marheshvan. Ant. 1, 3, 3.

Appellæus, to the ninth, Chasleu, or Chisleu. Ant. 11, 5, 4; 12, 7, 6.

Dystrus, to the last, Adar. Ant. 4, 8, 49.

And the venerable Bede thus reduces the Syro-Macedonian months, to the Julian; with a slight corruption of their names:

“Vocatur autem apud eos, ipse December Apileos, Januarius Exdynius, Februarius Perithius, Martius Distrius, Aprilis Xanthicus, Maius
Artemiseas, Junius Deseos, Julius Panemos, Augustus Loos, September Gorpieos,
October Hyperberetæos, November Dios.”

This passage, taken from a very ancient MS. of Bede's works, in the Cotton library, rectifies a gross adulteration of his printed text, Cap. 12, in the list there given.

rest of the months, the Nones fell on the fifth, and consequently the Ides on the thirteenth.

All the days of the Roman Month were counted in a retrograde order, according to their distance from the ensuing division: thus, the second of January was the fourth of, or before, the Nones; but the second of March, the sixth before the Nones; the fourteenth of January was the nineteenth before the Calends of February; but the fourteenth of March, the day before the Ides. But from the sixteenth, to the end, the reckoning was the same in all: thus, the twenty-fifth in every month, was the eighth of the Calends of the ensuing month.

VII. EGYPTIAN MONTHS.

The first month in the Egyptian Calendar, Thoth, was consecrated to the Dog-star, and it began with the dog-days, at the Heliacal rising of Canicula, about the summer solstice. According to Josephus, Pharmuthi corresponded to Nisan, Ant. 2, 14, 6; and according to Eutychius, at the time of the deluge, Thoth corresponded to the sixth Hebrew month, Ælul. Annal. p. 40.

VIII. PERSIAN MONTHS.

The Persian months were originally the same as the Egyptian; and the first month, Fervardin, corresponded to the Egyptian Thoth.

IX. ARABIAN MONTHS.

The Arabian months seem to have originally corresponded to the Hebrew; and the first, Muharram, to have begun about the vernal equinox: for the first, Muharram, and the seventh, Rajab, were counted sacred, as among the Hebrews; and the latter was set apart by the Pagan Arabs, before Mahomet, for their solemn fast; like the Hebrew Tisri, on the tenth of which, was the great day of atonement. But Mahomet transferred the fast from the seventh, to the ninth month, Ramadan; which had been formerly devoted to eating and drinking to excess; like the Roman December. See Sale's Koran, Prelim. Disc. p. 148.

X. PAPHIAN MONTHS.

The Paphian, or Cyprian months, corresponded to the Macedonian, and Syro-Macedonian; and the month Dius, of the former, Hyperberetæus, of the latter, and Paphian Aphrodisius, began at the autumnal equinox. According to Epiphanius, "CHRIST was baptized on the 16th of Apogonicus, among the Paphians, six days before the Ides of November." But, at Christ's birth, the autumnal equinox happened about Sept. 24, when the 16th of Apogonicus was the eighth of November, or the sixth of the Ides. Bevereg. Lib. I. cap. 13. p. 83.

XI. HINDU MONTHS.

The riddle of Cleobulus, noticed in the Attic month, is to be found in the emblematical astronomy of the Hindus. According to which, the god Soma, or Lunus, married twelve celestial nymphs, presiding over the constellations of the Zodiac; on whom he begot twelve Genii, or months, who were named after their respective mothers. The thirty Tithis, or days of the month, are represented as so many beautiful nymphs. On the Maha Cala, or day of the conjunction, they perform obsequies to the Pitris, or ancient "fathers" of mankind; to whom the darker fortnight is dedicated. See Asiat. Researches, Vol. II. p. 227—295; Vol. III. p. 522.

YEARS.

The primitive sacred year originally consisted of twelve months of 30 days each, or 360 days. This was in use before the deluge; as appears from Noah's reckoning five months, or 150 days, from the seventeenth day of the second month, to the seventeenth day of the seventh month; as expressing the time of the rising of the waters; and seven months and ten days more, till the waters were dried up, and Noah and his family left the ark, after a residence therein of 370 days, or a year and ten days, till the seven-and-twentieth day of the second month of the ensuing year. Gen. vii. and viii.

This was also the original Chaldean year; for Berosus, in his History of the Antediluvian Kings of Babylonia, counted their reigns by Sari, or decads of years; and a Sarus, as Alexander Polyhistor related (apud Syncell. p. 32.) was 3600 days; or ten years, consisting each of 360 days.

After the deluge, this primitive form was handed down by Noah and his descendants, to the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Phœnicians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Indians, and Chinese; as is evident from the testimonies of the best and most ancient writers and historians.

Diodorus Siculus relates, that at the sepulchre of Osiris, the Egyptian priests appointed to bewail his death, filled 360 milk-bowls every day, to denote the number of days in the primitive Egyptian year, used in his reign. And he represents an ancient custom at Acanthe, near Memphis, on the Libyan side of the Nile, for 360 priests to fetch water every day from the Nile, and pour it into a vessel full of holes, to represent the 360 days in continual flux, or succession. Diod. Lib. I. p. 26, 109.

The Egyptians attributed the invention of their year to the Phœnician Taaut, Thoth, or Hermes, the son of Misraim, who went with the first colony into Egypt, in the reign of Uranus, who lived in Phœnicia, soon after the dispersion, and was a great astronomer, or a diligent observer of the risings and settings of the stars; who discovered the year from the motion of the sun, and the months from the course of the moon, and was deified after his death. Diod. Lib. III.

Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, and Q. Curtius, relate that the Persian kings had 360 concubines, one for each day of the year; who went each in their turns to the king in the evening, and returned in the morning into the house of the women; as we learn from Herod. Lib. III. 69; and from Scripture, Esth. ii. 12—15.

Harpocraton, Suidas, and Julius Pollux relate, that in the original constitution of Athens, the people were divided into four tribes, representing the four seasons of the year; and these tribes into twelve wards, corresponding to the twelve months; and each ward consisted of thirty families, answering to the thirty days of each month; in all 360, as many as the days of the year. Suidas, voce Γεννηται et Γεννηται. This year, therefore, was introduced into Greece many ages before the arrival of Cecrops in Attica, from Sais in Egypt; probably by the first settlers, the Javanians, or descendants of Japheth; or by the old Pelasgi, from Phœnicia.

The first Latin and Roman year consisted of 360 days, as we learn from Plutarch; who says, in his life of Numa, that “in the reign of Romulus, the months were very irregular, some not being reckoned twenty days, others had thirty-five days, and others, more: the Latins not then understanding the difference between the solar and lunar year; but only providing for this one point, that the year should contain 360 days.”

The Chinese year originally consisted of 360 days; as did also the Mexican, which they divided into eighteen months of 20 days each. Scaliger de emend. temp. p. 225.

From this detail, it is evident that the primitive year every where throughout the ancient world, consisted only of 360 days, for many ages after the deluge.

II. The beginning of the year was various among different nations: the ancient Chaldeans, Babylonians, Medes, Persians, Armenians, and Syrians, began their year about the vernal equinox; and the Chinese in the East, and Latins and Romans in the West, originally followed the same usage. The Egyptians, and from them the Jews, began their Civil year about the autumnal equinox. The Athenians and Greeks in general began theirs about the summer solstice; and the Chinese, and the Romans after Numa's correction, about the winter solstice.

At which of these, the primæval year, instituted at the Creation, began, has been long contested among Astronomers and Chronologers. Philo, Eusebius, Cyril, Augustine, Abulfaragi, Kepler, Capellus, Simpson, Lange, and Jackson, contend for the vernal equinox; and Josephus, Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Bedford, Kennedy, &c. for the autumnal. The weight of ancient authorities, and also of arguments, seems to preponderate in favour of the former opinion.

I. All the ancient nations, except the Egyptians, began their Civil year about the vernal equinox: but the deviation of the Egyptians from the general usage, may easily be accounted for, from a local circumstance peculiar to their country; namely, that the annual inundation of the Nile rises to its greatest height at the autumnal equinox. According to Herodotus, B. 2, 19. "The Nile begins to increase about the summer solstice, and continues to rise for a hundred days; and then decreases for the same time, and continues low all the winter, until the return of the summer solstice." Diodorus, B. 1, 3. says, "Its inundation begins at the summer solstice, and increases till the autumnal equinox."—And this is confirmed by the reports of modern travellers: According to Pococke, Vol. i. p. 256, the river began to increase at Cairo, in 1714, June 30; in 1715, July 1; in 1738, June 20; "And so precisely is the stupendous operation of its inundation calculated," says Bruce, Vol. iv. p. 359, "that on the 25th of September, only three days after the autumnal equinox, the Nile is generally found at Cairo, to be at its highest; and begins to diminish every day after."—Moses, therefore, by bringing back the Sacred or Ecclesiastical year to the vernal equinox, while the Israelites still retained the Egyptian Civil year, which began at the autumnal equinox, only retrieved the primæval year, as well as the primæval Sabbath; which had been both disused and lost among the Israelites during their Egyptian bondage.

2. Josephus, the only ancient authority of any weight, on the other side, seems to be inconsistent with himself, in supposing that the deluge began in the second civil month, Dius, or Marheshvan, rather than in the second sacred month; Ant. 1, 2, 3. Because Moses, throughout the Pentateuch, uniformly adopts the sacred year; and fixed its first month by an indelible and unequivocal character, calling it Abib, as ushering in the season of "green" corn. And as Josephus calls the second month elsewhere Artemisius, or Iar, in conformity with Scripture, there is no reason why he should deviate from the same usage in the case of the deluge.

3. To the authority of Josephus, we may oppose that of the great Jewish antiquary, Philo, in the generation before him; who thus beautifully accounts for the institution of the sacred year by Moses. De Septenar. et Fest. p. 1190.

"This month, Abib, being the seventh in number and order according to the sun's course [or civil year, reckoned from the autumnal equinox] is virtually the first, and is therefore called "the first month," in the sacred books. And the reason, I think, is this: because the vernal equinox is the image and representative of the original epoch of the creation of the world. Thereby GOD notified the Spring, in which all things bloom and blossom, to be an annual memorial of the world's creation. Wherefore this month is properly called the first in the Law, as being the image of the first original month, stamp'd upon it, as it were, by that archetypal seal."

4. Virgil also, that profound Antiquary, gives some powerful physical arguments in favour of the creation of the world in Spring: Georg. 2, 332.

"Inque novos soles audent se germina tutò Credere, &c.

"The springing grass to trust this season dares,
No tender vine the gathering tempest fears,
By the bleak North, or roaring Southwind roll'd;
But spreads her leaves, and bids her germs unfold.

Such were the days, the seasons were the same,
 When first arose this world's all-beauteous frame ;
 The sky was cloudless, balmy was the air,
 And Spring's mild influence made young Nature fair ;
 And Cattle first o'er new-born pastures spread,
 And Man, an iron race, uprear'd his hardy head ;
 When Beasts through pathless brakes began to prowl,
 And glittering Stars through heaven's blue concave roll.
 Nor could this infant world sustain the extremes
 Of piercing Winter, and the dog-days' beams, Did not kind HEAVEN, the fierce excess between,
 Bid gentler Spring's soft season intervene."

PITT.

5. The first sacrifice on record seems to decide the question. The time of the sacrifice of Cain and Abel, evidently appears to have been Spring ; when Cain, who was a "tiller of the ground," brought the first fruits of his tillage, or a sheaf of new corn ; and Abel, who was "a feeder of sheep," "the firstlings of his flock," lambs : and this was done מִקֵּץ יָמִים, "at the end of days," or "at the end of the year ;" which is the correct meaning of the phrase* ; and not the indefinite expression, "in process of time," as in our public translation of Gen. iv. 3. It is a remarkable proof of the accuracy of Moses, and a confirmation of this explanation, that he expresses the end of the civil year, or "ingathering of the harvest," by different phrases, בְּצֵאת הַשָּׁנָה "at the going out of the year," Exod. xxiii. 16 ; and תְּקוּפֹת הַשָּׁנָה

* The word יָמִים, "days," is frequently rendered "a year," or "years," in the sense of שָׁנָה, a year ; signifying an annual system of days. Thus, "David abode in the country of the Philistines a year and four months." 1 Sam. xxvii. 7 ; where our translation renders it "a full year and four months." Again, "at the end of two years, Pharaoh dreamed, &c." Gen. xli. 1 ; where our translation renders, "at the end of two full years."—" Elkanah went up out of his city to sacrifice unto THE LORD in Shiloh, יָמִים בְּיָמִים, "year by year," or "yearly," as our translation renders the phrase. 1 Sam. i. 3. And he did so, שָׁנָה בְּשָׁנָה, "year by year." 1 Sam. i. 7. Whence, זֶבַח יָמִים, is justly rendered, "the yearly sacrifice." 1 Sam. ii. 19. And the phrase in question is more fully expressed and explained by מִקֵּץ יָמִים לְיָמִים, "from year's end to year's [end]," or "at every year's end," as it is rendered in our translation. 2 Sam. xiv. 26.

And this will enable us to correct some passages of our public translation. The same phrase should be rendered, "And it came to pass, at the end of the year, that the brook dried up," because it ceased to rain in Spring. 1 Kings xvii. 7. The phrase יָמִים אַחֲרֵים should be rendered "one year," Gen. xxvii. 44 ; xxix. 20 ; instead of "a few days." And the phrase יָמִים אֵו עֶשְׂרִים should be rendered "a year, or ten [months]." Gen. xxiv. 55. For surely it would be idle in Rebecca's friends to ask a respite for her departure to Canaan with Abraham's steward, for "a few days, at the least ten," with our translation.

“at the revolution of the year,” Exod. xxxiv. 22 ; as those phrases may more critically be rendered.

III. But in process of time, it was found that the primæval year of 360 days was shorter than the tropical year ; and the first discovery was, that it was deficient five entire days, which therefore it was necessary to intercalate, in order to keep up the correspondence of the civil year to the stated seasons of the principal festivals.

How early this discovery and intercalation was made is no where recorded. It might have been known and practised before the deluge. The apocryphal book of Enoch, which probably was as old as the Septuagint translation of the Pentateuch, stated that “the archangel Ariel, president of the stars, discovered the nature of the month and of the year to Enoch, in the 165th year of his age, and year of the world 1286.” And it is remarkable, that Enoch’s age at his translation, 365 years, expressed the number of entire days in a tropical year.

This knowledge might have been handed down to Noah and his descendants ; and that it was early communicated indeed to the primitive Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Chinese, we learn from ancient tradition.

1. Plutarch de Isid. et Osir. p. 355, states, from an old mythological tradition among the Egyptians, that the five supernumerary days of the year were discovered by the second Hermes, the secretary and chief counsellor of Osiris, or Menes, the first king of Egypt, whose reign, according to the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology, commenced about B.C. 2412 ; and that these days were dedicated to Osiris himself, Isis, his wife, Horus, or Apollo, his son, Typhon, his brother, and Nephthe, or Venus. And Syncellus, Chronograph. p. 123, further relates, that these five days were inserted in the Egyptian Calendar during the reign of Assis, or Asith, the last of the Shepherd kings, which began about B.C. 1948. Herodotus also ascribes this discovery to the Egyptians, and says, that “by inserting them at the end of their civil year of 360 days, they rendered the revolution of time equable and constant ;” B. 2. or brought their Civil year to correspond with the Solar or Tropical. And Diodorus Siculus mentions an ancient king, Osymandes, in whose magnificent sepulchre at Thebes there was a circle of gold, a cubit thick, [or rather, broad] and 365 cubits in circumference, which was divided into so many parts, or compartments, representing the days of the year; and in each division was marked the Heliacal risings and settings of the stars, and the astrological observations deduced from them. This circle, or zodiac, is reported to have remained till the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses, who carried it away to Persia. From the whole of this description of the sepulchre, in Diodorus, taken from Hecateus, who wrote an Egyptian history about B. C. 300, Jackson has abundantly proved, that it could have belonged to no other than the famous Sesostris, under the title of Osymandes, who began to reign about B. C. 1308. See Jackson, vol. ii. p. 396—402.

2. The most ancient and authentic of the Chinese annals, Xu-kim, relates, that the emperor Yao, or Yau, in the 70th year of his reign, B. C. 2269, by the assistance of two skilful astronomers, Hi and Ho, reformed the Chinese Calendar, and adjusted the lunar to the solar year of 365 days, by the intercalation of seven months in the course of 19 years. Jackson, vol. ii. p. 66.

3. These Egyptian and Chinese accounts tend strongly to corroborate the Babylonian or Chaldean astronomical observations of the risings and settings of the stars, reaching back from Alexander's capture of Babylon, B. C. 330, for 1903 years, which were sent to Aristotle by his relation Callisthenes, who attended Alexander on that expedition, according to Porphry. This series of observations, therefore, began B. C. 2233, about the accession of Belus II. who repaired the primitive tower of Babel, and built an observatory thereon. It therefore is more than probable, that the length of the solar year, 365 entire days, was known so early, at least, to the Chaldeans, if it did not originate from them to the neighbouring nations.

And this is confirmed by two remarkable circumstances: 1. That the five supernumerary days were intercalated alike by the Chaldeans, Medes, Persians, Egyptians, Grecians, Romans, and even Mexicans, at the end of their civil year; and 2. That they were celebrated among all these nations with great mirth and feasting. Such were the Σακεα, or Σακεαι ἡμέραι, among the Babylonians, or “days of ebriety,” from the Persic Sakia, “compotatio,” or the Hebrew Sakah, “bibit,” during which, according to sacred and profane history, Babylon was surprised and taken by Cyrus, as foretold by Jeremiah, xxv. 26; li. 39—57; and recorded by Herodotus, B. 1; and Xenophon, Cyropæd. B. 7. These circumstances evidently indicate a common origin.

4. From the Chaldeans and Egyptians, the knowledge of the five supernumerary days of the primitive year, we may presume, was early propagated among the Hebrews and Israelites. Abraham was reckoned a skilful astronomer by Berosus: and he visited Egypt about 29 years before the reign of Assis, when these five days were inserted in the Egyptian Calendar, and might therefore have imparted this discovery to the Egyptians, or learned it from them. And Moses, afterwards, “who was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,” (Acts vii. 22.) we may be assured, was not deficient in this respect. Indeed, his reformation of the calendar, and revival of the sacred year, which began about the vernal equinox; the institution of the anniversary feast of the passover, by a perpetual law, to be celebrated “on the 14th day of the first month, at even,” or about the full moon, which fell upon, or next after, the day of the vernal equinox, Exod. xii. 6—27, required no superficial knowledge of the revolutions of the sun and moon.

IV. By repeated observations, it was at length found, that the solar or tropical year exceeded 365 days by about six hours, or quarter of a day. The Egyptian priests of Thebes claimed the merit of this further discovery also, according to Diodorus, and even so early as the time of the second Hermes, according to Strabo. Still, however, they never introduced this fractional excess into their civil year, because they held all intercalations to be unlucky; and their priests were bound by oath not to intercalate either month or day which they might change into a festival.

Hence this redundancy was confined to the priests and to the astronomers among the Egyptians, nor was it communicated to the Greeks until long after its discovery. Herodotus, who travelled into Egypt, was ignorant of it. Plato and Eudoxus, who resided a long time there, afterwards learned it, as a great mystery, from the priests of Heliopolis and Memphis, and imported it into Greece, and thereby introduced the intercalation of an entire day every fourth year, when the Olympic games were celebrated.

The astronomical skill of the ancient Egyptians appears conspicuously in their celebrated cycle of 25 years, for adjusting the lunar and solar motions together, accommodated to their civil year of 365 days; which was more exact than the cycle of 19 years accommodated to the Julian year of $365\frac{1}{4}$ days. For 25 Egyptian years contain 9125 days, which exceed 309 lunations, amounting to 9124 days, 22 hours, 50 minutes, and 50 seconds, according to Mayer's tables*, by only 1 hour, 9 min. 10 sec.; whereas, 19 Julian years, containing 6939 days, 14 hours, 30 min. 3 sec. fall short of 235 lunations, amounting to 6939 days, 16 hours, 31 min. 16 sec. by 2 hours, 1 min. 13 sec. This cycle of 25 years they represented in their symbolical manner, by the fourth part of their aroura, a measure of ground containing 100 cubits square, according to the Egyptian grammarian Horapollo, who flourished about A.D. 380.

Their next and most celebrated cycle for adjusting the civil year to the solar, was the Sothiacal or Canicular period of 1460 solar years, equal to 1461 Egyptian. For since the deficiency of the Egyptian year of 365 days was one day every 4 years, so in $4 \times 365 = 1460$ years, it would amount to an entire year. Consequently, in the course of this period, the beginning of the Egyptian year, or the first day of the first month Thoth, shifted its place backwards through all the seasons, until it came round again to the same place. And to this probably the Egyptian priests mysteriously alluded, when they told Herodotus, "that from the reign of their first king Menes, to Sethon, priest of Vulcan, the sun had four times altered his course; that it had twice risen where it now sets, and had twice set where it now rises, and this without producing any change in Egypt; that the productions of the earth had been the same, and that there had not been more disease or mortality than usual. Herodot. B. ii. 142. But according to the ensuing rectification of Egyptian chronology, Menes began to reign about B.C. 2412, and Sethon, B.C. 713. The interval, therefore, of 1700 years included more than the Sothiacal period, and therefore, in the course of it, the sun rose twice, and set twice, in the same degrees of the ecliptic. Thus the relation of the priests was strictly conformable to astronomy, a mere natural occurrence, as they justly represented it, and neither a "falsehood," a "dream," nor a "fable," as it has been idly taxed even by chronologers †.

The Sothiacal period was so denominated from Sothis, the Egyptian name of the Dog-star, and was supposed to have commenced when its Heliacal rising coincided with the summer solstice. The learned Censorinus says, that the year A.D. 238, in which he wrote his book De die natali, was the hundredth year of the current period; which began, therefore, A.D. 138, and consequently the preceding period; $1460 - \text{A.D. } 138 = \text{B.C. } 1322$. But in this year the Dog-star rose heliacally on the 20th of July, according to Censorinus and Petavius; and this was also the solstitial day, according to Petavius; or rather the 22d of July, taking into computation the precession of the equinoxes, according to Jackson; so that both very nearly coincided. See Jackson, Vol. ii. p. 7, 75.

* See Tables V. VI.

† Scaliger thus reprobates it: "Missa igitur illa mendacia et somnia Ægyptiorum faciamus." De emend. Temp. p. 198. Stillingfleet:—"That Egyptian fable in Herodotus," &c. Orig. Sacr. p. 90. And Larcher:—"Quant à moi, je les regarde comme une fable grossiere, imaginée par des gens fort ignorans." Herodot. tom. ii. p. 56. Not. Edit. 1.

It is a curious circumstance, that the Egyptian Sothiacal period, and the Chaldean Nabonassarian, both consisting of 1460 years of 365 days, though they differed in the precise time of their introduction, critically synchronized in the beginnings of their correspondent years. For the Era of Nabonassar, beginning with his reign at Babylon, Feb. 26, B.C. 747, was the 120th year of the Period, which commenced 30 days earlier, March 28, B.C. 867, when the new moon fell on the day of the vernal equinox*. But the same year B.C. 747, was the 576th year of the Sothiacal period, commencing July 20, B.C. 1322, or 1323; during which interval, the Thoth, or beginning of the year, had regressed 144 days, (at the rate of a day in every four years) which, counted backwards from July 20, fell on Feb. 26, B.C. 747, also. This indisputably proves a common origin of the Chaldean and Egyptian astronomy. See Jackson, Vol. ii. p. 76.

There is also a remarkable analogy in the construction of those vast astronomical cycles, on which the Chaldeans, Hindus, and Egyptians, founded their pretensions to an antiquity far beyond the creation of the world, as warranted by the most sober and correct records of sacred and profane history, and which evidently were computed backwards, at later periods, from existing data or elements.

1. A Chaldean period of 432,000 years is mentioned by Syn-cellus, p. 30, as including the reigns of their first kings; and this is also supposed to be the length of the Cali yuga, or last of the four Indian ages of the world, beginning with the deluge, B. C. 3102, according to the Brahmins of Hindustan. But this period is evidently produced by the multiplication of the two factors, 18 and 24,000, into each other; of which 18 was the Chaldean Saros, or Plinian period of the lunar inequalities, which is performed in 18 years and 11 days, or 223 lunations; and was much esteemed for its accuracy in computing the returns of eclipses, and other phenomena of the moon's motion. See Cos-tard's Astronomy, p. 94. And the other factor was the annus magnus, or grand revolution of the orb or sphere of the fixed stars, in the course of 24,000 years, occasioned by the precession of the equinoxes, at the Hindu rate of 54 seconds of the ecliptic annually*; which differs surprisingly little from $50\frac{1}{2}$ seconds, the annual rate of the precession, as determined by the nicest observations and most accurate calculations of modern astronomy, in its present high state of improvement. This cycle, therefore, of 432,000 years, must have been invented since the days of Hipparchus, who first found out the precession of the equinoxes, about B.C. 128, and probably since the Christian era. And the year of the Cali yuga, B. C. 3102, was a remarkable astronomical epoch, when the mean motion of Jupiter was slowest, according to La Place, in his Mécanique Celeste, tom. 3. Another remarkable epoch in the Hindu astronomy is the year A.D. 1491, when the mean motion of Saturn was the most rapid, according to the same profound astronomer.

2. Cicero reprobates the foolish and arrogant pretensions of the Chaldeans to a series of recorded observations of the stars for 470,000 years, in round numbers. Diodorus is more particular, and raises it to 473,000 years, before Alexander's expedition into Asia. The correct number is somewhat more, 473,040 years; the additional 40 years being omitted by Diodorus, as insignificant in so great an amount: upon the same principle, that even the 3000 (fortunately preserved by Diodorus) were omitted by Cicero †. But this correct cycle of 473,040 years was evidently formed by the multiplication of two factors; the square of the Chaldean Saros, $18 \times 18 = 324$ years, and the Nabonassarean or Sothiacal period of 1460 years. The square of 18 seems to have been employed, in order to furnish a larger period, approximating more nearly to the true lunar motions than

* 360 degrees is equal to 21,600 minutes, or to 1,296,000 seconds; which, divided by 54 seconds, the annual precession, gives 24,000 years as the quotient.

† Thus Herodotus states, that the sovereignty of the Assyrians in Upper Asia lasted 520 years; but Diodorus reckons it 500 years in round numbers, dropping the surplus, as being immaterial in respect of the whole amount.

the Saros itself, or rather its deficient value, 18 years, neglecting the 11 days over.

3. The grand Egyptian period of 36,525 years, which was supposed to include the time of the 30 dynasties of Egyptian kings, cited from the Old Chronicle, by Syncellus, was formed, in like manner, by multiplying their Sothiacal period of 1461 years into their lunar cycle of 25 years. It was therefore purely astronomical like the rest.

4. M. Bailly, in his sceptical enquiries into the state of ancient astronomy, observed, that several ancient nations, as the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Indians, and Chinese, though seated at great distances from each other, possessed several astronomical formulæ common to them all. It appeared, also, that all these people employed these rules and formulæ, handed down to them by tradition, as several of our workmen make use of certain mechanical or geometrical rules, without any knowledge of the principles upon which they were originally constructed.

All these observations tend to justify the opinion of Herodotus, “that astronomy, with the gnomon, or sun-dial, and the division of the day into twelve parts, were received by the Egyptians from the Babylonians.” B. 2. And that Babylon was the cradle of arts and sciences, which diverged from thence, in every direction, among the more polished nations of antiquity.

In the reign of Giemschid, king of Persia, who was slain by Dahac, king of Media, B. C. 703, a simple and ingenious correction of their civil year of 365 days was introduced, to reconcile it, from time to time, with the sun’s course. Every 120 years they intercalated an entire month of 30 days, to compensate for the 120 quarter days, omitted in that time; and consequently 12 such months, in a period of $12 \times 120 = 1440$ years. This intercalation remained in use till the time of Jesdejird, who was slain, A.D. 632. See Hyde, p. 205.

So late as the time of Herodotus, the Greeks retained the primitive year of 360 days, and every two years they intercalated a month of 30 days. This only made “confusion worse confounded” in their civil year, which thereby consisted of 375 days, receding still further from the sun’s course than the primitive year itself! See the conversation of Solon with Cræsus, Herod. B. 1.

Waving the successive corrections of the Greek year, in their cycles of four, eight, twelve, and nineteen years, to be learned from the technical chronologers, Scaliger, Spanheim, Beverege, and Jackson, by those who are curious in such matters, I shall close this article with the successive improvements of our calendar year, from its rude original state, among the ancient Latins or Albans, to its present state of perfection.

THE LATIN YEAR.

It has been generally supposed that the primitive Latin, as well as the Roman year, consisted only of ten months, because there are only ten named in the calendars of both. But this is a mistake: both had two anonymous intercalary months to make up the primitive number of 360 days; and these were the same months to which Numa afterwards gave the names of Januarius and *Februarius, as in the annexed Table.

* Sciendum decem tantum menses fuisse apud majores—duo vero propter rationem signorum anni intercalabantur; qui postea a Jano et a Februo nominati sunt. Servius in Virgil. Georg. i. 43.

The irregular division of the ancient Latin months was owing to the unequal divisions of the zodiac, supposed to be occupied by the twelve constellations. Thus, according to Servius, Cancer had scarcely 17 degrees allotted to him; Gemini had about 20; Leo about 39; Virgo about 46; and Chelæ, the claws of Scorpio, anciently occupied the room of Libra. Reckoning, therefore, that the sun moved through a degree in the ecliptic each day, and 360 degrees, or the whole, in the year, and allotting as many days to each month as there were degrees in the sign belonging to it, the civil months became necessarily unequal. Servius on Virgil, Georg. i. 24. This is a curious fact, and shows how early the civil months were changed from lunar to solar.

YEAR OF ROMULUS.

Romulus made an important reform in the Latin months, by bringing them nearer to the true standard, and rendering them more equable. He transposed Martius from the third to the first, in honour of Mars, the god of war, as he was himself of a warlike disposition.

YEAR OF NUMA.

By more accurate observations, Numa found that the annual period of the moon, or twelve lunations, amounted to 354 days, and of the sun to 365 days. Instead of the old year, he substituted the lunar, which fell short of the solar by eleven days. Therefore, doubling this deficiency, he intercalated a month of 22 days, at the end of every second year, after the 23d day of the second anonymous month, which he called February, from Februo, “to purge or purify,” from the purifications then usually made by the people, and sacrifices to the manes, or infernal deities; and which, therefore, he did not presume to remove, while he transferred the first anonymous month to the head of the calendar, and called it Januarius, in honour of Janus, the god of time *, descended from יָי, Jah, the God of the Hebrews.

This emendation of the year of Romulus marks uncommon

* At Numa nec Janum nec avitas præterit Umbras, skill and sagacity in Numa, especially at so early an age, and in a country so remote from Chaldea and Egypt, those ancient seats of science. His construction of the lunar year, and adjustment to the solar of 365 days, was by far more simple, ingenious, and scientific, than any of the boasted cycles of Greece or Egypt, even at a later period.

Still, however, Numa injured his calendar by a superstitious veneration for odd numbers, as if they were more lucky than even*. This led him to deduct a day from all the even months of Romulus. February, as being in itself an unlucky month, he left an even number of 28 days, (including the five supernumerary days.) And though January ought to have had but 28 days, being the complement of the rest to 354 days, he added a superfluous day thereto, and made it an odd number 29; and so his lunar year 355 days, or a day too much, and thereby occasioned an excess of two days in his Dieteris, or biennial cycle.

To rectify this redundancy, of which Numa could not be ignorant, we learn from a very obscure passage of Livy, in the history of his reign, that "he so managed his intercalations as to make his year fully correspond with the solar, in the course of a period of 24 years †." Now this could only be effected by omitting the 24 redundant days in 24 years, or subtracting a month of 24 days from every 24th year. Jackson, Vol. ii. p. 62. Spanheim, Chron. Sacr. Part 1, p. 10.

YEAR OF THE DECEMVIRS.

The Decemvirs, who, according to Livy and Dion. Halicarn., were created B.C. 452; Ovid † says, was the general belief, made a slight alteration in the order of Numa's months, by mak-

N. B. Macrobius has miserably perplexed and perverted the meaning of this passage, by supposing that Numa knew the correcter year of $365\frac{1}{4}$ days, and meant to adjust his cycle of 24 years to the Greek Octaeteris. Saturnal. lib. i. 13; and Scaliger blames Numa.

ing February the second month instead of the last, and thereby restoring March to its former station, according to Romulus, as the first month of spring; and this order continued until the time of Julius Cæsar, and ever since.

But the Roman calendar having been entrusted to the care of the Pontifices, they, through neglect or design, did not make the proper intercalations and corrections*. Sometimes they inserted more, sometimes fewer days than they ought, in order to lengthen or shorten the year, thereby to serve their friends, or injure their enemies, who held public offices. This partiality or corruption, introduced such confusion into the calendar, that the civil months no longer corresponded to the proper seasons of the year, but had shifted their places, and fallen backwards considerably. Thus Cicero, four years before Cæsar's third consulate, dated the vernal equinox on the ides of May, which then in reality fell on the 23d of March. May therefore had fallen backwards into the place of March.

To reform this abuse, Julius Cæsar, who was himself a good mathematician, and published a tract on the subject, which is since lost, assisted by Sosigenes, an eminent Alexandrian astronomer, and others, undertook the arduous but important task of correcting the calendar, and also of reforming the old Roman year, which was lunar in its months, and introducing solar in their stead.

For this purpose, he formed a preparatory year of 15 months, or 445 days, thence called the year of confusion. This year began the thirteenth of October, according to the calendar, U.C. 708, or B.C. 46, the day on which he entered upon his third consulate. This day he called the first of January, and first intercalated one month of 23 days after the end of February, making a broken quarter of 80 days, in order to bring the first of March, according to the old system, to its true place of the first of January in the new. After which, he intercalated two months more after the old November, to make up 12 months; assigning to them 34 and 33 days, or 67 in both, which was the complement of the old 10 months to 365 days, as in the following Table, in which the old and intercalated months are reduced to their true places in the Julian year:—

* Diligenter habenda ratio intercalandi est; quod institutum perite a Numa, posterorum pontificum negligentia dissolutum est. Cicero de Legib. lib. ii.

This Table is formed from one given by Petavius, Vol. i. p. 161, corrected and improved. The Table of Jackson, Vol. ii. p. 85, is imperfect and unsatisfactory; it omits the reduction of the several months of the year of confusion to their corresponding beginnings in the Julian, and thereby leaves the reader at a loss to account for the interval between the intercalation of the first month after February, and of the two others after November *.

Thus did this admirable correction, the skill and ingenuity of which will be more admired the more closely it is considered, by its judicious intercalations, bring the beginnings of the new months nearly to a conformity with those of the old, and thereby preserve the Calends nearly in their old places; while, by inserting the additional days at the ends of the months, the Nones and Ides were unaltered: Cæsar thereby respecting the prejudices of the vulgar for these holy days.

* This perhaps will explain a passage in Cicero's epistle to Ligarius, Lib. vi. Epist. 14, which otherwise seems unintelligible: "Ego tamen ad quint. calend. intercalares priores, mane venissem ad Cæsarem."

JULIAN YEAR.

The reformed year, which succeeded the year of confusion, was called Julian, from Julius Cæsar, with whose fourth consulate it began, the first of January, U. C. 709, or B. C. 45.

In modelling the months of it, he first restored all the even months of 30 days, instituted by Romulus, which Numa had altered for the worse, to 29; he next retained the four months of 31 days, used by Romulus and Numa, and added thereto three more, namely, January, Sextilis, and December. February he retained from Numa, according to the following Table, including the twelve Dii Majores, to whom the months were dedicated. And from which it is remarkable, that Janus, the ancient god of time, was excluded, to make way for Juno Matrona.

Junxit, et e pleno tempora quarta die.*

Ovid. Fast. III.

To compensate for the additional quarter of a day, every year above the 365 days, Julius Cæsar inserted a whole day every fourth year; which, because it was inserted after the old terminalia, or 23d day of February, and was therefore reckoned Sextus ante Calendos Martias, bis, or twice *, the leap year in which it was inserted was called Bissextile. And this quadriennial cycle of the Julian year, Scaliger justly calls, Omnium formarum temporibus convenientissima.

The first year of the Julian era, B. C. 45, was Bissextile; consequently, the vulgar year of our Lord's Nativity was Bissextile also. Hence the Julian year 46, or the first of the Vulgar Christian Era, was the first after Bissextile, or a common year, but every fourth ensuing year was Bissextile. Hence, dividing any given year of the Vulgar Era by four, the remainder will give the distance from the former Bissextile. If there be no remainder, the given year is itself Bissextile. Thus the present year, A. D. 1807, which, divided by four, leaves a remainder of three, is "the third after Leap-year."

It might naturally have been expected, that Julius Cæsar would have so ordered his reformed solar year, as to begin on the day of the winter solstice, which, in the year of confusion, was supposed to fall on December 25th †. But he chose to begin his new year on the first of January following, because on that day the moon was new, or in conjunction with the sun, at 7 hours, 6 minutes, 35 seconds after noon. By this means, he began his year on a most high or holy day among the ancient Druids, with whose usages he was well acquainted ‡, and also made his new year the first of a lunar cycle.

* In the statute De Anno Bissextili, 21 Henry III. A. D. 1236, to prevent misunderstanding, the intercalary day and the next before it, were to be reckoned one day, according to the Roman usage.

† Sosigenes computed December 25th to be the day of the winter solstice. But this was incorrect: Kennedy calculated it December 23d, 13 hours, 48 minutes, for B. C. 45, the first Julian year, p. 346.

‡ Among the Celtic nations, the new moon nearest to the winter solstice was celebrated by peculiar religious ceremonies and superstitious usages. In ancient times, the chief Druid, attended by crowds of the people, went into the woods on that night, and cut with a golden sickle a branch of the misselto of the oak, called Ghiah in the Celtic language, and carried it in procession to the sacred grove. The people also cut branches for themselves, and carried them home after they had been blessed or consecrated by the chief Druid. Whence the usage of adorning the pews of our churches and chapels with evergreens, in lieu of misselto, at Christmas.

In France, at the Christmas gambols, so late as the reign of Louis XIV. when they were suppressed on account of their irregularities, traces of the Druidical usages were found. A man personating a prince, (Roi follet, "a mummer,") set out from the village into the woods, bawling out, Au gui menez: Le roi le veut. The monks followed in the rear with their begging-boxes, which they rattled, crying, tire-lire, and the people put money in them, under the fiction that it was for a lady in labour. Persons Thus did he render the Julian Era as complete as possible in that age, and by his authority caused it to be observed in Rome, Italy, and throughout the provinces of the Roman empire, and among all nations as far as his influence extended. A precedence to which it was justly entitled by its own intrinsic excellence.

Julius Cæsar, unfortunately for his country and the world, was assassinated on the Ides of March following, U. C. 710, or B. C. 44; and with him fell the grand plans of further improvement which he meditated. In honour of him and his successor, the months Julius and Augustus were named.

X GREGORIAN YEAR.

This was a correction and improvement of the Julian. It was discovered, at length, by more accurate astronomical observations, that the true solar or tropical year was 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and 57 seconds; whence it fell short of the Julian or Egyptian computation of 365 days and 6 hours, by an interval of 11 minutes, 3 seconds. And, consequently, the true beginning of the year anticipated the civil year by that interval: which, in the course of 130 years, amounted to a whole day. At the end of 130 years, therefore, the tropical year began a day earlier than the civil, or fell back a day behind it. And thus the Julian year, which, at its original institution, was supposed to be fixed, was found to be moveable.

Not adverting to this, when the General Council of Nice, held A. D. 325, wished to celebrate Easter in the Christian Church, according to the Levitical law of the Passover, they decreed, that for the future, "Easter-day should be the first Sunday upon or after the first full moon following the 21st day of March," which was the day on which the vernal equinox fell that year.

in disguise (Guiseards) forced into dwelling-houses, playing antic tricks, and bullying the inhabitants for money and choice victuals, crying, Tire liri, tire liri, maint du blanc, et point du bis.

Hence, says the late professor Robinson, of Edinburgh, (from whose Natural Philosophy, p. 200, this note is taken, p. 210.) evidently was derived the Guisearts of Edinburgh, and their cry, "Hog menay, troll lollay, Gie's your white bread, none of your gray."

The old French, Au gui menez, and the Scottish, Hog menay, are plainly corruptions of the Greek, ἅγια μνηνη, "holy moon," who was anciently supposed "to be in labour" at the time of the conjunction, or new moon. Perhaps tire liri may be a corruption of tirez le roi, "draw forth," and put money "for the king," namely, roi follet, "the nummer."

By this inaccuracy of substituting “ the 21st day of March,” instead of “ the day of the vernal equinox;” as the decree ought to have been worded, in the time of Pope Gregory XIII. A.D. 1582, or 1257 years after the Council of Nice, the equinox was found to be on the 11th of March, having fallen back ten days. In order, therefore, to bring it forward to its former place of the 21st, he left out ten days in October, calling the 5th, the 15th day of that month. Whence, in that year of confusion, the 22d day of December became the first of January A.D. 1583, which was the first year of the Gregorian Era. In making this correction, he was principally assisted by the celebrated mathematician Clavius.

1. But to prevent the repetition of this error in future, a further reformation of the Julian Calendar was wanting. Because the vernal equinox fell backwards three days in the course of 390 years, Gregory, chiefly by the assistance of Aloysius Lilius, decreed that three days should be omitted in every four centuries: namely, that every first, second, and third centurial year, which would otherwise be bissextile, should be a common year; but that every fourth centurial year should remain bissextile. Thus, the years A.D. 1700, 1800, 1900, and 2100, 2200, 2300, were to be common years; but A.D. 1600, 2000, 2400, to remain leap years.

By this ingenious reform, the Julian Calendar is rendered sufficiently accurate for all the purposes of Chronology, and even of Astronomy, for 6000 years to come; because the tropical year itself is subject to a periodical inequality.

2. At the end of 6000 years, a further correction will be necessary. For since the deficiency of the Tropical from the Julian year, 11 min. 3 sec. or 663 seconds, will amount to 265,200 seconds, in the course of 400 years; while three entire days, amounting only to 259,200 seconds, are deficient therefrom 6000 seconds, or one hour and 40 minutes, every 400 years; this deficiency from the correct deduction, will in fifteen such periods, or $15 \times 400 = 6000$ years, amount to 25 hours; or to one day and one hour. Therefore the omission of one day in every 6000 years (by making the 6000th year common, which would otherwise be bissextile) will leave only one hour to be corrected.

3. And this may be done by omitting one day more at the end of 144,000 years, which is the product of 24×6000 ; in which time the hour will amount to 24, or to one day. And this will bring every thing right to a second of time ; if the world shall last so long*.

The Gregorian, or reformed Julian year, was not adopted in England until A.D. 1751, when, the deficiency from the time of the Council of Nice then amounting to eleven days, this number was struck out of the month of September, by Act of Parliament; and the 3d day was counted the 14th, in that year of confusion. The next year, A.D. 1752, was the first of the New Style †, beginning January 1, instead of March 25.

The following Tables, selected from the most approved, will be found useful in such Chronological calculations as depend upon Astronomy.

* From the analogy of the 6000 years in the second correction, to the six millenary ages of the world; and of the 144,000 years, in the third, to the sealed number, in the Apocalypse, Rev. vii. 4; xiv. 1—3; the late Edward King, Esq. formed a very ingenious, but rather fanciful scheme, of a grand Sabbatic Era of 144,000 years, in his Morsels of Criticism, Vol. III. p. 188.

† By the Act of 24 Geo. II. A.D. 1752, relative to the Alteration of the Style, it was enacted,

“ That Easter-day, on which the rest of the moveable feasts depend, is always the first Sunday after the full moon which happens upon, or next after, the 21st of March: and if the full moon happens upon a Sunday, Easter-day is the Sunday after.”

Here our Legislators seemed to have considered the 21st of March as the earliest Paschal full moon; and in consequence of this, the earliest Easter-day, in the Tables annexed to the Calendar in the Book of Common Prayer, is fixed to the 22d of March; and the latest, to April 25, including a range of 35 days; on account of the variations of the time of full moon during a synodical month of $29\frac{1}{2}$ days, added to 7, the variations of Sunday, in that time = 36; from which subtracting 1, for the difference between the full moon and Easter-day, the remainder is 35.

But at present, the vernal equinox, which they supposed could not be earlier than the 21st of March, now falls on the 20th; and may fall back to the 19th, before the expiration of 130 years. And when this shall be the case, if the mean Paschal new moon shall happen on the 4th of March upon a Friday; then to March 4, add 15 days; and the Paschal full moon will fall on the 19th of March, on a Saturday; and will coincide with the day of the vernal equinox: and consequently the 20th of March will be Easter Sunday, according to the spirit, but not the letter of the Act.

Hence, the Paschal astronomical rule might have been worded more correctly, thus: “ Easter-day is always the first Sunday after the full moon which happens either upon, or next after, the vernal equinox; which, in the New Style, will ever fall either on the 19th, or on the 20th day of March; reckoning the hours from midnight.”

For this judicious correction, we are indebted to Kennedy's Astronomy, p. 362.

By the foregoing Act of Parliament, the beginning of the year was changed from March 25, to the first of January. Russia is the only civilized state of Europe that retains the Old Style.

Certain precautions, however, are necessary for avoiding mistakes, when we recur to remote astronomical observations, where the accurate interval of days is required, however large. For, 1. Although 100 Julian years contain 36,525 days, we must keep in mind, that from A.D. 300, to A.D. 1600, there is a deficiency of ten days from the whole amount; eleven days from A.D. 1600, to A.D. 1900; and twelve days from A.D. 1900, to A.D. 2200.

2. In astronomical tables, the years before the Christian Era are counted backwards: the supposed year of the Nativity being marked 0*, the foregoing, 1; the year before that, 2; &c. But Chronologers generally reckon the year of the Nativity, B.C. 1; the foregoing, B.C. 2, &c. as follows:

Julian years	41, 42, 43, 44, 45, — 46, 47, 48, 49.
Astronom.	4, 3, 2, 1, 0, — 1, 2, 3, 4.
Chronol.	5, 4, 3, 2, 1, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4.

The Astronomers are wrong, and the Chronologers right. For the commencement of the Era, or the fixed point from which we ought to reckon, both forwards and backwards, is midnight; which divides the old from the new year: it is the limit between both, and as not belonging to either, should be marked zero, or 0: but the Julian 45, terminating therein, is a real quantity, as much as the year 46, and should be marked -1 , or the first of the regressive series, as the latter, $+1$, is the first of the progressive.

To prevent such ambiguities chiefly, the Julian Period, of 7980 years, whose 4714th year corresponded to A.D. 1, was invented by Joseph Scaliger, who called it so †, as being accommodated to the Julian year, beginning the first of January. By the help of this, the years of the regressive series may be critically ascertained. As an Astronomical Cycle, indeed, it is of considerable use.

CYCLES.

Of the various Cycles, or recurring periods of years, noticed by Chronologers, the oldest and most celebrated is

* This is the case, not only in the old astronomical tables of Calvisius, &c. but in the modern, Pingrè, &c.

† Novam nostram periodum—Julianam vocavimus, quia ad annum Julianum accommodata, et quidem à Kalendis Januarii. p. 361.

I. THE CYCLE OF THE MOON.

The ancient Greeks were required, by the Laws and by the Oracles, to sacrifice according to Months, Days, Years; which they all interpreted, to regulate their years by the Sun; their months and days by the Moon. And their principal Games, the Olympic, were required to be celebrated every fifth year, (like the Roman lustra,) at the full moon next after the summer solstice. But as the lunar year was eleven entire days shorter than the solar, their great object was to bring both to a conformity, as near as may be, by occasionally intercalating months in the former, to fill up the deficiency. Meton, therefore, a celebrated Astronomer, found out, B.C. 430, that by intercalating 7 lunations in 19 lunar years, they were brought so nearly to a correspondence in length with 19 solar years, that the times of celebrating their games and festivals could be adjusted, both to the new and full moons, and to the equinoxes and solstices, with little variation, by the help of his tables. For a public service so important, he was declared victor in the first class, at the Olympic games, a statue was decreed to him, and his Tables were inscribed upon a marble pillar, in letters of gold. Hence the current years of his Cycle were called the Golden number.

But it was found that his Cycle was imperfect: for in 19 years there are sometimes five leap years, at other times only four. Hence the new and full moons computed thereby, sometimes varied a day from the truth, in leap years, after February. The only way to remedy this error, was by extending the Cycle to $4 \times 19 = 76$ years, in which there are 19 leap years exactly. This, we may suppose, led Calippus, in the ensuing century, to publish the Calippic period of 76 years, as an improvement of the Metonic, beginning B. C. 330.

But the lunar and solar Tables, constructed on the Lunar Cycle, will require correction, after 310 years. For 235 lunations, amounting to 6939 d. 16 h. 32 m. 28 sec. are deficient from 19 Julian years, or 6939 d. 18 h. by a remainder of 1 h. 27 m. 31 sec. or within an hour and half: and this interval in about 310, or 312 years, will amount to a whole day: so that the new moon, at the end of this period, will anticipate its time at the beginning of it, an entire day, earlier.

Not adverting to this, in our Prayer-books, before the alteration of the style, are given "Tables for finding Easter for ever," by the help of the Golden Number. In consequence of which, the Ecclesiastical Easter has several times been a week different from the true Easter, before A.D. 1752. But since the New Style, that inconvenience has been remedied, by giving Tables to find Easter only for limited times : 1. from 1765 to 1899, inclusive ; and 2. from 1900 to 2199, inclusive : by shifting the Golden Numbers a day later in the latter Table than in the former.

To find the Golden Number, see the Rules given in the Prayer-Book, Beverege, Ferguson, &c.

II. THE CYCLE OF THE SUN.

This is, strictly speaking, the Cycle of the Sunday letter. Since a common year consists of 52 weeks, and one day over ; if the first year begins on Sunday, the second will begin on Monday, the third on Tuesday, &c. the seventh on Saturday, and the eighth on Sunday again. And so, if all the years were common, it would be a cycle of seven years. But this order is interrupted by the Bissextile every fourth year, in which there are two days over : and this will prevent the recurrence of Sunday again, at the beginning of the year, until after a cycle of $4 \times 7 = 28$ years. The same will hold of any other day of the week.

To find the Dominical, or Sunday letter, see the rules in the foregoing books.

III. THE CYCLE OF INDICTION.

This was a cycle of 15 years, used only by the Romans, for appointing the times of certain public taxes ; as appears from the title in the Code, De tributo indicto. It was established by Constantine, A.D. 312, in the room of the heathen Olympiads ; and was used in the acts of the General Councils, Emperors, and Popes.

IV. THE JULIAN PERIOD.

This celebrated period was formed by the continued multiplication of the Cycles of the Sun, 28 years ; of the Moon, 19 years ; and of Indiction, 15 years ; whose product gives 7980 years. In its first year, the Cycle of the Sun was 1, of the Moon 1, and of Indiction 1 ; but the three Cycles can never so correspond again, until the end of it. Every intermediate year will be distinguished by different numbers of those Cycles, until the last year, 7980, when the division by the prime numbers 28, 19, and 15, respectively, will leave no remainders; the numbers themselves then expressing the last years of each cycle.

At the commencement of the Vulgar Era, the year of the current cycle of the Sun was 10, of the Moon 2, and of Indiction, 4; and from these characters, the corresponding year of the Julian Period may be found, by the help of the following analytical problem.

To find a number, which being divided by three given integral numbers, 28, 19, and 15; shall leave given remainders, 10, 2, and 4, respectively.

Let x be the integral number sought, which, divided by the two first divisors, will leave the remainders required. Then will $\frac{x-10}{28}$, and $\frac{x-2}{19}$, be integers. Put $\frac{x-10}{28}=m$, and $\frac{x-2}{19}=n$; then $x=28m+10$; and $x=19n+2$; and consequently, $n=\frac{28m+8}{19}$, an integer. From this, subtract the nearest integer, $\frac{19m+19}{19}$, and the remainder will be an integer, $\frac{9m-11}{19}=a$; and consequently, $m=\frac{19a+11}{9}$. From this, subtract the nearest integer, $\frac{18a+9}{9}$, and the remainder will also be an integer, $\frac{a+2}{9}=b$. And consequently, $a=9b-2$. Substitute this value of a , in the last found value of m ; which will give $m=19b-3$. Substitute this in the first original value of x , and then $x=532b-74$. Hence b will be affirmative; and substituting its least possible value, 1, then $x=532-74=458$. But this number, 458, will fulfil the conditions of the two first divisors; leaving the remainders 10 and 2, respectively.

If now to this number, 458, we add the product of the two first divisors, $28 \times 19=532$, or any multiple thereof, $532y$: supposing y to denote any affirmative integer, the aggregate $532y+458$, will equally fulfil the conditions of the two first divisors.

Let this aggregate next be supposed to answer the condition of the third divisor, 15, also. Then will $\frac{532 y + 458 - 4 =$

$\frac{532 y + 454}{15}$ be an integer. From it subtract the nearest integer, $\frac{525 y + 450}{15}$, and the remainder will be an integer also, $\frac{7 y + 4}{15} = c$.

And consequently $y = \frac{15 c - 4}{7}$. From this, subtract the nearest integer, $\frac{14 c}{7}$, and the remainder will be an integer, $\frac{c - 4}{7} = d$. And consequently $c = 7 d + 4$. Substitute now this value of c , in the foregoing value of y , and $y = 15 d + 8$. Where d may be either any affirmative integer, or nothing; taking, therefore, its least value, 0, then $15 d$, vanishing, $y = 8$. Substitute now this value of y , in the aggregate numbers, it becomes $532 \times 8 + 458 = 4256 + 458 = 4714$, which is the year of the Julian Period required*.

But the problem may be proposed generally, as in Simpson's Algebra, Edit. 4. p. 191.

“Supposing e, f , and g , to denote given integers; to find such a value of x , as that the quantities $\frac{x - e}{28}$, $\frac{x - f}{19}$, and $\frac{x - g}{15}$, may be all integers.

“By making $\frac{x - e}{28} = y$, we have $x = 28 y + e$; which value being substituted in our second expression, it becomes $\frac{28 y + e - f}{19}$, which as well as y , is to be a whole number: but $\frac{28 y + e - f}{19}$, by making $b = e - f$, will be $= y + \frac{9 y + b}{19}$; and therefore $19 y$, and $18 y + 2 b$, being both divisible by 19, their difference, $y - 2 b$, must also be divisible by the same number; whence it is evident that one value of y , is $2 b$; and that $2 b + 19 z$ (supposing z a whole number) will be a general value of y ; and consequently, that $x (= 28 y + e) = 532 z + 56 b + e$, is a general value of x , answering the two first conditions.

* This easy and simple method of solving the problem, was originally given in my Analysis Æquationum, 1784, p. 99.

“ Let this, therefore, be substituted in the remaining expression, $\frac{x-g}{15}$; which, by that means, becomes $\frac{532z + 56b + e - g}{15} =$

$$35z + 3b + \frac{7z + \beta}{15} \text{ (supposing } \beta = 11b + e - g = 12e - 11f - g\text{)}$$

Here $15z$ and $14z + 2\beta$ being both divisible by 15, their difference, $z - 2\beta$, must likewise be divisible by the same number; and therefore one value of z will be 2β , and the general value of $z = 2\beta + 15w$: from whence the general value of $x (= 532z + 56b + e)$ is given $= 7980w + 1064\beta + 56b + e$; which, by restoring the values of b and β , becomes $7980w + 12825e - 11760f - 1064g$.

“ Now to have all the terms affirmative, and their co-efficients the least possible, let w be taken $= -e + 2f + g$; whence there results, $4845e + 4200f + 6916g$, for a new value of x : from which, by expounding e , f , and g , by their given values, and dividing the whole by 7980; the least value of x , which is the remainder of the division, will be known.” So far Simpson.

From this ingenious and subtile analytical solution it appears,

1. That e , the given number of the Solar Cycle, is to be multiplied by 4845 ($= 19 \times 15 \times 17$) or by the least multiple of the Lunar and Indiction Cycles, which, divided by the Solar 28, will leave 1 remainder.

2. That f , the given number of the lunar cycle, is to be multiplied by 4200 ($= 28 \times 15 \times 10$) or by the least multiple of the solar and indiction cycles, which, divided by the lunar 19, will leave 1.

3. That g , the given number of the indiction, is to be multiplied by 6916 ($= 28 \times 19 \times 13$) or by the least multiple of the solar and lunar cycles, which, divided by the cycle of indiction 15, will leave 1.

4. That the aggregate of these three terms is to be divided by the Julian period 7980, and the remainder will be the year required.

Hence is derived Beverege's Arithmetical Rule, p. 192, 380.

I. To find the year of the Julian Period corresponding to certain given years of the Cycles of the Sun, Moon, and Indiction.

Multiply the given year of the cycle of the sun by 4845; of the moon by 4200, and of indiction by 6916; and divide the sum of the products by 7980: the remainder will be the year of the Julian Period required.

Thus, if we repeat the foregoing example of the given years of the three cycles, A.D. 1.

$$L \ 2 \times 4200 = 8400$$

$$I \ 4 \times 6916 = 27664$$

$$\text{Divide by 7980} \qquad \qquad \qquad \underline{84514}$$

The remainder is—4714, as before.

The converse is,

II. To find the respective years of the Cycles of the Sun, Moon, and Indiction, corresponding to a given year of the Julian Period.

Divide the given year by the numbers 28, 19, 15, successively; the quotients will shew the number of revolutions of each cycle till that time, and the remainders the respective years of each current cycle. If there be no remainders, then the divisors themselves will be the last years of the cycles.

Thus, if the same year 4714, be divided by 28, 19, 15, successively, the quotients 168, 248, 314, will express the number of revolutions of each cycle, from the beginning of the period till that time; and the remainders, 10, 2, 4, the years of the current cycles respectively.

Hence it appears, that the Julian Period began B.C. 4714, and will end A.D. 3266. It does not therefore precede the creation, and include the commencement of historical time, as was imagined by its inventor, and the followers of the shorter Jewish system of chronology. As an historical period, therefore, it is considerably inferior to the Vulgar Christian Era, which running infinitely, backwards and forwards, from a well-known fixed point, is immediately commensurate to the whole of duration, past, present, and future.

EPACTS.

Epacts, or ἡμέραι επακται, are “additional days,” requisite to find out the moon’s age.

Since the lunar year of 354 days is deficient from the solar of 365 days, by 11 days, this deficiency will run through every year of the lunar cycle. Thus the epact of the first year of the cycle is 11, because 11 days are to be added to the lunar, in order to complete the solar year ; the epact of the second is 22 ; the epact of the third $33 - 30 = 3$, because the moon's age cannot exceed 30 days ; the epact of the fourth, 14 ; and so on till the last year of the cycle, whose epact is 29 ; and the epact of the first year of the next cycle, 11, as before.

The following Rules will shew the use of Epacts :—

RULE I. To find the year of the Lunar Cycle, or the Golden Number, in any given year of our Lord.

Add 1 to the given year, then divide the sum by 19, the remainder, if any, is the golden number ; if there be no remainder, then 19 is the golden number.

Thus 1808 divided by 19 leaves 3, which is the golden number of the year 1807.

The reason of the addition of unit, is, because the Vulgar Christian Era began in the second year of the lunar cycle, as shewn before.

RULE II. To find the Epact in any given year.

If the year precede the alteration of the style, A.D. 1752 ;

First find the golden number of that year ; multiply it by 11 ; if the product be less than 30, it will be the epact, but if greater, divide it by 30, and the remainder will be the epact.

But if the year follow A.D. 1752, because eleven days were then struck out of the calendar, the epact so found will require correction.

If it be greater than 11, subtract 11 from it ; if less, add to it 30, and subtract 11 from the sum : the remainder, in either case, will give the epact.

Thus the golden number of the year 1807, namely 3, multiplied by 11, and the product divided by 30, left 3 for the epact ; this again multiplied by 11 gives 33, from which subtracting 11, the remainder 22 gives the corrected epact.

RULE III. To find the Moon's Age on any given day of the year.

Add together the epact of the given year, the number of months from March inclusive, and the proposed day of the month ; if the sum be less than 30, it will be the moon's age, but if greater, its remainder, when divided by 30, will be the moon's age.

Thus, if it be required to find the moon's age on November 15, 1807, the epact is 22, the distance from March inclusive 9 months, the day 15. The sum of these is 46, from which subtract 30, the remainder is the moon's age, 16. But upon the 15th of November, 1807, the moon was partially eclipsed about 7 in the morning, and consequently, 14 days, 18 hours, 22 minutes, after the true conjunction. But the true and mean conjunctions may differ from each other 12 hours, and this rule is adapted to the mean.

Again, if the moon's age be required on November 29, 1807 : to the epact 22, and distance 9, add 29 ; the sum is 60 ; which, divided by 30, leaves no remainder : therefore it was new moon that day ; and this is verified by a partial eclipse of the sun on that day, about $10\frac{1}{2}$ in the morning.

This simple and ingenious rule will never vary a whole day, or 24 hours, from the mean computed time, and will therefore answer sufficiently for common use.

PASCHAL FULL MOONS.

From the difference between the times of the true and computed Paschal new moons, as calculated astronomically, and computed by such rules as the preceding, which were in use among the Jews formerly, (as was the Calippic period at that very time*) and which may vary a day in their results, we may naturally account for a circumstance noticed in the Gospels ; namely, that our Lord and his disciples ate the passover on Maudy Thursday, but the chief priests and their adherents on Good Friday. The former day was, ἡ πρώτη των ἀζυμων, “the first of the feast of unleavened bread ;” Matt. xxvi. 17 ; ὅτε το πασχα εθουον, “when they usually sacrificed the passover ;” Mark xiv. 12 ; εν ἡ εδει θυεσθαι το πασχα, “on which the passover ought to be sacrificed ;” Luke xxii. 7 †. Thursday, there-

* See Spanheim, Chronol. Sacr. p. 82, who thinks it was introduced with the Syro-Macedonian year into Judæa, after Alexander the Great's time.

† The prime annual feast of the Passover, instituted in memory of that signal deliverance of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage, when the Lord “passed over,” or spared the houses of the Israelites, but smote the first-born of the Egyptians, was ordained by a perpetual law, to begin on the 14th day of the moon's age, at even, about that full moon which fell upon or next after the day of the vernal equinox. This is collected from Moses, Exod. xii. 6—27. as admirably explained by Josephus and Philo, those great Jewish antiquaries and philosophers.

The former says, “the Passover was to be sacrificed yearly, τεσσαρακαιδεκατη, κατα fore, was the proper ἡμέρα παρασκευῆ, “preparation-day,” Luke xxiii. 54; whereas the next, Friday, which was παρασκευῆ των Ιουδαιων, “the preparation of the Jews,” John xix. 42, or their παρασκευῆ του πασχα, “preparation of the pass-over,” John xix. 14, as distinguished from the former, was improper. Chrysostom, Hom. 74, on Matt. xxvi. thinks, “that the chief priests designedly postponed the celebration of the pass-over, in order to put JESUS to death;” which might have been the case, but the reason here given is sufficient. Petavius well accounts for our Lord’s sending to a particular householder, with whom he meant to celebrate the passover with his disciples; Matt. xxvi. 18; because he knew him to be a strict observer of the legitimate passover, as distinguished from the generality of the Jews, who were misled by the authority of the chief priests, Scribes, and Pharisees, to celebrate it improperly. Petav. Vol. II. p. 244.

Philo also mentions a circumstance, by which they might have easily known the legitimate day, even without astronomical calculation. He says, Νουμηνια γαρ αρχεται φωτιζειν αισθητω τω φεγγι ο ἡλιος σεληνην. “On the day of the new moon, the sun begins to illuminate the moon with a sensible light,” which, though it seldom happens so early in our gross atmosphere, yet σεληνην, εν κριω του ἡλιου καθεστωτος, on the 14th, according to the moon, when the sun was in Aries.” Ant. 3, 10, 5. The latter, that “the Passover, a public feast, was to be celebrated, τεσσαρακαιδεκατη ἡμερα, μελλοντος του σεληνιακου κυκλου γενεσθαι πλησιφαιου. On the 14th day, when the lunar disk was going to be fully illuminated.” De Vita Mosis, p. 530. Hence the phrase, “according to the moon,” in Josephus, must signify according to the moon’s age, reckoned from the true conjunction or new moon, and not from the first appearance of the new moon, as the later Rabbins have idly imagined. Otherwise, how could the Passover ever be celebrated in cloudy weather, when the moon was invisible perhaps for a week or fortnight? But to determine the times of mean and true lunar conjunctions, and of the sun’s entrance into the first degree of Aries, at the vernal intersection of the equinoctial and ecliptic, are nice astronomical problems, even at the present day, requiring accurate tables of the sun and moon’s motions. And surely Moses must have constructed such, in order to enable his successors to observe properly the indispensable law of the Passover.

It has been suspected, and not without foundation, that the celebrated lunar cycle of 19 years, which Meton, the astronomer, introduced into Greece for the adjustment of their lunar year with the solar, was borrowed from the ancient Jewish tables. This was the opinion of the learned Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, about A.D. 270.

Εχει τουνυ εν τω πρωτω ετει την νουμηνιαν του πρωτου μηνος, ἡτις ἀπασης εστιν αρχη της εννεακαιδεκατηριδος.—Εστι δ’ ουχ ἡμετερος ο λογος, Ιουδαιοις δ’ εγγινωσκετο τοις παλαι και προ Χριστου. “The cycle of 19 years has in the first year the new moon of the first month, which is the beginning of the whole.”—“This is not our opinion merely, but it was known to the Jews of old, even before CHRIST.”

sometimes will ; as Kennedy demonstrated of the Paschal new moon, A.D. 1761, when the 14th day of the month was also the 14th of the moon's age, immediately preceding the full moon, p. 367. And this vision of the moon might more frequently happen in the pure and serene climate of Judea. And on this was founded the modern Jewish rule, Π , Iah, (the numeral letters signifying 18) denoting 18 hours, which they counted backwards from the first vision of the moon, to find the true conjunction. And this is confirmed by the Grecian astronomer Geminus, who states, "that when the moon is in perigee, and her motion quickest, she does not usually appear until the second day, nor in apogee, when slowest, until the fourth." The exception in the former case intimating that she might sometimes be seen on the first day.

Near the end of the second century, a violent controversy broke out between the Greek and Roman Churches, whether the passover ought to be celebrated on the 14th day of the Paschal moon with CHRIST, or on the 15th with Caiaphas. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, in a Council held A.D. 197, decreed in favour of the Quatuordecimans, alleging the primitive usage ; on the other hand, Victor, bishop of Rome, in a Council held there the ensuing year, decreed in favour of the Quintadecimans, and absolutely excommunicated the Asiatic Churches for their schism ; which was resisted on their part, and so the controversy raged till the council of Nice, A.D. 325, when the emperor Constantine put an end to it by a decree in favour of the Quintadecimans, who were the most violent, because they had the worst of the argument, and were taxed with judaising by their opponents.

This controversy was afterwards revived in the sixth century, when a Council was held in England about A.D. 599, deciding in favour of the Quatuordecimans ; when the Romish monks, with Austin at their head, stirred up Ethelfrid, king of Northumberland, to massacre about 1200 monks of the monastery of Bangor, who dissented from the authority and usage of the Church of Rome, and much blood was spilt in the war kindled thereby. At length, about A.D. 716, the British Clergy were prevailed on to submit to the Papal decree. See Spanheim, p. 682, &c. 1118, &c.

If the year of the crucifixion was A.D. 31, as is most likely, it follows, from an eclipse of the moon, in Pingrè's tables, April 25th, at 9 afternoon, that the Paschal full moon that year fell on the 27th of March, which, in the calculations of Newton, Ferguson, and Lamy, and the computation of Bacon, is reckoned Tuesday; but there is sometimes a variation of a day or two in their computations of the days of the week, so that it might have happened on Thursday. On the other hand, Scaliger, Dodwell, and Mann, reckon that Paschal full moon, a day earlier, 26th of March *; and Petavius, 23d of March. Vol. ii. p. 374. This shews the uncertainty of the precise day of full moon, and supports the foregoing opinion of a double passover.

ECLIPSES.

The word Eclipse (εκλειψις) signifies “failure,” namely, of light. An eclipse of the sun is caused by the intervention of the moon, at new, or in conjunction with the sun, intercepting his light from the earth, either totally or partially. An eclipse of the moon † is caused by the intervention of the earth, intercepting the sun’s light from the moon, when full, or in opposition to the sun, either totally or partially.

The reason why the sun is not eclipsed every new moon, nor the moon at every full, is owing to the inclination of the moon’s orbit to the plane of the ecliptic, or earth’s orbit, in an angle of about $5\frac{1}{2}$ degrees; in consequence of which, the moon is generally too much elevated above the plane of the ecliptic, or too much depressed below it, for her disk to touch the earth’s shadow at full, or for her shadow, or her penumbra, to touch the earth’s disk at new.

An eclipse therefore of either luminary can only take place when they are within their proper limits, or distances from the nodes or intersections of both orbits. And because the limits of solar eclipses are wider than those of lunar, in general there will be more eclipses of the sun than of the moon. In any year, the number of eclipses of both luminaries cannot be less than two, and these will both be of the sun, nor more than seven: the usual number is four; and it is very rare to have more than six.

* See Bowyer’s Tables of the times of the Paschal full moons for A.D. 31, 32, 33, 34, in his Conjectures on the New Testament, Note on John vi. 4. p. 149. 3d edit.

† Manetho, the Egyptian priest, who flourished about B.C. 304, taught, Σεληνην εκλειπειν εις το σκιασμα της γης επιπτουσαν, “that the moon was eclipsed by falling into the earth’s shadow.”

But though solar eclipses happen oftener, lunar are more frequently observed in any particular place. For an eclipse of the moon is visible to the inhabitants of half the globe at the same instant; whereas, an eclipse of the sun is visible only within that part of the earth's surface, traversed by the moon's total shadow, and by her penumbra, or partial shadow. But her total shadow, when she is nearest to the earth, cannot cover a space of more than 158 geographical miles in diameter, nor at her mean distance more than 79, and at her greatest distance may not touch the earth at all. In the two former cases, the sun will be eclipsed in the places covered by the shadow totally, or by the penumbra partially: in the last it may be annular, but not total. Without the reach of the shadow, and within the limits of the penumbra, which cannot cover more than 4552 miles of the earth's surface, there will be a partial eclipse of the sun, and without these limits no eclipse at all. Hence lunar eclipses are more frequently noticed by historians than solar; and Diogenes Laertius may be credited, when he relates, that during the period in which the Egyptians had observed 832 eclipses of the moon, they had only observed 373 of the sun.

In the midst of a total lunar eclipse, the moon's disk is frequently visible, and of a deep red or copperish colour. This, in the poetic language of sacred prophecy, is expressed by "the moon's being turned into blood." Joel ii. 31. This remarkable phenomenon is caused by the sun's lateral rays in their passage through the dense atmosphere of the earth, being inflected into the shadow by refraction, and falling pretty copiously upon the moon's disk, are reflected from thence to the eye of the spectator. If the earth had no atmosphere, the moon's disk would then be as black as in a solar eclipse.

A total eclipse of the moon may occasion a privation of her light for an hour and a half, during her total immersion in the shadow; whereas, a total eclipse of the sun can never last in any particular place above four minutes, when the moon is nearest to the earth, and her shadow thickest.

Hence it appears, that the darkness which "overspread the whole land of Judea," at the time of our Lord's crucifixion, was præternatural, "from the sixth until the ninth hour," or from noon till three in the afternoon, in its duration, and also in its time, about full moon, when the moon could not possibly eclipse the sun. The time it happened, and the fact itself, are recorded in a curious and valuable passage of a respectable Roman Consul, Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator, about A.D. 514.

“In the consulate of Tiberius Cæsar Aug. V. and Ælius Sejanus, (U.C. 784. A.D. 31.) OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST suffered, on the 8th of the Calends of April: (25th of March) When there happened such an eclipse of the sun as was never before nor since.*”

In this year, and in this day, agree also the Council of Cæsarea, A.D. 196, or 198; the Alexandrian Chronicle, Maximus Monachus, Nicephorus Constantinus, Cedrenus; and in this year, but on different days, concur Eusebius and Epiphanius, followed by Kepler, Bucher, Patinus, and Petavius, some reckoning it the 10th of the Calends of April, others the 13th. Amidst this variety of days, we may look on the 26th or 27th of March as the most probable, noticed in the foregoing article.

And indeed that the passover of the crucifixion was an early one, may be collected from the circumstance of “the servants and officers having made a fire of coals in the hall of the high-priest’s house, for it was cold, at which they and Peter warmed themselves.” John xviii. 19; Luke xxii. 55; Mark xiv. 54. Whereas the passovers of the two ensuing years, A.D. 32, April 14, and A.D. 33, April 3, were later in the season, and probably milder.

The præternatural darkness at the crucifixion was accompanied by an earthquake, which altogether struck the spectators, and among them the centurion and Roman guard, with great fear, and a conviction that JESUS WAS THE SON OF GOD. Matt. xxvii. 51—54.

There was also a remarkable paleness of the sun on the year of Julius Cæsar’s assassination, B.C. 44, attributed by astronomers to an unusual number of spots on the sun’s disk; which Mark Anthony, in a letter to Hyrchanus, high priest of the Jews, written after the defeat and death of Cæsar’s assassins, Brutus and Cassius, attributed to the divine displeasure. “On account of these enormities, the sun, we think, was turned away, who, even himself, viewed with displeasure the crime against Cæsar †.”

II. Eclipses among the ancients, before their cause was known, were considered as signs of the times, and indications of divine displeasure. They are so represented even in SCRIPTURE.

The prophet Amos, who wrote two years before "the great earthquake," which probably happened near the end of Jeroboam II.'s reign, thus predicts it, and an extraordinary eclipse of the sun:—

"Shall not the land quake for this? [the sins of the people.] And it shall come to pass, in that day, saith the LORD GOD, that I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day; and I will turn your feasts into mourning, and your songs into lamentations." Amos viii. 8—10. And our Lord himself, among the prognostics of his second coming in glory, foretels, "And there shall be signs in the sun, and moon, and stars," &c. Luke xxi. 25. Hence, the Jews were warned against the superstitious notions of the heathens, attributing to the luminaries themselves (as in the case of Anthony) sense and intelligence, and a powerful influence over human affairs. "Thus saith the LORD: Learn not the ways of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of the heavens, for the heathen are dismayed at them." Jer. x. 2. Thus, the battle between the Medes and Lydians was put an end to by the solar eclipse of B.C. 603; and on the outsetting of Xerxes from Sardis, on the expedition against Greece, (though more probably from Susa the year before) Herodotus relates, that "the sun quitting his place in the heavens disappeared; and though the sky was free from clouds, and perfectly serene, instead of day it became night. Xerxes observing this with surprise, and no small anxiety, enquired of the Magi what might be the meaning of the prodigy? They answered, that the gods by this pre-*sa*ge plainly foretold the destruction of the Grecian states, because the sun was the protector of Greece, but the moon of the Persians." Herodot. B. vii. 37. The disastrous issue of this expedition to the Persians remarkably confirmed the observation of Isaiah: "That THE LORD frustrateth the signs of the liars, and maketh the diviners mad; he turneth wise men backwards, and maketh their wisdom foolishness." Isa. xlv. 25. The Magi were the established priests and diviners of the Persian empire.

Livy also mentions an eclipse of the sun, in the consulate of M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, U.C. 561, B.C. 188, July 17, for which the College of Decemvirs decreed a public supplication for three days. Liv. 38, 36.

III. How early Eclipses began to be calculated by the ancients does not appear. In the age of Thales, at least, the elements of the calculation of eclipses were known in Greece; for Herodotus says, that he foretold to the Ionians the year of the remarkable eclipse that put an end to the battle between the Medes and Lydians. Herodot. B. 1. 74. Anaxagoras, also, predicted that remarkable eclipse of the sun, mentioned by Thucydides to have happened in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, July 1, B.C. 431. And Livy states, that Sulpicius Gallus predicted with great accuracy a lunar eclipse, which happened on the night before the battle of Pydna, in which the Romans defeated Perseus, king of Macedon, June 21, U.C. 586, B.C. 168. "When the Roman soldiers looked on the wisdom of Gallus as almost divine; but the Macedonians and their priests were alarmed thereat, as an ominous prodigy portending the fall of the kingdom, and destruction of the nation; and there was a clamour and a howling in the Macedonian camp, until the moon emerged again into her own light." Liv. 44, 27.

Costard conjectures that Thales and Anaxagoras, in their computations, made use of the celebrated Chaldean Saros, or cycle, mentioned by Pliny; which "was a period of 223 lunations in the course of 18 Julian years and 11 days: in which the returns of eclipses, and other phænomena of the moon's motions, are very regularly performed;" in the judgment of Halley, that great astronomer, who, from an eclipse of the sun, observed at London and Dantzic, June 22, 1666, by the help of the Chaldean Saros, was enabled to calculate another, eighteen years after, July 2, 1684, with an exactness little inferior to the observation itself at the time. Costard. Astron. p. 94.

To this Chaldean period Theocritus probably alluded, when he styled Adonis, or the sun,

Οκτωκαιδεκατης η εννεακαιδεκ' ο γαμβρος,

"The bridegroom of eighteen or nineteen years."—Idyll. 15.

The ecliptic conjunctions of the sun and moon being represented, in mythological language, as a marriage.

The same imagery was used in SCRIPTURE by David, near 800 years before Theocritus, where he describes the sun as "a bridegroom coming out of his chamber." Ps. xix. 5.

IV. Eclipses are justly reckoned among the surest and most unerring characters of Chronology: for they can be calculated with great exactness backwards as well as forwards; and there is such a variety of distinct circumstances of the time when, and the place where they were seen; of the duration, or beginning, middle, or end of every eclipse, and of the quantity, or number of digits eclipsed; that there is no danger of confounding any two eclipses together, when the circumstances attending each are noticed with any tolerable degree of precision.

Thus, to an eclipse of the moon incidentally noticed by the great Jewish Chronologer, Josephus, shortly before the death of Herod the Great, we owe the determination of the true year of our Saviour's nativity.

During Herod's last illness, and not many days before his death, there happened an eclipse of the moon on the very night that he burnt alive Matthias, and the ringleaders of a sedition, in which the golden eagle, which he had consecrated and set up over the gate of the temple, was pulled down and broke to pieces by these zealots. This eclipse happened, by calculation, March 13, U. C. 750, B. C. 4. Antiq. 17, 6, 4. p. 768. Hudson's Edit.

But it is certain from Scripture, that CHRIST was born during Herod's reign; and from the visit of the Magi to Jerusalem "from the East," (απο ανατολων) from the Parthian empire, to enquire for the true "born king of the Jews," whose star they had seen "at its rising;" (*εν τη ανατολη) and also from the age of the infants massacred at Bethlehem, "from two years old and under." Matt. ii. 1—16. It is no less certain, that JESUS could not have been born later than U. C. 749, or B. C. 5, which is the year assigned to the nativity by Chrysostom, Petavius, Prideaux, and adopted in this work.

The star seen by these eastern Magi could not have been an ordinary star, or meteor; for when it re-appeared on their way to Bethlehem, "it conducted them, till it came and stood over the house where the young child was." Matt. ii. 9. It was, probably, the same "glory of the Lord" which, on the night of the nativity, "shone round about" the pious shepherds near Bethlehem, and might therefore have been of a globular form, which "ascended into the heaven," along with the celestial choir, Luke ii. 8—15, and might have been seen in its ascent by the Magi at the distance of five or six hundred miles, diminished to the size of a star, or meteor, and rising from the land of Judea, in the south-west quarter of the horizon, an unsual region, which must have strongly attracted their notice and attention. And if, according to Theophylact, these Magi were the descendants of Balaam, the celebrated Chaldean diviner, who prophesied of “the Star to rise out of Jacob, and the Sceptre from Israel ;” Numb. xxiv. 17 ; and also of the School of Daniel, the prophet, at Babylon, who was appointed Archimagus by Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. ii. 48, and foretold the precise time of the coming of “Messiah, the Prince,” Dan. ix. 25, we may naturally account for their journey to Jerusalem, their enquiry, their excessive joy on the re-appearance of the star, and their adoration of the divine child, who was indeed “a light to lighten the Gentiles, and a glory to his people Israel ;” Luke ii. 23 ; “the day-spring (η ανατολη) from on high ;” Luke i. 78 ; “the bright and morning star ;” Rev. xxii. 16 ; “the day star which rises in our hearts ;” 2 Pet. i. 19.

* Ανατολαι denote the "risings" of the stars in general, or the East; but the singular, ἡ ανατολη, "the rising" of a particular star.

Tables of ancient eclipses before the Christian Era, from B. C. 753 are furnished by Playfair in his Chronology, and by Ferguson in his Astronomy ; and from B. C. 1000, computed by Pingré, Hist. Acad. Bell. Lettr. Paris, 1786. Among the most remarkable and important are the following :

ECLIPSE OF THALES.

This celebrated eclipse forms one of the most important elements for connecting and adjusting the Assyrian, Babylonian, Median, Lydian, Scythian, and Grecian Chronology, at an interesting and eventful period of their histories. But it has hitherto proved an apple of discord among Chronologers: six several solar eclipses having been adopted by different writers, as the eclipse in question. See the foregoing list.

The cause of this confusion has originated from the vague and imperfect account given of it, incidentally, by Herodotus, B. 1. § 74, as follows :

“ In the sixth year of the war between the Medes and Lydians, on account of the refugee Scythians, whom Alyattes, King of Lydia, refused to deliver up to Cyaxares, King of Media; during an obstinate battle, the day suddenly became night. Thales, the Milesian, had foretold this alteration to the Ionians, and named the year when it should happen. The Lydians and Medes seeing darkness take place of light, desisted from fighting, and shewed a great inclination on both sides to make peace. Syennesis, King of Cilicia, and Labynetus, of Babylon, were the mediators thereof; who expedited the treaty, and confirmed it by a marriage; persuaded that treaties cannot be lasting without a powerful bond of union. They engaged Alyattes to give his daughter, Aryenis, in marriage to Astyages, the son of Cyaxares.”

1. The only discriminating circumstance of this eclipse, recorded by Herodotus, and which he afterwards repeats, § 103, namely, that “ the day suddenly became night *;” intimates that it was total. Consequently, four of the Eclipses, B.C. 607, 601, 597, 585, are excluded, because they were all partial, more or less; and only the eclipse of B. C. 603 is left; which, according to the accurate calculation of Mayer, in his Memoire, entitled Chronologia Scythica, of the Petersburgh Transactions, A. D. 1728, proved to be total et cum morâ; the moon being then in perigee, and the sun in apogee. And his calculation was afterwards verified by two English Astronomers, Costard and Stukely, respecting the quantity of the eclipse, and the track of the moon’s shadow on the earth’s disk; in the Philosophical Transactions, A. D. 1754.

According to their joint calculations, the moon’s shadow in the eclipse of B.C. 603, entered upon the earth’s disk about 23 degrees of longitude, reckoned from the Isle of Ferro, and one degree north of the equator. It traversed the mouths of the Nile, crossed the Mediterranean, passed through Cilicia and Cappadocia, as far as Trebisonde, under a breadth of 46 German miles; and therefore traversed the field of battle, which probably was near the mouth of the river Halys, about half after nine in the morning; at which time of the day it was likely that the engagement had commenced.

2. The other eclipses are also excluded on account of their tracks. For that of B. C. 585, followed the course of the Mediterranean Sea, and did not touch Cappadocia; that of B. C. 597, traversed Scythia and the Palus Meotis, north of the Caspian Sea; that of B. C. 601, passed considerably to the north of the Euxine Sea; and that of B. C. 607, traversed the earth's disk, in the vicinity and direction of the equator. Consequently, none of these eclipses, even supposing they had been total, could have been the eclipses coarsely predicted by Thales; who noticed only the year, but not the day or hour of the eclipse.

PRECESSION OF THE EQUINOXES.

This is a real retrograde motion of the equinoctial points, (or intersections of the Equinoctial and Ecliptic circles,) in consequence of which, the longitudes of all the fixed stars, are continually, though slowly, increasing. It is not, therefore, to be confounded with the anticipation of the time of the vernal equinox, or exact commencement of the Solar or Tropical year, which is above 11 minutes shorter than the Civil, or Julian year; and consequently begins so much earlier than it, every successive year.

The precession of the Equinoxes was a nicety in practical Astronomy, which does not appear to have been suspected by any of the Ancients before the time of Hipparchus. This prince of Grecian astronomers, by comparing his own observations of the bright star Spica Virginis, B. C. 128, with those of his predecessors, found a sensible increase in its longitude; which he attributed to a progressive motion of the orb, or sphere, in which they were supposed at that time to be set; and rated it at one degree in a century. But, according to Ptolomy, "he hesitated," (δισταζει δ' ὁμως) as to the precise quantity, because the preceding observations of Timochares, B. C. 380, were but coarsely made; and also because the interval of 150 years, elapsed between their observations, was not yet become sufficient to induce firm conviction, (ουχ ικανον ηδη γεγονεναι προς βεβαιαν καταληψιν.) It is, however, a remarkable proof of the accuracy of the observations of both, that the difference of two degrees of longitude, in the course of 150 years, gives 1 degree in 75 years, at 48 seconds in one year; which approaches surprisingly near to $71\frac{1}{2}$ years, which is now found to be the correct rate of the increase, at $50\frac{1}{2}$ seconds in one year; after the observations of 2000 years made with the nicest instruments, and most exquisite skill of modern Astronomy.

The sagacity of Joseph Scaliger first discovered that this motion was only apparent in the stars, and that it was owing, in fact, to the retrograde motion of the equinoctial points themselves: as thus expressed in his own words: His igitur animadversis, constat Æquinoctialia puncta moveri; ideoque [Coluros seu] circulos ad ea descriptos; et consequenter, polos eorum, esse mobiles. De Emend. Temp. p. 284, 285.

But it was reserved for the superior intelligence of a Newton, to trace the fact to its physical cause. He found, that it was occasioned by the oblate figure of the earth, which itself probably arises, or is increased, at least, by the earth's rotation round its axis; in consequence of which, the earth's equatorial diameter is nearly 37 English miles longer than the polar diameter, or axis. As more matter, therefore, is accumulated all round the equatorial parts of the earth than elsewhere, the sun and moon, when on either side of the equator, by attracting this redundant matter, which forms, as it were, a ring or belt round the earth, brings the equator sooner under them, in every return towards it, than if there was no such accumulation; and produces a retrogression of its intersections with the plane of the ecliptic, similar to, but much slower than, the retrogression of the moon's nodes.

The moon has a greater effect on these accumulated parts of the earth about the equator, than the sun, because she is nearer. Newton estimated the effect of the sun's attraction, in producing the annual precession, 9 seconds, 7 thirds; and of the moon's, 40 seconds, 52 thirds; and of both, 50 seconds. Principia, Lib. III. prop. 39. Later observations make it a little more, about $50\frac{1}{2}$ seconds. See Hutton's Mathematical Dictionary, Precession of the Equinoxes.

Hence, the rate of the precession is 1 degree in $71\frac{1}{2}$ years; 1 deg. 23 min. $53\frac{1}{2}$ sec. in a century; and 360 degrees, or an entire revolution, in 25,748 years.

From this shifting of the equinoctial points backwards, and with them all the signs of the ecliptic, it follows, that those stars, which, in the infancy of Grecian Astronomy, were in Aries, are now found in Taurus; those of Taurus, in Gemini, &c. In consequence of which, the stars that rose or set at particular seasons of the year, in the times of Job, Hesiod, Eudoxus, Virgil, Pliny, Columella, &c. no longer correspond to those particular seasons, at present. The difference of ancient and modern longitudes, if known, will easily give the difference of times.

GENERATIONS.

This was the earliest mode of computing considerable periods of time, employed in Sacred and Profane History.

The periods from the Creation to the Deluge, and from the Deluge to the birth of Abraham, are expressly so defined in Scripture, Gen. chap. v. and xi. And the reckoning by generations was adopted by the earliest Greek Historians, Pherecydes, Epimenides, and Ephorus. Newton's Chron. p. 2.

A generation is the interval of time elapsed between the births of the father and of his son. This interval, therefore, is variable; 1. according to the standard of human life; and 2. according as the generations are counted by eldest, middle, or youngest sons. Dividing human life into three stages, or climacterics, the generative faculty is generally found to subsist in its vigour during the second stage, or between 21 years and 42 years, at the present lowest reduction of the standard: whence, 33 years has been usually adopted in all countries, as the mean length of a generation; or three generations reckoned equivalent to a century. This was the computation of the Egyptians and Greeks, according to Herodotus, b. 2. And the Hindus also allowed a hundred years for three generations; according to Sir William Jones, in the Asiatic Researches, Vol. II. p. 136, octavo.

REIGNS.

The computation by reigns, was also employed for the same purpose, both in Sacred and Profane History. The chronology of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Judah, until the end of the Babylonish Captivity, was so adjusted; and the Assyrian, Babylonian, Median, Lydian, Persian, Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman Chronology, by their respective Historians.

Reigns, however, furnish more variable and uncertain measures of time than generations; because "Kings are succeeded not only by their eldest sons, but sometimes by their brothers: and sometimes they are slain, or deposed, and succeeded by others of an equal or greater age; especially in elective, or turbulent kingdoms." Newton's Chron. p. 54. Whence Newton concludes, that, "by the ordinary course of Nature, kings reign, one with another, about eighteen or twenty years apiece: and if, in some instances, they reign, one with another, five or six years longer, in others, they reign as much shorter:—eighteen or twenty years is a medium;" p. 53. And he states the proportion of mean reigns to mean generations, as 19 to $33\frac{1}{3}$, or as 4 to 7: thus reckoning generations nearly double the length of reigns. P. 57, 118.

This standard of reigns is collected from eleven cases adduced by Newton, which certainly give the average of 19 years to a reign. But in three of those cases, the reigns are uncommonly short; $11\frac{2}{3}$, $15\frac{1}{4}$, and $17\frac{1}{4}$ years apiece: and deducting these, the eight remaining cases furnish an average of nearly 21 years apiece.

And a fairer and fuller induction of particular cases, will furnish a higher average.

1. Syncellus gives a list of Egyptian kings, in which 59 kings, Tethmosis, &c. from the Exode of the Israelites, B.C. 1649, to the final reduction of Egypt by the Persians, B.C. 350, reigned 1299 years; or 22 years apiece.

2. The Parian Chronicle and Eusebius, furnish a list of 30 Athenian kings from Cecrops, B.C. 1558, to Alcmæon, ending B.C. 754, who reigned 804 years; or $26\frac{2}{3}$ years apiece.

3. Herodotus mentions 22 kings of Lydia, Argon, &c. B.C. 1223, ending with Candaules, B.C. 718, who reigned 505 years; or nearly 23 years apiece.

4. The 18 kings of Judah, Rehoboam, &c. B.C. 990, ending with Zedekiah, B.C. 586, and the destruction of the Temple, by Nebuchadnezzar, reigned 404 years, or $22\frac{4}{9}$ years apiece.

5. In England, 31 kings, from William the Conqueror, A.D. 1066, to the end of George II. B.C. 1760, reigned 694 years, or $22\frac{2}{5}$ years apiece.

6. In Scotland, 33 kings, from Malcolm I. A.D. 938, to the end of James I. in England, A.D. 1625, reigned 687 years, or nearly 21 years apiece.

7. In France, 32 kings, from Hugh Capet, A.D. 987, to the murder of Louis XVI. in 1793, reigned 806 years, or 25 years apiece.

8. In Spain, 32 kings, from Ferdinand the Great, A.D. 1027, to Charles III. ending 1788, reigned 761 years, or near 24 years apiece.

9. In Germany, 55 emperors, from Charlemagne, A.D. 800, to Leopold II. ending 1792, reigned 992 years, or 18 years apiece.

10. In Hindustan, the Brahmins reckon 142 modern reigns in a period of 3153 years, or nearly $22\frac{1}{2}$ years apiece. Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 143.

The average of these ten cases, is $22\frac{1}{3}$ years to a reign, in a series of 454 kings, in 10,105 years. From this great scale of comparison, therefore, we are abundantly warranted to fix the average standard of reigns at $22\frac{1}{3}$ years, which will give the proportion of generations to reigns, as $33\frac{1}{3}$ to $22\frac{1}{3}$, or 3 to 2, nearly.

Newton's defective standard of reigns was occasioned by his overlooking the circumstance of Minorities in hereditary kingdoms, and Interregna, or vacancies in elective; which may sometimes make a moderate series of Reigns equal, if not exceed, Generations. See the cases in point of the seventeen kings of Sparta, and the seven kings of Rome, in the Review of Newton's Chronology.

EPOCHS AND ERAS.

To ascertain the times of events, certain fixed points, or instants of time, have been assumed by Chronologers, from which they begin to reckon, or to which they refer these events. The term epoch, ($\epsilon\pi\omicron\chi\eta$) signifies “a stop;” because, says Scaliger, illis sistantur et terminentur mensuræ temporum, “in them stop and terminate the measures of times.” It now usually denotes a remarkable date; as, the epoch of the destruction of Troy, B.C. 1183, &c.

The term Era, (not Æra, as incorrectly written) is Spanish, signifying time, as in the phrase, de era en era, “from time to time*.” It was first used in the Era Hispanica, instituted B.C. 38, in honour of Augustus, when Spain was allotted to him, in the distribution of the provinces among the second Triumvirate, Augustus, Anthony, and Lepidus. The Gothic historians use it as a synonyme to year: thus Isidore's Chronicle :

Era 415, Anno 13 Valentis Imp. &c.

* See Spelman's Glossary, voce Era, p. 243—245.

Era 419, An. imperii Theodosii Hisp. 3, &c.

Era 446, An. 14 Arcadii et Honorii.

It now usually denotes an indefinite series of years, beginning from some known epoch; and so differs from a period, which is a definite series: as the Era of the foundation of Rome, the Era of the Olympiads, the Era of Nabonassar, &c.

Of these, the most generally used, by reference to which all the rest are now regulated, is,

THE VULGAR CHRISTIAN ERA.

Unfortunately for ancient Chronology, there was no one fixed or universally established Era. Different countries reckoned by different eras, whose number is embarrassing, and their commencements not always easily to be adjusted or reconciled to each other; and it was not until A.D. 532, that the Christian Era was invented by Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian by birth, and a Roman Abbot, who flourished in the reign of Justinian.

The motive which led him to introduce it, and the time of its introduction, are best explained by himself, in a letter to Petronius, a bishop.

“Because St. Cyril began the first year of his cycle [of 95 years] from the 153d of Diocletian, and ended the last in the 247th; we, beginning from the next year, the 248th, of that same tyrant, rather than prince, were unwilling to connect with our Cycles the memory of an impious [prince] and persecutor; but chose rather to antedate the times of the years, from the incarnation of OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST: to the end that the commencement of our hope might be better known to us; and that the cause of man’s restoration, namely, OUR REDEEMER’S passion, might appear with clearer evidence*.”

The era of Diocletian, which was chiefly used at that time, began with his reign A.D. 284; and therefore the new era of the incarnation, A.D. 284 + 248 = A.D. 532. Strauchius, and other

* Quia vero Sanctus Cyrillus primum cyclum ab anno Diocletiani 153 cœpit, et ultimum in 247 terminavit; Nos, a 248 anno ejusdem tyranni potius quam principis, inchoantes, nolimus circulis nostris memoriam impii et persecutoris innectere: sed magis elegimus ab incarnatione DOMINI NOSTRI JESU CHRISTI, annorum tempora prænotare; quatenus exordium Spei nostræ notius nobis existeret, et causa reparationis humanæ, id est, passio REDEMPTORIS NOSTRI evidentiùs eluceret. See the whole Letter, Petav. Tom. II. Append. p. 498.

Chronologers, I know not upon what grounds, date it A.D. 527, five years earlier.

How justly Dionysius abhorred Diocletian's memory, may appear from Eusebius, who relates, that in the first year of his reign, when Diodorus the Bishop was celebrating the Holy Communion with many other Christians in a cave, they were all immured in the earth, and buried alive! Hence, his era was otherwise called the Era of the Martyrs; and not from the tenth, last, and bloodiest of the Christian persecutions by the Roman Emperors, in the 19th year of his reign.

Dionysius began his era with the year of our Lord's incarnation and nativity, in U.C. 753, of the Varronian Computation, or the 45th of the Julian Era. And at an earlier period, Panodorus, an Egyptian monk, who flourished under the Emperor Arcadius, A.D. 395, had dated the incarnation in the same year.

But by some mistake, or misconception of his meaning, Bede, who lived in the next century after Dionysius, adopted his year of the Nativity, U.C. 753, yet began the Vulgar Era, which he first introduced, the year after, and made it commence Jan. 1, U.C. 754: which was an alteration for the worse, as making the Christian Era recede a year further from the true year of the Nativity.

The Vulgar Era began to prevail in the West about the time of Charles Martel, and Pope Gregory II. A.D. 730; but was not sanctioned by any public Acts or Rescripts, till the first German Synod, in the time of Carolomannus, Duke of the Franks, which, in the preface, was said to be assembled "Anno ab incarnatione Dom. 742, 11 Calendas Maii." But it was not established till the time of Pope Eugenius IV. A.D. 1431, who ordered this era to be used in the public Registers: according to Mariana, and others.

Dionysius was led to date the year of the Nativity, U.C. 753, from the Evangelist Luke's account that John the Baptist began his ministry "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar;" and that JESUS at his baptism, "was beginning to be about 30 years of age." Luke iii. 1—23. For Tiberius succeeded Augustus at his death, Aug. 19, U.C. 767; and therefore his fifteenth year was U.C. 782; from which, subtracting the assumed year of the nativity, U.C. 753, the remainder was 29 years complete, or 30 years current.

account, that CHRIST was born before Herod's death; which followed shortly after his massacre of the infants at Bethlehem, Matt. ii. 1—19. And Herod's death was also shortly after the lunar eclipse of March 13, U.C. 750; between that and the passover, which fell that year on the 12th of April; as may be collected from Josephus, Ant. 17, cap. 6—8; Bell. Jud. 1, cap. 13, 4—8.

And that Herod's death is rightly assigned to the year U.C. 750, is confirmed from the duration of his reign: for Josephus states, that by the interest of Anthony, Herod was appointed king by the Roman Senate, “in the 184th Olympiad, when Caius Domitius Calvinus, the second time, and Caius Asinius Pollio, were consuls,” U.C. 714. Antiq. 14, 14, 5. And that he was established in the kingdom by the death of his rival, Antigonus, who had been set up by the Parthians; “when Marcus Agrippa and Caninius Gallus were consuls,” U.C. 717. Antiq. 14, 16, 4. And he adds, that Herod reigned 37 years from his first appointment, by the Senate, and 34 years from the death of Antigonus, Antiq. 17, 8, 1; and Bell. Jud. 1, 33, 8. Now, if we take these as current years, according to the usage of *Josephus, the death of Herod was $U.C. 714 + 36 = U.C. 717 + 33 = U.C. 750$, as before. Such a critical conformity of astronomical and historical evidence, both furnished by an author the most competent to procure genuine information, establishes both; and decides the question, that Herod could not have died later than the year U.C. 750; though Lardner professed himself “unable to determine” between that year, or U.C. 751. See his Credibility, Vol. I. Append. p. 428. Edit. 1788.

Christ's birth, therefore, could not have been earlier than U.C. 748, nor later than U.C. 749. And if we assume the latter year, as most conformable to the whole tenor of Sacred History, with Chrysostom, Petavius, Prideaux, Playfair, &c. this would give Christ's age at his baptism, about 34 years; contrary to Luke's account.

In order, therefore, to reconcile the two Evangelists together, in this most important point, which forms the basis of the whole scheme of Gospel-Chronology, either the 15th of Tiberius must be antedated, or the age of Christ, at his baptism, enlarged; or perhaps both: for the 15th of Tiberius, reckoned from the death of Augustus, Aug. 19, U.C. 767, is indisputably fixed, by means of the great Lunar Eclipse, soon after, Sept. 27, U.C. 767, which contributed to quell the dangerous mutiny of the Pannonian Legions, on the death of Augustus, and to induce them to swear fidelity to Tiberius, recorded by Tacitus, Annal. 1, 28; and Dio, Lib. 57, p. 604.

But there were different computations of the reigns both of Augustus and Tiberius, in circulation. Some writers computed the reign of Augustus from the year of Julius Cæsar's death, U.C. 710; as Josephus, who reckons it 57 years, 6 months, and 2 days; Ant. 17, 2, 2; and Bell. Jud. 2, 9, 1. Some, from the year after, U.C. 711, the date of his first consulate, when he wanted but one day to complete his 20th year; and therefore reckoning his reign 56 years. Vell. Patere. 2, 65. Others, 46 years, 4 months, and 1 day. Clem. Alex. Strom. 1, p. 339. Others, from the year of the battle of Actium, U.C. 723, reckoning it 44 years. Others, from the Actian Era, U.C. 724, commencing from the death of Anthony and Cleopatra, as Ptolomy, in his Canon, who dates it 43 years, and is followed by Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 339.

Some also reckoned the reign of Tiberius 26 years, 6 months, 19 days. Clem. Alex. Strom. 1, p. 339. Others, 22 years, 5 months, 3 days. Joseph. Ant. 18, 7, 10. And Ptolomy, in his Canon, 22 years; which is adopted by Clemens Alexandrinus. And the cause of this difference we learn from the testimony of the Roman and Grecian historians, Velleius Patereculus, (the contemporary of Tiberius) Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dio Cassius; who all agree, that Tiberius was admitted by Augustus “colleague of the empire,” or partner in the government, and in “the administration of [the imperial] provinces,” [among which was Judea,] and “in the command of the armies,” two or three years before his death; either in U.C. 764, or more probably U.C. 765; and that this partnership was confirmed by a decree of the senate. But the 15th of Tiberius, reckoned from U.C. 765, would be U.C. 780; from which, subtracting the year of Christ's nativity, U.C. 749; the remainder, 31 years, more or less, sufficiently agrees with the latitude of the expression, “about 30 years of age.”

This solution agrees with the other historical characters of Luke, iii. 1, 2.

1. "When Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea."

After the death of Herod the Great, the Jewish nation, weary of his tyranny and cruelties, petitioned the Emperor Augustus, "that they might be permitted to live according to their own laws, under the Roman government." But the Emperor did not think proper, at that time, to comply with their wishes. In the mean time Archelaus assumed the government of Judea, according to his father's will, until it should be confirmed from Rome; and at the ensuing passover, April 12, slew above 3000 Jews in a tumult. At length, in the tenth year of his reign, the chiefs of the Jews and Samaritans, no longer brooking his tyranny, preferred an accusation against him to Augustus; who having heard both sides, deposed Archelaus, and banished him to Vienne, in Gaul, and confiscated his property; and thenceforth governed Judea by his procurators or commissaries. Joseph. Ant. 17. cap. 9—15.

The first Procurator was Coponius, appointed by the trusty Cyrenius, whom Augustus sent a second time, in quality of "Governor of Syria," U.C. 760, to transact these important affairs, and to levy the assessment of properties, or carry "the taxing" into effect; preparatory to which, he had made an "Enrolment of Persons," U.C. 749, at the time of Christ's birth, as the Emperor's procurator. Luke ii. 1—7. The second Procurator who succeeded Coponius, about two years, was Marcus Ambivius, about four years; then Annius Rufus, about one year; and Valerius Gratus, eleven years; who was succeeded by Pontius Pilate, to U.C. 760. Therefore the date of the appointment of Coponius, adding the amount of the several administrations, 18 years, will bring the appointment of Pilate to U.C. 778. The same year may be collected by a backward reckoning from the end of his government. Pilate continued ten years in the government of Judea, and was then deposed for the massacre of the Samaritans, some time before the passover of U.C. 789, which preceded the death of Tiberius, March 16, 790. Compare Ant. 18, 5, 2, 3; and Ant. 18, 6, 3. If then he was deposed about the end of U.C. 788, it would bring his appointment to U.C. 778*, as before; but this was the year before John's preaching; or in the fourteenth year of the joint reign of Tiberius.

* This is confirmed by Eusebius, who says that Pilate was made Procurator of Judea in the twelfth year of the reign of Tiberius, U.C. 767 + 11 = U.C. 778.

“Pilate therefore was undoubtedly Governor of Judea at the time of John the Baptist’s ministry, and till after our Saviour’s crucifixion.” Lardner, Credib. Vol. I. p. 381.

2. “Herod [Antipas] being tetrarch of Galilee.”

Augustus divided Herod the Great’s dominions, at his death, into four tetrarchies: the first of Judea, was given to Archelaus, with the title of Ethnarch, and a promise of that of King, if he should deserve it by his good conduct. He was therefore considered as king by the Jews. Hence the expression βασιλευι, “reigned,” was applied to him at his accession by the Evangelist, Matt. ii. 22. But the bad character he bore, and the divine warning, deterred the holy family from returning into Judea, after Herod’s death, from Egypt; and induced them to settle again under the milder government of Herod Antipas, in Galilee, at Nazareth. Matt. ii. 19—23. This was the same Herod who married Herodias, his brother Philip’s wife; and when rebuked for it by the Baptist, imprisoned, and at his wife’s instigation, beheaded him. Mark vi. 17—23. To whom also CHRIST was sent to be examined by Pilate. Luke xxiii. 6, 7.

3. “His brother Philip, tetrarch of Iturea, and of the region of Trachonitis.” Josephus informs us that “he died in the 20th year of Tiberius (U.C. 787) after he had governed Trachonitis, and Batanea, and Gaulanitis, 37 years.” Ant. 18, 5, 6. This brings the beginning of his reign to U.C. 750; and therefore furnishes an additional argument, that Herod’s death has been rightly assigned to that year.

When Caligula succeeded Tiberius in the empire, he gave Philip’s dominions, which were vacant, to Agrippa, the brother of Herodias, with the title of King. But this wicked and ambitious woman, envying her brother’s superior rank, urged and prevailed on her husband, against his will, to go to Rome, and solicit the same title from the Emperor; who, instead of granting his petition, having received some unfavourable information of his conduct, not only took away his government, and gave it to Agrippa; but also banished himself to Lyons, in Gaul, whither his wife and ill-adviser followed him: thus justly punished for her ambitious envy, and her husband for following her vain counsels, as Josephus observes, Ant. 18, cap. 7, 8.

4. “And Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene.”

This quarter of Herod the Great’s dominions had originally belonged to a former Lysanias, who was put to death by Anthony, during his government in the East ; Augustus afterwards granted it to Herod ; and on his death, restored it to a descendant of the former proprietor, of the same name. When Caligula appointed Agrippa king of the tetrarchy of Philip, he promised also to give him the tetrarchy of Lysanias, when it should be vacant ; which was afterwards given to him, on the death of Lysanias, by the Emperor Claudius ; who thus restored to Agrippa the whole of his grandfather Herod's dominions. Ant. 18, 7, 10 ; and 19, 5, 1 ; and Bell. Jud. 2, 11, 5.

This Agrippa was “Herod the king,” who to court popularity with the Jews, persecuted the Apostles, and beheaded James the elder, the brother of John ; and for his pride and arrogance, was smitten by an angel of the Lord, because he received the blasphemous adulation of the people, “without giving GOD the glory,” and was devoured by worms ; as recorded by the Evangelist, Acts xii. 1—23 ; and paraphrased by Josephus, Ant. 19, 8, 2. His son was “the king Agrippa,” before whom Paul so powerfully pleaded his cause ; Acts xxvi. 1—32.

5. “Annas and Caiaphas being high-priests.”

Ananus, or Annas, was appointed High-Priest by Quirinus, or Cyrenius, when he was sent by Augustus to confiscate the property of Archelaus, U.C. 760, in the 37th year after the battle of Actium, U.C. 723. Joseph. Antiq. 18, 2, 1. Ananus continued in office about 14 years, until the administration of Valerius Gratus, the fifth governor of Judea ; who deposed him about U.C. 774, and appointed Ismael, Eleazar, son of Ananus, and Simon, High Priests in succession, none of whom remained above a year in office. Near the end of his administration, he appointed Joseph, called Caiaphas, the son-in-law of Ananus, about U.C. 777 ; who therefore was High Priest during the whole of the administration of Pilate ; for Vitellius, his successor, removed Caiaphas about the passover of U.C. 789, and appointed Jonathan, another son of Ananus, High Priest in his room. Joseph. Ant. 18, 2, 2, and 18, 5, 3. Annas, therefore, was the coadjutor of Caiaphas, the reigning High Priest at this time : and on account of his age, rank, and consequence, as a man of the first consideration and influence in the state, is named first : for as such, he is represented by Josephus. “The elder Ananus was counted one of the most fortunate of men ; for he had five sons ; and it so happened, that they all ministered to God in the high priesthood ; after he had himself formerly enjoyed that honour for a long time: which happened to none of our High Priests." Ant. 20, 8, 1. To this, we may attribute the taking JESUS, when he was apprehended, "first to the house of Annas;" who "sent him bound to Caiaphas, the High Priest." John xviii. 13—24; Matt. xxvi. 57.

And it was usual with the High Priests at this time to have a senior, who had discharged that office as coadjutor. Thus Josephus relates, that on account of a disturbance between the Jews and Samaritans, Quadratus, the President of Syria, sent two of the most powerful men of the Jews, and the High-Priests, Jonathan and *Ananias, &c. and also some of the most distinguished of the Samaritans, to Claudius Cesar, to answer for the conduct of their nations. Bell. Jud. 2, 12, 6.

From this historical review, it appears how intimately acquainted the Evangelist Luke was with the affairs of Judea, the neighbouring states, and the Romans. He spent some time himself at Rome, and could not have been ignorant of the various modes of computing the reigns of their Emperors: and that he did not reckon the fifteenth year of Tiberius from the death of Augustus, is demonstrated by the opinion of several early Christians, Tertullian, Africanus, Lactantius, &c. that the crucifixion of CHRIST happened in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, when the two Gemini were consuls, U. C. 782, or A. D. 29, evidently reckoning from the sole empire of Tiberius. But it is impossible that Luke could have referred a transaction so early as John's ministry, to the same date, understood in the same sense. This argument appears to be decisive; especially if we consider, that their opinion was incorrect, and retrenched two years from the most probable date of the crucifixion, U. C. 784, or A. D. 31. which would throw back the date of John's baptism still earlier.

This solution, of dating the 15th of Tiberius from his joint reign with Augustus, U. C. 765, has been adopted in the margin of our English Bible, dating the 15th of Tiberius A. D. 26, or U. C. 779, and either U. C. 764, or U. C. 765, are reckoned the beginning of the joint reign of Tiberius, by Usher, Pagius, Herwaert, Clericus, Prideaux, Mann, Playfair, &c.

* Jonathan was an excellent character: when the high priesthood was offered to him a second time, he declined it, and recommended another brother of his, as worthier than himself. By his interest at the Roman court, he contributed to get Felix made governor of Judea: who, in return for it, and for his wholesome admonitions, got him assassinated!—Ananias, the High-Priest, was he who insulted Paul on his trial. Acts xxiii. 2, 3.

DAY OF THE NATIVITY.

The vulgar day of our Lord's nativity, December 25, though an early tradition, as appears from the Apostolical Constitutions, Lib. 5, cap. 13, p. 312, Edit. Coteler. was not established till the time of the Emperor Constantine, who died A. D. 337, when it was enacted, probably about the Council of Nice, A. D. 325, by the Roman Church, and adopted by the Greek Church ten years after, at Constantinople; according to Chrysostom, in his homily on the day of the nativity: and at that time it was separated from the Epiphany, held on the 6th of January: whereas the Greek Church had heretofore celebrated the Nativity and the Epiphany on the same day, supposing, as was natural, that the birth of CHRIST, and the first appearance of the Star, happened on the same day. But the Church of Rome separated them, under the pretext, that “*the second appearance of the Star to the Magi in the way to Bethlehem, was holier than the first: but in reality to multiply holidays. This occasioned great discontents at Constantinople, when introduced there by Gregory, the Theologian, from Rome, the citizens murmuring at the separation, and saying to him, You have divided the feast, and involved us in polytheism †!”—An early objection against the Church of Rome.

How injudiciously the 25th of December was fixed, may appear from comparison of the two days.

The 6th of January having been the established day of the feast of the Epiphany, the Romanists did not venture to alter that, but they fixed the day of the nativity a fortnight earlier, supposing that interval sufficient for the Magi to come from the neighbouring country of Arabia Felix, which was imagined then (and is still by some commentators, Grotius, &c.) to have been their native country, from some passages in the Psalms, “The kings of Seba and Saba shall bring gifts [to CHRIST.]” —“To him shall be given of the gold of Seba.” Ps. lxxii. 10—15, &c. Forgetting all the while that their visit to Bethlehem must have been after the purification of his mother, and his presentation in the temple, forty days after his birth, (Luke ii. 22—27; Levit. xii. 2—8.) which evidently was prior to the flight of the holy family to Egypt; and also, that the Magi were the established priesthood of the Persian empire, from the earliest times, and therefore, that even forty days would be too short for their journey from that distant country.

The true cause of their fixing on the 25th of December, is thus perhaps best explained by Sir Isaac Newton.

“ The times of the birth and passion of CHRIST, with such like niceties, being not material to religion, were little regarded by the Christians of the first age. They who began first to celebrate them, placed them in the cardinal points of the year; as the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, on the 25th of March, which, when Julius Cæsar corrected the calendar, was the Vernal equinox; the feast of John the Baptist on the 24th of June, which was the Summer solstice; the feast of St. Michael on September 29th, which was the Autumnal equinox; and the birth of CHRIST on the Winter solstice, December 25th; with the feasts of St. Stephen, St. John, and the Innocents, as near it as they could place them; and because the solstice, in time, removed from the 25th of December to the 24th, the 23d, and the 22d, and so on backwards, hence some, in the following centuries, placed the birth of CHRIST on December 23d, and at length on December 20; and for the same reason, they seem to have set the feast of St. Thomas on December 21, and that of St. Matthew on September 21.

“ So also, at the entrance of the sun into all the signs of the Julian calendar, they placed the days of other saints: as the Conversion of Paul, on January 25, when the sun entered Aquarius; St. Matthias, on February 25, when he entered Pisces; St. Mark, on April 25, when he entered Taurus; Corpus Christi, on May 26, when he entered Gemini; St. James, on July 25, when he entered Cancer; St. Bartholomew, on August 24, when he entered Virgo; Simon and Jude, on October 28, when he entered Scorpio; and if there were any other remarkable days in the Julian calendar, they placed the saints upon them: as St. Barnabas on June 11, where Ovid seems to place the feast of Vesta and Fortuna, and the goddess Matuta; and St. Philip and St. James, on the first of May, a day dedicated both to the Bona Dea, or Magna Mater, and to the goddess Flora, and still celebrated with her rites.

“ All which shews that these days were first fixed in the Christian Churches by mathematicians at pleasure, without any ground in tradition; and that the Christians afterwards took up with what they found in the calendars.” Prophecies of Daniel, chap. ii. Part I. p. 144.

Hospinian, a learned German antiquary, is of opinion that the Christians at Rome did not celebrate the 25th of December, as thinking CHRIST was then born, but to make amends for the Heathen Saturnalia; which was a season of great festivity, beginning on December 16, and lasting three days, but usually prolonged to the end of the week, on account of the succeeding feast of the Sigillarii. Macrob. Saturnal. lib. i. cap. 10. And indeed the crowding together so many holydays, near the end of December, as we find in the calendar, strongly confirms this opinion.

To determine the true day of CHRIST'S birth, as Scaliger says, *belongs to God alone, not man. Of all the various conjectures that have been proposed, the most probable are, either 1. that “ Christ, our Passover,” was born about the time of the vernal equinox, when the Passover was celebrated, or 2. about the autumnal equinox, at the celebration of the feast of tabernacles, when “ the WORD became flesh, and (εσκηνωσεν) tabernacled among us, (John i. 14.) or 3. on the great day of atonement, the 10th day of the seventh month, as “ a faithful high-priest, in things pertaining to GOD, to make atonement for the sins of the people [of Israel,”] Heb. ii. 17. “ to be himself a propitiation for our sins; and not for our's only, but also for those of the whole world.” 1 John ii. 2. And if this last (adopted by Primate Usher) be preferred, it gives a peculiar emphasis to the declaration of the angel to the shepherds on the night of the nativity:—“ Fear not, for lo, I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all the people [of Israel:] for unto you is born this day a SAVIOUR, who is CHRIST THE LORD.—Glory to GOD in the highest, and on earth, peace, goodwill towards men.” Luke ii. 10—14.

And indeed either of these two last epochs agrees better than the first with the prevailing traditions of the duration of

* Diem vero definire, unius DEI est, non hominis.

THE MINISTRY OF CHRIST.

The apostolical father, Ignatius, a disciple of John the Evangelist, and bishop of Antioch, the second in succession from Peter, who suffered martyrdom in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 107, in his epistle to the Trallians, gives the following curious and valuable testimony; Cotelerius, Patres Apostol. tom. ii. p. 68.

“GOD THE WORD—having lived in the world three decads of years, was baptized by John truly, and not seemingly; and having preached the Gospel three years, and wrought signs and wonders; he, the Judge, was judged by the false Jews and Pilate; was scourged, smitten on the cheek, spit upon, wore a crown of thorns and a purple robe, was condemned, was crucified, truly, not seemingly, nor in appearance, nor by deception; he died truly, and was buried, and was raised from the dead,” &c.

And this is confirmed by the testimony of Eusebius, the learned Bishop of Cesarea, who flourished about A. D. 300, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, p. 400.

“It is recorded in history, that the whole time of OUR SAVIOUR’S teaching and working miracles was three years and a half, which is the half of a week [of years.] This John the Evangelist will represent to those who critically attend to his Gospel. One week of years, then, may be reckoned the whole time of his continuance with his Apostles, both before his passion, and after his resurrection from the dead: for it is written, that until his passion, he shewed himself to all, disciples and not disciples; during which time, by his doctrines and extraordinary cures, he shewed the powers of his GODHEAD to all without distinction, both Greeks and Jews; and also after his resurrection from the dead, he was with his disciples and apostles, as it is reasonable to think, an equal number of years; ‘being seen of them forty days, and conversing with them, and telling them the things pertaining to the kingdom of God,’ as contained in the Acts of the Apostles. So that this is the ‘one week of years,’ signified by the prophecy [of the seventy weeks in Daniel] during which ‘he confirmed the covenant with many;’ namely, by strengthening the new covenant of the Gospel-preaching. And who were the many with whom he confirmed it? Plainly his disciples and apostles, and all those of the Hebrews that believed on him. Moreover, ‘in the half of this one week,’ in which he confirmed the covenant disclosed to the many, 'was the sacrifice taken away,' and the libation, and 'the abomination of desolation' began; since, in the midst of this week, after the three years and half of his teaching, at the time of his passion, 'the veil of the temple was rent from top to bottom;' so that from that time, the libation and the sacrifice was virtually taken away from them, and the abomination of desolation began to take place in the temple, that tutelary power which watched over and guarded the [holy] place from the beginning to that season, leaving them desolate."

These two admirable passages, which I have given at length, in order to render justice not only to the piety, but to the critical knowledge of the facts, the mysteries, and the prophecies of holy writ, which they display, by their consistency and harmony with each other, not only establish the authenticity of the former, which has been reckoned among the interpolated epistles of the venerable Ignatius, but the latter especially, furnishes the best clue, perhaps, any where to be found, to the whole scheme of the Gospel dispensation, as being the consummation of ancient prophecy, no less in its precise period of time, than in every other respect. They are indeed a host against all the discordant and absurd guesses, ancient or modern, about the longer or shorter duration of our Lord's ministry, which, to compare together, bring with them their own refutation. I shall not therefore waste the reader's patience, nor trespass on the limits of this apparatus by retailing them, in order to be rejected afterwards.

Ignatius and Eusebius both assign three years for the duration of our Lord's public ministry; the latter mentions an additional half year, from his baptism to its commencement, during which our Lord was employed in privately selecting and preparing his disciples. And a critical inspection of the Gospels, especially of John's, (recommended by Eusebius) will furnish internal evidence, the most solid and satisfactory, of the correctness of this period; by distinguishing the four passovers which included our Lord's public ministry, and arranging them chronologically, according to the foregoing principles:

In this general outline, I have annexed the leading occurrences after our Lord's ascension, during the remaining three years and a half of the Passion Week, ending with the martyrdom of Stephen, which our Bible Chronology, Usher, and Pearson, all date A.D. 34.

The simplicity and uniformity of the whole, and the consistency and harmony of the several parts, with the accounts of the Sacred, Jewish, and Roman historians, all carefully compared together, and verified by eclipses, will, I trust, confirm the solidity of the principles upon which this Table is constructed; and tend to remove much of the confusion, perplexity, and embarrassment, in which this most obscure and difficult, perhaps, but unquestionably, most important and interesting period of our Lord's Ministry has been hitherto involved by almost every new Harmonist, patching and mending the work of his predecessors.

Nor will the most prejudiced and attached advocate of the Vulgar Bible Chronology have any just cause to complain of this arrangement, which leaves him still in full possession of the established dates of the beginning of the Passion Week of Years, A.D. 27, and the ending, A.D. 34. It also retains the four passovers during three full years, and only reverses the antecedent and subsequent spaces, by shifting backwards the year of crucifixion from A.D. 33, which was assumed on no earlier authority than that of Roger Bacon, in the 13th century*, to A.D. 31, in

* Roger Bacon found by computation, that the Paschal full moon, A.D. 33, fell on Friday; and this circumstance led him, and several others, Scaliger, Usher, Pearson, &c. to conclude, that this was the year of the crucifixion. But admitting the computation to be exact, as afterwards verified by Scaliger, Newton, Mann, and Lamy, (see Bowyer's Conjectures * on the New Testament, John vi. 4, p. 149.) this very circumthe consulship of Tiberius and Sejanus, as supported by the respectable testimony of Aurelius Cassiodorus, in the sixth century, noticed before. This reduces the interval from our Lord's baptism, about Autumn, A.D. 27, to the first Passover, A.D. 28, to half a year; while it lengthens the interval from the crucifixion, in Spring, A.D. 31, to the martyrdom of Stephen, about Autumn, in A.D. 34, to three years and half: both surely with greater conformity to the Gospel history, which includes a much greater number of events in the latter interval than in the former.

Eusebius dates the first half of the Passion Week of Years as beginning with our Lord's baptism, and ending with his crucifixion. The same period precisely is recorded by Peter, as including the duration of our Lord's personal ministry: "All the time that the LORD JESUS went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of [or by] John, until the day that he was taken up from us," at his ascension, which was only 43 days after the crucifixion. Acts i. 21, 22. And the remaining half of the Passion Week ended with the martyrdom of Stephen, in the seventh or last year of the week. For it is remarkable, that the year after, A.D. 35, began a new Era in the Church, namely, the Conversion of Saul, or Paul, the Apostle, by the personal appearance of CHRIST to him on the road to Damascus, when he received his mission to the Gentiles, after the Jewish Sanhedrim had formally rejected CHRIST by persecuting his disciples. Acts ix. 1—18. And the remainder of the Acts principally records the circumstances of his mission to the Gentiles, and the Churches he founded among them.

The Bible Chronology, however, is more correct than Usher's, (from which it was taken, with some alterations, by Bishop Lloyd) in dating the beginning of John's baptism, A.D. 26, a year earlier than Usher, who dates it A.D. 27, the same year that he assigns to the baptizing of CHRIST, about six months after; which is certainly too short a space for the work of John's stance proves that it was not the year of the crucifixion; for the true Paschal full moon was the day before, Thursday, when CHRIST celebrated the Passover with his disciples. Besides, Dodwell and Ferguson give different results in their calculations, the former reckoning Saturday, the latter Tuesday, to be the day of the Paschal full moon, A.D. 33. Little stress, therefore, is to be laid on such calculations, respecting which Petavius remarked: "Desinant itaque chronologi in anno dieque passionis eruendo, mathematicorum calculis ac noviluniorum pleniluniorumque minutis et scrupulosis ratiociniis, sibi ac lectoribus suis negotium facere. Quo in genere, nimia sane περιεργεια quorundam extitit." Petav. Vol. II. p. 235.

ministry. For John made a great number of “disciples,” and “all the people,” came to his baptism, far and near, (Luke iii. 21.) which could not have required less than a year at least, if not two; nor is it likely that he would sooner have attracted the notice of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. It was not till his fame was generally spread, that they sent a solemn deputation of Priests and Levites to him, to enquire who he was.

After this explanation of the Vulgar Christian Era, and the important articles connected therewith, we shall proceed to consider the principal Eras of Sacred and Profane Chronology that most frequently occur, reduced to the Christian Era in the following Table :—

ARUNDEL MARBLES.

These celebrated marbles, with many other relics of antiquity, were purchased in Asia Minor, in Greece, or in the islands of the Archipelago, by Mr. William Petty, a skilful and indefatigable antiquary*, employed by Thomas, Earl of Arundel, in the

* The competence and qualifications of Mr. Petty, for antiquarian researches, justifying the choice of his munificent employer, are recorded by the editors of the marbles, Selden, Chandler, &c. and also by Sir Thomas Roe, in his Negotiations, who was ambassador at Constantinople from the year 1621 to 1628.

Selden, who was not apt to flatter, represents him as “a man of the greatest judgment and discernment, and no less distinguished for his learning;” and Dr. Chandler styles him, “hominem judicio doctrinæ clarum, et summopere prudentem.”

Sir Thomas Roe, in his correspondence with the Earl of Arundel, on the subject of ancient manuscripts, coins, statues, and inscriptions, repeatedly mentions him with great respect and approbation.

In a letter from Constantinople, dated January 20—30, 1624, Sir Thomas acknowledges the receipt of three letters from his Lordship, in recommendation of Mr. Petty, year 1624, for the purpose of making such collections for him in the East. They were brought into England about the beginning and doubts, "that he will find little worthy of his pains in those rude parts, where barbarism has trodden out all worthy reliques of antiquity." P. 334.

In the next letter, dated October 20—30, 1625, he says, "Mr. Petty hath visited Pergamo, Samos, Ephesus, and some other places, where hee hath made your Lordship greate provisions, though hee lately wrote to mee he had found nothing worth." This indicates both his industry and his discernment.

In a subsequent letter, dated March 28, 1626, O. S. he says, "My last letters brought your Lordship the advice of Mr. Pettye's shipwracke and losses, upon the coast of Asya, returning from Samos. Although hee will not boast to mee, yet I am informed he hath gotten many things rare and ancient. There was never man so fitted to an employment; that encounters all accidents with so unwearied patience, eats with Greekes on their worst days, lies with fishermen on plancks at the best, is all things to all men, that he may obtayne his ends, which are your Lordship's service. He is gone to Athens, whither also I have sent." P. 470.

In a letter to the Duke of Buckingham, dated Constantinople, November 5—15, 1626, he says, "Mr. Petty has raked together 200 pieces, all broken, or few entyre; what they will prove, I cannot judge. He hath this advantage, that hee went himself into all the islands, and took all he saw; and is now gone to Athens, where I have had an agent nine months."

And in a subsequent letter to the same, dated April 15, 1628, he says, "I could have laden shippes with such stones as Mr. Petty diggs, but good things undefaced are rare, or rather not to be found. Our search hath made many poore men industrious to rippe up old ruins." P. 808. Here Sir Thomas seems to prize no "good things," but such as were "entire." Mr. Petty had more discernment, and amidst a mass of rubbish, selected such fragments as appeared to him "rare and ancient;" though "what they would prove, he could not fully judge," at that time, any more than the ambassador.

Except these extracts, a few trifling anecdotes, scattered through the different writers on the Arundel marbles, and one manuscript letter in the British Museum, which states, that Petty was commissioned by King Charles I. to purchase a collection of pictures; Mr. Hewlet, the latest writer on this subject, could find no memoirs of this extraordinary person, to whom literature is so much indebted.

The foregoing passages of Sir Thomas Roe's letters, tend to invalidate the prevailing opinion, first broached by Gassendi, in his life of the celebrated Peiresc, (that learned and munificent patron of literature, who was counsellor in the Parliament of Provence, and died in 1637,) namely, that "the Parian Chronicle had first been discovered by means of Peiresc, and purchased for him by one Sampson, his agent, at Smyrna, for 50 pieces of gold (auris), but that when they were ready to be sent on board, by some artifice of the venders, Sampson was thrown into prison, and the marbles themselves deranged, or thrown into disorder (distracta), and that afterwards they were purchased for Lord Arundel, by Mr. Petty, at a far greater price, (pretio longe majori.)"

This report, unnoticed by Sir Thomas Roe and Petty, seems vague and improbable in itself; for 1. Gassendi evidently confounded the Parian Chronicle, which was engraved on a single tablet, with the whole collection. 2. It appears, that the collection of the Arundel marbles was made by Petty himself, in detached pieces, during his progress through Asia Minor, the Islands, and Greece; and that the Chronicle was not found till near the end, and probably at the island of Paros, according to the opinion of the generality of writers, Du Pin, Du Fresnoy, Rawlinson, &c. grounded on the evidence of the Chronicle itself, which seems to have been engraved at Paros for the author's and his of the year 1627, and placed in the gardens belonging to Arundel House, in the Strand, London.

On their arrival, they excited a lively curiosity, and were viewed by many inquisitive and learned men; among others, by Sir *Robert Cotton, who went immediately to that profound countrymen's use; for if elsewhere, why should Astyanax be noticed as Archon, at Paros, in the year that it was made?

It is not probable, indeed, that even Mr. Petty exactly knew the contents of the Marmor Chironicon, for it is not distinguished by any particular appellation in Sir Thomas Roe's correspondence, though included under the general description of "things rare and ancient." We might also reasonably form this conclusion from Selden's account of the great difficulty he found in decyphering it, which he represents as the labour of a great many days. "It is more obscure," says he, "than the Smyranean league, the characters being often entirely obliterated, often nearly so, (elementis sæpius omnino detritis, fugientibus sæpius.) Nevertheless, by the assistance of glasses, and the critical sagacity of my very kind friend, Patrick Young, after a great many repeated trials, I have restored them as well as I could." After all this labour, much was left for the industry and skill of future editors to explore; and even since the labours of a Chandler, the subject is not yet exhausted, nor the lacunæ fully and satisfactorily supplied by conjectural criticism.

These observations seem abundantly sufficient to establish both the authenticity and antiquity of the Parian Chronicle. No doubts of either were entertained at the time of the discovery of this precious fragment, nor long after, by those who were most competent to judge correctly, Selden, Prideaux, Maittaire, &c. until an ingenious classical sceptic, Rev. J. Robinson, ventured to call them in question, in a Dissertation on the Parian Chronicle, 1788, octavo. But his hypothesis refutes itself: he admits, that "this curious, learned, and comprehensive system of chronology, including a detail of the principal epochs and transactions of Greece, and other countries, of Athens, Corinth, Macedon, Lydia, Crete, Cyprus, Sicily, Persia, &c. during a period of 1300 years and upwards, must have been engraved at a considerable expense on a tablet of marble;" and yet he rather inconsistently supposes, "that it might have been a spurious fabrication of some learned Greek, so late as the 16th century, executed from a mercenary motive of gain, in order that it might be sold for a high price at Smyrna, a commodious emporium for such rarities, after he had artfully broken the block, and defaced the inscription in several places, to give it an air of antiquity!!" The weakness and inconsistency of his arguments throughout are ably exposed by the learned Mr. Hewlett, in a Vindication of the Authenticity of the Parian Chronicle, 8vo. which came out in the following year, 1789.

* Selden happily expresses the eager and impatient curiosity with which these precious reliques were viewed by the learned on their arrival in London.

Cum primum inviderat ea vir præstantissimus Robertus Cottonus, condus ille et promus vetustatis longe locupletissimus, ad me advolat, et impensius instat, ut mane proximo, (nam provector nox erat) ad Græca illa arcana me totum accingerem. Libentissime annuo. Sed ut expeditius res absolveretur, rogo ut in operæ societatem, adsciscerentur amici communes, eruditissimus Patricius Junius, bibliothecarius regius, et multijugæ doctrinæ et studii indefatigabilis vir Ricardus Jamesius. Utrique condicit ille. Illucescente die crastino, convenimus triumviri in hortis Arundelianis, ubi Smyrnæorum decreta, et fœdus ab iis cum Magnesiis, ad Seleuci Callinici Asiæ regis majestatem tutius conservandam percussum, in stelâ variatim disruptâ, primo comperimus. Fragmenta suis locis commissa longitudinem 8 pedum et 2 pollicum; latitudinem pedum 3, poll. 5; crassitiem pollicum 8, continent. Scriptura autem, cujus lineæ utramque oram contin-scholar and antiquary, Selden, and intreated him to undertake the explanation of the Greek inscriptions engraved on the marbles. Selden readily complied with his request, but desired the assistance of their common friends, the learned Patrick Young, (or Junius, as he styled himself in Latin,) librarian to James I. and Charles I. and Richard James, Fellow of Corpus Christi College, in Oxford.

“The next morning, as soon as it was light, this triumvirate met in Arundel Gardens,” and commenced their operations, by cleaning and examining the marble, which contained the league made by the cities of Smyrna and Magnesia with Seleucus Calinicus, king of Syria. Afterwards they proceeded to the Parian Chronicle, and other inscriptions.

Of these marbles, the most curious and valuable is unquestionably that which contained the precious fragment of the Parian Chronicle, which, in its perfect state, exhibited a chronological detail of the principal events of Greece, and the neighbouring states, beginning with the accession of Cecrops, B.C. 1582, and ending with the archonship of Diognetus, at Athens, B.C. 264. But the Chronicle of the last 90 years was lost, so that the part now remaining ends at the archonship of Diotimus, B.C. 354. In this fragment, the inscription is, at present, so much corroded and defaced in many places, that the sense can only be discovered by very learned, industrious, and sagacious antiquaries; or, more properly speaking, decyphered and supplied by their conjectures.

In the turbulent reign of Charles I. and the subsequent usurpation of Cromwell, Arundel House was often deserted by the illustrious owners; and in their absence, some of the marbles, which were deposited in the gardens, were defaced or broken, and others either stolen, or used to repair the house, to the great detriment of literature. This was, most unfortunately, the fate of the chronological marble in particular; the upper part of it, containing at least half of the inscription, is said to have been worked up in repairing a chimney in Arundel House! The fragment now remaining begins with these words—εσκευασε και νομισμα, l. 46, epoch. 31.

In the year 1667, the Hon. Henry Howard, second son of gunt, longitudinem pedum 7, et pollicum 6, occupat. Lavando, et sæpius detergendo, lectioni accommodam reddimus, mutuas tradimus operas, et demum quæ reliqua erant exscribimus. Selden's Works, Vol. II. p. 1439.

Henry, Earl of Arundel, and grandson, by the mother's side, of the first collector, on the application of John Evelyn, Esq. presented these curious remains of antiquity to the University of Oxford, where they are carefully preserved in a room adjoining to the public schools, called the Museum Arundelianum.

The first edition of the Arundelian Inscriptions was published by Selden, in 1628, the year after their arrival, in a small quarto volume, entitled Marmora Arundeliana, including twenty-nine Greek and Latin inscriptions, copied from the marbles, with a translation and commentary.

When his edition (which is chiefly the basis of the rest) grew scarce, Bishop Fell engaged Mr. Prideaux to publish a second, which he did, in 1676, under the title of Marmora Oxoniensia, and augmented it with the variorum notes of Lydiat, Ursatus, and other learned commentators.

In 1732, a third and enlarged variorum edition was published by Mr. Maittaire, with the comments of Selden, Price, Palmerius, Lydiat, Marsham, Prideaux, Reinesius, Spon, Smith, Bentley, Maffei, Dodwell, along with his own conjectures and remarks on the marbles, and the preceding comments.

In 1763, after the University had acquired a great variety of other ancient marbles, by the benefactions of Sir George Wheeler, the Countess of Pomfret, in 1755, Mr. Dawkins, Dr. Rawlinson, and others; Dr. Chandler undertook to give the public a new and improved edition of these valuable remains of antiquity, in a very magnificent volume, in which he has corrected the mistakes of his predecessors, and, in the Parian Chronicle especially, has supplied the lacunæ by many happy conjectures. These are introduced in the following copy of the original Greek Chronicle, given by him; and the English translation which follows, is chiefly that of Hewlett, founded thereon; which, therefore, is greatly superior to those of Count Scipio Maffei, in Italian, M. Du Fresnoy, in French, and Dr. Playfair, in English, from the earlier editions.

REMARKS ON THE CHRONICLE.

The Parian Chronicle was engraved on a coarse kind of marble, or stone, five inches thick, which, when Selden viewed it, at first measured 3 feet 7 inches by 2 feet 7. The top was imperfect, the lower corner on the right hand having been broken off, and the right-side measured only 2 feet 11 inches. It contained, at that time, ninety-three lines, reckoning the imperfect ones, and might originally, perhaps, have contained a hundred.

Upon an average, the lines consist of 130 letters, all capitals, in close continuation, unbroken into words, like the oldest Greek manuscripts : the ancient curtailed form of the Pi, Π, is observed ; the prostrate Eta, Ξ, is used for the Zeta ; and there are some smaller capitals, particularly the Omicron, Omega, and Theta, intermixed with the larger ; and the whole possesses that plainness and simplicity, which are among the surest marks of antiquity, bearing a general resemblance, but not a servile imitation, of the most authentic monuments about the same date ; of which, perhaps, it most nearly resembles the Marmor Cyzicenum, at Venice, in the forms of the letters. See a fac-simile of the characters, and of the stone itself, in Hewlett's Vindication, p. 50.

The following is a specimen of the mode of writing :—

————— ΑΦΟΥΟΙ ΝΕΣΕΙΣΤΡΟΙΑΝΕ
 . . . ΠΑΤΕΥΣ ΕΤΗϞΗΗΗΗΔ'ΙΙΙΙΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΟΝΤΟ
 ΣΑΘΗ ΕΣΘΕΩΣΤΡΕΙΣΚΑΙΔΕΚΑΤΟΥΕΤΟΥ

 ΝΟΣΕΒΔΟΜΗΦΘΙΝΟΝΤΟΣ.

The same, in modern Greek letters, divided into words, and the lacunæ supplied :—

————— 'Αφ' ού οι [Ελλην]ες εις Τροϊαν ε[στρο]ατευσ [αντο] ετη DCCCCLIV· βασιλευοντος Αθη[νων Μεν]εσθεως τρεις και δεκατου ετους. 'Αφ' ού Τροια ηλω ετη DCCCCLV, βασιλευοντος Αθηνων [Μενεσθε]ως, δευτερου ετους, μηνος Θ[αργηλιω]νος εβδομη φθινοντος.

The mode of numeration employed in the Chronicle, of expressing the dates of events by the initial letters of the words denoting the numbers, I, denoting εις, one, anciently written ις ; Π, πεντε, five ; Δ, δεκα, ten ; Η, the aspirate, in εκατον, one hundred ; and by combination Δ', or Π multiplied by Δ, fifty ; Ϟ, or Π multiplied by Η, five hundred ; which is not found in the most ancient books and manuscripts, is one of the most certain and unequivocal marks of its antiquity, and also of its country, then subject to the Athenians : for it was an Attic mode of numeration used in Solon's time, and is mentioned only perhaps by Herodian, who represents it as obsolete, in his little treatise περι αριθμων “ of numeration,” of which a fragment is preserved in the fourth volume of Stephens's Greek Thesaurus, p. 205—208.

See Hewlett, p. 46, and his answers to some Critical Strictures, p. 7, 8.

The author of four dissertations subjoined to the Septuagint version of Daniel, printed at Rome, in 1772, ascribes the Parian Chronicle to Demetrius Phalereus, as its author. The name is unluckily defaced at the beginning of the inscription, and he thus ingeniously supplies the lacunæ :—

[Δημητριος ὁ Φανοστρατ] ου [Φαληρευς, εκ των συ]μπαν[των ὑπαρχοντ]ων [χρο]νων ανεγραψα, &c.

It is true, indeed, that the classical purity of the style, the great variety of minute and miscellaneous information, in so short a compass, not only respecting the principal facts in some of the most important eras of Greece, but also marking the progress of civilization and science, by fixing the dates of the most eminent legislators, poets, and philosophers, all evince considerable learning and research, and local knowledge, in the compiler of the Chronicle, joined to the labour and expense of the engraving, which evidently prove that he could neither have been a mean nor illiterate individual, but rather some citizen, distinguished for his fortune and talents; yet it is not probable, that Demetrius, however the description may suit him in other respects, was the author, from the mention of Astyanax, the Parian Archon, as observed before, which, though highly proper, if the Chronicle was the production of a native, would surely be irrelevant, were he an Athenian himself, or governor of Athens. And Paros was one of the most flourishing and opulent of the Cyclades, and therefore likely to possess such citizens.

And, indeed, the most rational solution, perhaps, of the silence of subsequent classical writers respecting this curious Chronicle, (which is the principal argument urged to impeach its genuineness) may be derived from its insular and secluded situation. Even the Smyrnan league itself, though a public record of considerable notoriety and importance in history, is equally unnoticed by subsequent historians, and yet its authenticity is unquestioned.

The inscription in general, so far as is legible, may be considered as accurately engraved, which is no slight recommendation of its merit and utility, considering the difficulty of the task. Still, however, it exhibits occasional errors: such, probably, are those usually reputed archaisms, of εγ, for εν or εκ; εμ for εν;

αι for αν; τομ for τον; τημ for την, &c. because these words are in general written correctly; and in the foregoing specimen, epoch 25, there is a gross omission of εικοστου και, before δευτερου; because Troy was taken, not in the “second,” but in “the twenty-second year of the reign of Menestheus,” as is evident from the preceding paragraph, which dates the expedition against Troy “in the thirteenth year of his reign.” This latter clause is also erroneously introduced again verbatim in Selden’s edition of the inscription, epoch 28. It is true, Chandler proposes a different conjectural reading of the clause; namely, βασιλευοντος Αθηνων Μεδοντος τρεις και δεκατου ετους, substituting the perpetual Archon Medon for Menestheus; but this is inadmissible: for, 1. He could have no access to the marble itself for revision, which, since Selden’s time, has been destroyed and lost, as low down as epoch 31. 2. By the ensuing rectification of the heroic period of the Chronicle, it appears that the 28th epoch corresponded to the eighth year of Acastus.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE CHRONICLE.

From the foregoing specimen, epoch 24 and 25, it is obvious, that the Chronicle was constructed upon two distinct and independent principles of computation. The former Analytic, reckoning upwards from B.C. 264, the fixed date or radix, at the bottom; the latter Synthetic, reckoning downwards from the reign of Cecrops, through the succeeding kings, and perpetual, decennial, and annual Archons. The former was an ingenious and compendious mode of reckoning, by adding to the fixed date, successively, supplemental numbers, expressed shortly by numeral letters. This was, probably, the invention of the compiler of the Chronicle, to save labour and expense in engraving it. The other, however, was the original mode employed by the authors from whose works the Chronicle was taken. And that this was the compiler’s design, is evident from the omission of the years of each reign, for the most part, which, in the present epochs, so fortunately preserved, are expressed in words at full length, and took up much room.

It is observable, and has been remarked by Selden, and by all the editors of the Chronicle, that there is a difference of about 25 years between the two methods of computation; and that this difference is not accidental, but designed, running uniformly through all the dates of the heroic period, from Cecrops to the destruction of Troy; whereas, in the second or historic period, (according to the division here introduced, on Selden's authority,) the two methods agree to the end.

The cause of this systematic difference has not been explained, nor even attempted to be explained, by any of the writers upon the Chronicle that have come to my knowledge. Nor will I presume to erect the following conjecture into certainty. Still, however, I flatter myself it will not be adjudged altogether fanciful or unfounded by those candid and skilful readers, who are most willing and most able to appreciate the profound difficulty and obscurity of the subject, in traversing "the dark backward, and abyme of Time."

In order to prepare the way for this investigation, the first step necessary, was to construct a Table of the reigns of the Athenian kings, from Codrus downwards, which should critically correspond with the Chronicle, and give the precise year denoted by the twenty-second of Menestheus, in which Troy was taken. Such a table is, I trust, the XIVth, collected from careful comparison of the Chronicon of Eusebius, Petavius, Helvicus, Playfair, &c. with the Chronicle itself; by means of which, I at length discovered, that the twenty-second of Menestheus corresponded to the year B.C. 1184, the very year assigned for the taking of Troy by Apollodorus, and the Greek Chronographers in general; and, consequently, that the Chronicle, in its primitive mode of computation by reigns, established the received date of this leading epoch of Greek chronology.

In constructing this Table, I ascended from the fixed date of the appointment of annual Archons, B.C. 684, according to Prideaux and Playfair; and this process gave the commencement of the reign of Cecrops, B.C. 1558, the same year assigned by Petavius from Eusebius. And that it was rightly assigned may be collected from the following considerations:—

1. Castor, of Rhodes, who flourished about B.C. 50, reckoned that Cecrops began his reign 780 years before the first Olympiad, B.C. 776, or B.C. 1556, two years later. This date is adopted by Usher.

2. Isagoras, the orator, born B. C. 436, reckoned that "not less than 1000 years had intervened from the first settlement of the Athenian polity by Cecrops, till its subversion by Pisistratus, B. C. 561. This would give the accession of Cecrops,

B. C. 1561, or three years earlier. Whence we are warranted to assume the mean date, B. C. 1558, as correct.

3. This is confirmed by the Chronicle itself:—

By the former method of computation, from the accession of Cecrops, B. C. 1582, to the destruction of Troy, B. C. 1209, — was an interval of 373 years; but precisely the same interval results by the latter, from the first of Cecrops, B. C. 1558, to the twenty-second of Menestheus, B. C. 1185. Consequently, B. C. 1558, must have been the specific date upon which the table of reigns, adapted to the Chronicle, was originally constructed.

There appears, at first sight, a slight difference between the twenty-second of Menestheus, B. C. 1185, and the received date of the capture of Troy, B. C. 1184. But this is only apparent, depending on the different commencement of the Attic year, about the Summer solstice. Troy was taken, according to the Chronicle, on the 24th of Thargelion, or 26th of May, near the end of that Attic year, which therefore began in the Julian year, B. C. 1185, and ended in the succeeding, B. C. 1184. And the critical accuracy of the Chronicle, and correctness of the conjectural reading Thargelion, are vouched by Dion. Hal. who states, that “Troy was taken near the end of the Spring, seventeen days before the Summer solstice, on the 23d of Thargelion, according to the Attic reckoning.”

The same is confirmed by poetical authority:

Et Danaum decimo vere redisse rates.—Propert. IV.

———— vix prima inceperat æstas,

Et pater Anchises dare fatis vela jubebat.—Virg. Æn. III.

Here Propertius states that the Grecian fleet returned in the Spring of the tenth year of the siege; and Virgil, that Æneas set sail, soon after, at the very beginning of Summer ensuing.

But how are we to account for this systematic difference between the two methods, of about 25 years, which pervades the upper part of the Chronicle, but vanishes in the lower, where both methods agree?

The leading date of the first period appears to be that of the capture of Troy, the established date of which, B. C. 1184, is furnished by the latter method of computation by reigns. But the compiler of the Chronicle, rejecting this date, adopted the earlier, of B. C. 1209, probably on the authority of authors that rated it higher, such as Dicæarchus, a celebrated historian and philosopher, of the Aristotelian school, who flourished B. C. 310. or about 50 years before the Chronicle was engraved, and reckoned that Troy was taken, B. C. 1212, three years sooner. Whence the compiler found it necessary to raise all the other dates of this period by the same difference of 25 years; and by so doing, has proved the inaccuracy of his assumed date, B. C. 1209; because several of the earlier epochs are thereby thrown out of their proper places an entire reign backwards. Thus, epoch 21, the political reform of Theseus, which, by the table of reigns adapted to the latter method, happened B. C. 1234, in the second year of his reign, as confirmed by the testimony of Plutarch, and others, that he began his reform soon after his accession to the throne, is thrown back by the former method to B. C. 1259, the twenty-fourth year of the reign of his father Ægeus!

That the dates of the reigns, Tab. XIV. are rightly assigned, is confirmed also by another epoch, 32; in which, though the supplementary number is obliterated, yet "the twenty-first year of" the perpetual Archon "Æschylus" is fortunately preserved, which was B. C. 758. But Eusebius dated the foundation of Syracuse twenty-four years before the accession of the decennial Archon Clidicus, in B. C. 734, which, added thereto, gives the same result, B. C. 758, and corrects a slight error in Selden, p. 1514, who cites this testimony of Eusebius, and yet dates the epoch, B. C. 757, a year later.

This epoch, with which the historical or second period of the Chronicle begins, is of considerable importance:

1. It verifies the next epoch, 33, by reckoning downwards, and fixes the establishment of annual Archons in B. C. 684.
2. It also detects an error in Petavius, adopted by Playfair, that the decennial Archonship expired with Eryxias, B. C. 687, three years earlier; in consequence of which, the latter has unwarrantably deducted two years from the decennial Archon Charops, and one year from Æsimesdes, in order to fix the accession of the first decennial Archon Charops, in B. C. 754, which he rightly does, following Prideaux. It is to be regretted, indeed, that this excellent chronologer did not adduce his authorities in the first edition of his useful work; and it is to be hoped that he will remedy this defect in the next, which is now in contemplation.
3. Selden judiciously observes, that this epoch furnishes an important adjustment of the dates of the succeeding colonies, after Syracuse, which settled at Navos, Catana, Trotilus, &c. and are noticed in the beginning of the sixth book of Thucydides.

We are now warranted, upon the high authority of the Parian Chronicle, to consider the thirty reigns of the Athenian kings and archons, from Cecrops to Creon, the first annual archon, as one of the most authentic and correct documents to be found in the whole range of Profane Chronology; while the Chronicle also verifies the broken list of annual archons, as far as it reaches downwards, by confirming, in near twenty instances, the dates assigned by other historians, both earlier and later.

We are also enabled to adjust that much disputed epoch of the time of Homer with a high degree of precision. Diognetus, in whose archonship he flourished, epoch 30, did not begin to reign till B. C. 893; consequently, the date B. C. 907, furnished by the supplemental number, which is perfect, must be erroneous: if then we reduce it to B. C. 884, the ninth year of Diognetus, we shall find it confirmed by the important testimony of Herodotus, who declares, that "Hesiod and Homer lived not above four hundred years before his time." B. 2. 53. Herodotus was born B. C. 484, which, added to 400, gives B. C. 884.

The supplemental number in the epoch of Hesiod 29, is imperfect, DCLXX . . Selden supplies the chasm with another X, and so makes it 680; but Prideaux, with II, reducing it to 672, which also reduces the epoch to B. C. 936, and so leaves a difference of 52 years between the poets, which is still too much. But if we further deduct the systematic difference of 25 years, it will reduce Hesiod's time to B. C. 911, and leave an interval of only 27 years between them.

The conjectural date assigned to epoch 28, of the Ionic migration, B. C. 1077, by Selden, and followed by his successors, requires to be lowered in the same proportion. For Eusebius states, that this migration took place in the eighth year of the Athenian king Acastus, which, according to his Canon, was B. C. 1043; and Eratosthenes dated it 140 years after the destruction of Troy, which he reckoned B. C. 1183, furnishing the same year, B. C. 1043. And this rectification critically corresponds with the account of Thucydides, who, in his curious and valuable summary of the ancient state of Greece, antecedent to the Peloponnesian war, B. 1, dates the return of the Heraclidæ to Peloponnesus, 80 years after the destruction of Troy; and he describes the planting of Ionia, and several of the islands, as “ a good while after their return,” which agrees very well to 60 years after.

CORRECTIONS OF THE CHRONICLE.

Besides the general rectification of the first period, Table XIII. there are some epochs in the second that require correction.

Epoch 36, B. C. 605, cannot be understood of the first year of the reign of Alyattes, which began B. C. 619. It probably refers to the time of his war with Cyaxares, king of Media, which was put an end to by the celebrated eclipse of Thales, two years after, B. C. 603.

Epoch 42, B. C. 556. This was the fifth year of the reign of Cræsus, and refers perhaps to his first inquiry concerning his son who was dumb; to which the Oracle replied, that in an evil day he should hear his son speak! which was afterwards verified at the surprise of Sardis by Cyrus; when the son, alarmed for his father's life, eagerly exclaimed to the Persian soldier, “ Kill not Cræsus!”

Epoch 43. The supplemental number being obliterated, we may supply B. C. 548, the correct date of the capture of Cræsus. This corresponds with the sequel: for Hipponax, his contemporary, flourished in the 63d Olympiad, B. C. 528, according to Pliny; and Cræsus survived Cyrus, who died B. C. 529, and lived in the reign of Cambyses.

Epoch 45. The conjectural date B. C. 517, furnished by Selden, supposing that the last three letters of the supplemental number were III. is raised by Prideaux, to B. C. 520, substituting III, or VI. And this probably was the actual year of the accession of Darius I. after the death of Smerdis Magus, and also after the short reigns of Maraphis and Artaphrenes, noticed by Æschylus, which might altogether have taken up a year or more; but which, according to the construction of Ptolomy's Canon, are assigned to Darius, in dating his reign B. C. 521, or are included in his first year. See the ensuing article of Ptolomy's Canon.

Epoch 50. The conjectural date of the death of Darius, B.C. 490, is incorrect, however it be filled up, for it comes before B.C. 486, in the next epoch; but Xerxes succeeded Darius in B.C. 485, according to the Canon.

Epoch 52, 53. These dates are each a year too high.

Epoch 55. The supplemental number being mutilated, the date is furnished from Diodorus Siculus.

Epoch 61, 62, 65, are also supplied from Diodorus. The last, however, is incorrect, B.C. 406; for the accession of Artaxerxes Mnemon, the brother of Cyrus the younger, was not till B.C. 404, according to the Canon.

ERAS OF IPHITUS, AND OF THE OLYMPIADS.

Ουτ' Ολυμπιας αγωνα
Φερτερον αυδασομεν.

“ Nothing better than the Olympic games
Can we celebrate.”—PIND. Od. 1.

× These celebrated games were originally instituted in honour of Jupiter Olympius, by the Phrygian Pelops, who settled in the Grecian Peninsula, called from him Peloponnesus, about B.C. 1350. They were repeated by the Theban Hercules, about B.C. 1325, and after a long interruption, restored in part by Iphitus, king of Elis, and celebrated at Olympia, on the banks of the river Alpheus, B.C. 884, according to the most probable account. However, the Vulgar Era of the Olympiads did not commence till 108 years after, July 19, B.C. 776. From which time, they were regularly continued every four years complete, or fifth year current, and lasted for five days, on each of which were celebrated the different games of leaping, running, throwing the discus, darting, and wrestling; the last day fell on the first full moon after the Summer solstice, and the next day the prizes were awarded*.

Pausanias, that accurate antiquary, who flourished about A.D. 170, and had himself inspected the Olympic register at Elis, gives the following particular account of their gradual restoration:—

“ After Iphitus had revived the festival in the manner above related, the memory of several ancient customs was still lost, and it was by slow degrees that men came to the remembrance of them, and added to the games whatever they happened to recollect. This is evident. For reckoning from the time when the memorials of the Olympiads go on without interruption, the first prize given was for the foot-race, which was won by Coræbus, the Elean. Afterwards, in the 14th Olympiad, the Diaulos, (or double course) was added; when Hypenus, of Pisa, bore away the olive-branch for the Diaulos, as did Acanthus in the next Olympiad. Then, in the 18th Olympiad, they recollected the Pentathlos, (or the five exercises) and the wrestling." Eliac. 1. p. 394.

The registry of the victors in the games, and consequently of the Olympiads themselves, or Quadriennial Cycle, the first year of which was appropriated to the celebration of the games, was carefully kept at Elis, and the names of the victors inserted in it by the presidents of the games. Pausanias found it perfect, except in the 211th Olympiad, A.D. 65, "which (says he,) is the only Olympiad omitted in the register of the Eleans." Phocic. p. 892. It was therefore a register of the most public authenticity. See Musgrave's Vindication of the Olympiads, p. 230.

Before Pausanias, the judicious Strabo had remarked, that Coræbus was the first victor in the Olympic games, and Athenæus afterwards particularly notices his profession as a cook. Lib. ix. p. 392. And the learned chronologer Varro justly considers the era of the Olympiads, as forming the limit between the fabulous and historical ages. These testimonies infinitely outweigh the objections of Plutarch, too hastily adopted by Sir Isaac Newton, in his Chronology, p. 47; namely, that the register of the Olympiads was published rather late, "by Hippias, the Elean, about the 105th Olympiad, B.C. 360, and from no certain materials."

The adjustment of this era to the Christian is fully ascertained by historical and astronomical evidence.

The learned Censorinus, in his excellent work, De die natali, cap. 21, marks the year in which he wrote it, A.D. 238, in the consulate of Ulpianus and Pontianus, by its reference to some of the most remarkable eras*; and among the rest states, that it was “ the 1014th year from the first Olympiad, reckoned from the Summer days, on which the Olympic games were celebrated.” But 1014—A.D. 238=B.C. 776.

* Secundum Varronis rationem, nisi fallor, hic annus cujus velut index et titulus quidem est Ulpianus et Pontianus consulatus (A.D. 238) ab Olympiade primâ millesimus est et quartus decimus, ex diebus duntaxat æstivis quibus agon Olympicus celebratur. A Româ autem conditâ, nongentesimus nonagesimus primus, et quidem ex Parilibus, unde Urbis anni numerantur.—Ab Ægyptiis quidam anni in literas relati sunt; ut quas Nabonnazarus nominant, quod a primo imperii ejus anno consurgunt; quorum hic nongentesimus octogesimus est: Item Philippi [Aridæi] qui ab excessu Alexandri Magni numerantur; et ad hunc usque perducti, annos quingenta sexaginta duos consummant: sed horum initia semper a primo die mensis ejus sumuntur, cui apud

Polybius relates, that in the third year of the 140th Olympiad, during the Spring, there happened two memorable battles; the former between the Romans and Carthaginians, at the lake Thrasymene in Italy; the latter between Antiochus and Ptolomy, at Raphia, in Cœle-Syria. And also, that in the course of that same year, there was an eclipse of the moon, which terrified the Gallic auxiliaries whom Attalus was bringing over from Europe, in consequence of which they refused to proceed. Lib. v. p. 442. The third year of the 140th Olympiad began July, B.C. 218, and ended July, B.C. 217; but in the former Julian year, there was a great eclipse of the moon on September 1, an hour after midnight, in which the moon was near an hour and half immersed in the earth’s shadow, and which therefore was fully sufficient to terrify the ignorant and superstitious; and the battle of Thrasymene was fought in the next Julian year, B.C. 217, in the consulate of Servilius Geminus and C. Flaminius II. but as it was in Spring, it fell within the compass of the same Olympic year. But 139 Olympiads and two years over make 558 years, which added to B.C. 218, give B.C. 776 for the date of the first Olympiad. These demonstrative characters are furnished by Petavius, tom. ii. p. 56.

The following Table gives the first year of each Olympiad, and the victor in the Stadium, or foot-race: whence the second, third, and fourth years, are easily found.

ERA OF THE FOUNDATION OF ROME.

This celebrated Roman Era succeeds next in order of time to the Grecian. Its adjustment to the Christian Era is also equally ascertained from History and Astronomy.

1. Censorinus reckoned that the year A.D. 238, in which he wrote his work, was the 991st from the foundation of Rome, by the Varronian computation. But $991 - \text{A.D. } 238 = \text{B.C. } 753$. See Petav. tom. ii. p. 53, 69.

2. Cicero and Plutarch both relate, that on the day of the foundation of Rome, there was a total eclipse of the sun, which happened, according to the latter, in the third year of the sixth Olympiad, B.C. 754—3. But by astronomical calculation, there was an eclipse of the sun visible at Rome, B.C. 753, July 5, aft. $4\frac{1}{2}$, dig. 4, agreeing in every respect except the quantity. This also adjusts the Grecian and Roman eras together. See Cicero de Div. lib. ii. Plutarch in Romulo.

3. Livy records, in the consulate of Livius Salinator and Valerius Messala, U.C. 566, a total eclipse of the sun, which, by astronomical calculation, happened B.C. 188, July 17, morn. 8h. 38m. dig. $10\frac{5}{4}$: but the sum of these years gives B.C. 754, complete, or B.C. 753, current. Livy, lib. xxxviii. 36.

4. Livy also records, that in the consulate of Paulus Æmilius and Licinius Crassus, U.C. 586, Sulpitius Gallus, a military tribune, predicted an eclipse of the moon to happen on the ensuing night, from the second to the fourth hour, which accordingly happened the night before the famous battle of Pydna, in which Perseus, king of Macedon, was defeated, and this encouraged the Romans, and dispirited the Macedonians. And by astronomical calculation, there was an eclipse of the moon, B.C. 168, June 21, which began, aft. 6h. 14m. and lasted four hours, 15. dig. The total immersion, or eclipse, began 7h. 32m. or in the second hour of the night, and lasted till the fourth hour, exactly agreeing with the prediction of Gallus, which identifies the eclipses, and shews considerable skill, on his part, at that early age. It also proves, that Livy was incorrect, in assigning the night of the eclipse, pridie nonas Septembris. The context in the preceding chapter shews, that the season of the year was rather about the Summer solstice. Livy, lib. xlv. 37. But the sum of these years gives B.C. 754, complete, or B.C. 753, current, for the date of the foundation of Rome, according to the Varro-nian computation, which is infallibly established by means of these eclipses.

THE ERA OF NABONASSAR.

THIS scientific Chaldean Era commenced soon after the Grecian and the Roman. Combined with the Christian, they form the four cardinal Eras of Sacred and Profane Chronology.

The origin of this Era is thus represented by Syncellus, from the accounts of Polyhistor and Berosus, the earliest writers extant on Chaldean History and Antiquities.

“Nabonassar [King of Babylon] having collected the acts of his predecessors, destroyed them, in order that the computation of the reigns of the Chaldean kings might be made from himself*.”

It began therefore with the reign of Nabonassar, Feb. 26, B.C. 747. The form of year employed therein, is the moveable year, of 365 days, consisting of 12 equal months of 30 days, and five supernumerary days; which was the year in common use, as we have seen, among the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Armenians, Persians, and the principal Oriental nations, from the earliest times. This year ran through all the seasons, in the course of 1461 years, as observed before.

Though the Historic Era of Nabonassar began the 26th of February, this was not the Astronomical commencement of the grand period of 1461 years: that began 120 years before, March 28, B.C. 867; when there was a synchronism of the New Moon and Vernal Equinox on that day †; which was the beginning of the Chaldean year also, and therefore the fittest for the commencement either of the very first, or at least a new period of their Annus Magnus.

The freedom of the Nabonassarean year, from intercalation, rendered it peculiarly convenient for astronomical calculation. Hence it was adopted by the early Greek astronomers, Timocharis and Hipparchus; and by those of the Alexandrian * Ναβονασαρος συναγαγων τας πραξεις των προ αυτου βασιλεων, ηφανισεν, οπως απ' αυτου η καταριθμησις γινηται των Χαλδαιων βασιλεων. Syncell. Chronograph. p. 207.

† This is demonstrated in a curious periodical publication, by Mr. Howes, entitled, Critical Observations on Books, Ancient and Modern, Vol. iii. Append. p. 57, 58, White, 1788, from a newly constructed Calippic Table, and from two Solar Eclipses, Aug. 4, B.C. 868, and July 24, B.C. 867, furnished by M. Pingrè, Hist. Acad. Bell. N. B. By reckoning the first year before the Vulgar Era, O, he dates these eclipses a year short of the common mode; namely, B.C. 867 and 866.

school, Ptolomy, &c. In consequence of this, the whole historical catalogue of reigns has been commonly, though improperly, called Ptolomy's Canon; because he probably continued the original table of Chaldean and Persian kings, and added thereto the Egyptian and Roman, down to his own time.

The commencement of the Era of Nabonassar, B.C. 747, is critically defined, both from History and Astronomy.

1. Thucydides, B. 8, has preserved a curious original document, in the third treaty of peace concluded between Tissaphernes and the Peloponnesians, beginning with its date: "In the 13th year of the reign of Darius [II, Nothus,] &c." This treaty, it appears from the history, was made in winter, in the 20th year of the Peloponnesian war, which began in the spring, B.C. 431; and, consequently, the 20th year, in winter, was the beginning of the Julian year, B.C. 410: which, added to the 13th year of Darius, or 337th of the Era, gives its commencement, B.C. 747.

2. Censorinus, in the valuable synchronisms mentioned before, states, that the 986th Nabonassarean year began the 7th of the Calends of July, or June 25, in the year A.D. 238, in which he published his work. Therefore, that Nabonassarean year did not end till June 25, of the next Julian year, A.D. 239; which, subtracted from 986, gives the commencement of the Era, B.C. 747.

3. According to Ptolomy, Hipparchus selected three ancient eclipses of the moon, out of those observed at Babylon, and brought from thence; of which the first happened in the first year; and the two others, in the second year of Mardok Empadus, the fifth king in succession from Nabonassar. This proves decisively, that the Era of Nabonassar was in established use before the time of Hipparchus, though he did not give the collected years from the beginning of the Era. These, probably, were not reckoned up in the original Chaldean Era, which only marked the succession of kings, and the number of years which each reigned. The collected years might have been added afterwards by the Egyptian astronomers.

Ptolomy himself mentions a lunar eclipse of 7 digits, in the 7th year of Ptolomy Philometor, and 574th year from Nabonassar, which happened on the 27th of the Egyptian month Phamenoth, and lasted from the 8th, to the 10th hour. In that year, the 27th of Phamenoth, was the first of May. And, by astronomical calculation, there was a lunar eclipse of 7 dig. 26 min. on May 1, B.C. 174, which lasted 2 h. 50 min.; and this year, B.C. 174, added to 573 years complete, gives B.C. 747, for the commencement of the Era.

The following Tables of Nabonassarean years, reduced to Julian; and of the collective days of the twelve months of the Egyptian, or Nabonassarean year, are of considerable use in calculation.

N. B. It is necessary to observe, that in the first year of Darius Hystaspes, two Chaldean, or Nabonassarean years, began in the same Julian year, B.C. 521; namely, the 227th, on the first of January, and the 228th, on the 31st of December following. Before this time, the Chaldean year, which began in any Julian year, is also the year conumerary with it, or the year for the most part coinciding therewith. Thus the years N. E. 224, 225, 226, 227, beginning January 1, coincide throughout with the Julian years, B.C. 524, 523, 522, 521, respectively, beginning on the same day; and are, therefore, conumerary therewith, critically; and if we ascend to the first of the Era, N.E. 1, it began February 26, or only 57 days later than the Julian, B.C. 747; which, therefore, was conumerary the remainder of the year. Hence every Chaldean year before 228, is conumerary with the Julian year in which it began; and, accordingly, is rightly placed in Petavius' Tables, Lib. XIII. of the Doctrina Temp. Vol. II. p. 309, &c. But in consequence of his placing both these Chaldean years, 227, 228, in the same Julian year, B.C. 521, because they both began in it; no ensuing Chaldean year, down to the commencement of the Christian era, is conumerary with the Julian year placed against it, but rather with the following Julian year: thus the year N. E. 228, its first day excepted in B.C. 521, is all contained in B.C. 520, with which, therefore, it is, in strictness, conumerary. Marshall, on the 70 weeks of Daniel, and Blair, in his Chronology, more skilfully mark the conumerary years from thence, to the end, in a separate column. The sagacious Howes noticed this distinction, in his Critical Observations, Vol. I. p. 246, 247; my not sufficiently adverting to which, occasioned, in the former edition, an error in the Table; which, after all, is rather apparent than real; since surely the conumerary years are entitled to more regard, and correspond better with the history of those times, and with the Greek Chronology.

Thus in the foregoing instance, Table XVIII. shews that the 27th of Phamenoth is 207 days from the beginning of the year, and Table XVII. shews that the year N. E. 574, began October 6, but Table IV. foregoing, shews that October 6th is the 279th day, wanting 86 days of the end of the year. Deduct these 86 days from 207, and the remainder 121, corresponds to May 1, in the Julian Calendar.

According to Syncellus, from the time of Nabonassar, the Chaldeans accurately observed the times of the motions of the stars; and Pliny relates from Epigenes, an author of the first credit, that the Chaldeans had astronomical observations of 720 years engraved upon bricks; which, counted backwards from the second year of Augustus, (in his own time probably) would fall on the beginning of the Era of Nabonassar, and perfectly accords with the ancient eclipses made use of by Hipparchus, of which the earliest was N.E. 27, the first of Mardok Empad, according to Ptolomy. And Ptolomy himself has recorded a great number of eclipses, whose times he has marked by the Nabonassarean years in which they happened throughout the whole Canon; which may therefore justly be styled the most scientific in its construction of any within the whole range of ancient chronology.

PTOLOMY'S CANON.

Claudius Ptolomæus, the celebrated Alexandrian mathematician and astronomer, if not the original framer, was at least the continuator of this celebrated Canon down to his own time. He flourished in the reign of the second Antoninus.

The first correct edition of it was published by Calvisius in his Opus Chronologicum, A.D. 1613, from a copy sent to him by Doctor Overall, Dean of St. Paul's, and transcribed from the original, accidentally found annexed to a manuscript of Ptolomy's Astronomy. And Petavius, in his Rationarium Temporum, published in 1672, has given at the end of it a second edition of the Canon from a manuscript copy of Theon's Commentary on Ptolomy, collated with another ancient manuscript of the same in the French king's library, both of which agree entirely with that of Calvisius, except in the spelling of some of the names. And from these the Canon itself, from Nabonassar to Antoninus Pius, was republished by Jackson, Chronological Antiquities, Vol. I. p. 443, &c. From him (with a few corrections) it is given in Table XIX. (which originally contained no more than the reigns, and the collected years) with the current years of the Nabonassarean Era, and their accommodation to the Vulgar Christian Era, and the corresponding names of some of the Chaldean kings in sacred and profane history.

To the authenticity of these copies of Ptolomy's Canon, the strongest testimony is given by their exact agreement throughout, with above 20 dates and computations of eclipses in Ptolomy's Almagest, recited by Jackson, as he himself acknowledges. Vol. I. p. 450.

From its great use as an astronomical era, confirmed by unerring characters of eclipses, this Canon justly obtained the highest authority among historians also. It has most deservedly been esteemed an invaluable treasure, omni auro pretiosior, as Calvisius says, and of the greatest use in Chronology, without which, as Marsham observes, there could scarcely be any transition from sacred to profane history; and by means of it, some important dates are supplied in sacred Chronology, that could not otherwise be ascertained. It fills up especially an important chasm, from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar to the reign of Cyrus, without which the term of the 70 years of the Babylonish captivity, ending with the latter, could not easily be adjusted.

It must, however, be acknowledged, that accurate as these authentic copies of the Canon unquestionably are every where else, in this single period a small correction is necessary, to accommodate it to Scripture; for, according to the Canon, from the first of Nabokolassar, or Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 604, to the first of Cyrus, B.C. 538, is an interval of only 66 years; and therefore, if the Captivity began in the end of the third, or commencement of the fourth year of Jehoiakim, B.C. 605, Dan. i. 1; 2 Kings xxiv. 1; Jer. xxv. 1; from thence, to the accession of Cyrus, was only 67 years complete, or 68 current.

To remedy this, Syncellus, the oldest Christian author who has noticed it, in his valuable Chronographia, composed about the year A.D. 780, has given two copies of the Canon; the one he calls a Mathematical and Astronomical copy, pretending that it is the same as that of Ptolomy, which it certainly is not; the other, an Ecclesiastical copy, partly taken, as he says, from *Josephus, and partly from Africanus, and other Christian historians, p. 207 and 147, note. Both these copies agree in having two interpolated years in the reigns of Ilvarodam and Nericassolassar, making together eight years instead of six; with this difference, that the one copy gives to the former three years, and to the latter five; while the other gives to the former five, to the latter three years, reversing the numbers.

About A.D. 960, an anonymous Greek Canon, inserted in Scaliger's Emendatio Temporum, p. 743, adopted this interpolation of two years, assigning three years to Ουαλαμαροδαχ, Evilmerodach, and five years to Βαλτασαρ, Belshazzar; and the succeeding chronologers, Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Prideaux, Jackson, &c. have adopted this interpolation as indispensably necessary to reconcile the Canon to Holy Writ, which is effectually done thereby; for from the commencement of the Captivity, B.C. 605, to the corrected first of Cyrus, B.C. 536, is 69 years complete, or 70 years current, which corresponds to the account of Josephus: "In the first year of the reign of Cyrus, which was the seventieth (το ἑβδομηκοστόν) from the day of the removal of our people from their native land to Babylon, &c." Ant. 11, 1, 1. And it seems from Ezra's account, that the return of the children of Israel from captivity was completed in the seventh month of the first year of Cyrus, (Ezra iii. 1.) who, though styled "king of Persia," in the decree for their return, yet "it was after THE LORD GOD OF HEAVEN had given him all the kingdoms of the earth," or after his conquest of Babylon. Ezra i. 1, 2. And it is afterwards expressly stated to be "the first year of Cyrus, king of Babylon." Ezra v. 13.

How then are we to account for this anticipation of two years in the original Canon, dating the accession of Cyrus, B.C. 538?

This may satisfactorily be explained from the usage of the Canon in a parallel case. It is remarkable, that the accession of Alexander the Great to the Persian throne is dated from his decisive victory at Arbela, Oct. 1, B.C. 331, not from the death of Darius, his rival, the year after, about Midsummer, B.C. 330.

* But Josephus, Contr. Apion. lib. i. in his copy of the Canon, assigns only two years to Evilmerodach, and four to Neriglissar.

And Plutarch, in his life of Alexander, says, that “the Greeks themselves considered the Persian empire as subverted from that moment; and accordingly, after the battle, saluted Alexander king of Asia, who sacrificed magnificently to the gods on the occasion.”

In like manner the Canon dates the accession of Cyrus, not from the capture of Babylon itself, B.C. 536, but from his decisive victory over the rebellious king of Babylon, who is called Nabonadius, about two years before, B.C. 538, when he defeated him in a pitched battle, and drove the Babylonians into the city, which he afterwards besieged, and, at length, took by a stratagem, noticed both by Herodotus and Xenophon, of turning the waters of the Euphrates into a lake, or canal, above the town, and sending parties of troops to enter the channel of the river, above and below the town, as soon as it became fordable; by which means the city was taken “at each end” by surprise, Jer. li. 31, during the drunken festival of the Sakea, Jer. li. 41.

And, indeed, that the siege of Babylon could not have lasted much less than two years, may fairly be collected from the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon. The former says, that “the Babylonians having laid up provisions for many years, were under no apprehensions about the siege: on the other hand, Cyrus, finding much time consumed, and his affairs not at all advanced, was at a great loss what he should do next; when, at last, either by some other person’s suggestion, or by his own sagacious invention, he resolved upon the following stratagem,” &c. B. 1, §. 190, 191*.

Xenophon also sufficiently intimates, that Cyrus did not expect to take the city in less than a year: for Cyrus, he says, divided his army into twelve parts, that each division might be employed a month, in turn, at the siege, whilst the rest were engaged “in a work of so great labour and time, as digging the canal,” &c. where “the depth of the Euphrates was sometimes greater than the height of two men standing on each other.” Cyrop. B. 7.

That Cyrus did not survive the capture of Babylon above seven years, may also be collected from Xenophon. This historian, the basis of whose Cyropædia is true, though the work be embellished with some fictitious ornaments, and who served in Asia under Cyrus the younger, and therefore had an opportunity of learning many particulars of the life of Cyrus the Great, unknown to the Greeks, relates, that “Cyrus usually spent seven months in the year at Babylon, during the winter season, because the climate was warm; three months at Susa in spring; and two months at Ecbatana during the heat of summer; that he might enjoy an equal temperature throughout his extensive dominions.” Lib. viii. p. 498. Hutchinson. Shortly after, he observes, that “Cyrus, in process of time, being now very elderly, comes from [these his usual places of residence] to the Persians, the seventh [year] in the course of his sovereignty*,” and shortly after dies. Lib. viii. p. 499.

And that Cyrus actually died, and was succeeded by his son Cambyses, B. C. 529, according to the Canon, is demonstrated by a lunar eclipse, recorded by Ptolomy as happening in the seventh year of Cambyses, N.E. 225. or B.C. 523; for B.C. 523 + 6 = B.C. 529.

We are therefore abundantly warranted to deduct two years from the nine assigned by the Canon to the reign of Cyrus, reckoning from his decisive victory over the Babylonians, in order to reduce the commencement of his sovereignty to the actual capture of Babylon, two years after: this deduction exactly compensating the addition of two years to the reigns of Evilmerodach and Belshazzar, and thus preserving the subsequent integrity of the Canon; while, in the important period of the Captivity, it is thus easily and naturally reconciled to Holy Writ and Sacred Chronology. For though the Chaldeans might date the sovereignty of Cyrus from that decisive victory, which put an end to the independence of the Babylonians, yet the sacred historians would naturally date that sovereignty from the capture of Babylon, the era of their own deliverance from the Babylonish captivity.

And this is the only correction necessary to be admitted. Those of Petavius, Usher, Prideaux, Jackson, &c. altering the dates and lengths of the ensuing reigns after Cyrus, under the specious name of corrections, are in reality corruptions, founded in ignorance of the principles on which it was originally constructed; as Marsham truly observes: “Chronographi Christiani futilibus conjecturis nimium indulgentes, miris modis Canonem hunc castigarunt, vel potius conturbarunt.” Chron. p. 506.

1. Thus, Jackson, by continuing downwards the two interpolated years of Evilmerodach and Belshazzar, dates the reigns of Cambyses, B.C. 527; Darius I. B.C. 519; Xerxes, B.C. 483; Artaxerxes I. B.C. 462; Darius II. B.C. 421; and Artaxerxes II. B.C. 402; each two years lower than the Canon, in defiance of several eclipses recorded by Ptolomy as observed at Babylon; viz. in the seventh year of Cambyses; in the 20th and 31st of Darius I.; and in the 23d of Artaxerxes II.; ascertaining the true dates of the commencement of their reigns, in conformity with the Canon. Jackson, Vol. I. pp. 453, 454.

2. By an unwarrantable defalcation, he drops three years of the reign of Artaxerxes II. reducing it to 43 years, against the genuine copies of the Canon, and those of Syncellus also; and by this means, dates the succeeding reigns of the Persian kings a year higher than the Canon; namely, Ochus, B.C. 359; Arses, B.C. 338; Darius III. B.C. 336; and Alexander the Great, B.C. 332, antedating the accession of Alexander a year before the decisive victory of Arbela, in the year B.C. 331, as demonstrated by the lunar eclipse recorded by Plutarch, eleven days before the battle. Jackson, vol. I. p. 455.

3. A leading cause of these corruptions of the Canon by Jackson, may perhaps be traced to a fanciful and unfounded hypothesis which he adopted, respecting the time of the famous prophecy of the 70 weeks in Daniel; for, assuming that they began in the 20th year of Ahasuerus, Neh. ii. 1. and mistaking this prince for Xerxes, with Josephus, who in reality was Artaxerxes Longimanus; from his supposed date of the 20th of Xerxes, there were 463 years to the Christian era, and from thence 27 more to our Lord's baptism and preaching, A.D. 28, amounting to 490 years exactly; but the canonical date of the 20th of Xerxes being two years higher, would make the amount 492 years, overturning the hypothesis. Jackson, Vol. I. p. 454. Not. (27.)

II. The principles upon which this truly scientific Canon was constructed are next to be explained.

RULE I. The reigns consist of full or complete years, which are reduced to Julian years, Table XVII. in order to preserve the continuity of time in reckoning.

RULE 2. Each king's reign begins at the Thoth, or New year's day before his accession, and all the odd months of his last year are included in the first year of his successor.

Thus, the actual accession of Alexander the Great was at the decisive victory of Arbela, Oct. 1, B.C. 331, but his reign in the Canon began the preceding new year's day of the same current Nabonassarean year, Nov. 14, B.C. 332, which ended soon after the battle, Nov. 14, B.C. 331.

The death of Alexander the Great was in the 114th Olympiad, according to Josephus, May 22, B.C. 323*; but the era of his successor, Philip Aridæus, began in the Canon the preceding new year's day, Nov. 12, B.C. 324, as confirmed by Censorinus, who reckons from thence 294 years to the accession of Augustus, B.C. 30. But B.C. 324 — 294 = B.C. 30.

Tiberius died March 16, A.D. 37, but the reign of his successor, Caius Caligula, began in the Canon from the preceding new year's day, Aug. 14, A.D. 36.

From these two rules, it follows, that the last year of any reign belongs thereto wholly, or exclusively, and that the beginning of a reign is sometimes dated in the Canon near a full year before the actual accession, and frequently one nominal Julian year before. Whence Petavius complained that Ptolomy often makes the Roman emperors after Caligula begin their reign a year too soon. Rationar. Temp. Pars II. lib. iv. c. 6. This peculiar construction of the Canon was first fortunately discovered by the learned Dodwell, in the Appendix to his Dissertationes Cyprianicæ, and was afterwards confirmed by Vignoles in his Chronology. “In this Canon,” says he, “the first year of each king commences with the year which is current at his accession, although a considerable part of it should have been already past. We have just as many proofs of it as there are kings, with the time of whose death we are made acquainted;” and he has proved it in several cases of Persian kings in the Canon: but they are too intricate to be adduced. Chronol. Sacré, Berlin, 1738, ch. ii. sect. 4.

* Josephus contr. Apion. lib. i. § 22, says, “All historians acknowledge that Alexander died in the 114th Olympiad,” which began about the Summer solstice, B.C. 324; consequently, the 22d of May, or beginning of June, when he died, fell in the ensuing Julian year, B.C. 323.

Although the Canon assigns eight full years to the reign of Alexander the Great, which are included in the sum of collected years from Nabonassar, 424; yet it apparently contains only seven Julian years, namely, from B.C. 331, to B.C. 324. In order, therefore, to compleat the seeming deficiency, Jackson unskillfully interpolated one year in his reign, making it begin a year earlier, B.C. 332. While to compensate for this year, and the two other interpolated years of Evilmerodach and Belshazzar, he omitted three years of the longest reign, of Artaxerxes II.; following Diodorus, as he says. By this compensation of errors, his ensuing Canon of Egyptian kings' reigns is correct; and so is that of the Roman emperors till Caligula, in whose reign he interpolates a year, and renders the remainder of the Canon incorrect to the end.

RULE 3. The names of kings who reigned less than a year are omitted in the Canon; namely,

Laborosoarchod	- - -	9 months	before	Nabonadius .
Smerdis Magus	- - -	7	_____	Cambyses .
Maraphis	- - -	3	_____	} _____ Darius I.
Artaphrenes	- - -	3	_____
Artabanus	- - -	7	_____	_____ Artaxerxes I.
Xerxes II. $1\frac{1}{2}$	}	- -	8	_____ { _____ Darius II.
Sogdianus $6\frac{1}{2}$
Galba	- - -	7	_____	} _____ Vespasian .
Otho	- - -	3	_____
Vitellius	- - -	3	_____

RULE 4. But the short reigns of such kings are not suppressed; they are tacitly included either in the first year of the successor, if there be but one reign, or else distributed between the last year of the predecessor, and the first of the successor, if there be more, exceeding a year all together.

Thus, the nine months of Laborosoarchod are included in the first year of Nabonadius. The same will hold of the seven months of Artabanus, and the eight of Xerxes II. and Sogdianus. But the seven months of Smerdis Magus, according to Herodotus, were included in the reign of Cambyses, which was actually no more than seven years and five months, and thereby made eight years in the Canon. While the reigns of the two conspirators, Maraphis and Artaphrenes, who, according to Æschylus, succeeded Smerdis Magus, and which might have amounted to about half a year more, were included in the first year of their associate, Darius I. who succeeded them.

In like manner the reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, were distributed between their predecessor Nero and their successor Vespasian; but the greater portion of the amount of their reigns, 13 months, fell to the latter: for Nero died June 9, A.D. 68, and the Thoth, or New year's day that year, fell on August 6th, near two months after, which therefore were included in his reign, ending the New year's day after his death. Vespasian's accession was on July 1, in the ensuing year, A.D. 69; but his reign began, according to the second rule, on the foregoing New year's day, August 6, A.D. 68. Consequently, his first year included the 11 remaining months of the omitted emperors.

The inquisitive reader may find this very intricate subject copiously discussed in the learned and ingenious publication before referred to, Howe's Critical Observations on Books, Vol. I.

Table XX. contains a useful continuation of Ptolomy's Canon, down to the accession of his present Majesty, GEORGE III. taken from Kennedy's Astronomical Canon, with some corrections. Chronol. p. 148.

ERA OF SELEUCIDÆ, OR ALEXANDER'S SUCCESSORS.

This Era was so called from Seleucus, the successor of Alexander the Great, in the kingdom of Syria. It was more usually called the Era from Alexander, under which title it is still used by the Syrian Christians; and by the Arabs it was styled Dil-carnaim "of the two horned," meaning Alexander, who wished to be considered as the son of Jupiter Ammon, whose emblem was a Ram, and was so described in Daniel's prophecies. In the first book of Maccabees, i. 10, it was called the Era of "the kingdom of the Greeks," or of Alexander's successors. By the Jews, the Era of Contracts, because they were obliged to regulate their civil concerns thereby. Josephus is perhaps the only ancient writer who has joined to it the name of Seleucus, Ant. 12, 5, 3, whose power was by no means established when it commenced, nor for some time after, till the decisive battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301.

This era properly began from the death of Alexander Ægus, the son of Alexander the Great, who was murdered in the fifth year of his reign, B.C. 312, or the 12th year of the era of Philip, and therefore it properly began at the extinction of Alexander the Great's posterity, or the end of their dominion. And as the era of Philip was continued in the series of Egyptian kings, beginning with *Ptolomy Lagus, down to the Roman emperors, so this era likewise branched off from thence; and from its prevailing in Syria chiefly, the most powerful of the kingdoms erected by Alexander's successors thence assumed the name of Seleucus. Thus Albategni, the great Arabian astronomer and mathematician, in his work De Scientia Stellarum, c. 30, relates, that "he observed an eclipse of the sun in the year of Dilkarnaim, 1202, which is the 1214th year from Alexander's death, in the month Ab." Evidently considering it as the continuation of the Era of Philip, which began at Alexander's death, (or rather the end of his reign in the Canon) and not at the accession of Seleucus, as Prideaux and others have imagined. This year of the eclipse was 1202—B.C. 312=A.D. 890 complete, or 891 current; and the Syrian month Ab corresponded to August in the Julian Calendar, and accordingly, the astronomical tables intimate a solar eclipse, A.D. 891, August 8.

This example shews, that the fixed Syro-Macedonian year, which began at the calends of October, was used in computing by this era, as well as the moveable Chaldean or Egyptian by Ptolomy. And from the difference of half a year, between the end of Alexander's reign in the Canon, November 12, B.C. 324, and his death, May 22, in the ensuing year, B.C. 323, may we satisfactorily account for a variation in the date of this era, B.C. 312, or B.C. 311; the Syrians reckoning the twelve preceding years from the former epoch, the Greeks from the latter. Some Greek cities in Asia, also, began it in Spring, others in Autumn, and in different months of those seasons, as well as different days of those months. All these diversities indicate, that when they substituted Syrian or Macedonian months, and an intercalated fixed year, instead of the moveable retrograde year of the Chaldean and Philippine era, current in Asia, they departed irregularly from the old rule of the commencement of the civil year, without agreeing on any new general rule to supply its place, which has been of infinite detriment to Ancient Chronology.

Hence we may reconcile some apparent dissonances in the two books of the Maccabees :

* Although Alexander Ægus was murdered about the fifth year of his reign, it is continued to the twelfth year in the Canon, comprehending the anarchy that ensued till the establishment of Ptolomy Lagus on the throne of Egypt.

1 Mac. vi. 16. The death of Antiochus Epiphanes is dated “in the 149th year” of the kingdom of the Greeks; but 2 Mac. xi. 22—33, a letter of Antiochus Eupator, his son, who succeeded him, “after his father was translated to the gods,” is dated a year earlier, “in the 148th year, and on the 15th day of the month Xanthicus.”

Again: 1 Mac. vi. 20.—“in the 150th year,” Judas besieged the garrison in “the tower,” or citadel, who fled for refuge to Eupator, when the latter invaded Judea, but afterwards made peace with the Jews; but 2 Mac. xiii. 1. refers these transactions to “the 149th year.”

Lastly, 1 Mac. vii. 1. represents Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, as departing from Rome, where he had been a hostage, invading and putting Antiochus Eupator and Lysias to death, “in the 151st year;” but 2 Mac. xiv. 1, 2. refers this transaction to the 150th year. Compare 2 Mac. xiii. 1. and 2 Mac. xiv. 4.

The author of the first book of the Maccabees dated the commencement of the year from the first month, Nisan, or Xanthicus, in Spring; the author of the second, who was a different person, and of inferior estimation, dated it half a year later, from the seventh month, Tisri, or Autumn. Hence the letter of Antiochus Eupator to the Jews, dated the 15th of Xanthicus, was in the 148th year complete, or 149 current, according to the former, but only in the 148th current, according to the latter; and this solution satisfactorily reconciles the apparent dissonances between both.

The following Table of the reigns of Seleucus and his successors, until the voluntary annexation of the kingdom to Armenia by the Syrians, will be found equally useful in the study of Sacred and Profane History, during that turbulent and intricate period. It is chiefly collected from Dr. Gillies' History of the World, from Alexander to Augustus, 1807.

ERA OF THE HEJIRA, or FLIGHT OF MAHOMET.

This celebrated Era of Mahomet's flight from Mecca to Medina, commenced July 16, A.D. 622, the second day of the new Moon, when she became visible. See Abulfeda's Life of Mahomet, p. 53.

The use of the Lunar year was appointed by Mahomet, rejecting intercalations. He alludes thereto in the Koran. Sur. x. verse 5. "GOD has given light to the Sun, and brightness to the Moon: He has regulated her phases; they serve mankind to divide the time, [by weeks, and months] and to count the years*."

A complete Lunation, or Synodical month, consisting of 29½ days, the Arabs composed their months of 29 and 30 days alternately, thus:

	D. COLL.			D. COLL.
1. Muharram	30	30	3. Rabia I.	30	89
2. Saphar	29	59	4. Rabia II.	29	118

* See Savary's French Translation of the Koran; which is much more faithful and elegant than Sale's English Translation.

	D. COLL.			D. COLL.
5. Jomada I.	30	148	9. Ramadan.	30	266
6. Jomada II.	29	177	10. Shawal	29	295
7. Rajam	30	207	11. Dulkaadah	30	325
8. Shaaban	29	236	12. Dulheggia	29	354

This Lunar year of 354 days, falling short eleven days of the common Julian, or Calendar year of 365 days, is moveable, or runs through all the seasons in $\frac{365}{11} = 33\frac{2}{11}$ years. So that a cycle of 33 Lunar years gains an entire year upon the Calendar; containing only 32 Julian years. And three cycles gaining three years, we may reckon a hundred Lunar years equal to 97 Solar.

Beveridge in his Chronology, Lib. 1. Cap. 17., has given accurate rules for reducing the years, months, days, and feriæ or week-days, of the current years of the Hejira, to Calendar time, by the help of which was constructed a large and useful table in Playfair's Chronology, p. 305., which is here republished, in an improved form; marking the several cycles, in which the preceding and following years of the Hejira, at the end of one cycle and the beginning of another, are both found to begin in the same Julian, or Calendar year, between the limits of the first month, January, and the last, December. The first Cycle of the Hejira is broken, containing only 19 years; for it began 14 years earlier: since, $14 + 19 = 33$ years. The Asterisks (*) mark the Intercalary years of the Arabs, in which they adjust their Lunar year to the Solar, by inserting a month.

N. B. In the intercalary years, marked by the asterisks, the twelfth month, Dul-heggia, consists of 30 days. The feriæ all along are accommodated to the Old Style.

The use of this XXII^d. Table, of the Years of the Hejira, &c. may be thus illustrated.

Al Junabi, an Arab historian, relates that Mahomet Khan took Constantinople in the 857th year of the Hejira, on the 20th day of Jomad I., the third day of the week, or Tuesday. Pocock's Supplement to his Latin translation of Abulfaragi, p. 47. But by this Table, the 857th of the Hejira, began A.D. 1453, Jan. 12, on the sixth day of the week, or Friday. And by the foregoing Table of Arabian months, the 20th of Jomad I. was 137 days complete from the first day of the first month, Muharram, or $12 + 137 = 149$ days, counted from the first of January, A.D. 1453, which corresponds to May 29, according to Table IV. of Julian days. But the Cycle of the sun, that year, was 6, the Dominical letter G, the character of May 29, B. It was, therefore, the third day of the week, or Tuesday. And how critically this calculation corresponds to the fact, appears from the patriarchal history of Crusius, thus stating the capture of the city. Ησαν χρονοι απο Χριστου γενεσεως χιλιοι τετρακοσιοι πεντηκοντα τρεις. Μαιω εικοστη εννατη, ημερα τριτη. "It was 1453 years from Christ's nativity, on the 29th of May, the third day of the week."

Such a minute coincidence between the Mahometan and Christian historians, respecting this important date, is highly gratifying, and it affords an instance of the great ingenuity and accuracy of the chronological rules and tables in question; and especially of the value of this Table, which gives, at first sight, the result of a long and intricate calculation, by which Beveridge comes to the same conclusion, pp. 119—127.

The following easy-rule will serve, without the Tables, to reduce the current years of the Hejira, to Julian, or Calendar years.

Since 100 years of the Hejira are equal to 97 Julian years, multiply the centuries in the proposed year by 3; and to the product add 1, for each additional cycle; subtract the amount from the proposed year; and add 621 to the remainder. The sum will give the calendar year required.

Thus, in the year of the Hejira 699, Othman, the founder of the Turkish empire, assumed the title of Sultan. Multiply the number of centuries, 7, by 3; which gives 21, the number of Julian years omitted; subtract this from 699, and the remainder, 678, added to the elapsed 621 Julian years, before the era of the Hejira commenced, gives A.D. 1299, the same as in the Table. When the year proposed, however, is the last of a Cycle, it will give the result a year short.

INDIAN ERAS.

Megasthenes, a native of Persia, who enjoyed the confidence of Seleucus Nicator, and of Sibyrtius, governor of Aracosia, (the modern Candahar and Gazni) was frequently sent by them on embassies to the court of Chandra Gupta, (called Sandrocutos and Sandraccottus by the Greek historians) and also resided at the court of Porus. He wrote a history of Indian affairs, which is unfortunately lost, as from his country, his abilities, and his opportunities of conversing with the most learned and intelligent Hindus, we might have derived from it much authentic information on the subject. See Asiat. Research. Vol. V. p. 242, 290, &c.

In a fragment, however, preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus, he declares, that "the Hindus and the Jews were the only people who had a just conception of the creation of the world, and of the beginning of things;" and he states, that "the Hindus did not carry back their history and antiquities above 5042 years* and three months, from Alexander's invasion of India," B.C. 327. Their earliest era, therefore, B.C. 5369, differs only 42 years from the rectified Era of the Creation, B.C. 5411.

Since his time, the Brahmins have invented eras of the most extravagant antiquity, which are, in fact, no other than vast Astronomical Cycles, formed by retrospective calculation, like the Julian Period; and this is demonstrated by Mr. Davis, in the Asiatic Researches, Vol. II. p. 228, in a very ingenious communication on the Astronomical Computations of the Hindus. There, he states, that the Hindu astronomers chose as a radix, from which to compute the planetary motions, that point of time counted back, when they must have been in conjunction in the beginning of Mesha, or Aries, and coeval with which they supposed the Creation. Taking also into computation a slow motion of the Nodes and Apsides, which they had discovered, they found that it would require a vast cycle of 4320 millions of years, before the planets would return precisely to the same situation again. This grand Anomalistic period they denominated a Calpa. The Calpa they divided into 1000 Maha yugas, or “great conjunctions,” each consisting of 4,320,000 years, and a Maha yuga into ten lesser yugas, consisting each of 432,000 years. The Maha yuga was an Anomalistical period of the sun and moon, at the end of which, the moon, her apogee, and ascending node, are to be found in conjunction with the sun in the first of Aries; the planets also deviating from that point only as much as is their latitude, and the difference between their mean and true anomaly.

HINDU AGES OF THE WORLD.

The Maha yuga was also divided into four lesser yugas, or ages, which seem to have been formed on ideas similar to the Golden, Silver, Brazen, and Iron Ages of the Greeks; “according to the different proportions of virtue prevailing on earth,” in the language of Surya Sidhanta, their oldest astronomical treatise.

1. Satya yuga	4 × 432,000 = 1,728,000
2. Treta yuga	3 × 432,000 = 1,296,000
3. Dwapar yuga	2 × 432,000 = 864,000
4. Cali yuga	1 × 432,000 = 432,000
Maha yuga	10 × 432,000 = 4,320,000

In the Satya, or Age of “Virtue,” four parts or all mankind were supposed to be good; in the Treta, or Treda, “three” parts; in the Dwapar, Duapar, or Duabara, “two” parts; and in the Cali yuga, or “black conjunction,” only one part. The common factor, 432,000 years, was shewn in the preceding article on YEARS, to have been formed of the great astronomical cycle of 24,000 years, comprising the grand revolution of the sphere of the fixed stars, occasioned by the precession of the equinoxes, 54 seconds per annum, according to the Hindu calculation; multiplied by 18 years, the Chaldean Saros, or Plinian period of the lunar inequalities. These four ages composed a Maha yuga, and a thousand Maha yugas one Calpa, or “a day” of Brahma, “the Creator.” A sublime idea, corresponding to SCRIPTURE. Ps. xc. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 8.

It is agreed by the Hindu astronomers in general, that the Cali yuga, or last age, under which mankind now live, began when the equinoctial points were in the first degrees of Mesha and Tula, or Aries and Libra, B.C. 3102. Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 274, and p. 392.

The Cali yuga was the Hindu era of the Deluge. This is ingeniously collected by Captain Wilford, from the famous Arabian astronomer Albumazar, or Abu-mazar, about the middle of the ninth century, who lived in the court of the Caliph Al Mamum, and carefully studied the Hindu antiquities, especially the time of the creation of the world, its duration, and the conjunctions of the planets. He represented, that “the Hindus reckoned from the Flood to the Hejira, 720,634,442,715 days, or 3725 years.” Asiat. Research. Vol. V. p. 242, 293. Here is a manifest error, the number of days greatly exceeding the number of years. By a very ingenious correction, Mr. Davis found out that this was exactly the number of days elapsed of the Calpa, or from the Creation to the Flood, and only from the Flood to the Hejira 3725 years. Asiat. Research. Vol. IX. p. 579, 671. Subtracting, therefore, the date of the Hejira, A.D. 622, there remains B.C. 3103 for the date of the Deluge.

And this correction is verified by the Persian Chronology; for, according to George of Trebizonde, the Persians reckoned from the Deluge to the Era of Jesdejird, A.D. 632, (ten years after the Hejira) 3735 years, 10 months, and 23 days; which gives precisely the same date of the Deluge, B.C. 3103, current, or B.C. 3102, complete; but this is the date of the Cali yuga, consequently, the Cali yuga denoted the Deluge. Asiat. Research. IX. 673. This is further proved from the Cumarica Chanda, which states, that “after three thousand and one hundred years of the Cali yuga shall be expired, king Saka, or *Salivahana, will appear to remove wretchedness from the world.” This was to be a divine child, born of a virgin, and the son of the great Tacshaka, or “carpenter.” See Wilford's Essay on the Kings of Magodha, p. 435. Asiat. Research. Vol. IX.

But though the date of the Astronomical Era, Cali yuga, be invariably fixed to B.C. 3102, the Historical Era of that name fluctuates considerably.

The Bhagavat reckons it.	B.C. 1913

* Captain Wilford traces a resemblance in Salivahana to Sala, or Shiloh, in Jacob's prophecy. Asiat. Research. Vol. VIII. p. 601.

This discordancy of dates is sufficiently accounted for by Wilford, in the following discouraging survey of the present state of Hindu Chronology.

“In all their chronological lists, the compilers and revisers seem to have had no other object in view but to adjust a certain number of epochs. This being once effected, the intermediate spaces are filled up with the names of kings not to be found any where else, and most probably fanciful. Otherwise, they leave out the names of those kings of whom nothing is recorded, and attribute the years of their reigns to some among them better known, or of greater fame. They often do not scruple to transpose some of these kings, and even whole dynasties; either in consequence of some pre-conceived opinion, or owing to their mistaking one famous king for another of the same name. It was not uncommon for ancient writers to pass from a remote ancestor to a remote descendant, or from a remote predecessor to a remote successor, by leaving out the intermediate generations or successions. In this manner, the lists of the ancient kings of Persia, both by oriental writers and others in the west, have been compiled: and some instances of this nature might be produced from SCRIPTURE.—Through their emendations and corrections, you see a total want of historical knowledge and criticism; and sometimes some disingenuity is but too obvious.” Wilford's Essay on Vicra Maditya, &c. p. 469, quarto.

Indeed the gross imposition practised on Captain Wilford, and Sir William Jones, in the supposed Sanscrit account of Noah and his three sons, under the names of Satyavarnam, Sherma, Charma, and Jyapeti; forged in the Padma Puran, and translated by Sir William Jones; Asiat. Research. Vol. iii. p. 67, 262, octavo, are abundantly sufficient to justify the charge of disingenuousness, in the modern Pundits, or interpreters.

Besides the Cali yuga, there are two other principal Eras in use among the Hindus: namely, the Sombot, or Era of Vicra maditya, B.C. 56; and the Sakabdo, from the death of Rajah Soko, or Saka, A.D. 79. These are collected from ancient records and monuments. Thus, there is a royal grant of land, on a copper plate, found among the ruins of Mongeer, dated in the 33d Sombot, B.C. 23. Asiat. Research. Vol. i. p. 123: another, in the Era of Vicra maditya, 1005, or B.C. 1061, p. 287: a third, in the year 123, or 1230, of the same Era, A.D. 67, or A.D. 1174, p. 379: a fourth, in the year of King Saka, 939, or A.D. 1018, p. 357.

CHINESE ERAS.

Martinius, a learned Jesuit, who resided many years in China, says, in his history, that the Chinese writers dated the Deluge about 3000 years before the Christian Era. Sinens. Hist. lib. 1, p. 12. This nearly accords with the Cali yug, or Hindu date, B.C. 3102.

Great uncertainty prevails respecting the origin and first period of the Chinese empire. None of the ancient annals exist, a few fragments excepted; they perished by a singular calamity: the Emperor Hoangti, B.C. 213, like Nabonassar, the King of Babylon, in an earlier age, ambitious of being reputed by posterity the founder of the Empire, ordered all the books, medals, inscriptions, coins, and monuments of antiquity, to be destroyed, that there might remain no earlier record, date, or authority relative to religion, science, and politics, than those of his own reign. Hence, their most authentic history, composed from the relics of their ancient books, by Sse-ma-tsién, about a century before Christ, marked neither the dates nor the durations of reigns, or of dynasties, until B.C. 878. And in the Memoirs concerning the History, Arts, &c. of the Chinese, extracted from the Grand Annals, and lately published by the Missionaries of Pekin, it is asserted, that all the relations or events prior to the reign of Yao, or Yau, (as differently pronounced by different writers) which they date, B.C. 2057, “are fabulous, composed in modern times, unsupported by authentic records, and full of contradictions. And that neither the Chou-king, or Xu-king, their most ancient and authentic record, nor the books of Confucius, (who died B.C. 479) or of his disciples, make mention of any genealogies, or princes, before Yao. It is also proved, that the origin of the Chinese Empire cannot be placed higher than one or two generations before Yao.”

This is confirmed by the discordancy of the dates assigned to his reign by different writers: Duhalde asserts, from the most approved Chinese historians, that Yao began to reign B.C. 2357; Martinius and Couplet, B.C. 2159: Freret observes, that nothing certain was recorded in the Chinese Annals previous to the reign of Yao, who flourished B.C. 2325, or B.C. 2307. The latest accounts, we see, reduce it to B.C. 2057, three hundred years lower than the first.

† But the first date of Duhalde, which differs not much from those of Freret, seems to be preferable, from an ancient inscription in Chinese letters, upon a plate of marble, and preserved in the temple of a Jewish colony, who settled in China, A.D. 73, three years after the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus; and have still a settlement at Cai fong-fou, the capital city of the province of Honan, about 150 leagues from Pekin. They came originally from Persia, through Chorasan and Samarkand, from commercial views, and at first amounted to 70 families, of the tribes of Benjamin, Levi, Judah, &c.; but were reduced to seven families, when they were visited by the learned Jesuits, Gozani, Comurge, and Gaubil, A.D. 1720, who published their accounts of this singular colony, in Lettres Edifiantes, &c. Tom. VII.; from which a curious extract is given by Brotier, in the notes of his excellent edition of Tacitus, Tom. III. p. 567, &c.

This inscription, which was made by a literary Jew, named King-tchong, A.D. 1444, is as follows:

“The author of the law of Israel (Y-se-lo-ye) is Abraham (Ha-vou-lo-han), the nineteenth from Adam (Ha-tan). That holy man lived 146 years before the beginning of Tcheou. His law was transmitted by tradition to Moses (Nieche). He received his book on mount Sinai (Si-na): there he fasted forty days and forty nights. He was always conversant with Heaven. In his book are fifty-three sections.”—It adds, that “Moses lived 613 years after the beginning of Tcheou.” P. 575, 576.

This Era of Tcheou did not commence with the first prince of the dynasty of that name, whose reign began B.C. 1122; for Abraham certainly was much earlier. It derived its name from a celebrated division of the Empire into twelve Tcheou, or provinces; made by the Emperor Yao, in the eightieth year of his reign, (B.C. 2357—80=) B.C. 2277. According to Gaubil's computation. This would bring the birth of Abraham to (B.C. 2277—146=) B.C. 2131; which differs only 22 years from the rectified era of his birth, B.C. 2153. And the birth of Moses to (B.C. 2277—613=) B.C. 1664; which differs only 64 years from the rectified era thereof, B.C. 1728. And if, as Brotier suspects, the time of Moses was reckoned not from his birth, but from his mission to his brethren, 40 years after, B.C. 1688; it would reduce the difference of the Chinese account, to 24 years. † This near coincidence of Sacred and Chinese Chronology, is extremely curious, and tends to confirm both. We are therefore warranted to date the commencement of the Chinese Empire, with the reign of Yao, about 22 years higher, B.C. 2379, or about 235 years after the division of the earth, or its colonization by the families of Noah's sons, B.C. 2614, according to our rectified Era; which is not improbable.

The reduction of the era of Yao's reign 300 years lower, by the last Missionaries, was designed, most probably, to reconcile the Chinese with the curtailed Jewish Chronology in Europe; or with the Chronology of Petavius, founded thereon, and established in the Church of Rome: for thus, the reduced birth of Abraham, B.C. 1831, would differ only 19 years from the vulgar Jewish date, B.C. 1812; and the mission of Moses, B.C. 1388, would differ 36 years from the vulgar Jewish date, B.C. 1352; and near a century more, from the dates of Petavius.

The boasted eclipse of the Sun, in the reign of the fourth Emperor of the first dynasty, founded by Yao, Chong-kang, upon which the advocates of the early scientific attainments of the Chinese lay so great a stress; and among the rest, the over-fanciful Jackson, Vol. II. p. 424, is thus recorded in the Chou King:

“On the first day of the moon, in the reign of Chong Kang, and at the autumnal equinox, there was an eclipse of the sun at eight o'clock in the morning, in the constellation Fang, (which belongs to the forehead of Scorpio) and Hi and Ho, (who presided in the tribunal of Astronomy) pretended they knew nothing at all of it. They were plunged in wine and debauchery, paying no regard to ancient customs, and entirely forgetful of their duty:” which was to observe and record this eclipse in the Calendar. And for this neglect they were put to death.

This account is so vague, that nothing certain can be collected from it. Ko, a learned Chinese writer, in a work recently published on the Chinese Antiquities, has remarked, that “neither the date of the year, nor its quantity, are mentioned.” Accordingly, Astronomers have differed widely in regard to the year in which it happened: it has been referred to the several years, B.C. 2885, 2159, 2155, 2137, 2007, and 1948.

Jackson has pitched on the third year, B.C. 2155; in which, says he, “Father Gaubil found this Eclipse to have happened on the eleventh day of October, in the sign and at the hour set down in the Chinese Annals: but that, however, it was so small, as not to be quite one digit in quantity at Pekin, just after sun rising; and by consequence, lasted not very many minutes in China. This (says he) is a very remarkable attestation to the truth of the ancient Chinese Annals. P. 425.

In the same breath, however, Jackson remarks, and naturally enough, “But then, if the Eclipse was really so small and so short, it is not to be wondered that the two Astronomers, Hi and Ho, should not have observed it: nor could any others hardly be supposed to have seen it.”

Rejecting, therefore, this Eclipse, which “Whiston found to have been over in China, above an hour before sun-rising;” and therefore absolutely invisible to Hi, Ho, or any one else; Jackson stumbles on the next, B.C. 2137, Oct. 22, about three digits, seen at Pekin, the middle of which was about sun-set, or half an hour after five in the afternoon, according to Whiston's calculation. And “this,” Jackson pronounces, “is probably, if not certainly, the true Eclipse mentioned in the Chinese Annals of Xu-king.” P. 426.—Though it violates all the conditions!—At all events, Jackson was predetermined to have an Eclipse, right or wrong. And on this infallible Eclipse, he proceeds to rectify the whole Chinese Chronology! P. 427, &c.

The fact seems to be, that the Eclipse, (if there was any such) was interpolated in the Annals long after, to enhance the antiquity of the nation.

The same will hold of another boasted astronomical calculation, found also in the same Annals; that “Tchien-hio knew by calculation, that in one of the years of his reign, there would be a conjunction of the planets, observable in the constellation Che, (nearly corresponding to Pisces:) in consequence of which, he chose that year to be the first in his Calendar, and made it commence at the new moon of the Vernal Equinox.” Playfair, p. 78.

But Gaubil informs us, that the most credible Chinese historians consider this conjunction as fictitious, and omit it in their works: while the European Astronomers have wearied themselves to find it out, in the years B.C. 2513, 2461, 2449, 2012.

But the fullest refutation of these supposed early astronomical calculations in China, is furnished by the acknowledged time when Eclipses began to be regularly recorded in their Annals; when they began to calculate Eclipses. In the year B.C. 776, which was the beginning of the Olympic Era, an Eclipse of the Sun, in the 6th year of Yeou-rang, is noticed in their histories; which, according to Couplet's calculation, happened about 11 o'clock in the morning of Sept. 6; and was about 4 digits.

Another, in the 51st year of Ping-vang, as computed backward by Gaubil, happened B.C. 720, Feb. 22, about 10 in the morning, and was about 8 digits.

It is remarkable, that at the ensuing full moon, after this solar Eclipse, observed in China, happened that Eclipse of the moon, recorded by the Chaldeans, in the second year of Mardok Em-pad, N.E. 28, in the same year, B.C. 720. These two Eclipses mutually verify each other. Jackson, Vol. ii. p. 480.

It was not till the middle of the fifth century before Christ, that Comets began to be noticed in the history of Sema-kouang, and that very imperfectly, for several centuries after.

Is it to be imagined then, that they were able to compute an eclipse of the sun, and the conjunction of five planets, in times of such remote antiquity as pretended? Or if they were, how is the omission of all the intermediate Eclipses, in so long an interval, to be accounted for*?"

THE PRIMITIVE SPHERE.

Astronomy seems to have been cultivated in the earliest times, on account of its great and various utility. To discover the courses, or revolutions, of the sun and moon, which were originally "ordained for signs and for seasons, and for days and for years," was necessary for an accurate knowledge of these several measures of time and of the vicissitude of seasons; so important in History, Agriculture, Navigation, and the due celebration of stated religious festivals.

The fixed stars therefore first noticed with attention, were probably those which lay nearest to the sun and moon in their paths through the heavens; because, by observation of their relative positions and distances from such stars, the length of the Month and of the Year could only be determined. Hence, the first part of the Primitive Sphere that was framed, was naturally the Zodiac.

The earliest classification of the zodiacal stars, was probably into distinct groups or clusters, formed by connecting lines: such as were found on the most ancient Planispheres, among the Chinese; according to Goguet, Vol. ii. p. 403. And the names assigned to them, were probably at first significant only of their qualities. Thus, the book of Job, the oldest composition extant probably in the whole world ; since Job himself, who seems to have the best claim to it, was contemporary with Nahor, Abraham's grandfather, represents the cardinal constellations of spring and autumn, in his time, by Chimah, signifying "charming," corresponding to Taurus ; and Chesil, "chilled," corresponding to Scorpio ; and the cardinal constellations of winter and summer, by Aish, signifying "a group," or "assemblage," expressive of Ursa Major ; and Mazaroth, "raging," or "furious," expressive of Canis, in the sultry "dog days." As will be proved in the adjustment of Job's Chronology.

Of the time when the animal constellations, (Zωδία, whence the Zodiac derived its name,) were first introduced, there are no traces preserved in ancient history. They probably were the invention of the Chaldeans, to whom the Ancients in general attribute the invention of Astronomy ; Herodotus, Cicero, Pliny, &c. And not later, it should seem, than the time of Nimrod's death, when that "mighty hunter before the Lord" was supposed to be translated to the constellation Orion, with his hounds, Sirius and Canicula ; and the bear, his principal game among the wild beasts, into Ursa Major ; according to Homer. See the account of Nimrod, in the Assyrian Chronology.

It is the concurrent opinion of the most eminent Antiquaries, La Pluche, Bryant, Sir William Jones, Maurice, Faber, Kett, Barret, &c. that the Primitive Sphere was framed by Noah's posterity before the Dispersion ; and that from Chaldea, it was propagated to India, Egypt, and Greece. And indeed the general likeness that prevails among the Zodiacal constellations in all these countries, both in number and figures, seems strongly to warrant their descent from some common original or prototype.

In the second volume of the Asiatic Researches, p. 292, Sir William Jones has given the twelve constellations of an ancient Indian Zodiac, which are explained in Sanscrit verse, of which he has given the following verbal translation :

"The Ram, Bull, Crab, Lion, and Scorpion, have the figures of these five animals respectively ; the Pair, are a Damsel playing on a Vina, (or Indian Guittar), and a Youth wielding a mace ; the Virgin stands on a boat in water, holding in one hand a lamp, in the other, an ear of rice corn ; the Balance is held by a weigher, with a weight in one hand ; the Bow by an archer, whose hinder parts are like those of a horse ; the Sea Monster has the face of an antelope ; the Ewer is a water-pot, borne on the shoulder of a man, who empties it ; the Fishes are two, with their heads turned to each others tails : and all these are supposed to be in such places as suit their several natures."

The only difference between this and the Grecian Zodiac, is in two of the constellations ; the Damsel and Youth, instead of the twins, Castor and Pollux ; and the Sea Monster, instead of Capricorn ; and these probably were the original constellations, which the Greeks metamorphosed, according to their usage, not knowing the meaning of these astronomical symbols.

The whole Zodiac might perhaps have been originally framed by Noah's posterity, to record the great leading events in the history of mankind, from the Creation to the Deluge. It is truly remarkable, that four of the constellations, the Fishes, Ram, Bull, and Human Pair, exactly express the progress of animal creation, in the first chapter of Genesis, ascending from the lowest species, fish, to the last and noblest, Adam and Eve ; while the two last, the Sea Monster and Ewer, bear an obvious analogy to the Deluge, in the seventh chapter. The six remaining signs may possibly apply to the intermediate events which brought on the Deluge ; but these, being beyond my skill to decypher, I leave to professed Antiquaries.

HISTORICAL CHRONOLOGY.

SECTION I.

PRESENT STATE OF HISTORICAL CHRONOLOGY.

ART. I. REVIEW OF EPOCHS, ERAS, AND PERIODS.

HISTORY in general may not improperly be compared to a rich and copious repository, in which are stored, for the example and benefit of posterity, all the various “knowledge of things” and events, of customs and manners, virtues and vices, arts and sciences, which have contributed to the rise and fall of states, to the happiness and misery of mankind, individually and collectively*. But all these precious materials, unless they be arranged in order, and digested according to the times, are no better than a rude and confused mass. Without Chronology, History would lose its most valuable characters of truth and consistency, and scarcely rise above the level of romance: for, as it is well observed by an ancient chronologer, Tatian:—

Παρ' οἷς ασυναρτητος εστιν ἡ των χρονων αναγραφη,
Παρα τουτοις ουδε τα της ιστοριας αληθευειν δυναται.

“With those to whom the computation of the times is unconnected, not even the facts of history can be verified.”

But Chronology itself ought to be correct and accurate:

otherwise it will fail to discharge properly its important functions, as “the eye,” and even “the soul of history ;” it will propagate error, and render “confusion worse confounded ;” it will form strong holds and fastnesses of scepticism and infidelity : and some of the most specious weapons, the most mischievous shafts that have been levelled against the veracity and credibility of Sacred History, have been supplied from this quarter, to Voltaire, Bailly, and their associates ; and “those misregulators of time, the Bible Chronologists,” are subjects of the pointed ridicule of that witling, Paine.

And what is the present state of Historical Chronology?—This we may learn from a competent judge, the celebrated Joseph Scaliger ; thus complaining of the variety, discordance, and imperfection of chronological systems : In multis judicium, in quibusdam diligentiam requiro ; neque enim dum verum adepti sunt. Argumento fuerint, omnium quotquot de his rebus tractarunt dissentiones ; ut inter tot millia chronologorum, vix inter duos de eadem re conveniat!—Ab eorum lectione incertior atque indoctior sum quam dudum *.

To illustrate the observations and censures of this great technical chronologer, I shall first take a pretty extensive review of the surprising diversity of opinions that have prevailed among chronologers, respecting the leading epochs, eras, and periods, by reference to which all historical facts are usually regulated, and arranged in order of time. These are to CHRONOLOGY what the Cardinal points, and prime meridians, are to ASTRONOMY and GEOGRAPHY ; without which it would be impossible to delineate accurately on the celestial and terrestrial globes, the true places and relative positions of stars, planets, and comets ; of countries, cities, mountains, and rivers : but how carelessly these have been hitherto determined, where the greatest exactness and precision attainable are required, may appear from the variety of opinions respecting them.

In every system of Historical Chronology, sacred and profane, the two grand eras, of the Creation of the World, and of the Nativity of Christ, have been usually adopted as standards, by reference to which all subordinate epochs, eras, and periods, have been adjusted ; such as those of the Deluge, the Exode of the Israelites from Egypt, the reign of Sesostris, the destruction of Troy, the overthrow of Nineveh, the foundation of Solomon's Temple, the foundation of Rome, the era of the Olympiads, the eclipse of Thales, the time of Cyrus, &c. But how wide are their variations, may appear from the following lists :

Here are upwards of 120 different opinions, and the list might be swelled to 300; as we are told by Kennedy, in his Chronology, p. 350. This specimen, however, is abundantly sufficient to shew the disgraceful discordance of chronologers, even in this prime era: the extremes differing from each other, not by years, nor by centuries, but even by chiliads; the first exceeding the last no less than 3268 years!

II. Epochs of the NATIVITY.

		U. C. B. C.

Lydiat		756 3

Here are ten different years, (reckoned by the era of the foundation of Rome, and accommodated to the vulgar Christian era) which have been respectively adopted by so many celebrated chronologers, ancient and modern. Considering the comparative recency of OUR LORD'S nativity, this variety of opinions may naturally appear more extraordinary and surprising than the preceding, which relate to so remote and obscure an event as the creation of the world.

The vulgar Christian era, commencing with the Julian year, January 1, U.C. 754, according to the Varronian computation, though now acknowledged to be incorrect, if referred to the nativity of Christ, (which its inventor, Dionysius, mistakenly placed in the preceding year, U.C. 753) is still to be retained as a long established era, commencing from a known fixed epoch, both forwards and backwards, and furnishing the most convenient standard of comparison for all others.

Vulgaris illa quam tenemus era conservanda est, quæ præteritarum rerum memoriam usu jam inveterata continet; et undecunq̄ue ducatur nihil ad veritatis fidem interest. Petavius, tom. 2. p. 215.

III. Epochs of the DELUGE.

	B.C.		B.C.
Septuagint Version	3246	Playfair	2352
Jackson	3170	Usher, and English Bible	2348
Hales	3155	Marsham	2344

tion	3102	Strauchius	2293
Samaritan Text	2998	Hebrew Text	2288
Howard	2698	Vulgar Jewish Computation ..	2104

Of these several opinions, selected from a great number, the extremes differ no less than 1142 years. Indeed the variations of this important era, whence the history of the present race of mankind properly begins, are more perplexing and mischievous than those of the Creation itself.

Usher's date, attached to our English Bible, has been relinquished by the ablest chronologers of the present time, from its inconceivableness with the rise of the primitive empires, the Assyrian, Egyptian, Indian, and Chinese; all suggesting earlier dates of the Deluge. Hence, the authors of that great and elaborate work, the Ancient Universal History, adopted, in preference thereto, the date of the Deluge furnished by the Samaritan Hebrew text; and their example has been followed by Captain Wilford, in his Remarks on the Hindu Chronology, published in the Asiatic Researches.

IV. Epochs of the Exode of the ISRAELITES from Egypt.

	B.C.		B.C.
Josephus, Hales	1648	Scaliger, Strauchius	1497
Jackson	1593	Kennedy	1495

Petavius	1531	Helvicus, Marsham	1488
Irish Computation, Coemhaim,		Vulgar Jewish Chronology	1312
&c.	1502

The gradual enlargement of this date from the lowest, but earliest, the Jewish, to the highest, is remarkable. It shews that succeeding chronologers found the dates of their predecessors insufficient to accord with the range of ancient history.

V. Epochs of the Reign of SESOSTRIS.

	B.C.		B.C.
Playfair	1555	Jackson	1338

Vossius	591	Usher , Lang. }
Sulpitius Severus	588
Jackson	579

* This is the correct date of Josephus: there are two spurious dates in his present text, 612, and 592, years.

Here the extremes differ 262 years. And if to this we add the uncertainty attached to the epoch of the Exode, whence this period has been computed, the determination of the true time has been hitherto, as Houbigant justly states, Quæstio chronologica omnium difficillima.

Here the difference of the extremes is 126 years.

IX. Epochs of the Overthrow of NINEVEH.

	B.C.		B.C.
Petavius	{	896 Prideaux	612

Usher	{	748 Helvicus	602
		626 Vignoles	596

Here the extremes differ 300 years. Petavius and Usher, misled by Ctesias, have supposed a double capture of Nineveh, the first by Arbaces, the second by Cyaxares and Nebuchadonosor, when it was finally destroyed: differing widely from each other, and from the truth.

X. ECLIPSES supposed to have been that of THALES.

The solar eclipse foretold by Thales, which put an end to a battle between the Medes and Lydians, and is of the greatest importance in adjusting the Median, Lydian, and Assyrian chronology, has had the following claimants:

	B.C
Howes	March 5, 618
Calvisius	July 30, 607
Bayer, Mayer, Costard, Stukely, Lalande, Pingré, } Montucla, Kennedy, Playfair, Hales	May 17, 603
Usher	Sept. 19, 601

Pliny, Scaliger, Strauchius, Riccioli, Newton, Ferguson, } Vignoles, Jackson	May, 28, 585
Scaliger, from Eudemus	Oct... 1, 583

Here the extreme eclipses differ 35 years.

Such is the wide discordance that prevails among the learned respecting the principal epochs and periods of ancient chronology, sacred and profane.

ART. II. REVIEW OF THE LEADING SYSTEMS OF CHRONOLOGY.

IN this second article, I shall briefly examine and compare the general outline of each system.

I. Chronology of the JEWS.

The vulgar Jewish Chronology is the grand basis upon which the systems of Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, &c. and their followers, have been constructed, though not generally acknowledged by themselves.

What a variety of systems have prevailed among the Jews of different countries, and at different times, may appear from the foregoing dates of the Creation.

1. The Seder Olam Sutha, or “Small Chronicle of the World,” published about A.D. 1121, dates the Creation, B.C. 4359. See David Ganz’s Chronology, p. 135.

2. The Eastern Jews, B.C. 4220. See Abulfaragi, Hist. Dynast. p. 72.

3. The Western Jews, B.C. 4184, according to Riccioli.

12. Rabbi Lipman, B.C. 3616. He published a work called Nizachon, or “a Victory over Christianity,” in 1559. This notable champion of Judaism, outstripping all his predecessors in anachronisms and absurdity, (in which the Jewish chronologists abound) fixes the time of Christ’s birth in a new and unheard-of way.

He contends, that Jesus of Nazareth was contemporary with Rabbi Joshua, son of Perechiah, and that he was born in the fourth year of King Jannæus, or Alexander, which he dates in the year of the creation, 3615. And to set aside the Jewish tradition, that Jesus was born in the days of Helen, Queen of Adiabene, and of Herod the Great, he absurdly supposes that Helen, who lived about the year of the Creation 3803, according to Ganz, was the wife of the aforesaid Jannæus, who lived about 188 years earlier! See Ganz’s Chronology, p. 270, 271.

The following outline of their vulgar system is collected from Ganz.

The computation of Ganz, and of the Jewish chronologers in general, are considerably embarrassed, by their absurd fashion of dropping the chiliads; thus the epoch of the Deluge is written contractedly 656, instead of A.M. 1656; Abraham's migration to Charran, 18, instead of A.M. 2018; the destruction of the Temple 338, instead of A.M. 3338; the era of Contracts, 448, instead of A.M. 3448, &c.; the chiliads being registered only at the head of each millennium. For ease of comparison, I have reduced the years of the Jewish era of the world, to the vulgar Christian era, in the third column.

The imperfection of the Jewish Chronology, may appear from the following considerations:

1. The erection of the powerful empire of Nimrod, only 132 years after the Deluge, is at variance with the course of nature in the population of the earth, by Noah's sons; when on account of the greater longevity of mankind, the interval of generations, or of the birth of the father before the birth of the son, was proportionably longer. But even at the shortest standard of generations, corresponding to the most reduced period of human life, the earth could not have been sufficiently peopled to account for the extensive conquests attributed to Nimrod or Ninus, by sacred and profane history: nor can it be supposed that Noah and his sons would have permitted such a daring rebellion against patriarchal government during their life-time. Besides, Nimrod himself could scarcely be born so early, if according to the common interpretation of Gen. x. 8, he was the third in descent from Noah, the grandson of Ham, and the youngest of the sons of Cush; and not at all, if he was, most probably, the fifth in descent, and the contemporary of Peleg, by the line of Shem, in whose days the division or colonization of the earth took place. Gen. x. 25.

2. By a glaring anachronism, Abraham, the tenth in descent from Shem, is supposed to be born 48 years before the confusion of tongues! and the time assigned for his birth, only 292 years after the Deluge, is utterly irreconcilable with the state of the world in his days, according to the concurrent testimony of sacred and profane history; for, as judiciously remarked by Sir Walter Raleigh long since, “In this patriarch’s time all the then parts of the world were peopled; all nations and countries had their kings: Egypt had many magnificent cities, and so had Palestine, and all the bordering countries; yea, all that part of the world besides, as far as India: and these, not built with sticks, but of hewn stone and ramparts; which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity than those other men have supposed.”—“If [then] we advisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham’s time, yea, before his birth, we shall find that it were very ill done, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over deeply between the flood and Abraham: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole story might perchance bleed.” History, p. 228, 277. An irrational chronology is indeed the parent of Scepticism and Infidelity.

3. The period of 480 years, from the Exode to the foundation of Solomon’s Temple, is also too short, and is plainly repugnant to the tenor of Scripture, as will appear from the detail of the particulars, collected from Ganz.

The Jewish chronologers were hard set to make out this detail, as Ganz honestly confesses. For,

1. By a curious invention, they included the first four servitudes in the years of the Judges who put an end to them, contrary to the express declarations of Scripture, representing their administrations not as synchronizing with, but as succeeding the servitudes. Judges ii. 18.

2. They were forced to allow the fifth servitude distinct from the administration of Jephtha, because it was too long to be included therein, but they curtailed a year from the Scripture account, 18 years; and they curtailed a year more from Ibzan's administration.

3. They sunk entirely the sixth servitude to the Philistines, of 40 years, because it was too long to be contained in Sampson's administration. And to crown all,

4. They reduced Saul's reign of 40 years (Acts xiii. 21.) to two years only! The dishonesty of the whole fabrication could be equalled only by its absurdity; furnishing internal evidence, that the period of 480 years is itself a forgery, foisted into the Hebrew text of 1 Kings vi. 1.

5. The same dishonest management appears in the detail of the next period of 410 years, from the foundation to the destruction of the temple.

Here the Jewish Chronology has sunk or suppressed 14 years of the reign of Amaziah, two years of Jehosophat, and one year each of Jehoash and Amaziah, in all 19 years complete, or 20 years current; and this by the confession of their most learned Rabbis, Abraham ben David, Kimchi, Levi ben Gerson, Isaac, and the author of Meor Enaim. But what says Ganz to their evidence?

“It was not the intention of these learned interpreters to stir up a controversy concerning the number of the years of the creation which we use at this day; for we do not find any of them expressing the slightest intention of increasing or diminishing the usual computation of the years of the creation.”——“Know, therefore, learned reader, that although the words of our Rabbis, Kimchi, &c. and their followers, recommending the addition of 15 or 20 years to our tables of the years of the creation, seem preferable to the words of Rasi, who rejected them, yet we will not recede from the usage of our forefathers; since ‘the law was left unto us and to our children.’ Hence we are necessitated to abide by the computation of Rasi, of blessed memory, and to suppose that Uzziah reigned 15 years in the life-time of his father.” P. 37, 38.

This is a striking and melancholy instance of the force of prejudice, even on cultivated minds. And not a few Christian Divines, Protestant as well as Romish, will, perhaps, at first sight, be disposed to consider the present work as a mischievous innovation in Chronology; and be tempted to cry out with the Jew——“We will not recede from the usage of our forefathers.” See Kennedy’s Chronology, p. 88.

6. The last supposed period of 40 years, from the finishing of the second temple, in the sixth of Darius Hystaspes, B.C. 516, to the era of contracts, B.C. 312, was in reality an interval of no less than 204 years. This is one of the most flagrant violations of chronological truth ever attempted even by the Jews themselves. The enormous defalcation of 164 years is passed over in total silence by Ganz, though it was impossible that he could have overlooked it. But he quieted his conscience, for this gross imposition upon his readers, by the orthodoxy of his system, and its rigid conformity to the Seder Olam Rabba, that Jewish standard of chronological faith. As he scrupled not to mutilate the Sacred Chronicles themselves, so he did not hesitate to curtail the heretical canon of Ptolomy.

I have been the more careful in noticing the errors of the Jewish Chronology, because it is, in fact, the ground-work of the ensuing systems of Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, &c. as observed before, which are little more than corrections thereof, and because several of the preceding observations are equally applicable to their systems.

II. IRISH Chronology.

The Irish Annalists and Bards paid considerable attention to Chronology. Some of them. Eochodius, who flourished in the ninth century, and his followers, the four Masters, &c. adopted the Greek computation of the Septuagint Version, and with Bede, and the British Church, reckoned 5199 years from the creation to the Christian Era. But others, Gildas Coemhain, Tigerach, Flan, &c. adhered to the shorter Chronology of the Hebrew Masorete text. The system of the latter is contained in the curious and comprehensive Irish poem of Gildas Coemhain, containing the annals of the world from the creation to his own time: and he has given a concise and masterly sketch of his system, in the preface of his poem; which has been lately published by that learned Irish scholar, Dr. O'Conor, from two ancient Irish MSS. the Bodleian, upwards of 500 years old, and another, in the Stowe Library, formerly belonging to O'Flaherty, in his Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres, Vol. I. proleg. ii. p. 31, &c. accompanied with a literal Latin translation, and Notes, p. 35, &c.

The year in which Coemhain wrote his Annals, A.D. 1072, is ascertained by its Astronomical character: for the new moon fell on Dec. 25, 1071; and consequently, the 7th day of the month was Jan. 1, 1072, as critically remarked by Dr. O'Conor.

This system nearly corresponds with the

III. Chronology of SCALIGER.

Joseph Scaliger was the first scholar of his own, or of any age; he was distinguished by the brilliancy of his genius, and the variety and extent of his erudition. His celebrated work, De emendatione temporum, first appeared in 1596, and the last and best edition of it was published in 1629. It contains a copious fund of miscellaneous information, classical, historical, and chronological, intermixed with much that is fanciful. Two of its most curious and valuable parts are the Prolegomena, and the Appendix; the latter especially, which contains fragments from the most ancient Greek writers, Berosus, Abydenus, Menander, Herodotus, &c. collected chiefly from Josephus, and enriched with his own notes. Technical chronology is the professed subject of his work, not historical; however, he has incidentally noticed and determined some of the principal epochs of sacred history, and has supplied the following periods in sacred chronology, which are here reduced to the Julian period, and to the vulgar Christian era. See his Catholica Temporum, p. 780.

	YEARS.	J P.	B C.
Creation	1656 764 3950

Second Temple rebuilt	259 4291 423
Dedication by Judas Maccab. ...	164	... 4550 164

In the first five articles he has closely copied the Jewish Chronology, only inserting five years omitted by the Jews, to make up the 430 years from Abraham's migration to Canaan unto the Exode, and deducting one year from the 480, between the Exode and foundation of the temple. And he has enlarged the interval from the foundation to the destruction of the temple by 18 years, according to the corrections of Kimchi, &c.; but he incorrectly dates the building of the second temple, B.C. 423, which was finished near a century earlier, B.C. 516, though he has therein partly corrected the notoriously curtailed Jewish date thereof.

Concerning Daniel's famous prophecy of the 70 weeks, he rightly concluded, with the Jews, that it ended with the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70; and consequently began, B.C. 420, in the fourth year of Darius Nothus, king of Persia. Proleg. p. 43.

IV. Chronology of PETAVIUS.

Dionysius Petavius, or Petau, had all the requisites almost of a consummate chronologer. He was skilled in the learned languages, deeply read in universal history, a master of technical chronology, a good mathematician and astronomer, equal to the calculation of eclipses, and exerted the most laborious, patient, and indefatigable industry of research. By the combination of these talents, he was enabled to detect and expose the errors of his more ingenious, but more fanciful rival, Joseph Scaliger, but not to establish his own system. Unfortunately, he bowed down too implicitly to the Church of Rome, and to the Hebrew verity; reprobating every departure from, or emendation of, the Masorete text; and he pronounced the following anathema against those "who dared to assert, that the number 480 years was corrupt," in 1 Kings vi. 1. Hæc nimis effrænata grassandi in Scripturam licentia, coercenda et repudianda videtur. Emend. Temp. lib. viii. cap. 9.

Of course, his system is little more than an improvement on the preceding, as will appear from the following comparative outline:—

	Y.	J.P.	A.M.	B.C.
Adam (1656)	1655 ..	730 ..	1 ..	3984

Second Temple	208 ..	4194 ..	3464 ..	520
Era of Contracts	312 ..	4402 ..	3672 ..	312

Here he has enlarged Scaliger's epoch of the creation by 34 years. He reckons the 480 current, or 479 complete years, from the end of the Exode, which adds 40 years to the period, from the Exode itself; and fully correcting the mistakes of his predecessors, he dates the rebuilding of the second temple from the second year of Darius Hystaspes, B.C. 520, when the work was resumed, and afterwards finished in the sixth year of his reign.

His Chronological Series of Events from the Creation, B.C. 3983, to A.D. 533, is the fullest I have seen, and deserves to be republished separately for general use. It is in the 13th book, tom. 2, pp. 282—490.

V. Chronology of USHER.

This early-ripe, profound, and various scholar, James Usher, was one of the brightest luminaries of the Church of IRELAND, in which he rose by his transcendent merits to the highest dignity of Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland. He was a great encourager, and munificent patron, of literature in general, and of Oriental in particular. His collection of Oriental MSS., purchased at a great expence in all parts of the world, is highly valuable; and to him principally we owe the publication of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which first began to lessen the superstitious attachment of the learned to the Hebrew verity, as it was called, or the supposed immaculate purity of the Masorete Hebrew text. But though his own private opinion always was, that the Hebrew copies of the Old Testament were no less liable to the errors of transcribers, than those of the New Testament, and of *all other books, yet he scrupled to incur the charge of innovation. Hence his system is little more than a correction of the preceding; to which it is superior in some points, though inferior in others, as will appear from the following comparative outline:—

† The year B.C. 4004, was a remarkable astronomical epoch, when the great axis of the earth's orbit coincided with the line of the equinoxes; and consequently the true and mean equinoxes were united. This curious discovery was announced by the great French astronomer, La Place, in his Méchanique Céleste, Tom. III. p. 113.

From this it appears, that the Chronology of Usher is 20 years longer than that of Petavius; and it is remarkable, that throughout the whole outlines, they only agree in two dates, namely, the foundation of the Temple, B.C. 1012, and the Era of Contracts, B.C. 312.

The principal improvement of Usher's system is in the age of Terah, 130 years at the birth of Abraham, in which he happily rectified the vulgar error, that Abraham was born in the 70th year of his father's age, because he is named the first of his sons, "And Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran." Gen. xi. 26. But Abraham was probably the youngest son, and Haran certainly the eldest; because Haran's two daughters, Milcáh, and Iscah, the latter surnamed Sarai, afterwards Sarah †, were married to their uncles, Nahor and Abraham, respectively. Gen. xi. 29. And Sarah was only 10 years younger than Abraham. Compare Gen. xvii. 15—17.

Abraham was the son of Terah by a second wife. This appears from his apology to Abimelech, for his equivocation in calling Sarah his sister, "She is the daughter (grand-daughter) of my father, but not the daughter of my mother." Gen. xx. 12. By the same latitude of expression, Abraham called his nephew Lot "his brother." Gen. xiv. 14. And OUR LORD called his cousin-germans "his brothers and his sisters." Matt. xiii. 55, 56.

* These numbers in the series A.M. (or years of the world) are incorrect; they ought each to be a year less, viz. 1770, 2082, 2083. Hence, computations made by this series will frequently differ a year or two from those made by the series B.C. or the years before the vulgar Christian era, which puzzled me for some time before I discovered the cause. The series B.C. is more correct, and should be used in preference.

And that Abraham was born in his father's 130th year, is evident from the age of Terah, at his death, 205 years. Gen. xi. 32. At which time Abraham was 75 years old. Gen. xii. 4. But $205 - 75 = 130$.

Abraham was named the first of Terah's sons, "not from primogeniture, but from pre-eminence," as the father of the faithful, and the illustrious ancestor of the Israelites, and of the Jews, whose "seed was CHRIST," according to the flesh; with whose history the Old Testament properly commences: "Now these are the generations of Terah," &c. Gen. xi. 27. All the preceding part of Genesis being only introductory thereto. By the same analogy, Shem, the second son of Noah, is placed first of his three sons, Gen. v. 32, and Japheth, "the eldest," last. Compare Gen. x. 21, and xi. 20. Thus Isaac is put before Ishmael, though 14 years younger. 1 Chron. i. 28. And Solomon, the eldest, is reckoned the last of Bathsheba's children. 1 Chron. iii. 5*.

Although this addition of 60 years to the age of Terah, at Abraham's birth, was one of the most brilliant and important of Primate Usher's improvements in Chronology, yet it was perhaps injurious to his whole system. Not venturing, it seems, to recede too far from the prevailing systems, in fixing the age of the world, he injudiciously abridged the times before and after Abraham too much; for,

1. He reduces the commencement of Nimrod's reign still lower than his predecessors, to only 114 years after the deluge.
2. He reduces Abraham's sojournment at Charran to only one year. Even the five years allowed by the Jews and Petavius are short of the truth, 15 years; as will be proved hereafter.
3. He retains the spurious period of 480 years, which Peta-

* This argument is well stated by Marsham, who judiciously adopted the rectification of Usher.

Vixit pater (Terah) annos 205: post mortem patris, Abraham agebat annum ætatis 75: non itaque nasci potuit ante annum patris 130. Qui aliter sentiunt acriter urgent, 'Tharam vixisse annos 70, et genuisse Abraham, Nahor, Haran.' (Gen. xi. 26.) Non autem inde constat, omnes natos isto anno, non omnes eo ordine: Abraham ibi prærogativâ, non primogeniturâ, primus. Sic numerantur filii Abraham, 'Isaac et Ismael.' (1 Chron. i. 28.) At Ismael natus anno patris 86, Isaac 100. Sic inter Noe filios, Shem aliquoties primus nominatur. (Gen. v. 22.) At in recensendis genealogiis, secundum ordinem naturæ, tam Japhet quam Ismael primum locum obtinent. (1 Chron. i. 5 - 29.)

vius had enlarged to 520 current years, or 519 complete; and thereby renders his system, from Abraham's migration to Canaan downwards, still more defective than that of Petavius. The true period is 621 years, as will be proved in the rectification of the Chronology of Josephus.

4. His date of the destruction of the temple, B.C. 588, and Petavius's, B.C. 589, are both incorrect; it should be B.C. 586, as judiciously determined by Jackson, from Ptolomy's Canon.

The system of Usher has prevailed principally in the British empire, and among the divines of the Reformed Church on the continent of Europe; that of Petavius among the divines of the Church of Rome. The dates of Usher chiefly have been annexed to the last translation of the Bible, and established by public authority; but the system itself being radically defective, these dates must necessarily be erroneous, and therefore ought to be rectified, as furnishing a plausible ground of impeaching the veracity and credibility of Holy Writ to sceptics and infidels.

VI. Chronology of MARSHAM.

The very learned and acute chronologer, Sir John Marsham, has ingeniously, though unsuccessfully, attempted to reconcile the leading events of sacred and profane Chronology together, by a comparative view of the Egyptian, Hebrew, Phœnician, Grecian, &c. antiquities and chronicles. In the beginning of his Chronicon, p. 12. edit. 2. Leipsic, he has given a cursory outline of the Hebrew Chronology, from the Creation to the end of the Babylonish Captivity, steering his course between Petavius and Usher.

	Y.	J.P.	B.C.
The Creation	1656 ..	714 ..	4000
Deluge	426 ..	2370 ..	2344
Abraham goes to Canaan	430 ..	2796 ..	1918
Exode from Egypt	480 ..	3226 ..	1488
Temple founded	400 ..	3706 ..	1008
—— destroyed ..	70 ..	4106 ..	608
End of the Captivity in the first of Cyrus ..	538 ..	4176 ..	538

In reckoning 426 years from the Deluge to Abraham's migration to Canaan, he assigns 291 years to the birth of Haran, the eldest of Terah's sons, 60 years more to the birth of Abraham, and 75 years to his arrival in Canaan; but he reduces even lower than the Jews the interval 400 years, from the foundation to the destruction of the temple. From such a defective standard, then, the failure of his plan was naturally to be expected. The principal error which embarrassed his whole scheme of profane Chronology, was the adoption of the mistake of Josephus, that the famous Sesostris, king of Egypt, was the Shishac or Sesac of Scripture, who invaded Rehoboam, and plundered the temple of Jerusalem; and this, unfortunately, misled Sir Isaac Newton also.

VII. Chronology of NEWTON *.

This illustrious philosopher, who had laboured so successfully in his youth to improve experimental philosophy and mathematics, in his immortal Principia, Optics, Arithmetica Universalis, and Fluxions, devoted his latter days to the arduous study of Chronology, in which, according to the account he gave himself, about five months before his death, to his friend Dr. Pearce, late Bishop of Rochester:—"He had spent 30 years, at intervals, in reading over all the authors, or parts of authors, which could

* The author of this Review has long studied and admired the philosophical and mathematical writings of Newton, and has laboured to explain and vindicate them in various publications.

1. Sonorum Doctrina, &c. 1778, 4to. Dublin. Designed to explain and illustrate Newton's most abstruse and difficult Theory of Sounds, and to vindicate the demonstration of its fundamental proposition; Princip. Lib. 2. Prop. 47.

2. Dissertatio de Motibus Planetarum in orbibus excentricis, 1782, 8vo. Dublin. Designed to unfold Newton's Planetary and Cometary System, by a critical explanation of the Corollaries of Princip. Lib. 1, Prop. 16, from which it is derived.

3. Analysis Æquationum, 1784, 4to. Dublin. Composed principally as a comment on Newton's Arithmetica Universalis. In this, his celebrated Binomial Theorem is accurately demonstrated; and his method of finding the roots of æquations by approximation is vindicated, against the censure of De la Grange.

4. Analysis Fluxionum, 1800, 4to. London. An attempt to investigate and explain the genuine principles of Fluxions, from Newton's very concise account, Princip. Lib. 2, Lem. 2, and from his doctrine of Limits, or of prime and ultimate ratios, briefly delivered in the first section of the first book, to establish the demonstration of his elementary proposition, the fluxion of a rectangle, and expose the mistakes of Maclaurin, &c.; to vindicate his claim to originality of invention against the advocates of Leibnitz, &c.; and to repel the charge of Materialism, brought against him by Professor Robinson, from his theory of pulses or vibrations, &c.

It was not therefore without considerable reluctance that he could bring himself to censure the posthumous work of a venerated author; and accordingly, at first, he omitted to review his Chronology; but upon re-consideration, and revisal of this Introduction, he found it indispensably necessary to do so, in order to remove from error the powerful weight of such an imposing authority; and also to vindicate and establish the elementary dates of Greek, Latin, and Egyptian Chronology, which Newton, with much perverted ingenuity, had laboured to overthrow, but in vain.

furnish any materials for forming a just account of the subject; that he had in his reading made collections from these authors, and had, at the end of 30 years, composed from thence his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms; and that he had written it over several times (sixteen times, as the Bishop collected afterwards from his discourse) making few alterations therein but what were for the sake of shortening it, leaving out, in every later copy, some of the authorities and references on which he had grounded his opinion."

A few days before his death, Bishop Pearce visited and dined with him at Kensington. "I found him," says he, "writing over his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms, without the help of spectacles, at the greatest distance in the room from the windows, and with a parcel of books on the table, casting a shade upon the paper. Seeing this, on my entering the room, I said, 'Sir, you seem to be writing in a place where you cannot well see.' His answer was, 'Little light serves me.' He then told me, that 'he was preparing his Chronology for the press, and that he had written the greatest part of it for that purpose*.' The work was published in the year after his death, in 1728, by his nephew, Mr. Conduitt, who supplied the authorities found in it at present.

The date of the Creation does not occur any where in the course of the work; but from inspection and comparison of the dates in the short Chronicle prefixed, from the death of Eli, and capture of the Ark by the Philistines, to the invasion of Judea by Sesac, king of Egypt, in the fifth of Rehoboam, it is evident, that he preferred the system of Petavius before that of Usher. His dates are usually four years higher than those of the former; whence we may collect, that his epoch of the Creation was about B.C. 3988, or four years higher than that of Petavius.

* See Bishop Pearce's Life, prefixed to his Commentary on the Gospels, p. 42—44.

Here Newton notices the time of Samuel's death, omitted by Usher; and he reduces the reign of Saul to 10 years, following Petavius rather, who made it only 13 years, than Usher, who rightly rated it 40 years.

Notwithstanding the extreme ingenuity of its construction, the Chronology of Newton is now generally allowed to err in defect, and to fall short of the truth about three hundred years, more or less*. The structure, indeed, is elegant, but it is built upon a sandy foundation.

His fundamental error was the supposed identity of Sesostris, the great Egyptian conqueror, with Sesac.

“This is no new opinion,” says he: “Josephus discovered it when he affirms that Herodotus erred in ascribing the actions of Sesac to Sesostris, and that the error was only in the name of the king: for this is as much as to say, that the true name of him who did those things described by Herodotus, was Sesac, and that Herodotus erred only in calling him Sesostris, or that he was called Sesostris by a corruption of his name. Our great chronologer, Sir John Marsham, was also of opinion that Sesostris was Sesac. And if this be granted, then it is most certain that Sesostris came out of Egypt, in the fifth year of Rehoboam, to invade the nations, and returned back into Egypt in the fourteenth year of that king: and that Danaus, then flying from his brother [Sesostris] came into Greece within a year or two after.” P. 70.

But this cannot be granted: for, in the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology, it will be shewn: 1. That Herodotus did not ascribe to Sesostris the actions of Sesac; 2. That Sesostris returned from his Indian expedition about B.C. 1300; and that the Sesac who invaded Rehoboam, about B.C. 985, more correctly, was probably the Cephrenus of Herodotus, who was supposed to have built the second of the great pyramids of Memphis.

Grecian Chronology.

With the return of Sesostris from his Indian expedition, Newton has ingeniously and skilfully connected the leading facts of the earlier Grecian history, by a curious chain of analytical reasoning, of which this is the result:

* “Illustriss. Newtoni hypothesis, tercentum totos annos à veterum Chronologiâ amputans,” &c.—Dissertat. in Hesiod. Edit. Robinson, p. xxxii.

(1.) “ I have stated the time of the return of the Heraclides about 340 years before the battle of Thermopylæ; (2.) And made the taking of Troy eighty years older than that return, according to Thucydides; (3.) And the Argonautic expedition, a generation older than the Trojan war; (4.) And the wars of Sesostris in Thrace—a generation older than that expedition.”
P. 7.

The dates he assigns thereto are the following, compared with the most approved.

	Newton.	Correct.	Difference.
1. Return of the Heraclidæ	B.C. 825 1103 278
2. The taking of Troy 904 1183* 279
3. Argonautic Expedition	937 1225† 288
4. Return of Sesostris	965 1300 335

Return of the HERACLIDÆ.

1. To find out this return, Newton, following Herodotus, counts seventeen double Spartan kings of the two lines of Eurysthenes and Procles, who were born shortly after the return, to the death of Leonidas, the last of the former line, at the battle of Thermopylæ, B.C. 480; which counted upwards from thence, and multiplied by 20 years apiece, (his average of the duration of reigns) gives 340 years; and this added to B.C. 480, gives B.C. 820, or about B.C. 825, (Short Chron.) for the date of the return of the Heraclidæ; 278 years lower than the correct date.

But in this case, 1. His average of the length of reigns is too low; in such an uninterrupted succession, the reigns may be considered as equivalent to generations of three to a century. 2. The particular circumstances of the history also may warrant us to consider these 17 generations as equal in length to 19: For Aristodemus, who led back the Heraclidæ, died a year or two after their return, and left twin sons, Eurysthenes and Procles, who jointly succeeded him. Here then was a long minority, which may have made their joint reigns considerably longer than a generation. Afterwards, there was another long minority in the case of Charilaus, the seventh in succession from Procles, who was proclaimed king as soon as he was born, by his uncle and guardian, the celebrated legislator, Lycurgus. Cleomenes, also, the father of Leonidas, was advanced in years when his son was born, which lengthened his generation; and Leonidas himself was in the decline of life when he was killed*; as appears also from his being contemporary with Leutychides the eighth, from the Messenian war, by the line of Procles. But 19 generations give a term of about 633 years; which differs not much from 623, the correct interval of years between the return of the Heraclidæ and the battle of Thermopylæ.

* See Jackson's Dissertation on the time of the Argonaut expedition, Vol. III. p. 318—326.

And this corresponds very well with the time of the legislation of Lycurgus, B.C. 884, according to Eratosthenes. For from this to the battle of Thermopylæ, B.C. 480, was an interval of 404 years: and from Charilaus, the nephew and ward of Lycurgus, to Leutychides, were eleven kings inclusive. Their reigns may be reckoned equivalent to 12 generations, as observed before; but 404 years, divided by 12, gives $33\frac{2}{3}$ for the mean value of a generation: very near the standard of three generations to a century. See the Elements of Technical Chronology.

To support his hypothesis, Newton has reduced the time of Lycurgus too low; citing Thucydides, and Socrates in Plato, to shew that the institutions of Lycurgus were only a little more than 300 years before the end of the Peloponnesian War, in B.C. 404; or about B.C. 708, p. 35, 58. But the Latin version of Stephen's Thucydides, 300 years, which he followed, is incorrect; the Greek reads τετρακοσια, 400, which is confirmed by Duker's excellent edition, and all the MSS.; and it is strange how Newton could either overlook it, or prefer the faulty translation. And this is confirmed by the apposite testimony of Diodorus Siculus, who states, that "the Lacedemonians were very powerful after they used the laws of Lycurgus, for more than 400 years; till they fell into luxury and slothfulness, and began to use money and amass wealth." For Agis repealed the law of Lycurgus against gold and silver money, in his last year, B.C. 400.

Newton's additional arguments to fix the time of Lycurgus from Terpander the musician, and the Olympic disk, are vague and unsatisfactory. See Jackson, Vol. III. p. 344.

His last argument to determine the return of the Heraclidæ, from the time of Cypselus, King of Corinth, is inconsistent: for at first, p. 62, he counts six generations from Melas, who lived at the time of their return, to Cypselus, whose reign began B.C. 655. Whence, reckoning these generations at 30 years apiece, he dates the return of the Heraclidæ $180 + \text{B.C. } 655 = \text{B.C. } 835$. But afterwards, p. 139, from Aletes, King of Corinth, who reigned at their return, he enumerates eight of his lineal successors, and after them a succession of Prytanes, or Annual Archons, about 42 years, until Cypselus began his reign. But surely their reigns and jurisdictions exceeded the length of six generations.

* Musgrave reckons him 52 years old. See his Vindication of the Chronology of the Olympiads, p. 162—166.

The Destruction of TROY.

2. This next cardinal date must necessarily be raised with the foregoing. And both Eratosthenes and Diodorus Siculus have ascertained it within a year of each other, by different and independent arguments. According to Clemens Alexandrinus, the former reckoned 407 years from thence to the Olympic Era, B.C. 776, as follows :

	Y.	B. C.
Destruction of Troy	80 1183
Return of the Heraclidæ	60	. . . 1103
Ionic Migration	159 1043
Legislation of Lycurgus	108 884
	<hr style="width: 10%; margin: 0 auto;"/>
Era of the Olympiads	407	776

Tatian also adopted this interval; which is confirmed by the following independent computation :

	Y.	B. C.
Destruction of Troy	10 1183
Aeneas founds Lavinium	8 1173
Ascanius reigns	61 1165
Return of the Heraclidæ ..	328 1104
	<hr style="width: 10%; margin: 0 auto;"/>
Era of the Olympiads	407	776

This curious and valuable coincidence of Greek and Latin Chronology, establishing both, is furnished by Petavius, Vol. II. p. 36, from some ancient Greek Chronologer, whose name he unluckily omits.

Apollodorus, however, and Eusebius following him, reckoned this interval 408 years. Both are consistent; the former denoting complete, the latter, current years. This is plainly intimated by the judicious Diodorus Siculus, in his date of the destruction of Troy, Lib. XIV. cap. 1. He reckons that the dissolution of the Athenian government, at the end of the Peloponnesian war, in the 94th Olympiad, when Cocynas, of Larissa, was victor in the games, B.C. 404, took place in the 780th year current from the destruction of Troy; which gives the date of the latter B.C. 1184; and consequently 779 years complete from B.C. 1183.

ARGONAUTIC Expedition.

3. Along with its predecessors, the time of the Argonautic expedition requires also to be raised. Newton, following Diodorus Siculus and Tatian, reckons it one generation prior to the destruction of Troy, because the sons of Argonauts were engaged in the war: but Herodotus places it in the second generation before. We are warranted, therefore, to raise the interval from 33 to 42 years.

Newton, to give collateral support to his system from astronomy, laboured to confirm his assigned date of the Argonautic Expedition by an ingenious but fanciful argument derived from

The Precession of the Equinoxes.

By an elaborate process, p. 81—90, he computes the amount of the precession of the Equinoxes and Solstices from the time of the Argonautic expedition to the end of the year 1689, or the beginning of 1690, to have been 36 degrees, 44 minutes of longitude; and by a subsequent correction, reduces it to 36 degrees, 29 minutes: which, turned into time, at the rate of 72 years for each degree of precession, would give 2647 years, in the former instance, and 2627 years in the latter. These years, therefore, counted backwards from A.D. 1690, give the date of the Argonautic expedition, B.C. 957; and by the correction, B.C. 937, which is the very year assigned.

Newton, like Archimedes, might say, Δος που στω, και τον κοσμον κινησω, “Give me footing, and I will move the world.” But here, unfortunately, he wanted data. 1. His assumption of the positions of the cardinal points of the ecliptic, in the middles of the constellations of Aries, Cancer, Chelæ, and Capricorn, is altogether gratuitous at the time of the Argonautic expedition; and can be proved to be false, from the correcter date of it, and the correcter rate of precession, one degree in $71\frac{1}{2}$ years. 2. The primitive celestial sphere was certainly not invented either by Chiron or Musæus, jointly or separately, for the use of the Argonauts, in that expedition; for it was invented long before, by the Chaldean astronomers, whence it was adopted by the Indians, and by the Egyptians and Greeks. See the Elements of Technical Chronology.

Nor, 3. did "its asterisms, as Newton supposes, relate to the circumstances of the Argonauts, their contemporaries, or predecessors;" but probably to the earliest circumstances of patriarchal history; Argo, to Noah's ark; Chiron, to Noah himself, with his altar and sacrifice, after the flood; Orion and his dogs, to Nimrod, that "mighty hunter;" the great and little bear, the hare, &c. to his game, &c. And, 4. to crown all, Canopus, the principal star in the constellation Argo, is only 37 degrees from the south pole, and the greatest part of the constellation lies still nearer to it: the course of their voyage lay between 39 and 45 degrees of north latitude: consequently, if the sphere had been either constructed by, or for the Argonauts, the framer would not have given the name of the ship Argo to a constellation invisible at Pagasæ, whence they set out, and at Colchis, whither they came. The southerly position of this constellation, seems rather to indicate the approach of the waters of the deluge from that quarter of the globe, where "the fountains of the great deep were broken up;" probably in the vicinity of the south pole, if we may judge from the resting of the ark upon Mount Ararat, in Armenia, northwards, from the more abrupt and violent disruptions of the coasts of the old and new continents, southwards than northwards; and from the copious fossil remains of southern animals and vegetables, found very far to the northward at the present day. See the Elements of Sacred Geography.

In detailing the fabulous accounts of the asterisms, Newton appears to have given too much credit to the monstrous fictions of Grecian mythology*, under which, however, are frequently disguised, or caricatured, the genuine features of primeval tradition, and sacred history.

His additional astronomical arguments for confirming the assigned date of the Argonautic expedition, drawn from the positions of the cardinal points, in the times of Thales and Meton, (p. 91, 92) are unsatisfactory, because the observations of these early astronomers were coarse, as he himself confesses, and even so, have not been accurately recorded; the difference between the beginning or end of the same constellation, making a difference of about 2145 years in the calculation. From such observations no accurate conclusions can be drawn.

HESIOD.

His astronomical argument, however, for determining the time of Hesiod, and from thence supporting his assumed date of the Trojan war, deserves to be considered, because it will be found not only to militate against his system, but even to support the ancient, and to verify the Parian Chronicle in this case.

“Hesiod,” says he, “tells us, that sixty days after the winter solstice, the star Arcturus rose just at sunset: and thence it follows, that Hesiod flourished about a hundred years after the death of Solomon, (about B.C. 870, Short Chronicle) or in the generation or age next after the Trojan war, as Hesiod himself declares.” P. 93.

The passage to which he alludes is this:

Εὐτ' ἂν δ' ἑξάκοντα μετὰ τροπᾶς ἡελίοιο
Χειμερὶ ἐκτελεσθ' Ἰεὺς ἡμάτα, δὴ ρα τοτ' ἀστὴρ
Ἀρκτουρος προλιπὼν ἱερον ροον Ὠκεανοιο
Πρωτον παμφαινῶν ἐπιτελλεται ἀκροκνεφαίος.

“When Jove shall have completed sixty days
After the winter solstice, then the star
Arcturus, forsaking the ocean's sacred flood,
First rises achronically, all shining.”—Opera et Dies, v. 564.

Here “the star Arcturus” is put, by a usual metonymy, for the whole constellation Bootes, of which it is the most conspicuous: this is evident from the word παμφαινῶν, “all-shining,” which is inapplicable to a *single star, but corresponds with the usual phrases of the ancient astronomers respecting the risings of the constellations, either partially or totally; μεσος ἐπιτελλει, ὅλος ἐπιτελλει, &c.; sometimes, with the addition of the words φανερος, ἐκφανης. And Homer also uses ἀστὴρ, (which properly denotes a single “star,”) in the sense of σημα, a “sign,” or constellation; applying both to Κυν' Ὠριωνος, “Orion's dog,” or the constellation Canis. Ibid. 20. Plautus

* A single star has no apparent or sensible diameter, and therefore rises and sets nearly at once.

too applies both Stella and Signum to Arcturus, in his prologue to the Rudens.

“Ita sum, ut videtis, splendens stella candida,
Signum quod semper tempore exoritur suo,
 Hic atque in cælo: nomen Arcturo est mihi.”

Virgil likewise applies sidus to Arcturus:

“Arcturi sidera, Hædorumque dies servandi.”—Georg. 1, 204.

It does not appear from this passage of Hesiod, at what place, or in what time, the observation was originally made; whether at Ascra, the poet's residence, in Bœotia, or in a higher or lower latitude; whether in his own age, or from more ancient calendars; or whether the true or apparent rising of the constellation is meant: all which circumstances enter into, and materially affect, the result of the calculation.

Let us, however, suppose that the poet speaks of the apparent Achronycal rising of the constellation, at his own country, and in his own age.

In the latitude of Ascra, about 38 degrees, 30 minutes, and in the year assigned by Newton, B.C. 870, which was Bissextile, the apparent Achronycal rising of Arcturus, happened at the beginning of February 18, when the sun was in the 21st degree of Aquarius, and depressed twelve degrees below the horizon: that is, 50 entire days from the day of the winter solstice that year, including the extremes. But this falls short of the poet's observation of 60 days; which is repeated and verified both by Eudoxus and Democritus, and therefore is not liable to the suspicion of an error in the text.

Let us next take the year assigned to Hesiod, by the Parian Chronicle, B.C. 944; or, for the ease of calculation, B.C. 942, which was Bissextile; and, instead of Arcturus, take the star which rises last in the constellation Bootes, and is a star of the third magnitude, marked aζ by Bayer, and which therefore is visible at the horizon, when the sun is depressed 14 degrees below it. This star then rose achronycally in the beginning of February 27, or the sixtieth day after the day of the winter solstice, including the extremes: a usual mode of computation, of which we find many instances in sacred and profane authors.

This curious calculation, so satisfactorily verifying the Parian date of Hesiod's time, and refuting Newton's abbreviation, was made by a skilful astronomer, Doctor Joseph Atwell, and is inserted in the learned Dissertation prefixed to Robinson's excellent Variorum edition of Hesiod's works, 1737. Oxon. p. xxvii., &c. See the Editor's preface.

Newton's mistake, in lowering so much the time of Hesiod below the received chronology, may be traced to his mistake and misrepresentation of Hesiod's celebrated five ages * of the world, 1. The Golden; 2. The Silver; 3. The Brazen; 4. The Heroic; and 5. The Iron: in his Opera et Dies.

"Hesiod," says he, "hath told us himself that he lived in the age next after the wars of Thebes and Troy, [i. e. the Iron age.] And that this age should end when the men then living grew hoary, and dropt into the grave: and therefore it was but of an ordinary length." P. 31. And again:

"Hesiod himself tells us, that he lived in the fifth age, the age next after the taking of Troy: and therefore he flourished within 30 or 35 years after it." P. 160. And further:

"Hesiod, describing these four ages of the gods and demigods of Greece, [the Golden, Silver, Brazen, and Heroic ages] represents them to be four generations of men; each of which ended when the men then living grew old and dropt into the grave; and tells us, that the fourth ended with the wars of Thebes and Troy." P. 158.—"The four first ages succeeded the flood of Deucalion." P. 161.—"This flood was succeeded by four ages or generations of men:—the last of which ended with the Trojan war." P. 13.

In these several passages, Newton evidently appears to have confounded $\gamma\epsilon\nu\omicron\varsigma$, the word uniformly used by Hesiod in describing these five ages; signifying "a race," (or peculiar cast of men, distinguished from others, by some physical or moral qualities, as is evident from the context) with $\gamma\epsilon\nu\epsilon\alpha$, "a generation," or the men of a single age; three of which were equivalent to a century. And this fundamental error has deranged his entire chronology of those ages, and of the early times of Greece.

To rescue this curious and important period of ancient chronology from the uncertainty and perplexity under which it has so long laboured, which Newton, his predecessors, and successors, have all failed to explain and clear up; however hazardous, and even presumptuous, may be the attempt, at present, respecting a subject so very obscure and intricate, and so much disputed by the ablest critics and antiquaries, I will proceed to examine carefully the account given by Hesiod himself; and by comparing it with sacred history and primitive tradition, hope to offer at least a more rational and consistent account of Hesiod's Ages of the World, than has hitherto appeared, which I will preface in his own language :

Εἰ δ' ἐθελεῖς, ἕτερον τοι ἐγὼ λόγον ἐκκορυφῶσω
 Ἐν καὶ ἐπισταμένως· σὺ δ' ἐνὶ φρεσὶ βαλλέο σῆσιν.

Opera et Dies, v. 106.

1. His Golden Age bears no relation at all to Grecian History. It is evidently an imperfect tradition of the primeval times, before and after the fall; including the paradisaical state of our first parents, and also the purer state of Seth's line, until his descendants, "the sons of God," as they were styled in Scripture for their superior piety, about the age of the righteous Enoch, the seventh from Adam, began to be corrupted by their promiscuous inter-marriages with the fair, but frail, "daughters of men" of the apostate Cainite race. Gen. vi. 1, 2; iv. 25; Jude 14.

To this period, Hesiod's account bears a remarkable analogy: "When Saturn reigned, and men lived like gods, free from cares, without labour and sorrow, and the infirmities of age; rich in *sheep, dear to the happy gods, enjoying the spontaneous fruits of the earth in great abundance, and all manner of good things; and dying without pain, as if overcome by sleep. After death they became demons (or good angels) and were admitted to the council of Jove, and were appointed guardians of mankind. They went to and fro throughout the earth, observing the righteous or unrighteous deeds of men, dispensers of wealth. Such was their royal reward." Vers. 108—126.

Josephus also cites Hesiod (though no where extant in his present works) among the authors who recorded that the "first men lived a thousand years." Ant. i. 3, 9.

2. The Silver age seems to have succeeded the general deluge †.

* Μηλοῖς: I have rendered it "sheep," as it is afterwards understood, vers. 163; rather than "fruits," with the Latin translation, pomis; because the pastoral state is thereby distinguished from the agricultural. Gen. iv. 2.

† The learned and ingenious Mr. Mitford supposes that the first two ages preceded

At that time the original standard of longevity ending with Noah, was shortened by successive reductions, from 600 years, the age of Shem, to 400, 200, &c. years. Still, however, the mean length of generations to the days of Abraham, was a hundred years and upwards, according to the longer Greek computation of the Septuagint and Josephus, supported by the Samaritan text. This age probably reached from the deluge to the colonization of the earth, in the days of Peleg; or fifth from Shem. Gen. xi. 1—32.

It seems to be thus described by Hesiod:—"This was a race much inferior indeed; like the Golden, neither in body nor mind. Still at a hundred years of age they were boys, bred up with their careful mothers in simplicity at home. But their term of manhood was short, and they died early, suffering for their folly, because they could not abstain from injury to each other, and from impiety to the gods, whose lawful and customary sacrifices they would not offer; wherefore Jove, in his wrath, removed them, because they gave not due honours to the happy gods." And the following remarkable exception seems to relate to the first and purest patriarchs of this age, "who after their deaths were called the second happy mortals, for still honour attended even these." V. 140—143.

3. The three ensuing ages seem to have been peculiar, in a great measure, to the region of Greece, the poet's country. His description of the Brazen Age seems to relate to the early state of Greece, during its successive colonizations or settlements, by the various wandering tribes of Asia, Phœnicia, and Egypt; the Deluge; that the Golden age only represented the state of man in Paradise, before the fall; and the Silver, that which succeeded it. Hist. Greece, Vol. I. p. 63, 155.

This cannot be: for Hesiod's description of the Golden age evidently extended beyond the paradisaical state, in which Adam and Eve had no children; and includes that period in which "men began to multiply on the face of the earth." 2. His account of the diminution of the standard of human life in the Silver age, does not agree to the Antediluvian times, but agrees remarkably well to the patriarchal generations after the Deluge. Besides Mitford's hypothesis excludes the righteous Noah and his sons from any of the ages; as the three last refer entirely to Greece, in his opinion, which seems to be well founded.

Sir Isaac Newton's opinion, that the Golden and Silver ages, or races, relate particularly to Greece, as well as the Brazen, the Heroic, and the Iron, he justly rejects, as "wholly unwarranted."

Hesiod, under the preceding fable of the formation of the fair Pandora, who with her box of evils deceived Epimetheus, when nothing was left behind but Hope, (vers. 60—99) seems to have allegorized the history of the creation of Eve, of the fall, and of the hope of redemption through "the seed of the woman."

which was described by Herodotus, Thucydides, and Plutarch, in his life of Theseus, to have been a turbulent and insecure state of piracy, rapine, and violence of every kind. Such was the rape of Io, the daughter of Inachus, king of Argos, by some Phœnician traders, about B.C. 1745; the rape of Europa, daughter of Agenor, king of Tyre, by some Greeks, in reprisal, about B.C. 1600; which formed a precedent for the rape of Helen afterwards, by Alexander, or Paris, of Troy. Herod. Lib. I. 1.

These seem to be described by Hesiod's "Brazen race, in no respect like the Silver; robust, warlike, hardy, and rapacious; having brazen weapons, and brazen houses (probably armour) and working with brazen tools, for iron was not yet discovered. They perished by each other's hands, and went to the house of Hades, nameless, (or without renown,)"—because they wanted poets or historians, in those rude and barbarous times, to celebrate their exploits*. Vers. 144, 145.

This age ended with Deucalion's flood; for we are told by Apollodorus, and by Proclus, in their Scholia, that "Jove sent a flood to destroy the men of the Brazen Age." See Homer, Iliad. 1, 10. Didym.

This Deucalion and his flood, however, are not to be confounded with the former Deucalion, or Noah, described by Ovid, Lucian, &c. and the general deluge; though several of the circumstances of the former are injudiciously applied to the latter, by the poets and their scholiasts. Deucalion was a proper name in frequent use among the Greeks, on account of the celebrity of the first. There are four Deucalions, at least, on record: Noah, the first; the present Deucalion, king of Thessaly; Deucalion, son of Prometheus, and brother of Atlas; and Deucalion, the son of Minos, an Argonaut, and the father of

* This interpretation of αὐωνυμοί, "nameless," by which the Brazen was distinguished from the Heroic Age, is supported by Horace in the following marked references:—

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi: sed omnes illacrymabiles
Urgentur, ignotique, longâ
Nocte; carent quia vate sacro.—OD. 4, 9, 25.

Nam fuit ante Helenam mulier teterrima belli
Causa: sed ignotis perierunt mortibus illi,
Quos Vencrem incertam rapientes, more ferarum, Viribus editior cædebat, ut in grege taurus.—SAT. 1, 3, 108.

Idomeneus, who warred at Troy. Indeed, the confusion of different persons bearing the same name, is one of the most fruitful sources of error and perplexity in ancient history and chronology.

4. The Heroic Age, which succeeded, is represented by Hesiod as “A divine race, juster and better than the brazen; they were called demigods. But the two last generations thereof perished in destructive war and direful combat; namely, they who warred at Thebes about the sheep of Ædipus, [or disputed the succession to his inheritance, such as Tydeus, Capaneus, &c.] and they who invaded Troy by sea in ships, to avenge the rape of Helen, [such as their sons, Diomedes, Sthenelus, &c.] yet these were, after death, translated by Jove to the happy isles, in the deep [Atlantic] ocean. There they pass a quiet life, and the earth produces them annually a triple harvest of pleasant fruits.” Vers. 156—174.

This Heroic Age, so celebrated by the principal poets and historians of Greece,—Hesiod, Homer, Apollonius, Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, &c. Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Diodorus Siculus, &c. included six or seven generations, which Sir Isaac has so unmercifully pared away to four! For we learn from Apollodorus, in his Scholia on Homer, Iliad. xii. 117, and from Homer himself, Iliad. vi. 154—206, combined, that Deucalion, king of Thessaly, had seven descendants in one line; and from Proclus, that he had six by another, from the flood to the end of the Trojan war; namely, Hellen, Æolus, Sisyphus, Glaucus, Bellerophon, Hippolochus, and Glaucus II. in the former; and Hellen, Æolus, Critheus, Pheretes, Admetus, and Eumelus, in the latter. It began therefore, with Deucalion's flood, in the second year of his reign, B.C. 1548, according to the Parian Chronicle; and it ended B.C. 1183.

5. The Iron Age followed the destruction of Troy, in the course of which Hesiod himself lived. He abruptly introduces his account of it by an ardent wish, either “that he had died before it began, or should be born after its end;” struck with a lively sense of the daily and incessant toils and miseries of life. And he predicts, that Jove shall destroy this race likewise, when the natural and moral degeneracy of mankind shall come to the full; “when men shall grow grey-headed soon after their birth * , or the term of life shall dwindle to its shortest standard, compared with the original in the Golden Age; when human miseries, and crimes of every kind against God and man shall prevail universally: then shall white-robed Modesty and retributive Justice, forsaking the world, fly away to heaven, leaving grievous woes to mortals; and of evil there shall be no remedy*." Vers. 174—201.

* Ευτ' αν γεινομενοι πολιοκροταφοι τελεθωσιν. This expression is similar to that which Josephus puts in the mouth of Abraham, deploring the shortness of his son Isaac's

6. Hesiod no where notices expressly a sixth age to succeed the Iron, nor that it should be a state of regeneration, or revival of the Golden Age. Both these circumstances, however, are strongly implied in the wish itself:—

Μηκετ' επειτ' ωφειλον εγω πεμπτοισι μετειναι
 Ανδρασιν, αλλ' η προσθε θανειν, η επειτα γενεσθαι
 Νυν γαρ δη γενοσ εστι σιδηρεον'

"O that I had not been doomed to live among Men of the fifth race; but that I had either Died before, or were to be born after!
 For now, indeed, there is an iron race."

And this is confirmed by that profound antiquary Virgil, who, in his celebrated description of the Golden Age revived, unquestionably refers to several of the preceding passages, and furnishes an excellent supplement, as it were, to Hesiod. Eclog. 4.

Ultima Cumæi venit jam carminis ætas :
Magnus ab integro sæclorum nascitur ordo.
Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna :
Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto.

life, when going to be sacrificed: επειδη γεννηθεις αποθανοιη, "since you must die soon after your birth!" Ant. i. 13, 3. And Hesiod himself has explained it shortly after by αυφα γηρασκοντας τοκhas, men "speedily growing old after they become parents." Vers. 185. Newton has miserably misunderstood the meaning, and perverted the application of this passage; 1. by supposing that it related to the men then living in Hesiod's days; and 2. that it was applicable to the preceding ages, when the men then living in each of them should grow old also, as symptomatic of their dissolution.

* This gradual deterioration of the Iron Age is well expressed by Horace:—

Damnosa quid non imminuit dies!—
 Ætas parentum, pejor avis, tulit
 Nqs nequiores; mox daturos
 Progeniem vitiosiore.—Od. 3, 6, 45.

Alter erit tum Tiphys, et altera quæ vehat Argo
 Delectos Heroas : erunt etiam altera bella,
 Atque iterum ad Trojam magnus mittetur Achilles.—

Omnis feret omnia Tellus.—

Here “the last age,” “the renewal of a great succession of generations,” “the return of the virgin, Astræa, or Justice,” who had fled near the close of the Iron Age; “the return of Saturn’s reign,” which began with the Golden Age; “the birth of this Apollo at the end of the Iron Age, and recommencement of the Golden ;” “his living the life of the gods, and conversing with (Divis) the Demons, Demigods, and Heroes ;” and “the restoration of universal peace and plenty,” as in Saturn’s reign, &c. all convey the strongest marks of reference to Hesiod’s account of the ages.

Virgil, however, professed to record only the “Cumæan Sibyl’s prophecy ;” and Hesiod, too, might have derived his ages of the world from the same source ; for this Sibyl, or wandering prophetess, Phæbi Triviaque Sacerdos, “priestess of the Sun and Moon,” came originally, we are told, from Babylonia, and settled at Cuma, on the coast of Italy, about or after the time of the destruction of Troy, where she was supposed to have lived to the reign of Tarquin, to whom she offered for sale her prophecies, comprised in nine volumes ; of which the king at length, after she had burnt the rest, purchased three, for the same price she had demanded, at first, for the whole. But Hesiod’s father lived at Cuma, and removed from thence to Ascra, in Bœotia ; consequently, he might have been acquainted with that early tradition of six millenary ages of the world, which prevailed throughout the East, and was propagated to the West, by the Sibyls and others : which perhaps was founded on Balaam’s prophecies, foretelling the coming of CHRIST. “A star shall arise from Jacob,” &c. And it is truly remarkable, that “the Star of our salvation,” the true Apollo, or “Sun of righteousness,” “the Prince of peace,” was actually born in the course of the sixth millenary age, about A.M. 5411, or shortly before, according to our rectification ; and began that partial regeneration of the world, which the true word of prophecy tells us will be completed at his second advent in glory.

The adulation of Virgil, indeed, misapplied this Sibylline prophecy, to the infant of whom Scribonia, the wife of Augustus, was then pregnant, in the year of Pollio’s consulship, B.C. 40 ; but who, belying the poet's prediction, proved to be a daughter, according to Dio Cassius, namely, the infamous Julia, as she afterwards turned out. See Martyn's learned Notes on the fourth Eclogue of Virgil, p. 156.

The age of Hesiod, therefore, (to return to that) was not "within 30 or 35 years after the destruction of Troy," as Newton misrepresents, but rather the Parian date, B.C. 944, not less than 239 years after; nay, it was probably more than 239 years: for Thucydides declares, that "Homer was born a long time after the Trojan war;" and Homer flourished B.C. 907, according to the Parian Chronicle, only 37 years after Hesiod. And Herodotus also, born B.C. 484, represents Hesiod and Homer as living not above 400 years before his time, or about B.C. 884*, which is about 300 years lower than the established date of Troy. And this testimony of Herodotus, "the oldest historian of the Greeks now extant," which Newton himself cites, p. 160, militates most strongly against him; for B.C. 884, subtracted from his curtailed date of Troy, B.C. 904, leaves only an interval of 20 years; which is altogether absurd, as well as inconsistent with the foregoing, of 30 or 35 years.

I strongly suspect that Newton himself was aware of this absurdity and inconsistency, and to hide it, referred the time of Hesiod and Homer, by a round-about reckoning, to the remoter date of Solomon's death, instead of immediately referring it to the nearer date of Troy. "And therefore (says he) Hesiod and Homer flourished (B.C. 884.) within 110 or 120 years after the death of Solomon (B.C. 979.) and according to my reckoning, the taking of Troy was but one generation earlier," p. 160. We miss, indeed, in his Chronology, that luminous arrangement, accuracy, and precision, which mark his earlier productions in philosophy and mathematics; for $979 - 884 = 95$ years only.

I have been thus particular in noticing and correcting the leading errors and defalcations in Newton's Grecian Chronology, because it is the most ingenious, and also the most elaborate, abstruse, and difficult part of the work; and because, from the imposing authority of his great name, it is still held in estimation by some respectable historians and chronologers. For although it has been censured by many of the learned—Whiston and Bedford, in 1728, the very year of its publication; Shuck- ford, in 1730; Atwell and Robinson, in 1737; Squire, in 1741; Costard, in 1746; Musgrave, in 1772; and Freret and Larcher, in France, either in the whole, or in part; yet still we find it adopted by the learned authors of the Ancient Universal History, and preferred by others since; by the ingenious Howard, in his Thoughts on the Structure of the Globe, 1797, by the latest and best historian of Greece, *Mitford; and by a professed chronologer, Walker, so recently as 1796, who, though he censures some parts of the work, and justly rejects the supposed identity of Sesostris and Sesac, yet still adopts his subsequent dates of the Argonautic expedition, the return of the Heraclidæ, and the destruction of Troy; and even reduces the date of the last to B.C. 900, four years later than Newton. He seems to have been led into this by a fond wish to vindicate the now generally acknowledged poetic licence of Virgil, in making “Æneas coeval with Dido,” although she flourished about 300 years before him, by the most correct account: Walker’s reduced date, B.C. 900, exceeding only by 17 years, Newton’s date of the foundation of Carthage, B.C. 883. See his Analysis of Historical Time, p. 392.

Latin Chronology.

This also has suffered from Newton’s chronological pruning-knife. He has, without scruple, lopped off 126 years from the established date of the foundation of Rome, which he reduces to B.C. 627, by the following arguments drawn from the reigns of the Roman and Alban kings:—

1. “The reigns of the seven kings of Rome are reckoned at 244 years † from the building of Rome to the regifuge. But this can scarce be reconciled to the course of nature: for I do not meet with any instances in all history, since Chronology was certain, wherein seven kings, most of whom were slain, reigned 244 years in continual succession, [or, $34\frac{6}{7}$ years a piece.] The seven reigns of the kings of Rome, four or five of them being slain, and one deposed, may, at a moderate reckoning, amount to 15 or 16 years apiece, one with another. Let them be reckoned at 17 years apiece, and they will amount to 119 years, which, counted backwards from the regifuge, An. 1. Olymp.

* See Mitford’s Appendix to chap. iv. b. 1. Of the Chronology of Grecian History.

68, (or B.C. 508.] will place the building of Rome, B.C. 627." p. 37, 127.

It is indeed unquestionably true, that an average of nearly 35 years to a reign is too long, where Romulus and Tullus Hostilius, probably, and Tarquinius Priscus and Servius Tullius, certainly, were slain, and Tarquinius Superbus deposed; more especially in an elective government, where, as Plutarch observes, "not one of them left his crown to his son:" for Ancus Martius, and Tarquinius Superbus, though of royal families, were not the sons of their predecessors, and the other five were of different families, foreign as well as native.

But, on the other hand, in turbulent and elective monarchies, interregnums are longer and more frequent than in hereditary; and indeed, from the constitution of the Roman government at that time, they necessarily took place on every demise: the senate or patricians appointing an interrex, until the successor should be elected, and the election ratified by the people assembled in Comitia. Thus Livy notices one after the death of *Romulus, which lasted a year; he mentions two more after the deaths of Numa † and Tullus Hostilius ‡, but without stating their duration; and he observes, that Tarquinius Superbus expedited the election, in order to exclude the young sons of his predecessor, Ancus Martius §. We may therefore fairly infer, that there were interregnums also after the deaths of Tarquinius Priscus and Servius Tullius, though unnoticed by Livy; and that as they were both murdered, their long reigns included interregna of considerable length.

Though Livy seems undecided upon some points in the history, such as the precise year in which the battle at the lake Regillus was fought, shortly before the death of Tarquinius Superbus, and complains much of the confusion of the annals of that period, after the capture of Rome by the Gauls ||, yet he expresses no doubt of the duration of the regal dynasty for 244 years. And his detail of the reigns critically corresponds to the outline ; which is also confirmed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

The death or disappearance of Romulus (who probably was murdered, and made away with by the senators) during a thunder-storm, and a great obscuration of the day, Liv. 1, 16, seems to correspond accurately to a solar eclipse on May 26, B.C. 715 ; which therefore may tend to verify his reign of 38 years, including the interregnum, commencing B.C. 753 ; and furnishes a powerful astronomical argument against Newton's reduction. It is remarkable, that in the whole course of his Chronology, he has neglected, or designedly omitted, the infallible evidence of well-attested eclipses, because, perhaps, they would not bend to his favourite hypothesis. Such prepossession is really surprising in so great a philosopher. Indeed the Varronian era of the foundation of Rome, B.C. 753, is fully established by the combined weight of historical and astronomical evidence, as will be proved in the ensuing Chronological Apparatus.

2. Newton's next argument is drawn from his reduced date of the destruction of Troy, B.C. 904 ; from which, if counted downwards, the reigns of the 14 Alban kings, at his reduced average of 20 years apiece, amounting to 280 years, would end B.C. 624, giving the foundation of Rome three years lower than his former reduction, p. 126. But this is equally inconclusive, as will appear from the following rectification of their Chronology :—

In this list, collected from Livy, Ovid, and Dionysius Hal. the duration of the whole, 430 years, is determined from the establishment of the extreme dates; according to which, the intermediate reigns, taken from Dion. Hal. are adjusted with a slight amendment. By mistake, he split Æneas Sylvius into two separate kings, and thereby increased the list to 15. Retaining, therefore, the reign of the former, 29 years, as correct, I have substituted the 31 years of the latter, instead of the 13 assigned by him to Capetus, in which there is a deficiency of 18 years, requisite to complete the whole period of 430 years. Deducting, therefore, the ten years from the destruction of Troy, to the building of Lavinium, from which we may date the reign of Æneas, these 14 kings, in the course of 420 years, give an average of 30 years apiece. This sufficiently accords with the course of nature, in a lineal succession of kings, at that early period; especially, when in the case of Ascanius, there was a minority †, which also might have happened in others, and thereby have increased these reigns nearly to the standard of generations.

3. Newton himself assigns different amounts of the Latin and Roman kings, and of the average of their joint reigns. At first, p. 66, 67, misled by Dionysius Halicarnass. he reckons 15 Latin and 7 Roman kings, or 22 in all, and allowing them 18 years apiece, he assigns to them a period of 396 years. But afterwards, tacitly correcting the mistake, p. 126, 127, he reduces the Latin kings to 14, with Livy, and the whole to 21; and now, counting these reigns at 19 years apiece, he gets an amount of 399 years, nearly corresponding with the former. Thus does this literary Procrustes torture dates, by arbitrarily stretching or contracting them to fit the iron bedstead of his hypothesis! when he lengthens the kings, he shortens the reigns, and vice versâ.

* Inter Lavinium et Albam longam coloniam deductam, triginta ferme interfuere anni. Liv. I. 3.

His ingenious advocate, Hooke, infers from Livy, I. 40, where he speaks of the 38th year of Tarquinius Priscus, as being almost a hundred years after the reign of *Romulus, which, by the received Chronology, was 137 years, that he disregarded it. —Remarks on the History of the seven Roman Kings. But this does not follow: for the sons of Ancus, in whose mouth he puts the observation, when conspiring the death of Tarquinius Priscus, purposely abridged the time, to excite odium against the succession of Servius Tullius, his son-in-law, as if indignant, that in so short a time after the reign of a god, the Romans could be so degenerate as to submit to the government of “a slave, and the son of a slave †!” Though Livy, in his very concise summary, mentions neither the lives nor the reigns of the Alban kings, and only the reigns of the Roman, yet he evidently adopted the received chronology respecting both, and this after mature research at the most enlightened period of Roman history.

Egyptian Chronology.

It is in this branch of his work that Newton has erred most grievously. Misled and perplexed by his radical mistake of Sesostris, for Sesac, he has introduced inextricable confusion into the whole system of Egyptian Chronology, and the most extraordinary anachronisms.

1. The Shepherd Dynasty, who conquered Egypt before

* — Post centesimum fere annum, quàm Romulus Deo prognatus, Deus ipse, tenuerat regnum—id servus, servâ natus, possideat!

Abraham's days, about B.C. 2159, as will be shewn hereafter, and came originally from Arabia, according to Manetho, is lowered by Newton to the days of Joshua, above 500 years, and converted into the Canaanites, who fled from Joshua, and retired in great numbers into Egypt, and there conquered Timaus (Thamus, or Thammuz,) king of the lower Egypt, and reigned there under their kings Salatis, Bæon, Apachnas, Apophis, Janias, Assis, &c. until the days of Eli and Samuel; when, in the days of the former, they were expelled from Egypt by Misphragmuthosis, &c.; and in the days of the latter, B.C. 1100, the Philistines, strengthened by the access of the Shepherds, conquered Israel, and took the ark. P. 9, 10.

In his first ten kings Newton has strangely dislocated the order of Herodotus; in the last eleven he follows the same. To Newton's list I have assigned the dates collected from his Short Chronicle; to that of Herodotus the results of the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology.

The errors and derangements of Newton in this branch of Chronology are wild and extravagant.

1. He annihilates all Egyptian Chronology before the time of Joshua, though Sacred History testifies that it was a considerable kingdom in the days of Joseph and Jacob, and even of Abraham; and it is represented among “the first of the kingdoms,” after the Deluge, by the united voice of sacred and profane history.

2. He leaves a great chasm between the time of Joshua and the accession of Rehoboam, or from the supposed expulsion of the Shepherds to the supposed commencement of the reign of Sesostris, his Sesac.

3. Sesostris, the fourth mentioned by Herodotus, is made the founder of the Egyptian empire, at least 334 years lower than his truer time; and *Menes, the real founder, according to Herodotus, is degraded to the fourth place, and rated above 1500 years lower than his time. Nitocris also, the second noticed by Herodotus, and long before Mæris, is thrust down to the tenth place, and rated 940 years below her probable time. The reign of Cheops †, the supposed founder of the first of the great pyramids near Memphis, to whom Herodotus had expressly assigned 50 years, is reduced by Newton to a single year; and that of Cephren, the supposed builder of the second, is reduced from 56, to 16 years.

4. On the other hand, he places Sethon, priest of Vulcan, too high, by 38 years; for his reign is accurately determined from Scripture to B.C. 713; since, according to Herodotus, he reigned in the year of Sennacherib's invasion of Egypt. And in consequence of this mistake, he reckons no less than 96 years from the time of his accession to the sole reign of Psammitichus, who was one of the twelve contemporary kings, and who dethroned the rest; and has given him a reign of 38 years more. So that, deducting the true length of Sethon's reign, 40 years, Psammitichus reigned conjointly with the twelve kings, 56 years; and in all 94 years!—a period equivalent to five reigns, according to his reduced standard, $5 \times 19 = 95$ years.

Who now can read, without surprise and wonder, Newton's

* In the Short Chronicle, Menes is dated B.C. 912; and put before Proteus, B.C. 909. P. 28, 29.

final statement of the result of his discoveries in chronology. P. 8.

“ I have drawn up the following chronological table so as to make chronology suit (1.) With the course of nature [in the exact lengths of reigns and generations]; (2.) With Astronomy [in the precession of the equinoxes and achronycal risings of the stars]; (3.) With Sacred History, [in the times of the Shepherd invasion of Egypt, and of Sesostris, or Sesac]; (4.) With Herodotus, the father of History, [in the order and times of the Egyptian kings]; and (5.) With itself: without the many repu gnancies complained of by Plutarch.”

“ I do not pretend to be exact to a year: there may be errors of five or ten years, and sometimes twenty; and not much above.”
—Credat Judæus!

The rest of his chronology relates to the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, and Persians; it abounds, indeed, with considerable errors and anachronisms, but not of such magnitude or moment as these already described. I shall, therefore, wave them, for fear of protracting this review to a disproportionate length; and conclude with some conjectures on the causes which probably contributed to his deplorable failure in Chronology.

1. By a rare felicity of genius, this great man possessed, in an extraordinary degree, the art of collecting, combining, and amalgamating a great variety of unconnected, and seemingly discordant materials, drawn from widely different sources, History, Mythology, Antiquities, Etymology, and Astronomy, into one common mass of evidence. But his arguments were frequently fanciful and inconclusive, because he was more attentive to their number than to their weight; and he seemed to shut his eyes sometimes against the strongest, when they militated against a favourite hypothesis. Thus the positive and united testimony of the Parian Chronicle, Thucydides, and Herodotus, infinitely out-weighing all his counter-authorities, to determine the true time of Hesiod, were of no avail to change his pre-conceived opinion.

2. By a procedure still more unjustifiable, he did not scruple to wrest evidence, or strain a testimony to a sense foreign from its true import, in order to support his hypothesis. Thus he introduces Scripture to prove the identity of Sesostris and Sesac, from the supposed conquests of the latter: to whom, according to his interpretation, “GOD gave the kingdoms of the lands.”

2 Chron. xii. 8. pp. 69, 219. But this is a mistake: the text only signifying that to punish the Jews, for their rejection of the Theocracy, or Divine government, GOD gave them into the hand of Sesac; and put them under that severer yoke of human tyranny under which the neighbouring kingdoms or countries groaned: “that they may know [the difference between] my service, and the service of the countries around:” or, as well explained by Josephus, “that they might learn, whether it were less burthensome to serve man rather than GOD.”

He is also equally incorrect in his etymological analogy between the names Sesostris and Sesac. The true name of the Egyptian hero was Seth, Sethos, or Sethosis, which the Greeks metamorphosed, according to their fashion, into Sesostris: but, שישק, Sisak, (or שושק, Susak, as it is written, 1 Kings xiv. 25) may most easily and naturally be derived from ש, (in composition, the contraction of אשר) qui, and שקה (Sakah) bibit; it might therefore have been an appellation signifying a “tippler” or “*drunkard,” given to the Egyptian king, in derision or contempt. And nothing is recorded of him in Scripture, but his sacrilegious plunder of the temple, and of the royal treasures at Jerusalem, and return home again. How different his name and actions from the noble character and extensive conquests of the ancient Egyptian hero!

By a similar mistake, from those passages of Scripture, that “the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews: for that was an abomination to the Egyptians;” because “every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians,” Gen. xliii. 32; xlv. 34; he infers: that “the Egyptians, in the time of Joseph, were under the government of the genuine Egyptians, and not under that of the Shepherds,” p. 198. But he is mistaken in supposing that this happened before the government of the Shepherds; the text plainly proves that it was after; for why, unless from their past sufferings, ending with the expulsion of the Shepherds, about 30 years before, and which therefore were not yet forgotten, should “every shepherd be an abomination to the Egyptians?”

3. But the chief cause of his failure was suppression of evidence. Every time he transcribed the work, he shortened it, by leaving out some of the authorities and references on which he had grounded his opinion. This necessarily rendered his sixteenth and last copy the most imperfect and unsatisfactory of all; for surely in the course of 30 years he must have forgotten or mistaken several of his original documents: we have seen instances of both. Besides it savoured too much of self-sufficiency to attempt to obtrude his own opinions upon the world, without deigning to state or explain the grounds of them.

* In this sense evidently, the word ששך, “Sesach,” is applied to the last king of Babylon, as prophetic of the drunken feast, during which the city was surprised and taken by Cyrus, Jer. xxv. 26; li. 39—57. This anniversary feast was called by the Greeks, Σακεαι ἡμέραι.

Thus, in his Egyptian Chronology, the foregoing dates assigned by him, in the Short Chronicle, to the kings of Egypt, have not even the shadow of proof; not a trace of them remains in the body of the work, if ever it existed there. Several of them appear like the fictions of a disordered imagination; and his ingenious, but visionary system, upon the whole, resembles “the fantastic forms in an evening cloud: we seem to descry castles, and mountains, and gigantic appearances; but while we gaze, the forms die away, and we are soon lost in gloom and uncertainty.” Bryant.

VIII. Chronology of KENNEDY.

This is a most eccentric system, and deserves to be noticed for its singularity. It is purely astronomical; the chronology of it being subservient to the astronomy; whence he denominates the work, Physiological Chronology, as distinguished from Historical. Introduct. p. 11.

He begins à priori from the date of the Creation, which he arbitrarily assumes to have been in the year B.C. 4007, three years higher than Usher, because it possessed some remarkable astronomical characters; namely, that the autumnal equinox, when he supposes the world to have been created, began 1. at noon, 2. at the time of full moon, and 3. on the fourth day of the week: and on these data he frames his system, in a bulky quarto volume of about 750 pages.

The following is an outline of his Sacred Chronology:—

	Y.	A.M.	B.C.
The Creation	1656 ..	1 ..	4007
Deluge	222 ..	1656 ..	2351
Terah	130 ..	1878 ..	2129
Abraham	74 ..	2008 ..	1999

	Y.	A.M.	B.C.
Abraham goes to Charran	1	2082	1925
—— goes to Canaan	25	2083	1924
Isaac	60	2108	1899
Jacob (130)	129	2168	1839
—— descent to Egypt	215	2297	1710
Exode	512	2512	1495
Temple founded	395	3024	983
—— destroyed		3419	588

As he assigns no reasons, it is in vain to seek where he got his dates of the Exode, and the foundation of Solomon's Temple, which differ from all the foregoing, and even from the Hebrew text; though he is a violent stickler for its immaculate purity.

“The Jewish Hebrew Text, I will beg leave to affirm, has never been corrupted in the article of Chronology, either by Jew or Pagan, by chance or design.” P. 141.

——“It is not more certain that there are a sun and moon in the heavens, than it is, that not a single error of the press, or of a Jewish transcriber, has crept into the present copies of the Masorete Hebrew text, to give the least interruption to its chronological series of years.” P. 277.

Such extravagant and revolting assertions would better become a bigotted Jewish Rabbi, than a rational English Divine. His arbitrary postulates of the astronomical characters requisite for the commencement of the world, according to the Mosaic account, are imposed on the public with a confidence ill corresponding to their fancifulness. Ferguson, in his letter to Kennedy, calls the astronomical part of his scheme, “a train of scientific deceptions.” And Ferguson was an able practical astronomer. He allows Kennedy, however, the merit of confirming what others had suggested; namely, the coincidence of the first day of the week, under the Jewish and Christian dispensation, with the seventh of the Patriarchal. This, however, appears to be exceedingly doubtful, if not repugnant to the Mosaic account, of the revival of the Sabbath in the wilderness, after it had been lost during the Egyptian servitude.

Kennedy has brought down his chronological series from his year of the Creation, B.C. 4007, to A.D. 1761, the accession of his present Majesty, George III. in two tables: the former, a very long table of the entire series of years, in the first 69 pages of the work. To this he has accommodated, with great labour and considerable ingenuity, a large set of solar and lunar tables, beginning from his assumed era of the world, which seem to agree surprisingly in the computation of eclipses, with the results of the most skilful modern astronomers, computed from the most approved tables in present use. His method is certainly simpler and shorter, and may serve to give near conclusions, where strict accuracy is not required. There is also another abridgment of the former long table, in five pages, 145—150. And this, from A.D. 137, the end of Ptolomy's canon, is certainly useful, as exhibiting a continued and connected series of reigns, down to A.D. 1761, which is not to be found in one view elsewhere. It is given in the Elements of Technical Chronology, with some corrections.

The plan of this work might perhaps have been suggested by the system of Alphonsus, king of Castile, A.D. 1252. This scientific prince supposed that the world began with a cycle of 7000 years, comprehending the anomaly of the motion of the Apsides, and ending according to his computation, A.D. 16, which 16 years subducted from the whole period, left his epoch of the Creation, B.C. 6984. See Muller's edition of the Alphonsine Tables, and Spanheim's Chron. Sacra. P. 147.

IX. Chronology of PLAYFAIR.

Principal Playfair, of St. Andrew's, Scotland, published, in 1784, a splendid and useful folio volume, which may be considered as an improvement of Blair's Chronology. It is both technical and historical: beginning with an account of the principles of the science, and of the chief epochs, eras, and periods used in Chronology; proceeding to a short chronological history of the most remarkable kingdoms and states, ancient and modern, from the earliest times to the present; and concluding with a valuable set of chronological tables and charts, the chronology of eclipses, &c. and a copious biographical index of the most remarkable persons of every class, in all ages of the world, with concise notes of their respective characters. An improved and enlarged edition of this valuable work is preparing, we understand, for publication.

The following is a comparative outline of his system of sacred chronology, collected from his Tables, p. 310, 311, the basis of which, uninfluenced by Kennedy's infallible calculations, he places a year higher, B.C. 4008, following in general, though occasionally deviating from, the received systems, derived from the Jewish Chronology.

1. With the vulgar chronology of the Jews, Scaliger, and Petavius, he reckons 292 years from the Deluge to Abraham's birth, retaining the vulgar error that Abraham was Terah's eldest son, which was judiciously rejected by Usher, Marsham, and Kennedy.

2. With Usher and Kennedy, he allows only one year for Abraham's stay at Charran, whereas the Jews and Petavius allowed five; the correct number was 15 years.

3. He has enlarged the period from the Exode to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, to 540; but this is still too short, and consequently his chronology of this period is cramped and embarrassed, like his predecessors: the correct length was 621 years.

4. He has nearly followed in his assigned duration of the Temple, Petavius, 423 years, Usher, 424. And, consequently, his chronology of the Kings of Judah labours under the same defects as theirs: the correct length was 441 years.

X. Chronology of JACKSON.

Among the first of the modern school of Chronology who ventured to break through the shackles of the received systems founded on the shorter Hebrew computation, was the acute and learned Isaac Vossius. Rejecting the Jewish chronology altogether, of which the preceding systems were merely modifications, he at once adopted the longer Greek computation, derived from the Septuagint version. But as they erred in defect, so his erred in excess, running into the opposite extreme: for his date of the Creation, B.C. 5598, was soon found to be too high. Still, however, the system of Vossius was favourably received in England, and patronized by several learned men; Hudson, the editor of Josephus, in his notes, Whiston, Kennicott, &c. until at length the learned, ingenious, and adventurous Jackson, reduced his system to a lower standard, nearer to the truth; proposing, as a correcter date of the Creation, B.C. 5426, in his Chronological Antiquities, 3 vols. 4to. 1752.

This erudite and elaborate, but desultory work, contains a rich mass of valuable materials and original documents, collected from various quarters, and many ingenious criticisms and conjectural emendations of the received systems. And had the author been more attentive to method, and less diffusive; had he indulged less in fanciful and unfounded hypotheses, such as the second Cainan, &c. he would probably have given a more unexceptionable system, and superseded the necessity of the present attempt. That his system requires emendation also, will appear from the following comparative outline, collected from several detached periods, scattered through the first volume, pp. 36, 66, 132, 145, 189.

	Y.	A. M.	B. C.
Adam	2256	1	5426
Deluge	137	2256	3170
Second Cainan	389	2393	3033
Dispersion of Mankind	6	2782	2344
Nimrod's Reign	470	2788	2638
Terah	70	3258	2168
Abraham	75	3328	2098

Isaac	60	3428	1998
Jacob	86	3488	1938
Levi	41	3574	1852
Cohath	60	3615	1811
Anram	78	3675	1751
Moses	80	3753	1673
Exode	579	3833	1593
Temple founded	428	4412	1014
—— destroyed		4840	586

The fundamental error of this system, is the interpolation of the second Cainan, and his generation of 130 years, between those of Arphaxad and Salah, from the Septuagint version of Gen. xi. 13, where only it is to be found. This mischievous error Jackson "held fast, and would not let it go:" he clung to it with all the fondness of Newton for his favourite identity of Sesostris and Sesac; and he resisted the strongest arguments for its exclusion from the sacred text. This led him, in the construction of his system, to make the time from the Deluge to Abraham too long, and the remainder too short. To reduce the former time lower, he adopted the vulgar error that Abraham was Terah's eldest son, and he allowed no time for his sojournment at Charran. And because his errors in excess exceed those in defect, his date of the Creation is somewhat too high. Still his system is preferable to the rest: he has enlarged the period from the Exode to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, beyond any of his predecessors, to 579 years, and thereby brought it nearer to the truth; and he has critically determined his fundamental date, B.C. 586, which his predecessors placed two or three years higher.

In the foregoing review of these several systems, I have introduced, along with the years of the Vulgar Christian Era, those of the Julian Period, and of the Creation of the World, because the authors themselves make use of them. But the best and simplest is the first, which proceeds backwards and forwards from a known fixed point: the commencement of the Julian Period, being imaginary, and even so, deduced from the Christian Era; and the commencement of the Creation of the World, varying with each system. Its use, therefore, is only productive of confusion and perplexity. Much is it to be wished that Chronologers would confine themselves to the first, following the example of the English Bible, and Newton, in his Short Chronicle; or, that if they sometimes unavoidably introduce other Eras, (as those of the Olympiads, the foundation of Rome, Nabonassar, &c.) they would save their readers the trouble of reducing them to the common standard of the Christian Era. It would enable them also to reason more clearly themselves.

SECTION II.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHRONOLOGY.

ART. I. RULES OF CHRONOLOGIZING.

WHEN we survey the strange variety and discordancy of the several received systems of Chronology, scarcely two of them agreeing, even in their fundamental dates, and all differing from each other, more or less, in the principles of their construction, and in the application of those principles; sometimes adjusting sacred chronology by profane, and sometimes the reverse, without any settled rule or standard; we may naturally be led to despair of any solid or scientific improvement of the subject; especially at this advanced season, after the failure of so many of the greatest *Scholars, Historians, Mathematicians, and Astronomers; when no fresh documents can be expected; and when many valuable records, to which the earlier Chronologers had access, are now lost and swallowed up in the abyss of time. A modern Chronologer declares: "If it is easy to pull down the system of Chronologists, it is by no means so to build up in their room one that can support itself against all difficulties: I do not even believe it possible." Larcher. Herodote, Tom. I, p. 309, 1st Edit.

It is indeed "easy to pull down," as may appear from the foregoing section: but "to build up," is most difficult;—to cleanse the Augean stable of the mass of errors, accumulated in the course of ages, and still accumulating from the indolent practice of building upon decayed and rotten foundations, at present, is a task most arduous and truly Herculean. Still, however, though difficult the attempt, it is by no means "impossible," in Larcher's desponding style, provided the work be undertaken in a right way, and pursued upon a correct plan; provided certain fixed and established principles, or rules of chronologizing, be laid down and steadily adhered to; and that the original records and documents still subsisting, be more closely inspected, and more critically compared together, than has been hitherto done; and that Sacred Chronology be made

* Scaliger, speaking of the requisites for a Chronologer, says, Nemo, nisi liberalibus disciplinis, et omnigenis artibus initiatus, accedat. And perhaps the failure of so many may be ascribed to their being only partially qualified for the study: few possessing all the requisites, the invariable basis and standard of profane, by reference to which the whole of ancient Chronology must be adjusted, as by the only certain criterion. For as the venerable Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, the earliest Christian Chronologer, observed :

Ὁ παρ χρόνος καὶ τὰ ἐτὴ δεικνύται τοῖς βουλομένοις πειθεσθαι τῇ Ἀληθείᾳ.

“ The whole time [from the Creation] and the years [since] are discoverable by those who are willing to obey THE TRUTH.”

Nor is Chronology, at present, in a more wretched state than was Philosophy before the days of Newton ; during the reign of the Aristotelian, Ptolomaic, and Cartesian systems ; furnishing but too much occasion to the profane remark of the scientific Alphonsus : that if “ GOD had deigned to consult him at the Creation, he could have given HIM good advice !” Indeed, Ptolomy’s epicycles, to account for the regressions of the planets ; Descartes’s vortices, to account for their annual motions ; and the eternity of the world, according to the Peripatetic system, were revolting to reason and science, and repugnant to the laws of mechanics, and of natural history.

The same admirable methods and the same means that were so successfully employed by the illustrious Newton, in raising Experimental Philosophy from her low estate of vassalage, under fanciful and unfounded hypotheses, to her proper rank and dignity as a science, are still open in Chronology. Had he exerted the same “ patient thinking,” (to which he modestly attributed his success in Philosophy and Mathematics) the same cool and unprejudiced judgment, the same dislike to idle hypotheses—“ hypotheses non fingo”—in his chronological studies, we should not have to regret the waste of his time, and the perversion of his great talents, for the last thirty years of his life ; nor would there probably have been occasion for the present rectification of Ancient Chronology. Even before Newton, the sagacious Bacon, in his Improvements of the Sciences, skilfully pointed out the course to be pursued by the Chronologer :

“ By persevering industry, and by scrupulous attention to genealogies, monuments, inscriptions, names, titles, traditions and archives, fragments of history, and scattered passages from rare books on very different subjects, may a VENERABLE TABLET be preserved from the shipwreck of time ; a work operose and painful to the author, but extremely delightful to his readers.”

But “ persevering industry” and “ scrupulous attention” may be helped considerably by the following Canons, or Rules of Chronologizing, suggested by Newton's Rules of Philosophizing, in his Principia, lib. iii. And such indeed are still more necessary in Chronology than in Philosophy, on account of the greater obscurity of the subject, the wider range of materials to be collected and compared together, and the various and perplexing degrees of evidence, or counter-evidence, they are capable of affording in all their different bearings and aspects.

RULE I. To adhere to the Scriptural Standard.

The oldest records of time now extant are unquestionably the Mosaical. They are much earlier than the fragments of Sanchoniatho, Berosus, and Manetho, and indeed exhibit internal evidence of a purer and remoter antiquity, free from those monstrous fictions and absurdities, under which these heathen records caricature the venerable features of primæval history. The only sure and certain pole-star, to guide our wandering steps through the mazes, the deserts, and the quicksands of ancient and primæval Chronology, in which so many adventurers have been lost or swallowed up, by following the ignis fatuus of their own imaginations, or the treacherous glare of hypotheses, are the SACRED SCRIPTURES, well understood, and carefully and critically compared together; for otherwise, they also may be perverted into sources of error and confusion. "If we take THE BIBLE along with us, it is a teacher that will direct us through all the obscurity and maze of things, solve every difficulty, and lead up truth to the fountain-head." Ellis. "The purest and most fruitful source of ancient history is, doubtless, to be found in the HOLY BIBLE." Bielfield.

"The history recorded by Moses appears like a bright but remote object, seen through the glass of an excellent optician, clear, distinct, and well defined; but when we look back upon the accounts transmitted concerning the Assyrians, Egyptians, Medes, and Scythians, or those of the early ages of Italy and Greece, we find nothing but a series of incredible and inconsistent events, and groups of strange beings,

Abortive, monstrous, and unkindly mixed,
Gorgons, and Harpies, and Chimeras dire."

Such is the just and beautiful imagery of the learned and ingenious, but sometimes over-fanciful Bryant.

This was the primary canon prescribed by the earliest Christian Chronologer Theophilus, in the foregoing passage, when by "THE TRUTH" he evidently meant HOLY WRIT, as appears from the following restriction:—"We are ignorant, perhaps, of the accurate amount of all the years, because current months and days are not set down in the SACRED WRITINGS."

And to the neglect of this canon we may trace up much of that heterogeneous mixture of sacred and profane chronology, which disgraces and embarrasses the systems of Scaliger, Usher, Petavius, &c. Had these great men, for instance, attended more closely to the sacred Scriptures, they would not have adopted that gross error of the double capture of Nineveh, nor would Newton have identified Sesostris with Sesac. If, on the other hand, the present work shall be found to have improved, in any respect, upon its predecessors, the improvement may be principally ascribed to the careful study of, and rigid adherence to, THE ORIGINAL SCRIPTURES OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT.

RULE II. To begin with the Analytical Method, and end with the Synthetical.

The former part of this rule is well expressed by Dodwell: A certioribus temporibus ad incertiora progrediendum, "To proceed from the [nearer] times which are more certain, to the [remoter] which are more uncertain," or from "known to unknown dates."

The nature and application of the Analytical and Synthetical methods, is thus admirably taught by Newton, in his Optics, p. 380.

"As in Mathematics, so in Natural Philosophy, the investigation of difficult things by the method of Analysis, ought ever to precede the method of Composition [or Synthesis.]

"This Analysis consists in making experiments and observations, and in drawing general conclusions from them by Induction, and admitting of no objections against the conclusions, but such as are taken from experiments, or other certain truths: for hypotheses are not to be regarded in Experimental Philosophy. By this way of Analysis, we may proceed from compounds to ingredients, &c. and in general from effects to their causes, and from particular causes to more general ones, till the argument end in the most general. This is the method of Analysis."

And Newton himself has finely illustrated the application of these methods in his Optics and Principia, and also in his Chronology. In the last of these works, he investigated, by the Analytical method, his four cardinal epochs of Grecian Chronology, beginning with the lowest, the return of the Heraclidæ, as best known, and ending with the highest, the return of Sesostris, as least known, and connecting the intermediate epochs with each other, and with the extremes. And again, from these cardinal epochs assumed as principles, he has deduced several subordinate dates, as Deucalion's flood, the arrival of Cadmus in Greece, the flight of Danaus, &c.

“It is possible for you to learn from what time the creation of this world began, if going backwards from the present to the past, you shall endeavour to find out the first day of the creation; for by this method, you will find out from whence time acquired its first motion,” as measured by the motions of the sun and moon.

And as a key to the right understanding of the plan upon which the following work was constructed, the leading elementary date, by reference to which the whole range of sacred and profane Chronology has been adjusted, is the birth of Cyrus, B.C. 599, which led to his accession to the throne of Persia, B.C. 559; of Media, B.C. 551; and of Babylonia, B.C. 536: for, from these several dates, carefully and critically ascertained and verified, the several respective chronologies of these kingdoms branched off; and from the last especially, the destruction of Solomon's temple by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 586, its correcter date; which led to its foundation, B.C. 1027; thence to the Exode, B.C. 1648; thence to Abraham's birth, B.C. 2153; thence to the reign of Nimrod, B.C. 2554; thence to the Deluge, B.C. 3155; and thence to the Creation, B.C. 5411. And this date of the Creation is verified by the rectification of the systems of Josephus and Theophilus, as will be shewn in the sequel.

RULE III. Not to adopt any Date, that shall be repugnant to any other established Date.

This rule is essentially requisite to give uniformity and consistency to the whole system of Ancient Chronology, sacred and profane.

Thus, the generally received date of the destruction of Solomon's temple, B.C. 588, is inconsistent with the true and only date of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, B.C. 604, as established and verified by Ptolomy's scientific canon; by the application of which, the unfounded hypothesis of a double commencement of his reign, during his father's life, and after his death, is discarded.

The sagacious Jackson detected an error of two years even in Ptolomy's celebrated canon, but he omitted the necessary compensation in the reign of Cyrus, as dated from the capture of Babylon, B.C. 536. This rectification of the canon itself discovers the correct date of the expiration of the Babylonish captivity, which has been hitherto an apple of discord among the chronologers.

RULE IV. Never to frame an Hypothesis, nor to assign a conjectural Date, except in Cases of downright Necessity.

Thus, until every other resource had failed, I did not venture to assume the preaching of Jonah to the Ninerites, B.C. 800, according to Jackson's conjecture; that of the Bible Chronology, B.C. 862, being too early: nor the accession of Astyages, B.C. 601, two years before the birth of his grandson Cyrus. Petavius has an excellent remark on the subject, which cannot be too carefully attended to by Chronologers:—"As nothing is more easy, so nothing is less tolerable, than to transfer to the most ancient writers the fault of our own error and unskilfulness; on the contrary, nothing is more prudent and more desirable than to attribute very much to the authority and fidelity of the ancients; and not to recede therefrom, unless when we are admonished and convinced by the clearest and plainly necessary indications of truth." Petav. Vol. II. p. 87. Indeed, to rash conjectures, and fanciful hypotheses, may we attribute very much of the disrepute which the science of Chronology has unjustly incurred, by the treatment it has experienced even from Scaliger, Petavius, Usher, Newton, and Jackson.

RULE V. Carefully and critically to distinguish between different Persons, in different Ages and Countries, called by the same Name; and, on the other Hand, to unite or identify Persons bearing different names, in different Authors, or at different Times of their Lives.

The diversity of persons bearing the same name, and the diversity of names attributed to the same person, in sacred and profane history, form two of the most frequent and prominent causes of error and perplexity in adjusting sacred and profane Chronology. Thus Nimrod, and one of his descendants in the Assyrian empire, were both called Ninus, and the exploits of the former attributed to the latter, to the great embarrassment of the history: on the other hand Sesostris, the celebrated Egyptian conqueror of Herodotus, was called Sethosis and Osymanduas by Diodorus Siculus, and Vexoris by Justin, &c.

By the sober and skilful application of these rules, suggested experimentally, and matured gradually, in the course of these researches, both by my own mistakes, and those of my predecessors, in this most abstruse and difficult investigation; and by more careful and critical revision and comparison of all the various original documents, still extant, of ancient History, Antiquities, Etymology, Mythology, and Astronomy, connected with Chronology, I am persuaded, that the whole of Ancient Chronology, Sacred and Profane, may be reduced to one simple, uniform, and consistent system, in which all the parts shall correspond with each other, and with the whole, without “the many repugnancies most justly complained of,” in all the systems that have hitherto appeared; and the whole be brought to the highest degree of probability, bordering on moral certainty, beyond which it cannot be raised, from the imperfection of several of the leading data: for “who can count the sand of the sea, and the drops of rain, and the days of the world,” with absolute certainty, but HE that made them all—THE ANCIENT OF DAYS.

ART. II. REVISION AND COMPARISON OF THE SHORTER HEBREW, AND LONGER GREEK COMPUTATIONS, IN THE PATRIARCHAL GENEALOGIES.

The removal of error is the first step towards the discovery of truth. Let us therefore proceed to examine carefully and critically the most ancient of these venerable documents, which have survived the ravages of time, and are still extant in the records of the genealogies of the antediluvian patriarchs, Gen. v. and of the postdiluvian, Gen. xi.; for upon these, every system of Patriarchal Chronology must necessarily be built.

The first circumstance that strikes us on comparing these lists, as they are given in the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew texts, in the Greek version of the Septuagint, and in Josephus, (who was well acquainted both with the original Hebrew, and with the Greek version) is a remarkable difference in the lengths of the successive generations, amounting to 600 years in the antediluvian, and to 700 years in the postdiluvian; and which, it is evident, could not have originated from accident, but from premeditated design: for in the Hebrew, the centenary deficiencies in the lengths of the generations are added to the residues of the lives; whereas, in the Greek version, the centenary additions to the lengths of the generations are subducted from the residues of lives, so as to make the totals of lives equal, according to the following tables.

10. Abraham	292	942	1072	993
Totals	1948	2249	3334	3249

Thus, Adam's generation, or his age at the birth of Seth, is reckoned by the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew texts, 130 years; the residue of life, 800 years; and the total, 930 years; whereas, in the Septuagint and Josephus, the generation is enlarged to 230 years; the residue of life diminished to 700 years; so as to make the total 930 years the same*.

Besides this general and uniform difference of the addition or subtraction of a century, in the respective lists of generations, there are considerable variations in the four lists of the Masorete, Samaritan, Septuagint, and Josephus, some of which must be accidental, others designed.

Originally, however, there did not exist any remarkable difference between the Hebrew and Greek copies. This we learn from the important attestations of Philo and Josephus, those great antiquaries and historians.

Philo, of Alexandria, who flourished in the Apostolic age, thus speaks of the accuracy and fidelity of the Greek version, and of the high veneration in which it was held by the Jews in his time:—

* This remark is as old at least as Augustine's time, who flourished about A.D. 395.

arduous a task it was to interpret or translate the laws contained in the Divine Oracles, so as neither to add nor diminish, nor to alter any thing, but to retain their original form." And he observes, that the most learned Jews, best skilled in both languages, the Hebrew (which he calls Chaldee) and the Greek, at the time it was made, B.C. 240, styled the translators, "not interpreters merely, but prophets, who with the purest spirit had entered into the genuine sentiments of Moses." And he adds, that "an annual festival was celebrated in the isle of Pharos, where the version was made, until his time, to preserve the memory of it, and to thank God for so great a benefit." De Vita Mosis.

Josephus also, who flourished in the next generation after Philo, and published his admirable Antiquities, about A.D. 94, relates, that "at the request of Ptolomy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, a copy of the law [of Moses] was sent by the high-priest from Jerusalem to Alexandria, written in letters of gold, upon leaves of parchment wonderfully joined together. And that the version, after it was finished, was read in public, in order that every one might observe whether it was in any respect redundant or deficient; but the interpretation was adjudged by all to be so well done, that it ought to remain, as it was, without alteration." Antiq. 12, 2, 12, p. 517. Hudson's edit.

And Josephus himself, who was well skilled in both languages, professes that he translated his Antiquities from the Hebrew Scriptures into the Greek language, without adding to, or diminishing from, the original, for which he expresses the highest veneration. See his Life, §. 2; Proem. §. 2, 3; and Antiq. 10, 10, 6.

From these joint testimonies of Philo and Josephus, therefore, we may safely conclude, 1. That there was originally no difference between the Hebrew genealogies and those of the Greek version; and 2. That the computation of Josephus was conformable to both in his time; and consequently, 3. That either the Hebrew copies, or the Greek copies, both of the Septuagint and of Josephus, have been adulterated since his time.

II. That the adulteration took place in the Hebrew copies, rather than in the Greek, is most highly probable, for several reasons:

The superstitious veneration for the "Hebrew verity," as it was called, or supposed immaculate purity of the Masorete editions of the Hebrew text, which possessed some of the prinprincipal Hebraists and Divines of the last age, and precluded any enquiries or discussions of this nature, is now lowered to its proper level of rational respect. The great Usher seems to have entertained juster sentiments on the subject than most of his contemporaries, though he scrupled to innovate in Chronology, or recede much from the received systems in his time; when too many, like Kennedy, were obstinately and blindly attached to the Hebrew verity. But the inspection of various editions since, and the copious collations of the Hebrew text with a great number of MSS. collected from all parts of the world, by the laudable industry and extensive researches of Kennicott and De Rossi, and other learned men, have proved that the Sacred Classics are no more exempt from various readings than the profane. Nor indeed could it be otherwise, without a continued miracle, if we consider the vast number of transcripts that have been made by copiers, more or less skilful, and more or less careful, in all parts of the world; and surely their variations are equally the province of philological criticism, to approve some, and to reject others, according to the number and weight of the authorities for or against.

1. Hence the Hebrew copies were equally obnoxious to adulteration as the Greek.

2. But the Hebrew copies afforded greater facilities and opportunities of adulteration than the Greek: for, in the course of the Jewish war, until the final destruction of Jerusalem, and expulsion of the Jews from Judea, in the reign of Adrian, vast numbers of the Hebrew copies must have been lost or destroyed, besides those that were taken away by the conquerors among other spoils; and the few that were left were confined, in great measure, to the Jews themselves, as the Hebrew language was not in general use, like the Greek. Whereas, of the Greek copies, even if all that were possessed by the Hellenistic Jews, not only in Palestine, but throughout the world, had been destroyed, which was far from being the case, yet the copies of the Septuagint, in the possession of the Christians every where, rendered any material adulteration of the Greek text, at least in so important a case as that of the genealogies, well nigh impossible.

3. The temptation to adulteration was also greater in the Hebrew than in the Greek.

* After the first destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70, the Jews were so oppressed by their national calamities, that they could think of nothing else for some time; but about the end of the first century of the Vulgar Era, they were roused to oppose the wonderful progress of Christianity. What principally excited their rage and vexation was, that "their own scriptures" were turned into artillery against them, to prove that "JESUS was indeed the CHRIST," from the days of the Apostles. Acts xviii. 28.

In order to bring the Septuagint vulgate version, which was usually referred to by the Christians, into disrepute, they instituted a solemn fast on the 8th day of Tebeth (December), to curse the memory of its having been made. Some of the Rabbins compare it to "that unlucky day for Israel, when the golden calf was made." See Hodius de Version. Græc. p. 121. And they set up three other Greek versions in opposition thereto, framed from their curtailed Hebrew text.

The first was that of Aquila, published about A.D. 128, two years before the Seder Olam Rabba. He was originally a Pagan priest, who became a Christian, and afterwards, on his expulsion from the Church for irregular conduct, turned a renegado to Judaism, and became a pupil to that famous Rabbi Akiba, "whose name," says David Ganz, "is gone forth from one end of the world unto the other, and we have the whole oral law from his hand," p. 99: who for 40 years was president of the Sanhedrim, and had no less than 40,000 disciples, which qualified him to become one of the most subtle and formidable, as he was one of the most malignant adversaries of Christianity.

And now was written or "sealed" by Rabbi Jose, under the auspices and instigation of Akiba, the Seder Olam Rabba, or Jewish curtailed system of Chronology, A.D. 130, about five years before the total demolition of Jerusalem, and desolation of Judæa by Adrian; in the course of which war, Akiba, and the false Christ and rebel Barchocab, whom he abetted, were slain, and their adherents destroyed. See David Ganz's Chronology, entitled Zemach David, "the branch of David," translated by Vorstius, pp. 1, and 106, where this curious and valuable account of the time of the publication, and of the authors of the Seder Olam Rabba, is given.

Aquila is charged by Epiphanius with wresting Scripture, contrary to the interpretation of the Septuagint version, to a different sense, in order to invalidate the testimonies concerning CHRIST. De Mensur. et Pond. Cap. 15. And an unpublished Greek tract in the Bodleian library, inspected by Kennicott, relates, that "Aquila being filled with much rage, and imagining mischiefs in his heart, was transported by an unjust envy, and anathematizing Christianity, he became a Jew; and having assiduously learned the power of the Hebrew elements, and being superficially instructed in the Hebrew tongue, he interpreted Scripture, wishing to conceal the testimonies concerning CHRIST. Whenever, therefore, you find in the Hebrew, (for even there also he obliterated) or in the Greek, the testimonies concerning CHRIST disguised, know that it was the insidious contrivance of Aquila." See the original passage in the masterly Dissertatio generalis subjoined to the second volume of Kennicott's Hebrew Collations of the Bible, §. 69.

Justin Martyr, also, in his controversy with Trypho, the Jew, about A.D. 148, produces several instances of their altering or erasing the prophecies relative to the divinity, passion, and death of CHRIST, out of the copies of the Septuagint vulgate version used in their synagogues. "Your Rabbis, says he to Trypho, "have absolutely expunged many passages out of the Septuagint version, as I would have you to know."—"Still I will argue with you even from those received passages which ye admit, which if your Rabbis had understood, be assured they would have expunged them."

This testimony of Justin Martyr, who was himself a Samaritan, and understood the Hebrew Scriptures also, is of the greatest weight; and the following of Irenæus, who died A.D. 202, decides the point:

"If the Jews (says he) had known that we should have made use of those testimonies that are to be drawn from the Scriptures, they would never have hesitated themselves to burn their own Scriptures."

Hence we may safely conclude, that the adulteration was rather of the Hebrew genealogies than of the Greek; and that it was introduced, probably by Aquila, just before the time of the fabrication of the Seder Olam Rabba, A.D. 130, founded thereon.

Aquila published two editions of his version; about A.D. 185, a second translation was published by Theodotion, whom Jerom calls "a Jew and a blasphemer." This was principally designed to supersede the use of the vulgate version of the Septuagint among the Jews; which it soon did, as it more nearly resembled the style of that formerly venerable, but now obnoxious version, than Aquila's. Theodotion's translation of the book of Daniel was introduced into the Christian Churches also, as being deemed more accurate than the Septuagint, and thus the Septuagint version of that book was unfortunately long lost. Still, however, the rest of the version was providentially retained and preserved; for with all its numerous errors and corruptions at present, it is still one of our most useful and valuable helps to the understanding of the prophecies especially, because it was written before the birth of CHRIST, when there was no temptation to adulteration. A third translation was afterwards made by Symmachus, A.D. 200. He was a Samaritan and an Ebionite Christian, and gave a freer translation than the rest, according to Eusebius.

Although the corruption of the Hebrew genealogies began as early as Aquila's version, A.D. 128, and was sanctioned by the Seder Olam Rabba, A.D. 130, yet it does not appear to have made any considerable progress for two centuries after. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, who died A.D. 181, was the first Christian chronologer who attempted to compute the age of the world from Scripture. In his third book to Autolytus, he reckoned 2362 years from the creation to the deluge, and 1036 years from the birth of Arphaxad, two years after the deluge, to the birth of Isaac, which would give 938 years from the deluge to the birth of Abraham. These dates are incorrect: the first being too high, the last too low. But that he did not take them from the Septuagint is evident, because they both differ from it; and he expressly omits the second Cainan, found only in the Septuagint; consequently, he took them from some Hebrew copy, which followed the longer computation, and he allowed from Adam to Seth 330 years, a century more than the Septuagint.

Indeed, the shorter computation did not prevail in the Hebrew Bibles until a good while after his death; for Eusebius, who died A.D. 340, "found in the Hebrew copies which he consulted, different accounts of the times, some following the longer, others the shorter computations."

III. The motive which led the Jews to mutilate the Patriarchal genealogies, is most clearly exposed by Ephrem Syrus, who died A.D. 378.

"The Jews," says he, "have subtracted 600 years from the generations of Adam, Seth, &c. in order that their own books might not convict them concerning the coming of CHRIST: he having been predicted to appear for the deliverance of mankind after 5500 years."

2. This remarkable prediction or tradition, of the appearance of CHRIST in the course of the sixth millenary age of the world, and which was actually fulfilled, is still more fully explained by the excellent Armenian annalist Abulfaragi, p. 72.

“ It having been foretold in the Law and the Prophets concerning the MESSIAH, that he should be sent in ‘ the last times,’ and the earlier Rabbins finding no better device to reject [JESUS, as] THE CHRIST, than to alter the generations of the patriarchs, by which the age of the world might be known, they subtracted a century from Adam’s age until the birth of Seth, and added the same to his residue of life ; and this they did in the lives of the rest of Adam’s descendants, down to Abraham. By this device, their computation shewed that [JESUS] CHRIST was manifested near the middle of the fifth millenary of the age of the world, which, according to them, was to last for 7000 years ; and they said, We are still in the middle of the time, and the time appointed for the MESSIAH’S advent is not yet come.”

Here Abulfaragi reckons according to the eastern Jews, who dated the creation, B.C. 4220, consequently JESUS was born near the middle of their fifth age of the world. The western Jews, who date it B.C. 3760, following the Seder Olam Rabba nearly, depress his birth to the middle of the fourth age.

3. The origin of this notion of the six millenary ages of the world, is well explained by the learned Gregory, of Oxford.

“ In the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis, the Hebrew letter א, Aleph, which in the Jewish arithmetic stands for 1000, is six times found. From hence, the ancient Cabbalists concluded that the world would last 6000 years. Because also God was six days about the Creation, and a thousand years with him are but as one day ; (Ps. xc. 4 ; 2 Pet. iii. 8.) therefore after six days, that is, 6000 years’ duration of the world, there shall be a seventh day, or millenary sabbath of rest.”

This early tradition of the Jews was found also in the Sibyline Oracles, and in Hesiod, as we have seen ; in the writings of Darius Hystaspes, the old king of the Medes, derived probably from the Magi ; and in Hermes Trismegistus, among the Egyptians : and was adopted by the early Christian Fathers, Clemens, Timotheus, and Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, who observed, that “ upon the sixth day GOD made man, and man fell by sin ; so upon the sixth day of the Chiliad, (or sixth millenary age of the world) our Lord JESUS CHRIST came into the world, and saved man by his cross and resurrection."

"But to weaken or defend the tradition itself," says Gregory, "I have no engagement upon me. It yieldeth me this observation, that in the opinion of those who held it, our Saviour was to come in the flesh in the sixth millenary of the world."

The prevalence, therefore, of this tradition throughout the Pagan, Jewish, and Christian world, whether well founded, or otherwise, was a sufficient reason for the Jews to endeavour to invalidate it, by shortening their chronology.

IV. The defalcation of the Hebrew genealogies is also proved by the concessions of the early Jewish writers :

1. The Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, of the highest authority among the Jews, thus paraphrases Gen. iv. 25. "And Adam knew his wife when 130 years were completed after Abel was killed." And the same account is furnished by the Bere-shith Rabba, More Nevochim, Midrash Tanchuma, Solomon Jarchi, Elias, and others of their principal writers. A very ancient book called the Little Genesis, also relates that "Cain was born in the 70th year of Adam's life, and Abel in the 77th : that Cain brought his sacrifice in the 97th year of the world, and that Abel offered his in the 99th year, when he was slain by his brother." By this reckoning, Abel was slain about the beginning of the 100th year of the world, or end of the first century ; which, added to the 130 years of Adam's abstinence from his wife, gives the birth of Seth when Adam was 230 years old : exactly conformable to the Greek chronology of the Septuagint and of Josephus *.

2. The apocryphal book of Enoch, which certainly was older than the Christian era, and probably as old, if not older than the Septuagint Version, and was cited by the Apostles Jude and Peter, states that the Egregori, or "Watchers," of the line of Seth, called "Sons of God," Gen. vi. 2, came down from the high country of Eden, where they dwelt, in the days of Jared, in the 1070th year of the world, and took to them wives of the daughters of men, or family of Cain, who dwelt in the low country of Susiana. But this date corresponds to the 110th year of Jared, according to the Greek chronology : whereas it is utterly repugnant to the Hebrew ; which would bring down the defection of the Egregori, to the 14th year of Noah's age. See Syncellus Chronograph. p. 12, 16.

This same book of Enoch, as cited by Alexander Polyhistor, states that the archangel Uriel, who presided over the stars, discovered to Enoch * the nature of the month, and of the tropical year [of 365 days] in the 165th year of his age, and 1286th year of the world, which exactly accords with the Greek chronology, but differs totally from the Hebrew.

V. This defalcation is proved also by internal evidence the most undeniable.

1. In the Antediluvian genealogy, the centenary addition is still found in the sixth, eighth, and ninth generations of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech. Had these been curtailed, like the rest, their lives would have extended beyond the Deluge, contrary to Scripture: for, deducting their three centuries, the Deluge would have happened in the 1356th year of the world: consequently, had their three centuries been added to their residues of lives, like the rest, Jared would have survived the Deluge 66 years; Methuselah, 200 years; and Lamech, 95 years. Not daring, therefore, to shorten the lives of these three patriarchs, the Jews were forced to let the original amounts of their generations remain unaltered.

And that this was their motive, is demonstrated by the case of the seventh, Enoch: they, without scruple, deducted a century from his generation, and added it to his residue of life; because his life was short, and would not reach to the Deluge; so that the forgery could not be detected.

The reason also why they deducted six centuries and no more, was, that according to their reduced period of 1656 years, Methuselah died in the year of the Flood; and Lamech, five years before it. This was probably the work of Aquila at first.

The Antediluvian genealogy is still more corrupt in the Samaritan Pentateuch, both in generations and lives. At first the Samaritans did not venture to shorten the lives of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech; they only subtracted a century from Jared's generation, and added it to his residue of life, which brought his death within 134 years of the Flood. And so their copies generally stood in the time of Origen, about A.D. 230; and some, even until Jerom, about A.D. 392. But afterwards they grew less scrupulous; and in order to make the whole genealogy appear more uniform, they deducted a century from each of the remaining generations of Methuselah and Lamech. But then they were forced to shorten their lives also, to bring their deaths within the compass of the Deluge. By this management, Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech, all died exactly in their year of the Deluge, A.M. 1307: furnishing palpable evidence of the double forgery. With great reason, Kennicott conjectures, that Symmachus, himself a Samaritan, was the author of this. Disser. Gen. §. 84, 4.

* It is remarkable that Enoch's age, 365 years, gives the number of days in a year. The coincidence is curious without recurring to Rabbinical mysticism.

2. The Postdiluvian genealogy also furnishes internal evidence of its corruption.

The sums total of lives given in the Antediluvian genealogy, are omitted in the Postdiluvian. The chasm is fortunately supplied, and the genuine lengths of generations restored in the Samaritan Hebrew text, as follows:

9. And Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran :—and the days of Terah were 145 years, and Terah died in Charran.

This uniform chasm, or omission of the total lives of the first eight patriarchs, was introduced early into the Masorete Hebrew text; for it occurs also in the present copies of the Septuagint, and in all the other ancient versions; namely, the Latin Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic, Persic, and the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan. Still, however, the Septuagint furnishes evidence of the omission, by retaining the last two words, καὶ ἀπέθανε, “and he died,” throughout the whole. There cannot, therefore, remain a doubt, that the total lives were originally inserted in the ancient Jewish Hebrew copies, as well as in the Samaritan; no less than the total lives of the Antediluvian patriarchs, in both Hebrew texts, and in all the ancient versions. And the centenary addition to the generations of the first seven patriarchs after the flood, is now fully established, by the triple evidence of the Samaritan text, the Septuagint version, and Josephus.

In Nahor's generation, the addition in the Samaritan is only 50 years, and also in the Septuagint; but, according to the system of Josephus, it was 400 years. The Samaritan agrees with the Masorete, or present Hebrew text, in the generation of Terah, 70 years; but it differs in reducing the total of his life from 205 years to 145 years. But the correctness of the former number is confirmed by the Septuagint, Josephus, and all the ancient versions. Indeed the Samaritan alteration was grounded on the vulgar error that Abraham was Terah's eldest son; for 70 years, the supposed age of Terah, at his birth, added to Abraham's age of 75 years, when he left Charran after his father's death, would make the whole of Terah's life 145 years. But it was proved before (in the review of Usher's Chronology) that Abraham was most probably the youngest of the three sons, and Haran certainly the eldest.

And that the number 205 was originally in the Samaritan copies, we may collect both from Origen and Jerom: who both agree in reckoning that Abraham was 135 years old in reality, when he left Charran: but that the Scripture reckoned him only 75 years; because it was then only that he came to the knowledge of God; the preceding 60 years of his life, he having been addicted to the idolatry of the Chaldeans. Although they were wrong in the supposition that Abraham was born in the 70th year of Terah, yet it is evident that they reckoned Terah's whole age 205 years. If then the number 205 be genuine, as it unquestionably is, it demonstrates that Abraham was born when Terah was 130 years old; and of course that he was 60 years younger than Haran the eldest, born in Terah's

VI. The patriarchal generations, both before and after the deluge, according to the shorter Hebrew computation, are repugnant to the course of nature.

Arrian, the historian, justly observes :

“It is natural that they who are soonest liable to old age and death, should in proportion to the shortness of their life arrive soonest at the flower and vigour of their age.” The converse is also concisely expressed by Augustine : Tanto senior erat proportione pubertas, quando vitæ major immensitas. “The time of puberty was so much slower in proportion, when the length of life was so much greater.” And the following objection to the curtailed generations before the deluge, is strongly urged by Eusebius :

“Since according to the most ancient copy preserved among the Samaritans, and which agrees with the Septuagint version, they who lived after the flood, down to Abraham, did not beget children until after the age of 100 years, and so many more as these copies give them, what reason can be assigned, why their predecessors [before the flood], whose lives were many years longer, should begin to beget children sooner? and not rather at the ages set down in the Septuagint? On mature consideration, therefore, we must incline to the latter computation, and necessarily conclude, that the Jewish Hebrew reckoning of the times from Adam to Abraham, is wrong in all the ages [or generations] except three, Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech; and that the Samaritan computation is only wrong in the period from Adam to the flood: for in the years from the flood to Abraham, it agrees entirely with the Septuagint.”

Dividing human life into three periods, it appears from observation and experience, that the generative powers continue in full vigour during the second period. And according to this rule, Noah was near the close of his second period, when at the age of 600 years he begat Japheth, his eldest son, and two years afterwards, Shem, his second son; and probably after the same interval, at least, Ham his youngest. It was not probable, therefore, that the age of puberty among the Antediluvians, who lived to 900 years and upwards, began sooner than 160 or 170 years, corresponding to 14 or 15 years at present.

Thus, by the same rule Terah's eldest son, Haran, was born at the commencement of his second period; and Abraham, his youngest, near the close of it; bearing a remarkable analogy to Noah's case.

Among the Greeks, the celebrated legislator Solon, divides human life into ten periods, of seven years each: the third, he reckons the age of puberty, from 14 to 21; the fifth he recommends as the age of marriage, from 28 to 35.

Πεμπτη δ' ὄριον ἀνδρα μεμνημενον ἀρ' ἡγαμου εἶναι,
Καὶ παιδῶν ζῆτειν ἐξοπίσω γενεήν.

“ In the fifth, 'tis time for man to think of wedlock.
And seek to leave behind a progeny of sons *.”

And this accords with Hesiod's rule :

Μῆτε τριηκοντῶν ἐτεῶν μάλα πολλ' ἀπολείπων,
Μῆτ' ἐπιθείς μάλα πολλὰ· ἡγάμος δὲ τοι ὄριος οὗτος.

“ Marry not very much under thirty years,
Nor very much over: this is the seasonable age †.”

But this standard, founded in nature and verified by experience in all ages of the world, is violated by the shorter Hebrew computation: to suppose, for instance, that Cainan, Malaleel, Jared, Enoch, and Methuselah, begat children between 60 and 70, is to the full as preposterous as to suppose the same of children now, between five and six years. It is repugnant to the orderly course of nature; whose regular “measures” and proper “seasons,” Hesiod recommends us to “mind in all things.”

Μέτρα φυλάσσεισθαι· Καίρος δ' ἐπι πασιν ἀριστος.

VII. The shorter Hebrew computation is also absurd, or inconsistent with history, sacred and profane.

1. Eusebius well remarks: “The error of the Jewish Hebrew text is evident from this; that it makes Abraham and Noah contemporaries, which is inconsistent with all history; for, since according to the Hebrew text, there are no more than 292 years from the flood to Abraham; and since, according to the same text, Noah survived the flood 350 years; it follows that he lived to the 58th year of Abraham!

To this judicious remark we may add:

* See Solon's verses, in Philo, de Mundi opificio, p. 18. Edit. Colon. 1613.

† Hesiod. opera et dies, vers. 695.

2. Upon this supposition, Idolatry must have begun and prevailed, and the patriarchal government have been overthrown by Nimrod and the builders of Babel, during the life-time of the second founder of the human race, and his three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

3. If Shem lived until the 110th year of Isaac, and the 50th year of Jacob, why was not he included in the covenant of circumcision made with Abraham and his family? or why is he utterly unnoticed in their history?

4. How could the earth be so populous in Abraham's days, or the kingdoms of Assyria, Egypt, &c. be established so soon after the deluge? As remarked by Sir Walter Raleigh: see page 230.

To this objection, Newton replies:

“The four kings from the coasts of Shinar and Elam, who invaded and spoiled the Rephaims, and the inhabitants of the countries of Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the kingdoms of Sodom, Gomorrhah, Admah, and Zeboim, were pursued and beaten by Abraham, with an armed force of only 318 men: the whole force which Abraham and the princes with him could raise.”
Chron. p. 180.

But these 318 men were merely Abraham's own domestics; and “the princes,” nothing more than three young neighbours, who personally joined his party, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre: and he defeated the combined forces of the enemy, not by force, but by stratagem: for he pursued them in their retreat, and overtook them on the fifth night, secure and careless; and attacked them on two different sides of their camp, when they were oppressed with sleep and wine. As we learn from the joint testimony of SCRIPTURE and Josephus, Ant. 1, 10, 1. And the reflection of the Jewish historian is suitable thereto: “The event shewing, that victory does not depend upon a multitude, and a great armament; but that spirit and valour will overcome any number of adversaries in battle.”

This stratagem was not unlike that by which Gideon afterwards defeated the numerous host of the Midianites, Judg. vi. 12—22. when THE LORD fought for Israel; as he did for Abraham also.

But proceeds Newton: “And Egypt was so thinly peopled before the birth of Moses, that Pharaoh said of the Israelites, ‘Behold the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we:’ and to prevent their multiplying and growing too strong, he caused their male children to be drowned.”

This also is a misinterpretation of Scripture: the meaning is clearly explained in the sequel: “Come, let us deal wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to pass, that when there falleth out any war, they join themselves to our enemies, and fight against us, and get them up out of the land.”—Here it is evident, that Pharaoh did not then consider the Israelites as “more and mightier than the Egyptians;” but only used this precaution to prevent their future increase; and in case of a foreign war, to prevent them from making a powerful diversion, and effecting, not the conquest of Egypt, but their own escape from slavery. And Pharaoh, we find, was not afraid to pursue 600,000 of the Israelites, able to bear arms at least, if they did not carry them, with 600 chosen chariots, and we may be assured an army proportionable thereto, and probably equal at least to that of the Israelites: which gives us rather a high idea of the population of the country at that time. And we learn from Manetho, that at the time of the expulsion of the Shepherd kings, by the native Egyptian princes of upper Egypt, (which took place by the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology, about 27 years before the regency of Joseph) the Egyptian army which besieged Avaris or Pelusium, their chief retreat, consisted of 480,000 men: and the expelled Shepherds amounted to 240,000 souls.

VIII. I shall close this chain of evidence with an observation deduced from the review of the various opinions entertained of the epoch of the Creation. P. 211, &c.

The whole weight of antiquity and of the earliest Fathers of the Church, is decidedly in favour of the longer Greek computation, Origen and Jerom excepted; who reckoned it B.C. 4830, and B.C. 3981, respectively; acting under Jewish influence*;

* Jerom was reproached by Rufinus, and not without reason, for conceding too much to the Jewish notions, and to his Hebrew preceptor, Bar Anina, whom Rufinus styles Barabbas, in derision.

and whose authority is more than compensated by that of the learned chronologers, Theophilus and Eusebius; who expressly applied themselves to the study, which the others only noticed casually or incidentally. We may, therefore, without hesitation, adopt the conclusion of Eusebius.

ART. III. REJECTION OF THE SECOND CAINAN.

THE Septuagint version, however, is not to be followed implicitly: it requires correction in some parts; and principally in the case of the Second Cainan, interpolated between Arphaxad and Salah, to whom a generation of 130 years is assigned.

1. Its high antiquity indeed, previous to the Christian Era, cannot be denied: for it is taken into account by Demetrius, a heathen chronologer, who wrote in the reign of Ptolomy Philopator, about B.C. 220. He reckoned 3624 years from the Creation to the descent of Jacob's family to Egypt; but this is the exact amount of the Septuagint computation, including Cainan's generation: For from Adam to the birth of Abraham, is 3334

And Jerom himself confesses, that he gave up the important text of “THE SON [OF GOD,] Psalm ii. 12. which he had justly called a most signal prophecy concerning CHRIST; נשקן בר, “Adorate filium,” for the rendering of Aquila and Symmachus, “Adorate pure *,” not to give room to Jewish calumny and superciliousness, boasting of their superior knowledge of the Scriptures. “Ne qua nobis ab Hebræis calumnia fieret; solent enim ridere de nobis, et attollere supercilium et inflatis buccis ructare Scientiam Scripturarum.”

From the days of Ignatius indeed, who died A.D. 116, the constant objection of the Jews was, “If I find it not in the primitive Scriptures, I credit not what is said in the Gospel.”

Hence it was not uncommon for the Christian Churches to send deputies, as it were, to the Jews, praying and beseeching that “they would grant them a share of their Hebrew verity.” As the same Rufinus relates, who is surely an excellent counter-authority to Jerom.

* The Jews, instead of בר, Bar, “a Son,” read בר, Bor, “purity,” altering the vowel points.

years, to which add 75 years, his age on going to Canaan, and 215 more from thence to the descent into Egypt, and the sum is exactly 3624 years. And this is further confirmed by his reckoning 1360, (or rather 1362 years, including the two years from the flood to the birth of Arphaxad) from the flood to the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt: for if from the whole amount, from the Creation to that time, 3624 years, as stated above, we deduct 2262 years from Adam to the flood, the remainder is 1362 years.

2. And what strengthens this authority, is, that the Second Cainan is inserted in Luke's genealogy of CHRIST, iii. 36; the genuineness of which is confirmed by all the ancient versions without exception, and by all the ancient MSS. except Beza's or the Cambridge MS.

Still, however, the arguments for its exclusion seem greatly to outweigh those for its retention.

1. The Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew texts, and all the ancient Versions and Targums, without exception, omit Cainan and his generation of 130 years, in Gen. xi. 12.

2. The Septuagint version is not consistent with itself; for in the repetition of the genealogies, 1 Chron. i. 24. it omits Cainan there, following the Hebrew and all the ancient versions; Αρφαξαδ, Σαλα, Εβερ, &c. Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, &c. "The projector forgetting himself," as acutely observed by the learned John Gregory, of Oxford, in his Disproof of the Second Cainan, A.D. 1663.

3. Those great luminaries of the Jewish Church, Philo and Josephus, both rejected it; for Philo, in his allegorical way, reckoned two decads and a septenary of generations from Adam to Moses; namely, ten generations from Adam to the flood, including Noah; ten generations from the flood to *Abraham, including Shem and Abraham; and seven from Abraham to Moses, including both. But in the second decad, Cainan is

* Berosus, the Chaldean historian, about B.C. 284, indirectly noticed Abraham, though without naming him, as "living in the tenth generation after the deluge; and celebrates him for his eminent piety and skill in astronomy."

And Eupolemus, about B.C. 174, confirms the testimony of Berosus, and expressly names Abraham, as living in the tenth generation after the deluge. These two ancient heathen writers, of whom Berosus was earlier than Demetrius and the Septuagint version are powerful authorities for the rejection of Cainan; who, if inserted, would place Abraham in the eleventh generation from Shem inclusively.

evidently omitted. And Josephus omits Cainan in his list of the postdiluvian patriarchs.

4. Josephus obliquely commends Demetrius, among those other ancient chronologers, Philo Senior and Eupolemus, who “did not err much from the truth.” Contr. Apion. 1. §. 23*.

5. Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, who wrote about A.D. 168, omits Cainan in his list of postdiluvian patriarchs: and his testimony is the more valuable, because it differs from the Septuagint; and was taken, as it seems, directly from the Hebrew: Αρφαξάδ ετεκνωσε Σαλα, &c.; but in the Septuagint the verb is different, εγεννησε.

6. The very learned Origen, who reckoned the date of the Creation B.C. 4830, lower than Josephus and Theophilus, necessarily omitted his generation. According to Procopius, Origen marked him with an obelisk in his copy of the Septuagint, to mark his rejection.

7. Eusebius reckoned 942 years from the flood to Abraham, and therefore evidently omitted Cainan: and he was followed by Epiphanius and Jerom, both adopting the corrected Hexaplar copy, published by Eusebius and Pamphilus.

From this combination of counter-evidence, it appears that we are fully warranted to conclude, that “the second Cainan was not originally in the Hebrew text, and in the Septuagint version derived from it †.” And since water cannot rise to a level higher than the spring from which it issues, so neither can the authority of the New Testament for its retention, rise above that of the Old Testament, from which it is professedly copied, for its exclusion.

8. And the learned Gregory has ingeniously accounted for the original interpolation of Cainan, even so early as the time of

* This appears actually to be the case with Demetrius. His date of 3624 years from the creation to the descent of Jacob's family to Egypt, exceeds our corrected date 5411—1863 = 3548 years, only 76 years; and his date of 1360 years from the flood to the descent of Jacob's family, exceeds the corrected date 3155—1863 = 1272 years, only 88 years. And deducting these two errors in excess, of 76 and 88 years, from Cainan's generation of 130 years, which he inserted; they are changed into errors in defect, of only 54 and 42 years. Demetrius, therefore, is a valuable voucher for our system.

† It is strange how Jackson, to whose industry and extensive researches we owe most of these counter-testimonies, should be so blind to their evidence, and so obstinately attached to his hypothesis, as to conclude: “From what has been said, it appears very evident that the second Cainan was originally in the Hebrew text, and in the Septuagint version derived from it.” Vol. I. p. 79.

Demetrius, and shortly after the Septuagint version was composed.

According to the foregoing most ancient tradition of the six millenary ages of the world, they were to be equally divided in the days of Peleg, whose name signified “division;” and accordingly, the first 3000 years were supposed to end with the 130th year of Peleg’s life, or end of his generation, when he begat Reu.

The distinctest enumeration of the period is given by Theophilus, of Antioch, thus :

	Y.		Y.
Adam	330	Arphaxad	135
Seth	205	Salah	130
Enos ..	190	Eber	134
Cainan	170	Peleg	130
Malaleel	165		—
Jared	162		529
Enoch	165		2362
Methuselah	187		—
Lamech	188		2891
Noah	500
Shem	100

The amount of the whole is 2891 years, wanting 110 years to complete the 3000 years. First, therefore, the Hellenists, to make it look more unlike a cheat, cut off 20 years from Methuselah’s sum, which reduced it to 167 years, (as is still found in some copies of the Septuagint;) and consequently, the whole amount, to 2871 years current, or 2870 years complete. Then they inserted a new Cainan, assigning him 130 years; which, added to the former, precisely made up the 3000 years required.

This solution is preferable to that of Suidas, voce Φαλεκ; who reckons 2242 years from the Creation to the Deluge; and 758 years more from thence to Phaleg or Peleg, to make up the 3000 years; because Peleg’s number 758, will not agree to any system of Chronology. Whereas the other only requires the addition of another century to Adam’s generation, according to the Septuagint, to make it 330 years with Theophilus, which is not incredible.

9. Gregory also ingeniously proves, that the second Cainan was an imaginary person.

“ I find,” says he, “ in a MS. Chronicle in the Bodleian library, that after the flood, Cainan, the son of Arphaxad, wrote astronomy, having found the doctrine of the stars, written by Seth and his sons on tables of stone.” But none of all this is due to Cainan, the son of Arphaxad, but to Cainan, the son of Enos: as I shall make it appear by as sound a tradition as these, written back to Aristotle out of India by Alexander the Great.

“ When I came,” saith the king, “ into the land of Phar-saiacon, &c. the natives said unto me, Lo, here in this isle, is the sepulchre of an ancient king, whose name was Cainan, the son of Enos, who reigned over the whole world before the flood. He was a wise man, and endued with all kinds of knowledge, and had power given him against the spirits, devils, and destroying angels. This man foresaw by his wisdom, that the blessed God would bring a flood upon the earth; the prophecy whereof he wrote in tables of stone, which we have, and the writing is Hebrew,” &c.

“ This,” as Gregory quaintly observes, “ is the right owner of those parts and inventions. That other Cainan was a man of the Chiliasts’ making; one with whom things stood all otherwise than with Melchizedek.”

“ This man had neither beginning of days, nor end of life, but in the genealogies *.”

After this, not a shadow of doubt can, I think, remain of the propriety of expunging the second Cainan from the sacred text; more especially as the years attached to his generation are variously stated in different MSS. of Holmes’s Collation of the Text of the Septuagint.

ART. IV. RESTORATION OF THE CHRONOLOGY OF JOSEPHUS.

THERE is no ancient writer almost, except perhaps Herodotus, whose character has been so variously represented, as Josephus, the great Jewish Historian and Chronologer. By some he is praised for his veracity, by others censured for his fictions. Among the early Christians, his chronology was in the highest repute; and Theophilus, of Antioch, seems to have made it the basis of his own. But when the shorter Hebrew chronology gained ground, his system, founded on the longer computation, declined in estimation, and fell into disrepute. Very few of the modern Chronologers, Scaliger * excepted, do full justice to his merits: he is sometimes followed where he is wrong, and blamed where he is right. Thus Marsham hastily adopts his idle conjecture, that the Sesostris of Herodotus was the Sesac of SCRIPTURE, which afterwards ruined the chronology of Newton; while he misrepresents Josephus as confounding the ancient Arabian Shepherds, who conquered Egypt, with the enslaved Israelites, long after; than which nothing was further from his intention.—“Hinc itaque facessat illud Josephi somnium!”—“the dream” was all his own. P. 102, 103.

Much, however, of the censure that he has undeservedly incurred, is owing to the carelessness and fraud of his early editors. His dates especially, have been miserably mangled and perverted, frequently by accident and frequently by design. Thus, when the present text represents the period from the Creation to the Deluge, 2656 years, although the amount of the intervening generations, from Adam to Noah, is only 2256 years; this may be reckoned an error of inadvertence. Ant. 1, 3, 3. p. 11. Hudson's Edit. But when it is said that “Abraham was born in the 292d year after the Deluge;” this is a palpable forgery, designed to wrest Josephus into an agreement with the short Jewish computation; whereas the actual amount of the generations specified immediately after, from Abraham up to Shem, is 993 years. Ant. 1, 6, 5. p. 20.

Hence the younger Spanheim, in his Chronologia Sacra, has devoted an entire chapter to the errors, anachronisms, and inconsistencies of Josephus; most of which he acknowledges are derived “from the mistakes of transcribers, or the favourite hypotheses of interpreters;” and concludes with representing “the recovery of his genuine computation as a matter of great difficulty and hazard †.”

* “Diligentissimus και φιλαληθεστατος omnium Scriptorum Josephus.—De Josepho nos hoc audacter dicimus, non solum in rebus Judaicis, sed etiam in externis, tutius illi credi quam omnibus Græcis et Latinis.” Proleg. p. 16, 17.

† “Viderint instauratores antiquitatis temporum qui Josephi calculos suis adaptant! Unum excipi potest, corruptissimos esse Josephi codices et oppidò discrepantes, seu in periochis singulis, seu in epilogismis annorum, vitio amanuensium:—ut de germanâ Historici supputatione statuere sit res alea plena. Unde tot pugnantes conjecturæ et emendationes.” Pars II. cap. 3. p. 151—156.

Nothing, therefore, can be more discordant than the dates of the Creation, deducible from his present numbers: from one passage there results B.C. 4099, Ant. 10, 8, 5; from another, B.C. 4129; Ant. 8, 3, 1. It is reckoned, B.C. 4698, by the Universal History, pref. p. xlvi. folio; B.C. 5481, is collected from Jackson, Vol. i. p. 123; B.C. 5555, by Playfair; and the times of the history, prefixed to each of the 20 books of his Antiquities, by some early editor, amount to 5803 years, from the Creation to the 13th year of Nero, A.D. 52, when the Jewish war broke out: which deducted from the former amount, gives the date of the Creation, B.C. 5751: the extremes differing from each other no less than 1752 years. From such discordances, Ludolf calls Josephus, Antiquitatum Judaicarum Fabulator sæpius quam Historicus. Hardouin boldly pronounces, that Josephus was not the author of the works imputed to him, but some Monkish impostors of the thirteenth century; and a German critic, Emericus Bigotius, was persuaded that Josephus published two different editions of his Antiquities *.

However difficult and hazardous may be the attempt to recover the genuine chronology of Josephus, yet it should not be deemed desperate nor impracticable. Much may be done by a careful discrimination and a judicious selection of the genuine dates and numbers which still fortunately subsist in the work, though comparatively few, from the many spurious that disgrace and embarrass it. I shall therefore endeavour, by the help of some genuine dates and numbers, first to trace a correct outline of the Chronology of Josephus, and afterwards to confirm it by a detail of the particulars that fill it up, and by their conformity to the general outline.

I. The master-key to his system is found in the noble preface to his Antiquities, § 3, p. 3.

“There are ten thousand things noticed throughout the SACRED SCRIPTURES, inasmuch as they contain the history of five thousand years. Manifold, indeed, are the unexpected turns of fortune, many the issues of war, the gallant exploits of generals, and the revolutions of states. On the whole, whosoever desires to peruse it, may learn chiefly from this history, that with those who follow God's will, and dare not transgress his excellent laws, all things succeed beyond expectation, and to such is proposed the reward of happiness from God. But so far as they deviate from careful attention thereto, they fall into difficulties, which though in themselves surmountable, become insurmountable; and whatsoever they are eager to do, as good, is turned into incurable calamities."

The SACRED SCRIPTURES here meant are the canonical books of the Old Testament, as appears from another parallel passage at the end of his works, where the same number is repeated. Contr. Apion. lib. i. § 1. There he declares, that "his Antiquities, translated out of the JEWISH SACRED BOOKS into the Greek language, contained the history of five thousand years." And shortly after, § 8:—"There are not among us myriads of discordant and contradictory books, but only two and twenty books, containing the history of all time, which are justly believed divine;" namely, "five books of Moses, which contain the law, and the history of events from the creation of man till his death, during a period little short of *three thousand years; and from the death of Moses, to the reign of Artaxerxes [Longimanus] who succeeded Xerxes, king of Persia, the prophets after Moses compiled the history of their times in thirteen books; the other four contain hymns to God, and moral precepts." But $5 + 13 + 4 = 22$.

And he clearly distinguishes these canonical books from the apocryphal, written from the time of Artaxerxes to his own times, "which are not counted worthy of the like estimation as the preceding, because there was not then an exact succession of prophets."

Hence it is evident, that this period of 5000 years included the history from the Creation of man given by Moses, in the book of Genesis, to Malachi, the last of the prophets, inclusively.

The authenticity of this period of 5000 years is unquestionable from its repetition; and it has providentially escaped the depredations of his editors, because it was only mentioned thus incidentally, and not applied formally as a chronological character.

* It ought to be 4000 years: for Josephus reckoned from the Creation to the Deluge 2256 years; from thence to the birth of Abraham 993 years; and from thence to the death of Moses 545 years: the sum total of which, 3794 years, falls short by 206 years of 4000. Besides, the present reading is irreconcilable with his correct period of 5000 years.

In order to develop this period, we must first lay down certain cardinal dates, which form "the hinges," as it were, upon which the whole system of Josephus turns; and these are—

1. The birth of Abraham.
2. The foundation of Salem.
3. The foundation of Solomon's temple.

1. The date of Abraham's birth is no where explicitly stated by Josephus, but it may be collected from the following genuine periods still subsisting in his works:—

	Ant.	Y.	B.C.
Birth of Abraham	1, 7, 1. p. 21 75	.. 2153
His call to Canaan	— 2, 17, 7. p. 88 430	.. 2078
Exode of the Israelites	— 10, 8, 5. p. 449 1062	.. 1648
			<hr style="width: 20%; margin: 0 auto;"/>
Destruction of Solomon's temple			1567 586

Ascending, therefore, analytically, from the known and correct date of the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 586, we arrive at the date of Abraham's birth, B.C. 2153.

2. The foundation of Salem by Melchizedec is expressly stated to have been 2177 years before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70. Bell. Jud. 6, 10, 1. p. 1292. Therefore deducting the date of the latter, we get the date of the former, B.C. 2107, or 46 years after Abraham's birth.

From these first two dates, combined with the other known periods, from the Creation to the Deluge, and from thence to Abraham, by pursuing the former analytical process, we arrive at the date of the Creation, according to Josephus.

	Y.	B.C.
The Creation	2256 5402
The Deluge	993 3146
Birth of Abraham	46 2153
Foundation of Salem	2107 2107
<hr style="width: 20%; margin: 0 auto;"/>
5402

Hence it appears, that the whole period from the Creation to the vulgar Christian Era was 5402 years, from which subtracting the time of Malachi, or end of the Canon of the Old Testament, B.C. 423, we get the remainder 4979 years, which only falls short by 21 years of the period of 5000 years in round numbers, which Josephus stated as including the whole of sacred history.

We have assumed the time of Malachi, B.C. 423, because that was the end of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, when Nehemiah, the contemporary of Malachi, completed his reform of the Jewish polity, both in Church and State, after the return from the Babylonish Captivity. But we are warranted to assume a lower time for Malachi, from the latitude in the opinions of chronologers: Prideaux dating it, B.C. 429; Usher, B.C. 415; and Lloyd, B.C. 397. If then we choose an intermediate time, B.C. 402, and subtract it, as before, we shall get the exact number 5000 years. But the former is more conformable to the time assigned to Malachi by Josephus, and certainly he did not mean to be precise as to the very sum.

3. The date of the foundation of Solomon's temple is next to be determined.

From the Exode to this foundation two different periods are assigned, or may be collected from the present text of Josephus: first, it is expressly reckoned 592 years, Ant. 8, 3, 1. p. 341; and the same may be collected from a set of dates, Ant. 10, 8, 5. p. 449. It is therefore adopted by Spanheim and Jackson. But it is also expressly reckoned 612 years elsewhere, Ant. 20, 9, 1. p. 899, and p. 1363; and the same may be collected from another set of dates, Ant. 9, 14, 1. p. 428. And this longer period was adopted by Theophilus in his Chronology: both however are spurious.

The genuine period may be collected from the foregoing, of 1062 years from the Exode to the destruction of Solomon's temple, by the help of another genuine period of 477 years from the capture of Jebus by David, to the same term. Bell. Jud. 6, 10, p. 1292. For, from 1062 years, subduct 477, the remainder, 585 years, will give the time from the Exode to the capture of Jebus, 2 Sam. v. 6. To these 585 years add 36 more, (namely 33, for the remainder of David's reign after the capture, and the three first years of Solomon's) and the sum 621 years will give the correct period from the Exode to the foundation of the temple, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign. 1 Kings vi. 1. The number in the Hebrew text, 480 years, is also spurious, as was proved in the review of the Jewish chronology.

4. From the determination of this genuine period of 621 years, and its subtraction from the entire period of 1062 years, we get 441 years; the correct period from the foundation to the destruction of the temple, and consequently that of the reigns of the kings of Judah.

II. I shall next proceed to verify this general outline of the system of Josephus, by shewing the correspondence of the several parts thereof in detail.

The detail of the first two periods, including the generations before and after the deluge, having been given before in the general tables, it is superfluous to repeat it here.

The third period is as follows:—

	Y.	B.C.
Abraham's Birth	75	2153
——— he goes to Canaan	215	2078
Jacob's Family go to Egypt	215	1863
Exode of the Israelites	505	1648

See Ant. 2, 15, 2. p. 88. Following Demetrius, he has here made an important division of the 430 years noticed in Scripture, (Exod. xii. 41; Gal. iii. 17.) into two equal parts of 215 years each.

The fourth period (given incorrectly by Jackson, Vol. i. p. 145.) is as follows:—

	Y.	B.C.		Y.	B.C.

The only alteration here made in the present text of Josephus, is the insertion of Tola, and his administration of 23 years, respondences in the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel, 2 Kings xiv. 1, 2; and xv. 1; and is also necessary to fill up the outline of his period. It also furnishes an additional instance of his great skill in adjusting this period of his chronology; the greatest proof of which is furnished by another genuine date of 240 years, critically expressing that most perplexed and complicated period of the reigns of the kings of Israel, exclusive of two interregnums of 22 years and 10 years, amounting in the whole to 272 years current, or 271 years complete, as will be proved in the course of the ensuing rectification of Sacred Chronology. His detail of the reigns of the kings of Israel, in the present text, does not in its amount correspond with this curious and admirable date, which is found detached. Ant. 9, 14, 1.

Thus does the critical conformity of these several periods, composing his whole system, with the details of the particulars included therein, furnish demonstrative evidence, as it seems, of the accuracy of this rectification, from the agreement of the whole with the parts throughout, and evince the necessity of these few and slight emendations of his text, without altering a single date in the general outline, and only one (Solomon's spurious excrescence of 40 years) in the detail.

III. It only remains to rectify a slight error in the general outline of his system, which occurs in his second period, from the deluge to Abraham, amounting only to 993 years, which is 9 years deficient from the correcter length of it, 1002 years.

If we look back to his list of Patriarchal genealogies, we shall find that the present text of Josephus assigns 120 years to Nahor's generation; but he probably wrote 129, for 29 was the curtailed Hebrew generation, to which he rightly added a century, according to his system, where the Samaritan and Septuagint only added 50 in theirs. Since then the digit was 9, in all the rest there was a sufficient precedent for its retention by Josephus, whereas there was none for altering it into 0. Jackson also corrects it to 129. And that he originally wrote 129 is proved also from its being necessary to complete the correct period 1002, to which it appears he was no stranger, from his remarkable deviation from Scripture in the interval of 12 years, which he substitutes instead of 2 years, from the deluge to the birth of Arphaxad. For as Josephus adopted the vulgar error, that Abraham was Terah's eldest son, there was a deficiency of 60 years in Terah's generation, (which ought to have been 130 instead of 70 years;) and these 60 years, Josephus most ingeniously supplied, by adding 50 years to the correct length of Nahor's generation, 79 years, and 10 years more to the first interval of 2 years; which Jackson unskillfully supposed to be a mistake of his text, and altered to 2, and thereby made his period only 992 years. Vol. I. Table, p. 66.

This is a curious and remarkable instance, that a Chronologer may be perfectly correct in his outline, and yet incorrect in the detail, or distribution of the parts. Numerous instances might be adduced of this, drawn from the received systems of Chronology.

This rectification of the outline of Josephus raises his date of the Creation 5402 years before the Vulgar Era, to 5411.

This same rectified date, B.C. 5411, is verified also by its conformity with the rectified date furnished by Theophilus, who, according to Abulfaragi, p. 62, reckoned 5197 years from the Creation to the Era of the Seleucidæ, B.C. 312, which, added thereto, gives the date of the Creation, B.C. 5509. But this number requires a double correction: for, 1. Theophilus reckoned Adam's generation to Seth, 330 years, (p. 92) or a century too long; which being deducted, reduces it to B.C. 5409: And, 2. He omitted the two years from the deluge to the birth of Arphaxad; (p. 92,) which being added, we have the same rectified date, B.C. 5411, as before.

Thus have I endeavoured, and I trust not unsuccessfully, to vindicate the character of this illustrious Historian, profound Antiquary, and consummate Chronologer, Josephus, and to retrieve the integrity of his admirable system, by shewing its consistency throughout, both in the whole, and in the parts; thereby furnishing a solid foundation for a durable system of Ancient Chronology, sacred and profane, built upon the rectified Era of the Creation, B.C. 5411, now first deduced from the writings of two great luminaries of the Jewish and Christian Churches, JOSEPHUS and THEOPHILUS.

It is rather a curious circumstance, that by a compensation of errors, taking B.C. 5300, the mean, between the extreme opinions of Alphonsus, B.C. 6984, and Rabbi Lipman, B.C. 3616, in the first list of this Introduction, it differs not much from the corrected Era, B.C. 5411, which, though its critical accuracy, from the nature of the subject, and the omission of the odd months, weeks, and days, of the years of the generations and reigns by which it was computed (according to the remark of Theophilus) cannot be strictly demonstrated, yet that it approximates nearer to THE TRUTH than any Epoch of the Creation hitherto proposed, may be asserted with confidence.

III. ELEMENTS
OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY.

*The Earth is THE LORD's, and the fullness thereof,
The World, and they that dwell therein :
For HE hath founded it upon the seas,
And established it upon the floods.*

III. ELEMENTS

OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY.

INTRODUCTION.

IN every Historical transaction, the circumstances of Time and Place are essentially combined, and cannot be separated in fact, however distinct in theory. To determine the former, is the proper business of Chronology; to determine the latter, of Geography; and these joint handmaids to History are both indispensably requisite to its scientific study. Having, therefore, already given the Elements of Technical and Historical Chronology, I now proceed to give a sketch of the Elements of Ancient Geography, so far as connected therewith.

The necessity for this arises from the imperfection and the incorrectness of the elementary treatises in use. Of these, the best, perhaps, is Well's Historical Geography of the OLD TESTAMENT, in three volumes, octavo*. This work contains a great deal of excellent matter, well arranged, and many curious observations of modern travellers, respecting the ancient and modern state of the Holy Land, and of the other countries recorded in SCRIPTURE. But since his time, many mistakes have been corrected, and much new and important information conveyed by subsequent travellers, Bruce, Niebuhr, &c. and by later geographers, especially Major Rennel, in his valuable work on the Geography of Herodotus. Much also still remains to be gleaned from former travellers, Chardin, Sandys, Maundrel, Thevenot, Shaw, Poccoke, &c. more carefully examined; and not a little from the vast fund of miscellaneous information scattered through the Asiatic Researches, and other periodical publications, and the works of the learned in general; Bryant on the Plagues of Egypt; Bishop Clayton's Delineation of the Route of the Israelites in the Wilderness of Arabia Petraea, &c.; Mr. Howard's Thoughts on the Structure of the Earth, &c. From all which, the present Elementary Treatise has been compiled, with as much attention as possible to compression of matter and clearness of arrangement.

As Ancient Geography forms also one of the principal fastnesses of Infidelity at the present day, the objections of infidels, and the doubts of sceptics, respecting some very important points, are fully canvassed; and more philosophical, perhaps, as well as more Scriptural, solutions here proposed, of difficulties affecting the Mosaical account of the Creation, the garden of Eden, the Deluge, the varieties of Mankind, the passage of the Red Sea, the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness, the topography of Jerusalem, and its environs, &c. than have hitherto appeared.

CREATION OF THE WORLD.

Where wast thou when I laid the foundation of the earth?

Declare, if thou hast understanding.

Who laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest?

Or who stretched the line upon it?

Whereupon were its foundations fastened?

Or who laid the corner-stone thereof?

When the Morning Stars sang together,

And all the sons of God shouted for joy.—JOB.

THE Mosaical account of the Creation of the World is distinguished for its simplicity and perspicuity above all the cosmogonies of the Romans, Greeks, Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Chinese, which still, however, tend to confirm and verify it in the leading circumstances.

The venerable author relates the creation of all visible matter, and formation of “the heavens and the earth, and all the host of them,”—the earth, sun, moon, and stars,—in the order in which they were severally produced by Divine agency; but he does not attempt to inform us of the mode of operation by which the whole was accomplished. He states the simple facts, either as truths immediately revealed by God, or handed down by authentic tradition: which tradition must have been ultimately derived from Divine revelation, communicated either to our first parents, Adam and Eve, or to their pious descendants, Enoch, Noah, &c. For it is absolutely impossible, that human sagacity could have developed mysteries beyond the reach of mortal ken:

For man to tell how human life began,
Is hard, for who himself beginning knew?—Milton.

And man's utter ignorance of the original process of creation, is finely expressed in the foregoing passage of the early patriarch Job, who probably flourished in the seventh generation after the deluge, many centuries before the birth of Moses, but who speaks of the divine agency as a well-known fact, universally acknowledged at that time.

To instruct or reform mankind, when, in process of time, they had mistaken, or were prone to mistake, the creature for THE CREATOR, the venerable author, in the first instance, informs them, that "In the beginning, GOD created the heavens and the earth." Gen. i. 1.

Here, the sacred historian, in opposition to false and atheistical philosophy, teaches the true origin of things. He declares, that the world was not eternal, but had a beginning; that it was created, or its primitive elements produced, out of nothing; contrary to the maxim, ex nihilo nihil fit, which cannot controul OMNIPOTENCE, to whom the creation of passive senseless matter, and of active intelligent spirit, are both equally easy; and that it was not, as idly and absurdly asserted, made by chance, or a fortuitous concourse of atoms, or elementary pre-existent particles, but created by GOD, or THE LORD OF GODS, Gen. ii. 4; "who created all things by JESUS CHRIST," Ephes. iii. 9; "the Original WORD," or "ORACLE OF GOD," "by whom all things were made, and without whom was not any thing made that hath been." John i. 1, 2; Rev. xix. 13.

This appears to be the proper sense of creating, as distinguished from the subsequent acts of forming and making, which are also noticed, Gen. i. 7—31; ii. 3—7. They are all united in that sublime passage of Isaiah, where God, speaking of the regenerate in the latter days, “who should be called by his name,” declares, “For my glory, I have created him, I have formed him, yea, I have made him.” Isaiah xliii. 7. And we are taught, that there was no such thing as eternal and self-existent matter; for “by faith we understand, that (τους αιωνας) the worlds were framed by THE WORD OF GOD, to the end that (τα βλεπομενα) the things which are seen [or the visible creation] might not [seem] to have been (εκ φαινομενων) of apparent [materials.]” Heb. xi. 3.

“The heavens and the earth,” whose elements were then created, seem primarily to denote this globe, and its atmosphere; for the expanse, or “firmament,” is expressly called “heaven,” or rather “the heavens,” Gen. i. 8; and evidently denotes the sky. Verses 14 and 20.

“And the earth,” at its first creation, “was without form,” and waste; or, as Ovid not improperly expresses it—rudis indigestaque moles—“and darkness was upon the face of the abyss,” or *chaos, as it was called, in the Greek Cosmogonies. Gen. i. 2.

The formation of the earth is next described: “And THE SPIRIT OF GOD moved upon the face of the waters.” Verse 2.

The Spirit of God, in this place, cannot denote, with the Arabic version, “the winds of God;” or with Dr. Geddes, and others, “a mighty wind blowing upon the face of the waters;” for neither air nor wind were yet in existence. It must, therefore, denote THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The kind of motion, implied in the original, elsewhere denotes the fluttering of an eagle over its nestlings, (Deut. xxxii. 11.) or a gentle tremulous motion. Hence seems to have arisen that fiction of heathen mythology, that the world was produced from an egg by incubation. Milton has finely paraphrased the passage, taking also the descent of THE HOLY SPIRIT on Jesus at his baptism into consideration. Luke iii. 22.

* Ovid describes Chaos in the following beautiful lines:—

Me Chaos antiqui (nam res sum prisca) vocabant.

Aspice quam longi temporis acta canam.

Lucidus hic Aer, et quæ tria corpora restant,

Ignis, Aquæ, Tellus, unus acervus erant.

Quicquid ubique vides, cælum, mare, nubila, tellus,

Omnia sunt nostra clausa patentque manu.

Fast. Lib. I. Sect. 4.

————— “ THOU, from the first,
Wast present ; and with mighty wings outspread,
Dove-like sat'st brooding o'er the vast abyss,
And mad'st it pregnant.”

By his impulsive energy, various motions were now probably impressed on inert matter. 1. Motion of rotation around the earth's axis in 24 hours, at which time began the vicissitude of day and night. And perhaps, 2. Motion of revolution in its annual orbit, by a projectile force impressed. 3. The particles of matter were now probably indued with the active principles of cohesion, attraction, gravitation, and repulsion, whence arose precipitation of the denser substances towards the centre, and elevation of the rarer towards the surface of the globe, which consequently became covered with “ waters,” or a fluid mass, which the heathen cosmogonists called Μωτ, and Ιλυς, “ mud.”

From this mass, the several elements of Light, Air, Water, and Earth, were extricated in succession by the divine command, issued to THE SPIRIT OF GOD, to whom the preceding operation was ascribed ; and perhaps to the attendant angels, or “ ministering spirits,” who might also have been engaged in the process of creation ; called by Job “ the morning stars,” and “ the sons of God,” who “ sang together, and shouted for joy,” when the world was finished. Job xxxviii. 7. The former, and perhaps both, seem to be included in the plural expression afterwards, “ Let us make man in our image,” &c. Gen. i. 26. Compare Gen. iii. 22 ; xi. 7. And the joint ministry of angels is especially recorded at the visitation of Sodom, Gen. xviii. 1—22 ; xix. 1—24 ; at the delivery of the Law on Sinai, Deut. xxxiii. 2 ; and at the nativity of CHRIST, Luke ii. 13—15.

The first, Light, or elementary fire, such as is produced by electricity, and is a component principle of all bodies, was next called forth by the Divine Oracle*—“ Let there be light ;” and this concluded the work of “ the first day ;” which was equal in length to the evening and morning, or to an entire rotation of the earth in 24 hours ; for the sun had not yet appeared to discriminate them. Verses 4, 5.

* By THE WORD OF THE LORD were the heavens made ;
And all their host by the breath of his mouth.
He gathered the waters of the sea together as a heap ;
He laid up the deep in storehouses.—
He spake, and it was done ;
He commanded, and it stood fast.

Psalm xxxiii. 6—9.

The second day was employed in the production of the second element, Air, in obedience also to the divine oracle, or command. Of this was formed the atmosphere, to be a receptacle for the clouds or watery vapours, now rarified by heat, for now “a mist began to arise from the earth.” Gen. ii. 6. This atmosphere, in the original, is called “the expanse,” by the Septuagint, στρεβωμα, or “firmament,” by the Vulgate and our translation, as supporting the clouds. Thus were “the waters divided from the waters,” or the terrestrial separated from the atmospheric waters. Verses 6—8.

The third day was employed, first in the separation of the two remaining elements of Water and Earth. After the separation of the atmospheric waters, diminishing the mass of the terrestrial, the latter, which still covered the whole surface of the globe, and still “stood above the primitive mountains,” now retired beneath the surface also, into “the fountains of the great abyss,” or spacious caverns in the bowels of the earth, the divine “storehouses” prepared for their reception, until they were called forth again at the deluge. Gen. vii. 11. At length, the superficial waters subsided, or sunk to their proper level, and “the waters under the firmament,” or the superficial waters, “were gathered together into one place;” the ocean and its “seas;” “and the dry land appeared,” or the earth, its continents, and islands, emerged. Verses 9, 10.

The remainder of this day was employed in furnishing the land, now become dry, with grass, herbs, vegetables, and fruit-trees, for the use of the animal creation. Verses 11—13.

The fourth day was employed in making two great luminaries, the sun and moon, and the stars also, to “rule the day, and rule the night,” and to be for “signs and for seasons, and for days, and for years.” Vers. 14—18.

This passage strikes at the root of the earliest species of idolatry, the Zabian, or adoration of the heavenly host, into which the Assyrians, Egyptians, &c. soon fell, by shewing, that these glorious luminaries themselves were the workmanship of God, and the instruments of his providential government.

Though the sun, moon, and stars, were “made” on the fourth day, it is not said that they were then “created.” They might have been created along with the heavens and the earth in the beginning, and by similar processes in them also, made fit for their respective uses; their atmospheres becoming luminous by the separation of their elements, as that of the earth was not sufficiently depurated and transparent, until the fourth day, to receive their light, or to enable them "to give light upon the earth." Indeed, it is highly probable, that "the sun, moon, and stars," or planets and comets, which compose our immediate system, were all created and made at the same time with our "heavens and earth." This may reasonably be inferred from the admirable correspondence and symmetry of the parts with the whole, in the densities and distances of the several planets from the sun, and from each other, and in the nice adjustment of their projectile forces or velocities, and of their directions, with their perpetual attractions towards the sun and each other, in proportion to their masses, and in the inverse duplicate ratio of their distances, bending their several courses into elliptical orbits round the sun, placed in their common focus. To this we may add, the comparative smallness of the Earth, in respect of the Sun, and the superior planets, Jupiter and Saturn; whence the earth may rather be considered as an appendage to them, than they to the earth; and the sun, the common centre of attraction, the prime work of creation.

Whether "the host" of the fixed stars were all "created and made" at the same time with our system, may reasonably be doubted. For though all these had a beginning, unquestionably, it is no where explicitly stated in Scripture that they had the same beginning; and the first philosophy, in the days of Job, plainly intimates, that "the morning stars" (by a beautiful figure representing the angels of light) were prior to that creation which they celebrated with hymns of joy. Modern telescopic discoveries, as they have augmented the number of stars that are invisible to the naked eye, immensely, leading us to conclude that there are infinite numbers far beyond our ken, utterly undiscoverable; so they demonstrate the immense distances even of the largest and nearest; and lead us also to conclude, that these can be no other than suns, shining with native light, and, from analogy, attended with suitable trains of planets, furnished like ours, with inhabitants adapted to each, compared with which our whole system shrinks into insignificance. Is it then to be imagined for a moment, that the whole "spangled heavens, a shining frame," were called into existence merely "to give light upon the earth," which would be absolutely invisible from the nearest? or that the universe, which is found to be infinite or boundless, was not created until so lately as seven or eight thousand years ago?

On the contrary, the most accurate catalogues of the fixed stars, that have been made from the days of Hipparchus to Herschel, evince, that old stars frequently disappear, and new stars appear in the heavens. And if, as revelation assures us, this earth, which had a beginning, will also have an end, and as it was formerly destroyed by water, so it shall be finally consumed by fire; we may safely conclude, that the amazing process of creating and annihilating worlds has been carrying on, and will continue, through all eternity, according to the will of the SUPREME CREATOR AND GOVERNOR OF THE UNIVERSE, who “neither slumbers nor sleeps,” and whose ETERNAL SON hath declared, “My Father worketh hitherto, and I work!”

The process of inanimate creation having been completed in the first four days, and the earth fitted for the reception and nourishment of animals, the fifth day commences with the production of fishes and birds in succession, beginning with the lower classes in the scale of intelligence, and gradually rising to the highest. Vers. 20—23.

Here it is remarkable, that the term “created,” which had been discontinued from the first verse, is now resumed, and, with strict propriety, applied to the production of life, or the living principle, in animals, which is evidently distinct from, and higher than, inanimate matter, and must therefore be attached to the organized bodies of animals by the power of GOD. Hence is refuted the senseless and “crazy wisdom” of the Epicureans, and other ancient Materialists, idly supposing that animals were hatched in the slime of the earth by the heat of the sun*.

It is also remarkable, that the divine blessing was solemnly pronounced on these animal tribes, and extended, we may presume, to the higher, commanding them to “be fruitful and multiply.” Thus intimating, that the propagation of animals was not owing to any inherent principles of generation in their natures, but that “children and the fruit of the womb are a heritage and gift that cometh of THE LORD.” To impregnate

* *Cum proreperunt primis Animalia terris,

Even the Athenians boasted that they were Αυτοχθονες, “sprung from the soil itself.” the fœtus, or embryo animal, “a quickening spirit” is indispensably necessary.

The sixth day was employed in creating the various classes of land animals; cattle of the tame kinds, beasts of the wild, and all the reptile tribes that creep along the ground; and, last of all, the highest and noblest, Man. Vers. 26—30.

The creation of man is described with peculiar solemnity; 1. “He was made in the image and likeness of GOD;” invested with reason and *speech; indued with the knowledge of his CREATOR, and made an heir of immortality, not like “the beasts that perish.” 2. He was invested with dominion † over all the animal tribes, the vegetables, and the earth itself. 3. Whereas all other animals were created “after their kinds,” the sex of the human species is particularised: “Male and female

* The ancient and modern professors of Atheistical philosophy, Lucretius, Horace, Rousseau, Herder, Monboddo, &c. represent the faculty of articulate speech, or language, as the mere instinctive expression of the wants and desires of a herd of associated savages,—mutum et turpe pecus—gradually invented for mutual convenience of communication, and established by mutual consent.

Mittere, et Utilitas expressit nomina rerum.”—LUCRET. 5, 1027.

But our great Lexicographer justly remarks, that “Language must have come by INSPIRATION: a thousand, nay a million of children, could not invent a language; while the organs are pliable there is not understanding enough to form a language; and by the time that there is understanding enough, the organs are grown stiff. We know that after a certain age, we cannot learn a language.” Boswell’s Life of Johnson.

This is confirmed by experience: Alexander Selkirk, when cast away on the desert island of Juan Fernandez, almost lost the use of his native tongue, after some years residence. The young savage, called Peter, caught in the woods of Hanover, several years ago, though soon tamed, and reconciled to society, never could be taught to speak.

And lately, the young savage of Aveyron, in France, though put under the care of the celebrated Sicard, master of the deaf and dumb school, has never yet been observed to utter an articulate sound, not even to express his most urgent wants. After spending a month in the hospital of St. Afrique, he did not advance one step towards civilization, and is still as far removed from the manners and habits of social life, as when he was first discovered in the woods. Nothing can console him for the loss of his liberty, and original mode of living, and he is always anxious to run away. He was about twelve years of age when taken.

How piously and correctly has Ovid expressed the truth:—

Quod loquor et spiro, cœlumque et lumina solis, Aspicio.—Possumne ingratus et immemor esse!—
[DEUS] ipse dedit.

It is remarkable, that Adam was indued with the faculty of speech in his solitary state, and gave names to the animal tribes before the formation of Eve. Gen. ii.

created He them." And this, by a distinct formation of the woman out of the man. The separate process of both is described in the second chapter, not to interrupt the general account of the creation in the first.

The seventh day, on which God rested, or ceased from all his work, which he created and made, was blessed, as a gracious sabbath, or day of rest, repose and relaxation from labour to mankind, and the cattle employed in their service. It was also "sanctified," or consecrated, by the divine command, to the higher duties of religious worship and instruction.

PARADISE.

The situation of Paradise, "the garden" of Eden, or "delight," in which our first parents, Adam and Eve, were placed by their Creator, to keep it in order, is perhaps one of the most disputed points of Ancient Geography. It has been sought for in every quarter of the globe. Widely different indeed, are the sites assigned to it by ancient and modern Geographers: Armenia, Babylonia, Syria, Palestine, Ethiopia, Tartary, Hindustan, Ceylon, and China; originating from the conciseness of the Mosaical Account. Gen. ii. 8—15.

"And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden.—And a river issued from Eden to water the garden. And from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good: there is (bdolah) bdellium, and (Shoham) the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon; the same is it which compasseth the whole land of (Cush) Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which goeth before* (Assur) Assyria. And the fourth river is (the Phrat) Euphrates."

This account obviously intimates that the garden was watered by a river that ran into it from the adjacent country of Eden; and there probably formed a reservoir or lake: from which issued in different channels and directions, the heads, beginnings*, or sources of four rivers. Of these rivers the last is simply mentioned, the Phrat, as being the well known river Euphrates, encompassing Mesopotamia; the Hiddekel, Dig-lath, or Tigris, is ascertained by its bounding Assyria on the western side; but the two other rivers have never yet been determined, from the uncertainty of the countries, Havilah and Cush, and of the productions, Bdolah, and Shoham; which are differently interpreted according to the different countries to which they are supposed to belong: the former being variously rendered bdellium, (a bitter gum,) the carbuncle, loadstone, oleaster, crystal or pearl; the latter, the beryl, and the emerald, with perhaps as little propriety as the onyx stone, which is condemned by Bochart.

The Jewish Historian Josephus, blending oriental fables with Scripture, placed the land of Havilah in India, and Ethiopia in Africa; and thence supposed that the river Pison divided the Ganges, and the Gihon the Nile. Still admitting that the Dig-lath denoted the Tigris; and the Phorath the Euphrates. Ant. 1, 1, 3.

In order to account for the appearances of the Pison and of the Gihon, at such immense distances from their sources, some of the early Christian fathers, Theophilus of Antioch, Theodoret, Philostorgius, and Severianus, and Rabbi Moses bar Cephas, imagined that they ran in subterraneous channels; and the latter river, even under the bed of the Ocean, before their emergence, as the Ganges and the Nile! Hudson's note on Josephus, ibid.

Mr. Wilford transfers Eden and all the Rivers to India, following the tradition of the Hindus, and supposes the river Pison to be the Neilab, Sindus, or little Indus; the Gihon, the Haomund; the Hiddekel, the Bahlac, and the Perath the Cunduz. Asiat. Research. Vol. VI. But this hypothesis is utterly inconsistent with the courses of the Euphrates and Tigris, whose "heads" or sources are known to lie in Armenia. The third and prevailing hypothesis, invented by Calvin, and adopted by Morinus, Bochart, Huetius, Wells, Shuckford, &c. and also in the first edition of this work, is, that the Garden of Eden was placed upon the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris, in a common channel, two days journey above Bassorah, and extending as far as their separation again, about five leagues below it. Consequently the four rivers of Paradise described by Moses, were two, above the junction, namely the Euphrates and Tigris; and two below the separation, the Pison and Gihon. And to accommodate this hypothesis to the Mosaic account, the land of Eden is found in Thelassar, Isa. xxxvii. 12, near the Persian Gulph, and the embouchure of these rivers, corresponding to the Adin and Talatha of Ptolomy, and the ancient Geographers. Havilah compassed by the Pison, is supposed to denote the eastern part of Arabia Petræa, as contrasted with Shur, the western, at the head of the red sea, or isthmus of Suez, from 1 Sam. xv. 7; and Cush, encompassed by the Gihon, the Asiatic Ethiopia, called Susiana by the Greeks, and Chusistan, “the land of Cush,” by modern Geographers. See Wells's Sacred Geography, Vol. I. Chap. 1.

* τας αρχας, the Septuagint rendering.

But this hypothesis appears to be untenable in every point.

1. The land of Eden, whence issued the river that watered the Garden, must have been in the neighbourhood of the heads, or springs of the principal rivers, the Euphrates and Tigris, and not near their endings, at the sea. And Eden is a general term, signifying “delightful,” or “pleasant,” and was applied to other countries also; to a place in the land of Syria, Amos i. 5; to a town in Cilicia, and to a port in Arabia felix, as being situate in a delightful country, &c.

2. The two upper Rivers, the Euphrates and Tigris, cannot, with any shadow of propriety, be said to have had their “heads,” or their “beginnings,” at their junction, when they ended as distinct rivers; nor were the lower, Pison and Gihon, any other than merely the continuation of the former, after their separation.

3. The Pison was said to “encompass,” or skirt for a considerable length, the land of Havilah, and the Gihon, the land of Cush; but their course, after their separation below Bassorah, is not above eighteen leagues distant from the place where these two branches fall into the sea; according to Therivot and Texeira. Univers. Hist. Vol. I. Chap. 1. They can be said, therefore, only to wash a corner of these countries, not to encompass them.

4. The junction of the Euphrates and Tigris, above Bassorah, at present, did not take place till after the time of Alexander the Great, B.C. 330—before which the Euphrates and Tigris ran in separate channels, from their sources to the sea. This appears from the testimony of Herodotus, and the voyage of Nearchus.

See Rennel's Geography of Herodotus, p. 201. The hypothesis, therefore, built upon their ancient junction, falls to the ground.

5. The land of Havilah, watered by the Pison, could not possibly be the eastern part of Arabia, as collected from 1 Sam. xv. 7; because the Havilah where Saul smote the Amalekites unto Shur, was evidently the land of Amalek, bordering upon Judea, and also upon the western part of Arabia Petraea, near the wilderness of Sin, Exod. xvii. 8. And, consequently, about a thousand miles distant from the Euphrates, according to the judicious remark of Faber, Origin of Pagan Idolatry, I. p. 303.

6. If the confluent waters of the mighty rivers Tigris and Euphrates, ran through the middle of the Garden, according to this hypothesis, how could Adam have free access to all parts of the Garden? as plainly intimated, Gen. ii. 16. And if to avoid this objection, the garden be placed with Shuckford, on the Eastern bank, it contradicts Scripture.

Rejecting the foregoing hypothesis, it remains, therefore, that we look for the land and Garden of Eden, somewhere near the springs of the Euphrates and Tigris, and for the springs of the Pison and Gihon somewhere in their neighbourhood, with the judicious Reland, Faber, &c.

“The Armenian mountains rise very suddenly from the north, and from the elevated level, the highest of western Asia, whence the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Cyrus, spring at no great distance from the Euxine sea.”—The “Euphrates and Tigris spring from opposite sides of Mount Taurus in Armenia; the former, from its upper level, northward; the latter, from its southern declivity: and certain of the sources of the two rivers are only separated by the summits of Taurus. And yet, notwithstanding this vicinity, the sources of the Tigris, by being in a southern exposure, where the snow melts much earlier than at the back of the mountain, and in a more elevated situation, occasion the periodical swelling of this river to happen many weeks earlier than those of the Euphrates. Of the two, the Tigris seems to be the largest body of water.” Rennel, Geography of Herodotus, pp. 177, 201, 282.

This is beautifully illustrated by the son of Sirach, who seems to have been well acquainted with the situation of the four rivers of Paradise.

“God filleth all things with his wisdom, as Pison and as Tigris in the time of the new fruits. He maketh the understanding abound, like Euphrates and like Jordan in the time of harvest. He maketh the doctrine of knowledge appear as the light, and as Gihon in the time of vintage." Ecclus. xxiv. 25, 26.

The Pison has been supposed to be the Phasis, from the resemblance of the names. But the true Phasis rises in the northern range of Caucasus, between the Euxine and Caspian seas, at too great a distance from the heads of Euphrates and Tigris. For this, Faber substitutes the Absarus of Pliny, or Batoum of modern geographers, which rises in Armenia, and runs into the Euxine sea. Origin of Pagan Idolatry, I. p. 303. But its course, by his map of Eden, appears too short to encompass the whole land of Havilah, supposing, with him, Havilah to denote Colchis, which was famed, in ancient times, for the abundance and excellence of its gold; as Strabo, Appian, Eustathius, and Pliny all attest.

The Araxes seems to have a better claim, which rising in Armenia, runs by a more circuitous course into the Caspian sea, skirting the countries of Colchis and Georgia, which lie between the two seas, and might both have constituted the land of Havilah.

The Gihon has also been supposed to be the ancient Gyndes, from the resemblance of the names. This river, the modern Diala, lies eastward of the Tigris, and, according to Herodotus, rises in the mountains of Matiene, bordering on Armenia, and runs through the country of the Darneans, in its way to join the Tigris. B. I. §. 189. The country which it waters is supposed to be Chusistan, by Faber. I. p. 306. But Major Rennel suspects that the Gyndes, divided into three hundred and sixty channels by Cyrus, was rather the river Mendeli, which descends from the quarter of Mount Zagros, and passes by the country of Derne, probably the Darnea, of Herodotus. D'Anville supposes the river Dainawar to be meant, whose waters descend to Susiana. Rennel, &c. p. 202.

But notwithstanding the uncertainty attached to the rivers Pison and Gihon at present, which is not likely to be removed, the hypothesis which places the Garden of Eden near the springs of the Euphrates and Tigris, in the elevated region of Armenia, is infinitely preferable to the rest. And it is supported by the high geographical authority of our sublime and deep-learned poet, Milton, in his Paradise Lost. When Satan, escaping from Pandemonium, applied to the archangel Uriel, stationed in the sun, to inform him of the way to the newly-created Earth, and to the abode of man, Uriel shewed him the globe of the earth, and pointed to the spot where Paradise lay; in consequence of which, Satan, following the course of the ecliptic, lights on “Niphates’ snowy top,” “the Assyrian Mount.” B. III. 654—742; IV. 126. and thence, proceeds to Paradise, which is described as a hilly region,—“with cedars crowned, above all hills,” IV. 131—172; V. 260, 261; XI. 377, 378. “The Assyrian Garden,”—“wide remote from Mount Amara, in Abysinia, under the Ethiop line, by Nilus’ head; supposed by some to be true Paradise.” Milton here rejecting the hypothesis of Josephus. IV. 280—285. And he further describes the rise and course of the river which watered the Garden, issuing from the country of Eden.

“Southward, through Eden, went a river large,
Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill,
Passed underneath, ingulphed; for God had thrown
That mountain, as his garden mound, high raised
Upon the rapid current, which through veins
Of porous earth, with kindly thirst updrawn,
Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill
Watered the Garden; thence united fell
Down the steep glade, and met the nether flood,
Which from his darksome passage now appears;
And now divided into four main streams
Runs diverse, wand’ring many a famous realm
And country, whereof here needs no account.”—IV. 223—235.

And that by “the river large” he meant the Tigris, appears from the parallel passage; when he describes Satan as getting admission into the Garden, through the subterranean course, which lay remotest from the Cherubic watch at the entrance.

“———— There was a place,
Now not, (though sin, not time, first wrought the change)
Where Tigris at the foot of Paradise,
Into a gulph shot underground, till part
Rose up a fountain, by the tree of life.
In with the river sank, and with it rose
Satan, involved in rising mist; then sought
Where to lie hid:”————

IX. 69—72.

Milton has here adopted, and applied to his own purpose, with admirable learning and ingenuity, Pliny’s account of the Tigris. B. VI. 27. Pliny represents the Tigris as rising in the region of Armenia Major, from a spring in a remarkable plain, called Elongosine. It runs through the lake Arethusa, and meeting with Mount Taurus, buries itself underground, and rises again on the other side of the mountain," which Strabo mistook for its first rise. Lib. XI. p. 363.

And if we attend to the accounts of modern travellers, there is no country that more strongly resembles the terrestrial paradise than the delightful region of Armenia and Georgia. It is thus described in the memoir of a map of the countries between the Black Sea and the Caspian. P. 46.

"The whole country is so extremely beautiful, that fanciful travellers have imagined that they found here the situation of the original garden of Eden. The hills are covered with forests of oak, ash, beech, chesnuts, walnuts, and elms, encircled with vines, growing perfectly wild, but producing vast quantities of grapes. From these is annually made as much wine as is necessary for the yearly consumption; the remainder are left to rot upon the vines. Cotton grows spontaneously, as well as the finest European fruit-trees. Rice, wheat, millet, hemp, and flax, are raised on the plains, almost without culture. The valleys afford the finest pasturage in the world; the rivers are full of fish; the mountains abound in minerals: and the climate is delicious; so that Nature appears to have lavished on this favoured country, every production that can contribute to the happiness of its inhabitants."

These travellers may be deemed "fanciful," rather for not adducing arguments in support of their opinion, than for their opinion itself, as justly observed by Faber, Vol. I. p. 300.

See also Tournefort's similar description of the country of the Three Churches, at the foot of Mount Ararat, in the following article of the Residence of Noah's Family.

THE UNIVERSAL DELUGE.

When the universal degeneracy and corruption of the primitive world had come to its height, in the tenth generation from Adam, so that only "Noah walked with God, and was found perfect in his generation," God destroyed them all by the waters of a deluge, except Noah and his family, consisting of his wife, his three sons, Japhet, Shem, and Ham, with their wives, eight persons in all; who were miraculously preserved in an ark built according to the divine command and model.

1. "The wood," of which the ark was built, was called "go- phar," probably cypress; for the radical part of the Greek κυπαρισσος, namely, kupar, by an easy interchange of kindred letters, may be derived from the Hebrew.

2. The dimensions of the ark were 300 cubits in length, 50 in breadth, and 30 in height, and it consisted of three stories or floors. Reckoning the cubit at 18 inches, it will be found that it must have been of the burden of 42,413 tons. A first rate man of war is between 2200 and 2300 tons; and consequently, the ark had the capacity or stowage of 18 of such ships, the largest in present use, and might carry 20,000 men, with provisions for six months, besides the weight of 1800 cannons, and of all military stores. It was then by much the largest ship ever built. Can we doubt of its being sufficient to contain eight persons, and about 200 or 250 pair of four-footed animals? a number to which, according to Mr. Buffon, all the various distinct species may be reduced, together with all the subsistence necessary for a twelvemonth?

3. The time employed in building the ark was 120 years; as collected from Gen. vi. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 20. And when it was finished, Noah and his family, and all the animals to be preserved, assembled in pairs, male and female, by the divine command, and in the course of a week entered into the ark. And when they were all entered, "THE LORD shut him in," or effectually closed the outside of the ark*.

And now the deluge began, for "in the same day were all the fountains of the great abyss broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened." The same Almighty power which originally drew off the redundancy of the waters, which covered the earth's surface, into the atmosphere, and into the subterraneous caverns, until they subsided to their proper level, now discharged them again upon the earth, until it was entirely covered with the waters of the deluge.

The continuance of the rain was "forty days and nights," or forty entire days, until the atmosphere was drained of its waters; but the eruption of the subterraneous waters lasted for 150 days, until "the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills, that were under the whole heavens, were covered; fifteen cubits upwards [above the highest] did the waters prevail, and the mountains were covered. Gen. vii. 5—24. Words cannot more forcibly express the universality of the deluge.

From the Mosaic account it is evident, that there were high hills and mountains in existence before the deluge, otherwise they could not be covered thereby. And indeed the sources of ivers, which existed before the deluge, must have lain in such. How unscripturally, then, and how unphilosophically, do our modern geologists reason, De Luc, Wallerius, who allot not more than 50 toises, or fathoms, to the highest Antediluvian hills; or Whitehurst, who reduces them to as many feet! according to Howard, in Thoughts on the structure of the Globe, 1797, p. 529. This is a valuable work, well calculated, in general, to expose the reveries of modern Materialists on the subject, Buffon, Bailly, Hutton, &c.

De Luc, Wallerius, Whitehurst, and Howard himself, all suppose, that before the deluge, the earth's axis was perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptic, and that its present obliquity took place at the deluge, which occasioned an alteration of the earth's centre of gravity. Thoughts, &c. p. 524, 540.

But this notion is not warranted either by Scripture or Philosophy; for,

1. At the creation, the two great lights, the sun and moon, were ordained among other uses, to be for signs and for seasons, and for days and for years. Gen. i. 14. But seasons and years are produced by this obliquity, as acknowledged by these geologists themselves; and could not have existed on the former supposition; as is known to the meanest astronomer. If then seasons and years existed before the deluge, so must the obliquity. But that they did, is evident from the history. The duration of time from the creation to the deluge, is measured by the years of the generations of the patriarchs from Adam to Noah. Chap. v. The year, therefore, was an established measure of time, during that period, consisting of 360 days, or 12 months of 30 days; as appears from the rising of the waters of the deluge for 150 days, or five months, and from Noah's stay in the ark for a year and ten days, from the 17th of the second month till the 27th of the same.

And when God promised Noah, that “while the earth remained, seed-time and harvest [or Spring and Autumn] cold and heat, or Winter and Summer, and day and night, should not cease, Gen. viii. 22. plainly signifying, that the world should go on after the deluge as it had done before, and that the same vicissitude of seasons should still prevail, as of day and night; How was it possible to represent, that “ God found it necessary to forewarn Noah, that he must expect successive changes of seasons, and vicissitudes of heat and cold, such as he had never yet experienced!” Howard, p. 526.

2. The supposition of an alteration of the earth's centre of gravity, produced by the deluge, is gratuitous and unfounded. However considerable in themselves may be the subterraneous caverns that form the storehouses of the redundant waters of the globe, which principally contributed to cover the earth, and its highest mountains, yet they bear but a trifling proportion indeed to the whole mass of the earth. From calculations made at Schhallion, in North Wales, some years ago, by those eminent astronomers and mathematicians, Doctors Maskelyne, Hutton, &c. it was found, that the earth, upon an average, through its whole sphere, has twice the density of granite, or about five times that of water. Therefore it cannot be a hollow shell, as some have formerly supposed: nor can its internal parts be occupied either by central fire or water. The solid parts must greatly exceed the fluid; and the probability is, that the substances composing them grow denser, or more ponderous, the deeper they lie, or the nearer they approach to the centre. Paley's Natural Theology, p. 400.

To promote the recess of the waters, the Divine Power caused a “ wind,” to excite evaporation, and to repel the waters, in a contrary direction to that in which they rose. The direction of this wind was from the North, according to primitive tradition, preserved by Ovid:—

Nubila disjecit, nimisque Aquilone remotis,
Et cælo terras ostendit, et æthera terris.—Metam. I.

Hence we might reasonably conclude, that the main current of the waters of the deluge came from the south.

And this conclusion is strongly supported by the present appearances of the great continents of the terraqueous globe; which are such as might naturally have arisen from tremendous disruptions of “ the fountains of the great abyss,” principally in the higher southern regions; the waters issuing northwards with inconceivable fury at first, but growing less violent toward the end of their progress.

Thus, if we inspect the map of the world, the deep indentations of the southern coasts of Asia, Africa, and America, and the bold projecting capes of the peninsula of Hindustan, of Good Hope, and of Horn, with the disruptions of Ceylon, Madagascar, and of Terra del fuego, from the continents; the chaotic appearances of the ghauts of Hindustan, of the mountains of Abyssinia and Caffraria, and of those in the neighbourhood of the streights of Magellan, which are described by the most intelligent travellers; as if they had been torn up by the roots, turned topsy turvy, or piled upon each other in wild confusion; whereas the mountains of Northern Asia, Europe, and North America assume tamer aspects, and more regular forms; we have no longer room to doubt of the northerly progress of the cataracts of the deluge from high southern regions.

There are also traces of prodigious disruptions of the earth in high northern regions, as if on purpose to absorb the redundant waters from the south. In some parts, whole countries have been uplifted on one side, and half buried on the other, in vast gulphs which opened to receive them. Thus, the coasts of Norway are the most abrupt, and the highest known, on the ocean, rising from the level of the sea, to the height of from 300 to 900 toises or fathoms. From these, the general face of the country slopes till it meets the Baltic, under whose bason part of its former surface lies deep buried. In the shock of the sudden fall of such extensive tracts into the subterraneous vaults, vast fissures were opened into its uplifted parts, forming at present the most frequent, the deepest, and the narrowest creeks yet known in any part of the world. Howard, p. 540*.

* In addition to this curious remark from Howard, the annals of Norway furnish an instance of a most remarkable subsidence and absorption of ground:—

“In the night of February 5, 1703, the superb family seat of Borge, near Frederickstadt, in Norway, was suddenly immersed into a deep abyss of a hundred fathom deep, together with every thing in it; the gap being instantly filled up by a piece of water, betwixt three or four hundred ells long, and of half the breadth. The house was doubly walled, but of these walls, as well as of several high towers, not the least trace was to be seen.—With it perished fourteen souls, and two hundred head of cattle. The Lord and Lady Wærnschiold, two children, and the steward, had the good fortune providentially to save themselves. The lady, being then near her time, was attended by a midwife, who in great consternation came to tell them that the house and ground began to give way; upon which they immediately crossed the water to a seat of her lord's brother, where the lady was the very next day delivered.—King's Morsels of Criticism, Vol. III. p. 306.

And hence, perhaps, we may account for the remarkable redundancy of land towards the north, and of sea towards the south pole, from the uplifting of the land in the former case, and its subsiding in the latter.

The universality and northerly course, in general, of the deluge, appear to be fully established by well-attested accounts of the fossil remains of foreign animals and vegetables, found all over the globe, in places and at elevations where they could not have been naturally produced.

1. At Port Julian, on the eastern coast of South America, in 49 deg. south lat. Sir John Narborough, in 1670, found on the tops of the hills, and in the ground, very large oyster-shells, six or seven inches broad, and yet not one oyster was to be found in the harbour. They lay in veins in the earth, and in the firm rocks, and on the sides of the hills in the country. Voyage to the Streights of Magellan, p. 46.

2. On the Andes, near the western coast of South America, Ulloa found bivalve shells at the elevation of 13,869 English feet; and in the same rocks containing these, petrified wood, which must have been drifted thither at the same time the shells were deposited. See Ulloa's Memoires, &c. Acad. Paris, 1771, cited by the Monthly Review, May 1803, p. 73.

3. The Alps and Pyrenean mountains in Europe abound with fossil shells, at considerable elevations.

4. In the Tauric mountains of the Crimea are found petrifications of foreign shells, not to be met with in the adjacent seas. Mrs. Guthrie's Travels, cited by the Monthly Review, November, 1803, p. 230.

5. At the mountain of St. Peter's, near Maestricht, in Germany, among other fossil remains, have been found the head of a crocodile; large jaw-bones and vertebræ, a thigh bone and shoulder blade of some large species of animal; tortoise shells; fragments of branched horns resembling those of the elk; the teeth of various species of sharks, and of some unknown fishes; sea shells of various kinds; silicious wood, perforated by worms, madrepores, and fungites.

Of these shells, the Ostrea Jacobea, whose upper valves are frequently found in the environs of Maestricht, and in such beautiful preservation, now haunt the Mediterranean sea; the delicate and fragile pecten pleuronectes, of Lamark, (erroneously denominated ostrea pleuronectes by Linné) now inhabits the seas of China and Japan; and the Echinophora digitata, of Rumphius, has its abode in the Indian ocean. The greatest number of species, however, which are described and figured in St. Fond's Natural History of St. Peter's, are unknown. In fact, it rarely happens that beds of fossil shells contain many of the kind actually existing in the neighbourhood.

6. The same observations may be applied to the petrified skeletons of the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, &c. which abound in the steppes, or table lands of Tartary and Siberia. Most of the fossil crocodiles which have been discovered in the different parts of Europe, are referred by St. Fond to the Gavial, or Asiatic species. Monthly Review, September, 1803, p. 461.

7. In a gravel-pit in the parish of Newton St. Loe, three miles from Bath, in the valley adjoining the Bristol road, were found, in 1801, several fossil remains of foreign animals, now in the possession of Jacob Wilkinson, Esq. Among them is a great tusk, probably of a mammoth, which is seven feet long, and measures, at the butt, thirteen inches round; a large shoulder-blade, probably belonging to the same animal; and the petrified jaws of an alligator, in which the teeth are perfect, and locked in each other.

In a limestone quarry belonging to Thomas Leir, Esq. of Weston, near Bath, in 1807, there were found, in quarrying for stones, two peach-stones, in perfect preservation, and in their natural state, imbedded in a layer of soft blue clay, at the depth of twelve feet, under a solid mass of limestone. These peach-stones must have been deposited there before the growth of the limestone by which they were covered, and this to a considerable extent all around; many ages before the importation of peach trees into England.

8. In the year 1775, the Russian government sent a surveyor, Chvoïnoff, to explore the shores of the Icy sea, who found, near the promontory of Svatoi noss, an island about 150 versts long, and 80 broad in the widest part, which was "formed," to use his own expressions, "of the bones of that extraordinary animal the mammoth, mixed with the heads and horns of the buffalo, or something like it, and some horns of the rhinoceros."

9. Also during the expedition for exploring the north and east coasts of Russia, in 1785—1794, on the high sandy shores of the river Kovima, which runs into the Icy sea, in lat. 69 deg. 16 min. were found in great abundance the tusks of the mam- mouth. The largest of these, which Sauer, secretary to the expedition, measured, was eight feet seven inches (French) long, and at the thickest part, twenty-two inches from the root, was seventeen inches round, and weighed 115 pounds Avoirdupois. Monthly Review, May 1803, p. 7.

10. M. Pallas, who had formerly espoused the opinion of Buffon, that Siberia was once the abode of elephants, was convinced, by later observations, that such, whose remains are there found in considerable numbers, must either have fled to these high grounds to avoid an increasing deluge, or that their carcases had been wafted thither by its waters. In his observations on the formation of mountains, this author says, that the relics of those large animals, inhabitants of Hindustan, the elephant, rhinoceros, and monstrous buffaloes are to be found in great quantities near the course of rivers, and chiefly wherever there is any considerable opening in the chain of Oural mountains, which bound Siberia on the south. They are deposited at no great depth, under beds of sand or slime, accompanied with various sea-shells, bones of fish, and wood covered with ochre; an evident proof that they were transported thither by water, [and that they did not travel thither by land.] A rhinoceros, still covered with its skin entire, found in the frozen soil of the borders of the Vilouï, "is a convincing proof," says he, "that it must have been the most rapid inundation, which could have hurried this carcase to these frozen countries, before corruption had time to destroy its tenderest parts." He adds, that according to the report of hunters, "elephants, and other monstrous animals, are found yet, covered with their skins, at the foot of the mountains which occupy the space between the rivers Indighirka and Kolyma." Howard, p. 471.

11. "A complete mammoth has lately been found in a state of perfect preservation on the borders of the frozen ocean. It was discovered by Schoumakoff, a Tungoose chief, in the autumn of 1799, in the midst of a rock of ice; but it was not till the fifth year after finding it that the ice had melted sufficiently to disengage the mammoth, when it fell over on its side on a bank of sand. Schoumakoff then cut off the tusks, which he bartered for goods with a Russian merchant to the value of 50 roubles (11l. 6d.) He then left the carcase to be devoured by bears and wolves; previously to which, he had a rude drawing made of it, which represents it with pointed ears, very small eyes, horse's hoofs, and a bristly mane extending along the whole of its back."

"In 1806, Mr. Michael Adams, of Petersburgh, hearing of the circumstance, repaired to the spot, where having arrived, he found the skeleton entire, one of the fore feet excepted, though nearly stripped of its flesh. The vertebræ, from the head to the os coccygis, one of the shoulder blades, the pelvis, and the remaining three extremities, were still held firmly together by the ligature of the joints, and by strips of skin and flesh. The head was covered with a dry skin. One of the ears, well preserved, was covered with a tuft of bristles. These parts could not avoid receiving some injury during their removal to Petersburgh, a distance of 6875 miles; the eyes, however, are preserved, and the pupil of the left eye is still distinguishable. The tip of the under lip was eaten away, and the upper being destroyed, the teeth were exposed. The brain, which was still within the cranium, appeared dry. The parts least damaged were one of the fore feet, and one of the hind: these were still covered with skin, and had the sole attached to them. According to the Tungoose chief, the animal was so corpulent and well fed, that its body hung down below the knee joints. It was a male, but had neither tail nor trunk. From the structure of the os coccygis, however, Mr. Adams is persuaded that it had a short thick tail. Schoumakoff always persisted in asserting that he never saw any appearance of a proboscis; and it does not appear probable that his rude draughtsman would have omitted such a striking feature, if there had been one. The skin (three-fourths of which is in the possession of Mr. Adams) was of a deep grey colour, and covered with reddish hair, and black bristles. More than 40lbs. weight of them, that had been trodden into the ground by the bears, were collected, and many of them were two feet four inches long. The head weighs 460lbs.; the two horns, each of which is nine feet and a half long, weigh 400lbs.; and the entire animal measured ten feet and a half high, by sixteen and a half long. The tusks are curved in the direction opposite to those of the elephant, bending towards the body of the animal. Mr. Adams adds, that he found a great quantity of amber on the shores."

This curious and circumstantial account, which has all the marks of veracity, is transcribed from a foreign journal by the Christian Observer, March, 1808, p. 198.

12. In the heart of North America, also, some years ago, in a salt marsh near the river Ohio, were dug up several skeletons of animals of enormous size. One tooth, belonging to a large row, weighed upwards of eleven pounds. A thigh bone of a quadruped was found in the same place, which was more than four feet in length. Buffon, Nat. Hist. Tom. IX. These, corresponding to the preceding account, seemed to have belonged to the mammoth, of which the species probably was extinct after the deluge.

13. In the year 1783, a huge skeleton, probably of this kind, was discovered in a marl-pit, under a peat moss, surrounded by a stratum of sea-shells, and other marine productions, on the lands of Doctor Percy, Bishop of Dromore, in Ireland. The horns were seven feet and one inch long; the length of the skull one foot eleven inches; the breadth of the forehead above the eyes, eleven inches. All the bones were of a gigantic size, not in the least petrified, but as fresh as if the animal had only died a week before. Miln's Physico-Theological Lectures, p. 299.

These instances seem fully sufficient to establish the universality of the deluge, and its general progress northwards from the southern polar regions.

At what season of the year the deluge began, has been much disputed, whether in Spring, or in Autumn. The same arguments adduced in the Chronological Apparatus, to prove that the world was created in Spring, concur to intimate, that the "second month," when the deluge began, was reckoned by the sacred year, which began about the vernal equinox. And in addition to them, the history of the deluge itself seems to furnish internal evidence in favour of this opinion: for near the end of his confinement, the dove, sent forth by Noah out of the ark, brought him back, in her mouth, "an olive-leaf plucked off;" (we may presume, with the ancient versions) from a green branch, which could only correspond to the season of Spring. And a great naturalist, Woodward, declares: "Among all the remains of the antediluvian world, I have found such a uniformity, and general consent, that I was able to discover what time of the year it was that the deluge began. The whole tenor of these bodies, thus preserved, clearly pointing forth the month of May. Nor have I ever met with so much as one single plant, or body, among all those vast multitudes which I have carefully viewed, that is peculiar to any other season of the year, or any thing that falls out earlier or later; or any of them short, or further advanced in growth, seed, or the like, than they now usually are in that month." Miln. p. 321. These arguments seem to be decisive.

By a special providence, the ark, upborne by the flood, which continued to encrease for 150 days, then rested upon the neighbouring "mountains of Ararat." And immediately the waters began to abate from thenceforward, till the surface of the earth was dry, and fit for the residence of Noah's family. The ark probably was flat-bottomed, that it might the more easily take the ground; and if, when loaded with all its freight, it sunk to half its depth, 15 cubits, it would just touch the summit of Ararat, at the same elevation of water above it, which is remarkably recorded in Scripture to be the height to which it rose above the highest hills, "fifteen cubits" for the highest, "and upwards" for the lower.

Thus, under the guidance and protection of the Almighty, the ark was no longer tost to and fro by every wind, and buffeted by the most tremendous and frightful billows that ever raged, but rested on the ground steady and immoveable for the remainder of the deluge, and for ever after.

The fall of the deluge was more gradual than its rise. Though the waters sunk below the level of the high table land of Armenia, in the course of seven months and ten days more that Noah remained in the ark, yet it was probably a length of time before the waters all retired again into "the fountains of the great abyss," their former reservoirs, so as to leave the continents dry, as at the creation, the weight of the incumbent waters lessening as they sunk.

Thus did GOD, who "founded the world upon the seas," at the creation, "establish it upon the floods," at the deluge.

ARARAT, IN ARMENIA.

The determination of the site of this famous mountain is of considerable importance in Sacred Geography. The prevailing tradition in the east is, that it lies in the greater Armenia, near the borders of the ancient Media, from which it is separated by the rapid river Araxes, winding round its base on the north and east, until it falls into the Caspian sea.

Mount Ararat, according to Major Rennel's excellent map of the ancient Persian empire, Geography of Herodotus, p. 229, lies in 39° 30' north lat. and 44° 30' east long. nearly in the middle of the vast ridge of Taurus, that "stony girdle encompassing the earth," as aptly described by the Arabian geographers, which runs eastwards from Cilicia through the whole extent of Asia, for Ararat lies nearly midway between the southern extremities of the Euxine and Caspian seas.

This relative position is confirmed by SCRIPTURE. The prophet Jeremiah (li. 27.) represents as contiguous to each other, "the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz." But Ararat is rendered Armenia by the Syriac and Vulgate versions of Gen. viii. 4. and by the Septuagint, Arabic versions, and Chaldee paraphrase of Isaiah xxxvii. 38. followed in the latter passage by our English Bible. Minni denotes the lesser Armenia westwards of the former; and Ashkenaz, the ancient Phrygia, thence called Ascania, bordering on the Black sea; which was afterwards metamorphosed by the Greeks into Αἴθριος, "the inhospitable sea," and by a more flattering appellation again into Ευξείνιος, "hospitable;" whence the present Euxine, according to Bochart's ingenious conjecture, Vol. I. p. 173, 174.

This great mountain, called by the Armenians, at present, Macis, or "the Mother of the World*," and by the Turks, Agri-dah, or "the Great Mountain," is counted the highest in all Armenia, and probably in the world, if we consider its central position nearly between the great oceans, the Atlantic and Eastern, in the midst of the united continents of Europe and Asia. Herodotus reckoned the northern branch of "Caucasus," running between the Euxine and Caspian seas, "the greatest and highest of all mountains." B. i. § 203. But Ararat probably is higher; for whereas the snow remains on the other mountains of Armenia, which furnish the springs of the Euphrates, Araxes, and Tigris, but ten months of the year; on this, or rather the highest of its two tops, the western, the snow is permanent, and the summit covered with eternal snows, continually increasing from the time of the deluge; as we learn from Tournefort's entertaining and instructive Voyage to the Levant, Vol. III. p. 104, 195.

And, indeed, its greater elevation is confirmed by Scripture: for from the day when the waters began to decrease, as soon as the ark grounded on the summit, “on the seventeenth day of the seventh month,” until “the tops of the neighbouring mountains were seen on the first day of the tenth month,” was an interval of 73 days, or ten weeks and three days; consequently, its superiority of elevation must have been considerable, to require so long a time for the sinking of the waters to their level. This superiority may justly be estimated by the distance from the top of the mountain to the limit of permanent snow, which, according to Tournefort, reaches half way down. The snowy region, according to his account, is absolutely inaccessible, by reason of its steepness. Few travellers, whose curiosity may lead them to explore it, can reach even to the limit of the permanent snow, on account of the great labour and difficulty of the ascent through sliding sands, which are daily increasing, and furnish the most barren and frightful desert imaginable, and from the danger of being devoured by tygers, which infest its lower region.

So great is the veneration of the Armenians for this mountain, that as soon as they can see it, (and it is so lofty that it can be seen at the distance of ten days journey) they kiss the earth, and repeat certain prayers, making the sign of the cross. They verily believe that the ark rested on its summit. The old patriarch of Armenia, who resided at Erivan, about two days’ journey from the mountain, northward, when applied to for guides thither by Tournefort and his company, told them, that “God had never yet favoured any one with a sight of the ark, except only one saint of their order, who, after fifty years spent in fasting and prayer, was miraculously carried thither, but was so seized by the excessive cold that he died at his return.” Vol. III. p. 183. Thus was it wisely ordained by Providence, that the ark should at length become inaccessible, and buried under perpetual snows, that it might not become an object of idolatrous veneration!

This mountain stands by itself, in the form of a sugar-loaf, in the midst of one of the greatest plains to be seen, stretching northward and westward, principally, as far as Erzerum, which is nine days’ journey from thence, and is seated between two beautiful streams that form the heads of the Euphrates, and which spring from mountains to the north and east, little inferior in height to the Alps. P. 94, 101.

The great elevation of the level of Armenia is proved from its extraordinary coldness. "At Erzerum," says Tournefort, "on the 14th of June, we were much surprised to find our hands so numbed at day-break that we could not write. This continued till after sun-rise, though the nights were pretty gentle, and the heats even troublesome, from ten in the morning unto four in the afternoon." P. 94. "There fell some snow about Erzerum in the night between the 2d and 3d of July." P. 120. And on the 14th of August, the third day after their visit to the mountain, during their stay at the Three Churches, there fell so much snow upon Ararat, that its smaller top, which before was clear, was all white with it. "We gave God thanks," said these pious travellers, "that we were safe returned, for we might have been lost there, or died with hunger upon the mountain." P. 208.

From the circumstance of the olive-leaf, brought back by the dove, on "the evening" of the same day that she had been let out the second time, Tournefort has raised a difficulty: "I do not see," says he, "where the dove, which went out of the ark, could find an olive-branch, if the ark be supposed to have rested upon Mount Ararat, or any of the mountains of Armenia; for this sort of tree is not found hereabouts, where the species must be lost, and yet olives are known to be a sort of tree that never die." P. 173. But whatever modern travellers may find, Assyria, which bounded Armenia on the south, was anciently famous for olives. 2 Kings xviii. 32. And Strabo says expressly, that olives grew in Gogarene, a province of Armenia. Lib. II. p. 800. And from either of those places, the dove, which is a bird of strong wing and rapid flight, might have returned in the evening of the same day. This objection, therefore, only tends to confirm the Mosaical account.

An additional argument for the descent of Noah's family from the top of Ararat, in Spring, may be drawn from the clouds, with which it is constantly capped during the winter half of the year; and from the greater facility of procuring provisions for all the tenants of the Ark, on their descent into the plain, during the summer half-year.

RESIDENCE OF NOAH'S FAMILY.

When Noah and his family quitted the Ark, they descended, as it were, from the clouds, to inhabit the rich and fertile plains that lay at the foot of the mountain; which are thus described by Tournefort.

“The country is admirably fine, and I do not know of any that can give us a better idea of Paradise. It is full of rivulets, which render it extremely fruitful: and I question whether there be any other country in the world, where one may gather so many commodities all at one time. Besides great quantities of all sorts of grain, there are fields of prodigious extent covered with tobacco. The rest of the country abounds with rice, cotton, flax, melons, pastiches, orchards, and fine vineyards. The people at Erivan are simple enough to believe that the vines are of the same sort which Noah planted. Gen. ix. 20. Be that as it may, they yield a very good wine.—The wine there is admirable; but the culture of vines is very difficult, by reason of the cold and frosts: which oblige the dressers, not only to cover, but to bury them under ground, at the beginning of winter, where they are kept till the spring.” P. 172.

But in Noah's time, and for several centuries afterwards, Armenia was probably warmer than at present. For though the waters had sunk below the level of this high table land, in the course of seven months from their decrease, yet it was probably a considerable length of time, several centuries perhaps, before they were reduced to their proper level. And, therefore, if we consider the larger surface of the seas, and smaller elevation of the land above the level of the seas at that time, on both accounts, the temperature should then be milder.

PARTIAL DELUGES.

That such happened in different places after the general deluge, at intervals, may be collected, both from local evidences, and from ancient records.

1. From the present aspect of the country itself, there is the greatest reason to think, that the Euxine, or Black Sea, the Caspian, and the lake of Aral, stretching along the northern skirts of Taurus, formerly covered a much greater extent of ground than at present, and were even united in one great inland sea: and that, in process of time, the mounds, which confined it on the south, being either gradually sapped and undermined by the pressure of the accumulated waters, or suddenly rent asunder by earthquakes or volcanos, or by the combination of both, gave way, or were broken down, whereby vast bodies of water were suddenly discharged into the Mediterranean Sea, inundating its borders, till then separated from the Atlantic Ocean; and deserting great tracts of land behind it; and so forming three separate lakes, of their present dimensions. In confirmation of this, not only on their immediate borders, but to very great distances northwards, up the courses of the Don, the Wolga, and the Jaick, these three seas are surrounded by flat, sandy deserts, destitute of fresh water, but interspersed with innumerable small lakes, whose waters are salt or bitter. The plains of Cuban stretching between the Black and Caspian Seas, and those that lie between the latter and the lake of Aral, and far eastward of this last, bear still more evident marks of having been once covered by waters. All these deserts are strewed with shells belonging to fish, of similar kinds with those yet found in the Caspian. And it is said, that the ancient extent of this former interior sea may be traced over the whole desert of Astracan, and beyond the Jaick, by the symptoms of coast, with which the elevated plains of Russia border this desert, and by the fossil productions covering its whole surface. The same appearances have been found on the plains of the Borysthenes. Other travellers have remarked the traces of sea in the plains of Asia Minor, and of Persia, and above the Danube, very far above the actual limits of the Caspian and the Black Sea. But the whole range of its southern great mountainous barrier is so strong by nature, that it could not be broken through any where, except where the present streights of the Bosphorus are situated.

By the irruption of such a vast body of waters from the Northern Seas, the countries contiguous to the Mediterranean, must have been deluged, and many islands formed, which before were connected lands; and numbers of the inhabitants have been drowned on the maritime coasts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, surrounding this sea. And from this circumstance, probably, the southern parts of Europe received in Scripture the denomination of “the isles of the nations,” in the earliest times. Gen. x. 5.

That the level of the Mediterranean Sea indeed in ancient times was considerably higher than at present, has been confirmed of late years by means of the works carried on for the improvement of the fortifications of Gibraltar. In excavating, or boring the ground, petrified human bones have been found in very great numbers, either incased in the rocks, or heaped together in subterraneous caverns. Their petrification proves them to be of very ancient date, before they and the surrounding stone became so hardened by the joint operation of salt water and air. They are probably the remains of the islands and submerged lands of the Archipelago, and of the various coasts of the Mediterranean, swept away by the sudden irruption of the Black Sea, and conveyed thither by a strong current driving impetuously against the barrier which separated the Mediterranean from the Atlantic Ocean: until this mound, at length, undermined, or perforated, by the accumulated weight of this new torrent, still depositing these floating bodies in its recesses, was burst open, and gave a vent for the redundant waters into the Atlantic Ocean through the Straits, into the Ocean; until the interior waters sunk to the same level as the exterior.

2. And this perfectly corresponds with ancient and general tradition. Diodorus Siculus asserts, that the Euxine Sea was formerly a great lake, whose waters, increasing by length of time, at last broke down the mounds which restrained them, and forced themselves a passage in the first instance near the Cyanean islands; and, finally, through the Hellespont. Strabo also cites the authority of Strato, who maintained that the Euxine had formerly no opening near Byzantium; but that the great rivers which run into it, at last forced an opening, and flowed from thence into the Propontis, and next opened themselves a passage through the Hellespont. He further states, that the same event took place in the Mediterranean, which opened itself a passage, near the columns of Hercules, into the Atlantic; and that, in consequence of this discharge, great tracts of land, which had before been covered with water, now first emerged. And according to Plato, the island Atalantis was overwhelmed by an inundation; but it lay beyond the streights of Gibraltar, in the ocean.

The rupture of the streights of the Baltic was probably effected by a similar cause. The bason of that sea might have retained some of the redundant waters of the deluge, after the rest were withdrawn into the subterraneous caverns; or it might have been filled by the waters of all the surrounding rivers of the higher lands of Germany, Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, which are as numerous and copious as those that flow into the Black Sea; and these accumulated waters at length forced themselves a passage into the ocean. And to confirm this, the old Swedish historians report, that formerly their whole country, except the mountains, which then composed a group of islands, was covered with water. And Linnaeus and Celsius, in the Amœnitates et Acta Academiæ Sueciæ, observe, that the sea-ports of East and West Bothnia, and of the Eastern side of Gothland, are every year decreasing in depth; and that the inhabitants of West Bothnia have observed, by marks upon rocks, that the sea decreases every ten years about five inches. This, no doubt, is effected by the gradual deepening of the Streights, which carry off the Baltic waters into the North Sea.

There is indeed reason to think, that this Sea, formerly, approached the Black Sea; for Diodorus relates, that the Argonauts sailed from the Euxine, up the Tanais; and that, after a short passage by land, they found rivers which carried them into the North Sea, and thence into the Ocean; from whence they returned through the straits of Hercules to Telamon. The story, no doubt, is improbable; but it shews that there existed a tradition, that the Euxine Sea was once not very distant from the Baltic. And indeed the ancient name of Pontus, or “the Great Sea,” given to the Euxine, in times preceding the Argonautic expedition, denotes that it was then of much greater extent than at present.

To successive disruptions of the barriers of the Euxine Sea, at the Bosphorus, may naturally be ascribed the early deluges of Ogyges and Deucalion, so celebrated in Grecian History; the latter of which is confounded by Ovid with the general deluge.

His description of Deucalion, Mount Parnassus, and the renewal of the human race, by casting stones over the shoulders of Deucalion and Pyrrha, which became men and women, is evidently taken and caricatured from the Mosaical account.

The flood of Ogyges, which inundated Bœotia and Attica, the ravages of which those countries did not recover for 200 years, happened, according to the ancient Greek historians, Hellanicus, Castor, &c. 1020 years before the first Olympiad, B.C. 776, or B.C. 1796. It preceded Deucalion's deluge 248 years, according to Cedrenus, from an ancient computation, which therefore happened B.C. 1518, or in the second year of Deucalion's reign, according to the preceding rectification of the Parian Chronicle; and is reckoned the most important and destructive that ever happened, by the Grecian writers. It is possible that the first rupture of the Bosphorus, might have preceded the flood of Ogyges; but it is highly probable, that it was finally completed by the flood of Deucalion * ; and that not long after the latter, the straits of Gibraltar were burst open, to give an outlet to the surcharged waters of the Mediterranean : and to the gradual deepening of the Straits, we may attribute the recess of the waters from the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean ; which were formerly covered to a greater extent.

It has been supposed by Buffon and others, that the disruptions of the barriers of the Mediterranean and Baltic, proceeded from without, from the fury of the ocean bursting in. This certainly might have contributed to weaken them on the outside ; but the effect seems most naturally to have been produced from the inside. To invalidate the argument, in the case of the Mediterranean, and to set aside the accumulation of its waters from the interior seas and rivers, it has been contended, 1. That evaporation on the surface of the Mediterranean Sea, by the heat of the sun, draws off the surplus waters ; and that this is proved, 2. By the constant in-draught of the waters of the ocean setting into the mouth of the Straights.

But to this it is answered by Howard, 1. That the rains which fall in great torrents, restore much of the waters evaporated by heat ; and that no evaporation takes place in the Baltic, on account of the coldness of the climate : and 2. That there is an under current, in the gut of Gibraltar, constantly setting outwards from the Mediterranean, which may discharge a greater body of water than is admitted by the upper : and 3. That from a Chart published in Germany during the last siege of Gibraltar, of the tides and currents in the Straights, it appears, that whilst a strong upper current drives from the ocean into the Mediterranean, along the coasts of Africa ; a contrary upper current sets into the ocean from that sea, tuning round Europa point

* The flood of Deucalion may rather perhaps have originated from a disruption and discharge of waters in Thessaly itself, described by Herodotus, B. 7, 129.

“ Thessa'y is said to have been anciently a lake, surrounded on all sides by lofty mountains ; to the East, by Pelion and Ossa, whose bases meet each other ; to the North, by Olympus ; to the West, by Pindus ; and to the South, by Othrys. The intermediate space is Thessaly, a hollow country, watered by a great many rivers, the principal of which are Peneus, Apidanus, Orochonus, Enipeus, and Pamisus. These rivers, collected in the plain, cross a very narrow valley [Tempe] at the outlets of the mountains, and discharge themselves into the sea by one common channel, which assumes the name of Peneus, absorbing the rest. It is said that formerly, before this aperture to the sea existed, these five rivers, and the lake Bæbeis also, had not distinct names as at present ; but that their body of water being as great, and flowing incessantly, made the whole of Thessaly a sea.”

into the bay of Gibraltar, and sweeping round that bay, takes its course along the coasts of Andalusia *. According to that Chart, the whole Streights may be divided into five bands, in all which the tides are different : in the mid-channel, the tide coincides with the ocean ; in the two bands on each side, the hours of flow and ebb are different from that of the ocean, and different from each other ; in the two bands following the two coasts, the hours of tide are the same, though different from all the others. 4. The same counter-currents prevail also in the Streights of Constantinople : over against that city, the most rapid of its superior currents drives into the Black Sea along the Asiatic Coast, yet no one doubts that the Black Sea pours a considerable surplus of water into the Mediterranean ; and that the general current of the latter sets from East to West, is ascertained beyond a doubt, by the usually longer navigation up than down the Mediterranean, according to the nautical phrase, founded on experience. See Howard's fourth letter, with its notes and illustrations ; from which this article is principally extracted.

THE TERRAQUEOUS GLOBE.

The last century has been more productive of Geographical discoveries than any, or almost all that preceded it. The fictions of speculative Geographers for ages past, have been imaginary Continents in the Southern hemisphere, and imaginary seas in the Northern. The true proportion of land to water on the earth's surface, was never ascertained till the voyages of discovery made by that celebrated British Navigator, Captain Cook, under the auspices of his present Majesty, George III. in three successive voyages round the world. The result of which, as being of considerable importance in itself, and throwing great light on the process of the original colonization of the earth by the families of Noah's sons, is thus expressed by himself :

“ I have now made the circuit of the Southern Ocean in a high latitude ; and traversed it in such a manner, as to leave not the least room for there being a Continent, unless near the South Pole, and out of the reach of navigation. By twice visiting the Tropical Sea, I had not only settled the situation of some old discoveries, but made there many new ones, and left, I conceive, very little to be done, even in that part. Thus I flatter myself, that the intention of the voyage has in every respect been fully answered. The Southern Hemisphere has been fully explored, and a final end put to the searching after a Southern Continent, which has at times engrossed the attention of the maritime powers for near two centuries past, and been a favourite theory amongst the Geographers of all ages." Cook's Second Voyage, Vol. II. p. 239.

If in his two first Voyages Captain Cook annihilated imaginary southern lands, he has made amends for the havoc in his third and last voyage, by annihilating imaginary northern seas, and filling up the vast space which had been allotted to them, with the solid contents of his new discoveries of American land, farther West and North than had been hitherto traced.

The two continents of Asia and America, so widely separated from each other by the vast Pacific or Eastern ocean, at their Southern extremities, are now found to approach each other towards the Northern, within thirteen leagues, instead of eight hundred, as supposed by the author of Recherches Philosophiques sur les Americains. And in this narrow streight there are several intervening islands, as Behring's, &c.

Among other good purposes, therefore, these voyages have rendered essential services to Religion, by robbing Infidelity of a favourite objection to the Mosaical account of the peopling of the earth. North America might have been easily furnished with inhabitants from the opposite coasts of Asia; and South America, by means of the great chain of newly discovered tropical isles, scattered between the two great Continents, and successively colonized from Asia; and also, on its Eastern side, by vessels driven by storms, or trade winds and currents, from the shores of Europe and Africa; and indeed the similarity of languages, religion, manners, and customs, in several leading points, furnishes decisive evidence of the descent of all mankind from the same parent stock.

The seas, both of the North and South, grow shallower, the nearer they approach to the Pole. Captain Cook, in his repeated voyages round the Antarctic circle, constantly found innumerable isles and fields of ice obstructing his course in lat. 61 and 62, South. Having, however, penetrated as far, in some parts, as lat. 72, he there found a firm and fixed continent of ice, on which he descried vast accumulated mountains. From repeated and judicious observations, he pronounces this to be owing, not to the proximity of lands; the islands which he called Sandwich, in lat. 59, being the last which he descried towards that Pole; but to the shallowness of that sea: the accumulating snows and ice sinking there to the very bottom, become immovably fixed thereto. In the Northern hemisphere, it was not the proximity of land which stopped his progress, for he passed Behring's Straits: but though the lands diverging from thence open a more extensive widening sea, he was again stopped by an icy continent, in lat. 70, North, because he perceived the sea was there so shallow, as to suffer the ice to be rooted to its bottom. On the opposite western side of the hemisphere, it is well known, that the sea, though sometimes covered with floating ice, is passable, in the proper season, and even becomes less obstructed, as far as lat. 88, to which, by various accounts, it appears that some ships have penetrated. This probably is owing to the greater depth of the ocean about Spitzbergen, and northwards, for a considerable extent.

This curious discovery puts an end likewise to the doubts that have been raised about the difficulty of maintaining the equilibrium of the earth, from the greater redundancy of land in the Northern, than in the Southern hemisphere. We know the fact, that the equilibrium is maintained; whence we may safely conclude, either that the shallowness of the Polar seas leaves the earth of the same density at each pole, or rather, perhaps, that all these inequalities on the surface of the land and water, are light and insignificant, compared with the great solid mass of the earth itself, nearly 8000 miles in diameter.

*Opinionum commenta delet dies,
Naturæ judicia confirmat.*

“ The fictions of hypothesis, lapse of time effaces, But confirms the decisions of Nature !”
—And the dictates of Revelation.

NOAH AND HIS SONS.

Noah survived the deluge 350 years, and Shem 500 years. This is decisive evidence against the hypothesis, that the diminution in the standard of human life after the deluge, was owing to the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere, occasioned by the stagnant waters after the deluge ; for the longevity of Noah exceeded that of any of his ancestors, except Methuselah ; of whose age of 965 years, Noah's wanted only 15 years ; and Shem survived his father 150 years, and probably his brothers lived as long. The regular reduction of nearly 200 years each, for three sets of generations, from Shem, 600 years, to Terah, 205, marks design ; and the successive reductions, down to David, when the standard was lowered to 70 years, at a time when, according to the hypothesis, the stagnant waters of the deluge must have long since been dried up every where, and, of course, the earth rendered more wholesome, shows, that the diminution must be resolved into the sole will and pleasure of our Creator.

During the lives of Noah and his sons, their families occupied Armenia, and probably extended themselves into the adjacent pleasant and fertile regions of Georgia, Assyria, and Media.

It was probably near the close of his life, that Noah delivered that famous prophecy respecting the fortunes of the three great families that peopled the whole earth, so wonderfully descriptive of their distinctive characters at the present day, and so minutely fulfilled in their respective settlements. As a Geographical prophecy, therefore, it requires to be noticed in this place.

NOAH'S PROPHECY.

The immediate occasion of this prophecy is stated to be the intoxication of Noah ; in consequence of which he lay exposed in his tent. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without. And Shem and Japheth dutifully covered him with a garment, going backwards that they might not see his nakedness. And when Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his youngest son had done unto him, he said,

- I. "Cursed be Canaan :
A servant of servants shall he be to his brethren.
- II. Blessed be THE LORD, THE GOD of Shem,
And Canaan shall be his servant.
- III. GOD shall enlarge Japheth,
He shall even dwell in the tents of Shem ;
And Canaan shall be his servant."—Gen. ix. 20—27.

It has been generally supposed that the youngest son, here meant, is Ham ; the same who saw and told his father's unseemly situation to his brothers. And hence the reading of the Arabic version, "Ham, the father of Canaan," in the three branches of the prophecy, instead of "Canaan" singly, as the subject of the curse throughout, upon him and upon his posterity in general, extending even to the youngest, Canaan; has, either virtually or expressly, been adopted by the current of Commentators, ancient and modern; and was thence inadvertently introduced into the text itself, in the first edition of this work.

Josephus thus explains the transaction: While Noah lay in an unseemly posture, the youngest of his sons, seeing it, shewed it to his brothers, mocking: but they covered their father. And when Noah knew, he blessed his other sons; he did not curse Ham himself, on account of his kindred to him; but he cursed his descendants: and the rest escaping the curse, God inflicted it on the children of Canaan." Antiq. I. 6, 3.

Abulfaragi, also: "Noah cursed Canaan the son of Ham, although the offence was his father's, not his own, because he knew by revelation, what he would afterwards perpetrate, in making musical instruments, in fornication and other base practices, which the sons of Cain applied themselves to teach." Dynast. p. 11.

And even the most learned expositors have implicitly adopted the appropriation of the Curse of servitude to Ham and his posterity. Bochart styles Ham accursed; and represents Noah as foretelling that his children should be slaves; while Mede, not content with calling upon us to tremble at the horrible curse of impious Ham; and with intimating that he was destined to be a servant of servants to all his brethren, roundly asserts, that there hath never yet been a son of Ham that hath shaken a sceptre over the head of Japheth; that Shem hath subdued Japheth, and Japheth hath subdued Shem, but Ham never subdued either." Mede's Works, Disc. 49 and 50, pp. 271, 283.

The integrity, however, of the received text of the prophecy, limiting the curse to "Canaan" singly, is fully supported by the concurrence of the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew texts, with all the other ancient versions, except the Arabic; and is acknowledged, we see, by Josephus and Abulfaragi, who evidently confine the curse to Canaan; though they inconsistently consider Ham as the offender, and are not a little embarrassed, to exempt him, and the rest of his children, from the operation of the curse; an exemption, indeed, attested by sacred and profane History: for Ham himself had his full share of earthly blessings, his son Misr colonized Egypt, thence styled “the land of Ham,” Ps. cv. 23, which soon became one of the earliest, most civilised and flourishing kingdoms of Antiquity, and was established before Abraham’s days, Gen. xii. 14—20; and in the glorious reign of Sesostris, extended its conquests both in Asia and Europe into the territories of Shem and Japheth; while Ham’s posterity in the line of Cush, not only founded the first Assyrian Empire under Nimrod, but also the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman Empires; in direct contradiction to the unguarded assertion of Mede.

How then is the propriety of the curse, exclusively to Canaan, to be vindicated? evidently by considering him as the only guilty person. And this may be done by adopting the very ingenious conjecture of Faber, that the “youngest son,” who offended, was not Ham, but Canaan; not the son, but the grandson of Noah. For the original, “his little son,” according to the latitude of the Hebrew idiom, may denote a grandson; by the same analogy, that Nimrod, usually considered the youngest son of Cush, Gen. x. 8, was, most probably, his great grandson; as being the contemporary of Peleg, the great grandson of Shem, “in whose days the earth was divided,” Gen. x. 25; compare Gen. x. 10, and xi. 9.

And this interpretation is supported by ancient Jewish tradition, Beresith Rabba, § 37, recorded also by Theodoret, in Gen. quest. 57, that “Canaan first saw his grandsire’s nakedness, and shewed it to his father, in mockery of the old man.” The tradition indeed, adds, that Ham joined in the mockery; but for this addition there seems to be no sufficient ground: Canaan might have invited his father to come and see a ludicrous spectacle, without precisely communicating what it was; and Ham might have been thus led, innocently and inadvertently, to see* his father’s exposure; not joining, however, in Canaan’s mockery, he might have withdrawn in disgust, from the degrading spectacle, and with concern communicated it to Shem and Japheth

* The original verb, נָתַן, rendered “he saw,” in the active conjugation Kal, occurs in the same defective form in Hiphil, “he made to see,” or “shewed,” 2 Kings xi. 4, and is in the same form in the passive Hophal, “was made to see,” or “was shewn,” as acutely remarked by Faber.

without; and they, being thus made acquainted with their father's exposure, piously contrived to cover, without beholding it themselves. In this transaction Ham took no active part; Noah, therefore, passed him over in silence, without either a blessing or a curse; as he had done nothing to incur a curse, nor any thing to merit a special blessing; he only pronounced a curse upon the guilty and depraved Canaan, that he should be a "servant of servants to his brethren" in general, to the other descendants of Ham, as well as to the descendants of Shem and Japheth; while he predicted appropriate blessings to their descendants, spiritual and temporal.

Hence we may see a reason, why Ham, at the beginning of the narrative, is described as the father of Canaan, rather than as the father of Cush, Misr, or Phut. It was evidently designed to draw attention to Canaan, though the youngest of his sons, on account of the curse of servitude denounced against him at the end; and, therefore, as pre-eminent in disgrace, on account of the enormity of his guilt.

Let us now proceed to the completion of the prophecy in its several parts.

I. The curse denounced against Canaan's posterity, to be "servant of servants," the lowest of servants, even slaves, to their brethren in general, did not affect individuals, nor even nations, so long as they continued righteous. In Abraham's days, Melchisedek, whose name was expressive of his character, signifying "king of righteousness," was a worthy and revered "Priest of THE MOST HIGH GOD." And Abimelech, whose name denotes "parental king," pleaded the "integrity of his heart," and "the righteousness of his nation," before God: and his plea was accepted. Yet they both appear to have been Canaanites. See Gen. xiv. 18—20; xv. 16; xx. 4—9. At the same time, the impieties and abominations of their neighbours, in the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c. drew down the signal vengeance of heaven in their overthrow.

In the fourth generation afterwards, when the "iniquity of the Canaanites was come to the full," or a general corruption had taken place; when in the energetic imagery of Scripture, "the land itself vomited forth its inhabitants," on account of their frightful impieties and abominations, as detailed, Levit. xviii. 25—28, containing the fullest justification of the infliction of the national curse ; Canaan was in part exterminated, and in part reduced to servitude, by the Israelites of the House of Shem, under the conduct of Moses, Joshua, and David. Afterwards he fell under the yoke of Ham and Shem, when he bowed the neck beneath the Medo-Persian Sceptre ; he fell under the yoke of Ham and Japheth together, when his land became a province of the Macedo-Grecian and Roman Empires ; and he was subjected to Japheth, Ham, and Shem, conjointly, when he finally yielded to the Tartaric Ottomans ; under whose iron sceptre, he still languishes, enslaved.

II. Shem, signifying “ name,” or “ renown,” though he attained not to great temporal power, being usually under the influence of Japheth, received the promise of a spiritual blessing, which raised him high in dignity above either of his brothers. He was chosen to be the ancestor of the blessed “ seed of the woman,” “ the Man CHRIST JESUS,” in preference to his elder brother Japheth. To this glorious privilege, Noah, to whom it was probably revealed, might have alluded, in that devout ejaculation ;—“ Blessed be THE LORD, THE GOD of Shem ;”—who was destined to be “ the glory of his people Israel ;” in after ages, while the rest of the Pagan world “ lay in darkness and in the shadow of death.”

III. Japheth signifies “ enlargement.” And how wonderfully did Providence enlarge the boundaries of Japheth ! His posterity diverged eastwards and westwards ; from the original settlement in Armenia, through the whole extent of Asia, north of the great range of Taurus, distinguished by the general names of Tartary and Siberia, as far as the Eastern Ocean ; and in process of time, by an easy passage across Behring’s streights, the entire continent of America ; and they spread in the opposite direction, throughout the whole of Europe, to the Atlantic Ocean : thus literally encompassing the earth, within the precincts of the northern temperate zone. While the enterprising and warlike genius of this hardy hunter-race, frequently led them to encroach on the settlements, and to dwell in “ the tents of Shem,” whose pastoral occupations rendered them more inactive, peaceable, and unwarlike : as when the Scythians invaded Media, and overran western Asia southwards, as far as Egypt, in the days of Cyaxares ; and when the Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, subdued the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians in the East, and the Syrians and Jews in the South ; as foretold by the Assyrian prophet, Balaam :

“ And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim,
And shall afflict the Assyrians, and afflict the Hebrews,
But he [the invader] shall perish himself at last.”—Numb. xxiv. 24.

And by Moses :

“ And the Lord shall bring thee [the Jews] into Egypt [or bondage] again with ships,” &c.—Deut. xxviii. 68.

And by Daniel :

“ For the ships of Chittim shall come against him” [Antiochus, king of Syria.]—Dan. xi. 30.

In these passages Chittim denotes the southern coasts of Europe, bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, called the “Isles of the Gentiles.” Gen. x. 5. And in later times, the Tartars in the East have repeatedly invaded and subdued the Hindus and Chinese ; while the warlike and enterprising genius of the British isles have spread their colonies, their arms, their arts, and their language, and in some measure, their religion, from the rising to the setting sun. And now, “Blessed be THE LORD !” He who was “the GOD of Shem,” in former times, is now become more especially the GOD of Japheth !—Now Europe, that most highly and gratuitously favoured quarter of the Globe, though the smallest, is blessed with the marvellous light of the Gospel ; while Asia has sunk, in turn, into the darkness of Idolatry and superstition : the lamps of the Asiatic Churches which formerly shone so brightly, are now well nigh extinguished ! How long this inestimable blessing may be preserved to Europe is matter of awful and anxious concern : the apostacy of too many of the European Churches from the genuine faith of Christ, and the lukewarmness of the rest, threaten the extinction of their lamps also, and that ominous retaliation denounced against the invader, that “He shall perish at last !”

The mention of Canaan, the youngest son of Ham, proves that this signal prophecy was uttered long after the deluge, and probably near the end of Noah's days. It evidently alludes to the divine Decree for the orderly division of the Earth among the three primitive families of his sons ; where it notices the “tents of Shem,” and the “enlargement of Japheth.” This decree was probably promulgated by the venerable Patriarch, about the same time. Eusebius, and others of the fathers, on the authority of ancient tradition, assign it to the nine hundred and thirtieth year of Noah's life, or about twenty years before his death ; that is, in the three hundred and thirtieth year after the deluge, or B.C. 2825. Euseb. Chron. p. 10. Syncell. Chronog. p. 89. Epiphan. Oper. I. p. 703.

DIVISION OF THE EARTH.

The prevailing tradition of such a Decree for this three-fold division of the earth, is intimated both in the Old and New Testament. Moses refers to it, as handed down to the Israelites, "from the days of old, and the years of many generations; as they might learn from their fathers and their elders," and further, as conveying a special grant of the land of Palestine, to be the lot of the twelve tribes of Israel.

"When THE MOST HIGH divided to the Nations their settlements,
When He separated the Sons of Adam,
He assigned the boundaries of the peoples [of Israel]
According to the number of the sons of Israel :
For the portion of the Lord is his people,
Jacob the lot of his inheritance."—Deut. xxxii. 7—9.

And this furnishes an additional proof of the justice of the expulsion of the Canaanites, as usurpers, by the Israelites, the rightful possessors of the land of Palestine, under Moses, Joshua, and their successors, when the original grant was renewed to Abraham. Gen. xv. 13—21.

And the knowledge of this Divine decree will satisfactorily account for the panic terror, with which the devoted nations of Canaan were struck, at the miraculous passage of the Red Sea, by the Israelites, and approach to their confines; so finely described by Moses :

"The nations shall hear [this] and tremble,
Sorrow shall seize the inhabitants of Palestine.
Then shall the Dukes of Edom be amazed,
Dismay shall possess the princes of Moab,
The inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away :
Fear and terror shall fall upon them,
By the greatness of thine arm they shall be petrified,
Till thy people pass over [Jordan] O LORD,
Till the people pass over, whom Thou hast redeemed !" — Exod. xv. 14—16.

St. Paul also addressing the Athenians, refers to the Divine decree, as a well known tradition in the heathen world.

“God made of one blood every nation of men to dwell upon the whole face of the earth ; having appointed the predetermined seasons and boundaries of their dwellings. Acts xvii. 26.

Here he represents mankind as all of one blood, race, or stock, “the sons of Adam” and of Noah in succession ; and the seasons and the boundaries of their respective settlements, as previously regulated by the divine decree. And this was conformable to their own Geographical Allegory : that Chronus, the god of time, or Saturn, divided the universe among his three sons ; allotting the heaven to Jupiter ; the sea to Neptune, and hell to Pluto. But Chronus represented Noah, who divided the world among his three sons, allotting the upper regions of the North to Japheth, the maritime or middle region to Shem, and the lower regions of the South to Ham.

According to the Armenian tradition recorded by Abulfaragi, Noah distributed the habitable earth from north to south between his sons, and gave to Ham the region of the blacks ; to Shem the region of the tawny (fuscorum) ; and to Japheth, the region of the ruddy (rubrorum). P. 9. And he dates the actual division of the earth, in the 140th year of Peleg, B.C. 2614 ; or 541 years after the deluge, and 191 years after the death of Noah, in the following order :

“To the sons of Shem was allotted the middle of the Earth, namely, Palestine, Syria, Assyria, Samaria, (Singar or Shinar,) Babel (or Babylonia), Persia, and Hegiaz (Arabia.)

“To the sons of Ham, Teiman (or Idumea, Jer. xlix. 7.) Africa, Nigritia, Egypt, Nubia, Ethiopia, Scindia, and India, (or India, west and east of the river Indus.)

“To the sons of Japheth also, Garbia (the north), Spain, France, the countries of the Greeks, Slavonians, Bulgarians, Turks, and Armenians.” Annals. p. 11.

In this curious and valuable Geographical Chart, Armenia, the cradle of the human race, was allotted to Japheth, by right of primogeniture ; and Samaria and Babel to the sons of Shem ; the usurpation of these regions therefore by Nimrod, and of Palestine by Canaan, was in violation of the divine Decree.

Though the migration of the primitive families began at this time, B.C. 2614, or about 541 years after the deluge, it was a length of time before they all reached their respective destinations. The “seasons” as well as the “boundaries” of their respective settlements were equally the appointment of GOD. The nearer countries to the original settlement being planted first, and the remoter in succession. These primitive settlements seem to have scattered and detached from each other, according to local convenience. Even so late as the tenth generation after the flood, in Abraham’s days, there were considerable tracts of land in Palestine unappropriated, on which he and his nephew Lot freely pastured their cattle, without hindrance or molestation. That country was not fully peopled till the fourth generation after, at the exode of the Israelites from Egypt. And Herodotus represents Scythia as an uninhabited desert, until Targitorus planted the first colony there, about a thousand years, at most, before Darius Hystaspes invaded Scythia, or about B.C. 1508.

The orderly settlements of the three primitive families are recorded in that most venerable and valuable Geographical Chart, in which, it is curious to observe how long the names of the first settlers have been preserved among their descendants, even down to the present day.

THE TENTH CHAPTER OF GENESIS,

I. Japheth, the eldest son of Noah, Gen. x. 21, and his family, are first noticed. Gen. x. 2—5.

The name of the patriarch himself, was preserved among his Grecian descendants, in the proverb του Ιαπετου πρεσβυτερος, “Older than Japetus,” denoting the remotest antiquity. The radical part of the word Ιαπετ, evidently expressing Japhet.

1. Gomer, his eldest son, was the father of the Gomerians. These, spreading from the regions north of Armenia and Bactriana, Ezek. xxxviii. 6, extended themselves westward over nearly the whole continent of Europe; still retaining their paternal denomination, with some slight variation, as Cimmerians, in Asia; Cimbri and Umbri, in Gaul and Italy; and Cymri, Cambri, and Cumbri, in Wales and Cumberland, at the present day. They are also identified by ancient authors, with the Galatæ of Asia Minor, the Gaels, Gauls, and Celtæ, of Europe, who likewise spread from the Euxine Sea to the Western Ocean; and from the Baltic to Italy southwards, and first planted the British Isles. Josephus remarks, that the Galatæ were called Γομαρῆσις, "Gomariani," from their ancestor Gomar. Ant. I. 6, 1. See the numerous authorities adduced in support of the identity of the Gomerians and Celts, by that learned and ingenious antiquary, Faber, in his Origin of Pagan Idolatry, Vol. III. B. 6. chap. 3. p. 447.

Of Gomer's sons, Ashkenaz appears to have settled on the coasts of the Euxine Sea, which from him seems to have received its primary denomination of Ἀξενος, Axenus, nearly resembling Ashkenaz; but forgetting its etymology in process of time, the Greeks considered it as a compound term in their own language, Α-ξενος, signifying "inhospitable;" and thence, metamorphosed it into Ευ-ξενος, Eu-xenus, "very hospitable." His precise settlement is represented in Scripture as contiguous to Armenia, westward: for "the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz," are noticed together. Jer. li. 27.

Riphat, the second son of Gomer, seems to have given name to the Riphean mountains of the north of Asia, and Togarmah, the third son, may be traced in the Trocmi, of Strabo, the Trogmi, of Cicero, and Trogmades, of the Council of Chalcedon, inhabiting the confines of Pontus and Cappadocia.

2. Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, sons of Japhet, are noticed together by Ezekiel, as settled in the north, xxxviii. 2, 14, 15. And as the ancestors of the numerous Sclavonic and Tartar tribes; the first may be traced in the Mongogians, Monguls, and Moguls; the second in Tobolski, of Siberia; and the third, Mesech or Mosoch, in the Moschici, Moscow, and Muscovites.

3. Madai was the father of the Medes, who are repeatedly so denominated in Scripture. 2 Kings xvii. 6; Isa. xiii. 17; Jer. li. 11; Dan. v. 28, &c.

4. From Javan was descended the Javanians, or Ιαονες of the Greeks, and the Yavanas of the Hindus. Greece itself is called Javan by Daniel, xi. 2; and the people Ιαονες by Homer, Iliad. XIII. 685.

These aboriginal Ιαονες of Greece, are not to be confounded, as is usually the case, with the later Ιωνες, who invaded and subdued the Javani territories, and were of a different stock. The accurate Pausanias states, that the name of Ιωνες, was comparatively modern, while that of Ιαονες is acknowledged to have been the primitive title of the barbarians who were subdued by the Ιωνες. Achaic. p. 396, 397. Strabo remarks, that Attica was formerly called both Ionia and Ias, or Ian. Geogr. Lib. IX.

p. 302. While Herodotus asserts, that “the Athenians were not willing to be called Ιωνες :” and he derives the name from Ιων, the son of Xuth, B. VIII. 44, descended from Deucalion, or Noah. And this Ion, is said by Eusebius, Chron. p. 13, 14, to have been the ringleader in the building of the tower of Babel, and the first introducer of Idol worship, and Sabianism, or adoration of the sun, moon, and stars. This would identify Ion with Nimrod. And the Ionians appear to have been composed of the later colonists, the Palli, Pelasgi, or roving tribes from Asia, Phenicia, and Egypt, who, according to Herodotus, first corrupted the simplicity of the primitive religion of Greece. B. II. §. 51, 52. and who, by the Hindus, were called Yonigas, or worshippers of the Yoni, or dove. This critical distinction between the Iaones and the Iones, the Yavanas and the Yonigas, we owe to the sagacity of Faber. Vol. III. p. 449.

Of Javan's sons, Elishah and Dodon, may be recognized in Elis and Dodona, the oldest settlements of Greece; Kittim, in the Citium of Macedonia, and Chittim, or maritime coasts of Greece and Italy, Numb. xxiv. 24; and Tarshish, in the Tarsus of Cilicia, and Tartessus of Spain.

II. Ham and his family are next noticed. Gen. x. 6—20.

The name of the patriarch is recorded in the title frequently given to Egypt, “the land of Ham.” Ps. cv. 23, &c.

1. Of his sons, the first and most celebrated appears to have been Cush, who gave name to “the land of Cush,” both in Asia and Africa: the former still called Chusistan, by the Arabian geographers, and Susiana by the Greeks, and Cusha dwipa within, by the Hindus. The other, called Cusha dwipa without. And the enterprizing Cushim or Cuthim, of Scripture, in Asia and Europe, assumed the title of Getae, Guiths, and Goths; and of Scuths, Scuits, and Scots; and of Sacas, Sacasen, and Saxons.

The original family settlement of Abraham was “Ur of the Chasdim,” or Chaldees, Gen. xi. 28, who are repeatedly mentioned in Scripture; Isa. xiii. 9; Dan. ix. 1; &c. According to Faber's ingenious remark, it may more properly be pronounced Chus-dim, signifying “God-like Cushites.” Vol. III. p. 435. It is highly improbable that they were so named from Chesed, Abraham's nephew, Gen. xxii. 22, who was a mere boy, if born at all, when Abraham left Ur, and was an obscure individual, never noticed afterwards.

Of Cush's sons, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Sablacha, and Raamah; and the sons of Raamah, Sheba, and Dedan, seem to have settled in Idumæa and Arabia, from the similar names of places there: and of his descendants, Nimrod, the mighty hunter, first founded the kingdom of Babylon, and afterwards of Assyria, invading the settlements of the Shemites, contrary to the divine decree. His posterity were probably distinguished by the title of Chusdim. Isa. xxiii. 13.

2. The second son of Ham was Misr, or Mizraim. He settled in Egypt, whence the Egyptians were universally styled in Scripture, Mizraim, or Mizraites, in the plural form. But the country is denominated in the east, to this day, "the land of Misr;" which, therefore, seems to have been the name of the patriarch himself.

The children of Misr, like their father, are denominated in Scripture by the plural number. Of these, the Ludim and Lehabim were probably the Copto-Libyans; Ezek. xxx. 5: the Naphtuhim occupied the sea-coast, which by the Egyptians was called Nephtus; whence, probably, originated the name of the maritime god Neptune. Plut. de Isid. The Pathrusim occupied a part of lower Egypt, called from them Pathros. Is. xi. 11. The Capthorim and the Casluhim, (whose descendants were the Philistim of Palestine) occupied the district which lies between the delta of the Nile and the southern extremity of Palestine. Deut. ii. 23. Amos ix. 7.

3. Phut is merely noticed, without any mention of his family. But the tribes of Phut and Lud are mentioned together, with Cush, or Ethiopia; Jer. xlvi. 9. Ezek. xxx. 5. And Jerome notices a district in Libya, called Regio Phutensis, or "the land of Phut."

4. Canaan has been noticed already; and the original extent of the land of Canaan is carefully marked by Moses. Its western border, along the Mediterranean Sea, extended from Sidon, southwards, to Gaza; its southern border from thence, eastwards, to Sodom and Gomorrhah, Admah and Zeboim, the cities of the plain, afterwards covered by the Dead Sea, or Asphaltite Lake; its eastern border extending from thence, northwards, to Laish, Dan, or the springs of the Jordan; and its northern border, from thence to Sidon, westward. Of Canaan's sons, Sidon, the eldest, occupied the north-west corner, and built the town of that name, so early celebrated for her luxury and commerce in Scripture ; Judg. xviii. 7 ; 1 Kings v. 6 : and by Homer, who calls the Sidonians, πολυδαίδαλοι, “skilled in many arts.” Iliad. XXIII. 743 ; Odys. XV. 114, &c. And Tyre, so flourishing afterwards, though boasting of her own antiquity, Isa. xxiii. 7, is styled “a daughter of Sidon,” or a colony from thence ; Isa. v. 12.

Heth, his second son, and the Hittites, his descendants, appear to have settled in the south, near Hebron, Gen. xxiii. 3—7 ; and next to them, at Jerusalem, the Jebusites, or descendants of Jebus, both remaining in their original settlements till David’s days ; 2 Sam. xi. 3 ; v. 6—9. Beyond the Jebusites, were settled the Emorites, or Amorites, Numb. xiii. 29, who extended themselves beyond Jordan, and were the most powerful of the Canaanite tribes, Gen. xv. 16 ; Numb. xxi. 21 ; until they were destroyed by Moses and Joshua, with the rest of the devoted nations of Canaan’s family.

III. Shem and his family are noticed last ; Gen. x. 21—30. His posterity were confined to Middle Asia.

1. His son Elam appears to have been settled in Elymais, or Southern Persia, contiguous to the maritime tract of Chusistan. Dan. viii. 2.

2. His son Ashur, planted the land thence called Assyria ; which soon became a province of the Cushite, or Cuthic empire, founded by Nimrod.

3. Arphaxad, through his grandson Eber, branched out into the two houses of Peleg and Joktan.

Peleg probably remained in Chaldea, or southern Babylonia, at the time of the dispersion ; for there we find his grandson, Terah, and his family, settled, at “Ur of the Chaldees,” Gen. xi. 31.

Of the numerous children of Joktan, it is said by Moses, that “their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sephar, a mount of the east.” Faber is inclined to believe that they were the ancestors of the great body of the Hindus, who still retain a lively tradition of the patriarch Shem, Shama, or Sharma ; and that the land of Ophir, abounding in gold, so called from one of the sons of Joktan, lay beyond the Indus eastward.

4. Lud was probably the father of the Ludim or Lydians, of Asia Minor : for this people had a tradition that they were descended from Lud or Lydus, according to Josephus, Ant. i. 6, 4.

5. The children of Aram planted the fertile country north of Babylonia, called Aram Naharaim, “Aram between the two rivers,” the Euphrates and Tigris, thence called by the Greeks, Mesopotamia, Gen. xxiv. 10. and Padan Aram, the level country of Aram, Gen. xxv. 20. This country of Aram is frequently rendered Syria in Scripture; Judges x. 6; Hosea xii. 12, &c.; which is not to be confounded with Palestine Syria; into which they afterwards spread themselves, still retaining their original name, of Ἀραμοί, or Arameans, noticed by Homer, Il. ii. 783.

THE CONFUSION OF TONGUES AT BABEL.

This miraculous event, though recorded after the Division of the Earth among the families of Noah's sons, must have happened before it in the order of time: and it must have been universal, or equally affected them all; for the settlements of each of the three primitive families are said to have been, “after their tongues, in their lands or countries, in their nations.” Gen. x. 5, 20, 31. And the account given of it, in the eleventh chapter, corresponds therewith. “And the whole earth was of one lip [or language,] and of one speech, [or dialect]. And it came to pass, as they journeyed from the east, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and they dwelt there. And they said, Come, let us build us a city, and a tower, whose top may reach into heaven; and let us make us a name, [or a sign] lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the earth. And the Lord came down to see the city which the children of men builded. And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one lip, [or language], and this they begin to do; and now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do. Come, let us go down, and there confound their lip [or language] that they may not understand each other's lip, [or language]. So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of the whole earth. And they left off to build the city. Therefore is the name of it called Babel, because the Lord did there confound the lip [or language] of all the earth.” Gen. xi. 1—9.

From this concise account we may collect, that when the families of Noah's sons had sufficiently increased in population, and the lower grounds were sufficiently dried, so as to require, or encourage emigration, they took their journey in one community, while they all spake the same language, and the same speech, tongue, or dialect, from the original settlement, in the mountainous region of Armenia, to the fertile plain of Shinar in Mesopotamia. Here they settled themselves, with a firm determination not to separate from each other, in obedience to the divine decree; but to found a single universal empire. For that purpose, they proceeded to build a city, and a lofty tower. But God miraculously confounded their language, so that they were no longer intelligible to each other: and from Babel they were scattered over the face of the earth.

Respecting the particular route by which they arrived at the plain of Shinar, Scripture is silent: but the Chaldean historian, Berosus, informs us, that “they proceeded circuitously to Babylonia *.” And Mr. Penn †, guided only by a geographical view of the country, happily conjectures, that they followed the course of the great river Euphrates; which rising in the mountains of Armenia, flows at first in a westerly direction; then it turns to the south, and at length, bending eastward, it reaches Babylon from the north-west. Its progress, therefore, is circuitous; and as the approach to Shinar would be most easily and naturally effected by following its winding course; so, in that case, the route of the emigrants would minutely correspond with Berosus and with Scripture, which represent them as travelling from the original settlement, eastward of the springs of the Euphrates; whose circuitous course, according to the ingenious remark of Faber, is described in the Sanscrit word Uratta, pronounced Urat, and signifying “a circle;” so nearly analogous to the Hebrew name of the river, Phrat. Origin of Idolatry, Vol. III. pp. 374—376.

The lofty tower which they built of bricks, burned and baked in the sun, and cemented with bitumen, was a pyramidal temple, of a quadrangular base, nearly of the same size of the great pyramid of Egypt, but somewhat loftier. The Tower of Belus, at Babylon, was probably the original Tower of Babel, built by Nimrod, and afterwards repaired by Nebuchadnezzar, and again ruined by Xerxes. See the following article of Babylon.

The prime author of this rebellion against the divine decree, and grand corrupter of the pure patriarchal religion, by Sabaism and Demonolatry, was the Cushite Nimrod, “the Rebel,” as the name implies, who was afterwards deified himself, under the title of Belus, and supposed to be translated to the constellation Orion, in the heavens. See his history, Vol. II. of this work. And from the central region of Babel, this grand apostacy from the primitive faith seems to have been transplanted into the four quarters of the world; as proved from the remarkable fact of the general resemblance of the Pagan Mythology, in these its two leading outlines, in Asia, Africa, Europe, and America; and from the conformity between the leading doctrines of the primitive Pagan priesthood, the Magi in Chaldea, the Brahmins in the East, and the Druids in the West, as circumstantially proved by Faber, in his elaborate work.

That great linguist, Sir William Jones, in the Asiatic Researches, has discovered traces of three primeval languages, corresponding to the three grand aboriginal races, which he calls the Arabic, the Sanscrit, and the Slavonic, into which all others resolve themselves.

1. From the Arabic or Chaldee, spring the dialects used by the Assyrians, Arabs, and Jews *.

2. From the Sanscrit, which is radically different from the Arabic, spring the Greek, Latin, and Celtic dialects, though blended with another idiom, the Persian, the Armenian, and the old Egyptian or Ethiopic †.

3. From the Slavonic or Tartarian, which again is radically different both from the Arabic and Sanscrit, spring (so far as Sir William can venture to pronounce upon so difficult a point) the various dialects of northern Asia, and north-eastern Europe ‡.

VARIETIES OF MANKIND.

The derivation of the human species, all from one stock, Noah, the second father of mankind, has proved a great stumbling-block to minute philosophers. "Though we cannot doubt the authority of Moses," says Lord Kaims, "yet his account of the creation of man is not a little puzzling, as it seems to contradict every one of the forementioned facts;" namely, the varieties of the human species in different countries, as to colour, size, shape, disposition, &c. Sketches of the History of Man, Vol. I. p. 36.

* Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 5. Vol. III. p. 419.

‡ Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 23, 29, 40. Vol. III. p. 419.

However inadequate we may be fully to unfold the mysteries of Nature, and the ways of Providence, yet much of these alleged varieties may be satisfactorily accounted for, from the influence of climate, local circumstances of air, water, food, customs, &c. which may, in process of time, make a material change in the constitutions and complexions of the inhabitants. If dogs, taken to the frigid zone, grow shaggy; and if sheep, transported to the torrid zone, exchange their wool for hair; why may not the human species gradually partake of the influence of climate?

1. Man was formed to reside in all climates.

“The human animal is the only one which is naked, and the only one which can clothe itself. This is one of the properties which renders him an animal of all climates and of all seasons. He can adapt the warmth or lightness of his covering to the temperature of his habitation. Had he been born with a fleece upon his back, although he might have been comforted by its warmth in high latitudes, it would have oppressed him by its weight and heat, as the species spread towards the Equator.” This is the simple, but profound remark of Paley, Natural Theology, p. 231.

2. “Man, though white in Europe, black in Africa, yellow in Asia, and red in America, is still the same animal, tinged only with the colour of the climate. Where the heat is excessive, as in Guinea and Senegal, the people are perfectly black; where less excessive, as in Abyssinia, the people are less black; where it is more temperate, as in Barbary and in Arabia, they are brown; and where mild, as in Europe and in Lesser Asia, they are fair.” Buffon, Tom. VI.—This concession from a great Naturalist and Sceptic, is important.

3. Shaw, in his travels through Barbary, found a tribe in the mountains of Auress, south of Algiers, who appeared to be a different race from the Moors: far from swarthy, their complexion is fair and ruddy, and their hair a deep yellow, instead of being dark, as among the neighbouring Moors. He conjectures, that they are a remnant of the Vandals; the tribe perhaps mentioned by Procopius, in his first book of the Vandalic War. And they probably retained their complexion, from their high, mountainous situation; as the natives of Armenia, in Western Asia, and Cashmire, in Eastern, are fair; owing to the great elevation of the soil in both places, and the temperature of the climate occasioned thereby.

4. On the other hand, a colony of Jews, settled at Cochin, upon the Malabar coast, from a very remote epoch, of which they have lost the memory; though originally a fair people in Palestine; and from their customs, preserving themselves unmixed, are grown as black as the other Malabarians, who are hardly a shade lighter than the negroes of Guinea; as we learn from Hamilton. And at Ceylon, the Portuguese, who settled there only a few centuries ago, are degenerated, and grown blacker than the original natives. They are in number about 5000, still speak Portuguese, wear the European dress, and profess the Romish religion. According to Cordiner, in his late Description of Ceylon, cited, Antijacobin Review, April, 1808, p. 345. Moore also, in his Account of the River Gambia, remarks, that the Portuguese, who settled near the Mundingoes about three centuries ago, differ so little from them, as to be called Negros. This they resent.

The late discoveries in the Tropical Isles of the great Pacific Ocean, seem to decide the question respecting the cause of the difference between the long-haired Asiatic Indians, and the woolly-headed African Negroes; whom Herodotus long ago described in his curious catalogue of the nations composing the immense army of Xerxes, under the names of "the Eastern and Western Ethiopians." B. 7.

Among the isles of the New Hebrides, Eastward of New Holland, the natives of New Caledonia, 21. deg. South lat. are of a swarthy colour, their hair crisped, but not very woolly, their faces round, with thick lips, and wide mouths. The natives of Tanna, 19 deg. S. L. are almost of the same swarthy colour: their hair and beards were black and crisp in general, and in some, woolly. The natives of Millicollo, 17 deg. S. L. border the nearest upon the tribe of monkeys. The hair of most of them is frizzled and woolly, their complexion sooty, their features hard, the cheek-bones and face, broad. The natives of Egmont Island, 10½ deg. S. L. are black, and woolly headed. Captain Carteret found a young man, near the neighbouring isle of Trevanion, "with a woolly head, like that of the Negroes, and a small beard; but he was well featured, and not so black as the natives of Guinea: he was of the common stature, and like all the rest of the people we had seen upon this Island, quite naked." Carteret's Voyage, p. 580.

The situation of these Isles, in East longit. 165 degrees, and 130 degrees distant from the coast of Guinea, or Negroland, in the direct line, and more than half the globe, along the coasts of Africa and Asia, furnishes the most decisive evidence that they never had, nor could have, any connexion with those countries, the inhabitants of which they yet so strongly resemble in their peculiar features. They were unquestionably colonized from Asia, by the Malayans, those Phœnicians of the Oriental world; whose language is found to prevail through all the various clusters of the Tropical Isles, from Madagascar westwards, near the African Coast, to the remotest of Captain Cook's discoveries, the Marquesas and Easter Island, towards South America; throughout a tract of near 200 degrees of longitude! A wider field than the Latin, or any other tongue, has ever boasted of. See the masterly Introduction to Cook's last Voyage, p. lxxii.

Still, however, there are anomalies, or exceptions, to these general conclusions of the influence of climate and customs, that must be ascribed to other, and perhaps undiscovered causes, which baffle the pride of human sagacity to develope; and which, after all, must be resolved into the will and pleasure of the CREATOR, and deposited among "the unsearchable riches" of his wisdom and providence, in the variety, no less than in the regularity, of his works.

1. Such, for instance, is the uncommon fairness of the inhabitants of Guayaquil, in Peru, only two degrees removed from the line. Though the heat here is equal to that of Panama, or Carthagera, yet the climate distinguishes itself in the colour of the human species. And if a certain author has styled it, "the Equinoctial Low Countries," in allusion to the resemblance it bears to the Netherlands of Europe, it may with equal propriety bear that appellation from this singularity: namely, that all the natives, except those born from a mixture of blood, are fresh coloured, and so finely featured, as to be justly styled the handsomest both in the province of Quito, and even in all Peru.

Two things are here the more remarkable, as being contrary to common observation; one, that notwithstanding the heat of the climate, its natives are not tawny; the other, that though the Spaniards have not naturally so fair a complexion as the Northern nations, their children born here of Spanish women are very fair. To attribute it to the effluvia exhaling from the contiguous river, appears to me little satisfactory; other cities have the same advantageous situation, without producing any improvement in the complexion of the inhabitants; whereas here, fair persons are the most common; and the children have universally light hair and eye-brows, and very beautiful faces. This phenomenon has not hitherto been sufficiently explained:” according to that intelligent and scientific traveller, Ulloa, Vol. I. p. 141.

2. Another as remarkable anomaly prevails at the other extremity of South America, on the Eastern coast of Patagonia, bordering on the entrance into the Straights of Magellan. Commodore Byron, and Captains Carteret and Wallis, in two successive voyages, found a description of Natives, to the amount of 500, the first time, in 1764; and some hundreds, the second, in 1766; among whom they appeared as “pigmies among giants.” Wallis, who measured the tallest of the Patagonians, found one of them “six feet seven inches high; several more were six feet five, and six feet six inches; but the stature of the greater part of them was from five feet ten to six feet. They are well made, robust, and bony; but their hands and feet are remarkably small. Their complexion is a dark copper colour, like that of the Indians in North America: their hair is strait, and nearly as harsh as hog’s bristles: it is tied back with a cotton string. Several, both men and women, were on horseback. Their horses appeared to be well made, and nimble, and were about 14 hands high. The women rode astride, and both men and women without stirrups; yet they galloped fearlessly over the spit upon which we landed, the stones of which were large, loose, and slippery.” Cook’s first Voyage, Vol. I. p. 26—32; 375—380. Descriptions, so circumstantial, and so well attested, place beyond the reach of doubt or cavil the existence of this populous race of giants, in 52 degrees of South latitude, and in a cold climate; which is thus described by Captain Wallis:

“Thus we quitted a dreary and inhospitable region, where we were in almost perpetual danger of shipwreck, for near four months, having entered the Strait of Magellan on the 17th of December, 1766, and quitted it on the 11th of April, 1767; a region where, in the midst of summer *, the weather was cold,

* Commodore Byron advanced into the Straights of Magellan, as far as Cape Forward, the Southern extremity of the Continent, in lat. 54. There, on December 24, 1764, about their Summer solstice, he found the weather cold, and the air keen; and walking across the Cape, the hills, as far as he could see, were of an immense height, very craggy, and covered with snow, quite from the summit to the base. Vol. I. p. 36—39.

gloomy, and tempestuous, where several of the summits of the mountains were covered with snow, and others rose towering above the clouds in vast crags, piled upon each other, exhibiting more the appearance of chaos than of nature; and where, for the most part, the vallies were without herbage, and the hills without wood." P. 383—409.

How different are these Patagonians from the stunted Laplanders of Europe, and the Esquimaux of North America, in similar climates; contradicting the general theory of the decrease of the human stature as we approach the frigid zones.

If the following observation of Bruce be well founded, the predominance of white, as the original complexion, over the black, seems to be ascertained.

"The royal family in Abyssinia were originally negroes, and remain so still, when their mothers have been black like themselves: but where the king has happened to marry an Arab woman, as he often does, the black colour of the father cedes to the white of the mother, and the child is white. The last Baady (or king) who was slain at Teawa, was a perfect negro; and by a slave from his own country, he had the late king, Nasser, who, like his father, was a perfect black: by an Arab, of the tribe of Daveina, he had Ismain, the present king, who is white. And so it has invariably happened in the royal family, as well as in private ones. But what is still more extraordinary, though equally true, an Arab, who is white, marrying a black woman slave, has infallibly white children. I will not say that this is so universal as that an example of the contrary may not be found; but all the instances I happened to see, confirmed this." Bruce, Travels, Vol. V. p. 223.

In Captain Cook's first voyage, during his stay at Success Bay, lat. 54, 45', on the Eastern coast of Terra del Fuego, in the Streights of Le Maire, a party, consisting of Mr. Banks, Doctor Solander, and ten more, went to visit a mountain, at some distance, in search of plants, on January 16, 1769; but were surprised there by a sudden snow-storm, attended with piercing cold; in which they were all nearly lost: two of their party were frozen to death, and the rest, with great difficulty, found their way back to the ship next day.

Such a phænomenon, about their midsummer, is unknown in the Northern hemisphere, at the corresponding season, even in the higher latitudes of Norway and Lapland. And yet, notwithstanding, Captain Cook, describing the natives of Terra del Fuego, says, "The men are large and clumsily built, their stature is from five feet eight to five feet ten. The women indeed are much smaller, few of them being more than five feet. We saw no appearance of their having any food but shell-fish. These are gathered by the women, at low water." Vol. II. p. 46—56.

An ingenious, but fanciful writer, the late Mr. King, in his Morsels of Criticism, Vol. III. 87, 93, &c. revived the long-exploded scheme of Peyrerius, adopted by Blunt, in his Oracles of Reason; namely, that of the Præ-Adamites, or an inferior race, or caste, created before Adam and Eve; with whom Cain intermarried, and produced a black progeny; some of whom, surviving the deluge, propagated the species afterwards! But nothing can be more express than the Scripture-account of the total and absolute destruction of “all mankind,” and “every” man, by the deluge, except Noah’s family. Gen. vii. 21—23. And, indeed, to suppose that “some persons might escape on floating trees or timber, or on the summits of mountains, (from which the water soon flowed off) or by other extraordinary means—as men sometimes escape and are preserved, from a wreck at sea,”—evinces the height of credulity, and would be a miracle greater than the deluge itself.

THE PRIMITIVE LANGUAGE.

Which was the primitive language? and wherein did the confusion of tongues consist? These are curious and interesting questions, more easy to propose than to resolve. None, therefore, have been more warmly disputed by antiquarian philologists; and the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Chaldee, Phœnician, Egyptian, Ethiopic, Greek, Sanscrit, and Chinese, have each had their respective advocates for the palm of priority and precedence.

Of these various claimants, the language spoken by the inhabitants of the first districts occupied by Noah’s family, after the flood, seem to have the fairest pretensions to originality, or rather of affinity to the primitive language, supposing all to be altered, more or less, by lapse of time and change of place.

————— Mortalia facta peribunt,
Nedum sermonum stet honos, et gratia vivax.—HOR.

The great affinity that still reigns, at the present day, among the kindred dialects of the east, and the remoter of the west, lead us to suspect, that the confusion of tongues consisted rather in diversity of pronunciation of the same words, than in the introduction of new words expressing the same ideas.

If these assumptions be valid, the Hebrew and the Syriac have the fairest pretensions to originality ; and they accordingly have been patronized by the most skilful orientalists, and a decided preference given to them above the rest.

That this preference is well founded, may perhaps be most simply and satisfactorily proved from their respective alphabets ; for the names and the numeral values of the Hebrew and Syriac letters, which agree together, are almost generally adopted in the rest, however unlike the letters themselves may be in their respective shapes.

Thus, the names of the Hebrew and Syriac letters, Aleph, Beth, &c. have been adopted, with some slight variations, by the Arabians, Persians, Copts, Ethiopians, Greeks, &c. But whatever dislocations may have arisen in the order of the letters of each respective alphabet, yet it is truly remarkable, that, for the most part, in the kindred dialects they still retain the same numeral powers as in the primitive alphabets.

From inspection of the several alphabets, it appears, that only the two first letters of the Hebrew and Syriac alphabets, Aleph and Beth, retain their primitive order in the other dialects, and also their numeral powers. Thus, the third Arabic letter Ta, retains both the name Thau, and the numeral value 400, of the last letter of the Hebrew and Syriac alphabets ; the fifth Arabic letter, Jim, corresponding to the third Hebrew Gimel, retains its proper value, 3 ; the sixth Hha, corresponding to the eighth Hebrew Hheth, retains its proper value, 8 ; while the twenty-eighth and last Arabic letter Ya or Ia, corresponding to the tenth Hebrew letter, Iod, still retains its proper value, 10.

This furnishes demonstrative evidence of the dislocation of the present Arabic alphabet * ; and, consequently, that it must have deviated from the primitive alphabet, as well in the order and power, as in the form of its several letters. The same argument will apply to the other alphabets, which are still more modern than the Arabic, the Ethiopic, the Sanscrit, &c.

To this we may add, that the superior simplicity of the Hebrew and Syriac letters, which originally had each only one form, decides their superior antiquity also above the Arabic, the Ethiopic, the Sanscrit, &c. alphabets, in which each letter has a distinct form, at the beginning, middle, and end of words, to the great embarrassment of learners, and sometimes even of adepts.

* The Arabic alphabet was originally the same as the Syriac ; a change was made in the order of the alphabet, and character of the letters, about the age of Mahomet.

The Hebrew language also furnishes internal evidence of its priority before the other dialects, and of their descent from it.

1. In the original nomenclature, Adam called his wife אשה (Aishah) "Woman," because she was taken out of איש (Aish) "Man." Gen. ii. 23. Here the derivation is obvious in the Hebrew language, but the resemblance is lost in the ancient versions. Though the derivation of אַתְּתָא, in Chaldee, or אִיתְתָּא, in Syriac, (Aitta) "Woman," from the Hebrew, Aishah, (by the usual and frequent interchange of the letter ש Shin, and ת Thau, both in the eastern and western dialects) is obvious, yet the primitive Hebrew root, איש, Aish, "Man," is not now found in these dialects, but has grown obsolete; and in its stead, the Chaldee has substituted בעל (Baal) "Master," the Syriac, גְּבֻרָא (Gebura) "the strong."

2. From the primitive name of GOD in Hebrew, אֵל (ÆL) signifying "power," was obviously derived אֱלֹהִים (ÆLOH) in Hebrew, signifying "potentate;" ALAH, in Syriac; AL-ALAH (or, by contraction of the article Al, "the," prefixed) ALLAH, in Arabic; ULLAH, in Ethiopic; ALOH, in the South Sea Isles, where Captain Cook found ALO ALO, the name of the Supreme God, in Hapae, one of the Friendly Isles, similar to the Hebrew, אֵל אֱלֹהִים, "God of gods."

3. The Hebrew שק (Sak) "a bag," pervades most of the eastern and western languages, precisely in the same sound and sense. The Hebrew מַת (Math) "dead," runs through all the Oriental dialects*; and Mat, or Matte, is found in the vocabularies of the South Sea Isles exactly in the same sense. The same may be observed of many other words.

4. The primitive proper names of Rivers, Mountains, Cities, Persons, &c. throughout the east, are all deducible from the Hebrew.

5. When Abraham, "the Hebrew," travelled through Palestine and Egypt, he appeared to be easily understood in all these countries, without the aid of an interpreter, and freely conversed with Melchizedek, Abimelech, Pharaoh, &c.

6. When Laban called the pillar, erected in memory of his

* Hence the Arabic phrase in the game of chess, Cheik Mat, "the king is dead." It is also the name of a place near Arbela, in Assyria Proper.

convention with Jacob, in Syriac, יגַר סַחְדוּתָא, Jegar Sahadutha, which Jacob called גַּל עֵד, Gal-eed, in Hebrew, Gen. xxxi. 47. they are synonymous phrases, as “the mount of testimony,” and “the heap of witness,” in English.

The formation of the nearer dialects of the east, and remoter of the west, from the primitive language, by change of vowels, and interchange of consonants of the same or kindred organs of speech, may be aptly illustrated by a few instances, ancient and modern.

1. The primitive name of Lower Egypt was אֵי כַפְתוֹר, *Ai Caphtor, or “the covered land,” Jer. xlvii. 4; because, according to Herodotus, “the Delta was originally a marsh covered with water, and so was all the Lower Egypt, as far as Mount Masius, and the Sirbonic lake.” Hence, by elision, came Ai-capht, or Ai-copht; and by transmutation, Aigupt; whence our English word Egypt, retaining only the two last original letters. In Sanscrit, it is called Gupta-sthan, “the covered land;” and Cardama-sthan, “the mud-land.” Wilford on Egypt and the Nile. Asiat. Research. Vol. III. p. 335.

2. From the Greek Ἐπισκοπος, by elision, came Piscop, and thence the English Bishop; or Episk, whence the French Evêque.

3. From the Latin, Dies, came the adjective Diurnus, from thence the Italian, Giorno; whence the French, Jour, “day;” not retaining a single letter of the original word.

ALPHABETICAL AND HIEROGLYPHICAL WRITING.

An hypothesis seems to be pretty generally prevalent among antiquaries, that hieroglyphical was earlier, and that it gave rise to the invention of alphabetical writing, by contraction of the hieroglyphic symbols into alphabetical letters.

In favour of this hypothesis, it has been asserted, that the letters of the primitive alphabet were originally intended for symbols of the things whose names they bear; as Aleph, “an ox,” Beth, “a house,” Gimel, “a camel,” Daleth, “a door,” &c. but in process of time were curtailed and reduced to simpler forms.

* The Egyptian word Caphtor, is evidently derived from the Hebrew, כַּפַּר, Caphar, “to cover,” which is the root of the English word, also.

1. This however may be doubted: for as the learned orientalist Schultens remarks, “the names given to the primitive letters were rather designed as artificial helps of the memory, to excite the attention of learners,” by means of the alliteration; as our spelling-books for children contain cuts or figures, in which A is connected in the same compartment with an Ass, B with a Bear, C with a Cat, D with a Dog, &c. without the remotest likeness between the letters and the objects themselves, intended to be conveyed or understood.

2. The original structure of hieroglyphical symbols, and of alphabetical letters, seems to be totally and radically different, and incapable of transmutation into each other. Hieroglyphics are imperfect outlines of the figures or objects themselves intended to be represented, which, in process of time, were transferred from sensible objects to intellectual, by a metaphorical language; whereas, letters are arbitrary marks of a few simple elementary sounds of the easiest and readiest pronunciation, to which they bear no manner of resemblance; and the progress of writing, like that of oral language, is from monosyllables to dissyllables; from thence to trisyllables; and so on to polysyllables: thus, by their various combinations, forming all that endless variety of oral or of written words, which serve to communicate ideas or notions. If the origin of language, or articulate speech, was divine, how much more the invention of writing, of alphabetical letters, and written words!

Which, by the magic spells of a few cabalistical characters, grouped together in various clusters, can fix and embody, as it were, fleeting sounds and perishable ideas, with which they have no natural union or connection whatsoever, and embalm or preserve them to ages yet unborn!

3. Notwithstanding this, the author of the account of the late Embassy to China, Sir George Staunton, endeavours to uphold the fashionable hypothesis, from the introduction of an alphabetical mode of writing in China, by the British factors at Canton, for convenience of communication with the Chinese merchants, founded on their hieroglyphical writing.

“On account,” says he, “of the vast concourse of persons using the English language, who resort to Canton, a vocabulary of English words has been published in Chinese characters merely expressive of sound, [or of the English pronunciation] for the use of the native merchants concerned in the trade. To each character is annexed a mark, to denote that it is not intended to denote the [Chinese] idea, but merely the foreign sound attached to it. The habit of applying the sound instead of the meaning of hieroglyphics, [may have] led to the application of them likewise as sounds, to assist the memory in the pronunciation of other hieroglyphics in the same language, but not in common use; and this repeated application of them, for the same purpose, may be at length supposed to have effaced their original use.”

“Thus the passage from hieroglyphic alphabetic writing may naturally be traced, without the necessity of having recourse to Divine instruction, as some learned men have conjectured, on the ground that the art of writing by an alphabet is too refined and artificial for untutored reason.”

“It is indeed,” concludes he, “equally natural to suppose, that no such art could have preceded the establishment of hieroglyphic, or that a mixture of other nations superinduced the invention of alphabetic language.”

The drift of this hypothesis, so freely and openly avowed by its patron,—to exclude the necessity of Divine instruction,—would lead us to distrust his reasons, were they even more specious: but they are evidently insufficient: for, 1. It will appear, from the whole tenor of ancient history, both sacred and profane, that the art of alphabetical writing not only could, but actually did, precede the establishment of hieroglyphic; and 2. That the invention of alphabetic language was not superinduced by a mixture of other nations, nor could it be so superinduced.

1. “The book of the genealogy” of the antediluvian patriarchs from Adam to Noah, is evidently represented as a written record, Gen. v. 1. And indeed how could it possibly record their names, and their generations, residues of life, and total ages, without written words? How could oral tradition hand down, through two and twenty centuries to the deluge, unimpaired, thirty large and unconnected numbers, rising from a hundred to near a thousand years?

2. Some Jewish and Oriental traditions ascribe the invention of writing to Seth, the son of Adam; others to Enoch, the seventh from Adam; whether well founded, or not, it proves the prevailing opinion, that letters were of antediluvian date.

3. And Western tradition affirms the same. Pliny says, Literas semper arbitrator Assyrias fuisse. "I am of opinion that letters were always found among the Assyrians." The term semper, "always," is emphatic, and marks from the beginning of the world. Nat. Hist. 7, 56.

4. Cicero confirms the opinion of Pliny, and assigns an additional reason for it; namely, that the Assyrians were much addicted to astronomy, and therefore required the art of writing to record their observations*.

5. The first numeral characters in use were the letters of the primitive alphabet; their introduction, therefore, as letters, must have been prior to their designation of numbers.

On the other hand,

6. Gaspar Samedo expressly asserts, from the Chinese annals, that hieroglyphic symbols were first introduced into China only 3700 years before he wrote, in A.D. 1640; or about B.C. 2060, which was upwards of a thousand years after the deluge.

7. Tacitus attributes the invention of hieroglyphics to the Egyptians:—Primi per figuras animalium Ægyptii sensus mentis effingebant. Annal. 11, 14. And the learned Needham has endeavoured to trace a resemblance between the Egyptian and Chinese hieroglyphics. And indeed it is recorded by Herodotus and Diodorus, that the great pyramids near Memphis abounded both with hieroglyphics, and also written inscriptions, recording the number of workmen employed, their expences, &c.

8. By a fortunate discovery, a stone has been recently brought from Egypt to England, on which is a triple inscription in hieroglyphic symbols, in alphabetical Egyptian letters, and lastly, an explanation of both in Greek, which may furnish a clue to decypher the rest.

From these observations, we may fairly collect, that the hieroglyphic symbols formed the sacred character of the Egyptian priests, who thereby veiled their discoveries from the vulgar and uninitiated; and consequently, that they were in reality long posterior to the use of alphabetical writing, which was often subjoined by way of explanation, and probably not earlier than B.C. 2095, in Egypt, and B.C. 2060, in China.

The second presumptive argument, "that a mixture of other nations superinduced the invention of alphabetical language," is equally contradicted by experience.

1. Ever since the first introduction of hieroglyphics into China, the labours of their literati have been spent in classing and contracting their symbols, and extending their system; and the curious and scientific nature of their classification into genera and species, by characteristic marks*, is much commended by Sir George Staunton. The whole number amounts to about 80,000 distinct symbols. Few of their scholars, however, know more than twenty or thirty thousand, and the generality are satisfied with about ten thousand.

In consequence also of "the insensible deviation of these characters from their primitive shapes," in the lapse of ages, some of their most ancient books, as the Shuking, are now almost obsolete, and unintelligible to their most skilful and sagacious grammarians. See Sablier's Essai sur les Langues, 1778, Paris.

And yet so wedded are the Chinese literati to their own awk-

* The following extract from an ancient Chinese writer, Li yang ping, given by Sir William Jones, in the Asiatic Researches, Vol. II. p. 195, is curious, and throws light on the nature and construction of Chinese hieroglyphics:—

"The ancient characters used in China were the outlines of visible objects, terrestrial and celestial; but as things merely intellectual could not be expressed by these figures, the grammarians contrived to represent the various operations of the mind by metaphors, drawn from the productions of nature. Thus the idea of roughness and of rotundity, of motion and rest, were conveyed to the eye by signs representing a mountain, the sky, a river, and the earth; the figures of the sun and moon, and the stars, differently combined, stood for smoothness and splendour, for any thing artfully wrought, or woven with delicate workmanship. Extension, growth, increase, and many other qualities, were painted in characters taken from the clouds, from the firmament, and from the vegetable part of the creation; the different ways of moving, agility and slowness, were expressed by various insects, birds, fish, and quadrupeds. In this manner, passions and sentiments were expressed by the pencil, and ideas, not subject to any sense, were exhibited to the sight; until, by degrees, new combinations were invented, new expressions added, the characters deviated insensibly from their primitive shape, and the Chinese language became not only clear and forcible, but rich and elegant in the highest degree."

How it was possible for a language to be "clear," precise, or distinct, where literal and figurative meanings of the symbols, applied with great variety and latitude, were so apt to be confounded and mistaken for each other, is difficult to conceive. See a Chinese Ode in the original, Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 273, and its literal translation and paraphrase, p. 199.

ward and embarrassing symbols, which can only be decyphered, not read; exhibiting a string of disjointed metaphors, without connecting verbs or particles, piled on each other like a wall of loose stones, without mortar or cement, that they still obstinately reject the inestimable advantages of alphabetical writing, which they might easily have learned from the European missionaries resident among them for some centuries past. The mercantile expedient for conveying English words by means of Chinese sounds expressed in their hieroglyphics, upon which Sir George Staunton builds so much, is foreign to the purpose, for it is neither pure hieroglyphic, nor alphabetical writing, but a mongrel species between both, and never can lead to the invention of the latter, from which it is so radically and essentially different. And it is strange, how this writer could be so blinded, by his sceptical prejudices against the Mosaic history, as to imagine that it could ever lead thereto; especially among such a people as the Chinese, the jealous policy of whose government prevents their intermixture with Europeans in general; and the pride of whose Mandarins, through an affectation of concealing their knowledge, probably occasioned at first their neglect of alphabetical writing, which they might have once known, but gradually lost, and their preference of the more mysterious and recondite mode of hieroglyphical.

The learned Brotier profoundly observes, "Writing diverged from Assyria to all those nations, who either through rusticity did not neglect, or through vanity did not despise, this excellent invention. Two nations, the Egyptians and Chinese, between whom Assyria lay, and who were both exceedingly alike in vices and virtues, seem to have laboured under this sort of pride. But their pride turned to the punishment of both: the stupendous monuments of the Egyptians are become unknown and obsolete; the Chinese, always children, grow old together in decyphering their characters." Brotier's Tacitus, Vol. II. p. 341, Note.

EGYPT.

This country seems to have attained an earlier and a higher degree of civilization and refinement than any other in the world. Even in Abraham's days, we find it the seat of a royal government, and a princely court, abounding with provisions, while the neighbouring countries, and even the fertile regions of Palestine, were exposed to frequent famines. Gen. xii. 10. In his grandson Jacob's time, there was a settled caravan trade carried on through Palestine, from Arabia and the east, for spicery, balm, and myrrh, and probably also for slaves. Gen. xxxvii. 25. Its superior fertility, indeed, was occasioned by the annual inundation of the Nile, and the irrigation of their lands. Deut. xi. 10.

The length of Egypt was very disproportionate to its breadth: its extent, from the mouths of the Nile to Syene, the border of Nubia, under the tropic of Cancer, was about 500 miles; but it was little wider than the valley through which the Nile ran in Upper Egypt, until it reached the Lower Egypt, at some distance above the head or vertex of the Delta, where the valley expanded itself. The Upper Egypt, or Thebaid, seems to be called PATHROS in Scripture, as distinguished from the Lower, properly called CAPHTOR, or Egypt. Compare Isa. xi. 11. with Ezek. xxix. 14; and Jer. xlv. 1. with Ezek. xxx. 14—16. Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4.

THE LAND OF GOSHEN.

This was the most fertile pasture-ground in the whole of Lower Egypt: thence called Goshen, from Gush, in Arabic, signifying “a heart,” or whatsoever is choice or precious. There was also a Goshen in the territory of the tribe of Judah, so called for the same reason. Josh. x. 41. Hence Joseph recommended it to his family as “the best of the land,” Gen. xlvii. 11. and “the fat of the land,” Gen. xlv. 18.

The land of Goshen lay along the most easterly branch of the Nile, and on the east side of it; for it is evident, that at the time of the Exode, the Israelites did not cross the Nile. In ancient times, the fertile land was considerably more extensive, both in length and breadth, than at present, in consequence of the general failure of the eastern branches of the Nile; the main body of the river verging more and more to the west continually, and deepening the channels on that side. Rennel's Herod. p. 537.

ZOAN, OR TANIS.

This appears to have been an ancient city. To raise the antiquity of Kiriath-Arba, or Hebron, the chief residence of Abraham and his family, it is said to have been built “seven years before Zoan.” Numb. xiii. 22. It was one of the royal cities, for the plagues of Egypt were inflicted "in the field of Zoan." Psalm lxxviii. 12. And it continued perhaps to be a seat of government even in Isaiah's time. "Surely the princes of Zoan are fools; the counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish." Isa. xix. 11. צֹאן , Tsoan, is constantly rendered by the Septuagint, Tanin, or Tanis; according to the same analogy that Tsur was called Τύρος , or Tyre, by the Greeks. But Tanis was situated near the mouth of the second branch of the Nile, next the Pelusiac, thence called the Tanitic.

ON, OR HELIOPOLIS.

The father-in-law of Joseph was high-priest of On, Gen. xli. 45; there rendered, Heliopolis, by the Septuagint version, and noticed also by Herodotus; who says, that "the Heliopolitans were reckoned the wisest of the Egyptians." This was the city of Moses, according to Berosus; and well accounts for his scriptural character, that "he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." Acts vii. 22. Heliopolis was the Greek translation of Beth-shemesh, "the house, or city of the Sun," as it was called by Jeremiah, "Bethshemesh, in the land of Egypt" (xliii. 13.), to distinguish it from another Beth-shemesh, in the land of Canaan. It was nicknamed Beth Aven, "the house of vanity," or idolatry, by the Jews, Ezek. xxx. 17. from Bethel, where Jeroboam erected one of the golden calves; thence called Beth-aven, Hos. x. 5. Aun, or On, and Aven, being only different pronunciations of the same Hebrew word, און , according as Vau, the middle letter, was sounded as a vowel, O or U, or as a consonant V. This city was probably near the royal city Zoan, and only fifteen stadia from the sea, according to Herodotus.

RAMESES.

Benjamin of Tudela, in the twelfth century, was informed by the Egyptian Jews, that this was the same as Heliopolis; but Niebuhr thinks that Rameses lay to the north-west of it, where there is a heap of ruins, about four leagues from Kahira, or Cairo, in the way to Suez, called Tel el Jhüd, or Tourbet el Jhüd. Descript. de l'Arabie, p. 351. Rameses was in the land of Goshen, called also "the land of Rameses." Gen. xlvii. 11.

SIN, OR PELUSIUM.

Sin, in Arabic, signifies "mud," and was therefore the same as Pelusium, from πηλος, “mud.” Ezekiel styles Sin, “the strength of Egypt,” (xxx. 15.) and Suidas, “the key of Egypt,” or its strong barrier on the side of Syria and Arabia. Near it, southwards, was PIBESETH, OR BUBASTUS.

Mentioned in the neighbourhood of On, or Aven, by Ezekiel (xxx. 17.) which was the Bubastus of the Greeks; whence the eastern branch of the Nile was indiscriminately called the Bubastic, or the Pelusiæc.

TAHAHPANES, TAHPANES, OR HANES,

Was the same as Daphnæ Pelusiæcæ, noticed by Herodotus. Here the prophet Jeremiah resided in his exile, (xliii. 8.) Isaiah abridged it to Hanes, (xxx. 4.)

MIGDOL.

This word signifies “a tower,” and was a frontier town of Lower Egypt, towards the Red Sea, between which and that sea the Israelites encamped, Exod. xiv. 1. It is there rendered by the Septuagint Magdolos: and there also Herodotus represents Nekus, or Pharaoh Necho, as gaining a great victory over the Jews, when Josiah was killed; mistaking Magdolos for Megiddo. Jeremiah represents it as belonging to Egypt Proper, (xlvi. 14.) and in the neighbourhood of Tahpanes, or Daphnæ. The itinerary of Antoninus reckons it a little to the south of the Delta, about twelve miles from Pelusium.

NOPH, MENOPH, OR MEMPHIS.

This great city lay somewhat above the vertex of the Delta, or parting of the channels of the Nile, upon quitting Upper Egypt. It is called by the Arabs at the present day, Menoph, whence Memphis, which is the Septuagint rendering of Noph, in Jer. xlvi. 14. and elsewhere.

The founder of Memphis, according to Herodotus, was Menes, the first king of Egypt, who turned the channel of the river, and built the city in the ancient bed, where the streight between the Arabian and Libyan mountains is narrowest. B. ii. It was probably, therefore, the most ancient city of Lower Egypt, and older than Zoan, or Tanis; which probably was not recovered from the sea till a good while after. Herodotus thought that the valley above Memphis, where it widens, was once a bay of the sea, but was gradually raised by the alluvions of the Nile; which also, in his opinion, formed the Delta. And this tends strongly to confirm the opinion, that the Mediterranean was once much higher than at present, and that it was lowered by the disruption of the streights of Gibraltar.

The learned Doctor Shaw, in his Geographical Observations on Egypt, p. 341, combats the opinion of Bochart, that Zoan was the residence of Pharaoh, during the plagues of Egypt, from the local circumstance of "a strong west wind blowing the locusts into the Red Sea;" (Exod. x. 19.) which, says he, agrees better to the site of Memphis, which lay westward of the Red Sea; whereas a westerly wind from Zoan would blow them into the Mediterranean, or else into the land of the Philistines. But the original, Ruah Yam, is "a sea wind," or a wind blowing from the Mediterranean, and was therefore rather a northerly wind, which would answer much better to Zoan, near the sea, than to Memphis, inland; and was also better adapted to drive the locusts along the Red Sea rather lengthwise than across it, and so more completely immerse them therein.

But why might not both have been royal cities, even allowing Memphis to have been the capital? Pharaoh had cattle in the land of Goshen, (Gen. xlvii. 6.) which was in the neighbourhood of Zoan; and "the princes of Zoan," and "the princes of Noph," are both classed together as "fools" or idolaters. Isa. xix. 13. Zoan perhaps might have been a pleasanter winter residence when the river was low, which was the season in which the plagues were inflicted.

Memphis stood on the west side of the river, and opposite to Old Cairo. New Cairo, or Grand Cairo, lies near the Old, to the south, at the foot of the hill on which the castle stands, in a worse situation, being farther from the river, and exposed to more sultry heat. Cairo is a corruption of Kahira, signifying in Arabic, "the city," by way of eminence.

NO, NO-AMMON, DIOSPOLIS, OR THEBES.

This was the capital city of Upper Egypt, and was probably the most ancient of all, built by the first settlers, Misraim and his family; whence Egypt, in general, is styled the land of Misraim," in the original Scripture, though usually rendered, "the land of Egypt."

Its Egyptian name was No, (Ezek. xxx. 14.) to which was added Amon, or Amoun, a title of Jove among the Egyptians, according to Herodotus. Whence אֱמוֹן מִנָּה should not be rendered, “the multitude of No,” (Jer. xlvi. 25.) but “Amon [the god] of No ;” and which, accordingly, is rendered Diospolis, “the city of Jove,” by the Septuagint version of Ezek. xxx. 15. It is reversed, מִנָּה אֱמוֹן [“the god] of No, Amon, (Nahum iii. 8.) and then variously rendered by the Septuagint, “the portion of Ammon.”

It has been mistakenly supposed that this term denoted Ham, the youngest son of Noah, and the father of Misraim. Its real signification is “Truth,” or “Veracity,” whence THE LORD is styled אֱלֹהֵי אֱמוּנָה, Æl Amunah, “God of Truth.” Deut. xxxii. 4. According to Plato, “the secret and invisible creative power supreme, among the Egyptians, was called Ammon ;” and Plutarch agrees, that it signified “hidden.” See Cudworth’s Intellectual System, p. 339. And this also was an epithet of the true God : “Why askest thou my name, seeing it is secret ?” Judg. xiii. 18. And this perfectly accords with the famous inscription on the temple of Neith, or “Wisdom,” at Sais, in the Lower Egypt, recorded by Plutarch. See Cudworth, p. 341.

Εγώ εἰμι Πάν το γεγονός και ον και εσομενον
Και τον εμον πεπλον ουδεις πω θνητος απεκαλυψεν.

“I am all that hath been, and is, and will be ;
And my veil no mortal yet uncovered.”

Hence perhaps the meaning of the ancient aphorism may best be explained, “Truth lies hid in a well ;” as primarily relating to the incomprehensible nature of the Supreme Being, “THE ONLY TRUE GOD,” (John xvii. 3.) whom the Egyptians styled Σκοτος αγνωστον, “darkness unknowable,” and the Athenians, a Saite colony, Αγνωστος Θεος, “THE UNKNOWABLE GOD.” Acts xvii. 23. Its other Grecian name, Thebes, was probably derived from תְּבֵה, Thebeh, “an ark,” like Noah’s (Gen. vi. 14.) the memory of which would naturally be preserved by the first settlers after the deluge, in all parts of the earth ; and accordingly we find Thebets (תְּבֵת) in Canaan, called Thebez, (Judg. ix. 50.) Thebes in Bœotia, and Thibet in Eastern Asia, all from the same root. And Bruce observes, that “the figure of the temples in Thebes do not seem to be far removed from the idea given us of the ark.” Vol. II. p. 31. There he found the ruins of four prodigious temples, all of them in appearance more ancient, but neither so entire nor so magnificent as those of Dendera, covered with hieroglyphics. Vol. I. p. 124.

SYENE.

This was the most southern city of the Thebais, bordering on Nubia. The prophet Ezekiel describes the whole extent of Egypt from north to south, "from Migdol to Syene, even to the borders of Cush." Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6. Our English Bible incorrectly renders Migdol, "tower," instead of the town near the Red Sea, noticed before, and also by Jer. xlv. 1; xlv. 14. The affix ה, in סונה, is local "to Syene."

CUSH, or ETHIOPIA,

Usually rendered Ethiopia in our English Bible, has a very extensive signification. It comprehends all the southern and eastern borders of Egypt. In the foregoing passage of Ezekiel, it plainly denotes African Ethiopia, or Nubia and Abyssinia; and in many other passages: Isa. xviii. 1; xx. 3; Ezek. xxx. 5, &c. But in others it must signify Asiatic Ethiopia, or Arabia, as in the description of the garden of Eden, Gen. ii. 13. The wife of Moses was contemptuously styled a "Cushite," or Ethiopian of Arabia. Numb. xii. 1. And where, "Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya," are recited in order, the second must denote Arabia. Ezek. xxxviii. 5.

Herodotus, in his curious catalogue of the various nations composing the army of Xerxes, distinguishes the long-haired Eastern or Asiatic Ethiopians from the woolly-headed Western or African; B. vii. Both being descendants of Cush, a roving and enterprising race, who gradually extended their settlements from Chusistan, "the land of Cush," or Susiana, on the coasts of the Persian gulph, through Arabia, to the Red Sea; and thence crossed over to Africa, and occupied its eastern coast, and gradually penetrated into the interior of Abyssinia.

THE PYRAMIDS OF EGYPT.

These stupendous monuments of ancient grandeur and ancient tyranny, appear to be of the remotest antiquity. Herodotus, who visited Egypt about B.C. 448, and Diodorus afterwards, about B.C. 60, found various and contradictory reports in circulation respecting their age. The Egyptian priests, wishing perhaps to conceal the early disgrace and slavery of their nation, ascribed the building of the two great pyramids of Memphis, or Geeza, to their native kings, Cheops and Cephrenes; of whom, the former began to reign about B.C. 1082, according to the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology. But the people told a different story: "The Egyptians," says Herodotus, "have so great an aversion to the memory of their founders, that no one will repeat their names; but they attribute their pyramids to one Philition, a shepherd, who kept his cattle in these parts." Diodorus too observes: "Concerning the builders of these pyramids there is no agreement of opinion, neither among the inhabitants nor historians; for some say, that they were built by the foregoing kings a thousand years ago, [B.C. 1060.] others, about three thousand four hundred years, [B.C. 3460.]"

Truth lies nearly between: for, according to Manetho, compared with the Hindu records, the first pyramid was built about B.C. 2095, by Apachnes, the third king of that Shepherd dynasty, who invaded and conquered Egypt from Arabia, in the reign of Timaus, or Thamuz, who were called Yksos, or "Shepherd kings," by the Egyptians, and Pali, or Palli, "Shepherds," in the Sanscrit language, by the Hindus; whence probably was derived the Philition, of Herodotus, signifying not a proper name, but an appellation, "Shepherd." See the Egyptian Chronology. The Arabs call them Dsjebel Faroûn, or "Pharaoh's mountains."

The labour of constructing these factitious mountains was immense. "The founder of the great pyramid," says Herodotus, from the priests themselves, "shut up all the temples, and interdicted the public sacrifices." He could not therefore be a native prince, of the same religion with the Egyptians. "He oppressed the Egyptians with hard labour;" probably from the barbarous policy of breaking their spirits, and diminishing their numbers. "He appointed some to receive the stones that were dug out of the quarries in the Arabian mountains, in order to be transported in vessels across the river, when brought down to the Nile; and ordered others to convey them from thence to the mount called Libycus, [upon which the pyramids were built.] About a hundred thousand men were employed in this laborious work; ten thousand every three months; [and consequently the whole number in 30 months, or two years and half.] And ten years were spent in building a bridge, [or causeway, across the ancient bed of the Nile] which I think to be a work little less considerable than the pyramid; for that bridge [or causeway] is five stadia in length, sixty feet in breadth, and its greatest elevation forty-eight feet; all built of polished stone, and carved with figures of various animals. The pyramids and subterraneous vaults within the hill, on which the pyramids stand, were the labour of twenty years." Consequently the whole time, according to this account of Herodotus, was thirty-two years and half.

The first and largest pyramid, according to Diodorus, employed three hundred and sixty thousand men for twenty years; and Pliny relates the same, and that the three pyramids were built in the space of seventy-eight years and four months, which is scarcely credible.

"On the first pyramid," says Herodotus, "an inscription is seen, declaring in Egyptian characters, how much was expended in radishes, onions, and garlick, for the workmen; which the interpreter, as well as I remember, told me amounted to no less than the sum of sixteen hundred talents of silver." Here is the testimony of an eye-witness to the engravings and inscriptions on the causeway, and on the pyramid, though since defaced by time. The characters on the pyramid, to express the vegetables and money, could not, surely, be any other than literal or alphabetical.

The base of the great pyramid, according to Herodotus, was 800 Grecian, or about 700 English feet long, and the height equal thereto. This measurement of the base agrees with those of the most skilful and intelligent modern travellers, but not the height, which is under 500. Herodotus, therefore, reckoned by the sloping side, representing each side as an equilateral triangle.

This pyramid ends at the top in a platform about twelve or sixteen feet square, which, viewed from the bottom, is diminished nearly to a point. A strong man cannot throw a stone from the top, so as to fall beyond the bottom. And it covers, by calculation, at least an area of eleven English acres!

The great Pyramid seems to have been originally cased with polished marble. After mentioning the enormous stones employed in the work, and the mode of raising them from the lower steps, or ranges, to the higher; Herodotus adds, that first, the highest range was finished off, (εκποιεῖν) then the rest, in succession; and lastly, the lowest. Savary, and others, have found remains of mortar, and splinters of white marble, on several of the steps. And Niebuhr, who denies that they were cased, yet acknowledges, that near the third Pyramid he found a multitude of stones of granite; "which," says he, "might lead us to conjecture, that formerly it had been cased in part with this stone, as the ancient historians have remarked." The Hindu records represent them as three mountains of Gold, Silver, and Gems; or as cased with yellow, white, and spotted marbles, respectively. See Wilford's Essay on Egypt and the Nile, Asiat. Research. Vol. III. p. 228.

The entrance of the great Pyramid, leads by some steep and difficult passages to an apartment which is thirty-two feet long, sixteen feet wide, and nineteen feet high. The roof is flat, consisting of nine stones only; whereof seven in the middle are each four feet wide, and sixteen feet long; all laid athwart over the breadth of the chamber, with their ends resting upon the walls on each side.

At the end of this chamber stands an empty tomb all of one stone, three feet and an inch wide, and seven feet two inches long. The stone, says Le Brun, is above five inches thick, extraordinarily hard, and like porphyry: it is well polished, and so very beautiful, says Thevenot, that it is very neat when polished, which makes many break off pieces of it to make seals of. There is no cover to the tomb. The inhabitants of the country say, that the king, who ordered that Pyramid to be built, was never buried there. This tomb, if intended for one, must have been set in the chamber before it was roofed, as the passages thereto are too narrow to admit it through.

In the year 1763, Mr. Davison, then consul at Algiers, accompanied Mr. Wortley Montague into Egypt, and spent eighteen months at Cairo; during which, he made frequent visits to the pyramids; and was so fortunate as to discover a second chamber in the great pyramid, directly over that which contains the tomb; which had escaped the notice of former travellers, even of Maillet, who had been above forty times in the pyramids; and also of later travellers. Niebuhr could not find it, though told of it by Mr. Maynard, who accompanied Mr. Davison. He, therefore, considered its existence as problematical. Niebuhr, Voyage en Arabie, Tom. I. p. 161. But it was lately discovered by an enterprising traveller, M. Caviglia, the master of a mercantile vessel in the Mediterranean trade, who visited the pyramid in January, 1817 ; and found this upper chamber five feet longer than the lower, but of the same breadth ; its sides and roof coated with red granite of the finest polish, and the floor uneven, composed of the same blocks of granite which formed the roof of the room below.

The supposed well in this pyramid, which was imagined to communicate with a canal from the Nile, was descended first by Davison, and afterwards by Caviglia. It consisted of three separate shafts ; the first, of 22 feet depth, and at the distance of about 8 feet laterally from its bottom, a second shaft of 34 feet depth ; and, beside this, a third shaft of 99 feet, which, added together, made the whole depth 155 feet. But this was dry at the bottom ; where it was found, by the latter, to communicate, by a horizontal passage, with the principal entrance or main passage of the pyramid, which he succeeded in clearing of stones and rubbish, (apparently placed there to obstruct it) ; and after he had opened this continuation of the main passage, sloping downwards in the same inclined angle, to the distance of 200 feet from its commencement, he found a door way which opened upon the bottom of the well. The new passage, however, did not terminate there, but continuing to the distance of 23 feet beyond it, in the same angle of inclination, it became narrower, and took a horizontal direction for about 28 feet farther, where it opened into a spacious chamber, immediately under the central point of the pyramid. This new chamber is 66 feet long, by 27 broad, with a flat roof ; and when first discovered, was nearly filled with loose stones and rubbish, which, with considerable labour, M. Caviglia removed. The platform of the floor, dug out of the rock, is irregular, nearly one half of the length from the entrance on the eastern end being level, and about 15 feet from the ceiling, while in the middle it descends five feet lower ; in which part there is a hollow space, bearing all the appearance of the commencement of a well or shaft. From hence it rises to the western end, so that, at this extremity, there is scarcely room between the floor and the ceiling to stand upright ; the whole chamber having the appearance of an unfinished excavation. Some Roman characters, rudely formed, had been marked with the flame of a candle on the rock, part of which having mouldered away, rendered the words illegible. No trace of a sarcophagus appeared in this third, and deeply excavated chamber, which might, perhaps, have been used for the performance of more solemn and secret mysteries.

Mr. Salt, the British consul-general at Cairo, who had the merit of promoting the discoveries of M. Caviglia, and also of M. Belzoni, and of communicating them to the public, through the medium of the Quarterly Review, attributes the spoliation of the sarcophagus in the first chamber, of its contents, to Al Mamoun, the son of Caliph Haroun al Raschid, prompted by the treasure-searching spirit of that age, about A.D. 813.

The circumstance of not finding any bones in the sarcophagus of the pyramid of Cheops, combined with the supposed communication of the well with the waters of the Nile, led the traveller, Shaw, to conclude rather hastily, that the pyramids were never intended for sepulchral monuments, according to the representations of Herodotus, Diodorus, and Strabo; and the ingenious but fanciful Bryant, thence imagined that they were designed for water-temples, consecrated to the divinity of the Nile; and the sarcophagus, no other than a cistern or water-trough, for holding the sacred elements drawn up from the river. And this hypothesis was adopted in the first edition of this work. But the supposed well has no communication with the river, and does not descend within thirty feet of its level: and the discovery of bones in the sarcophagus of the principal chamber of the second pyramid, supposed to be built by Cephrenes, and lately opened, has decided the truth of the ancient tradition.

This second pyramid was opened by the sagacity and persevering industry of an Italian traveller, M. Belzoni, at his own cost principally, March 2d, 1818, and a curious account of his process, furnished by Mr. Salt, is communicated in the Quarterly Review. Exactly under the top of the pyramid, and in the centre of its base, he discovered the great chamber, 46 feet 3 inches long, 16 feet 3 inches wide, and 23 feet 6 inches high, for the most part cut out of the rock, except that part of the roof towards the western end. In the midst, he observed a sarcophagus of granite, partly buried in the ground, to the level of the floor, 8 feet long, 3 feet 6 inches wide, and 2 feet 3 inches deep inside, surrounded by large blocks of granite, being placed apparently to guard it from being taken away, which could not be effected without great labour. The lid of it had been opened: he found in it only a few bones of a skeleton, which he supposed to be human, and, in all probability, those of Cephrenes, the reported builder of this pyramid. On the wall of the western side of this chamber, is an Arabic inscription, testifying that 'this pyramid was opened by the Masters Mahomet El Agar and Otman, and that it was inspected in the presence of the Sultan Ali Mahomet I. Ugloch *.' Part of the floor of this chamber had been removed in different places, evidently in search of treasure, by some of those who had found their way into it.

In this pyramid a second chamber has also been discovered, lower than the first, and nearer the entrance, which is 32 feet long, 9 feet 9 inches wide, 8 and 6 feet high.

Shortly after the opening of the pyramid, Major Fitz-Clarence, in his journey over-land from India, arrived at Cairo, and visited the central chamber, and brought away a few fragments of the bones in the sarcophagus; one of which proved to be the lower extremity of the thigh bone, where it comes in contact with the knee joint. This singular relic he presented to the Prince Regent on his return home, and the Prince submitted it to the inspection of that eminent surgeon, Sir Everard Home. Sir Everard, not entertaining a doubt of its belonging to a human skeleton, took it to the Musæum of the College of Surgeons, that by adjusting it with the same part of different sized skeletons, he might be enabled to form some estimate of the comparative size of the ancient Egyptians and modern Europeans. On a closer and more laborious inspection, however, the fragment was found to agree with none of them: and it finally appeared, that instead of forming any part of the thigh-bone of a human body, it actually made part of that of a cow.

And to corroborate this evidence, M. Belzoni discovered a grand catacomb at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, called Biban el Moluk, "the tombs," or, rather, "gates of the kings," which extended 309 feet from the entrance in front to the innermost chamber, the whole cut out of the living rock; the sides of which were as white as snow, covered with paintings of well shaped figures in al fresco, as fresh as if they had been just laid on, and with hieroglyphics quite perfect. In one of its numerous chambers, he found a sarcophagus of alabaster, exquisitely beautiful, 9 feet 5 inches long, by 3 feet 9 inches wide, and 2 feet 1 inch deep, carved within and without with hieroglyphics and figures in intaglio, nearly in a perfect state; sounding like a bell, and as transparent as glass. From the extraordinary magnificence of this tomb, M. Belzoni conceives that it must be the depository of the remains of Apis: in which idea he is the more confirmed by having found the carcass of a bull, embalmed with asphaltum, in the innermost chamber.

This decides the point, that the pyramids of Egypt, and the subterraneous caverns of Thebes, were alike designed as sepulchral monuments of their bestial gods, and probably of their kings and priests also. The celebrated Labyrinth, near the lake Mæris, which Herodotus admired still more than the pyramids, in its fifteen hundred subterraneous chambers, which he was not permitted to enter, according to the information of the priests, contained the bodies of the kings who built the Labyrinth, and also of the Holy Crocodiles. B. II. §. 148.

The second pyramid of Cephrenes, is the only one which retains a part of its outside casing, from the top, about a third part of its distance downwards; what remains entire, is of a white calcareous stone, which has been usually called marble, but is, in fact, a fine close-grained lime-stone, susceptible of a high polish.

The remains of the covering of the third pyramid of Mycerinus, are still scattered about its base, and particularly near the angle; they are of red granite.

Behind this stands a fourth pyramid, a hundred feet lower than the third. These four great pyramids are surrounded by an immense number of smaller pyramids and tumuli, like the graves in a church-yard round the church, extending on the north and on the south, along the western bank of the Nile, as far as the eye can reach.

Several of these edifices were cleared of the sand and rubbish with which they were choaked, by M. Caviglia, and found to consist of different numbers of apartments, variously disposed, but similarly decorated with bas-reliefs and paintings, according, perhaps, to the wealth or caprice of those who erected them. One in particular, from the delicacy of its colours, its general pleasing effect, and superior style of execution, was deemed deserving of the closest attention. In all the mausoleums which they opened, were found fragments of bitumen, great quantities of mummy cloth, and of human bones, which seemed to remove all doubt of their having served the purpose of entombing the dead.

It deserves to be noticed, that in some one apartment or another of all these monumental edifices, was a deep shaft or well, from the bottom of which a narrow passage conducted to a subterranean chamber. One of these shafts cleared out by M. Caviglia, was 60 feet deep, and in the chamber a little to the south of the lower extremity, was standing, without a lid, a plain but highly finished sarcophagus, of the same dimensions nearly as that in the pyramid of Cheops, but of a superior polish. This discovery supplies a strong argument in favour of the pyramids being tombs for the kings who constructed them, and also for their animal gods, the Apis, &c.

Many of these sepulchral edifices seem to have been constructed of the dilapidated casing of the great pyramids; for their walls consist of the same sort of stone, and many of the fragments are covered with hieroglyphics, particularly the parts round the door-ways. One of these stones, bearing an inscription of hieroglyphics and figures, was observed to be built into the walls upside down: a curious circumstance, which proves beyond a doubt, that it had constituted part of some other edifice previously to being placed in its present position.

There are no traces of hieroglyphics at present discoverable upon any of the pyramids. But that they formerly abounded with such, may be inferred from the reports of the ancient Historians, Herodotus, Diodorus, Pliny, &c. At a later period, Abdollatiph, an Arabian physician, who visited Egypt in A.D. 1190, found abundance. "On the stones of the two greater pyramids," says he, "are ancient hieroglyphic inscriptions, but unknown: nor is there any person in the cities of Egypt, who can assert that they are now to be understood. The inscriptions are very numerous; so that if such as are found on these two pyramids alone were to be copied, they would fill ten thousand volumes."

These new and curious discoveries, satisfactorily account for the extraordinary dilapidation and spoliation of the original coating of the great pyramids, since the time of Herodotus, and still later, of Abdollatiph. The casing was torn down, and applied to the construction of the small pyramids, or oblong sepulchral edifices of later ages.

It is probable, however, that the tumuli, or little mounds, which also abound in this vast cemetery, are nothing more than similar buildings of higher antiquity, mouldered away to their present shape; or that they were constructed, originally, of more perishable materials, like the brick pyramid of DASHOUR, which has every appearance of soon changing its form into that of the rude tumulus. Herodotus, our surest guide, when he speaks from his own information, reports the following remarkable inscription thereon: "Do not compare me with the pyramids of stone; for I excel them as much as Jupiter excels the other gods: for those who built me thrust poles into a lake, and collecting the mud which adhered to them, they made bricks of it, and thus they constructed me."

This pyramid is generally allowed to have been built by Asychis, or Bocchoris, whose reign began, B.C. 815, according to the ensuing rectification of Egyptian Chronology.

The recent discoveries of Davison, Belzoni, and Caviglia, are circumstantially detailed in the Quarterly Review, September, 1818, in the Article of Light's Travels and Addendum; and January, 1819, under the Article of Antiquities of Egypt.

That the Pyramids were originally cased with marble, or granite, is proved by the testimony of Abdollatiph: who has also demonstrated the stupendous labour and skill employed in the construction of these factitious mountains; by a mad and fruitless project for pulling them down, attempted by Malec al Azir Othman, son and successor of the famous Sultan, Saladin Joseph ebn Job, the real builder of Joseph's famous well at Cairo, vulgarly attributed to the patriarch and prime minister of Egypt.

This young prince, at the persuasion of some foolish favourites, wished to immortalize himself by pulling down the Pyramids. And accordingly began with the smallest, built of red granite. Having collected a great number of engineers, masons, and labourers, he ordered them to demolish that Pyramid, and commissioned the grandees of the kingdom to superintend the execution of it. They immediately pitched their tents upon the spot, collected artists and workmen from all parts, and maintained them at an enormous expence. Here they continued for eight months, with horses and men: pulling down, in the course of an entire day, with the utmost labour and difficulty, one or two stones at the utmost. The labourers above forced out every stone with wedges, levers, and iron crows; while those below pulled it down with cables and ropes. When it fell, so violent was its fall, that the sound was heard at a surprising distance, the mountain trembled and the earth shook; and the stone buried itself in the sand; whence they extracted it at length, with additional labour and fatigue. Then they broke it in pieces with wedges, and conveyed the fragments in carriages to the further end of the mountain, at no great distance. Having thus spent much time to little purpose, their resources failed, their difficulties increased, and at last they were obliged to desist, filled with dejection, confusion, and despair. All they effected was to deface the Pyramid, and betray the weakness and impotence of the attempt. Should any one view the stones that are taken down, he would imagine that the whole Pyramid had been destroyed, so great is the mass; but if he should then view the Pyramid itself, he would scarcely believe that it had been at all injured; for only a small part of one of its sides is demolished. Perceiving the prodigious toil it cost them to pull down every single stone, I asked the superintendant of the masons, says Abdollariph, Whether, if they were offered a thousand pieces of gold to replace any stone in its proper and original position, they would be able to do it? He answered, swearing by the living God, that though they should be offered double that sum, the thing would be impossible." This happened in the year of the Hegira 593, [A.D. 1197.] See Abdollariph's History of Egypt, translated by Professor White, of Oxford, in Latin; or the Monthly Review, April, 1802, p. 344.

THE PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA BY THE ISRAELITES.

The precise place of this passage, when the Israelites were thrust out of Egypt in haste by the Egyptians, after the last tremendous plague of the destruction of the first-born, has been much contested by Geographers and Travellers. Some place it near Suez, at the head of the Gulph: others, with more probability, about ten hours journey lower down, at Clyasma, or the valley of Bedeä. See Niebuhr's and Bryant's Maps of the Red Sea.

The day before the passage, by the Divine command, "the Israelites encamped beside Pi-ha-hiroth, between Migdol and the Sea, over against Baal-zephon." Exod. xiv. 2; Numb. xxxiii. 7.

Pi-ha-hiroth signifies "the mouth of the ridge," or chain of mountains, which line the western coast of the Red Sea, called Attaka ("Deliverance;") in which was a gap, which formed the extremity of the valley of Bedea, ending at the sea eastward, and running westwards to some distance, towards Cairo; Migdol, signifying "a tower," probably lay in that direction; and Baal-zephon, signifying "the Northern Baal," was probably a temple on an opposite promontory, built on the eastern coast of the Red Sea.

And the modern names of places in the vicinity tend to confirm these expositions of the ancient.

Besides Attaka, on the eastern coast opposite, is a head-land, called Ras Musa, or "the Cape of Moses;" somewhat lower, Hamam Faraun, "Pharaoh's springs;" below Girondel, a reach of the Gulph, called Birket Faraun; and the general name of the Gulph is Bahr al Kolsun, "the Bay of Submersion." These names indicate that the passage was considerably below Suez, according to the tradition of the natives.

The depth and breadth of the Gulph, from Suez downwards, is thus described:—"I have not found," says Niebuhr, "in this sea, from Suez southwards, any bank or isthmus under water. When we departed from Suez, we sailed as far as Girondel, without fear of encountering any such. We had in the first place, (the road of Suez) four fathom and half; at three German leagues from Suez, and in the middle of the Gulph, four fathoms; and about Girondel, near the shore, even to ten fathoms." Description de l'Arabie, p. 355. Bruce also, describing the place of passage, opposite Ras Musa, or a little below it, says, "there is here about fourteen fathom of water in the channel, and about nine in the sides, and good anchorage every where. The farthest side (the Eastern) is a low sandy coast, and a very easy landing place." Travels, &c. Vol. I. p. 244. Shaw reckons the breadth of the Gulph, at this place, about 10 miles; Niebuhr, three leagues and more; Bruce, something less than four leagues: we may therefore estimate it about 12 miles, from their joint reports. But this space the host of the Israelites could easily have passed in the course of a night; from the evening to the ensuing "morning watch," or dawn of day, according to the Mosaical account. And surely the depth of the sea was no impediment, when the LORD “divided it by a strong east wind, which blew across the sea all that night, and made [the bottom of] the sea dry land; and the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them, on their right hand and on their left.” Exod. xiv. 21—27.

In the queries of Michaelis, sent to Niebuhr, when in Egypt, it was proposed to him to enquire upon the spot, “Whether there were not some ridges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army at particular times may pass over? Secondly, Whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly all Summer from the north-west, could not blow so violently against the Sea as to keep it back on a heap; so that the Israelites might have passed without a miracle.” And a copy of these queries was left also for Bruce, to join his enquiries likewise. His observations on which, are excellent.

“I must confess, however learned the gentlemen were who proposed these doubts, I did not think they merited any attention to solve them. This passage is told us by Scripture to be a miraculous one; and if so, we have nothing to do with natural causes. If we do not believe Moses, we need not believe the transaction at all, seeing that it is from his authority alone we derive it. If we believe in God, that He made the sea, we must believe he could divide it when He sees proper reason; and of that He must be the only judge. It is no greater miracle to divide the Red Sea, than to divide the river Jordan.

“If the Etesian wind, blowing from the north-west in Summer, could keep up the sea as a wall on the right, or to the south, of fifty feet high; still the difficulty would remain of building the wall on the left hand, or to the north. Besides, water standing in that position for a day must have lost the nature of fluid. Whence came that cohesion of particles which hindered that wall to escape at the sides? This is as great a miracle as that of Moses. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before and since, from the same causes. Yet Diodorus Siculus, Lib. III. p. 122, says, The Troglodytes, the indigenious inhabitants of that very spot, had a tradition from father to son, from their very earliest ages, that once this division of the sea did happen there; and that, after leaving its bottom some time dry, the sea again came back, and covered it with great fury *. The words of this author are of the most remarkable kind : we cannot think this Hea-then is writing in favour of Revelation : he knew not Moses, nor says a word about Pharaoh and his host ; but records the miracle of the division of the sea in words nearly as strong as those of Moses, from the mouths of unbiassed, undesigning pagans.

“ Were all these difficulties surmounted, what could we do with the pillar of fire ? The answer is, We should not believe it. Why then believe the passage at all ? We have no authority for the one, but what is for the other : it is altogether contrary to the ordinary nature of things ; and if not a miracle, it must be a fable.” P. 244—246.

Still, such sceptical queries have their use ; they lead to a stricter investigation of facts, and thereby tend strongly to confirm the veracity of the history they meant to impeach. Thus it appears, from the accurate observations of Niebuhr and Bruce, that there is no ledge of rocks running across the Gulph any where, to afford a shallow passage. And the second query, about the Etesian, or northerly wind, is refuted by the express mention of a strong easterly wind blowing across, and scooping out a dry passage ; not that it was necessary for OMNIPOTENCE to employ it there as an instrument, any more than at Jordan : but it seems to be introduced in the Sacred History by way of anticipation, to exclude the natural agency that might in after times be employed for solving the miracle ; and it is remarkable that the monsoon in the Red Sea blows the summer half of the year from the north ; the winter half, from the south : neither of which could produce the miracle in question.

Wishing to diminish, though not to deny, the miracle, Niebuhr adopts the opinion of those who contend for a higher passage near Suez. “ For,” says he, “ the miracle would be less if they crossed the sea there, than near Bedeá. But whosoever should suppose that the multitude of the Israelites could be able to cross it here without a prodigy would deceive himself : for even in our days, no caravan passes that way to go from Cairo to Mount Sinai, although it would shorten the journey considerably. The passage would have been naturally more difficult for the Israelites some thousands of years back, when the Gulph was probably larger, deeper, and more extended towards the north: for in all appearance the water has retired, and the ground near this end has been raised by the sands of the neighbouring desert." P. 354.

But it sufficiently appears, even from Niebuhr's own statement, that the passage of the Israelites could not have taken place near Suez: for 1. He evidently confounded the town of Kolsum, the ruins of which he places near Suez, and where he supposed the passage to be made, with the bay of Kolsum, which began about 45 miles lower down; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved, from the astronomical observations of Ptolomy and Ulug Beigh, made at Heroum, the ancient head of the Gulph. See his Plagues of Egypt, p. 371, 372.

2. Instead of crossing the Sea at or near Ethan, their second station, the Israelites "turned" southwards, along the western shore; and their third station at Pihahiroth, or Bedea, was at least a full day's journey below Ethan; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved from Scripture. Exod. xiv. 2. And it was this unexpected change in the direction of their march, and the apparently disadvantageous situation in which they were then placed, "entangled in the land, and shut in by the wilderness," with a deep sea in front, the mountains of Attaka on the sides, and the enemy in their rear, that tempted the Egyptians to pursue them through the valley of Bedea, by the direct route from Cairo; who "overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pihahiroth, opposite to Baalzephon." Exod. xiv. 2—9.

Niebuhr wonders how the Israelites could suffer themselves to be brought into such a disadvantageous situation, or be led blindfold by Moses to their apparent destruction. "One need only travel with a caravan," says he, "which meets with the least obstacle, viz. a small torrent, to be convinced that the Orientals do not let themselves be led, like fools, by their Caravan Baschi," or leader of the caravan. P. 350.

But the Israelites went out of Egypt with "a high hand," though led by Moses, yet under the visible guidance and protection of "THE LORD GOD of the Hebrews," "who went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, and by night in a pillar of fire." And who, for their encouragement, to enter the passage of the Sea miraculously prepared for them, removed the cloud which went before the camp of Israel hitherto, and placed it behind them. "And it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel: and it was a cloud and darkness to the one, but gave light by night to the other: so that the one came not near the other all the night." Exod. xiv. 8—20.

Niebuhr wonders also, how Pharaoh and the Egyptians could be led to follow the Israelites.

"Pharaoh must have wanted prudence, if, after having seen so many prodigies in Egypt, he had entered into a sea of more than three leagues wide: all the Egyptians too must have been bereft of understanding, in wishing to pursue the Israelites into such a sea. Doubtless they knew their own country well enough to distinguish the bottom of a large sea, which bounds Egypt on that side, from a desert." P. 352.

But Pharaoh and the Egyptians probably did not know their situation. The cloud which separated them from the Israelites, increased the darkness of the night: and they probably did not enter into the sea till about midnight, by which time the van of the Israelites might have reached the Eastern shore. Meanwhile the bed of the sea, now beaten by the feet of the immense multitude of men and cattle that had gone before, might not have been easily distinguishable from the desert. If we ask, why did the Egyptians venture to pursue the Israelites by night? why did they not wait till day-light, when they could see whither they were going? Niebuhr himself has unwittingly answered the question: Pharaoh wanted "prudence," indeed, and the Egyptians were "bereft of understanding."—And this is the Scriptural solution: "For GOD hardened the heart of Pharaoh to follow after them, that He might be honoured upon Pharaoh and all his host; and that, by their miraculous destruction, the Egyptians might know that He was THE LORD" [SUPREME.] Exod. xiv. 4—18.

The Egyptians did not find out their mistake till the morning appeared, or till day-break; when the rear of the Israelites had gained the shore, and the Egyptians had reached the middle of the sea, and their whole host had entered into it: then indeed they attempted to fly back; but in vain; for "their chariot wheels were broken off, so that they drave them heavily, and their host was troubled" by THE LORD, who looked, or frowned, upon them through the cloudy pillar of fire, and overwhelmed all their host in the midst of the sea; when the sea suddenly returned to his strength at the signal of Moses stretching forth his hand over it. Exod. xiv. 24—28.

The particulars of this transaction demonstrate, that neither the host of the Israelites, nor the host of Pharaoh, could possibly have passed at the head of the Gulph near Suez; where the sea was only “half a league” broad, according to Niebuhr’s own supposition, and consequently too narrow to contain the whole host of Pharaoh at once; whose 600 chariots alone, exclusive of his cavalry and infantry, must have occupied more ground.

Manetho, and the Egyptian writers, have passed over in silence this tremendous visitation of their nation. An ancient writer, however, Artapanus, who wrote a history of the Jews, about B.C. 130, has preserved the following curious Egyptian traditions :

“The Memphites relate, that Moses, being well acquainted with the country, watched the influx of the tide, and made the multitude pass through the dry [bed of the] sea. But the Helio-politans relate, that the king, with a great army, accompanied by the sacred animals, pursued after the Jews, who had carried off with them the substance of the Egyptians. And that Moses, having been directed by a Divine voice to strike the sea with his rod, when he heard it, touched the water with his rod; and so the fluid divided, and the host passed over through a dry way. But when the Egyptians entered along with them, and pursued them, it is said, that fire flashed against them in front, and the sea, returning back, overwhelmed the passage. Thus the Egyptians perished, both by the fire, and by the reflux of the tide.” Euseb. Præp. Evang. Lib. 9, cap. 27, p. 436.

The latter account is extremely curious: it not only confirms SCRIPTURE, but it notices three additional circumstances: 1. That for their protection against THE GOD OF ISRAEL, the Egyptians brought with them the sacred animals; and by this means “GOD executed judgment upon all the [bestial] gods of Egypt,” as foretold, Exod. xii. 12, who perished with their infatuated votaries; completing the destruction of both, which began with “smiting the first-born both of man and beast.” 2. That the recovery of “the jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment,” which they asked and obtained of the Egyptians,” according to the Divine command, Exod. xii. 35, 36, was a leading motive with the Egyptians to pursue them ; as the bringing back the Israelites to slavery had been with “ Pharaoh and his servants,” or officers. And 3. That the destruction of the Egyptians was partly occasioned by lightning and thunderbolts, from the presence of the Lord : exactly corresponding to the Psalmist’s sublime description :

“ The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee : they were afraid ; the depths also were troubled. The clouds poured out water, the air thundered, thine arrows also went abroad :— Yea he sent out his arrows, and scattered them ; he shot forth lightnings, hail-stones, and coals of fire—and discomfited them. Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered, at thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.” Psalm lxxvii. 16, 17 ; xviii. 13—15.

The Red Sea derived its name from Edom, signifying “ red,” a title of Esau, to whom the bordering country of Edom, or Idumæa, belonged. Gen. xxv. 30 ; xxxvi. 31—40. It was also called Yam Suph, “ the weedy sea,” in several passages, Numb. xxxiii. 10 ; Psalm cvi. 9, &c. which are improperly rendered “ the Red Sea.” Some learned authors have supposed that it was so named from the quantity of weeds in it. “ But in contradiction to this,” says Bruce, “ I must confess, that I never in my life, (and I have seen the whole extent of it) saw a weed of any sort in it. And indeed, upon the slightest consideration, it will appear to any one, that a narrow Gulph, under the immediate influence of monsoons, blowing from contrary points six months each year, would have too much agitation to produce such vegetables, seldom found but in stagnant water, and seldom, if ever, found in salt ones. My opinion then is, that it is from the large trees, or plants, of white coral, perfectly in imitation of plants on land, that the sea has taken its name. I saw one of these, which, from a root nearly central, threw out ramifications in a nearly central form, measuring twenty-six feet diameter every way.” P. 247.

This seems to be the most probable solution that has been hitherto proposed of the name.

The tides in this sea are but moderate. At Suez the difference between high and low water did not exceed from three to four feet ; according to Niebuhr’s observations on the tides in that Gulph, during the years 1762 and 1763. Voyage en Arabie, p. 363.

STATIONS OF THE ISRAELITES IN THE DESERTS OF ARABIA PETRÆA

From BISHOP CLAYTON'S Map.

Engraved by J. Ewe

STATIONS OF THE ISRAELITES IN THE WILDERNESS.

The journey of the Israelites, for forty years, from their departure out of Egypt, till their arrival in the promised land of Canaan, is the most extraordinary ever recorded in history. Every stage of it almost is marked by a succession of miracles the most signal and astonishing. And for the instruction and admonition of posterity, Moses was directed to form a journal of their several stations and encampments; the principal of which are set down, Numb. xxxiii. 1—49; and the rest are here supplied from the tenor of the history, in the last four books of Moses; together with the leading occurrences, arranged in chronological order.

In tracing their intricate route through “the great and terrible, the waste and howling wilderness” of Arabia Petræa; I have principally followed the ingenious delineation of Bishop Clayton, in his Chronology of the Bible, 1747; and adopted the numeral references of his map; the general plan of which is taken from Shaw, Poccoke, Reland, &c. It is more correct in its outline than any I have seen; though it is not professed by the author to be critically accurate as to the situation of every place. The line of larger dots represents the route of the Assyrian Confederates, until they were defeated by Abraham. Gen. xiv.

The chief difficulty in constructing this most ancient, curious, and valuable Itinerary, arose 1. From the difference of the names given to the same place; and 2. From the sameness of the names of widely different places.

I. The great sandy desart of Shur, which divides Egypt from Palestine, stretching from the Mediterranean to the head of the Red Sea, at both sides of the latter assumes the name of Etham. Thus the third station of the Israelites is called “Etham, on the edge of the wilderness,” Exod. xiii. 20. And after passing the Red Sea, they entered “the wilderness of Shur,” Exod. xv. 22. But near their landing-place on the eastern coast, Niebuhr marks a mountain to the north-east, called Etti, evidently from Etham. See his Map, Tab. XXIII. Description de l’Arabie, p. 352.

This mountain forms the southern termination of the great ridge of mountains, now called Jebel Te, which runs in a north-easterly direction, stretching along the eastern coast of the Dead Sea, or Asphaltic Lake, towards the head of the Elanitic, or eastern gulph of the Red Sea; forming the western boundary of Arabia Petrea, and called in Scripture indiscriminately Mount Hor, and Mount Seir, because it was conquered from the original inhabitants, the Horites, Gen. xiv. 6; by Esau and his family, Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21; whose eldest son was Seir, Deut. ii. 22.

The southern district of Arabia Petrea was called in general, “the wilderness of Zin,” which name is still given by the inhabitants of Tor to the desert in their neighbourhood. The northern and western districts were also called Paran and Kadesh. Thus the disastrous station of Kadesh, named Barnea, “son of wandering,” (No. 19.) to which the Israelites returned again, (No. 38.) after thirty-eight years, is said to be in the wilderness of Zin, Numb. xiii. 21; and again, on their return, Numb. xx. 1; Deut. xxxii. 51; but in the wilderness of Paran, Numb. xii. 16. While in the Itinerary, it is simply called Rithmah, signifying “the wilderness,” from Rethem, which, according to Castellus, signifies locus desolatorius, desertum; and properly denotes a plant which flourishes in sandy deserts, called “Juniper,” Job xxx. 3, 4; 1 Kings xix. 4, 5; whence it is transferred to signify a desert, like our English word Heath, from the plant of that name. This very ingenious conjecture of Bishop Clayton, which furnished a clue to the construction of his map, p. 383, is confirmed by the preceding station of Hazereth, (No. 18.) which is placed also immediately before Kadesh-Barnea, Numb. xii. 16; xiii. 3—26.

2. On the other hand, Wells, Shaw, the Universal History, &c. have greatly perplexed and obscured the geography of this Itinerary, by supposing that the latter Kadesh (No. 38.) was distinct from the former (No. 19.) They place the latter on the western side of Mount Hor, towards the land of Canaan, confounding it with that Kadesh, in the land of the Philistines, where Abraham sojourned, Gen. xvi. 14; xx. 1. But it evidently lay on the east side of Mount Hor; for why should Moses send messengers from Kadesh to the king of Edom, requesting permission to pass through his territories, in the way to Canaan, if they were already at the verge of Palestine? Numb. xx. 14. Whereas the application was necessary, if his territories lay between. The true situation of Kadesh is ascertained beyond a doubt, from its lying between Mount Hor and Eziongeber, on the Elanitic Gulph. Numb. xxxiii. 35—37. And by rectifying this material error, Bishop Clayton has restored the true geography of the route.

After leaving Kadesh Barnea the first time, where “they abode many days,” or years, by the divine appointment, Deut. i. 46. they were ordered “to turn away from the promised land, and take their journey through the wilderness towards the way of the Red Sea,” in a south-westerly direction, Deut. ii. 1. And after passing through ten stations, they arrived at Hashmonah, (No. 30.) which was the utmost limit of their wanderings in that direction, because Azmon (which was evidently the same place) lay at the angle of the southern boundary of the promised land, where it fetched a compass, and ran in a north-westerly direction toward the river of Egypt, and the Great Sea, or Mediterranean. Numb. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4. This station, therefore, lay between the western termination of Mount Hor, and the head of the Red Sea, near the borders of the desert of Shur, or Etham.

To this same station, of Hashmonah, or Azmon, the Israelites returned again, after “they had compassed Mount Seir many days,” Deut. ii. 1. towards the end of their wanderings for 38 years, but it was now called by a different name in the Itinerary, Salmonah, (No. 41.) Its identity, however, is fortunately ascertained by the venerable Septuagint version, which renders Azmon, Josh. xv. 4. by the same word, Σελμωνα, as here in the Itinerary, Numb. xxxiii. 41. And the change of name is easily accounted for: the original, צלמנה, Tsalmonah, being evidently derived from צלם, Tsalam, “an image,” in allusion to the brazen serpent erected there by Moses.

The fixing these two most important stations of Kadesh, or Rithmah, and Hashmonah, Azmon, or Salmonah, which we owe to the ingenuity of the Bishop of Clogher, furnishes a satisfactory clue to develop and delineate the mazy labyrinth of the circuitous wanderings of the Israelites for the last thirty-eight years, through the interior of Arabia Petrea. For, when they first arrived at Kadesh, (No. 19.) they turned westwards towards Azmon; then they turned northwards, and again eastwards, till they reached Elath, (No. 35.) and *Eziongeber, (No. 37.) and thence turned southwards and westwards till they reached Kadesh again, (No. 38.) thence they proceeded to Azmon, now Salmonah, again; whence they took their final departure, steering north-east, by the direct course, towards the lands of Edom and Moab.

The remarkable station, Kibroth Hataavah, (No. 40.) signifying "the graves of lust," because there they buried the people that lusted, or longed for flesh to eat, and who were smitten with a plague, while they were satisfying their appetites with the quails, Numb. xi. 4—34. seems also to be denoted by the station Tophel, Deut. i. 1. For this word was used by Job, in the country of Arabia, to denote insipid bread made without salt, and compared to the white of an egg for tastelessness, Job vi. 6. and thence perhaps was used by the Israelites to denote the manna, that "light bread which they loathed," and "whose taste resembled that of fresh oil." Numb. xi. 8.

By a fortunate discovery, the exact site of Kibroth Hataavah seems to be exactly ascertained by Niebuhr. In his way from Suez to Mount Sinai, he was brought by his guides to a lofty and steep mountain in the district of Beni Legat, about nineteen German miles from Suez, and eleven from the convent of St. Catherine's, at Mount Sinai. After an hour and half spent in climbing to the summit, he was greatly surprised to see there a superb Egyptian cemetery, as he reckoned it, in which were a number of stones of a fine and hard grit (grais) from five to seven feet long, and a foot and half, or two feet broad, loaded with hieroglyphics, as beautiful as those of Egypt. Some of these stones were standing upright, others overturned or broken. The inscriptions on three of these stones are copied in Plates XLV. and XLVI. of his Voyage en Arabie, Tom. I. p. 190. consisting of birds, serpents, fishes, hares, and tots, or human figures, sitting on their hams, some with human, others with dogs' heads. But he observes, as remarkable, that though the figures of hares were numerous, which abound in these deserts, there were none to be found of oxen, so often found on the obelisks of Egypt.

* Eziongeber, at the head of the Elanitic, or Eastern Gulph of the Red Sea, is now called by the Arabs, Meenah et Dsahab, "the port of gold," from Solomon's traffic. 1 Kings ix. 26. It was therefore the Dizahab of Deut. i. 1.

Besides these, there was an oblong rectangular edifice, about fifty geometrical paces long, and about ten broad, whose walls were standing, containing in its area several of these stones, covered with hieroglyphics. In this edifice were also found busts in the Egyptian style, and architectural ornaments, like those which Norden copied in Upper Egypt. At the larger end was a small chamber, the roof of which was still subsisting, supported by a square pillar; and this pillar, as well as the walls around, were covered with hieroglyphics. Niebuhr has also given an engraving of the ground-plan of this edifice, which is divided by a cross wall into two equal parts, Plate XLIV. p. 169.

He asks, "Whether these might not be the graves of lust, noticed Numb. xi. 34. or else Mount Hor, [where Aaron was buried.] Numb. xxxiii. 38. But (says he) whether this be a cemetery of the Israelites, or of the ancient inhabitants of the country, it fails not to furnish an ample field of speculation for the learned." Tom. I. p. 189—191.

There are no traces in ancient history of any city, formerly subsisting in this part of the desert, which, though not destitute of inhabitants, never could be populous from its barren and sequestered situation. It could not be the tomb of Aaron, which was at Mount Hor, at a considerable distance: it was therefore most probably at or near Kibroth Hataavah, erected by the Israelites during their long stay in the neighbourhood of Kadesh Barnea, from which it was removed only two stages.

The inscriptions also on these tomb-stones are strikingly Egyptian, like them, engraved on hard granite, and abounding in Egyptian tots, among the hieroglyphic symbols. The remarkable omission of the ox, however, so frequent in Egypt, intimates, that they were not the work of Egyptians, properly speaking, but rather of the Israelites; still smarting with the recollection of the severe chastisement they had received not long before for their idolatry of the golden calf at Sinai, and not daring to introduce that ominous symbol among the other Egyptian hieroglyphics. These, therefore, might have been the tomb-stones of the princes of the congregation who perished there. Ps. lxxviii. 31.

The smaller birds in the engravings correctly represent the quails, which satisfied their longing for flesh meat. The quail of the desert, according to Hasselquist, very much resembles the red partridge, but is not larger than the turtle-dove. The Arabs bring many thousands of them to sell at Jerusalem about Whitsuntide. Moses represents the quails as brought by "a wind from the sea," Numb. xi. 31. which the Psalmist calls "a south-east wind," Psalm lxxviii. 28. The southerly monsoon begins to blow in Egypt about April, and brings with it many of the birds of passage, as turtles, quails, &c. flying northwards to more temperate climes, in order to avoid the sultry heats. Josephus states, that quails breed in greater numbers than any other birds about the Arabian gulf; and that this extraordinary flight, through fatigue, flew so near the ground, as to be within reach of the Israelites, "two cubits from the face of the earth," or within a yard of the ground, Numb. xi. 31. so that they could easily knock them down, as the Arabs do at present, with sticks.

This extraordinary flight of quails spent two days and a night in passing, during which the Israelites might have procured a sufficient supply to last them for a whole month, by spreading them "all round about the camp," to dry in the sun, according to the Arab usage. The same hot wind which brought the quails, by its continuance, probably produced sickness and mortality in the camp of the Israelites, as it does at present in Egypt, according to Maillet.

The quails, therefore, were not locusts, as imagined by Ludolfus, in his Ethiopian History, and adopted by Bishops Patrick, Clayton, and others; a notion utterly incompatible with the Psalmist's representation of the miracle: "HE rained flesh upon them as dust, and feathered fowls as the sand of the sea." Ps. lxxviii. 27.

The larger birds in the engravings might also denote the eagle, which haunts the deserts of Arabia. And from the parent eagle training his young brood to fly, which Moses might often have witnessed, was borrowed that inimitable imagery of the Israelites, "whom GOD bore on eagles' wings, and brought unto himself." Exod. xix. 4.

" HE found him (Israel) in a desert land,
And in a waste howling wilderness ;

HE led him about, He instructed him,
 He kept him as the apple of his eye.
 As the eagle stirreth up his nestlings,
 Hovereth about his brood,
 Spreadeth abroad his wings,
 Taketh them up,
 Carrieth them upon his shoulder :
 [So] THE LORD alone did lead him ;
 And with HIM was no strange God."—Deut. xxxii. 10—12.

Indeed, the minute coincidence of this cemetery, in every respect, with the occurrence at Kibroth Hataavah, raises the conjecture almost to a certainty, that this could be no other than that remarkable station, which was no more than three stages from Mount Sinai, (No. 14.)

The circumstance which led to this happy discovery of Niebuhr, and which serves also to establish the foregoing conjecture, was his curiosity to visit Jebel al Mokatteb, "the written mountains," which lay in that neighbourhood, which had been seen and described by the Prefetto of Egypt, sent thither by the Congregation de propagandâ fide at Rome.

In his journal, published by Bishop Clayton, the Prefetto observes :—"After passing the mountains of Faran [or Paran] we came to a large plain surrounded by high hills. These hills are called Gebel el Mokatab, which we passed by for an hour together, and found engraved with ancient unknown characters, cut into the hard marble rock, and so high, as to be in many places at twelve or fourteen feet above the ground, carved with the greatest care, in a place where there is neither water nor provisions to be procured."

These inscriptions, so carefully engraved, and at such a height, are quite distinct from the trivial memorandums of modern passengers, frequently found in the neighbourhood. They also might have been hieroglyphics of the same nature as those at the cemetery. Niebuhr, in his map, places El Mokatab next to the Mountain of the Cemetery, westwards, or nearer than it to Suez.

The remarkable station of Rephidim, in that neighbourhood, (No. 13.) which lay westwards of Mount Sinai, (No. 14.) still preserves that wonderful relic of antiquity, the rock of Massah, "temptation," and Meribah, "chiding," because there "the children of Israel tempted the LORD, and chided with Moses." Exod. xvii. 2 ; 1 Cor. x. 9. It is thus described by Pococke :—

“ This rock is on the foot of Mount Serich, and is a red granite stone, fifteen feet long, ten wide, and about twelve high. On both sides of it, towards the south end, and at the top of the stone, for about the breadth of eight inches, it is discoloured, as if by the running of water ; and all down this part, on both sides, and at top, are a sort of openings, or mouths, some of which resemble the lion’s mouth, that is sometimes cut in stone spouts, but appears not to be the work of a tool. There are about twelve on each side, and within every one is a horizontal crack, and in some also a crack down perpendicularly. There is also a crack from one of the mouths next the hill, that extends two or three feet to the north, and all round the south end. The Arabs call this the stone of Moses.” Pococke’s Travels, p. 148.

Shaw also gives this further description : “ It lies tottering, as it were, and loose, in the middle of the valley ; and seems formerly to have belonged to Mount Sinai, which hangs in a variety of precipices all over this plain.”—“ The Arabs,” says he, “ who were our guard, were ready to stone me, for attempting to break off a corner of it.”—This enhances the miracle : since the water must have been supplied from the rock itself, and not from the ground, which is detached from it : when “ GOD did cleave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink, as out of the great abyss.” Psalm lxxviii. 15.

The famous mountain adjoining is called indiscriminately in Scripture Horeb and Sinai. The former seems to be the general name of the whole mountain, signifying “ a desert ;” the latter appropriated to its highest summit. Thus the rock at Rephidim is called “ the rock in Horeb,” Exod. xvii. 6. and “ the law was given in Horeb,” Deut. v. 2. but “ from Mount Sinai,” Exod. xix. 18—23. Sinai is derived from Sene, “ a bush,” Exod. iii. 2. or a bramble bush.

“ Sinai,” says Sandys, “ has three tops of a marvellous height ; that on the west side, where God appeared to Moses in a bush, fruitful in pasturage ; far lower than the middlemost, and shadowed when the sun riseth thereon ; which is that whereon God gave the law to Moses, and which is now called the Mount of Moses ; at the foot of which stands the monastery called St. Catherine’s, from which there were steps formerly up to the very top of the mountain, and were computed 14,000 in number. At present some of them are broken, but those that remain are well made, and easy to go up and down. There are, in several places of the ascent, good cisterns, and especially near the top, a fair and good one. The third or most easterly summit, is called by the religious in those parts, Mount Catherine; on the top of which there is a dome, under which they say was interred the body of this saint, brought thither by angels after she was beheaded at Alexandria." One may judge of the height of St. Catherine's Mount, which certainly is not so high as that of Moses by a third part, from this circumstance, that Thevenot found much snow on both, when he was there, which was in February. The monastery of St. Catherine is from Cairo some eight days' journey over the desarts, according to Sandys, p. 96. See Wells, Vol. II. p. 105; and Niebuhr has given a drawing of the convent of St. Catherine, and of the rugged precipices of Sinai behind it. Plate XLVII. Tom. I. p. 197.

In one of the roads from the convent of Sinai to Suez, there is exactly such another stone as the rock of Massah, with the same sort of openings all down, and the signs where the water ran. "I was desirous to pass by it on my return (says Pococke), but unfortunately was led another way. I asked the Arabs about it, who told me that it was likewise called the stone of Moses."—"The way to it is by the valley of Sheik Salem, being about sixteen miles from the convent, to the north-west," p. 147. Afterwards, he says, that Kadesh was about eight hours north or north-west of Mount Sinai, p. 157. The reason, says he, why I am so particular, is because it is said, that this must be the rock Meribah Kadesh, Deut. xxxii. 51. which Moses smote twice, and the waters came out abundantly, after they had returned into these parts, from Eziongeber.

This rock of Meribah Kadesh, therefore, furnishes an additional land-mark for determining the important station of Kadesh Barnea with geographical accuracy.

When thirty-eight years were expired from the time of the rebellion at Kadesh Barnea, or thirty-nine and a half from the Exode, the LORD said unto Moses, "Ye have compassed this mountain (Hor or Seir) long enough; turn you northward." Deut. ii. 2, 3.

From inspection of the map, it appears that the Israelites were at this time encamped at Zalmonah, (No. 41.) their farthest station in the south-west direction; where the murmurers were destroyed by fiery flying serpents, and the faithful saved or cured by looking at the brazen serpent, that wondrous emblem of CHRIST crucified, to which our Lord himself alludes:—"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must THE SON OF MAN be lifted up:"—"And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me," John iii. 14 ; xii. 32 ; so finely foretold by Isaiah, "Lift up a standard to the nations ! Lo, the Lord hath proclaimed to the end of the earth, Say ye to the daughter of Sion, Lo, thy Saviour cometh !" Isa. lxii. 10.

In marching northwards, they were ordered not to molest the kindred nations of the Edomites and Moabites, through whose territories they were obliged to pass. Deut. ii. 4—9. At first, indeed, the Edomites refused them a passage, and actually came out to oppose them by force, whereupon "Israel turned away from them." Numb. xx. 14—21. The Moabites also probably refused them at this time, for both refusals are noticed together, Judg. xi. 17. Afterwards, however, the Lord interposed, and made them afraid of the Israelites, for the Edomites did not obstruct their passage through the several stations of Punon (No. 42.) and Oboth, (No. 43.) by the way of the plains of Eloth and *Eziongeber, or by the way of the Red Sea, not far from the head of the Elanitic gulph. Numb. xxi. 4—10 ; Deut. ii. 29.

At the next station, Jim, or Jie Abarim, (No. 44.) they reached the borders of Moab, and next passed the valley and brook Zered, (No. 45.) and went quietly on through Ar, in the territory of Moab, and pitched over against the children of Ammon, on the other side of Arnon, (No. 46.) Numb. xxi. 12—15 ; Deut. ii. 13—19. "The other side of Arnon," was the south side of the river Arnon, which they did not pass over till after the prohibition not to molest the Ammonites, Deut. ii. 19—24. Moses, therefore, wrote the book of Numbers on the north side of the river, after the conquest of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who had refused them a peaceable passage through his territories, Deut. ii. 26—34. as judiciously observed by Clayton, p. 422.

Their next station was Beer, (No. 47.) or Beer Elim, "the well of the princes," as it is called by Isaiah, xv. 8 ; because there God supplied them with water. "Then Israel sang this song : Spring up, O well, sing ye unto it : The princes digged the well, the nobles digged it with their staves, by [the direction of] the lawgiver," (Moses.) Numb. xxi. 16—18.

At the next station, Jahaz, (No. 48.) they overthrew Sihon,

* Eziongeber was two days' journey from Mount Sinai, according to Shaw ; but three days' journey, according to Pococke.

and all his people, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and took all his cities from Aroer, which is by the brink of the river Arnon (southwards) and Heshbon, his capital city, in the valley between Arnon and Jabbok, even unto Gilead (northwards). Numb. xxi. 23—32; Deut. ii. 32—36.

It was now indeed that "God began to put the dread and fear of the Israelites" upon all the neighbouring nations, Deut. ii. 25. and that he hardened the spirit of Sihon, and made his heart obstinate to refuse them a passage. For this whole territory of his was an usurpation, he having subdued the Moabites, the original possessors, and seized all their lands and cities, Heshbon, Ar, Dibon, from Arnon even to Medeba, as recorded in a proverb, or popular song. Numb. xxi. 26—30; Deut. ii. 30, 31.

Then the Israelites turned away from the Ammonites, eastwards, to attack Og, the king of Bashan, who had joined Sihon against them, Deut. xxix. 7. and defeated him and all his people at Edrei, (No. 51.) "And they took at that time out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites (Sihon and Og), all their land on this (the eastern) side of Jordan, from the river Arnon (southwards) unto Mount Hermon" (northwards), Deut. iii. 8. which was bounded eastwards by the wilderness of Kedemoth (signifying "eastern"), that great wilderness which reached to the river Euphrates, Deut. ii. 26; Judg. xi. 22. and westwards, by the land of the Ammonites, and the remnant of the land of the Moabites; from which it was separated by a great chain of mountains, which formed, "a strong border," or barrier, which Sihon could not force, Numb. xxi. 24. This mountainous border, therefore, separated these eastern Amorites from the western, beyond Jordan, and also from the plains of Moab, on the coasts of Jordan, which belonged to the Moabites, Midianites, and Ammonites conjointly; according to the judicious interpretation of this detached part of their journey, which is not noticed in the Itinerary by Clayton. P. 425—429.

These conquered lands, and "cities of the plain," being fit for pasturage, were allotted, at their own request, to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, which abounded in cattle, on the condition of their assisting the other tribes in the conquest of the promised land, westwards of the Jordan. Numb. xxxii. 1—42; Deut. iii. 8—20.

Hence the fifty-second station is called in the Itinerary, Dibon Gad, as belonging to that tribe, in order to distinguish it from another Dibon, belonging to the Reubenites, Josh. xiii. 7.

Dibon Gad was on the northern border of the territories of Sihon, Numb. xxi. 30. thence they turned back again to Almon Diblathaim, (No. 53.) or Diblath, on the edge of the wilderness of Kedemoth, Ezek. vi. 14. from thence they proceeded southwards to Mattanah, (No. 54.) from thence westwards to Nahaleel, (No. 55.) from thence, in the same direction, to Bamoth, (No. 56.) in the valley belonging to Moab, into which they entered peaceably, and proceeded northwards again to the top of Pisgah, (No. 57.) which looked towards the wilderness, eastwards. N. B. These last three stations lay in the mountains of Abarim, before Nebo, Numb. xxxiii. 47. From thence they crossed the mountains, westward, and pitched in the plains of Moab, on this side Jordan (or the eastern), opposite to Jericho, and abode in Shittim, or, as it was afterwards called, Abel Shittim, or "the mourning of Shittim," from the slaughter of the Israelites there for their whoredoms and idolatry with the daughters of Moab and Midian, in the matter of Baal Peor; which was the same as Chemosh, the obscene divinity of the Moabites, the Lingam of the Hindus, the Phallus of the Egyptians and Greeks, and the Priapus of the Romans; representing the generative powers of nature residing principally in Baal, the Sun.

To punish the Moabites and Midianites for seducing the Israelites, a severe retaliation was inflicted: a party of twelve thousand men was sent under the conduct of the zealous Phineas, who slew all their males of the age of puberty, and all their women that were not virgins, burnt their cities, and spoiled their goods, Numb. xxxi. 6—18. And now their lands also were distributed among the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, Josh. xiii. 32. which, before their transgressions, had been reserved; and a law was made, that no Moabite or Ammonite should be admitted into the magistracy, or the freedom of the congregation of Israel, until the tenth generation. Deut. xxiii. 10.

PASSAGE OF THE RIVER JORDAN BY THE ISRAELITES.

This miraculous passage was performed on the tenth day of the first month, wanting only five days to complete forty years from the day the Israelites left Egypt, on the fifteenth day of the first month. Numb. xxxiii. 3; Josh. iv. 19.

The circumstances attending it were as follows :—

The Ark of the Covenant, by the Divine direction, was borne by the priests before the body of the people on their march, about 2000 cubits, or 1000 yards. As soon as the feet of the priests had touched the brim of the waters of the river, which then was swollen, and overflowed its banks, about “barley harvest,” or about the vernal equinox, from the melting of the snows on Hermon, Antilibanus, and the mountains of Syria; immediately the waters recoiled upwards, stood on heaps, and went backwards a considerable way, while the lower waters pursued their course to the Dead Sea, leaving the channel dry.

Then the priests, bearing the Ark, entered the bed of the river, and stood still when they had reached the middle, while the congregation hastily passed over below them, at the same distance of 2000 cubits; and as soon as the people had all passed over, then the priests proceeded also with the Ark to the further bank. And immediately, when the soles of their feet touched the dry land, the suspended waters of the river above returned to their place, and overflowed the banks as usual. Josh. iii. 6—17.

The passage of this deep and rapid, though not wide river, at the most unfavourable season, was more manifestly miraculous, if possible, than that of the Red Sea; because here was no natural agency whatsoever employed; no mighty wind to sweep a passage, as in the former case; no reflux of the tide, on which minute philosophers might fasten to depreciate the miracle. It seems, therefore, to have been providentially designed to silence cavils respecting the former; and it was done in the noon-day, in the face of the sun, and in the presence, we may be sure, of the neighbouring inhabitants; and struck terror into the kings of the Amorites and Canaanites, westwards of the river, “whose hearts melted, neither was there any spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.” Josh. v. 1.

To record this memorable event to the latest posterity, Joshua was commanded to erect two monuments of twelve stones each, taken out of the bed of the river; the one upon the bank, the other in the middle of the channel, where the priests had rested with the Ark. And the ford, or place of passage, was called Beth Abara, "the house of the passage," until our Saviour's time." Josh. iv. 8, 9; John i. 18.

BOUNDARIES OF THE PROMISED LAND.

By the Abrahamic covenant, the original grant of this land to the Israelites was "from the river of Egypt (southwards) to the great river, the river Euphrates," (northwards.) Gen. xv. 18.

"The river of Egypt," which is here contrasted with the river Euphrates, must also be "a great river," and a marked boundary, about which there could be no dispute; and this was no other than the river Nile, whose eastern or Pelusiatic branch was reckoned the boundary of Egypt, towards the great desert of Shur, which lies between Egypt and Palestine, and which is about ninety miles in breadth; and this is confirmed by a comparison of parallel passages:

From the entering in of Hamath [in Syria, northwards] unto the river of Egypt, [southwards] 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Chron. vii. 8. evidently corresponds to, "From Sihor of Egypt, to the entering in of Hamath," 1 Chron. xiii. 5. Therefore, "Sihor," and "the river of Egypt," are the same. But it appears from another passage, that Sihor was the Nile: "And now what hast thou to do in the way of Egypt, to drink the waters of Sihor? or, what hast thou to do in the way of Assyria, to drink the waters of the river?" (Euphrates.) Jer. ii. 18. Here Sihor, or the Nile, is plainly contrasted, in situation, with the Euphrates, which was unquestionably the river of Assyria, as in the original Abrahamic covenant.

The Hebrew name, Sihor, signifies "black;" and it is an apt epithet of the Nile, bringing down with its flood from Abyssinia, a rich, black, loamy sand, which fertilizes the Lower Egypt, as accurately described by Virgil:—

Et viridem Ægyptum nigrâ fecundat arenâ.

Georg. IV. 291.

From Sihor, or Sihr, was derived the Ethiopian name of the river Siris; and this was translated into various languages. Dio- dorus remarks, that the Egyptian name of the river was Okeames, from Okema, or Okem, signifying “black;” whence also it was styled by the Greeks, Melas and Melo, and by the Hindus, “Cali :” all of the same import.

From a solitary passage in the Septuagint version, rendering “the stream, or the river of Egypt,” Isa. xxvii. 12. by “Rhincorura,” a city of Palestine Syria, built on the borders of the desert which separates that country from Egypt, it has been supposed to denote a stream or torrent near that city, by Augustine, and by some respectable modern geographers, Wells, Cellarius, Bochart, &c. But none of the old geographers, Strabo, Mela, Pliny, Ptolomy, &c. notice any such stream or torrent there; and even admitting that there was, it would not deserve to be contrasted with the Euphrates.

II. The boundaries of the Promised Land are thus accurately described by Moses before the entrance of the Israelites into it, Numb. xxxiv. “When ye come into the land of Canaan, (this is the land that shall fall unto you for an inheritance, even the land of Canaan, with the coasts thereof :) Your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin, along by the coast of Edom,” or Idumæa. This was its general description. The boundary itself is next traced: “And your south border shall be the utmost coast of the Salt Sea eastward;” or as explained by Joshua’s description afterwards, (xv. 2—4.) “the south border of the tribe of Judah began from the bay of the Salt Sea that looketh southward;” or by combining both, from the south-east corner of the Salt Sea, or Asphaltite lake. “From thence, your border shall turn southwards to the ascent of Acrabbim,” or the mountains of Accaba, (signifying “ascent” in Arabic) which run towards the head of the Elanitic, or Eastern gulf of the Red Sea; passing (we may presume, with Clayton) through the sea-ports of Elath and Eziongeber, on the Red Sea, which belonged to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 26. though they are not noticed in this place.

“Thence it shall pass on to [the wilderness of] of Zin,” on the east side of Mount Hor, including that whole mountainous region within the boundary; “and the going forth thereof shall be to Kadesh Barnea southwards; and it shall go on to *Hazar Addar, and pass on to Azmon.”

* Joshua (xv. 3.) interposes two additional stations, Hezron and Kirkaa, before and after Adar, or Hazer Adar, which are not noticed by Moses.

“And the border shall fetch a compass,” or form an angle, “from Azmon,” or turn westwards “towards the river of Egypt,” or Pelusiac branch of the Nile; “and its outgoings shall be at the sea,” the Mediterranean.

This termination of the southern border westwards, is exactly conformable to the accounts of Herodotus and Pliny: the former represents Mount Casius lying between Pelusium and the Sirbonic lake, as the boundary between Egypt and Palestine Syria, (3, 5.) the latter reckoned the Sirbonic lake itself as the boundary, (Nat. Hist. 5, 13.)

“And as for the western border, ye shall have the Great Sea for a border. This shall be your west border.” The Great Sea is the Mediterranean, as contrasted with the smaller seas or lakes, the Red Sea, the Salt Sea, and the sea of Tiberias, or Galilee.

And this shall be your north border: from the Great Sea you shall point out Hor ha-hor, (not “Mount Hor,” as unskilfully rendered in our English Bible, confounding it with that on the southern border, but) “the mountain of the mountain *,” or, “the double mountain,” or Mount Lebanon, which formed the northern frontier of Palestine, dividing it from Syria; consisting of two great parallel ranges, called Libanus and Antilibanus, (derived from Leban, “white,” because their summits are usually covered with snow) and running eastwards from the neighbourhood of Sidon to that of Damascus.

“From Hor ha-hor ye shall point your border to the entrance of Hamath ;” which Joshua, speaking of the yet unconquered land, describes, “All Lebanon, towards the sun-rising, from (the valley of) Baal Gad, under Mount Hermon, unto the entrance of Hamath,” Josh. xiii. 5. This demonstrates, that Hor ha-hor corresponded to all Lebanon, including Mount Hermon, as judiciously remarked by Wells, Vol. II. p. 271. who observes, that it is not decided which of the two ridges, the northern or the southern, was properly Libanus; the natives at present call the southern so, but the Septuagint and Ptolomy called it Antilibanus.

“From Hamath it shall go on to Zedad, and from thence to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar Enan,

* The Septuagint Version has judiciously rendered it, παρα το ορος το ορος, “the mountain beside the mountain.”

(near Damascus, Ezek. xlviii. 1.) This shall be your north border."

And ye shall point out your east border from Hazar Enan to Shephan, and the coast shall go down to Riblah, on the east side of Ain ("the fountain" or springs of the river Jordan) and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the [east] side of the sea of Chinnereth, (or sea of Galilee, or lake of Tiberias, thence probably called Gennesareth in our Saviour's time.) "And the border shall go down to Jordan on the east side, and the goings out of it shall be at the Salt Sea." There it met the southern border, at the south-east corner of that sea, or the Asphaltite lake.

"This shall be your land with the coasts thereof round about" in circuit.

Such was the admirable geographical chart of the Land of Promise, dictated to Moses by the GOD OF ISRAEL, and described with all the accuracy of an eye-witness.

In his first expedition, Joshua subdued all the southern department of the Promised Land, and in his second the northern, having spent five years in both, Josh. xi. 18. What Joshua left unfinished of the conquest of the whole, was afterwards completed by David and Solomon. In the reign of the latter was realized the Abrahamic covenant in its full extent.

"And Solomon reigned over all the kingdoms from the river (Euphrates) unto the land of the Philistines, and the border of Egypt:—for he had dominion over all the region on this side of the river (Euphrates) from Tipsah (or Thapsacus, situated thereon) even to Azzah (or "Gaza with her towns and villages, unto the river of Egypt," southward, "and the Great Sea," westward, Josh. xv. 47.) even over all the kings on this side the river (Euphrates.) 1 Kings iv. 21—24.

THE DEVOTED NATIONS OF CANAAN.

Four hundred years before the event, the fate of these nations was revealed to Abraham. The long-suffering of God waited so long, "till their iniquities should come to the full." Gen. xv. 16. It was for the wickedness of these nations they were expelled; and the Israelites were put in possession of their land, not for their own righteousness or merits, for they were a stiff-necked people, but to perform the covenant which GOD made with their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Deut. ix. 4—6.

These nations had repeated warnings from God, to repent and reform their evil ways, in an awful succession of judgments, signs, and wonders, inflicted on the neighbouring nations for their wickedness. First, in the signal destruction of the cities of the plain, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, by the immediate vengeance of Heaven, destroyed by fire and brimstone, or lightning, and overwhelmed by the Salt Sea: Secondly, in the plagues of Egypt, and destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, forty years before, for abominations resembling their own, Levit. xviii. 3. Thirdly, in the recent destruction of their neighbours, the Eastern Amorites, and the miraculous passage of the river Jordan. All these terrified, but did not reform them.

“I know,” said Rahab, the harlot, to the spies, “that the LORD hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that the inhabitants of the land faint because of you,” Josh. ii. 9. The Gibeonites, in excuse for deceiving the Israelites into a league, pleaded, “It was certainly told thy servants, that THE LORD THY GOD commanded Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you: therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing,” Josh. ix. 24. Here was no charge of cruelty or injustice brought forward by these sinners themselves, who are such objects of commiseration to modern philanthropists!

In Abraham's days, the land was occupied by ten nations: the Kenites, the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites, eastwards of Jordan; and westwards, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaims, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites, Gen. xv. 18—21.

These latter, in the days of Moses, were called, the Hittites, the Girgashites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11; the Hivites being substituted for the Rephaims.

These seven nations were thus distributed:—

“The Hittites,” or sons of Heth, “the Perizzites, the Jebusites, and the Amorites, dwelt in the mountains,” or in the hill country of Judea, southwards; “the Canaanites” dwelt in the midland, “by the sea,” westwards, and “by the coast of Jordan,” eastwards; and “the Girgashites,” or Gergesenes, along the eastern side of the sea of Galilee; and “the Hivites” in Mount Lebanon, under Hermon, in the land of Mispeh, or Gilead, northwards. Compare Numb. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3; Judg. iii. 3; and Matt. viii. 28.

The Canaanites, as distinguished by the family name from the other tribes, called after the sons of Canaan, probably were a mixture of the descendants of the other sons of Canaan, who were driven out of their original settlements by the Philistines, who occupied Gaza, which belonged to them, Gen. x. 15—20. and forced to settle farther backwards, towards the coasts of Jordan, according to the conjecture of Wells, Vol. II. p. 256—267.

Of all these nations, the Amorites grew the most powerful, so as to extend their conquests, beyond the river Jordan, over the Kadmonites, or “Easterns.” Hence they are sometimes put for the whole: “The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full, Gen. xv. 16. “The gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell,” Josh. xxiv. 15. “The Gibeonites were of the remnant of the Amorites,” 2 Sam. xxi. 2.

The departments of Canaan, lying nearer to Egypt, were more corrupt than the northern, and of course received severer chastisement. For “Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings. He left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded. So Joshua smote them from Kadesh Barnea, (eastwards) even unto Gaza, (westwards) and all the country of Goshen, (southwards) even unto Gibeon, (northwards.”) Josh. x. 40, 41.

The Divine command, indeed, was most express: “Of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth, but thou shalt utterly destroy them.” Deut. xx. 16, 17.

Still, however, the command was not absolute; it admitted of exceptions; it was to be literally inflicted only on those who opposed the Israelites.

Thus, 1. Amidst the general slaughter of the inhabitants of Jericho, Rahab, the harlot, and all her family, were spared; and she was even married to one of the princes, the prince of Judah (Salmon) the progenitor of CHRIST, Matt. i. 5. though intermarriages with the devoted nations were most expressly prohibited, in order to prevent seduction to idolatry. Deut. vii. 3, 4.

2. The Gibeonites, after the destruction of Jericho and Ai, in their neighbourhood, would not oppose the Israelites, but made a fraudulent league with them, under pretext that they came from a distant country, lying beyond the devoted pale, and yet, notwithstanding the fraud, the princes of the congregation adhered to the treaty, and let them live, lest wrath should be upon them if they violated it; but they degraded them to a state of slavery.

3. The “cities which stood still in their strength,” or did not attack the Israelites, “Israel burned none of them,” Josh. xi. 13. Hence, the strong fort of Jebus, at Jerusalem, was maintained by the Jebusites, the original proprietors, and was not reduced until David's reign, 2 Sam. v. 5—9. and the remnant who escaped the slaughter in battle entered into fenced cities. Josh. x. 20.

4. How soon the conquered countries recruited their strength, is evident from the several servitudes of the Israelites to the Moabites, Canaanites, and Midianites. Jabin, king of Canaan, only fifty-six years after Joshua's death, had no less than 900 chariots of iron, and mightily oppressed the children of Israel for twenty years. Judg. iv. 2, 3.

5. The Philistines, on the sea-coast southwards, were not subdued till David's days; and the Sidonians and Tyrians, northwards, never were subdued at all.

6. The case of the reprobate Canaanites, whose hearts GOD is said to have hardened to fight against the Israelites, that He might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, Josh. xi. 20. plainly intimates, that they might have had favour, had they repented, and submitted.

7. But when the reprobates were destroyed, the survivors might, and probably did, in many instances, repent and reject their idolatries, and turn to the LORD GOD OF ISRAEL. And this seems to be implied in the remark, that “none moved his tongue against the children of Israel,” Josh. x. 20. But if so, every principle of religion and sound policy forbad their extermination, when they might become proselytes to the true religion, and faithful subjects. Uriah, the Hittite, was as brave and loyal an officer as any in David's army; and Araunah, the Jebusite, as religious as David himself, when he surrendered, as “a king,” or as proprietor, his threshing-floor on Mount Moriah, to build thereon an altar of sacrifice, on the future site of the temple. 2 Sam. xxiv. 23.

Hence we do not find any censure passed on Solomon, when “ he levied a tribute of bond service upon all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites—their children that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel were not able utterly to destroy,” 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. as specified of the Jews, Benjamites, Manassites, Ephraimites, Zebulonites, Asherites, Naphthalites, and Danites, Judg. i. 19—34.

There is no foundation, therefore, for the charges of extreme cruelty and injustice, brought idly and blasphemously against the God of Israel, and his chosen people, as if the case of the devoted nations of Canaan was irreconcilable with the Divine Attributes, and with the rights of nations, by Deists, Infidels, and false Philanthropists. If blame is to attach any where, it is to the Israelites; when able, they were not willing to inflict the Divine sentence on the justly-devoted nations, who “ served Baalim and Ashteroth,” or the sun, moon, and stars; who made their children pass through the fire, or burnt them alive as sacrifices to Moloch; who worshipped obscene idols, as Baal-peor, Chemosh, &c. who practised the most execrable vices and impurities, not fit to be named, of which a frightful catalogue is exhibited, Levit. xviii. and elsewhere; and whose abominations were so enormous, that the land itself, in the energetic language of Scripture, vomited forth her inhabitants! And from this criminal neglect and false compassion, “ these nations were left to be pricks in their eyes, and thorns in their sides,” so as by tempting the Israelites to follow their abominations, to transfer that vengeance to themselves which was intended for the others. Numb. xxxiii. 53—56.

OTHER NATIONS OF CANAAN.

Besides these devoted nations, there were others settled in the land at the arrival of the Israelites. In addition to the Moabites and Ammonites, the descendants of the incestuous sons of Lot, Gen. xix. 37, 38. and the Midianites, descended from Midian, a son of Abraham, by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 4. who lived together on the east side of Jordan; the Edomites, or descendants of Esau, settled southwards of the former in Mount Hor, or Seir; the Amalekites settled in the south coast, westwards of Jordan, descended from Amalek, grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 12. who soon became “the first,” or most powerful, “of these nations,” Numb. xxiv. 20. and first opposed the Israelites after the Exode, but were defeated and doomed to destruction, Exod. xvii. 8—16. which was begun by Saul, and finished by David; the Kenites, a small mountainous tribe, their neighbours, who were at peace with the Israelites, and seem to have been a branch of the Midianites, for the father-in-law of Moses was a Kenite, Judg. i. 16. and also a Midianite, Numb. x. 29. they were, therefore, spared in the destruction of the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 6; the Kenizzites, another small neighbouring tribe, descended probably from Kenaz, a grandson of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11; and the Avims, or Avites, on the south-west coast, in Abraham's days, of whom was Abimelech, king of Gerar, who were afterwards subdued by the Philistines, “or Shepherds,” expelled from Caphtor, or the Lower Egypt, from the land of Goshen, in Jacob's days. The Philistines became a powerful nation, and the most formidable opponents of the Israelites, and rescued from them Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron, which had been allotted to, and taken by the tribe of Judah, after Joshua's death. They had constant wars with the Israelites, and were not subdued till David's days. Compare Deut. ii. 23; Josh. xiii. 3; Gen. xxvi. 1; Judg. i. 18, &c.

On the north-west coast was Great Zidon, as it is styled, Josh. xi. 8. founded by the eldest son of Canaan, Gen. x. 15. whom the Asherites could not expel nor reduce, Judg. i. 31. And “the strong city of Tyre,” a colony from Zidon, which they were also not able to reduce, Josh. xix. 29. not even in David's days, 2 Sam. xxiv. 7. These entered into treaties with the Israelites, and greatly corrupted them by their idolatries and abominations. Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, who introduced the worship of Baal, or the Sun, 1 Kings xvi. 31. And even Solomon introduced the worship of Ashtoreth or the Moon, the goddess of the Zidonians, 1 Kings xi. 5.

DIVISION OF THE PROMISED LAND.

The whole land appears to have been called Palestine in the days of Moses, Exod. xv. 14. probably from Palisthan, signifying “Shepherd land,” in the Sanscrit language, which is a dialect of the ancient Syriac. By Herodotus it was called Palestine

Syria, to distinguish it from Cæle-Syria, northward of Mount Libanus.

It was styled, in general, "the pleasant land," Ps. cvi. 24; Dan. viii. 9. and is described by Moses, as "a good land, a land of hills and valleys, a land of brooks and waters, and depths, (or lakes) springing out of valleys and hills; a land flowing with milk and honey; a land of wheat and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates, and oil olives; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." Deut. viii. 7—9; xi. 9—11. And Rabshakeh, the Assyrian, describes it as like his own, "a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards," Isa. xxxvi. 17. It must, indeed, have been a wonderfully rich and fertile land to produce its immense population, both before and after the conquest of the Israelites.

Before the death of Moses, the region eastward of Jordan was assigned to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Half-Manasseh, in order, proceeding from south to north.

After the conquests of Joshua, the region westward of the river Jordan, and its lakes, was allotted to the tribes of Simeon, Judah, and Benjamin, in order, from south to north, of which Judah's portion was the most considerable.

The northern region, midland, was allotted to the tribes of Ephraim, the other half of Manasseh, Issachar, and Naphthali; of which the lot of the sons of Joseph, especially Ephraim, was the richest and most considerable, reaching from Jordan, eastwards, to the Mediterranean Sea, westwards.

The remainder of the maritime coast, westwards, was allotted to Dan, Zebulon, and Asher; from the Philistine border, southwards, to Zidon, northwards; for Zebulon was foretold to be a maritime tribe by Jacob, Gen. xlix. 13. "Zebulon shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for a haven for ships, and his border shall be unto Zidon." And Dan and Asher are declared to be so by Deborah, Judg. v. 17. "Dan remained in ships, Asher continued on the sea shore, and abode in his breaches."

Of the southern tribes, the most powerful was Judah; of the northern, Ephraim; whence originated a jealousy and rivalry between the two, which broke out early, and laid the foundation of that fatal schism which took place on the death of Solomon, by the revolt of the ten tribes, brought about by Jeroboam, the Ephraimite, who revived the Egyptian idolatry of the golden calf, and stationed one at each end of the new kingdom, at Bethel southwards, and Dan northwards, formerly called Lasha, or Laish.

To the tribe of Levi no division of land was assigned: its place was supplied by the tribe of Ephraim, the younger of Joseph's sons, Josh. xiv. 4. But it was abundantly compensated; "for the priesthood of THE LORD was their inheritance;" and they were most wisely distributed throughout the rest of the tribes, to keep up the national worship, and for the education of youth; for forty-eight cities were appropriated throughout all the tribes for the residence of the three families of the sons of Levi, namely, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari.

To the Kohathites were allotted twenty-three cities; namely, to the sons of Aaron, the high-priest, descended from Kohath, thirteen cities out of the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon; and to the rest of that family, ten more out of the tribes of Ephraim, Dan, and Half-Manasseh, westwards.

To the children of Gershon, thirteen cities out of the tribes of Issachar, Asher, and Naphthali, and out of Half-Manasseh, eastwards.

And to the children of Merari, twelve cities out of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulon. In all forty-eight cities.

Of these Levitical cities, there were thirteen that were properly sacerdotal; namely, those assigned to the sons of Aaron, to whom the priesthood was exclusively confined, for though all were Levites, these only could be priests. And the legal economy of High-priest, Priest, and Levite, has been adopted in the Christian, of Bishop, Priest, and Deacon.

It is remarkable, that all the sacerdotal cities lay within the southern tribes; eight belonging to Judah, four to Benjamin, which are specified, and only one to Simeon. Compare the lists in Joshua, xxi. 13—19; and 1 Chron. vi. 60. That one must have been Juttah, which is omitted in the latter list. And this may furnish a good comparative estimate of the territory of each of these tribes.

This was wisely allotted by Providence, to guard, as it were, against the evils of the schism between the southern and northern tribes. For by this arrangement, all the sacerdotal cities, except one, lay in the faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin, to keep up the national worship in them, in opposition to the apostacy of the other tribes. And even that one sacerdotal city of Simeon might have remained under the controul of Judah, as being situated on his frontier. Otherwise, the kingdom of Judah might have experienced a scarcity of priests, or have been burthened with the maintenance of those who fled from the kingdom of Israel, 2 Chron. xi. 13, 14. when the base and wicked policy of Jeroboam made priests of the lowest of the people, without learning or religion, to officiate in their room.

Out of all the Levitical cities, six were selected to be cities of refuge, that “the slayer who killed any person unawares, might flee thither for refuge from the avenger of blood,” Josh. xx. 2. Of these, three were in the eastern departments, and three in the western, placed in the most convenient stations in the middles and extremities of the united states.

In tracing the route of the Israelites through the desarts of Arabia Petræa, in their way to Canaan, some confusion was occasioned by the similitude of the names of different places, or by the difference of the names assigned to the same places. Several instances of the same occur in the subsequent course of their history. To instance a few:—

1. Besides Mount Hermon, on the northern frontier, which was a branch of Mount Lebanon, as we have seen, there was another, midland, which lay to the south of Mount Tabor, not far from Nazareth, Ps. lxxxix. 12. celebrated for its copious dews, Ps. cxxxiii. 3. “We were sufficiently instructed of this by experience,” says that intelligent traveller, Maundrel, “our tents being wet with it, as if it had rained all night.” (March 22,) p. 74.

2. From the eastern end of Lebanon also, branched off a southern ridge, which inclosed “the land of Mizpeh,” called also “the land of Gilead,” from the convention made there between Jacob and Laban, his father-in-law. Gen. xxxi. 48. Hence, Ramoth Mizpeh, Josh. xiii. 26, appears to be the same as Ramoth Gilead, Josh. xx. 8; which latter name at length superseded the former.

3. A considerable Geographical difficulty, which has greatly embarrassed commentators, may be easily removed by a slight alteration of the arrangement of the translation: thus:

“When the Midianites from the east had crossed the river Jordan, to invade the western tribes, Gideon, who followed them from Gilead, by the Divine command, dismissed the greater part of his army by proclamation: “Whosoever, from Mount Gilead, is fearful and afraid, let him return [home], and depart early. So there returned [home] twenty-two thousand of the people." Judges vii. 3. The present translation is: "Who-soever is fearful or afraid, let him return and depart early from Mount Gilead. And there returned of the people twenty and two thousand." To solve the difficulty of departing from Mount Gilead, another mount of the same name has been introduced on the west of Jordan, of which there is no trace; or the word "Gilead" has supposed to have been a corruption of Gilboa; near which the armies were encamped, equally unfounded. See Wells, Vol. II. p. 297.

JERUSALEM.

The metropolis of the prerogative tribe of Judah, is frequently styled in Scripture, "the Holy City;" Isa. xlviii. 2; Dan. ix. 24; Neh. xi. 1; Matt. iv. 5; Rev. xi. 2; &c.: because "THE LORD chose it out of all the tribes of Israel to place his name there," his temple, and his worship; Deut. xii. 5; xiv. 23; xvi. 2; xxvi. 2; &c. And to be the centre of union in religion and government, for all the tribes of the commonwealth of Israel. Psalm cxxii. 3—5.

It was also held in high veneration by the Gentiles. Herodotus, who visited Palestine, calls it "the great city of Cadytis;" and represents it as "little inferior to Sardis," in his opinion. B. 2 and 3. Here Καδυστις is evidently taken from the Syriac, קדוּתָא, Kadutha, signifying "the holy," from the Hebrew, קדוּשָׁה, Kadushah, "holy;" which is found inscribed on ancient Jewish shekels; ירוּשָׁלַם קדוּשָׁה, Ierusalem Kadushah, "Jerusalem the Holy." See Polyglott Bible; Walton's Apparatus; De Siclorum Formis, p. 38.

The original name of the city was Salem, signifying "peace." And "Melchizedek, King of Salem," in Abraham's days, was also "Priest of THE MOST HIGH GOD." Gen. xiv. 18. He was probably a Jebusite prince; for Jerusalem is called Jebus; 1 Chron. xi. 4. And the strong fort of Jebus, built on Mount Sion, was contiguous thereto. When David reduced this fort, he built "the city of David" around it, and downwards, as far as Millo, or the House of Assembly; 2 Sam. v. 6—9. And thus formed the southern quarter of the city; which became gradually united with the ancient city, in the western quarter, on the hill called Acra, by Josephus; to which the eastern quarter was added, by the erection of the Temple on Mount Moriah, by Solomon. The northern quarter was a suburb, called Bezetha, by Josephus; on which afterwards was built Herod's palace, in our Saviour's time. The united city was called IERUSALEM, signifying, "they shall see peace *:" probably, from the name given by Abraham to Mount Calvary, after his intended sacrifice of his son Isaac; IAHOH JIREH, "THE LORD will see," or "provide:" alluding to his ambiguous answer to Isaac: "GOD will see (or provide) for himself—the lamb for a burnt offering, my son." At which time, probably, was revealed to him the all-sufficient sacrifice of "THE LAMB OF GOD, that taketh away the sins of the world;" nearly on the same spot, two thousand years after.

The name of the whole mountain, on the several hills and hollows of which the city stood, was called Moriah, or "Vision;" because it was high land, and could be seen "afar off," especially from the south. Gen. xxii. 2—4. Afterwards, the name was appropriated to that part on which the Temple was erected; where "THE LORD appeared to David." 2 Chron. iii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17.

This mountain is described by travellers as a rocky, limestone hill, steep of ascent on every side, except the north. It is surrounded on the other side by a group of hills, in form of an amphitheatre. Psalm cxxv. 2. On the east, by Olivet, or the Mount of Olives, fronting the Temple, and stretching from north to south about a mile in length. It has three tops; on the middle and highest stands the little chapel of the Ascension, marking the spot of our Lord's Ascension, according to Sandys, p. 155; which was "a Sabbath day's journey," or about a mile from the city, in the district of Bethany. Acts i. 12; Luke xxiv. 50.—Maundrel reckons the highest part of Mount Olivet to be the northern, about two furlongs from the chapel of the Ascension. P. 105.

* There seems to be an elegant allusion to this signification, in OUR LORD'S mourning over Jerusalem:

"O that thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day [of respite,] the things that belong to thy peace! But now are they hidden from thine eyes: for the days shall come upon thee, when thine enemies shall cast a trench around thee, and shall encompass thee, and hem thee in on every side, and level thee, and thy children within thee, to the ground; and shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knowest not the season of thy visitation [by THE DAY SPRING from on high.] Luke xix. 41; i. 78.

Between Olivet and the city, lay the valley of Kedron, about five furlongs wide in the broadest part, according to Josephus. Through it ran in the "winter" season the "brook" Kedron, (χειμαρρον, John xviii. 1.) which was dry in summer. Its course was southerly, through the valley of Jehosaphat, anciently Shaveh, or "King's Dale," where Melchizedek entertained Abraham. Gen. xiv. 17. Here Absalom reared for himself a pillar, or obelisk, 2 Sam. xviii. 18; which Josephus reckoned two furlongs from the city; Ant. 7, 10, 3; and which is still shewn to travellers.

On the south side lay the mount of Corruption, where Solomon, in his declining years, built temples to Moloch, Chemosh, and Ashtaroth; 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13: whose rites and worshippers are thus graphically described by the deep-learned Milton:

"First Moloch, horrid 'king,' besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
Though for the noise of drums and timbrels loud,
Their children's cries unheard, that past thro' fire
To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
Worship'd in Rabba and her watery plain,
In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
Of utmost Arnon. Not content with such Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart
Of Solomon he led by fraud, to build
His temple right against the Temple of GOD,
On that opprobrious Hill; and made his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnon, Tophet thence,
And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell.

"Next Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons,
From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild
Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines,
And Eleale to the Asphaltic pool.
Peor his other name, when he enticed
Israel in Sittim, on their march from Nile,
To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.
Yet thence, his lustful orgies he enlarged
Even to that hill of Scandal, by the grove
Of Moloch homicide; Lust hard by Hate:
Till good Josiah drove them thence to hell.

"With these, came they who from the bordering flood
Of old Euphrates, to the brook that parts
Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names
Of Baalim and Ashtaroth; those male,
These feminine:—————

For those, the race of Israel oft forsook
 Their LIVING STRENGTH, and unfrequented left
 His righteous altar, bowing lowly down
 To bestial gods ; for which their heads as low Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
 Of despicable foes. With these, in troop, Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called Astarte, Queen of Heaven, with crescent horns ;
 To whose bright image, nightly by the moon
Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs :
 In Sion also not unsung, where stood
 Her temple on the Offensive Mountain, built
 By that uxorious king, whose heart, though large,
 Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell
 To idols foul.”

PAR. LOST, I.

This mount of Corruption was separated from the city by the narrow valley of Hinnon, or Gehinnon ; Josh. xviii. 16 ; Jer. xix. 2 ; where the Israelites burnt their children in the fire to Moloch ; Jer. vii. 31 ; xxxii. 35. Thence made the emblem of Hell, Gehenna, or the place of the damned ; Matt. v. 22 ; Mark ix. 48 ; Matt. xxiii. 33, &c.

Towards the west, lay Mount Calvary, separated from the city by the ravine, or deep ground of Goatha ; Jer. xxxi. 39. Afterwards called Golgotha ; Matt. xxvii. 33.

The southern quarter, originally “the city of David,” built on Mount Sion, Josephus calls the “upper city ;” and “the house of Millo” was probably what he calls “the upper market,” (ἡ ἀνω αγορά.) In process of time the upper city spread downwards into the winding hollow way, which he calls “the cheese manufactory,” (τυροποιον,) and composed “the lower city,” and the most populous part of Jerusalem, which formed an amphitheatre round the temple.

THE TEMPLE.

This magnificent and extensive structure occupied the northern and lower top of Sion ; as we learn from the Psalmist : “Beautiful in situation, the delight of the whole earth, is Mount Sion ; on her north side is the city of THE GREAT KING ;” Psa. xlvi. 2 : or “his dwelling place on Sion ;” Psa. lxxvi. 2. The grandeur indeed of the situation is remarked by travellers :

“A fitter place for an august building,” says Maundrel, “could not be found in the whole world than this area. It lies on the top of Mount Moriah, over against Mount Olivet, the valley of Jehosaphat lying between both mountains. It is, as far as I could compute, by walking round it without, five hundred and seventy of my paces in length, and three hundred and seventy in breadth*: and one may still discern marks of the great labour that it cost to cut away the hard rock, and to level such a spacious area upon so strong a mountain. In the middle of the area stands at present a mosque of an octangular figure, [erected by the Caliph Omar, the next successor of Mahomet] supposed to be built upon the same ground where anciently stood the Sanctum Sanctorum. It is neither eminent for its largeness, nor its structure; and yet it makes a very stately figure, by the sole advantage of its situation." P. 106.

"As soon as we had entered the city again at Sion Gate," says Maundrel, "turning down on the right hand, and going about two furlongs close by the city wall, we were had into a garden lying at the foot of Mount Moriah, on the south side. Here we were shewn several large vaults, annexed to the mountain on this side, and running at least fifty yards under ground. They were built in two isles, arched at top with huge firm stone, and sustained with tall pillars, consisting each of one single stone, and two yards in diameter. This might possibly be some under-ground work, made to enlarge the area of the temple: for Josephus seems to describe some such work as this erected over the valley on this side the temple," [by Solomon; Antiq. Jud. 15, 11, 3 †.] p. 100. He also notices an enlargement of the area on the north side, by breaking down the north wall, in after times. Bell. Jud. 5, 5, 1.

The height of the temple wall, especially on the south side, was stupendous. In the lowest places it was three hundred cubits (or 450 feet); and in some places more. The whole circuit of the wall was crowned above by a range of porticoes, or cloisters.

The royal southern portico reached in length from the east valley to the west. Josephus represents it as the noblest work

* Reckoning, with Maundrel, ten paces equal to nine yards, the length is 513 yards, the breadth, 333; and the whole circuit 1692 yards, or near an English mile. Josephus reckoned it, in Solomon's time, a square of four stadia in circuit; Ant. 15, 11, 3, p. 702.

† The reference of Maundrel, " Antiq. Jud. Lib. 15, cap. ult." relates to a subterranean passage made on the north side, from the tower of Antonia to the eastern gate of the temple, by Herod, as a retreat from insurrections in the city.

under the sun. For besides the great depth of the valley, so that one could not bear to look down from the top [of the wall] into the abyss, there was a very lofty portico erected thereon; so that if one looked down from the verge of its roof, joining both heights together, he would grow giddy, the sight not reaching to such an immeasurable depth. The roof of the portico was flat, and of considerable breadth, supported by four rows of pillars. And Josephus elsewhere relates, that Cumanus stationed a Roman band, or cohort*, thereon, to overawe the Jews, at the time of the Passover, shortly before the commencement of the war. Bell. Jud. 2, 12, 1.

This description of the Jewish historian may throw light upon an important passage in the account of our Lord's temptation; which is thus translated in our English Bible:

"Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple," &c. Matt. iv. 5.

The original, παρλαμβανει, may more correctly be rendered, "taketh along with him;" or, as in the parallel passage of Luke, iv. 9.; ηγαγεν, "led" JESUS into the holy city; and placed him, επι το πτερυγιον του ιερου, on "the extremity of the wing," or portico, of the temple; probably at the south-east corner of the roof; where the height was greatest above the valley; and tempted him "to throw himself down," and remain suspended in the air, by the angels of God, as a proof that he was THE SON OF GOD; and thereby give him, and the multitude, that "sign from heaven," of "the Son of Man coming in the clouds;" according to the signal prophecy of Daniel, vii. 13; which the Jews and their rulers so often required of Christ; they also "tempting him," like "their father, the devil:" who, on this occasion, probably appeared in a human form, or as "an angel of light." See Matt. xii. 38; Mark viii. 11; Matt. xvi. 1; Luke xi. 29; John vi. 30; 1 Cor. i. 22; John viii. 44; 2 Cor. xi. 14.

This was כנף, Canaph, "the wing" [of the temple], upon which the prophet Daniel foretold should stand "the abomination of desolation," or the Roman ensigns; Dan. ix. 27; as explained by our LORD; Matt. xxiv. 15: but unskilfully rendered, "the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate," in the English Bible.

* A cohort usually consisted of 120 Triarii, 120 Principes, and 120 Hastati, besides Velites, or light infantry; about 480, or 500 men, in all. Ten cohorts made a legion.

That the Devil could not have led or conducted CHRIST to the top of the roof of "the Sanctuary," as imagined by some, is evident from the appropriation of the Greek word, ὁ ναός, thereto, both in the NEW TESTAMENT and in Josephus, as distinguished from το ἱερόν, "the temple," or sacred enclosure in general. See Matt. xxiii. 35; xxvii. 51; John ii. 19—21, &c. Into the Sanctuary none but the Priests could be admitted: and Josephus observes, that even "Herod himself, who rebuilt it, was excluded, as not being a Priest;"—and that "the Sanctuary was built by the Priests," (τοῦ δε ναοῦ δια τῶν ἱερέων οἰκοδομηθέντος) Ant. 15, 11, 5, 6. But into the outer temple courts (το ἱερόν) the Laity were admitted; John ii. 14; v. 14, &c.; Matt. xxiv. 1, &c. And further, the roof of the Sanctuary was inaccessible even to birds, being covered with gold spikes set very thick, to prevent them from pitching upon, and polluting it; as remarked by Josephus; Bell. Jud. 5, 5, 6.

The inner Temple, or Sanctuary, was the most splendid and magnificent part of the whole stately pile; covered all over at top with plates of gold; and so brilliant, that when the sun at his rising shone thereon, passengers at a distance could not bear to look at it; and it seemed like a mount of snow, being excessively white below the gold, or roof. Its dimensions were but small: sixty cubits in length and height, and twenty cubits in breadth. This was divided into two parts; the outer Sanctuary, forty cubits in length, and the inner, or most holy place, of twenty cubits square, separated from the outer by a rich veil. Into the latter, none but the High Priest entered once a year, on the great day of atonement. Heb. ix. 2—7; Bell. Jud. 5, 5, 5.

It is remarkable that the Sanctum Sanctorum, or "Most Holy Place," where was supposed to be the more immediate residence of the Shechinah, or Divine presence, was at the west end of the Sanctuary; pointing, as it were, towards Mount Calvary, the future scene of our Lord's crucifixion: perhaps by a typical reference thereto, as the true place of atonement for the sins of mankind; and also to distinguish it from the Heathen temples in the East, whose Adyta, or Oracles, usually fronted the East, or rising sun, the grand object of Heathen idolatry. Our "SUN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS rose with healing in his wings," or rays, in the West.

MOUNT CALVARY.

The modern city of Jerusalem has in some measure shifted its site, westwards. Mount Calvary was shut out of the walls of the old city as an execrable and polluted place, and appropriated to the execution of malefactors; where OUR LORD suffered "without the gate," Heb. xiii. 12; but, "nigh to the city;" John xix. 20. But since it was made the altar on which was offered up the precious and all-sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, it has recovered itself from that infamy, and has been always revered and resorted to with such devotion by all Christians, that it has attracted the city round about it, and stands now in the midst of Jerusalem; a great part of the hill of Sion being shut out of the walls, to make room for the admission of Calvary. And now, by an awful and disastrous reverse, the once holy hill of Sion is now become a dry and poor desert, flat and level, left by the Turks as a burial ground for all denominations of Christians to bury their dead! The Swedish traveller, Hasselquist, botanized there, and found only such plants as usually grow in waste grounds: Allium pallens, veronense, two sorts of garlick; Betonica officinalis, betony of the shops; Biscutilla didyma, buckler mustard; Trifolium globosum, tomentosum, resupinatum, three sorts of trefoil; Ephedra distactica, the shrubby horsetail.

Mount Calvary is eight hundred paces from the palace of Pilate, according to Sandys; and two hundred paces from the ancient Gate of Judgment, through which criminals were led to execution on Calvary. It stands in the west wall of the old city of Jebus, or Salem, and still resists the subversions of time, so many ages since the rest of the wall at that side has been demolished; a standing monument of our Lord's iniquitous judgment. Nehe-miah called it the Valley Gate, Neh. ii. 13. leading into the valley of Goatha, Jer. xxxi. 39, or Golgotha, "the place of a skull," where the skulls of the criminals who had been executed upon Calvary, and buried there, rolled, or tumbled, in process of time, into the deep ground or valley beneath. Matt. xxvii. 33, &c. And where they usually gave criminals, going to execution, a stupifying potion of "wine mingled with myrrh." But this our Lord refused to take. Mark xv. 23.

The ancient city of Jerusalem was completely razed to the ground by the Romans, contrary to their usual policy, partly through resentment at the obstinate resistance of the Jews, partly through avarice, to discover the treasures of money and plate, which it was customary with them to bury. It may therefore appear a matter of surprise, how the situation of particular places could be ascertained amidst the general devastation. But, as ingeniously observed by Mr. Townson: “the city stood on very uneven ground, and was intersected, as well as encompassed, with walls of great strength and thickness; whose bases would still remain after the demolition of the city, and render the boundaries and contents of each division, or ward, more easily discoverable, than if the same calamity had befallen a city built in a plain. By such standing landmarks, the first Christians, who returned after the siege, preserved the memory of the most remarkable places, consecrated as it were by some transactions of our Saviour and his Apostles, to the present day.”

CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.

This magnificent structure, which covers the whole summit of Calvary, including under its roof both the place of crucifixion, and the holy Sepulchre, was built by the piety and munificence of the Empress Helena, the mother of Constantine, the first Christian Emperor. See Sandy's plates, p. 125, 126, 129.

In order to the fitting of this hill for the foundation of a church, the first founders were obliged to reduce it to a plain area; which they did by cutting down several parts of the rock, and by elevating others. But in this work care was taken that none of those parts of the hill, which were reckoned to be more immediately concerned in our blessed Lord's passion, should be altered or diminished. Thus, that very part of Calvary where they say Christ was fastened to, and lifted upon his cross, is left entire; being about ten or twelve yards square, and standing at this day so high above the common floor of the Church, that you have 21 steps, or stairs, to go up to its top. And the Holy Sepulchre itself, which was at first a cave hewn into the rock under-ground, is now, as it were, a grotto above ground.

The Church is less than one hundred paces long, and not more than sixty wide: and yet is so contrived, that it is supposed to contain under its roof twelve or thirteen sanctuaries, or places consecrated to a more than ordinary veneration, by being reputed to have some particular actions done in them relating to the death and resurrection of Christ. As first, the place where he was derided by the soldiers; secondly, where the soldiers parted his garments; thirdly, where he was shut up, while they digged the hole to set the foot of the cross in, and made all ready for his crucifixion; fourthly, where he was nailed to the cross; fifthly, where the cross was erected; sixthly, where the soldier stood that pierced his side; seventhly, where his body was embalmed in order to his burial; eighthly, where his body was deposited in the sepulchre; ninthly, where the angels appeared to the women after his resurrection; tenthly, where Christ himself appeared to Mary Magdalen, &c. The places where these and many other things relating to our Blessed Lord are said to have been done, are all supposed to be contained within the narrow precincts of this church, and are all distinguished and adorned with so many several altars. Maundrel, p. 69.

The church is crowned with two cupolas; the eastern, called the temple of Golgotha, over the place of crucifixion; and the western, a stately rotunda, open at top, like the Pantheon at Rome; in the centre of which, and under the opening, stands the holy Sepulchre itself, having its entrance on the east side, hewn into the form of a small chapel, decorated with a small, elegant cupola, supported by polished pillars of porphyry. Within are two caves; the outer, or antichamber, about three yards square, capable of containing about a dozen persons; from thence, a narrow passage, about two feet square, leads into the inner, or tomb, where the body was laid, at the right side of the entrance, capable of containing about half a dozen persons. The inside of both is floored and lined with white marble*.

* This fabric was burnt down to the ground, in the year 1808, as we learn from the following account, in the Christian Observer, May 1809, p. 326.

“ On the night of the 11th of October, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was discovered to be on fire; and though every effort was made by the Christians residing at Jerusalem to stop the progress of the flames, it was found impossible; and about five or six in the morning, the burning cupola, with all the melted and boiling lead with which it was covered, fell in, and gave the building the appearance of a great smelting house. The excessive heat which proceeded from this immense mass of liquid fire, caused not only the marble columns which supported the gallery to burst, but likewise the marble floor of the Church, together with the pilasters and images in bas relief, that decorated the chapel containing the Holy Sepulchre, situated in the centre of the Church. Shortly after the massive columns that supported the gallery fell down, together with the whole of the walls. Fortunately, no lives were lost; only a few persons were hurt, or scorched by the fire.

This account of the Holy Sepulchre, collected from Sandys, Maundrel, and Hasselquist, throws considerable light on the circumstances of the Resurrection.

1. When the body of our Lord was interred in the inner vault, or tomb, Joseph of Arimathea, and his attendants, rolled a great stone to its entrance; which was afterwards "sealed" by the High Priests, and secured by a Roman "watch," or guard, "set," or stationed, in the antechamber. Matt. xxvii. 60—66. N.B. The Evangelist critically distinguishes between μνημειον "the sepulchre," in general, and ταφος, "the tomb," in particular: our translation confounds both.

2. The Evangelist calls the stone, "great," and Mark, "very great," xvi. 4. And it is so described by modern travellers. According to Maundrel, "it was kept a long time in the church of the Holy Sepulchre; but the Armenians, not many years since, stole it from thence by a stratagem, and conveyed it to a small chapel belonging to them, near Sion Gate; where they deposited it under the altar. It is two yards and a quarter long, one yard high, and as much broad. It is plastered all over, except in five or six little places, where it is left bare, to receive the immediate kisses, and other devotions of pilgrims. P. 99. In its place a small stone is placed, to mark the spot where "the angel, who rolled away the stone" from the entrance, "sat upon it," in the antechamber, and terrified the watch, so that "It is stated, (and the fact if true, is doubtless a very extraordinary one,) that the interior of the above chapel containing the Holy Sepulchre, and wherein service is performed, has not been in the least injured, although the same was situated immediately under the cupola, and consequently, in the middle of the flames: and that, soon after the fire had been extinguished, it was found that the silk hangings, wherewith it is decorated, and the splendid painting representing the resurrection, placed upon the Altar, had not received the least injury."

The fate of the whole of the walls, is remarkable, considering the great strength of the fabric, which Sandys in his time represented to be "of so strong a constitution, as rather decayed in beauty than substance." p. 132. A period, we trust, is thereby put to the disgraceful mummeries, superstitions, and corruptions, that have so long disgraced both the Holy Sepulchre, and the Church: Especially that pious fraud of kindling the Holy fire every Easter Eve, by a counterfeit miraculous flame, supposed to descend from heaven into the Holy Sepulchre; the process of lighting which is so well described by Maundrel; who adds, "'Tis the deplorable unhappiness of the Greek and Armenian priests, that having acted the cheat so long already, they are forced now to stand to it, for fear of endangering the apostacy of their people, who fix their faith upon, and make their pilgrimages chiefly upon this motive. It is the opinion of these poor people, that if they can have but the happiness to be buried in a shroud smutted with this celestial fire it will certainly secure them from the flames of hell!" Maundrel, pp. 94—97.

“ they became as dead,” or were entranced at the brightness of his presence. Matt. xxviii. 2—4.

“ Here,” says the pious and eloquent Sandys, “ thousands of Christians perform their vows, and offer their tears yearly, with all the expressions of sorrow, humility, affection, and penitence. It is a frozen zeal that will not be warmed with the sight thereof. And O that I could retain the effects that it wrought with an unfainting perseverance ! Who then did dictate this hymn to my REDEEMER :

“ Saviour of mankind, Man, IMMANUEL,
 Who, sinlesse, died for sin, who vanquisht hell ;
 The first fruits of the grave ; who life did give,
 Light to our darknesse ; in whose death we live ;
 O strengthen Thou my faith, correct my will,
 That mine may thine obey : protect me still,
 So that the latter death may not devour
 My soul, sealed with thy seal. So in the hour
 When Thou, whose body sanctified this tombe ;
 Unjustly judged, a glorious Judge shalt come
 To judge the world with justice ; by that sign
 I may be known, and entertained for thine !” P. 130.

The circuit of the ancient city was considerably larger than of the modern, from which Mount Sion is excluded. Nehemiah has traced the course of the ancient wall and gates very accurately ; chap. ii. 13—15 : and again, in his account of the repairs of the wall ; chap. iii. And Maunderel has given the dimensions of the modern city as follows ;

To the accuracy of Sandys, his judicious successor, Maundrel, bears the following honourable testimony :

“The descriptions and draughts of our learned, sagacious countryman, Mr. Sandys, respecting the remarkable places in and about Jerusalem, must be acknowledged so faithful and perfect, that they leave very little to be added by after comers, and nothing to be corrected.” P. 68.

The environs of Jerusalem are annexed, Plate III. from careful comparison of other ancient and modern authorities; and the bearings of the principal places around, in the Holy Land, or bordering thereon.

ADDITIONAL OBSERVATIONS.

The accuracy, however, of the foregoing account of Jerusalem and its Environs, has been lately impeached, and upon strong grounds, by that universal and intelligent traveller, Dr. Clarke, who visited the Holy Land in 1801; as not agreeing with his own observations on the spot, nor with the ancient history of Jerusalem, as recorded in Scripture and in Josephus.

In the fourth volume of his Travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, fourth edition, octavo, 1817, he has given a plan and description of Jerusalem, as it appeared to him, differing in several respects from the foregoing.

1. He disputes the supposed site of the Holy Sepulchre on Mount Calvary, within the walls of the modern City, as not being “a grotto above ground,” from which the rock has been cut away on all sides, to a level with the floor of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, according to Sandys, &c. but as actually built of mason work, cased with thick slabs of that beautiful Breccia, vulgarly called Verd-antique marble. This objection is not novel; it was urged, he observes, long ago, and thus contemptuously stated by the Monk Quaresmius:—Audivi non- nullos nebulones, occidentales hæreticos, detrahentes de iis quæ dicuntur de jam memorato sacratissimo Domini nostri Jesu Christi sepulchro; et nullius momenti ratiunculis, negantes illud verè esse in quo positum fuit corpus Jesu, &c.—[quia] monumentum Christi erat excisum in petrâ vivâ, &c. illud vero ex petris pluribus est compositum, de novo conglutinato cæmento. Lib. v. cap. 14.

Even Sandys, with all his partiality, could not avoid censuring the absurdity of thus disguising the scenes of our Saviour's life and death, "so that these natural forms are utterly deformed, which would have better satisfied the beholder; and too much regard hath made them less regardable." And he happily applies to this subject the similar violation of the fountain of Egeria,

In vallem Egeriæ descendimus, et speluncas
 Dissimiles veris. Quanto præstantius esset
 NUMEN AQUÆ, viridi si margine clauderet undas
 Herba, nec ingenium violarent marmora tophum.

Juv. Sat. iii.

We may further observe, that the cemeteries of the ancients were universally excluded from the precincts of their cities, and placed in their suburbs and gardens. Such was the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, in which our Lord was interred, John xix. 41, 42. But the supposed Holy Sepulchre could not have been in the suburbs of the ancient city: it must lie within the precincts of the lower City, as it is called by Josephus, built upon Mount Acra, which was originally separated from the eastern, or Temple quarter on Mount Moriah, by a broad valley, which was afterwards filled up, during the reign of the Asamoneans, or Maccabees, and the top of Acra was then lowered below the level of the Temple. Bell. Jud. Lib. vi. 4, 1. To remove this weighty objection, Sandys traces a part of the old city wall (marked X. X. X. in the foregoing map) and the ancient Valley Gate, (10) so as to exclude the supposed Calvary. But this, as Clarke judiciously observes, "would contract the city so much on that side, as not to leave sufficient room for its population." This part of the wall, and the ancient gate, therefore, might have belonged rather to the primitive city of Salem, built on Mount Acra; which would afterwards become an inside wall of Jerusalem, when the city was enlarged by the addition of the Temple quarter, and of the upper City, or citadel of David on Mount Sion; which, according to Josephus, (ibid.) was opposite to Mount Acra, and was much higher and steeper, and was separated from it by the valley called τυροποιων, Tyropoeon, which he says extended as far as the fountain of Siloam, (eastward) and that the houses on each side terminated in this valley. We have, therefore, strong grounds to suspect that the supposed mount Calvary is not the true; and that the pious empress Helena, who undertook her pilgrimage to Jerusalem in the eightieth year of her age, was imposed upon, as to the site of the Holy Sepulchre, by the fables of the monks; such as finding the place where Adam's head was discovered, the three crosses of Christ and his fellow-sufferers, &c.

2. The true Mount Calvary, Clarke suspects to be the southern part of Mount Moriah, called at present Mount Sion; which is indeed, excluded from the modern city, and made a burial ground. It probably was excluded from the ancient city likewise, and used for the same purpose. He represents the place of crucifixion, in his plan, as outside the present Sion gate. And that the supposed Mount Sion was a solitude in our Lord's days, we may further infer, from its summit being the traditional spot where Peter is said to have "wept bitterly" after denying Christ. Matt. xxvi. 75. The expression, εξελθων εξω, "going forth outside," strongly implies that he went out of the city.

3. The true Mount Sion, Clarke suspects to be that called by Sandys the Hill of Offence, facing Mount Sion, on the south, and the deep valley which he calls Tophet, or Gehinnon, to be in fact the valley of Millo, 2 Sam. v. 9. called Tyropoeon by Josephus, as we have seen: and this he infers, not only from its situation, so remarkably corresponding to Scripture and to Josephus; but also from the top of the mountain being still covered by ruined walls and the remains of sumptuous edifices, corresponding to "the bulwarks, towers, and regal buildings" of the citadel, and city of David; and further, from its base being perforated by numerous sepulchral caves hewn into the solid rock; upon which are Hebrew and Greek inscriptions; the former much obliterated; and among the latter he found several, deep graven in large letters on the face of the rock—ΤΗC ΑΓΙΑC CIWN. "Of the Holy Sion;" which seems to ascertain the fact, that this was indeed Mount Sion itself: and if so, the sepulchre will then appear to have been situate beneath the walls of the citadel; as was the case in many ancient cities; such as the Grecian sepulchres in the Crimea, belonging to the ancient city of Chersonesus. And should this assumed position ever be confirmed, the remarkable things belonging to Mount Sion, such as the garden of the kings near the Pool of Siloam, where Manassch and Asa were buried, 2 Kings xxi. 18; 1 Kings xv. 24; 2 Chron. xvi. 14; the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, 2 Chron. xxi. 20; xxiv. 25; the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David, where Hezekiah was buried, 2 Chron. xxxii. 33, of which there are no traces in the hill now called Sion, will in fact be found here.

These sepulchres consist of a portico, and one or more inner chambers, hewn into the rock; and they are still situate in the midst of gardens. Among them, says Clarke, are we not warranted to look for the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea?

4. The real Mount of Offence, he suspects to be no other than Mount Olivet. This is not a novel opinion. Brocardus and Adrichomius formerly, supposed it to have been the northern top of Olivet; and Maundrel and Pococke, the southern top: and the deep-learned Milton, no mean authority, places the temple of Moloch, built by Solomon, ————— “ Right against the temple of God,

On that opprobrious hill.” ———

This Hill evidently denotes Olivet; for Zechariah describes “the mount of Olives,” as “before Jerusalem, on the east,” xiv. 3. separated from Mount Moriah, on which the temple stood, by the valley of Jehosaphat. On this mount of “corruption,” “before Jerusalem,” Solomon built “high places for Chemosh the abomination or idol of Moab, and for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon.” 1 Kings xi. 7. And, likewise, for Ashtoreth the abomination of the Sidonians. 2 Kings xxiii. 13. probably on the summit of the three tops of Olivet. Of which, the middle, might have been that of Ashtoreth; “on the right-hand of the mount of Corruption,” or south of the high place of Moloch, seated, perhaps, on the northern summit; and that of Chemosh on the southern*.

That the temple of Ashtoreth, or Astarte, occupied the middle summit, is highly probable from a curious discovery of Clarke, who found there a pagan Adytum, or Crypt; which he thus describes.

* To this pagan Trinity, may there not be an allusion, in the name of a place, called Baal Shalisha, “the triad Baal,” and probably in that neighbourhood? 2 Kings iv. 42.

“We found upon the top, the remains of several works, whose history is lost. Among these were several subterraneous chambers of a different nature from any of the cryptæ we had before seen. One of them had the shape of a Cone of immense size, the vertex alone appearing level with the soil, and exhibiting, by its section at the top, a small circular aperture; the only entrance we could find to it: the sides extending below to a great depth, were lined with a hard red stucco, like the substance covering the walls of the subterraneous galleries which we found in the sandy isle of Aboukir, upon the coast of Egypt. This extraordinary piece of antiquity, which from its form, may be called a subterraneous pyramid, is upon the very pinnacle of the mountain. It might easily escape observation, although it be of such considerable size; and perhaps this is the reason why it has not been noticed by preceding travellers. This crypt has not the smallest resemblance to any place of Christian use or worship. Its situation upon the pinnacle of a mountain, rather denotes the work of Pagans, whose sacrilegious rites upon ‘the high places,’ are so often alluded to in Jewish History:”—And its peculiar form of the cone, was a symbol of the Paphian Venus, which was the same divinity as the Phœnician Ashtoreth.

It is remarkable, that when the good Josiah afterwards “brake in pieces the images or idols, and cut down the consecrated groves, he filled their places with the bones of men.” 2 Kings xxiii. 14. He did not destroy the places, or temples themselves; he only defiled them with the greatest of all pollutions, by rendering them charnel-houses.

The remote antiquity of this conical temple of Ashtoreth, may be collected from the stucco, for the walls of the cryptæ near the pyramids of Egypt, and the surface of the Memphian Sphynx, which has remained so many ages exposed to all the attacks of the weather, may be instanced as still exhibiting the same sort of cement, similarly coloured, and equally unaltered. Clarke’s Travels, Vol. IV. pp. 355—358. The worship of Ashtoreth, indeed, was introduced into Syria, even before Abraham’s days; for we read of Ashtoreth Karnaim, (“the shining cow, two horned,”) the name of a place where the Assyrian confederates smote the Rephaims, Gen. xiv. 5. Solomon, therefore, might have only revived the ancient pagan worship of this nocturnal Goddess, representing the Moon, and of Chemosh and Moloch, the Sun. “Lust hard by Hate”—in the energetic language of Milton, thus distinguishing the libidinous orgies of Chemosh and Ashtoreth, from the “horrid” human sacrifices of Moloch.

The sepulchral caves at the base of the newly discovered Sion are not to be confounded with the “Royal Caves” noticed by Josephus, as situate northward of the city; which he represents as the sepulchres of Helena, queen of Adiabene. De Bell. Jud. Lib. V. Cap. 4. and are described as most magnificent, by Maundrel, Pococke, and Clarke.

The Greek inscriptions noticed on the former caves, may perhaps be assigned to the time of the Maccabees, or reigns of the Asamonæan princes, when the Greek language, under Alexander’s successors, became prevalent all over Asia. Some of these caves, however, are ornamented with paintings on the walls, remarkably fresh in the colour, representing the Apostles, the Virgin, &c. with circular lines as symbols of glory around their heads. These evidently were formed since the Christian era; and Clarke thinks, after the dispersion of the Jews by Adrian, when the Christian Church became established at Jerusalem, until the reign of Diocletian. pp. 345, 346.

PHœNICIA.

Phœnicia extended from the Gulph of Issus, where it bounded Cilicia on the north, along the coast southwards, to the termination of the ridges of Libanus and Antilibanus, near Tyre, where it met the border of Palestine. In breadth it only comprehended the narrow tract between the continuation of Mount Libanus and the Sea.

The principal cities of this maritime tract, were Sidon and Tyre; which rose to great power and opulence by their extensive commerce. The manufactures of Sidon are noticed by Homer: “Embroidered female dresses,” Iliad VI. 289. “Silver cups, curiously wrought,” Iliad XXIII. 743; Odyss. XV. 115—118; who styles the Sidonians, πολυδαδαλοι, “skilled in many arts.” And before his time, Sidon is styled “great,” by Joshua, xi. 8; xix. 28. But she was afterwards eclipsed by “her daughter,”

TYRE.

This flourishing colony, from Sidon, was situated about eight hours journey from thence, southwards; and in process of time became "a mart of the nations:" Isa. xxiii. 3. Tyre also boasted of a very early antiquity: "Is this your joyous city, whose antiquity is of ancient days?" Isa. xxiii. 7. And the antiquity of both was recognized by Xerxes; when, in a general council of his chieftains, during the Grecian war, he made the King of Sidon sit down first, next to him the King of Tyre, and the rest, according to their respective ranks. Herod. B. 8.

The antiquity of Tyre has been variously estimated. Herodotus says, that the Tyrians, in his time, boasted of the antiquity of their temple and city, as founded 2300 years before, or about B.C. 2746; which is earlier than the date of the dispersion. On the other hand Josephus dates it too low, only 240 years before the foundation of Solomon's Temple, or B.C. 1267: whereas Joshua notices "the strong city of Tyre" about B.C. 1602. Probably the numeral letter denoting a thousand, was dropt from the text of Josephus; which, being restored, would give the date of the foundation of Tyre, B.C. 2267; or about 160 years before the foundation of Salem; which is probably correct; as the progress of colonization was later, the farther from the parent stock. Sidon, as the eldest of the sons of Canaan, probably was also the first settled in his allotted station.

Tyre was twofold, Insular and Continental. Insular Tyre was certainly the most ancient; for this it was which was noticed by Joshua: the continental city, however, as being more commodiously situated, first grew into consideration, and assumed the name of Palatyrus, or Old Tyre. Want of sufficient attention to this distinction, has embarrassed both the Tyrian Chronology and Geography. Insular Tyre was confined to a small rocky island, eight hundred paces long, and four hundred broad, and could never exceed two miles in circumference. But Tyre, on the opposite coast, about half a mile from the sea, was a city of vast extent, since many centuries after its demolition by Nebuchadnezzar, the scattered ruins measured nineteen miles round, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. Of these, the most curious and surprising are, the cisterns of Roselayne, designed to supply the city with water; of which there are three still entire, about one or two furlongs from the sea; so well described by Maundrel, for their curious construction and solid masonry. "The fountains of these waters," says he, after the description, "are as unknown as the contriver of them. According to common tradition, they are filled from a subterraneous river which King Solomon discovered by his great sagacity; and that he caused these cisterns to be made as part of his recompence to King Hiram, for the materials furnished by that prince, towards building the temple at Jerusalem. It is certain, however, from their rising so high above the level of the ground, that they must be brought from some part of the mountains, which are about a league distant; and it is as certain that the work was well done at first, seeing it performs its office so well, at so great a distance of time; the Turks having broken an outlet on the west side of the cistern, through which there issues a stream like a brook, driving four corn mills between it and the sea." From these cisterns there was an aqueduct which led to the city, supported by arches, about six yards from the ground, running in a northerly direction about an hour, when it turns to the west, at a small mount, where anciently stood a fort, but now a mosque, which seems to ascertain the site of the old city, and thence proceeds over the isthmus that connects insular Tyre with the main, built by Alexander, when he besieged and took it.

Old Tyre withstood the mighty Assyrian power, having been besieged, in vain, by Shalmanasar, for five years; although he cut off their supplies of water from the cisterns; which they remedied, by digging wells within the city. It afterwards held out for thirteen years against Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, and was at length taken; but not until the Tyrians had removed their effects to the insular town, and left nothing but the bare walls to the victor, which he demolished.

What completed the destruction of the city was, that Alexander afterwards made use of these materials to build a prodigious causeway, or isthmus, above half a mile long, to the insular city, which revived as the Phoenix, from the ashes of the old, and grew to great power and opulence as a maritime state; and which he stormed after a most obstinate siege of five months. Pococke observes, that "there are no signs of the ancient city; and as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered, and the great aqueduct is in many parts almost buried in the sand." Vol. II. p. 81. Thus has been fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel:

“Thou shalt be built no more: though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again!” xxvi. 21.

The fate of Insular Tyre has been no less remarkable: When Alexander stormed the city, he set fire to it. This circumstance was foretold: “Tyre did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold, as the mire of the streets. Behold the Lord will cast her out, and He will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire.” Zech. ix. 3, 4. After this terrible calamity, Tyre again retrieved her losses. Only eighteen years after, she had recovered such a share of her ancient commerce and opulence, as enabled her to stand a siege of fourteen months against Antigonus, before he could reduce the city. After this, Tyre fell alternately under the dominion of the Kings of Syria and Egypt, and then of the Romans, until it was taken by the Saracens, about A.D. 639, retaken by the Crusaders, A.D. 1124; and at length sacked and razed by the Mamalukes of Egypt, with Sidon, and other strong towns, that they might no longer harbour the Christians, A.D. 1289.

Maundrel, the most intelligent of modern travellers, who visited the Holy Land A.D. 1697, described it thus:

“This city, standing in the sea upon a peninsula, promises, at a distance, something very magnificent; but when you come to it, you find no similitude of that glory for which it was so renowned in ancient times, and which the prophet Ezekiel describes, chap. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii. On the north side, it has an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle; besides which, you see nothing here but a mere Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c.; there being not so much as one entire house left! Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches harbouring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly by fishing: who seem to be preserved in this place by Divine Providence, as a visible argument how God has fulfilled his word concerning Tyre; viz. that it should be as the top of a rock; a place for fishers to dry their nets upon.” Ezek. xxvi. 14. And Hasselquist, who saw it since, in A.D. 1751, observes:

“None of those cities which were formerly famous, are so totally ruined as Tyre, (now called Zur) except Troy. Zur now scarcely can be called a miserable village, though it was formerly Tyre, the queen of the sea! Here are about ten inhabitants, Turks and Christians, who live by fishing.”

The Phœnicians in general, were the most extensive and experienced navigators of antiquity. Not confining themselves to the Mediterranean and Euxine Seas, they explored the coasts of the Eastern and Atlantic Oceans. We read of two voyages made by Solomon's ships, assisted by Hiram, the King of Tyre's subjects: the first from Eziongeber, a port on the Idumæan sea, to Ophir, whence they brought back gold, 1 Kings ix. 27, 28; 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18; and also " Almug trees, and precious stones," 1 Kings x. 11. The Almug tree is thought to be Ebony, or Lignum vitæ; and Ophir is judiciously conjectured by Bruce, to have been Sofala *, a district on the eastern coast of Africa, nearly opposite to the centre of the great island of Madagascar.

The second voyage, which employed three years, was made by their joint fleets, which sailed to Tarshish, or Tartessus, or the isle of Cadiz, lying between the two branches of the Gualquiver, on the coast of Spain, whence they proceeded southwards, to the coast of Guinea; from which they brought back " gold, ivory, apes, and peacocks;" and from Spain, " silver;" 1 Kings x. 22; as well explained by Gillies, Vol. I. p. 151—153; who also remarks, that they traded northwards, to the Cassiterides, or Scilly Islands, and the coasts of Cornwall, in Great Britain, for tin, which was used for hardening copper, to supply the want of iron or steel weapons; and even to the coasts of the Baltic, for the admired article of Amber, then deemed more precious than gold.

In Pharaoh Necho's time, the Phœnician mariners, employed on a voyage of discovery, setting out from the Red Sea, circumnavigated Africa in three years. Herodot. IV. 42.

ASSYRIA.

This country, in its most extensive signification, both in sacred and profane history, comprehended,

1. Assyria Proper, eastward of the Tigris, and south of Taurus. It was called in Scripture, Kir: " Have not I brought up the Assyrians from Kir?" Amos ix. 7. " The people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir." Amos i. 5. " And the king of

* From Ophir was derived Σωφίρα, Sophira, the name given by Josephus, Ant. 8, 6, 4: and from thence, Sophala, or Sofala, by a usual permutation of L and R. It was the country of the Macrobian Ethiopians, or Abyssinians, whom Cambyzes invaded unsuccessfully, coveting their gold: the abundance of which is expressed by " the gold chains of their prisoners." Herodotus, III. 23. See Gillies' History of the World, Vol. I. p. 154.

Assyria took Damascus, and slew their king, Rezin, and carried the people captive to Kir." 2 Kings xvi. 9. And the name is still traceable in that country; the Kar- duchian, or Kur-distan, mountains; Kiarè, the name of their loftiest ridge, the large town of Ker-kook, and several other places of less note, in their prefixes, evidently retain the original word, Kir, with some slight deviation. This was a rich and fertile, though mountainous region; whence it was called by the Greeks, Adiabene, "impassable;" finely watered by the springs of the Tigris, the greater and lesser Zab, the Diala, and the Mendeli. Its capital city was Nineveh, on the east side of the Tigris, opposite to the modern city of Mosul; in lat. 36, 20, according to Niebuhr, Tom. II. Tab. XLV.

2. Aram, or Syria, eastward of the Euphrates. This was divided into two districts, the northern and the southern. The upper was called in Scripture, Aram Naharaim, "Aram between the two rivers;" and by the Greeks, Mesopotamia, of the same import. This was the country of Nahor, Gen. xxiv. 10; and of Laban, the Syrian, Gen. xxxi. 20; and of Balaam, the diviner, who came from "Aram, out of the mountains of the east," Numb. xxiii. 7; or from Aram Naharaim, Deut. xxiv. 4.

The lower part of this division was called Padan Aram, "the champaign Aram," Gen. xxv. 20; in which was Haran, Gen. xi. 31; called Charran, Acts vii. 2; and the city of Nahor, Gen. xxiv. 10, compared with xxvii. 43; to which Abraham's family first emigrated from the original settlement of the family at "Ur, of the Chaldees," situated near "the river" Tigris, and probably the same place as Pethor, Peth-Ur, or Beth-Ur, "the house of light," the residence of Balaam, and "the land of the children of Balak's people," or of his ancestors; whence this king of Moab sent for the diviner to curse Israel. Numb. xxii. 5. Charran is probably still recorded in Charrae, in the north-west of Mesopotamia, a city situated on an arm of the river Chaboras, which runs into the Euphrates; and noticed by the Roman writers, on account of the signal defeat of Crassus, and the Romans there, by the Parthians.

The whole of this northern district extended from Mount *Masius, to the wall of Media southwards, including all that fertile tract between the two rivers, from their greatest divergence of one or two hundred miles, to their contraction, within twenty miles asunder; in the vicinity of Bagdat, the great modern capital, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, in lat. $33^{\circ} 20'$; according to Niebuhr, Tom. II. p. 239.

The southern district was called, "the land of Shinaar," Gen. x. 10; xi. 2; or Babylon, "the land of Nimrod," Micah v. 6; and Babylonia, by the Greek and Latin writers. It reached from the wall of Media, or contracted the space between the two rivers about three hundred miles down to the Persian Gulph; never exceeding four-score miles in breadth. The river Euphrates ran through the ancient capital, Babylon, which lay about 60 miles below Bagdat, in lat. $32^{\circ} 28'$. Niebuhr, Tom. II. p. 206, Tab. XLI.

3. Aram, or Syria, westward of the Euphrates. This, in Scripture, was divided into Aram Zobah, which reached from the Euphrates to the north and east of Damascus, 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3. And Aram, of Damascus, which lay to the south and west of the former, 2 Sam. viii. 5. These corresponded to the Upper Syria, north of Mount Libanus, including Cœle Syria, or the hollow valley between the two ranges of Libanus and Antilibanus, and the lower, or Palestine Syria, the Promised Land, and reaching southwards to the borders of Egypt. These were the proper boundaries of Aram, or Syria in general, according to its divisions; but Syria and Assyria are frequently used indiscriminately by the classic authors.

NINEVEH.

This capital of the Assyrian empire could boast of the remotest antiquity. Tacitus styles it, "Vetustissima sedes Assyriae." Annal. 12, 13. And Scripture informs us, that Nimrod, after he had built Babel, in the land of Shinaar, invaded Assyria, where he built Nineveh, and several other cities. Gen. x. 11. Its name denotes "the habitation of Nin," which seems to have been the proper name of "that rebel," as Nimrod signifies. And it is uniformly styled by Herodotus, Xenophon, Diodorus, Lucian, &c. Ἡ Νίνοϛ, "the city of Ninus." And the village of Nunia, opposite Mosul, in its name, and the tradition of the natives*, ascertains the site of the ancient city, which was near

* In the mosque of this village, Nunia, is shewn the tomb of the prophet Jona h which is held in great veneration by the Jews at this day. Niebuhr, Tom. II. p. 286.

“the castle of Arbela,” according to Tacitus, so celebrated for the decisive victory of Alexander the Great over the Persians there; the site of which is ascertained by the village of Arbil, about ten German miles to the east of Nunia, according to Niebuhr’s map. Tab. XLV.

Diodorus Siculus, indeed, asserts, that Ninereh was built on the Euphrates, Lib. II.; but this must be a mistake; for Herodotus, I. 193; Pliny, VI. 13; and Ptolomy, p. 146; all agree that it was built on the Tigris. Such a combination of ancient and modern authorities against his single assertion, decides the question beyond a doubt. And it is rather strange, how so accurate a geographer and historian as Doctor Gillies, in his late History of the World from Alexander to Augustus, Vol. I. p. 57. could adopt the mistake of Diodorus, and imagine that there were two Ninevehs, the one on the Tigris, the other on the Euphrates.

He also adopts the opinion, that the former Nineveh was founded by Ashur, not Nimrod; following the translation of our English Bible:

“Out of that land (Shinar) went forth Ashur, and builded Ninereh, and the city of Rehoboth and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah; the same is a great city.” Gen. x. 11.

That this is incorrect, may appear from the following reasons:

1. The introduction of Ashur, the second son of Shem, into the account of the settlement of Ham’s family, is rather irrelevant.

2. There is no evidence that Ashur at any time resided in the land of Shinar; he probably lived always in Assyria, which bore his name.

3. “The land of Ashur” is distinguished from “the land of Nimrod,” or Shinar, in the prophecy of Micah, v. 6. where both are threatened “to be laid waste with the sword,” in retaliation for the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities of the Jews.

4. The original verb אָשׁוּר, axivit, “went forth,” frequently denotes hostile invasion. See instances, 2 Sam. xi. 1; 2 Kings xxiv. 8; Ps. lx. 10; Isa. xlii. 13; Zech. xiv. 3. And the noun אֲשׁוּר, Ashur, put frequently for the land of Assyria, Gen. ii. 14; Numb. xxiv. 24, &c. is used elliptically for אֲשׁוּרָה, “to,” or “into Assyria,” both the affix, ה local, and the preposition, אֶל or ל, both signifying “to,” or “towards,” being often understood. Compare in the original, 2 Sam. x. 2. with 1 Chron. xiii. 13; and 2 Sam. x. 2. with 1 Chron. xix. 2, &c.

The passage, therefore, may more correctly be rendered, "Out of that land (Shinar) went forth (Nimrod) to (invade) Assyria, &c." or, "into Assyria," as in the margin of the English Bible; supported by the authorities of the Targums of Onkelos and Jerusalem, Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, and Jerom; and the most judicious moderns, Bochart, Hyde, Marsham, Wells, Le Chais, Universal History, &c.

Nineveh, at first, seems only to have been a small city, and less than Resen, in its neighbourhood; which is conjectured by Bochart, and not without reason, to have been the same as Larissa, which Xenophon describes as "the ruins of a great city, formerly inhabited by the Medes," Anabas. 3. and which the natives might have described as belonging La Resen, "to Resen."

Nineveh did not rise to greatness for many ages after, until its second founder, Ninus II. about B.C. 1230, enlarged and made it the greatest city in the world. According to Diodorus, it was of an oblong form, 150 stadia long, and 90 broad, and, consequently, 480 in circuit, or 48 miles, reckoning 10 stadia to an English mile, with Major *Rennel. And its walls were 100 feet high, and so broad that three chariots could drive on them abreast; and on the walls were 1500 towers, each 200 feet high. We are not, however, to imagine that all this vast enclosure was built upon: it contained great parks and extensive fields, and detached houses and buildings, like Babylon, and other great cities of the east, even at the present day, as Bus-sorah, &c.

And this entirely corresponds with the representations of Scripture: In the days of the prophet Jonah, about B.C. 800, it is said to have been "a great city, " an exceeding great city, of three days' journey," Jonah i. 2; iii. 3. perhaps in circuit; for 16 miles is about an ordinary day's journey for a caravan †. The Jews, at present, however, understand it in length, according to Niebuhr, Vol. I. p. 286, which seems to agree with the prophet's "entering into the city a day's journey," Jonah iii. 4. if it does not rather denote his going throughout the city, which was a day's journey in length; and this corresponds with the tradition of the natives, that the city extended from Kadikend

* By a more accurate calculation, made by the learned and ingenious Doctor Falconer, of Bath, nine Greek stadia were equal to one English mile, and 030185 decimals over. See his curious Tables of Ancient Measures of Length, Tab. I.

to Jeriudsjd, two villages on the east of the Tigris, about two or three German miles asunder, of which Niebuhr reckons fifteen to a degree.

The population of Nineveh also, at that time, was very great. It contained "more than six score thousand persons that could not discern between their right hand and their left, besides much cattle," iv. 11. Reckoning the persons to have been infants of two years old and under, and that these were a fifth part of the whole, according to Bochart, the whole population would amount to 600,000 souls. The same number Pliny assigns for the population of Seleucia, on the decline of Babylon, VI. 26. London at present, which perhaps is the most populous city in the world, not excepting Pekin, in China, is not reckoned to exceed 800,000, by Major Rennel, Herodot. p. 341, 348.

The threatened "overthrow of Nineveh within three days," by the general repentance and humiliation of the inhabitants, from the highest to the lowest, was suspended for near 200 years, until "their iniquity came to the full;" and then the prophecy was literally accomplished, in the third year of the siege of the city, by the combined Medes and Babylonians; the king Sardanapalus, being encouraged to hold out, in consequence of an ancient prophecy*, That Nineveh should never be taken by assault, till the river became its enemy; when a mighty inundation of the river, swollen by continual rains, came up against a part of the city, and threw down twenty stadia of the wall in length; upon which, the king, conceiving that the oracle was accomplished, burnt himself, his concubines, eunuchs, and treasures, and the enemy entering by the breach, sacked and razed the city, about B.C. 606.

Diodorus also relates, that Belesis, the Governor of Babylon, obtained from Arbaces, the king of Media, the ashes of the palace, to erect a mount with them near the temple of Belus, at Babylon; and that he forthwith prepared shipping, and, together with the ashes, carried away most of the gold and silver, of which he had private information given him by one of the eunuchs who escaped the fire. Doctor Gillies thinks it incredible that these could be transported from Nineveh to Babylon,

* This was the more explicit prophecy of Nahum, 115 years before the destruction of Nineveh, "With an over-running flood, HE (THE LORD) will make an utter end of the place thereof," i. 8.—"The gates of the river shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved," ii. 6.

300 miles distant; but likely enough, if Nineveh was only 50 miles from Babylon, with a large canal of communication between them, the Nahar Malka, or “Royal River,” p. 132. But we learn from Niebuhr, that the conveyance of goods from Mosul to Bagdat by the Tigris is very commodious, in the very large boats called Kelleks; in which, in Spring, when the river is rapid, the voyage may be made in three or four days, which would take fifteen by land, Niebuhr, p. 287.

The complete demolition of such immense piles as the walls and towers of Nineveh, may seem matter of surprise to those who do not consider the nature of the materials of which they were constructed; of bricks, dried or baked in the sun, and cemented with bitumen, which were apt to be “dissolved” by water*, or to moulder away by the injuries of the weather. Besides, in the east, the materials of ancient cities have been often employed in the building of new ones in the neighbourhood. Thus Mosul was built with the spoils of Nineveh. Tauk Kesra, or “the palace of Chosroes,” appears to have been built of bricks brought from the ruins of Babylon; and so was Hellah, as the dimensions are nearly the same, and the proportions so singular. And when such materials could conveniently be transported by inland navigations, they are to be found at very great distances from their ancient place, much farther, indeed, than are Bagdat and Seleucia, or Ctesiphon, from Babylon. Rennel’s Herodot. p. 377, 378.

The city of Babylon was of a still earlier date than Nineveh. It began to be built at the same time as the tower of Babel, and both were left unfinished at the confusion of tongues. Gen. xi. 4—8.

The earliest notice of Babylon in profane history is, that Belus II. who is frequently confounded with Belus I. or Nimrod, built the tower of Belus, at Babylon, where he was buried, and had a temple dedicated to him, which the Chaldeans, or Babylonian priests, used for an observatory. And the astronomical observations which Alexander found at Babylon, and sent to

* Captain Cunningham remarked that at Bussorah, which is built of sun-dried bricks, after heavy rain, the falling of houses into the streets is no unusual sight. Rennel’s Herodot. p. 749.

Aristotle, are said to have been continued for 1903 years back, which would bring their commencement to B.C. 2230, the most likely date of the accession of Belus II.

Herodotus, who visited Babylon, takes no notice of its founder, or of its antiquity; he only tells us, that it was principally improved by two queens, Semiramis and Nitocris, who strengthened its fortifications, guarded it against inundations, and improved and adorned it; and that one of the gates of Babylon was called the gate of Semiramis. Nitocris appears to have been the queen of Nebuchadnezzar, who was regent during his distraction, and completed those great works which he began; and Semiramis lived only five generations, or 166 years, before Nitocris, and was therefore most probably the wife of Nabonassar, king of Babylon, who began to reign B.C. 747. It is not indeed likely that Babylon should grow great till the decline of her rival Nineveh.

The testimony of Herodotus, which is of considerable weight, refutes the fiction of Ctesias, followed by Diodorus and Justin, that Semiramis, the builder of the immense walls of Babylon, was the wife of Ninus II, the second founder of Nineveh. Moses Choronenensis, in his Armenian History, with more probability, relates, that “Semiramis built a city and palace in the most fruitful and pleasant part of Armenia, whither she resorted to spend the summer season, and resided the rest of the year at Nineveh.” She might perhaps have contributed to finish the walls of Nineveh after her husband’s death; for Suidas relates, that “Semiramis, the first Assyrian queen, walled Nineveh about, and called it Babylon, changing its name.” Voce Σεμυραμυς. But from what authority does not appear. The change of name is improbable.

The city of Babylon was originally built by Nimrod, along with the tower of Babel, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates. Gen. x. 10; xi. 4. At first, it was probably but small; but was afterwards enlarged and improved by Belus, Semiramis, Nebuchadnezzar, and his queen, whom Herodotus calls Nitocris, until it became the wonder of the world.

According to Herodotus, Babylon was a perfect square, each side of which was 120 stadia, and of course its circuit 480 stadia, the same as that of Nineveh; but its area was considerably greater. The walls were 200 royal cubits high, and 50 wide. On the top were erected small watch-towers, of one story high, leaving a space between them, through which a chariot and four horses might pass and turn. In the circumference of the wall, at different intervals, were a hundred massy gates of brass, whose hinges and frames were of the same metal. The whole was surrounded by a wide and deep trench, full of water. Of the earth dug out of the trench bricks were made, which were baked in a furnace, and when laid, were cemented with hot bitumen.

This circuit of 480 stadia is reckoned "enormous and improbable," by Major Rennel, p. 353; and he prefers the lower reports of Clitarchus, who accompanied Alexander, 365 stadia; or of Diodorus, from Ctesias, 360 stadia, p. 340; supposing that the present numbers of Herodotus are corrupt, p. 363*. But of this there is no evidence; rather the contrary. For Pliny and Solinus both agree with Herodotus, reckoning the circuit 60 Roman miles, at 8 stadia to a mile. And surely Herodotus, who visited Babylon above a century before Clitarchus, and near three centuries before the time of Diodorus, and is a more credible witness than Ctesias, is more to be regarded; especially as he visited it earlier, and therefore in a more unimpaired state; and appears to have surveyed it with much attention.

Indeed a strong presumptive argument of the fidelity of the report of Herodotus, is the sameness of the dimensions of Nineveh and Babylon. The distinguishing trait in Nebuchadnezzar's character was inordinate pride, which occasioned his humiliation. Dan. iv. 29—31. He wished to surpass Nineveh, the greatest city in the world; which contained $150 \times 90 = 13500$ square stadia, within its walls; but the walls of Babylon contained $120 \times 120 = 14400$ square stadia; or 900 more than the former. The walls too were twice as high; and if the towers thereon were not as numerous, (only two hundred and fifty, according to Diodorus) it was only because the city was defended on the western side by deep and extensive morasses, which rendered also fewer gates and communications with the country necessary on that side. Thus, when Alexander, after his return from India, in order to avoid the evils foretold by the soothsayers, if he entered the city on the eastern side, wished to have entered by the west, he was compelled, by the marshes and morasses on that side, to relinquish the attempt: as we learn from Arrian, lib. 7. And of the principal gates of the city, we may collect from Herodotus, lib. 2; that the gate of Ninus, or Nineveh, fronted the north; the gate of Chaldea, the south; and the gates of Semiramis, Belus, and Cissia, or Susa, the east, proceeding from north to south*. See Rennel's Map of Babylon, p. 335.

* The accounts of Herodotus and Diodorus are easily reconcileable. The circuit of the walls of Nineveh and Babylon were originally equal; each 480 stadia: but the haughty Nebuchadnezzar, in all the pride of conquest, enlarged the city, by taking in the western quarter of the city, beyond the river Euphrates, in which he built his famous Palace and Hanging Gardens, on the western side of the river, to correspond and vie with the tower of Babel on the eastern side. And this exactly corresponds with his arrogant boast, in Scripture: at the end of a twelvemonth (after his significant dream of the holy watchers, Dan. iv. 1—28) the king walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon. He spake and said: Is not this Babylon the Great, that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty! While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven: O King Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken, thy kingdom is departed from thee, &c. Dan. iv. 29—37.

The magnificence and splendour of Babylon, after its enlargement and improvement by Nebuchadnezzar, when it became one of the wonders of the world, is well expressed by his arrogant boast: "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built for the house [or capital] of my kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty." Dan. iv. 30. It contained many streets, adorned with houses, three or four stories high; and these furnished with spacious parks and gardens. Among

* Major Rennel, in his Geography of Herodotus, p. 357, has thus ingeniously determined the positions of these gates.

"When Darius Hystaspes besieged Babylon, (Thalia, 155 et seq.) the Belidian and Cissian gates were [betrayed and] opened to him by Zopyrus, and the Babylonians fled for refuge to the temple of Belus; as we may suppose, the nearest place of security. The Cissian or Susian gate must surely have been in the eastern front of the city, as Susa lay to the east: and by circumstances the Belidian gate was near it; as the plan was laid that Persian troops were to be stationed opposite to these gates; and it was probable that matters would be so contrived, as to facilitate, as much as possible, the junction of the two bodies of Persian troops that were first to enter the city, as a kind of forlorn hope.

"It may also be remarked, that the gates at which the feints were made, previous to the opening of the Belidian and Cissian, were those of Ninus, Semiramis, and Chaldea. The first towards Ninus, or Nineveh, must have been, of course, to the north; and the Chaldæan, to the south: and perhaps that of Semiramis, to the north-east, between the Belidian and Ninian; as that of Cissia, to the south-east, between the Belidian and Chaldæan: as it is unquestionable, that the Ninian and Cissian gates, if not the Chaldæan, were in the eastern division of Babylon, (since the countries from which they are respectively denominated, lie to the east of the Euphrates) it may be collected, that the attack was confined to that division alone. (And what army could invest a fortress 34 miles in circuit?) And if this be admitted, the Belidian gate, and temple of Belus, must have stood on the east side of the Euphrates."

its curiosities, the most celebrated were, 1. the tower and temple of Belus, on the eastern side of the Euphrates, which ran through the center of the city, from north to south; 2. opposite thereto, on the western side of the river, and with a tunnel of communication between them, running across under the bed of the river, stood the strong and spacious palace of Nebuchadnezzar, which formed the citadel; adjoining to this, 3. the hanging gardens.

1. The tower of Belus was of a pyramidal form, somewhat loftier, but less massy, than the pyramids of Egypt. It consisted of eight stories, of which the lowest was a stadium in breadth (or 500 feet) and it rose to the same altitude. On the summit, according to Diodorus, was erected a statue of Belus, 40 feet high: but Herodotus, when he visited Babylon, found no statue there. This intelligent traveller, however, was informed by the Chaldeans, that there formerly stood in the temple of Belus adjoining, a statue of solid gold, twelve cubits high, which was spared by Darius Hystaspes; but afterwards was taken away by Xerxes, who slew the priest that forbade him to remove it. Herod. i. §. 182. Might not this have been the identical "golden image," made by Nebuchadnezzar, in all the pride of conquest, which he set up as an object of idolatrous worship to his subjects; recorded by the prophet Daniel? iii. 1. It was evidently distinct from the statue or image of Jupiter Belus, noticed by Herodotus and Diodorus; and was designed to represent Nebuchadnezzar himself, or the genius of his empire, according to Jerom, supported by Daniel:—"Thou art this head of gold." Dan. ii. 38. This arrogant monarch, having made not only the head, but the whole image of gold, prefiguring the stability and permanency of his empire, in opposition to the succession of the four monarchies, signified by the image, in his dream, compounded of various metals. And the height of the image, twelve cubits, mentioned by the Chaldeans, well accorded with the breadth, "six cubits," noticed in Scripture; (perhaps, with the arms extended.) For the height, "sixty cubits," being evidently disproportionate to its breadth, must have included the elevation of the pillar, or pedestal, on which it stood.

Both the tower and the temple of Belus, (the former of which probably stood on the site of the tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 4.) were enclosed within a square court of two stadia in length, having gates of brass, which were still subsisting in the time of Herodotus. It fronted, probably, the middle eastern gate of Belus.

2. The royal palace and citadel, opposite, on the west side of the river, were spacious, and strongly fortified. The former was a square of five stadia in circuit. It was contiguous to the citadel, called by Berosus, "Borsippon," and by Strabo, "Borsippa," which was a square of 15 stadia. These names are evidently derived from the Punic, "Byrsa, or Bursa;" or from the Hebrew, "Bosrah;" all signifying "a fortress:" and they are still retained, with some slight variation, by the natives: for Niebuhr observed a ruin on the west side of the river, which his guide called Birs; where, according to the tradition of the country, formerly stood Nimrod's palace; Tom. II. p. 236. And, according to Beauchamp, the Arabs call a great mass of ruins on the west, Broussa, or Boursa, which is separated by the river from another, which they call Macloube, or "Topsy Turvy." The latter evidently denoting the immense ruins of the tower and temple of Belus. They are described as about sixty yards high, flat at top, of an irregular form, intersected by ravines, worn by the rains. The whole could never be suspected of having been the work of human hands, were it not for the layers of bricks, which are found therein. They are fire-baked, and cemented with zephth, or bitumen; between each layer are found oziars. Here are found those large and thick bricks imprinted with unknown characters: specimens of which were presented to the Abbé Barthelemi. How exactly does this correspond to the builders of Babel: "Let us make brick, and burn them throughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar." Gen. xi. 3.

These ruins are very visible a league north from Hellah, which is an Arab town, built on the west side of the Euphrates, containing about ten or twelve thousand souls. This corresponds exactly with the description of the Turkish geographer, Ibrahim Effendi: "Babel is close to Hellah; and on the left hand (i. e. on the west) of the road, in going from Hellah to Bagdat. The latitude of Hellah is about $32^{\circ}, 28'$; which gives that of the tower of Babel, or Belus, $32^{\circ}, 31'$. Rennel Herodot. p. 350.

Around this vast pile of ruins, De la Valle observed the foundations of buildings, at the distance of 50 or 60 paces; but beyond that, to a great distance, the whole was a clear and even plain. These probably were the range of buildings that formed the exterior circuit of the square in which the tower and temple stood, according to Herodotus, confirming the accuracy of his account: while the clear and level ground outside, proves that a great part of the area within the walls of the city was originally unbuilt, consisting of large parks and fields; and it is highly probable, that not more than a third of the whole enclosure was ever built upon; according to the conjecture of Major Rennel; whose ingenious remarks respecting the population of Babylon, as probably not exceeding that of Nineveh, or Seleucia; from the local circumstances of its situation, bounded by deserts on the west, and at a considerable distance from the sea, cutting off, or limiting, its supplies of provisions; with many other curious particulars, may be found in his 14th section, on Babylon, p. 335—388.

3. The celebrated hanging gardens, also contiguous to the royal palace, were built by Nebuchadnezzar to gratify his wife, who was a native of Media, a mountainous country, with the resemblance of her own, in the level country of Babylon. According to Diodorus, they formed a square of 400 feet, (about $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres) supported by 20 walls, eleven feet asunder, and 50 cubits high, commanding an extensive view over the walls. Trees of various kinds were planted therein, some of considerable size; not less than eight cubits in girth, according to Curtius. And Strabo mentions a contrivance to prevent the large roots from injuring the superstructure, by building vast hollow piers, which were filled with earth to receive them. These trees, modern travellers inform us, have been perpetuated in the same place, notwithstanding the sinking of the terraces, by the mouldering of the piers that supported them. And Niebuhr observed there trees of a particular kind, some very ancient, which have been left untouched by the inhabitants; whereas, from the gulf of Persia to that neighbourhood, no other kinds are to be found than date and fruit trees.

The territory round Hellah at the present day, is composed chiefly of plains, whose soil is rich, and the river banks are bordered with willows. This circumstance reminds us of the pathetic mourning of the captive Jews:—

“ By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept,
When we remembered thee, O Sion.
We hanged our harps upon the willows,

In the midst thereof. For there,
 They that carried us away captive required of us
 A song; and they that wasted us, required
 Mirth:—‘Sing us one of the songs of Sion.’

How shall we sing THE LORD'S Song in a strange land!—Psalm cxxxvii.

Babylon rapidly declined during the Persian dynasty: Darius Hystaspes broke down the walls, and took away the gates, which Cyrus had spared. Alexander the Great designed to rebuild the temple of Belus, which had gone to decay; and actually employed ten thousand labourers for two months, in removing the rubbish; but the attempt was rendered abortive, by his premature death, in the flower of his age, and pride of conquest. Seleucus Nicator, his successor in the kingdom of Syria, dismantled and spoiled Babylon, to build Seleucia in its neighbourhood, to which he transplanted the inhabitants; and in Strabo's time, about the Christian Era, “the greater part of Babylon was become a desert:” which the Parthian kings converted into a park, in which they took the recreation of hunting, in Jerom's time, A.D. 340.

Thus were gradually fulfilled the predictions of Scripture:

“Babylon, the beauty of kingdoms, the glory of the pride of the Chaldeans, shall become as Sodom and Gomorrah, which God overthrew. It shall never be re-established, neither shall it be inhabited from generation to generation. The Arab shall not pitch his tent there, nor shall the shepherd make his fold there: the wild beasts of the desert shall lie there, and howling monsters shall fill their houses:—for her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged.” Isaiah xiii. 17—23.

MEDIA.

Media Proper was bounded by Armenia and Assyria Proper, on the west; by Persia, on the east; by the Caspian provinces, on the north; and by Susiana, on the south. It was an elevated and mountainous country, and from its midland situation between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulph, derived its name; forming also a kind of pass between the cultivated parts of eastern and western Asia. And thus, both from its geographical position, and from the temperature, verdure, and fertility of its climate, Media was one of the most important and interesting regions of Asia.

Into this country, the ten tribes, who composed the kingdom of Israel, were transplanted, in the Assyrian Captivity, by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmanassar. The former prince, B.C. 740, carried away the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, on the east side of Jordan, “to Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan.” And his successor, B.C. 719, carried away the remaining seven and half tribes, to the same places, which are said to be “cities of the Medes, by the river of Gozan.” Compare 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Kings xvii. 6.

The ingenuity and skill of Major Rennel has traced these places by their present names. In the remote northern district of Media, towards the Caspian Sea, and Ghilan, he found a considerable river, named Ozan, separating Media Major, or Al Jebal, from Media Minor, or Aderbigian; but Ozan is evidently a variation of Gozan.

On a branch of this river there is found a city named Abhar, or Habar, which is reputed to be exceedingly ancient*: evidently Habor.

Bordering on the river itself, is a district of some extent, and of great beauty and fertility, named Chalcal, having in it a remarkably strong position of the same name, situated on one of the hills adjoining to the mountains, which separate it from the province of Ghilan. Allowing for the change of spelling and pronunciation in so many ages, this name is not far removed from Halah, or Chalach.

There is also a district named Tarom, or Tarim, bordering on the Ozan, and occupying the intermediate space between those of Abhar and Chalcal. This also is but little removed from Hara.

The geographical position of Media was wisely chosen for the distribution of the great body of the captives: for, 1. It was so remote, and so impeded and intersected with great mountains and numerous and deep rivers, that it would be extremely difficult for them to escape from this natural prison, and return to their own country; and 2. They would also be opposed in their passage through Kir, or Assyria Proper, not only by the native Assyrians, but also by their enemies, the Syrians, transplanted thither before them. And 3. The superior civilization of the

* Sir John Chardin notices Abhar as a small city, situated in a delightful country, well watered; where Persic is the first spoken in coming from the west; from thence eastward to India, all is Persic; to the west of it, Turkish.

Israelites, and their skill in agriculture, and in the arts, would tend to civilize and improve those wild and barbarous regions. And 4. They could safely be allowed more liberty, and have their minds more at ease, than if they were subject to a more rigorous confinement nearer to their native country.

A similar policy seems to have actuated the Russian Monarch, Peter the Great, in modern times. This sagacious politician transplanted the Swedish prisoners, taken at Pultowa, into the far distant region of Siberia, in order to civilize and improve it, by their superior knowledge and information; while the dreary and inhospitable deserts between, cut off all hope of escaping, and returning to their own country.

Major Rennel thinks, and with great reason, that both in the Assyrian, and also in the Babylonish captivity of the two remaining tribes, which composed the kingdom of Judah, by Nebuchadnezzar, the whole mass of the people was not carried away, but only the principal inhabitants, the nobles, soldiers, and artisans, the merchants, and men of letters, who might be dangerous if left behind, by creating disturbances; and who could be useful in their new settlements, by bringing with them their superior knowledge and skill in arts and manufactures. The labourers, and the poorer classes in general, who composed the great body of the people, must have been left behind; as the maintenance of them, through a great desert of 600 miles across, must have been impracticable, without a miraculous supply of provisions. And that some of the captives rose to high rank and estimation, even at Nineveh, Babylon, Ecbatana, and Rages, the seats of government in the Assyrian, Chaldean, and Median empires, is evident from the books of Daniel and Tobit. See Rennel's Herodot. sect. 15, for a fuller detail of the preceding remarks.

Nine years after the final destruction of the kingdom of Israel, the Medians revolted, and shook off the Assyrian yoke, B.C. 710. Upon this occasion, we may presume, the Jewish exiles contributed not a little to this revolution, by assisting the Medes; and thus retaliating upon their conquerors.

Dahak, or Dejoces, the first king of the Medes, after his election, built the celebrated city of ECBATANA, NOW HAMADAN.

This lay near the north-west end of Media, and was remarkable for the coolness of its temperature; for which it was afterwards chosen to be the summer residence of Cyrus, and the succeeding kings of Persia. Della Valle, in his travels, observes, that the ink froze in the room in which he was writing; a sure proof of the great elevation of the soil, in the latitude of only 35 degrees; which is further proved from the great mountain Elwend, the Orontes of the Greeks, only a league distant, being constantly covered with snow. Rennel's Herodot. p. 178, 397.

RAGES, OR REY.

This was also formerly a great city in that quarter of Media; where many of the captive Jews resided, Tobit i. 14, remarkable for the defeat and death of Arphaxad, or Phraortes, son of Dejoces, by Nabuchodonosor, king of Assyria, B.C. 641, in the plain of Ragau, or Rages. Judith i. 5.

PERSIA.

This country was bounded on the west by Media and Susiana; on the south, by the Persian Gulph; on the north, by the great desert that lay between it and Parthia Proper; and on the east, by another still greater, that lay between it and the river Indus. Until the time of Cyrus, and his succession to the Median empire, it was an inconsiderable country, always subject to the Assyrians, Babylonians, or Medes. Its capital city was Persepolis, now Chelminar; lat. 30 degrees. In the neighbourhood of which, to the south-east, was Passagardæ, where was the tomb of Cyrus.

The ruins of Persepolis are remarkable, among other things, for the figures, or symbols, to be seen on the walls and pillars of the temple. Sir John Chardin observed there Rams' heads with horns, one higher, and the other lower, exactly corresponding to Daniel's vision of the Medo-Persian empire: the lower horn denoting the Medes, the higher, which came up last, the Persians. Dan. viii. 3. A winged Lion, with a crown on his head; alluding, perhaps, to the symbolical representation of the Assyrian empire, by “ a lion with eagle’s wings ;” denoting their ferocious strength and cruelty, and the rapidity of their conquests. Dan. vii. 4.

ST. PAUL’S VOYAGE FROM CÆSAREA TO PUTEOLI.

The course of this voyage related, Acts xxvii. in which the Apostle was shipwrecked on the Island of Melite, Acts xxviii. 1. has been much mistaken by the first Geographers and Commentators ; and their maps of it erroneously constructed, in consequence of the vulgar error, that the island in question was the African Melite, or Malta ; instead of the Adriatic Melite, or Meleda. This correction of the received Geography, we owe to the sagacious Bryant ; and it has recently been established with much learning and ability, by a Layman, in a Dissertation on this Voyage, Oxford, 1817.—the ingenious Dr. Falconer, the Physician at Bath, who has also furnished a correcter map of the voyage. From his Dissertation chiefly, the following remarks are extracted, explanatory of the narrative.

Acts xxvii. 1, 2. St. Paul, with other prisoners, under the care of a Centurion of Augustus’ band, embarked at Cæsarea, on board a ship of Adramyttium, intending to coast along Asia Minor to that place, which lay opposite to the Isle of Lesbos, in the Ægean sea, and still retains its name Adramyttor.

Ver. 3. Next day they reached Sidon, about a degree northward of Cæsarea, where they remained some days ; the centurion Julius obligingly permitting St. Paul to visit his friends there.

Ver. 4. On their loosing from Sidon, they were compelled, by contrary winds, to relinquish their intention of coasting Asia Minor, and obliged to sail under Cyprus, (ὑπεπλευσαμεν) or on the south-side of the island, instead of the north-side, as they had at first proposed.

Ver. 5. Crossing the Cilician and Pamphylian sea, they arrived at Myra, a sea-port on the coast of Lycia.

Ver. 6. There they found an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy, laden with corn, on board which they embarked.

Ver. 7. After several days of slow sailing, they came over against Cnidus, a maritime city of Caria ; but were driven by a contrary wind, probably from a northern quarter, under Crete, over against its eastern cape, Salmonè.

Ver. 8. This they with difficulty weathered, (μολις παραγενο- μειοι) and arrived at a place, on the southern side of the same Island, called Fair havens: there being no good ports on the northern side. Δυσλιμενος ἡ Κρητη προς βορραν. Eustath. ad Odyss. T.

Ver. 9. They did not reach fair havens, till the Fast was already past, and sailing already dangerous. The fast alluded to was the Jewish fast of expiation, which was observed on the tenth of the month Tisri, or the 25th of September, the day on which the Autumnal equinox was then computed to fall, after which stormy weather was usual. The repetition of ἡδη, “already,” intimates that a good while had elapsed after the autumnal equinox; St. Paul, therefore, advised them not to proceed

Ver. 10. On the voyage, at the risque of the cargo, and of the ship, and of their own lives also.

Vers. 11, 12. But the haven not being commodious to winter in, the pilot and the owner of the ship, and the majority of the crew, preferred the sailing from thence, and endeavouring to reach Phenice, a haven on the western coast of Crete, and there to winter. And the centurion followed their advice in preference to the Apostle’s.

Ver. 13. Taking the opportunity of the south wind blowing softly; they weighed anchor, (αφαντες) and coasted along Crete; probably about the middle of November.

Ver. 14. But not long after, a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon, drove forcibly against it, (the Island) (εβαλε κατ’ αυτης ανεμος τυφωνικος ο καλουμενος Ευροκλυδων). This word is compounded of Ευρος, “the south-east wind,” and κλυδων, “a wave.” And it is described by Virgil as raising innumerable waves:

Aut ubi navigiis violentior incidit Eurus,
Nosse quot Ionii veniant ad littora fluctus.

Georg. ii. 107, 108.

It seems to be the wind called “Hellespontine” by Herodotus, which shattered and dispersed the fleet of Xerxes, in the Persian war, B. vii. 188. now called by mariners a Levanter, Rennel, Herod. p. 119. and was prevalent at this season of the year, as we learn from Columella, who reckons the fifth of the Ides of November, (Nov. 9.) the beginning of winter, when the south-east wind blows; and (Nov. 11.) the seas dangerous to sail on.”

Ver. 15. And when the ship was hurried away with it, (συναρπασθεντος) and not able to face the wind, (αντοφθαλμειν τω ανεμω) they let her drive.

Vers. 16, 17. And running under a little island called Clauda, nearly opposite to Phenice, they were scarcely able to come by the boat: which, taking up, or rather drawing close to the vessel, they made use of braces, undergirding the ship; or binding it round under the keel or bottom, with cables, to prevent the ship from splitting, and foundering, by the violence of the waves. An expedient alluded to by Horace, and practised in modern time. See Anson's Voyage. And now, the mariners, not knowing where they were, as neither sun nor stars had been visible for several days, ver. 20. and as these violent Levancers are apt to change their direction, (Shaw's Travels, p. 331.) fearing that they might be cast on the Syrtis [major,] dangerous quicksands on the coast of Africa, lying to the south-west of Phenice, in Crete, they lowered their sails, (χαλασαντες το σκευος) and so were driven, according to the nautical expression, under bare poles, at the mercy of the elements.

————— Ac sine funibus

Vix durare carinæ

Possint imperiosius æquor.—Hor. Od. i. 14.

Vers. 18, 19. The tempest continuing, the next day they lightened the ship; and the third day they cast out, with their own hands, the furniture of the ship, (σκευην του πλοιου) and at length, after the tempest had affected them for several days, they lost all hopes of safety.

Vers. 21—26. In this distress, St. Paul blamed them for not following his advice; but encouraged them with assurance of being saved, in consequence of a divine vision; but foretold that they should be cast away upon a certain island.

Ver. 27. At length, on the fourteenth night after they had left Crete, they discovered that they were driven into the Adriatic Sea; perhaps from some abatement of the gloom, and some knowledge of the coast at its entrance, where it was narrowest.

The limits or boundaries of the Adriatic Sea, are accurately marked by the Ancient Geographers. Strabo says expressly, that it is bounded at its mouth by Panormus, and the port of Oricum; or by the Japygian Promontory of Calabria, and the Ceraunian mountains of Epirus, which lie in about 40 degrees of north latitude, and upwards of 4 degrees to the north of Malta. And Ptolomy, so far from reckoning Malta to be an island of the Adriatic Sea, reckons it to be a part of Africa. And Mela speaks of Corcyra (half a degree to the south of the Ceraunian mountains) as being situate in the neighbourhood, [vicina] not in the Adriatic Sea.

Ver. 28. After much tossing about in this Sea, they apprehended at last that they were approaching the land, although the darkness of the night did not permit them to discover it. They, therefore, sounded repeatedly, and from the decrease of the depth, they judged that their apprehensions were well founded.

Ver. 29. Fearing, therefore, that they might fall on the rocks during the darkness of the night, when few or none could escape, they cast four anchors from the stern of the ship, and waited anxiously for the appearance of day. It is the oriental custom to cast anchors from the stern of the ship, not from the prow, as with the Romans, and with us. St. Paul's ship had two anchors on each side of the stern.

Vers. 30, 31. In this distress, the mariners anxious to save themselves, by quitting the ship, lengthened or loosened the rope at the stern that towed the boat, under colour of bringing it round to the prow of the vessel, so as to cast anchors from thence; and it was probably their attempting to do what was so unusual in the navigation of that age, that led St. Paul to suspect their real design, which he communicated to the Centurion and the soldiers, and they accordingly prevented, by cutting the towing-line of the boat, and setting her adrift.

Vers. 33—37. And while the day was approaching, St. Paul exhorted them all to partake of food; after fourteen days of abstinence, during which they had no regular meals, and were put to short allowance, on account of the long continuance of the storm, and the great number of passengers, as noticed before, verse 21. The whole number of persons on board was 276 persons. The Alexandrian corn vessels were very large. Lucian describes one of 180 feet in length, more than 45 feet wide, and $43\frac{1}{2}$ deep. The tonnage of such a ship, according to the usual mode of calculation, would be 1938 tons, English feet measure. The vessel in which Josephus was shipwrecked, on his voyage to Rome, and in the midst of the Adriatic sea likewise, carried about 600 souls. Vita § 3.

Ver. 38. And when they were satiated with food, (κορεσθεντες τε τροφης) they lightened the ship by casting out the wheat into the sea; which they had spared before.

Vers. 39, 40. And when the day came, they saw, but knew not the land; and discovered a creek with a strand, into which they wished, if possible, to thrust the ship, thereby to facilitate their escape. In consequence of this intention, they weighed their anchors, committed the ship unto the sea, loosed the rudder bands which directed the helm, to let it play freely, hoisted their main-sail to the wind, and made toward the shore.

Ver. 41. In the attempt to run the ship aground, she fell into a place where two seas met; by which we are to understand an eddy, or surf, which beat on the stern of the vessel, while the head remained fast aground, in which situation the ship soon fell to pieces; but the nearness of the shore, and the assistance afforded by the broken pieces of the wreck, providentially brought them all safe to land.

xxviii. 1. When they had reached the shore in safety, they found that the Island on which they were cast, was named Melita.

That this island was Meleda, near the Illyrian coast, not Malta, on the southern coast of Sicily, may appear from the following considerations.

1. It lies confessedly in the Adriatic sea, but Malta a considerable distance from it.

2. It lies nearer the mouth of the Adriatic than any other island of that sea; and would, of course, be more likely to receive the wreck of any vessel driven by tempests towards that quarter. And it lies N.W. by N. of the south-west promontory of Crete; and came nearly in the direction of a storm from the south-east quarter.

3. An obscure island called Melite, whose inhabitants were "barbarous," was not applicable to the celebrity of Malta at that time, which Cicero represents as abounding in curiosities and riches, and possessing a remarkable manufacture of the finest linen. Orat. in Verrem, iv. § 18, 46. And Diodorus Siculus more fully: "Malta is furnished with many and very good harbours, and the inhabitants are very rich; for it is full of all sorts of artificers, among whom there are excellent weavers of fine linen. Their houses are very stately and beautiful, adorned with graceful eaves, and pargetted with white plaster. The inhabitants are a colony of Phœnicians, who trading as merchants, as far as the western ocean, resorted to this place on account of its commodious ports and convenient situation for maritime commerce; and by the advantage of this place, the inhabitants frequently became famous both for their wealth and their merchandize." Diodor. Lib. V. c. 1.

4. The circumstance of the viper, or venomous snake, which fastened on St. Paul's hand, agrees with the damp and woody island of Meleda, affording shelter and proper nourishment for such, but not with the dry and rocky island of Malta, in which there are no serpents now, and none in the time of Pliny.

5. The disease with which the father of Publius was affected, (verse 8.) Dysentery combined with fever, (probably intermittent) might well suit a country woody and damp, and probably, for want of draining, exposed to the putrid effluvia of confined moisture; but was not likely to affect a dry, rocky, and remarkably healthy island like Malta.

Ver. 12. After a stay of three months, they departed, probably about the beginning of March, in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered also in the isle, and perhaps from similar stress of weather, and came from thence to Syracuse, where they spent three days, and thence proceeded to Rhegium, on the straits of Messina, and after a day's stay there, reached Puteoli, in two days, which was the usual port at which the corn ships from Egypt landed their cargoes. Here, also, Josephus and his shipwrecked companions landed, after they were taken up by a Cyrenian vessel, the year after St. Paul's voyage.

PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, for their various and matchless excellences, have won the admiration and veneration of the wise and good of all ages and countries that have been blessed with their light.

In addition to the praises of Ellis, Bielfield, and Bryant, noticed in the first volume of this work, p. 267, the following are judicious and characteristic.

“ Study the Holy Scriptures : therein are contained the words of eternal life. They have God for their author, Salvation for their end, and Truth without any mixture of error for their matter.” Locke.

“ Theological enquiries are no part of my present subject ; but I cannot refrain from adding, that the collection of tracts which we call from their excellence, THE SCRIPTURES, contain, independently of a divine origin, more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains both of poetry and eloquence, than could be collected within the same compass from all other books that were ever composed in any age or in any idiom.

“ The two parts of which the Scriptures consist, [the OLD and NEW TESTAMENT] are connected by a chain of compositions, [THE PROPHECIES] which bear no resemblance in form or style to any that can be produced from the stores of Grecian, Indian, Persian, or even Arabian learning. The antiquity of these compositions no man doubts; and the unstrained application of them to events long subsequent to their publication, is a solid ground of belief that they were genuine predictions, and consequently inspired." Sir William Jones, Eighth Discourse, &c.

The intimate connexion between the Old and New Testament is thus strongly marked.

"The writings of the OLD and NEW SCRIPTURES are to be considered as one work, written it is true, by different persons, at different times, but dictated by THE SAME SPIRIT. They relate the uniform conduct of GOD to his people; and the divine proceedings under the new dispensation bear a strict conformity to those under the Old: they are parallel, and therefore a reference is frequently made to rites and ceremonies, and circumstances and events that are exactly similar in both." Dr. Gregory Sharpe, Second Argument in favour of Christianity.

And most justly does Chrysostom style them, "Books that are MEDICINES OF THE SOUL, not to read which is the cause of all evils."

II. But THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, notwithstanding their superlative excellence, are, in many places, δυσνοητα, "hard to be understood," and δυσερμηνευτα, "hard to be interpreted;" which the ignorant and unstable of all ages and countries are apt "to wrest to their own destruction," "deceived themselves, and deceiving" others, 2 Pet. iii. 16, Heb. v. 11, 2 Tim. iii. 13. "Ye do err," said our blessed Lord, “not knowing THE SCRIPTURES*,” Matt. xxii. 29.

That various, and even opposite errors, indeed, have been drawn from Holy Writ by different sects and individuals, cannot be denied, and must not be dissembled in an attempt to explain THE SCRIPTURE OF TRUTH. Whence then proceed these acknowledged errors? The question is interesting, and demands a serious and sufficient answer.

The real difficulties of Scripture originate from sundry causes.

1. The ancient languages in which they were written. The Hebrew of the Old Testament, and Greek of the New, have long, very long since, ceased to be spoken. But a living language abounds in niceties of construction, which expire with it, and are irretrievably lost. Like the life-blood, they cannot be transfused into another language.

2. The oriental phraseology, imagery, manners and customs differ widely from those of our age and country, and are apt to be misunderstood.

3. The miscellaneous form of the sacred books, detached from each other, without apparent connection or continuity, and seldom with any express reference to each other.

4. The History, Laws, and Customs of God’s chosen people the Jews, and of the several heathen or foreign nations with whom they were connected by alliance, or

* ————— In Religion,
 What damned error, but some sober brow
 Will bless it, and approve it with a text?—
 The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose.—Shakspeare.

by vassalage, are all blended together, and intermingled with the prophecies relative to both. These prophecies are often obscure and enigmatical. And this was wisely ordered, lest a clearer exposure might have proved detrimental to the prophets themselves, and also to the people, for whose information they were intended, by exposing the former to the indignation of the ruling powers, and the latter, to the vengeance of their brutal and barbarous conquerors.

5. Times and seasons are not critically marked in Scripture, by reference to any one fixed or established era, or standard of computation; but by vague and indefinite measures of time, generations, reigns, priesthoods, &c.

6. The Scriptures abound in chasms and abrupt transitions of the History and Chronology; to be filled up or supplied, as well as may be, by incidental references to parallel passages, or by extraneous supplements from Jewish, Ecclesiastical, and Heathen Historians.

7. The want of a correct standard text. There are not any two editions almost of the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures that accurately agree together, or critically correspond in all points, either by Jewish or Christian editors; and the variations create no small embarrassment to the Translator, the Commentator, the Chronologer, and the Historian, to select the best, or the most unexceptionable readings throughout.

8. The imperfections of all the received Translations. Our last authorized Translation, under the auspices of King James I. published in 1611, is unquestionably superior, in most respects, to its predecessors, at home and abroad. But it is far from being immaculate. It is not sufficiently close and uniform in rendering the originals, and though a good popular Translation, in the main, of admirable plainness and simplicity of style, yet it is not calculated to convey precise and critical information, in difficult and mysterious passages, of the prophecies especially, and poetical parts of Scripture, abounding in abrupt transitions, and perplexing involutions: even in the Gospels, those perfect models of historical narration, mistranslations abound, originating from ignorance of, or inattention to the peculiar force of the Greek Article; as fully proved in Dr. Middleton's excellent Treatise on the Greek Article. And strange as such a declaration may perhaps appear to the generality of readers, and even to scholars, there is no part of the Bible, in which the author of this work has been reluctantly and unavoidably compelled to deviate more from the received Translation, than in the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles.

But, blessed be God, great as are the difficulties attending the study of the Scriptures, still greater are the sources of correction and emendation of the sacred text, and of judicious exposition of the SCRIPTURE OF TRUTH.

1. SCRIPTURE is its own best interpreter. The same incidents, the same sentiments, and the same expressions and phrases, are frequently repeated in the same, or in different books. What is obscure, and unintelligible perhaps, in one passage, is frequently cleared up satisfactorily, either by the context, or by parallel passages, in the same, or in different books. The NEW TESTAMENT especially, is the noblest comment on THE OLD, of the "spirit" always, of "the letter" often, 2 Cor. iii. 6.

2. The poetical and prophetical parts of Scripture, by a peculiar structure of Hebrew versification, abound in distichs, of which the following, or the alternate verse, is usually parallel to the foregoing, or an echo to its sense. This often furnishes an excellent clue to the leading sentiment, or drift of the whole passage in question*.

3. The recent collations of Hebrew Manuscripts, made by Kennicott and De Rossi, &c. and of Greek, by Mill, Wetstein, Matthai, and Griesbach, &c. and the ancient Versions, the Greek of the Septuagint, the Latin Vulgate, the Chaldee Targums, or Paraphrases, the Syriac Version, the Arabic, &c. all furnish copious sources of correction and emendation of the received Texts. While the insignificance of the mass of various readings, in a multitude of places, consisting in myriads of passages, merely in the insertion or omission of a single letter, Vau, &c. establishes the authenticity of the received Text in the main. The most valuable sources indeed, are the Ancient Versions, framed from manuscripts of a much earlier date than any of the present; few, if any of which, can boast an antiquity higher than 1400 years back; and scarcely any of the Hebrew class, are free from the corrections, (not seldom the adulterations) of the Masorete school †.

* See Bishop Louth's preliminary Dissertation to his Translation of Isaiah, and Archbishop Newcome's Preface to his Translation of Ezekiel, for many ingenious and critical observations on the structure and beauties of the Hebrew Poetry.

† The Targums, or Chaldee Paraphrases, are those of 1. Onkelos on the Pentateuch; 2. Jonathan, on the Historical and Prophetical Books; 3. of Jerusalem, and 4. that ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel. The two first are greatly superior in value.

The principal Rabbinical Commentators are 1. R. Schelomo ben Isaac, or Jarchi,

4. In addition to the Chaldee Targums, we find that the Jewish historians and antiquaries, Philo and Josephus, usually called Rashi, (a cabalistical word formed from the initials of his name, RaSHI.) His Commentary is in the highest estimation among the Jews. It has been translated into Latin by Breithaupt.

2. R. David ben Joseph ben Kimchi, usually called Radak. His Commentary is chiefly grammatical.

3. R. Moses bar Nachman, or Nachmanides, usually called Ramban. His Commentary is chiefly cabalistical.

4. R. Levi ben Gerson, usually called Rabag. His Commentaries are rather metaphysical.

5. R. Abraham ben Meir Aben Ezra. The most learned, perhaps, of the Rabbinical Commentators, and best expounder of the literal sense of Scripture, though rather obscure from his conciseness. He understood astronomy, and to him we owe the best exposition of the Cardinal Constellations in Job's days, Aish, Chimah, and Chesil, &c. Job ix. and xxxviii.

R. Saadias Gaon. His Commentaries are learned, and furnish copious extracts from the Mishna, or Traditional law, and from the Talmud. He flourished in the tenth age, about two centuries before the rest.

7. R. Jacob ben Asher, ben Jechiel. His Annotations on the Pentateuch, under the title of Baal Turim, are in high repute among the Jews, but are rather too subtle and cabalistical.

8. R. Moses ben Maimon, or Maimonides, usually called Rambam. His various writings are much celebrated among the Jews, especially his Commentary on the Mishna, his Doctor Perplexorum, and his Thirteen Articles of Faith, explaining six hundred and thirteen precepts of the Law.

These Commentaries, either in the whole, or in part, are given in the large Rabbinical Hebrew Bibles. Of these Bibles, the most correct, (according to Masch's improved edition of Le Long's Bibliotheca Sacra, Vol. I. p. 95—111,) are the following :

1. The third Bomberg edition, by the learned R. Chajim. 1547—1549.
2. The fourth Bomberg edition, by R. Judas de Mutina. 1617—1618.
3. Buxtorf's great Hebrew Bible. Basil. 1618. The most correct of this class.
4. The most complete Rabbinical Bible, was published by Moses ben Simeon, in four volumes, folio. Amsterdam. 1724—1727. Enriched with many additional Comments, and dissertations, by himself and others.

These variorum Bibles, however, being all without Latin Translations, are only useful to Rabbinical scholars. And the Comments themselves, as Buxtorf judiciously remarks, in the preface to his Bible, “ contain both honey and gall; and therefore are to be read, and recommended with caution; for though they may be useful to explain the literal and grammatical sense, and to exhibit the mystical and allegorical interpretations of Scripture, adopted by the later Jewish Rabbis; yet they scruple and the Rabbinical comments, often furnish valuable explanations of the language, rites, and customs, and of the literal and figurative interpretation of Holy Writ.

5. The great difficulty which hitherto obstructed the composition of a correct and critical History of the Bible, originating in the imperfection of all the received Systems of Sacred Chronology, is now, I humbly trust, considerably lessened, if not entirely removed, by the present System, restoring the original Chronology of Josephus and Theophilus, so as to harmonize Sacred History with itself throughout, and also with the whole range of Profane History.

6. To these recorded helps we may add, the improved and still improving state of Biblical Criticism in general*.

not to pervert and distort the Prophecies concerning CHRIST. Of which, several instances are shewn, in the course of this work, and in my Dissertations on the Prophetic Character of OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Nor can any of these editions be considered as furnishing an absolutely correct Text: for they all servilely adhere to the boasted "Hebrew verity" of the Masora; which, at the present day, after the Collations of Kennicott and De Rossi, is not to be deemed immaculate. How greatly Buxtorf himself was prejudiced in its favour, we learn from his own declaration, Textum Hebræum in antiquissimâ et verissimâ suâ puritate et substantiâ, in minimo etiam apice, reliquimus. Impius enim quisquis ei aliquid addiderit, vel detraxerit, aut quovis modo in eo quid mutaverit.

The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, with tolerably correct Latin translations, are given in the three first volumes of the London Polyglott Bible, and the Targums of Jerusalem, and Jonathan ben Uzziel, in the fourth volume. The Mishna is elegantly published, with a Latin translation, and Notes, by Surenhusius, six small vols. folio. 1689. Amsterdam.

* The following Select Biblical Apparatus, I can recommend from my own experience, as most useful to such "nobler minded" students, like the "Bereans" of old who may be both able and willing to "search the Original Scriptures."

I. BIBLES and TESTAMENTS.

1. The London Polyglott Bible. 6 vols. folio. 1657. Containing the Masorete and Samaritan Hebrew, and the Greek Texts of the OLD and NEW TESTAMENT, with the

Within the two last centuries, and especially in the course of the present, the learned languages have been Chaldee Targums, and the Septuagint Greek, the Vulgate Latin, the Syriac, Arabic, Samaritan, Ethiopic and Persic Versions.

This is placed at the head of the list, as unquestionably the most useful and valuable Polyglott Bible ever published in any age or in any country. A grand work, indeed, the glory of the British press.

2. Kennicott's Hebrew Bible, and Collations of Hebrew Manuscripts. 2 vols. folio, Oxford. 1776—1780.

3. De Rossi's Supplemental Collations. 4 vols. quarto. Parma. 1784.

These form one complete set of collations. Kennicott has given besides, the various readings furnished by the Samaritan Hebrew Text, in the Chaldee characters, and with an excellent arrangement, exhibiting those readings by the blanks on each side. The Dissertatio Generalis, subjoined to the second volume, is a valuable piece of sacred criticism, and satisfactorily overturns the received hypothesis of the immaculate purity of the Hebrew Text. Scarcely any two of the great number of manuscripts collated by him, exhibiting precisely the same.

In addition to many of Kennicott's manuscripts, and many others beside, De Rossi has also collated the principal readings furnished by the earlier printed editions of the Hebrew Bible, and by the Fathers. His Prolegomena furnish excellent rules of Philological criticism.

Of the immense mass of various readings which their collations exhibit, multitudes are insignificant; consisting frequently of the addition or omission of a single letter in a word, as a Vau, &c. but they are not therefore useless: all of this class contribute powerfully to establish the authenticity of the sacred text in general, by their concurrence; while they occasionally afford valuable emendations of the received text, in several important passages, supporting, by their evidence, the various readings suggested by the ancient Versions, derived from Manuscripts of an earlier date. Masch, in his improved edition of Le Long's Bibliotheca, has given, in his Dissertatio Præliminaris, some valuable rules for appreciating the merit of various readings, according to their several classes; and a useful table of such as are important, furnished by the different Masoretic and Amasoretic editions of the Hebrew Bible, either of the whole or of the parts.

4. Houbigant's Hebrew Bible, with a Latin Translation, written rather elegantly than closely. 4 vols. folio. Paris. 1753.

This splendid work furnishes several ingenious conjectural corrections of the received Text; but it has fallen considerably in public estimation since the more solid publications of Kennicott and De Rossi. Bishop Horsley has given some judicious cautions against conjectural emendation, unsupported by printed editions or Manuscripts, in the Preface to his Hosea, p. xxxiv—xliv.

5. Wetstein's Greek Testament. Two vols. folio. Amsterdam. 1751. Second edition.

This invaluable book, which no sacred critic should be without, besides an en-more skilfully studied, and considerable accessions have been made to the general fund of Sacred Literature, in all largement of the preceding collations of Mill and Kuster, &c. contains a mine of philological learning, illustrative of the Text, in the Notes, which furnish a copious collection of parallel passages from Jewish, Greek, and Latin authors. His own opinions and inferences, however, are sometimes tinged with Socinianism, and therefore to be received with caution. Sometimes, indeed, his candour rises nobly superior to his prejudices, and leads him to adduce powerful counter evidence. Witness his important note in support of the Divinity of JESUS CHRIST; from which a selection is given, p. 191, note, of volume III.

6. Griesbach's Greek Testament. 2 vols. large 8vo. Amsterdam. 1796—1806. Second edition.

This contains an enlargement of the Collations of Wetstein. He also had a Socinian bias, and therefore his emendations of the received Text are sometimes questionable. Witness his alterations of Luke ii. 33, and of 1 Tim. iii. 16, where the received Text is much better supported, by the context, by the ancient Versions, and by the weight of Manuscripts adduced by himself. His first edition, in a single volume, 1777, is preferable, perhaps, to the second, because he was then more scrupulous of innovating in the Text. A third, and more splendid edition, has been published in London, in two vols. 1809—1810, but it is not reckoned so correct as the second.

7. Matthai's Greek Testament. 12 vols. bound in 9, 8vo. Riga. 1788.

This, in the opinion of a most competent judge, Dr. Middleton, the learned and acute author of the Doctrine of the Greek Article, is by far the best edition of the Greek Testament that has appeared hitherto; the Manuscripts referred to, being of a better quality than those of his predecessors, and the editor himself more competent fairly to appreciate the merits of their various readings.

II. LEXICONS.

8. Castell's Heptaglott Lexicon. 2 vols. folio. London. 1669.

This stupendous work was designed for a companion to the London Polyglott Bible, by furnishing Lexicons for the Hebrew Text, for the Chaldee of Daniel and Ezra, and of the Targums, and for all the Oriental Versions. How long, and how indefatigably he laboured therein, how great were his losses and sufferings, and what was his reward in this life, we learn from his mournful Dedication to King Charles II *.

9. Mercer's

* The following is an extract from Castell's Dedication to King Charles II.

“Annus jam agitur decimus septimus, ex quo, relicto rure paterno, immanibus his atque tremendis ausis (talìa fuerunt certè,) non sine MAJESTATIS TUE consensu, quum primùm specimen hujus operis sub ejus initium ob oculos fuit positum; nec non literis insuper quamplurimis, a viris magni nominis, quà in Ecclesia, quà in Re- its various branches, by the researches of the learned, and the discoveries of travellers, in all quarters of the globe.

9. Mercer's Thesaurus. Folio. 'Cologn. 1614. This excellent Hebrew Lexicon is an improvement of Pagninus.

10. Buxtorf's Manual Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon. Small 8vo. London. 1646. Sixth edition; Basil. 1696. Seventh edition. These are the best editions of this most useful and convenient Lexicon.

11. Parkhurst's Hebrew Lexicon. 8vo. 1799. London. Fourth edition.

12. ————— Greek Lexicon. 8vo. 1788. London. Third edition.

These Lexicons are deservedly esteemed for the various erudition of the pious and learned author. But unhappily, he was deeply infected with Hutchinsonian mysticism, the offspring of Rabbinical, and is frequently fanciful in his derivations and expositions of words. See, for instance, his revolting explanation of Ελωι, in publica, domi forisque ad me missis, (quarum magna pars, uti etiam Bibliotheca meæ cum multâ suppellectili, et tricens Lexici polyglotti exemplaribus, in flammis perii Londinensibus,) me submissi invitum admodum, animoque (quod testabitur ὁ Καρδιο-γνωστῆς,) multum horrescente, quodque satis superque noverunt illi omnes summi viri, qui me promissis tum auxilii, tum etiam remunerationis, ad istæc non *pelle*xerunt tantum, sed vi quâdam urgenter impulerunt. Mihi vero, in hoc molendino per tot annorum lustra indesinenter occupato, dies ille tanquam festus et otiosus visus est, in quo tam Bibliis polyglottis quam Lexicis hisce provehendis, sexdecim aut octodecim horas dietim non insudavi.

our Lord's exclamation on the cross, which he derives from אלה, to swear, and renders “accursed!” p. 231 of volume III, note.

13. Schleusner's Greek Lexicon. 2 vols. in four parts. 8vo. Leipsic. 1801. Second edition.

This is by far the best Lexicon of the NEW TESTAMENT, hitherto published. It is highly recommended by Dr. Marsh, the learned translator of Michaelis' Introduction to the N. T.

III. CONCORDANCES.

14. Calasio's Hebrew Concordance. Romaine's edition. Four vols. folio. London. 1747.

This splendid and valuable work furnishes a complete Concordance of Hebrew words, explained in Latin, with marginal readings of the Greek Septuagint and Latin Vulgate; and in the last volume, an explanation of proper names, more copious than that subjoined to the last volume of the Polyglott Bible.

15. Taylor's Hebrew Concordance. 2 vols. folio. London. 1754.

This valuable Concordance and Lexicon, is a considerable improvement of Buxtorf's celebrated Hebrew Concordance, in giving the various renderings of the Hebrew words in our English Bible. The Index of the second volume gives the English and Hebrew.

16. Trommius' Greek Concordance. 2 vols. folio. 1718. Amsterdam.

This is a Concordance of the Alexandrine Copy of the Greek Septuagint, with the corresponding Hebrew words. The Index of the second volume furnishes a valuable Hebrew-Greek Lexicon, by giving the Hebrew words with their various renderings in Greek. For methodical and judicious arrangement, it is perhaps the best Concordance published in any language; and is particularly useful as a key to the Alexandrine Greek, which is the basis of the Evangelical.

19. Stephens' Greek Concordance. Folio. 1599. Or its improvement by Schmiedius. Folio. 1717. Leipsic.

These are most useful Concordances of the Greek Testament.

18. Noldius' Concordance of Hebrew Particles. Quarto. 1734. Jena.

This is highly useful as a guide to that most difficult and delicate branch of Philological Criticism; especially in Hebrew, which has so few particles, and those, of course, used with great variety and latitude.

19. Glasse's Philologia Sacra. Quarto. 1694. Amsterdam.

This also is a valuable assistant to the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. A new edition has been published by Professor Dathe.

20. Middleton's Doctrine of the Greek Article. 8vo. London. 1808.

This important work, after a profound critical investigation of the nature and use of the Greek Article, drawn from the philosophy of the Greek language, applies crease knowledge" in general, and Scriptural knowledge in particular. And we are assured, by the unerring the doctrine, in detail, to the NEW TESTAMENT throughout, and detects a multitude of loose and inaccurate translations of our English Bible, owing to ignorance and inattention. For logical precision, acuteness of remark, and depth of research, it ranks among the highest class of critical comments. No Biblical student should be without it. It exposes, most ably and fully, the mistake of the Unitarian Translators, especially Wakefield. Dr. Middleton, however, is not infallible himself, and in his expositions does not always adhere to his own excellent rules.

20*. Magee on Atonement and Sacrifice, 1812, third Edit.

This enlarged and improved Edition was originally designed for the use of the Students of Trinity College, Dublin; and will be found a useful and valuable assistant to Divinity Students in general: on account of, 1. Its careful references to authorities throughout; 2. Its elaborate and exhaustive discussion of principles and arguments; 3. Its acute strictures on the leading errors of Papists, Methodists, Socinians, and Unitarians, respectively; and, 4. The copious supplemental lists of books, ancient and modern, consulted by the Author, down to the year 1811.

21. Cruden's Concordance of the English Bible. Quarto. London. 1785. Fourth edition; the last which he published himself, with improvements.

This also contains a concise and excellent explanation of the most remarkable and important technical terms in Scripture; which renders it the best, perhaps, that has hitherto appeared. Still it is capable of improvement; and especially in the proper names, which are too scanty, and their meanings are better explained in Calasio's Concordance, and in the London Polyglott Bible.

IV. COMMENTARIES AND NOTES.

22. Critici Sacri. 9 vols. folio. 1660. London.

————— 12 vols. folio. 1698. Amsterdam.

This great work, first published under the direction of four English Divines, Bishop Pearson, John Pearson, Anthony Scattergood, and Francis Gouldman, is considerably augmented in the second edition; which, beside several additional Commentators on the Continent, gives a multitude of select Dissertations on the most difficult and important subjects of the NEW TESTAMENT, by various authors, enumerated by Dr. Clarke.

23. Poole's Synopsis Criticorum. 5 vols. folio. London, 1669—1674.

On this most elaborate work, the learned author spent ten years, and must have worked as hard as Castel himself. It consolidates, with great skill and conciseness, all the Critici Sacri of the London edition, into one continued comment; besides many valuable additions from other authors of note, Hammond, &c. and his own corrections and decisions in several places. It has "many advantages over the Critici Sacri, not only in point of size," but in its admirable arrangement and concentration of evidence, and in the author's remarks, and it furnishes a most complete material index to the Critici Sacri. So that upon the whole, "the Synopsis will be

Word of Prophecy, that “it shall be increased until the time of the end,” or full disclosure of the PROVIDENTIAL HISTORY of mankind.

preferred to the Original,” by many, beside the author of this note, who reflect on the old adage, and do not wish to waste their precious time in wading through a multitude of discordant comments,

Ars longa, Vita brevis.
“Slow is the attainment of skill ;
Short, the expectation of life.”

It is highly to the honour of the city of London, (as remarked by Dr. Clarke,) that the great works of the Polyglott Bible, and Castel's Lexicon, the Critici Sacri, and Poole's Synopsis, forming twenty-two large folio volumes, in nine languages, were begun and finished in the comparatively short compass of about twenty years, by the industry of seven or eight English Divines, and the munificence of a few Noblemen. “To complete,” says he, “its eminence in Biblical literature, and to place itself at the head of all the cities of the universe, London has only to add a new and improved edition of its own POLYGLOTT,” p. xiv.

24. Lightfoot's Works. 2 vols. folio. 1684. London.

He was one of the most profoundly learned of the bright constellation of Scholars and Divines, which adorned that age, and shone, unrivalled, perhaps, in any other. His Talmudical learning he most happily applied to the illustration of Scripture. He was not, however, so happy in his Chronological and Geographical remarks. The former, indeed, was not to be wondered at, from the imperfect state of Chronology in his time. In the latter, he has committed several gross mistakes in the Holy Land and site of Jerusalem.

25. Schoettgenius Supplement to Lightfoot's Horæ Hebraicæ, et Talmudicæ. 2 vols. 4to. Dresden. 1733.

This is a learned and useful work ; and is both scarce and dear. It is therefore entitled to republication in London.

26. Calmet's Commentaire Literale. 9 tomes, folio. Paris. 1719—1726.

An excellent Supplement is furnished in Calmet's Dictionaire, &c. de la Bible, 4 tomes, folio, 1730. Paris.

A valuable abridgment and improvement of Calmet's Dictionaire, &c. has been lately published by Dr. John Robinson, in his Theological, Biblical, and Ecclesiastical Dictionary. London, 1815. Large Octavo. Which contains a great variety and compass of Religious information, in a moderate size, illustrative of the Old and New Testament.

27. Bible de Chais. 6 vols. 4to. Hague. 1743—1777.

Besides a French Translation, which, in general, is judicious, this learned and elaborate work contains a valuable comment upon the OLD TESTAMENT, as far as the end of Kings, and a great number of curious and critical Dissertations, Maps, &c. It is much to be regretted, that the learned and pious author did not complete

III. The paramount excellence, therefore, the importance and the difficulty of the ORIGINAL SCRIPTURES, the whole. What he has published, however, at long intervals, is excellent. His Notes are chiefly taken, as he professes, from the best English Commentators, to whom he gives a decided preference above the foreign, Houbigant, Calmet, &c. all of whom he appears to have carefully studied. It may, therefore, be justly considered as a considerable and valuable improvement upon his predecessors of every description, as far as it goes. I have found it such in the course of my researches; far superior, indeed, in critical information, to any single commentary, within its range, which I have consulted.

28. Dodd's Commentary. 3 vols. folio. London. 1770.

This may justly be considered as a Supplement to Chais. "Mr. Chais," says he, "has hitherto carried his work only to the second Book of Samuel; I was forced, therefore, to leave with regret, so useful an instructor, and should have been happy to have improved my comment by a continuance of his well-digested volumes." He also gives Calmet his well-earned praise, but qualified with "proper allowances for the author's faith, and his Church's attachment to the edition of the Vulgate." Preface.

V. ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY AND ANTIQUITIES.

29. The first and highest of this class is unquestionably Josephus, the great Jewish Historian and Antiquary. The first twelve books of his Antiquities form a regular comment on the Ecclesiastical and Civil History of the Jews, from the Creation till the time of the Maccabees, or Asamonean Dynasty. Hudson's edition of the Text, is more correct and convenient; though Havercamp's is larger, and abounds more in notes. His Jewish war, and the corresponding latter books of his Antiquities, furnish the most admirable illustrations of the predictions of Moses, the Prophets, and OUR LORD, respecting the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

30, 31. Shuckford's and Prideaux's Connexions are very useful in tracing the connexion, and supplying the chasm between the Old and New Testament.

32. Lardner's Works. 11 vols. 8vo. 1788. London.

This elaborate work is truly valuable. It contains the most copious materials for judging of the authenticity and credibility of the Canonical Scriptures of the NEW TESTAMENT.

33. Michaelis' Lectures on the New Testament. 4 vols. 8vo. 1793—1801. Cambridge. Marsh's Translation.

This may be considered as the sequel of Lardner's, and in many respects an improvement thereon. Both these writers, however, are rather sceptical, and not to be implicitly relied on in their conclusions, though generally fair and candid in citing their authorities, both for and against their own opinions.

34. Abulfaragi's History of the Dynasties. Quarto. Arabic and Latin. Oxford. 1663. Edit. Pococke.

This celebrated historian, whose real name was Gregorius Bar Hebræus, has given have given birth to a greater number and variety of helps and expositions, than any other books that ever a compendium of Universal History, from the creation of the world to A.D. 1273, in Ten Dynasties, or Periods. Though bred a physician, and a leader of the Jacobite sect of Christians in Syria, he was admired by Mahometan and Jewish writers, as "the phœnix of his age," and "we justly venerate him," says Michaelis, "as the most learned, and the best historian of the Syrian writers."——To this honourable distinction I also willingly subscribe, having found him the best and surest guide, in adjusting the Chronology of the Patriarchs, Job, Jacob, Levi and his sons, &c. and furnishing the true outline of the chronology of Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch; supplying important chasms, both in the SCRIPTURES and in Josephus, with an accuracy and fidelity not to be found elsewhere.

35. Eutychius' Annals. Quarto. Arabic and Latin. Oxford. 1659. Edit. Pococke.

This excellent Annalist and Patriarch of Alexandria, has also given a Compendium of Sacred and Ecclesiastical History, from the creation of the world to A.D. 637; which will be found a useful Supplement to Abulfaragi; but he is not so correct in his Chronology.

36. The younger Spanheim's Ecclesiastical History, from the Creation to the Reformation, 1535, including also his Sacred Geography and Chronology. Latin. Folio. Leyden. 1701.

This is a valuable work, and well deserving republication of the Ecclesiastical History, singly.

37. Jortin's Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

Of this a new edition has been lately published. The character of this work is too well established to require recommendation.

38. Jortin's Erasmus.

Of this also a new edition has been published. It contains curious and authentic documents of the progress of the Reformation.

39. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity.

This work is superior to all praise for profound learning, compass of information, and accurate fidelity. His Preface, addressed to them that seek, (as they term it,) the Reformation of the Laws and Orders Ecclesiastical in the Church of England; and his Seventh Book, describing the Constitution and Maintenance of the primitive Church; and vindicating the Discipline of the Church of England; for close, temperate, masterly, and exhaustive reasoning, are unrivalled, and well deserve to be reprinted separately. The whole eight books are indeed too prolix and tedious for the indolent fastidiousness of modern readers and critics.

40. Mede's Works.

These contain a rich and varied fund of Original Criticism, on several important parts of Scripture, both of the OLD and NEW TESTAMENT. He was the first who furnished a rational Key to the Apocalypse, and who had the high merit of retrieving the doctrine of the Millennium from undeserved obloquy and neglect.

were written in any age or in any language : and if we review the infinite multitude of Translations, Notes, Comments, Keys, &c. of Lexicons, Dictionaries, Concordances, &c. of Histories, Connections, Abridgments, &c. that have already appeared, in all languages, wherever THE GOSPEL has been published throughout the whole world, we may safely conclude, without any hyperbole or exaggeration, that the world itself could not contain the books that might be written, upon a subject so absolutely inexhaustible in all its various branches and ramifications.

But amidst all this endless and oppressive variety of Scriptural Helps, there are scarcely any which are not liable to serious and weighty objections. Some are too voluminous, diffusive, and expensive for ordinary use ; others too short, superficial, and imperfect to convey sufficient information : and we may search in vain for a COMPETENT HISTORY OF THE BIBLE ; a History of the Bible which shall be plain and clear, even to the unlearned, and yet concise, correct, and critical ; competent, 1. to arrange all the scattered events in a regular and lucid, chronological and geographical order ; 2. to trace the connexion between the OLD and NEW TESTAMENT throughout, so as to render the whole one uniform and consistent narrative ; competent, 3. to expound the mysteries, doctrines, and precepts of both, intelligibly, rationally, and faithfully ; without adding to, or diminishing from the WORD OF GOD ; and without undue respect of persons, parties, or sects ; 4. to unfold and interpret the whole grand and comprehensive scheme of “ the prophetic argument *," from Genesis to Revelations; all admirably linked and closely connected together, subsisting in THE DIVINE MIND, "before the foundation of the world," 1 Pet. i. 20, Rev. xiii. 8, and gradually revealed to mankind, at sundry times, and divers modes and degrees, during the Patriarchal, Mosaical, and Christian dispensations, as they were able to bear it, Heb. i. 1, competent, 5. to solve real difficulties, and reconcile apparent dissonances, resulting from the obscurity of the original text, or from inaccurate translations; 6. to silence Sceptics and Heretics, Infidels and Scoffers, by exposing the weakness and inconclusiveness of their objections and cavils; 7. to defend the institutions of the Primitive Church against Schismatics and Levellers; and in fine, 8. to copy, as closely as possible, the brevity and conciseness, yet simplicity and plainness of the Gospel style;—such a history of the Bible is altogether a desideratum in the annals of sacred literature.

Such a plan was partly suggested many years ago, after the grand rebellion, by Samuel Torshell, a preceptor of the royal family of Charles I. as it seems, who addressed "the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament," on this great and important national concern, in a tract preserved in the Phoenix about 1707, Vol. I. p. 96, &c.

In this, he proposed "to dispose THE BIBLE into a method and harmony, by transposing the order of books and chapters; inserting the sacred oracles according to the times they were delivered in, and the psalms in their places, and on the occasions which they were framed to suit ; in such a manner that by the mere force of series and connexion, the historical and prophetical parts might reciprocally explain and authenticate each other."

It is much to be regretted that this masterly plan was not attended to, and encouraged by a British Parliament. It proved abortive, and Torshell's materials, if he had collected any, were unfortunately lost, or condemned as waste paper. As far as the limited powers and confined opportunities of an unassisted and retired student could avail, an attempt has been made, in the present work, to fill up the scanty outline in some measure ; but to complete and perfect the whole, in all the various branches, expressed above, will require the united talents of the most learned, and the most enlightened scholars and divines, not only of the present age, but of ages yet unborn ; for THE MYSTERY OF THE GOSPEL cannot be fully unfolded till the time of the end.

IV. This second volume, comprises the History of the Old Testament, and Apocrypha, in eight Chronological Periods, reaching from the creation of the world, B.C. 5411, (according to the present system) to the birth of John the Baptist, B.C. 5 ; and the third volume comprises the History of the New Testament, from thence, to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70.

To these is added, a tenth prophetic period, including a brief sketch of the state of the Church militant, or suffering, both before and after CHRIST, from the rise of the Babylonian empire upon the ruins of Nineveh, B.C. 606, to the end of the period of the three woes, for 1260 years, ending, according to this scheme, A.D. 1880. See the analytical investigation of it, p. 517, 518, of this volume.

The Church militant is to be succeeded by the Church triumphant, during the establishment of THE kingdom of God upon earth, foretold by the ancient prophets, especially Daniel, ii. 44, vii. 13, 14, for a thousand years, or probably generations, Exod. xx. 5, 6, Deut. vii. 9, Ps. cv. 8, 1 Chron. xvi. 15, in the regeneration, Matt. xix. 28; at the first resurrection, John v. 25, Rev. xx. 4, 5; or resurrection of the just, Luke xiv. 14, as distinguished from the general resurrection at the end of the world, John v. 28, 29, Matt. xxv. 31—46; when seasons of refreshment shall arrive, Acts iii. 19—21, at OUR LORD'S second appearance, Heb. ix. 28. When wars and discord shall cease throughout the world, and religion and virtue flourish, and the paradisaical state be once more revived upon earth during that blessed millenary period of a thousand generations. Under each of these periods its chronology is first given, and the principles upon which it was constructed are briefly explained before its history is detailed. Thus the chronology and history keep pace with each other, and their mutual consistency, and the harmony that pervades the whole of the analytical outline of the chronology, (as determined from the general principles laid down in the first volume of this work,) and the synthetical arrangement of the events furnishes no slight presumption, that the whole system is well founded, and solidly built in its superstructure.

The leading prophecies throughout the Old and New Testament, are introduced “according to the times they were delivered in,” for the following reasons:

1. This chronological order of the prophecies is recommended by the sacred writers themselves, who constantly interweave their prophecies with the thread of the history, in the most simple and natural way.

2. The most important prophecies grew, as it were, spontaneously out of the circumstances of the history, and they mutually explain and illustrate each other: the prophecies, by their reflex operation, often contributing materially to explain the passing events, and also to predict others that were nearer, or less remote.

Thus, the grand charter of our REDEMPTION originated from the historical fall of our first parents in Paradise, (Gen. iii. 15.) And it contributes in turn to ascertain the spiritual nature of the tempter, under the image or form of a serpent; as expressly explained, (Rev. xii. 9.) And the famous prophecy of the chosen virgin of the royal house of David, of whom "THE BLESSED SEED," IMMANUEL, was to be born, destined in the fulness of prophetic time, to crush the serpent's head, or destroy the power of the Devil; was naturally suggested by the infidelity of Ahaz, king of Judah, refusing a sign of deliverance from his enemies, offered to him from THE LORD by the prophet Isaiah, vii. 10—15: while the re-moter prophecy of the birth of JESUS was verified by the nearer prediction, that in the course of two years, before THE HOLY CHILD should learn to distinguish his food, the hostile land of Samaria and Syria, which Ahaz then dreaded, should be deprived of its two kings, those fire-brands to Judea, ver. 16. See p. 419 of this volume.

3. And it is truly remarkable, that the most disastrous periods of the history were the most highly illuminated by THE SPIRIT OF PROPHECY, for the comfort and support of the faithful under their present, or approaching trials. Thus, the sufferings of the Israelites, in their Egyptian bondage, and in the waste howling wildernesses of Arabia Petraea, were mitigated and relieved by the most signal prophecies of future rest and salvation in the promised land; not merely for a short period, but for “a thousand generations” of the faithful, by the voice of THE TUTELAR GOD OF ISRAEL himself, from Mount Sinai. The greatest prophets, “in word and deed,” Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Micah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Daniel, &c. were all raised up before, or during the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities.

The like kind and gracious economy took place under the GOSPEL dispensation. The times and seasons were highly calamitous, when OUR LORD and his harbinger the Baptist, appeared on the stage. And their most important prophecies, pointed chiefly to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the long desolation to ensue during the Roman captivity; critically explaining and applying the foregoing prophecies of Moses, Isaiah, and Daniel relative thereto, for the comfort, support, and deliverance of the faithful; of whom not a hair of their heads perished in the catastrophe of the devoted city, because they listened to OUR LORD’S admonitions, and watched his signs of the times.

The same is still continued to us and to our children in these latter times and seasons. We likewise are forewarned in the sure and unerring word of prophecy, by CHRIST and his Apostles in the NEW TESTAMENT, and especially in his last and fullest revelation to his exiled servant John, in Patmos, of the three woes that are to conclude the persecutions of the Church militant before it shall become triumphant; and there is abundant reason to dread that the last woe has already begun; that the effusion of the first vial of wrath upon the apostate world, began about A.D. 1793 ; and that the last persecution of the remnant of the witnesses, shortly before the expiration of the period in 1880, is likely to take place in England, and chiefly in its metropolis, London, that greatest seminary of religion and virtue, and also of irreligion and vice. In which conflict, we greatly apprehend, the National Church shall be extinguished for a short time, but shall rise again like the Phoenix from her ashes, with renewed lustre, at the regeneration. Nor is this ominous exposition of Rev. xi. 7—12, by any means singular or novel. It was expressly applied to the Protestant, or Reformed Churches in general, by the sagacious Mede ; it was dreaded for the Church of England in particular, by Bishop Jewell, Archbishop Whitgift, and the profound Hooker, in consequence of the sacrilegious spoliation of ecclesiastical property by the Laity ; and it is supported by some of the soberest witnesses of the present eventful times.

The study of the Apocalypse furnishes the master key to the whole scheme of chronological prophecy. The Apocalyptic visions, like the head corner stone, crown the whole fabric, laid by the great architect CHRIST himself, for the edification of the faithful in the last days. “ He that will understand the old prophets must begin with the Apocalypse,” said Sir Isaac Newton. Observations, &c. p. 250. And his analytic method was pursued throughout in framing this Analysis of Sacred Chronology, especially in the prophetic scheme. To such serious students as may wish to see the whole plan of this volume unfolded, it is earnestly recommended by way of preparation, to begin at the end, and read the tenth period first. This will furnish the clue to the whole. There they will find out what was “first, last, and midst, and without end” in the author’s thoughts, during this long and laborious task:—1. an ardent desire and anxious endeavour to rouse and excite public attention to most awful and interesting and impending prophecies; 2. to engage, if possible, all the various jarring and discordant sects and parties that flourish even to rankness, in this enviable land of religious and civil liberty, to join in mutual peace and charity * with the Church, and with each other, from a lively sense of their common danger; and to unite cordially against the common enemy, Popery, now rearing her hydra head aloft in these isles, after having been wounded to death on the continent of Europe; one of the most astonishing and portentous signs of the times:—3. to establish upon solid and unshaken grounds, the truly Scriptural and Orthodox doctrine of the first resurrection, at OUR LORD’S approaching appearance at the regeneration, and his ensuing spiritual kingdom upon earth for a thousand years or generations; and to rescue this reviving and awakening doctrine (too long suppressed and neglected,) from the vain terrors of ignorant enthusiasts, and the presumptuous imaginations of artful and designing fanatics, vending their “seals,” or false securities among a deluded populace; 4. to promote the conversion of the Jews, and contribute to bring back the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to the great SHEPHERD of their salvation; demonstrating, by a close and critical survey of all the prophecies from Moses to Malachi, in the originals, respecting their MESSIAH, that they were altogether fulfilled in JESUS OF NAZARETH *, and altogether in no other person whatsoever ; according to the judicious plan, proposed, indeed, but insufficiently, and unfairly executed by David Levi †, owing to his partial blindness and rooted

* In the APPENDIX to the third volume, all these prophecies are collected into two grand series. The first, descriptive of the Human Nature of CHRIST, his pedigree, sufferings, and glory ; the second, of his divine character, titles, and offices.

† About the year 1787, the late Doctor Priestly, rather unadvisedly, attempted the conversion of the Jews, and provoked a controversy with David Levi, a learned London Jew, in which “ little David,” as he humourously styled himself, encountered “ this Goliath,” in controversy; and boasted that “ he slew, with his own sword, this man of war from his youth ;” who, certainly, was not competent to maintain the cause of CHRISTIANITY upon Unitarian principles, against his brother the Jew.

Elated with his success, Levi threw down the gauntlet to the Christian Divines at large in these terms,——“ If I might presume to offer my opinion, in so weighty a cause, I think that the fairest method, and that which is the likeliest to lead to conviction on either side, (Jewish, or Christian) is to take a review of all the prophecies concerning THE MESSIAH, from Moses to Malachi, and compare them with the acts of Jesus, recorded in the New Testament ; to see whether they have been fulfilled in his person or not.”

This, Levi attempted to do in a publication of three volumes 8vo. on the prophecies ; which, with some ingenious expositions, mixes much trite and common place argument of Jewish writers, and much indecent virulence against “ the name of JESUS.” Still, the work is in estimation among his countrymen, and we understand, several of them have expressed surprize that it has not been answered.

This induced the Society lately instituted in London, to promote the conversion of the Jews, to offer a premium for the most approved answer to David Levi's book ; and one has lately appeared under their auspices, signed Talib, which has considerable merit, as far as it goes ; stating Levi's fundamental principle, namely, that the glorious kingdom of the MESSIAH was to take place immediately, or shortly after his first appearance upon earth ; and proving that it is, 1. a mere petitio principii, or taking for granted the question at issue between the Jews and Christians ; 2. That it is contrary to the whole analogy of the divine government of the world, in which the progress toward perfection is gradual ; from the grain of mustard seed to the great tree, Matt. xiii. 31, 32 ; 3. And contrary also, to the express intimations of the Hebrew Scriptures ; and 4. expressly opposed to those prophecies which foretel a suffering MESSIAH, &c. But the learned and ingenious author modestly professes neither sufficient leisure nor erudition for a complete answer to every part of Levi's work, p. vi.

This has been attempted, in the present Analysis of Sacred Chronology ; the necessity of which was originally suggested, indeed, in great measure, by Levi's prejudices;—5. to induce and persuade all descriptions of scholars competent thereto, Jewish, Christian, and Sceptical, “up to reascend, though hard and rare,” to the original sources of information in the HEBREW and GREEK SCRIPTURES, rejecting their leaky and “broken cisterns that can hold no water”—no living waters from the ROCK CHRIST; and exchanging their sounding brass for solid gold:—their secondary authorities, of received translations, dogmas, Mishnas and Talmuds, their formularies of faith, confessions, and traditions of men, for the native simplicity and dignity, and lucid argument, “in thoughts that breathe, and words that burn,” of THE GOSPEL OF PEACE, from Genesis to Revelations;—6. and by their influence and exertions among the unlearned and unstable, to bring all descriptions of men, high and low, rich and poor, one with another, from darkness to light, from the power of Satan unto GOD, to guide their feet, and thereby our own also, into the way of peace here, and bliss hereafter.

To propose and enforce in their full lights and bearings, views so vast and comprehensive, as are here delineated, is not the author's province, nor of any individual whatsoever, even the most highly gifted. He has, indeed, sketched a grand outline; but to fill it up, cor-imposing challenge; for this led to a critical examination of the Jewish System of Chronology in the first volume of this work; which was found to be false and hollow. With the ground work, therefore, the superstructure of his argument necessarily fails; as I have endeavoured to prove by a critical analysis and dispassionate examination of the prophecies themselves in the course of this volume; to which the attention of the most learned Jewish Rabbis, is most earnestly and anxiously requested, by their sincere well-wisher.

rectly and completely, will require the joint concurrence, and the strenuous co-operation of the most intelligent and the most enlightened of the wise and good of all sects and parties, of “all sorts and conditions of men,” who compose the visible Church, under THE LAW and under THE GOSPEL. And such, he humbly trusts, are still to be found among the Israel of God and followers of THE LAMB. May their number, their unanimity, their faith, and fervent but considerate zeal according to knowledge, abound more and more to promote this blessed work of GENERAL REFORMATION in belief and practice!

In the progress of this arduous and tedious undertaking, as a laborious pioneer in the cause and service of Sacred Literature, he has proceeded all along with fear and trembling; impressed with the most lively and profound sense of the awful responsibility of a sacred critic to GOD and the world, if he presume, if he dare, to handle that sharp two-edged sword, of THE SPIRIT, THE WORD OF GOD, either heedlessly, unskilfully, or deceitfully; fully concurring in sentiment with the pious and sagacious, but most cautious and circumspect Joseph Mede, that “Rashly to be the author of a false interpretation of SCRIPTURE, is to TAKE GOD’S NAME IN VAIN, in a high degree,”—higher in writing than in speaking; for, Litera scripta manet.—

The book of Genesis begins with an account of the Creation of the Earth, its elements, vegetable productions, and animals, in the course of six days. At the same time were created, we may presume, the sun, moon, planets and comets, which compose our Mundane System. See the process of Creation described in the Elements of Ancient Geography, Vol. I. p. 308, &c.

The world was probably created in Spring, about the Vernal

* The probable Chronology of Cain's line is given in the fourth volume of this work. Section I.

Equinox. See Elements of Technical Chronology, Vol. I. p. 33. And the year of the Creation, assumed as the basis of this system, is B.C. 5411, collected from the rectification of the Chronology of Josephus, and of Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, as stated, Vol. I. p. 302.

The primæval or sacred year, consisted of 360 days. See the article of years, Vol. I. p. 31. And in this genealogical table of Seth's line, six centuries are added to the generations of Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Malaleel, and Enoch, exhibited in the present Masorete Hebrew text; for the reasons assigned, Vol. I. p. 272, &c.

ADAM.

The first chapter of Genesis, closes the general account of the creation with that of Man, the last and noblest work of GOD: who were created separately, "male and female," "in the image and likeness of God," endued with reason, speech, and knowledge of their CREATOR, who graciously conversed with, and "blessed them," and gave them "dominion" over the earth, its elements, and its productions, vegetable and animal: and concluded with the institution of the sabbath on the seventh day, after the work of creation was all finished, which "God blessed" to be a day of "rest," (as the name implies) or repose from labour; "and sanctified," to be a day devoted to religious worship and instruction. Gen. i. 26—31; ii. 1—3.

The second chapter (which more correctly begins with "These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth," &c. ver. 4.) resumes the subject, and gives a particular account of the separate formation of Adam and Eve; of their first settlement in the garden of Eden, made for their accommodation, and furnished with "every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food;" of the first covenant which God made with them; and of their marriage. Gen. ii. 7—25.

According to this more circumstantial account, "THE LORD OF GODS formed the first man*, dust of the ground: and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and the man became a living soul."

* The original expression, אֶת הָאָדָם is doubly emphatic, and should be rendered, "the first Adam," or "the first man," as it is by St. Paul, alluding to this passage, 1 Cor. xv. 47. "The first man was of the ground, earthy, or dusty," (χρῆμα.)

Human nature therefore, consisted of three parts, 1. the body, formed of the dust of the ground; 2. the breath of life, (or the "breath of the spirit of life," as more fully expressed in the original, Gen. vii. 22;) and 3. the living soul. And it is so explained by Josephus, Ant. I. 1.

"GOD formed the man, having taken dust of the ground; and put into him spirit and soul." The NEW TESTAMENT also represents the whole man as compounded of spirit, soul, and body, 1 Thess. v. 23, Heb. iv. 12.

Of these parts, "the spirit," or "breath," Job xxxiv. 14, is the noblest, and the peculiar prerogative of man, as distinguished above the rest of the animal creation, Eccl. iii. 21, by which he is made an heir of immortality, Titus iii. 7; for, "there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration [or breath] of THE ALMIGHTY giveth them understanding," Job xxxii. 8; "the dust [or body] shall return to the earth as it was; but the spirit shall return to GOD who gave it," Eccl. xii. 7. And it is remarkable, that when our blessed Lord began to regenerate his disciples after his resurrection, when "he was invested with all power in heaven and earth;" in allusion it seems, to the creation of Adam, originally, "he breathed on, or into them, (ενεφυσησε) and said, Receive a holy spirit." (λαβετε πνευμα αγιον) John xx. 22.

The spirit is also called in Scripture, "the understanding," Ephes. i. 18, iv. 18; "the mind," Rom. vii. 25, or "the spirit of the mind," Ephes. iv. 23. Reason, Dan. iv. 36, Acts xviii. 14; and conscience, Rom. ii. 15, ix. 1. All these distinctions are found also in heathen philosophy, and in both, the spirit, reason, or conscience is represented as the governing principle of human nature, Rom. ii. 15, &c. This, according to the Mosaic account, is supposed to be seated in the head, as the sensorium.

The second part, or soul, is the principle of sensation, or mere animal life, which man shares in common with brutes. Hence it was called a "living soul." And the term ψυχη, indiscriminately denotes both soul and life. This is supposed in Scripture to be seated in, or attached to the blood; "for the life of the flesh [or body] is in the blood," Gen. ix. 4, Levit. xvii. 11, Deut. xii. 23. And that excellent anatomist, Mr. John Hunter, from the result of many experiments, has confirmed the doctrine, that *the principle of life is inherent in the blood. Phil. Transact. vol. LXVI. p. 414.

* "Hunter's experiments, however, are not decisive of the doctrine of the vitality of

Because the soul is more intimately connected with the third and lowest part, the body, it is frequently styled in Scripture, the flesh, as contrasted with the spirit, Matt. xxvi. 41; and is opposed thereto, "the spirit being inclined to good, the flesh, to evil," Gal. v. 17; compare Rom. vii. 15, viii. 6, 7. Sometimes, however, the soul, by a popular use of the word, includes the spirit; as when it is contrasted with the body, Psal. xvi. 10, Matt. x. 28, Luke xii. 4; or with fleshly lusts, 1 Pet. ii. 11.

To the soul belong the appetites, affections and desires, Ephes. ii. 3; the passions and lusts, Rom. i. 26, Gal. v. 24. All these were wisely implanted in man, to excite and stimulate him to action; and are therefore good in themselves; they only become bad or mischievous by excess or abuse, 1 Cor. vii. 31. Like fire and water, "they are good servants, but bad masters:" good, when restrained and controuled by reason or conscience; bad, when unrestrained*.

Human nature therefore, like all the other works of God's creation, was "good," in its kind, and "very good," for the purposes for which it was designed, Gen. i. 31; yet even in its original constitution it was imperfect, frail, and liable to evil, both natural and moral; as described by HIM who knew it best; "the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak!" Matt. xxvi. 41. And this is the uniform doctrine of Scripture throughout: "The first man knew not wisdom perfectly, neither shall the last find her out," Ecclus. xxiv. 28. "Verily, every man, in his best estate, is altogether vanity," [or imperfection,] Psalm xxxix. 5. And this, by the divine appointment: "For the [human] creation was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by HIM who subjected [them thereto,]" Rom. viii. 20. This vanity, or natural imperfection, is styled by our Church, in her Article IX, the blood, either in the body, or out of the body. The blood contains the principle of the increase and nourishment of the body; and distributes heat through every part of it. It is, indeed, the principle of life, so far as it is the vehicle of the living principle." This judicious remark is due to an esteemed friend, the Rev. T. Falconer, editor of Strabo, Bampton Lecturer, &c., the learned son of a learned father, and physician, Dr. W. Falconer, of Bath.

* Bishop Butler, in his sermon on Resentment, has an excellent observation on this subject.

"We should learn to be cautious lest we charge God foolishly, by ascribing that to HIM, or the nature he has given us, which is owing wholly to an abuse of it. Men may speak of the degeneracy and corruption of the world, according to the experience they have had of it: but human nature considered as the divine workmanship, should, methinks, be treated as sacred; for in the image of God made he man."

an Original or Birth-sin, “an infection of nature,” which “doth remain, yea even in them that are regenerated :” and this is correct scriptural doctrine; for, says St. Paul, who entered so deeply into the philosophy of human nature, “We know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth until now; and not only they, [the unregenerate] but we [the regenerated apostles] who have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, awaiting adoption, namely our deliverance from the body ;” Rom. viii. 22, 23; or from bodily infirmities; 2 Cor. xii. 7—10. Phil. xi. 23, 24; at the resurrection; 1 Cor. xv. 23, &c.

But when it is said, that man was made “an heir” of immortality, “according to the hope of eternal life,” Titus iii. 7. this is not to be understood as being derived from any inherent virtue in his nature; as if the spirit or mind was necessarily immortal, according to the arrogant notions of Heathen philosophers, and philosophizing divines of their school. The divine sentence pronounced on Adam, “dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return,” Gen. iii. 19: included the dissolution of the spirit also; for what had a beginning might reasonably be expected to have an end; and the Stoic philosophers reasoned more justly from analogy than the rest, when they maintained, that “the soul, from its distinct nature, might, indeed, long survive the body; but denied its eternal existence*.” “And this, I say,” says St. Paul, “that flesh and blood [or mankind, Matt. xvi. 17.] are not able [naturally] to inherit the kingdom of God, neither shall corruption inherit incorruption:” in order to this end, a great and sudden change is to be wrought in both soul and body; for the Apostle proceeds, “Behold, I tell you a mystery: we shall not all sleep [an eternal sleep, in death] but shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet (for the trumpet shall sound), and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed: for this corruptible [body] must put on incorruption, and this mortal [soul] put on immortality, 1 Cor. xv. 50—53. “Eternal life, indeed, is the free gift of GOD, through JESUS CHRIST OUR LORD,” Rom. vi. 23; “Who illustrated life and incorruption both by THE GOSPEL,” 2 Tim. i. 10, which he preached, John vi. 68; xx. 21; and by the example of his own resurrection, in a glorified body, as “the first fruits,” the sample and the pledge, of “the resurrection of the just,” to “glory, honour, and immortality,” 1 Cor. xv. 20—23; Luke xiv. 14; Rom. ii. 7; Col. iii. 1—4.

It is remarkable that the first man was formed of the common earth, and afterwards translated into Paradise; and the name אדם Adam, signifying “red,” or the reddish colour of native virgin earth, according to Josephus, is common to the human species, “male and female:” for “God blessed them, and called their name *Adam, in the day that he created them,” Gen. v. 2.

The first woman was formed separately, from a rib of Adam himself, and animated with the same spirit. He called her, אשה Aishah, “woman,” because she was taken out of אִישׁ, Aish, the proper name of “man,” or the male, Gen. ii. 23, he afterwards called her חַוָּה Hhavah, or Eve, “because she was the mother of all living,” Gen. iii. 20; either from חַי Hhai, “life,” or “living;” or from חָוָה, which in Arabic, signifies “to live †.” Robertson’s Clavis Pentateuchi, p. 49.

By thus forming woman from a part of the man’s body so near his heart, PROVIDENCE seems to have intimated the peculiar tenderness, and lasting union, of the matrimonial state:—“Therefore shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh,” Gen. ii. 24; “What, therefore, GOD hath joined together, let not man put asunder,” Matt. xix. 5, 6.

PARADISE.

The site and description of Paradise, most conformable, perhaps, to the Mosaical account of the “garden of Eden,” is given in the Elements of Ancient Geography, Vol. I. p. 316.

The state of our first parents in Paradise, was a pleasant state of moderate employment; “to dress and keep” the garden in order; which God furnished with every thing necessary for their accommodation and gratification: “Out of the ground, made the

* In Numb. xxxi. 35, אדם Adam, is remarkably applied to “female persons.”

† Parkhurst, in his Hebrew Lexicon, p. 220, gives a fanciful derivation from the same verb, which in Hebrew, usually signifies to declare, or discover; as if Eve signified “the manifestor,” because she was to be the mother of all who live unto God, through Christ, the promised seed of the woman. The Rabbins ludicrously derive it from the same verb, as denoting her talkativeness. See Buxtorf’s Manual Lexicon.

LORD GOD to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food." It was also a state of trial or probation, and of discipline or preparation for a better. For these purposes, two remarkable trees were planted "in the midst of the garden," (in the most conspicuous place, we may presume,) "the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil," Gen. ii. 9. iii. 3.

The tree of life was so called, as being the appointed instrument of conferring upon man, "that thing which, by nature, he could not have," to "live for ever," by eating of its fruit, Gen. iii. 22. It partook, therefore, of the essence of a sacrament, according to the interpretation of the best divines, "as a means whereby to receive the same; and a pledge to assure them thereof;" upon the condition of receiving it worthily.

The tree of knowledge, was so called as being the appointed test of the obedience or disobedience of our first parents; procuring good or happiness, in the former case, and evil or misery, in the latter.

THE FIRST COVENANT.

"And the LORD GOD commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."

This command was also repeated to both Adam and Eve, in still stronger terms: "God said, ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die." Gen. iii. 3.

The divine permission to eat of "every tree of the garden," and that "freely;" evidently included "the tree of life;" and also implied the divine approbation to partake thereof, as the appointed means of procuring that free and gratuitous "gift of GOD—eternal life, through JESUS CHRIST OUR LORD;" while, on the other hand, "the wages of sin," in eating of the forbidden tree, "was death," Rom. vi. 23.

This covenant, therefore, with both its sanctions, is thus well paraphrased by Bishop Bull, in his excellent Sermon, on the first Covenant, and the State of Man before the Fall, &c. Vol. III. p. 1069.

"If thou shalt obey my commandment in not eating of the tree of knowledge, thou mayest continue in Paradise, and freely enjoy all the other delights thereof, not being debarred from the tree of life, which thou mayest eat of, and live for ever : but if thou transgress this my commandment, in eating of the tree of knowledge, thou shalt certainly die.”

GOD, therefore, dealt with our first parents, as with rational and free agents, capable of understanding a law for the regulation of their conduct, and free to obey or disobey it. He dealt precisely in the same manner afterwards, in the covenant which Moses made, in his name, with the Israelites :

“ I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing : therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live *.” Deut. xxx. 19.

The simplicity of the prohibition, not to eat of the fruit of a particular tree, has proved a stumbling-block to † Scepticism and Infidelity ; but it was wisely adapted to the peculiar circumstances of our first parents. In their primitive state of innocence and seclusion from society, what opportunity or what temptation had they to violate any one of the ten commandments ? No other God than one knew they, their Creator ; and, therefore, they had no inducement to polytheism, idolatry, or profanation of his name or sabbaths ; no earthly parents had they to dishonour ; no neighbours to injure by murder, adultery, theft, or

* The sublime Milton has finely expressed the foundation of free agency.

————— “ I made man just and right,
Sufficient to have stood, though free to fall,
Such I created all the æthereal powers ;
Freely they stood, who stood, and fell who fell :
Not free, what proof could they have given sincere
Of true allegiance, constant faith, or love ?”

Young expresses the same sentiment, with his peculiar boldness and energy.

“ Blame not the bowels of the DEITY ;
Man shall be bless'd, as far as man permits.
Not Man alone, all Rationals, Heaven arms
With an illustrious, but tremendous power —
That power denied, Man, Angels, were no more
But passive engines, void of praise or blame.
Heaven wills our happiness, allows our doom :
Invites us ardently, but not compels.”

† “ If we consider Reason as our only oracle, we shudder at the thought of so many calamities, temporal and eternal, entailed upon mortals in punishment of the disobedience of one man, who tasted an apple ! though we should consider that master a bloody tyrant who should deprive a slave of his life, for such a trifle ; still, are we uncharitable for believing the transgression of one man will be the occasion of the loss of several ?” O'Leary against Wharton and Hawkins, p. 38.

perjury; where all was their sole property and dominion, no room had they for covetousness. Nothing, therefore, but the privation of some appetite, the restriction of some gratification within their reach, could easily have been proposed as a test of their obedience.

Both trees, indeed, were admirably ordained to contribute to the discipline, improvement, and perfection of human nature: the tree of knowledge, to restrain the inordinance of appetite, and keep the flesh in constant subjection to the spirit; the tree of life, “to strengthen and refresh the soul,” by its sacramental virtue, and to repair the decays of the body by divine power; until at length, after their appointed time, they might have been translated from the earthly to the heavenly Paradise, without tasting death; like Enoch, before the Law, and Elijah, under the Law. Indeed, that the garden of Eden could never have been designed for the perpetual residence of Adam’s posterity, is evident from its scanty limits: even the world itself could not contain the multitudes that would be born in a limited number of ages, supposing mankind to have propagated their species at the same rate as since the fall.

THE FALL OF MAN.

How long our first parents remained in Paradise is not noticed in Scripture. Various have been the guesses of Jewish and Christian chronologers; reckoning it a day, a week, or ten days, a year, or seven years. The period was probably longer: that it was not less than a century, may be collected from the primitive tradition of the golden age, evidently including the state of innocence; and still more decisively, from the most approved date of Seth’s birth, in the 230th year of Adam, soon after the murder of Abel by Cain, when the latter was arrived at manhood, and married at the time; and therefore not less, probably, than 100 years old, which would bring Cain’s birth to the 130th of Adam; not long after their expulsion from Paradise.

This longer period seems also more agreeable to the History of the Creation and Fall; which intimates that our first parents had other communications with their MAKER before that last, “when they heard his voice [probably in thunder] walking in the garden in the cool of the day, and were afraid, and hid themselves.” Before that fatal day, they might often have heard him, speaking in “a still small voice;” as at their creation, Gen. i. 28, &c. ; and afterwards, as he spake to Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Samuel, Elijah, &c.

The third chapter of Genesis gives an account of the fall. It has been the fashion with minute philosophers, and philosophizing divines, to endeavour to explain away the reality of the fall, and to resolve it all into “*allegory, apologue, or moral fable.” But the whole scheme of redemption by CHRIST is founded thereon, and must stand or fall therewith; a figurative fall requiring only a figurative redemption. Even that noted Deist, Lord Bolingbroke, justly rejects the allegorical mode of interpretation:—“It cannot,” says he, “be admitted by Christians; for if it was, what would become of that famous text [that the seed of the woman should crush the serpent’s head, Gen. iii. 15] whereon the doctrine of our redemption is founded.” Vol. V. p. 372. 8vo.

Indeed, the Mosaical account, from its simplicity and consonance with the whole tenour of Holy Writ, was evidently designed to represent a real transaction; and it has been received as such, by the inspired penmen of the Old and New Testament, who certainly were most competent to decide. It discloses a mysterious doctrine of the most alarming information: that we are exposed to “the craft and subtlety” of a formidable spiritual adversary, who first seduced our first parents from their obedience to the law of God, by artfully working on their appetites and affections; and is still permitted to exercise a tremendous influence and sway over mankind, for a limited time. 1 Pet. v. 8; Rev. xii. 12; xx. 2; Matt. viii. 29.

His various titles in Scripture are, “the great dragon, the old serpent, called the Devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world,” Rev. xii. 9; “the prince of this world,” John xii. 31; and even “the god of this world,” 2 Cor. iv. 4; who claimed supreme jurisdiction over its kingdoms, Luke iv. 6; “the prince of demons,” or devils, Matt. xii. 29; as being leader of a numerous and formidable host of wicked spirits, called his angels, Matt. xxv. 41; and also, called the principalities, and powers, and rulers of this world, Ephes. vi. 12 ; the power of darkness, Luke xxii. 53 ; who for his pride and rebellion was cast out of heaven, with his angels, Isa. xiv. 12—14 ; Luke x. 18 ; Ephes. ii. 2 ; Rev. xii. 7 ; and shall be finally cast into hell, at the end of the world, and the general judgment, Rev. xx. 10 ; Matt. viii. 29, with his angels and wicked men, Matt. xxv. 41.

* “The account of the fall cannot be considered under any other character than that of allegory, apologue, or moral fable.” Middleton.

“The fall is an excellent mythologue, or an Egyptian allegory, judiciously selected by Moses, to enable him to account for the introduction of evil, and of man’s antipathy to the reptile race.” Geddes.

Of the real and personal existence therefore of “the tempter,” as he is emphatically styled by way of bad eminence, when he tempted CHRIST himself, Matt. iv. 3, not the slightest doubt can be entertained by any one who “searches the Scriptures:” and, perhaps, one of “the depths of Satan,” or his deepest devices, Rev. ii. 24, is to deny or ridicule the idea of his own existence, and to represent it as allegorical, visionary, or imaginary, in order to throw an unsuspecting world off their guard, and “sift them as wheat,” or shake their faith, Luke xxii. 31.

The motive that instigated the tempter, was envy at the happiness of our first parents : “through envy of the devil * came sin into the world, and they that hold of his side do find it.” Wisd. ii. 24.

That the fall of man was considered as a real historical fact, by the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testament, is evident. The seduction of Eve is noticed ; “of the woman came the beginning of sin ; and through her we all die,” Ecclus. xxv. 24.—And Adam’s hiding himself ; “If I covered my transgressions as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my bosom,” [or lurking place,] Job xxxi. 33.—“Adam was formed first, then Eve ; and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression,” 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14 :—and the faithful are warned to take heed from her example : “I fear, that as ‘the serpent beguiled Eve’ through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity [of the faith] concerning CHRIST, by false apostles,” 2 Cor. xi. 3.

* Milton has finely represented this, in Satan’s soliloquy at the sight of Adam and Eve in Paradise.

O hell ! what do mine eyes with grief behold ?
 Into our room of bliss thus high advanc’d,
 Creatures of other mold ; earth born perhaps,
 Not spirits, yet to heavenly spirits bright,
 Little inferior. _____

_____ Aside the devil turn’d
 For envy ; yet with jealous leer malign

Among the great variety of the serpent kind, none was more likely to have been chosen by the tempter, (either assuming the form, or entering into a real serpent, as a convenient instrument of seduction,) than that deadly species of “fiery serpents *,” so called from their bright reddish colour, by which the Israelites were bitten near the close of their wanderings in the Arabian deserts, because they murmured for more substantial food, against THE LORD and against Moses, Numb. xxi. 6—8. In the original they are called Seraphim, from שרף Saraph, “to burn or glow;” and are represented as “flying,” and infesting Palestine and Egypt, Isa. xiv. 29; xxx. 6. Herodotus also describes a peculiar species of flying serpents, found in Egypt, and chiefly in Arabia, as of small body, spotted with various colours, in shape like the water-snake, and their wings without feathers, smooth like those of a bat. And he reports, that in Arabia Felix, the trees that bear frankincense are guarded † by great numbers of them; but that the Arabs drive them away by burning a gum called styrax underneath the trees, and then gather the frankincense, B. II. § 75, and III. § 107. This description accurately corresponds to the seraph-serpent; and happily establishes the propriety of that epithet of Satan, in the Apocalypse, δρακων μεγας πυρρος, “the great fiery dragon,” Rev. xii. 3, which was a water-snake, common in Egypt, Isa. xxvii. 1; Ezek. xxix. 3.; and was their principal divinity also, called Serapis (evidently from Seraph), worshipped all over the heathen world in ancient times, and even still in Hindustan and China. And by a striking analogy, as the healing brazen serpent erected on a pole by Moses in the wilderness, was a significant type of the Saviour of mankind, CHRIST on the Cross, John iii. 14; so, the deadly Seraph, was equally fit to denote “him that had the power of death, that is the devil.” Heb. ii. 14.

By a mysterious imagery, the winged angels, in prophetic vision to Isaiah, which surrounded the throne of GOD, or CHRIST, in glory, are called Seraphim, from their bright, shining appearance, Isa. vi. 2—6; referred to, John xii. 40. These seem to have resembled the Cherubim, stationed at the garden of Eden after the fall; whose images, we may suppose, were, by divine command, placed at each end of the mercy-seat over the ark, in the Holy of Holies, both of the Tabernacle and of the Temple, Exod. xxv. 17—22, &c. which Ezekiel also beheld in mystical vision; compare Ezek. i. 5—13. with x. 20; and afterwards John; who, following Ezekiel, describes them as “living creatures,” or “animals,” (ζωα,) Rev. iv. 6—8. Whence the Te Deum in our excellent Liturgy, joins “Cherubim and Seraphim” together in singing the doxology of Isaiah and John: “Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Sabaoth (‘Hosts;)’ heaven and earth are full of the majesty of thy glory.”

* In the Targum of Jonathan, they are called “royal serpents,” or basilisks.

† This seems to bear a remote allusion to the tree of life, guarded by the Cherubim, on the expulsion of our first parents from Paradise.

We may presume, therefore, that when “Satan beguiled Eve,” he was “transformed into an angel of light,” 2 Cor. xi. 3—14, or a seraph-serpent. Eve might easily and naturally have mistaken him for an angel of light, in this disguise, especially when possessed of the faculty of speech, which was denied to the brute creation. And she might have imagined that he came out of good will, to explain more fully the nature of the divine covenant, and to enlighten her ignorance.

The tempter artfully assailed Eve, as “the weaker vessel,” when she was alone, or separated from her husband; and in the course of conversation began to enquire: “Yea, hath God said ye shall not eat of every tree in the garden?” and when she repeated the prohibition, and the penalty of death, he allured her with the hope of impunity: “Ye shall not surely die:” and ingeniously perverting the meaning of “the tree of knowledge,” he added, “for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil;” or ye shall become as wise as gods, to know or distinguish good and evil.

“And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food; and that it was pleasant to the eyes; and a tree to be desired to make one wise; she took of the fruit thereof and did eat; and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat.” Gen. iii. 1—6.

The temptation under which Eve fell, was three-fold: “the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life,” in the language of St. John, or appetite, vanity, and ambition. And it is truly remarkable, that those with which the Devil, above five thousand years afterwards, vainly assailed the blessed Seed of the woman, and Saviour of mankind, were precisely the same in kind, accommodated to their respective situations, Matt. iv. 1—12. It is probable, that on this occasion also, Satan appeared as an angel of light, not only from his claiming divine worship, but also from the circumstance of true “angels ministering unto CHRIST,” after the devil’s departure.

When it is said, that “Eve gave of the fruit to her husband with her,” the expression “with her” only implies her partner, or help-mate, Gen. ii. 20. As understood in Adam’s apology afterwards : “the woman whom Thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat,” Gen. iii. 12. Adam, therefore, was not deceived ; he transgressed wilfully ; “he hearkened to the voice of his wife” more than to the voice of God, Gen. iii. 17 ; “he loved his wife more than God,” Matt. x. 37, and was, therefore, no more worthy to be called a “son of God,” Luke xiv. 26, iii. 38, xv. 19. The temptation which overcame him was “*inordinate affection,” (παθος) Col. iii. 5.

And now, after their transgression, the delusive promise of the tempter was in part fulfilled ; “the eyes of them both were opened,” or enlightened †, not to their expected glory, “as gods,” or angels of light, but to their shame, as “fallen from their high estate,” and become rebels and apostates from GOD : “and they knew that they were naked,” both literally and figuratively ; like the Israelites afterwards, when seduced into idolatry and fornication, in the matter of the golden calf, whom “Aaron made naked, to their shame,” Exod. xxxii. 6—26, they felt conscious of concupiscence ‡, resulting from a sense of their nakedness : a feeling to which they had been strangers before ; when “they were both naked, and were not ashamed,” Gen. ii. 25. And to hide their nakedness from each other’s eyes, “they sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons,” or rather girdles.

* Milton has finely expressed this, in Adam’s mourning over Eve :

————— Some cursed fraud
Of enemy hath beguil’d thee, yet unknown,
And me with thee hath ruin’d ! for with thee
Certain my resolution is to die :
How can I live without thee !—&c.

† See Gen. xxi. 19, Numb. xxii. 31, 2 Kings vi. 17, Acts xxvi. 18.

‡ In this sense it is understood by Milton, and the best commentators.

And hence, in the hottest regions, and most savage nations, the custom of wearing girdles about their loins, even where the rest of the body is left naked, universally prevails; and furnishes extensive historical evidence of the reality of the fall, from which that custom took its rise.

THE JUDGMENT.

The judicial trial of the guilty offenders before God, is next related, with all the circumstantial evidence of a real transaction; and is perfectly analogous to the Divine procedure afterwards, at the confusion of tongues, Gen. xi. 5—7, and the destruction of Sodom, Gen. xviii. 20, 21, in which the Lord is represented as coming down personally from heaven, to enquire into the conduct of the parties.

“And they heard the voice of the LORD GOD,” (who probably was in a glorious human form,) “walking in the garden, in the wind (רוח) of the day,*” (in the evening breeze.) This was probably thunder, frequently called “the voice of the Lord,” Psalm xxix. 3. &c. Job xxxii. 5. John xii. 28. gradually growing louder, as the Shechinah or Divine presence approached: “and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God, among the trees of the garden.”

“And the Lord called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden; and I was afraid because I was naked, and I hid myself.” This confession of his fear and nakedness, was a virtual acknowledgement of his crime; and furnished a remarkable instance of that confusion which commonly attends and often betrays a guilty conscience.

“And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? [or rather†, why hast thou done this?] And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat," Gen. iii. 8—13.

Nothing can exceed the simplicity and conciseness of this examination of the parties, "the deceived and the deceiver," Job xii. 16, before the righteous Judge of all the earth: the man, as the head, is first brought to the bar; he ingenuously confesses the truth, and lays the blame on his wife; she, on the serpent; the serpent is mute, confounded, and appalled*.

After the trial, judgment is immediately passed upon the delinquents: first on the serpent, as the most guilty; on the woman next, and on Adam last, as the least guilty.

"And the Lord said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, cursed be thou above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life.

"And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: he shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."

This sentence is two-fold; first, on the animal, and secondly, on the spiritual serpent. The animal serpent, used as an instrument of seduction, is cursed and degraded to the lowest reptile state; and condemned to eat dust †, for a standing monument of the fall, and a living emblem to deter future ages from such apostacy; and also for a warning against that base and grovelling idolatry of serpent-worship; by which "the old serpent deceived the whole world," until the birth of CHRIST; and which still subsists in Pagan countries, throughout Asia, Africa, and America.

And whereas the spiritual serpent seduced the woman under the mask of friendship, while he intended to compass her death, his eyes also are now opened, to his own shame and destruction: he is told, that his wicked policy should be defeated, and recoil upon himself; that the woman should live to have seed or offspring; that there should be a perpetual enmity ‡ between her and her righteous seed, and him and his wicked seed; for that He, who was to be in a peculiar sense, “the seed of the woman,” JESUS CHRIST, should be “manifested [in the flesh] that he might destroy the works of the devil, 1 John iii. 8; and should finally “bruise his *head;” or “through death, destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil,” Heb. ii. 14; but woman delivered of a male child, and persecuted with her offspring, by the great fiery dragon, Rev. xii. 1—14. And JESUS CHRIST was actually persecuted at his birth, by “the seed of the serpent,” Herod; Matt. ii. 13—20; and tempted by the devil, after his baptism; who, when foiled, “departed from him for a season,” Luke iv. 14, but afterwards renewed his attacks; when (we may presume) he raised a sudden storm to sink the ship in which OUR LORD lay asleep, Mark iv. 35—39. When he entered into Judas Iscariot, and tempted him to betray his master, Luke xxii. 3, John xiii. 2; and the chief priests and Pharisees to condemn him; acting under the influence of the power of darkness, Luke xxii. 53; and Pilate, the pusillanimous Roman governor, to crucify him, after acknowledging his innocence, John xix. 12—16. The devil working upon their various passions and prejudices, of covetousness, hypocrisy, superstition, resentment, and fear; and taking advantage of their ignorance of their LORD’s prophetic character, John v. 46, Luke xxiii. 34, Acts iii. 17, 18, 1 Cor. ii. 8.

* Milton has admirably paraphrased this :

“ So spake this Oracle: then verified
 When JESUS, son of Mary, (second Eve)
 Saw Satan fall like lightning down from Heaven (a,) Prince of the air (b,) then, rising from his grave,
 Spoil’d principalities and pow’rs triumph’d,
 In open shew (c,) and with ascension bright,
 Captivity led captive through the air (d,)
 The realm of Satan long usurp’d;
 Whom he shall tread (e,) at last (f,) under our feet.”

Par. Lost, B. x.

(a) “ I beheld Satan, as lightning fall from Heaven,” Luke x. 18, Isa. xiv. 12.

(b) “ Prince of the power of the air,” Ephes. ii. 2.

(c) “ He (CHRIST) having spoiled principalities and powers, made a shew of them openly; triumphing over them, on it [the cross,] Coloss. ii. 15.

(d) “ HE ascended on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men,” Ephes. iv. 8, Psalm lxxviii. 18.

(e) “ The God of peace shall bruise Satan, shortly, under the feet of his saints,” Rom. xvi. 20, Psalm xci. 13, cx. 6. “ Behold I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you,” Luke x. 19.

(f) “ For He (CHRIST) must reign, until he hath put all enemies under his feet,” 1 Cor. xv. 25, Rev. xx. 2—10.

To crush the head of a serpent is used figuratively in the Greek classics, to break the yoke of tyranny. Thus Epaminondas the Theban general, when he exhorted them to attack their oppressors the Lacedemonians, shewing them the head of a serpent which he had crushed, said to them: “ See the head of the serpent is crushed; his body can live no longer.” Polyæni Stratag. 2, 3, 19.

should suffer somewhat himself, though not fatally, in the conflict; for that the devil, and “that generation of vipers, who were of their father the devil,” John viii. 44, “should bruise his heel :” as was literally and remarkably fulfilled, in the very act of nailing his feet to the cross !

It is not to be supposed however, that our first parents, or even Satan himself, understood this oracle, so obscurely and concisely expressed, to the extent that we do now with the help of the Gospel. A general and indistinct intimation only, of punishment to the tempter, and of mercy to the tempted, was conveyed thereby; and our first parents were comforted with an obscure hope, that they should be avenged of their adversary, by means of the peculiar “seed of the woman :” that as the offence had originated from her, so might the remedy likewise. And this was signified to them in kindness, by their merciful CREATOR, before sentence was pronounced upon themselves, the better to enable them to support it, and to prevent despair. But the full meaning of “this grand charter of God’s mercy to mankind,” (as this oracle has been justly styled) was gradually developed by a curious and connected chain of prophecies, growing clearer and distincter, from Adam to CHRIST; like the first dawns of the morning twilight, gradually brightening into the glorious appearance of “the Sun of righteousness,” rising with “healing in his wings,” or rays; and “shining more and more into perfect day.”

That the general import of the oracle was so understood, even before the coming of CHRIST to take our nature upon him, and to be born of a pure virgin; according to later prophecies, Isa. vii. 14, Jer. xxxi. 22; we learn from the Targums, and Paraphrases which conveyed the sense of the primitive Jewish Church *. And the earlier Greek Version of the Septuagint, remarkably renders the passage, αυτος σου τηρησει την κεφαλην, “he shall lie in wait for thy head :” using the masculine αυτος,

* The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel paraphrases it thus.

“Moreover I will put enmity between thee and the woman, between the seed of thy sons and between the seed of her sons. And it shall come to pass, that when the sons of the woman shall observe the precepts of the law, they shall endeavour to smite thee on thy head; but when they shall forsake the precepts of the law, thou shalt endeavour to smite them on their heels: but they shall have a remedy, when thou shalt have no remedy; because they shall apply a remedy to the heel, in the days of king MESSIAH.” which, according to the Jerusalem Targum, were to be “in the end of the days.”

instead of the neuter αυτο, which in strictness, corresponds to the foregoing, σπερματος αυτης, “her seed*.” And in a subsequent limitation of “the seed of the woman” to “the seed of Abraham,” Heb. ii. 16, it is understood of a single person: “and that seed is CHRIST,” Gal. iii. 16.

Sentence is next pronounced on the woman: Unto the woman he said, “I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children: and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.”

By a just retaliation, the woman’s desire of gratifying her appetites, is punished with the pains of childbirth; and her ambition to vie with gods in knowledge, or to be exalted, by her desire of subjection to her husband, (as the phrase is understood afterwards, Gen. iv. 7,) and her submission to his will.

Thus was woman degraded from her original rank of equality with the man, and made his inferior. And in this fallen estate did the female sex continue till the birth of the promised Seed, their peculiar Deliverer, who in his gracious Gospel, reinstated them in their first privileges. For, as professor Robinson justly observes, “Woman is indebted to Christianity alone for the high rank she holds in society.” This is in great measure confined to the countries blessed with the light of the Gospel. Before that auspicious era, woman, every where, was in a state of servitude, regarded principally as an object of sensual passion, or of domestic economy, and seldom as a rational helpmate. And it is still the case, in heathen or Mahometan countries, where polygamy prevails. Indeed “the blessed” Mary’s thanksgiving to “GOD HER SAVIOUR, who regarded the low estate of his handmaiden;”—“who put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree,” Luke ii. 47—52, was applicable to the whole sex; husbands are no longer permitted to lord it over their wives, but required to “dwell with them according to knowledge; giving honour to them as the weaker

* The Vulgate Latin Version, in defiance of the sense and grammatical construction of the original, applies this prophecy to the Virgin Mary, as the representative of the woman: “Inimicitias ponam inter te et mulierem, et semen tuum et semen illius: Ipsa conteret caput tuum, et tu insidiaberis calcaneo ejus;” for the participle אָרַם, is masculine, agreeing with זָרַע “seed.” This Vulgate Version was authenticated by the Infallible Council of Trent, and preferred before the Hebrew and Greek fountains. vessels, and as joint heirs of the grace of [eternal] life." 1 Pet. iii. 7*.

Adam's sentence comes last.

And unto Adam He said, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it; cursed is the

* "It is undoubtedly Christianity," says Professor *Robinson, "that has set woman on her throne, making her in every respect the equal of man, bound to the same duties, and candidate for the same happiness." Mark how woman is described by a Christian poet:

————— "Yet when I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute she seems,
And in herself complete, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best.

"Neither her outside form'd so fair,——
So much delights me, as those graceful acts,
Those thousand deceucies that daily flow
From all her words and actions, mix'd with love
And sweet compliance, which declare unfeign'd
Union of mind, or in us both one soul.

————— "And to consummate all
Greatness of mind, and nobleness, their seat
Built in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic plac'd."—MILTON.

This is really moral painting without any diminution of female charms. This is the natural consequence of that purity of heart so much insisted on in the Christian morality, as an indispensable duty, and enforced by many arguments peculiar to itself.——

"Look into the works of the Greek and Latin poets, and the writings of antiquity:—I can find very little, indeed, where woman is treated with respect.——What does Ovid, the great panegyrist of the sex, say for his beloved daughter, whom he praised for her attractions, in various places of his Tristia, and other compositions? He is writing her epitaph, and the only thing he can say of her as a rational creature, is, that she is a domisida, ["stay-at-home,"] not a "gad-about."——"Chastity, modesty, sobermindedness," are all considered as of importance, merely in respect of economy or domestic quiet. Recollect the famous speech of Metellus Numidicus to the Roman people, when, as Censor, he was recommending marriage :

Si sine uxore possemus Quirites esse, omnes eâ modestia careremus: Sed quoniam ita Natura tradidit, ut nec cum illis commodè, nec sine illis ullo modo, vivi posset, saluti perpetuæ potius quam brevi voluptati consulendum.—Aulus Gell. Noct. Att. 1, 6.

Here the grave censor considers a wife as a necessary evil, and a "lasting union with a modest" woman, preferable to "transient enjoyment" with a harlot, merely upon "prudential considerations!" And yet, women ranked higher at Rome than elsewhere in the ancient world.

* See his Proofs of a Conspiracy, p. 263—271.

ground for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee: and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."*

Here it was consolatory † to observe, that no positive curse was pronounced on Adam, as on the wicked serpent, and that the penalty of death was not to be immediately inflicted; but a respite graciously granted to the frail offenders to repent and amend. The ground, indeed, was "cursed for their sake," [rather, "transgression,"] or the culture of it rendered more laborious and troublesome, by "thorns and thistles," which were unknown in Paradise, where his easy employment was only to dress the garden, and keep it in order; and instead of its delicious fruits, he was now doomed to eat of the herb of the field.

* The venerable book of Job, which in all probability is considerably the oldest in the Sacred Canon, (as will be proved in the sequel,) notices the circumstance of Adam's hiding himself after his transgression, xxxi. 33: and in another passage seems to have recorded an oracular saying, omitted by Moses, which may thus be more correctly rendered, xxviii. 28.

"And unto Adam HE said:

*Behold, the fear of THE LORD, this is wisdom,
And to depart from evil is understanding.*

The word Adam here, should not be rendered man, in general, as in our public translation; but Adam, our first parent, as it is rendered in the former passage. "Whether it was spoken to him before or after his fall, is not easy to determine. If after the fall, as seems rather more probable, the words carry with them a reproof as well as an instruction highly seasonable, and suited to the circumstances of his unhappy change. As if GOD had said: You, who in defiance of the prohibition I had given you, have been seeking after another sort of wisdom and knowledge than was proper for you; go learn from sure experience, that your truest wisdom is to fear ME, and to pay an implicit obedience to MY commands.—Peters on Job, p. 460.

† Milton thus beautifully represents Adam consoling Eve :

————— "Remember with what mild
And gracious temper HE both heard and judg'd,
Without wrath or reviling: we expected
Immediate dissolution, which we thought
Was meant by 'death that day;' when lo, to thee
Pains only in child-bearing were foretold,
And bringing forth, (soon recompens'd with joy,) Fruit of thy womb: On me, the curse aslope Glanc'd on the ground."

And by a *wholesome necessity, he was for the future to procure his livelihood by the sweat of his brow, until his death, or dissolution of the body.

The final salvation of our first parents, upon their repentance and obedience in future, was the doctrine of the primitive Jewish and Christian Churches. The author of the book of Wisdom, declares: "WISDOM preserved the first-formed father of the world, who was created alone, and brought him out of his fall; and gave him power to rule all things," Wisd. x. 1, 2. Here, WISDOM denotes the ORACLE, or personified WORD OF GOD, as in Prov. viii. 22—25; Matt. xi. 19; Luke xi. 49; or JESUS CHRIST, Matt. xxiii. 34. And Adam was brought out of his fall, or from the punishment due thereto, when a remedy was promised by the blessed Seed of the woman; through whom he was to be reinstated in his original privileges of dominion, &c.

To this very passage St. Paul appears to allude, in his extension of redemption to Eve also:

"For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived; but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression. Nevertheless she [also] shall be saved, by means of the child-bearing; if they [both] remained [for the rest of their lives] in faith, and love, and holiness, with sobriety †," 1 Tim. ii. 14, 15.

THE INSTITUTION OF SACRIFICES.

It is very probable, that sacrifice was instituted immediately after GOD had revealed the covenant of grace, by means of the promised "seed of the woman" in his denunciation to the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. That promise was the first stone that was laid toward the erection of this glorious building, the work of

* Virgil well expresses it:

———— PATER IPSE, colendi

Haud facilem esse viam voluit, primusque per artem

Movit agros: curis acuens mortalia corda.

GEORGIC.

† In this difficult and much contested passage, we may, with the judicious Hammond, understand δια της τεκνογονιας to refer to the bearing the promised Seed, or CHRIST: the salvation of Eve, σωθησεται, to include the salvation of Adam, a fortiori; which will account for the plural aorist, εαν μεινωσιν, "if they remained," both Adam and Eve, in the observance of their several duties of faith or trust in the divine promise, of love, or gratitude, and holiness of life, with sobriety, or moderation in the indulgence of their appetites.

Redemption, through JESUS CHRIST, "the chief corner stone," to crown and complete the whole, at the consummation of all things, Ephes. ii. 20. And the next stone that was laid upon that, was the institution of sacrifice, to be a type or significant emblem of the great atonement, or all-sufficient sacrifice of "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the repentant and believing world," John i. 29, thus "slain for us, from the foundation of the world," Rev. xiii. 8.

After God had pronounced sentence on all the offending parties, we are next told, that "the Lord God made to Adam and his wife, coats of skins, and clothed them*." Instead of the slight and imperfect covering they had made for themselves, God now taught them to make more substantial, to protect them from the inclemency of the weather in their new abode, when excluded from Paradise.

These coats are supposed, by the generality of divines, to have been made of the skins of beasts slain in sacrifice, by the Divine appointment. They could not have been slain for food: because in Paradise, man was only allowed to eat of its "fruits;" and after his expulsion, of "the herb of the field:" the grant of flesh-meat was not given till after the deluge, to Noah and his family, Gen. ix. 3. For sacrifice, therefore, no other reasonable cause can be assigned. What temptation could have induced our first parents to shed the blood of unoffending animals? a deed so revolting to their feelings and to their reason; to which, nothing short of a divine injunction would naturally have compelled them. In animal sacrifices, the blood, in which was the principle of life, was devoted to GOD, as an atonement for the forfeited life of the sacrificer, Levit. xvii. 11. But this symbolical atonement could only have been appointed by Him with whom are "the issues of life and death," GOD himself; whose sole prerogative it is "to kill and to make alive, to wound and to heal," Deut. xxxii. 39. The death of the victim was also wisely appointed to be a mournful presage to our first parents, as often as they were required to sacrifice, of that death which they had incurred by their transgression, and to be inflicted on them-

* This is beautifully expressed by Milton, and expanded,

"Nor HE their outward only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness, (much more Opprobrious) with his robe of righteousness

selves, they knew not how soon. Sacrifice, therefore, furnished a useful memento of their own death.

Besides their positive transgression, our first parents seem also to have been guilty of a sin of omission, not usually noticed, but implied in the reason assigned for their expulsion from Paradise in the divine council; namely, a continual neglect to partake of the fruit of the tree of life, that sacramental sign and pledge of immortality, during the golden opportunity of their residence there. "And the LORD GOD said, Behold, the man is become [in his own imagination] as one of Us, [Gods,] to know good and evil; [by eating of the forbidden tree of knowledge, at the Devil's suggestion;] and now, lest he [presumptuously] put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and live for ever: therefore, the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken." "So he drove out the man [and the woman,] and [to prevent any one from entering it again] He placed at the east of [or before] the garden of Eden, Cherubims, and a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way to the tree of life."

THE SHECHINAH, OR DIVINE PRESENCE, AT PARADISE.

"This flaming sword," or as it may be rendered, by a usual enallage, "sword-like, or pointed flame," is generally considered as a sensible symbol of the divine presence: resembling, perhaps, the flame that appeared to Moses in the bush, Exod. iii. 2; or, that afterwards rested on the heads of the Apostles at the day of Pentecost, in the form of "fiery tongues," or tongue-like flames, Acts ii. 3, and was here "placed," or stationed, between two Cherubim, or glorious angels; according to the interpretation of the ancient Targums*, furnishing, probably, the original archetype of the Shechinah, (from שכן, shachan, he placed) in the first tabernacle in the wilderness, and of the second, in Solomon's temple.

One design of this symbol of the Divine presence, was by "turning every way," or darting its refulgent beams all around, to bar all access to the garden on every side. But in the midst of judgment, God remembered mercy; a further, and most gracious design of its residence here, was “to keep (or preserve) the way to the tree of life* :” by keeping up or maintaining the practice of religious public worship, at this place, among Adam and his righteous descendants.—“The terrestrial paradise, indeed, was shut soon after the fall of man; nor is it now subsisting any where: but the way to the celestial one was opened from the first promise that was given of a REDEEMER.” As judiciously remarked by Peters, on Job, p. 402, edit. 2. Paradise was lost by the first Adam: but it was regained by the second, CHRIST JESUS. Speaking in the person of CHRIST before his passion, the inspired Psalmist declares, “Thou wilt shew me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand pleasures for evermore,” Psalm xvi. 11; thus elegantly alluding to the second tree of life, and the Shechinah in the celestial Paradise; so admirably described in the Apocalypse, according to the following masterly explanation given by Lord Barrington, in his Miscellanea Sacra, vol. iii. p. 48.

* "And drove out the man, and stationed his majesty of old between the two cherubim, on the east of the garden of Eden." Targum Jerusalem.

"Then He drove out the man. From which time, He stationed the glory of his divinity of old between two Cherubim." Targum Jonathan.

“To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God, Rev. ii. 7. The tree of life here signifies life and immortality, Rev. xxii. 2. It bears twelve manner of fruits, and fresh fruit every month, to shew that there will be no failure of its fruit, and that the fruit will be always in the greatest perfection: which is to signify, that the immortality of those who can take of its fruit will be preserved. It is said to grow in the midst of the street of the heavenly Jerusalem †, in allusion to its growing in the midst of the garden, Gen. ii. 9. And it is said to grow on each side of the river that runs through the street of the heavenly Jerusalem, to

* The verb שמר (Shamar) signifies to keep, or take care of. Thus, Adam was placed in the garden of Eden, “to dress it, and to keep it” [in order,] Gen. iii. 15; and the phrase לשמר את דרך, (lishmor eth derech), to “keep the way,” is constantly used in the sense of observing or preserving. So, to “keep the way of the Lord,” Gen. xviii. 19, Judg. ii. 22, is the same, as to “observe and keep his laws,” Psalm cv. 45. In the present case, the emphatic article את eth, intimates the true or proper way to the tree of life: as in the translation of Junius and Tremellius; ad custodiendum viam ad arborem vitæ; adopted by Wells, in his Paraphrase: the preposition ל, to, being understood; and omitted, perhaps, on account of its occurrence immediately before.

shew that all men may have constant and easy access to it. Farther, its leaves are said to be for the healing of the nations; that is, of the hurt they had received by Adam's eating of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And when they are represented as healed, it is immediately added, that there should be no more curse, Rev. xxii. 3, as there had been on [the ground, for] Adam and Eve's [transgression] after their being placed in the garden. And it is likewise added, that there shall be no more night, ver. 5, which there was in Paradise when the evening and the morning made every day, Gen. i. 5—31. The night being then as well as now, made for rest, and the day for labour. Finally, it is said, ver. 14, Blessed are they that do his commandments; for they shall have a right to eat of the tree of life, i. e. shall be entitled to immortality.

“All these observations plainly shew that relation which the tree of life in the Revelation bears to the original tree of life in Eden; and the allusion to it as a tree preserving life, Gen. ii. 9. This meaning of the tree of life is the more probable, because it makes the history of the fall appear a real history, and not a parable; which it must seem unnatural to suppose an account to be, which is related by an historian who gives us an account of facts, not parables, in all the rest of his writings: and above all, that is the foundation of all the rest of his history, and indeed of all future revelation; for such every one must allow the history of the fall to be.”

Though Adam was expelled from the garden of Eden, it is highly probable that he took up his residence in its vicinity; and that he offered the sacrifices prescribed to him by God, especially that of expiation or atonement, in the presence of the Lord, or before the SHECHINAH, at the stated seasons.

CAIN AND ABEL.

The first transaction noticed after the expulsion of Adam and his wife from Paradise, is the birth of their first son, Cain; which probably happened about a year after, and about the 130th year of the world. See Vol. I. p. 280. His name Cain signifies “acquisition,” from his mother’s declaration, “I have gotten (קניתי Kanithi) a man [from *] the Lord,” Gen. iv. 1.

* The particle את, (eth), “the,” is put elliptically for מאת, (meth), “from the,” as understood Gen. xlix. 25; and expressed, Gen. xix. 24, Josh. xi. 20, Ezek. xxxiii.

Not long after, "she again bare his brother Abel," [חבל] whose name, signifying "pain," as of childbirth, Isa. lxvi. 7, Hosea xiii. 13, &c. was given, probably, from the accomplishment of her sentence, Gen. iii. 16. After these two sons, she bore several sons and daughters, Gen. v. 4. Cedrenus, in his history, Vol. I. p. 8, from ancient tradition, reckons, that she bore thirty-three sons, and twenty-seven daughters; sixty in all.

The different occupations of Cain and Abel are next recorded; "Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain a tiller of the ground." Thus, says Lord Bacon, were those brothers dedicated, the one to the active, the other to the contemplative life. Cain assisted his father in the labours of husbandry, while Abel provided the sheep for sacrifice and clothing.

The ensuing sacrifices and oblations of Cain and Abel, are curious and important, as they furnish the only formal account we have of the religion of the antediluvian world: though they plainly intimate the established religion of Adam's family, and the pious education of his children. And from Adam's example, probably, was derived the primitive patriarchal custom, that the head of the family was also its priest: as in the cases of Noah, Gen. viii. 20, Job, i. 5; Abraham, Gen. xii. 8, xv. 9, 10, &c. Melchizedek, Gen. xiv. 18; Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 25; Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 54, &c. Whence, it is reasonable to suppose, that Cain and Abel did not offer up distinct sacrifices and oblations, till they were grown up to manhood, and married, as Cain seems to have been at the time, Gen. iv. 17, which might have been when they were both upwards of a hundred years of age; as may be collected from the birth of Seth, after Abel's murder, in the 230th year of Adam. See Vol. I. p. 280.

The season of offering these sacrifices and oblations was not "in process of time," as vaguely rendered, but "at the end of days," or "the end of the year;" as the original was shewn to denote: Vol. I. p. 35, namely, at the beginning of *spring, when "the firstlings of the flocks," and the "first fruits of the harvest," were ready to be offered unto the Lord; the former as a sacrifice of atonement, the latter as an oblation of thanksgiving. And the whole of this short, but most difficult passage, may thus be rendered, supplying elliptical expressions.

30, Job ii. 10, &c. So the Arabic version renders it; and the Targum of "Onkelos." מן קדם, "from before THE LORD."

* It is so understood by the Targum of Jonathan, who renders the passage: "And it came to pass, at the end of days, on the fourteenth of Nisan, Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, flax seed, an oblation of the first fruits," &c.

“And it came to pass, at the end of the year, Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, an oblation unto the LORD; and Abel brought [an oblation:] he also [brought] of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof, [a sin offering.] And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his oblation; but unto Cain and to his oblation, he had not respect,” Gen. iv. 3, 4.

If we may be allowed to reason from the analogy of the Levitical law, founded on patriarchal usage, the original term, מִנְחָה, Minhah, or “oblation” of the first fruits, denoted “green ears of corn dried by the fire, or corn beaten out of full ears,” Levit. ii. 14, (where it is rather improperly rendered, “meat offering,” instead of “bread offering.”) It was contrasted with זֶבַח, Zabah, “the animal sacrifice,” Psalm xlix. 7, or חַטָּאת, Hatah, “the sin offering,” Ezek. xlv. 29. And both the oblation of the first fruits, and the sacrifice of a lamb, were required at the yearly sacrifice of the passover, Levit. xxiii. 10—13. And also in the daily sacrifice, under the service of the Tabernacle, in the wilderness, Exod. xxix. 38—42; of the first temple, 2 Kings xvi. 15; and of the second temple, Ezra iii. 3, Nehem. x. 33, which subsisted till “the daily sacrifice was abrogated*,” Dan. ix. 27; by “CHRIST, our passover, who was sacrificed for us,” “once for all,” 1 Cor. v. 7. (εφαπαύξ,) Heb. ix. 26.

The sacrifice of Cain, therefore, was imperfect or incomplete; he brought indeed an oblation of his first fruits, as an offering of thanksgiving for God’s temporal bounties, Deut. xxvi. 2—11; he was not, therefore, devoid of religious sentiment: but he did not bring an animal sacrifice, or a sin offering; either, because he did not count himself a sinner, and so had no need of it; or because he wanted faith, and disbelieved the use and efficacy of this instituted mode of atonement; or perhaps upon both accounts conjointly. Whereas Abel, not only brought a Minhah, (as expressly asserted in the latter clause, and therefore to be understood in the former) in token of thanksgiving; but also, “by faith,” a sin offering also, confessing himself a sinner; which, therefore, St. Paul styles, πλειονα θυσιαν, “a fuller sacrifice*,” or more complete and “excellent,” than Cain’s; and speaks of it in the plural number, δωροισ, “gifts,” Heb. xi. 4.

When it is said that “the Lord had respect unto Abel and his oblation,” it was, because it was accompanied by the sin offering; whereas “unto Cain and his oblation, He had not respect,” because it was defective in the form, and rebellious in the spirit, with which it was offered. This was “the error of Cain,” Jude 11;—a renunciation of “the benefits of the instituted mode of atonement for sin;” and a “going about to establish his own righteousness,” like the self-sufficient Jews, Rom. x. 3 †. The visible token of the divine approbation of Abel’s offering, was probably fire from heaven, or from the Shechinah or divine presence, before which the offerings were probably made. Such was the token of acceptance of the sacrifice of Moses and Aaron, Levit. ix. 24; of Gideon, Judg. vi. 22; of Manoah, Judg. xiii. 20; of David, 1 Chron. xxi. 16; of Solomon, 2 Chron. vii. 1; of Elijah, 1 Kings xviii. 38. And accordingly, Theodotion’s version, in this case, expresses the verb ἤψ, respexit, by ενεπυρρισεν, inflammavit, “The Lord set fire to the offering of Abel,” &c.

* Wickliffe, in his translation of Heb. xi. 4, renders,—“By faith Abel offridd a much more sacrifice than Cayn to God, &c.” which, in the Geneva Bible, was altered to, “a greater sacrifice;” as less uncouth, and in the last, to “more excellent.”

† This interpretation was first given by Doctor Kennicott, in his second Dissertation on the Oblations of Cain and Abel; and has been generally approved, as the best that has been offered. Dr. Magee, however, has produced good reasons to prove, that Kennicott’s interpretation is untenable.

1. The particle וְ, Gam, “also,” Gen. iv. 4, refers rather to Abel himself, as contrasted with Cain, than to his sacrifice.

2. מנחה, Mincha, properly signifies any gift, or offering to a superior; as in Gen. xxxii. 20, xliii. 11—15; and if made to God, includes both the bread, or flour offering, and the animal sacrifice; as in Judges vi. 18, 1 Sam. ii. 17, 1 Kings xviii. 29, &c. But in the Levitical law, it is usually applied to the animal sacrifice; as the principal offering.

3. In the account of Abel’s sacrifice, Heb. xi. 4, the term πλειονα is not confined to number, according to Kennicott’s hypothesis; it sometimes denotes excellence; as in Matt. vi. 25, “Is not the soul [or life] more (πλειον) than meat?” And again, xii. 41, “Lo a greater (πλειον) than Jonah is here.” The expression therefore denotes a “fuller sacrifice,” partaking more fully and essentially of the true nature and virtue of sacrifice. Magee, vol. ii. p. 213—223.

We readily concur with Dr. Magee so far; but, admitting Kennicott’s interpretation to be novel and fanciful, yet it does not seem to follow, that it is either “dangerous” in its consequences, or “inconsistent with his principles;” since it ascribes the whole efficacy of Abel’s sacrifice, to the animal victim, or prescribed mode of atonement, which was neglected by Cain.

This marked preference of his brother's offering, excited the resentment and the envy of Cain. "And he was very wroth, and his countenance fell." And the Lord condescended to reason with Cain, probably from the Shechinah, and said unto him, "Why art thou wroth, and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou doest not well, a sin offering * lieth (coumeth) at the door; [in readiness to be sacrificed.] Or, it may be rendered, "If thou didst well, shouldst thou not have been accepted? [like Abel ;] but if thou didst not well, a sin offering lieth at the door, [in readiness to be sacrificed, as an atonement for thy offence.] And to remove Cain's jealousy, lest his brother might aspire to pre-eminence, the Lord states Abel's humility, and submissive disposition: "And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him," [as the elder brother †.]

But this did not avail. When they departed from the presence of the Lord, or the place of public worship, at the east of the garden of Eden, "Cain said unto Abel his brother, [Let us go into the field:] and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him."

This parenthetical clause, is expressly required by the context; and seems to have been dropt by accident, out of the present Masorete Hebrew text. It is preserved in the Samaritan

* Here, the original חַטָּאת, Hatath, rendered "sin" in our translation, may more correctly be rendered a sin offering, as in several passages, Levit. iv. 21—29, vi. 25, Numb. vi. 14, 15, Ezra vi. 17, Ezek. xlv. 29, &c. And so the Septuagint rendering ἁμαρτία; "GOD made him (CHRIST,) who knew no sin, to be a sin offering, for our sakes; that we might become GOD's righteousness in Him," 2 Cor. v. 21. Compare 1 Pet. ii. 22, 1 John ii. 2, iii. 5.

† Dr. Magee ably paraphrases the whole passage thus: "Of Cain, who was filled with rage, at the preference given to his brother Abel, by the acceptance of his sacrifice, while his own was rejected; JEHOVAH demands the reason of his anger? "If thou doest well," says He, "shalt thou not be accepted?" (or rather, as the margin of our Bible reads, Shalt thou not have the excellency, or exaltation above thy brethren, which thou conceivest to be thy birth-right?) "And if thou doest not well, [is there not] a sin offering, lying at thy very door, to make the due reconciliation, and restore thee to the station which thou hast lost by thy misconduct? And thus in every way, [or in either case] it depends upon thyself, that he (thy brother) may become subject unto thee, and that thou mayest have the dominion over him." And this explanation is supported by Theodotion's version, as he observes. Vol. ii. p. 238—249.

Perhaps the transgression of Cain is recorded in Scripture, among other reasons, to account for the transfer of the seniority, or right of primogeniture, and so the parentage of the Messiah, from Cain's, into Seth's younger line: which was absolutely necessary to be known in the history of our Lord's genealogy. See Kennicott, Diss. II, p. 211.

text, and translated by the Greek Sept. the Latin Vulgate, and the Syriac Versions ; and therefore ought to be restored.

And now, as before in the case of Adam's transgression, the Lord took immediate cognizance of Cain's ; who, according to Josephus, interred the body, to hide his crime.

“ And THE LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother ? And he said, I know not ; am I my brother's keeper ?” And HE said, “ What hast thou done ? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.”

“ And now cursed art thou from the earth which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. When thou tillest the ground it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength. A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.”

For this complication of crimes, envy, which led him to murder his brother, and then to attempt to hide it by a lie, and an insolent rebellious answer to GOD ; Cain is styled in the New Testament, “ a child of the Devil,” 1 John iii. 12 ; as imitating his works, who through envy seduced our first parents, and was “ a liar and a murderer from the beginning,” John viii. 44 ; and therefore Cain became the first of “ his wicked seed,” Gen. iii. 15, and like him, inherited a positive “ curse,” of banishment from the Divine presence, and his father's family, in its neighbourhood ; which he was no longer worthy to enjoy, for his premeditated crimes against both ; and of additional barrenness of the soil, in the land of his exile.

“ And Cain said unto the Lord, My punishment is greater than I can bear, [or rather, my iniquity is greater than to be forgiven *.] Behold thou hast driven me out this day from the face of this land ; and from thy face [or presence] shall I be hid : and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth ; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.”

By the usual progress of guilt, Cain adds to his former sins that of despair, for he does not attempt to supplicate mercy from God : and terror, lest he should find no mercy from man. His apprehension of being slain, in retaliation for the death of his brother, by “every one that should find him,” proves that Adam must have had several other children at the time, and then grown up to manhood: and furnishes a powerful confirmation of the longer antediluvian chronology of the Septuagint, and Josephus, adopted in this work.

“And the Lord said unto him, Not so *: whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him seven fold. And the Lord gave to Cain a sign †, that no one finding him should kill him. And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, eastward of Eden.”

The law against murder was not enacted until after the deluge; when it was given to Noah and his family, Gen. ix. 6; and afterwards renewed to the Israelites, Exod. xx. 13, &c. Cain's life, therefore, was spared, as not having been forfeited by a positive law. What the sign was, which God gave him of his security from man, it is impossible to guess. The land of Nod, or “exile,” to which Cain retired with his wife, is generally reckoned by the Oriental Geographers, to have been the low country of Susiana, or Chusistan.

The sacred historian proceeds to relate, concisely, the descendants of Cain for seven generations, but without specifying their ages. His design seems to have been to record the earlier progress of Cain's line, in the arts of luxury, vice, and refinements of society. Cain built a city, called Enoch, after his son; and Lamech, the sixth in descent, is the first on record for polygamy and homicide.

“And Lamech said unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, Hear my voice ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech: I have slain a man for ‡ my wounding, and a young man for ‡ my hurt. If Cain shall be avenged seven fold; truly Lamech, seventy and seven fold.”

Lamech here apologises for killing a man who had wounded, and a young man who had hurt him; adding, that if Cain

* Instead of לָכֵן (lachen), “therefore,” the Sept. Vulg. Syriac, Arab. read לֹא כֵן (lo-chen), “not so,” which is more agreeable to the context.

† Thus the Lord gave to Noah a sign or token, in the rainbow, Gen. ix. 12, 13; to the Jews a sign, “the Virgin shall conceive and bear a son,” Isa. vii. 14.

‡ The preposition לְ, frequently signifies “for,” “on account of,” and is so rendered Numb. vi. 7, Deut. xiv. 1, 1 Kings xxii. 48, Isa. x. 3, Psalm lxxxiv. 2, Job xxx. 25, &c. See Noldius, Concord. ad לְ, No. 28. Junius and Tremellius correctly render, propter vulnus meum,—propter livorem meum.

should be avenged on any one who slew him, seven fold, for the heavier crime of unprovoked murder; surely Lamech, seventy and seven fold, for the smaller, of homicide in his own defence.

The conduct of Lamech was that of the age in which he lived; which was remarkable for lust and violence, Gen. vi. 1—4. and thus began in the family of Cain.

SETH.

He was born about a year after the murder of Abel, according to some Jewish writers; about A. M. 230, and might have been one of the youngest sons of Adam. Eve called his name Seth, (“appointed;)” because GOD had appointed her another seed, instead of “Abel whom Cain slew.” Abel probably died without children; as only those of Seth are noticed in the sequel. “Adam begat Seth in his own likeness, after his image;” who became the head of that righteous family, called “Sons of God,” Gen. v. 3. vi. 2. Seth is reported by the Arabian historians to have invented writing.

ENOS.

He was one of the sons of Seth. In his time the righteous Sethites “began to call themselves by the name of the Lord*;” or “Sons of God;” to distinguish themselves from those that neglected the fear and worship of the Lord, called “children of men,” Gen. vi. 2. And to this distinction the prophet Malachi perhaps alludes: “Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard: and a book of remembrance was written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked: between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not.” Compare Rev. xx. 12, Deut. xiv. 2, Matt. xxv. 32—46. Hence also, the distinction in the New Testament, between “the children of God, and the children of the Devil,” 1 John iii. 8—11.

* This is the marginal rendering of our Bible, and preferable to that in the text, Gen. iv. 26. The same phrase occurs, Isa. xlv. 5, xlvi. 1.

Enos, whose name signifies “man,” is reckoned by the Arabian historians to have been a great philosopher and astronomer. Elmacin adds, that he expressly forbade the intermixture of his family with the Cainites: which corresponds with the foregoing account.

CAINAN

Was the son of Enos. His name signifies “possessor.” According to the Arabian historians, by his wisdom he foresaw that the blessed God would bring a flood upon the earth: the prophecy of which he wrote upon tables of stone. See Vol. I. p. 293.

MAHALALEEL

Was the son of Cainan. His name signifies “He that praises God.” The Arabian historians assert that he made his children swear by the blood of Abel, that they would never descend from the mountains where they dwelt, to associate with the Cainites.

JARED

Was the son of Mahalaleel. His name signifies “He that descends.” It was perhaps descriptive of the descent of the Sethites; of whom a hundred, in his days, notwithstanding his remonstrances, went and associated with the female Cainites; according to the Arabian historians. This inauspicious connexion, which laid the foundation of the ensuing corruptions, began in the 1070th year of the world, in the days of Jared; according to the apocryphal book of Enoch; and consequently, in Jared's 110th year, which furnishes a confirmation of the present system of chronology. See Vol. I. p. 280.

ENOCK.

The name of this distinguished patriarch, the son of Jared, signifies “dedicated,” as he was to GOD; probably before his birth, like Samuel. He is celebrated in early and extensive traditions, for his proficiency in astronomy, mathematics, and other sciences; (see Vol. I. p. 280) and is called Edris by the Arabian historians, from his great knowledge; and is honourably noticed in the Coran, as “a just person and a prophet,” chapter xix. He is more gloriously distinguished in Scripture, for his faith, and his progressive improvement in piety, intimated twice, by the phrase, “he walked with God ;” and as a preacher of “repentance” to a corrupt world. And because “he pleased God, he was not found” [any longer upon earth,] for “God took him away,” [at the early age of 365 years,] “and translated him that he should not see death” to the celestial Paradise. Compare Gen. v. 22—24, Heb. xi. 5, Eccclus. xlv. 16, xlix. 14, Luke xxiii. 43.

It is highly probable, that some visible or sensible demonstration of the translation of Enoch was given to his contemporaries ; as afterwards in the case of Elijah *. “And as the fate of Abel was an argument addressed to the reason of mankind, so the translation of Enoch was a proof to their senses, as it were, of another state of life.” Peters on Job, p. 272.

Enoch was also a distinguished prophet : he foretold the general judgment, in a precious fragment of antediluvian history, preserved by the apostle Jude.

“And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied against them, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads, to execute judgment upon all, and to convict all the ungodly among them of their impious works which they have impiously committed, and of all the hard [sayings] which impious sinners have spoken against Him,” ver. 14, 15 †.

Those against whom Enoch prophesied, are evidently the sinners described in the preceding part of the Epistle, against whom

* Milton so represents :

————— “Him, THE MOST HIGH
 Wrapt in a balmy cloud with winged steeds, ————— received to walk with God,
 High in salvation and the climes of bliss, Exempt from death.”————— P. L. B. xi.

† We learn from Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, that this prophecy, ascribed to Enoch, is to be found, word for word, in the second chapter of the apocryphal book of Enoch. Travels, 8vo. Edit. Vol. II. p. 422, 423. Hence, some object to the truth of the prophecy itself, because the book, in which it is found, is spurious ; and conclude that Jude only cited it, as an argumentum ad hominem, as deemed to be Enoch's, by those to whom the Apostle wrote, without vouching for its veracity ; in the same way as he cited an ancient tradition, ver. 9, respecting Michael the archangel contending with the devil, &c. See Poole's Synopsis. But surely the prophecy might be true, though found in an apocryphal book, and yet the rest of the book be spurious. Its complete fulfilment at the deluge is evidence of its truth ; and this gives more weight to the Apostle's argument than the other supposition.

“woe” is denounced: 1. “They who walked in the way of Cain ;” and their successors, “in the error of Balaam,” and “in the gainsaying of Korah,” ver. 11. 2. “The Angels *, [“Sons of God,” or pious Sethites,] who kept not their own principality, (την ἑαυτῶν ἀρχήν,) but left their proper habitation, (το ἰδίον οἰκητήριον,) [“to take wives of the daughters of men,” or apostate Cainites, Gen. vi. 2:] whom HE hath kept in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day, ver. 6.

That these are the angels meant by the apostle, in this very obscure passage (not the fallen angels, or outcasts from heaven, as generally imagined,) is evident from the ensuing illustration of their peculiar crime: “Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example; suffering the vengeance of eternal fire,” ver. 7.

And the degeneracy of the Sethites, in the age of Enoch, is remarked by Josephus:

“They continued, indeed, for seven generations, holding GOD the governor of the universe, and in all respects, attending to virtue. But in the course of time, they changed, for the worse, from their primitive institutions, no longer paying legitimate honours to God, nor regarding justice to men. They even manifested in their deeds, double the zeal for vice, that they formerly had for virtue. Hence they rendered God their adversary.” Ant. I. 3, 1.

From these impure and promiscuous connexions of the Sethites with the Cainites, there sprang a race of “giants, mighty men of old, men of renown,” for their strength, and violence, and rapacity. Gen. vi. 4.

We learn from profane history, preserved in a curious fragment of Berosus, the Chaldean historian, that an empire was erected in Chaldea or Babylonia, in violation of the primitive patriarchal government, which subsisted, under a dynasty of ten elective kings, till the Deluge; and began with Alorus, the first prince, about B.C. 4355, or the 96th year of Jared, and 69 years before the birth of Enoch. See an account of this dynasty, in the ensuing Analysis of Assyrian and Chaldean Chronology, Vol. IV.

* “The Sons of God,” or pious Sethites, Gen. vi. 2, are rendered, “The Angels of God,” by the Alexandrine Greek Version; and also by Josephus, Ant. i. 3, 1. Although the latter misapplies it to the Spiritual Angels; and is followed by several early Jewish and Christian writers, Philo, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Lactantius, &c.

It is not to be imagined, that a prophet so highly favoured as Enoch, with the remotest views of the Divine economy, could be ignorant of the impending Deluge; and through him, perhaps, was communicated to the world that obscure prophecy which immediately follows the account of the defection of the Sethites, Gen. vi. 3.

“And the Lord said, My Spirit shall not always [or any longer] strive [or plead] with mankind, because they are flesh; [and walk according to the flesh, not according to the Spirit, Rom. viii. 1—8; Jude 19.] Nevertheless, their days shall be 120 years.”

The former part of this prophecy is generally understood to denote, that the Spirit of Christ, which was in his prophets, Enoch, &c. would make no further efforts to reclaim an incorrigible world, but would exercise his just vengeance upon them;—as God afterwards “gave his good Spirit to instruct the Israelites”—and “testified against them, by his Spirit, in his Prophets,” Nehem. ix. 20—30.

Instead of the verb יָרִן, (Iadun) “shall strive;” the ancient versions, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, Syriac, and Chaldee Paraphrast, appear to have read יָרַר (Iadur) “shall dwell, or remain:” for they render it, “My spirit shall not always dwell, or remain among men.” As implying a threat, that the Shechinah, or visible presence of the Lord, which had resided hitherto among the Sethites, should henceforth be withdrawn from a guilty world. And this interpretation is supported by the primitive tradition, preserved by the mythological poet, Ovid, that in consequence of the impiety and violence of the old world, the goddess Astræa, or Justice, at last, quitted the earth, and flew away to heaven, where she holds the balance of justice, among the constellations of the zodiac.

Victa jacet pieias, et virgo cæde madentes

Ultima Cælestum terras Astræa reliquit. Met. I. 149.

This departure of the Shechinah, might perhaps have taken place at the translation of Enoch, “of whom the world was not worthy,” after they had despised his admonitions and warnings; and perhaps sought his life; as afterwards, in the similar case of Elijah.

The limited term of 120 years, in the latter part, is also generally understood to denote that last respite for repentance, granted to the world in the days of Noah, "when the long suffering of God waited while the ark was preparing; wherein he and his family were saved in the general deluge," 1 Pet. iii. 20.

Enoch is generally thought to have alluded to the destruction of the old world, by the deluge, in the name of his son,

METHUSELAH,

Signifying, "His death shall send" [the deluge]. And, accordingly, Methuselah, who lived the longest of any of the Patriarchs, God adding to the son, what he had subtracted from the father, died in the very year of the deluge, shortly before it, of which, therefore, he was the immediate harbinger. The son of Methuselah was Signifying, "Poor." A remarkable prophecy of his is recorded at the naming of his son Noah, signifying "consolation," which was fulfilled after the deluge; "He shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed," Gen. v. 29.

LAMECH,

NOAH.

By the usual progress of impiety and vice, in the tenth generation, the iniquity of the old world came to the full, and "all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth," save Noah; who "found grace in the eyes of the Lord, because he was a just man, perfect in his generation, and walked with God," like his immortal ancestor, Enoch.

"And GOD said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them: and behold I will destroy them with the earth.—Make thee an ark of gopher wood, &c.—for behold I, even I, am going to bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant: And thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee," &c. Gen. vi.

From the extraordinary dimensions of the ark, which was by far the greatest vessel that ever was built, (see the description of it, Vol. I. p. 323,) it should seem, that 120 years was a moderate time to be employed in its construction. And if so, Noah began it in his 480th year; while he was childless; a striking proof of his implicit faith, both in the divine threatenings and promises: for his eldest son, Japheth, Gen. x. 21, was not born till twenty years after, in the 500th year of his age, Gen. v. 32; and the second, Shem, two years after, Gen. xi. 10. Such is the apostle Paul's description:—"By faith, Noah, having been instructed by the divine oracle, concerning things not yet seen, [the ensuing deluge, &c.] moved with fear, prepared an ark for the saving of his house," [or future family,] Heb. xi. 7.

During the time while the ark was building, Noah, as "a preacher of righteousness," like Enoch before him, warned the world of their impending danger, during this gracious season of respite, but in vain; and their punishment is recorded by the apostle Peter, in terms strongly resembling the prophecy of Enoch, preserved by Jude, and explanatory thereof:

"CHRIST went also (in the spirit) to the spirits in prison, and preached to them who were disobedient formerly, when the long suffering of God once waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing; wherein a few [that is eight] souls were saved [in the midst of the water] by means of water," 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20.

"GOD spared not the offending angels, but cast them into Tartarus, (ταρταρωσας) and reserved them, kept in chains of darkness, unto judgment: And he spared not the old world, but preserved Noah the eighth [of his family,] a preacher of righteousness, bringing the flood upon the world of the ungodly, 2 Pet. ii. 4, 5.

Here, the "disobedient spirits in prison," the "offending angels in Tartarus," evidently correspond to Jude's "angels who kept not their own principality," who were shewn to denote "the Sons of God," or offending Sethites: they are all equally reserved, in chains of darkness, to the judgment of the great day.—Tartarus, a term borrowed from the Heathen mythology, denotes that part of hades, (or "the invisible world," and general receptacle of departed spirits, good and bad,) in which the bad are confined: called by the Latins, Orcus, (from ἔρκος, "a fence,") because it is separated by "a great impassable gulf;" Luke xvi. 26, from that other part of hades, called in Scripture, Paradise, Luke xxiii. 43; and by the Heathens, Elysium, which is set apart for the abode of the spirits of just men, until "the resurrection of the just," Luke xiv. 14, and the general resurrection, Rev. xx. 6. To this, Enoch, Moses, and Elijah, are supposed to be translated; Abraham, the father of the faithful, and his sons, to reside there, Luke xvi. 22; and this OUR LORD visited, immediately after his crucifixion, Luke xxiii. 43.

The careless security of the old world, and the unexpected suddenness of their catastrophe by the deluge, are circumstantially described by OUR LORD; and set forth as an awful warning to future generations in the latter "days of vengeance," upon apostate Christendom, foretold to precede his next triumphant coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, to establish the kingdom of God upon earth; of which he laid the foundation, at his first coming in humiliation: and those days, if we attend to the disastrous signs of the times, have perhaps already commenced.

"But as the days of Noah, so shall also the coming of THE SON OF MAN be. For as in the days before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark; and knew not, until the flood came and took them all away, [or destroyed them all:] so shall also the coming of THE SON OF MAN be*, Matt. xxiv. 37—39, Luke xvii. 26—30.

"By his exemplary faith, Noah condemned the world," rendering their infidelity more inexcusable by the contrast, Heb. xi. 7. And we may be assured, that while he was employed in building the ark, he underwent much ridicule and reproach from the scoffers of his day, for his folly, as they might represent it,

* The alarming analogy between the rebels of the old world, who despised the preaching of Noah, and the rebels of the new, who despise the preaching of CHRIST and his Apostles and Ministers, throughout the Gospel dispensation, is well and concisely expressed in Poole's Synopsis on 1 Pet. iii. 19.

"Rebellibus tempore Noe, ob spretam prædicationem Noe diluvio absorptis, respondent rebelles toto hoc tempore quo prædicatur evangelium, quos diluvium iræ Divinæ obruit et perdit. Contra, paucis illis in aqua servatis, respondent fideles, qui præ incredulis sunt pauci, servandi per mortem et resurrectionem CHRISTI. Ex hoc loco colligitur, CHRISTUM fuisse tempore Noe, quia tunc prædicasse dicitur."

in preparing such a great vessel, in an inland situation, at such a distance from the sea!

And now at length, when the ark was finished, and Noah, his family, and all the various species of animals destined to be preserved, had entered, by a divine impulse, into the ark, in the space of seven days, and that "the Lord had shut them all in;" immediately after, the miraculous and stupendous process of the deluge began, on the seventeenth day of the second month, or about the middle of the spring quarter, at an unusual season of the year: in the same day, were all the fountains of the great abyss [of subterraneous waters,] broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, [to discharge the atmospheric waters.] The rains continued, without intermission, for forty entire days, and the eruptions of subterraneous waters, for 150 days, or five months, until at length the inundation came to its height, and covered all the high hills which were under the whole heaven, fifteen cubits upward, above the highest. And on the seventeenth day of the seventh month, the ark, which had been borne aloft by the waters, rested, or grounded on the highest summit of the mountains of Ararat, in eastern Armenia. And from thence, the waters decreased continually till the first day of the tenth month, when the tops of the neighbouring mountains were seen; and at length, by the further recess of the waters, into their subterraneous reservoirs, which was more gradual than their rise, the face of the ground, or surface of the low lands became dry, on the seven and twentieth day of the second month; when Noah and all the souls with him in the ark, went forth, after a confinement therein of a year and ten days. See the circumstances of the Deluge, and the site of mount Ararat, more fully explained, Vol. I. p. 322, 332.

The first act of the pious Noah, after his deliverance was, to build an altar unto the Lord, and offer burnt-offerings of every clean beast and of every clean fowl upon the altar, as a sacrifice of thanksgiving. And THE LORD smelled a sweet savour, or was pleased with his offering; and promised, 1. that He would not again curse the ground any more for man's sake, [or transgression,] even though the imagination of man's heart should* be evil from his youth, or mankind become corrupt again, as before the deluge, Gen. vi. 5; neither, 2. again smite any more every living creature by a deluge; but that, 3. while the earth remained, the regular vicissitudes of the seasons of the year, and of day and night, should continue; or seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, should not cease. And moreover, 4. He renewed to Noah and his family, the temporal blessings granted to Adam at the creation; for He blessed them, and said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth; and invested them with dominion over all the animal tribes, beasts, and birds, and fishes. 5. He also gave the additional grant of animal food, of eating flesh meat, even as the green herb, and 6, to prevent violence, He enacted the salutary law against murder; and to crown all, 7. in reward of his exemplary faith, Noah was entitled to the spiritual blessings of the first covenant in Paradise, and “was made heir of the righteousness which is by faith,” in the Redeemer, CHRIST, Heb. xi. 7.

“Tell me now,” says Bishop Sherlock, “what is there bestowed in the first blessings, that is wanting in the second? What more did Adam enjoy in his happiest days, what more did he forfeit in his worst, with respect to this life, [and also to the next,] than what is contained in these blessings? If he neither had more, nor lost more, all those blessings you see expressly restored to Noah and his posterity. And can you still believe that a curse upon the earth remains? A blessing is once more pronounced on the earth, and a covenant of temporal [and also of spiritual] prosperity confirmed to Noah; and by him to all mankind: making good the prophecy of his father at the time of his birth; This same shall comfort us,” &c. Sherlock on Prophecy, Disc. IV. p. 104.

On this occasion, the *rainbow, which must have existed from the beginning, in consequence of the immutable laws of “the refraction and reflection of the sun’s rays in drops of falling rain;” See Newton’s Optics, p. 147, was appointed for a sign or token of the ratification of this gracious covenant with

* The description of the rainbow by the Son of Sirach, is eminently beautiful: “Look upon the rainbow, and praise Him that made it, very beautiful it is in the brightness thereof: it compasseth the heavens with a glorious circle, and the hands of the Most High have bended it,” Eclus. xliii. 11. Homer calls it τερας μεροπων ανδρωπων, “a wondrous sign to mankind.”

Noah and his posterity. Hence it is called "the faithful witness in heaven," in the sublime hymn of Ethan, Psalm lxxxix. 37; and by a beautiful imagery, "the mighty angel" of mercy, in the Apocalypse, the representative of our Lord and Saviour JESUS CHRIST, "had a rainbow upon his head;" Rev. x. 1; and "the throne of grace was surrounded by a glorious rainbow, in appearance like an emerald," Rev. iv. 3. It is, indeed, no more necessary to suppose that the rainbow was now created, for this purpose, than the symbols of bread and wine, for the institution of the Lord's Supper *.

The residence of Noah and his family, is supposed to have been in the delightful plain at the foot of Mount Ararat, near Erivan and the three Churches, according to the tradition of the Armenians; which is still famous for its vines, according to Tournefort. See the foregoing volume, p. 335.

Here the venerable Patriarch lived an agricultural life, for 350 years after the deluge, Gen. ix. 29. An eminent proof that the diminution of the standard of human life after the deluge, first to 600 years, in the case of Shem, and by successive reductions, to 400 years, and 200 years until the days of Abraham, in the tenth generation, did not originate from any insalubrity of the air or waters, shortening life by natural causes, but from the sole will and pleasure of GOD. Had such causes existed, they must have operated most powerfully in the times nearest to the deluge, contrary to the fact.

The famous prophecy of Noah †, concisely foretelling the fortunes of the families of his sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, could not have been delivered until after the birth of Canaan, the youngest of the four sons of the undutiful Ham; "Cursed be [Canaan,] &c. Gen. ix. 22—25, and probably not long before his death, when such solemn blessings and cursings upon obedient and disobedient children, were usually pronounced, as in the case of Jacob, &c. Gen. xlix. 1.

At the same time also, was probably delivered the general

* In the original passage, Gen. ix. 13—16, the verb נָתַתִּי, being in the perfect tense, ought to be rendered, "I have set, or given my bow in the cloud," &c. as a former effect, now appointed for an outward sign, &c. and not in the present tense, with our English Bible, "I do set my bow in the cloud," &c. nor in the future, with Maslef and others, "I will set my bow in the cloud," &c. as if the first appearance of the bow had been after the deluge.

SHEM.

The chronology of this second period is carried on by the sacred historian, in the line of Shem (signifying "name" or "renown"), the ancestor of Abraham, of David, and of CHRIST. His genealogy therefore is given entire, while the descendants of Japheth and Ham are only brought down as low as the confusion of tongues, and the subsequent dispersion, in order to transmit to posterity the names of the first founders of nations, and there to dismiss them. Thus, only the sons and the grandsons of Japheth are recorded, "by whom the isles of the Gentiles," or the maritime regions of Europe, were colonized, "each after their tongue and their families in their nations," Gen. x. 2—5; and likewise the sons and grandsons of Ham, with the exception of Cush, the eldest son, whose genealogy is carried down, through Raamah and Sheba, to his great-grandson, Nimrod, the remarkable founder of the first empire after the deluge, in the land of Shinar or Babylonia. And for the same reason, Joktan, the brother of Peleg, the contemporary of Nimrod, is recorded, with his thirteen sons, because they gave names to so many districts in Arabia, colonized by them, and inhabited by their descendants. And this is stated in the conclusion of the chapter: "These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations; and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood." Gen. x. 32. See the explanation of this chapter, Vol. I. p. 352.

ARPHAXAD.

He was the eldest son of Shem, born two years after the deluge, Gen. xi. 10, though ranked the fourth among the sons of Shem, Gen. x. 22. His name signifies, "He that heals, or releases," probably in allusion to the deliverance of Noah's family from the deluge. His lot appears to have been the plain of Shinar, in the southern part of Mesopotamia, stretching westward of the river Tigris, together with the country of Eden, and the tract on the east side of the same river, called Arrapachitis, in Assyria; evidently derived from אַרְפַּכְשָׁד, Arpachshad, his name in Hebrew. And Josephus relates, that the Chaldeans, who occupied a part of the land of Shinar, were originally called Arphaxadecans, from him. He lived 438 years. With him began the second reduction of the standard of human life; the first having begun with his father, Shem, who lived 600 years; whereas Noah lived 950 years.

SALAH.

His name signifies "He sends," and was probably given him by Arphaxad his father, in allusion to the deluge, as in Job v. 10. "He sendeth waters upon the face of the fields." A town near Susa, called Sala or Sela, is supposed to be named from him. He lived 433 years.

EBER, OR HEBER,

Signifies "He that passes over." He is reckoned the father of the Hebrews, or of them who retained the pure Hebrew dialect, nearest to the primæval language, after the confusion of tongues, Gen. x. 21; Numb. xxiv. 24. Hence Abraham was called "the Hebrew," Gen. xiv. 13. And his descendants, by way of distinction from the rest of the children of Heber, called themselves by the double title, "Hebrew of the Hebrews;" so Eusebius called Moses, "That great theologian, a Hebrew of the Hebrews ;” and St. Paul called himself “ a Hebrew of the Hebrews,” Phil. iii. 5. He lived 464 years.

PELEG, OR PHALEG,

His elder son, whose name signified division, “because that in his days the earth was divided” among the three families of the sons of Noah, by the divine decree promulgated before by Noah. By the most probable account of Abulfaragi, the Armenian annalist, this division actually began to take place in the 140th year of Phaleg, B.C. 2614, or 541 years after the deluge, 191 years after the death of Noah, and 29 years after the death of Shem, when probably Japheth and Ham were dead also. This was a likely time for the three primitive families to begin to separate, when their original settlement became too scanty for their increased population. Abulfaragi, as living in Armenia, the immediate residence of Noah after the deluge, has, from the primitive tradition of his countrymen, preserved some valuable and authentic epochs for the adjustment of sacred chronology, in its early periods, no where else to be found. And we learn from St. Paul, that this division was not made at random, but that “ GOD made of one blood (namely, Noah’s,) every nation of men to dwell upon the whole face of the earth, having ordained the predetermined seasons and boundaries of their respective settlements,” Acts xvii. 26. See the foregoing account of these settlements, Vol. I. p. 352.—Of Peleg’s allotted settlement, a trace may perhaps remain in the town of Phalga, not far from the conflux of the river Chaboras with the Euphrates, where the town of Charran was seated. Bochart rather derives the name of the town from Phalga, signifying, in the Syriac dialect, “the middle,” because it was midway between the two Seleucias; the one city in Pieria, the other in Mesopotamia. Vol. I. p. 93. Peleg lived 239 years, and began the third reduction of the standard of human life.

REU, OR RAGAU,

His son, whose name signifies “his shepherd.” From him, perhaps, was denominated “the great plain in the borders of Ragau,” and “the mountains of Ragau,” in Media, Judith i. 5—17. He lived 239 years.

In the 70th year of Reu, (B.C. 2554,) according to Abulfaragi, p. 12, sixty years after the migration of the primitive families of Noah's sons, from their original settlement to Shinar, or Mesopotamia, they conspired to build the Tower of Babel; but their rebellious attempt was defeated by the confusion of tongues, and they were all scattered from thence upon the face of the earth. See Vol. I. p. 351.

The leader in this disastrous enterprise, which instead of renown, brought shame and confusion upon the perpetrators, was

NIMROD,

Signifying "the Rebel," by way of bad eminence. He is generally supposed to have been the immediate son of Cush, and the youngest, or sixth, from the Scriptural phrase, "Cush begat Nimrod," after the mention of his five sons, Gen. x. 8. But the phrase is used with considerable latitude, like father and son, in Scripture. Thus Moses warns the Israelites of their future apostacy, "When thou shalt beget children and children's children, and shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves," &c. Deut. iv. 25, where the phrase evidently extends to remote descendants. In David's pedigree, "Naashon begat Salmon, and Salmon begat Boaz," &c. Ruth iv. 20, 21, where there is a deficiency of four generations at least after the two latter. In Nimrod's pedigree, the chasm may be supplied by the insertion of the intermediate generations of Raamah and Sheba, thus :

- | | |
|------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. Ham | 1. Shem . |
| 2. Cush | 2. Arphaxad . |
| 3. Raamah | 3. Salah . |
| 4. Sheba | 4. Eber . |
| 5. Nimrod | 5. Peleg . |

Hence it appears that Nimrod was contemporary with Peleg, according to Abulfaragi, confirmed by the whole tenor of sacred and profane history. He is introduced incidentally by Moses, as the most famous of the sons or descendants of Cush. "For he began to be a mighty one in the earth: he was a mighty hunter before the Lord; even [proverbially,] as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord."

"And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech and Accad and Calneh, in the land of Shinar: out of that land he went forth [to invade] Assyria; and built Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Ninereh and Calah: the same is a great city," Gen. x. 8—12.

Though the main body of the Cushites was miraculously dispersed, and sent by Providence to their original destinations along the sea-coasts of Asia and Africa, yet Nimrod remained behind, and like "the giants and mighty men, men of renown, of the old world, who founded an empire in Babylonia," according to Berosus; Nimrod did the same, by usurping the property of the Arphaxadites in the land of Shinar; where "the beginning of his kingdom was Babel," or *Babylon, and other towns: and not satisfied with this, he next invaded Assur, or Assyria, east of the Tigris; where he built Ninereh, and several other towns.

The marginal reading of our English Bible, "He went out into Assyria," or to invade Assyria, is here adopted in preference to that in the text; "And out of that land went forth Ashur, and builded Ninereh," &c. for the reasons assigned, Vol. I. p. 451.

The meaning of the word Ninereh may lead us to his original name, Nin, signifying "a son," the most celebrated of the sons of Cush. That of Nimrod, or "Rebel," was probably a parody, or nickname, given him by the oppressed Shemites; of which we have several instances in Scripture. Thus Nahash, the brazen "serpent" in the wilderness, was called by Hezekiah, in contempt, Nehushtan, "a piece of brass," when he broke it in pieces, because it was perverted into an object of idolatrous worship by the Jews, 2 Kings xviii. 4.

Nimrod, that arch-rebel, who first subverted the patriarchal government, introduced also the Zabian idolatry, or worship of

* This also is confirmed by Heathen testimony.

1. Dorotheus, an old Phœnician poet, cited by Julius Firmicus, called "ancient Babylon, the city of the Tyrian (or Assyrian) Belus."

Ἀρχαία Βαβυλῶν Τυρίου Βηλοιο πόλισμα.

2. Eustathius, in his Commentary on the Periegesis of Dionysius, verse 1006, states, that "Babylon was built 1800 years before Queen Semiramis, who surrounded it entirely with a strong wall." But according to Herodotus, Semiramis lived five generations, or about 166 years before Nitocris, the last queen, who embellished it. She was probably the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, who flourished about B. C. 581, which would bring the time of Semiramis, to about B. C. 747: and the building of Babylon to B. C. 2547, or the seventh year of Nimrod's reign: which therefore seems to be rightly assigned in the preceding rectification; and furnishes a valuable coincidence of sacred and profane chronology, at so early a period, drawn from different and independent sources.

the heavenly host; and after his death, was deified by his subjects, and supposed to be translated into the constellation of Orion, attended by his hounds, Sirius and Canicula, and still pursuing his favourite game, the Great Bear; supposed also to be translated into Ursa Major, near the north pole; as admirably described by Homer, Iliad. xviii. 485.

Ἀρκτον θ', ἣν και ἀμαξαν επικλησιν καλεουσιν,
'Η τ' αὐτου στρεφεται, και τ' Ὠριωνα δοκενει.

“And the Bear, surnamed also the Wain, [by the Egyptians,] who is turning herself* about there, and watching Orion.”

Homer also introduces the shade of Orion, as hunting in the Elysian fields, Odyss. xi. 571.

Τον δε μετ' Ὠριωνα πελωριον εισενοησα,
Θηρας ὄμιον ειλευντα κατ' ασφοδελον λειμωνα,
Τους αὐτος κατεπεφνεν εν οιοπολοισιν ορεσσιν·
Χερσιν εχων ροπαλον παγχαλκειον αιεν ααγεε.

“Next, I observed the mighty Orion,
Chasing wild-beasts through an Asphodel mead,
Which himself had slain on the solitary mountains:
Holding in his hands, a solid brazen mace, ever unbroken.”

The Grecian name of this “mighty hunter,” may furnish a satisfactory clue to the name given him by the impious adulation of the Babylonians and Assyrians. Ωριων, nearly resembles Ουριαν, the oblique case of Ουριας, which is the Septuagint rendering of Uriah, a proper name in Scripture; as in 2 Sam. xi. 6—21. But Uriah, signifying “the light of the Lord,” was an appropriate appellation of that most brilliant constellation.

He was also called Baal, Beel, Bel, or Belus, signifying “Lord,” or “Master,” by the Phœnicians, Assyrians, and Greeks, and Bala Rama, by the Hindus; or Bala, the son of Rama, who was evidently the Raamah of Scripture; confirming the foregoing rectification of his genealogy. At a village, called Bala deva, or Baldeo, in the vulgar dialect, 13 miles east by south from Muttra, in Hindustan, there is “a very ancient statue of Bala Rama, in which he is represented with a ploughshare in his left hand, and a thick cudgel in his right, and his shoulders covered with the skin of a tiger.” Asiat. Research. Vol. V. p. 294. Captain Wilford supposes, that “the plough- share was designed to hook his enemies;" but may it not more naturally denote the constellation of the Great Bear? which strikingly represents the figure of a plough, in its seven bright stars; and was probably so denominated by the earliest astronomers, before the introduction of the Zabian idolatry, as a celestial symbol of agriculture. The "thick cudgel" corresponds to the "brazen mace" of Homer. And it is highly probable, that the Assyrian Nimrod, or Hindu Bala, was also the prototype of the Grecian Hercules, with his club and lion's skin.

* Homer thus poetically expresses the diurnal rotation of this constellation around the north pole. It is remarkable, that both Homer and Job, represent the Bear as feminine.

According to the foregoing scheme, the migrations of the three primitive families, from the central regions of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, began about B. C. 2614, or 541 years after the deluge: and lasted, as Sir William Jones conjectures, about four centuries*; in the course of which, by successive colonizations, they established far distant communities, and various modes of society and government: the Phœnicians, Arabians, Egyptians, *Ethiopian*s, and Libyans, southwards; the Persians, *Ethiopian*s, Indians, and Chinese, eastwards; the Scythians, Celts, and Tartars, northwards; and the Goths, Greeks, and Latins; even as far as the Peruvians and Mexicans, of South America, and the Indian tribes of North America, westwards. All these various inhabitants of the globe, retain a striking affinity in the leading principles of their language, customs, and religions, however diversified, in process of time, from each other, by local circumstances: such affinity evincing their common descent from one and the same parent stock. See the Articles on the Division of the Earth, and the Varieties of Mankind, Vol. I. p. 350, 359.

And this period of four centuries, corresponds remarkably well with the most authentic documents of profane history, still subsisting, as to the establishment of the primitive nations in their respective settlements.

SERUG

Was the son of Reu. From him, Bochart conjectures, that the town of Sarug was named; which was near Charra, in Mesopotamia. Suidas and others ascribe to him the introduction of the idolatry of deifying the dead, as benefactors of mankind.

* See Asiat. Research. Vol. IV. p. 4; and his valuable discourses, on the three primitive families of Noah's sons, in the first four volumes.

And it is remarkable, that the arch-rebel Nimrod died in his days, about B. C. 2456. Serug lived 230 years.

NAHOR

Was his son. In his time, according to Euty chius, flourished Zorodasht, or the elder Zoroaster, the founder of the Zabian religion: and according to Abulfaragi, on the authority of Arudha, a Canaanitish historian, the trial of Job began in the twenty-fifth year of Nahor, or B. C. 2337. He lived only 148 years.

JOB.

Vir fortis cum malâ fortunâ compositus *.—Seneca.

This celebrated patriarch, has been represented by some sacred critics, as imaginary, and his book as a fictitious dramatic composition. But he was evidently considered as real, in the prophecy of Ezekiel, wherein Noah, Daniel, and Job are ranked together †, as powerful intercessors with God; the first for his

† The sceptical Michaelis, of more learning than judgment, considers Job as a fictitious character, and represents his poem as an allegory, composed by Moses during his exile, to raise the spirits of the oppressed and enslaved Israelites in Egypt. In his Supplement to Louth's admired Prelections on Hebrew Poetry, he thus endeavours to set aside the evidence of Ezekiel, p. 180.

Locus Ezechielis fictionem habet et vero impossibilem; fieri enim omnino nequit, ut viri non coævi, Noachus, Jobus, et Daniel, in eadem simul urbe vivant: nec inauditum aut absurdum, veras personas et fictam, in proponendo exemplo conjungi.

But this is a misrepresentation of the prophet's meaning: the passage neither contains “a fiction nor an impossibility,” but a perfectly natural supposition; not that Noah, Daniel, and Job were actually “coeval, and lived together in the same city,” which indeed would be a glaring anachronism and absurdity; but only, that if three such eminent personages were therein, their intercessions should avail only to save themselves, but not their countrymen; thus forcibly delineating the total corruption and degeneracy of the latter. And surely, to blend a fictitious character with others avowedly real, would serve only to weaken the effect of the whole, and not only be “unusual,” but even “absurd,” or incongruous. The German professor's illustration of recommending “chastity to a daughter,” by the examples of “Lucretia,” in Livy, and of “Pamela,” in Richardson's novels, could only tend to set them on a par in point of reality, and render the former rather doubtful.

With equal improbability, Michaelis ascribes the difference of the style of Job and of Moses, to the youth of the latter at the time of its composition, when his imagination was more fervid; but surely, the most glowing and brilliant of all his compositions, his last hymn, Deut. xxxii, was written at the age of 120, just before his death. “The poetical vigour of which appeared miraculous,” even to the professor himself!

family; the second for the wise men of Babylon; and the third for his friends, Ezek. xiv. 14. And the apostle James celebrates the exemplary "patience of Job," Jam. v. 11. And the book itself, whose early admission into the Sacred Canon is strongly in favour of its veracity, describes the residence of Job and his friends, with all the geographical precision of true history.

Job himself, whose name, by the most natural derivation, signifies "enduring enmity *," lived "in the land of Uz;" (colonized by Uz, the son of Aram, Gen. x. 23,) of which Edom, or Idumea, was a district, Jer. xxv. 20, Lam. iv. 21. Eliphaz was of Teman, a city of Edom, Jer. xlix. 7—20, Ezek. xxv. 13, Amos i. 12. Bildad was of Shua, a district in "the east country" of Arabia Petraea, where Abraham's sons by Keturah were settled, Gen. xxv. 2—6. Zophar, of Naamah, a city of Edom, Josh. xv. 21—41. And Elihu, is still more particularly described by his parentage also, as "the son of Barachiel, the Buzite;" in the neighbourhood of Dedan and Teman, in Edom, Jer. xxv. 23, xlix. 8, Ezek. xxv. 13, "of the kindred of Ram," or Aram †. "This," says Mercerus, "was done designedly by the author of the book, to shew the certainty of the history, and that it was not a fictitious or imaginary composition."

That Job was not a Hebrew of the Hebrews, or of the chosen line of Peleg, may be inferred from the omission of his name in the list of worthies renowned for their faith, Heb. xi. He was probably of Joktan's race, who first colonized Arabia, Gen. x. 25, Job xv. 19. And that the author was not of Peleg's line, may be most unequivocally collected from the style of the book, which differs considerably from the writings of Moses and the prophets; abounding in *Syriasm*s, *Chaldaism*s, and *Arabism*s.

The time of Job, his trials, and his faith, have given rise to

The English professor, Lowth, has well accounted for such reveries of the learned, by the following remark, in his own elegant Latinity :

Nunquam in dubium vocata fuisset historiæ veritas nisi quibusdam allegoariarum conquisitoribus tantum placuissent suæ fictiones, ut nihil amplecti vellent quod non unbratile esset et commentitium. "The truth of the history would never have been called in question, had not some searchers for allegories been over-pleased with their own fictions; so as to admire nothing that was not visionary and fanciful." Prælect. xxxiii. p. 419. Peters, 143.

* אִיּוֹב, (Aiob), from אִיב, (Aib), "inimicus est."

† Thus, "Ram, the father of Aminadab," Ruth iv. 19, is called "Aram," Luke iii. 33, and רַמִּים, (Ramim), "the Syrians," 2 Chron. xxii. 5, are called אַרְמִים, (Aramim), 2 Kings viii. 28.

a great variety of opinions ; they are next to be determined and explained, according to the most probable.

THE TIME OF JOB.

I. The Bible chronology dates the trial of Job, twenty-nine years before the exode of the Israelites from Egypt. And indeed, 1. That the book was composed before, is evident from its total silence respecting the mighty signs and wonders that accompanied the exode ; such as the passage of the Red Sea *, the destruction of the Egyptians, the manna in the desert, &c. all happening in the vicinity of Job, and so apposite in the debate about the ways of Providence.

2. That it was composed before Abraham's migration to Canaan, may also be inferred from its silence respecting the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrhah, and the other cities of the plain, covered by the Dead Sea ; which were still nearer to Idumæa, where the scene is laid.

3. The longevity of Job sufficiently corresponds to the time assigned by Abulfaragi. He survived his trial 140 years ; xlii. 16, and his age was probably not less at that time ; for his seven sons were all grown up, and settled in their own houses a good while, i. 4, 5. He speaks of the " sins of his youth," xiii. 26 ; of the prosperity of " his youth," xxix. 4. And yet Eliphaz schools him as a novice ; " With us are both the gray headed and very aged, much older than thy father," xv. 20.

4. That he did not live at an earlier period, may be collected from an incidental observation of Bildad, referring Job to their forefathers for instruction in wisdom.

" Enquire, I pray thee, of the former age,
And prepare thyself to the search of their fathers."

Assigning as a reason, the comparative shortness of life, and consequent ignorance of the present generation :

* The following passage, " He divideth the sea with his power," Job xxvi. 12, has been considered as alluding to the passage of the Red Sea : but it probably refers to the separation of the waters at the creation ; like the parallel passage, xxxviii. 8—11. In both passages, Rahab, or " proud," is an epithet of the sea. The former passage may perhaps allude to the deluge, from the preceding xxvi. 10, more correctly rendered, " He hath inscribed a covenant on the face of the waters, until the day and night come to an end." The sign of this covenant with Noah was the rainbow, Gen. ix. 31.

N.B. Many other passages supposed to be imitations of Moses and the prophets, will be found, on examination, either irrelevant, or to have been imitated rather by them.

“ For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing ;
Because our days upon earth are a shadow,” viii. 8, 9.

But “ the fathers of the former age,” or grandfathers of the present, were the contemporaries of Peleg and Joktan, in the fifth generation after the deluge : and they might easily have learned wisdom from the fountain head, by conversing with Shem, or perhaps with Noah himself ; whereas, in the seventh generation, the standard of human life was reduced to about 200 years ; which was “ a shadow” compared with the longevity of Noah and his sons*.

5. The manners and customs critically correspond to that early period. Job acted as high priest in his own family, according to primitive usage, Gen. viii. 20. For the institution of an established priesthood does not appear to have taken place any where, until Abraham’s days. Melchidezek, king of Salem, was a priest of the primitive order, Gen. xiv. 18 ; and so was Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, in the vicinity of Idumæa, Exod. xviii. 12. The first regular priesthood probably took place in Egypt : Joseph was married to the daughter of the priest of On, Gen. xli. 45.

6. The slavish homage of prostration to princes and great men, which prevailed in Egypt, Persia, and the east in general, and still subsists there, was unknown in Arabia at that time. Though Job was one of “ the greatest of all the men of the east ;” we do not find any such adoration paid to him by his contemporaries, in the zenith of his prosperity, among the marks of respect so minutely described, chap. xxix. “ When the young men saw him, they hid themselves,” through rustic bashfulness ; the aged arose, and stood up, in his presence ; the princes refrained from talking, and laid their hand upon their mouth ; the nobles held their peace, and were all attention while he spoke. All this was highly respectful indeed, but still it was manly, and shewed no cringing or servile adulation.

And so Sir William Jones describes the genuine Arabs at the present day, as “ a majestic race,” who were never conquered, and who have retained their primitive manners, features, and characters, without scarcely any alteration. “ Their eyes,” says he, “ are full of vivacity, their speech voluble and articulate, their deportment manly and dignified, their apprehension quick, their minds always present and attentive, with a spirit of independence appearing in the countenance of the lowest among them. Men will always differ in their ideas of civilization, each measuring it by the habits and prejudices of their own country : but if courtesy and urbanity, a love of poetry and eloquence, and the practice of exalted virtues be a juster proof of perfect society, we have certain proof that the people of Arabia, both on plains and in cities, in Republican and Monarchical states, were eminently civilized for many ages before their conquest of Persia." Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 3—9.

* This argument for the antiquity and traditional knowledge of Job and his friends is ably insisted on in the sagacious Mr. Davis’ Celtic Researches, p. 11.

7. The only species of idolatry noticed in the book, is Zabianism, which is the earliest on record, and an additional proof of the high antiquity of the composition ; especially as it is noticed with abhorrence, as a novelty, deserving judicial punishment, xxxi. 26—28.

And we learn also from Sir William Jones, that "The people of Yemen, (Arabia,) very soon fell into the common but fatal error of adoring the sun and the firmament ; for even the third in descent from Yoktan, who was, consequently, as old as Nahor, took the surname of Abdu-Shams, or ' Servant of the Sun ;' and his family, we are assured, paid particular honour to that luminary. Other tribes worshipped the planets and fixed stars."—Zabianism, therefore, was actually introduced into Arabia, (probably from Chaldea,) in Job's days, who was the contemporary of Nahor.

8. The cardinal constellations of spring and autumn, in Job's time, were Chimah and Chesil, or Taurus and Scorpio ; noticed ix. 9 ; and again xxxviii. 31, 32, of which, the principal stars are Aldebaran, the bull's eye, and Antares, the scorpion's heart. Knowing, therefore, the longitudes of these stars at present, the interval of time from thence to the assumed date of Job's trial, will give the difference of their longitudes, and ascertain their positions then, with respect to the vernal and autumnal points of intersection of the equinoctial and ecliptic ; according to the usual rate of the precession of the equinoxes, one degree in $71\frac{1}{2}$ years. See that Article, Vol. I. p. 78.

The following calculations I owe to the kindness and skill of the respectable Dr. Brinkley, Andrew's Professor of Astronomy in the University of Dublin.

In A.D. 1800, Aldebaran was in 2 signs, 7 deg. east longitude. But since the date of Job's trial, B.C. 2338 + 1800 = 4138 years, the precession of the equinoxes amounted to 1 sign, 27 deg. 53 min. which, being subtracted from the former quantity, left Aldebaran in only 9 deg. 7 min. longitude, or distance from the vernal intersection: which, falling within the constellation of Taurus, consequently rendered it the cardinal constellation of spring; as Pisces is at present.

In A.D. 1800, Antares was in 8 signs, 6 deg. 58 min. east longitude, or 2 signs, 6 deg. 58 min. east of the autumnal intersection: from which subtracting, as before, the amount of the precession, Antares was left only 9 deg. 5 min. east. Since then, the autumnal equinox was found within Scorpio, this was then the cardinal constellation of autumn; as Virgo is at present.

Since, then, these calculations critically correspond with the positions of the equinoxes at the assumed date of Job's trial, but disagree with the lower dates of the age of Moses, and still more, of Ezra, furnishing different cardinal constellations; we may rest in the assumed date of the trial*, as correct.

Such a combination and coincidence of various rays of evidence, derived from widely different sources, history, sacred and

* These astronomical calculations were originally published in a Series of Essays on Sacred Criticism, Orthodox Churchman's Magazine, 1802, Vol. II. p. 241. Since that time, I have reduced the date of Job's trial a year lower, B.C. 2337.

This day, (Jan. 2, 1809,) I was agreeably surprised to find, that this astronomical mode of determining the age of Job, by the precession of the equinoxes, had been anticipated forty-four years ago, by a learned and ingenious Frenchman, Ducoutant, in a Thesis, published at Paris, 1765, in the Sorbonne; stating that Chimah and Chesil, corresponded to the Pleiades and Scorpio, and were the cardinal constellations of spring and autumn, in Job's time. As the tract is scarce, I will transcribe the passage:

Libri Jobæi antiquitatem, confirmant, etiam non mediocriter, constellationes quarum fit mentio, Job. ix. 9, et xxxviii. 31. Ibi, DEUS Jobum alloquens ait: Numquid religare poteris amœnitates (seu delicias) Pleiadum, (כִּימָה,) id est, Numquid cohibere poteris ne erumpant deliciae quas Pleiades, (seu sidus Kimah) annunciant? Unde rite colligitur, constellationem Kimah, seu Pleiades, tempore Jobi fuisse veris prænuncias. Jam vero, si astronomice calculus ineatur temporis quo Kimah seu Pleiades vernal tempus prænuntiabant, invenietur id contigisse anno ante Christum 2136. — Jam vero nomine Kimah Pleiadas esse intelligendas, multa gravissimaque argumenta demonstrant.

Ibidem, Job xxxviii. 31. Deus Jobum alloquens ait: Numquid poteris dissolvere vincula Kesil (כֶּסֶל) id est, Numquid efficere poteris ut dum apparet sidus Kesil, terram frigore constringens, erumpant flores et fructus? Ex his pariter concluditur, Kesil esse sidus oppositum rov Kimah, et tempore Jobi fuisse hyemis prænunciam; ac proinde, nomine Kesil, intelligendum esse Scorpionem; seu sidus quod vocatur cor Scorpionis. Per Kesil Scorpionem intelligendum esse, multa alia gravissimaque monumenta ostendunt. Jam vero calculo astronomice inito, invenietur pariter Kesil, seu Scorpionem hyemem prænunciassse anno [ante Christum, 2136.] Atqui, tempore Mosis, nec Kimah vernal tempus, nec Kesil hyemem jamdudum prænunciare poterant: Ergo Liber Jobæus longe est Mose antiquior, p. 7.

profane, chronology and astronomy, and all converging to the same common focus, tend strongly to establish the time of Job's trial, as rightly assigned in the year B.C. 2337; or 818 years after the deluge; 184 years before the birth of Abraham; 474 years before the settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt; and 689 years before their exode or departure from thence*.

If now we reckon, with the most intelligent critics, Schultens, Peters, Lowth, &c. that the work was written by Job himself, whose name it bears; by the same analogy, as those of Samuel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, &c. (and surely among the various authors that have been assigned by the learned, Elihu, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Ezra, &c. none has a better title than the venerable patriarch himself to be considered as such,) this supposition stamps an additional value on the authority and authenticity of the work; and accounts for the high estimation in which the character of Job is represented, (and by the ALMIGHTY himself,) in that solemn denunciation to the Israelites, recorded by Ezekiel, and thrice repeated, as if to guard against any mistake of his name; Ezek. xiv. 14—18—20; and also by the apostle James; and also, for the respect with which that passage, "HE taketh the wise in their own craftiness," v. 13, is cited, as canonical Scripture, by the apostle Paul, 1 Cor. iii. 19, which surely would not have been the case, had it been the work of a doubtful or unknown author. Nothing, indeed, but its intrinsic excellence, and the inspiration of the author, which is not obscurely intimated by his seeing the Divine presence, xlii. 5, can account for the admission of a foreign production into their sacred canon, certainly before the time of Ezekiel; and, not improbably, as early as the time of Hezekiah, Solomon, Samuel, or even Moses himself, who might have found it among the collections of his father-in-law, Jethro, priest of the neighbouring country of Midian, who appears to have been a person of great wisdom; and Moses could not want curiosity to procure

* The witting Paine ridicules "the Bible makers, and those Regulators of Time, the Bible Chronologists," for "their ignorance in affixing to it the æra, [rather, date,] of 1520 years before Christ; which is during the time the Israelites were in Egypt:" "and for which," says he, "they have just as much authority, as I should have for saying it was a thousand years before that period! The probability, however, is, that it is older than any book in the Bible."—Little did he know, in the extent and compass of his ignorance, that the supposition which he treated as downright extravagant, is not much more than the truth.

a book so fraught with wisdom and instruction, and so apposite to his own case, during his long exile of forty years.

I have been solicitous to investigate its author, and the time of its composition, as well as its canonical authority, because the circumstance of its remote antiquity, being considerably the oldest book in the world, long prior to the Pentateuch, stamps the highest value on it, as a most faithful and authentic monument of the language, the learning, the manners, and the religion of the earlier and purer patriarchal ages; it is a valuable voucher for all such historical facts and doctrines, as it notices conjointly with the books of Moses, such as the creation of the world, the ministry of good angels, the agency of bad, the fall of Adam, the universal deluge, &c. while the difference of the manner, and the new circumstances it incidentally relates, not to be found in the Pentateuch, prove it to be also an independent voucher, which derived information from different sources or traditions, preserved in Aram's and Joktan's families.

THE TRIALS OF JOB.

II. These come next under consideration.

The grand spiritual "adversary" of mankind, who is here, first, introduced in Scripture, under his proper name, *Satan, and under the character assigned to him from hence, in the New Testament, of "walking about, as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour," 1 Pet. v. 8, (alluding to Job i. 7, and ii. 3 †,) and as "the accuser of the brethren, who accused them before God, day and night," Rev. xii. 10, is represented, by the Divine permission, as afflicting, with divers trials, a person of distinguished piety and virtue, who was "perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil," ver. 1.

Job is described as one of "the greatest and most prosperous of all the men of the east, or Arabia." He had a numerous family, "seven sons and three daughters," all by one wife, xix. 17; for he had no concubines, xxxi. 1; and abhorred fornication and adultery, xxxi. 9. And his sons were all grown up and settled in their own houses, and lived in the greatest harmony with each other, and with their sisters, whom they regularly feasted on their birth-days, each in his turn: "His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household," ver. 2—4. All these circumstances critically correspond to the earlier and purer patriarchal ages.

How well the "illustrious" patriarch bore this dangerous trial of long and increasing "prosperity *," appears from his pious solicitude to "send for his sons, when their feast days were gone about, and to sanctify them, early the next morning, and to offer burnt-offerings of atonement, according to the number of them all," seven times in the year, lest "his sons might have sinned at their feastings, and forgotten to bless God †, even in their

* Constat Jobum maximis opibus prædivitem, eò illustriorem fuisse, quod his neque integris corruptus, neque amissis depravatus fuerit. Severus Sulpitius.

† The verb בָּרַךְ (Barak,) properly signifies to "bless." In this passage, therefore, where the sense evidently requires the contrary, the particle לֹא, "not," should be understood; "Perhaps, my sons have sinned (הִטְאוּ), and [not] blessed [לֹא] וְ (וְ בָרַכוּ GOD in their hearts;" which is necessary, by implication, to support the translation of our English Bible—"and cursed God in their hearts." (See a parallel passage, Jer. xx. 14, where the particle is expressed.) But this latter is harsh and revolting: for surely, the sons of Job, who were pious men, could have no inducement to curse or blaspheme God at any time, much less in the midst of their festivity; but there might have been danger of neglecting or forgetting to bless Him on such occasions: Thus Moses warns the Israelites: "When thou hast eaten and art full, then shalt thou bless the Lord thy God, for the good land which he hath given thee: Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God," &c. Deut. viii. 10.—"Bless THE LORD, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits! Psalm ciii. 2.

In a parallel passage also, 1 Kings xxi. 10, the particle לֹא, "not," must likewise be understood: "Thou didst [not] bless God and the king;" in order to support the English translation: "Thou didst blaspheme (or curse) God and the king:" by malicious implication of the contrary, Eccles. x. 20. "Curse not (אֵל תְּקַלֵּל) the king, not even in thy thought."

The two following passages also, in our English Bible, where Satan says of Job to the LORD,—"He will curse thee to thy face," i. 11, ii. 5, are harsh and revolting, and altogether incompatible with the character of Job. But the impropriety will be removed, if they be rendered interrogatively: "And will he bless Thee to thy face?" The interrogation malignantly insinuating the reverse, that he would not bless God. And this antiphrasis is frequent in Scripture: Thus Jezabel said to Ahab, when vexed at Naboth's refusal to exchange or sell his vineyard, "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel?" 1 Kings xxi. 7; plainly intimating the reverse; that he did not govern it. And when the Lord gently declined David's offer of building a temple to his honour: "Shall thou build Me a house for my dwelling?" 2 Sam. vii. 5. In the parallel passage, the refusal is clearly expressed: "Thou shalt not build Me a house to dwell in," 1 Chron. xvii. 4. And so, when Bethlehem was foretold to be honoured as the birth-place of CHRIST: "And art thou Bethlehem Ephratah little to be [esteemed] among the thousands of Judah?"—Micah v. 2; the reverse here understood is clearly expressed in hearts," for his gracious bounties. "Thus did Job continually," every year, ver. 5.

And now Satan is represented as appearing in a council of "the sons of God," or holy angels, before GOD, and thus calumniating Job, by ascribing his extraordinary piety to interested or mercenary motives: "Hast not Thou made a hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath, on every side? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land: But put forth thy hand now, and touch all that he hath; and will he bless Thee to thy face?"—malignantly insinuating the reverse, ver. 6—11.

Then THE LORD, knowing Job's sincerity, and the integrity of his heart, permitted Satan to afflict him with the trials of adversity;—to touch his substance, but to spare himself: "Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thy hand," ver. 12.

And now Satan began the first set of trials, choosing a day of rejoicing, on the eldest son's birth-day, to convert it into a day of the deepest mourning, by a complication of calamities, following close on the heels of each other, in rapid succession. The first "messenger of Satan sent to buffet him," (2 Cor. xii. 7.) brought the disastrous intelligence,—1. That his oxen and asses were suddenly carried off, and his servants who attended them slain by the Sabæans, or marauding "companies of Saba or Seba;" vi. 19, the Nabathean Arabs; and that he only escaped; and while he was yet speaking, 2. a second, that his sheep and the shepherds were all destroyed by lightning, except himself; 3. a third, that his camels were carried away, and his servants slain, by the irruption of three bands of Chaldeans, from the borders of the *Euphrates, and that he only escaped; and to fill up the the evangelist's translation: "And thou Bethlehem, territory of Judah, art by no means least among the princes of Judah," Matt. ii. 6.

The counsel of Job's wife, "Curse God and die," ii. 9, in our English Bible, is equally harsh and revolting. It should rather be rendered, "Bless God, and die:" conveying a bitter irony; grounded perhaps upon his pious resignation in the loss of his children and substance: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, Blessed be the name of the Lord!" i. 21; as if she said, "Bless the Lord" for depriving you, now of health, as before of your children, "and die," for nothing else remains!

* To Job's residence in Idumæa has been objected the improbability that the Chaldeans should cross the frightful deserts of Arabia, above 600 miles broad, for the sake of plunder. But it was not unusual for these roving bands of robbers to make very distant excursions. To such, the camels of Job would prove a great prize, from their ability of travelling a long time without water; whence the camel is emphatically styled measure, 4. a fourth, that a "whirlwind" from the desert, or "from the south," xxxvii. 9, had blown down his eldest son's house, and destroyed all the company except himself.

The unexpectedness, the suddenness, and the completeness of all these calamities deeply affected, but did not overcome Job: he felt them as a man, but he bore them with astonishing patience and resignation.

"Then Job arose and rent his mantle, and shaved his head [in token of mourning, Jer. lxi. 5*.] And he prostrated himself on the ground, and worshipped, and said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return; the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: Blessed be the name of the Lord. In all this, Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly," ver. 13—22.

On the event of this first trial, when the Lord in council, as before, commended Job for "holding fast his integrity," or his faith; Satan maliciously attributed it to selfishness, as if Job disregarded the loss of his children and substance, since he had escaped himself: "Skin for skin, (or his children's skins instead of his own,) yea, all that a man hath (his substance) will he give for his life: But now put forth thy hand, and touch his bone and his flesh; and will he bless Thee to thy face?" Then "the Lord delivered Job to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the Spirit might be saved in the day of our Lord JESUS CHRIST," 1 Cor. v. 5: for the further trial of his faith, He permitted Satan to torment his body, but to spare his life, ii. 1—6.

Satan then began a second and a sorer trial: "He smote Job with sore boils, from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head," or with a loathsome and universal leprosy †. "And he by the Arabs, "the ship of the desert." The other cattle would be useless to the Chaldeans.

* Compare Jer. vii. 9; Isa. xv. 2; Hom. Odyss. iv. 197. Herodotus speaks of it as a general practice among all people, except the Egyptians, to cut off their hair as a token of mourning, ii. 36. At the Friendly Isles in the South Sea, "cutting off the hair is one of their mourning ceremonies;" Cook and Clarke's Voyage, Vol. I. p. 112; and at Otaheite "the hair was cut off and thrown upon the bier." Forster's Observations, p. 560.

† The leprosy is a most loathsome scrofulous disease, common in the east and in hot countries. It is of two kinds, the white and the black.

The former, such as that of Gehazi, 2 Kings v. 27, is thus described by the judicious Maunderel, as he saw it in ten poor lepers at Sichem (now Naplous), near the place where our SAVIOUR healed an equal number.

took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal :” And in token of profound humiliation *, “he sate down among the ashes.” But his sorrows were too great for utterance ; he sate in silence.

To exasperate his sufferings, his wife, by a taunting irony, compels him to break silence only to rebuke her : “Dost thou still maintain thine integrity,” or faith ? “Bless God and die !” She was naturally offended at the composure with which he had borne the loss of all their children, and all their substance, for which her grief was probably excessive and impatient †. When he, on the contrary, blessed the Lord for his losses, she sarcastically recommended him to bless the Lord for this last stroke too, which was incurable, “and die.”—But he said unto her, “Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh : What ! shall we

“This distemper not only defiles the whole surface of the body with a foul scurf, but also deforms the joints of the body, particularly those of the wrists and ankles, making them swell with a gouty scrofulous substance, very loathsome to look upon. I thought their legs resembled those of old battered horses, such as are often seen in drays in England. The whole distemper, indeed, as it there appeared, was so noisome, that it might well pass for the utmost corruption of the human body on this side the grave. And certainly the inspired penmen could not have found out a fitter emblem to express the uncleanness and odiousness of vice.” Maundrel’s Travels, p. 150 —It is called Beres by the Arabs, and Λεκη by the Greeks.

The latter has been called the leprosy of the joints, because it principally affects the extremities, which, in the last stage of the malady, are distorted, and at length drop off. It is in truth a distemper corrupting the whole mass of blood, and is therefore considered by Paul of Egina, as an universal ulcer, requiring a more general appellation, and may properly be named the black leprosy ; which term is in fact adopted by M. Boissieu de Sawages, and Gorræus, in contradistinction to the white. It is called Judham by the Arabs, and also Daul Asad, a name corresponding with the Leontiasis of the Greeks ; and supposed to have been given in allusion to the grim, distracted, and lion-like countenances of the miserable persons who are affected with it. See the Asiat. Resarches, Vol. II. p. 153, on the cure of the Elephantiasis, which is its more common name, because it renders the skin like that of an elephant, uneven and wrinkled, with many tubercles or furrows.

With which of these two species of leprosy Job was smitten, is not easy to determine —but the latter, or “universal ulcer,” seems more applicable to his case, Job ii. 7.

† The Septuagint Version, without any warrant from the Original, or the other ancient Versions, puts the following speech into her mouth : “And after a long time had elapsed, his wife said unto him, How long wilt thou persist in saying, Lo, I will wait a little longer, expecting the hope of my salvation : for lo, thy remembrance is blotted out from the earth : thy sons and daughters, the pains and labours of my womb, whom I have borne in vain with throes, [are no more ;] thou thyself, the prey of worms, sittest the whole night in the open air ; while I, a vagrant and dependant, rove from place to place and from house to house, expecting, till the sun shall set, to get a respite from my sorrows, and from the woes which now oppress me : but speak some word unto the Lord, and die.” (Αλλα ειπον τι ρημα εις κυριον, και τελευτα.) receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? —[the former with gratitude, the latter with resignation.] In all this [trial also] Job sinned not with his lips*," ver. 7—10.

"Hearing of all the evil that had befallen him," Job's three principal friends and neighbours, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, followed by a younger, Elihu, soon after, xxxii. 4, "came by appointment to mourn with him, and to comfort him." And their meeting is described in the most lively and picturesque terms: "And when they lift up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, [so disfigured was he by the disease] they lifted up their voices and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads towards heaven. So they sate down with him upon the ground, seven days and seven nights †; but none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his grief was very great," ver. 11—13. This closes the historical preface to the work, or prologue to the poem.

The third, the last, and the severest trial of all, forms the subject of the poem itself. It was occasioned by the unkind suspicions, and the unjust reproaches of his morose and austere friends, obliquely insinuating, and at length openly asserting, that his sufferings were inflicted by God as a punishment for his

* In the Arabian Tales of the thousand and one nights, Cogia Hassan Alhabbal, the cobbler, lost a sum of money given him by his friend, Saadi, to relieve his poverty, by means of a kite who flew away with his turban from off his head, in which it was concealed. But he "murmured not" at his misfortune, and the misery to which it again reduced him; and expressed himself nearly in the language of Job:

"God has wished to prove me, in giving me aid when I least expected it. He has taken it away, almost at the same time, because it so pleased Him, and because it belonged to Him: Praised be the Lord! As I have praised Him heretofore, for the benefits which He bestowed upon me, according to His pleasure, so now I submit to His will.

"I was engaged in these reflections; mean while, my wife, from whom I could not conceal the loss I had suffered, and the means by which it had happened, was inconceivable. My neighbours, to whom, in my trouble, I had disclosed the loss of a purse of 190 pieces of gold along with my turban, knowing my poverty, and not conceiving how I could have gained so large a sum by my work, did nothing but laugh at me, and the children still more than they." Tom. VII. p. 194. of Galland's French translation.

This popular work exhibits a lively, entertaining, and faithful picture of Arabian manners and customs at the present day; and is in high estimation in Arabia. A good English translation of it, immediately from the Arabic, is much wanting; and is, we understand, expected from the skilful hand of Major Scott. That in common use, is a paltry one, formed from Galland's.

See Alnaschar, the Glassman's story, given in Arabic, with a literal English translation, by Richardson, in his Arabic Grammar, p. 200.

† This was the usual period of mourning, Gen. i. 10, 2 Sam. xii. 16—18, Ezck. iii. 15.

crimes. This attack on his reputation, the dearest thing in the world to a good man, next to his integrity, stung him to the quick; and led him, at length, when goaded by repeated accusations, to assert his innocence, and even in some measure to arraign PROVIDENCE, with a heat and intemperance of expression, excusable only by the greatness of his provocations from these "miserable comforters," his friends: for which he was reprehended by God, but pardoned upon his repentance and humiliation, and finally restored to twice the temporal prosperity that he had enjoyed before.

The poem consists of five parts: the first dialogue, or debate between Job and his three friends, occupies chap. iii.—xiv; the second, chap. xv.—xxi; the third, chap. xxii.—xxxii.; the fourth, the speech of Elihu, chap. xxxii.—xxxvii; and the fifth, the answer of GOD, and Job's submission; chap. xxxviii.—xlii. 1—6.

I shall endeavour to give a general outline of the argument, more closely and critically translated, omitting amplifications and episodes, which, however beautiful or illustrative thereof, are not absolutely essential thereto; and also obscure passages, whose meaning and connexion are not easily, if at all discoverable, at the present day.

Job breaks his long silence by an abrupt and passionate lamentation, in which he "cursed the day of his birth," in the glowing imagery of the East, or wished that he had never been born, and longed for death to end his woes. His grief, however, though impetuous, is still decorous; he does not presume to impeach the Divine justice, or "charge God foolishly." He rather indirectly imputes his calamities to the sins of his children, which appear to have been to him a constant source of dread, i. 5.

- III. 3. Let the day perish wherein I was born,
And the night which said, a male child is brought forth *!

* The Prophet Jeremiah, in his tribulation, evidently imitated Job's complaint:

- Jer.* xx. 14. "Cursed be the day, wherein I was born,
Let not the day be blessed, in which my mother bare me!
15. Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, Saying, 'a male child is born unto thee!'—
18. Wherefore came I, thus, forth from the womb,
To see labour and sorrow;
That my days shall be consumed in shame?"

The distress, in both cases, is painted in strong and lively colouring. The pencil is

11. Why died I not from the birth,
Why expired I not from the womb?—
20. Why is light given to the wretched,
And life to the bitter of soul?
21. Which long for death, but it cometh not,
And dig for it more than for hid treasures.—
23. [Why]—to the man whose way is hid,
And whom God hath hedged in?
24. For my sighs intrude upon my food,
And my roarings are poured forth like waters.
25. For the fear that I feared, is come upon me,
And that which I dreaded is befallen me.
26. I had no ease, no quiet, no rest,
Yet trouble came!

1. Eliphaz, the eldest of the three friends, begins the debate, with an apology for his speech, as if occasioned by Job's intemperance of expression: representing his grief as rather unmanly and inconsistent with his former character for wisdom, piety, and integrity. He then shrewdly insinuates that his sufferings were the punishment of some secret iniquity. This he collects from general observation of God's dealings with the righteous and the wicked; and as an illustration of his argument, he pointedly alludes to the particular calamities of Job. He then recommends him to seek unto God for refuge; that such corrections were intended for his good; and concludes, for his comfort, that God guided by the hand of nature, which delights in amplifying passions, especially the violent and tumultuous; and expanding the imagery over whatever has the slightest relation to, or connection with, the exciting object. But if we compare the original with the copy, the former appears to have considerably the advantage: in Job, the night itself, by a bolder and more poetical imagery, is represented as announcing his birth; a curse directed against it, was harmless; but in Jeremiah, it is directed also against the innocent messenger of "glad tidings to the prophet's father:" who, therefore, ought not to suffer; much less, to be devoted to "the fate of the impious and inhospitable inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah." This is neither poetical justice, nor morality. Indeed, "the holy men of old," are candidly represented in Scripture, as often impatient under their sufferings or their disappointments. Moses, "the meekest of men," expostulated with God, for the burden laid upon him, and wished for death. David abounds with imprecations against the enemies of GOD and CHRIST; and sometimes, perhaps, his own; Elijah, like Moses, wished for death to end his sufferings. And Jonah, likewise, in his disappointment because Nineveh was not overthrown according to his prediction! The apostles James and John, those "sons of thunder," (as our Lord, perhaps from thence, denominated them,) wished to call down fire from heaven, as Elijah formerly did, to consume the inhospitable Samaritans. The holy Scriptures throughout, faithfully "hold the mirror up to nature," and shew mankind as they really are, without extenuation or exaggeration: they—"nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice"—"Dipping their pen in mind,"—not in partiality or prejudice, "without respect of persons."

was still able to deliver him from all his troubles, to restore his prosperity, to grant him a numerous issue, and a ripe old age.

- IV. 2. If we attempt to answer thee, wilt thou be offended?
 For who is able to refrain from speaking?
3. Behold thou hast instructed many,
 And thou hast strengthened the weak hands:
4. Thy discourses have upholden the falling,
 And thou hast confirmed the feeble knees:
5. But trouble cometh upon thee, and thou faintest,
 It toucheth thee, and thou art dismayed.
6. Is [this] thy fear [of God,] thy confidence, Thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways!—
7. Remember, I pray thee, who, being innocent, perished?
 And when were the righteous cut off?
8. According as I have seen, they that plough iniquity,
 And sow wickedness, do reap the same.
9. By the blast of God they perish,
 And by the breath of his nostrils they are consumed.—
- V. 3. I have seen the foolish taking root,
 But I quickly cursed his habitation:
4. His children were far from safety,
 And they were crushed in the gate,
 And there was none to deliver [them.]
5. Whose harvest the hungry [Sabeans] devoured,
 And even from the thorn—hedges carried it away;
 And their substance the thirsty [Chaldeans] swallowed up.—
8. I would seek unto GOD,
 And to GOD would I commit my cause.
 Who doeth great things and unsearchable,
 Marvellous things without number.—
17. Behold, happy is the mortal whom God correcteth, Therefore despise not thou the chastenings of the ALMIGHTY!
18. For HE maketh sore and bindeth up,
 He woundeth, and his hands make whole.
19. He shall deliver thee in six troubles,
 Yea in seven, no evil shall touch thee.
20. In famine HE shall redeem thee from death,
 And in war, from the power of the sword.
21. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue,
 Neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.—
24. And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace,
 And thou shalt visit thy habitation, and not be disappointed.
25. And thou shalt know that thy seed shall be many,
 And thine offspring as the grass of the ground.
26. Thou shalt go to thy grave in full age,
 As a shock of corn cometh up in its season.

Job, in reply, apologizes for the intemperance of his grief, by the greatness of his calamities; he rejects the proffered comfort, in any prospect of future earthly prosperity, as distasteful to him, and inconsistent with his hopeless state ; he prays for a speedy death, and looks only for comfort beyond the grave ; he complains of the unkindness of his friends, as aggravating his sufferings, and cavilling at his hasty expressions. He expostulates with God for the severity of his trials ; and concludes with a humble acknowledgment of his sins in general, an earnest supplication for mercy, and for a speedy death.

- VI. 2. O that my grief were thoroughly weighed,
And my calamities set against it in the balance !
3. For now are they heavier than the sand of the sea,
Wherefore my words are impetuous ;
4. For the arrows of THE ALMIGHTY are within me,
The poison whereof my spirit drinketh up.
The terrors of God are arrayed against me.
5. Doth the wild ass bray [discontentedly] over his grass,
Or the ox lowe [dissatisfied] over his fodder ?
6. Can insipid food be eaten without salt ?
Or is there flavour in the white of an egg ?
7. My soul refuseth [your consolations]
They are to me as putrid meats.
8. O that I might have my request,
That God would grant my desire,
9. That it would please God to destroy me,
With outstretched hand to cut me off.
10. Then should I yet have comfort,
Yea I would rejoice in sorrow,
Even though He should not spare :
For I have not denied the words of the HOLY ONE.
11. What is my strength that I should hope,
And what my end that I should prolong my life ?——
14. Whoso withholdeth pity from his friend,
Forsaketh the fear of THE ALMIGHTY.
15. My brethren have dealt treacherously,
As a brook, as the current of brooks, they pass away !——
21. For now ye are become nought,
Ye see my downfall, and are afraid.——
24. Teach me, and I will hold my tongue,
And instruct me how I have erred.
25. How forcible are right words,
But what doth your reasoning reprove ?
26. Do ye argue to reprove [hasty] expressions
And to cavil at the words of the forlorn ?
Yea, ye overwhelm the desolate,
And dig a pit for your friend !——
- VII. 17. What is man that thou sustainest him,
And that thou regardest him ;
18. If Thou visitest him every morning,
If Thou triest him every moment ?

19. How long wilt thou not depart from me,
Nor let me alone, till I swallow my spittle *,
20. I have sinned, [but] what have I done to thee,
O THOU OBSERVER OF MAN,
Why hast Thou set me as an offence unto Thee,
So that I am a burden to myself?
21. And why pardonest thou not my transgression,
And removest not mine iniquity?
So should I soon lie down in the dust:
Thou shouldst seek me in the morning,
But I should be no more.

Not satisfied with this animated and pathetic apology, and humble confession of his sins in general, and supplication for a mitigation and end of his punishment, in which Job does not yet appear to have "sinned with his lips," nor to have "charged God foolishly;" Bildad, the second of his morose friends, treading in the steps of Eliphaz, reproves him, with more acrimony, and less disguise.

- VIII. 2. How long wilt thou speak thus,
And the words of thy mouth resemble a whirlwind?
3. Doth GOD pervert judgment,
Doth THE ALMIGHTY pervert justice?
4. If thy children have sinned against him,
Then hath He cast them off for their transgression.
5. If thou wilt seek unto God betimes,
And make thy supplication to THE ALMIGHTY,
6. If thou be pure and upright,
Surely now will He watch over thee,
And make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.
7. And though thy beginning be small,
Yet shall thy latter end greatly increase. —
11. Can the reed grow up without mire,
Can the flag grow without water?
12. While yet in its bloom, and not cut down,
It withereth sooner than any herb;
13. So are the paths of all that forget GOD;
And the hope of the hypocrite perisheth:
14. Whose hope shall be cut off,
And whose trust shall be a spider's web;
15. Who leaneth upon her frail house,
She graspeth it, but it shall not stand. —
20. Lo, God will not cast off the perfect,
Neither will He strengthen the hand of the wicked.
21. When shall He fill thy mouth with laughter,
And thy lips with rejoicing?
[When] shall thy adversaries be clothed with shame,
22. And the tabernacle of the wicked be brought to nought?

* This phrase is equivalent to "Let me draw my breath," ix. 18; or "get a little respite," x. 20.

This unkind speech, the obvious charges of irreligion and hypocrisy, and the taunting irony with which it concludes, overpowered the patience of Job, and in his reply betrays him into inconsistencies: one time he acknowledges the divine justice, and his own submission to its decrees; at another he seems to arraign it, and complains, rather impatiently, of his sufferings, as greater than he deserved, and wishes for a public trial before God with his calumniators, to clear his innocence, before his speedy death.

- IX. 2. I know, indeed, that it is so,
But how can man be justified with GOD ?
3. Should He summon them to judgment,
One of a thousand could not answer Him.—
14. Much less should I be able to answer Him,
Though I should use the choicest arguments.
15. Even if I were righteous, I would not answer,
But rather supplicate my Judge.—
20. If I justify myself, my own mouth shall condemn me,
If [I say that I am] perfect, it shall prove me perverse.—
22. This is singular, therefore I say it,
HE destroyeth the perfect and the wicked.
23. Though the scourge slay the foolish,
Yet it laugheth at the trial of the innocent,
24. The earth is given into the hand of the wicked,
The face of the judges thereof is hid ;
If [so] where, or what, is HE ? —
28. All my griefs terrify me,
I know that Thou holdest me not innocent.
29. [If] I be wicked why do I thus labour in vain ?
30. If I wash myself with snow water,
And cleanse my hands in purity ;
31. Still shalt Thou plunge me in the ditch,
And mine own clothes shall abhor me.
32. For [GOD] is not a man, as I, that I should answer Him,
That we should go together to judgment ;
33. There is no umpire between us,
Who might lay his hand upon us both.
34. Let Him withdraw His rod from me
And let not dread of Him terrify me, 35. Then would I speak and not fear Him ;
But it is not so with me.—
- X. 7. Thou knowest that I am not wicked,
Yet none can deliver me out of thine hand.—
15. If I be wicked, woe unto me,
And if I be righteous yet can I not lift up my hand.—
I am full of ignominy, and the spectators of my affliction
Even pride themselves against me, and insult me.
16. Thou huntest me, as if I were a fierce lion,
And repeatest thy marvellous assaults upon me.

17. Thou renewest thy witnesses against me,
And increasest thine indignation upon me.
Fresh assailants are upon me.—
20. Are not my days few and fleeting?
Let me alone, that I may get a little respite,
21. Before I go, whence I shall not return,
To the land of darkness and of the shadow of death,
22. A land of darkness, like the thick darkness
Of the shadow of death without luminaries,
Whose light is like darkness.”

This passionate and intemperate reply, called forth the still severer animadversions of Zophar, the third of his morose friends; who, without any reserve, taxes him openly, with loquacity, arrogance, and iniquity, and as justly punished for his sins; and exhorts him to repentance, as the only means of recovering his prosperity.

- XI. 2. Shall not this multitude of words be answered,
And shall a man full of talk be justified?
3. Shall thy companions be silent at thy boastings,
And shalt thou mock, and no one shame thee?
4. Thou sayest, My life is pure,
And I am clean in thine eyes:
5. But O that God would speak,
And open his lips against thee,
6. That He would shew thee the secrets of wisdom,
Which surpass the most perfect knowledge,
Then shouldst thou know, that God exacteth of thee
[Less] than thine iniquity [deserveth].—
13. If thou prepare thy heart,
And stretch out thy hands unto Him,
14. If iniquity be in thy hand put it away,
And let not sin dwell in thy tents,
15. Then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot, ———
16. Thou shalt forget thy misery ———
17. Thine age shall be clearer than the noon day;
Thou shalt shine forth,—as the morning——
19. Yea many shall make suit unto thee.
20. But the eyes of the wicked shall fail,
And they shall not escape.
And the giving up the ghost, shall be their hope.

In answer to this taunting speech, Job treats such commonplace sayings with contempt, as if he had not some share of understanding as well as they, to discern the ways of PROVIDENCE; who, in his wisdom, sometimes suffered the upright to be afflicted, and the wicked to prosper; but that no one could call OMNIPOTENCE to account. That therefore, to conclude from his sufferings that he must needs be wicked, was to be guilty of wickedness themselves; as if God needed their rash censures to vindicate the ways of his providence. Even in death, he professes his trust in God, as his Saviour, maintaining his own integrity, and that he was no hypocrite: and supposing himself already dead, he challenges his friends to plead with, or accuse him before the awful tribunal of God; beseeching his Judge, before he enters into judgment with him, to grant him two things; to withdraw his afflicting hand, and veil the terrors of his majesty, that it might not overpower him with dread; then to question him, and he would answer; and also, that God would vouchsafe to inform him what were his sins and transgressions, that occasioned such severe inflictions. He professes his hope in a future resurrection at the end of the world, illustrated by the renovating analogy of nature, in the sprouting of a tree when cut down; and wishes to be kept in hades, the region of departed souls, until the time of his change, or renovation, and summons to the general judgment; when he should receive a more equitable sentence from his CREATOR, who had a tender regard for his own workmanship, than from his rash ill-judging friends and accusers: though now, God seemed to deal hardly with him, by numbering his steps, and carefully recording all his transgressions, even the smallest, and by those severe chastisements which exposed him to obloquy and unmerited censure.

- XII. 2. Truly, ye are [the voice of] the people,
And with you is the perfection of wisdom!
3. I also have understanding as well as you,
I am not inferior to you:
Who knoweth not such [trite] things? —
6. The tents of the spoilers are prosperous,
And they that provoke God are secure;
To whom their hand [or power] is their god. —
13. With [GOD] is wisdom and power,
He hath counsel and understanding —
16. With Him is strength and perfection,
The deceived and the deceiver are his. —
23. He encreaseth the nations and destroyeth them. —
He enlargeth the nations and straiteneth them. —
- XIII. 7. Will ye speak iniquitously for GOD,
And will ye speak deceitfully for Him?
8. Will ye accept His person,
If ye plead for God?
9. Will it be good [for you] that He should search you?
Can ye mock Him, as man is mocked?
10. Surely He will reprove you,
If ye do secretly accept persons.

11. Shall not his majesty make you afraid
And his terror fall upon you?—
15. Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him.
But [still] I will maintain my own ways [or integrity]
16. Before Him; He also shall be my salvation,
For a hypocrite shall not come into his presence.
17. Hear diligently my speech,
And give ear to my declaration.
18. Behold now I have set my cause in order;
I know that I shall be justified.
19. Who is he [among you] that will plead with me [before God?]
(For now shall I [soon] be silent, and expire.)
20. Only do, O GOD, two things with me,
Then will I not hide myself from Thee:
21. Withdraw thy hand from over me,
And let not thy terror affright me.
22. Then call Thou, and I will answer;
Or I will speak, and answer Thou me.
23. How many are my iniquities and sins?
Make me to know my transgression and my sin.
24. Wherefore hidest Thou thy face,
And holdest me for thine enemy?
25. Wilt Thou break a leaf driven [by the wind?]
Wilt Thou pursue the dry stubble?
26. For Thou writest bitter things against me,
And imputest to me the sins of my youth.—
- XIV. 7. If a tree be cut down, there is hope That it will sprout again, and that its branches will not fail;
8. Tho' its root wax old in the ground,
And its stock die in the dust,
9. Yet by the moisture of water it will bud*,
And bring forth boughs like a plant:
10. But man dieth and wasteth away,
Yea, man expireth, and where is he?—
11. The waters fail from the sea,
And the rivers decay and dry up,
12. Man also lieth down; and riseth not again,
Until the heavens shall be no more: [until then]
They shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.
13. O that Thou wouldest hide me in hades,
That Thou wouldest screen me till thy wrath be past,
That Thou wouldest set me a term, and remember me!
14. If a man die shall he revive?—[assuredly.]
All the days of my appointed station will I wait Until my change shall come.
15. [Then] shalt Thou call, and I will answer Thee,
[Then] shalt Thou yearn on the work of thine hands!
16. But now, Thou numberest my steps;
Dost not Thou watch over my sin?

* Vide adeo, quàm in solatium nostri resurrectionem futuram omnis Natura meditetur, says an elegant Christian writer, Minucius Felix, p. 170.

17. Thou hast sealed up my transgression in a bag,
And Thou hast sewed up my iniquity.—

2. The second dialogue is opened, as before, by Eliphaz, the eldest of the friends; who goes nearly over his former ground, but with greater asperity. He charges him now, unreservedly, with vain and unprofitable talk, xv. 2, 3; with casting off the fear of God, and prayer, 4; as self-convicted of sin, 5, 6; of arrogance, in despising the advice of his wiser friends, 7—10; and of impiety towards God, 11—13. And he concludes with an elaborate representation of the progress and end of a wicked man; which bears, in the following, a marked resemblance to Job's particular case:

- XV. 19. He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance continue,
Neither shall he strike root in the earth.
30. He shall not emerge from darkness,
The fire [of God] shall wither his branches,
By the breath of His mouth, they shall be swept away!
31. Let not the deceived trust in vanity,
For vanity shall be his recompense.
32. He shall come to an untimely end,
And his branch shall not be green,
33. He shall shake off, as a vine, his unripe grapes,
And cast off, as an olive, his blossoms,
34. For the assembly of hypocrites are like a flint,
Fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.
35. They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity,
And their womb teemeth with deceit.

Job, in reply, complains of the unkindness of his friends in aggravating his sorrows, instead of assuaging them, as he would have done in their case; and considers this as the most grievous visitation of God. He maintains his integrity, and relies on God, as his witness, or inspector, to justify him from the scorn of his friends: and again challenges any of them to a trial before God. He apprehends the scandal his sufferings might create among even just men, and the anger of the innocent at his supposed hypocrisy; but still persists in the steadfastness of his righteousness, and looks to death as his last resource.

- XVI. 2. I have heard many such things:
Miserable comforters are ye all!
3. [When] shall vain words have an end,
Or what emboldeneth thee to answer.
4. I also could talk as ye do,
If your soul were in my soul's stead:

- I could mutter over you, words,
I could shake mine head at you.
5. But I would strengthen you with my mouth,
I would soothe you with the motion of my lips. —
 9. He that hateth me, teareth me in his wrath,
He gnasheth upon me with his teeth,
Mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me !
 10. They gape on me with their mouth,
They smite me upon the cheek, in scorn,
They gather themselves together against me,
 11. GOD hath delivered me up to the ungodly,
And turned me over into the hands of the wicked. —
 16. My face is foul with weeping,
And on my eye-lids the shadow of death,
 17. Not for any injustice in my hands ;
My prayer also was pure.
 18. O earth, cover not my blood,
Let there be no obstruction to my cry !
 19. For even now, lo, my witness is in heaven,
And my Inspector, on high.
 20. My friends indeed scorn me,
But mine eye weepeth unto GOD. —

- XVII. 2. Are there not mockers with me,
Whose reproaches are continually in my sight ?
3. Appoint now, my surety with thee,
Which [of you] is he that will strike hands with me ?
 4. For Thou hast veiled their hearts from understanding [my cause].
Therefore, Thou shalt not exalt them [in the judgment] —
 6. Thou hast made me a by-word among the people,
I am become a mockery unto them. —
 8. The upright are astonish'd at this,
And the innocent is roused against the hypocrite.
 9. But the righteous will persist in his way,
And the pure in hands will gain strength.
 10. But as for you all, return now, and depart,
For I cannot find a wise man among you. —
 14. I cry to Corruption, thou art my Father !
To the worm, thou art my Mother, my Sister !
 15. Where is now my hope ?
And my expectation, who shall see it ?
 16. It shall descend to the gates of hades,
We shall rest together, in the dust !

Bildad follows Eliphaz. He goes over his former ground, but with greater asperity, and more marked references to the peculiar sufferings of Job ; which he represents as the punishment of his wickedness ; and a salutary warning to his contemporaries, and to posterity ; the whole being the necessary result of the established order of things in this world, by which God punishes the wicked, and rewards the good; which Job wished to set aside in his own case :

- XVIII. 2. How long wilt thou not refrain from talking?
Stop, that we also may speak.
3. Wherefore are we counted as beasts,
And reputed vile in your sight ?
4. He teareth himself in his rage !——
Shall the earth be forsaken for thee ?
Or shall the rock be removed from its place ?
5. Yea [rather] let the light of the wicked be put out,
And let not the spark of his fire shine.——
16. His root shall be dried up beneath,
And his branch shall be cut off, above.
17. His memory shall perish from the earth,
And he shall have no name in the street.
18. He shall be driven from light into darkness,
And chased out of the world.
19. He shall neither have son nor grandson among his people,
Nor any, remaining in his dwellings.
20. They that come after him, shall be astonished at his day,
As they that went before him, were affrighted.
21. Such, verily, are the dwellings of the wicked,
And such, the place of him that knoweth not God !

Wearied with such incessant and accumulated reproaches and accusations, Job, in his reply to Bildad, more mournful than vehement, laments the estrangement and alienation of his friends and his family, in the most pathetic terms ; and attributes it to the divine wrath : and despairing of redress, or the vindication of his innocence in this life, he makes a solemn appeal to his REDEEMER ; and professes his belief, that he should be acquitted, at his resurrection, in the general judgment of the last day ; and bids his friends beware, lest God should afflict them with those common visitations here of the sword, &c. which were designed to evince God's judgment on sinners.

- XIX. 2. How long will ye vex my soul,
And afflict me with your speeches ?
3. These ten times have ye reproached me ;
Are ye not ashamed to harden yourselves against me ?
4. Supposing indeed that I have erred [in my opinion]
Let my error remain with myself.
5. But if indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me,
[At least] prove against me my reproach.
6. Know now, that GOD hath overthrown me,
And hath compassed me with his toils.
7. Behold, I cry out of misrepresentation, but I am not heard,
I complain, but there is no redress !

8. HE hath hedged in my way, that I cannot pass,
And hath set darkness in my paths.
9. He hath stripped me of my glory,
And taken the crown from my head.
10. He destroyeth me on every side, and I perish.
And my hope, like a tree, hath He removed.
11. His wrath hath He kindled against me,
And he counteth me as an enemy unto him.
12. His troops assemble together,
And heap up their way against me,
And encamp around my tabernacle.
13. He hath removed my brethren far from me,
And verily my acquaintance are estranged!
14. My kinsfolk desert me,
And my familiar friends have forgotten me!
15. My domestics and my maids count me a stranger,
I am become an alien in their sight!
16. I call my servant, but he answereth not,
Though I entreat him with my mouth!
17. My breath is strange to my wife,
Though I entreat [her] for mine own children's sake!
18. Yea, the little ones of my household despise me;
I arise, and they insult me!
19. All my intimates abhor me,
And my favourites are turned against me!
20. My bones cleave to my skin and to my flesh,
And I have scarcely any gums to my teeth.
21. Pity me, pity me, O ye my friends,
For the hand of GOD hath touched me.
22. Why do ye persecute me, as God,
And are not satisfied with my [wasted] flesh?
23. ——— O that my words were now written,
That they were inscribed in a book,
That they were engraven with an iron pencil,
And [inlaid with] lead, in a rock, for ever:
25. "I know that my REDEEMER [is] living,
And that at the last [day]
He will arise [in judgment] upon dust [mankind:]
26. And after my skin be mangled thus,
Yet even from my flesh, shall I see GOD:
27. Whom I shall see, for me, [on my side]
And mine eyes shall behold HIM not estranged;
[Though] my reins be [now] consumed within me."*

* The translation here given of this famous passage, differing considerably from the received, and also from the interpretations of several commentators and critics, Grotius, Warburton, &c. supposing that it relates only to the miraculous restoration of Job's health, at the end of his trial, which actually took place; the high importance of the subject demands that its accuracy should be supported by a critical analysis of the terms of the original.

Ver. 25. The word גַּאֵל, (Goel), when applied to God, as it evidently is in this place, (being in apposition to אֱלֹהִים, Elohim, in the next verse,) denotes a Redeemer, or deliverer from all evil, temporal and spiritual. Thus, the patriarch Jacob, invokes “the angel who redeemed him from all evil,” to bless Joseph and his sons, Gen. xlviii. 16, in which there seems to be a marked allusion both to this passage, and also to another in Job xxxiii. 23, where he is called “an angel, an intercessor.” David also invokes him under the same title; “O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer,” Psalm xix. 14, &c. And Isaiah, “Our Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts is his name, the Holy One of Israel,” xlvii. 4; and again, “The Redeemer shall come from Sion,” lix. 20; evidently applying the term to CHRIST; as it is also understood by St. Paul; “The Deliverer shall come out of Sion,” Rom. xi. 26.

The Redeemer is said to be חַי, (Hai), “living,” and the Sept. αὐνοῦς, “ever living.” This also is a usual epithet of God: “My soul thirsteth for God, even for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?” Psalm xlii. 2; which bears a remarkable analogy to this passage. The most solemn oath or adjuration, was by “the living God,” Matt. xxvi. 63, “who liveth for ever,” Dan. xii. 7; and “who is ever living to make intercession for us,” Heb. vii. 25; whence our Lord styles himself, “the living,” and “living for evermore,” Rev. i. 7; and declares, “As the Father hath life in himself, so hath He given to the Son also, to have life in himself,” John v. 26; and to his faithful disciples he says, “Because I live, ye shall live also,” John xiv. 19; and in the noblest comment that ever was given on this passage of Job, our Lord, before he raised Lazarus from the dead, styles himself “the resurrection and the life,” or the author of the resurrection to eternal life: “He that believeth on Me, though he die [here,] yet shall live [hereafter;] and every one that liveth [hereafter,] and believeth in Me, shall die no [more] for ever,” John xi. 25; as this most sublime and important text may be more critically rendered and explained.

The next term אַהֲרֹן, (Aharon), is here put elliptically for יוֹם אַהֲרֹן, (Iom aharon), “the last day,” as in a parallel passage of Isaiah, which bears a remarkable analogy to that passionate wish which ushers in this noble declaration of Job’s faith in a future resurrection: says the Lord to the prophet, “Go now, [to the people of Israel,] write it before them in a tablet, and inscribe it in a book; and it shall be until the last day, for ever, even for evermore,” Isaiah xxx. 8. The repetition of so many remarkable terms used by Job in this short passage, could not have been casual. The ellipsis also is supplied by our Lord, in his solemn and repeated declarations to the unbelieving Jews:

“I descended from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of Him that sent me. And this is the will of the Father who sent me, that I should lose nothing of all that He hath given me, but should raise it up at the last day.” “And this is the will of Him that sent me, that every one who beholdeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day,” John vi. 38—40.

And that this was also the popular belief, appears from Martha’s answer to our Lord’s promise, “Thy brother shall rise again.”—“I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day,” John xi. 23, 24, which seems to be a citation from Job, and determines the sense in which the passage was understood at that time.

The ensuing verb יָקוּם, (Iakum), signifies “He shall arise,” and is frequently annexed in the Scripture to the prerogative of judging, in a judicial capacity. The posture of standing up to pronounce sentence, being usual among judges in all ages and countries. In allusion to this, the Psalmist says, “Arise, O God, judge the earth,” Psalm lxxxii. 2. And it is so understood in a subsequent passage of Job, which can only relate to the future judgment: “If I despised the plea of my man-servant or maid-servant in their suit with me, what then shall I do when God *arise*th [in judgment?] and when He *visit*eth, what shall I answer Him?" Job xxxi. 13; where the verbs arise and visit are plainly parallel or synonymous, and the noun מישפט, (Mishpat), ambiguously denotes both plea and judgment: of which the former sense is expressed, and the latter, though suppressed, is elegantly understood. The ellipsis, however, is fully expressed in the following passage: "Every tongue that shall arise in judgment against thee shall be condemned," Isaiah liv. 17.

 For [divine] wrath [punisheth] iniquities [with] the sword;
 That ye may know there is a judgment.

The following noun, עפר, (Aphar), literally signifies "dust;" but is frequently used figuratively, to denote mankind, as having been originally formed from "the dust of the ground," Gen. ii. 7; and doomed to return thither, Gen. iii. 19. Thus, "He knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are "dust!" Psalm ciii. 14. Whence Abraham, in his self-abasement before the righteous Judge of all the earth, styles himself "dust and ashes!" Gen. xviii. 27; for, "shall dust and ashes be proud?" Ecclus. x. 9. But it is peculiarly applicable to the dead, after their bodies are reduced to dust. "Shall the dust praise thee? Shall it declare thy truth?" Psalm xxx. 9, as explained elsewhere, "Wilt Thou shew wonders to the dead? Shall the deceased arise and praise Thee? Shall thy compassion be declared in the grave, or thy faithfulness in destruction? Shall thy wonders be known in the dark, and thy righteousness in the land of oblivion?" Psalm lxxxviii. 10—12. These interrogations are perhaps to be answered affirmatively, from the Psalmist's positive belief of a future resurrection, expressly stated elsewhere, Psalm xvi. 9—11, xvii. 15, lxxiii. 20, lxxi. 20, xlii. 2, &c. And so are the similar passages in Job. If a man die shall he live again? xiv. 12, &c. by no means doubting the fact, but conveying a lively and animated expression of its certainty; corresponding to his positive declaration immediately after, of his "change or renovation," xiv. 14; an expression adopted by St. Paul in that noble description of the resurrection: "Lo, I tell you a mystery: all we, indeed, shall not sleep, but shall all be changed; in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed," 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

Versc 26. The verb נקפו, (nikephu), is plural, signifying "they shall mangle, rend, or destroy;" Here our translators have introduced "worms," as the nominative case understood; but unnecessarily, for this form of the verb is frequently taken singularly, in a passive sense. Thus, our public translation judiciously renders, "The mighty shall be taken away without hand," Job xxxiv. 20; where the literal construction is, "They shall take away the mighty," &c. And, "This night shall thy soul be required of thee," Luke xii. 26, is literally, "They shall require thy soul;" (την ψυχην σου απαιτουσιν), meaning, in both cases, "the destroyers," Job xxxiv. 22, or "the angels of death;" who are expressed, Luke xvi. 22, where the soul of Lazarus, the beggar, "was carried by the angels unto Abraham's bosom."

The following particle זאת (zoth), is rendered "thus," in several passages of the English Bible, as Levit. xvi. 3, 2 Sam. xvii. 15, 2 Chron. xxxi. 20, Amos ii. 11. or, "in this manner," Gen. xlv. 17, 2 Chron. xxxii. 15; or, "after this sort," 1 Chron. xxix. 14; intimating the present ulcerated state of Job's skin. The word "body," therefore, is awkwardly and irrelevantly introduced in our public translation of the passage, to the manifest detriment of its sense and grammatical construction.

The next word, ומבשרי, (u-me-basari), is literally "and from my flesh." But the conjunction ו, Vau, is used in various senses; here, as contrasted with the preceding

This pathetic speech is here given entire, to shew more clearly the natural connexion between Job's lamentation at the unkindness and estrangement of his friends and his family, and his animated appeal to his gracious REDEEMER, who he doubts not will be on his side, and clear his character at the last day.

In answer thereto, Zophar, the most violent, immediately turns his appeal against himself. He labours with much eloquence to describe, from the earliest annals of the world, the short-lived triumph of the wicked, and the momentary joy of the hypocrite, here and hereafter; for he seems to glance at both, xx. 4—9. He paints, in glowing colours, the outward calamities, and the inward terrors, which sometimes marred his prosperity, and turned his wholesome meat into the gall of asps, through dread of future retribution, when his secret sins * should lie down in the dust with him, but should rise in witness against him, when “the heavens should reveal his iniquity, and the earth rise up against him in the general judgment,” 11—27, for to both Job had appealed to witness his innocence; endea-

Vau, it must be rendered “yet ;” as in Deut. ix. 29, Job xxiv. 12, &c. or “nevertheless ;” as in Psalm xlix. 12; or “again,” as in Zech. ii. 1, of our English Bible, the expression “from my flesh,” signifies “from, or out of my changed or renovated body.” The necessity of this change is finely represented by St. Paul: “For this I say unto you, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither shall corruption inherit incorruption.”—“It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.” 1 Cor. xv. 44—50. For “the children of God,” must be first “likened unto their glorified REDEEMER, before they can see Him as He is,” 1 John iii. 2.

Job next, by anticipation, views his REDEEMER in a most encouraging light; first as his gracious Protector, לִי, (li), signifying “with me,” as in Gen. xxxi. 42, &c. or “for me,” Psalm lvi. 9, xciv. 16, &c. or, “on my side,” Psalm cxviii. 6, &c. and next, as finely contrasted with his unkind friends, וְלֹא זָר (velo-zar) “and not a stranger,” or “not estranged or alienated from me,” as they are; alluding to their treatment of him in the preceding part of his speech, ver. 14—17.

That he had no expectation of a miraculous recovery or restoration to health in this life, is evident from the sequel; though “my reins be [now] consumed within me,” or “in my bosom ;” according to the Septuagint rendering, παντα δε μοι συντετελεσται εν κολπῳ, where, instead of the present Masorete text, בחקי, “in my appointed time ;” they evidently read, בחקי, “in my bosom ;” as understood plainly by the Masoretes, &c. furnishes a more easy and natural sense, and most agreeable to the context, in which Job all along despairs of his recovery, and wishes earnestly and repeatedly for death to end his sufferings. In this noble declaration of faith in a future resurrection, Job evidently had no more notion of a miraculous recovery, than Martha of the immediate resurrection of her brother Lazarus, when she professed her faith, in the language of Job, “I know that he shall rise again at the last day.”

* עֲלוּמִים, from עָלַם, abscondit, is rendered “secret sins,” Psalm xc. 8.

vouring, by this tragical description, to scare Job, if it were yet possible, into a confession of guilt. Peters, p. 180.

The following chapter, xxi. contains Job's reply; in which he enters at large into the momentous question of God's dealings with mankind, in order to shew the falsehood of Zophar's argument of the short-lived triumph of the wicked.

He begins his speech with a gentle complaint of their severe treatment of him, and calls their attention to his reasoning upon this delicate subject, which he reflected on with awe and reverence, why do the wicked live, &c. ver. 2—7; he then shews that the wicked sometimes live long, and prosper, and die in peace; he enlarges, 1. on their security from the incursions of robbers; 2. their health, or freedom from diseases, ver. 9; to this is added, 3. plenty of cattle, the riches of those times, ver. 10; next comes, 4. a numerous and happy offspring, ver. 11, 12; and to crown all, 5. after a prosperous and pleasant life, an easy death, ver. 13; and yet that all this only hardened them in their wickedness, and led them to cast off all regard to God and religion, ver. 14, 15.

But in touching on this tender ground, the prosperity of the wicked, which his adversaries might misinterpret, as if he were pleading the cause of impiety, he adds an apology for himself, that he was not of the counsel of the wicked, neither of their opinion nor society; for that he did not consider their prosperity to be owing to themselves, or in their own hand or power; that oftentimes God makes them terrible examples of his justice, and their children after them; thus admitting his adversaries' arguments, as far as they were just, ver. 16—21.

Still, however, he contends, in opposition to them, that in the general course of God's providence, as it appears in fact, however mysterious his ways, that good and evil are not seldom dispensed here promiscuously, without any strict regard to merit or demerit, during the whole period of human life, ver. 22—26.

He next touches on their uncharitable perversion of his calamities into judgments, and as he had before stated his own hope of a resurrection, and a gracious sentence from his REDEEMER, so now he closes and completes his masterly argument with a declaration, that the impious wicked who prosper in this life, and leave their proud monuments behind them, shall receive a dreadful recompense in the future day of judgment, 27.

- XXI. 2. Hear ye attentively my speech,
Let this be in return for your consolations.
3. Bear with me while I speak ;
And after I have spoken, [Zophar] mock thou on.
4. What ! do I [direct] my complaint to man ?
And if [I did,] why might not my spirit be impatient ?
5. Observe me, and be astonished,
And lay your hand upon your mouth.
6. For when I reflect, I am affrighted,
And my body is seized with trembling.
7. Why do the wicked live [happy]
Grow old, and even become mighty in substance ?
8. Their seed is established with them in their sight,
And their offspring before their eyes.
9. Their houses are secure from fear,
Neither is the rod of God upon them.
10. Their bull gendereth and faileth not,
Their cow beareth, and casteth not her calf,
11. They send forth the little ones of their household, like a flock,
And their children dance.
12. They take up the timbrel and harp,
And rejoice at the sound of the pipe ;
13. They spend their days in good,
And in a moment descend to Hades ;
14. And yet, they say unto God, Depart from us,
For we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.
15. Who is the ALMIGHTY, that we should serve Him,
And what shall we profit, if we pray unto Him ?
16. Lo their good is not in their own hand ;
Far be from me the counsel of the wicked !
17. How oft is the candle of the wicked put out,
And their destruction cometh upon them ?
[How oft doth God] distribute sorrow to them in his anger ?
18. [How oft] are they as stubble before the wind,
And as chaff which the storm carrieth away ?
19. GOD layeth up his iniquity for his children,
He rewardeth him, that he may know ;
20. His eyes see his destruction,
And he drinketh of the wrath of the ALMIGHTY.
21. For what pleasure hath he in his house after him,
When the number of his days is cut off ?
22. Shall any teach knowledge to GOD,
To Him who ruleth on high ?
23. One [the wicked] dieth in the fulness of his strength,
Wholly at ease, and in tranquillity :
24. His bowels are full of fat,
And his bones are moistened with marrow.
25. Another [the good] dieth in bitterness of soul,
And never eateth with pleasure.
26. They lie down alike in the dust,
And the worms cover them.

27. Behold I know your thoughts,
And the calumnies which ye forge against me,
28. For ye say, *Where is the house of the prince !
And the habitations of the wicked !*
29. Have ye never asked them that pass by the way,
And do ye not know their tokens ?
30. *That the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction,
They shall be brought forth to the day of wrath* *.—
34. How then comfort ye me in vain,
Since in your answers remaineth falsehood ?

3. The third dialogue is opened by Eliphaz, who returns once more to the charge, in chap. xxii. He represents Job's vindication of himself, and his appeal to heaven, as displeasing to God, and an aggravation of his guilt; with which he now openly taxes him. Is not thy wickedness great, and thine iniquities infinite? ver. 2—5. He accuses him, without scruple, of several heinous acts of fraud, cruelty, and oppression, and even atheism itself, or a denial of God's providence; (and Eliphaz has been followed in this by Maimonides, Kimchi, and several of the later Jewish Rabbis.) He reminds him of the destruction of the old world by the deluge, and of its future destruction by fire, ver. 15—20. And concludes with a fresh exhortation to repentance and prayer, as the only means of his restoration, acquaint thyself now with HIM, and be at peace, ver. 21—30.

In the two following chapters, xxiii. xxiv. Job repels the charge of atheism in a most noble description of the universal presence of God, though invisible. He contends that his sufferings were designed as trials of the purity of his faith, and again maintains his integrity. And shews, in a variety of instances, that wickedness often escapes punishment in this life.

This calls up Bildad: who, in a short speech, chap. xxv. repeats his former positions, that God, in the plenitude of his dominion, both punishes and rewards in this life; and that no

* To interpret this passage, with some commentators, of temporal destruction, is to represent Job as condemning himself, and justifying the charges of his friends against him; and contradicts the whole tenor of his argument. And the writers of the NEW TESTAMENT, adopt the same language, when they speak of the future judgment and the final doom of sinners. "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power," 2 Thess. i. 9, in "the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God," Rom. ii. 5; "a day of perdition to ungodly men," 2 Pet. iii. 7. Such a remarkable analogy of expression, indicates imitation, and shews how the apostles understood such passages in the OLD TESTAMENT.

man, strictly speaking, can be justified before God: man, at best, being a frail and fallible creature, a mere worm; but GOD, a Being of infinite purity and perfection. These were commonplace arguments, involving themselves, as well as Job, in the general description of sinners: and having been previously admitted by Job, could not tend to make him criminate himself in particular, which was their main object.

Job having at length silenced, though not convinced his opponents, after addressing a short reproof to Bildad, chap. xxvi. enters into an elaborate vindication of his character, in the five following chapters, xxvii—xxx. He asserts his integrity and their slanders, in the following animated appeal to heaven, in rather too bold a tone of remonstrance:

- XXVII. 2. [As] GOD liveth, who hath taken away my judgment,
 And THE ALMIGHTY who hath afflicted my soul,
 3. Surely all the time that my breath is in me,
 And the spirit of God, in my nostrils,
 4. My lips shall not speak wickedness,
 Nor my tongue, utter deceit.
 5. God forbid, that I should justify you!
Till I expire, I will not forego my integrity;
 6. My righteousness will I hold fast, and will not let it go,
My heart shall not reproach me, so long as I live.
 7. Let my enemy be as the wicked
 And my adversary as the unjust.
 8. For what is the hope of the hypocrite,
 When he is cut off, when God taketh away his soul? —
 19. The [ungodly] rich man shall lie down, [or die]
But he shall not be gathered [to his fathers]
He openeth his eyes [in hades] and is not.*

* Peters thus ingeniously explains this important passage, p. 382. “The wicked rich man, (for of such Job was speaking,) shall die, but shall not be gathered to the assembly of good and pious souls: he openeth his eyes in the other world, and [is not, or] finds himself lost and miserable!” He observes that the phrase of “being gathered to their fathers,” or “to their peoples,” is confined in Scripture to the eminently good and pious. Thus it is applied to Abraham, Gen. xv. 15, xxv. 8. To Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 17. To Isaac, Gen. xxxv. 29. To Jacob, Gen. xlix. 29—33. To Aaron, Numb. xx. 24. To Moses, Numb. xxvii. 13, xxxi. 2, Deut. xxxii. 50, &c. To Joshua and the elders of his time, Judges ii. 8—10. To David, Acts xiii. 36. To Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 20; whereas the general expression applied to good and bad indifferently is, to lie down, or sleep with their fathers; as Jeroboam, 1 Kings xiv. 20. Rehoboam, 1 Kings xiv. 31, &c. To lie down with the uncircumcised, or the wicked, as Pharaoh, Ezek. xxxii. 19—28, &c. for “the uncircumcised shall be cut off from his peoples,” Gen. xvii. 14. The plural, עַמִּים, “peoples,” is remarkable, it cannot denote the present generation only, but must mean the several generations of good men that were gone before; to whose assembly, as the circumcised hoped to be gathered when they died, so the uncircumcised are threatened to be cut off from it.

Job then, to repel the calumnies of Eliphaz especially, xxii. 5—20, enters into a minute detail of his past life and conversation, which shews him to have been, indeed, exemplary in piety, virtue, and sobriety: and he closes his admirable apology, reluctantly extorted from his modesty, by repeating his ardent wish for an immediate trial with his calumniator, before the tribunal of God, in the following terms:

- XXXI 35. O that I had a hearing granted me !
 Lo there is my gage ! Let the ALMIGHTY question me,
 And let my accuser write a bill of indictment !
 36. Surely I would take it upon my shoulder [in triumph]
 And bind it as a crown upon me ;
 37. I would declare to HIM, the number of my steps,
 As a prince would I approach Him !—

Here ends the controversy between Job and his friends. The grand question in debate between them was, whether Job was a sinner and a hypocrite, or not. Both parties draw their arguments from the providence of God, which, they both agreed, could not act wrong.

The friends represent his extraordinary calamities, as a visible judgment on him for his sins: and because he had none that were public and notorious, they at first insinuate, and afterwards plainly assert, that he must needs have been guilty of some secret bosom sin, and that of the deepest die, that could subject him to such extreme misery: for that God never afflicts in so remarkable a manner, but for sins of great magnitude.

By these expressions was denoted the happiness or misery of good or bad souls, in the intermediate state between their death and resurrection. The general receptacle of departed spirits was called in Hebrew שְׁאוֹל, Sheol, and in Greek Ἅιδης, Hades; and is defined by Job, “The house of assembly for all living,” xxx. 23. This was supposed to be divided into two separate departments: the one for good souls, called “Paradise ;” into which our Saviour promised admission to the penitent thief on the cross, Luke xxiii. 43; to which Paul was caught up in vision, 2 Cor. xii. 4; and wished to be there with Christ, Phil. i. 23; and to which the soul of the beggar, Lazarus, was carried by the angels of death to “Abraham’s bosom,” Luke xvi. 22. The other for bad souls, separated from the former by an “impassable gulph,” was called “the lower Sheol,” Tartarus, or Hades, where the rich man, in the parable, lift up his eyes, being in torments, and saw Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom, Luke xvi. 23, a metaphor taken from the manner in which the Jews reclined at meals. Both, perhaps, are included in the following passage of Job, xxxviii. 17. “Have the gates of death been opened unto thee, or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death? Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth?”—where the Chaldee Targum thus remarkably paraphrases the latter clause: “Hast thou perceived the breadth of the land of the garden of Eden?” supposing it to denote Paradise; as the former clause, Gehenna, or “Hell,” which he improperly substitutes for the lower Sheol.

For which they appeal to experience: “Recollect, I pray thee, says Eliphaz, what innocent person ever perished? And when were the righteous cut off?” iv. 7; “Behold, says Bildad, GOD will not cast off the perfect man, neither will He help the evil doers,” viii. 20; and Zophar tells him bluntly, “Know therefore, that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth!” xi. 5.

Job, on the other hand, defends himself, by setting before them another view of Providence. He denies an exact retributive justice in this life, arguing from the general course of it; whereas they argued chiefly from extraordinary exceptions: they had seen a good man sometimes remarkably delivered; and oftentimes a wicked man remarkably punished. But he bids them reflect, how many they had known, who were notoriously wicked, and had nevertheless prospered a long time, and no extraordinary calamity befel them in the course of their lives, nor in their deaths. And though it was not so easy to discern who were really good, (a bad inside being often covered by a fair outside,) yet he bids them consider what ravages were sometimes made, either by the pestilence or the sword; and they must needs be convinced that many good men must unavoidably suffer with the bad, in such great and general devastations. So that no certain conclusion could be drawn of men’s being either good or bad, from what they enjoyed or what they suffered in this world. And therefore it was rash, and even wicked in them, to charge him with heinous sins, without any apparent foundation, besides the greatness of his sufferings.

This is evidently the way of reasoning on both sides; and the leading object of Job’s repeated wishes for an immediate trial before God with his accusers; and when that failed, his hopes of a future resurrection at the day of judgment, was, by such a solemn appeal, to convince them, if possible, of his innocence. Peters on Job, p. 176.

Now, Elihu appears on the stage, and acts the part of a moderator in the disputation between Job and his friends; and blames both, very freely, in a long speech, which runs through six chapters, xxxii—xxxviii, and forms the fourth part of the poem. He censures the friends for charging Job with crimes which they could not prove, and for persisting in condemning him, after they were silenced, xxxii. 3, and for their respect of persons, in treating GOD as a man, and vindicating the course of his moral providence unjustly, in maintaining that virtue was uniformly rewarded, and vice punished in this life, xxxii. 21. He censures Job for justifying himself rather than God, saying, “I am righteous, and God hath taken away my judgment,” xxxiv. 5; and this because God did not gratify his impatience, by bringing him and his accusers presently to trial, and clearing his innocence before them and the world: also, for speaking without knowledge, and uttering words without wisdom, in “his answers for wicked men,” or in putting an argument in their mouth to charge God foolishly, as if he had dealt unjustly with Job; thus adding rebellion unto his sin, xxxv. 35—37; whereas God’s omnipotence was sufficient to prove that He could not do wrong; and consequently, that GOD, who does not explain the ways of his providence, will render unto every man according to his work; if not here, assuredly hereafter.

XXXIV. 10. Hearken to me, ye men of understanding :

Far be iniquity from GOD,

Yea far be injustice from the ALMIGHTY.

11. For He shall render unto man, [according to] his work,

And cause every man to find according to his ways :

12. Yea surely GOD will not do wickedly,

Neither will the ALMIGHTY pervert judgment.—

21. For his eyes are upon the ways of man,

And he seeth all his goings :

22. There is no darkness nor shadow of death,

Where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves.

XXXIII. 13. But God giveth no account of any of his proceedings.—

There is a remarkable passage in Elihu’s speech, which seems to allude to Job’s faith in his REDEEMER, and even obscurely to predict his approaching temporal deliverance, and justification by GOD. It is introduced with much solemnity, as an oracular declaration; and gives a lively description of a person supposed to be chastised for his pride, with the most excruciating pains; abhorring all manner of food, wasted away to a skeleton, and nearly at the point of death; and then suddenly restored by a redeeming angel or intercessor, to health, prosperity, and the favour of God. Than which nothing can be more apposite to Job’s particular case.

XXXIII. 14. GOD speaketh once for all,

And will not repeat it twice,

15. In a dream, in a nightly vision,

When deep sleep falleth on man,

In slumbers upon the bed.

16. Then He openeth the ears of men,
And sealeth their instruction.
17. To withdraw man from his [foolish] doings,
And to hide pride from man :
That He may save his soul from death,
And his life from perishing by the dart.
19. [Therefore] is he chastened with pain upon his bed.
And the cry of his bones is strong,
20. So that his life abhorreth bread,
And his soul, dainty meat,
21. His flesh wasteth away from view,
And his bones that were not seen, stick out ;
22. Yea his soul draweth nigh unto the pit,
And his life, unto the destroyers.
23. If then, there be over him an angel * ,
An intercessor * , one of a thousand,
To represent, in man's behalf, his uprightness,
24. Then will [GOD] be gracious unto him, and say, “ Deliver him from going down to the pit :
I have found an atonement * .”

* The word מלאך, (Malach), rendered Messenger in the English Bible, may more correctly be rendered Angel, signifying “ the angel who redeemed Job, as well as Jacob, from all evil,” Gen. xlviii. 16, who was indeed “ one of a thousand,” or the most excellent : whom Isaiah called “ the Angel of God's presence,” lxiii. 9 ; in whom “ God placed his name,” or reposed his authority, according to Moses, Exod. xxiii. 20, 21 ; whom Malachi called “ the Angel of the Covenant,” iii. 1, and who was CHRIST, “ anointed with oil of gladness above his fellows,” Psalm xlv. 7, Heb. i. 5.

The epithet מליץ, (Melits), is rendered “ Interpreter,” Gen. xlii. 23, and “ Ambassador,” 2 Chron. xxxii. 31, and critically corresponds to the titles of CHRIST, “ Intercessor,” Isa. lix. 16. “ Mediator,” 1 Tim. ii. 5, Heb. xii. 24 ; and “ Advocate with the Father,” 1 John ii. 1.

The word כִּפָּר, (Caphar), literally signifies “ a covering,” and in a religious sense, an “ atonement,” Exod. xxix. 36, Numb. xvi. 46 ; or “ propitiation.” Such was CHRIST for the sins of the whole world, 1 John ii. 2, Rom. iii. 25, whose precious blood, as “ the Lamb of God,” virtually sacrificed “ from the foundation of the world,” Rev. xiii. 8, had a retrospective efficacy to all preceding times, under the Patriarchal covenants, as to future, under the Christian. In whom, therefore, “ God found an atonement for Job's sins ;” and restored him to that original righteousness, which had been lost by Adam's transgression. A transgression which Adam vainly endeavoured to cover, or hide in concealment, and to remedy by his own imperfect contrivance, Job xxxi. 33.—Such views of the medialtorial scheme of salvation, through the blessed seed of the woman, in so early an age, and in a Heathen country, are really surprising. But that such subsisted, we learn from apostolical authority, in the following passage of Peter.

“ Concerning which salvation, the [ancient] prophets enquired and searched diligently ; who prophesied concerning the grace [of THE GOSPEL] communicated unto you, [Gentile as well as Jewish converts :] searching what [time,] and what manner of time, the spirit of CHRIST, which was in them, pointed out ; when it testified, beforehand, concerning the sufferings, and the ensuing glories of CHRIST. To whom it was revealed, that they ministered not to themselves, but to us, these things,” or foretold, by

25. His flesh shall become fresher than a child's ;
He shall return to the days of his youth ;
26. He shall beseech God, and He will accept him ;
He shall see his face with joy,
And [GOD] will restore to the man his righteousness.
27. He shall sing among men, and say,
" I have sinned, and have done amiss,
But [GOD] hath not retaliated on me :
28. He hath delivered my soul from going into the pit,
And my life, that it may behold the light !"
29. Lo, all these worketh God with man,
30. Ofi-times, to bring back his soul from the pit,
To enlighten him with the light of the living.

And in this view Job himself appears to have considered it, for when he was called upon "to answer, if he had any thing to say," by his youthful but friendly monitor, who, unlike the rest, "desired to justify him," where he was right, and to "teach him wisdom," where he was wrong, xxxiii. 31—33, he held his peace, and listened, in respectful silence, to his sage admonitions, though rather severe, without attempting any reply. And he also exactly followed the course prescribed to him, and humbled himself before God. And now the ALMIGHTY put an end to the debate, and spoke to Job, out of the whirlwind, in a most sublime and magnificent speech, chap. xxxviii—xli, the substance of which is nearly a counterpart to Elihu's, though more splendid in its ornaments and amplifications ; dwelling chiefly on the points noticed by Elihu, namely, the omnipotence of GOD, and man's utter ignorance of His ways and works of creation and providence.

Indeed, this argument of Omnipotence, when duly considered, (as Peters justly remarked, p. 184,) includes in it a full, perfect, and sufficient vindication of the ways of God with man. For if He can do all things, and nothing is impossible with God, He can have no temptation to do wrong ; for "GOD cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth He any man," James i. 13. Though for wise and salutary purposes, for correction, for discipline, for purification of heart and life, and preparation for a better, he tries the best men, like Job, and proves them in the divine inspiration, mysteries which were not to be accomplished in their times, but in ours. Mysteries "into which angels are desirous to pry," 1 Pet. i. 10—12.

Among these ancient prophets Job seems to be included by the apostle, by a marked reference immediately before, to the sufferings of the converts, designed, like those of Job, "for the proof of their faith, a proof much more precious than that of gold which perisheth, though proved by fire," ver. 7. Compare Job xxiii. 10.

furnace of affliction, that they may come forth like gold! While He restrains the craft and subtilty of the devil or man, working against them, to shake their faith, and “sift them as wheat,” by his all-governing and all-controuling providence; saying to the former, as to the ocean originally, Hitherto shalt thou come and no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed!—At the same time, of his infinite mercy and goodness, He is not severe to mark what they have done amiss, upon their hearty repentance and true faith, for HE knoweth whereof they are made, He remembereth that they are dust!

That transcendant speech, too long to be inserted, and too sublime to be abridged, begins with this animated interrogation:

XXXVIII. 2. *Who is this that darkeneth counsel
By words without knowledge?—*

XL. 2. *Let him that contendeth with the ALMIGHTY reply;
Let him that reproveth GOD answer.*

3. Then Job answered the LORD, and said,

4. Behold I am vile, what shall I answer Thee.
I will lay my hand upon my mouth.

5. Once have I spoken, but I will not answer;
Yea twice, but I will not proceed.

6. Then the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind—

7. *Gird now thy loins like a man:
I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto Me:*

8. *Wilt thou supersede My judgment?
Wilt thou condemn Me, to justify thyself?—*

XLII. 1. Then Job answered THE LORD, and said,

2. I know that Thou art all powerful,
And that no device can be withholden from Thee.

3. Who is this [saidst Thou] that hideth counsel without knowledge?
Therefore I uttered what I did not understand!
Wonders above me which I did not know!

4. Hear I beseech Thee, and I will speak,
I will inquire of Thee, and instruct Thou me;

5. By the hearing of the ear have I heard of Thee,
But now mine eye seeth Thee!

6. Wherefore I abhor myself,
And repent in dust and ashes.

This humble confession and self-abasement of Job was graciously accepted. It covered all his imperfections: his passionate complaints, wrung from him by the extremity of sufferings, corporeal and mental; his despair and weariness of life; his often wishing for death; his eagerness to come upon his trial; his earnest requests, and even expostulations with his Judge, to bring him to it, or at least to acquaint him with the reasons of such severe afflictions. Such shades and blemishes in the character of this illustrious patriarch, argue somewhat of impatience in this heroic pattern of patience*. But God is ever ready to pass over the frailties and infirmities of human nature, where there is a tried and resolute integrity, determined to adhere to GOD in all trials and temptations, whatever may be the result.

*Nec Deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus
Inciderit.* Hor.

The fullest exculpation of Job, and condemnation of his three friends, is furnished by THE ALMIGHTY himself, in the following historical conclusion.

XLII. 7. "THE LORD said to Eliphaz, the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends, because ye have not spoken rightly of Me, as hath my servant Job. Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering, and my servant Job shall pray for you (for him will I accept), lest I deal with you according to your folly, in that ye have not spoken rightly of Me, like my servant Job.

9. "So Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, went and did according as the Lord commanded them.

10. "And the LORD accepted Job: and the Lord turned the captivity of Job when he prayed for his friends.

"And the LORD gave Job twice as much as he had before."

The three friends, as we have seen, endeavoured to vindicate

* As a singular curiosity, the reader is presented with the following character of Job, and of his book, sketched with a masterly hand, by the witty Paine; the only one in the whole range of the Bible, which his jaundiced imagination has not caricatured: furnishing the most unequivocal proof of that excellence, which extorted even his applause!

"The book of Job shews itself to be the production of a mind cultivated in science.—The allusions to objects of natural philosophy are frequent and strong.—It is full of the meditations of a mind strongly impressed with the vicissitudes of human life, and by turns sinking under and struggling against the pressure. It is a highly wrought composition, between willing submission and involuntary discontent, and shews man, as he sometimes is, more disposed to be resigned than he is capable of being. Patience has but a small share in the character of the person of whom the book treats; on the contrary, his grief is often impetuous, but he still endeavours to keep a guard upon it, and seems determined, in the midst of accumulating ills, to impose upon himself the hard duty of contentment."—O SI SIC OMNIA!

the ways of PROVIDENCE, by contending for an exact distribution of good and evil in this world ; that the righteous are never afflicted without remedy, nor the wicked, upon the whole, prosperous here, which is a wrong representation of the fact ; and they falsely and uncharitably represented Job's sufferings as judgments from God for his wickedness. Their opinion, therefore, (like the Stoic philosophers in after ages, that virtue is its own reward,) tends, in its consequences, to sap the foundation from reason, of the belief of a future state ; which would be superfluous on this supposition. They therefore spoke unworthily of God. On the other hand, Job asserted that God destroyeth the perfect and the wicked, ix. 22, which is the argument upon which he all along insists ; that the righteous are sometimes afflicted here indiscriminately, and that without remedy, and the wicked prosper ; whence evidently follows the necessity of that future judgment in which he rests his hope, to redress all these seeming irregularities, when ultimately the righteous should be rewarded and the wicked punished. Job therefore spoke worthily of God, as the righteous Judge of all the earth.

The charity of Job was as conspicuous as his piety. GOD appointed him the priest to make atonement for his repentant friends. And it is truly remarkable, that it was not until the display of his charity in "praying for his friends," that "THE LORD turned the captivity of Job," or restored him to health and prosperity ; and "gave him twice as much as he had before."

With this simple conclusion the author of the book seems to have ended. The six remaining verses, particularizing the increase, the number of his sons and daughters, and the names of the latter, who, according to primitive usage, were made co-heiresses with their brothers ; and the number of years that Job survived his trial, form an appendix, which, probably, was added in later times from tradition, either by Moses, who resided so long in his neighbourhood, Samuel, or whoever introduced the book into the sacred canon.

At the end of the book, after the account of Job's death, xlii. 16. the Alexandrine Greek version adds, γεγραπται δε, παλιν αναστησεται αυτον, μετ' ων ανιστησιν ο Κυριος. "But it is written, that he shall rise again, along with those whom the Lord raiseth up." Where it was so written concerning Job, is not easily to be found ; unless in his own celebrated confession,

“I know that my REDEEMER is living,” &c. The remark, however, is so far of importance, as it proves the popular belief of the doctrine, before the coming of CHRIST: a belief, to which this inestimable book, we may rest assured, contributed not a little.

It is remarkable that Job's substance was doubled in every respect, except his children; for “he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses;” but only “seven sons and three daughters.” For this, the following excellent reasons are assigned by that early and learned Father of the Christian Church, Basil, in his Homily on the trials of Job, xxiii. p. 565, &c.

“When the Devil was foiled, his disease fled away also, having assaulted him in vain, and gained no ascendancy over him. He first began to be renewed with a second youth; he flourished also in his substance, which was restored to him with encrease; for riches flowed so plentifully into his house, that they became double of what he had before: First, that he might be no loser by his affliction; and secondly, that he might have a gracious reward of his patience under it. Therefore it was, that his horses, and mules, and camels, and sheep, and all the rest of his income, were doubled; only his children were not more than equal to the number he had before, seven sons and three daughters. The reason was, because his cattle perished entirely; but the better part of his children still survived, when they were taken from him. And, therefore, being again adorned with as many sons and daughters as he had formerly possessed, he had a double portion of them also: these, who were present with him here, and those who expected him in the next world.”

“Behold then,” proceeds this pious and enlightened divine, “what good things this just man, Job, heaped up for himself, by his patient submission to God! and do thou, therefore, if thou hast suffered grievously in this fire, which the malice of the devil hath kindled, bear it with constancy, and mitigate the affliction with these better thoughts: Cast all thy care upon THE LORD, and He will support thee.” See the whole of this admirable Homily, in Patrick's Commentary, Vol. III. Appendix, p. 61.

Job's trial, altogether, probably did not last a year; as we may collect from “the months of vanity,” of which he complains, vii. 3, compared with “the months past,” of his prosperity, xxix. 2.

THE FAITH OF JOB.

III. It now remains to ascertain the nature and extent of the faith of Job; a curious and important disquisition, involving the state of religion and morality in his age and country.

The two prime articles of patriarchal faith, from the earliest days, according to St. Paul, were, Heb. xi. 6.

1. That there is a GOD.

2. That He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.

These articles are comprised in Job's famous declaration,

*I know that my REDEEMER is living,
And at the last day shall arise [in judgment] upon dust.*

And, indeed, are inculcated throughout the whole book.

What exalted and sublime conceptions Job entertained of THE DEITY, and how firmly he trusted in Him, under all the pressure of his accumulated trials, may appear from the following specimens, selected out of many, stating his omnipresence, and spirituality or invisibility.

“ Canst thou by searching find out God?
Canst thou find out the ALMIGHTY to perfection?
Higher than heaven——what canst thou do!
Deeper than hell——what canst thou know!
Longer than the earth, is His measure,
And broader than the sea.”——xi. 7—9.

“ O that I knew where I could find HIM,
That I might go, even to his throne!——
Lo, I go eastward, but He is not found,
And westward, but I cannot perceive Him,
Northward, where He worketh, but I behold Him not,
He covereth Himself southward, and I cannot see:
But he knoweth the way that I take,
He hath tried me; I shall come forth as gold!”——xxiii. 3—10.

But where could Job expect to “come forth as gold,” purified and refined in the fire, and perfected by sufferings? Surely not in this life, in which he repeatedly despaired of his recovery; xvii. 1, xxx. 23, &c. and, from the beginning, wished for death to relieve him from his sufferings, iii. 21, vi. 9, vii. 21, x. 20, &c. It must have been, therefore, in the next, as intimated by the whole tenor of his argument; and especially in this and in the following passages, before and after his confession of faith, perfectly harmonizing therewith; such as vi. 8—10, xiii. 15, 16, xiv. 12—15, xvi. 19, &c. where he expected to be comforted and justified; and the wicked to be tormented, xxi. 30, xxvii. 8—19.

To this it has been objected, that in several passages Job speaks as if he had no hope beyond the grave, or considered death as an eternal sleep; such as vii. 8—21, x. 21, xvi. 22, xvii. 13—16; but surely these are to be limited, and to be interpreted in unison with the preceding*, that after death, he expected no return to this world; since he did not look for his “change,” or resurrection, until the general judgment at the end of the world. At the same time, it is by no means necessary to suppose, that this sage heathen was fully acquainted with the doctrine of the resurrection, as illustrated in the Gospel, and exemplified by CHRIST, “the first fruits.” It was to Job, as “a light shining in a dark place, until the day should dawn,” or rather, “shine forth in full splendour,” (διανγασθη,) 2 Pet. i. 19, involved in some degree of doubt and obscurity, John i. 5. Still, however, it was sufficient to guide his steps, to support his patience, in the main, and to animate his faith and hope, under the pressure of such accumulated trials, with the cheering prospect of being gathered to his fathers, and of seeing GOD, as He is.

Indeed, as observed before, the death of the pious Abel, immediately after his acceptance by GOD, was an argument for a future state, addressed to the reason of mankind; as the translation of the righteous Enoch afterwards, without tasting death, was more palpably addressed to their senses. With great propriety, therefore, are they placed in the fore-ground of the noble catalogue of the faithful, furnished by St. Paul, Heb. xi.

And this may account for the prevalence of the belief of a Providence, and of a future state, in the earliest and purest ages of the heathen world. Mankind received it first by tradition; they obscured, or lost it afterwards, by the speculations of vain philosophy, affecting to be wise above what was delivered by the ancients.

“If,” says Sir William Jones, in the foregoing discourse,

* If popular expressions were to be understood literally and rigidly, our Christian poet, Gray, might be charged with infidelity, in his celebrated Elegy in a Country Church-yard:

“Each in a narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep!”

“an inscription, said to have been found on marble in Yemen, be authentic, the ancient inhabitants of that country preserved the religion of Eber, and professed a belief of miracles and a future state.”——“We may safely pronounce, that before the Mahomedan revolution, the noble and learned Arabs were Theists;——because we have Arabian verses of unsuspected antiquity, which contain pious and elevated sentiments on the goodness and justice, the power and omnipresence of GOD:——but that a stupid idolatry prevailed among the lower orders of the people.”

How nobly Job protested against the growing idolatry of his age and country, will appear from the following passage :

- XXXI. 26. If I beheld the light [of the sun] when shining,
Or the moon advancing in splendour,
27. And my heart were enticed in secret,
Or my hand kissed by my mouth ;
28. Even this would be a judicial crime,
For I should have lied unto GOD ABOVE.

In Job's time idolatry was a capital offence*, cognizable by

* The propriety of this procedure is ably vindicated against the charge of intolerance or religious persecution, by the profoundly learned Bishop Butler, in his Occasional Sermon on the thirtieth of January, p. 363, sixth edition.

“Whenever the book of Job was written, the scene of it is laid at a time when idolatry was in its infancy, an acknowledged novelty, essentially destructive of true religion ; arising, perhaps, from mere wantonness of imagination, [Eccl. vii. 29.]

“In these circumstances, this greatest of all evils, which afterwards laid waste true religion over the face of the earth, might have been suppressed at once, without danger of mistake or abuse. And one might go on to add, that if those to whom the care of it belonged, instead of serving themselves of prevailing superstitions, had, in all ages and countries, opposed them in their rise, and adhered faithfully to that PRIMITIVE RELIGION which was received of old, since man was placed upon earth, (Job xx. 4,) there could not possibly have been any such difference of opinion concerning the ALMIGHTY GOVERNOR OF THE WORLD, as could have given any pretence for tolerating the idolatries which overspread it ; on the contrary, HIS universal monarchy must have been universally recognized ; and the general laws of it more ascertained and known, than the municipal ones of any particular country can be.

“In such a state of religion, as it could not but have been acknowledged by all mankind, that immorality of every kind was disloyalty to THE HIGH AND LOFTY ONE, that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy, (Isa. lvii. 15,) so it could not but have been manifest, that idolatry, in these determinate instances of it, was plain rebellion against HIM ; and, therefore, might have been punished as an offence of the highest sort against the Supreme Authority in Nature.

“But this is in no sort applicable to the present state of religion in the world : for if the principle of punishing idolatry, were now admitted among the several different parties in religion, the weakest in every place would run a great risk of being convicted of it ; or, however, heresy and schism would soon be found crimes of the same the Pelilim, or Judges, who were arbitrators, consisting of the heads of tribes or families, appointed by common consent, to try offences against the community, and to award summary justice. Such was the case of the Transjordanite tribes, suspected of apostasy, and threatened with extirpation by the heads of the ten tribes on the western side of Jordan, Josh. xxii. 16—22. Adultery was also cognizable by them, xxxi. 10, 11; and punishable with death, as in the case of Thamar, Gen. xxviii. 34.

How admirably does this sublime poem strike at the root of the Zabian superstition, which idly imagined that the stars and constellations were the residences of certain spiritual intelligences, regulating, by their occult influence, the various seasons of the year; in the following passages, proving that they were all mere machines, guided and directed by the almighty Creator and Governor of the universe.

IX. 2. "How can man be justified with GOD!—

7. Who commandeth the sun, and it riseth not,
And sealeth up the stars, [with clouds];—

9. Who made Aish, Chesil, and Chimah,
And the recesses of the south."

XXXVIII. 31. Canst thou shut up the delightful teemings of Chimah?

Or the contractions of Chesil, canst thou open?

32. Canst thou draw forth Mazaroth in his season?

Or Aish, with her sons, canst thou guide?

1. The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, and Vulgate versions, all agree that Chimah denotes the Pleiades, or principal cluster of stars in the constellation Taurus. And the name, signifying "charming," admirably corresponds to the delightful season of spring, of which Taurus was the cardinal constellation in Job's time; when the earth expands her bosom to the genial warmth of the sun, and all Nature blooms*.

2. The learned Abraham ben Ezra says, that Chesil denoted Antares, or the Scorpion's heart. Its name signifying "be- nature, and equally deserving punishment. Thus the spirit of persecution would rage, without any stop or controul.

"But our religious establishment disclaims all principles of this kind, and desires not to keep persons in its communion, or gain proselytes to it, by any other methods than CHRISTIAN ones, of argument and conviction."

* Nunc omnis ager, nunc omnis parturit arbos, Nunc frondent sylvæ, nunc formosissimus annus. Virg.

כִּימָה, Chimah, is derived from כָּמָה, Chamah, "desideratus est." Hence Cama, the Indian Cupid, armed with bow and arrows. Asiat. Research. Vol. I. p. 255. Fig.

numbed*, or torpid with cold," aptly represents the chill season of autumn, of which Scorpio was then the cardinal constellation, when the earth contracts her bosom at the approach of cold weather, in the month Chisleu, or November, when fires begin to be lighted, Zech. vii. 1, Jer. xxxvi. 22.

3. Suidas has happily determined the meaning of Mazaroth, in his second signification of Μαζουρωθ, namely, τον αστροων κυνα, "the constellation Canis;" belonging to the mighty hunter "Orion," or "the Giant" Nimrod, as it is expounded by the Septuagint, Vulgate, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic versions. It signifies "raging, or furious†," and aptly represents the sultry heats of summer during "the dog days;" when the dog star is drawn or dragged forth, by an Almighty Hunter, "from the recesses of the south," in the parallel passage, where he is poetically supposed to have lain hid, during the winter and spring; "in his proper season," which begins at the heliacal rising or emersion of Sirius from the sun's beams, and lasts for forty days until his sitting, or occultation.

4. With this southern constellation, is finely contrasted Aish, signifying "a group or assemblage‡," and aptly denoting, ac-

* כסיל, Chesil, from כסל, Chasal, "frigus," in Arabic.

† מזרות, Mazaroth, from מזר, Mazar, "inebrians, potens," Syriac, or "fortis ac validus fuit," Arab. And this derivation is confirmed by the Latin epithets of Sirius, and προκυων, canicula;—"Rubra canicula"—"Æstus caniculæ"—"flagrantis atrox hora caniculæ"—"Jam Procyon furit"—"Insana canicula"—"Rabiem canis."—"Sirius ardor"—"Torrens sitiens Sirius Indos," &c. in Virgil, Horace, Columella.

‡ עיש, Aish, from עוש, Aush, "congregavit."—Our English Bible, through inattention to the feminine affix בניה, "her sons," and from ignorance of astronomy, renders, "Canst thou guide Arcturus and his sons?" It is remarkable, that Job and Homer both agree in representing the bear as female: as observed before in the article of Nimrod. Dalhè, by a blunder unpardonable at the present day, calls Aish, "Ursus Major!"

N.B. This astronomical analysis was first published in the Inspector, 1799, 8vo. White. It was occasioned by the blundering ignorance of the witling Paine: who, from the Greek names of the constellations, "Pleiades, Orion, and Arcturus," in our public translation of those passages, idly imagined, that the book of Job was originally written in Greek, by some Heathen philosopher, and translated from thence into Hebrew: the Jewish translator, being ignorant of astronomy, (as he supposes the Jews in general were,) and retaining the Greek terms! Thus betraying his ignorance of Greek as well as Hebrew; since the fourth constellation, Mazaroth, by its Hebrew or Egyptian termination, (like Naboth, Thoth, Behemoth, &c.) could not otherwise have been overlooked by him; for it was discreetly left untranslated, from ignorance of its meaning, in the English Bible. In the Syriac dialect, by a usual change of kindred consonants, it is written Mazaloth, 2 Kings xxiii. 5, and unskilfully rendered "the planets;" as if it were plural. The Septuagint there, correctly restores the Hebrew Μαζουρωθ.—The cording to A. ben Ezra, the northern constellation of Ursa Major, supposed to preside over the winter frosts, from its contiguity to the north pole. The ancient versions all connected it with Arcturus or Arctophylax, the Almighty "keeper of the Bear;" who is here supposed to "guide her and her sons," in their never-setting diurnal rotation.

The whole drift of the argument, in these two most sublime, but difficult passages of Job, may thus be summed up :

GOD IS ALL POWERFUL———

Constantly regulating the appearance of the sun,
And of the stars, and the seasons of the year,
And canst thou, puny and presumptuous mortal!
Reverse the distinguishing characters of spring and autumn ;
Or produce the sultry summer-heats, and winter-frosts ;
Each in their proper season ?

The morality of Job was not less excellent than his theology. He thus expresses his undeviating obedience to the laws of GOD, and his delight therein.

- XXIII. 11. " My foot hath held in His steps,
I have kept His way, and not turned aside,
12. Neither have I gone back from the commandment of His lips.
I have esteemed the words of His mouth,
More than my necessary food."

It is evident from this passage, and others, that there was some collection of written precepts, or rules of religion and morality, in use among the patriarchs ; such were the precepts of the Noachidæ, or sons of Noah ; and there is great reason to believe, that the substance, at least, of the Decalogue, given at Sinai, was of primitive institution. The decree of the first council, held at Jerusalem by the apostles, seems to refer to such, Acts xv. 28, 29. Compare Gen. ix. 1—6.

How well he observed the duties of morality, may appear from the following :

- XXIX. 11. " When the ear heard, it blessed me,
When the eye saw, it witnessed for me,
12. Because I delivered the poor, that complained,
And the orphan, and him that had no helper.

Egyptian title of the dog star, was Chiun, (whence was derived the Greek κυων,) Amos v. 26 ; which, in the citation of this prophecy, is rendered Raiphon or Remphan, Acts vii. 43. Another Egyptian epithet of this star, signifying "verdant," from רִיף, Raiph, "viridis fuit." Castellus. Whence Egypt is called by the Arabs at present, Raif or Rif ; from its verdure and fertility, occasioned by the inundation of the Nile, beginning with the dog days.—Et Viridem Ægyptum, nigrâ fœcundat Arenâ. Virgil.

13. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me,
And I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.
14. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me,
And justice, as a robe and a diadem,
15. I was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame,
16. I was a father to the needy,
And the cause of the stranger, I searched out.
17. I also brake the jaws of the wicked,
And plucked the prey out of his teeth !"
- XXXI. 16. " If I withheld from the poor their desire,
Or caused the eyes of the widow to fail ;
17. If I ate my morsel by myself, [alone,]
And the orphan did not eat thereof ;
18. If from his youth, I brought him not up as a father,
And guided her, from her mother's womb ;
19. If I saw any perishing for want of clothing,
Or any poor without covering,
20. If his loins did not bless me,
And he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep ;
21. If I lift up my hand against the orphan,
When I saw my assistance in the gate,
22. Then let my shoulder fall from the blade,
And mine arm be broken from the socket.
- XXXI. 1. " I made a covenant with mine eyes,
That I would not look upon a maid.
2. For what would be [my] share in GOD ABOVE,
Or, my inheritance with the ALMIGHTY ON HIGH ?
3. Is not destruction [reserved] for the wicked,
And estrangement [from GOD] for the workers of iniquity ?
4. Doth not HE see my ways,
And count all my steps ?" —

Such was Job's " religion pure and undefiled," who " visited the orphan and widow in their affliction, and kept himself " unspotted from the world ;" no wonder, then, that it was accepted " before GOD, even THE FATHER," James i. 27.

This surely is gospel faith.—And the apostle James, in his excellent practical epistle, seems particularly to allude to the case of Job, whose " patience" he expressly celebrates, in the following marked passages also, i. 2—26.

" My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into various trials : knowing that the proof of your faith worketh patience : Let patience, then, have her perfect work ; that ye may be perfect and complete, deficient in nothing.—

" Blessed is the man that endureth trial : for when he is proved, he shall receive the crown of life ; which THE LORD hath promised to them that love him.

" Let no man say, when tempted, ' I am tempted by GOD :'

for God cannot be tempted by evil, neither tempteth He any one, HIMSELF: But every man is tempted, when he is drawn out, by means of his peculiar appetite, and *ensnared (δελεαζομενος) [by the Devil; that wicked ‘fisher of men:’] Then the appetite having conceived, produceth (τικτει) sin; and sin when perfected, bringeth forth (αποκυει) death.”—

“If any seem to be religious among you, who bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his heart; this man’s religion is vain.”

OUR LORD also, has set his seal to the integrity of Job, by marked allusions to his continence, in abstaining from “the lust of the eye,” in his Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vi. 28, 29. And to his charity, in feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, &c. at the representation of the general judgment, Matt. xxv. 34—46.

There is a remarkable reference in the book of Job, to the former destruction of the world by water, and to its final dissolution by fire; which was prophesied by Enoch before the deluge, as we have seen in the foregoing pages; whence it must have been known to Noah; and no doubt, transmitted by him to his family; and so might be communicated to Job and his friends. It occurs in the last speech of Eliphaz, the most intelligent of the three.

- XXII. 15. Dost [not] thou keep the old way,
Which wicked men have trodden?
16. Who were cut off, before their time,
The flood overthrew their foundation:
17. Who said unto GOD, ‘Depart from us:’
And, ‘What can THE ALMIGHTY do for us?’
18. Yet He filled their houses with good,
Though the counsel of the wicked was far from Him,

* The finest comment on this passage of James, (more critically translated from the original,) is furnished by Shakspeare, in that inimitable soliloquy of a libidinous and hypocritical Judge, caught by the charms of a fair and virtuous maiden, when supplicating for an offending brother’s life:

“O cunning Enemy! that to catch a Saint,
With Saints dost bait thy hook: Most dangerous
Is that temptation, that doth goad us on to sin,
In loving VIRTUE!”————— “Hooking both right and wrong to the appetite,
To follow as it draws!”—————

Measure for Measure.

This is exquisite moral painting, drawn from NATURE, or from the GOSPEL, in the original.—Quere, Did Shakspeare understand Greek?

19. The righteous saw, and were glad,
And the innocent [Noah] derided them :
20. ' Is not their substance cut down ?
And the fire shall consume the remnant of them !'

As if Noah had said, Though this judgment by water, however universal, may not so thoroughly purge the earth, as that iniquity shall not spring up again, and wicked men abound: yet know that a final judgment by fire, will utterly consume the remnant of such sinners as shall then be found alive, along with the earth itself.

This surely is a more rational interpretation of the last clause, furnished by the very intelligent Peters, p. 411, (who has seized the spirit of the original, in many places, where tamer commentators "weary themselves to find the letter;") than that of Heath and others, who refer it to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.—For, as Peters justly objects, "How could the destroying a little city or two, be said, with any propriety, to consume the remnant, that is, the whole remainder of wicked men; when, at the same time, Chaldea, and perhaps the greatest part of the world, was overrun with idolatry?"

Of this final judgment, Moses has given no obscure intimation, in his Divine Ode, Deut. xxxii. 22.

For a fire is kindled in mine anger,
And it shall burn to Hades beneath ;
It shall consume the earth and her productions,
And set on fire the foundations of the mountains.

" Hades beneath," or " the lower Hades," ἕως Ἁϊδου κατω, as rendered by the Septuagint, is what St. Peter called Tartarus, in the parallel passage, noticed before; ταρταρωσας, 2 Pet. ii. 4.

The Chaldee Paraphrast has given a very bold exposition of the whirlwind, out of which the Lord is said to have answered Job, xxxviii. 1. understanding it figuratively, as a "whirlwind of grief," or amidst the tumult of Job's sorrows.

But the generality of expositors agree in understanding it to denote a visible and miraculous interposition of the VISIBLE LORD, appearing in a cloud, the symbol of his presence, or the ANGEL OF THE COVENANT, speaking in GOD'S name. Such divine manifestations and communications to favoured mortals, were not infrequent in the purer patriarchal ages; and are plainly intimated in some remarkable passages of the poem, by Eliphaz, iii. 12—21. Elihu, xxxii. 8—16, xxxiii. 14—17.

And by Job, viii. 5. It may, therefore, best be understood literally. The Divine argument, on the Omnipotence of God, displayed in the works of the Creation, is transcendently sublime; furnishing, indeed, internal evidence the most irresistible, that it must have proceeded from immediate inspiration; like the Divine Ode of Moses; which, perhaps, is the only part of the sacred writings that may admit of comparison therewith, except our Lord's divine Sermon on the Mount, his parables and discourses. But like the ALMIGHTY himself, it is veiled in clouds and darkness, and fraught with difficulties and obscurities, arising out of the subject itself, and the majesty, energy, and conciseness of the style; abounding in short and animated interrogations, crowding thick upon each other in rapid succession; and operating on the imagination, like flashes of lightning, with a suddenness and force impossible to be resisted. Such are the sublime passages respecting the creation of the world, and the cardinal constellations; amidst a multitude.

There is a part of this speech especially, that seems as if it were designed to humble the pride of the learned; namely, the pompous descriptions of the Behemoth and Leviathan, with which it concludes.

One good use may result from these and the like difficult passages of Scripture: they will lead us to know our own mediocrity; that we must not hope to understand every thing in the word of God, any more than in his works. Peters, p. 441.

From a careful and critical comparison of the Hebrew Text with the Ancient Versions and the best modern commentators; and by availing myself of the various readings, furnished by these Versions, the Septuagint and Vulgate especially, I have endeavoured to render more justice both to the translation and to the argument, than is possible, from the present Masorete text alone. Still, however, adopting the apology of his ablest expositor, Peters; "whoever attempts to write on the book of Job, must be a happy man indeed, if he does not commit some errors. My own may form, perhaps, the subject of another's observation," p. 173.

VINDICATION OF JOB.

Before I close this long and important article, it is a debt of justice due to this venerable and enlightened patriarch, to vindicate his fame from some calumnies of later date, with which it has been assailed by injudicious friends or concealed enemies.

1. By a mischievous misconception, founded upon incorrect translation of the original, and want of sufficient attention to the whole tenor of the argument, the learned orientalist, *Schultens, has idly imagined, that Job had the rashness and folly to challenge the ALMIGHTY himself to trial, as a party, when he only appealed to Him as a judge between him and his accusers. And he has been followed by several expositors. The passages on which he founded it, are principally xiii. 19—22, xvii. 3, xxiii. 3—7, and xxxi. 35. In all which, it is evident, that the adversary whom Job challenged to a trial before the Divine tribunal, was Eliphaz chiefly, the eldest and most pertinacious of his accusers. Indeed Job himself expressly declares, ix. 32, 33, early in the debate, that “ he, as a man, could not contend with GOD;” for that there was no umpire to arbitrate between them both. Consequently, to challenge God, would not only be foolish and absurd, but ruinous also; as tending to provoke the ALMIGHTY to render his condition still worse, for such daring arrogance and presumption: which is the very argument adduced by Schultens himself, from Mercerus, in his note on another passage, ix. 17, vol. I, p. 246.—Si a Deo non lacessito, non provocato, tam graviter adfligat; quid non paterer, si Eum in jus trahere, atque lacessere, auderem?

2. The later Jewish Rabbi's, Ben Maimon, (or Maimonides, as he is called by Christian writers,) David Kimchi, &c. have defamed Job, no less than his immediate friends. They accuse him of denying the resurrection, and a future state; of blaspheming God, as if he asserted, that “ GOD made no distinction between the just and the unjust, by reason of the baseness of the human race:” and they accordingly load him with maledictions;

* Schultens published an elaborate Commentary on Job, in two volumes, 4to. 1737, which contains several useful and ingenious remarks, amidst a multitude that are irrelevant or nugatory. His predilection for Arabic literature led him, on many occasions, to adopt fanciful derivations from the Arabic, when better could be found in the Hebrew; and his Latin translation is rugged, and frequently unintelligible. It is given, with a selection from his notes, in Grey's useful edition of Job, in 8vo. Dathè has given a freer Latin translation, better expressing the meaning and spirit of the original: and a generally close and correct English Translation, by that early prodigy of genius and learning, Miss Elizabeth Smith, was published, after her decease, by the Rev. Dr. Randolph, 8vo. 1810, Bath.

Terra super os Jobi, &c. "Let Job's mouth be stopped with earth," &c. More Nerochim, p. 403.

That Job did not deny a resurrection, is evident from the preceding analysis of the general argument. And perhaps we may trace the slander to their own pride and self-sufficiency: they were persuaded that "salvation was of the Jews;" that the doctrine of the resurrection was first revealed to Moses and their nation only; and they could not brook, nor bring themselves to grant, that an "alien from the commonwealth of Israel," or a foreigner, like Job, could have been acquainted therewith, from different and independent sources of tradition or revelation. And the REDEEMER of Job, bore too striking a resemblance to the SAVIOUR of the Christians.

Upon all these accounts, they set themselves to depreciate a book so highly esteemed in the earlier and purer ages of their Church, long before the time of CHRIST, if not from the age of Moses.

Unhappily, the imposing weight of their authority in Hebrew literature, influenced several learned and ingenious Christian writers to imagine, that Job looked only to a temporal deliverance, or to a miraculous restoration of his former health and prosperity. In this class we may rank Le Clerc, Grotius, Patrick, Warburton, Heath, Dathè, Stock, &c. At first, adopting the opinion of the Jews, and afterwards, following each other. To them, however, we may oppose authorities of no less weight and erudition, equally skilful and industrious to "search the original Scriptures," without respect of persons or parties: such as Mercerus, Schultens, Houbigant, Spanheim, Lowth, Michaelis, Sherlock, Grey, Scott, Parkhurst, &c. and Peters, who is himself a host; maintaining, and upon the strongest grounds, that Job looked beyond the grave to a future resurrection. An opinion, which now, I trust, is placed beyond the reach of further controversy.

The grand moral of the book is to show, 1. that GOD sometimes permits the best men to be afflicted by Satan, and that most grievously, in this life, to try or prove their faith, patience, humility, and resignation to his will: that 2. this world is not a perfect state of retribution for virtue and vice: but that 3. all the inequalities that are to be found here, will be completely redressed in a future state, at the general judgment, in which the good will be finally rewarded, and the wicked punished.

Job indeed, was one of the best men that ever lived; but he was not exempt from the frailties and infirmities of human nature; and he failed, in some measure, under his last and sorest trial. Still, with all his imperfections, he will shine forth to the end of time, an admirable example, and a heroic pattern of piety and patience: to be exceeded only by THAT inimitable standard of perfection, who was “meek and lowly of heart;” who was “tried in all respects as we are,” and that “by the Devil,” but yet did “no sin,” nor was guile found in his mouth; and who was “perfected by sufferings,” in this life, that HE might be “transcendently exalted at the right hand of GOD,”—the “blessed seed of the woman,” THE MAN CHRIST JESUS.

“There is, methinks,” says Peters, p. 118, “a pleasure in observing the accomplishment of that passionate wish of his, chap. xix. 23, and that in a higher and better sense than Job himself could possibly have hoped for when he made it.

“Had his words been graven upon a rock, they might have remained some few ages; but in this divine poem they will live for ever. And how could this good man better employ the remainder of that life which God had so miraculously restored and lengthened out to him, than in the composing such a noble work as this! A thing so agreeable to his own most ardent wishes, and for which none could be so well qualified as he:—to write his own story, and to leave it as an instruction for the Church of God in all succeeding ages.”

With this period the Mosaical history properly commences. All the preceding part of Genesis is only introductory to the birth of Abraham, the illustrious ancestor of the Israelites, and of the Jews; the father of the faithful, and by the highest of all titles, “the friend of GOD,” 2 Chron. xx. 7, Isa. xli. 8, James ii. 23, and “a blessing” to the world, Gen. xii. 2; as being the privileged ancestor of CHRIST, in whom, “all the nations of the earth are blessed,” Gen. xxii. 18.

“Now these are the generations of Terah [or the history of his family]. Terah begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran.” &c. Gen. xi. 27.

The chronology of this period has been considerably embarrassed by the vulgar error, that Abram was the eldest of Terah's sons, because he is named first; and the date of Abram's birth has been usually assigned to the seventieth year of Terah, because it is said that "Terah lived seventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran." But this is the date of the birth of Haran, who was unquestionably the eldest son, because his daughters, Milcah and Iscah (the latter surnamed Sarai and Sarah) were married to their uncles, Nahor and Abram, respectively, and Sarah was only ten years younger than her husband, Gen. xvii. 17; Abram was probably the youngest son, born by a second wife, Gen. xx. 12, when Terah was 130 years old, Gen. xi. 32. xii. 4, as proved in Vol. I. p. 229, &c.

From this rectification of the time of Abraham's birth, in the year B.C. 2153, according to the genuine system of Josephus, (see Vol. I. p. 297,) the outline of this period is easily adjusted, for Abram was 75 years old when he went to Canaan, and the exode of the Israelites from Egypt happened 430 years after, Gen. xii. 4, Exod. xii. 41, Gal. iii. 17, amounting to 505 years. We learn also from Josephus, that from Abraham's migration to Canaan, until the settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt, was 215 years, and from thence to the exode 215 years more; thus subdividing the 430 years, Ant. II. 15, 2. And it was foretold to Abraham by the divine ORACLE, that "his seed should sojourn in a land, not their own" [Canaan], and serve [in Egypt] 400 years, in round numbers, and should return again to Canaan in the fourth generation after they left it, Gen. xv. 13—16, which was accordingly fulfilled; for from the birth of Isaac, the promised seed, to the exode was 405 years, and Moses, who led the Israelites out of Egypt, was the fourth in descent from Levi, whose son, Kohath, was born in the year of their migration to Egypt, shortly before it; and from the exode of the Israelites, under Moses, till their arrival in Canaan, under Joshua, was 40 years more.

But there are some chasms in the sacred history which render it difficult and embarrassing to fill up the outline, and give the particular dates in detail. 1. The stay of Abraham's family at Charran, until the death of Terah, is not noticed in Scripture; and 2. The years of the births of Levi, Kohath, and Amram, are also omitted, though the lengths of their lives are given in their genealogy, Exod. vi. 16—20. Fortunately these chasms are supplied by the judicious Abulfaragi, and by him only, with critical accuracy. He informs us, 1. that Abraham was 60 years old at the time of his first migration to Charran, where he staid with his household fourteen years complete, or fifteen years current, p. 13; and 2. that Levi was born when Jacob was 82 years old, p. 15; Kohath when Levi was 47*, p. 17; and Amram when Kohath was 75, ibid. These numbers accurately harmonize both with the outline and with the detail, and by so doing, demonstrate their correctness.

We shall now proceed to explain the leading events of this period.

ABRAHAM.

Terah's family were originally idolaters, and "served other gods," Josh. xxiv. 2. According to tradition, Terah himself was a statuary, or maker of images, Suidas voce Σεργουχ. Such were the Teraphim, or "images" of divination, probably, in his grandson Laban's days, used in Mesopotamia, Gen. xxxi. 19. But they were converted to the true faith by special revelation to Abraham, Acts vii. 2, and forced to fly from Chaldea, to avoid the persecution of their countrymen, for adhering to "THE GOD whom they knew, THE GOD OF HEAVEN;" because "they would not follow the gods of their fathers," Judith v. 6—8. In obedience to the divine oracle, Terah, his two sons Abraham and Nahor, and their wives, and Lot, the son of Haran, went from the family settlement, "Ur, of the Chaldees," in the eastern, to Charran, in the western part of Mesopotamia. Compare Gen. xi. 31, with xxiv. 10, where Charran is called "the city of Nahor," and xxvii. 43, the residence of Laban, his son.

FIRST CALL.

This first call, omitted in the Old Testament, is fortunately recorded in the New;

"THE GOD OF GLORY appeared to our father Abraham while he was [at Ur of the Chaldees] in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Depart from thy land and from thy kindred, and come hither to a land (γην) which I will shew thee. Then departing from the land of the Chaldees, he dwelt in Charran," Acts vii. 2—4. Compare Nehem. ix. 7.

* In the foregoing Table, Levi's generation is reckoned 48 years current, in order to complete 215 years to the migration of Jacob's family to Egypt, and to complete the remaining 215 years from the birth of Kohath, shortly before, to the exode; therefore Kohath was the youngest son of Levi, Gen. xlvi. 11.

Charran, as it is called still by the Arabian geographers, was Carrhæ, a city in the north-west part of Mesopotamia, famous in after times for the defeat of Crassus, the Roman general, by the Parthians; it was seated upon a river of the same name, which ran into the Chaboras, and thence into the Euphrates, and was about 150 miles distant from Ur, lying in the road to Canaan. See Bochart's Phaleg, map, p. 78, and p. 95. This then was a convenient resting place for the aged Terah, and there they all "sojourned many days," Judith v. 8, or fourteen years, till his death, aged 205 years, Gen. xi. 32.

"From thence, after his father's death, GOD removed him to the land of Canaan," Acts vii. 4.

SECOND CALL.

This is recorded in the Old Testament only.

"Then THE LORD said unto Abram, 'Depart * from thy land,' and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto the land (צְרַרְרָא, תְּנִיב גְּנֻב, Sept.) which I will shew thee †," Gen. xii. 1.

The difference of the two calls (more carefully translated from the originals) is obvious; in the former, the land is indefinite, which was designed only for a temporary residence; in the latter, it is definite, intimating his abode. A third condition is also annexed to the latter, that Abram shall now separate himself from his father's house, or leave his brother Nahor's family behind at Charran. This call Abram obeyed, still "not knowing whither he was going," but trusting implicitly to the Divine guidance, Heb. xi. 8 ‡.

"So Abram departed, as THE LORD had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: (and Abram was seventy-five years old when he departed from Charran.) And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot, his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Char-ran; and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and came to the land of Canaan," Gen. xii. 3—5.—“The souls that they had gotten” during their sojournment of fourteen years in Char-ran, were “the little ones of their household,” (עִילִים) which formed part of the riches of the primitive patriarchal times; see Job xix. 18; xxi. 11; and compare Gen. xiv. 14.

* Heb. לך, לך. "Go, go."

† This call is injudiciously confounded with the former, in the English Bible; incorrectly rendering the Hebrew, "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country," &c. Gen. xii. 1.

‡ This distinction of the two calls is not novel: I have since found that it was made by the sagacious Lightfoot, on Acts vii. 3, and noticed from him in Poole's Synopsis.

When Abram arrived at Shalem, or Sichem, in the plain of Moreh, and northern part of Palestine, then inhabited by the Canaanite tribes, as distinguished from the rest, the Hivites, Perizzites, &c. GOD was pleased, in reward of his faith and obedience, to appear unto Abram a third time, and to enter into a covenant with him, ratifying the promise He had made him before he left Charran, which was both of a temporal and spiritual nature.

FIRST COVENANT.

“And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed,” xii. 2, 3.

—“Unto thy seed will I give this land,” xii. 7.

The temporal part was the promise of prosperity; that he should be blessed himself, and be the founder of a great nation, which should inherit that land: the spiritual, that he should be the chosen ancestor of the promised REDEEMER, and, thereby, the means of “blessing all the families of the earth.”

From this covenant, so understood, the Apostle Paul dates the commencement of the 430 years, Gal. iii. 14—17.

The implied condition on Abraham's part, was that he should publicly profess the worship of the TRUE GOD in this more tolerant land. And accordingly, Abram built here an “altar unto THE LORD, who appeared unto him;” and again, in his progress southward, another altar, at Luz, or Bethel; where “he called upon the name of THE LORD,” xii. 7, 8.

VISIT TO EGYPT.

Abram's visit to Egypt was occasioned by a sore famine in the southern part of Palestine, towards which he still proceeded. Egypt at this time was under the iron yoke of the Arabian, or Cushite shepherds, who had invaded and conquered it, in the time of Tirmaus, or Thammuz, under Salatis, about B.C. 2159, or seventy-two years before this visit; which the generality of chronologers place in the year after his arrival in Canaan, B.C. 2077. See the ensuing rectification of Egyptian chronology.

Here Abram appears to have laboured under a temporary suspension of faith, and to have stooped to the mean and foolish prevarication of denying his wife, and making her pass for *his sister: apprehending that the fear of God was not in that country, and that he should be killed on account of her great beauty, if she was known to be his wife. And had not the Lord miraculously interposed to punish Pharaoh, “the king,” (as the name signified in the Egyptian tongue,) and his household “with great plagues, because of Sarai, Abram’s wife,” whom he withheld; and to reveal to him the truth; and to compel him with a high hand to restore her, and dismiss him with all his substance, Abraham must have sunk under his timidity, and forfeited his title to the covenant which God had so recently made with him, Gen. xii. 11—20.

What is still more extraordinary is, that Abraham failed, a second time, under the same trial, twenty-three years after; when he again denied his wife to Abimelech, the king of Gerar, whose character, and that of his people, was the reverse of that of the Egyptian court: for he took her in the “innocency of his heart,” and his nation was then “righteous;” God therefore dealt more gently with him than with the Egyptians; and removed the plague of barrenness from him and his household, on Abraham’s intercession, Gen. xx. 1—18.

The beauty of Sarah at that time, when she was in her nineteenth year, and pregnant with Isaac, seems to have been miraculous; and the latter circumstance especially, renders Abraham’s conduct still more unaccountable. But he nobly retrieved his character in his last and sorest trial; his faith increasing, as he had further proofs of the divine aid and veracity.

After his return from Egypt, Abraham advanced northwards, as far as Bethel, his first station in the land of Palestine; where he again called on the name of THE LORD, xiii. 1—4. Some time after, a separation took place between him and his nephew Lot, because their substance was too great for them to dwell together in that land. Abraham kindly gave Lot his choice, what part of the vacant country to occupy. So Lot chose Sodom, in the fertile plain watered by the river Jordan, eastward; while Abraham remained in the land of Canaan; and after the separation, he pitched his tent in Hebron, about twelve miles to the south of Jerusalem, and built there also an altar to THE LORD: who was pleased to signify the exclusive inheritance of the whole land to him and to his seed for ever; rejecting Lot's family, xiii. 5—18.

RESCUE OF LOT, AND DEFEAT OF THE ASSYRIANS.

About eight years after Abraham's migration to Canaan, the cities of the plain, Sodom, Gomorrhah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela, afterwards called Zoar, rebelled against Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, (or a part of Persia, called by Heathen writers, Elymais,) after having served him as tributaries twelve years. He therefore invaded their territories, assisted by his neighbouring allies, the kings of Shinar, or Babylonia, Ellasar, and Goim, or "nations" which lay between Elam and them, defeated the confederate cities in a pitched battle, after reducing in their route*, the Rephaims, Zuzims, Emims, Horites, Amorites, and Amalekites; and carried away much spoils and many captives; and among them Lot and his goods. Hearing of this disaster, Abraham armed three hundred and eighteen trained servants of his household, pursued the invaders, and, according to Josephus, overtook them on the fifth night, encamped at Dan, one of the springs of the river Jordan; and dividing his small force into two parties, attacked them on opposite sides, secure and careless, and buried in sleep and wine, defeated them with great slaughter, and recovered all the goods and captives; and among them his brother Lot †: and he generously refused any recompense for his services from the king of Sodom:

"And Abraham said, I have lift up my hand [or sworn] unto THE LORD, the MOST HIGH GOD, the CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH, that I will not take any thing that is thine, from a thread to a shoe-latchet; lest thou shouldst say, I have made Abraham rich," xiv. 1—23.

* See their route, traced on the Map, Vol. I. p. 397.

† See Vol. I. p. 287.

MELCHIZEDEK.

On this occasion, Abram, returning from the slaughter of the Assyrians, in his way to Hebron, was met at Shaveh, or “King’s dale,” (afterwards the valley of Jehoshaphat, between Jerusalem and Mount Olivet,) by Melchizedek, king of Salem, (the most ancient quarter of *Jerusalem,) and priest of THE MOST HIGH GOD; who gave him a eucharistic feast of bread and wine; and blessed him in the name of THE MOST HIGH GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH. To whom Abram, in return, piously gave tythes, or the tenth part of all the spoils, as an offering to GOD: thus acknowledging his sacerdotal office, Heb. vii. 2, Joseph. Ant. i 10, 2.

This Canaanitish prince was early considered as a type of CHRIST, in the Jewish Church;—“THOU art PRIEST for ever, after the order of Melchizedek!” Psalm cx. 4, who resembled CHRIST in the following particulars: 1. in his name, Melchizedek, “King of Righteousness;” 2. in his city, Salem, “peace;” 3. in his offices of king and priest of the Most High God; and 4. in the omission of the names of his parents and genealogy, the time of his birth, and length of his life; exhibiting an indefinite reign and priesthood; according to the Apostle’s exposition, Heb. vii. 5. And from whom, perhaps, OUR LORD adopted the symbols of bread and wine in the Eucharist, as of primitive institution.

A leading reason, we may presume, which influenced Abraham to settle at Hebron, was its vicinity to Salem, and to the public worship of the true God there. For the religion of Abraham and Melchizedek were evidently the same; from their joint use of the same epithets, or attributes of the DEITY; which were introduced, or designed to counteract the Zabian idolatry. That this idolatry had crept from Chaldea, where it began, into the northern borders of Palestine, before Abraham’s days, is evident, among other reasons, from the names of places: thus, the Rephaims, or “giants,” who were smitten by the Assyrian confederates in their march, xiv. 5, worshipped the moon in particular; as we may collect from the name of their district, Ashteroth-Karnaim, signifying “the shining cow two horned †.”

* See the Map of Jerusalem, Vol. I. p. 437.

† Ashteroth, from עשת (Asht,) “to shine;” תורה (Torah,) “a cow,” or “heifer,” in Chaldee; and Karnaim, the dual of קרן (Kern,) “a horn.” Hence

And the idolatrous worship of "Baalim," or of "Baal and Ashtaroth," (the sun and moon,) was that into which the northern tribes of Israel fell the soonest; these being "the principal gods of the people that were round about them," Judges ii. 12, 13. The tribe of Naphthali, in particular, which afterwards occupied the country of the Rephaims, worshipped "the heifer Baal," before the Assyrian captivity, Tobit i. 5. The southern districts of Palestine, were, at that time also, a more religious people; as in the case of the Arims, the ancient inhabitants of Gerar, and the people of Abimelech; who were then "a righteous nation," as pleaded by Abimelech to God; and God admitted the plea; though afterwards they were expelled or subdued by the Philistines, or "shepherds," who fled from Caphtor, or lower Egypt, in Jacob's days, when they grew corrupt, Gen. xx. 1—4, Deut. ii. 23, Gen. xxvi. 1, as will be shewn in the ensuing rectification of Egyptian chronology.

THE WORD OR ORACLE * OF THE LORD.

"After these things," or after this eminent display of brotherly kindness, generosity and piety, (and we may reasonably conclude, the Sidonians called the moon Astarte; and "queen of the stars," or "queen of the heavens," Jer. vii. 18; and the Phœnicians called the sun Beelsamen, "master of the heavens," whom the Ammonites and Moabites called Baal, Numb. xxii. 41; and Moloch, or Melech, "king," i. e. "of the heavens," 1 Kings xxi. 7, Jer. xi. 5, xxxii. 35. Orpheus called the moon ταυροκερως μηνη; and Horace, "Siderum regina bicornis;" both renderings of Ashtaroth Karnaim.

* The original expression, דָּבָר יְהוָה, DABAR IAHOH, is rendered here, and throughout the work, THE ORACLE OF THE LORD, or THE ORACLE, in preference to the WORD OF THE LORD, or THE WORD, for the following reasons:

1. To avoid ambiguity, by discriminating the PERSONAL WORD from the written word.

2. The term Oracle is familiar in Scripture. It is applied to the inner Sanctuary, whence the divine responses were given from the Mercy-seat, 2 Sam. xvi. 23, 1 Kings vi. 5—16, &c. And the divine responses, and revelations to the prophets, are frequently rendered Λογια, in the New Testament, and translated Oracles, in our Bible, Acts vii. 38, Rom. iii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 11, &c.

3. St. Paul has sanctioned the use of the term, by his rendering of the original expression, ὁ χρηματισμος, Rom. xi. 4, which Macrobius, a competent judge of the Greek language, renders Oraculum, in Latin. And there seems to be a peculiar propriety in this rendering, which so pointedly describes "THE TRUE ORACLE," reclining on THE FATHER'S bosom; who expounded (ἐξηγησατο) his spiritual nature and true worship to mortals, (John i. 18, Matt. xi. 27) and revealed his "lively oracles" to the Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian world, as THE SAVIOUR OF MANKIND; thus pointedly contrasted with the false Oracle, Apollo, the destroyer of mankind; the Abaddon of the eastern soon after,) a signal manifestation of Himself was made to Abraham by the personal WORD OF THE LORD, or ORACLE OF THE LORD, for the first time that this expression is used in the Old Testament: “who came to Abram, in vision, and said, “Fear not, Abram, I am thy shield, thy exceeding-great reward.” Thus promising him protection and abundant recompence:—an heir that should proceed from his own loins,—not Eleazar of Damascus, his household steward,—as Abram complained; and a seed as numerous as the stars of heaven,—“And he believed, (or trusted) in THE LORD, and it was counted to him for righteousness,” xv. 1—6. This is that faith of Abraham, which is so highly celebrated in the New Testament, Rom. iv. 3, Gal. iii. 6, James ii. 23, and which consisted in a firm belief or persuasion, that the divine promises, both temporal and spiritual, would be fulfilled in their season; and a conduct suitable to that persuasion; which were counted meritorious in the sight of God.

On this solemn occasion, The ORACLE OF THE LORD announced Himself to Abram, as the same God who had brought him out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give him the inheritance of the land of Canaan. And He was pleased to gratify Abram, after a sacrifice which He prescribed, in a vision, with a prophecy of the wanderings and servitude of his posterity in Canaan and Egypt, four hundred years; their return to Canaan, when the iniquity of the Amorites, (and other inhabitants,) should come to the full, in the fourth generation, after the descent to Egypt; and to fix the boundaries of the land promised to his seed, xv. 7—21. See the Elements of Ancient Geography, Vol. I. p. 413.

ISHMAEL.

After ten years' residence in the land of Canaan, Abram, by the persuasion of his wife, who had been barren heretofore, and now despaired of bearing children herself, when she was se-world, and the βασιλευς απολλυων, or αναξ απολλων, of the western; who was the Old Serpent, the Devil, or Satan, deceiving the whole world.

These reasons, the Author humbly trusts, will be sufficient to justify him for the use of a term which he dares not surrender, without incurring the imputation of “handling the word of GOD deceitfully,” through that “fear of man which bringeth a snare.”—To please all sorts and conditions of readers, is indeed impossible; he wishes to sacrifice to THE TRUTH alone.

venty-five years old, took as a second wife, or concubine, her handmaid, Hagar, an Egyptian. And when Hagar conceived, she despised her mistress; who dealt hardly with her, Abram giving her up to his wife's discretion; so that she fled towards Egypt from the face of her mistress; but was stopped in her flight by the ANGEL OF THE LORD, who foretold that she should bear a son called Ishmael, because "THE LORD heard" her affliction, and that his race should be numerous, rapacious, and unconquered; so remarkably fulfilled in the Ishmaelites, or Arabs, even to the present day! And Abram was eighty-six years old when Hagar bare Ishmael, chap. xvi.

ISAAC PROMISED.

Thirteen years after, when Abram was ninety-nine years old, THE LORD appeared to him by the name of ÆL SADI, "GOD ALMIGHTY;" changed his name from Ab-ram, signifying "a high father," to Abraham, "a father of a multitude of nations*." And solemnly renewed the covenant, to "be A GOD unto him and to his seed;" and instituted the rite of circumcision in token thereof, for an everlasting covenant. He also changed his wife's name from SARAI, signifying "my princess," to SARAH, "the princess," promised him a son by her, and declared that she should be "a mother of nations." And when Abraham laughed inwardly with joy at the prospect of a son, when he was a hundred years old, and Sarah ninety; and prayed for a blessing on Ishmael: the LORD promised that Ishmael should beget twelve princes, and be the founder of a great nation: but that His peculiar covenant should be limited to the son which Sarah should bear that time twelvemonth; and who should be called Isaac, "he laughed," to record the foregoing circumstance.

The self-same day, in obedience to the Divine ordinance, Abraham himself, his son Ishmael, and his household servants, and slaves, were all circumcised, xvii. 23—27.

About three months after, THE LORD was pleased to renew the promise to Abraham that Sarah should bear a son; when HE and two attendant angels, in human form, to make trial of Abraham's hospitality, visited, conversed, ate and drank with him. Sarah also laughed inwardly at the good tidings ; which at first she disbelieved, on account of her great age, and that it had “ ceased to be with her after the manner of women.” But THE LORD rebuked her, and said, “ Is any thing too hard for THE LORD? at the time appointed I will return to thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah shall bear a son.” The original term which this Divine Person here applies to himself, is the awful and venerable name, יהוה, (IAHOH,) usually rendered “ THE LORD,” xviii. 1—14.

* From אב, (Ab), "a father;" רב, (rab), in Chaldee, "great;" and הם, (Ham), the abridgment of המון (Hamun), "multitude;"—Abraham, Ab-rab-ham, "a father of a great multitude."

The faith of both Abraham and Sarah on this occasion, are celebrated in the New Testament, in the following passages, more closely translated.

“ Abraham, against hope, believed in hope, that he should become a father of many nations, according to the saying, So shall thy seed be. And not being weakened in faith [by the increase of his age,] he considered not his own body, now deadened, (νενεκρωμενον,) when he was about a hundred years old, nor the deadness of Sarah’s womb ; and staggered not, through unbelief, at the promise of God, but was strengthened in faith, giving glory to God ; being fully persuaded, that what HE had promised, He was able to perform : and therefore, it was imputed to him for righteousness,” Rom. iv. 18—22.

“ By faith Sarah herself also received strength to conceive seed, and bore [Isaac] when she was past the seasonable age, because she accounted HIM faithful who had promised.”

“ Therefore there sprang from one, and he too deadened, (νενεκρωμενον,) in these respects, [a seed] like the stars of heaven for multitude, and as the sand on the sea shore innumerable,” Heb. xi. 11, 12.

DESTRUCTION OF SODOM, &c.

The enormous wickedness of these cities of the plain, now ended in their total overthrow. Unmindful of the merciful warning they had recently received in their defeat and captivity by their Assyrian masters, and their deliverance by the valour and generosity of Abraham, principally for Lot his brother’s sake, they persisted in their evil courses ; and so universally had they corrupted their ways, that when Abraham was informed by his divine guest, immediately after the preceding transaction, of his intention of punishing their wickedness, if the report of it were well founded ; mindful of Lot, he ventured to intercede with the righteous Judge of all the earth, with much humility, for the devoted city of Sodom; and emboldened by the Lord's gracious acceptance of his repeated intercessions for sparing the city, at first if there were fifty righteous, and at last if there were only ten found therein; his conduct on this occasion furnishes a powerful instance of the efficacy of well-directed prayer; and an encouragement to the faithful at all times, to continue instant in prayer, watching thereunto with all perseverance; without fainting indeed, but with all humility of mind. Though Abraham did not succeed for the guilty Sodom, his intercession was powerful to save Lot and the righteous part of his family; for "it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that GOD remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow." And one of the five cities, Zoar, was saved from the general destruction, by the sole intercession of Lot; and, by a gracious impossibility, Sodom itself, the largest and the guiltiest could not be destroyed, while one righteous person remained therein.—"See, I have accepted thee," said THE LORD to Lot,—"that I will not overthrow this city for which thou hast spoken: Haste thee, escape thither, for I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither."

These are remarkable and comfortable instances of the mighty efficacy of intercession before the throne of grace: "Much availeth the energetic supplication of the righteous," James v. 16, not only for themselves, but for their families and friends, and for their country, and even for strangers: while the destruction of Sodom, because there were not ten righteous found therein, furnishes a most awful and awakening example, that every obstinate and incorrigible sinner, is not only an enemy to himself, but an enemy to his family and to his country; by contributing to swell the tide of national guilt, which will not fail to end in national calamity, whenever the measure of the iniquity of the individuals that compose the community, shall come to the full!—The inhospitality of the inhabitants of Sodom to the two attendant angels, who went thither while Abraham was pleading their cause before THE LORD, who designedly remained behind to give him this opportunity; and their ingratitude to their benefactor Lot, to whom they owed their deliverance from captivity, completed their complicated crimes, and hastened their catastrophe.

"GOD having consumed to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrhah, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample to the ungodly in future, and delivered righteous Lot, afflicted with the filthy conduct of the lawless: (for this righteous man, dwelling among them, afflicted his righteous soul from day to day, with seeing and hearing their unlawful deeds,) 2 Pet. ii. 6—8.

The fate of Lot's wife, who, for “looking back *” wistfully towards Sodom, in their flight, contrary to the divine command, was turned into “a pillar of salt,” furnishes an awful warning of the dangers of irresolution, and relapse into unbelief † and disobedience. So it is perhaps applied by our SAVIOUR: “No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of GOD,” Luke ix. 63. And in that most awakening representation of the dreadful catastrophe that is to come upon the Christian world, about the time of his next approaching advent; the example of the people of Sodom, and of Lot's wife, is forceably adduced by our Lord:

“Likewise, as it was also in the days of Lot, they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, [the LORD] rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all: so shall it be in the day when the SON OF MAN is to be revealed.”

“In that day, whosoever shall be on the house [top,] and his furniture in the house, let him not descend to take it away; and whosoever shall be in the field, let him likewise not return back [to his house.] Remember Lot's wife, Luke xvii. 28—32.

And in his instructions to his Apostles, and to the seventy disciples, to preach repentance through the cities of Judea and Galilee, he repeatedly declares, that “it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrhah, than for that city, [which should refuse their preaching,] in a day of judgment,” or visitation by temporal calamities, Matt. x. 15, Mark vi. 11, Luke x. 12.

The following most tender and affecting apostrophe of the tutelar God of Israel, to that backsliding people, drawn from the fate of the two remaining cities of Admah and Zeboim,

* Hence probably was derived the Grecian fable of the descent of Orpheus to hell, or hades, to recover his wife Eurydice, whom he lost again, for “looking back” at her on the way.

which shared in the general overthrow, is furnished by the Prophet Hosea :

How shall I give thee up Ephraim !
 How shall I deliver thee up Israel !
 How shall I make thee as Admah !
 How shall I set thee as Zeboim !
 My heart is turned within me,
 My bowels are moved together ;
 I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger,
 I will not return to destroy Ephraim :
 For I am GOD, and not man,
 THE HOLY ONE in the midst of thee, x. 8, 9.

Yet notwithstanding God's reluctance to punish that most highly cherished people, when they obstinately persisted in their ingratitude and disobedience, and abusing his indulgence and forbearance, grew more and more corrupt and licentious, He saw it expedient to execute his long threatened judgments upon them, even to the utter subversion of their kingdom, and desolation of their country ; which ever since the Babylonian and Roman captivities, has been subject to a foreign yoke.

In the account of the overthrow of Sodom, there is a distinction of persons in the Godhead, marked in the original, which is ambiguous in the English Bible :

“ The sun was risen upon the earth, when Lot entered into Zoar. Then the Lord (יהוה) rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrhah, brimstone and fire* from THE LORD (את יהוה) out of heaven,” xix. 24. The former was the visible Lord, “ THE

* Though this shower of fire and brimstone, or sulphureous lightning, was unquestionably miraculous, from its beginning at the precise time that Lot entered into Zoar, that “ little” city of refuge, yet it may not be improper to observe, that such showers have sometimes fallen, even in Europe.

The Abbé Richard, in his entertaining Histoire Naturelle de l' Air, Vol. V. p. 370, records the following, as happening in one of the sea-port towns of Spain.

“ In the month of November, 1741, a cloud of this sort, driven by a very violent east wind, struck several times against the mountains above the town of Almeria, in the kingdom of Grenada, in Spain, near Capdegate, in 31 deg. 51 min. latitude ; and then burst, and discharged a shower of burning sparks, (une pluie d'étincelles ardentes,) which not only set fire to all the country in the environs, and especially to the brambles with which the mountains called Alpuzarras, are covered, which stopped the cloud, but even to a part of the squadron then in the harbour of Almeria, commanded by M. De Court. The ships le Saint Esprit, commanded by M. de Piolenk, le Tigre, by M. de la Galissoniere, and l'Eole, by M. le Chevalier d'Albert, were damaged by the fall of these fires. This fact has been certified to me by M. le Marquis de Bataille, governor of Flavigny ; who was at that time an officer in the squadron.”—Some other instances, of a similar nature, may be found in a former publication of mine, De Sonis et Modificationibus Atmosphærae, 1778, p. 85.

IMAGE," or representative, of "THE INVISIBLE," whom "no man hath seen, at any time, nor can see; nor ever saw his shape, nor heard his voice;" as we learn from the former; who only could expound to mortals, the nature and the will of the FATHER: for "no man intimately knoweth (επιγινωσκει) the FATHER, save the SON; and he, to whomsoever the SON is willing to reveal [HIM*."] Compare Coloss. i. 15, John i. 18, v. 37, 1 Tim. vi. 16, Matt. xi. 27.

LOT'S POSTERITY.

The failings of Lot and his daughters, are impartially related in the same chapter which records their miraculous deliverance. From their incestuous commerce sprang two sons, whose descendants, the Moabites and Ammonites, soon relapsed into the idolatry of the neighbouring nations. And mindful, it should seem, of their origin, by the usual association of fornication and idolatry, they afterwards seduced the Israelites in the plains of Moab: which gave rise to that severe law of Moses, that an Ammonite or Moabite should not enter into the congregation of the Lord, [as a citizen,] even to his tenth generation, Deut. xxiii. 3. In order to preclude any intermarriages with them.

St. Paul is supposed by some to have alluded to this transaction, in his prohibition against drunkenness, the sin under which Lot fell. "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is dissoluteness (ασωτια): but be filled with THE SPIRIT," Ephes. v. 18.

ABRAHAM VISITS GERAR.

The time of this visit is ascertained by its happening between the destruction of Sodom and the birth of Isaac, the next year. It probably took place the same year, shortly after the former

* That the visible LORD was the SON OF GOD, was the doctrine of the primitive Church:

FILIUS est qui ab initio judicavit: turrim superbissimam, (Babel), elidens, linguasque disperdens; orbem totum aquarum violentiâ puniens; pluens super Sodomam et Gomorrham ignem et sulphurem, DOMINUS a DOMINO. Tertullian.

Philo has a fine remark, applicable to the deliverance of Lot and the destruction of Sodom:

"When THE ORACLE OF GOD, (ὁ του Θεου λογος), comes from [Heaven] to visit our mundane system, he aids and assists the friends of virtue, and such as are disposed to virtue; so as to grant them complete succour and safety; but on the adversaries he inflicts incurable loss and destruction."

This coincidence of the primitive Jewish and Christian Churches, respecting the person and character of CHRIST, is most satisfactory.

catastrophe, which naturally struck great terror all around. To this, perhaps, Abimelech's expostulation with the Lord, obliquely referred,—“Wilt THOU also destroy a righteous nation!” xx. 4. Sarah's pregnancy would, in the next year, naturally have discovered the imposition put upon the king by Abraham; which was noticed in the former article, of his visit to Egypt. Abraham now settled at Beersheba, in the neighbourhood of Abimelech, xxi. 14—34.

ISAAC BORN.

Sarah not only bore Isaac, when she was ninety years old, but she also suckled him. In the joy of her heart she said, “GOD hath made me to laugh; so that all that hear, will laugh with me;” or rejoice at this miraculous dispensation of Providence, xxi. 6.

When Isaac was weaned, Ishmael, the son of Hagar, who was now about fifteen years of age, offended Sarah by some mockery or ill-treatment of Isaac; the original word signifies elsewhere, “to skirmish, or fight,” 2 Sam. ii. 14. And St. Paul represents Ishmael as persecuting him, Gal. iv. 29. Sarah therefore complained to Abraham, and said, “Cast out this bond-woman and her son, for the son of this bond-woman shall not be heir with my son Isaac. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight, because of his son Ishmael;” but God approved of Sarah's procedure, and again excluded Ishmael from the special covenant of Grace; “for in Isaac shall thy seed be called: Nevertheless, the son of the bond-woman will I make a nation also, because he is thy seed.” And GOD renewed this promise to Hagar, during her wanderings in the wilderness of Beersheba, when she despaired of support;—“Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hands, for I will make him a great nation. And GOD was with the lad, and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, and became an archer. And his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt,” xxi. 8—21.

“And Abraham planted a grove, [or place of worship,] in Beersheba, (signifying “the well of the oath,” from the convention into which he there entered with Abimelech,) and called there on the name of THE LORD, THE ETERNAL GOD,” or his “EVERLIVING REDEEMER,” in the language of Job.

ABRAHAM'S LAST TRIAL.

After a residence of many days at Beersheba, xxi. 34, when Isaac was come to the age of twenty-five years, according to Josephus, Ant. I. 13, 2. God was pleased to prove Abraham, by the last and greatest trial of his faith and obedience, after he had passed through nine trials, according to the Jewish doctors, 1. in quitting his native country, Chaldea; 2. his flight to Egypt from famine in Canaan; 3. the first seizure of Sarah in Egypt; 4. the war for the rescue of Lot; 5. his taking Hagar to gratify Sarah; 6. his circumcision; 7. the second seizure of Sarah in Gerar; 8. the expulsion of Ishmael; 9. the expulsion of Hagar.

XXII. 2. "And the Lord said unto Abraham, Take now thy son, thy *only son, whom thou lovest, Isaac, and get thee unto the land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I shall tell thee."

3. "And Abraham arose early in the morning and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went towards the place which God told him."

4. "And on the third day [of the journey], Abraham lift up his eyes, and saw the place [Mount Calvary] afar off. And Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass, while I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and return again to you. So Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife, and they went both of them together."

7. "And Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son: and he said, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering? And Abraham said, *GOD will see (or provide) for

* Isaac was not the "only son," as in the English Bible. The Hebrew יְהוֹדָי, (Jehid) is rendered by the Septuagint here, μονογενης, "only begotten," which is adopted by St. Paul, Heb. xi. 17. "Only," is the literal translation of the Hebrew; and in the usual latitude of speech, frequently "pre-eminent," or "excellent." In this sense, THE FATHER is styled the ONLY TRUE GOD, John xvii. 3; without excluding THE SON from being THE TRUE GOD also, 1 John v. 19. And in the concluding Hymn of the Communion Service, THE SON is invoked in a similar sense, "Thou only art HOLY; thou only art THE LORD; thou only, O CHRIST, with the HOLY GHOST, art most high in the glory of GOD THE FATHER. Amen."

* From the name given to this place by Abraham, Jahoh Jireh, "THE LORD will himself a lamb for a burnt offering, my son. So they went both of them together.”

After this ambiguous answer, Abraham probably unfolded to Isaac, on the way to the top of the hill, that he was himself the victim provided by GOD. When this pious and dutiful youth voluntarily submitted to become a sacrifice, in obedience to the will of God, and the desire of his father. It could not be an act of compulsion; for how could his aged father, of 125 years, alone, without assistance, have compelled a youth of 25 years, in full strength and vigour, and who was able to carry the whole of the wood, from a considerable distance? It must, therefore, have been with Isaac's own consent.

9. “And they came to the place of which God had told him, and Abraham built an altar there, and laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar, upon the wood: and Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son.”

“11. “And THE ANGEL OF THE LORD called to him out of heaven, and said Abraham! Abraham! and he said, Here am I. And He said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing to him: for now I know that thou fearest GOD, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thy only son, from Me.”

13. “And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns; and Abraham went and took the ram [which GOD thus unexpectedly provided,] and offered him up for a burnt offering, in the stead of his son. And Abraham called the name of that place JAHOH JIREH*, (“THE LORD WILL SEE,”) according as he see,” afterwards, Gen. xxii. 14, Kennicott, with much probability, infers, that the original reading here was Jahoh; which was changed into Elohim. Dissert. Vol. I. p. 510.

* The true ancient pronunciation of “this glorious and awful name, יהוה,” was lost, by the superstitious scruples of the Jews to utter it, perverting the meaning of Deut. xxviii. 58; and substituting for it, Jehovah, formed by the vowels of Elohim, &c. But the primitive pronunciation has been fortunately preserved in several of the Heathen Classics, according to the pronunciation of those foreigners who had early intercourse with the Israelites, and afterwards the Jews. Thus the Clarian Oracle, (founded before the Trojan war,) in answer to the enquiry, “Which of the Gods is he to be reckoned, who is called IAΩ?” uttered a remarkable response, preserved by Macrobius, of which this is a part:

Φραζεο τον παντων υπατον Θεον εμμεν' ΙΑΩ.

“Learn, that THE GOD SUPREME OF ALL, is IAΩ.”

See my Dissertations, p. 192, and the Hymn of Eupolis.

said that day, on the Mount, "THE LORD will see," &c. alluding to his ambiguous answer, "GOD will see," &c. *

It is most highly probable, that GOD, on this occasion, revealed to Abraham, that great future sacrifice of the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world: for so may we most easily and naturally interpret our Lord's observation to the unbelieving Jews, those unworthy children of faithful Abraham, who boasted that they were not born of fornication, (like the Ishmaelites, &c.) but were Abraham's legitimate children: "Your father Abraham longed to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad;" or he foresaw it, in prophetic vision, John viii. 56, like Baluam, the Chaldean diviner, afterwards. "I see Him, but not now: I behold Him, but not nigh," &c. Numb. xxiv. 17.

And Isaac was a remarkable type of Christ, in his voluntary devotement of himself, in the prime of life, and in his carrying the wood for the burnt sacrifice on his shoulders, as Christ, his cross †, the beloved son of his father, as CHRIST, of GOD.

We may, therefore, reasonably conclude, that Abraham also, was among those ancient prophets, to whom the SPIRIT OF CHRIST, which was in them, revealed the sufferings of CHRIST and his ensuing glories, 1 Pet. i. 11; Luke xxiv. 25—27.

On this last trial, GOD was pleased to renew and ratify by an oath, his special covenant with Abraham.

XXII. 15. "And the ANGEL OF THE LORD called unto Abraham the second time out of heaven, and said, By MYSELF have I sworn saith THE LORD, because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thy only son, That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore, and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice."

* The received translation of this passage: "As it is said [to] this day, In the mount of the Lord [it] shall be seen;" is scarcely intelligible, and is also ungrammatical: for the verbs אָמַר and רָאָה, should be rendered actively, in Kal, "dixit," and "videbit;" not passively in Niphal, dicitur and videbitur; contrary to their acceptation in the rest of the chapter, and to the obvious analogy of the case. The Vulgate and Syriac Versions have rightly rendered the latter clause, "Domínus videbit."

† This is not the observation of Christian divines only, the Jews themselves have so understood it: the lesser Bereshith, on the passage, "and Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon his son:" observes in a note—"as a man carries his cross upon his shoulders." Pearson on the Creed, p. 200.

By the latter "seed" St. Paul understood a single person, and "that seed is CHRIST," Gal. iii. 16.

This last and greatest trial of Abraham's faith and obedience has given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, as if unworthy of GOD to propose, and of Abraham to obey, being repugnant, say they, to the fundamental principles of religion and humanity, which both prohibit human sacrifices, especially of the innocent: it may not be amiss, therefore, to vindicate the Divine command, and Abraham's implicit obedience thereto, by considering, with all due humility, the motives which may have led to both.

The horrid custom of human sacrifices, introduced by the gradual corruption of the primitive religion, had probably, by this time reached Palestine, and Moloch, the Sun, and his bloody sacrifices, in Canaan, either accompanied, or soon followed, we may presume, the worship of Ashteroth Karnaim, or the Moon, and were prevalent throughout Phœnicia, Egypt, and the coasts of Asia and Africa, colonized by the gloomy and superstitious race of Cush and Ham. Diodorus Siculus relates that it was an ancient usage of the kings of Egypt, especially of the shepherd dynasty (founded soon after Abraham's birth) to sacrifice men to Typhon, at the tomb of Osiris, particularly in the dog days, when those Typhonian victims, as they were called, were burnt alive, and their ashes scattered in the air! And Philo remarks, that "the Barbarian nations had long reckoned the sacrifice of their children as a work holy and acceptable unto God; it being the most valuable and precious offering in their power to present." Following early ages, we may presume, the Sepharvites, in later times, burnt their children in the fire to their gods, Adram-Melech and Anam-Melech, 2 Kings xvii. 31. And the king of Moab, when pressed in battle, "took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt offering upon the walls," 2 Kings iii. 27. Balak proposed the same, Micah vi. 7. See the following article of Balaam's Prophecies.

Hence Philo conjectures, and not unreasonably, that God proposed to Abraham, as a test of his zeal for the true God, that usual sacrifice by which the Heathen manifested theirs to their false gods. And this seems to derive weight from the requisition itself:—"Take now thy son, thy only son, whom thou lovest, Isaac," the terms rising in their value, by an admirable climax, from the first to the last, according to the order of the original. GOD, therefore, in kindness to Abraham, knowing the strength of his faith, designed to make him an illustrious example, as the Father of the Faithful, to all future ages, that when proved, like Job, he might come forth as gold; thus proportioning the greatness of the trial to the firmness of his faith*.

And as God was pleased to grant Abraham, at his request, a sacrificial sign of the temporal branch of the covenant, in the heifer, she-goat, and ram, which he divided asunder, and the turtle-dove and pigeon, which he divided not, Gen. xv. 8—12: so, from analogy, we may conclude, that this was a sacrificial sign also of the spiritual branch, in consequence of a request of Abraham, not noticed in the Old Testament, but intimated by our Lord, that “Abraham longed to see his day;” and in other passages, as where He declared to his disciples, that “many prophets and kings had desired to see those things that they saw, and did not see them,” &c. Luke x. 24. And, perhaps, after the sacrifice of the ram, substituted by THE LORD, instead of his son, the great mystery of the future sacrifice of Christ, on that very spot, was graciously revealed to him; to which also he seems to have alluded in the name of the place, JAHOH JIREH.

We may then naturally account for Abraham's readiness to obey the divine command, however revolting to human nature and a father's feelings, if it was in consequence of his own requisition of a sign. While he was careful to guard against this transaction being brought as a precedent for human sacrifices †, by cautiously excluding his attendants from witnessing it. He

* Some years since, a lady in Italy, who had lost an only and a darling son, at confession, could not forbear repining at her loss. Her confessor endeavoured to console her, by reference to Abraham's case: “True father,” said she, “GOD knew what Abraham was able to bear, but He would not have laid so heavy a trial upon Sarah!”

† By preventing the sacrifice of Isaac, GOD testified his rejection of human sacrifices. Sanchoniatho, in his Phœnician History, strangely metamorphosed this transaction; he represented Saturn, whom the Phœnicians call Il, as sacrificing his only son, Icud, by the nymph Anobret, adorned in royal attire, upon an altar which he had made. Euseb. Præp. Evangel. 4, 16.

Here the Phœnician Il is evidently from the Hebrew אֵל, Æl, “God;” Anobret, from חַן עֹבֶרֶת. Han-obreth, by “grace conceiving,” as intimated of Sarah in Scripture; and Icud, from יחיד, Ichid, “only,” the epithet of Isaac.

The learned Poole, in his excellent Synopsis, observes, “Such is the relation of Sanchoniatho and Porphyry: the Devil wishing that the matter might be so understood, as to be made a precedent, which happened accordingly, for they sacrificed their children, through a false and vicious desire of imitating Abraham.” designed to have offered up his son, indeed, but in the presence of God alone; and the intention * was accepted by God, as equivalent to the actual sacrifice, "Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son," &c. For Isaac was virtually dead from the time of his intended sacrifice. Hence the apostle remarks, that Abraham "received him from the dead, εἰ παρὰβολῆ, in a parable, figure, or similitude."

But how did Abraham reconcile the required sacrifice and death of his son with GOD's promise, that in "Isaac should his seed be called?"

He was assured that the command came from that GOD who had so often appeared to him personally; he was likewise persuaded that GOD could neither lie nor do wrong; therefore depending upon the promise, he implicitly obeyed the command, though he could not comprehend the reason of it. And he still hoped even against hope, in this instance also, that the same ALMIGHTY, who gave him this son, out of the usual course of nature, would again raise him from the dead, or restore him to life, after he should be sacrificed. And this is the Apostle's solution, "By faith, Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac, and he that had received the promises offered up his only son; accounting that GOD was able to raise him even from the dead. From whence also he received him, in a figure" [or resemblance of the resurrection from the dead], Heb. xi. 19.—Isaac was figuratively "offered up," and therefore figuratively "received again" by his joyful father, who might well say, This my son was dead, and is alive again! and was lost, and is found! And surely Isaac must have been more endeared to him than ever, by this signal proof of pious resignation and filial duty.

Twelve years after the last transaction, Sarah died at Kiriath Arba, or Hebron, to which place Abraham returned from Beer-sheba: her age was 127 years. Isaac was then 37 years old, having been born when his mother was 90. Gen. xxiii.

FAITH OF THE PATRIARCHS.

Abraham's declaration, that "he was only a stranger and sojourner in that land," and his purchase of a burial-place for his deceased wife and his family from the proprietors, the

† A Heathen philosopher has justly observed, Ea quæ proficiscuntur a virtute, susceptione prima, non perfectione recta sunt judicanda.—This was the Stoical doctrine.

Hittites, or sons of Heth, Gen. xxiii. 3—20, is finely introduced by St. Paul, to prove how well he and the Patriarchs understood that the grant of the land of promise gave them no present title, or immediate possession of it, that it was only designed for a future inheritance.

“By faith Abraham sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents, with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. For he looked unto the city that hath [lasting] foundations, whose builder and framer is GOD, Heb. xi. 9, 10.

“All these died in faith * ; not having received [the fulfilment

* These important passages lead us to a more correct rendering of St. Paul's celebrated definition of faith, at the beginning of this chapter.

“Faith is a subsistence of things hoped for ; a conviction of things not seen,” Heb. xi.

1. The original term ὑποστασις, literally signifying a “foundation,” is often understood figuratively for a firm assurance, or a confident expectation. It is the rendering of the Septuagint for the Hebrew תַּלְתָּה, “patient expectation,” Psalm xxxix. 8 ; and for הַקָּה, “earnest expectation,” Ruth i. 12, Ezek. xix. 5. And Diodorus Siculus contrasts ὑποστατικός, a confident person,” with ἀνηλπισας, one “without hope.” In the second clause, οὐ, “not,” may be put for οὐπω, “not yet,” corresponding to Noah's conviction of the approaching deluge, μηδεπω βλεπομενων, though “not yet seen,” ver. 7 ; and to the Patriarchs' conviction of the truth of the Divine promises, though seen afar off, verse 13. But although the subjects of Faith are for the most part future “things not yet seen ;” yet the past is by no means excluded ; as in the first instance of the “creation of the worlds :” therefore the general expression in the definition οὐ βλεπομενων, “not seen,” is to be retained.

Chrysostom has furnished an admirable commentary thereon :

Ἡ πιστις τοιωνν εστιν οψις των αδηλων, φησι, και εις την αυτην τοις ορωμενοις φερει πληροφοριαν τα μη ορωμενα.— Επειδη γαρ τα εν ελπιδι ανυποστατα ειναι δοκει, ἡ πιστις ὑποστασιν αυτοις χαριζεται· μαλλον δε, ου χαριζεται, αλλ' αυτο εστιν ουσια αυτων. Οιον δε αναστασις ου παραγεγονεν, ουδε εστιν εν ὑποστασει, αλλ' ἡ ελπις ὑφιστησιν αυτην εν τη ἡμετερα ψυχῃ.

“Faith, then, is vision of things unseen. And it brings the things that are not seen to the same fulness of assurance as the things that are seen. For when the things hoped for seem to be unsubsisting, faith bestows on them a subsistence, or rather, not bestows, but constitutes itself their existence. Thus the resurrection is not yet come, nor is it already in subsistence, but hope makes it subsist in our mind.”

This is a happy illustration of the transition from the literal sense of the word ὑποστασις, “foundation,” to the figurative πληροφορια, “fulness of assurance,” with which it is here considered as synonymous. And the familiar, but most important instance of the resurrection is well chosen, which OUR LORD represents as already present to the faithful, by a beautiful and lively anticipation of the event: “Verily, verily, I say unto you, that whosoever heareth my discourse, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath (εχει) eternal life, and is not to come into judgment, but is already passed (μεταβεβηκεν) from death unto life.” John v. 24.

And so St. Paul: “But ye are already come to (προσεληλυθατε) Mount Zion, and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to myriads of angels, to the assem- of] the promises, but seeing them afar off, having been persuaded of, and embracing them, and confessing ‘that they were strangers and sojourners in the land.’ For they that speak thus, indicate that they seek a country [of their own;] and, truly, if they had been mindful of that from whence they came [Chaldea], they had opportunity to return thither. But now they desire a better, that is, a heavenly; wherefore God is not ashamed to be called THEIR GOD, for He hath prepared for them a city”—“the Heavenly Jerusalem,” Heb. xi. 13—16; xii. 22.

ISAAC’S MARRIAGE.

In his fortieth year Isaac married Rebecca, the grand-daughter of Nahor, Abraham’s brother, by his son Bethuel; who had remained behind with his family at Charran, when Abraham removed to Canaan from thence, Gen. xxii. 20—23, xxiv. 15, xxv. 20.

ABRAHAM’S SECOND MARRIAGE.

Soon after his son’s marriage, Abraham married Keturah, when he was turned of 140 years of age; by whom he had six sons, Zimram, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah; and before his death, thirty-seven years after, he settled her sons, in the east country of Arabia, near the residence of Ishmael. Whence the Ishmaelites and Midianites are mentioned promiscuously afterwards, when Joseph was sold to them by his brethren, Gen. xxv. 1—10, xxxvii. 28.

Some chronologers, Bishop Clayton, Hallet, &c. thinking it improbable that Abraham should marry again at such an advanced age, have dislocated the chronology of this period, by supposing that Abraham took Keturah as a concubine, in consequence of his wife Sarah’s barrenness, even before he left Charran; and that Keturah’s children were among the souls that were born to him and Lot during their residence there.

But it is evident from the whole tenor of the history, that Abraham was “childless” until the birth of Ishmael, Gen. xv. 2, 3; that he had no other son but Ishmael when he received the promise of Isaac, Gen. xvii. 18; and that Isaac and Ishmael, jointly, as his eldest sons, celebrated his funeral, Gen. xxv. 9. That he should marry again, at 140 years of age, shews his faith blage and Church of the first born, registered in heaven, and to GOD the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men perfected, and to JESUS the Mediator of the new covenant,” &c. Heb. xii. 22.

in the divine promise, that he should be “a father of many nations:” for which purpose his constitution might have been miraculously renovated, like Sarah’s. Besides, Abraham himself was born when his father Terah was 130 years of age. “The souls gotten in Charran,” denoted the joint increase of the households of Abraham and Lot. Even after their separation in the land of Canaan, Abraham took with him, in the pursuit of the Assyrian confederates, “318 trained servants, born in his own house,” about eight or nine years after his arrival in Canaan; several of these, therefore, must have been born at Charran, in order to be then able to bear arms, Gen. xiv. 14.

ESAU AND JACOB.

After Isaac and Rebecca had been married twenty years, Esau and Jacob were born, Gen. xxv. 26. Their fortunes were predicted, before their birth, by the Oracle of the Lord, which Rebecca went to consult, (at Debir, perhaps, signifying “the Oracle.”) Abulfaragi, from ancient tradition, reckons that the response was given by Melchizedek, p. 15.

The Oracle foretold that “Rebecca should bear twins, and that the elder brother should serve the younger,” which was afterwards fulfilled in the days of David, who subdued Edom, and put garrisons in all the country, 2 Sam. viii. 14, 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13.

From the adoption of Jacob’s family in preference to Esau’s, before their birth, when they had neither done good nor evil, St. Paul infers, that the purpose of God’s election was not derived from works, but from his sole will and pleasure; as strongly expressed by Malachi the prophet, “Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated,” Rom. ix. 10—13, Mal. i. 2.

After Abraham’s death, the Lord blessed his son Isaac, and made him to prosper greatly, Gen. xxv. 11. And he twice solemnly renewed the Abrahamic covenant with him in its full extent, during his residence in Gerar, Gen. xxvi. 2—5; and again, after his removal to Beersheba, Gen. xxvi. 23, 24.

During his residence in Gerar, Isaac denied his wife, as his father Abraham had done, in the same country, and for the same reason; for which he also was reproved by the reigning king, Abimelech; who likewise was a just prince, and feared God; and renewed with Isaac the convention that had been formerly made with Abraham, Gen. xxvi. 6—31.

Esau, the elder son of Isaac, was guilty of two offences, by which he forfeited his title to the blessing of Abraham. First, "he despised his birthright," and sold it to his brother Jacob for a mess of pottage, to relieve his hunger, Gen. xxv. 29—34. That this birthright meant more than the temporal rights of primogeniture, namely, a double portion of the father's estate, Gen. xlviii. 22, and authority over the younger brethren, Gen. iv. 7, is noticed by the Jewish Targums on the place, "Thus Esau despised the birthright, and the portion in the world to come"—Jonathan Ben Uzziel. "Thus Esau despised the birthright, and spurned his portion in the world to come, and renounced the resurrection of the dead." Jerusalem. And this interpretation seems to be warranted by the NEW TESTAMENT, which styles Esau "profane," Heb. xii. 16.

Next, when he was forty years old, (the age at which his father Isaac married, and which seems to have been the established age of manhood, till Moses' days; compare Exod. ii. 11, Acts vii. 23.) he took two wives of the Hittites, one of the devoted nations of Canaan; "which were a grief of mind to Isaac and Rebecca," Gen. xxvi. 34, 35, and for which he is also called a "fornicator" in the New Testament, Heb. xii. 16. Still "Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison: but Rebecca loved Jacob," who declined such prohibited intermarriages.

ISAAC'S BLESSING TO HIS SONS.

Thirty-seven years after, when Jacob was seventy-seven years old*, according to Abulfaragi, p. 15, and Isaac 137, "when he was old, and his sight had failed, and he expected soon to die, his partiality for Esau led him to attempt to set aside the oracle, and the cession of Esau's birthright to Jacob, by conferring on him the blessing of Abraham, in reward for bringing him savoury venison to eat, before his death. In this design, however, he was disappointed by the artifice of Rebecca, who dressed her favourite Jacob in his brother's cloaths, and made him personate

* His age at this time, may thus be collected from SCRIPTURE. When Jacob had been fourteen years at Charran, Joseph was born, Gen. xxxi. 25. Joseph was thirty years old when made Regent of Egypt, xli. 46; and in the ninth year of his regency, brought his father and family to settle in Egypt, xli. 53, 54, xlv. 6. The amount of these sums, 14 + 30 + 9 = 53 years from the time that Jacob went to Charran; which, being subducted from 130 years, his age when he stood before Pharaoh, xlvii. 9, leaves seventy-seven years for his age when he went to Charran: thus confirming the account of Abulfaragi, and also of Demetrius, an earlier writer, according to Polyhistor.

Esau, and thereby surreptitiously obtained for him the blessing : “ Let people serve thee and nations bow down to thee : Be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother’s sons bow down to thee : Cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee !” Gen. xxvii. 1—29.

It is remarkable, that notwithstanding the agitation of Isaac, when “ he trembled very exceedingly,” at the detection of the fraud, he did not attempt to rescind the blessing, nor transfer it to Esau ; but on the contrary, confirmed it on Jacob ; “ yea, and he shall be blessed !*” His wishes were overruled and controlled by that higher Power, which he vainly endeavoured to counteract ; and that he spoke as the Spirit gave him utterance, appears from his prediction respecting Esau’s family ;— “ And it shall come to pass, when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break thy brother’s yoke from off thy neck,” Gen. xxvii. 40, which was fulfilled in the days of Jehoram, king of Judah, “ when the Edomites revolted from under the dominion of Judah, and made themselves a king—unto this day !” 2 Chron. xxi. 8—10.

In this transaction all the parties were to be blamed. Isaac, for endeavouring to set aside the oracle in favour of his younger son, to which he pointedly alluded in the second clause of his blessing, and especially in the invidious expression, “ thy mother’s sons ;” the last clause contained the first blessing of Abraham, Gen. xii. 3. Esau, for wishing to deprive his brother of the blessing which he had himself relinquished ; and Rebecca and Jacob, for wishing to secure it by fraudulent means ; not trusting wholly in THE LORD.

That their principal object, however, was the spiritual blessing, and not the temporal, was shewn by the event. For Jacob afterwards revered Esau, as his elder brother, and insisted on Esau’s accepting a present from his hand, in token of submission, Gen. xxxiii. 3—15. Esau also appears to have possessed himself of his father’s property, during Jacob’s long exile ; 1. from his coming to meet him, in his return homewards, with so large a retinue as four hundred men ; 2. from his saying that “ he had enough,” when he wished to decline Jacob’s present ; 3. from Jacob’s making no claim on him for a division of the patrimony, saying, that he also had enough ; and 4. from Esau’s removal to Mount Seir, with all his substance which he had got in the land of Canaan; thus relinquishing to his brother's family, all future title to the possession of that land, by establishing himself elsewhere, Gen. xxxiii. 3—14, xxxvi. 6, 7.

But though the intention of Rebecca and Jacob might have been good, and free from worldly or mercenary motives, they should not have done evil that good may come, according to the maxim of Scripture, Rom. iii. 8. And they were both severely punished in this life for their pious fraud: which destroyed the peace of the family, and planted a mortal enmity in the breast of Esau against his brother:—"Is not he rightly named Jacob, ('a supplanter,') for he hath supplanted me these two times: he took away my birth-right, and lo, now he hath taken away my blessing:"—"The days of mourning for my father are at hand, then will I slay my brother Jacob," Gen. xxvii. 36—41. And there can be little doubt of his intention of executing this threat, when he came to meet him on his return, with such an armed force; which strongly alarmed Jacob's fears; had not GOD changed the spirit of Esau into mildness; so that "he ran to meet Jacob, and fell on his neck, and they wept," Gen. xxxiii. 4.

Rebecca was deprived of the society of her darling son, whom "she sent away for one year *," as she fondly imagined, "until his brother's fury should turn away," Gen. xxvii. 42—44, but she saw him no more; for she died during his long exile of twenty years, though Isaac survived, Gen. xxxv. 27. Thus was "she pierced through with many sorrows," and according to the Apostle's inference, from the foregoing maxim, "her punishment was just."

Jacob also had abundant reason to say, "Few and evil have been the days of the years of my pilgrimage!" Gen. xlvii. 9. Though he had the consolation of having "the blessing of Abraham" voluntarily renewed to him by his father, before he was forced to fly from his brother's fury, Gen. xxviii. 1—4, and had the satisfaction of obeying his parents in going to Padan Aram, or Charran, in quest of a wife of his own kindred, Gen. xxviii. 7, yet he set out on a long and perilous journey of 600 miles and upwards, through barren and inhospitable regions, seemingly unattended and unprovided; like a pilgrim indeed, with only his staff in his hand, Gen. xxxii. 10. And though he was supported with the assurance of the Divine protection, and the renewal of the blessing of Abraham by God himself, in his remarkable vision at Bethel; and solemnly devoted himself to his service, wishing only for food and raiment; and vowing to profess the worship of God, and pay tythe unto Him, should he return back in peace, Gen. xxviii. 10—22; yet he was forced to engage in a tedious and thankless servitude of seven years, at first for his daughter Rachel, with Laban, who retaliated upon him the imposition he had practised on his own father; and substituted Leah, whom he hated, for Rachel, whom he loved; and thereby compelled him to serve seven years more; and changed his wages several times during the remainder of his whole servitude of twenty years; in the course of which, as he pathetically complained, “the drought consumed him by day, and the frost by night, and the sleep departed from his eyes,” in watching Laban’s flocks, Gen. xxxi. 40; and at last he was forced to steal away, and was only protected from Laban’s vengeance, (as afterwards from Esau’s,) by Divine interposition. Add to these his domestic troubles and misfortunes; the impatience of his favourite wife—“Give me children, or I die!”—her death in bearing her second son, Benjamin; the rape of his daughter Dinah; the perfidy and cruelty of her brothers, Simeon and Levi, to the Sechemites; the misbehaviour of Reuben: the supposed death of Joseph, his favourite and most deserving son; were, all together, sufficient to have “brought down his grey hairs with sorrow to his grave!” had he not been divinely supported and encouraged throughout the whole of his pilgrimage.

JACOB’S MARRIAGES.

Whether Jacob married at the beginning or the end of his first seven years of stipulated service for Rachel, is a question which has divided and embarrassed chronologers. Demetrius and Josephus, followed by Petavius, Jackson, Kennicot, &c. suppose the latter; founding their opinion on Jacob’s declaration to Laban, “Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled,” &c. Gen. xxix. 21. On the other hand, Usher, Lloyd, Clayton, &c. contend that his marriage with Leah took place about a month after his arrival at Charran, at the beginning of the seven years; and his marriage with Rachel the week after. And this is the more probable opinion, For, 1. Jacob’s demand, “Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled,” Gen. xxix. 21, seems rather to relate to the expiration of the days of courtship, which, by a decorous usage, were a month: during which a bride, though betrothed, might put off the consummation of her marriage. This privilege was extended by the Mosaic law afterwards, even to a female captive, who was granted this respite before her marriage, "to bewail her father and mother," Deut. xxxi. 13. And when Saul promised his daughter Michal to David in marriage, requiring as a dowry, the fore-skins of a hundred Philistines, David, in his impatience "to be the king's son-in-law," furnished double the amount required, "in full tale, before the days were fulfilled," or "expired," 1 Sam. xviii. 25—27. For the phrase in the original is precisely the same in both cases; but in the latter, it can only relate to the days of courtship, which in Jacob's case were included in Laban's agreeing to Jacob's proposal, after he had spent a month with him, of serving him seven years for Rachel. "It is better that I should give her to thee than to another: Abide with me," verse 19. The next verse, ("So Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed to him but one year, for the love he bare unto her,") is plainly parenthetical, stating, by anticipation, the performance of the agreement: then naturally follows Jacob's demand, in the 21st verse, "Give me my wife," &c.

2. It is admitted, that the second seven years were subsequent to his marriage with Rachel; and why not the first seven years subsequent to his marriage with Leah? which was only a week earlier than Rachel's.

3. Is it to be imagined, that Jacob, at the advanced age of seventy-seven, as we have seen, when he went to Charran, would have patiently waited seven years before he married? And would not the policy of the selfish Laban have rather wished to secure his attachment and his services, by a speedy connexion with his family?

4. That he married at the beginning of the first seven years of service, is demonstrated by the birth of his third son, Levi, in his eighty-second year, as rightly stated by Abulfaragi, or in the fifth year of his service.

The following Table gives the birth of Jacob's children, by his wives and concubines.

JACOB'S CHILDREN.

1. Reuben	78	1915
2. Simeon	80	1913
3. Levi Leah ...	82	1911

11. Dinah	90	1903
12. Joseph	91	1902
13. Benjamin Rachel ..	104	1889

This table of the years of Jacob, at the birth of each, is constructed from the date of Jacob's marriages, in his seventy-seventh year, soon after his arrival in Charran; from the birth of Levi, in his eighty-second year; and of Joseph, in his ninety-first, at the end of his fourteen years of service. Compare Gen. xxx. 25, xxxi. 41. For by these known dates, those of the intermediate births are easily adjusted from the history, in the twenty-ninth and thirtieth chapters. The birth of Benjamin, the youngest, followed the rape of Dinah, when she was about her fifteenth year, according to the Testament of the twelve Patriarchs, Jackson, Vol. I. p. 131, and probably in the same year; for Jacob was obliged to remove from Shalem, where he had resided for some years, after his return from Charran, in consequence of the massacre of the Shechemites by his sons, Simeon and Levi, Gen. xxxiii. 18, xxxiv. 30, xxxv. 1. And Rachel died on the journey, near Bethlehem, after being delivered of Benjamin, xxxv. 16—20. And her monument is still subsisting, about three miles from Bethlehem, midway between it and Jerusalem, according to Hasselquist. It was surnamed Ephrath, or Ephratah, from Caleb's wife, 1 Chron. ii. 19—50. She called him, when dying, Ben-Oni, “Son of my sorrow;” but Jacob called him Ben-jamin, “Son of days,” in the Syriac dialect; because he was “the son of his old age,” Gen. xxxvii. 3, xlv. 20.

Isaac survived Jacob's return home to Hebron, sixteen years; and died at the advanced age of 180 years; five years older than his father Abraham: and was buried by his sons Esau and Jacob, Gen. xxxv. 27—29.

JOSEPH.

The history of this illustrious Patriarch, is one of the most interesting and instructive recorded in ancient history, and is inimitably told by Moses.

When he was seventeen years old, his father's partiality for him above all his children, indiscreetly dressed him in a gaudy coat of many colours. This excited the jealousy and hatred of his brethren in general, so that they "could not speak peaceably to him;"—and he had particularly offended the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, "by reporting to his father their evil discourse," Gen. xxxvii. 2—4.

In addition to these causes of dislike and hatred, two remarkable dreams, signifying his dominion over them, and over his whole family, not only increased their hatred, but the latter especially, drew on him a rebuke from his father:—"Shall I, and thy mother, and thy brethren, indeed come to bow ourselves to thee to the earth?" for so his father interpreted the obeisance of the sun, moon, and eleven stars, (or constellations of the zodiac) to him, the twelfth. "And his brethren envied him, but his father observed the saying," verses 5—11.

To defeat the accomplishment of his dreams a convenient opportunity soon offered, when Joseph was sent by his father to enquire after the welfare of his brothers, and their flocks. As soon as he came in sight, they resolved to kill him, but were prevented by Reuben, who wished to deliver him out of their hands; and persuaded them to cast him into an empty pit. Afterwards, by the advice of Judah, they sold him to a company of Ishmaelitish and Midianitish merchants, going to Egypt, for twenty pieces of silver; who again sold him to Potiphar, captain of the guard to the king of Egypt. Pharaoh, in Egyptian, signifies "king," verses 12—36.

After he had served Potiphar, with great fidelity, for ten years, and had obtained his unbounded confidence; upon a false accusation of his lustful mistress, who solicited him in vain, and whom he nobly and piously repulsed, alleging that he could not violate his trust, nor sin against God; he was thrown into prison by his master, and remained there for three years; whence he was unexpectedly liberated, at the age of thirty years, and raised to the rank of governor, or regent, of the kingdom of Egypt, in reward for his interpretation of two remarkable dreams, which Pharaoh dreamed, signifying seven years of plenty to be succeeded by seven years of famine. And Pharaoh called Joseph, Zaphnath Paaneah, signifying, in the Egyptian dialect, “a revealer of secrets* :” and gave him to wife Asenath, the daughter of Potipherah, priest of On, in order to ennoble him, by the highest alliance in the kingdom, Gen. xli. 1—46.

During the seven years of plenty, this enlightened statesman, justifying the wise choice of the king and his council, providently stored up all the redundant provisions of the country, in the cities adjacent, Gen. xli. 48; and when the famine began, he opened all the storehouses, and sold to the Egyptians and to all countries, for it was universal, xli. 54—57.

In the second year of the famine, when the money and the cattle of the Egyptians failed, Joseph, by their own desire, bought all their lands for the Crown, in return for supplying themselves with provisions, and he then removed the people into the cities, from one end of the borders of Egypt even to the other, xlvii. 15—21. That is, he brought the people, who were scattered throughout the open country, into the cities wherein the provisions were stored, for the greater ease of distribution: he did not, as idly imagined by some, transplant the people to cities remote from their residence; but consulting their convenience, only to the cities adjacent: the people round about every store-city, brought he into that city; and this he did throughout the whole extent of the country. And the lands thus voluntarily sold, he farmed to the occupiers again, at the moderate and fixed crown rent of a fifth part of the produce. Thus did he provide for the liberty and independence of the people, while he strengthened the authority of the King, by rendering him sole proprietor of the lands. And to secure the people from further exaction, “Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt, that Pharaoh should have only the fifth part;” which law subsisted to the time of Moses, xlvii. 21—26. By this wise regulation, the people had four-fifths of the produce of the lands for their own use; and were exempted from any further taxes; the King being bound to support his civil and military establishment out of the crown rents. Whereas, by the original constitution, settled by Menes and his prime minister, Thoth, or Hermes; (as we learn from Diodorus,) the lands had been all divided between the King, the Priesthood, and the Soldiery; who possessed each a separate third part, to support their respective establishments. The revenues of the crown, therefore, were rather abridged than increased by this regulation; while Joseph respected the primitive usage, and bought not “the lands of the priests ;” but during the continuance of the famine, he fed them at the King’s expence: so that by the royal bounty, “they sold not their lands.” Thus was this consummate statesman so truly “wise and discreet,” because he was guided by the SPIRIT OF GOD,—“a father to Pharaoh” and his people, and a blessing to the world; whom GOD, in kindness, raised up, to preserve life to many nations, by a great deliverance! beside his own family, as he piously observed, xlv. 5—7.

How totally groundless then, is the censure of Larcher :—“When Pharaoh, king of Egypt, possessed himself of the money, cattle, and lands of his subjects, by the barbarous counsel of a stranger, whom he had made his minister, and who had espoused the daughter of the high priest of the sun; he touched not the possessions of the priests: and while the people chose rather to make themselves slaves, than perish with famine; the ministers of the altars felt nothing of the public miseries, and were furnished with corn in abundance!” Herodote, Tom. II. p. 237, first edit.

And how different from this barbarous criticism of a professed Christian, is the character of this matchless prime minister, drawn by an unprejudiced Heathen, Justin, in his General History, lib. xxxvi. 2.

“Joseph was very dear (percarus) to the king himself: for he was most sagacious in explaining prodigies, and first framed the interpretation of dreams, and nothing in divine and human jurisprudence, seemed to be unknown to him. Insomuch that he even foresaw a barrenness of the grounds, many years before it happened; and all Egypt would have perished with famine, had not the king, by his counsel, ordered the fruits to be preserved for several years. And so excellent were his regulations, (tantaque experimenta ejus fuerunt,) that they seemed rather to be oracular responses (responsa) not given by man, but by GOD."

Among the many who were fed by the provident stores of Joseph, his brethren, all but Benjamin, came down to Egypt, to buy corn, in the first year of the famine, or the eighth of his reGENCY. And here, at their first interview, they fulfilled those dreams which they vainly endeavoured to frustrate: for "they bowed themselves before him with their faces to the earth," not knowing him in his present dignity, though he knew them perfectly. Not seeing his own brother, Benjamin, among them, and apprehending, perhaps, that they had destroyed him also, out of jealousy, because he was his father's remaining favourite; and "remembering his dreams," and their cruelty in consequence of them, "he spake roughly to them," and charged them with being "spies, come to see the nakedness of the land."

To conceive the full force and heinousness of this charge, it is necessary to state briefly the situation of Egypt at the time.

In the reign of Tirmaus, or Thamuz, about B.C. 2159, Egypt had been invaded and subdued by a tribe of Cushite shepherds, from Arabia, who cruelly enslaved the whole country, under a dynasty of six kings, until, at length, the native princes, weary of their tyranny, rebelled, and after a long war of thirty years, shook off the yoke, and expelled the shepherds to Palestine, where they became the Philistines; (from Pallisthan, "the shepherd land," in the Sanscrit, or primitive Syriac.) about B.C. 1899, or twenty-seven years before Joseph's administration. But the memory of their tyranny was still fresh in the minds of the Egyptians; so that "every shepherd was an abomination to the Egyptians," Gen. xlvi. 34; and "they could not endure to eat bread with the Hebrews," because they were shepherds, and came from the neighbourhood of Palestine. And they were justly apprehensive, that the Philistines, who were a warlike people, might attempt to regain a footing in Egypt, weakened, as it had been, by so long a war; and when the land of Goshen, which had been their principal settlement, the best pasture land in Egypt, was now in great measure waste; as will be shewn more fully in the ensuing analysis of Egyptian Chronology.

Such a charge, to strangers especially, coming from a suspicious quarter, was natural and well contrived; and when in their anxiety to repel it, they entered into a particular detail of the circumstances of their family, and observed that their youngest brother was at home with their father, the policy of Joseph made his appearance the test of their sincerity.—“Hereby shall ye be proved: By the life of Pharaoh, ye shall not go from hence, except your youngest brother come hither. Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother; and ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be truth in you: or else, by the life of Pharaoh, surely ye are spies.”—These repeated asseverations indicated strong emotions of resentment, at the remembrance of their cruelty; and his conduct at the time proved it, for “he put them all together into ward, three days.”—He made them taste, for three days, the sufferings he had undergone for three years, and probably in the very same state prison!

But the third day his anger cooled, and he reversed the former sentence; and dismissed them all but one, Simeon, whom he kept as a hostage, for the appearance of Benjamin; and “bound before their eyes.” From the tried cruelty of Simeon’s disposition in the perfidious massacre of the Shechemites, he had probably been the most active against Joseph himself.

The remorse of conscience, and compunction of mind, which they felt on this occasion, and not only felt, but expressed in his hearing, interpreting this procedure into a divine judgment for their ill-treatment of himself, disarmed Joseph’s resentment.—“And they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear: therefore is this distress come upon us! And Reuben answered them saying, Spake I not unto you saying, Do not sin against the child, and ye would not hear! therefore behold also his blood is required!—And he turned about from them and wept;” and as a delicate token of his good-will, privily restored their money in their sacks, and also gave them provision for the way.

Their artless relation of what had befallen them to their father, his refusal at first to send Benjamin; his reluctant consent to let him go, at length, in the second year of the famine, after blaming his sons, “Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me as to tell the man that ye had yet a brother?”—the offer of Judah to be responsible for his return; the tenderness of Jacob at their departure, and of Joseph at their meeting, when his bowels did yearn upon his brother Benjamin; his ingenious contrivance to prove their attachment to Benjamin, by offering to keep the person in whose sack his cup should be found, and to dismiss the rest; their speechless grief at the detection; Judah's noble and generous offer to be a bondman in his stead—Joseph's disclosure of himself to his brethren, and his kind endeavours to relieve their confusion—" I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt. Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for GOD did send me before you to preserve life."—Jacob's disbelief of the news, that "Joseph was alive, and governor over all the land of Egypt," through excess of joy,—the revival of his spirit at the sight of "the waggons sent to convey him;" his alacrity to go and see Joseph;—the tenderness of their meeting;—the settlement of his family in the vacant land of Goshen, providentially prepared for their reception, and best accommodated to their profession as shepherds; all together furnish a dramatic composition of the most unrivalled excellence, whether we consider the chaste simplicity of the language, the accurate description of manners, the appropriate delineation of character, the conduct and development of the plot, and the fortunate and gratifying issue of the catastrophe; all under the guidance and direction of PROVIDENCE; adopting this chosen family to be "a peculiar treasure to himself," and "the repository of his oracles," when the whole world beside had become immersed in the corruptions of polytheism, and abominations of idolatry.

And the policy of the Egyptian court in giving "a possession," or establishment, to Jacob's family in the land of Goshen especially, was wise and liberal. This country stretched along the Bubastic or Pelusiatic branch of the Nile, and formed the eastern barrier of Egypt, towards Palestine and Arabia, the quarters from which they most dreaded invasion: whose "nakedness" was now covered, in a short time, by a numerous, a brave, and an industrious people; amply repaying, by the additional security and resources which they gave to Egypt, their hospitable reception and naturalization.

JACOB'S HOUSEHOLD IN EGYPT.

There is a numerical difficulty in the account of Jacob's household which settled in Egypt. The Old Testament mentions seventy souls; Gen. xlv. 27, the New seventy-five souls, Acts vii. 14. The difference, however, is only apparent, and they can be satisfactorily reconciled together by critical comparison of both passages.

Moses states, that "all the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which issued from his loins, (except his sons' wives,) were sixty-six souls," Gen. xlv. 26, and this number is thus collected :

Jacob's children, eleven sons and one daughter.....	12
Reuben's sons	4
Simeon's sons	6
Levi's sons	3
Judah's three sons and two grandsons	5
Issachar's sons	4
Zebulun's sons.....	3
Gad's sons	7
Asher's four sons and one daughter, and two grandsons...	7
Dan's son.....	1
Naphthali's sons.....	4
Benjamin's sons	10

If to these sixty-six children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, we add Jacob himself, and his two sons born in Egypt, or four more, the amount is seventy, the whole number of Jacob's family which settled in Egypt.

In this statement, the wives of Jacob's sons, who formed part of the household, are omitted; but they amounted to nine: for of the twelve wives of the twelve sons, Judah's wife was dead, Gen. xxxviii. 12, and Simeon's also, as we may collect from his youngest son, Shaul, "by a Canaanitess," xlv. 10; and Joseph's wife was already in Egypt. These nine wives, therefore, added to the sixty-six, gave seventy-five souls, the whole amount of Jacob's household that went down with him to Egypt: critically corresponding with the statement in the New Testament, that "Joseph sent for his father Jacob, and all his kindred, amounting to seventy-five souls." The expression "all his kindred," including the wives, who were Joseph's kindred not only by affinity, but also by consanguinity; being probably of the families of Esau, Ishmael, or Keturah. Thus does the New Testament furnish an admirable comment on the Old.

From this list, compared with that of the births of Jacob's sons, it appears that some of them must have married remarkably early.

Judah was about forty-seven years old when Jacob's family settled in Egypt. He could not, therefore, have been more than fifteen at the birth of his eldest son, Err; nor Err more than fifteen at his marriage with Thamar; nor could it be more than two years after Err's death, till the birth of Judah's twin sons, by his daughter-in-law, Thamar; nor could Pharez, one of them, be more than fifteen, at the birth of his sons, Hezron and Hamul, supposing they were twins, born just before the departure from Canaan. For the aggregate of these numbers, $15 + 15 + 2 + 15 = 47$ years, gives the age of Judah. Compare chap. xxxviii with xli. 12.

Asher was about forty-three years at that time. He therefore must have married under twenty, and his fourth son, Beriah, also, under twenty, (supposing him to be the youngest,) in order that the latter should then have two sons.

Benjamin was about twenty-six years at that time. And he could not have married later than fifteen, to have had then ten sons, unless some of them were twins.

Joseph's sons and grandsons must also have married early. He lived eighty years after his marriage, and, before his death, saw Ephraim's children of the third generation, and Manasseh's children of the second, Gen. l. 23. Ephraim, therefore, the younger brother, who was born during the seven years of plenty, and probably near their end, Gen. xli. 50; his sons, and his grandsons, could not have been much above twenty when they married, in order that he should have great-grand-children, in the course of seventy-three years*.

From such early marriages, in a fruitful country, finely watered, and a warm climate, like Egypt, joined to the prolific blessing of Providence, the children of Israel, in the course of 215 years, till their exode, multiplied exceedingly; insomuch that the men above twenty years old then amounted to 600,000, beside women and children, Exod. xii. 37, Numb. i. 3. And supposing the men able to bear arms in a given district, amount to about a fourth part of the whole community, (according to Templeman's Tables, and Rennel's Herod. p. 400, note,) the whole of the Israelites who went out of Egypt, must have exceeded two millions. A prodigious increase.

* How rapidly the tribe of Ephraim increased in its population, we may judge from the pedigree of Joshua, 1 Chron. vii. 20—27, who was in the tenth generation; and was born about B.C. 1692, or 270 years after the settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt, which gives twenty-seven years to a generation.

In the list of Jacob's family, it is remarkable that there were only two women; his daughter Dinah, and Asher's daughter, Sarah. Providence, by this deviation from the ordinary course of nature, in which the equality of males and females is nearly preserved, laying the seeds of an immense population, in so extraordinary a stock of males, as went down to Egypt. It is further observable, that at the first muster in the wilderness, the number of the tribe of Benjamin, from ten sons, was 35,400 men, the least of all; and that of the tribe of Dan, from one son, 62,700; the greatest of all, next to Judah, 74,600; as if on purpose to confound the calculations of political arithmeticians, and the speculations of human reason. GOD'S ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts! Numb. i. 17—46; and at the second muster, thirty-nine years after, while these tribes had increased, the tribes of Reuben and Simeon had dwindled; and the whole amount diminished, about 200,000 men. Compare Numb. xxvi. 1—51. This may be accounted for by their rebellions and chastisements in the wilderness, which fell heaviest on the Reubenites, in the rebellion of Korah, Numb. xvi. 1; and on the Simeonites, in the whoredoms of Shittim, Numb. xxv. 1.

The tribe of Dan, at first so flourishing, was one of the first to fall into idolatry, soon after Joshua's death, Judges xviii. It is, therefore, we may presume, omitted in the general registry of the first nine chapters of Chronicles. And not one of that tribe are represented as sealed among the 144,000 true Israelites! Rev. vii. 3. Ephraim also, the head of the northern tribes, which led the revolt of the ten tribes under Jeroboam, is likewise excluded from the Apocalypse, for its earlier idolatries, Judges xvii. Their places are supplied by the true Israelites of the tribes of Levi and Joseph in general, Rev. vii. 7, 8.

Another remarkable instance of the adoption of the younger son in preference to the elder, so frequent in Scripture, was shewn in Jacob's election of Ephraim, the younger, before Manasseh, the elder of Joseph's sons; when, as his eldest son by Rachel, he invested Joseph with the double prerogative of furnishing two tribes; thus putting Ephraim on a footing with Judah, the prerogative tribe of Leah's sons, in consequence of the forfeiture of his three elder brothers, Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, for their misconduct, Gen. xlviii. 1—20. To Joseph, also, the most deserving of all his sons, he left an additional portion of land above his brethren, Gen. xlviii. 22.

JACOB'S BLESSING, OR PROPHECIES.

At the close of his life, after he had lived seventeen years in the land of Egypt, and was 147 years old, Gen. xlvii. 28, Jacob assembled his sons, to tell them “ what should befall them or their tribes, in the last days ;” or to foretel their future fortunes, by Divine inspiration, Gen. xlix. 1.

XLIX. 2. Gather yourselves together and hear, ye sons of Jacob,
And hearken unto Israel your father.

3. Reuben, thou art my first born,
My might, and the beginning of my strength,
Excelling in dignity and excelling in power ;

4. Unstable as waters, thou shalt not excel,
Because thou wentest up to thy father's bed,
Then in going up, thou didst defile my couch.

5. Simeon and Levi are brethren,
They accomplished the iniquity of their purpose,

6. O my soul, enter not into their privy council,
Mine honour be not united to their assembly ;
For in their anger, they slew an [honourable] man,
And in their wilfulness, they destroyed a prince !

7. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce,
And their wrath, for it was cruel :
I will divide them in Jacob,
And will scatter them in Israel.

8. Judah art thou ; thy brethren shall “ praise ” thee,
Thy hand shall be on the neck of thine enemies :
The sons of thy father shall bow down to thee.

9. Judah is a lion's whelp,
From the prey, my son, art thou come up—
He lieth down, as a lion,
He coucheth as a lioness ;
Who shall rouse him up ?

10. The Sceptre shall not depart from Judah,
Nor a Teacher of his offspring ;
Until SHILOH shall come ;
And [until] to Him, a congregation of peoples * ;

* In this 10th verse, there is an alternation, frequent in Hebrew poetry ; of the first and third, and of the second and fourth lines ; which should be read thus :

The Sceptre shall not depart from Judah,
Until SHILOH shall come ;
Nor a Teacher of his offspring,
[Until] to Him, a congregation of peoples :

11. [HE,] binding his fole to the vine,
Even his asses colt to the [choice] vine of Sorek,
Shall wash his garments in wine,
And his clothes in the blood of grapes ;
12. His eyes shall be red with wine,
And his teeth, white with milk.
13. Zebulon shall dwell at the haven of the sea,
And shall be for a haven of ships,
And his border shall be unto Zidon.
14. Issachar is a strong ass,
Couching between two burdens,
15. And he saw that the resting place was good,
And that the land was pleasant,
And he inclined his shoulder to the load,
And became a servant to tribute.
16. Dan shall "judge" his people,
As one of the tribes of Israel.
17. Dan shall be a serpent by the way,
An adder by the path,
That shall bite the horse-heels,
And his rider shall fall backwards.
18. I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord!—
19. A "troop" shall invade Gad,
But he shall invade their rear.
20. Asher's bread shall be fat,
And he shall yield royal dainties.
21. Naphtali is a spreading oak,
Which produceth goodly branches.
22. Joseph is a fruitful plant [vine],
A fruitful plant beside a well,
His branches spread over the wall ;
23. The archers sorely grieved him,
They shot at him, and hated him ;
24. But his bow remained in strength,
And his hands bended its arms ;
By the hands of the mighty [GOD] of Jacob,
By the name of THE SHEPHERD, the ROCK OF Israel,
25. By the GOD of thy Father, who helped thee,
By the ALMIGHTY, who blessed thee.
May the blessings of heaven from above,
The blessings of the deep lying beneath,
The blessings of the breasts and of the womb,
26. (The blessings of thy father *) prevail,
Unto the blessings of the eternal mountains,
The desirable things of the everlasting hills ;
May they be on the head of Joseph,
Even on the crown of the head of the prince of his brethren !
Benjamin is a ravening wolf ;
In the morning he shall devour the prey,
And in the evening he shall divide the spoil."

* See the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xxvii, 28, 29.

In this sublime, but highly figurative and obscure prophecy *, (the translation of which I have endeavoured to amend in some places, where the Samaritan text, the ancient versions, and parallel passages furnish various readings, more eligible than those of the present Masorete text,) Jacob begins with his eldest son,

REUBEN.

After stating his privileges as such, he proceeds to the offence for which he lost them, Gen. xxxv. 22. And accordingly, the tribe of Reuben never rose to eminence, and with the other transjordanite tribes, was the first that was carried into cap-

* When Joseph told his remarkable dream of the sun, moon, and eleven stars, or constellations of the Zodiac, bowing down to him, the twelfth; it is said that "his father observed the saying," Gen. xxxvii. 11; and the learned Origen supposed that he alluded thereto in his predictions on this occasion:—Legite in tabulis cæli, quæcunque accident vobis et filiis vestris. "Read, in the cæstrial tables, the fortunes of yourselves and of your children." My respected antiquarian friend, Gen. Vallancey, has endeavoured to trace the analogy, in his Collectanea, Vol. VI. Part ii. p. 344, from which the following scheme is taken, with some alteration:

1. Reuben—"Unstable as waters,"—Aquarius.
2. Simeon and Levi—"Brethren,"—Gemini.
3. Judah—"A lion,"—Leo.
4. Asher—"His bread shall be fat,"—Virgo and her ears of corn.
5. Issachar—"A strong ass," or an ox, both used in husbandry,—Taurus.
- 6, 7. Dan—"An adder biting the horse-heels,"—Scorpio.

N. B. On the celestial sphere, the Scorpion is actually represented as biting the heel of the horse of the archer Sagittarius. And Chelæ, "his claws," originally occupied the space of Libra.

8. Joseph—"His bow remained in strength,"—Sagittarius.
9. Naphtali—By a play on his name, תֵּלֶחַ, Teleh, the latter part of it signifies the constellation Aries. See Buxtorf's Rabbinisms.
10. Zebulon—"A haven for ships,"—Cancer.
11. Gad—"A troop." The name also reversed, Dag, signifies "a fish,"—Pisces.
12. Benjamin—"A ravening wolf,"—Capricornus;—which, on the Egyptian sphere was represented by a goat, led by Pan, with a wolf's head.

In Gen. Vallancey's scheme, Asher and Gad are omitted; he thinks that Joseph is likened to Virgo, with her ears of corn, as an elegant allegory of his chastity, and of his care of Egypt, p. 347. But Virgo corresponds better to Asher, and Sagittarius exclusively to Joseph, to whom and his persecutors he assigns both signs.

"This knowledge of the Zodiac," says he, "might have descended in the family of Abraham, who dwelt in Chaldea." And to strengthen this conjecture, it is highly probable that the primitive Zodiac was invented in Chaldea, prior to the dispersion of the families of Noah's sons, and that the Asterisms were formed to record the leading events from the creation to the deluge. See Vol. I. p. 204, &c.

In addition to the six Asterisms there explained, we may, perhaps, reckon two more, Scorpio and Sagittarius, as recording the first covenant made after the fall of our first parents, Gen. iii. 15.

tivity, 1 Chron. v. 26. His birth-right, or double portion, was given to Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 49; 1 Chron. v. 1.

SIMEON AND LEVI.

These "brethren," in disposition as well as in blood, are next excluded for their cruelty and treachery in the matter of Shechem, who was "prince of the country," and "more honourable than all the house of his father," Gen. xxxiv. 2—19. And the tribe of Simeon was always inconsiderable, lying on the outskirts of the promised land, and an appendage to Judah, until the revolt of the ten tribes. The tribe of Levi, though it afterwards recovered its character by its zeal for the Lord, and was honoured with the exclusive privilege of the priesthood, had no landed portion, but was scattered throughout the tribes of Israel and Judah, and thus the two tribes were as remarkably separated from each other, as their heads had been united in conspiracy.

JUDAH,

The fourth son of Leah, by the misconduct of his elder brothers, and by his own merit, in generously offering to redeem Benjamin by his own captivity, was set over their heads, and honoured with the high distinction of being the ancestor of CHRIST: "Judah prevailed above his brethren, for out of him came He that was to be LEADER," (דָּוִד, εἰς ἡγούμενον, Sept.) 1 Chron. v. ii. Compare Micah v. 2, Matt. ii. 6.

The prophecy begins with his name, Judah, signifying "the praise of THE LORD," which was given to him at his birth by his mother Leah, Gen. xxix. 35. It then describes the warlike character of this tribe, to which, by the divine appointment, was assigned the first lot of the promised land, which was conquered accordingly by the pious and heroic Caleb, the first who "laid hand on the necks of his enemies," and routed and subdued them, (Josh. xiv. 11; xv. 1; Judges i. 1, 2,) and led the way for their total subjugation under David, who, in allusion to this prediction, "praises GOD," and says, "Thou hast given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me," Psalm xviii. 40. In the different stages of its strength, this tribe is compared to a lion's whelp, to a full grown lion, and to a nursing lioness, the fiercest of all. Hence a lion was the standard of Judah. Compare Numb. ii. 3; Ezek. i. 10. The city of David, where he reposed himself after his conquests, secure in the terror of his name, 1 Chron. xiv. 17, was called Ariel, “the Lion of GOD,” Isa. xxix. 1. And OUR LORD himself, his most illustrious descendant, “the Lion of the tribe of Judah,” Rev. v. 5.

The duration of the power of this famous tribe is next determined:—“The sceptre of dominion,” as it is understood, Esth. viii. 4, Isai. xiv. 5, &c. or its civil government, was not to cease, or depart from Judah, until the birth or coming of SHILOH, (signifying “THE APOSTLE,” as CHRIST is styled, Heb. iii. 1,) nor was the native lawgiver, or expounder of the law, “teacher, or scribe *,” intimating their ecclesiastical polity, to cease until SHILOH should have “a congregation of peoples,” or religious followers, attached to him.

And how accurately was this fulfilled in both respects!

1. Shortly before the birth of CHRIST, a decree was issued by Augustus Cæsar, that all the land of Judea and Galilee should be enrolled, or a registry of persons taken, in which CHRIST was included, Luke ii. 1—7; whence Julian the apostate unwittingly objected to his title of CHRIST, or KING, that “He was born a subject of Cæsar!” About eleven years after, Judea was made a Roman province, attached to Syria, on the deposal and banishment of Archelaus, the son of Herod the great, for mal-administration; and an assessment of properties, or “taxing,” was carried into effect by Cyrenius, then governor of Syria; the same who before, as the Emperor’s Procurator, had made the enrolment, Luke ii. 2, Acts v. 37; and thenceforth Judea was governed by a Roman deputy, and the judicial power of life or death taken away from the Jews, John xviii. 31.

2. Their ecclesiastical polity ceased with the destruction of their city and temple by the Romans, A.D. 70, at which time the GOSPEL had been preached throughout the known world by the Apostles, “his witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth,” Matt. xxiv. 14; Acts ii. 8; Rom. x. 18; and a vast congregation of Christians then formed, both among Jews and Gentiles.

Our Lord’s triumphant entry into Jerusalem, before his crucifixion, “riding on an ass, even a colt, the foal of an ass,” which, by his direction, his disciples brought to him for this purpose—

* See the Chaldee Paraphrase and the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan.

“Go into the village over against you, and presently ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her, loose them, and bring them unto me,” Matt. xxi. 2—5, (remarkably fulfilling the prophecy of Zechariah, ix. 9,) is no less a fulfilment of this prophecy of Shiloh, “binding, or tying, his foal to the vine, even his asses colt to the choice vine.” In ancient times, to ride upon white asses, or ass colts, was the privilege of persons of high rank, Princes, Judges, and Prophets, Judges v. 10; x. 4; Numb. xxii. 22. And as the children of Israel were symbolized by the vine, Psalm lxxx. 8, Hosea x. 1, “and the men of Judah” by “the [choice] vine of Sorek *,” in the original, both here and in the beautiful allegory of Isaiah, v. 1—7; adopted by Jeremiah, ii. 21, and by OUR LORD, Matt. xxi. 31, who styled himself “the true vine,” John xv. 1; so, the union of both these images signified our Lord’s assumption, as the promised SHILOH, of the dignity of King of the Jews; not in a temporal, but a spiritual sense, as he declared to Pilate, John xviii. 36, as a prelude to his second coming in glory, “to restore again the kingdom to Israel,” Matt. xxvi. 64, Acts i. 6.

The vengeance to be then inflicted on all the enemies of his Church, or “congregation” of faithful Christians, is expressed by the symbolical imagery of “washing his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes,” which, to understand literally, would be incongruous, and unusual any where; while it aptly represents his garments crimsoned in the blood of his foes, and their immense slaughter, an imagery frequently adopted in the prophetic Scriptures. Thus, the evangelical prophet Isaiah foretels the triumphant inauguration of the Messiah, and the subsequent slaughter of his foes, after “the divine proclamation to the ends of the earth,” announcing his coming :

LXII. 11. “Say ye to the daughter of Sion,
 LO, THY SAVIOUR † cometh,
 Lo, his reward is with Him,
 And his work, before Him.”

* The valley of Sorek, Judg. xvi. 4, was in the district of Judah, near Eshcol, whence the spies sent by Moses, brought that extraordinary cluster of grapes, which was borne by two men, on a staff, between them, to Kadesh Barnea. Numb. xiii. 23.

† Here יְשׁוּעָה, (Iesha), “salvation,” is rendered, by all the versions, “Saviour ;” put for יְשׁוּעָה, (Ieshuah), as frequently elsewhere; compare Isa. xvii. 10, &c. with Deut. xxxii. 15, &c. From this latter Jesus is formed: “For he shall save his people from their sins,” Matt. i. 21.

- LXIII. 1. " Who is this, coming from Edom * ?
 With dyed garments from Bosrah ?
 This, who is glorious in his apparel ;
 Advancing in the greatness of his strength ?
 [' It is] I, speaking in righteousness,
 [Who am] mighty to save.'
 2. " Wherefore is thy apparel red,
 And thy garments as one treading the wine-vat ?
 3. ' I have trodden the wine-vat alone,
 And of the peoples there was not a man with me,
 And I trod them in mine anger,
 And trampled them in mine indignation,
And their blood was sprinkled upon my garments,
And I have stained all my apparel.
 4. For the day of vengeance was in my heart,
 And the year of my Redeemed was come.
 5. And I looked, and there was none to help ;
 And I wondered that there was none to uphold ;
 Therefore my own arm wrought salvation for me,
 And my indignation itself sustained me.
 6. And I trod down the peoples in my anger,
And spilled their blood upon the ground.' "

And such are the representations of CHRIST'S second coming, in the Apocalypse, evidently alluding hereunto.

" Lo, I come quickly,
 And my reward is with me,
 To give to every one according to his work †."——Rev. xxii. 12.

" Lo, a white horse, and his rider having a bow ;
 And a crown was given him, and he went forth Conquering and to conquer."——vi. 2.

" And He was clad in a garment dipt in blood.—
 And himself treadeth the wine-vat of the wrath
And indignation of ALMIGHTY GOD."——xix. 11—15.

" And the vat was trodden without the city,
 And there came blood out of the vat, even to the horses' bridles, for 1600 furlongs."——xiv. 20.

The strength and wholesomeness of Shiloh's doctrine are next represented, by having "his eyes red with wine, and his teeth white with milk." And thus the evangelical prophet, in similar strains, invites the world to embrace the GOSPEL :

" Ho every one that thirsteth, come to the waters,
 And he that hath no money, come, buy and eat :

* Edom is put for the land of unbelievers, or infidels, who had been chastised.

† This explains the foregoing obscure passage, "And his work before Him," Isaiah lxii. 11.

Yea, come buy wine and milk,
Without money and without price."——Isa. lv. i.

On the last day of the feast of Tabernacles, it was customary among the Jews, for the priests to bring water from the fountain of Siloah, or Siloam, which they poured upon the altar, singing the words of Isaiah, xii. 3. "With joy shall ye draw water from the fountain of salvation ;" which the Targum interprets, "With joy shall ye receive a new doctrine, from the Elect of THE JUST ONE." And the feast itself was also called Hosanna. ("Save, we beseech Thee.") And Isaiah has also described the apostacy of the Jews, from their tutelar God, IMMANUEL, under the corresponding imagery of their "rejecting the gently flowing waters of Siloah." Isaiah viii. 6—8.

Hence OUR LORD, on the last day of the feast, significantly invited the Jews to come unto Him, as "the true and living fountain of waters," Jer. ii. 13. "If any thirst, let him come to ME, and drink," John vii. 37. He also compared his doctrine to new wine, which required to be put into new bottles, made of skins strong enough to contain it, Matt. ix. 17, while THE GOSPEL is repeatedly represented as affording "milk for babes," or "the first principles of the Oracles of God," for novices in the faith, as well as strong meat [and strong wine] for "masters in CHRIST," or adepts, Matt. xiii. 11 ; Heb. v. 12—14.

And our Lord's most significant miracle was wrought at this fountain, when he gave sight to a man of forty years old, blind from his birth, by sending him, after he had anointed his eyes with moistened clay, to wash in the pool of Siloam, (which is the Greek pronunciation of the Hebrew שִׁלּוֹחַ, Siloah, or Siloh, Isa. viii. 6, where the Septuagint Version reads Σιλωαμ;) signifying, according to the Evangelist, ἀπεσταλμενος, "sent forth;" and consequently, derived from שִׁלּוֹחַ, Shalahh, "to send," John ix. 7. OUR LORD thus assuming to himself his two leading titles of MESSIAH, signifying "anointed," and SHILOH, "sent forth," or delegated from GOD ; as he had done before, at the opening of his mission :—

"THE SPIRIT OF THE LORD is upon me, because He hath anointed Me to preach the Gospel to the poor ; He hath sent Me forth, (ἀπεσταλκε,) to heal the broken-hearted," &c. Luke iv. 18.

And in the course of it he declared, "I was not sent forth (ἀπεσταλην,) but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," Matt. xv. 24, by a two-fold reference to his character in Jacob's prophecy of SHILOH, and SHEPHERD OF ISRAEL, Gen. xlix. 10—24;—"This is life eternal, to know Thee, THE ONLY TRUE GOD, and JESUS CHRIST, whom Thou sentest forth," (ἀπεστειλας,) to instruct and save mankind, John xvii. 3; and He thus distinguishes his own superior mission, from his commission to his Apostles: "AS THE FATHER hath sent forth Me, so I send you," (ἀπεσταλκε με—πεμπω υμας,) John xx. 21.

Whence St. Paul expressly styles "JESUS CHRIST the Apostle, (ὁ αποστολος,) and High Priest of our profession," Heb. iii. 1. And by an elaborate argument, shews the superiority of his mission, above that of Moses, and of his Priesthood above that of Aaron, in the sequel of the Epistle. His Priesthood was foretold by David, to be a Royal Priesthood, after the order of Melchizedek, Psalm cx. 4; but where shall we find his Mission or Apostleship foretold, except in Jacob's prophecy of Shiloh? which was evidently so understood by Moses, when God offered to send him as His ambassador to Pharaoh, and he declined, at first, the arduous mission: "O MY LORD, send, I pray thee, by the hand of Him whom Thou wilt send," or by the promised Shiloh, Exod. iii. 10, iv. 13, by whom, in his last blessing to the Israelites, parallel to that of Jacob, he prayed that "GOD would bring back Judah to his people," from captivity, Deut. xxxiii. 7.

Here, then, we find the true meaning and derivation of the much-disputed term, *Shiloh, in this prophecy of Jacob, which

* Instead of שלה, Shilohh, ending with ה, Hheth, the present Masorete text reads שילה; and in the most correct MSS. שלה, ending with ה, *He: which might easily have been corrupted from the former, by the erosions of age, changing ה, Hheth, into ה, He; or by the mistake of transcribers, confounding these similar letters, in some early copies.

Of the various derivations of the present reading the most approved by lexicographers and commentators, Buxtorf, Leigh, the Robinsons, Parkhurst, Mede, &c. is from שלה, Shalah, "to be peaceable, quiet, or tranquil." But however applicable this may be to CHRIST after his second coming, as "the Prince of Peace," Isai. ix. 6: when peace and harmony will universally prevail; OUR LORD himself rather disclaimed the title at his first coming: "Think ye, that I came to give peace upon earth? I tell you nay, but rather division," Luke xii. 51, or "the sword," Matt. x. 34; "I came to cast fire is fortunately preserved by the Vulgate rendering, Qui mittendus est, "He that is to be sent;" and also by a Rabbinical comment on Deut. xxii. 7, "If you keep this precept, you hasten the coming of the MESSIAH, who is called SENT."

* See Kennicott and De Rossi's Collations on the place; and especially in the latter, the Appendix, Vol. IV. p. 217, where the rejection of the second letter, ה Iod, seems to be fully established.

This important prophecy concerning Judah, intimates, 1. the warlike character and conquests of this tribe. 2. The cessation of their civil and ecclesiastical polity, at the first coming of Shiloh. 3. His meek and lowly inauguration at that time, as spiritual King of the Jews, riding on an ass, like the ancient Judges and Prophets. 4. His second coming, as a warrior, to trample upon all his foes; and 5. to save and instruct his faithful people.

ZEBULON.

The fortune of Zebulon is next foretold, not only that he should be a maritime tribe, but that his border should reach to the territory of Zidon. This is a remarkably minute local prophecy, so many years before the conquest and division of the promised land.

ISSACHAR.

The lot of this tribe was to be in a pleasant land. It is compared to the ass, patient of labour, and submissive to tribute; and was the least warlike of all the tribes. They made no attempts to drive out the ancient inhabitants of the land, but settled among them, and submitted to their rule. This may be collected from the silence of the sacred historian respecting Issachar, where he records the wars of the other eight and half tribes on the west side of Jordan, to subdue the natives, Judah, Simeon, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh, Zebulon, Asher, Nephthali, and Dan, in the first chapter of Judges.

upon the earth, and what will I, if it be already kindled?" Luke xii. 49.—"OUR GOD is a consuming fire," Heb. xii. 29. "His fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor; He will gather the wheat, (the good,) into his garner, but he will burn the chaff, (the bad,) with unquenchable fire," Matt. iii. 12.—And surely the sword of THE LORD, which formerly desolated Judea, for the rebellions of the Jews, and their rejection and crucifixion of the Lord of Life, is now going through Christendom, to punish the lukewarmness and apostasy of the Christian Churches, in this declining age of faith, foretold by our Lord: "Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh [again] will he find faith upon the earth?" or Christianity any where established in purity.—The signs of the times are tremendous, and threaten the subversion of all religious establishments!

DAN.

Dan was the elder of Jacob's sons by Rachel's maid. From his name, signifying "Judge," he promises him an equal rank among the tribes of Leah's and Rachel's sons. This was a very numerous and warlike tribe, "A lion's whelp," Deut. xxxiii. 22, which, from the craft and stratagems they should use against their enemies, he compares to a serpent, biting the horse-heels of the passengers.—When straitened for room, they sent spies to discover what part of their enemies' land was weakest, and most exposed to their attack, and thus surprised and destroyed the careless and secure inhabitants of Laish, or Leshem, Josh. xix. 47, Judg. xviii. And Samson, the Judge, destroyed the Philistines by stratagem, Judg. xvi. 30.

A remarkable ejaculation is here introduced by the venerable Prophet.

"I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord!"

It was perhaps suggested by the preceding image of the serpent biting the heels of the horse, and throwing his rider; which might have reminded him of the old serpent bruising the heel of the blessed Seed of the woman, or CHRIST, who is frequently represented in Scripture as a horseman, going to battle against his enemies, Psalm xlv. 3—5, &c. Rev. vi. 2, xix. 11. And the contemplation of his grand victory over the serpent, "by bruising his head," or finally destroying him and his power, foretold to our first parents, and now more fully unfolded to the Patriarch, in the foregoing signal prophecy of Shiloh, near the close of his days, after he had long waited for a clearer disclosure of this mysterious mode of salvation, would naturally have produced such an ejaculation: which was afterwards adopted by the pious Simeon, when he actually saw the LORD'S CHRIST, Luke ii. 25—32.

And in this sense it is also understood by the ancient Jewish Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem, which thus paraphrase it, recording the sense of the primitive Jewish Church.

T. Jonathan.

“I wait not for the salvation of Gideon; I expect not the salvation of Samson, because their salvation was a temporal salvation; but I wait for and expect thy salvation, O Lord, because thy salvation is an everlasting salvation.”

T. Jerusalem.

“My soul waits not for the salvation of Gideon, son of Joash, which is temporal; nor the salvation of Samson, which is a transitory salvation; but the salvation which thou saidst by THY WORD should come to thy people, the children of Israel: my soul waits for this thy salvation.”

GAD.

The prediction concerning this tribe bears an affinity to the foregoing, in the allusion to the name, “a troop,” and the mode of deliverance. This was a valiant tribe, and with the Reubenites and half tribe of Manasseh, settled in the conquered territories of Sion, Og, and the Moabites, on the east side of Jordan.

ASHER,

Whose name signifies “happiness,” was fortunate in his lot, which abounded in oil, Deut. xxxiii. 24, choice wines, aromatic shrubs, balms, perfumes, &c. “a place where there was no want of any thing that is on the earth,” Judg. xviii. 10.

NEPHTHALI.

This tribe was to possess a rich and fertile land*; see Moses' description in the parallel place, Deut. xxxiii. 23. When David was crowned king of all Israel at Hebron, this and the neighbouring tribes supplied meat, meal, cakes of figs, bunches of raisins, wine, oil, oxen, and sheep, for the entertainment, 1 Chron. xii. 40. It bordered on Lebanon, so celebrated for its beauty and fertility, and especially for its wine, Hosea xiv. 5—7.

* Nephthali is compared to a “hind,” in our English Bible, but אילה also signifies “an oak,” as well as אלה; see Isa. i. 29, lxi. 3, lxvii. 5, and שלוח is “a shoot.”

JOSEPH.

Jacob having now come to his favourite son, by his beloved wife, and the most deserving of all his children, dwells on him with peculiar tenderness and affection. He compares him to “a fruitful plant;” according to the interpretation of the Rabbins Jonas and Jehuda, (deriving the word פֶּרֶת from פֶּאֵר,) meaning thereby “the vine,” according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem; which is usually planted against a wall, or other prop, Psalm cxxviii. 3. And accordingly, the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, flourished exceedingly, were settled in the finest part of the land of promise, and spread on both sides of the river Jordan, to the Mediterranean sea, westwards, and eastwards towards the wilderness of Kedemoth. See the Elements of Ancient Geography, Vol. I. p. 422. He next recounts his sufferings from his brethren, “who hated him, and could not speak peaceably to him,” Gen. xxxvii. 4; but “shot out their arrows, even bitter words;” and “laid snares for him,” and persecuted him, Psalm lxiv. 2—5, and then his deliverance by the mighty God of Jacob; for “his bow remained in strength, and his hands bended its arms;” when he retorted their own policy against them, and charged them with being spies, &c. And “GOD suddenly shot at them with an arrow, and they were wounded; so that their own tongue fell upon themselves,” Psalm lxiv. 7, 8. when their conscience smote them, and “they said, we are verily guilty concerning our brother,” &c. Gen. xlii. 21. His repeated deliverances in Egypt from his mistress, and from prison, and his advancement to the regency, are next aptly represented, I conceive, by the three-fold repetition of the divine titles, “by the name of the SHEPHERD, the ROCK * of Israel,” &c. (supposing these to relate, as they do most naturally, to the preceding, rather than to the following sentence; and that מִשֶׁם, should be rendered “by the name †,” rather than “from thence,” which easily connects them therewith) and his multiplied blessings form the conclusion: these were, 1. a fertile and extensive country, stretching to the mountains which formed their northern and eastern

* This title of the “stone,” or “rock,” which is frequent in the poetical Scriptures, was probably borrowed from Jacob's pillow, Gen. xxviii. 12, 13.

† Instead of מִשֶׁם, the Syriac Translator reads, מִשֶׁם.

barriers; 2. a numerous progeny to possess it; which in the joint population of the house of Joseph, or two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, considerably exceeded any other tribe; so that they complained to Joshua, "Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people; because THE LORD hath blessed me hitherto?" Josh. xviii. 14. And 3. superior authority * over his brethren. Besides Joshua, the successor of Moses, five of the twelve succeeding judges were of the tribe of Ephraim, as expressly stated; and probably two of the others, Deborah and Abdon, Judg. iv. 5, xii. 15. And though the tribes of Benjamin and Judah furnished the three first kings, Saul, David, and Solomon; after the revolt of the ten tribes, on the accession of Rehoboam, Jeroboam the Ephraimite, was made king of Israel, and the crown remained for some generations in his family; and the tribe of Ephraim held the lead, until the Assyrian captivity. These conclusions seem to be supported by the parallel blessing of Joseph, in Moses' prophecy; on which the alterations of the translation of this last clause are principally founded, Deut. xxxiii. 13—16.

BENJAMIN.

The last tribe is compared to a wolf, for its ferocious and martial disposition, such as was evinced in their contest with all the other tribes, in which, after two victories, they were almost exterminated, Judg. xix. and xx. Its union with the tribe of Judah seems to be intimated in their joint conquests, expressed nearly in the same terms; "Judah went up from the prey;"—"Benjamin devoured the prey." Moses, in his parallel prophecy, confirms this, by signifying that the Sanctuary should be fixed in his lot; and that He should continue as long as the existence of the Temple itself.

"THE BELOVED OF THE LORD shall dwell with him in safety,
And shall cover him all the day long;
And shall dwell between his shoulders.—Deut. xxxiii. 12.

* The word נָזִיר, (Nazir), applied to Joseph both by Jacob and Moses, signifies "separated," or "distinguished" by superior eminence and dignity. In Persia, at present, Nazir is the title of the first officer of state, or superintendent of all the demesnes.—Sir John Chardin.

This wondrous chain of prophecies, stretching so far into futurity, and including a train of events, as minute and circumstantial, in some particulars, as they are important in others, prove, all together, by their exact accomplishment, that this highly-gifted Prophet spake as “THE SPIRIT gave him utterance;” unfolding, especially, in a surprising degree, the fortunes of the Jewish nation, still fulfilling; and a more distinct and extensive view of the two-fold character of “the blessed SEED,” as an Apostle and a Conqueror, than had been vouchsafed to any of the preceding Prophets.

Abraham and Moses excepted, none of the Prophets appear to have been favoured with such frequent communications with the angelic host, and with GOD himself, as Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 12—17, xxxii. 1, 2, xxxv. 1—15, &c. But most astonishing was his “wrestling with GOD, in a human form, face to face,”—when he meditated flight from his offended brother Esau; a symbolical mode of instruction, to support his spirits, by yielding, as it were, to his might, when his divine antagonist “prevailed not against him” in the struggle; and to disable him from flight, by an unequivocal proof of divine power, in touching and dislocating his thigh, so that he halted thereon; and also to encourage him, by the new name of Israel, given to him in consequence of this significant transaction:—“Thy name shall no more be called Jacob,” (“the supplanter,” a term of reproach,) but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with GOD; and with men shalt thou prevail*.” And from this high title, his posterity were denominated “children of Israel,” rather than of Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 22—32, xxxv. 1—10; Hosea xii. 4.

JOSEPH’S PROPHECY.

The inspired Joseph also, before his death, comforted his brethren with the prospect of the future accomplishment of the divine promises.—“God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he swore unto Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob.”—The Apostle cites this as an evidence of his faith, Heb. xi. 22. With the death of Joseph, at the age of 110 years, the book of Genesis ends.

* This is the excellent reading of the Septuagint: ὅτι ἐνισχυσας μετὰ θεοῦ, καὶ μετὰ ἀνθρώπων δυνατός ἐσθ, the former is an exact translation of שְׂרִית עִם אֱלֹהִים, whence יִשְׂרָאֵל, Israel is derived; the latter is rightly rendered in the future tense, to denote his ensuing success with Esau, Pharaoh, &c.

EGYPTIAN BONDAGE.

The extraordinary increase of the Israelites in Egypt, is expressed by a remarkable amplification of terms: and “they were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty, and the land was filled with them,” Exod. i. 7.

The prodigious increase of their numbers and power, excited the jealousy and apprehension of the court of Egypt, when “a new king arose, who knew not Joseph,” or regarded not his great and important services to the state; and who, in violation of their charter, as a free people, naturalized in the country, in order to check their population, and exhaust their strength, put them to works of hard labour, “and made them serve with rigour, and made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field,” Exod. i. 9—14.

Beside “the store cities of Pithon * and Raampses †,” which they built for Pharaoh, on the confines of the desert of Arabia, Josephus mentions that they were employed in making canals and embankments, to prevent the overflowing of the river, and also in building pyramids. Perhaps the principal brick pyramids found in Egypt, were their work.

The Bible chronology, following Usher, dates the commencement of their bondage immediately from Joseph's death, or seventy-one years after their settlement in Egypt: but this seems to be too soon for the Egyptians to forget Joseph, and for the Israelites to increase to such a degree. We may, therefore, reasonably date it about thirty years, or one generation later, or about a century after their settlement.

The more the Israelites were oppressed, the more they multiplied and grew, and the more were the Egyptians alarmed; finding, therefore, this expedient insufficient to check their increase, the Hebrew midwives were ordered to destroy all the male children that should be born, but they disobeyed the command; alleging that the Hebrew women were more lively than

* פתן, or Pith-on, or Beth-on, “the house of On,” or the Sun; was a second Helio-polis, near Babylon; both built upon the confines of Arabia, according to Ptolomy.—Bryant, Plagues of Egypt, p. 318.

† Instead of Raampses, the Sept. reads Ramesses; and Eusebius says, that Ramesses, which gave name to that district of the land of Goshen, Gen. xlvii. 11, was built by the Israelites.

the Egyptian, and did not require their assistance ; upon which that cruel edict was issued by the king, that all the male infants should be destroyed, Exod. i. 12—22.

This decree was in force at the birth of Moses, sixty-four years after the death of Joseph ; and was probably enacted soon after the birth of his elder brother, Aaron, three years earlier, who was not subject to the decree. We may date it, therefore, about the thirty-second year of their bondage, and about 133 years after their settlement.

MOSES.

This illustrious legislator of the Israelites was of the tribe of Levi, in the line of Kohath and of Amram, whose son he was, and therefore, in the fourth generation after the settlement of the Israelites in Egypt. The time of his birth is ascertained by the exode of the Israelites, when Moses was eighty years old, Exod. vii. 7.

By a singular Providence, the infant Moses, when exposed on the river Nile, through fear of the royal decree, after his mother had hid him three months, because he was a goodly child, was taken up and adopted by Pharaoh's daughter, and nursed by his own mother, whom she hired, at the suggestion of his sister Miriam. Thus did he find an asylum in the very palace of his intended destroyer ;—while his intercourse with his own family and nation was still most naturally, though unexpectedly, maintained ; so mysterious are the ways of Heaven.—And while he was instructed “ in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,” and bred up in the midst of a luxurious court, he acquired at home the knowledge of the promised redemption of Israel ; and “ by faith in the REDEEMER CHRIST, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter ; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to have enjoyment of sinful pleasures for a season, esteeming the reproach of CHRIST, (or persecution for CHRIST'S sake,) greater wealth than the treasure of Egypt : for he had respect to the [future] recompence of reward,” Exod. ii. 1—10 ; Acts vii. 20—22 ; Heb. xi. 23—26 ; or looked forward to a future state.

When Moses was grown to manhood, and was full forty years old, he was moved by a divine impulse, as it seems, to undertake the deliverance of his countrymen, “ for he supposed that his brethren would have understood how that GOD, by his hand, would give them deliverance, but they understood not."—For when, in the excess of his zeal to redress their grievances, he slew an Egyptian, who injured one of them, and afterwards endeavoured to reconcile two of them that were at variance, they rejected his mediation, and "the man who had done wrong said, Who made thee a judge and a ruler over us? Intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian yesterday?"—So Moses, finding it was known, and that Pharaoh sought to slay him, fled for his life to the land of Midian, in Arabia Petraea, where he married Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, or Reuel, prince and priest of Midian, and as a shepherd, kept his flocks in the vicinity of Mount Horeb, or Sinai, for forty years, Exod. ii. 11—21; iii. 1; xviii. 5; Numb. x. 29; Acts vii. 23—30.

During this long exile, Moses was trained in the school of adversity, for that arduous mission which he had prematurely anticipated, and instead of the flaming zeal which at first actuated him, at length became "very meek, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth," Numb. xii. 3. And no man indeed had greater trials, or more occasion for meekness, and his humility was equal thereto. His backwardness afterwards to undertake that mission, for which he was destined from the womb, was no less remarkable than his forwardness before, Exod. iv. 10—13.

At length, when the oppression of the Israelites was come to the full, and they cried to GOD for succour, and the king was dead, and all the men in Egypt that sought his life, "the God of glory" appeared to Moses, in a flame of fire, from the midst of a bush, and announced himself as "the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob," under the titles of JAHOH and ÆHJEH, expressive of his unity and *sameness, and commissioned him first to make known to the Israelites the divine will for their deliverance; and next, to go with the elders of Israel to Pharaoh, requiring him, in the name of "THE LORD, the God of the Hebrews, to suffer the people to go three days' journey into the wilderness, to sacrifice unto the Lord their God,"—after such sacrifices had been long intermitted during their bondage, when the Egyptians had sunk into bestial polytheism, and would have stoned them had they attempted to sacrifice their principal divinities, the Apis, or Bull, &c. in the land itself. Foretelling also the opposition they would meet from the king, the mighty signs and wonders that would finally compel his assent, and their spoiling of the Egyptians, by *asking, or demanding of them (not borrowing) jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, (by way of wages or compensation for their services,) as originally foretold to Abraham, that "they should go out from thence with great substance," Gen. xv. 14; Exod. ii. 23—25; iii. 2—22; viii. 25, 26.

To vouch his divine commission to the Israelites, God enabled him to work three signal miracles: 1. turning his rod into a serpent, and restoring it again; 2. making his hand leprous as snow, when he first drew it out of his bosom, and restoring it sound as before when he next drew it out; and 3. turning the water of the river into blood. And the people believed the signs, and the promised deliverance, and worshipped.

To assist him also in his arduous mission, when Moses had represented that "he was not eloquent, but slow of speech," and of a slow or stammering tongue, GOD inspired Aaron, his elder brother, to go and meet Moses in the wilderness, to be his spokesman to the people, Exod. iv. 1—31, and his prophet to Pharaoh, while Moses was to be a God to both, as speaking to them in the name, or by the authority of God himself, Exod. vii. 1, 2.

At their first interview with Pharaoh, they declared: "Thus saith THE LORD, the GOD OF ISRAEL, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness." And Pharaoh said, "Who is THE LORD, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not [or regard not] THE LORD, neither will I let Israel go."

In answer to this haughty tyrant, they styled the LORD by a more ancient title, which the Egyptians ought to have known

* In this prophecy, and in its performance afterwards, Exod. xii. 35, 36, the verb לָשָׁא, in the conjugation Kal, is improperly rendered to "borrow," instead of to "ask," or "demand," which is its usual signification; and in Hiphil, to "lend," instead of to "give freely;" as in a parallel passage, where "Hannah freely gave," or consecrated to THE LORD her first born son, whom she had "asked," or prayed for, in obedience to the law of Moses respecting the first born, 1 Sam. i. 28; Exod. xiii. 2.—On the present mis-translation has been grafted a calumny against the Israelites, as if they cheated the Egyptians; whereas "THE LORD gave them favour in the sight of the Egyptians," who freely gave what they as freely asked.

and respected, from Abraham's days, when He plagued them in the matter of Sarah :

“THE GOD OF THE HEBREWS hath met with us: Let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God, lest He fall upon us with pestilence or with the sword.” Plainly intimating to Pharaoh also, not to incur his indignation, by refusing to comply with his desire.—But the king not only refused, but increased the burdens of the people, Exod. v. 1—19. And the people murmured and hearkened not unto Moses, when he repeated from THE LORD His assurances of deliverance and protection, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage, Exod. v. 20—23, vi. 1—9.

At their second interview with Pharaoh, in obedience to the divine command, again requiring him to let the children of Israel go out of his land; Pharaoh, as foretold, demanded of them to shew a miracle for themselves, in proof of their commission, when Aaron cast down his rod, and it became a serpent, before Pharaoh, and before his servants, or officers of his court.

The king then called upon his wise men and magicians, to know if they could do as much by the power of their gods, “and they did so with their enchantments; for they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents, but Aaron's rod swallowed up their serpents.”

Here the original phrase ויעשו כן, “and they did so,” or “in like manner,” may only indicate the attempt*, and not the deed; as afterwards, in the plague of lice, “when they did so with their enchantments, but could not,” Exod. viii. 18. And indeed, the original term, להטיהם, rendered “their enchantments,” as derived from the root לאט, or לוט, to hide or cover, fitly expresses the secret deceptions of legerdemain, or “sleight of hand,” to impose on spectators. And the remark of the magicians, when unable to imitate the production of lice, which was beyond their skill and dexterity, on account of their minuteness,—“this is the finger of a God!”—seems to strengthen the supposition; especially as the Egyptians were famous for legerdemain, and for charming serpents; and the magicians, having had notice of the miracle they were expected to imitate, they might make provision accordingly, and bring live serpents, which they might have substituted for their rods. And though Aaron's serpent swallowed up their serpents, shewing the superiority of the true miracle over the false, 2 Thess. ii. 9, it might only lead the king to conclude, that Moses and Aaron were more expert jugglers than Jannes and Jambres, who opposed them, 2 Tim. iii. 8. And *the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, so that he "hearkened not unto them, as THE LORD had said," or foretold, Exod. vi. 10, 11; vii. 8—13.

* Apuleius, speaking of a juggler, describes his tricks as if they were realities; as “swallowing a sharp-pointed spear, and plunging a lance into his belly.”—Circulatoreum aspexi equestrem, spatham præacutam mucrone infesto devorasse; ac mox eundem venatoriam lanceam—in ima viscera condidisse. Metam. lib. i.

The incredulity of Pharaoh on this occasion, only resembled the incredulity of the Israelites themselves, when the same miracle was wrought before them; and it was not considered as decisive, even by THE LORD, when he supposed that they might not be convinced till the third miraculous sign, as was actually the case, iv. 8, 9, compared with iv. 30, 31. In both cases, therefore, the reality of the transformation might have been doubted by Pharaoh as well as by the Israelites, on the supposition that it might have been the effect of legerdemain.

After this miracle, the rod was restored, as before, vii. 15.

THE PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

The design of these visitations, growing more awful and tremendous in their progress, was to make Pharaoh know, and confess, that the GOD OF THE HEBREWS, was THE SUPREME LORD; and to exhibit his power and his justice, in the strongest light, to all the nations of the earth, Exod. ix. 16, 1 Sam. iv. 8, &c. to execute judgment upon the Egyptians, and upon all their gods, inanimate and bestial, for their cruelty to the Israelites, and for their grovelling polytheism and idolatry, vii. 14—17, xii. 12.

The season of the year, and the commencement of the plagues, is no where specified, but both may be collected from the history. The exode of the Israelites, after the tenth and last plague, was about the vernal equinox, or beginning of April, on the fifteenth day of the first month, Abib, Exod. xii. 6 ; but by the seventh plague of hail, the barley was smitten, but not the wheat and rye of later growth. For according to the report of modern travellers, Egmont, Hayman, and Hasselquist, the barley harvest in Egypt is reaped in March, and the wheat in April ; and Le Brun found the whole to be over at Cairo upon the nineteenth of April. This agrees with the account of Moses, that “ the barley was in the ear,” though not yet fit for reaping ; but the “ wheat and the rye were not grown up,” ix. 31, 32. This judgment, therefore, must have happened about a month before the exode, or in the beginning of March, before the barley harvest, so early as to leave room for the three succeeding plagues ; and if we count backwards two months, by the same analogy, for the six first plagues, it will bring the first about the beginning of January, or commencement of the winter season ; at which time the river Nile was lowest, and its waters clearest* : as evidently indicated by

* The original is so rendered by all the ancient Versions, without exception, and by the most judicious modern translators, Coverdale, the Geneva Bible, Le Chais, &c. Our last Translators incorrectly render, "And HE hardened Pharaoh's heart," inconsistently with their rendering of the same phrase afterwards, Exod. vii. 22, viii. 19, ix. 7, as above; for Pharaoh hardened his own heart several times before GOD began to harden it. They seem to have been led into this mischievous error, by the expression, "as THE LORD had said;" referring to the foregoing; "And I will harden his heart," iv. 21; and "I will harden Pharaoh's heart," vii. 3; but this did not take place till Pharaoh became obdurate and incorrigible, ix. 12.

THE FIRST PLAGUE.

The Nile was the principal divinity of the Egyptians.—According to Heliodorus, “ they paid divine honours to this river, and revered it as the first of their gods. They declared him to be the rival of heaven, since he watered the country without the aid of clouds and rain,” Ethiop. B. IX. And the priests told Herodotus, that one of the kings of Egypt, Pheron, the son of Sesostris, was struck blind by the river-god, for an act of impiety : “ That at a time when the inundation had risen to the extraordinary height of more than eighteen cubits, a violent storm of wind having arisen, which greatly agitated the waters, the king, with a foolish temerity, took a javelin in his hand, and flung it into the midst of the foaming billows, for which he was immediately seized with a pain in his eyes, which made him blind for ten years,” B. II. § 111. This proves how excessive was their superstitious adoration of their river. His principal festival was at the summer solstice, when the inundation commenced ; at which season, in the dog-days, by a cruel idolatrous rite, they sacrificed red-haired persons, principally foreigners, to

* See the account of the annual inundation of the Nile, Vol. I. p. 33.

Typhon, or the power that presided over tempests, at *Busiris, Heliopolis, &c. by burning them alive, and scattering their ashes in the air, for the good of the people; as we learn from Plutarch, Isis et Osir. Vol. I. p. 380. Hence Bryant infers the probability, that these victims were chosen from among the Israelites, during their residence in Egypt. Plagues, &c. p. 117.

The judgment then inflicted upon the river, and all the waters of Egypt, in the presence of Pharaoh and of his servants, as foretold, when as soon as Aaron had smitten the waters of the river, they were turned into blood, and continued in that state for seven days, so that all the fish died, and the Egyptians could not drink of the waters of the river, in which they delighted, as the most wholesome of all waters; but were forced to dig wells for pure water to drink; was a significant sign of GOD's displeasure for their senseless idolatry, in worshipping the river, and its fish; and also "a manifest reproof of that bloody edict, whereby the infants were slain," Wisd. xi. 7, and a punishment on themselves; in which also the Israelites shared, who had been infected with their idolatries.

The magicians imitated this miracle also, with their enchantments. And Pharaoh's heart was hardened a second time; "neither did he set his heart to this also," as soon as the river was restored, Exod. vii. 15—25.

SECOND PLAGUE.

In the plague of frogs, their sacred river itself was made an active instrument of their punishment, together with another of their gods. The frog was one of their sacred animals, consecrated to the sun, and considered as an emblem of divine inspiration in its inflations †.

This was a severe chastisement; for the frogs came up from the rivers, and covered the land of Egypt: they penetrated every where, polluting and defiling every thing they touched, their beds, ovens, and kneading-troughs. In this plague also, the Israelites were involved. The magicians imitated this miracle also. Pharaoh, however, began to be humbled; he sent for Moses and Aaron, and said, "Intreat THE LORD, that He may take away the frogs from me, and from my people; and I will let the people go, that they may sacrifice to the Lord."—But when the plague was removed, and precisely at the time he had appointed himself—"to-morrow;" and Pharaoh saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart, a third time, and broke his promise, viii. 1—15.

† In the symbolical imagery of the Apocalypse, three unclean or demoniacal spirits, doing signs, or proposing miracles, like frogs, are represented as issuing from the mouths of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, Rev. xvi. 13. It is singular, that the ancient arms of France were three frogs! Comment on Nostradamus, p. 251. edit. 1672.

THIRD PLAGUE.

This plague of lice, which was produced without any previous intimation to Pharaoh, was peculiarly offensive to a people so superstitiously nice and cleanly as the Egyptians; and above all, to their priests, "who used to shave their whole body every third day, that neither louse, nor any other vermin, might be found upon them, while they were employed in serving their gods," as we learn from Herodotus, B. II. § 37. And Plutarch informs us, that "they never wore woollen garments, but linen only, because linen is least apt to produce lice." De Isid. et Osir. Vol. II. p. 352. This plague, therefore, was particularly disgraceful to the magicians themselves, and when they tried to imitate it, but failed, on account of the minuteness of the objects, (not like serpents, water, or frogs, of a sensible bulk that could be handled,) they were forced to confess, that this was no human feat of legerdemain, but rather, "the finger of a God," or wrought by the supernatural agency of some demon. For they gave not the glory to THE ONLY TRUE GOD; nor "the honour due unto his name," as the GOD OF THE HEBREWS. This we may collect from their continuing to withstand Moses, until the sixth plague of the boil, which they shared in common with the Egyptians; after which we hear no more of them. Thus were the "illusions of art magic put down, and their vaunting in wisdom reprov'd with disgrace," Wisd. xvii. 7. "Their folly was manifest unto all men," in absurdly and wickedly attempting at first to place the feats of human art on a level with the stupendous operations of divine power, in the two first plagues: and being foiled in the third, by shamefully miscarrying, they exposed themselves to the contempt of their admirers*. And the Apostle imputes their folly, in “withstanding the truth,” to their being men of a “corrupt mind, reprobate, [or undiscerning]” concerning the FAITH,” or belief in the ONE TRUE LORD OF ALL, 2 Tim. iii. 8.

Philo, the Jew, has a fine observation on the plagues of Egypt: “Some, perhaps, may enquire, why did God punish the country by such minute and contemptible animals [as frogs, lice, flies,] rather than by bears, lions, leopards, or other kinds of savage beasts, which prey on human flesh? or if not by these, [why not] by the Egyptian asp, whose bite is instant death? But let him learn, if he be ignorant, first, that GOD chose rather to correct than to destroy the inhabitants: for if He desired to annihilate them utterly, he had no need to have made use of animals as his auxiliaries, but of the divinely inflicted evils of famine and pestilence. Next, let him further learn that lesson so necessary for every state of life, namely, that men, when they war, seek the most powerful aid to supply their own weakness; but GOD, the highest and the greatest power, who stands in need of nothing, if at any time He chooses to employ instruments, as it were, to inflict chastisement, chooses not the strongest and greatest, disregarding their strength, but rather the mean and the minute, whom He indues with invincible and irresistible power to chastise offenders.”

Notwithstanding the declaration of the magicians, “the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, a fourth time, and he hearkened not unto them [Moses and Aaron,] as the Lord had said,” viii. 16—19.

The first three plagues were common to the Egyptians and the Israelites, to convince both that “there was none like THE LORD ;” and to wean the latter from their Egyptian idolatries, and induce them to return to the Lord their God. And when this end was answered, the Israelites were exempted from the ensuing plagues; for the LORD “severed the land of Goshen” from the rest of Egypt; whence the ensuing plagues, confined to the latter, more plainly appeared to have been inflicted by THE GOD OF THE HEBREWS, viii. 20—23. To convince both, more clearly, of “the goodness and severity of GOD,” Rom. xi.

* Numenius, the Pythagorean philosopher, says that “Jannes and Jambres were inferior to none in magic skill; and for that reason, chosen, by common consent, to oppose Musæus,” [or Moses.] Euseb. Præp. Evang. Lib. ix. cap. 8. See also Pliny, Hist. Nat. Lib. xxx. c. 1.

22. "That great plagues remain for the ungodly, but mercy embraceth the righteous on every side," Psalm xxxii. 11.

FOURTH PLAGUE.

This visitation of flies, of the gad-fly, or hornet, was more intolerable than any of the preceding. By this, his minute, but "mighty army," GOD afterwards drove out some of the devoted nations of Canaan, before Joshua; Exod. xxiii. 28, Deut. vii. 20, Josh. xxiv. 12. This insect was worshipped in Palestine and elsewhere, under the title of Baal-zebul, "Lord of the Gad fly," 2 Kings i. 1, 2. Egypt, we learn from Herodotus, abounded with prodigious swarms of flies or gnats: but this was in the heat of summer, during the dog-days; whence this fly is called by the Sept. κννομυια, "the dog-fly." But the appointed time of this plague was in the middle of winter; and, accordingly, this plague extorted Pharaoh's partial consent: "Go ye, sacrifice to your GOD, but in the land;" and when Moses and Aaron objected the offence they would give to the Egyptians, who would stone them for sacrificing "the abomination of the Egyptians," viz. animal sacrifices*; he reluctantly consented;—"only ye shall not go very far away;"—for he was apprehensive of their flight, like his predecessor, who first enslaved the Israelites, Exod. i. 10; and he again desired them to "intreat for him." But he again "dealt deceitfully;" and after the flies were removed so effectually that "not one was left," when Moses "intreated THE LORD, Pharaoh hardened his heart this fifth time also, neither would he let the people go," viii. 24—32.

This confirms the foregoing conjecture, that the Israelites were debarred from the exercise of their religious rites during their slavery.—Their minds were enslaved still more than their bodies, by the cruellest of all despotisms, to render them incapable of the enjoyment of rational liberty, as moderated by religion, pure and undefiled.

FIFTH PLAGUE.

This second breach of promise on the part of Pharaoh, drew down a plague of a more deadly description than the preceding.

* Tacitus has remarked the opposition between the customs of the Jews and Egyptians: "Judæi, cæso ariete, velut in contumeliam Ammonis; bos quoque immolatur, quem Egyptii Apim colunt."

The fifth plague of murrain destroyed all the cattle of Egypt, but of “the cattle of the Israelites died not one.” It was immediately inflicted by GOD himself, after previous notification, and without the agency of Moses or Aaron, to manifest the divine indignation at Pharaoh’s falsehood. And though the king sent, and found, that not one of the Israelites was dead, yet his heart was hardened this sixth time also, and he would not let the people go, ix. 1—7.

SIXTH PLAGUE.

At length, after Pharaoh had repeatedly abused the gracious respites and warnings vouchsafed to him and his servants, a sorer set of plagues, affecting themselves, began to be inflicted.—And Moses, now for the first time, appears as the executioner of divine vengeance; for in the presence of Pharaoh, by the divine command, he sprinkled ashes of the furnace towards heaven, and it became a boil, breaking forth with blains upon man and upon beast. And the magicians could not stand before Moses, because of the boil, which affected them and all the Egyptians, ix. 8—11.

This was a very significant plague: “the furnace” from which the ashes were taken, aptly represented “the iron furnace” of Egyptian bondage, Deut. iv. 20; and the scattering of the ashes in the air, might have referred to the usage of the Egyptians in their Typhonian sacrifices of human victims; while it converted another of the elements, and of their gods, the air, or æther, into an instrument of their chastisement.

And now “THE LORD, for the first time, hardened the heart of Pharaoh,” after he had so repeatedly hardened it himself, “and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had foretold unto Moses,” ix. 12. Though Pharaoh probably felt the scourge of the boil, as well as his people, it did not soften nor humble his heart. And when he wilfully and obstinately turned away from the light, and shut his eyes against the luminous evidences vouchsafed to him of the supremacy of the GOD OF THE HEBREWS, and had twice broken his promise, when he was indulged with a respite, and dealt deceitfully, he became a just object of punishment; and GOD now began to encrease the hardness or obduracy of his heart. And such is the usual and the righteous course of his Providence: when nations or individuals despise the warnings of heaven, abuse their best gifts, and resist the means of grace, "GOD then delivers them over to a reprobate or undiscerning mind, to work all uncleanness with greediness," Rom. i. 28. In the emblematical plagues of the Apocalypse, when the fifth vial is poured out upon the air, the throne of the beast, the sufferers blaspheme the God of heaven, in consequence of their pains and their ulcers, and repent not of their works, Rev. xvi. 10, 11.

SEVENTH PLAGUE.

In the tremendous plague of hail, the united elements of air, water, and fire, were employed to terrify and punish the Egyptians, by their principal divinities. This plague was formally announced to Pharaoh and his people :

"I will, at this season, send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, that thou mayest know that there is none like ME in all the earth. For now I could stretch out my hand, and smite thee and thy people with pestilence, [or destroy thee at once, like thy cattle with the murrain,] and thou shouldst be cut off from the earth : but in truth, for this cause have I sustained thee, that I might manifest in thee my power, and that my name might be declared throughout the whole earth," ix. 13—16. This rendering of the passage is more conformable to the context, the Chaldee Paraphrase, and to the foregoing observation of Philo, alluding thereto, than the received translation,—“ For now, I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence.” —For surely Pharaoh and his people were not smitten with pestilence ; and “ they were preserved ” or kept from immediate destruction, according to the Sept. (διετηρηθησιν,) “ to manifest the divine power,” by the number and variety of their plagues.

Still, however, in the midst of judgment God remembered mercy ; He gave a gracious warning to the Egyptians, to avoid, if they chose, the threatened calamity. “ Send therefore now, and gather thy cattle, and all that thou hast in the field : every man and beast that shall be found in the field, and shall not be brought home, the hail shall come down upon them, and they shall die.”

And this warning had some effect : “ He that feared the word of the Lord among the servants of Pharaoh, made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses ; and he that regarded not the word of the Lord, left his servants and his cattle in the field," ix. 17—21.

But it may be asked, If all the cattle of the Egyptians were destroyed by the foregoing plague of murrain, as asserted, ix. 6. how came there to be any cattle left?—Surely the Egyptians might have recruited their stock from the land of Goshen, where "not one of the cattle of the Israelites died."—And this justifies the supposition, that there was some "respite," or interval, between the several plagues, and confirms the conjecture of the duration of the whole, about a quarter of a year. And that the warning, in this case, was respected by many of the Egyptians, we may infer from the number of chariots and horsemen that went in pursuit of the Israelites afterwards.

This was foretold to be "a very grievous hail, such as had not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof;—and the Lord sent thunder and hail, and the fire ran along the ground.—And the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt all that was in the field, both man and beast; and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field. Only in the land of Goshen, where the children of Israel were, was there no hail."

The effect of such a tremendous hurricane, in a country where it seldom rains or thunders, insomuch that Herodotus represents rain at Thebes, in upper Egypt, as an alarming event, (αναρσιον προημα.) B. III. 10; and its universality; whereas hurricanes are usually partial; and the total exemption of Goshen, in the heart of Egypt, altogether moved the obdurate heart of Pharaoh, so that he sent and called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them "I have sinned this time; the LORD is righteous, and I and my people are wicked. Intreat THE LORD, (for it is enough,) that there might be no more mighty thunderings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer."—But when there was respite, Pharaoh "sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants—neither would he let the people go," Exod. ix. 27—35.

In this instance, there is a remarkable suspension of the judicial infatuation. Pharaoh had humbled himself, and acknowledged his own and his people's guilt, and the justice of the divine plague. The Lord, therefore, forebore this time to harden his heart. But he abused the long-sufferance of God, and this additional respite; he sinned yet more, because he now sinned wilfully, after he had received information of the truth; he relapsed, and hardened his own heart, a seventh time. He became, therefore, “a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction,” Heb. x. 26; Rom. ix. 22.

The state of such a relapsed penitent is awfully described by our LORD: “when the impure spirit is gone out of a man, [expelled, for a time, by some divine judgment or visitation in mercy,] it walketh through desert places, seeking rest, but findeth none: Then it saith, I will return to my house [the man’s heart,] from whence I went out, and having come, [thither,] findeth it vacant, swept, and garnished, [disposed and prepared for re-occupation]. Then it goeth, and taketh with it seven other spirits more wicked than itself, and they enter in and dwell there. So, the last state of that man is worse than the first,” Matt. xii. 43. Compare 2 Pet. ii. 20.

From this awakening passage, compared with other parts of Scripture, may we not venture to collect, that when GOD is said to harden Pharaoh’s heart, it was in reality hardened by diabolical influence, or demoniacal possession. The cases of David and Ahab are precisely in point: in one passage it is said, “The anger of THE LORD was kindled against Israel, and HE moved David against them, [to say to his captains,] Go, number Israel and Judah,” 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. But the parallel passage states, that “Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel,” 1 Chron. xxi. 1. And in Ahab’s case, “THE LORD, in his council, commissioned a lying spirit to persuade Ahab to his destruction, by fighting the Syrians at Ramoth Gilead,” 2 Kings xxii. 19. See the foregoing analysis of the book of Job.

And surely the distinction between Pharaoh’s hardening his heart, at first, and GOD afterwards, is too strongly marked, to resolve the latter, with most expositors, merely into “divine dereliction ;” as if God only left Pharaoh to himself, to follow his own inventions or imaginations, unrestrained by preventing grace. Pharaoh’s situation in the latter case, after his relapse, exactly resembled that of Eli’s sons; who “were sons of Belial, [or the Devil, 2 Cor. vi. 15, 1 Cor. x. 21,] they knew not THE LORD:—and they hearkened not unto the [warning] voice of their father, because THE LORD willed to slay them,” 1 Sam. ii. 12—25. Their destruction is here expressly ascribed to THE LORD; which implies something more than a bare negation, or desertion, on his part; it implies the active operation of divine wrath.—Like them, Pharaoh was “a son of Belial,” and the magicians of his court were like Elymas the sorcerer, who withstood the Apostles, and endeavoured to pervert Sergius Paulus from the faith of CHRIST; whom Paul, “filled with the Holy Spirit,” called “a son of the Devil, and an enemy of all righteousness;” and struck with a temporary blindness, Acts xiii. 6—12.

THE EIGHTH PLAGUE.

The design of this and the ensuing plagues, was to confirm the faith of the Israelites.—“That thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son’s son, what I have wrought in Egypt, and my signs which I have done among them: that ye may know how that I am THE LORD.”

This plague of locusts, inflicted on the now devoted Egyptians and their king, completed the havoc begun by the hail; by this “the wheat and rye were destroyed, and every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left: and there remained not any verdure in the trees, nor in the herbs of the field, throughout the land of Egypt.”—“Very grievous were they; before them there were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall there be such,” Exod. x. 3—15.

Though locusts are common in Arabia, they are seldom found in Egypt; the Red Sea forming a barrier against them, as they are not formed for crossing seas, or for long flights. The winds, also, blow there six months from the north, and six from the south: so that “the strong easterly wind” that enabled them to cross it, was evidently præternatural. Such was the powerful operation of this plague, that “Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron in haste, and said, I have sinned against THE LORD YOUR GOD, and against you: Now, therefore, forgive I pray thee, my sins, only this once, and intreat the Lord your God, that he may take away from me this death only.”—“And the Lord turned a mighty strong sea wind,” (which blew from the Mediterranean Sea, or in a north-westerly* direction,) “and carried away the locusts, and cast them into the Red Sea,” so completely, that there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt. But THE LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh, so that he would not let the children of Israel go, with their families and flocks, as Moses demanded, though he had reluctantly consented to let the men go, before the infliction of this plague, on the remonstrance of his servants: "How long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed?" Exod. x. 7—20.

THE NINTH PLAGUE.

This most awful plague of darkness over all the land of Egypt, for three days, "a thick darkness, which might be felt," in the emphatic language of Scripture, was inflicted on the Egyptians, and their chief god, the sun; and was, indeed, a most significant sign of the divine displeasure, and of that mental darkness under which they now laboured. Their consternation thereat is strongly represented by their total inaction: neither rose any from his place for three days, petrified, as they were, with horror. They were also "scared with strange apparitions and visions, while a heavy night was spread over them, an image of that darkness which should afterwards receive them. But yet, they were unto themselves more grievous than that darkness!" Wisd. xvii. 3—21. See Psalm lxxviii. 49. The same prodigy, but of shorter continuance, three hours, attended our Lord's crucifixion, when there was darkness over all the land from the sixth hour till the ninth hour, when he expired, Matt. xvii. 45, &c.; emblematical, likewise, of that darkness and destruction which awaited his murderers. That it was miraculous in both cases, see Vol. I. p. 69.

This terrific and horrible plague compelled Pharaoh to relax: he offered to let the men and their families go, but he wished to keep the flocks and herds as security for their return. But Moses peremptorily declared, that "not a hoof should be left behind"—Again,—"THE LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let them go," x. 21—27. "And the LORD said unto Moses, Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt. And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh; and THE LORD [ultimately] hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land," xi. 9, 10. This passage forms the conclusion to the nine plagues, and should properly follow the preceding: for the result of the tenth and last plague was foretold—that Pharaoh should not only let them go, but surely thrust them out altogether, xi. 1.

THE TENTH PLAGUE.

This plague was announced to Pharaoh with much solemnity—“ Thus saith THE LORD : About midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt, and all the first born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even to the first born of the maid servant that is behind the mill ; and all the first born of cattle. And there shall be a great cry throughout the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be any more.”—— “ But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue against man or beast ; that ye may know, how that THE LORD doth make a difference between the Egyptians and Israel. And all these thy servants shall come down unto me, and bow themselves unto me, saying, Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee. And after that, I will go out,” xi. 4—8.

Such a threat, delivered in so high a tone, both in the name of the God of Israel and of Moses, did not fail to exasperate the infatuated Pharaoh, and he said, “ Get thee from me ; take heed to thyself ; see my face no more : for in the day thou seest my face, thou shalt die. And Moses said, [Be it] so, [as] thou hast spoken : I will see thy face again no more,”——“ and he went out from Pharaoh in great anger,” x. 28, 29, xi. 8.

The two last verses of the tenth chapter are evidently out of their place ; they properly belong to the last interview, and are therefore here inserted, in the eighth verse of the eleventh chapter.

INSTITUTION OF THE PASSOVER.

This solemn rite was ordained for a perpetual memorial of the deliverance of the Israelites from the destroying angel, when he passed over, or spared the houses of the Israelites, but destroyed the first born of the Egyptians, Exod. xii. 27.

Each family had been previously required, at the beginning of the month Abib, (which, from henceforth, was made the first month of the sacred year, retrieving the original beginning of the year, in spring, about the vernal equinox*,) to take a lamb without spot or blemish, upon the tenth day of the month, to keep it up, and to kill it on the fourteenth, *between the two evenings, (the former of which began at the ninth hour, the latter at the twelfth, or sunset.) They were to roast it whole, and to eat it in haste, not breaking a bone of it, with bitter herbs and unleavened bread, standing, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staves in their hands, after the manner and posture of distressed pilgrims, who were setting out instantly upon a long journey, through a dreary wilderness, towards a pleasant land, where their toil and travel was to cease. And they were also required to sprinkle the blood of the pascal lamb, with a bunch of hyssop dipped therein, upon the lintel, or head post, and upon the two side posts of the doors of their houses, to save them from the destroyer, who, seeing this token, would pass over their houses, without entering to smite hem.

* See Vol. I. p. 33.

“ And the people bowed the head and worshipped, and went away, and did as the LORD had commanded ;” and waited in their houses for the catastrophe that was to work their deliverance.

“ And at midnight the Lord smote all the first born in the land of Egypt—and there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house where there was not one dead,” xii. 1—30.

This last tremendous judgment is described with much sublimity, in the book of Wisdom, xviii. 14—18.

“ For when all things were wrapt in still silence,
 And Night, in her proper speed, holding her mid-course,
 THY ALL POWERFUL ORACLE † leapt down from heaven,
 Out of the royal throne, a fierce warrior,
 Into the midst of the land of destruction,
 Wielding a sharp sword—thine unfeigned command—
 And standing up, he filled the whole with death,
 He touched the heavens indeed, but trode upon the earth !”

And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians—“ And he called for [or sent to] Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel ; and go serve THE LORD, as ye said ; take also your flocks and your herds, and be gone ; and bless me also”—And the Egyptians also were urgent upon the people to send them out of the land in haste ; for they said, “ we shall all be dead.”

* See Vol. I. p. 15.

† Ὁ παντοδυναμος Σου Λογος.

It is evident from the extreme urgency of the occasion, when all the Egyptians apprehended total destruction, if the departure of the Israelites was delayed any longer, that Pharaoh had no personal interview with Moses and Aaron, which would have wasted time, and was quite unnecessary: he only sent them a peremptory mandate to be gone, on their own terms*.

“And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses, and they asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. And THE LORD gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they freely gave [what they required,] and they spoiled the Egyptians,” Exod. xii. 31—36, as originally foretold to Abraham, Gen. xv. 14; and to Moses before the plagues began.

This, as observed before, was an act of perfect retributive justice, to make the Egyptians pay for the long and laborious services of the Israelites, whom they had unjustly enslaved, in violation of their charter.

EXODE OF THE ISRAELITES.

“Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, [and of their fathers,] which they sojourned in the land of Egypt, [and in the land of Canaan,] was 430 years. And it came to pass, at the end of the 430 years, (even the self-same day, it came to pass,) that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt,” Exod. xii. 40, 41. This period of 430 years included the whole time from Abraham’s migration to “Canaan,” during the sojourning of “their fathers” there, for 215 years; and “their own, in Egypt,” for 215 years more. The foregoing insertions, therefore, in the Masorete text, warranted by the Samaritan, and by the Septuagint version, are absolutely necessary to adjust the chronology of this period.

The Israelites were thrust out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month; “about six hundred thousand [men] on foot, besides [women] and children. And a mixed multitude † went up also with them: and flocks and herds, even very much cattle,” Exod. xii. 37—39, Numb. xi. 4, xxxiii. 3.

And “they went out with a high hand;” for THE LORD went

* Listen to the misrepresentation of Gibbon: “A tenfold repetition of prodigies were scarcely sufficient to effect, not the victory, but the flight of six hundred thousand of the children of Israel!” Hist. Decline and Fall, &c. Vol. IX. 418.

† These were the offspring of Israelites and Egyptians, Levit. xxiv. 10.

before them by day, in a pillar of a cloud,* to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light, to go by day and night. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people," Exod. xiii. 20, Numb. ix. 15—23. And the motion or rest of this divine guide, regulated their marches, and their stations or encampments, during the whole of their route, Numb. x. 33—36. See the Table of Stations, &c. Vol. I. p. 397.

After they set out from Rameses, in the land of Goshen, in the neighbourhood of Cairo, their first encampment was at Succoth, signifying "booths," or an "enclosure for cattle," after a stage of about thirty miles; their second at Etham, or Adsjerud, on "the edge of the wilderness," about 60 miles further; "for the Lord led them not by the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near: for GOD said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt: but God led the people about by the way of the wilderness of the red sea;" or by a circuitous route to the land of promise, in order "to train them and instruct them," in the solitudes of Arabia Petræa, Exod. xiii. 17—20. Deut. xxxii. 10.

Instead of proceeding from Etham, round the head of the Red Sea, and coasting along its eastern shore, the Lord made them "turn" southwards along its western shore, and after a stage of about twenty or thirty miles*, to "encamp" in the valley of Bedeä, where there was an opening in the great chain of mountains that line the western coast, called Pi-ha-hiroth, "the mouth of the ridge," between "Migdol" westwards, "and the sea" eastwards, "over against Baal zephon," on the eastern coast: to tempt Pharaoh, whose heart He finally hardened, to pursue them when they were "intangled in the land," and "shut in by the wilderness" on their rear and flanks, and by the sea in their front.—The leading motive with "Pharaoh and his servants," was to bring back the Israelites to bondage, and of the Egyptians in general, to recover the treasures of which they had been spoiled, Exod. xiv. 1—5. See Vol. I. p. 396.

So Pharaoh pursued the Israelites by the direct way of Migdol, with six hundred chariots, his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pihahiroth, over against Baal zephon. And when the children of Israel beheld Pharaoh marching after them, they were sore afraid, and disposed to submit, without resistance, to their oppressors,—Let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians! justifying the wise precaution of Providence, that would not expose them to warfare with the Philistine, when their spirits were depressed and debased by bondage, xiv. 6—15.

PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

When their destruction, or their return to bondage, seemed to be inevitable, the Lord interposed, and “fought for Israel.” He opened for them a passage across the Red Sea, where it was about twelve miles wide, and brought them through in safety; while he drowned the Egyptians, who blindly followed them to their own destruction, Psalm lxxvii. 18, &c. See the place, and miraculous nature of the transit ascertained, Vol. I. p. 389.

On this memorable deliverance, Moses composed a thanksgiving, which he and the Israelites sang unto the Lord. It is also a sublime prophecy, foretelling the powerful effect of this tremendous judgment, on the neighbouring nations of Edom, Moab, Palestine, and Canaan, the future settlement of the Israelites in the promised land; and the erection of the Temple and Sanctuary on Mount Sion; and the perpetuity of the dominion and worship of God.

MOSES' THANKSGIVING.

- XV. 1. Let us sing unto THE LORD, for He hath triumphed gloriously.
The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea.
2. IAH is my strength and my song,
And hath become my salvation.
He is MY GOD (ÆLI) and I will build Him a tabernacle,
THE GOD OF MY FATHER, (ÆLOHI) and I will exalt Him.
3. IAHOH is a man of war, IAHOH is his name.
4. Pharaoh's chariots and host, He plunged in the sea,
His chosen captains are drowned in the *weedy sea;
5. The depths covered them, they sank to the bottom, as a stone.
6. Thy right hand, O LORD, is glorified in might,
Thy right hand, O LORD, hath crushed the enemy:
7. In the greatness of thy power hast thou overthrown thine adversaries;
Thou sentest forth thy wrath, it consumed them as stubble.

* See Vol. I. p. 396.

8. With the blast of thy nostrils were the waters condensed,
The floods stood collected, as a heap,
The depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.
9. The enemy said,
' *I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil,
My desire shall be fulfilled upon them,
I will unsheath my sword, my hand shall destroy them.*'
10. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea overwhelmed them,
They sank as lead, in the deep waters.
11. Who, among the Gods (Ælim) is like thee, O LORD,
Who is like thee, glorious in holiness,
Awful in praises, doing wonders !
12. Thou didst stretch forth thy right hand,
The earth swallowed them.
13. Thou, in thy mercy, dost conduct this thy people Whom thou hast redeemed ;
Thou dost guide them, in thy strength, towards thy holy settlement.
14. The nations shall hear [this] they shall tremble,
Sorrow shall seize the inhabitants of Palestine.
15. Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed,
Dismay shall possess the princes of Moab,
The inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away.
16. Fear and terror shall fall upon them,
By the greatness of thine arm, they shall be petrified,
Till thy people pass over [Jordan] O LORD,
Till the people pass over, whom Thou hast redeemed.
17. Thou shalt introduce them, and plant them,
In the mount of thine inheritance [Sion]
The place of thy residence, O LORD,
The Sanctuary, O LORD, which thy hands have established.
18. " THE LORD shall reign for ever and ever." —
20. " And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and dances ;
21. And Miriam answered them, (the Chorus of Men, perhaps.)
" Let us sing unto THE LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously,
The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

Thus repeating the burden of Moses' thanksgiving ; according to the reading of the ancient versions, in the first person plural ; " Let us, &c." which is most suitable to the occasion.

We shall now proceed to notice the principal stations and occurrences in the wilderness ; referring the reader to the table of stations, &c. Vol. I. p. 397.

MARAH.

At this station (7) the third after the passage of the Red Sea, the people murmured against Moses, because the waters were " bitter," whence the place took its name ; and the LORD shewed him a tree, by casting which into the waters they were healed, or made sweet, xv. 23—25.

DESERT OF SIN.

To this station (10) the people came exactly a month after they left Egypt. And here again they murmured for “the bread and the flesh pots of Egypt.” So the Lord gave them quails for a day, and manna for forty years, till they came to the borders of Canaan.

On this occasion the institution of the Sabbath was revived, as a day of rest, which had been intermitted during their Egyptian bondage. On this day there fell no manna, but on the preceding they were directed to gather two days’ provision thereof. To perpetuate the memorial of “this bread from heaven” to future generations, a pot of manna, which was preserved fresh, by a standing miracle, was ordered to be laid up beside the ark of the covenant, in the sanctuary, Exod. xvi. 1—25.

REPHIDIM.

At this station, adjoining to Mount Horeb, (13) the people again murmured for want of water ; and they chid Moses, saying, “give us water that we may drink.” And “they tempted THE LORD, saying, is THE LORD among us or not ?” Moses therefore, to convince them that he was, by a more obvious miracle than at Marah, smote the rock with his rod, by the divine command, and brought water out of it for the people to drink. Wherefore, he called the place Meribah, “chiding,” and the rock Massah, “temptation.” See the description of it, Vol. I. p. 407.

On their way to Rephidim, the Amalekites, the original inhabitants of the country, who are noticed in Abraham’s days, Gen. xiv. 7, not having the fear of God before their eyes, nor regarding the judgments recently inflicted on the Egyptians, attacked the rear of the Israelites when they were faint and weary ; but were defeated by a chosen party, under the command of Joshua, the faithful servant of Moses, who is first noticed on this occasion, and even then pointed out by THE LORD, as his successor. This victory was miraculous ; for, while Moses held up his hand, Israel prevailed, but when he let it down Amalek prevailed. So Aaron and Hur, (the husband of Miriam, according to Jose- phus,) held up both his hands steadily till sun set, and thereby gave a decided victory to Israel. This unprovoked aggression of the Amalekites, drew down upon them from THE LORD, the sentence of "war from generation to generation," between them and the Israelites, and of final extermination; which was commanded to be written or registered in a book, for a memorial to Joshua and his successors, the judges and kings of Israel; and was carried into execution by Saul, 1 Sam. xv. 8; by David, 1 Sam. xxx. 17; and finally accomplished by the Simeonites in Hezekiah's reign, 1 Chron. iv. 43, Exod. xvii. 8—13, Deut. xxv. 17.

While the Israelites were encamped at Rephidim, on the western side of Horeb, the Mount of God, Jethro, the father in law of Moses, who lived in that neighbourhood, and was priest and prince of Midian, came to visit him, with his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Eleazar and Gershom, who had accompanied him part of the way to Egypt, but returned home again; and they rejoiced with him "for all the goodness which the Lord had done for Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians;" and upon this occasion, Jethro, as "a priest of the most high God," of the order of Melchizedek, "offered a burnt offering, and sacrifices of thanksgiving to GOD, at which Aaron, and all the elders of Israel, ate bread with Jethro before God;" by a repetition of the Eucharistic feast upon a sacrifice, which Melchizedek formerly administered to Abraham, Gen. xiv. 18, Exod. xviii. 1—12.

Thus was fulfilled the prophetic "sign," which THE LORD had given to Moses, when he first appeared to him in the burning bush. "This shall be a token unto thee that I have sent thee: When thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve GOD upon this mountain," Exod. iii. 12. The speedy accomplishment, therefore, of this sign, at the beginning of their journey, was well calculated to strengthen their faith, or reliance on the divine protection throughout.

Jethro appears to have been distinguished, not only for his piety, but also for his political wisdom. By his advice, which also was approved by THE LORD, Moses, to relieve himself from the fatigue of administering justice to the people, the whole day, from morning until evening, instituted inferior judges or magistrates, over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens*, as his deputies; who were to relieve him from the burden of judging the smaller causes, but to refer the greater, or more difficult, to Moses, for his decision.

SINAI.

To this remarkable station, (14) on the southern side of Horeb, the Israelites came on “the new moon,” [or first day] of “the third” [month,] on the forty-fifth day after they had left Egypt, Exod. xix. 1.

On the second of the month, or the next day, Moses went up to converse with GOD on Mount Sinai, the highest summit of Horeb, (see Vol. I. p. 407.) And, on his return, communicated to the people God’s gracious promise of taking them under his peculiar protection, as “his people,” provided they would be obedient unto Him, as “their GOD.” To which they all agreed unanimously. “All that THE LORD speaketh, we will do.”

And Moses repeated their answer unto THE LORD, xix. 3—9.

On the third day THE LORD commanded the people to sanctify, or purify themselves, and to wash their clothes on that day and the following, preparatory to his appearance in glory, the day after, upon Mount Sinai, in the sight of all the people, to deliver the law to them in person, xix. 10—25.

Accordingly, on the fifth day of the month, and the fiftieth after their departure from Egypt, The ten commandments were delivered with a loud voice, in the hearing of all the people, from the mouth of THE GOD OF ISRAEL: but they saw no similitude, they only heard a voice speaking out of the midst of the fire, and smoke, and thick darkness, in which the top of the mountain was enveloped; accompanied with thunderings and lightnings, and a great earthquake. So awful and tremendous, indeed, was the scene, that all the people, and even Moses himself, exceedingly feared and trembled, Exod. xx. 1—18, Deut. iv. 11—15; v. 2—22, Heb. xii. 18—21.

When THE LORD had spoken the Ten Commandments, with a great voice, and then ceased, “for he added no more,” the people said unto Moses, “speak thou with us, and we will hear, but let not God speak with us, lest we die.”—“Go thou near,

* Lord Bacon thinks, in his Essay on English Government, P. I. p. 70, that Alfred the Great took from hence his idea of the old Saxon constitution of sheriffs in counties; hundredors or centgraves, in hundreds; and deciners in decennaries or tythings; who were a sort of justices of peace in their respective divisions.

and hear all that THE LORD OUR GOD will say ; and speak thou unto us all that THE LORD OUR GOD shall speak unto thee, and we will hear, and do it," Exod. xx. 19, Deut. v. 27, xviii. 16.

And the Lord approved of the people's proposal :

" I have heard the voice of the words of this people, which they have spoken unto thee : they have well said all that they have spoken." " O that there were such a heart in them, that they would fear Me, and keep my commandments always, that it might be well with them and with their children for ever !" Deut. v. 28, 29 ; xviii. 17.

After this tender ejaculation, worthy indeed of the tutelar GOD OF ISRAEL, He required Moses to stand by him on the Mount, which he did, for forty days, while THE LORD communicated to him the fundamental laws and institutions of the government, by which the people were in future to be governed, Exod. xxiv. 18, Deut. v. 31—33. See the two last articles of this period.

THE PROPHET LIKE MOSES.

On this occasion THE LORD was pleased to signify to the people, the coming of a future legislator and prophet, like Moses, whom they had desired to mediate between them and God.

" I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth ; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him : and it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him,"—which Moses communicated to the people :

" THE LORD THY GOD will raise up unto thee a prophet, from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me : unto Him shall ye hearken," Deut. xviii. 15—19.

This prophet like unto Moses was OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, who was by birth a Jew, of the middle class of the people, and resembled his predecessor, in personal intercourse with GOD, miracles and legislation, which no other prophet did, Deut. xxxiv. 10—12. And to whom, GOD, at his transfiguration, required the world " to hearken," Matt. xvii. 5. Whence OUR LORD'S frequent admonition to the Jewish Church, " He that hath ears to hear, let him hear," Matt. xiii. 9, &c. Addressed also, " by THE SPIRIT, to the Christian Churches" of Asia Minor, Rev. iii. 22.—“ The lamps” of both have been extinguished for their apostacy, according to the tremendous denunciations of prophecy, Rev. ii. 5.—Heaven avert the omen from the “ lukewarm” Churches of Europe, in this their day of trial ! Rev. iii. 15, 16.

THE GOLDEN CALF.

This first apostacy of the Israelites, and relapse into the idolatry of Egypt, specially prohibited by the second commandment, happened during Moses' stay in the Mount for the first forty days. Impatient of the delay, and wishing to return to Egypt, they applied to Aaron and Hur, who had been left in the regency by Moses ; “ Up, make us a god to go before us, for as for this Moses, the man who brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him,” Exod. xxxii. 1, Nehem. ix. 18, Acts vii. 39, 40.

Aaron, accordingly, by a criminal compliance with their importunity, and fearing perhaps for his life, for they threatened to “ stone him,” made a golden calf of their ear rings, which he required them to contribute for the purpose, and set it up as an Egyptian emblem of the true God :—“ This is thy God, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.” And he proclaimed a feast unto THE LORD on the morrow ; and a great majority of the people offered burnt offerings and peace offerings on the altar which he had made ; and after the unhallowed sacrifice, rose up to wanton play, singing and dancing, according to the obscene Egyptian rites by which Aaron “ made them naked to their shame.”

Moses then, by the divine command, descended from the Mount—THE LORD, as “ a jealous God,” for their spiritual adultery, now disclaiming them as his people : “ Go, get thee down, for thy people, whom thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves,” &c.

And when Moses drew nigh, and saw their proceedings, his anger waxed hot, and he cast away the tables of the covenant, or stone tablets on which were engraven the ten commandments by the finger of God himself, and brake them beneath the Mount, in the presence of the people ; in token that the covenant between God and them was now rescinded on his part, in consequence of their transgression.

He then took the golden calf and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and mixed it with water, and made the children of Israel drink of it.

After thus destroying their idol, he inflicted punishment on the idolaters themselves, for he summoned all that were on THE LORD'S side to attend him, and all the Levites having obeyed the call, he sent them, in the name of the Lord, to slay all the idolaters, from one end of the camp to the other, without favour or affection, either to their neighbour or to their brother; and they slew about 3000 men. And THE LORD also plagued the people for their idolatry, Exod. xxxii. 2—35.

On this occasion Moses gave a signal proof of his love for his people, by interceding for them with THE LORD, and of his own disinterestedness, in refusing the tempting offer of THE ALMIGHTY to adopt his family in their room, and make of them "a great nation." He prayed that God would blot him out of his book, or take away his life, if He would not forgive "the great sin of his people," and prevailed with GOD to alter his determination of withdrawing his presence from them, and sending an inferior angel to conduct them to the land of promise.

And can we have a stronger proof of his veracity and strict fidelity as an historian, than his recording a fact so disgraceful to his people, whom he loved so tenderly? A fact which the Jewish historian, Josephus, has passed over in total silence; as he has also that other of the brazen serpent, so expressive of the crucified SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD.

RENEWAL OF THE COVENANT.

When the Lord had pardoned the people, and taken them again into favour, He commanded Moses to hew two tablets of stone, like the former, which were broken, and to present them to Him on the top of the Mount. And on these the LORD wrote again the Ten Commandments, for a renewal of the covenant between Him and his people.

To reward and strengthen the faith of Moses, GOD was pleased, at his request, to grant him a fuller view of the divine glory, or presence, than he had hitherto; and, to confirm his authority with the people on his return, after the second conference of forty days, He imparted to him a portion of that glory; for the face of Moses shone so, that Aaron and all the people were afraid to come nigh him, until he had put a vail on his face to hide its brightness. This was an honour never vouchsafed to mortal before, nor afterwards, till CHRIST, the Prophet like Moses, in his transfiguration also, appeared; when Moses again beheld the glory of the LORD, ministering thereto in a glorified form himself, Exod. xxxiv. 1—35; Matt. xvii. 1—8.

PLAGUE AT KIBROTH HATAAVAH.

After nearly a year's stay at Sinai, from the first of the third month after they left Egypt, until the twentieth day of the second month in the following year, when the constitution of the civil and ecclesiastical polity of the United States of Israel was completed, in that sequestered wilderness, their host set forward, under the guidance of the divine presence, towards the promised land, Numb. x. 11, 12.

Not long after, when they reached the third station from thence, Kibroth Hataavah, or Tophel (No. 17), the whole multitude grew tired of the manna, and longed for the flesh, the fish, and the vegetables of Egypt, Numb. xi. 4—9.

On this occasion Moses himself betrayed a degree of impatience and incredulity that is surprising. Unable to bear the importunities of the people, he prayed for death to put an end to his wretchedness; and when the Lord promised a supply of flesh for a month for all the people, even to satiety, he expressed a doubt of the possibility: "The people among whom I am are 600,000 footmen, and Thou hast said, I will give them flesh to eat for a whole month: Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them to suffice them? And THE LORD said unto Moses, Is the hand of the Lord waxed short? Thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass or not." Verses 10—23. And accordingly the LORD sent a prodigious flight of quails, which the people were employed in gathering two entire days, and dried afterwards in the sun; and at the end of the month, the Lord smote the people with a very great plague; whence the place derived its name, signifying "*the graves of lust ," ver. 31—35.

With this miracle, we may parallel OUR LORD'S signal miracle of feeding the 5000 men, besides women and children, in the wilderness, with a few barley loaves and fishes, recorded by all the Evangelists; which satisfied the multitude that JESUS was indeed “the prophet like unto Moses ;” insomuch that they wanted to take him by force and make him King, or Messiah. On that occasion too, the same incredulity was shewn by OUR LORD’S disciples: when, “to prove them,” (as THE LORD proved Moses,) he said, “Whence shall we buy bread that these may eat? Philip answered, Two hundred pennyworth of bread would not be sufficient that each of them should take a little. And Andrew said, There is a lad here that hath five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?” John vi. 5—15.

* See the account of this miracle, and determination of the site of this station, Vol. I. p. 403.

MIRIAM’S LEPROSY.

At the very next station of Hazereth (No. 18), the spirit of opposition to Moses broke out in his own family, for Miriam, his sister, and Aaron, his brother, spake against his wife Zipporah, contemptuously styling her “a Cushite,” or “Ethiopian woman,” and against himself, “Hath THE LORD indeed spoken only by Moses? Hath He not also spoken by us?” Numb. xii. 1, 2. Miriam probably was jealous of the respect paid to the wife of Moses, which she before had enjoyed without a rival, when, as a “prophetess,” she joined with Moses in his triumphant hymn, on the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, and led the women with timbrels and dances, Exod. xv. 20. And Aaron was “the prophet of Moses,” by the Lord’s appointment, Exod. vii. 1, 2. That Miriam, however, was the principal offender, we may conclude from Aaron’s not being involved in her punishment, and from her being cured of her leprosy, on his humble intercession to Moses, and confession of their joint offence: “Alas my Lord, lay not, I beseech thee, the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned. Let her not be as the untimely fruit of the womb,” &c. And Moses, “the meekest of mankind,” and the most forgiving, besought the Lord, “Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee,” &c.

REBELLION AT KADESH BARNEA.

At this next disastrous station (No. 19), on their way to the promised land, Moses encouraged them to proceed: “Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee; Go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto you : Fear not, neither be discouraged," Deut. i. 19—21.

But the people betrayed a diffidence, for they, "every one," proposed to Moses to send spies to search out the land, and point out to them the way they should enter, and the course they should take. And the proposal "pleased him well," and with the consent of the LORD, he sent twelve men, one out of each tribe, to spy out the land. Compare Deut. i. 22, 23, with Numb. xiii. 1—20.

Forty days after* they returned from searching the land; but all the spies, except Caleb and Joshua, brought an "evil report" of the amazing number and size of the inhabitants, and of the strength of their cities, "walled up to heaven," which so discouraged all the people, that they murmured against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt; or would God that we had died in the wilderness! And wherefore hath THE LORD brought us unto this land to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children shall be a prey! Were it not better for us to return into Egypt? And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and return into Egypt." They even went so far as to propose to stone Joshua and Caleb, because they exhorted the people not to rebel against the Lord, nor to fear the people of the land, Numb. xiv. 1—10; Deut. i. 26—28.

Still more meritorious was the intercession of Moses again for this stiff-necked and revolting people. He again rejected the divine offer to disinherit the Israelites, and make of him, or his family, a "greater and mightier nation than they." He urged the most persuasive motives with their offended God, not to destroy them with the threatened pestilence, lest the Heathen might say, that THE LORD was not able to bring them into the land which he swore unto them. He powerfully appealed to the long-tried mercies and forgivenesses they had experienced ever since their departure from Egypt; and much availed his energetic supplication: the Lord graciously said, "I have pardoned, according to thy word:—But verily, as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord; or shall adore Him for his righteous judgments: For all these men which have seen

* From the bunch of ripe grapes, which they brought back, it appears that they returned about the seventh month, near the vintage.

my glory and my miracles which I did in Egypt, and in the wilderness, and have tempted me these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice, surely shall not see the land which I swore unto their fathers: neither shall any of them that provoked me see it.—As ye have spoken in my ears, so will I do unto you, [by a righteous retaliation.] Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness. But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in; and they shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms—after the number of the days in which ye searched the land, each day for a year;—until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness.” And immediately after this sentence, as the first fruits, all the spies, except Caleb and Joshua, were cut off, and died by the plague before the Lord, Numb. xiv. 11—37; Deut. i. 34—39.

The people now, to repair their fault, contrary to the advice of Moses, presumptuously went to invade the Amalekites and Canaanites of Mount Seir, or Hor, who defeated them, and chased them as bees to Hormah, Numb. xiv. 39—45; Deut. i. 41—44.

On the morrow, they were ordered to turn away from the promised land, and to take their journey south-westwards, towards the way of the Red Sea. And they abode in the wilderness of Kadesh many days, or years, Numb. xiv. 25; Deut. i. 40—46. See an account of their stations from the time they left Kadesh (Barnea, son of wandering,) No. 19, till their return thither again, No. 38, thirty-eight years after, Vol. I. p. 401, 403, &c.

REBELLION OF KORAH, &c.

The ill success of the expedition against the Amalekites, according to Josephus, occasioned this rebellion, which broke out shortly after, against Moses and Aaron, with greater violence than any of the foregoing, under Korah, the ringleader, who drew into it Dathan and Abiram, the heads of the senior tribe of Reuben, and two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, among whom were even several of the Levites. Korah himself was the cousin-german of Moses and *Aaron, of the tribe of Levi; and he and his company disputed the exclusive right of Moses to the regency, and of Aaron to the priesthood.—“Ye

* Moses and Aaron were the sons of Amram, the eldest son of Kohath, the son of Levi, Exod. vi. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 2; and Korah was the son of Izhar, the second son of Kohath, Numb. xvi. 1.

take too much upon you, [Moses and Aaron,] seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them: Wherefore, then, lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of THE LORD?"

Struck with so alarming a rebellion, "Moses, when he heard this, fell on his face" [before THE LORD,] to supplicate his aid, and to receive his directions. And then, addressing himself to "Korah and all his company," and to the Levites in particular, he reminded them of their ingratitude to the God of Israel, for separating them for the service of the Tabernacle, and their ambition in seeking the priesthood also—ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi; and he directed them to appear before the Lord on the morrow, with their censers, and Aaron with his censer; when the Lord would decide who were his, and whom, as holy, he chose to come near to him as high priest; representing also the inoffensiveness of Aaron, "And what hath Aaron done, that ye murmur against him?"

He next sent for Dathan and Abiram, to expostulate with them; but they refused to obey his authority; "Is it a small thing, that thou hast brought us up, [from Egypt,] a land flowing with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness, except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us?—Moreover, thou hast not brought us [according to promise] into a land that floweth with milk and honey, or given us inheritance of fields and vineyards: wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? [or blind the understandings of the people by false hopes,] we will not come up."—Filled with indignation at this unfounded charge, Moses also asserted his own inoffensiveness, "I have not taken one ass from them, neither have I hurt one of them," ver. 12—17.

To punish this daring rebellion, when Korah and his party of 250 men came, with their censers, to the door of the Tabernacle, along with Moses and Aaron, and offered incense as well as Aaron; the LORD said unto Moses and Aaron, Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment. And they fell upon their faces, and said, O GOD, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?—which Korah had gathered against Moses and Aaron, to the door of the Tabernacle of the congregation, ver. 17—22.

GOD then was pleased to separate the innocent from the guilty. And Moses, by his desire, warned the congregation to depart from the assembly of Korah, [and from the tents of] Dathan and Abiram, under pain of being consumed in the sins of the former, and swallowed up with all that appertained to the latter.—“ So they gat up from the assembly of Korah, [and from the tents of] Dathan and Abiram, on every side.” But Dathan and Abiram contumaciously came out, and stood in the door of their tents, and their wives, and their sons, and their little children, as if in defiance of the threat. And when Moses had made an end of speaking, they, and their tents, and all their goods, were swallowed up by the earth cleaving asunder under them, and closing upon them, so that they perished from among the congregation. And there also came out a fire from THE LORD, and consumed Korah and the 250 men that stood with Aaron, and offered incense at the door of the Tabernacle, ver. 23—35*.

That “ the children of Korah died not” in the sin of their father, is expressly asserted afterwards, Numb. xxvi. 11 ; and Heman, the singer in David’s time, was a descendant of his, 1 Chron. vi. 33—38.

The Royal Psalmist has thus recorded this transaction, cvi. 16.

“ They envied Moses also in the camp,
And Aaron, the saint of the LORD:
The earth opened, and swallowed up Dathan,
And covered the company of Abiram:
And a fire was kindled in their company,
The flame burnt up the wicked [Korah, &c.]”

The censers of these *sinner*s against their own souls, by the command of THE LORD, were converted into broad plates for a covering of the altar: “ to be a memorial unto the children of Israel, that no stranger, not of the seed of Aaron, should usurp the office of the priests, to offer incense before the Lord ; that he be not punished as Korah and his company,” ver. 36—40.

* There is an apparent confusion in the account of this judgment in the English Bible ; which, at first sight, seems to involve the tents and family of Korah, in the same destruction with those of Dathan and Abiram. But it may be removed ; 1. by rendering the original, ver. 24, with the Septuagint, της συναγωγης Κορε, “ the assembly or company of Korah ;” and by a parenthesis, ver. 32, “ and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up and their houses, (and all the men that [adhered] to Korah,) and their goods.” The parenthesis is more fully expressed, Numb. xxvi. 10,— (together with Korah : when that company died, at the time that the fire devoured the two hundred and fifty men.)

Although “all Israel round about had fled at the cry of the devoted families of Dathan and Abiram, for fear that the earth should swallow them up also;” yet strange to tell, on the morrow they returned to their rebellious spirit, and murmured against Moses and Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of THE LORD!—When THE LORD again threatened to consume them as in a moment, but on the intercession of Moses, only smote them with a plague; which was stayed by an atonement made by Aaron, after the destruction of fourteen thousand seven hundred souls, ver. 41—50.

AARON'S ROD.

And to silence for ever any future claims to the priesthood, by any but the chosen family of Aaron, the Lord commanded the twelve princes, who were heads of the twelve tribes, (including Aaron, as head of the tribe of Levi,) to present twelve rods, one for each, marked with their names, before the Lord, in the Tabernacle, before the ark of the testimony. And on the morrow, Moses brought them forth to the people, when Aaron's rod alone appeared in all the different stages of vegetation, for it brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds.

To record this miraculous decision, in Aaron's favour, this rod was commanded to be laid up before the ark of the testimony in the inner sanctuary, along with the pot of manna; both being miraculously preserved in the same state, the former as a token against the rebels; the latter as a witness of God's providential provision for the Israelites in the wilderness.

This astonishing miracle silenced all murmurings in future, and established the authority of Moses in the regency, and of Aaron in the priesthood, without any further opposition. And now the congregation, from the one extreme of stubborn and presumptuous rebellion, ran into the opposite, of abject and slavish fear, and a superstitious dread of approaching the Tabernacle at all.—“Behold, we die! we perish! we all perish! Whosoever approacheth the Tabernacle of the Lord shall die. Shall we all be consumed?” Numb. xvii. 1—13.

THE OFFENCE OF MOSES AND AARON.

On the return of the Israelites, after so many years wandering, to the same disastrous station of Kadesh Barnea, even Moses himself was guilty of an offence, in which his brother Aaron was involved, and for which both were excluded, as a punishment, from entering the promised land.

At Meribah Kadesh the congregation murmured against Moses, for bringing them into a barren wilderness without water; when THE LORD commanded Moses to take his rod, which had been laid up before the Lord, and with Aaron, to assemble the congregation together, and to speak to the rock before their eyes; which should supply water for the congregation and their cattle.

“ But Moses said unto the congregation, when they were assembled, Hear now, ye rebels, must we fetch you water out of this rock? and he smote the rock twice with his rod, and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their cattle also*.

“ And THE LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify Me in the eyes of the children of Israel: therefore ye shall not bring this congregation unto the land which I have given them,” Numb. xx. 1—13; and afterwards in stronger terms: “ because ye rebelled against my commandment,” &c. xxvii. 14.

The offence of Moses, as far as may be collected from this concise account, seems to have been, 1. He distrusted or disbelieved, that water could be produced from the rock, only by speaking to it; which was a higher miracle than he had performed before at Rephidim, Exod. xvii. 6. 2. He unnecessarily smote the rock twice; thereby betraying an unwarrantable impatience; 3. He did not ascribe the glory of the miracle to GOD, but rather to himself and his brother; “ Must we fetch you water out of this rock;” and he denominated them “ rebels” against his and his brother’s authority; which was an implied act of rebellion against GOD: for he ought to have added, as on a former occasion, “ ye have been rebels against THE LORD, from the day that I knew you,” Deut. ix. 24, which he spake without blame; but for want of that restriction on this occasion, “ he spake unadvisedly with his lips, because they provoked his spirit,” Psalm cvi. 33.

Thus “ was GOD sanctified at the waters of Meribah, where the children of Israel ‘ strove’ with THE LORD,” by this signal miracle to relieve their wants, rebellious as they were; and by his impartial justice, in punishing his greatest favourites when they did amiss, Numb. xx. 13.

* See the account of this rock, Vol. I. p. 406.

How severely Moses felt his deprivation, appears from his humble, and it should seem, repeated supplications to the Lord to reverse the sentence;

“O LORD OF GODS, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand; for what God is there in heaven or in earth that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might? I pray thee let me go over and see the good land beyond Jordan, even that goodly mountain Lebanon, [or the whole breadth of the land.] But THE LORD was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and He said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto Me of this matter. Get thee up unto the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan,” Deut. iii. 23—27.

The apostle Paul, with equal impartiality, has recorded the refusal of THE LORD, after he had besought him thrice, to remove a thorn in the flesh, or some bodily infirmity, under which he laboured, 2 Cor. xii. 7—9.

It was reserved for a greater than Moses or Paul, that perfect model of patience in tribulation, to teach his disciples how to pray on such occasions: “O MY FATHER, if it be possible, let this cup [of affliction] pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt!” Matt. xxvi. 39.

The remainder of the route of the Israelites from Kadesh Barnea again, to the plains of Moab, eastward of the river Jordan; and the leading occurrences of the history, till the death of Moses, are detailed in the Elements of Ancient Geography, Vol. I. p. 402—409, &c.

BALAAAM'S PROPHECIES.

Balaam was a celebrated Chaldean diviner, who dwelt in “Aram Naharaim, in the mountains of the east,” or in the eastern part of Mesopotamia, “at Peth-or,” or *Beth-ur, probably the original residence of Abraham's family, “beside the river" Tigris: whither Balak, king of Moab, the descendant of Lot, "sent messengers to the land of the children of his people," or of his ancestors, to invite Balaam to come to him, in order to curse, or devote to destruction, the Israelites, who had encamped in his territories, on their way from Egypt to the promised land; and whom he was afraid to attack with open hostility, Numb. xxii. 1—6, xxiii. 7, Deut. xxiii. 4.

This mercenary diviner, who "loved the wages of unrighteousness," and earned them to his own destruction, was notwithstanding, a highly gifted prophet, and favoured with signal communications with God, in visions and dreams; and his fame had spread to distant countries: "I know," says Balak, "that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed."

How well acquainted he was with the theory of religion, and what just notions he entertained of the spiritual worship of the Deity, appears from a curious conversation between him and Balak, omitted by Moses, but fortunately recorded by the prophet Micah, vi. 5—8.

Balak enquires,

"Wherewith shall I come before THE LORD,
And bow myself before THE HIGH GOD?
Shall I come before Him with burnt offerings,
With calves of a year old?
Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams,
With ten thousands of rivers of oil?
Shall I give my first born for my transgression,
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?"

Balaam answers,

"HE hath shewed thee, O man, what is good:
And what doth THE LORD require of thee,
But to do justice, and to love mercy,
And to walk humbly with THY GOD?"

This is an advantageous specimen of the purity of the Patriarchal religion, even amidst the reigning corruptions of Superstition and Idolatry. It shews the insufficiency of the most numerous, most costly, and most precious burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin, to please GOD, without the love of GOD and our neighbour; as remarked by the Jewish doctor, Mark xii. 33, and confirmed by our LORD in the weightier matters of the law, "mercy and justice," towards man, "and faith" towards "God," Matt. xxiii. 23; both approving and sanctioning the doctrine of Balaam, as containing the cardinal virtues of the LAW and of the GOSPEL; and the means of attaining the kingdom of heaven, Mark xii. 34.

And yet, this prophet, so well instructed in his duty to God and man, and so competent to instruct others, furnishes a deplorable and alarming instance of the deceitfulness of the human heart.—He could not forego “the rewards of divination,” and the allurements of ambition: he first sought permission to go to Balak, wishing to gratify that prince, even after he had been refused by GOD, and told expressly, “Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed,” Numb. xxii. 7—12. And he tempted GOD, who afterwards permitted him to go in his anger*, by seeking to prevail on him, by solicitations and sacrifices, to alter his purpose, Deut. xxiii. 5; though he inconsistently declared, when under the influence of the Spirit, “GOD is not a man, that He should lie;

Nor a son of man, that He should repent.
Hath He said, and shall He not do?
Hath He spoken, and shall He not perform?
Lo, I am commanded to bless,
And HE hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it,” Numb. xxiii. 19, 20.

* Though GOD permitted Balaam to go with the second embassy of Balak, because the prophet himself wished it, He gave him manifest tokens of his “anger, because he went,” in order to put him the more on his guard: 1. in sending his destroying angel, as Satan, “an adversary,” to withstand him in the way; as he withstood Moses, Exod. iv. 24; 2. in enduing the ass which he rode, with the power of speech, to rebuke the prophet’s impatience and furious anger; in which he still persisted, unawed by this stupendous miracle, “I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee!”—when THE LORD opened his eyes, to see his own danger, from Satan, with his sword drawn in his hand, Numb. xxii. 22—35. And in this sense it appears to be understood by the apostle Peter:—“Balaam, the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of iniquity; but was rebuked for his own transgression: the dumb beast, speaking with a human voice, forbad the phrenzy of the prophet,” (παραφρονας,) 2 Pet. ii. 15, 16.

Philo suppresses this transaction in his life of Moses, and Maimonides supposes it happened only in vision. But its reality is evidently admitted by the apostle. And for the design of the miracle, it has been well observed, “that if Satan inspired the mute serpent to speak to and beguile our first parents, why should it be thought incredible, that the DIVINE POWER should give human speech to the dumb ass, in order to shut the mouth of this other instrument of Satan, who wanted to curse his people?” Wogan, on the proper Lessons, Vol. III.—The express mention of Satan here, and here only in the Pentateuch, seems, indeed, to indicate the analogy between the two miracles. Hence, the Pythagorean precept, recommending precaution in attempting a difficult undertaking: Stop, without attempting to pass further, where your ass couches.—The Pagan fables of the ass of Bacchus that spoke, the horses of Achilles, &c. seem to be taken from this.

And when these failed, and he had thrice blessed the people, after three solemn sacrifices, in different places, which Balak offered at his desire, he sinned yet more against the whole meaning, end, and design of the prohibition against the spirit of it, which no consideration in the world could prevail with him to go against the letter of. For surely, that mischievous counsel which he gave Balak, to send the daughters of Moab to seduce the Israelites into idolatry, was, in fact, a greater piece of wickedness and impiety, than if he had formally cursed them in words. Still, however, his partial regards to his duty seem to have quieted his conscience, and kept him from despair, when he could so far impose on himself, as to utter that pious wish :

*Let me die the death of the righteous !
And let my end be like his !*

How otherwise could he expect, that while “he did not live the life of the righteous,” he could be entitled to his peaceful death, and joyful resurrection?

And accordingly his ill-founded wish was frustrated, for he was cut off by the avenging sword of the Israelites, in reward for his pernicious counsels, along with his licentious abettors, and perished in the slaughter of the Moabites, Numb. xxxi. 8 ; Josh. xiii. 22 ; Rev. ii. 14. And his end furnishes an awful and alarming example, that extraordinary “gifts of THE SPIRIT” are not always accompanied by the genuine “fruits of THE SPIRIT,” in the hearts and lives of the possessors ; and that without charity, the rarest gifts and endowments are nothing worth, 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2 ; Matt. vii. 22.

Still the prophecies of Balaam are most curious and important ; they seem to be dictated by the same spirit as those of Jacob, of which they furnish the continuation and development, and thereby prove, that the gift of prophecy was by no means confined to the chosen seed, as the Jews boast*.

THE FIRST PROPHECY.

XXIII. 7. “Balak, the king of Moab, hath brought me from Aram,
Out of the mountains of the east : [saying]
Come, curse me Jacob,
And come, defy Israel.”

* “I am confident to assert,” says David Levi, “that the gift of prophecy was entirely confined to the chosen seed, as may be clearly perceived from the whole tenor of the Old Testament.” Proph. Vol. I. p. 2.

8. How shall I curse, whom GOD hath not cursed ?
Or how shall I defy, whom THE LORD hath not defied ?
9. For from the tops of the rocks I see Him,
And from the hills I behold Him.
*Lo, the people shall dwell alone [or separate],
And shall not be reckoned among the nations.*
10. Who can count the dust of Jacob ;
Even the number of a quarter of Israel.
*Let me die the death of the righteous,
And let my end be like his,"* Numb. xxiii. 7—10.

The divine command to Balaam, "not to curse the people, for they are blessed," which he pleads in opposition to Balak's wishes, refers to the blessing of Abraham, Gen. xii. 3, renewed to Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 29. He next remarks the separation of the Israelites from the Heathen nations, to be God's peculiar people, nearly in the language of Moses, in his last blessing to the tribes, Deut. xxxiii. 27—29.

"The eternal God is thy refuge.—
Israel shall dwell in safety alone.—
Happy art thou O Israel ;
Who is like thee, O people, saved by THE LORD,
The shield of thy help,
And the sword of thy excellency !"

"The dust of Jacob" intimates the amazing populousness of the Israelites, which was compared to "the dust of the earth," in the Divine promise to Abraham, Gen. xiii. 16 ; renewed to Jacob, Gen. xlviii. 4 ; which, by a beautiful amplification, is extended even to one of the four divisions of their encampment : the standard of Judah eastward ; of Reuben southward ; of Ephraim westward ; and of Dan northward, Numb. ii. 2—25 ; each of which was thus foretold to be as numerous as a great nation. And then the contemplation of the prosperity of Jeshurun, or "righteous Israel," and the spiritual blessings reserved as the future reward of obedience in the next life, leads to that rapturous wish respecting himself. The term אַחֲרִית, Aharith, "end," literally signifying "hereafter," denotes a future state, in the parallel passage of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 29 ; corresponding to אַחֲרוֹן, "the last day," in Job, xix. 25.

THE SECOND PROPHECY.

The conclusion of the second, pointedly refers to Jacob's prophecy respecting Judah ; ascribing their national prosperity to their righteousness, and obedience to the divine law under the theocracy.

- XXIII. 21. " HE hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob,
 Nor seen perverseness in Israel :
 THE LORD HIS GOD is with him,
 And the shout of their KING * is amongst them.
22. GOD brought them out of Egypt ;
 HE is to them as the strength of a unicorn :
23. For no enchantment [shall avail] against Jacob,
 And no divination against Israel.
 In [due] season it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel,
What hath God wrought !
24. Lo, the people shall rise up as a lioness,
 And lift up himself as a lion,
 He shall not lie down till he devour the prey,
 And drink the blood of the slain." Numb. xxiii. 21—24.

THE THIRD PROPHECY.

This remarkably unfolds the prophecy of Shiloh, and the future fortunes of the Jews.

- XXIV. 5 " How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob,
 And thy tabernacles, O Israel !
6. As streams do they spread forth ;
 As gardens, by the river side ;
 As sandal trees which THE LORD planted ;
 As cedar trees beside the waters.
7. There shall come forth a man of his seed,
And shall rule over many nations :
 And his King shall be higher than Gog †,
 And his kingdom shall be exalted.

* So Moses styles the God of Israel :

" And HE was KING in Jeshurun,
 When the heads of the people, even of the tribes,
 Were gathered together." Deut. xxxiii. 5.

† The rendering of this seventh verse, in our English Bible, from the present Masoretic text, is this :

" He shall pour the water out of his buckets,
And his seed shall be in many waters,
 And his king shall be higher than Agag.

Instead of which, I have adopted the widely different rendering furnished by the venerable Septuagint Version ; whose genuineness is supported by the context, and by the joint testimonies of Philo and Josephus, the Syriac Version, the Samaritan text, the Chaldee Targums of Onkelos, Jonathan, and Jerusalem, Cyprian, and the early Fathers ; either in the whole or in part.

Εξέλυσεται ανθρωπος εκ του σπερματος αυτου,
 Και κυριενσει εθνων πολλων
 Και υψωθησεται η Γωγ [βασιλεια] βασιλευς αυτου.

8. (God brought him forth out of Egypt,
He is to him as the strength of a unicorn.)
He shall devour the nations his enemies,
And shall break their bones,
And pierce them through with his arrows.
9. He lieth down as a lion,
He coucheth as a lioness,
Who shall rouse him !
Blessed is he that blesseth thee,
And cursed is he that curseth thee."

From all the various sources of emendation, and from the present Masorete text, we may collect the genuine Hebrew text, from which the Septuagint Version was made :

PRESENT TEXT.

| יזל מים מדליו | 1. " There shall flow water from his buckets, |
| וזרעו במים רבים | 2. And his seed, in waters many |
| וירם מאגג מלכו | 3. And higher than Agag shall be his king, |
| ותנשא מלכותו | 4. And his kingdom shall be exalted." |

REFORMED TEXT.

| יצא איש מילדיו | 1. " There shall come forth a man of his children, |
| * וזרועו בעמים רבים | 2. And his arm *, on peoples many : |
| וירום מוגג מלכו | 3. And higher than Gog , shall be his king, |
| ותתנשא מלכותו. | 4. And his kingdom shall be exalted." |

The adulteration of the original text, probably took place about A.D. 130, about the time that Aquila published his Greek Version of the Old Testament, in order to supersede the Septuagint, and first mutilated the chronology thereof, by curtailing the generations of the patriarchs, in the Hebrew text, according to the system of the Seder Olam Rabba. For about this time, there might be a great destruction of the Hebrew copies of the Old Testament, in Adrian's war, and the disastrous issue of Barchocab's rebellion, founded on Balaam's prophecies, Numb. xxiv. 7—17, might make the adulteration in the remaining copies more feasible, and might tempt the Jewish Rabbis to pervert that fatal prophecy in particular, which brought such desolation upon their nation. See Vol. I. p. 218—224.

The facility of the adulteration is obvious on comparison :

In the first line, יצא, (Iatsa), the term applied to CHRIST's birth, in the signal prophecy of Micah, v. 2, was easily changed into יזל, (Iazal), resembling it in sound: and איש, (Aish), into מים, (Maim;) and מילדיו, (Mildiv), into מדליו, (Midliv) by expunging the first yod, and transposing the two following letters.

In the second, זרועו, (Zarūhu), into זרעו, (Zarahu), by erasing the middle Vau; and בעמים, (Baamim), into במים, (Bemaim), by erasing the second letter Ain.

In the third, גוג, (Gog), into אגג, (Agag.) This, and the fuller readings in the fourth line, are warranted by the Samaritan text.

See an Attempt to restore the Original Hebrew Text, &c. in the first Dissertation of the volume of Dissertations on the prophetic Character of JESUS CHRIST, where this subject is fully discussed.

* זרועו, (Zarahu.) " Arm," frequently signifies "power," or "rule," Exod. xv. 16, Isai. liii. 1, li. 9, lxiii. 5, Luke i. 57, &c.

Here SHILOH is expressly declared to be “ a man of Jacob's seed,” who shall subdue many nations, and set up a kingdom higher than that of *Gog, or the fierce nations of the north, who are the subject of succeeding prophecies, in Ezekiel, xxxviii. 1—17; and in the Apocalypse, Rev. xvi. 14—16, xx. 7—10. And are here threatened to be destroyed with “ arrows,” their own weapons. See Vol. I. p. 353, and see the following article of the Jewish feasts, especially the feast of Tabernacles, when this immense slaughter is to take place, in the valley of Hamon Gog, Ezek. xxxix. 1—22; or Armageddon, Rev. xvi. 16.

In the ninth verse there is a repeated allusion to the ferocious, warlike disposition of the tribe of Judah, intimated in the prophecy of Jacob, under the same imagery as in the preceding; and the conclusion is a repetition of the original blessing to Abraham, Gen. xii. 3; renewed to Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 29.

These remarkable references to former prophecies, with which Balaam, from his situation, in Mesopotamia, can scarcely be conceived to have been acquainted, at such a distance from the time and place in which they were originally communicated to Abraham and to Jacob, in the land of Canaan, seem to furnish decisive proof that he was no more than a vehicle of the divine oracles; and spake only as the Spirit gave him utterance.

THE FOURTH PROPHECY.

This last completes the preceding, and unfolds more fully the remote and distant period of the Messiah's coming; the future subjugation of the Transjordanite nations, the Moabites, Edomites, Amalekites, and Kenites; the Assyrian captivity of these nations; the Roman conquests of the Assyrians and Hebrews; and the destruction of the conquerors themselves at last.

“ Come now, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do unto thy people in the end of the days.”

* David Levi, endeavouring to support the present Masorete reading, מִיָּאָג, contends, that the præposition מִ, put for מִן, (Min), does not properly form the comparative degree, “ higher than Agag ;” but denotes time; so that the meaning should be—“ His king shall begin to be exalted, from the time of Agag :” that is, from the time of Saul, the first king of Israel, who overcame Agag; and that his kingdom should be still more exalted, during the prosperous reigns of David and Solomon,” p. 7. But Agag was a petty prince; and most unfortunately for his argument, Saul's sparing him was the cause of his own downfall, not rise, or exaltation.

*I see Him, but not now ;
I behold Him, but not nigh * ;
A star shall proceed from Jacob,
And a sceptre shall arise from Israel,
And shall smite the corners of Moab,
And the pate of all the sons of Seth, [or tumult †,]*

* This is well explained by David Levi, Proph. Vol. I. p. 8.

“Balaam here shews that his visions were real prophecies. And although he was so far overpowered by the force of the vision, that his corporeal faculties were deprived of their proper functions, yet his intellectual powers were in full force ; which he beautifully describes by his falling down in a trance, but having his eyes open. And as he clearly saw the vision with his intellectual eye, he makes use of that image to shew the nature of his prophecy ; and therefore observes, “I see him, but not now ! I view him, but not nigh.” That is, I plainly see the thing I foretel, although it doth not yet exist ; and I have a clear view of it, although it is to be at such a distance of time. — Asher shall come forth,” &c.

Blinded, however, by his Jewish prejudices, Levi afterwards objects : “Balaam, in this last prophecy, clearly points out the restoration of the Jews, and the destruction of their enemies, at the coming of THE MESSIAH ; but nothing of this kind took place at the coming of Jesus : for at that time no star came forth from Jacob, nor did a sceptre rise out of Israel which smote the corners of Moab, and broke down the walls of all the children of Seth, i. e. brought the whole world into subjection,” p. 25. — Levi could not distinguish between the first and nearer coming of the MESSIAH in humiliation, and his second and remoter coming in triumph, to which the prophecy alludes, by his own explication, and by Balaam's limitation, in the end of the days.

† The prophet Jeremiah has imitated this passage in the following, xlvi. 45.

“ There shall go forth a fire from Heshbon,
And a flame from the midst of Sihon,
And it shall devour the corner of Moab,
And the pate of the sons of tumult.”

The imagery here is somewhat different : instead of “ a sceptre to smite,” we read “ a flame to devour :” which seems to be borrowed from the popular song of the conquest of Moab, at first by Sihon, king of the Amorites :

“ There is a fire gone out of Heshbon,
A flame from the city of Sihon,
It hath consumed Ar [‘ the city’] of Moab,
And the lords of the high places of Arnon,” Numb. xxi. 23.

See Vol. I. p. 409.

“ The corner of Moab” to be smitten, or consumed, is the same in both prophets, Balaam and Jeremiah ; whence we may collect, that the succeeding line in each, signifies the same. We seem, therefore, to be warranted, by the rules of comparative criticism, to substitute for קרקר, Karkar, a scarce word of doubtful signification, in Balaam's prophecy, קדקד, Kadkad, in Jeremiah, which so nearly resembles it, signifying “ the crown of the head,” or “ the pate ;” and is actually the reading of the Samaritan text, in this prophecy of Balaam ; and is also strongly supported by other imitations.

“ GOD shall smite the head of his enemies,
And the hairy pate of him that walketh in wickedness,” Psalm lxviii. 21.

“ GOD shall smite with a scab
The pate of the daughters of Sion,” Isai. iii. 17.

And Edom shall be a possession for his enemies,
Seir also shall be a possession,
 And Israel shall do valiantly.
 And [a man] shall rule out of Jacob,
 And shall destroy the remnant of the city.

And he beheld Amalek, and said,
Amalek was the head of the nations :
 But his end [is doomed] to destruction.

And he beheld the Kenites—and said,
 Strong is thy habitation, and
 Thou puttest thy nest in a rock ;
 Nevertheless, the Kenite shall be wasted,
 Until the Assyrian shall carry thee away captive.

And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim,
 And shall afflict the Assyrians,
 And shall afflict the Hebrews,
 But he also, [the invader, is doomed] to destruction.

Numb. xxiv. 17—24.

Balaam here, in prophetic vision, describes the remote coming of SHILOH, under the imagery of a star and a sceptre, or an illustrious prince. Though it was foretold that “the sceptre should depart from Judah at his coming,” this prophecy confirms to him a proper sceptre of his own. And our Lord claimed it when he avowed himself “a king” to Pilate ; but declared that “his kingdom was not of this world,” John xviii. 37, 38.

This branch of the prophecy was fulfilled about 1600 years after ; when, at the birth of Christ, “the Magi from the east,” (who are supposed by Theophylact to have been the posterity of Balaam,) came to Jerusalem, saying, “Where is the [true] born King of the Jews ? for we have seen his star, at its rising, and are come to worship Him,” Matt. ii. 1, 2. See Vol. I. p. 92.

The foregoing restoration of the original prophecy, from the Septuagint Version, Numb. xxiv. 7, “There shall come forth a man of his seed,” &c. is supported also by verse 19, “And [a man] shall rule out of Jacob ; and shall destroy the remnant of the city ;” the city here referred to, seems to be “*Ar, of

Which latter, the Septuagint excellently translates, Καὶ ταπεινωσεί ὁ Θεὸς ἀρχουσὰς θυγατέρας Σιών. “And God shall humble the imperious daughters of Sion.”

By the same analogy, “the sons of Seth,” in Balaam, correspond to “the sons of tumult,” in Jeremiah. But we learn from Plutarch, that “Seth was a name given by the Egyptians to Typhon, or the power which overturns all things, and overleaps all bounds.” De Isid. et Osir. p. 351, 357.—And τυφών, signifies a “whirlwind,” or “hurricane”—Hesychius, Suidas.

* The original עֵר, is written by the Sept. Ηρ, abridged from עֵיר, Ir ; signifying, Moab," whose destruction was noticed, Numb. xxi. 15—28, corresponding to Bozrah, "a fortress," from the destruction of which THE SAVIOUR is represented as coming by Isaiah, lxiii. 1. See the foregoing article of Jacob's prophecy of Judah.

The doom of Amalek, which had been first foretold by Moses, is here repeated by Balaam, with the additional circumstance of the preservation of the tribe of the Kenites, for Jethro's sake, the father-in-law of Moses, who is called a Kenite, Judg. i. 16, whom Saul spared in the destruction of the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 6. Still the Kenites were "wasted," or reduced in strength, after their separation from Amalek, until they shared the general fate of these Transjordanite nations, and were swept away into captivity by the Assyrians, 1 Chron. v. 26; and afterwards by the Babylonians, Jer. xxv. 9—11. The woeful prospect of these captivities, drew from the prophet that passionate exclamation, Alas, who shall live when God doeth this!

As a source of consolation, however, to these nations, he notices the future retaliation of vengeance on their enslavers, the Assyrians and the Hebrews, (who appear to be meant by Asher and Heber, in the Original, retained in our English Bible,) by naval invasions from Chittim, or the northern coasts of the Mediterranean Sea; at first by the Macedo-Grecians, and afterwards by the Romans; (as afterwards more fully unfolded by Moses and Daniel,) concluding with the final doom of these last invaders, in their turn.

MOSES' PROPHECIES.

These may be considered as supplementary to those of Jacob and Balaam; furnishing a more detailed account of the fortunes of the Israelites, and afterwards of the Jews. His predictions of the corruptions of his people, after his death, of their subsequent calamities under the judicial and regal states; of the horrors of the Assyrian and Babylonian, and afterwards of the Roman captivities; are delivered with such plainness and precision, that they seem rather to be historical narratives of past transactions, than prophecies of future. In this respect they differ from all others, excepting those of OUR LORD himself:

"a city;" which in the plural, ערים, Irim, "cities," frequently drops the intermediate Vau, Numb. xxv. 2, &c. and also in regimen ערי, Iri, Numb. xxxii. 36.

the predictions of the rest being generally delivered in a figurative and highly poetical style, very concise, and very obscure.

When Moses had written and finished "the Book of the Law," he commanded the Levites to put the copy, written by himself, beside the Ark of the Covenant, in the Sanctuary, that it might be preserved there, "for a witness against the people:" "For I know," said he to them, "thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord: and how much more after my death? Gather to me all the elders of your tribes, that I may speak all these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them. For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you: and evil will befall you in the latter days, because ye will do evil in the sight of the LORD, to provoke Him to anger through the work of your hands," Deut. xxxi. 24—30.

This original copy, written by Moses, was afterwards found by Hilkiah the priest, in the reign of Josiah, when the temple of Solomon was repaired, shortly before the Babylonian captivity, and the denunciations contained therein, were read before the king, 2 Kings xxii. 8—10.

These denunciations are chiefly contained in the 26th chapter of Leviticus, delivered by Moses to the Israelites at Mount Sinai; and repeated thirty-nine years after to their children, on the plains of Moab, in the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy.

After specifying the blessings attached to their obedience, Levit. xxvi. 3—13; Deut. xxviii. 1—11; and the curses to their disobedience in their own land, Levit. xxvi. 14—26; Deut. xxviii. 15—31; the enlightened prophet proceeds to delineate their captivities in foreign lands.

I. Of the Assyrian and Babylonish Captivities.

Deut. xxviii. 32. "Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given to another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long: and there shall be no might in thy hand.

33. "The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not, eat up; and thou shalt only be oppressed and crushed away.

36. "THE LORD shall lead thee, and thy king which thou shalt set over thee, unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known; and there shalt thou serve other gods, wood and stone.

37. "And thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a bye word among all nations whither THE LORD shall lead thee.

47. "Because thou servedst not THE LORD THY GOD with joyfulness and gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things:

48. "Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies, which the Lord thy God shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee." Compare Levit. xxvi. 23—34.

"And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity, in your enemies' land; and also in the iniquities of their fathers, shall they pine away with them," Levit. xxvi. 39.

These passages are remarkably descriptive of the captivities of the ten tribes carried away by the Assyrians, and transplanted in Media, and the remotest parts of the empire; and of the two remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin, by the Babylonians. These captivities were not to take place until their rejection of the primitive constitution of Judges, and rebellious choice of kings, during their regal state, which is here foretold; and also that these captivities were to be by land; as marked in the original expression יָלַךְ, (Iolech,) "THE LORD shall cause thee to walk," or, "shall lead thee on foot," ver. 36.

"The true import of these passages is determined by the prophet Jeremiah, in the following summary.

"Lo, I will bring a nation upon you from far, O house of Israel, saith THE LORD: a mighty nation, an ancient nation, a nation whose language thou knowest not, neither understandest what they say: their quiver is an open sepulchre; they are all mighty men. And they shall eat up thy harvest, and thy bread which thy sons and daughters should eat: they shall eat up thy flocks and thy herds; they shall eat up thy vines and thy fig-trees; they shall impoverish thy fenced cities with the sword," Jer. v. 15—17.

The remoteness of the Babylonians is noticed, Isa. v. 26; and the antiquity of "the land of Nimrod," Micah v. 6; the Syriac language was not understood by the Jews, 2 Kings xviii. 26. And their arms were chiefly bows and arrows, Jer. vi. 23, xlix. 45; Isa. lxvi. 19.

II. OF THE ROMAN CAPTIVITY.

Deut. xxviii. 49. "THE LORD shall bring a nation upon thee from far, from the end of the earth, [swift] as the eagle flieth, a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand,

50. "A nation of *fierce countenance, which shall not respect the person of the old, nor pity the young.

51. "And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed: he shall not leave thee corn, wine, or oil, the increase of thy kine, nor flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee.

* How singularly applicable this characteristic of a fierce countenance, was to the Romans, may appear from the following instances.

In a war which broke out between the Romans and Samnites, U.C. 412; the latter attributed their defeat, after a long and obstinate engagement, to the fierce looks of the Romans, when they were called upon to account for it. They said, "that the eyes of the Romans seemed to be on fire, their countenances were wild, and their looks furious; and that this excited more terror in them than any thing else," (oculos sibi Romanorum ardere visos aiebant, vesanosque vultus et furentia ora: inde plus quam ex alia ulla re terroris ortum.) Liv. VIII. 33.

Horace describes Attilius Regulus, returning to surrender himself to the Carthaginians, as their captive, and rejecting the caresses of his wife and children, wishing to detain him, as "sternly fixing his manly countenance on the ground."

———— et virilem

Torvus humi posuisse vultum. —Od. III. 5.

Plutarch thus represents C. Marcius Coriolanus; 'Ο γαρ ην (ὡσπερ ηξίου τον στρατιωτην ὁ Κατων) ου χειρι και πληγγ μονου, αλλα και τουφ φωνης και οψει προσωπου φοβερος εντυχειν, which is admirably translated by Shakspeare, in his play of Coriolanus:

" ————— Thou wast a soldier [Marcius]
Even to Cato's wish: not fierce and terrible
Only in strokes; but with thy grim looks, and
The thunder-like percussion of thy sounds,
Thou mad'st thine enemies shake."

Horace describes Cato, the Censor, as "fierce with stern countenance," (vultu torvo ferus,) Epist. I. 19, 12; and Plutarch, more particularly:

When a Cimbrian soldier undertook to put C. Marius to death, in prison, he was so daunted by the lustre of Marius's eyes, naturally vivid, but now heightened into flame, (φλογα.) by the great emotion of body and mind, with which he uttered these words, "Darest thou kill C. Marius!" that he thought he saw and heard a god; and casting away his sword, fled affrighted, crying out through the city, "I cannot kill C. Marius." See Plutarch and Strabo.

Tacitus describes an impostor, who personated Nero, as "remarkable for his eyes and hair, and sternness of countenance," (corpus insigne oculis comaque, et torvitate vultus.) Hist. 2, 9.

See Zouch's Enquiry into the prophetic character of the Romans, 1792, 8vo. whence these instances are selected.

52. " And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down wherein thou trustedst, throughout thy whole land :—

53. " And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters (which the Lord thy God hath given thee) in the siege and in the straitness wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee.

54. " The man that is tender and very delicate among you, his eyes shall be evil [or grudging] toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave :

55. " So that he will not give to any of them [share] of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat : because he hath nothing left him in the siege and in the straitness wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates.

56. " The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not venture to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil [or grudging] toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter,

57. " And toward her young infant, and toward her children which she shall bear : for she shall eat them, for want of all things, secretly, in the siege and straitness wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates.

58. " If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of THIS LAW, (written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and awful name, THE LORD THY GOD :)

59. " Then THE LORD will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed : great plagues and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses and of long continuance.

62. " And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitudes, because thou wouldest not obey the voice of THE LORD THY GOD.

63. " And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you, so shall the Lord rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought ; and ye shall be plucked from off the land, whither thou goest to possess.

64. " And THE LORD will scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other : and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, wood and stone.

65. "And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest; but THE LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind :

66. "And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have no assurance of thy life.

67. "In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thy heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.

68. "And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt [or captivity] again, in ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee; thou shalt see [thy land] no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bond men and bond women: and no man shall buy," [the market being overstocked with slaves.]

How exactly was this minute and circumstantial prophecy fulfilled in all its branches, by the Roman captivity, and is still fulfilling at this very day! Its accomplishment, indeed, is for "a sign" of their rebellion against GOD, and "a wonder" of their preservation amidst all those dreadful calamities which they have suffered for so many hundred years, Deut. xxviii. 46, according to the interpretation of David Levi, who has furnished an affecting commentary thereon, in the Introduction to his Dissertation on the Prophecies, 2 vols. 8vo.

1. The Romans are here described, with the most characteristic precision, above eight hundred years before their existence as a nation, First, by their country, "far" to the westward of Palestine; from "the end of the earth," or shores of the Atlantic ocean; and it is remarkable, that the armies of Titus and Adrian, were principally composed of Gauls, Britons, and Spaniards. Second, by the rapidity of their marches, "swift as the eagle flieth,"—and their ensigns too, were eagles, expressive thereof; Third, by their language, Latin, which was not understood by the Jews, though Greek was, from the time of Alexander's conquests in Asia; Fourth, by their fierce countenance, for which the Romans were distinguished, from the early periods of their republic; and, fifth, by their ferocity, or merciless disposition in war. By an over-refinement, perhaps, Manasseh ben Israel traces, in the repetition of the word "nation," thrice, the three principal expeditions of the Romans against Judea; the first under Pompey, the second under Sosius, in support of Herod the Great against Antigonus, the third under Titus, when the city was destroyed.

2. Josephus, whose Jewish war is the best commentary on this prophecy, relates the devastation of the country by the Romans, that, in their rage, “they ceased not day nor night from ravaging the lands, plundering the goods, slaying all that were of the military age, and taking the weaker captives,” Lib. III. 4, 1. He relates the sieges of the principal towns taken by the Romans, Jotapata, Gadara, Joppa, Tiberias, Tarichea, and Gamala; at which last town in particular, after a long and obstinate defence, “above 5000 persons precipitated themselves from the walls into a deep valley beneath; and the Romans spared not even the infants, but slung them in numbers (εσφενδωνων) from the citadel.” Lib. IV. 1, 10.

3. The horrors of the siege of Jerusalem, aggravated by an intestine war in the city itself, by the three factions who occupied it, headed by Eleazar, Simon, and John, are related in the most lively colours by the Jewish historian, and especially the miseries of famine,—“when wives snatched the food from their husbands, children from their parents, and what was most lamentable, mothers, even from the mouths of their infants; while they themselves were not allowed in quiet to devour the prey, for the seditious broke into any houses which they saw shut, suspecting that provisions were concealed therein, and tore the morsels from their very jaws. The old men were beaten while grasping the food, the women dragged by the hair, while hiding it in their hands. There was no pity for grey hairs nor infants; the children, clinging to the pieces of food, were lifted up, and dashed against the ground.” Lib. V. 10, 3.

4. The following deed, “horrible to relate, and incredible to hear,” occurred near the end of the siege.

“Mary, the daughter of Eleazar, a woman of distinguished rank and fortune, at the breaking out of the troubles, had fled to Jerusalem from Bethesob, the place of her residence, beyond Jordan, with the relicks of her fortune, and whatever stock of provision she could procure. But of these she was plundered every day, in the domiciliary visits of the soldiers. Provoked at this, she often endeavoured to exasperate the plunderers, by reproaches and imprecations, to kill her; but in vain. Being reduced at length to absolute want, she was driven by pressing hunger to kill her suckling babe, and when she had dressed it, she eat the half of it, and kept the remainder covered up. Immediately the seditions came to her, and attracted by the scent, threatened to slay her instantly, unless she produced the provision which she had prepared. Accordingly, she uncovered what was left of her son, telling them that she had reserved a good share for them.—Struck with horror and amazement at the spectacle, they departed, trembling, and, with reluctance, left the remains to the wretched mother.” Lib. VI. 3, 4.

5. The sack of the temple quarter of the city is thus described, in the following terms, by Josephus; himself an eye-witness of the heart-rending spectacle :

“Whilst the TEMPLE was burning [to which one of the Roman soldiers, moved by a divine impulse, set fire (δαμονιῆ ὄρητι χρωμενος), contrary to the wishes and the orders of Titus,] the sack of that quarter began, and the slaughter of those whom the soldiers found was immense. There was no pity shewn to age, no respect to dignity, but young and old, the profane vulgar, and the sacred priesthood, were put to death alike. And the battle involved and invaded every sort, confounding the suppliants with the defendants; and the crackling of the wide-spreading flames resounded along with the groans of the falling. And by reason of the height of the Mount, and the greatness of the flaming pile, you would have thought that the whole city was on fire, and nothing can be conceived grander nor more terrible than that noise; for there was a shouting of the Roman ranks coming to close engagement, and a cry of the seditions, hemmed in by fire and sword. And the people who were left in the upper city, turned with dismay toward the enemy, and groaned at the catastrophe, while the cry of the multitude in the lower city, conspired with those on the Mount. And now many of those that were famishing with hunger, and their lips closed, when they saw the Temple on fire, recovered full strength for wailings and moans. These again were echoed from the suburbs, and from the surrounding mountains, making the impression still deeper on the mind, while the havoc increased the horror of the tumult. You would have thought that the Temple Mount was burnt up from the very roots, it was so loaded with fire throughout. And yet the blood was still more abundant than the fire, and the slaughtered more than the slayers, for the ground was no where clear of the dead ; and the soldiers, mounting on heaps of carcasses, rushed upon the fugitives, flying in every direction." Lib. VI. 5, 5, and VI. 6, 1.

6. Josephus reckons that eleven hundred thousand souls perished during the siege of Jerusalem by the sword, pestilence, or famine, besides ninety-seven thousand whom they took captives. The greater part of these were of the same nation, but not of the same country, for they had assembled from all parts to celebrate the feast of the Passover, and were suddenly surrounded by the Romans, and the whole of this vast multitude, composing the whole nation, shut up as it were in an enclosure by destiny.

7. Of the captives, above seventeen years of age, some were sent to Egypt in chains, to work in the mines ; the greater part were distributed through the provinces, to be destroyed in the theatres, by the sword, and by wild beasts ; the rest, under seventeen, were sold for slaves, and that for a trifling sum, on account of the numbers to be sold, and the scarcity of buyers. Lib. VI. 8, 2 ; IX. 2—4. So that at length the prophecy of Moses was fulfilled—"and no man shall buy."—The part that was reserved to grace the triumph of Vespasian and Titus at Rome, chosen out of the most comely, were probably transported to Italy "in ships," or by sea, to avoid a prodigious land-journey thither, through Asia and Greece ; a circumstance which distinguished this invasion and captivity from the preceding, by the Assyrians and Babylonians, which were solely by land. In the ensuing rebellion, a part of the captives were sent by sea to Egypt, and several of the ships were wrecked on the coast.

8. In the ensuing rebellion, excited by the impostor Barchocab, signifying "son of the star," or CHRIST, so denominated in Balaam's prophecy, Julius Severus, the general of Adrian, according to Dio, destroyed five hundred and eighty thousand Jews in the public combats, besides an innumerable multitude which perished by famine, misery, and fire ; so that very few of them escaped this war, in which were plundered and burnt fifty fortified castles, and nine hundred and eighty-five towns, flourishing and populous ; and so general was the massacre of the inhabitants, that all Judea was, in some measure, left desolate, and converted into a desert. Dio Cassius, Lib. LXIX.

9. The dispersion of the Jews into all countries, from the rising to the setting sun, and the “very long continuance of their plagues,” or sufferings, in this captivity, intimated in the repetition, ver. 59, and now subsisting upwards of 1700 years; during which they have still been preserved a distinct people, though every where despised and persecuted, exhibit a standing miracle and fulfilment of prophecy, the most extraordinary and convincing. The different fortunes of the ten tribes, and of the Jews, are distinguishable in the Divine Ode, or prophetic poem, called Moses’ Song, according to the following ingenious remark of David Levi, Proph. Vol. I. p. 21.

“Moses, in his prophetic poem, hath also clearly pointed out the mercy of God in the preservation of Israel, and the means taken by Providence to effect it; for in Deut. xxxii. 26, he says, I said I would drive them into one corner, and [consequently] I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men.—This hath really been the case of the ten tribes, whom the king of Assyria carried captive to Halah and Habor, by the river Gozan, and of whom we have not, to this hour, any certain or authentic account as to their real place of abode*. And this would have been the fate of the rest of the nation, had they been carried to one spot. The prophet therefore proceeds thus, ‘Were it not that the wrath of the enemy would be collected?’ The sense of which is, that if they were all in one place, under one prince, and the wrath of the enemy should arise against them, it would be more collected, and consequently operate with a greater force to effect their destruction. But GOD, in his infinite mercy, scattered them among all nations, (Deut. iv. 27, xxviii. 62,) and thereby prevented their annihilation; for if one prince persecutes them, they retire to some of their brethren, who live under the dominion of another that favours them, as history clearly evinces. And although they are but few, (Deut. xxviii. 62,) in comparison to what they were, owing to the numberless persecutions and massacres which they have suffered in the different kingdoms of Spain, Portugal, France, Germany, Poland, England, &c. at various periods; yet had they all been in one kingdom, they most likely would have been annihilated. But their dispersion among different nations was the very means of their preservation ; for the interests of the various princes were so opposed to each other, that when one persecuted, another favoured, and granted them an asylum. Hence it is manifest, that their dispersion among so many nations is not a sign that God hath cast them off entirely, but, on the contrary, is the strongest apparent proof, that they are under the immediate providence of God, who carefully watches over and preserves them, amidst the numerous enemies that surround them, till the coming of the TRUE MESSIAH, when they will be all gathered together, and return to their own land, where they will serve God in truth and sincerity, as written in the law which God commanded his servant Moses. This testimony of a learned and pious Jew is curious and valuable. And we have only to regret, that he was unable to distinguish “THE TRUE MESSIAH” in the person of OUR LORD JESUS, between his first advent in humiliation and suffering, and his next, in triumph and glory, as foretold by Moses and all the prophets, Luke xxiv. 25—27.—May this work, under GOD, contribute to open the eyes of his nation !

* The ingenuity and skill of Major Rennel, has probably discovered those places, in the district of Media. See the foregoing Elements of Geography, Vol. I. p. 461. And the Afghans seem to be an Israelitish colony. See Asiat. Research. Vol. II. p. 67—76.

III. OF THE RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

This also is clearly foretold by Moses.

Levit. xxvi. 44. “ Nevertheless for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, nor will I abhor them to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them : for I am THE LORD THEIR GOD,” &c.

Deut. xxx. 1. “ And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee,

2. “ And shalt return unto the LORD THY GOD, and shalt obey his voice, according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thy heart and with all thy soul ;

3. “ That then THE LORD THY GOD will turn thy captivity and have compassion upon thee ; and will return and gather thee from all the nations whither THE LORD THY GOD hath scattered thee :

4. “ If any of thine be driven out unto the uttermost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will He fetch thee.

5. “ And THE LORD THY GOD will bring thee unto the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it : and He will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers.

6. "And THE LORD THY GOD will circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD THY GOD with all thy heart, and with all thy soul : THAT THOU MAYEST LIVE" [or inherit eternal life,] Luke x. 25.

Here the restoration of the Jews to their own country is plainly predicted, at the destined end of their captivity. But it should seem, that their conversion to CHRIST, is to be the preliminary condition of their acceptance with GOD, for so long as their nation continues in a state of rebellion against CHRIST, they are not worthy to be redeemed.—And in conformity with Moses, OUR LORD declared to the unbelieving Jews, "Lo, your house [OF THE LORD] is left unto you desolate : for I say unto you, ye shall not see ME henceforth, until ye can say, [with hearty repentance and true faith,] Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD," Matt. xxiii. 38, 39.

The following reflections, from an excellent French work, Principes de la Foy Chretienne, Tom. I. c. 16, are selected from a copious extract, translated by West, in his evidences of our Lord's resurrection, p. 402.

"The Jews, punished and dispersed, bear witness to JESUS CHRIST. The Jews, recalled and converted, will render Him a testimony still more awful and striking. The Jews, preserved by a continual miracle, that they may preserve to JESUS CHRIST the stock and succession of those who shall one day believe in HIM, bear witness to Him continually.

"Had they been only punished, they would have proved his justice only : had they been only preserved, they could have proved nothing but his power : had they not been reserved to worship Him one day, they could not have proved his mercy and veracity, nor have made Him any reparation for their outrageous crimes [in rejecting and crucifying Him.]

"Their dispersion proves that He is come, but they have rejected Him : their preservation demonstrates that He hath not rejected them for ever, and that they shall one day believe in Him ; and they declare by both, that He is the Messiah and the promised SAVIOUR : that their miseries proceed from their not having known him ; and that the only hope they have left, is, that they shall one day come to the knowledge of Him."

"The change will be in their persons, and not in his religion , that will remain what it is, but they will then begin to see it. JESUS CHRIST will take away the veil that is upon their eyes, but He will be the same: He will cure their deafness, but He will speak the same things:" but as Moses himself foretold, "GOD hath not yet given them a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, to this day," Deut. xxix. 4. And the observation of Paul is still true, that "partial blindness hath befallen Israel; nor shall it be entirely removed till the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in," with their conversion, Rom. xi. 25.

IV. OF THE PUNISHMENT OF THEIR FOES.

Jacob, in his prophecy, figuratively foretold the retaliation of divine vengeance upon the persecutors of the Jews, Gen. xlix. 11. Balaam concisely foretold it, in his last prophecy, Numb. xxiv. 24; and Moses more plainly:

Deut. xxx. 7. "And THE LORD THY GOD will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and upon them that hate thee, which persecuted thee.

8. "And thou shalt return* [from thy captivity] and obey the voice of the Lord, and do all his commandments, which I command thee this day."

But it was reserved for the ensuing Ode, to describe these judgments in all their terrors.

V. THE DIVINE ODE, OR MOSES' SONG.

These historical prophecies of Moses, growing clearer and brighter towards the close of his life, are crowned by a poetical composition of the most transcendent excellence; worthy indeed

* Jeremiah appears to have unfolded this prophecy in the following:

"Fear not thou, my servant Jacob,
Neither be dismayed, Israel:
For lo, I will bring thee safe from far,
And thy seed from the land of their captivity,
And Jacob shall return, and be at rest;
He shall be secure, and none shall make him afraid.

"Fear not then, my servant Jacob,
Saith the Lord; for I am with thee:
Wherefore I will make a full end of all the nations
Whither I have driven thee;
But I will not make a full end of thee,
But will correct thee in measure,
And not make thee altogether desolate," Jer. xlvi. 27, 28.

of its author, THE GOD OF ISRAEL: who dictated it to Moses, shortly before his death, and commanded him to teach it to the children of Israel, “That it might be a witness for HIM against them,” in future times, “when many evils and troubles should befall them, for breaking his covenant:” “For,” added THE LORD, “It shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed.”—“Moses, therefore, wrote this song the same day, and taught it the children of Israel:” By whom it is still rehearsed, above three thousand years since; and shall be to the end of time, Deut. xxxi. 16—22.

- XXXII. 1. Give ear, O heavens, and I will speak,
Hearken, O Earth, to the words of my mouth * ;
2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain,
My speech shall distil as the dew ;
As the showers upon the tender herb,
As the mists upon the grass ;
3. While I declare the name of THE LORD :
Ascribe ye greatness to OUR GOD.—
4. He is THE CREATOR †, his work is perfect,
For all his ways are judgment ;
THE GOD OF TRUTH, and not of iniquity,
He is just and upright :
5. Their own iniquity hath corrupted his children, [now] not his † ;
A perverse and crooked generation !

* Isaiah has imitated concisely this noble exordium :

“Hear, O Heavens, and give ear, O Earth,
For THE LORD speaketh.—
I have begotten and brought up children,
And they have rebelled against Me,” Isai. i. 2.

† The original, צור, (Tsur), usually signifies a rock, and is figuratively applied to GOD, as expressing his stability and immutability, and the security of those who are under his protection, as in verses 15 and 37, so finely expressed by Isaiah,

“Trust ye in THE LORD for ever,
For in ONE AND THE SAME LORD is the rock of ages,” Isai. xxvi. 4.

But it is here, and ver. 18, rendered “the Creator,” by the Arabic Version, and κτιστην, by the Septuagint Version of 2 Sam. xxii. 32, and by Theodotion here πλαστην, of the same import: which agrees better with the context. In this sense it may be derived from the verb צר, which signifies to “cast,” 1 Kings vii. 15; or to “form,” Jer. i. 5. The Septuagint Version here, and ver. 18, renders it “God,” (Θεον,) which I have substituted, ver. 31.

‡ This translation is supported by the various reading of the Samaritan Text, which gives, “they have sinned [they are] not his, sons of corruption,” and which was evidently the reading of the Septuagint, rendering ἡμαρτωσαν, ουκ αυτω, τεκνα μωμητα. Doctor Kennicott, in the General Dissertation to his Collations of Hebrew MSS. Vol. II. p. 31, § 72, has shewn how the present Masorete was easily derived from the Samaritan, by transposition of letters; from which it does not differ materially in this translation.

- II. 6. Do ye thus requite THE LORD,
O people foolish and not wise!
Is not He THY FATHER, who got thee,
Who made thee, and who formed thee?
7. Remember the days of old,
Consider the years of [past] generations,
Ask thy father, and he will shew thee,
Thy elders, and they will tell thee.—
8. When THE MOST HIGH divided to the nations their settlements,
When He separated the sons of Adam ;
He assigned the boundaries of the peoples [of Israel *]
According to the number of the sons of Israel :
9. For the portion of THE LORD is His people,
Jacob, the lot of His inheritance.—
10. He found him in a desert land,
In a waste howling wilderness ;
He led him about, He instructed him,
He kept him, as the apple of His eye.
11. As the eagle † stirreth up his nestlings,
Hovereth about his brood,
Spreadeth about his wings,
Taket them up,
Carrieth them upon his shoulder ;
12. [So] THE LORD alone did lead him,
And with HIM was no strange God [coadjutor.]
13. He made him mount upon the heights of the land,
To eat the produce of the fields ;
He made him suck honey out of the rock,
And oil, out of the flinty stone.
14. Butter of kine, and milk of sheep,
With the fat of lambs, and of rams,
Of Basan's breed, and of goats :

* This insertion of the parenthetical words [of Israel,] derived from the succeeding verse, furnishes a plain and rational sense of one of the most embarrassed and most contested passages in the whole poem; signifying, that the promised land was allotted to the twelve tribes of Israel, as being descended from his twelve sons; each of which, from their extraordinary population, might be considered as “a people” in itself; (and so the Ephraimites represented themselves to Joshua, xvii. 14—17;) while the aggregate composed “his people,” the most highly favoured of all the nations of the earth, with whom they are contrasted.

† This admirable similitude of the parent eagle training his young nestlings to fly; first “stirring them up,” or rousing them from the nest; then “hovering about them,” to watch and encourage their timid efforts: “spreading abroad his wings,” to receive them when drooping; “taking them up, carrying them on his shoulder,” to ease them; when wearied and exhausted by unusual efforts, is probably painted from the life, with so much circumstantial imagery, from the scenes which Moses might often have witnessed in the deserts of Arabia Petraea.

This description of the Hebrew bard, far exceeds in simplicity, the classical, of the training of the young Alpine eagle, to which Horace elaborately compares the education of young Drusus, (Livia's Son,) by Augustus; Qualem Ministrum, &c. Od. IV. 4.

- With the finest flour of wheat *—
Thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape.—
- III. 15. But Jeshurun waxed fat, and spurned;
Thou art waxed fat, and gross, and sleek!—
 He forsook THE GOD who made him;
 And slighted the Rock of his salvation.
16. They made HIM jealous with strange gods,
 They provoked Him with abominations;
17. They sacrificed to [false] gods † not to THE [TRUE] GOD,
 To gods whom they knew not;
 To new [gods] that came from the neighbourhoods
 Whom your fathers feared not:
18. Of THE CREATOR who begat thee art thou unmindful,
And hast forgotten THE GOD who bore thee!—
- IV. 19. And THE LORD saw, and was wroth,
 For the provocation of His sons and of His daughters,
20. And He said, I will hide my face from them,
I will see what will be their end;
For they are a froward generation,
Faithless children:
21. They have made Me jealous by what is not God,
They have provoked Me with their vain idols;
And I will make them jealous by what is not a people,
I will provoke them with a foolish nation.—
22. For a fire is kindled in mine anger,
And it shall burn to the lower Hades;
It shall consume the land and her increase,
And set on fire the foundations of the mountains.
23. I will heap mischiefs upon them,
I will spend mine arrows upon them;
24. I will send upon them the raging of famine,
The burning of ulcers, the bitterness of pestilence,
And the teeth of wild beasts, with the poison of serpents.
25. The sword from without, and the terror from within,
Shall destroy both the young man, and the maiden,

* The imagery of the original is uncommonly bold: “with the fat of kidneys of wheat:” it has been adopted by the Psalmist twice, who speaks of “the fat of wheat,” Psalm lxxx. 16, cxlvii. 14; where our translation judiciously renders, “with the finest wheat;” though it has retained the original expression in this place. But uniformity of rendering, unfortunately, was not sufficiently attended to by our Bible translators, however excellent their version in the main.

† These gods, in the original, are שָׂדִים, (Sadim), signifying “Almighties,” Gen. xvii. 1, and like the plural, אֱלֹהִים, (Elohim), “Gods,” applied to the false gods of the Heathens. These seem to have been the local gods of the neighbourhood; from whom the vale of הַשְּׂדִים, (Ha-Sidim, or Ha-Sadim), “the Almightyies” near Sodom and Gomorrhah, was denominated, Gen. xiv. 3, whose idolatrous abominations, under the imagery of bitter grapes and poisonous wines, are noticed afterwards, verses 32, 33. These false gods are opposed to אֱלֹהֵי, (ÆLOH,) THE GOD, THE ONE TRUE GOD.

* There is a beautiful alternate parallelism in this 25th verse, which may be read thus :

*The sword from without, shall destroy the young man,
And the terror from within, the maiden,
The suckling, with the man of grey hairs.*

† Instead of the present reading, וְשָׁלַם, “and recompence ;” the Sept. Vulg. Syr. and Chald. all read אֲשַׁלֵּם, “I will repay, or recompense ;” which is established by St. Paul, citing the passage, Ἐμοὶ ἐκδίκησις, ἐγὼ ἀνταποδώσω. “Vengeance is mine, I will repay,” Rom. xii. 19, corresponding also more exactly to the construction of the ensuing verse :

41. *I will render vengeance to mine enemies,
And will repay them that hate Me.*

‡ The particle כִּי, chi, which introduces the last part, frequently signifies “nevertheless,” or “notwithstanding,” Isai. ix. 1, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5, &c. THE LORD will “judge,” or plead the cause of his people, as a righteous judge ; and deliver them from the oppressions of their enemies : as the verb יָדַן is understood, Gen. xlix. 16, Psalm ix. 4—8, xxii. 2, xcvi. 10, cxl. 13, &c. “And will repent himself for his servants,”—or will revisit them with mercy, as the phrase is understood, Psalm xc. 13, cvi. 45, Jer. xviii. 8, Jonah iii. 10.—“When He seeth that their strength is spent,” as foretold, Levit. xxvi.

“ And Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel, the words of this song, until they were ended,” Deut. xxxi. 30.

This majestic vindication of the Tutelar God of Israel with his chosen people, and with their persecutors, which I have attempted to render more closely and intelligibly, though still at 20 ; and “ that none is shut up, [spared] or left ;” a proverbial saying, 2 Kings xiv. 26, to denote the depth of distress.

* In the original forty-second verse, there is an alternate parallelism of the first and third lines, and of the second and fourth, which is here adjusted. Instead of the received translation of the last line, “ From the beginning of revenges upon the enemy,” until their final completion ; in which the rendering of פְּרָעוֹת, “ revenges,” is unsupported by any of the ancient versions ; I render it “ hairy ;” for the words פָּרַע שֵׁר, are rendered “ locks of hair,” Numb. vi. 5, and the expression here, ראש פְּרָעוֹת, “ head of locks,” remarkably corresponds to קַדְקַד שֵׁר, “ scalp of hair,” or “ hairy pate,” in the following parallel passage :

“ God shall wound the head of his enemies,
And the hairy pate of him that walketh in his sins. Psalm lxviii. 21.

Compare Balaam's last prophecy, Numb. xxiv. 17, and Jer. xlvi. 15.

infinite distance from the inimitable energy and conciseness of the original, consists of six parts.

The first opens with an animated summons to the inhabitants of heaven and earth, to angels and men, or the whole rational creation, to listen to the prophet's wholesome and refreshing discourse, contrasting the veracity and justice of GOD, with the iniquity and ingratitude of his people. This forms the prefatory introduction to the whole poem, ver. 1—5.

The second recapitulates GOD'S parental care and fostering protection of the Israelites, from their earliest origin to their complete settlement in the rich and fertile land of promise: whose twelve tribes are called "peoples," from the numerous population of each; while the aggregate composed "His people," the most highly favoured of all the nations of the earth, from whom they are thus distinguished. This part contains the admirable imagery, so sublimely beautiful, and yet so simple and natural, of the parent Eagle, training his young brood to fly; which Moses might often have witnessed in the deserts of Arabia Petraea. The affixes in the original, are all masculine; corresponding to GOD himself, who had been pleased to adopt this comparison;—"I bare you on eagles wings," Exod. xix. 4, ver. 6—14.

The third part describes the usual but ungenerous effect of prosperity, upon Jeshurun, or "righteous Israel" heretofore, in their adoption of the false gods of the neighbouring nations, and forgetfulness of the true God their Creator and Protector. This is expressed in the most animated and glowing apostrophes, (or changes of person,) in which this most highly wrought Lyric composition abounds; uniting all the fire and richness of oriental eloquence, with the close and accurate reasoning of occidental composition:—"Thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape!"—"Thou art waxed fat," &c.—"Thou art unmindful," &c. ver. 15—18.

The fourth expresses the indignation of the LORD, and his denunciations, that He would reject apostate Israel, and adopt in their room the believing Gentiles; according to the interpretation of St. Paul, Rom. x. 19, citing ver. 21, and the parallel prophecy of Isaiah, lxxv. 1, 2, and describes, in the glowing colours of the preceding prophecies, all the calamities of the Babylonian and Roman captivities, ver. 19—25.

The fifth part states the wise and gracious reasons of the dispersion of the Jews into all lands, rather than their confinement to one corner, as in the Assyrian captivity ; both for their preservation from the collected force of their enemies, and to prevent the boasts of the latter, ascribing to themselves their destruction. It next states the true reason of the timidity of the Israelites, so that a thousand would fly from one enemy ; as GOD had warned them repeatedly before, in even stronger terms ; “ I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies ; they that hate you shall conquer you, and ye shall flee, when none pursueth you.”—“ And upon them that are left alive of you, I will send a faintness into their hearts, in the lands of their enemies, and the sound of a leaf shall chase them ; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword : and they shall fall when none pursueth,” Levit. xxvi. 17—36.—“ THE LORD shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies : thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them,” Deut. xxviii. 25. Then follows a parenthetical observation of Moses himself, introduced incidentally into the divine speech, stating the superiority of the God of Israel over the gods of their enemies, even by their own confession. Thus Jethro acknowledged it, Exod. xviii. 11 ; the Egyptians confessed it, Exod. xiv. 25 ; Balaam, Numb. xxiii. 19—23 ; the Canaanites, Josh. ii. 11 ; the Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 9—24 ; the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 7 ; Nebuchadnezzar, the haughty king of Babylon, Dan. iii. 29, iv. 37 ; Darius the Mede, Dan. vi. 26, 27 ; Cyrus king of Persia, Ezra i. 3 ; Artaxerxes Longimanus, Ezra vii. 23. And Philostratus has preserved a remarkable declaration of Titus, modestly attributing his conquest of the Jews to the divine assistance ; “ That he was only an instrument in the hand of GOD, whose wrath had been so signally manifested against them.”

The prophet next proceeds to state, that the enemies of the Jews had no claim to the divine assistance, from any superior merits of their own ; for that on the contrary, their idolatries and corruptions were still more abominable than those of the Jews ; not only compelling them in their captivities to serve their gods, by the most dreadful persecutions, such as those of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. 8—28 ; of Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. i. 41—64 ; of the Romans, &c. Dan. xi. 35, xii. 1 ; but corrupting the whole world by their mischievous example and influence. Thus Babylon is represented as making “ all the nations of the earth drunken and mad with the wine of her idolatrous fornication," Jer. li. 8; and the mystical Babylon, or Rome Imperial and Papal, likewise, Rev. xvii. 2, xviii. 3. The bitter and poisonous ingredients of which, are here emphatically described. Of all these, God declares in the sequel, that He will keep an account, or registry, and severely punish them in the day of vengeance. The delay of which, is thus excellently explained by David Levi, Vol. I. p. 47. "Although the Gentiles have, according to their evil doings, and their corrupt religious tenets, long deserved exemplary punishment; yet is GOD pleased to defer his wrath, so long as the Jews remain unworthy of being redeemed, and have not repented; or received the full measure of their punishment," ver. 26—35.

The sixth and last part rehearses the consolation of Israel, and signal punishment of their foes. It begins with God's expostulation with his people, when reduced to their lowest state of desolation, referring them for relief, ironically, to the vain idols in which they had trusted, and to which they had sacrificed, as He did afterwards, Judg. x. 14. The Psalmist, citing this passage, thus describes the idols themselves, and their votaries:

" They are [but] silver and gold, the work of men's hands,
They have mouths, but speak not,
They have eyes, but see not,
They have ears, but hear not,
Neither is there any breath in their mouths.
They that make them are like them,
And so are all that trust in them," Psalm cxxxv. 14—18.

By an admirable contrast to which, the LORD describes his own self-existence, as living for evermore; and his sole and exclusive power "to kill," and "to make alive," "to wound and to heal."—Hence the captivity is called "the wound of Israel," which is to be "healed" at the restoration of Israel, Isa. xxx. 26, while his power to kill, or destroy his adversaries, as a mighty warrior, with sword and arrows, or by the miseries of war, (as in the present awful "days of vengeance," perhaps, Luke xxi. 22,) forms the conclusion of it.

The last verse, 43, terminates the whole, with the joint exultation of the Gentile with the Jewish converts to Christianity, arising from the prospect of the approaching judgments of God to be inflicted both upon his adversaries and the persecutors of his servants. St. Paul has cited this verse to prove the future conversion of the Jews and of the Gentiles to CHRIST, Rom. xv. 10—12, supported by the parallel prophecies of Psalm cxvii. 1; Isa. xi. 1—10.

Theodoret has well paraphrased the last verse; “The Gentiles and the Jews, the people of GOD, might well rejoice together; for even among the Jews there were many myriads who believed [early] in CHRIST, (Acts xxi. 20,) as well as by far the greatest part of the Gentile world. But the Heathens were indebted to the Jewish believers for their knowledge, and received the principles and precepts of the Christian religion solely from them: for the holy Apostles were Jews. The prophet, therefore, enjoying a clear view of this great period, exults, “Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people,” [the converted Heathens with the believing Jews.]

Such was the extensive range of prophetic vision vouchsafed to the great law-giver of the Jews, comprising the whole fortunes of their state, from the first redemption, after the Egyptian bondage, until the last, on their final return to their own land, after the long continued Roman desolation, which it is the business of the succeeding prophets, under the former dispensation, and of OUR LORD and his apostles, under the new, to unfold more explicitly and circumstantially.

THE SPIRIT OF THE MOSAICAL LAW.

Moses was mighty both in words and deeds, Acts vii. 22. He excelled in miracles and prophecies, and still more in legislation. His laws and institutions have been admired and adopted by the wisest sages of antiquity. And upon the closest scrutiny, they breathe a spirit of the most exalted piety, the most extensive benevolence, and the most enlightened policy; worthy, indeed, of the TUTELAR GOD OF ISRAEL, by whom they were dictated to this most highly favoured man of GOD, because most faithful servant of THE LORD, Deut. xxiii. 1; Numb. xii. 7; Heb. iii. 2; with whom God conversed face to face, or familiarly, as a man with his friend, Exod. xxxiii. 11.

The calling of the Israelites, and their separation from the Gentiles, to be “a holy people, and a peculiar treasure unto God above all nations,” took place in the fulness of time, when the apostacy from the pure patriarchal religion was become universal, and polytheism and idolatry had pervaded the most polished nations of the earth, the Assyrians, Babylonians, Phæ- nicians, Canaanites, and Egyptians; and pure and undefiled religion would soon have been exterminated and lost, every where, had not the Israelites, themselves a degraded and enslaved people, “been borne on eagles’ wings,” from the house of bondage in Egypt, and brought by their gracious REDEEMER unto Himself, to his holy mountain, in the solitary deserts of Arabia Petraea; where they were at first instructed by the voice of GOD himself, pronouncing the Ten Commandments, with an audible voice, from the summit of Sinai; and were afterwards trained up to religion and virtue, during forty years of wandering “in the waste howling wilderness;” until Jeshurun, or “righteous Israel,” were qualified to enter the land of promise, and replace the devoted nations of Canaan.

The idolatry of the Heathens in general, and of the Egyptians and Canaanites in particular, consisted not only in worshipping false gods, such as the sun, moon, stars, winds, elements, &c. Deut. iv. 19, which they supposed to be animated, and actuated by some intelligences residing in them, and exerting their beneficial or noxious powers to the advantage or detriment of mankind; but also in framing certain symbolical or figurative representations of THE TRUE GOD, under the forms of beasts, birds, and fishes, expressive of their peculiar excellencies, or powers; as the horns or strength of the bull, the milk or nourishment of the cow, the swiftness and sharp-sightedness of the eagle or hawk, the wisdom or cunning of the serpent, &c. until, at length, the symbols were forgotten, or perverted by the vulgar, into the most grovelling and senseless materialism, on the one hand, or bestial idolatry on the other.

Under the Theocracy, therefore, or divine government of the Israelites, the fundamental laws were the first and second commandments, peculiarly levelled against the reigning corruptions of polytheism and idolatry; the first, prohibiting the worship of any but THE ONE TRUE GOD, and LORD of the universe; the second, the worship even of the true God, under any animal or sensible representation of bird, beast, or fish.

The reason assigned for these prohibitions, is, that “the Lord their God was a jealous God,” who would not bear the spiritual adultery of his espoused people, Numb. xiv. 33, and “neither give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images,” Isa. xlii. 8, not brooking a rival or associate in his worship, “with whom was no strange god,” Deut. xxxii. 12.

And these fundamental laws were sanctioned with powerful national sanctions of punishment and reward, to be administered by GOD himself, as their KING and their JUDGE. "The haters of GOD," or the disobedient, were threatened with temporal calamities, extending to "the third or fourth generation * of their children;" but "the lovers of GOD," or the obedient, who should keep "these his commandments," were encouraged by the promise, that God would shew mercy unto their children to the thousandth [generation †,] or to the remotest ages. Thus the idolatries of the Jewish nation drew down on themselves and on their children, the Babylonish captivity of seventy years, including the third and fourth generation of the offenders: while the righteous posterity of the true Israelites, in the regeneration, will flourish till the end of the world.—How infinitely does the goodness transcend the severity of GOD!

This penalty of "visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children," was reserved to GOD himself, as the SUPREME JUDGE: for no magistrate was allowed, in ordinary cases, to punish the innocent for the guilty; "the fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin," Deut. xxiv. 16; compare Ezek. xviii. 4—20. But the sin of idolatry, here meant, was the greatest national crime that could be committed; it was high treason against the supreme majesty of the state, during the THEOCRACY; the offenders, therefore, and even enticers to idolatry, whether cities or individuals, by the municipal law, were to be utterly destroyed, or stoned to death; or any one that sacrificed to a strange god. Exod. xxii. 20; Levit. xx. 2; Deut. xiii. 1—16; Josh. xxii. 22. And in cases of high treason, do not human lawgivers punish the children or families of the delinquents with confiscation of property, and legal disabilities, that parents may be deterred from disturbing the public peace, and be more strongly attached to the existing government, from regard to their offspring?—Cicero commends the policy of

* Men seldom live to see more than the third or fourth generation of their offspring, Gen. i. 23. So far, therefore, parental affection may naturally be supposed to extend; and the fear of involving the children in the punishment of the fathers, operate as a restraint.

† This is the judicious rendering of the Syriac Version and Chaldee Paraphrase of Exod. xx. 5; supported by the parallel passages, Deut. vii. 9; 1 Chron. xvi. 15; Psalm cv. 8.

such penalties?—Hoc præclare legibus comparatum est, ut caritas liberorum amiciores parentes Reipublicæ redderet. Epist. ad Brut.

The characteristic excellence of the Mosaical law, consists in the inward principle upon which obedience thereto was founded, namely, the LOVE OF GOD, as noticed in the second commandment, and more fully unfolded afterwards, in the admirable commentary upon the Decalogue, furnished in the remainder of the Pentateuch.

Its nature and degree is thus specified :

“Thou shalt love the LORD THY GOD with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength : and these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart,” Deut. vi. 5, 6. .

And the grounds of it also :

“For THE LORD, THE LORD OF GODS, is merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in mercy and truth ; keeping mercy for a thousand [generations,] forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin, [upon repentance,] but by no means clearing [the impenitent:] visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children’s children, unto the third and fourth [generation,]” Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7, Numb. xiv. 17, 18.

The love of GOD was, therefore, necessarily accompanied with the fear of GOD :

“For THE LORD YOUR GOD is GOD OF GODS, and LORD OF LORDS, a great, a mighty, and a terrible GOD, who regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward.”—“Thou shalt fear THE LORD THY GOD, Him shalt thou serve, and to Him shalt thou cleave,” Deut. x. 17—20. “And now, Israel, what doth the LORD THY GOD require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love Him, and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, to keep the commandments of THE LORD, and his statutes, which I command thee this day, FOR THY GOOD,” Deut. x. 12, 13.

The greatness, the majesty, and justice of GOD, necessarily render him an object of fear and awe ; while his disinterested goodness, and free bounties, naturally tend to excite love and gratitude in the receivers ; and both together, a hearty desire, and sincere endeavour, to obey his will in all things*.

* The genuine love of GOD includes all those mingled sentiments of fear, awe, admi-

This love of GOD, therefore, is made the ruling principle of the love of our neighbour, or of benevolence to mankind.

“Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart; thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people; but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: I AM THE LORD,” Levit. xix. 17, 18. This emphatic conclusion intimating that they were bound to do so, for THE LORD’S SAKE.

Nor was it to be confined merely to their neighbour, or their own countrymen: it was to extend to strangers and even to enemies: “THE LORD YOUR GOD—loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment: Love ye therefore the stranger, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt,” Deut. x. 17—19. They were warned, therefore, “not to abhor the Edomite, nor even the Egyptian,” their most inveterate foes or oppressors, Deut. xxiii. 7. They were even required to do them acts of kindness, “to bring back the stray ox or ass of their enemy, and to help his ass when lying under a burden,” Exod. xxiii. 4, 5.

The law of Moses softened the horrors of war in the treatment of female captives especially, whom it protected from the insolence and brutality of the conquerors.

“When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive; if thou seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife; then shalt thou bring her home to thy house, and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails, and she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and mother a full month; and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife,” Deut. xxi. 10—13.

Philo justly commends this as an admirable ordinance: on the one side, far from tolerating that licentiousness which the laws of war tolerated among other nations, it kept the soldier in a state of constraint for thirty days; during this interval, shewing him his captive, unattired and unadorned, and giving time for the first impulse of his passion to cool. On the other side, it humanely respected the captive’s grief, at being torn from her ration, veneration, gratitude, and love, which the contemplation of such a perfect character as that of the DEITY, naturally and necessarily suggests. See Bishop Butler’s sublime and beautiful Sermons on the LOVE OF GOD.

parents, if a maid, and not indulged with a husband of her own choice.

But, proceeds the law, “if it shall happen that she shall not please thee, then thou shalt let her depart, whither she will: and thou shalt neither sell her for money, nor make traffic of her, because thou hast humbled her,” Deut. xxi. 13, 14.

The liberation of the captive in this case, was a just punishment on the captor for his fickleness, and a consolatory recompense to her for the affront of being rejected as his wife, after the humiliation of cutting off her hair, a principal ornament of her sex; and the design of the law, according to R. Bechai, was, “that the camp of the Israelites should be holy, and free from the fornications and abominations usually committed in the camps of the Heathens,” with whom it was customary not only to offer violence to their female captives, but when tired of them, either to sell them, or give them to their slaves*.

The case of slaves, indeed, was truly deplorable among the most polished nations of antiquity, the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans. Their slavery was perpetual, and they were deprived of all civil rights and immunities, and might be tortured, put to death, or starved, at the will of their merciless masters. The last was practised by old Cato the censor, so admired for his virtue, when his slaves grew old and past their labour!

How different were the humane and equitable regulations of the Hebrew legislator:

The hired servant, or day-labourer, was to be paid his wages in the evening, after his work was over; payment was not to be deferred till the next morning, Levit. xix. 13.

The bought servant, or household slave, was to be freed at the end of seven years' service, in the sabbatical year, Exod. xxi. 2, Levit. xxv. 39—43, Deut. xv. 12—18, unless he refused his freedom, and chose to continue in his master's service; in which case his ear was to be bored with an awl to the door of his master's house; signifying his attachment thereto for the rest of his life, Deut. xxi. 5, 6.

Servants of any description were not to be treated harshly. The master could not beat them unmercifully, the number of stripes for offences was limited by law to forty, and the reason assigned is liberal: "lest thy brother should seem vile unto thee, if beaten with many stripes," Deut. xxv. 1—3. Hence, not to run the risk of violating the law, they never inflicted the full number, but at the utmost, forty stripes save one, 2 Cor. xi. 24. If a master beat his servant to death, he was surely to be punished with death; if he struck out his or her eye, or even a tooth, he was bound to let him go free, for his eye or his tooth's sake, Exod. xxi. 20—27.

The stranger, the orphan, and the widow, were not to be vexed or oppressed, under pain of incurring the divine displeasure, Exod. xxii. 21—24; and the gleanings of the vineyards and of the harvests, were enjoined to be left for the use of them and of the poor in general, Levit. xix. 9—11, Deut. xxiv. 19—22. The lands during the sabbatical year were to be left free for the poor, and for the cattle, Exod. xxiii. 10, 11. The tythes of the third year were reserved for the poor, Deut. xxvi. 12.

This merciful code was no less attentive to the animal creation. The ox and the ass were not to be yoked together in the plough; ill matched in size and strength, Deut. xxii. 10; the ox was not to be muzzled, or prevented from eating, while he trode out the corn, Deut. xxiv. 4. The kid was not to be boiled in its mother's milk*; a law thrice repeated, Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26, Deut. xiv. 21. The bird in the nest, sitting on her eggs or her young, was required to be let go, when they were taken; and the reward of obedience to this seemingly "least of the commandments," was the same as was attached even to the greatest; "that it may go well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days," Deut. xxii. 6, 7, upon the principle assigned by OUR LORD, "He that is faithful in the least, is faithful also in much," Luke xvi. 10.

Thus the love of GOD, in the Mosaical law, is made throughout the basis of the love of our neighbour, of all mankind, and even of the animal creation, for his sake. Accordingly, our blessed Saviour declares, that the love of GOD is the first and great commandment of the law ; and that the second, the love of our neighbour as ourselves, is like it in principle, as being derived from it, and regulated thereby. And in the instructive parable of the good Samaritan, he has enlarged the meaning of the word neighbour to all of every sect, religion, or country, with whom we happen to be connected in the ordinary intercourse of society, or who stand in need of our good offices, in the true spirit of the Mosaical law, which under the term "brother," includes a stranger or sojourner in want, Levit. xxv. 35. — "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets," or the whole religion and morality of the OLD TESTAMENT, Matt. xxii. 36—40. They evidently coincide, therefore, with the evangelical virtue of LOVE, or CHRISTIAN CHARITY, so well explained by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiii. and which may accordingly be defined,

* This was practised in magical ceremonies and incantations, according to Spencer.

A divine virtue, by which we love GOD above all things for his own sake, and our neighbours as ourselves, for the love of God.*

For it is only in this comprehensive sense that charity is "greater" than the virtues of faith and hope, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. It is usually, but injudiciously, confined to the love of our neighbour, to philanthropy, good nature, and alms-giving, which is only considered in Scripture as the test of our love of GOD, 1 John iv. 20, 21.

The tenth commandment, prohibiting covetousness in any shape, is thrown as a fence around the whole moral law, comprised in the second table, controuling not only overt acts and words, but even the inward thoughts and desires that might lead thereto by criminal indulgence. It stamps, indeed, the seal of DIVINITY upon the Mosaical code, of which the decalogue is the summary. No such restriction is to be found in the ordinances of Lycurgus or Solon, the twelve tables, or the institutes of Justinian, because the thoughts and desires of the heart are not cognizable by human tribunals. This was a case reserved only for HIM, who both can and "will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil," Eccl. xii. 14 ; because "HE is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart," 1 Sam. xvi. 7 ; Heb. iv. 12.

The LAW, therefore, "was our schoolmaster to bring us to

* This is the excellent definition of the Romish Catechisms.

CHRIST, who in his GOSPEL has so finely commented on the tenth commandment in particular, Matt. v. 28—30, and who inculcates obedience to all his laws, from an inward principle; requiring us to shew the work of the law written in our hearts," Rom. ii. 15.

A SKETCH OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE HEBREW GOVERNMENT.

THE THEOCRACY.

The form of government in the united states of Israel was properly a THEOCRACY, in which the Supreme Legislative power was vested solely in GOD or his ORACLE, who only could enact or repeal laws: "Whatsoever I command you," said THE LORD, "observe to do it; thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it," Deut. iv. 2; repeated xii. 32. The same prohibition is repeated in the GOSPEL, under the penalty of incurring temporal plagues, and also of exclusion from the book of life, Rev. xxii. 18, 19.

THE JUDGES.

Hence the judges, and afterwards the kings, were no more than GOD'S viceroys; for the LORD was KING in Jeshurun, (or righteous Israel,) Deut. xxxiii. 5; as acknowledged even by the Heathen prophet, Balaam: "THE LORD HIS GOD is with him, and the shout of a KING is among them," Numb. xxiii. 21; whence the pious David styles the Lord, "my GOD and KING," Psalm lxviii. 24; and "the HOLY ONE OF ISRAEL, OUR KING," Psalm lxxxix. 18; and declares that his son Solomon "was chosen to sit upon the throne of the KINGDOM OF THE LORD over Israel," 1 Chron. xxviii. 5. It was typical, therefore, of the spiritual KINGDOM OF CHRIST in the GOSPEL, John xviii. 36.

The judge, or king, was the first executive magistrate of the state. He was to command the army in war, to summon and preside in the sanhedrim, senate, or council of the princes and elders, and in the general assembly of the commons, or congregation of Israel, and to propose public matters for the deliberation of the former, and ratification of the latter. "He was to go in and out before the congregation of the LORD, to lead them out, and bring them in, that they might not be as sheep without a shepherd," Numb. xxvii. 15—17.

THE SANHEDRIM, OR COUNCIL.

This consisted of seventy princes or elders of Israel, instituted at the request of Moses, to assist him with their advice, and to lighten the burden of government, that he might not bear it himself alone, Numb. xi. 4—25. The same, probably, who attended Moses, Aaron, and his two sons to the mount of God, where they were permitted to see the glory of the GOD OF ISRAEL, Exod. xxiv. 1—11.

They were, probably, thus elected: twelve princes, or heads of tribes, who were usually the first born* of the eldest son's families in each, and fifty-eight heads of families † in the twelve tribes, according to the last muster in the plains of Moab, Numb. xxvi. 1—51, taken from the sons of the patriarchs.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, OR CONGREGATION OF ISRAEL.

During the administration of Moses, this was probably an assembly of all the people, collected together in the encampment. Thus, when he summoned them to recognize the LORD as their GOD, and their LAW-GIVER, "He called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which THE LORD commanded him;" and when they had communicated them to the congregation, "all the people together answered and said, all that THE LORD speaketh, we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto THE LORD," Exod. xix. 1—9. At this primary convention was settled the magna charta of the constitution, or the original compact between GOD and his people; communicated by him as SOVEREIGN to the judge; proposed to the sanhedrim, and ratified by the congregation.

When Joshua afterwards made a league with the Gibeonites, confirmed by the oath of the princes of the congregation, the

* Naashon, prince of Judah, was not the heir male of Judah, for he was descended from Pharez, the younger son of Judah. He might have been elected for his extraordinary merit among "the renowned of the congregation," in preference to the elder branches, Numb. i. 16; and so might the fifty-eight heads of families.

† This number was thus collected: Reuben 4, Simeon 5, Gad 7, Judah 5, Issachar 4, Zabulon 3, Manasseh 8, Ephraim 4, Benjamin 8, Dan 1, Asher 5, and Nephtali 4, Numb. xxvi. 1—54. This seems to be a more probable account of the constitution of this celebrated council, than that of the Rabbins. See Lowman on the Hebrew Government, p. 76, 168.

people murmured at the fraud of the Gibeonites; but the princes recommended to the general assembly to ratify the league, from regard to the oath; "lest wrath be upon us," for violating it, Josh. ix. 15—20. Joshua, however, and the princes, acted rather precipitately on this occasion; for they ought to have first consulted THE ORACLE, before they entered into any treaty with strangers whom they knew not.

THE ORACLE.

The Inner Sanctuary, within the vail of the Tabernacle, or Most Holy Place, was called the ORACLE, 1 Kings vi. 15, because there THE LORD communed with Moses, face to face, and gave him instructions in cases of legal difficulty or sudden emergency, Exod. xxv. 22; Numb. vii. 89; ix. 8; xii. 8; Exod. xxxiii. 11; a high privilege, granted to none of his successors.

THE URIM AND THUMMIM.

After the death of Moses, a different mode was appointed for consulting THE ORACLE, by the High Priest. He put on "the breast plate of judgment," a principal part of the pontifical dress, on which were inscribed the words Urim and Thummim, signifying "lights and perfections," emblematical of divine illumination; as the inscription on his mitre, "Holiness to the Lord" was of sanctification, Exod. xxviii. 30—37; Levit. viii. 8. Thus prepared, he presented himself before THE LORD to ask counsel on public matters, not in the inner sanctuary, which he presumed not to enter, but on the great day of national atonement, but without the vail, with his face towards the ark of the covenant, inside; and behind him, at some distance, without the Sanctuary, stood Joshua, the judge, or person who wanted the response, which seems to have been given with an audible voice, from within the vail, Numb. xxvii, 21, as in the case of Joshua, vi. 6—15; of the Israelites during the civil war with Benjamin, Judges xx. 27, 28; on the appointment of Saul to be king, when he hid himself, 1 Sam. x. 22—24; of David, 1 Sam. xxii. 10; xxiii. 2—12; xxx. 8; 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; of Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6.

This mode of consultation subsisted under the Tabernacle, erected by Moses in the wilderness, and until the building of Solomon's Temple: after which we find no instances of it. The Oracles of THE LORD were thenceforth delivered by the pro- phets : as by Ahijah to Jeroboam, 1 Kings xi. 29 ; by Shemaiah to Rehoboam, 1 Kings xii. 22 ; by Elijah to Ahab, 1 Kings xvii. 1, xxi. 17—29 ; by Michaiah to Ahab and Jehoshaphat, 1 Kings xxii. 7 ; by Elisha to Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 11—14 ; by Isaiah to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xix. 6—34, xx. 1—11 ; by Huldah to Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 13—20 ; by Jeremiah to Zedekiah, Jer. xxxii. 3—5, &c.

After the Babylonish captivity, and the last of the prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, the ORACLE ceased ; but its revival was foretold by Ezra, ii. 63 ; and accomplished by JESUS CHRIST, who was himself THE ORACLE, both under the old and new covenants, Gen. xv. 1, &c. John i. 1, &c.

REDEMPTION OF THE FIRST BORN OF THE ISRAELITES.

Immediately after the last and sorest plague of the destruction of the first born of the Egyptians, the Lord commanded that all the first born of the Israelites, both of man and beast, should be consecrated or devoted to his service, in memory of his sparing them on that occasion, Exod. xiii. 1, Numb. iii. 13.

About fourteen months after, they were allowed to be redeemed, and the children of the Levites were accepted as a compensation, to minister unto THE LORD in their stead ; probably on account of their zeal for the LORD in punishing the worshippers of the golden calf, Numb. iii. 12, Exod. xxxiii. 26—29.

On numbering all the males of the tribe of Levi, from a month old to thirty years of age, Numb. iii. 34, iv. 3, they were found to amount to 22,000 *. And all the first born males of the other tribes to 22,273. The surplus of the latter, namely 273, which could not be redeemed by the children of the Levites, were allowed to be redeemed at the rate of five shekels a head ; and the amount 1375 shekels of the sanctuary, to be given to Aaron the high priest, and his sons the priests, for sacred uses, Numb. iii. 14—51.

* By an error in the Masorete text, the males of the family of Gershom, the son of Levi, are reckoned 7500, instead of 7200 ; which Kennicott has ingeniously accounted for, from the similitude of the Hebrew numerals, ך, Caph final, 500, and ך, Resh, 200. Diss. Vol. I. p. 100. The latter is the genuine reading, because with the family of Kohath, 8600, and of Merari, 6200, it exactly makes the amount 22,000.

FUNCTIONS OF THE PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

The priesthood was exclusively appropriated to the family of Aaron, the eldest son of Kohath, the son of Levi, Exod. xxviii. 1—43; and he and his sons were consecrated at Sinai, Levit. viii. 6—36.

Their functions were 1. to offer sacrifices for themselves and for the people, Levit. ix. 1—21 : 2. to bless the people. See the form of blessing prescribed, Numb. vi. 24—26, which bears a remarkable analogy to the Christian blessing, 2 Cor. xiii. 14. 3. They and the Levites were bound to attend the high priest in the service of the Tabernacle, Deut. x. 8, Numb. iv. 1—49; and both priests and Levites were to instruct the people in the law, Levit. x. 11, Deut. xxxiii. 10.

The wise and salutary institution of public teachers for the religious instruction of the people, was peculiar to the Mosaical law. They were supported at the public charge by tythes, not by lands, for the Levites had no inheritance among their brethren; that they might devote themselves solely to their sacred functions. But they were dispersed throughout all the tribes, in the forty-eight sacerdotal and Levitical cities, that they might be most conveniently stationed for the discharge of their duties.

Moses, in his last blessing, marks the functions of the Levites, and the meritorious service by which they redeemed the curse of Levi, in Jacob's prophecy; which, it is remarkable, took place in the time of Moses and Aaron, who were “the third generation” from Levi, by the mother's side; and “the fourth,” by their father's, Exod. vi. 16—20.

And he said of Levi :

Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy Saint *,
Whom thou didst prove at Massah,
And with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.
Who said to his father and mother,
I have not seen you,
Neither did he acknowledge his brethren,
Nor know his own children.
For they observed thy word,
And kept thy covenant.

* Aaron is styled “the saint of the Lord,” Psalm cvi. 16. He and his successors wore the breast-plate of judgment. The failings of Aaron are here first recorded, and afterwards the meritorious zeal of the Levites, and their consecration to God's service.

They shall teach Jacob thy judgments,
 And Israel thy law ;
 They shall offer incense before thee,
 And whole burnt sacrifice upon thine altar, Deut. xxxiii. 8—10.

THE PRIESTS' MAINTENANCE.

The provision made for the priests was considerable :

1. A share of the sin-offerings, heave-offerings, and first-fruits of the whole congregation, Numb. xviii. 8—13.
2. Things or persons separated or devoted to the Lord by vow, Levit. xxvii. 1, Numb. xviii. 14.
3. The redemption fees of the first born of men and cattle : which were five shekels a head for the former. Part, however, was reserved for sacred uses, or the service of the Tabernacle, Numb. iii. 51.
4. The tenth of the Levites tythes of every kind, Levit. xxvii. 21—28.
5. A share of the tythe of the spoils taken in war, Numb. xxxi. 28—41.
6. The skins of the burnt-offerings, with some exceptions ; and other small articles, Levit. vii. 8.

Thus were the priests wisely exempted from the cares of agriculture, and the avocations of a landed property, that they might have leisure to attend wholly to their sacred functions ; while their political influence arising from their sacred station, and superior learning and information, was checked, by rendering them dependent on the people for their daily bread.

THE TABERNACLE AND ARK.

This was a portable tent, built by Moses at Sinai, by the command of the LORD, and after a model furnished by Him, which was to contain the Sanctuary for the LORD, to “ dwell ” visibly, as the Shechinah, or divine glory, among his people. It was composed of planks of shittim wood, (supposed to have been either cedar or acacia,) curiously jointed together, so as to be easily taken asunder, and put up again, on their journeys and stations. The length of it was thirty cubits, and the breadth and height ten cubits. It was divided into two parts ; the outer called the holy place, or sanctuary in general, was twenty cubits long ; the inner sanctuary, called the most holy place, was an exact cube of ten cubits ; divided from the outer by a rich embroidered vail or curtain, which hung upon four pillars of shittim wood, plated with gold. The inside of the Tabernacle was also plated with gold, and the outside covered with a casing of ram skins dyed red; forming altogether a splendid and magnificent structure, befitting the majesty of the GOD OF ISRAEL, Exod. xxv. 8, 9.

In the outer sanctuary were deposited the table of shew bread, the golden candlestick, and the golden altar of incense; in the inner, the ark of the covenant, which contained nothing but the two stone tables of the decalogue, written with the finger of God, over which was the mercy seat, between the cherubims, or throne of the GOD OF ISRAEL, and the residence of his glory; where he personally communed with Moses, 1 Kings viii. 9, Exod. xxv. 22.

The ark itself was a chest of shittim wood, two cubits and half in length, and a cubit and half in breadth and height, made to hold the two tables of the covenant. It was overlaid with pure gold, both within and without, with a crown, or circular rim of gold round about it.

This was the most holy of all the sacred furniture. None but the priests were allowed to touch it; and only the Kohathites, the sacerdotal family, to carry it, with poles of shittim wood, overlaid also with gold, inserted in two golden rings at each end, 1 Kings viii. 8. Hence Uzzah, the Levite, was punished with death for touching it, 2 Sam. vi. 7.

THE FESTIVALS.

1. Of these, the primary was the passover. This was instituted on the night before the exode, for a perpetual memorial of the signal deliverance of the Israelites, when the LORD, or his destroying angel passed over, or spared the houses of the Israelites, while he smote the first born of the Egyptians. It was ordained to be celebrated on the same day, the fourteenth of the first month, at even, and in the same circumstances.

This was an indispensable rite, to be observed by every Israelite, except in particular cases of pollution or defilement, or absence in foreign countries, under pain of death, Numb. ix. 1—13. No uncircumcised person was to eat thereof.

2. The second was that of weeks, or Pentecost. It was appointed on the fiftieth day after the wave sheaf, or first fruits of the barley harvest was offered, on the second day of the paschal week, Levit. xxiii. 15, 16, in order to commemorate the promulgation of the Decalogue on Mount Sinai, and also to offer unto THE LORD the first fruits of the wheat harvest. See the form of thanksgiving, Deut. xxvi. 5—10.

3. The third was that of tabernacles. It was instituted in memory of the booths formed of branches of trees, in which the Israelites sojourned on their departure from Egypt; and was to be held on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, at the end of the vintage and ingathering of fruits, Levit. xxiii. 34—43.

Each of these grand festivals was to last a week, during which they were bound to rejoice before THE LORD for all his deliverances and mercies, Deut. xvi. 11—15.

Each of these festivals had also a further typical reference or analogy to the Gospel dispensation.

1. A bone of the paschal lamb, or passover, was not to be broken, Exod. xii. 46, Numb. ix. 12. This singular injunction was fulfilled in CHRIST, our passover, who was sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. v. 7; and yet not a bone of him was broken, as foretold by David, Psalm xxxiv. 21, and recorded as accomplished, John xix. 36.

2. Pentecost was equally significant of the effusion of the HOLY SPIRIT upon the apostles and first fruits of the Christian Church, on Pentecost or Whitsunday, the fiftieth day after our Lord's resurrection, Acts ii. 1—40.

3. The feast of tabernacles was celebrated with greater joy at the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, by Ezra, iii. 4; and by Nehemiah, viii. 14—17; and was evidently considered by the Jews in OUR SAVIOUR'S time, as typical of future deliverance, at his triumphal entry into Jerusalem from Bethany, at his last passover, in which they carried branches of palms in procession. And according to the Jewish traditions founded on ancient prophecy, the grand defeat of Gog and Magog, the enemies of the Church, shall take place on the feast of Tabernacles, when the seven months' cleansing of the land shall expire, and the final restoration of the Israelites to their own land shall take place, Ezek. xxxix. 12; and they shall keep the feast, Zech. xiv. 16.

All the males of the united states were bound to attend these three grand festivals, Exod. xxxiv. 23, Deut. xvi. 16; and for their encouragement to do so, they were assured that "no man should desire their land," during their absence, Exod. xxxiv.

24; or that they should be secure from hostile invasion, during their attendance on their religious worship.

SACRIFICES.

These were of three kinds :

1. Burnt-offerings, or holocausts, free-will offerings devoted wholly to God, according to primitive patriarchal usage. The man himself was to kill them before the LORD, and cut them in pieces; while the priests were to sprinkle the blood of the victim upon the altar of burnt-offering, and the whole was to be burnt thereon, with the head and fat, for a sweet savour unto the Lord. The victim to be offered, was according to the person's ability, a bullock without blemish*; or a male of the sheep or goats; or a turtle dove or pigeon, Levit. i. 1—17.

If he was too poor to offer any of these, he was to bring a minha, or “bread offering,” of fine wheat flour, with oil and frankincense, as a memorial of God's goodness to him, and for a sweet savour unto THE LORD, equally acceptable as the more costly offerings †. It is even called “the most holy of the offerings of THE LORD made by fire,” Levit. ii. 1—10. This bears a remarkable analogy to the LORD's supper; that peace offering, foretold to be offered in the name of the Lord, “from the rising to the setting sun,” in the room of the Jewish minha, Mal. i. 11, 12.

2. Peace offerings. These also were free-will offerings, in token of peace or reconciliation between GOD and man: and were both of animals, or of bread or dough. If the former, part of them was burnt upon the altar, especially all the fat, as an offering unto the Lord; and the remainder was to be eaten by the priest and the offerer. The victims in these might be male or female, provided they were without blemish. The parts of

* Homer observes in his first Iliad, that the cattle sacrificed, were τελειοι, “without blemish;” and that after they were flayed, they were cut up with great care, skill, and accuracy, εν, και περιφραδεως, and επισταμενως. Hence, perhaps, St. Paul borrowed the technical expression, ορθοτομειν, to express the duty of the ministers of the Gospel, “rightly to divide” the word of truth, 2 Tim. ii. 15.

† This is well expressed by Horace.

Immunis aram si tetigit manus,
Non sumptuosa blandior hostia,
Mollibit aversos Penates,
Farre pio et saliente micá.—Od. III. 23, 17.

both appropriated to the priests and to the levites, were called heave or wave-offerings, because they were heaved, or lifted up, or waved to and fro, before they were eaten, in token of being first consecrated to THE LORD, Levit. iii. 1—6, Exod. xxix. 26, 27, Numb. xviii. 24—28.

Beside these that were voluntary, there were others that were indispensable.

3. Sin-offerings, for sins committed through ignorance, or wilfully, against knowledge. The offerings for sins of these kinds are specified; which in general consisted of a sin-offering to God; and a burnt-offering, or "gift," in token of acceptance; accompanied with restitution of damage, Levit. v. 2—19, xxv. 17, vi. 1—7. Conformably to which, our Lord requires previous reconciliation with an injured brother, including restitution, before the burnt-offering or gift would be acceptable to THE LORD, Matt. v. 23, 24.

4. Purification of women after child birth. The term of purification prescribed for a son was forty days, and for a daughter eighty, perhaps with reference to Eve's transgression, Gen. iii. 16, 1 Tim. ii. 14; after which the mother was required to offer a sin-offering for her purification, and a burnt-offering as a thanksgiving for her safe delivery. These were a turtle dove or young pigeon for the former, and a yearling lamb for the latter; if unable to afford a lamb, she was to offer two doves or pigeons; the one for the sin-offering, the other for the burnt-offering, Levit. xii. 1—8. Our Lord's mother presented the offering of the poor, Luke ii. 24, and her first born son unto THE LORD, Luke ii. 23, according to the law, Exod. xiii. 2, Numb. iii. 13; after he had been regularly circumcised on the eighth day, according to the law, Luke ii. 21, Levit. xii. 3.

5. Purification of lepers after their recovery. The signs of this horrible disease, and of its cure, are minutely described, Levit. xiii. for the information of the priests; after the cure, the priests were required to inspect and certify the fact, in order to readmit the patient into society. Among the sacrifices and ceremonies of his purification, minutely described, Levit. xiv. the following is remarkable.

The priest was required to take two small birds, (the Vulgate says sparrows;) to kill one of them over an earthen vessel filled with river water, so as that the blood might be mixed with the water; then to dip the other, or living bird, into the water; and to sprinkle the leper therewith seven times, with a stick of cedar wood, upon the end of which a bunch of hyssop was tied with a scarlet thread. After which, the priest was to pronounce him purified, and let loose the living bird into the open air, Levit. xvi. 2—7.

This ceremony seems to be typical of the purification of our sins, by the sprinkling of the blood of JESUS CHRIST, Isai. lii. 15, 1 Pet. i. 2, which flowed out of his wounded side, mixed with water, John xix. 34, while the dismissal of the living bird resembles that of the scape goat into the wilderness, with the sins of the leper upon him. And OUR LORD expressly commanded the lepers whom he healed, to conform to the law, Matt. viii. 4, Mark i. 44, Luke v. 14, xvii. 14.

II. All these sacrifices were occasional, and regarded individuals; but there were others that were national and regular, daily, monthly, and yearly.

1. The daily sacrifice. This was a burnt-offering every day, morning and evening, at the third and ninth hours, of two lambs of the first year, one at each time; with a bread offering and a drink offering of strong wine, Levit. vi. 9—18, Numb. xxviii. 1—8.

2. The weekly sacrifice, on every Sabbath-day, equal, and added to the daily sacrifice, Numb. xxviii. 9, 10.

3. The monthly sacrifice, on every new moon, of two young bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs, with a suitable bread and drink offering, Numb. xxviii. 11—14.

4. The yearly sacrifices :

1. At the beginning of the sacred year, on the fifteenth day of the first month, or first day of the paschal week.

2. At the feast of pentecost, on the day of offering the first fruits of the wheat harvest. 3. On the new moon, or first day of the seventh month, or beginning of their civil year. In all which the burnt offerings were nearly the same as in the monthly sacrifices. 4. At the feast of tabernacles, or ingathering of the fruits and vintage, which was the most copious of all; these were to be offered every day of the week; on the first day, or fifteenth of the seventh month, thirteen young bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs; on the second, twelve bullocks, on the third, eleven, and so on decreasing, till the seventh day, seven bullocks, and on the eighth day, a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs. All these stated burnt offerings were to be accompanied with a sin offering of a goat, to shew their insufficiency to make the comers thereto perfect, Numb. xxvii. 17—31, xxviii. 1—39, Heb. x. 1.

THE SACRIFICE OF ATONEMENT.

Of all the legal sacrifices, this was the most solemn and important, to be offered on the tenth day of the seventh month, by the high priest alone, for the sins of the whole nation.

On this day only, in the course of the year, was the high priest permitted to enter the sanctuary*, and not even then without due preparation, under pain of death; all others being excluded from the tabernacle during the whole ceremony, Levit. xvi. 2—17.

Preparatory thereto he was to wash himself in water, and to put on the holy linen garments, with the mitre; and to bring a young bullock into the outer sanctuary, and present it before the Lord to be a sin offering for himself and his household, including the priests and Levites, and a ram also for a burnt offering, xvi. 3, 4.

He was then to take two young goats, and present them before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle, to be a sin offering for the whole congregation of Israel, and a ram also for a burnt offering, xvi. 5.

He was then to cast lots upon the two goats, which of them should be sacrificed as a sin offering to THE LORD, and which should be let go for a scape goat into the wilderness.

After this, he was first to sacrifice the bullock as a sin offering for himself and his household, and to take some of the blood into the inner sanctuary, bearing in his hand a censer with incense burning, kindled at the sacred fire on the altar, and to sprinkle the blood with his finger upon the mercy seat, and before it, seven times; to purify it from the pollution it might be supposed to have contracted from his sins and transgressions during the preceding year.

He was then to sacrifice the allotted goat, for the sins of the whole nation, and to enter the inner sanctuary a second time, and to sprinkle with blood as before, to purify it from the pollution of the people's sins and transgressions of the foregoing year. After which, he was to purify, in like manner, the tabernacle and the altar.

* When the Tabernacle was to be removed, and set up again, the inner Sanctuary might safely be entered, but not at other times.

He was next to bring the live goat, and lay both his hands upon his head, and confess over him all the iniquities, transgressions, and sins of the children of Israel, putting them upon the head of the goat; and then to send him away by the hand of a fit person into the wilderness, to bear away upon him all their iniquities to a land of separation, where they should be remembered no more.

After this atonement he was to put off his linen garments, and leave them in the sanctuary, and to wash himself again in water, and put on his usual garments; and then to offer burnt offerings for himself and for the people, at the evening sacrifice, Levit. xvi. 3—28.

The whole of this process seems to be typical or pre-figurative of the grand atonement to be made for the sins of the whole world by JESUS CHRIST, “the High Priest of our profession,” Heb. iii. 1, and a remarkable analogy thereto, may be traced in the course of OUR LORD’S ministry.

He began it with personal purification at his baptism, to “fulfil all legal righteousness,” Matt. iii. 13—15. Immediately after his baptism, he was led, by the impulse of the HOLY SPIRIT, into the wilderness, as the true scape goat, who “bore away our infirmities, and carried off our diseases,” Isai. liii. 4—6, Matt. viii. 17.

Immediately before his crucifixion, “he was afflicted,” and “his soul was exceeding sorrowful unto death,” when he was to be made a sin offering, like the allotted goat, Psalm xl. 12, Isai. liii. 7, Matt. xxvi. 38, 2 Cor. v. 21, Heb. i. 3; and “his sweat, as great drops of blood falling to the ground,” corresponded to the sprinkling of the mercy seat, Luke xxii. 44; and when to prepare for the sacrifice of himself, he consecrated himself in prayer to GOD, John xvii. 1—5, Matt. xxvi. 39—46; and then prayed for his household, his apostles and disciples, John xvii. 6—9, and for all future believers on Him, by their preaching, John xvii. 20—26. He put off his garments at his crucifixion, when he became the sin offering, Psalm xxii. 19, John xix. 23, 24; and as our spiritual high priest entered once for all into the most holy place, heaven, to make intercession with God for all his faithful followers, Heb. vii. 24—28, ix. 7—15; “who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification.” Rom. iv. 25.

THE BRAZEN SERPENT.

This crowns the whole of the typical references of the law to the sacrifice of Christ, instituted near the end of the journeyings of the Israelites in the wilderness, Numb. xxi. 6—9; the ultimate design of which, our Lord himself unfolded: "As Moses lifted up the [brazen] serpent [upon a pole] in the wilderness, [for the cure of all those bitten by the fiery serpents, who looked upon it with the eye of faith,] even so must the SON OF MAN be lifted up [upon the cross,] that every one who believeth on Him may not perish, but have eternal life," John iii. 14, 15. "And I, if I be lifted up [upon the cross,] will draw all men unto me," John xii. 36, or unto my standard, as foretold, Isai. xlix. 22, lix. 19, lxii. 10, as the Saviour of the world, Isai. lxii. 11, and he declared to the unbelieving Jews, "When ye shall lift up the SON OF MAN, then shall ye know that I am [HE,] John viii. 28. "They [the Jews,] shall look upon Him whom they pierced," Zech. xii. 10, John xix. 37, with the eye of contrition and faith, at his second coming in glory; "when after their long desolation, they can say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of THE LORD," Matt. xxiii. 38, 39.

May that auspicious epoch come quickly! and may these types and prophecies of their own Scriptures, so remarkably and wonderfully fulfilled in CHRIST at his first coming, contribute to remove the vail that is still over their hearts, and to dispel that partial blindness which hath still befallen Israel, and prepare them for his approaching appearance, and their conversion!

DIVISION OF LANDS.

By the original constitution of the government, the promised land was to be divided among all the tribes except that of Levi, in proportion to the population of each.

The whole land, from north to south, was about 189 miles long, and from east to west about 130 miles broad, according to the mean computation; containing near fifteen millions of acres; but the number of adult males, above twenty years of age, at Sinai, and at their entrance into the promised land, was about 600,000, in round numbers; which would give each man, at an average, near twenty-two acres a piece, without reckoning near four millions of acres reserved for public uses. See Lowman on the Civil Government of the Hebrews, p. 38, 39.

This was fully sufficient, with industry, to give each man a comfortable independence for himself and his family. The princes, however, and chiefs, had larger shares, to support their rank: thus the heroic Caleb got the mountain of Hebron for an inheritance, by a grant from Joshua, xiv. 6—13; Phineas, the priest, had land allotted to him for his public services, in Mount Ephraim, Numb. xxv. 11; Josh. xxiv. 33; and Joshua himself had a grant from the nation of the territory of Timnath Serah, in Mount Ephraim, Josh. xix. 49, 50, xxiv. 30.

Each of the proprietors held their lands by immediate tenure from GOD himself: “the land is mine, saith THE LORD, ye are strangers and sojourners with Me,” Levit. xxv. 23.

The yeomanry of Israel formed a national militia for the defence of the state; their lands were granted to them upon the condition of military service, when summoned by the government. Thus, when Moses granted to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Half-Manasseh, the conquered lands eastward of Jordan, they were bound to assist their brethren of the other tribes, in the conquest of the lands westward; and not to return to their own settlements until the war should be over; which they did, and were discharged at the end of it by Joshua, Numb. xxxii. 6—32; Josh. xxii. 1—9. And afterwards, during the civil war with the Benjamites, when the men of Jabesh Gilead did not attend the general summons to meet at Mizpeh, a chosen party of twelve thousand men was sent by the congregation, to put them all to the sword, men, women, and children, for a treasonable desertion of their duty, Judges xxi. 8—14.

The permanence of the original division of lands was secured by Agrarian laws, of the most profound wisdom and justice, which formed the sheet anchors of the state; 1. by preventing the accumulation of debts; no Israelite being allowed to lend money on usury, or interest, to any fellow-citizen, though they might to strangers, Levit. xxv. 36; Exod. xxii. 25; Deut. xxiii. 20. 2. By regularly abolishing all debts, every seventh, or sabbatical year, Deut. xv. 1, 2. 3. By the reversion of all lands that had been sold or mortgaged, to the owners or their heirs, every Jubilee, or seventh sabbatical year. Being the Lord's property, the lands could not be sold for ever, or alienated, but subject to redemption, Levit. xxv. 10—24. While, 4. the lands of each tribe were kept distinct, by the laws respecting heiresses; who were not permitted to marry out of their own tribe, Numb. xxvii. 1—9, xxxvi. 1—11. From the want of such admirable regulations, the states of Greece and Rome, who adopted equal divisions of land among their citizens, were exposed to great fluctuations and inequalities of property, which produced perpetual contests between the rich and the poor, the Patricians and Plebeians, and finally overturned the state.

THE SABBATICAL YEAR.

The sabbath, or “rest,” ordained for men and cattle every seventh day, was graciously extended to the land itself, every seventh year; during which the owners were to let it lie fallow, and “the sabbath of the land,” or its spontaneous crop or harvest, was dedicated to charitable uses, to be enjoyed by the servants of the family, by the way-faring stranger, and by the cattle, Levit. xxv. 1—7.

To guard against famine on this and the ensuing year, the Lord was graciously pleased to promise a triple produce of the lands upon the sixth year, sufficient to supply the inhabitants till the fruits or harvest sown in the eighth year, were ripe, Levit. xxv. 2—20. This was a singular institution, peculiar to a Theocracy. And the breach of it was among the national sins that occasioned the captivity, that “the land might enjoy her sabbaths,” of which she had been defrauded by the rebellion of the inhabitants, Levit. xxvi. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21.

This was also the year of release from personal slavery, Exod. xxi. 2, as well as of the abolition of debts, Deut. xv. 1, 2.

The commencement of the first sabbatical year, has been much disputed, and various years have been assigned by Scaliger, Usher, Jackson, &c. The following chronological determination will, perhaps, be found most probable.

The first division of the conquered lands in Canaan, took place in the sixth year of the war, B.C. 1602; the second division, probably six years after, B.C. 1596; the seventh year after that, B.C. 1589, was therefore, probably, the first general sabbatical year.

THE YEAR OF JUBILEE.

The Jubilee was a more solemn sabbatical year, to be held every seventh sabbatical year, at the end of forty-nine years, or the fiftieth current, Levit. xxv. 8—10.

It was to be proclaimed by sound of trumpet, throughout the whole land, on the great day of atonement. All debts were to be abolished, all captives or slaves released, and every man authorized to return to his possession, that had been sold or mortgaged; and religious instruction to be given to the people, during the ensuing feast of Tabernacles, by the Priests and Levites.

That OUR LORD began his public ministry on a Jubilee, we may collect from his declaration; "THE LORD hath anointed me, (as THE CHRIST,) to preach the Gospel to the poor: He hath sent me (as SHILOH, "THE APOSTLE,") to heal the broken hearted, to proclaim deliverance to the captives, and restoration of sight to the blind; to set at liberty the bruised: to proclaim the acceptable year of THE LORD," Luke iv. 18, 19.

And it appears to have been a jubilee from the following chronological argument.

To the first general sabbatical year, B.C. 1589, add the year of our Lord's public ministry, A.D. 28; and divide the sum 1617 years, by the jubilee period, 49 years, it leaves no remainder. Therefore, A.D. 28, was the last year OF THE PERIOD, or a jubilee itself.

Great care was taken to prevent the probable operation of the laws of the sabbatical year, and of the jubilee, to check the feelings of compassion towards the indigent.

"If there be a poor man among you, or one of thy brethren within any of thy gates, in the land which the Lord thy God is to give thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother.—Beware lest there be a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, the year of release is at hand, and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought, and he cry unto the Lord, and it be sin against thee: Thou shalt surely give, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him, because that for this thing THE LORD will bless thee in all that thou puttest thine hand unto. For the poor shall never depart out of thy land, therefore I command thee saying, Thou shalt open thy hand wide to thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy in thy land," Deut. xv. 7—11.

By this most humane law, the poor are represented as always to continue in the land, in order to exercise the liberality of the rich, who are promised to be rewarded, in proportion to their liberality, with temporal blessings, by GOD himself, the supreme proprietor of their lands; while, on the other hand, by a necessary inference, the churlish or the niggardly were to be punished with a temporal curse. Never were municipal laws and institutions fenced with so complete and certain sanctions, both of reward and punishments, in this life.

Those also of the future, though not expressly enacted, are plainly understood or pre-supposed. The chief design of their gracious Lawgiver, was “to humble them, to prove them, and to do them good, at their end,”—that “they might live,” or “inherit eternal life,” Deut. viii. 16, xxx. 6; Luke x. 25. This is expressly intimated in Moses’ last solemn appeal :

“I call heaven and earth to record against you this day, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore, choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live,” Deut. xxx. 19. “The blessing and cursing” include the temporal, and “life and death,” the spiritual sanctions of the law.

THE DEATH OF MOSES.

The faculties of this illustrious legislator, both of mind and body, were not impaired at the age of 120 years, when he died. “His eye was not dim, nor his natural strength abated,” Deut. xxxiv. 7. And the noblest of all his compositions was his Song, or the Divine Ode, which Bishop Lowth elegantly styles, Cyanea Oratio,—“the Dying Swan’s Oration.”

His death took place after THE LORD had shewn him, from the top of Pisgah, a distant view of the promised land, throughout its whole extent. “HE then buried his body in a valley opposite Beth-peor, in the land of Moab; but no man knoweth his sepulchre unto this day,” observes the sacred historian, who annexed the circumstances of his death to the book of Deuteronomy, xxxiv. 6. From an obscure passage in the NEW TESTAMENT, in which “Michael the archangel is said to have contended with the Devil about the body of Moses,” Jude 9, we may collect, that he was buried by the ministry of angels, near the scene of the idolatry of the Israelites; but that the spot was purposely concealed, lest his tomb might also be converted into an object of idolatrous worship among the Israelites, like the Brazen Serpent. Beth-peor lay in the lot of the Reubenites, Josh. xiii. 20.

Josephus, who frequently attempts to embellish the simple narrative of Holy Writ, represents Moses as attended to the top of Pisgah by Joshua, his successor, Eleazar the high priest, and the whole senate; and that after he had dismissed the senate, while he was conversing with Joshua and Eleazar, and embracing them, a cloud suddenly came over and enveloped him, and he vanished from their sight, and was taken away to a certain valley. "In the sacred books," says he, "it is written, that he died: fearing to say, that on account of his transcendent virtue, he had departed to THE DEITY." Ant. IV. 8, 48.

The Jewish historian has here perhaps, imitated the account of OUR LORD'S ascension, furnished by the evangelist, Luke xxiv. 50, 51, Acts i. 9, wishing to raise Moses to a level with CHRIST. According to him, Moses departed on the new moon, or first day of the last month Adar. His death was announced by THE LORD himself to Joshua, "Moses, my servant, is dead," &c. Josh. i. 2, which decides the point, that there was no human witness of his decease; the account of which was probably added by Joshua from revelation.

The pre-eminence of his character is briefly described by the sacred historian, Samuel or Ezra: "And there arose not a prophet since, in Israel, like unto Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face; in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and all his servants, and all his land; and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror, which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel," Deut. xxxiv. 10—12.

The noblest trait in his moral character, was his patriotic disinterestedness. He twice refused the tempting offer of the aggrandizement of his own family, when God threatened to reject the Israelites for their rebellions, and make of him "a great nation" in their stead. And he left his sons without rank or patrimony, as private Levites, to subsist on the national bounty, in common with their brethren!—And, melancholy to relate, his grandson, "Jonathan the son of Gershon," and his family, became idolatrous priests to the Danites, until the capture of the ark by the *Philistines, Judges xviii. 30; where the Masorete doctors, to hide the disgrace to his memory, changed “Moses” into “Manasses,” by interpolating the letter N in the present copies of the Hebrew text. The posterity of his son Eleazar, were numerous in Solomon’s time, and some of them high in office, 1 Chron. xxiii. 14—17, xxvi. 24, 25.

* The original expression is, until "the day of the captivity of the land," which is thus paraphrased, Psalm lxxviii. 60, &c.

“ So GOD forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which He pitched among men : and delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemies hand.” Compare 1 Sam. iv. 22.

The correct length of this period is collected from the foregoing restoration of the Chronology of Josephus, in the General Introduction, Vol. I. p. 298. There it was shewn, that the interval from the Exode to the foundation of Solomon's temple, was 621 years: from which, subtracting 123 years, (namely, 40 years from the Exode to this return, 80 years for the two reigns of Saul and David, and the three first years of Solomon) the remainder is 498 years.

But although we are indebted to Josephus for this, and for supplying some material chasms or deficiencies in the sacred annals, such as, 1. The administration of Joshua and the *elders, 25 years; 2. The ensuing anarchy, 18 years; 3. The administration of Shamgar, 1 year; and 4. of Samuel, 12 years: still his detail of the outline there given requires correction.

For, 1. The one year assigned to Shamgar's administration is too short, as is evident from Deborah's account, Judg. v. 6; I have, therefore, included it, with David Ganz, in Ehud's enormous administration of 80 years, and transferred the one year to Joshua's, making that 26 years. 2. I have restored Abdon's administration of 8 years, omitted by Josephus, and deducted it from the 18 years he assigns to the anarchy, thereby reducing the latter to its correct length of 10 years. 3. I have dated the first division of the conquered lands in the sixth year, which Josephus reckoned in the fifth year†; because Caleb was 40 years old when Moses sent him as one of the spies from Kadesh Barnea, in the second year after the exode: consequently, he was 39 years old at the exode; and therefore, 79 years old, 40 years after, at the arrival in Canaan; but he was 85 years old when he claimed and got the hill of Hebron for an inheritance; and therefore, $85 - 79 = 6$ years, after the arrival in Canaan. Compare Numb. x. 11, xiii. 6, with Josh. xiv. 6—15. 4. Josephus has omitted the date of Samuel's call to be a prophet, 1 Sam. iii. 1—19, which St. Paul reckons 450 years after the first division of lands, Act. xiii. 19, 20, and which, therefore, commenced with the 10 last years of Eli's administration of 40 years. This last most important chronological character from the New Testament, verifies the whole of this rectification, while it demonstrates the spuriousness of the period of 480 years in the present Masorete text of 1 Kings vi. 1, from the exode to the foundation of Solomon's temple, which was also proved in detail, Vol. I. p. 221, 222.

* Josephus states, that Eleazar, the high-priest, died about the same time as Joshua (θνήσκει κατ' αὐτον τον καιρον) Ant. 5. 1, 29. And it is evident, that "the elders, who survived Joshua," died shortly after him, from Josh. xxiv. 29—33. Phineas, the son of Eleazar, was high-priest during the anarchy, in the Benjamite war. Judg. xx. 28.

† Josephus states, that Joshua survived the first division of lands 20 years, and that his whole administration was 25 years, Antiq. v. 1. 28, 29; therefore, according to him, that division took place in his fifth year, or the fifth year of the war, Ant. v. 1. 19. The Jewish Chronology reckons his administration 27 years, Vol. I. p. 221. The mean, therefore, 26 years, is correct, agreeing with Caleb's age.

JOSHUA.

His original name was Hoshea or Oshea, Deut. xxxii. 44, which Moses, whose minister he was, Exod. xxiv. 13, changed into Jehoshua, Numb. xiii. 16, and by contraction, Joshua, or Jeshua, or Jesus, (according to the Greek pronunciation,) Acts vii. 45, Heb. iv. 8, signifying "Saviour." He therefore was a type of CHRIST, both in his name, and in his actions, as well as Moses.

The first notice of him is on occasion of the Amalekite war, Exod. xvii. 9, when he was appointed captain of a chosen party to repel their attack, at which time he was about 44 years of age, and was called a young man, Exod. xxxiii. 11. Even then he was pre-ordained by THE LORD, to put the Israelites in possession of the promised land, as appears from the injunction to Moses, to write the aggression of the Amalekites, and the decree of their extermination, in a book, and "to rehearse it in the ears of Joshua," as a memorial to him and the future Judges, Exod. xvii. 14. And THE LORD appointed him to succeed Moses, Numb. xxvii. 18, and, after his death, commanded Joshua, about the age of 84, to pass over Jordan with the people, and take possession of the promised land, Josh. i. 2, and inculcated the observance of the law of Moses in the following impressive terms:—

— "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate thereon day and night*, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein, for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success," Josh. i. 8. And how well Joshua profited by these instructions, we learn from his last solemn speech to the congregation of Israel, in which he recapitu-lates the divine mercies, and warns them to shun the idolatries of their forefathers, and of the neighbouring nations; declaring, on his own part,—“As for me and my house, we will serve THE LORD,” xxiv. 15.

The miraculous passage of the river Jordan was effected on the tenth day of the first month, Josh. iv. 19, wanting only five days to complete forty years from the day they left Egypt, on the fifteenth day of the first month, Numb. xxxiii. The circumstances of the passage are noticed, Vol. I. p. 412.

The day after the passage, by the divine command, the rite of circumcision, which had been intermitted from the time that they left Egypt, was renewed, and all the children of the circumcised generation that perished in the wilderness were circumcised at Gilgal. Thus were they taken into the Abrahamic covenant, and “the reproach of Egypt rolled away from them,” or the reproach of the circumcision, Gen. xxxiv. 14; Josh. v. 2—9. They were then qualified to sacrifice the passover, which had been intermitted from the second time of their observance of that rite at Sinai, in consequence of their rebellions, and they gave a signal proof of their faith, in submitting to that painful operation in the face of their enemies, relying on the Divine protection till they were healed, for Gilgal was only two miles from Jericho.

Accordingly, they celebrated this third passover on the fourteenth day of the month, at even, in the plains of Jericho; and next day, on the fifteenth, the long and miraculous supply of manna ceased, when they got a natural supply of provisions in the land, Josh. v. 10—12.

At this time Joshua, when surveying Jericho, was encouraged, by the appearance of the CAPTAIN OF THE LORD’S HOST with a drawn sword in his hand, the same who appeared to Moses in the bush at Horeb; as follows from the sameness of the injunction, “Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy,” v. 13—15.

And most signally did HE fight for Israel. 1. In the miraculous downfall of the walls of Jericho, v. 1—20. 2. In destroying the confederated southern nations with hailstones in their flight, x. 32. 3. In prolonging the day of battle to an unusual length, at Joshua’s petition, by making the sun and moon stand still about a whole day, x. 12—14. And 4. By driving out some of the northern nations by the hornet, or gad-fly, xxiv. 12, as foretold by Moses, Exod. xxiii. 28 ; Deut. vii. 20.

DOWNFALL OF THE WALLS OF JERICHO.

This stupendous miracle, at the beginning of the war, was well calculated to terrify the devoted nations, and to encourage the Israelites, by shewing that the loftiest walls and strongest barriers afforded no protection against the Almighty God of Israel.

“ And the Lord said unto Joshua, Lo, I have given into thy hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour, and ye shall compass the city all ye men of war, and go round about the city once each day for six days, and seven priests shall bear before the ark [carried in procession] seven trumpets of rams’ horns, and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets ; and it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the rams’ horns [the seventh time], and ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout, and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him,” [and destroy the inhabitants with the sword, and burn the city.] Josh. vi. 2—5. Which was accordingly executed, and none spared but the hospitable Rahab, the harlot, and her family, ver. 6—25.

In the symbolical representations of the judgments to be inflicted upon the apostate nations of the earth, in “ the days of vengeance,” destined to precede the second advent of Christ, or his appearance in glory, the mysterious imagery of the apocalypse appears to be borrowed from this description : The seven angels, with seven trumpets, correspond to the seven priests ; and the seven vials, containing the last plagues, to the seven blasts of the trumpet on the last day. At the last of which, “ the mystery of GOD is to be finished.” Rev. viii. 2, &c. ; xv. 1, &c.

THE SUN AND MOON STAND STILL.

This miracle, like the former, is utterly impossible to account for on philosophical principles. It must be resolved wholly into the power of God, who hearkened to the voice of a man, to stop the luminaries in their diurnal courses (or rather, perhaps, the earth’s rotation), and by prolonging the day of battle, to make them fight for Israel.

From the circumstances of the narrative, however, we may collect the time of the day, and of the month that it happened—soon after sun-rise, and when the moon was rather past the full.

Joshua, when summoned by the Gibeonites to come to their succour against the confederate kings, “went up from Gilgal all night, and came suddenly” upon the enemy, we may conclude about day-break, whom he slew with great slaughter, and chased along the way from Gibeon to Beth-horon (“the house of fury”), in a westerly direction, THE LORD co-operating in their destruction by a tremendous shower of great hail-stones, which slew more than the sword of the Israelites, but did not touch the latter. In this situation, the sun appeared to rise over Gibeon eastward, and the moon to set over Ajalon westward, near the Mediterranean sea, in the tribe of Dan, when Joshua, moved by a divine impulse, uttered this invocation in the sight of Israel:—“Sun, stand thou still over Gibeon, and thou Moon in the valley of Ajalon.” “So the sun stood still in the hemisphere [at his rising], and hastened not to go down [at his setting] about a whole day,” which, in that climate, and shortly after the vernal equinox, might have been about thirteen hours long; thus giving him day-light for the destruction of his enemies for twenty-six hours, during which he took the city of Makkedah, and slew the five kings, who hid themselves in a cave near it, x. 1—28.

It is said, immediately after this miracle, ver. 15, “And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Gilgal,” which he certainly did not, until the end of the expedition, ver. 43, where it is properly introduced. It is, therefore, either an interpolation, or must signify that Joshua *intended to have returned, &c. but changed his resolution when he heard that the five kings had fled and hid themselves in a cave at Makkedah, ver. 16, 17. This is the solution of Wells.

THE HORNET.

By this scourge of GOD, he drove out two kings of the Amorites from before the Israelites, or compelled them to emigrate to other countries, Josh. xxiv. 12. One of these, according to the Jewish commentaries of R. Nachman, was “the nation of the Girgashites, who retired into Africa, fearing the power of God.” And Procopius, in his history of the Vandals, mentions an ancient inscription in Mauritania Tingitana, stating, that “the inhabitants had fled thither from the face of Joshua, the son of Nun.” This account accords with Scripture, in which, though the Girgashites are included in the general list of the seven devoted nations either to be driven out or destroyed by the Israelites, Gen. xv. 20, 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11; yet they are omitted in the list of those to be utterly destroyed, Deut. xx. 17; and among whom, in neglect of the divine decree, the Israelites lived, and intermarried, Judg. iii. 1—6. That the name of the Girgashites, however, was not extirpated, we may collect from the Gergesenes, in our Saviour’s time, inhabiting the same country, Matt. viii. 28.

* So Balak, king of Moab, warred against Israel, Josh. xxiv. 9; i. e. “intended to war against.”

Other tribes of the Hivites, Canaanites, and Hittites, were also expelled by the Hornet gradually; not in one year, lest the land should become desolate, and the wild beasts multiply to the prejudice of the Israelites, Exod. xxiii. 28—30.

Of these “fugitive tribes,” some appear to have fled beyond sea to Italy, where they became the *Aborigines, or first colonists, so distinguished from the Indigenæ, or natives, as we learn from that profound antiquary Virgil:—

Hæc nemora indigenæ Fauni Nymphæque tenebant,
Gensque virûm truncis et duro robore nata;
Quis neque mos neque cultus erat, neque tangere tauros,
Aut componere opes norant, aut parcere parto:
Sed Rami, atque asper victu venatus agebat.

Primus ab Ætherio venit Saturnus Olympo,
Arma Jovis fugiens, et regnis exul adeptis.
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis,
Composuit, legesque dedit: Latiumque vocari
Maluit, his quoniam latuisset tutus in oris.—

Tum manus Ausonia, et gentes venere Sicanæ:
Sæpius et nomen posuit Saturnia tellus. ÆN. viii. 314—329.

1. From this curious passage, we learn, that the rude native settlers lived on fruits in the savage or hunter state. These were primitive Javanians, whose leader Janus gave name to the

* Αβορτ-γινεες, “Gentes transfugæ,” is rather derived from the Hebrew עבר (Abar) “transivit ;” and גוי (Goi) “gens,” which, in the Phœnician plural, gives גין (Gin) “gentes ;” than from the Latin, “Primi que ab origine reges.” Virg. ÆN. vii. 18.

hill Janiculum, at Rome, and was prior to Saturn, as we learn also from Virgil:—

Hæc duo præterea disjectis oppida muris,
Reliquias, veterumque vides monumenta virorum :
Hanc Janus pater, hanc Saturnus condidit arcem ;
Janiculum huic, illi fuerat Saturnia nomen. ÆN. viii. 355—358.

2. Saturn was prior to the Ausonian and Sicilian colonists, and introduced civilization and laws in the agricultural state; and his name Saturn proves his oriental extraction, being evidently derived from סַתַר (Satar) Latuit, which Virgil accurately expresses, and describes him as “an exile, stript of his kingdom, flying from the east, from the arms of JOVE ;” than which, there cannot be a more suitable description of the expulsion of one of “the kings of the Amorites” before Joshua.

3. And these “arms of JOVE” were the hornets sent by the God of Israel IAHOH, or by contraction IO, to which Virgil's description of the Asilus exactly corresponds :

Plurimus—volitans, (cui nomen Asilo Romanum est; οιστρον, Graii vertere vocantes)
Asper, acerba sonans, quo tota exterrita silvis
Diffugiunt armenta. Georg. III. 145.

The Latin Asilus, and Greek οιστρον, were probably only different pronunciations of the same oriental term, הצרעה *Ha-tsiraah, as this fly is called by Moses and Joshua, Exod. xxiii. 28, Deut. vii. 20, Josh. xxiv. 12.

That οιστρον was actually of Phœnician, not Latin descent, appears from Æschylus, who, in his Prometheus, thus introduces

* By an easy and usual interchange of the letters R and L, both in the east, and in the west, Ha-tsiraah might have been changed into Ha-tsil-aah, whence A-sil-us. Thus the dog-star, Mazaroth, Job xxxviii. 32, was also called in Syriac Mazaloth, 2 Kings xxiii. 5, where it is improperly rendered “planets.” And the shepherd's festival among the Romans was call Parilia, from Paris, “a shepherd,” by Dionysius Hal. Cicero, Pliny, &c. : but Palilia, from Pales, (and Pali, in the Sanscrit language, signifies “a shepherd,”) by the poets Virgil, Ovid, &c.

Te quoque magna Pales, et te, memorande, canemus, Pastor ab Amphryso. Georg. III. 1.

And so, by transposition of the letters T and S, which compose the Hebrew Tsade, צ, Ha-tsiraah became Ha-istr-aah, whence Οιστρον.

The Phœnician term itself, without the He emphatic צרעה, may naturally be derived from the Hebrew, צרה, Tsiraah “clamavit,” expressive of its loud buzzing, acerba sonans.

Io, the daughter of Inachus, changed into a heifer, and persecuted by the hornet, through the jealousy of Juno :

————— Οιστροπληξ δ' εγω
Θειη μαστιγι, γην προ γης ελαυνομαι.

————— “Alas, I hornet-struck
By a divine scourge, from land to land am driven !”

And to this very passage Virgil alludes, after the foregoing description of the Asilus :

Hoc quondam monstro, horribiles exercuit iras, Inachiæ, JUNO, pestem meditata Juvenæ. Vers. 153.

The vindictive power that presided over this dreadful scourge was worshipped at Ekron, in Palestine, through fear, the reigning motive of Pagan superstition, under the title of Baal-zebub *, “Master of the Hornet,” 2 Kings i. 2, whence Beelzebub, in the New Testament, “the prince of Demons,” Matt. xii. 24.

Bruce, in his travels in Abyssinia, has given an accurate description of this tremendous fly, which in Arabic is called Zimb, and by the Abyssinians Tsalsal-ya †, “the cymbal of THE LORD,” from its sonorous buzzing.

“This insect has not been described by any naturalist: it is in size very little larger than a bee, of a thicker proportion, and its wings, which are broader than those of a bee, placed separate like those of a fly; they are of pure gauze, without colour or spot upon them. The head is large; the upper jaw or lip is sharp, and has at the end of it a strong pointed hair of about a quarter of an inch long; the lower jaw has two of these pointed hairs; and this pencil of hairs, when joined together, makes a resistance to the finger nearly equal to that of a hog’s bristle. Its legs are serrated in the inside, and the whole covered with brown hair, or down.” Vol. II. p. 24.

And in his Appendix, Vol. VI. p. 234, Plate 48, he has given a drawing of this fly, magnified, for distinctness sake, something above twice the natural size. After which he observes, p. 237, * זבוב, Zebub, the Phœnician title of this “deadly” fly, as it is styled, Eccl. x. 1, is probably derived from the Hebrew, סבב Sabab, “circuivit,” alluding to their wheeling flight. Thus the Psalmist describes his enemies: “They compassed me about (סבבני Sabuni) like bees.” Ps. cxviii. 12.

† Isaiah, denouncing “a woe” against Abyssinia, describes it as “the land of the winged cymbal,” (Tsalsal canaphin) xviii. 1. By the same analogy that Tsalsal signifies a locust, Deut. xxviii. 42;—“a streperá voce sic dictam.” R. Salomo.

“ He has no sting, though he seems to me to be rather of the bee kind ; but his motion is more rapid and sudden than that of the bee, [volitans] and resembles that of the gad-fly in England. There is something particular in the sound or buzzing of this insect : it is a jarring noise, together with a humming, [acerba sonans] which induces me to believe it proceeds, in part at least, from a vibration made with the three hairs at his snout.”

Bruce does not cite, or refer to Virgil's description, though his account furnishes the most critical and exact explanation of it. Such undesigned coincidences are most satisfactory and convincing ; they shew that the poet and the naturalist both copied from nature. And the terror impressed by this insect on all the cattle, Quo tota exterrita sylvis diffugiunt, according to Virgil, is thus illustrated by Bruce :

“ As soon as this plague appears, and their buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about the plain till they die, worn out with fatigue, fright, and hunger. No remedy remains but to leave the black earth, [where they breed] and hasten down to the sands of Atbara ; and there they remain while the [periodical] rains last, this cruel enemy [asper] never daring to pursue them farther.

“ The camel, emphatically called by the Arabs, the ship of the desert,—— though his size is immense as is his strength, and his body covered with a thick skin, defended with strong hair, still is not able to sustain the violent punctures the fly makes with his pointed proboscis. He must lose no time in removing to the sands of Atbara ; for when once attacked by this fly, his body, head, and legs, break out into large bosses, which swell, break, and putrify, to the certain destruction of the creature.

“ Even the elephant and rhinoceros, who, by reason of their enormous bulk, and the vast quantity of food and water which they daily need, cannot shift to desert and dry places, as the season may require, are obliged to roll themselves in mud and mire, which, when dry, coats them over like armour, and enables them to stand their ground against this winged assassin ; yet I have found some of these tubercles upon almost every elephant and rhinoceros that I have seen, and attribute them to this cause.

“ All the inhabitants of the sea-coast of Melinda, down to Cape Gardefan, to Saba, and the south coast of the Red Sea, are obliged to put themselves in motion, and remove to the next sand, in the beginning of the rainy season, to prevent all their stock of cattle from being destroyed. This is not a partial emigration: the inhabitants of all the countries from the mountains of Abyssinia, to the confluence of the Nile and Astaboras northward, are once a year obliged to change their abode, and seek protection in the sands of Beja; nor is there any alternative, or means of avoiding this, though a hostile band was in the way, capable of spoiling them of half their substance, as was actually the case when we were at Sennaar." [See Vol. V. p. 196.] Vol. II. p. 24—26.

"Of such consequence is the weakest instrument in the hand of PROVIDENCE."

THE CONQUEST OF CANAAN.

In his first campaign, Joshua reduced all the open country, and several of the towns in the southern division of the land of promise, which he describes by "the hill-country, the south, the vale, the springs; from Kadesh Barnea (eastwards) even unto Gaza, (westwards) and all the country of Goshen, (southwards) even unto Gibeon, (northwards.)" Josh. x. 40—42.

In the ensuing campaigns, he subdued the northern powers, who were assisted by the Jebusites of the hill-country, in the southern division, and reduced the rest of the land, as far as great Zidon, (northwards) and the valley of Mizpeh, (eastwards) except "the fenced cities, which stood still in their strength," or did not attack the Israelites; among which were Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, (or Azotus, westwards) in the land of the Philistines.

"And Joshua made war a long time, with all these kings" of the south, and of the north, xi. 1—18. Josephus reckons that it lasted five years.

FIRST DIVISION OF LANDS.

In the sixth year, (as shewn from the age of Caleb) the first division of lands among the western tribes took place, when the tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and Half-Manasseh, obtained their lots. These, added to the eastern tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Half-Manasseh, settled in the lands of the Amorites, Moabites, and Midianites, conquered by Moses, completed the settlement of five of the tribes. The eastern are described, Josh. xiii. 15—32; the western, chap. xv. 16, 17.

SECOND DIVISION OF LANDS.

This did not take place till a good while after the former, as appears from Joshua's reproof of dilatoriness to the seven remaining tribes :—" How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which THE LORD, the God of your fathers, hath given you ?" Josh. xviii. 2, 3. We are, therefore, warranted, from the analogy of expression between this and the duration of the war, "a long time," to date the allotments of the seven remaining tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulon, Issachar, Asher, Naphthali, and Dan, six years after the former division. These are described, chap. xviii. and xix.

The arms of the Israelites prevailed every where, during the vigorous administrations of Moses and Joshua, who enforced obedience to the law ; but when the tribes began to be settled, they were so intent on the occupations of agriculture, and on their own separate concerns, that the stronger tribes neglected to assist the weaker in the reduction of the several "fenced cities," or fortresses, which still held out ; and so, by their divisions, they weakened the force of the whole nation. Hence the history of the Judges, is what might naturally be expected to follow from such neglect of the common interest. The native powers gradually recruited their strength, revolted, and, in their turn, subdued and oppressed the Israelites, either totally or partially. Judges, or leaders, with small undisciplined and mutinous armies, were occasionally raised up to repel them, according to the exigency of the times ; and though often warned and chastised, they would not depart from their stubborn way.

Still, however, under Joshua's administration, they prospered in the main, because they served the Lord, and were jealous to prevent the introduction of idolatry.

FAITH OF THE ISRAELITES.

Of this a remarkable proof was given, after the return of the Trans-Jordanite tribes to their settlements, where they built a great altar beside Jordan, near the passage of Bethabara, xxiv. 10.

This roused the indignation of the rest of the congregation westwards ; and they gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against them ; and sent a deputation of ten princes with Phineas the priest, to threaten them with punishment for their rebellion against the Lord, and against the congregation; or if they disliked the lands, as unclean, or not honoured with the residence of the Tabernacle of the Lord, which was then stationed at Shiloh, xviii. 1, to invite them to leave it, and share in their possession on the western side; reminding them of the punishments inflicted on the whole congregation, for their idolatry of Baalpeor, and the trespass of Achan.

The apology of the eastern tribes furnishes an advantageous specimen of the purity of their faith at that time, in the following strain of impassioned eloquence, interrupted by frequent parentheses, which may thus be more closely rendered:

“THE GOD OF GODS, THE LORD! THE GOD OF GODS, THE LORD! Himself knoweth, and Israel also shall know, whether [we have done this] through rebellion—(and if through transgression against THE LORD, save us not this day!)—to build us an altar in order to forsake THE LORD; (and if to offer thereon burnt-offering or oblation, or if, to offer thereon, peace-offering, let THE LORD himself judge!)—Or whether we have not [rather] done it, through a religious fear of this thing: that is to say, Lest your children might say hereafter unto our children, What have ye to do with THE LORD, THE GOD OF ISRAEL, ye children of Reuben and Gad? For THE LORD hath made Jordan a boundary between you and us; Ye have no share in THE LORD; and so, your children might make our children cease from worshipping THE LORD: Therefore, we said, Let us build ourselves an altar,—neither for burnt-offerings nor for sacrifice, but for a witness between you and us, and our posterities—and for a pattern, &c.——GOD forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, and turn this day from following the Lord, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, for bread-offerings, or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the Lord our God, which is before his tabernacle.”——

“And these words pleased the children of Israel; and the children of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up against them in battle.—And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, [and the children of Manasseh,] called the altar Ed; for it shall be “witness” between us, that THE LORD is GOD,” xxii. 12—34.

Even in Joshua's time, however, the Israelites were not purged of the idolatries of their ancestors in Mesopotamia, which he warned them to put away; declaring the resolution of himself and his family, to serve the LORD wholly, xxiv. 14, 15. And like Moses, he predicted their relapse into the idolatries of the Amorites and the surrounding Heathens;—"Ye cannot serve THE LORD, for He is a HOLY GOD, [and his ordinances are too pure for your observance.] He is a JEALOUS GOD, and will not forgive your transgressions and your sins," xxiv. 18. 20; and the two last chapters in general, contain an admirable and affectionate exhortation to obedience, and denunciations of the punishments of disobedience; in the true spirit of Moses' disciple.

THE ANARCHY OR INTERREGNUM.

During the short administration of Eleazar, the high priest, and the elders, who survived Joshua, the Israelites served THE LORD. But they soon fell into the idolatrous practices and abominations of the Heathen nations, among whom they settled and intermarried; instead of endeavouring to extirpate the devoted nations, as the Lord had commanded.

About this time, THE ANGEL OF THE LORD, who had appeared to Joshua at Gilgal, Josh. v. 13—15, now again appeared to the people assembled at Shiloh, the established place of the Tabernacle; and thus upbraided them for their rebellion:

"I made you go up out of Egypt, and brought you into the land which I sware unto your fathers. And I said, I will never break my covenant with you; And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land, ye shall throw down their altars; but ye have not obeyed my voice: Why have ye done this?"

"Wherefore also I said, I will not drive them out from before you: but they shall be [as thorns] in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you."

This produced a temporary effect: at this authoritative rebuke and threat from their tutelar God, "the people lift up their voice and wept; and sacrificed there unto THE LORD!" whence the place was called Bochim, "weepers," Judges ii. 1—5. But they soon relapsed again; and the last five chapters of the book of Judges form an instructive appendix thereto, containing the gradual introduction and progress of idolatry in the tribes of Ephraim and Dan; the corruptions of a Benjamite city, Gibeah, resembling those of the men of Sodom; the refusal of the tribe of Benjamin to surrender the offenders to justice; the intestine war between them and the rest of the tribes, which ended nearly in the destruction of that tribe, during the ten years anarchy, while Phineas was high priest, xx. 28; and there was “no king in Israel, but every man did what was right in his own eyes*,” xvii. 6, xxi. 25. This appendix properly comes in between the second and third chapters.

THE SERVITUDES OF THE ISRAELITES.

To punish these disorders, the Lord, in his anger, brought on them an invasion from a distant and unexpected quarter, when Chusan Rishathaim, (“the wicked Chusan,”) from Mesopotamia, reduced them to servitude for eight years, until their repentance and deliverance by Othniel, Judges iii. 8, 9. This was succeeded at intervals, according as they relapsed into idolatry, by the Moabite for eighteen years, iii. 12; the Canaanite for twenty years, iv. 2, 3; the Midianite for seven years, vi. 1; the Ammonite for eighteen years, x. 7, 8; the two Philistine, for forty and for twenty years, xiii. 1, 1 Sam. iv. 1, vii. 2—13, according as the Israelites successively fell into the respective idolatries of these nations, in “serving Baal and Ashtaroth, the sun and moon, or Baalim, the gods of Syria, the gods of Zidon, the gods of Moab, and also of Ammon, and the gods of the Philistines,” in the order in which these idolatries are recapitulated, iii. 13, x. 6.

Thus this whole disastrous period was spent in a course of alternate sinning and repenting; of sinning in prosperity, and of repenting in adversity.

JUDGES.

Joshua deviated from the example of his illustrious predecessor, in not, like him, applying to the LORD to appoint a successor to “lead the people, that the congregation of THE LORD might not be as sheep without a shepherd,” Numb. xxvii. 17. What were his reasons for this remarkable omission, which made an essential breach in the constitution of the government, and led to all the disorders of the anarchy, are not noticed in Scripture, and can only be supplied by conjecture. Perhaps the rising jealousy and rivalry of the southern and northern states, headed by the tribes of Judah and Ephraim, could not be brought to unite in the choice of a judge for the common weal, looking only to their own aggrandizement, as likely to be impaired, if the judge were not of their own tribe, and so might have prevented them from concurring in such an application to THE LORD *; who might also have left them to themselves, to follow their imaginations, in politics as well as in religion, to prove them, and to humble their pride, and to chastise them for their good, as he left, for these wise purposes, the remnant of the devoted nations, and about a quarter of the land, unsubdued by Joshua, without driving them out hastily, Judges ii. 20—23, iii. 1—4.

* From this expression it is conjectured, that the book of Judges was written under the regal state, and probably by the prophet Samuel. It was written after the captivity of the ark, Judg. xviii. 30, Psalm lxxviii. 61, 1 Sam. iv. 11.

For a vindication of the Divine procedure, in devoting the most idolatrous and corrupt of the Canaanitish nations to destruction by the sword of Israel, see Vol. I. p. 416, &c. See also Dodd's Reflections, subjoined to his Commentary on the 20th chapter of Deuteronomy; and Greaves' Lectures on the Pentateuch, Vol. II. p. 37—100; in which last the question is fully and ably discussed.

OTHNIEL.

When the children of Israel were oppressed during the Mesopotamian bondage, and cried to the Lord, he raised up a deliverer for them in Othniel, the nephew and son-in-law of the heroic Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, who had before signalized his valour in the capture of Kiriath Sephir, Josh. xv. 13—19, (repeated Judges i. 10—15,) and defeated Chusan, and gave “rest” or peace to the land for forty years, Judges iii. 9—11. “The Spirit of THE LORD,” by which he was said to be inspired, here and in most parts of the Old Testament, intimates the spirit of fortitude, or extraordinary courage, as opposed to “the spirit of fear,” or faintness of heart.

* In the Benjamite war, the tribes consulted the Lord, not whether they should go to war, that having been already determined on; but which tribe should go up first to battle. Hence they were twice defeated: at length, the third time, they asked that question, and succeeded, Judges xx. 18—28.

EHUD.

He was a Benjamite, and raised up to deliver his people from the Moabite yoke, under which the Israelites had groaned for eighteen years. This proves that the Moabites, notwithstanding the severe vengeance inflicted on them by Moses for the whoredoms of Shittim, were by no means extirpated, but on the contrary, in the course of eighty-four years, became a powerful people, and with the assistance of their confederates, the Ammonites and Amalekites, subdued the Israelites, and established a post at the "city of Palm trees," or Jericho, in the tribe of Benjamin, which cut off the communication between the eastern and western tribes, and kept both in awe. But Ehud got access to Eglon, king of Moab, under pretence of delivering him a message from God; and assassinated him with a dagger, concealed; and after his escape, defeated the Moabites at the ford of Jordan, and slew ten thousand chosen men of them, and totally reduced that nation, iii. 12—30. How far such an assassination was justifiable, we cannot presume to say; Scripture barely states the fact, without any comment.

SHAMGAR.

Ehud's administration of eighty years in the east, probably included Shamgar's in the west; who defeated the Philistines, and slew six hundred of them with an ox-goad, iii. 31. The goad of Palestine is of enormous size, and well calculated for a military offensive weapon, according to the description of the intelligent Maundrell; who in his diary, April 15, 1697, observes: "At Kane Leban, the country people were now every where at the plough in the fields, in order to sow cotton. 'Twas observable, that in ploughing they used goads of an extraordinary size: upon measuring of several, I found them about eight foot long, and at the bigger end six inches in circumference. They were armed at the lesser end with a sharp prickle, for driving the oxen; and at the other end with a small spade, or paddle of iron, strong and massy, for cleansing the plough from the clay that encumbers it in working. May we not from hence conjecture, that it was with such a goad as one of these, that Shamgar made that prodigious slaughter*?—I am confident, that whoever should see one of these instruments, would judge it to be a weapon, not less fit, perhaps fitter, than a sword, for such an execution. Goads of this sort, I saw always used hereabouts, and also in Syria: and the reason is, because the same single person both drives the oxen, and also holds and manages the plough; which makes it necessary to use such a goad as is described above, to avoid the incumbrance of two instruments," p. 110. This place of Kane Leban, which was a day's journey from Jerusalem, might have been in the very neighbourhood of that where Shamgar fought the Philistines.

As Shamgar's administration might have been of some continuance, so this Philistine servitude, which is not noticed elsewhere, might have been of some duration, as may be incidentally collected from Deborah's thanksgiving, v. 6.

DEBORAH AND BARAK.

Deborah was a prophetess of Mount Ephraim, who, moved by a divine impulse, exhorted Barak, of the tribe of Naphtali, to undertake the deliverance of the northern tribes, with 10,000 infantry of the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulon, from the oppression of Jabin, king of Canaan, who had 900 war chariots of iron; which he accomplished, accompanied by her, when Sisera, the captain of the enemies' host, fell by "the hand of a woman," as remarkably foretold by Deborah. A circumstance which alone justifies Jael for that otherwise unaccountable breach of hospitality † to the fugitive Sisera, whom she had at first har-

* Homer mentions the same weapon employed for the same purpose by Lycurgus.

————— ἡ π' ἀνδροφονοιο Λυκούργου
Θεινομενας βουπληγι.—————

† The rites of hospitality are held so sacred among the Arabs, that a bread and salt traitor, who violates them, is the bitterest reproach that can be applied to any person in their language. After harbouring, therefore, and entertaining Sisera with so much kindness, Jael must have been influenced by some extraordinary and overruling impulse, not only to forego the natural softness and compassion of her sex, but to have been guilty of such an heinous outrage against the acknowledged rites of hospitality.

The moment a captive among the Arabs has obtained meat or drink from his captor, he is rendered secure of life. During a truce between the Crusaders and Saracens, in the Holy Land, Arnold, Lord of Cracha, cruelly pillaged and imprisoned the caravan going from Mecca to Egypt; adding insult to breach of faith—Let your Mahomet deliver you!

Fired with indignation thereat, Saladin the Sultan vowed to dispatch him with his boured in her tent, and treated him with so much kindness, by ascribing her conduct in driving a tent-pin through his temples, and nailing his head to the ground, as he lay oppressed with sleep and weariness, solely to a divine impulse, making her the instrument of divine vengeance. But this and Ehud's are uncommon cases, and not to be judged by ordinary rules, nor drawn into precedent in these times.

Upon this occasion, Deborah composed a thanksgiving, like that of Moses, abounding in the richest ornaments of sacred oriental poetry. It is here attempted to be rendered more closely and intelligibly, amidst the difficulties and obscurities which cloud, but cannot hide its various beauties, arising from the local imagery, and reference to the history of the times, now lost, in which it also abounds.

DEBORAH'S THANKSGIVING.

V. 1. Then sang Deborah, and Barak son of Abinoam, on [the victory of] that day, on the avenging of wrongs in Israel; [and]

2. On the volunteering of the people: saying,

BLESS YE THE LORD!—

3. Hearken, O kings [of Canaan,]

Give ear, O princes [of the land:]

I, even I, will sing unto THE LORD,

I will chant to THE LORD, the GOD OF ISRAEL.

II. 4. O LORD, on thy going forth from Seir,

On thy marching from the land of Edom,

The earth quaked, the heavens dropped,

The clouds, I say, dropped water,

5. The mountains melted away

From the presence of THE LORD;

Even Sinai, himself, from the presence

OF THE LORD, THE GOD OF ISRAEL.

own hand, if he could ever make him prisoner. The fatal battle of Hittyn, in which the Crusaders were defeated, and their principal commanders taken, gave him that opportunity. He then ordered the captives into his presence, Guy, the king of Jerusalem, his brother Geoffry, and prince Arnold. Saladin presented Guy, who was nearly expiring for thirst, with a delicious cup cooled with snow, out of which the king drank; and then gave it to Arnold. Observe, said Saladin, it is thou king, and not I, who hast given the cup to this man.—After which, he said to Arnold,—See me now act the part of Mahomet's avenger. He then offered Arnold his life, on condition of embracing the Mahometan faith, which he refusing, the Sultan first struck him with his drawn scymetar, which breaking at the hilt, the rest of his attendants joined and dispatched him.—Bohadin's Life of Saladin.

- III. 6. From the days of Shamgar son of Anath,
To the days of Jael, [through fear of the enemy]
The highways were unfrequented,
And travellers walked through bye paths,
7 The villages were deserted;
They were deserted, till I Deborah arose,
Till I arose, [to be] a mother in Israel.
8. [The Israelites] had chosen New Gods,
Therefore, was war in their gates :
Was there a shield or spear to be seen
Among forty thousand in Israel !
- IV. 9. My heart is attached to the senators of Israel,
Who volunteered among the people.—
10. Bless ye THE LORD !
Ye that ride on white asses,
Ye that sit in [the gates of] judgment :
Extol [HIM] ye travellers,
11. [Now freed] from the noise of archers
At the watering places.
There shall they rehearse the righteousnesses
Of THE LORD, his righteousnesses
Toward the villages of Israel.
Now shall the people of THE LORD,
Go down to the gates [of judgment in safety.]
12. Awake, awake, Deborah ;
Awake, awake, utter a song [of praise :]
Arise, now, Barak, lead thy captivity captive,
Thou son of Abinoam.
13. For [GOD] made a remnant of the people Triumph over the nobles [of the enemy]—
THE LORD made me triumph over the mighty.
14. From Ephraim unto Amalek was their root ; —
Next to thee [Ephraim] was Benjamin, among thy peoples ;
From Machir [Manasseh] came down the senators ;
And from Zebulon, they that write with the pen of the scribe ;
15. The princes in Issachar [were] with Deborah,
Even Issachar, as well as Barak [Naphtali :]
He was sent on foot into the valley.
- V. For the divisions of Reuben,
[I feel] great griefs of heart : —
16. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds,
To hear the bleatings of the flock ? —
For the divisions of Reuben,
[I feel] great griefs of heart.
17. [Why] abode Gilead [Gad] beyond Jordan ;
And Dan remain in his ships ?
[Why did] Asher sit in his sea-ports,
And continue in his creeks ?
18. [While] the people of Zebulon hazarded their lives unto death,
And of Naphtali, in the heights of the field.
- VI. 19. The kings came, they fought ;
The kings of Canaan fought in Taanah,

- Near the waters of Megiddo ;
 But they gained no lucre [thereby :]
20. The stars of heaven fought in their courses,
 They fought against Sisera.
21. The torrent of Kison swept them away,
 The torrent of Kedummin,
 The torrent of Kison. — O my soul,
Thou hast trodden down strength ! —
22. Then were the horse-hoofs broken, by the gallopings,
 The gallopings of their great men. —
23. Curse ye Meroz, saith the angel of THE LORD, Bitterly curse her inhabitants ;
 Because they came not to the aid of THE LORD,
 To the aid of THE LORD, among the mighty.
- VII. 24. Blessed above women, be Jael,
 The wife of Heber the Kenite.
 Blessed be she above women, in the tent.
25. He asked water, and she gave him milk,
 She brought forth butter in a lordly bowl.
26. She put her hand to the nail,
 And her right hand to the workman's hammer,
 And she smote Sisera :
 She pierced his head, she penetrated,
 And she perforated his temples.
27. Between her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay,
 Between her feet he bowed, he fell,
 Where he bowed, there he fell down slain.
- VIII. 28. The mother of Sisera looked through the window,
 And exclaimed, through the lattice,
*Why is his chariot so long in coming * ?*
Why linger the steps of his steeds ?
29. Her wise ladies answered their mistress,
 Yea, she returned answer to herself :
30. Have they not found,
Have they not divided the spoil ?
To each, a damsel or two, apiece ;
To Sisera himself, a spoil of divers colours,
A spoil of divers colours, embroidered,
Of divers colours, embroidered on both sides,
A spoil for [adorning] his neck. —
31. So perish all thine enemies, O LORD !
 But let thy friends [rejoice]
 As the sun going forth in his strength.

The design of this beautiful ode, which breathes the characteristic softness and luxuriance of female composition, seems to be two-fold, religious and political : first, to thank GOD for the recent victory and deliverance of Israel from Canaanitish bondage and oppression ; and next, to celebrate the zeal and alacrity with which some of the tribes volunteered their services against the common enemy ; and to censure the lukewarmness and apathy of others, who staid at home, and thus betrayed the public cause ; and by this contrast and exposure, to heal those fatal divisions among the tribes, so injurious to the common weal. The first verse, as a title, briefly recites the design or subject of the poem ; which consists of eight stanzas.

* The original is highly figurative : “ Why is his chariot ashamed to come ? ”

The first opens with a devout thanksgiving, to which she calls the attention of all, friends and foes.

The second describes, in the sublime imagery of Moses, the magnificent scenes at Mount Sinai, Seir, &c. in the deserts of Arabia, while they were led, by the divine power and presence, from Egypt to Canaan.

The third states their offending afterwards, by their apostacies, in serving new gods, as foretold by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 16, 17 ; and their consequent oppression by their enemies ; the insecurity of travelling, and desertion of the villages, during the twenty years that intervened from the death of Shamgar, till Jael's exploit, and till Deborah became judge ; while they were disarmed by the Philistines and Canaanites, and scarcely a sword or a spear to be seen in Israel. This policy was adopted by the Philistines, in Saul's time, 1 Sam. xiii. 19 ; and was probably introduced before, when Shamgar, for want of other weapons, had recourse to an ox-goad ; which only was left with them for the purposes of agriculture, 1 Sam. xiii. 21.

The fourth contrasts their present happy state of security, from the incursions and depredations of their foes, especially at the watering places, which were most exposed to attacks *, owing to the divine protection which crowned the victory, the zeal and exertions of “ a remnant of the people,” or a part of the tribes, against the enemy, under her conduct : these were the midland tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, including, perhaps, Judah and Simeon, which bordered on Amalek southward, and Issachar, Zebulon, and Naphtali northward.

The fifth censures the recreant tribes, Reuben and Gad, beyond Jordan eastward ; and Dan and Asher, on the Mediterranean sea westward ; who deserted the common cause, in consequence of their divisions and their paltry attachment to their own concerns.

The sixth records the miraculous defeat of the confederate kings of Canaan, who were swept away by the torrents issuing from the different springs of the river Kishon, swollen by uncommon rains. Meroz was probably a place in the neighbourhood.

The seventh contains a panegyric on Jael, who is here "blessed above women," for attempting an exploit above her sex to perform; and a picturesque description of her giving Sisera butter milk to drink; which is considered as a great treat at present among the Arabs. Then follows a minute and circumstantial description of her mode of slaying him.

The eighth affords an admirable representation of the impatience of the mother of Sisera at his delay in returning; her sanguine anticipation of his success; in which she dwells not upon the greatness of his exploits, or the slaughter of his enemies, but upon the circumstances most likely to engage a light female mind, such as captive damsels, and embroidered garments, as the spoils of victory, which she repeats and amplifies with much grace and elegance.

The abrupt and unexpected apostrophe which concludes the poem, So perish all thine enemies, O LORD!—tacitly insinuates the utter disappointment of their vain hopes of conquest and spoils, more fully and forcibly than any express declaration in words; while it marks the author's piety and sole reliance on the divine protection of his people, and the glorious prospect of a future and greater deliverance, perhaps by THE SUN OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, Mal. iv. 2.

The signal victory of Deborah and Barak over the confederate kings of the Canaanites, freed the western tribes, for a long time, from invasion in that quarter, for the two succeeding servitudes of Midian and Ammon were from the east.

GIDEON.

The mode of warfare practised by the Midianites, and their confederates the Amalekites, and the *children of the east, was peculiarly ruinous and destructive: for they ravaged and plundered the whole country, destroying the increase of the earth, and carrying off the cattle of every kind, as far as Gaza on the Mediterranean coast westward; so that they greatly impoverished Israel for seven years, Judges vi. 1—6.

* The children of the east included the posterity of Abraham's sons by Keturah, of whom the Midianites were the principal, Gen. xxv. 6. It also included the Ishmaelites, Judges viii. 24, who were settled near the Midianites, Gen. xxxvii. 28, in the wilderness of Paran. Gen. xxi. 21.

Gideon, “a mighty man of valour,” a Manassite, westward of Jordan, was involved in the common calamity, and was threshing wheat, to hide it from the Midianites; when he was commissioned by THE ANGEL OF THE LORD, who now appeared to him, 223 years after his appearance at Bochim, to deliver his people, when they cried to Him, from their oppressors. To prove his divinity, and confirm the faith of Gideon and his family, THE LORD was pleased to work a succession of signal miracles before him, by setting fire to his sacrifice when he departed out of his sight, and afterwards by sending dew on the fleece of wool, and leaving the adjacent ground dry, and the reverse; miracles peculiarly adapted to wean them from the idolatrous worship of Baal, or the sun, whose altar had been set up by his father, at Ophrah, the town of his residence; this he was commanded to destroy, and to build an altar unto THE LORD on the rock where the Lord had accepted his sacrifice, as a memorial of the miracle, which he did.

Joash, the father of Gideon, was converted by this first miracle, as is evident from his noble and undaunted vindication of his son's conduct in throwing down the altar of Baal, for which the men of the city demanded Gideon's death; when Joash retorted the sentence of death against the idolaters themselves, for their apostacy:—“ [Why] should ye plead for Baal? [Why] should ye save him?—Whosoever will plead for him, let him [rather] be put to death in the morning—If he be a god, let him plead for himself, since his altar is pulled down,” verse 31. That is, If Baal be a god, he is able to vindicate his own cause, and punish the offender with death: if he be unable, (as appears to be the fact,) he is no God; and it is not only absurd in you to espouse his quarrel, but idolatrous; for which you deserve death, by the law of Moses, Deut. xvii. 2—6, appointed for individuals; and Deut. xiii. 12—16, for cities infected with idolatry. This unanswerable argument appears to have been followed by the conversion of the people: for when Gideon blew the trumpet to summon all the people to the war, “Abiezer, (his own district,) were gathered unto him;” and all Manasseh, eastern and western, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali, obeyed his summons.

The Spirit of THE LORD, by which Gideon was animated to undertake the deliverance of his country, was a spirit of fortitude and of prudence, and of all the virtues requisite in a commander, Judges vi. 7—40.

The militia assembled on this occasion being too numerous, the LORD, “lest the people should vaunt themselves against him,” or ascribe the victory to their own numbers and prowess, directed him first to dismiss all the eastern Manassites, who came from Mount Gilead, and might possibly be more afraid of their neighbours, the Midianites, than the western tribes. The passage may thus be more correctly rendered, by a slight transposition of the English translation, vii. 3. “Whosoever, from Mount Gilead, is fearful and afraid, let him return [home] and depart early. So there returned [home] twenty-two thousand of the people.” See Vol. 1. p. 425.

THE LORD next dismissed all the people that stooped down to drink water with their mouth at the surface; and retained only 300 men that lapped, or took up water in the palm of their hand to drink; and with these three hundred only, Gideon defeated the Midianites by a curious stratagem: at the beginning of the second, or middle watch, at midnight, (see Vol. I. p. 13,) he divided his party into three companies of one hundred men each, furnished every one with a trumpet, a lamp, and a pitcher to hide the lamp; and he stationed them, in silence and darkness, on the outside of the enemy’s camp. Then, on a signal given by Gideon, the three companies blew their trumpets, broke their pitchers, shewed their lights, and shouted, *The sword of THE LORD, and of Gideon, and stood every man in his place; as if they were the advanced guard of the whole army of Israel, whom they were lighting to attack the camp. And all the host of the enemy, “ran, and cried, and fled” through the openings between the three companies; and in their panic terror, put each other to the sword; and were pursued by the rest of the militia that had been dismissed; while the Ephraimites, by Gideon’s orders, secured all the passes or fords on the river

* This watch-word was taken from the interpretation of the Midianites’ dream in the camp, to denote “the sword of Gideon,” vii. 14; to which Gideon piously prefixed, “the sword of THE LORD,” as the author of the stratagem, of the dream, and of its interpretation.

Jordan, from the lake of Gennesareth down to Beth-bara, or Bethabara, where Joshua had crossed it; and joined in the pursuit of the fugitives across the river; followed by Gideon and his chosen party; to whom they brought the heads of the two kings or leaders of the Midianites, Oreb and Zeeb, whom they had slain on the eastern, or "other side of Jordan," Judges vii. 1—25. In this destructive pursuit there fell, of all the hosts of the children of the east, no less than 120,000 that drew the sword, vii. 10.

The remnant of their mighty army, amounting to 15,000 men, were pursued by Gideon, who discomfited them, coming upon them by surprise, and slew their leaders, Zeba and Zalmunna, and took away their golden ornaments, (crests,) that were about their camels' necks; and were, probably, consecrated to the moon, who was worshipped in that neighbourhood, before Abraham's days, under the title of Ashtarothe Karnaim, ("the shining cow two-horned,") Gen. xiv. 5. These crests are still in use among the Arabs, and even among the Mahometans in general, however scrupulous about images; being evidently a remnant of that ancient Pagan superstition of Zabianism, which too soon infected the extraneous posterity of the faithful Abraham, and even the Israelites themselves.

"Thus was Midian," which had been chastised before in the days of Moses, Numb. xxv. 17, 18, xxxi. 1—18, now subdued completely, "before the children of Israel; so that they lifted up their heads no more," Judges viii. 10—28.

Gideon was a consummate judge: he possessed all the qualifications requisite for that arduous station, among a contumacious, a divided, and a rebellious people.

When the haughty Ephraimites chid him sharply for not calling them, at first, to the Midianite war, he appeased their anger by a soft answer; modestly extenuating his own exploits, in comparison of theirs: "Is not the gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim, better than the vintage of Abiezer?" or their services at the end of the war, better than his at the beginning: "GOD hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb; and what was I able to do in comparison of you?" viii. 1—3.

When he and his 300 men in the pursuit of Zeba and Zalmunna, and the remnant of the Midianite army, were faint, and asked a little refreshment from the men of Succoth, (a town in the tribe of Gad, near Jordan, not far from the lake of Gennesareth, where it discharges itself into that river,) they inhospitably refused him, adding insult to the refusal: “Is the palm of Zeba and Zalmunna yet in thine hand, that we should give bread to thine army?” ridiculing his attempt to reduce the Midianites with so small a force; and he received a like refusal, in his progress, from the men of Penuel; instead of chastizing their rebellious spirit on the spot, he coolly told both, that he would do so on his return: which he did as he had promised: he scourged to death the princes and elders of Succoth; coming upon them by surprise, before the sun was up; and he beat down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city, by a severe punishment, but a wholesome example, viii. 4—17.

When the men of Israel unanimously offered to make him king, and to continue the crown in his family, for this great deliverance, thus setting aside the Theocracy; he nobly and religiously refused the tempting offer: “I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: THE LORD shall rule over you.” viii. 22, 23.

Though Gideon refused to violate the civil constitution of the government, yet he made a material innovation in the religious establishment. He was probably induced, by the altar which the LORD required him to build at Ophrah, on the rock where he had accepted his sacrifice, to think that this might be the place which THE LORD so often declared in the law, that “He would choose for his name,” or his worship; and who often styled himself “THE ROCK;” especially after he had commissioned Gideon to throw down the altar of Baal there. And the ephod which Gideon made out of the golden ear-rings of the spoils of the Ishmaelites, willingly given him by his army, on his request; (not unlike Aaron, Exod. xxxii. 2,) seems to have included not only “the priests’ dress,” as the word signifies, but also a sacerdotal establishment in his own town, where sacrifices might be regularly performed, and for which purpose a considerable sum of money would be requisite, such as the amount of the offerings, 1700 shekels of gold; which at the rate of £1 16s. 6d. a piece, according to Arbutnot’s Tables, amounted to £3102 10s. sterling*.—And such establishments had been made elsewhere during the anarchy, by Micah, in Mount Ephraim, Judges xvii. 5—13; and by the Danites at Laish, or Dan, xviii. 29—31. This establishment, however, infringing on that at Shiloh, Josh. xviii. 1, proved a “snare to Gideon and his family,” or a seduction to idolatry, in worshipping the true God in an improper manner; and “all Israel went thither a whoring after it;” as they did after Gideon’s death, relapsing into the worship of false gods; when “they went a whoring after Baalim,” the celestial luminaries; “and made Baal Berith their god,” or, rather, “their goddess;” for the moon was worshipped in Phœnicia, under the title of Βηρουτ, *Beruth, at Berytus, as we learn from Sanchoniatho.

There is, indeed, reason to think, that Gideon himself acted as a priest of this establishment; as he had formerly done, by the divine direction, when he sacrificed his father’s second bullock of seven years old, (coeval with the Midianite servitude,) upon the altar to THE LORD HIS GOD, built in the appointed place. For the title of Jerubbaal, given him by his father, (or by the people, in consequence of his father’s vindication,) signifying, “Let Baal plead [against him,] because he had thrown down his altar,” is afterwards in Scripture contemptuously parodied into Jerubbeseth; Beseth signifying “shame,” 2 Sam. xi. 21; as if Gideon had been the promoter of that “shameful” idolatry of Baal, which prevailed among the Ephraimites; censured by Hosea, ix. 10; and among the Jews, censured by Jeremiah, xi. 13. In both these passages Beseth is synonymous with, or set in apposition to Baal.

And this seems to be supported by Heathen testimony: for Sanchoniatho, the Phœnician historian, (who is said by Eusebius to have lived before the Trojan war, and who, therefore, might have been contemporary with Gideon, whose administration began 166 years before it,) is said by Porphyry to have drawn some of his materials “from the commentaries furnished by Jerombal, the priest of the god, IAO.” But Jerombal is easily formed from Jerubbaal, by changing the first B into M †; and

* “Among the Phœnicians there is a god called Ελιουν, (עליון,) ὑψιστος, “most high,” and a goddess called Βηρουτ, (ברות,) who lived about Byblus,” namely, at Berytus, which is midway between Byblus and Sidon. Bochart, Vol. I. p. 775.

† Thus, the name of the hornet, zimb, in Arabic, is evidently formed from the Hebrew zebub, zebbub, or zemb-ub; the various readings, Raiphan, or Rephan, gave Remphan, the dog-star, Acts vii. 43. Sambuca, a musical instrument, from the Syriac Sabuca, or the Chaldee, Dan. iii. 7, &c.

the commentaries in question might be the books of Moses, especially Genesis; which Sanhoniatho might have obtained from Gideon, his neighbour; and from which, he evidently borrowed, and metamorphosed his cosmogony. This is the ingenious conjecture of Bochart, Vol. I. p. 171, &c. De Sanhoniathone.

Gideon's administration lasted forty years.

ABIMELECH.

By his numerous wives, Gideon left seventy sons, and by his concubine of Sichem, (a city of Ephraim,) a spurious son, Abimelech, who artfully seduced his townsmen from their allegiance, and slew all his brethren, except the youngest, Jotham; having hired assassins, with money given him by the favourers of idolatry, out of the treasury of the temple of Baal berith:—"the Sechemites thus shewing no kindness to the house of Gideon, in return for all his goodness and his services to Israel," Judges viii. 35, ix. 1—6.

For this ingratitude they were indignantly upbraided in these animated terms by Jotham:—"My father fought for you, and ventured his life far, and delivered you out of the hand of Midian: And ye have risen up against my father's house, this day, and have slain his sons, threescore and ten persons, upon one stone; and have made Abimelech the son of his concubine, king over the men of Sechem, because he is your brother."—And in the oldest and most beautiful apologue of antiquity extant, the trees chusing a king; with the mild and unassuming dispositions of his pious and honourable brethren, declining, like their father, we may suppose, the crown, when offered to them, perhaps, successively; under the imagery of "the olive tree, the fig tree, and the vine;" he pointedly contrasts the upstart ambition and arrogance of the wicked and turbulent Abimelech, represented by the bramble; inviting his new and nobler subjects, the cedars of Lebanon, to put their trust in his pigmy shadow, which they did not want, and he was unable to afford them; but threatening them, imperiously, on their refusal, to send forth a fire from himself to devour those cedars: whereas the fire of the bramble was short and momentary, even to a proverb, Psalm lviii. 9, Eccl. vii. 6.

The application is thus given: "If ye have dealt truly and faithfully with Jerubbaal and his house, this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech,” or enjoy the benefits of his government ; and “ let him also rejoice in you,” and in your fidelity : but if not—if ye have dealt ungratefully and unfaithfully with the house of Jerubbaal,—may fire come forth from Abimelech and devour the men of Sechem, and their abettors, and contrariwise ; or let intestine war consume both parties !—The name Jerubbaal is well chosen here, to mark their deliverance from Pagan idolatry, by his means ; for which he got the title ; and the result verified the prophetic imprecation, in the total destruction, by Abimelech, of the city and tower, of Shechem, which had revolted from him ; and in his own destruction at the siege of Thebez, in its neighbourhood, when his skull was fractured by the blow of a millstone, let fall on him by a woman from the walls*.—“ Thus God retaliated the wickedness of Abimelech against his father, in slaying his seventy brethren ; and all the wickedness of the men of Shechem did GOD retaliate upon their heads. And upon them [both] came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.”—It is remarkable, that a stone avenged the death of his brethren, slain upon “ one stone,”—the rock, perhaps, whereon Gideon had erected the altar to THE LORD.—And his usurpation was short, only three years ; “ the LORD sending an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem,” for their mutual and speedier destruction, ix. 7—57.

TOLA AND JAIR.

Abimelech was succeeded by Tola, of the tribe of Issachar, who dwelt in Mount Ephraim ; who judged Israel twenty-three years ; and after him arose Jair, a Gileadite, [of eastern Manasseh,] who judged Israel twenty-two years, and was the first Transjordanite judge. His opulence is noticed, in having thirty sons who rode on young asses, Judges x. 1—5. The administration of these judges having been peaceable, is despatched in a few lines : the sacred historian designing principally to record the calamities which the Israelites drew on themselves by their apostacies to the idolatries of the neighbouring nations, and their providential deliverances upon their repentance and return to the Lord their God. After the calm of these administrations, they multiplied their idolatries, which drew on them the Ammonite servitude, for eighteen years, which was particularly severe upon the Transjordanite tribes, x. 6—9.

* “ And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech’s head, and al-to, (i. e. altogether, or entirely,) brake his skull.” Jud. ix. 53. The word al-to, is so used by Chaucer, Spenser, and Milton.

The following admirable expostulation of THE LORD with his penitent people, and his tender compassion on their return to him, is conceived in the spirit of the DIVINE ODE, and furnishes the finest commentary thereon.

“Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians? and from the Amorites? and from the children of Ammon? and from the Philistines? the Sidonians also, and the Amalekites, and the Maonites, [perhaps Midianites,] oppressed you, and ye cried unto Me, and I delivered you out of their hand. Nevertheless, ye have forsaken ME, and served other gods: Wherefore I will deliver you no more.—

“Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen: Let them deliver you, in the time of your tribulation!

“And the children of Israel said unto THE LORD, We have sinned: Do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good in thine eyes: Only deliver us, we pray thee, this day:

“And they put away the strange gods from among them, and served THE LORD.

“And HIS soul was grieved for the misery of Israel,” x. 10—16.

JEPHTHAH.

“This mighty man of valour,” endued with “the spirit of THE LORD,” like Gideon, was a Gileadite, raised up to be the deliverer of his country; who was elected captain in the war against Ammon, by the elders of Gilead.

After his election had been solemnly ratified before the Lord at Mizpeh of *Gilead, he sent messengers to demand of the king of Ammon why he invaded his land? who answered, to recover the land taken from his ancestors by the Israelites, on their way from Egypt; of which, therefore, he required peaceable restitution. Jephthah, in his reply, refused to surrender them, upon the following grounds: 1. He denied the title of the Ammonites thereto; for that the Israelites took these lands

* This was “Mizpeh of Moab,” on the east side of Jordan, where probably there was an established altar of the Lord, 1 Sam. xxii. 3, as distinguished from the western Mizpeh of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 26, Judg. xxi. 1, 1 Sam. vii. 5, x. 17, &c.

from the Amorites, after they, the Amorites, had conquered them from the Ammonites. 2. That the title of the Israelites was confirmed by a prescription of 300 years *, and upwards; during which, none of the kings of Moab, from Balak's time, nor of Ammon, ever reclaimed these lands; who had, at least, as good a right as the Ammonites, now; and 3. That the God of Israel was as well entitled to grant them the lands in question, as their god, Chemosh, in their opinion †, to grant the Ammonites what they occupied at present. Concluding, 4. with an appeal to heaven for the justice of his cause. Judges xi. 1—27.

The issue of this war was such as might be expected. Jephthah defeated the Ammonites with great slaughter; and subdued the nation, xi. 32, 33.

He also severely chastised the haughty and turbulent Ephraimites, who had refused to assist him at the beginning of the war; and had also insulted the Gileadites, calling them “fugitives of Ephraim,” and threatened to destroy him and his house with fire, because he had not invited them to the decisive battle;—“and there fell of the Ephraimites at that time, 42,000.” And he judged Israel six years, xii. 1—7.

HIS VOW.

When Jephthah went forth to battle against the Ammonites, “he vowed a vow unto THE LORD, and said, If thou wilt surely give the children of Ammon into my hand, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh out of the doors of my house, to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall either be the Lord's, or, I will offer it up [for] a burnt-offering,” Judges xi. 30, 31.

* From the conquest of the lands of Sihon and Og, the kings of the eastern Amorites, to the election of Jephthah, was 356 years; which corresponds with the general statement of 300 years in round numbers; or as judiciously rendered by Josephus, ὑπερ τριακοσια ετη, “above 300 years.” Ant. v. 7, 9. This chronological character is inconsistent with the shorter chronology of the Jews, reckoning the interval 293 years; of Usher, 265 years, and of Petavius 238 years only.

† Voltaire, in his Treatise on Toleration, says, that “Jephthah's declaration, who was inspired by GOD, is an evident proof that GOD permitted the worship of Chemosh.”

This is a gross misrepresentation. Jephthah only argued with these idolaters upon their own principles; that all nations had a right to keep what their gods enabled them to possess, which is widely different from admitting the divinity and the worship of Chemosh. Nor does it appear that Jephthah was inspired at this time; the Spirit of THE LORD came upon him after this manifesto, xi. 29.

According to this rendering of the two conjunctions, ׀, Vau, in the last clause, “either,” “or,” which is justified by the Hebrew idiom *; (the paucity of connecting particles in that language, making it necessary that this conjunction should often be understood disjunctively,) the vow consisted of two parts: 1. that what person soever met him, should be THE LORD’S, or be dedicated to his service; and 2. that what beast soever met him, (if clean,) should be offered up for a burnt-offering unto THE LORD.

This rendering, and this interpretation, is warranted by the Levitical law about vows.

The נדר, Neder, or “vow,” in general, included either persons, beasts, or things, dedicated to the LORD for pious uses; which if it was a simple vow, was redeemable at certain prices; if the person repented of his vow, and wished to commute it for money, according to the age and sex of the person, Levit. xxvii. 1—8. This was a wise regulation to remedy rash vows.

But if the vow was accompanied with הרם, Hherem, “devotement,” it was irredeemable, as in the following case, Levit. xxvii. 28.

“Notwithstanding, no devotement which a man shall devote unto THE LORD, [either] of man, or of beast, or of land of his own property, shall be sold, or redeemed. Every thing devoted is most holy unto the Lord.”

Here the three ׀, Vaus, in the original, should necessarily be rendered disjunctively, or; (as the last actually is, in our public translation,) because there are three distinct subjects of devotion, to be applied to distinct uses: the man to be dedicated to the service of the Lord, as Samuel, by his mother Hannah; 1 Sam. i. 11; the cattle, if clean, such as oxen, sheep, goats, turtle doves, or pigeons, to be sacrificed; and if unclean, as camels, horses, asses, to be employed for carrying burdens in the service of the Tabernacle or Temple, and the lands to be sacred property.

This law, therefore, expressly applied, in its first branch, to Jephthah’s case: who had devoted his daughter to the Lord; or “opened his mouth unto the Lord, and therefore could not go back ;” as he declared in his grief, at seeing his daughter, and his only child, coming to meet him, with timbrels and dances, xi. 35. She was, therefore, necessarily devoted, but with her own consent, to perpetual "virginity," in the service of the Tabernacle, xi. 36, 37. And such service was customary: for in the division of the spoils taken in the first Midianite war, of the whole number of captive virgins, "THE LORD'S tribute was thirty-two persons," Numb. xxxi. 35—40. This instance appears to be decisive of the nature of her devotement.

Her father's extreme grief on the occasion, and her requisition of a respite of two months to bewail her virginity, are both perfectly natural; having no other issue, he could only look forward to the extinction of his name or family; and a state of celibacy, which is reproachful among women every where, was peculiarly so among the Israelites: and was therefore no ordinary sacrifice on her part, who, though she generously gave up, could not but regret the loss of becoming "a mother in Israel."—"And he did with her according to his vow which he had vowed, and she knew no man," or remained a virgin all her life, 34—39.

There was also another case of devotement which was irredeemable, and follows the former, Levit. xxvii. 29.

"No one devoted, who shall be devoted of man, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death."

This case differs materially from the former:

1. It is confined to persons devoted, omitting beasts and lands; 2. It does not relate to private property, as in the foregoing; and 3. the subject of it was to be utterly destroyed, instead of being most holy unto THE LORD. This law, therefore, related to aliens or public enemies devoted to destruction, either by GOD, by the people, or by the magistrate.

Of all these we have instances in Scripture:

1. The Amalekites and Canaanites were devoted by GOD himself. Saul therefore was guilty of a breach of this law, for sparing Agag, the king of the Amalekites, as Samuel reproached him, 1 Sam. xv. 23; and "Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord," not as a sacrifice, according to Voltaire, but as a criminal, "whose sword had made many women childless."—By this law the Midianite women, who had been spared in battle, were slain, Numb. xxxi. 14—17.

2. In Mount Hor, when the Israelites were attacked by Arad, king of the southern Canaanites, who took some of them prisoners, they vowed a vow unto THE LORD, that they would utterly destroy these Canaanites, and their cities, if the Lord should deliver them into their hand: which THE LORD ratified. Whence the place was called Hhormah; because the vow was accompanied by Hherem, or devotement to destruction, Numb. xxi. 1—3. And the vow was accomplished, Judges i. 17.

3. In the Philistine war, Saul adjured the people, and cursed any one that should taste food until the evening. His own son, Jonathan, inadvertently ate a honey-comb, not knowing of his father's oath, for which Saul sentenced him to die. But "the people" interposed, and "rescued him," for his public services; thus assuming the power of dispensing, in their collective capacity, with an unreasonable oath, 1 Sam. xiv. 24—45.

This latter case, therefore, is utterly irrelative to Jephthah's vow, which did not regard a foreign enemy, or a domestic transgressor, devoted to destruction; but on the contrary, was a vow of thanksgiving, and therefore properly came under the former case.

And that Jephthah could not possibly have sacrificed his daughter, (according to the vulgar opinion, founded on incorrect translation,) may appear from the following considerations:

1. The sacrifice of children to Moloch was an abomination to THE LORD, of which, in numberless passages, he expresses his detestation; and it was prohibited by an express law, under pain of death, as "a defilement of God's sanctuary, and a profanation of his holy name," Levit. xx. 2, 3. Such a sacrifice, therefore, unto THE LORD himself, must be a still higher abomination. And there is no precedent of any such under the law, in the OLD TESTAMENT.

2. The case of Isaac, before the law, is irrelevant: for Isaac was not sacrificed; and it was only proposed for a trial of Abraham's faith.

3. No father, merely by his own authority, could put an offending (much less an innocent) child to death, upon any account, without the sentence of the magistrates, Deut. xxi. 18—21, and the consent of the people, as in Jonathan's case.

4. The Mischna, or traditional law of the Jews, is pointedly against it, ver. 212.

"If a Jew should devote his son or daughter, his man or maid servant, who are Hebrews, the devotement would be void: because no man can devote what is not his own, or whose life he has not the absolute disposal of."

These arguments appear to be decisive against the sacrifice, and that Jephthah could not even have devoted his daughter to celibacy against her will, is evident from the history, and from the high estimation in which she was always held by the daughters of Israel, for her filial duty and her hapless fate, which they celebrated, by a regular anniversary commemoration, four days in the year, Judges xi. 40.

Jephthah was succeeded by Ibzan, of Bethlehem in Ephraim, for seven years. Then by Elon, a Zebulonite, for ten years. Then by Abdon, an Ephraimite, or Pirathonite, for eight years. During whose peaceable administrations, the Israelites again relapsed into idolatry, and drew down on themselves a rigorous servitude to their western foes, the Philistines, who had now recruited their strength, from the days of Shamgar, and oppressed the Israelites for forty years, Judges xii. 8—15; xiii. 1.

SAMPSON.

At the beginning of this servitude, THE ANGEL OF THE LORD, 137 years after his appearance to Gideon, appeared again to the wife of Manoah, a Danite, who had been barren, and promised her a son, who should be a Nazarite, or consecrated to God from the womb, and should begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines, a deliverance completed by David.

The woman then went and told her husband, saying, “A man of GOD [or a prophet] came unto me, and his countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible, but I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name*,” xiii. 2—6.

And when he appeared again, at the prayer of Manoah, and repeated his directions for the woman’s treatment of herself, and of her future son, according to the law of the Nazarites, Numb. vi. 1—8, he refused to tell Manoah his name, on enquiry—“Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is WONDERFUL.”—And when Manoah offered a kid for a burnt-offering upon the rock, according to his directions, “the angel acted

* The Syriac and Arabic versions here assign a satisfactory reason why the woman did not ask the Angel’s name; viz. because she was greatly affrighted at his appearance. This will satisfactorily account for Manoah’s asking his name afterwards, which would rather be improper, if he had refused to tell it before, according to the now rejected rendering of the Vulgate, but would not be improper, if the Angel had only omitted it.

wondrously in the presence of Manoah and his wife; for [he] THE LORD, ascended up toward heaven in the flame of the altar," xiii. 8—20.

This was a significant sign to this pious couple, that "HE was THE ANGEL OF THE LORD himself*, ver. 16, who formerly had appeared to Gideon, and set fire to his sacrifice upon the rock, and now vanished in the flame, by a fuller manifestation of his divinity. His name, wonderful †, is repeated among the magnificent titles, applied in prophecy to the great Deliverer of the faithful, when his future birth was announced by Isaiah—"His name shall be called wonderful," &c. Isai. ix. 6, or "He shall be great;" as in the application of this prophecy to CHRIST, by the angel Gabriel, Luke i. 32, at the annunciation to the Virgin Mary. And from the fears of death expressed on seeing him by Manoah, ver. 22, and intimated by Gideon before, Judges vi. 22, 23, it appears that He was the same God who told Moses, "No man can see my face and live," Exod. xxxiii. 20; or THE SON OF GOD.

And "THE LORD blessed" this extraordinary child, whom his mother called Sampson ‡, and as he grew up, "the Spirit of THE LORD began to move him at times," which the Chaldee Paraphrast explains, "the spirit of fortitude from before THE LORD began to strengthen him," Judges xiii. 24, 25.

In the twentieth year of his age, and the twentieth also of the Philistine servitude, from which term, therefore, we are to date the commencement of his vindictive administration (Judges xv. 20, xvi. 31.) he was moved, by a divine impulse, to seek a wife among the Philistines, that it might furnish an occasion of quarrel between them, and so that he might be made an instrument of their punishment, xiv. 1—4. On his way to Timnath, to propose for the woman in marriage, he gave the first indication of his prodigious strength, in tearing a young and fierce lion who attacked him, as easily as a kid, without any weapon in his hands; for “the Spirit of THE LORD came mightily upon him,” ver. 5, 6.

‡ In the explanation of proper names in Scripture, subjoined to the last volumes of the London Polyglott Bible, and of Calasio's Concordance, Romaine's edit. and Cruden's Concordance, various etymologies are assigned of this name; the most probable seems to be שמשון, Sampson, a diminutive from שמש, Shemesh, or Semes, "the sun," signifying "a little sun;" alluding to the prediction that he should "begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines;" typical, perhaps, of that fuller deliverance expressed by Deborah, of "the sun going forth in his strength," Judges v. 31, or of "the Sun of Righteousness with healing in his wings, or rays," Mal. iv. 2; to be accomplished by that last and greatest Nazarite, the Man CHRIST JESUS, Matt. ii. 23, whose "countenance" is compared to "the sun shining in his strength," Rev. i. 16.

And he returned [after the days of courtship were fulfilled *] to take her to wife, and in his way, turned aside to see the carcass of the lion, which had speedily been devoured by jackals, or beasts of prey, and he found a swarm of bees and honey in the skeleton of the carcass, which suggested his riddle at the marriage feast: “out of the eater came forth food, and out of the fierce came forth sweetness;” which was answered as to the latter part, by the guests to whom he proposed it, “What is sweeter than honey? what is fiercer than a lion?” which shewed that they also understood the former; that the honey, which was “the food” meant, was taken out of the lion, “the eater” or devourer of other creatures, ver. 8—18. Sampson was filled with indignation against his wife, for betraying the secret of the riddle, which she had extorted from him by her importunity, to prevent the threatened destruction of her family by the guests, who could not otherwise expound it; and against them also for “plowing with his heifer,” or tampering with his wife; he therefore left her and went home, after he had slain thirty Philistines at Ashkelon, and given their garments, as his forfeit, to the guests, ver. 19.

Some time after, when his anger cooled, he returned to visit his wife, with a present of a kid, but found her married to his friend, who had been his brideman at the wedding. Fired at this insult, and rejecting her father’s offer of his youngest daughter in her stead, he considered himself as fully warranted in revenging it upon the Philistines in general; and he employed the singular stratagem of collecting three hundred foxes (or jackals †, which abound in that country), tying them by their

* The days of courtship, from proposal to marriage, were a month. See the cases of Jacob, Gen. xxix. 21, and David, 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

† The original term שׂוּעַל is nearly the same as Sciagal, or Sciugal, the Persian names for the jackal, which is evidently formed from thence. This creature is between a wolf and a fox, and according to Beton, Sandys, Shaw, Morison, &c. so abounds in Palestine, particularly about Cæsarea, that sometimes troops of two or three hundred tails together, in pairs, so that by pulling against each other, they might not run into their holes, (Matt. viii. 20,) and then putting a fire-brand between the tails of every pair, he set the brands on fire, and turned them into the standing corn of the Philistines, which they burnt with fire, and also the shocks of corn, with the vineyards and olives, doing them great damage.

To appease Sampson, it should seem, the Philistines went up and burnt his wife and her father with fire, for the insult they had offered him, which provoked this hostility on his part against the nation; thus punishing them for that breach of faith, to which they were first led through fear of that very punishment! But this did not yet content Sampson: for "he smote them hip and thigh," or "heaps upon heaps," xv. 16, with a great slaughter: and after he had satisfied his vengeance, went and dwelt in the top of the strong rock Etam, in the tribe of Simeon, 1 Chron. iv. 32.

of them are to be seen, differing in this respect from the common fox, which is not gregarious. Hasselquist calls it the little eastern fox, and Kempfer thinks that it might not improperly be called the wolf-fox. Several places in Palestine were denominated from thence, as "the land of Shual," or the fox, 1 Sam. xiii. 17; Hazar Shual, "the fox's habitation," a city of Judah or Simeon, Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3. They are a bold ravenous animal, not afraid of a man, though not inclined to attack him, unless at a great disadvantage. Governor Hastings observes of them, in the East, that "he has known frequent instances of their attacking and devouring drunken men, whom they have found lying on the road, and heard that they will do the same by men that are sick and helpless, though they will not venture to touch a sleeping person (excepting infants) not affected by drunkenness or infirmity. He has seen many graves that have been opened by the jackals, and parts of the bodies pulled out by them,"—in a letter to Mr. Merrick.

Ovid mentions an annual custom observed at Rome, at the feast of the vulpinalia, in spring, in which they let go, in the circus, foxes with fire-brands tied to their tails, of which he inquires the origin:

Cur igitur missæ, junctis ardentia tædis
Terga ferant vulpes, causa docenda mihi. Fasti, Lib. IV. 681.

And prefixed to Leland's Collectanea, after p. lxx. is a copper-plate, representing a brick of the Roman make, found twenty-eight feet below a pavement, in London, about the year 1675, on which is exhibited, in basso relievo, the figure of a man driving into a field of corn two foxes with fire fastened to their tails.

This institution among the Romans was probably borrowed from the Phœnicians, who might have perpetuated the memory of Sampson's stratagem by one of a similar kind.

For further particulars of the jackal, see a curious and learned note on Psalm lxxiii. 10. "They shall fall by the sword, they shall be a portion for foxes,"—in Merrick's Annotations on the Psalms, p. 124, from whence this is principally extracted. See also Cruden's Concordance, Art. Fox.

The Philistines then came in force into the territory of Judah, near Etam, to demand that Sampson should be delivered up to them bound. And he consenting thereto, the men of Judah delivered him up to the Philistines, who shouted for joy on getting him into their power. But the Spirit of THE LORD came mightily upon him, and he brake the cords with which he was bound, as easily as flax burnt with fire; and with a fresh jaw bone of an ass, which he found there, he slew a thousand of the Philistines; thus fulfilling the prophecy of Moses, Levit. xxvi. 8, and that of Joshua, xxiii. 10, whence he called that place Ramath Lehi, “the lifting up of the jaw bone.” To quench his thirst, on Sampson’s prayer, “THE LORD clave a hollow place which was in *Lehi, and water issued from it; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived: wherefore he called its name En hakore, “the well of the caller [upon God] which is in Lehi unto this day,” Judges xv. 1—19.

The next exploit of Sampson was at Gaza, a city of the Philistines, who had recovered it, with Askelon and Ekron, from the tribe of Judah, Judges i. 18. There, blinded by that passion which hath cast down many, wounded; yea, hath slain many strong men, and himself at last; he exposed his life to the un-circumcised, wantonly and criminally, by visiting a harlot of the town; who probably betrayed his coming to the Philistines. The inhabitants, therefore, shut the gates to confine him, and stationed a guard there, waiting to surprise and kill him in the morning. But Sampson anticipated their plan, and rose at midnight, went to the gate boldly, and carried off the doors of it, with the posts, and bar, and all, upon his shoulders, to the top of a hill leading to Hebron. The guards probably being so astonished and panic struck, that they dared not oppose or pursue him, xvi. 1—3.

Not venturing any longer to indulge his ruling passion abroad, at such a risk, “he loved a woman” at home, in the valley of Sorek, and land of Judah, famous for its grapes, or vines; who probably was a Jewess, and a harlot, though Josephus thinks she was a Philistine; but her profession, which he records, was sufficient to render her mercenary.

* From a fondness for multiplying miracles, it should seem, several of the ancient versions, followed by the English translation, understand Lehi here, to denote “the jaw bone of the ass,” rather than “the place” so called; at variance with the sequel. The marginal rendering Lehi, is correct.

This treacherous Dalilah was tempted with the offer of eleven hundred pieces of silver, (or shekels * probably,) from each of the five lords of the Philistines, to discover the secret of his great strength, and to betray him into their hands, that they might bind him and afflict him.

After three unsuccessful attempts to draw the fatal secret from him, she worried him so with her daily reproaches and importunities, that "his soul was vexed to death, and he told her all his heart," or the whole truth; that he was a Nazarite from his mother's womb; and that if his hair was shaven, then he should lose his extraordinary strength. Accordingly she sent for the lords of the Philistines, "who came readily with the money in their hand," made him sleep upon her lap, and got a man to shave off the seven locks or tresses of his hair, and delivered him up to the Philistines; who put out his eyes, thus punishing him in the offending part, "the lust of the eye †," took him down to Gaza, and made him grind in the prison house, xvi. 4—21.

Sampson's strength, therefore, was evidently miraculous, and was withdrawn when THE LORD forsook him for his vices. But along with his repentance in adversity, and the growing of his hair, God was pleased to restore his strength.

At this juncture Sampson was brought forth from prison, on a day of public rejoicing and thanksgiving, by the lords of the Philistines, to the house or temple of Dagon, their god, or rather goddess, who was represented under the form of a mermaid, with a woman's head, body and hands, but a fish's tail ‡. Compare I Sam. v. 4.

And when the people saw him they praised their god, for they said, Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy, and the destroyer of our country, who slew many of us. And he made them sport, or they mocked and insulted him. Wearied at length, he applied to the lad that led and held him by the hand, to let him lean, or rest himself upon the two central

* The silver shekel was worth about two shillings and sixpence, or half-a-crown; therefore 5500 shekels amounted to £577 10s. a considerable bribe.

† Might not OUR LORD have alluded to this? Matt. v. 29.

‡ Dag signifies a "fish," and as fishes are remarkable for their fecundity, this idol might have originally denoted the prolific powers of nature. She was, therefore, the Palestine Venus, and the prototype of the Venus αναδυομενη of the Greeks, "rising out of the sea." Horace perhaps alludes to this idol:

————— turpiter atrum pillars which supported the roof of the temple, upon which three thousand men and women were collected to see the spectacle, and celebrate the sacrifice to Dagon. But the Lord, to punish their impious rejoicing in their god, converted it into a day of mourning and destruction to themselves and their god: for he endued Sampson, who had prayed to Him for vengeance, with such prodigious strength, that he bowed himself with all his might, broke the pillars, and pulled down the house upon himself and upon all the people assembled therein; and so slew more at his death than all that he had slain in his life; and delivered his country, for this time, from the Philistine yoke, xvi. 22—30.

This stupendous judgment was inflicted before Sampson's hair was fully grown; for it is evident from the context, that the sacrifice to Dagon was soon after his capture. The superstition of the lords, and the impatience of the people, both wishing to signalize their zeal for their god, would not certainly have admitted of a long delay, in that small state, when the nation could be so speedily assembled together.

It is remarkable, that the exploits of Sampson against the Philistines, were performed singly, and without any co-operation from his countrymen to vindicate their liberties. Whether it was that the arm of the Lord might be more visibly revealed in him, or that his countrymen were too much depressed by the severity of their servitude, to be animated by his example. They seem also to have feared him almost as much as they did the Philistines. Else why should three thousand men of Judah have gone to persuade him to surrender himself to the Philistines, when, with such a leader, they might naturally expect to have been invincible? or why, when he destroyed a thousand Philistines with so simple a weapon, did they not join in the pursuit of the rest? So true was the prediction of the Angel to his mother, that he should only begin to deliver Israel.

The case of Sampson furnishes also an instructive and awful example, that extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, are not always accompanied with corresponding graces, or fruits of the Spirit. Manoah and his wife appear to have been a pious couple, and likely to train up their son in the way that he should go, betimes, in the fear and nurture of the Lord. But so early as twenty years of age, against his parents' wishes and remonstrances, he seeks a wife among the uncircumcised, (as he himself contemptuously styled the Philistines) and after his disappointment in her, he spent the rest of his life in the company of strange and lewd women, which must have been a great grief of mind to his parents and friends, who, from their solicitude to inter his dead body, could not have been inattentive to, nor unconcerned at, his conduct when living. But he was stubborn and self-willed, and vain of his prodigious strength, infinitely surpassing any of the Philistine giants, or sons of Anak, Josh. xi. 22, who prided themselves on their strength and stature, 1 Sam. xvii. 4, &c.

Sampson died without issue; no notice, at least, is taken of any in Scripture. God, perhaps, thus punishing his incontinence in kind.

ELI.

He succeeded Sampson as judge, according to the judicious arrangement of Josephus, Ant. v. 9, 1. He was also the first high-priest of the line of Ithamar, the younger son of Aaron, that office having continued in the line of Eleazar, Phineas, and their successors, Abishuah, Bukki, and Uzzi, 1 Chron. vi. 4—6, when it was transferred to Eli, and continued in his family till Abiathar, who was deposed by Solomon for supporting Adonijah's pretensions to the throne, and Zadok, of Eleazar's line, appointed in his stead, 1 Kings ii. 22, Ant. v. 11, 5, as foretold to Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 35.

Eli was fifty-eight years of age when he began his administration, 1 Sam. iv. 15—18. In the course of it, Hannah, the wife of Elkanah, a Levite, of the family of Kohath, 1 Chron. vi. 22, 23, who lived at *Ramah, in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 1—19, not having children, was insulted thereupon, and fretted by another wife of Elkanah, who was fruitful, and in her affliction prayed to the Lord that he would grant her a son; and vowed that if her petition was heard, she would dedicate him as a Nazarite to the Lord all the days of his life, i. 6—11 †.

And the Lord granted her petition, and she bare a son, and

* At Ramah was a school of the prophets, called Ramathaim Tsophim, 1 Sam. i. 1, whence Elkanah is called by the Chaldee paraphrast, "a man of Ramatha, a disciple of the prophets." From the Hebrew Tsophim, was probably derived the Greek, Σοφοι, "wise men."

called his name Samuel, signifying, “heard,” or “given of God*.”

On this joyful occasion, she composed the following Hymn of Praise to THE LORD :—

HANNAH'S THANKSGIVING.

- II. 1. My heart rejoiceth in THE LORD,
My horn is exalted in THE LORD,
My mouth is enlarged over mine enemies,
Because I rejoice in thy salvation.
2. There is none holy as THE LORD,
There is none beside Thee,
There is no rock like OUR GOD.
3. Boast not yourselves, talk not exceeding proudly,
Let not arrogancy come out of your mouth,
For the Lord is a God of knowledge,
And by Him actions are weighed.
4. The bows of the mighty are broken,
And the tottering are girt with strength.
5. They that were full, hire themselves for bread,
And they that were hungry, cease,
So that the barren hath borne seven,
And she that abounded in children is enfeebled.
6. The Lord killeth, and maketh alive,
He bringeth down to Hades, and lifteth up.
7. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich,
He bringeth low, and lifteth up.
8. He raiseth the poor from the dust,
And exalteth the beggar from the dunghill,
To make them sit among princes,
And make them inherit the throne of glory.
For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's,
And He hath placed the world upon them.
9. He will keep the feet of his saints,
But the wicked shall be silent in darkness,
For by strength shall no man prevail.
10. The adversaries of the Lord shall be crushed,
Out of heaven shall he thunder upon them.
THE LORD shall judge the ends of the earth,
He shall give strength unto his KING,
And exalt the horn of his MESSIAH.

This admirable Hymn excels in simplicity of composition, closeness of connection, and uniformity of sentiment; breathing the pious effusions of a devout mind, deeply impressed with a conviction of God's mercies to herself in particular, and of his providential government of the world in general; exalting the poor in spirit, or the humble-minded, and abasing the rich and the arrogant, rewarding the righteous, and punishing the wicked.

Hannah was also a prophetess of the first class. Besides predicting her own fruitfulness, verse 7, (for she bore six children in all, ii. 21,) she foretold not only the more immediate judgments of God upon the Philistines, during her son's administration, vii. 10, but his remoter judgments, "upon the ends of the earth," verse 10, in the true spirit of the prophecies of Jacob, Balaam, and Moses. Like them, she describes the promised Saviour of the world, as a KING, before there was any king in Israel; and she first applied to him the remarkable epithet MESSIAH in Hebrew, CHRIST in Greek, and ANOINTED in English, which was adopted by David, Nathan, Ethan, Isaiah, Daniel, and the succeeding prophets of the Old Testament, and by the Apostles and inspired writers of the New. And the allusion thereto by Zachariah, the father of the Baptist, in his Hymn, Luke i. 69, where he calls CHRIST, "a horn of salvation;" and the beautiful imitation of it by the Blessed Virgin throughout in her Hymn, Luke i. 46—55, furnishing the finest commentary thereon, clearly prove, that Hannah, in her rejoicing, had respect to something higher than Peninah, her rival, or to the triumphs of Samuel, or even of David himself. The expressions are too magnificent and sublime to be confined to such objects. Indeed, the learned Rabbi, David Kimchi, was so struck with them, that he ingenuously confessed, that "the king, of whom Hannah speaks, is the MESSIAH; of whom she spake either by prophecy or tradition;" "for," continues he, "there was a tradition among the Israelites, that a great king should arise in Israel; and she seals up her song with celebrating this king, who was to deliver them from all their enemies." The tradition, as we have seen, was founded principally on Balaam's second and third prophecies, Numb. xxiv. 7—17; and we cannot but admire that gracious dispensation of spiritual gifts to Hannah, (whose name signifies grace) in ranking her among the prophets, who should first unfold a leading title of the blessed Seed of the woman.

SAMUEL.

The date of Samuel's birth, though not noticed in his book, is fortunately ascertained by the remark of Josephus, that Samuel, at the time of his prophetic call, was twelve years complete* ; but his call was 450 years after the first division of the conquered lands, Acts xiii. 20, and, therefore, happened in the thirty-first year of Eli's administration, and, consequently, his birth in the nineteenth year of it. He died about two years before Saul, and therefore lived about ninety-two years.

So early a call to the prophetic office is remarkable, but was not singular. Jeremiah was called about the same age, i. 6. In this respect, also, Samuel was a type of CHRIST, who visited the temple when he was twelve years old, Luke ii. 42, and called it, "HIS FATHER'S house," asserting his own divinity, Luke ii. 49.

The call of Samuel is prefaced with a remark, that "THE ORACLE OF THE LORD was precious [or scarce] in those days; there was no open vision," or manifestation of his presence, since that recorded to Manoah and his wife, seventy years before, 2 Sam. iii. 1. And the personification of THE ORACLE in this case is express; for "THE LORD came, and stood, and called, the third time, Samuel, Samuel," iii. 10, and denounced the destruction of Eli's house, for the iniquity of his sons, and of himself, "because he restrained them not," iii. 13, or only rebuked them mildly, when he should have punished them severely, for causing the people to abhor the offering of the Lord, by their rapacity in seizing their own share first, and in making the Lord's people to transgress, by their shameless fornications, ii. 12—25.

Eli, who appears to have been a religious man himself, but of too easy a disposition for a judge, or a "watcher appointed over the house of Israel," to warn and punish the wicked, under the awful responsibility of having their blood required at his hand, even though they die in their own sins, Ezek. iii. 17—21, bore the sentence of THE LORD with meekness and resignation: "It is THE LORD himself; let him do what is good in his eyes," iii. 18. Indeed, the sacred historian had offered some extenuation of his offence, by stating that Eli was very old when he heard of all his sons' doings : he was then eighty-eight years old.

* Σαμουηλ δε πεπληρωκως ετος ηδη δωδεκατον, προεφητευε. Ant. V. 10, 4.

THE ARK TAKEN.

Ten years after, the threatened judgments began to be inflicted upon Eli's family, during which interval "THE LORD appeared again in Shiloh, and revealed himself to Samuel by the ORACLE OF THE LORD ;" and all Israel, from Dan even to Beersheba, knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord, iii. 19—21.

Without consulting the Lord, the Israelites rashly embarked in a war with the Philistines, who, in the forty years since Sampson's death, had recruited their strength ; and when the Israelites were defeated in the first engagement, with the loss of 4000 men, they presumptuously sent for the ark of the covenant into the camp, to fight under its protection ; but GOD forsook them ; and though the Philistines were alarmed at the coming of the ark, the sacred symbol of the mighty God, that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues, yet they encouraged themselves to fight manfully, to avoid slavery, and slew 30,000 men of Israel, and the priests Hophni and Phineas, " in the flower of their age," as predicted, ii. 33, and took the ark of God. On the news of these accumulated disasters, Eli, whose heart trembled for the ark of God, which he had not the spirit or the power to prevent the sacrilegious profanation of, and who sat watching by the way-side, fell down backwards, and broke his neck, and died, when he was ninety-eight years old, and had judged Israel forty years, iv. 1—18.

When the Philistines had taken the ark of God, they brought it into the house of Dagon, their chief god, and set it beside Dagon, at Ashdod, or Azotus, their capital city, as the proudest trophy of their victory ; and perhaps also to conciliate " the mighty God of Israel," by thus associating him with their own god. But " what fellowship hath CHRIST with Belial ?" He overthrew their idol twice, to prove his own superiority and disdain of such base alliance ; and also to convince them, that the Israelites were defeated not through his want of power to save, but through their own wickedness, which rendered them unworthy of his protection. To punish the Philistines also for their idolatry, and their fornications connected therewith, he smote them with hemorrhoids, or ulcers in their secret parts, with a deadly destruction; and also with a plague of mice that marred the land, and compelled them to appease his wrath, and “give glory to the GOD OF ISRAEL,” by trespass-offerings, expressive of their plagues; and to send away the ark, after it had been seven months in their land; while He demonstrated that it was He himself who inflicted their plagues, by guiding the milch kine, who drew the cart on which the ark was laid, with the offerings in a coffer beside it, to quit their calves, and take the road straight to the land of Israel, and stop at Bethshemesh, in the tribe of Judah, Josh. xv. 10, and a city of the priests, Josh. xxi. 16, 1 Sam. iv. 1—12, v. 1—18.

The men of Bethshemesh also, for presuming to look into the ark, were smitten with a great slaughter of 5070 men*, which made them send to the neighbouring town of Kiriath-jearim, in the tribe of Judah, on the confines of the tribe of Benjamin, nine miles distant from Jerusalem, in the hill-country, “to come and fetch it up,” which they did, and brought it to the house of Abinadab, in the hill, who consecrated Aminadab, his son, to take care of it. There it abode twenty years, vii. 1, 2.

N.B. In this term we have included the sojournment of the ark among the Philistines for seven months, which Josephus reduces to four months. Ant. VI. 1, 4.

SAMUEL JUDGE.

At length, when “all the house of Israel lamented after the LORD,” or repented, during their servitude, and were disposed to return to their allegiance, by Samuel’s direction they put away their strange gods, and served THE LORD only, and held a solemn fast and humiliation for their sins, and “poured out water before THE LORD,” as expressive of their grief, 1 Sam. i. 15, Lam. ii. 19, or of their despondency, 2 Sam. xiv. 14; and being now elected judge, he interceded earnestly, and “cried unto THE LORD to save Israel” from the Philistines, who hearing of this convention at Mizpeh of Benjamin, were preparing to fight against them. “And THE LORD heard him, and thundered with a great thunder on the day of battle upon the

* This is the reading of the Syriac and Arabic versions; the present Masorete text, 50,070, is enormous; and that of Josephus, only 70, does not correspond with “a great slaughter.”

Philistines, and discomfited" and subdued them all the days of Samuel's administration, vii. 2—13.

This excellent judge, so powerful with God, administered justice regularly, in his annual circuit which he took through the land to Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpeh, [of Gilead,] and at his residence at Ramah, where he built an altar unto THE LORD; probably by the divine direction or permission at least for the present, GOD not yet having made any declaration where he would have the ark to be fixed. It continued, therefore, at Kiriath-jearim, until the tenth year of David's reign, for eighty-two years, when it was brought into the tabernacle which he had prepared for it in the city of David, 2 Sam. vi. 1—17. The tabernacle of the Lord, and the altar which Moses made, still remained at Shiloh, after the capture of the ark, until Saul's reign, when they were removed to Nob, in the tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. xxi. 1, probably on account of the destruction of Shiloh in the Philistine war, 1 Sam. xiv. 3, Jer. vii. 12—14, and were removed again from thence on account of the massacre of the priests by Saul, and the destruction of that town, 1 Sam. xxii. 9—19, to Gibeon, where it continued till Solomon's reign, 1 Chron. xxi. 29, 2 Chron. i. 3.

THE PEOPLE REQUIRE A KING.

The administration of Samuel as sole judge lasted twelve years, as we learn from Josephus, Antiq. VI. 13, 5, though he is mistaken in supposing that it commenced at the death of Eli, whereas it commenced at the end of the Philistine servitude of twenty years that ensued. Near the close of it, when he was growing old *, viii. 1, and grey-headed, xii. 2, he made his sons Joel and Abiah deputy judges in Beersheba, for the accommodation of the southern district. But they walked not in his ways; they turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment.

This misconduct of his sons, and his own age, furnished "all the elders of Israel," or the heads of the congregation, with a pretext for a change in the form of government, from judicial to regal, which they thus proposed to Samuel.

* The original כָּאִשְׁרֵי זֶקֶן, is well rendered, "Cum senesceret," by Houbigant; for Samuel, at the end of his administration, was sixty-four years old. This character of his age corresponds with the present rectification of the Chronology of this period, better than with the Bible Chronology of fifty-nine years.

“Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways, now make us a king to judge us like all the nations.” But the true reason of this application, as he afterwards declared, was their apprehension of an invasion from Nahash, king of Ammon. They wanted a younger and more warlike leader than Samuel to oppose him, forgetting his intercession for them, and forgetting the arm of the Lord, so visibly exerted for them in subduing the Philistines, xii. 12. And their application was so understood by THE LORD, when He granted it, and “gave them a king in his anger:” “They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected ME, that I should not reign over them,” by thus shewing their distrust of the divine protection, viii. 6—8. And when Samuel, by the LORD’S desire, solemnly protested against their rebellious request, and forewarned them of the severe services and requisitions they and their children, and their substance, would be exposed to, from a king, instead of the mild and gentle service of THE LORD, “the people,” joining with their elders, said, “Nay, but we will have a king [to reign] over us, that we also may be like the nations, and that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles,” viii. 9—22. Thus relinquishing the glorious singularity of their government, the theocracy, under which they had hitherto “dwelt alone,” or detached from the Gentile nations; and shewing what sort of a king they wanted; not a civil judge, like Samuel, but a military captain, rejecting “THE CAPTAIN OF THE LORD’S HOST,” who had led them from the days of Joshua. After which, Samuel dismissed the people to their own cities, or dissolved the assembly.

About this time, probably, to chastise the people for their perverseness, and their rejection of THE LORD, thus wilfully and deliberately, they were again reduced under servitude by the Philistines. This may be collected from THE LORD’S private communication to Samuel the day before Saul came to enquire after his father’s asses which had strayed. “To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hand of the Philistines, for I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me,” ix. 16; and mention is made, shortly after, of “a garrison of the Philistines,” x. 5; another at Geba, xiii. 3; and another at Micmash, xiii. 23.

Samuel's spirited justification of his conduct before all Israel is an admirable composition. He first challenges them to adduce any instance of oppression, fraud, or bribery, on his part, while he judged Israel; that he and his sons both stood before the tribunal of the public, ready to await their sentence; and when the people expressly acknowledged his integrity, he then reminded them of the servitudes they had incurred for forgetting or forsaking God; and the deliverers, whom God, on their repentance, occasionally raised up to them, such as Jerubbaal, or Gideon, [Bedan] Barak *, Jephthah, and [Samuel] Samson †. And he concluded by threatening them with the divine chastisements upon them and their king, whom the Lord had granted to them, if they should rebel any more against him; and to mark the divine displeasure at their proceedings, and also his own power with God, he called down thunder and rain from heaven at the unusual season of wheat harvest. “And when all the people greatly feared THE LORD, and Samuel,” his prophet, and besought him to intercede for them, that their lives might be spared, he kindly encouraged them to trust in the Lord, notwithstanding this additional crime of asking a king; and he still assured them of his intercession in their behalf, and of his services as their civil judge and teacher, for that the omission would be a sin on his own part:—“Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against THE LORD in ceasing to pray for you; but I will teach you still ‡ the good and the right way. Only fear the Lord, and consider what great things He hath done for you; but if ye shall do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king,” xii. 1—25.

This illustrious prophet, like his predecessor Moses, was mighty to intercede for his backsliding people, and has placed the duty of public intercession on its firmest basis, the sin incurred by neglecting it on the part of the ministers of religion, and of the guardians of the state.

* בַּרַק, Barak, nearly resembles בְּדָן, Bedan, whose name is not found among the Judges, and was the reading of the Sept. Syr. and Ar. versions.

† שַׁמְשׁוֹן, Samson, resembles שְׁמוּאֵל, in three of its letters, and was the reading of the Syr. and Ar. and of Heb. xi. 32, and is confirmed by the indelicacy of Samuel's praising himself.

‡ And Samuel judged Israel [in a religious and civil capacity] all the days of his life, 1 Sam. vii. 15, while Saul acted in a military capacity. The people were summoned “to go forth after Saul and after Samuel” conjointly, 1 Sam. xi. 7.

And when the measure of the iniquities of the Jews came to the full, shortly before the Babylonish captivity, THE LORD declared by Jeremiah, "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet should not my mind be towards this people: cast them out of my sight, and let them go forth!" Jer. xv. 1.

The reigns of Saul, David, and Solomon, were forty years each, Acts xiii. 21, 2 Sam. v. 4, 1 Kings xi. 42, which determines the length of the period. But the dates of the detail are not noticed in Scripture. They may, however, be collected from incidental circumstances, and from the series of the events, to a considerable degree of exactness, not differing, perhaps, above a year, more or less, from the truth.

SAUL.

The first king granted by THE LORD to the importunity of the people, is described as a choice young man, of a goodly person, and taller by the head and shoulders than any of the people, ix. 2, qualifications likely to engage their admiration and respect, x. 24. He was a Benjamite, “of the smallest of the tribes of Israel, and his family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin,” as he declared to Samuel, modestly stating his own insufficiency for the office to which he was called, ix. 21, xv. 17. And when the lot fell on him, he had actually hid himself to avoid being made king, x. 17—24. He was first proclaimed by the people; and about a month after, when he had defeated the Ammonites, “the kingdom was solemnly renewed,” or confirmed to him, by all the people before the Lord at Gilgal, xi. 1—15.

The smallness of the tribe of Benjamin, which had not yet recovered from the civil war, in which they had been nearly destroyed, and the insignificance of Saul's family in that tribe, might tend to compose the jealousies and rivalry of the two most powerful tribes of Ephraim and Judah, which all along were disposed to “envy and vex each other,” Isa. xi. 13, had the first king been elected from either. And it is not unlikely, that “the men of Belial,” or factious persons, who despised Saul, as too inconsiderable to save the state, were of the breed of those haughty and turbulent Ephraimites, who chid Gideon so sharply, and threatened to destroy Jephthah, representing his people as “fugitives from Ephraim.”

Saul therefore took no notice of their insults, but wisely “held his peace,” x. 27, and Samuel afterwards interposed to save their lives, when the people wanted to put them to death, not only as an ungracious act, on “a day” of victory, when “God wrought salvation in Israel,” but through policy, not to provoke the spirit of disaffection among the leading tribes, xi. 12, 13.

Saul's age, at the time of his election, seems to have been dropped from the original, xiii. 1, which, literally rendered, is "Saul, a son of a year *," (not "Saul reigned one year," as in the English Bible.) Vignoles reckons that he was then forty years old †, Chronol. Tom. I. p. 152, and certainly he could not have been much less; for, in the second year of his reign, Jonathan, his eldest son, had a separate military command, and smote the Philistine garrison in Geba, xiii. 2, 3; and the youngest of four of his sons, Ishbosheth, who succeeded him for a while, was born in the first year of his reign, 2 Sam. ii. 10.

It is worthy of observation, that "the Spirit of THE LORD, which came upon Saul, and turned him into another man," as foretold by Samuel, x. 6, by no means interfered with his free will, or free agency; he was still free "to act as occasion should serve," or require, x. 7; and accordingly, when his uncle wanted him to tell what the prophet had said unto him, he mentioned the finding of the asses, but "of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spoke, he told him not," x. 16. He followed the dictates of his own prudence on this occasion, as afterwards, in "holding his peace," when insulted by the seditious. But he was still at liberty to "grieve the Spirit," and even to "quench the Spirit," and to be possessed, on the contrary, with an evil spirit from THE LORD, when he lost that modesty and humility which first recommended him, and became envious, jealous, cruel, and tyrannical.

SAUL'S FIRST OFFENCE.

His first offence was an infringement of the directions and functions of his coadjutor Samuel, who had treated him all along with so much kindness, hospitality, and distinction, superior to envy, ix. 18—24, and to encourage him, gave him some remarkable signs, which accordingly came to pass, x. 1—13.

In the second year of his reign, and beginning of his long and "sore warfare with the Philistines, which lasted all his life," at intervals, xiv. 52, Samuel had appointed to meet him at Gilgal, in the course of seven days, to offer burnt offerings, and sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings, and to shew him what he should do, both to propitiate THE LORD, (as formerly, vi. 9,) and to advise Saul how to act in carrying on the war, x. 8. But when Samuel came not within the time appointed, (on purpose, perhaps, to prove his faith and patience,) and that the people were scattered from him for fear of the Philistines, Saul ordered the burnt-offerings and sacrifices to be brought unto him, and offered the *burnt-offering by his sole authority, not waiting any longer for Samuel, xiii. 8—10.

* Thus Joseph was "a son of seventeen years," or "seventeen years old," Gen. xxxvii. 2.

† Origen, in his Hexapla, inserts "thirty," (ὄλιος τριακοντα ετων Σαουλ.)

Before he had time to offer the peace-offering, of which he had rendered himself unworthy, Samuel came, and rebuked him for “acting foolishly,” and forewarned him that his kingdom should not continue, or remain in his family, for that THE LORD would seek † him a man after his own heart, or who should faithfully do all his will, as king or captain over his people. Compare 1 Sam. ii. 35.

He then left Saul to himself to prosecute the war by his own counsel, in which he had so inauspiciously embarked, “and Samuel arose and departed from Gilgal. [And the remnant of the people went up after Saul to meet the enemy, going from Gilgal] to Gibeah of Benjamin; and Saul numbered the people that were with him, about 600 men,” xiii. 15.

The Septuagint version has happily restored a chasm in the Masorete text (here inserted between brackets), which is supported by the Vulgate, and established by the context; for Samuel went home to Ramah, xv. 34, and Saul proceeded with his 600 men, towards the Philistines, to Gibeah of Benjamin, where he occupied a strong post at the foot of the celebrated rock Rimmon (signifying “a pomegranate-tree”), Judg. xx. 47, over against Micmash of Ephraim, northwards, where the Philistines had a garrison, and an encampment, xiii. 5—16; xiv. 1—5.

On the first invasion of the Philistines, with a prodigious host, some of the Israelites had hid themselves in caves and thickets, and rocks, and high places, and pits, while others fled over Jordan, into the land of Gad, and Gilead, or Manasseh; and the Philistines sent out, from their camp at Micmash, three companies of spoilers, throughout the land west of Jordan, and disarmed the rest of the inhabitants, all except Saul and Jonathan's party, and killed or removed all the smiths that were left, so that no more weapons could be made. And during this invasion, the people were compelled to go to the Philistines, or to their garrisons, to sharpen their instruments of husbandry, which proves that it must have lasted two or three years, but probably not more, as may be inferred from the sameness of Saul's force of 600 men, at the time of the miraculous defeat of the Philistines by Jonathan and his armour-bearer, assisted by a panic terror and a great earthquake, when Saul and his party, and the fugitive Israelites, and the *Hebrews, joining in the pursuit, completed that destruction which they had begun by slaying each other, xiv. 6—23.

* Saul did not offer the sacrifices himself, he only directed the priests to do so. Thus David acted, 2 Sam. vi. 13, and Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 2—4.

† The Septuagint judiciously renders, “THE LORD will seek,” &c. (ζητησει) for David, who was meant, was not yet born.

GOD gave the glory of this victory to Jonathan for his faith or trust in the divine protection. "Come, said he to his armour-bearer, and let us go over [across the valley] to the garrison of these uncircumcised: it may be that THE LORD will work for us, for there is no restraint to THE LORD to save by many or by few."

Saul's conduct on this memorable day, in which THE LORD fought for Israel, was rash and impolitic in the extreme. Instead of trusting in THE LORD to avenge him of his enemies, like his pious son Jonathan, he cursed any of the people who would eat food until the evening, that nothing might interrupt the slaughter, but he troubled the land thereby, for the people grew faint, and unable to pursue the enemy; and in their hunger, he forced them to transgress, by eating ravenously of the cattle they had taken with the blood; and he would have put Jonathan to death for inadvertently incurring the curse, had not the people rescued him, or reversed his father's sentence, because "he wrought with GOD that day." Still Saul was not deserted by THE LORD, for He answered his enquiries by the high priest, respecting the breach of his rash vow, by directing the lot to fall upon Jonathan.

"So Saul took the kingdom over Israel," or recovered it from the Philistines, xiv. 47.

* The Hebrews were those renegade Israelites who had submitted quietly to the Philistine yoke, and lived among them, xiv. 21.

SAUL'S WARS.

These were various: he fought against all his enemies, on every side, whenever they attempted any invasion; namely, against Moab and the children of Ammon eastward, and against Edom southward; and against the kings of Zobah, or Syria, northward; and against the Philistines westward; and whithersoever he turned himself, he reved, or harassed, but did not subdue them, xiv. 47.

These several expeditions, at intervals, took up a space of five or six years, until the Amalekite war, about the tenth or eleventh year of his reign, when David was now born, as may be collected from xv. 28*, compared with xiii. 14. The Bible Chronology dates this war in the sixteenth year of Saul's reign, and the French of Chais in the twenty-first year. Both seem rather less consistent with the long time that followed Saul's offence in this war, until the anointing of David, about the twenty-fifth year of his reign, during the "long mourning of Samuel for Saul," xvi. 1. Samuel, who spoke as the Spirit gave him utterance, did not then know who was "the neighbour better than Saul, chosen to succeed him," until he was commissioned to anoint him as "the king provided by THE LORD among the sons of Jesse." And Saul's decisive victory over the Amalekites would naturally give him a long rest from his hostile neighbours all around, during this interval of fifteen years.

SAUL'S SECOND OFFENCE.

Saul had still an opportunity afforded him of recovering the favour of THE LORD, if he had fully executed his commission against the Amalekites, delivered by the prophet in the name of the Lord:

"Thus saith the Lord of Hosts: I remember what Amalek did to Israel; how he laid wait for him, in the way when he came up from Egypt. Now go smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass," xv. 1—3.

* This denunciation is judiciously rendered by the Septuagint: "THE LORD hath rent the kingdom from thee this day, and will give it ($\delta\omega\sigma\epsilon\iota$) to a neighbour of thine better than thou."

The severity of this sentence has given offence to infidels and false philanthropists, but without any just ground. The Amalekites had all along shewn the most determined and inveterate hostility towards the Israelites; they had waylaid them at first, after crossing the Red Sea, when they were so visibly under the divine protection and guidance, so that they were guilty of fighting against the LORD OF HOSTS himself, Deut. xxv. 18, and for which they were then doomed to destruction, and their sentence recorded by direction of THE LORD, Exod. xvii. 8—16. They afterwards defeated the Israelites when prematurely attacked, Numb. xiv. 42—45, and joined the Amorites against them, Judges iii. 13, and also the Midianites, Judges vi. 3, and had recently spoiled the Israelites, 1 Sam. xiv. 48; and to crown all, they were *sinner*s themselves, 1 Sam. xv. 18, and were not cut off “until their iniquity had come to the full,” as was the case of the devoted nations in general, Gen. xv. 16; and therefore after a respite of 548 years from the time that their sentence was first pronounced*, of which they could not be ignorant, and which they might have averted by repentance, like the Ninevites; they were therefore fit objects of the vengeance of the RIGHTEOUS JUDGE OF ALL THE EARTH, to be inflicted by the sword of the Israelites, the executioners of his decrees.

Saul therefore, when he spared Agag the king, and the best of the cattle, because “he feared the people and obeyed their voice,” was guilty of rebellion against the LORD, and stubbornness, or contumacy, in persisting a second time in his disobedience, and therefore the kingdom was justly rent from his family, as Samuel pronounced, from the significant act of Saul's rending the skirt of his mantle. And the sentence was now made absolute, and his successor actually appointed. Though still in the midst of judgment, God remembered mercy, and did not deprive Saul himself of the kingdom, when he confessed his sin, and besought Samuel to honour him before his people, and join him in worshipping the Lord.

Samuel probably “hewed Agag in pieces before THE LORD,” as a criminal whose “sword had made many childless;” as Saul offered burnt-offerings, not by himself, but by his officers. Neither his age nor his office were suitable to such an execution with his own hand, though it was practised by such a warrior as Gideon, Judges viii. 21.

* This affords an awful illustration of the Divine Government in general: that “present delay of punishment affords no presumption of final impunity,” Eccl. viii. 11. Butler's Analogy, p. 56.

After this, Samuel returned to his house at Ramah, and went no more to see Saul until the day of his death. Nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul; and THE LORD repented that he had made Saul king over *Israel, xv. 34, 35.

DAVID ANOINTED.

That Samuel still retained his authority as judge, notwithstanding his breach with Saul, is evident from the alarm his coming to Bethlehem, to anoint David as successor to the crown, excited in the elders; who “trembled” at his coming, for fear it should be in judgment, not “peaceably.”

This was a delicate commission, which if known, might provoke Saul to slay the prophet, as he apprehended; he therefore veiled it under the form of a public sacrifice, which he had a right to enjoin; and probably communicated his business to none but Jesse himself; when after the rejection of all the rest of his sons, David, the youngest son was chosen at length by the Lord, he anointed him, in the midst of his brethren, without David himself, who was then a boy about fifteen, knowing for what purpose he was anointed. This is the age assigned to him at the time by Calmet, and the most likely; Josephus reckons him only ten, which was too young to attend the sheep; Abarbanel and Le Clerc, twenty, and Lightfoot twenty-five; which are too old for the context. An interval of five years from thence, till he was of the military age of twenty, when he slew Goliath, critically corresponds with the gradual effect of the unction: “And the Spirit of the LORD came upon David from that day forward,” xvi. 1—13.

DAVID KILLS GOLIAH.

When the Philistines had recruited their strength in the course of sixteen years after their last overthrow at Micmash; and the children at that time had come to manhood, they renewed the war with Saul, and invaded the neighbouring territory of Judah. About this time, we may suppose, David, like another Sampson, and at the same age, slew the lion and the bear that had taken each a lamb from the flock which he attended at home, while his three eldest brothers followed Saul; and this encouraged him to offer himself for the deliverance of his country, to fight the gigantic champion of the Philistines, who had challenged the whole Israelite army to fight him, and renewed the challenge for forty days, without any of the Israelites daring to accept his challenge; so much were they daunted at his size, and his armour and weapons.

* This phrase cannot be understood rigorously: for “GOD is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent,” as Balaam had declared before, Numb. xxiii. 19; and Samuel repeated, xiv. 29, stating, that the Divine decrees are irreversible. It only signifies that he withdrew his grace from Saul, when he rendered himself unworthy of it.—Deus interdum mutat opus; nunquam voluntatem.

The zeal which David first evinced on this occasion, against this uncircumcised Philistine, who had defied the armies of the living God; his noble confidence before Saul, in the divine protection—"The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion and the paw of the bear, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine"; his rejection of the king's arms, as too cumbersome, and trusting solely to his shepherd's sling; his hasting and running to meet the Philistine, when advancing to the combat, whose curse in the name of his gods he had retorted, in the name of the LORD OF HOSTS, THE GOD of the armies of Israel; foretelling the destruction of the Philistine, and that he would cut off his head [with his own sword—for there was no sword in the hand of David,]—that all the world might know that there is a God in Israel; and that all the assembled hosts might know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear; for the victory is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hands;" altogether affords the finest illustration of the nature of that Spirit of THE LORD, by which David was then so fully actuated.

Accordingly, at the very first discharge of his sling, he hit the Philistine in the only vulnerable part that was not cased in armour, his forehead, and buried the stone in his brain; and then ran and cut off his head with his own sword, fulfilling his prediction, xvii. 1—51.

Saul, in his conversation with David, had omitted to ask whose son he was; but when he was going forth against the Philistine, he asked Abner; and when Abner could not tell, desired him to enquire whose son the stripling was? and afterwards learnt from David himself, when brought to him by Abner, with the head of the Philistine in his hand, that he was the son of Jesse the Bethlehemite, xvii. 55—58.

So Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house; and the valiant Jonathan contracted the "strongest friendship for him, and loved him as his own soul," and gave him presents that marked the highest consideration, for he "stripped himself of the robe that he wore, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and his bow, and his girdle," xviii. 1—3, nor did the knowledge of David's succession to the throne, in exclusion of himself, when he learned it afterwards, ever blunt or abate the ardour of his generous and disinterested affection for his younger friend, but not his rival, or interrupt their sacred covenant of friendship, xx. 12—17. Jonathan and David indeed, "were lovely in their lives, and in their death they were not divided"—if kindred souls be re-united beyond the grave!

Widely different were the sentiments of his father, whose envy was first excited by the higher praises of David; "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands;" and then his jealousy—"what can he have more, but the kingdom!" and he eyed David, from that day and forward, xviii. 6—9. And the Spirit of THE LORD departed from Saul, and an evil spirit troubled him, xvi. 14. This was an anticipation, which in the order of time should be introduced here; though in the order of events it naturally followed the growth of the Spirit of the Lord in David, after his unction, xvi. 13, as contrasted therewith.

When Saul's malady and his jealousy increased, it is probable that he either sent David home, or that David himself prudently retired from court; where he had behaved himself so wisely or discreetly, as to gain favour in the sight of Saul's servants, xviii. 5.

Some time after, Saul's servants, or officers of his household, proposed to him to get a skilful player on the harp, to soothe his malady, when the evil spirit from GOD should be upon him; and one of them recommended "the son of Jesse," not only as "skilful in playing, but also as a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in counsel, and a comely person, and that THE LORD was with him." Saul approving this, sent for David; and was refreshed by his musick, when he played before him on the harp, and, for a time, loved him greatly, and made him his armour bearer, xvi. 15—23.

But at length his jealousy returning, when the evil spirit from God came upon him, he prophesied in the midst of the house, or raved and roamed about; and while David was playing, as at other times, Saul cast his javelin at him, to smite him through, even to the wall, twice *, but David avoided out of his presence, xviii. 10, 11.

He then removed David from him; but still fearing him, because THE LORD was with David, and was departed from himself, he made him captain over a thousand, and set him over the men of war, xviii. 5—13.

In this public situation, “David behaved himself wisely in all his ways, and THE LORD was with him,” he therefore became extremely popular throughout the kingdom, for his attention to business: for “all Israel and Judah loved David, because he went and came in before them.” But the more his popularity increased, the more Saul feared him, xviii. 14—16.

DAVID'S MARRIAGE.

Wishing to destroy David rather by the hand of the Philistines, than by his own, Saul offered him his elder daughter, Merab, in marriage, on condition that “he should be valiant for him, and fight THE LORD'S battles.”—But he disappointed David, and married her to another. Finding, however, that his younger daughter, Michal, loved David, he promised her to him, requiring only as a dowry, the fore-skins of an hundred Philistines. Pleased to be the king's son-in-law, David brought double the number in full tale, before the days [of courtship] were expired, or within the month, xviii. 17—27.

The Bible chronology, with Usher, date this marriage the same year in which David slew Goliath. But this is evidently too soon. I have dated it five years after, in the thirty-fifth year of Saul's reign, and twenty-fifth of David's age, because that time seems to be requisite for the intervening events, and for the character of David, and his popularity to be established. In this year, Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, was born, 2 Sam. iv. 4. A circumstance to which Jonathan probably alluded, in his second covenant with David, soon after; “THE LORD be [witness] between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed, for ever,” xx. 42. The five remaining years of Saul's reign afford time sufficient for the succeeding transactions.

* Including another attempt afterwards, xix. 10.

MICHAL'S STRATAGEM.

After David's marriage, “Saul saw and knew, that the Lord was with David, and that Michal loved him:” and he was still the more afraid of David, and became his enemy more and more: especially when David “behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, in repelling the princes of the Philistines,” who had endeavoured to revenge his late aggression, and the indignity offered to them. Insomuch, that he proposed to Jonathan, his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David; but Jonathan nobly pleaded his cause, his public services, and his loyalty, and got Saul to swear, “As THE LORD liveth, he shall not be slain.” But when David came again into his presence, after a great defeat of the Philistines, and played as usual, he attempted a second time to slay him with his javelin; and then sent messengers to apprehend him, when he fled from his presence to his own house, who were deceived by Michal's stratagem of the Teraphim, or “image,” laid in the bed in his stead; while she let David down through a window, and he escaped to Samuel to Ramah, and told him all Saul's behaviour, xvi. 28—30, xviii. 1—18. Saul, in revenge, took away Michal, David's wife, and married her to another husband, xxv. 44. David afterwards recovered her, 2 Sam. iii. 14—16.

Hearing that David was with Samuel, Saul sent messengers to apprehend him; who, when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, or singing hymns, and Samuel presiding over them, became inspired, and prophesied; as did also a second, and a third party, sent by Saul, and at length, himself; when, filled with rage, and intending, probably, to destroy the venerable prophet also, for sheltering David; he also prophesied, before Samuel, in like manner, and lay in a trance or ecstasy, naked, or stript of his upper garment, all that day and night, xviii. 19—24.

On this occasion, David's succession to the crown was probably revealed to, and predicted by Saul. This may be collected from Jonathan's declaration, shortly after, to David: “Thou shalt be king over Israel, and I shall be next unto thee: and that also, my father Saul knoweth,” xxiii. 17; who hid nothing that he intended to do, great or small, from Jonathan, xx. 2. And Saul himself afterwards declared to David, “I know well, that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thy hand, [or family,]" xxiv. 20.

The folly and impiety of Saul in fighting against GOD, while he persisted in persecuting David; and his ingratitude to this faithful and loyal servant, after all his services, and after he had twice spared his life, when David had him in his power, Saul himself acknowledged: "Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil!" xxiv. 17; and again, "I have sinned! return, my son David, for I will no more injure thee, because my life was precious in thine eyes this day. Lo! I have played the fool, and have done foolishly," xxvi. 21.

Such obstinate infatuation on the part of Saul, savours of something more than common phrenzy or madness; it strongly resembles Pharaoh's case, after he had resisted all the means of grace, when THE LORD at length hardened his heart to his destruction. The evil spirit from THE LORD, which actuated Saul, also strongly resembles the demoniacal possessions of the NEW TESTAMENT, in the foregoing symptoms; for they likewise raved and prophesied on several occasions. And we may judge what manner of spirit Saul was of, when he cast a javelin to smite his most deservedly favourite son Jonathan, because he presumed to plead for David, and assert his innocence; "Wherefore shall he be slain? what hath he done?" xx. 30—34. And when he afterwards committed that sacrilegious massacre of Nob, and slew Ahimelech, the high-priest, and eighty-five priests of Eli's house, "now cut off," 1 Sam. ii. 33, and smote both men and women, children and sucklings, oxen, asses, and sheep of the city, with the edge of the sword; because Ahimelech, not knowing of Saul's hatred to David, enquired of the Lord for him, and gave him victuals, and the sword of Goliath, xxi. 1—9, xxii. 9—19. Thus shewing less respect to God and his priests, and less mercy to his subjects, than he had done to Agag and the Amalekites, his devoted enemies. Such complicated and enormous crimes, were indeed worthy of a "son of Belial," or "child of the Devil," (who was a liar and murderer from the beginning,) and only wanted the additional sin of witchcraft, as Samuel foretold, to complete his rebellion against God, in his last offence, 1 Sam. xv. 23.

THE DEATH OF SAMUEL.

This venerable prophet, after his miraculous deliverance from Saul's fury, died about two years before him, at the advanced age of ninety-two years, 1 Sam. xxv. 1. The precise time is not noticed in Scripture, but may be collected very nearly from the subsequent transactions.

Immediately after his death, David retired to the wilderness of Paran, where he spent half a year, or eight months, as appears from the declaration of Nabal's servants, speaking of the inoffensive behaviour of David's men, and their protection, as long as they were in their neighbourhood, xxv. 15, 16. When he married Abigail, and shortly after Ahinoam, upon the loss of his wife Michal, xxv. 39—44. He then spent a year and four months among the Philistines, during his first and second flight to Gath, xxvii. 7. Both these times amount to about two years. And it is evident, that the Philistine war was not long after Samuel's death, xxviii. 1—4. Accordingly, Chais, &c. from Lightfoot, Bedford, reduces it to two years: which might also have been the original reckoning of Josephus, Ant. VI. 14, 9, where the present reading, twenty-two years*, is utterly inconsistent with the history, and with Josephus elsewhere, assigning only twenty years to Saul's reign, Ant. X. 8, 4; and eighteen years to Samuel's joint administration with him, Ant. VI. 13, 5, VI. 14, 9.

David's conduct during this disastrous period, in which he was "hunted like a partridge in the mountains," by the implacable Saul, xxvi. 20, though praise-worthy in sparing his life, twice, yet in other respects was not free from censure. His marrying two wives, was an irregularity that Samuel, probably, would have prevented, had he been living; his flight to the Philistines twice, was a desperate measure, in which he did not ask counsel of THE LORD, as he might have done, and did against the machinations of Saul, xxiii. 9; but was instigated by "his own heart," or his apprehensions, xxvii. 1; from which he escaped the first time, only by counterfeiting madness or idiocy, xxi. 10—15; and the second, by abusing the confidence of the generous and unsuspecting Achish, with repeated acts of equivocation and hypocrisy, xxvii. 8—12, xxix. 8; and thereby he exposed himself to the dreadful dilemma of the destruction of himself and his family, if he refused to join the Philistines against Saul, in the fatal battle of Gilboa; or of turning traitor and rebel, and fighting against his king and country: had he not been providentially extricated by the jealousy of the Philistines, lest he should turn against them in the battle, in order to reconcile himself with his master, xxix. 1—7, as they had suffered before from “the Hebrews,” in the victory of Jonathan, 1 Sam. xiv. 21.

* Hudson, in his note on Ant. VI. 9, p. 276, (k), cites the Epiphonian version of Josephus,—Et regnavit Saul, vivente Samuele, 18 annis, et eo mortuo, 2 annis—and correcting from thence the present text, δύο και εικοσι, reads ετη δύο, [ὀμμου δε, ετη] εικοσι.—"18 and 2 years; twenty years in all."

SAUL'S LAST OFFENCE.

About the time of Samuel's death, in a lucid interval, perhaps, wishing to make some atonement for his crimes, Saul banished from the land all the diviners and wizards he could find, in obedience to the divine law, Deut. xviii. 10, 11. But on the renewal of the war by the Philistines, in his dismay, he consulted THE LORD, who answered him no more, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Abandoned by THE LORD, he now had recourse to the witch of Endor, not far from Gilboa, where his camp lay, by night, and in disguise, attended by two of his men, to evoke the spirit of Samuel, by divination or necromancy, in order to seek counsel from him in this dreadful emergency; contrary to the law, Levit. xx. 6.

His enquiry may thus be more closely rendered:

XXVIII. 8. “Divine for me, by אֹב, Aob, or Ob, [the spirit of divination,] and raise him for me, whom I shall name unto thee.”

9. And the woman said, Thou knowest what Saul hath done; how he hath cut off, הַאֹבֹת, Haoboth, [the diviners,] and הַיִּדְעָי, Haiedoni, [the wizards,] or prognosticators, out of the land: and now layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die?

10. And Saul sware unto her by THE LORD, saying, As the LORD liveth, there shall no harm befall thee for this thing.

11. Then said the woman, Whom shall I raise for thee? And he said, Raise me Samuel.

12. And the woman saw Samuel. And she cried with a loud voice and said unto Saul, Why hast thou deceived me? even thou art Saul!

13. And the king said unto her, Fear not: but what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw a god rising out of the earth. And he said unto her, What is his form? And she said, An old man rising, and he is clad with a mantle.

14. And Saul [also saw, and] knew that it was Samuel himself. And he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed [before Samuel.]

15. And Samuel said unto Saul, Why hast thou provoked me to raise me? And Saul said, I am sorely distressed, for the Philistines make war against me, and GOD is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by dreams, nor by prophets; therefore I called upon thee, to inform me what I shall do.

16. Then Samuel said, And why dost thou enquire of me, since THE LORD is departed from thee, and is with thy rival?

17. And THE LORD hath done to him, as He spake by me; for THE LORD hath rent the kingdom out of thy hand, [or family,]

18. And hath given it to thy neighbour, even David. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord, nor executedst his fierce anger upon Amalek, therefore hath the Lord done this thing unto thee this day.

19. Moreover THE LORD will also give up Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines: even to-morrow, shalt thou and thy sons be with me; the host of Israel also, will THE LORD give into the hand of the Philistines.

20. Then Saul straightway fell all along on the earth, and was sore afraid, because of the words of Samuel, &c.

Whatever might have been the nature of this woman's art, or her design in undertaking to raise Samuel; whether she meant to impose on Saul by getting some accomplice to personate Samuel, whom she must have often seen, and well known, during his long administration; or whether she expected to raise a demoniacal spirit, to give an answer: it is evident from the original, more closely translated and compared throughout with itself, that "*Samuel himself," or his spirit, was actually raised, immediately, and before the witch had time to utter any incan-

* So Josephus also correctly rendered the Original; εγνωρισεν εκ τουτων ο βασιλευς, τον Σαμουηλον οντα, who also expressly states, that Samuel's soul enquired why it was raised from Hades. Σαμουηλου ψυχης πυθομενης διατι—αναχθηναι ποιησειε [εξ ιδου.] Ant. VI. 14, 2.

tations, by the power of GOD, in a glorified form, and wearing the appearance of the ominous mantle in which was the rent that signified the rending of the kingdom from Saul's family: for the following reasons:

1. The woman herself was surprised at his unexpected appearance, and immediately concluded that the enquirer could be no other than Saul; for that the venerable prophet would not probably answer any one inferior to the king.

2. Saul acknowledged his reality, when he prostrated himself before him, and declared the cause of his evocation.

3. The very soul of Samuel seems to breathe in the keenness and severity of his reproaches,—“*Why hast thou provoked me , to raise me?—And why dost thou enquire of ME, since THE LORD is departed from thee, and is with thy rival?—David,” whom he now expressly names, as “the neighbour;” meant in his former prophecy, of which this is the terrific sequel; foretelling the impending defeat of his army, and death of himself and his sons in the battle; and their going to join the prophet in Hades, or the region of departed spirits in general.

4. Saul gave the most unequivocal proof of the reality of the denunciation, which none surely but a prophet of THE LORD could utter; for he fell down in a swoon, overwhelmed with anguish and despair when he heard his doom, and the just reward of his sacrilegious impiety: and was with difficulty restored to his senses, and refreshed by the witch and his attendants; who might also have been witnesses of the awful scene. He returned that night to his camp, and on the fated “morrow,” rushed on his doom, after he was sore wounded by the Philistine archers, falling on his own sword! xxx. 4.

5. The reality of Samuel's appearance on this occasion, was the doctrine of the primitive Jewish Church:

“And after his death he prophesied, and shewed the king his end. And he lift up his voice from the earth, to blot out the wickedness of the people,” [foretelling their defeat by the Philistines,] Ecclus. xlvi. 20.

The leading offences of Saul, are thus well summed up in the Book of Chronicles.

* This is the judicious rendering of the Vulgate, Cur irritasti me? And the original verb, קָרַח, is rendered to provoke, Job xii. 6, to rage, Prov. xxix. 9, to be wrath, Isai. xxxviii. 21.

“So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against THE LORD, even against the word of THE LORD, which he kept not; and also for asking counsel by Ob, [the spirit of divination,] to enquire of it; and trusted not in THE LORD. Wherefore HE slew him, and transferred the kingdom to David, the son of Jesse,” 1 Chron. x. 13, 14.

This Ob, or “spirit of divination,” was unquestionably the same, which in the New Testament is called “the spirit of Python,” by which the damsel at Philippi, was possessed, and which was expelled by the apostle Paul, Acts xvi. 16—19.

For the phrase בעלת אוב, Balaath aub, or Ob, signifying “mistress of Ob,” twice applied to the witch of Endor, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, and loosely rendered in the English Bible, “having a familiar spirit,” is there rendered by the Vulgate, “habens Pythonem :” and is equivalent to בהם אוב, Behem Ob, “in whom is Ob,” Levit. xx. 6—27, there rendered by the Vulgate, “in quibus pythonicus spiritus.” But this is the very expression of the evangelist in the foregoing passage, εχουσαν πνευμα πυθωνος, “having a spirit of Python,” or “of divination,” in the English Bible. But the Greek πυθων, or Latin Python, are evidently the Hebrew פתן, Pethon, signifying the asp, or adder, a most venomous serpent, whose poisonous bite was incurable, Deut. xxxii. 33, Psalm lviii. 4, xci. 13, Isai. xi. 8, Job xx. 14—16, and aptly denoting “the old serpent, the Devil and Satan, that deceiveth the whole world,” Rev. xii. 9, whose Hebrew name, אוב, seems to be a contraction of אויב, signifying “an enemy,” from איבה, Aibah, “the enmity,” decreed between the serpent and the woman at the time of the fall *, Gen. iii. 15,

* That Python signified “a serpent,” we learn from the mythological poet, Ovid, in the curious account of his destruction by the youthful archer Apollo. Representing it as a huge serpent of an unknown species, produced by the earth after the deluge, which was a terror to the new race of mankind, until he destroyed it, pierced through with a thousand arrows, almost exhausting his quiver; and instituted the Pythian games, in honour of this his first victory.

————— Sed te quoque, maxime Python,
 [Terra] tum genuit, Populisque novis, incognite serpens,
Terror eras, tantum spatii de monte tenebas.
Hunc Deus arcitenens, (et nunquam talibus armis whence ὁ ἐχθρός, “the enemy,” or “the arch-enemy,” is appropriated to the Devil, by way of bad eminence, and by OUR SAVIOUR himself, Matt. xiii. 39, Luke x. 19, whose Hebrew title, אבאδδון, Abaddon, is actually preserved in the Apocalypse, Rev. ix. 11, and is no other than אדון אוב, Aub adōn, “the master of Ob,” or the “arch-enemy,” corresponding to the Greek translation there given, βασιλευς-απολλυων, “the king destroying,” the same as the Heathen title, αναξ απολλων, in Homer, the word אדון, Adon, being frequently rendered in the Sept. by the synonymous terms, αρχων, “ruler,” δεσποτης, “master.”

This mode of divination into which “the arch enemy” seduced mankind, seems to have been of very early date; we find אבות חדשים, Aboth hhadashim, “*the monthly diviners,” noticed in the ancient book of Job, as remarkable for their inflations, xxxii. 19, corresponding to מודיעים לחודשים, Modihim le hhadashim, “the monthly prognosticators,” who used to prognosticate future events “at the new moons,” Isai. xlvii. 12, 13, where the prophet thus reprobates the practice:

—“Stand now [or persist] in thy enchantments, and in the multitude of thy sorceries:—let the astrologers, the stargazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand now, and save thee from [the woes] that shall come upon thee!”

But it may be objected, why should the venerable prophet quit paradise, (that department of Hades, which is the mansion of spirits who depart hence in THE LORD, Luke xxiii. 43,) to

Neve operis famam possit delere vetustas, Instituit sacros, celebri certamine, ludos,
Pythia, perdomitæ serpentis nomine dictos. Metam. I.

In this caricature, we may easily trace the distorted features of the grand prophecy after the fall, that the blessed seed of the woman should crush the serpent's head. And CHRIST is often represented in Scripture as an archer, Deut. xxxii. 23, Psalm xlv. 5, lxxvii. 17, Rev. vi. 2; and his victory over the Serpent, was probably symbolized in the primitive Chaldean sphere, by the signs Sagittarius and Scorpio. See Vol. I. p. 205.

* This phrase in Job is improperly rendered “new bottles,” in the English Bible. The whole passage may be thus more correctly translated:

“I am full of matter; the spirit within me constraineth me: lo, my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst, like the monthly diviners.”—Such was the Sibyl in Virgil.

attend the summons of a Pythoness? to satisfy the criminal application of Saul?—Among other reasons, perhaps,

1. To make Saul's crime the instrument of his punishment *, in the dreadful denunciation of his approaching doom.

2. To shew to the heathen world the infinite superiority of the ORACLE OF THE LORD, inspiring his prophets, over the powers of darkness, and the delusive prognostics of their wretched votaries in their false oracles.

3. To confirm the belief of a future state, by “One who rose from the dead,” even under the Mosaical dispensation, Luke xvi. 30, and who was the harbinger of OUR LORD'S resurrection under the Christian. A doctrine, indeed, which was the popular belief of both Jews and Heathens; and was only denied by philosophizing infidels, such as the Sadducees and Epicureans, Acts xxiii. 8, xvii. 18—32. To silence and convince such, a well-attested apparition, minutely prophesying what was to befall Saul, in close connexion with, and completion of former prophecies, during his life time, furnishing the strongest evidence of personal identity, was peculiarly well adapted †.

DAVID'S ELEGY.

The first specimen of David's poetical talents, is furnished by “his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan,” it is elegant, tender, and pathetic.

2 Sam. i. 19. Thy glory, O Israel, is slain upon thy high places !
How are the mighty fallen !

20. Tell it not in Gath,
Publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon,
Lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice,
Lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.

II. 21. Ye mountains of Gilboa,
And ye [fertile] fields of offerings,
Let there be no dew,
And let there be no rain, upon you ;

* Nec Deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus Inciderit.———Hor.

† Modern Infidels are therefore without excuse, both Jewish Rabbis and professed Christians, who doubt or dispute the fact: foolishly supposing, 1. either that the whole scene was visionary, or represented to Saul in a trance, overturning historic evidence; or, 2. that a phantom of Samuel, or 3. the ghost of Samuel, was raised by the power of the Devil, or by force of magical incantation, which is utterly at variance with the clearness of the prophecy; that could come from GOD only.

- For there were cast away the shields of the mighty,
The shield of Saul [as if] not anointed with oil [as king.]
- III. 22. From the blood of the slain,
From the fat of the mighty,
The bow of Jonathan turned not back,
Nor the sword of Saul returned, in vain.
- IV. 23. Saul and Jonathan were affectionate,
And united together, in their life,
And in death they were not divided.
They were swifter than eagles,
They were fiercer than lions [against their foes.]
- V. 24. Ye daughters of Israel weep over Saul,
Who clothed you in scarlet,—with [your] delight,— Putting golden ornaments upon your apparel.
- VI. 25. How are the mighty fallen
In the midst of the battle!
O Jonathan, [the glory of Israel,]
Slain upon thy high places!
26. I am grieved for thee, O Jonathan, my brother,
Thou wast very dear to me:
Thy love to me was wonderful,
Surpassing the love of wives [to their husbands.]
27. How are the mighty fallen,
And the weapons of war, perished!

This beautiful ode opens with the praise of Jonathan, in particular, who was indeed the chief “glory of Israel” as a warrior, next to David himself. The tacit application to him is disclosed afterwards, ver. 25. Jonathan first vanquished the Philistines.

In the second stanza he imprecates a curse of barrenness upon the fertile mountains and fields of Gilboa, which usually furnished offerings to THE LORD, but now deserved to do so no longer, for witnessing the disgraceful defeat of Israel.

The third stanza recites the successful valour of Jonathan and Saul; the fourth their affectionate union in general; to which Jonathan had borne testimony, 1 Sam. xx. 2; notwithstanding their occasional disputes about David, xx. 30—34, with which is beautifully connected their union in death also, contrasted with their hostility to their enemies.

After a short recommendation of Saul to the regret of the daughters of Israel, whom Saul had clothed with the ornamental spoils of his enemies, in the fifth stanza; he enlarges, in the sixth, on the merits of his bosom friend, Jonathan; the ardour of whose friendship exceeded even that of the tenderest love of women to their husbands; in which comparison he might perhaps have glanced at that of his own wife, Michal, who hazarded her life to save his; as did also Jonathan, on a more perilous occasion*.

DAVID KING OF JUDAH.

With the approbation of the LORD, whom he consulted, David now took his family and his friends with him to Hebron, where he was chosen king by the tribe of Judah only, at first, 2 Sam. ii. 1—4; and in the thirtieth year of his age, v. 4.

But the rest of the tribes, from that radical jealousy that subsisted between Judah and Ephraim especially, which took the lead among the other tribes, elected Saul's only surviving son, Eshbaal, as he was originally named, 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, but nicknamed Ishbosheth, “a man of shame,” from his weakness and incapacity; by the influence of Abner, the captain of the host, who expected to govern in his name, ii. 8—10.

After two years of peace between them, Abner provoked hostilities, by proposing to Joab, the captain of David's men, a skirmish of twelve men on each side; that brought on a general engagement, in which Abner and his men were defeated, ii. 12—31. After this, there was a long war between the house of David and the house of Saul, in the course of which David gained ground. At length Ishbosheth having offended Abner, by remonstrating against his taking Saul's concubine, Rispah, which was a high indignity offered to himself, (as in the similar case of Adonijah, 1 Kings ii. 22,) indicating that he aspired to the crown; this haughty prime minister, in revenge, threatened to bring over all Israel to acknowledge David king, as “THE LORD had sworn to David;” and entered into treaty with David for that purpose; but was assassinated by Joab, the son of Zeruiah, David's sister, 1 Chron. ii. 16, in revenge for his brother Asahel's death, slain by Abner in the former pursuit, ii. 12—32, iii. 1—27.

The indignation expressed by David at this treachery of Joab, which yet he was not able to punish; the funeral honours he paid to Abner, and afterwards to Ishbosheth, when he was assassinated by two of his captains, who were Benjamites, and whom David put to death, so won the hearts of the rest of the tribes, that they tendered him the united crown, which they acknowledged he was entitled to by the divine grant, in Saul's reign, ii. 28—39; and accordingly, he was anointed king over all Israel, seven years and a half after his election by the tribe of Judah.

DAVID KING OF ISRAEL.

His first exploit after this, was the reduction of the fortress of Jebus, on Mount Sion, which had remained in the hands of the natives ever since the days of Joshua, and was deemed impregnable, both from its situation and its fortifications, according to Josephus, Ant. v. 2, 2, Josh. xv. 63. The Jebusites, therefore, ridiculed the attempt, and seem to have placed the blind and the lame on the walls, in derision, as fully sufficient to keep him out. But there was “a gutter,” or subterraneous passage from the town to the fortress, by which David introduced a party of men, and “took the strong hold of Zion,” 2 Sam. v. 6—8, 1 Chron. xi. 4—6. This David made his residence, and called it the city of David, and built a house or palace for himself, adding other buildings “round about the hill, from Millo, (‘the house of assembly,’ on the top of the hill, 1 Kings xi. 27.) and inwards,” or upwards toward the summit of the hill, v. 9—11, 1 Chron. xi. 7, 8.

DAVID’S CHILDREN.

When David was established in the kingdom, he took more wives and concubines, by whom he had a numerous issue, v. 12—16, 1 Chron. iii. 1—9.

PHILISTINE WAR.

About the ninth year of his reign, the Philistines renewed the war, but were defeated by David in two pitched battles. In the former, David, when thirsty, longed for a drink of water from the well of his own town, Bethlehem, which was brought him by his three mightiest men, Joab, Jashobeam, and Eleazar, who brake through the host of the Philistines, and brought it to him at the peril of their lives. But when he received, he would not drink, but poured it out, as a libation to THE LORD, 2 Sam. v. 17—25, 1 Chron. xi. 15—19. The same thing is reported of Alexander the Great, in his Indian expedition.

THE ARK BROUGHT HOME.

And now when David had a respite from war, about the tenth year of his reign, he brought the ark from the house of Aminadab, in Gibeah, about eighty-two years after it had been left there, on its return from the Philistines, with great joy and triumph, to the tabernacle which he had prepared for it in the city of David. But on the way, the officious Uzzah, the son, or grandson of Aminadab, was struck dead upon the spot, for putting forth his hand to support the tottering ark; none but the priests being warranted to touch it, under pain of death, Numb. iv. 15. David too, and the people, sinned ignorantly upon this occasion, in placing the ark upon a cart drawn by oxen, like the idolatrous Philistines, who knew no better, 1 Sam. vii. 6, instead of having it carried on the shoulders of the Levites, as prescribed, Exod. xxv. 14. Wherefore “the LORD brake in upon them, because they sought Him not according to order.”—David afterwards rectified this impropriety, when he removed it from the house of Obed Edom, where the offence was given, and he had left it for three months, 2 Sam. vi. 1—17, 1 Chron. xv. 1—15.

This remarkable case shews how dangerous it is to follow good intentions, or do any thing in God's service without his express word; a consideration worthy of the most serious attention of all self-called labourers in the sacred vineyard; and also proves, that sins of ignorance are punishable, where the error is not invincible.

NATHAN'S PROPHECY CONCERNING CHRIST.

About five years after, and the fifteenth of David's reign, when he had finished and "inhabited his house of cedar, and God had given him rest from all his enemies round about;" he meditated a design of building a Temple to the Lord, instead of the temporary Tabernacle which he had provided; and he communicated his design to Nathan the prophet; who, at first, encouraged him to proceed, not knowing the will of the Lord. But that night, THE ORACLE OF THE LORD came to Nathan, and countermanded David's design; but communicated that signal prophecy, which contained the last limitation of the Blessed seed of the woman, or CHRIST, to the house and lineage of David, who should build a spiritual Temple to the Lord, and whose kingdom should be established for ever, 2 Sam. vii. 1—16.

5. "Go and tell my servant David, thus saith THE LORD: *Shalt thou build me a house for my dwelling?"

6. "For I have not dwelt in a house, from the day that I brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have sojourned in a tent and in a tabernacle:

7. "Whosoever I sojourned with all the children of Israel, spake I a word to any of the tribes of Israel, [or rather, judges of Israel, 1 Chron. xvii. 6,] whom I commanded to feed my people Israel, saying, Why do you not build me a house of cedar?"
