Mr. Beach [To Mr. Tracy]: Why can you not ask him in what connection that was said?

Mr. Tracy—In what connection was that said?

Mr. Beach—Give the preceding remarks, if you can?

The Witness—I think I gave you, in substance, the preceding remarks. Mr. Tilton's manner was very—I won't say dramatic, but it was highly suggestive of something that was very severe if it should only come out. I remember his saying to us: "Your Committee is too large, gentlemen; I cannot make such a disclosure or tell such a story to so many. I will take you, Mr. Sage [pointing to him], if you please, and I will tell you in confidence my whole story. Your Committee is too large. I cannot tell it," and the statement was made after that, I think, as I have before referred to, that this matter didn't rest upon his word, that he would not ask us to believe him, and then we had urged him—Mr. Tracy had urged him, as was suggested before, to bring forward the papers that the Committee might judge and construe them, and I think his reply to that was that he would not be so cruel to Mr. Beecher. He said, "I don't want to hurt a hair of that old man's gray head; Mr. Beecher has before this asked me if it ever became necessary, if I should feel compelled to publish these papers, that then I should give him notice in order that he might leave Brooklyn, or take his life."

Q. Then it was in connection—

Mr. Fullerton—No, no, I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Was it in that connection that he made use of this remark in the connection that you have just stated? A. I have stated it as nearly as I could, Sir, from my present memory.

MR. TILTON'S EXPLANATION TO THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Was he asked by the Committee to bring forward his documents and show them to the Committee? A. Yes, Sir, repeatedly.

Q. Was it in that connection that he said that the Committee was too large?

Mr. Beach—We object to that, Sir.

The Witness—Well, it was in regard to making his case known to us; we were too many. There was a great deal said that you have not asked me for, that my answer would not be responsive to, if I told it, but as a part of the things that I have stated—or rather the facts which I have stated, are a part of those things in respect to which he said that the Committee was too large to know about it.

Q. Now, I repeat my question; did Mr. Tilton on that occasion state or pretend that he had any other evidence against Mr. Beecher except written evidence?

Mr. Morris—One moment. I object to it. He has not asked the witness to state what he said.

Judge Neilson—It needs no argument; it is a leading question.

Mr. Tracy—Is it objected to on the ground that it is leading?

Mr. Morris—Certainly.

Mr. Tracy—What did he say on the subject of having verbal evidence against Mr. Beecher, if anything?

Mr. Morris—One moment. Is it proper, until he has taken the witness's best recollection, to call his attention to the subject?

Judge Neilson—This is a very intelligent witness. I think he will have to state all that occurred that he remembers, and then put him particular questions.

Mr. Tracy—I will ask you to state what was said on the subject of his having verbal confessions of Mr. Beecher, if he said anything. A. There was no suggestion made, according to my best recollection, of any confession having been made at that time, aside from the inferential suggestion that I have before stated, that Mr. Beecher had requested him to give him notice.

Q. And you have stated the conversation in which he said that? A. I have stated the connection in which he said that.

Q. Now, what did he say, if anything, on the subject of deprecating an investigation? A. Well, he said a great deal, Sir; I could give, perhaps, considerable of what he said, and I might leave out something that was just as important. I will give you the best recollection of what he said. He said—he commenced his conversation on that subject—on that branch of the subject, by saying that his letter to Dr. Bacon had been called from him as a matter of defense of his own honor, from the attitude which had been assumed by Mr. Beecher and by Plymouth Church, that he had published so much of the—of a paper which he held against Mr. Beecher—signed by Mr. Beecher, as would show that he was not the creature of Mr. Beecher's magnanimity, but that Mr. Beecher was the creature of his magnanimity, if there was magnanimity between them, and that having exercised sufficient hostility in this matter to place himself right in that regard—those are not his words, but that is the substance of his idea—to place himself right in that regard, he did not feel called upon to say anything further until either Mr. Beecher or Plymouth Church should make further aggression upon him, in which case he would feel bound—he might feel bound to make still further disclosures, and went on to say that he had taken pains in the Bacon letter not to characterize what the charge was, and when we called for him—when we stated to him that we had been appointed on behalf of Plymouth Church to investigate the question of what charges were referred to in the Bacon letter, he says, "Well, gentlemen, now you don't want that; Mr. Beecher does not want it, and as a matter of honor towards Mr. Beecher"—and then I think perhaps he brought in—it came in several times, in regard to his having no desire to harm Mr. Beecher or to hurt a hair of his gray head—he said that he didn't want any investigation further in regard to it and he deprecated it as being unwise and uncalled for.

Q. Did he say anything about disbelieving that Mr. Beecher had invited an investigation? A. He did, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Beecher's letter conveying the Committee shown him there? A. It was, Sir.

Q. Did he read more than once? A. I could not say about that, Sir; I think he took long enough to have read it through carefully and scan it over again, perhaps, but I don't think he read it aloud. He looked at the paper, holding it for some time.

Q. What did he say that night as to whether he would appear before the Committee and furnish documents and proofs if he had any? A. Up to the time of reading that letter he absolutely declined, saying, "Gentlemen, you don't want me to talk" and once putting the question, "Do you want me? Suppose I know that Henry Ward Beecher has been guilty of adultery?" I would not state that at—that word being used, but "Suppose I know of his being guilty of a grave offense against my family," perhaps it was. "Do you want me to state it?" And the Committee replied, or some of the members of the Committee, "Yes, we want to know the worst, and exactly what it is;" and he continued to decline to give it, up to the time that he had read the letter. After reading the letter, he says, "I will think about this," and the last thing that he said as he was going away, "I will think about this; perhaps I may consent to come before you, but I will not decide that to-night."

Q. Did you afterward see his card published in The Argus saying that he would? A. Well, I saw it in some paper, Sir; I don't know whether it was The Argus, or what it was.

MR. TILTON DENOUNCES THE COMMITTEE TO ITS FACE.

Q. Now, were you present when he made his sworn statement before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he present any letters accompanying that report? A. No, Sir.

Q. None at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you also present at the Committee rooms at the time that he attacked Mr. Tracy, or his position in the case? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you hear what transpired between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Tracy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you state it? A. Well, my recollection of that is that it grew out, in the first place, of Mr. Tilton's reply to some questions which I had propounded to him on his cross-examination, and his becoming apparently irritated, or losing his temper, or getting out of patience with us. On the direct examination, the sworn statement, Mr. Tilton ton's position seemed to be, as it impressed me, that he was—had been shielding Mr. Beecher and his family from exposure in regard to the relations which he charged had existed between Mr. Beecher and his wife; and I, on cross-examination, testing him as to whether or not he had, in good faith, tried to keep this scandal from becoming public, asked him whether he knew a man by the name of Charles A. Blanchard, son of President Blanchard, of Illinois; to that he replied that he had seen him, I think he said once; and I asked him whether or not, on the first occasion, when he had seen him, he had not said to Mr. Blanchard, in the Winter of 1870 or 1871, that he did not like Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, that he was a bad man, and that he preached to mistresses in his own congregation every Sunday; and whether further, he had not said to him that he was at liberty to publish that in his paper, a paper with which young Blanchard was connected in Chicago, and could give his name as authority; and Mr. Tilton had replied in the affirmative up to everything except the question as to whether or not he told him to publish it, and use his name as authority, when he did not remember that, but passed it over, I think by saying that if young Blanchard said so he should not deny it; it was not very distinct in his mind, what he did say to him. And he then suddenly turned upon us and said: "Gentlemen, you are not trying to get at the facts of this case. You have been here now—had me before you four or five different times, and you have not asked me in regard to those things which would really get at the facts in this case. You are asking about collateral things all the time;" and, says he, "I have not told you—I have not begun to tell you my case; I have told you but a small part of the evidence that I have against Mr. Beecher." I replied to him: "Well, now, Sir, the legitimate course to pursue, after you had taken time to prepare a sworn statement, was to cross-examine you in regard to the different parts of that statement, and the Committee, or at least I, for one of the Committee, had supposed that you had told your whole case in that, and I, as one of the Committee, now call upon you to state anything and everything that you may know that tends in the interest of truth and justice to throw light upon the question of the private and moral character of Henry Ward Beecher." After some other conversation immediately following this, Mr. Tilton suddenly seemed to lose his temper very considerably, and he turned upon Mr. Tracy and says, "and you promised me when I showed you this case years ago, that if ever Mr. Beecher and I clashed swords in any legal conflict in regard to it, that you would not appear as counsel for Mr. Beecher." Mr. Tracy's reply was not angry in that first instance, and did not particularly impress myself, except that he was inclined to reason the matter, and Mr. Tracy—Mr.—

Mr. Beach—Tilton?

The Witness—Tilton further made the charge and charged him with unprofessional conduct, and says, "You are guilty of unprofessional conduct in what you are doing now, Sir, and I will hold you to accountability for it." Whereupon Mr. Tracy said, "It is false; the case which you stated to me was that Mr. Beecher had made impure or improper proposals to your wife, and I notified you when I found," or—I wouldn't say—I am not clear on that point, whether it was "when I found," or whether, "when I suspected that you were changing your indictment against Mr. Beecher, that if you changed the charge which you had made against him of impure proposals to the crime of adultery, I should feel myself exonerated from the promise which I had made you," or "freed from the promise which I had made you;" and Mr. Tilton's reply to that was, "It makes no difference in regard to it; you have got my case and you have no right to appear against me in this matter;" and Mr. Tracy replied to him, "Well, on that point I differ with you. I have taken the judgment of the best legal talent of my acquaintance in New-York and Brooklyn, and I am conscientious in regard to my course in this matter, and I am determined to pursue it as I have been pursuing it." Mr. Cleveland—it is not responsive to your question, but it settles that whole point, so far as it is in my mind—at that time made a remark, in course of this conversation between you and him, suggestive that you were not counsel for Mr. Beecher, saying that you were the counsel for the Committee in this case, to which neither he nor you made any reply, but each one of them—each one of you seemed to treat the difficulty over your unprofessional conduct as wholly unaffected by the question as to whose counsel you were there, or in whose interest you appeared.

Q. Well, where did this occur which you have been detailing?

A. At 34 Monroe-pl.

Q. Well, which room? A. That occurred in the back room where we generally had our sessions. You go through the hall and it was in the rear of the parlor, in the library.

Q. Afterwards did you see or hear a further interview between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Tracy that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did that occur? A. That occurred in the front parlor close by the door, by the sofa.

Q. How soon after the first interview? A. Well, time to cool off, from 15 minutes to half an hour; something like that.

Q. What occurred there? A. Tilton came in, and I think threw his arm over your shoulder, and said that he liked—"I have nothing against you," or nothing against Tracy, and said, perhaps, "the members of the Committee; and now I take back what I have said." Perhaps those are not the words; they did not impress me very particularly, as the statement impugning your professional character—but I think he said, "I take back what I said: there is not a man in Brooklyn that I respect more," or "that I like better," or something to that effect; and you jokingly accepted the apology, if apology it were, and expressed sentiments of friendship; and then Mr. Tilton turned to the Committee and said: "Tracy and I are a good deal alike, after all; the difference between us is, that I do wrong, and am sorry for it, and say so; and Tracy does wrong, and is sorry for it, and he don't say so. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, was that the last of the interview on that day? A. That was the last of the quarrel, Sir, that I remember. I think it was the last of the interview on that day; yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S DISTRUST OF THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Were you present on the day that he brought letters to the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was done with the letters that he brought them? A. He took them away with him.

Q. What was done in the Committee room by him? A. He started to read from them, and there seemed to be a very large folio, and reading fast there was no time for the Committee to digest them if they had bearing upon the case; and, after several letters had been read, including, for one, one of—early in 1868—I won't swear to dates: I have heard you say here to-day, Jan. 31st, 1868—but it only impressed me as being anterior by several months to Oct. 1868, in which Mrs. Tilton spoke of her wrong or her offense or her sin, or something or other in the matter; and I remember that one distinctly, because we asked "What does that refer to?" and he says, "You ask Elizabeth;" and then went on. After reading several of them, and owing to the fact, which seemed to be evident to the Committee, that it was impossible to give them any considerable legal weight, if they had such, or bearing upon the case, it was suggested that we should either have the letters left with us or—yes, that we should have the letters left with us to be returned; and that Mr. Tilton objected to, and said he was willing to place them in the hands of some person where the Committee could have access to them; and it was finally compromised or agreed upon that Mr. Winslow should be the representative of the Committee, or should be the eyes of the Committee to inspect this volume of letters, and that he would show them to Mr. Winslow upon his, Mr. Winslow's, request.

Q. Did he ever show to the Committee the Griffith Gaunt letter? A. He never showed it to the Committee as a Committee, Sir; I never saw it.

Mr. Tracy—That is all. You may examine.

Mr. Hill—If your Honor will permit me to examine the telegraphic manager.

Mr. Fullerton—I have only a single question.

Judge Neilson—Well.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. WHITE.

Mr. Fullerton—Was Mr. Winslow at all of these conversations you have related? A. That is impossible for me to remember, Sir; I am sure he was present, Sir, at the quarrel, the first—at the first quarrel, and I feel very sure that he was present at the interview when Mr. Tilton came forward, before us for the first time, and declined to make a statement at that time.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY L. HUGHES.

Henry L. Hughes, called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Hughes, what is your business? A. I am manager of the telegraph office.

Q. Western Union? A. Western Union, yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been such manager? A. About six years.

Q. And engaged all the while in Brooklyn here? A. All the while, yes, Sir; that is during those six years.

Q. Do you know Mr. Densler and Mr. Rochford? A. I do, Sir.

Q. And you were superintendent of the office where they were engaged? A. I suppose you would call it superintendent—manager.

Q. Manager of the office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A telegram has been produced here, dated the 2d day of June, apparently, and signed by Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you that with you now? A. I have; yes, Sir.

Q. A question has been suggested, or questions have been asked of the other witnesses with respect to the date of the telegram. Just look at the handwriting of the date. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And state if it is your work? A. Yes, Sir.

A MISTAKE IN DATING THE TELEGRAM.

Q. When did you make it? A. I made it about three weeks ago.

Q. Was there anything in that blank where you have now written that date, at the time you made that entry? A. No, Sir.

Q. None at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. From what bundle, that is to say, what days did you take this telegram in the files of the office? A. I took it from the package of messages containing the business for the 1st and 2d days of June. If you will notice, June the 1st is on Sunday, and June the 2d is Monday. Well, we place the business of Saturday and Sunday together, making one report for the days. Well, when I took the message out, I saw that there was no date on it, and I took it out of the package containing the business of the 1st and 2d, and naturally thinking that the 1st would be Saturday, because we place the two days business together, and enter them on the report the same day. I dated it the 1st. When I came to look at the calendar I knew that the 1st was Sunday, and Monday was the 2d, and if you will see that by placing the 1st with the Saturday's business would put one day of June in May's business, consequently I altered the date afterwards.

Q. Well, it is your work, and Mr. Beecher, or nobody representing him, had anything to do with it? A. I didn't know that message was there until I looked for it; that is to say, I could tell by the record.

Q. As to putting that date in nobody requested you to do it at all? A. No, nobody.

Q. It was your own work, altogether? A. Altogether, and it is correct, without a doubt.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Hill—Gentlemen, you requested the other book, and I will give you this. [Handing a book to Mr. Beach.]

TESTIMONY OF MR. HORACE B. CLAFLIN.

Horace B. Claflin was next called by the defense and sworn. He testified as follows:

Mr. Tracy—You reside in Brooklyn, Mr. Claflin, I believe? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. I have been here about thirty years, Sir, I think. I have got a very bad cold, Sir; I can hardly make myself heard.

Mr. Tracy—I don't know as it is possible for Mr. Claflin to make himself understood.

Judge Neilson—You can repeat the answers—About thirty years, you say? A. About thirty years; yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I will sit by Mr. Claflin and repeat the answers.

Mr. Tracy—What is your business, Mr. Claflin? A. I sell dry goods in New-York.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that business? A. About thirty years in New-York; some time before in Worcester, Mass.

Q. Do you know the defendant, Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Beecher? yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him since he came here, Sir.

Q. Are you a member of his congregation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And have been how long? A. Ever since he came here, Sir, or within a short time after he came.

Q. Do you know the plaintiff, Theodore Tilton? A. I know him a little, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I should think a much less time; perhaps half that time.

Q. Do you know Henry C. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him—I knew him five years before I came to New-York—about thirty-five years, probably.

PRELIMINARIES OF THE ARBITRATION.

Q. Were you present at a meeting at Mr. Moulton's house, where Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Samuel Wilkeson were present, in the Spring of 1872, where a settlement or arbitration was talked of between Bowen, Beecher and Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What day of the week was it that you first met on that business? A. That was Sunday, Sir.

Q. Who went to Moulton's house with you, if any one? A. I think I went alone, Sir.

Q. Whom did you find there? A. I found Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton.

Q. Had Mr. Wilkeson any papers there at that interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What papers had he? A. Well, Sir, I don't—I don't know whether Mr. Wilkeson had the paper—a paper was shown me, a press copy, which seemed to have been talked over by the three parties before I got there; they called it a "Personal Statement."

Q. Do you mean that it was a press copy or a press proof? A. A press proof, Sir; a press proof it was.

Q. It was in print? A. It was in print, yes, Sir.

Q. Was it the paper that has been referred to on this trial as the press copy from The Golden Age? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Called "A Personal Statement?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is the one—subsequently embodied in the tripartite agreement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether it was the same identical paper that they had that night, that was afterwards embodied in the tripartite agreement? A. It was not the same, Sir; it was the substance of that paper—it was considerably changed after that.

Q. Ah! he has misunderstood the question; I mean the printed matter; was the printed matter that they had there that night—do you know whether it was the same identical slip of paper that they had there that night that was afterwards pasted on and constituted a part of the tripartite agreement? A. That was the same one, or one exactly like it.

Q. Exactly like it—had Mr. Wilkeson any other paper there that night? A. He had a rough draft, if I remember right, Sir, of what was afterwards called the "Tripartite Agreement."

Q. Was that draft read over, in the presence of the parties, by Mr. Wilkeson that night? A. Yes, Sir; it was read over, and talked over for some time.

Q. At this time had you seen Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir; I had not.

Judge Neilson—Had you seen him on that subject? [To Mr. Tracy.] You mean had he seen him on that subject?

The Witness—No, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—On that subject, I mean.

Mr. Shearman—He says no, Sir.

Q. What was the subject of conversation that night between yourself and Moulton, Tilton and Wilkeson? A. Well, Sir, the subject was the publication of this statement that Mr. Tilton threatened to make in the next Golden Age, unless Mr. Bowen—unless he got a settlement with Mr. Bowen.

Q. A settlement of what? A. Of contracts he had with Mr. Bowen, involving an agreement with him for The Independent and Golden Age.

Judge Neilson—You mean The Union, do you not? A. The Christian Union, yes, Sir—The Brooklyn Union.

Judge Neilson—The Brooklyn Union?

Mr. Tracy—The Brooklyn Union and The Independent? A. The Brooklyn Union and The Independent.

Q. Was any amount stated that Mr. Tilton claimed to be due on those contracts from Mr. Bowen that night? A. I don't remember, Sir, but I think Mr. Tilton said, if I remember right, there was seven, eight, or nine thousand dollars due him or something like that, I am not quite certain as to the amount.

Q. Was there anything said on the subject of the efforts which he had already taken to compel Mr. Bowen to pay that amount? A. Yes, Sir; he said he had tried—he had tried to get a settlement with Mr. Bowen—get the payment of his claims, very hard; I think he said he had commenced a suit.

Mr. Shearman—[Repeating.] "Yes, Sir; he said he had tried to get a settlement of his claims with Mr. Bowen very hard; I think he said he would commence a suit." I do not remember word for word. [To the witness.] I cannot take a great deal.

Q. What did he say he would do, if anything, unless Mr. Bowen did settle and pay him the amount due?

Mr. Beach—I think, Sir, that this is an exceptional way of examining the witness.

Judge Neilson—You should take the conversation, Mr. Tracy, I think, without any suggestion whatever.

Mr. Beach—Every question is leading.

Mr. Tracy—No, I beg your pardon; I differ with you there.

Judge Neilson—At any rate, he thinks this one is leading.

Mr. Tracy—That may be; I don't doubt he thinks so; I am quite willing to do that, but I had assumed from Mr. Clafin's condition that it would be hardly possible for him to go on and make a full narrative; he gets relief by answering questions in a shorter manner than he can statements.

Mr. Beach—Undoubtedly he does, when questions are put that he can answer yes or no.

Mr. Tracy—That is the best answer always to a question.

Judge Neilson—Well, do the best you can.

Mr. Tracy—If Mr. Clafin thinks he can go on and narrate what took place there that night, I have no objection. [To the witness.] Just go on and detail, in short passages, what Mr. Tilton said about Mr. Bowen's claim—his claim against Mr. Bowen, and about paying it, or what he would do if he did not pay it? A. Well, Sir, Mr. Tilton said he would publish the article, or should publish it in the next paper, unless he got a settlement with Mr. Bowen; the money was his due and he ought to have it and would have it. I told him I thought there was no occasion for such a publication, that Mr. Bowen would no doubt do what was right about it; that the publication could do him no good and it would be a great shame that such a thing should be made public. I said I would intercede for him with Mr. Bowen, and an arbitration had been talked of, and I thought Mr. Bowen would readily come into it. That seemed to be satisfactory to Mr. Bowen, and, in fact, to all present.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that answer.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; I move to strike out that answer; it is no part of the conversation, or what was said.

Mr. Tracy—It is no part of an answer to any question, because it is part of a narrative.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is that it seemed to be satisfactory—that is the objection—an estimate by the witness, and so it is stricken out.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I suppose it is only another way of saying that it was satisfactory.

Mr. Beach—Well, we will judge whether it was satisfactory from what was said.

Judge Neilson—Whatever was said.

Mr. Tracy—What was said, Mr. Clafin, by Mr. Tilton or the others present about that being satisfactory? A. Well, I think the agreement was not completed—it was not put in complete form; Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton thought something of that kind, substantially that, would answer the purpose.

Q. Was there anything said, and if so, what, by anybody there that interview as to the effect of such a publication? A. Yes,

Sir, Mr.—It was talked about very fully by myself and Mr. Wilkeson.

Q. Well, what did you say about it? A. Well, Sir, I said it ought not to be published; that no possible good could come from it; it would be a great shame to publish such a scandal as that.

Q. What further was said either by yourself or Mr. Wilkeson or anyone else? A. Well, Sir, there was a great deal said; I don't remember exactly what, but generally in that tone; that is about the substance of the conversation.

Q. What, if anything, did Mr. Tilton say in answer to your statement that it would be a shame to have such a scandal? A. Well, he said he would publish it notwithstanding.

Q. What time in the evening did that interview break up, Mr. Clafin? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Well, was it late in the evening? A. I think it was; I should think it was ten o'clock, perhaps.

Q. Did you see Mr. Bowen afterwards on this subject? Or before answering that question—when you said that you would see Mr. Bowen for Mr. Tilton, what did Mr. Tilton say to that?

Mr. Beach—What? There has no such thing been said.

Judge Neilson. When he said he would see Mr. Bowen?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—What did you say, Mr. Clafin, on the subject of your seeing Mr. Bowen? A. I said that I would intercede with him, or with Mr. Bowen for him.

Mr. Tracy—That is what I understood the witness to say.

Mr. Shearman—Oh, yes, he said it.

MR. CLAFIN'S MEDIATION.

Mr. Tracy—Now, did you see Mr. Bowen on the subject of the settlement of this claim? A. I did, Sir; I don't know whether we had a meeting, Sir, a day or two afterwards.

Mr. Shearman [Repeating]—"I did, Sir—I don't remember—we had a meeting a day or two after."

The Witness—I don't remember whether I saw Mr. Bowen before the next meeting, but I think I did.

Q. Did you agree, before parting on that Sunday, to meet again? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When were you to meet again?

Mr. Shearman—General, give me a chance. [Mr. Tracy having put the question before Mr. Shearman could repeat the last answer.]

Mr. Tracy—Excuse me.

The Witness—We were to meet Tuesday night.

Q. And you think you saw Mr. Bowen before the Tuesday night? A. I think I saw him, Sir—

Q. Do you remember whether or not—

Mr. Shearman—Wait a moment; he has not finished.

The Witness—I think I saw him the next day or the next evening.

Q. Do you remember whether or not you had with you the personal statement, this press proof? A. When I went to Mr. Bowen's, Sir, I had; I showed him that.

Q. What did you say to him?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that that is admissible; he had agreed to intercede with Mr. Bowen for Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think that point would be covered by asking him if he did intercede—take a general answer; you cannot take a prolonged conversation in the absence of the party.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I will accept the suggestion of the Court. Did you intercede with Mr. Bowen for Mr. Tilton? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you meet the parties again on Tuesday night. A. I did.

Q. Who was present on the Tuesday evening? A. There were Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Wilkeson and myself.

Q. What paper had Mr. Wilkeson with him that night, if any? A. Mr. Wilkeson had the paper I have spoken of before engrossed and made complete, as they call it; that paper was read over and discussed for a considerable time. Finally Mr. Tilton said it was satisfactory, and he would sign it, and he was—in fact he was about to sign it but I suggested to him that he had better—it had better be left until Mr. Bowen had signed it; Mr. Bowen was the first mentioned in the paper. I said there was great propriety in Mr. Bowen signing first, and that I should tell Mr. Bowen, in carrying him the paper that if he would sign it, that I knew Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher would sign it.

Mr. Shearman [Repeating]—I should tell Mr. Bowen, when I carried him the paper, that if he would sign it that I knew Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher would sign it.

Q. What further was said? A. Well, Mr. Bowen didn't object to the paper much—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; I move to strike that out.

Mr. Tracy—Was there anything further—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—Was there anything further said that night between yourself and Mr. Wilkeson, and Moulton and Tilton there before you went to see Mr. Bowen? A. There was; yes, Sir; there was a good deal said; there was a general conversation, we talked I suppose two hours—I don't know.

Q. What was said, if anything, by you on the subject of Mr. Bowen's consent to an arbitration? A. I said Mr. Bowen—I thought Mr. Bowen would consent to an arbitration, and Mr. Tilton differed with me a little about that, if I remember right—did not think he would.

Q. Go on; state anything further that you recollect that was said there before you went to see Mr. Bowen? A. I think I have given you, Sir, the substance of what was said; there was a good deal of talk there; the idea was that I was to see Mr. Bowen.

Mr. Beach—Oh! well, I object to that.

The Witness—And get him to consent to an arbitration if I could.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment; I object to that—he can tell what was said.

Mr. Tracy—What was said on the subject of—

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that.

Judge Neilson—Yes; now your question.

Mr. Tracy—What was said, if anything, on the subject of your taking the paper to Mr. Bowen and presenting it to him? A. Well, Sir, I might have—I probably assigned some reasons why I supposed Mr. Bowen would sign it; I said he ought to sign it, it was such a paper as any three Christian men ought to sign. I believed that the quarrel had been gotten up between them on these matters of newspapers, and that there had been a good deal of misunderstanding, and that they ought to be peaceable—signing that paper and keeping it in good faith, what they promised to do, I thought it would be a very excellent thing.

Mr. Shearman—[Repeating]: "Signing that paper and keeping it, what they promised to do, I thought would be a very excellent thing."

Q. Was any reference made by you in that conversation to the fact that Mr. Bowen, being the owner of two papers, could not afford to have such a scandal as that publication would make? A. Yes, Sir; I remember urging that as one of the reasons; I said Mr. Bowen had two newspapers on hand—that he could not afford it.

Q. Could not afford what? A. To publish such an article, or to have such an article as that published.

Q. Was any reply made to that, and, if so, by whom? A. Well, I think Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton talked about that; they were very uncertain as to whether Mr. Bowen would do anything; they didn't believe in it much.

Q. Anything said by them, or either of them, or by Mr. Wilkeson, as to the effect that such a publication would be likely to have on Mr. Bowen's business? A. I said I thought it would injure him—injure the papers, and I think they all assented to that; I believe they all—

Mr. Shearman [repeating]: "I said I thought it would injure the papers, and they all assented to that."

Mr. Beach—"I think they all assented to—"

Mr. Shearman—Yes; "and I think they all assented to that."

Q. Well did you take that "Tripartite Agreement" to Mr. Bowen that night? A. I did, Sir; I think I took it that night.

Q. Did you return to this meeting after seeing Mr. Bowen on that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What report did you make to them as to Mr. Bowen's disposition about settling this claim? A. Well, I said Mr. Bowen did not object to signing the paper, decidedly object; but he said he would like to read it over again after I left, and he would like to think of it a little. I told him there was great impropriety in his thinking of it, and I went—I talked with Mr. Bowen some little time.

Mr. Beach—Never mind what you talked with Bowen.

Mr. Tracy—Well, what did you say to them on returning about what you thought Mr. Bowen would do? A. I said I thought Mr. Bowen would sign the paper; and Mr. Wilkeson said that I had made a great mistake, if I remember right, in not getting him to sign it. I think it was Wilkeson said that; either Wilkeson or Tilton said that, that I should not have left it. I said there was no reason why I should not leave it—why Bowen should not think of it—take his time to consider of it.

Q. What was said about an arbitration, about arbitrating the claim? A. It was agreed—it was—

Mr. Beach—Just repeat that, "it was—"

Mr. Shearman—"It was agreed."

The Witness—I think Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton proposed Mr. Charles Storrs as one of the arbitrators, and then another party was talked of as the third, and by, I don't exactly know whose suggestion, but by general consent, Mr. James Freeland was agreed upon—Mr. James Freeland—as the third man.

Q. At what meeting, and at what stage of the meeting, if you remember, Mr. Claflin, was Mr. Freeland's name mentioned as one of the arbitrators? A. I think it was that evening, Sir.

Q. Tuesday night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether it was before or after you had seen Mr. Bowen? A. I think I had talked with Mr. Bowen about Freeland before.

Q. And were the names of the three arbitrators agreed upon on Tuesday night?

Mr. Beach—Who between?

Mr. Tracy—Well, I will find out—after I find whether they were agreed upon I will ask.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I object to the question.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Mr. Beach—The objection is that it does not call for an agreement between the parties, who were parties to this action, or parties to that claim.

Mr. Tracy—I don't care; if Mr. Tilton was present that is enough.

Mr. Fullerton—But it is not proper to ask if it was agreed upon; that we will judge of when we hear what was said.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Tracy—Well, were the three names selected that night?

Mr. Beach—Selected where?

Mr. Tracy—At this meeting at Moulton's house between Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton and the witness? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is the interview I am inquiring of and no other. Was the time of the meeting of the arbitrators agreed upon that night? A. I think it was, Sir.

Q. Where were you to meet? A. At the same place; we were at Moulton's study, Sir, and we were to meet at the same place.

Mr. Tracy—It is after 4 o'clock, your Honor, and trusting that the witness will be better in the morning, I propose that we now adjourn.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE TRIPARTITE AGREEMENT AGAIN.

TESTIMONY OF H. B. CLAFLIN, LOUISA J. WROEGER, MARY C. JOSEPHS, AND CHARLES STORRS—MORE PROOF OFFERED OF MR. BEECHER'S ABSENCE ON THE MORNING OF JUNE 2, 1873—MR. TILTON'S DETERMINATION TO "SMASH" HIS WIFE AND MR. BEECHER.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1875.

H. B. Claflin occupied the whole of the morning session to-day, chiefly in reciting for the second time, on the cross-examination, the story of the "Tripartite Agreement," the facts of which have already been made familiar by Mr. Wilkeson's testimony. Mr. Claflin still suffered from a severe cold, and Mr. Shearman interpreted his whispers until near the close of the session, when it was found that continuous talking had half cured Mr. Claflin, and his voice grew as strong as that of Mr. Shearman.

The matter elicited on the examination of Mr. Claflin was not new or curious. The most interesting fact brought out was that the first condition of the "Tripartite Covenant" was that all the papers bearing on the scandal were to be destroyed. This was not merely the first-named of the conditions, but the chief of all considerations. It did not apply merely to Mr. Tilton's letter of Jan. 1, 1871, quoting Mr. Bowen's charges against Mr. Beecher, but the letter of apology and other documents had been named and were to be included. Mr. Bowen insisted on having back his Woodstock letter. Another curious point in Mr. Claflin's evidence was the statement that when asked to subscribe for the establishment of The Golden Age he was told from Mr. Tilton to consult Mr. Beecher before refusing. On consulting Mr. Beecher the latter proved indifferent and laughed at the idea of his advising Mr. Claflin on a mere matter of business. Mr. Claflin was asked if he had ever denounced Mr. Tilton as a blackmailer, but the counsel for the plaintiff objected. The cross-examination of Mr. Claflin by Mr. Fullerton was of a searching character and evidently annoyed the witness. He took the first fair opportunity to hit back at Mr. Fullerton, and in so doing knocked down the whole array of lawyers on both sides. He had been asked how long it took to arrange the terms of the "Tripartite Agreement." "Not long," answered Mr. Claflin, "they stated their case in person—they were their own lawyers, and got through quick." The hit was so palpable and the retort so fair, under the circumstances, that all joined in the first hearty laugh of the week.

The afternoon session opened with some additional testimony about Mr. Beecher's telegram to Peekskill on June 2, 1878. The defense completed their line of evidence on this point by tracing the dispatch from Brooklyn to the New-York office, and thence to the telegraph office in Peekskill. Miss Louisa J. Wroeger, an operator in the New-York office, identified a copy of the telegram as one of those which she had received from Brooklyn on that day at 8:58 a. m. She also explained the various marks on it by which she could fix its date and the time of its reception. Miss Mary C. Josephs, an operator at the Peekskill office, testified to having received the telegram at Peekskill. The plaintiff's counsel made no efforts to impair the effect of the testimony of these witnesses by cross-examining them.

George F. Williams of The Herald was called, and the defendant's counsel sought to show by him that Mr. Tilton had been engaged in the circulation of the Woodhull scandal, and had allowed proofs of the article containing it to be furnished to the newspapers of the city. The evidence was ruled out, and Mr. Williams left the stand without testifying.

Mr. Charles Storrs, the next witness, gave his account of the discussions between Mr. Tilton and his friends concerning the "Tripartite Covenant" and the arbitration of Mr. Tilton's claims against Mr. Bowen. He corroborated Mr. Claflin's testimony in respect to the agreement that the injurious papers should be destroyed, and related a conversation between Mr. Moulton and himself on that subject, after the arbitration, when Mr. Moulton, in answer to his inquiries said, with a laugh, "O yes; I have burned the papers—that is, Mr. Beecher thinks I have. But if I were to do that, what would Theodore do if any trouble should arise?" It appeared by Mr. Storrs's testimony that he had been on speaking terms with the plaintiff, and had conversed with him at various times during the scandal excitement last Summer. In July Mr. Tilton told the witness that Mrs. Tilton had left him, and added that he (Mr. Tilton) now "felt that the time had come for him to smash his wife and Mr. Beecher." Mr. Storrs also testified that Mr. Moulton had sent for him to come to see him at his house, and on his calling there Mr. Moulton had asked the witness to tell his brother not to sign the report of the Church Committee, and said that Mr. Beecher was guilty and had confessed his adultery, and he (Mr. Moulton) was going to drive Mr. Beecher from Brooklyn. Up to this stage of the proceedings after recess, the evidence had been given with few objections from the plaintiff's counsel, and no arguments of any length. The defense now made an effort to contradict by this witness Mr. Moulton's testimony on cross-examination. Mr. Storrs was asked, "Did Mr. Moulton say Mr. Beecher is a liar and a libertine?" The witness replied, "He said that in substance." The plaintiff's counsel moved to strike out the answer. Mr. Tracy asked that the matter be left open till the next day, when they would cite authorities to show that they had a right to contradict a witness by showing what he said in substance if they could not give his original words. Mr. Fullerton made the point that the cross-examination of Mr. Moulton on this subject was on his exact words alone, and that he was not interrogated on the substance of his language, and, therefore, could not be contradicted by evidence of what it was. Mr. Tracy, amid a murmur of applause, read from the volume report of the trial a question put to Mr. Moulton as to the substance of his words about Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beach seized the book and instantly declared with some heat that the question which Gen. Tracy had read was on a different subject, and that his opponent had acted disingenuously in reading. Mr. Hill came to Mr. Tracy's assistance and declared that the citation was correct, but while he was speaking Mr. Tracy discovered his mistake and promptly acknowledged it, and Mr. Moulton's testimony remained unimpeached by this witness at least. Mr. Storrs's examination was not concluded at the adjournment of the court.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

A SICK WITNESS TO BE EXAMINED IN BED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Nelson—Are you ready to proceed, Mr. Tracy?

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evans—If your Honor please, we regret to have occasion to state to the Court that a witness whom we regard as of importance, and whose attendance we have expected as a man ordinarily in good health, is very sick, and although we have delayed an application until we should be quite sure that we should be disappointed in our hope that he would be well enough to attend, we now feel that his own safety may require him to leave the city, even. That is Mr. Henry M. Cleveland, who is a witness of a good deal of importance, and who is seriously ill, so that he could not attend Court without risk to his life, probably, and yet could sustain an examination where he could have the support of a couch or a bed. We desire that some arrangement should be made, as most acceptable to your Honor, and to our friends here, of least inconvenience to all concerned, for taking his testimony.

Judge Neilson—When is he expected to leave?

Mr. Evarts—Well, he will stay—I don't think he is able to leave now, but we should like to take his testimony as soon as possible.

Judge Neilson—Whatever may be agreeable to the counsel I will consent to. You might take an order to examine him; I will attend if desired.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; it is thought very desirable that your Honor should attend, and we will consult our friends if they will allow us, as to convenience to them.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps some afternoon at 4 o'clock would be agreeable, or some morning at 9.

Mr. Evarts—The afternoon is the only part of the day that his health would permit; in the morning he is too ill.

Judge Neilson—Any afternoon that you will agree upon, at 4 o'clock, I will go with you.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, if they could postpone it until Saturday it would be more agreeable to us.

Mr. Evarts—That would undoubtedly be possible, excepting, as I have stated, we shall have to name a somewhat late hour; probably not so late as 4, but as late as 2 we should have to name, on account of his health. His suffering is of a somewhat peculiar nature, and through the early part of the day he is quite sick.

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps it would be better to leave the day and the hour of the day open for the present, and see what arrangement we can make.

Judge Neilson—Very well, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—But Saturday would be more convenient, as it now strikes me, than any other day.

Mr. Evarts—It may take more than one day within his strength, I mean; he is very seriously sick, and we should like, therefore, to begin next Saturday if our friends think it possible to do so, and your Honor thinks so.

Mr. Fullerton—We may fix upon an earlier day after consultation.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Claflin may take the stand.

HORACE B. CLAFLIN RECALLED.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Claflin is still laboring under his severe indisposition, your Honor, and I shall have to ask Mr. Shearman to repeat his answers to-day as he did yesterday.

Judge Neilson—Yes, that is satisfactory.

By Mr. Tracy—You said last evening, Mr. Claflin, that you were to meet—the arbitrators were to meet at Mr.

Moulton's study. Did that meeting take place? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who were the arbitrators? A. Mr. James Freeland, Mr. Charles Storrs, and myself.

Q. Who of the parties were present at that arbitration? A. They were all present, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Beecher present? A. No, Sir; I thought you spoke of the arbitrators, Sir.

Q. Who of the parties to the arbitration were present? A. Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton also present? A. Yes, Sir.

THE ARBITRATION.

Q. State how the arbitration proceeded. A. Well, Sir, Mr. Tilton made a statement of his case—quite a long argument, perhaps thirty minutes—in which he stated his grievances and went over the whole ground with Mr. Bowen. After he had finished, Mr. Bowen stated his case, occupying much less time; if I remember aright, but a few minutes.

Q. What then was done? A. After they had got through, they left, and we took the matter into consideration.

A. Well, did you agree upon an award that night? A. In about half an hour we made up our minds what it should be.

Q. After having agreed upon the award, what was done? A. Well, Sir, we sent for the parties and announced to them what we had agreed upon.

Q. What persons were in your presence at the time you announced the award you had agreed upon? A. Mr. Bowen, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Moulton.

Q. Who of the arbitrators made the announcement? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. What did you state you had determined upon? A. I said we had made up our minds that they should first burn all the papers connected with the scandal, and that Mr. Bowen should pay Mr. Tilton $7,000 and they should sign the covenant, the Tripartite Agreement, as we called it.

Q. Were any of the papers that were to be burned mentioned by you particularly? A. There was a talk, Sir, about a letter of apology, I think, and the letter was spoken of, prepared—which was then in print—prepared by Mr. Tilton, of the 1st of January, 1871.

Mr. Shearman—[Repeating]—And the letter was spoken of, which was then in print, prepared by Mr. Tilton on the 1st of January, 1871.

Q. Well, you say those letters were mentioned particularly—those papers? A. Those, Sir, and all the papers connected with the scandal were to be destroyed.

Q. Well, after you had announced your award, what was said by the parties—Mr. Tilton or Mr. Bowen, or either of them? A. Well, Sir, they—Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton—agreed to it; they seemed satisfied with the the sum awarded, and said they would acquiesce in the decision; and, as to burning the papers, Mr. Bowen said he had no papers, but he would like the return of the Woodstock letter, which was agreed to.

Q. What else was said or done—anything said by Mr. Tilton about his signing the Tripartite Agreement? A. Well, after the award was made I brought out the paper for them to sign. Mr. Tilton said: "I want to alter that paper." "Why," I said, "Mr. Tilton, you perfectly understand that paper; it is just what you have agreed to." He acquiesced in that, but said, notwithstanding that, that he insisted upon altering it.

Q. Go on. A. Well, I asked him what alterations he desired to make, and he said he would soon—he took his pencil and said he would soon indicate what they were, and he interlined the paper, and I think he wrote—I think he put some part of it to some extract on another paper which was attached to it by—it was either pinned to it, or a seal, or something—it was some way attached to the agreement, so he understood how it read.

Mr. Shearman [Repeating]—Some way attached to the agreement so that we understood how it read.

Q. Well, what then? A. Well, the paper was then—the paper was then satisfactory; I asked Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen—I believe they all said they were satisfied.

Q. What then occurred? A. There was considerable talk; it was prolonged for some time, and I took the paper and I carried it to Sam Wilkeson, as he had drafted the paper, to make a clean copy.

MR. BOWEN GIVES HIS CHECK AT THE ARBITRATION.

Q. Well, before proceeding to that, Mr. Claflin, did Mr. Bowen give his check to Mr. Tilton that night? A. Oh! Mr. Bowen gave his check on the spot, Sir.

Q. I present "Exhibit D, 108;" look at that check; is that the check given by Mr. Bowen on that occasion to Mr. Tilton? A. I don't know whether I saw the check, Sir, but I know that it was given; Mr. Bowen was very prompt about it, and he turned to me and said he didn't know how his—what the state of his exchequer was; he asked me if I would lend him the money, and I told him I would with pleasure.

Q. Well, what did he do then; did he fill out the check? A. He filled out the check immediately; it was done within a very short time—five minutes.

Q. What was done with the check after he filled it out? A. I don't know, Sir; I did not seem him pass it to Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton—I don't remember that I did; I presume it was handed.

Mr. Beach—"I presume" what?

Mr. Shearman [repeating]—"I presume it was handed!"

Mr. Tracy—Did you observe the date of the check? A. Yes, Sir; April 4, I think.

Q. Does that enable you to fix the date of this arbitration? A. Yes, Sir; it was the 3d or 4th, it must have been; I presume it was the 3d, for I think, as it was after bank hours, the presumption would be that that check was dated the next day.

Q. How soon after Mr. Tilton's altering the agreement, and saying it was satisfactory, did Mr. Bowen make out this check? A. Oh, it was done immediately, Sir; the check part of it. Mr. Bowen showed very great promptness and willingness in completing the arrangement.

Q. State whether or not the making out of this check was the last act that was done that night in closing the arbitration? A. I think it was, Sir; it was the last thing of any importance.

MR. CLAFLIN THE CUSTODIAN OF THE COVENANT.

Q. I understand you to say that you took the Tripartite Agreement away with you that night, and took it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. I took it to Mr. Wilkeson; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you take it that night or the next day? A. I took it away that night; I think I carried it with me away.

Q. When did you take it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. I took it the next day—probably the next day, I am not quite certain about it, but I presume I took it the next morning.

Q. Did you afterward receive a clean copy, or an engrossed copy of this Tripartite Agreement from Mr. Wilkeson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you do with it? A. I have forgotten who saw the paper first.

Q. You mean which of the parties saw it first? A. Yes, Sir; I think I carried the paper to Mr. Charles Storrs—that is my impression—to go to Mr. —, to take to Mr. Bowen, and that the paper was returned to me, if it did go to Mr. Storrs, without any signature, and I afterwards took it to Mr. Bowen, and Mr. Bowen signed it.

Q. What then became of it? A. I have forgotten who took it next, Sir, but I think Mr. Storrs took it.

Q. Well, was it afterwards returned to you with Mr. Tilton's signature? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you then do with it? A. I took it to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well? A. And he signed it.

Q. What then became of it? A. Then I kept the paper.

Q. You have been the custodian of the paper since, have you? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. CLAFLIN SOLICITED TO SUBSCRIBE FOR GOLDEN AGE STOCK.

Q. Now, Mr. Claflin, I desire to call your attention to a conversation between yourself and Mr. Southwick, in the early part of 1871, about your subscribing to the stock of The Golden Age; did you have a conversation with Mr. Southwick on that subject? A. Yes, Sir, I had.

Q. Was anything said to you by him about your consulting Mr. Beecher—

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy [continuing the question]—as to whether you had better subscribe or not?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—We consider that very material, your Honor, and admissible. The evidence of Mr. Southwick shows that Mr. Tilton requested him to solicit Mr. Claflin to subscribe to the stock of The Golden Age, and on Mr. Southwick's expression of doubt whether Mr. Claflin would do so, Mr. Tilton says to him, "You have Mr. Claflin consult Mr. Beecher as to whether he had better subscribe to the stock of The Golden Age, and Mr. Beecher will advise him to subscribe." "Well," says Southwick, "I will say so to Mr. Claflin." He says he did say so to Mr. Claflin, and that Mr. Claflin reported to him that he had consulted Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Beecher declined so to advise, and Mr. Southwick reported that fact to Mr. Tilton. Now, I ask the witness whether he did, as a matter of fact, apply to Mr. Beecher for advice, and what advice he received on that subject.

Judge Neilson—You cannot take the conversation. You can take the simple fact that, after conversation with Mr. Southwick, he did consider the question himself and did confer with Mr. Beecher, and that Mr. Beecher declined to advise him, if that was so. You can take the result simply.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; I will take the result of the conversation; I am satisfied with that.

Mr. Tracy—Did you have such a conversation with Mr. Southwick? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you, in pursuance of that conversation, apply to Mr. Beecher to know whether you should take stock in The Golden Age? A. I did.

Q. And you had a conversation with him on that subject? Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he, or did he not, advise you to so subscribe?

Mr. Beach—We object to that question, and take exception to its admission.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Shearman—[To the Witness]. You can answer. Did he, or did he not, so advise you?

Judge Neilson—Do not tell anything that was said except yes or no.

The Witness—Shall I tell what was said, Sir?

Judge Neilson—No; state the result.

The Witness—Yes, Sir. Well, he told me—

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

The Witness—Well, he was utterly indifferent about it. Said he, "You know more about business matters than I do; it is purely a business matter; I am incompetent to advise you on any business matter."

Judge Neilson—Well, he did not advise? A. No, Sir; he did not.

Mr. Tracy—Did you so report to Mr. Southwick? A. I did.

Q. Mr. Claflin, do you remember the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal? A. Yes, Sir; I remember it.

THE SCHEME FOR A NEW NEWSPAPER

Q. Do you recollect the date of the publication? A. I think that was in—it was about the last of October, 1872, I think, Sir, just before I came from the country.

Q. In the December following, did you have a conversation with Frank B. Carpenter and others concerning a newspaper enterprise? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who applied to you touching that enterprise? A. I think Mr. Carpenter.

Q. Did you, in pursuance of his request, have a meeting with any gentlemen in Brooklyn, where that subject was discussed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was that meeting? A. That meeting was at Mr. Bowen's.

Q. When was it? A. That was—I think it was in December, 1872, Sir. It was—

Q. The fore part or the latter part of December? A. I should think it was the last of December. It was after the death of Mr. Greeley, I think, Sir.

Q. Who was present at that meeting at Mr. Bowen's house. A. Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Charles Storrs, Mr. Bowen and myself.

Q. How long had you known Charles Storrs? A. I had not known him very much, Sir, until about that time; until within a year or so of that time.

Q. As a merchant in New York residing in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir, I knew of him; I had not met him personally.

Q. Did you at that time know him as a friend of Mr. Tilton's? A. Well, I thought he was.

Q. And had you been for a long time well known as a friend of Mr. Beecher's? A. I suppose I had, Sir. I attended his church for a good while.

Q. How long? how late was that interview at Mr. Bowen's house protracted between you four gentlemen on the subject of a newspaper? A. It was quite a long interview, Sir: it lasted until late in the evening.

Q. What was the scheme that was canvassed and considered?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—I expect, your Honor, to bring this conversation home to Mr. Tilton afterward. It is a mere question of the order of proof.

Judge Neilson—I think you have it sufficiently. It was the scheme of starting a paper; that is the subject that was considered.

Mr. Tracy—Was it the scheme of starting a new paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who were to be the parties to be interested in that paper?

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Mr. Tracy—I do not ask what was the scheme; I ask who were to be the parties to be interested in it.

Mr. Beach—That he can only know from what was said.

Judge Neilson—Yes; we cannot take it. It does not yet appear that Mr. Johnson had any authority to speak for Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Shearman—Carpenter, your Honor, not Johnson.

Mr. Tracy—I shall show the conversation brought home to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Very well. I think we cannot take it at present.

Mr. Tracy—After that conversation—I will ask you this fact, did you refuse to subscribe for the enterprise?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—That is a fact.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, it is a fact that grows out of—

Judge Neilson—You can ask him whether he did or did not subscribe. His refusing, I think, is—

Q. Did you subscribe for that enterprise? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did you favor the enterprise?

Mr. Beach—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—That is immaterial.

Q. After this conversation, did you see Mr. Tilton? A. I don't remember, Sir, whether I did or not. Do you mean in relation to this enterprise?

Q. No. I ask you—I call your attention to a conversation where the subject of blackmail was talked about between yourself and Mr. Tilton—did you have such a conversation? A. Oh! Mr. Tilton came to my house one night, and said he had heard that I had called him a blackmailer; I asked him who told him so; he did not tell me who told him so; the conversation turned upon his relations with Mr. Beecher—

Q. Now, Sir, had you at any time before that called upon Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Claflin had not finished.

Mr. Tracy—Ah, excuse me.

Mr. Shearman [to the witness]—Had you finished?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you at any time before that called Mr. Tilton a blackmailer?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We can't take that.

Mr. Tracy—I submit, your Honor, that that is admissible and material, for this reason, Mr. Tilton comes to Mr. Claflin and says: "I understand you have called me a blackmailer"—

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Tracy—Now, I propose to show that in this conversation at Mr. Bowen's Mr. Claflin did say that Mr. Tilton was a blackmailer—

Judge Neilson—Well, you can give the conversation which occurred when Mr. Tilton was present.

Mr. Tracy—No, Mr. Tilton was not present, but the conversation had been repeated to him, and he comes and says to Mr. Claflin, "I understand you have called me a blackmailer." Now, I propose to show by Mr. Claflin that he had called him a blackmailer, and that the only conversation in which he had denounced him as a blackmailer was that conversation at Mr. Bowen's house, when this scheme of starting a newspaper was discussed.

Judge Neilson—It is a previous, independent conversation, where Mr. Tilton was not present, and I don't think we can take it. If the plaintiff came to this witness and inquired whether he had charged him with being a blackmailer and the witness made answer and avowed he had, that would be competent; but the independent fact lying beyond is immaterial.

Mr. Tracy—I will ask the question, and take your Honor's ruling on the subject. Will the stenographer please read the question, so that I may see whether it is in form?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows:

"Now, Sir, had you at any time before that called Mr. Tilton a blackmailer?"

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out, unless it was in Mr. Tilton's presence.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Certainly, Sir.

Q. State whether or not you had at this conversation at Mr. Bowen's house called Mr. Tilton a blackmailer?

Judge Neilson—The same ruling.

Mr. Tracy—I submit, if your Honor please, that the fact of that conversation—that he came to Mr. Claflin and asked him that question shows that this conversation had been repeated by some one or other to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—That might be. It may have been repeated to him, but not adopted by him.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will please note our exception. I will put another question. [To the witness.] In that conversation did you understand Mr. Tilton as referring to the interview that you had had touching the newspaper scheme at Mr. Bowen's house?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out, because we must take the understanding from what was said.

Mr. Tracy—Inasmuch as I could not get that—

Judge Neilson—You are at liberty to give the conversation Mr. Tilton had.

Mr. Tracy—That is all, I believe, on that subject. [To plaintiff's counsel.] You may examine the witness.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF HORACE B. CLAF-LIN.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Clafin, when do I understand you to say the first meeting was had between you and any other person in regard to this matter? A. The agreement, Sir, do you mean—this Tripartite Agreement?

Q. The first meeting that you had with any person with regard to this subject matter of which you spoke yesterday? A. I think the first meeting I had was at Mr. Moulton's.

Q. On what day of the month was it? A. It must have been one of the last days of March.

Q. Of what year? A. 1872.

Q. Now, will you name the persons who were present? A. Yes, Sir; they were Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Sam Wilkeson and myself.

Q. Mr. Bowen was not present then? A. No, Sir.

Q. At whose request did you attend at that meeting? A. I think Mr. Beecher asked me to go there, Sir; I am not quite certain, but before I went, I think Mr. Moulton sent for me or came around to the house. I think I was a little late, and they sent around for me; I am not certain about that.

Q. Had you seen Mr. Bowen before you went to that meeting? No, Sir.

Q. When was the next meeting between you and any of those gentlemen? A. The next meeting was a night or two after.

Q. Be particular, if you please, and state whether it was a night or two nights after. A. I think it was Tuesday night; I am not quite certain; I think it was Tuesday night. The first meeting was Sunday night, the second was Monday or Tuesday, I think it was Tuesday.

Q. Between those meetings did you see Mr. Bowen? A. That Sunday night I think likely I did, Sir.

Q. Is that as near as you can come to stating whether you actually saw him or not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have no distinct recollection of having seen him? A. I am not positive whether I saw him before the next meeting; I think I did, however.

Q. It is merely an impression of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now will you state what took place at the first meeting? A. Yes, Sir; at the first meeting Mr. Tilton showed me the press copy of the letter of 1871, called the "Personal Statement," which he said he would publish in the next Golden Age unless he got satisfaction from Mr. Bowen in the way of a settlement.

Q. In whose presence was that said; I mean who were present besides yourself? A. These gentlemen that I have mentioned—they were all present.

Q. Go on with the narration now as to what occurred at that meeting? A. Well, Sir, when I saw this article that he proposed publishing, I said it would be a very great wrong to all concerned to publish that, it could do him no good and might do much harm; it was a great scandal to be published to the world.

Q. I have asked you for the whole of what occurred at that interview, and when you get through I will put another question? A. Further than that Mr. Wilkeson proposed that they sign an agreement. I said I thought Mr. Bowen could be persuaded to pay Mr. Tilton—I told him so—what was his due, and Mr. Wilkeson said they must sign an agreement apiece. I told him I quite agreed with him, that it was quite time they had. Mr. Wilkeson produced a rough draft, if I remember aright, of such an agreement, and it was talked over for a long while, and it was finally concluded that if a settlement could be made with Mr. Bowen, that Mr. Tilton would sign it.

Q. No, I asked what was said, and not what was concluded. A. We only concluded from what was said—I had no other way to conclude except from what these gentlemen said.

Q. If you will tell us what was said, Mr. Clafin.

Mr. Shearman—One moment. I cannot talk to two at once.

Mr. Fullerton—You can keep quiet while I am talking.

Mr. Shearman—The witness said it was agreed they should sign it—that a settlement was had.

Mr. Tracy—I say that is an answer to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I say it is not.

Judge Neilson—I think we will let it stand. You can repeat your question.

Mr. Fullerton—Is this witness to determine that there was an agreement there on that occasion?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he assumes to determine that important fact. I want him to tell us what occurred, and let the jury determine whether it amounted to the dignity of an agreement or not.

Judge Neilson—Well, the witness understands that now.

Mr. Tracy—If your Honor will pardon me—

Judge Neilson—I will let it stand, unless you insist on striking it out.

Mr. Tracy—Oh, I beg your pardon; I thought the ruling was the other way.

Judge Neilson—We will take the conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—Let his conclusion stand and take the conversation!

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—We except to that ruling, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—I want you to state, Mr. Clafin, what was said by the parties at that interview, and let others determine whether it was an agreement or not. A. Mr. Tilton insisted all the way through that this publication would be made, and nothing could stop it except a settlement was made by Mr. Bowen. Mr. Bowen, he said, had treated him very badly in the discontinuance of this contract that had been made, and he was going to have satisfaction, and unless he had it he would publish that agreement.

Q. Publish that agreement? A. Publish that statement—"Personal Statement."

Q. Well? A. Well, Sir, there was considerable talk.

Q. That considerable talk is what I want. A. I cannot remember what it was; I could not give you the language; I could not of what I talked with my partner only yesterday on an important subject, but I know that that was the subject of the conversation.

Q. What you have now stated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have now stated all you can recollect? A. It was agreed that we should have a meeting the next evening.

Mr. Morris—No.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—That is a mere agreement.

Mr. Fullerton—Before you come to that I want to know whether you can relate all that you remember that took place between the parties in regard to the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. It was said by Mr. Wilkeson and myself that we had no doubt Mr. Bowen would come into an arrangement or a settlement in some way by arbitration, and that that being done it was understood that the papers that we were talking about, that Mr. Wilkeson had spoken of, should be burned.

Q. You are speaking now of the first meeting? A. Yes, Sir; Sunday night.

Q. If you remember anything else please state it? A. I think I have given you the substance of the conversation that night. It ran into the meeting of the next night very much.

Q. The conversation of the first night did not run into the meeting of the second night, did it? A. We proposed to continue the meeting the next night.

Q. Mr. Claflin, don't intermingle the two occasions. I want you to go on and state, until you have exhausted your memory, as to what occurred at the first meeting; leave the second meeting by itself. A. Yes, Sir. Well, Sir, I believe I have stated the substance of that meeting.

Q. A moment since you said that something was agreed upon there. Have you stated all that occurred there, and all that was said by any party to that meeting, from which you inferred there was an agreement? A. I spoke of an agreement alluding to the "Personal Statement." I correct myself there, Sir. When I spoke of his agreement I meant the "Personal Statement."

Q. You said, in effect, that something was agreed to in that conversation on the first meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now have you stated all that was there said by any party there from which you inferred that something was agreed to? A. I said that Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton—

Mr. Fullerton—You are not answering my question.

The Witness—Won't you please give me the question again?

THE PAPER OFFERED BY MR. WILKESON.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you now stated all that occurred at that first meeting from which you inferred something had been agreed to? A. Doubtless I have not, for the meeting lasted three or four hours; there was a great deal no doubt said that I have not told you, but I have given you the substance.

Q. Have you now stated all that you remember that occurred there from which you inferred an agreement had been made? A. I don't think of anything now, Sir.

Q. Very well; we will pass on. You have said that Mr. Wilkeson produced some paper that he had drawn up? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he read it? A. Yes, Sir; I think he did.

Q. Was that the paper which you stated yesterday was satisfactory to all parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the paper which Mr. Tilton then proposed to sign? A. No, Sir; it was not.

Q. What paper, if any, did he propose to sign? A. A similar paper that had been made more complete.

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Fullerton—I am speaking of the first paper.

The Witness—No, Sir; he didn't speak of any paper that he was ready to sign that evening; he didn't propose to sign it; it was merely an agreement that seemed satisfactory. The next evening he spoke—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, don't get to the next meeting, I beg of you; you will get things mixed, if you don't keep quiet.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—There was no proposition on his part to sign that paper on the first evening? A. It was not ready for signature.

Q. I don't ask you that; I want you to pay attention to my question. A. He expressed a willingness to sign a paper such as that, in effect; he was ready to sign it the next evening, which was finally agreed to; Mr. Tilton gave us the substance of that agreement as it was finally consummated—Mr. Wilkeson did; it was altered somewhat, but it was in substance the same paper.

Q. It is all irresponsible to my question, Mr. Claflin. Was there any proposition that Mr. Tilton should sign the paper which Mr. Wilkeson read at that first meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who made that proposition? A. I don't know whether I did or Mr. Wilkeson; I think Mr. Wilkeson made it.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say to that proposition? A. Mr. Tilton expressed his willingness to come into such an agreement as that; I don't know the language he used.

Q. What did he say to the proposition to sign that paper which Mr. Wilkeson read that night? A. I don't think it was proposed to sign the paper, for the paper was not ready for signature, as I remember.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton make any objection to any of the terms of the paper which Mr. Wilkeson read? A. I think he did propose to alter it, and I think it was altered.

Q. The first night? A. I think it was altered after Mr. Wilkeson produced it.

Q. Who made the alteration? A. I think Mr. Tilton made it, or suggested—I don't know whether he got it so far as to make it; I don't know that the paper was sufficiently complete to alter, but it was—

Q. Pray, Mr. Claflin, tell us whether any alterations were proposed or made that evening of that paper, as you remember? A. As I remember it, it was a rough draft of a paper.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. Tracy—He is proceeding to answer the question.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not an answer to my question.

Mr. Tracy—It is not an entire answer; he is beginning to answer it.

Mr. Fullerton—He begins wrong, then.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Fullerton]—You had better repeat your question.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask you to tell me whether there were any alterations made to that paper there that evening by any one? A. Mr. Tilton, I think, made some suggestions as to what he would sign and what he would not, but the paper I don't think was sufficiently complete to really alter.

Q. Were any alterations suggested that night which were reduced to writing? A. I don't remember any, Sir, that night.

Q. Well, did they agree upon a form paper which would be satisfactory to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He stated that he would sign such a paper, if prepared? A. He said he would sign such a paper—a similar paper.

Q. A paper such as Mr. Wilkeson had prepared, with Mr. Tilton's amendments? A. Yes, sir; such a paper.

THE SECOND MEETING ON THE ARBITRATION.

Q. Now, then, we come to the next meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That, you think, was on Tuesday evening? A. I think that was Tuesday.

Q. May it not have been on Monday? A. I think it was Tuesday.

Q. How positive are you upon that subject? A. Well, I am entirely positive.

Q. If it were not on Tuesday, then you think it was on Monday, do you not? A. It was within a day or two; it might have been Wednesday, possibly.

Q. Give us your best recollection upon the subject? A. My best recollection was Tuesday; I am almost certain it was Tuesday.

Q. If not Tuesday, then what do you think? Was it Monday or Tuesday? A. Well, I don't believe it was the next day after Sunday.

Q. Is that all that you can say upon that subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where did you meet, then, if it were Tuesday? A. We met at Mr. Moulton's study—the same place.

Q. And did Mr. Wilkeson produce the paper there in a perfect form? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Embodying the suggestions of Mr. Tilton. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it read over? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By whom? A. Mr. Wilkeson I think read the paper.

Q. Now, in whose presence was that paper read? A. We were all present—these gentlemen mentioned—Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Wilkeson and myself.

Q. Mr. Bowen was not there? A. No, Sir, he was not there.

Q. When that paper was read over, what did Mr. Tilton say in regard to it? A. Mr. Tilton said he was satisfied with the paper and would sign it. Says he: "I will sign it five times or ten times," or something, "if Mr. Bowen will sign it once, but I don't believe Mr. Bowen will sign it."

Q. What else did he say in regard to signing it? A. Well, I said I thought Mr. Bowen would sign it. We still talked about it, and he thought he would not. There was considerable talk about it. Mr. Moulton was uncertain.

Q. Can you remember anything else now that Mr. Tilton said with respect to the signing of that paper, or anything that any one else said in regard to the signing of that paper at that second meeting? A. I think I assigned some reasons there, as they seemed quite certain he would not sign it. I assigned some reasons why I thought he would. I said Mr. Bowen had two newspapers—was the owner of two newspapers, and I thought it would be—the publication of this scandal that was threatened would injure him in his papers, and I thought, on the whole, Mr. Bowen would be disposed to do right, and that he would sign it.

Q. Mr. Claflin, I am asking you what was said at that second meeting in regard to Mr. Tilton signing that paper. Now, if you recollect anything else, I would be very much obliged to you if you would state it? A. I remember, Sir—the principal thing I remember about that is his readiness to sign it. He expressed an entire willingness to sign it; I think he took a pen to sign it.

Q. That is the point. A. I think he did.

Q. Now, tell me what he said when he expressed a willingness to sign it? A. Well, Sir, when he expressed a willingness to sign it, I think he took up his pen to sign it; I said to him: "Mr. Tilton, perhaps you had better not sign it now; I will take the paper to Mr. Bowen, and I shall tell Mr. Bowen that I am sure you and Mr. Beecher will sign it if he does; it is a sort of a peace offering all around, and I think it will be signed on the part of the whole of you."

Q. Now, what did Mr. Tilton say when he expressed a willingness to sign it, and took up a pen? A. Well, Sir, what I have said; he said he would sign it two or three times, or a dozen times, or twenty times, if Mr. Bowen would sign it once—I don't know how many times—quite emphatic.

Q. Did he say in substance "I will sign it, and I will sign it now half a dozen times if Mr. Bowen will sign it once?" A. Something like that.

Q. And on saying that he picked up the pen to execute his purpose? A. I think he did.

Q. Did you not restrain him from thus signing it? A. Yes, Sir; I said: "You had better not sign it."

Q. From what you observed don't you think he would have signed it if you had not made that suggestion? A. I have no doubt he would; I have no doubt at all.

Q. Now, Sir, will you be kind enough to state what occurred at that second interview upon any subject other than the signing of that paper—I mean something you have not related on your cross-examination? A. No, Sir, I don't think of anything; there may have been other things said. It was quite a long talk there.

Q. That don't satisfy me. I want you to state what you remember was said, and, if you cannot remember anything further, if you so state I will be satisfied? A. In the course of the evening I think I took the paper to Mr. Bowen some time.

Q. I want to know what occurred before you left with the paper to go to Mr. Bowen's? A. Well, Sir, I think I have told you the substance of all I recollect.

Q. You think you cannot recollect anything more? A. I don't think of anything at this moment.

Q. Nothing occurs to you that Mr. Tilton said that night that you have not related now? A. No, Sir; not at this moment.

Q. You took the paper and went to Mr. Bowen's, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And left it with him? A. I think I did that evening; yes, Sir.

Q. Left the paper with him? A. I left the paper.

Q. For his consideration? Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you return again to Mr. Moulton's house that evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And were Mr. Wilkeson and Mr. Moulton there? A. They were all there; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what occurred after you returned? A. Well, they were rather dissatisfied—

Mr. Fullerton—No, no.

The Witness—Well, Mr. Wilkeson said—

Mr. Fullerton—That is what I want.

The Witness—Mr. Wilkeson said I ought not to have left the paper; Mr. Wilkeson or Mr. Tilton said that, I have forgotten which of them—I am not sure about that—that I should not see the paper signed in the shape it was; I ought to have completed it on the spot; I said Mr. Bowen ought to have time to think of the thing and consider it, if he was going to sign the paper; it would be good for nothing; it would be of no value if he signed it without consideration, or something like that, and that I thought there was a propriety in leaving it.

Q. My question covers all that was said after your return from Mr. Bowen's, Mr. Claffin; don't forget that.

A. Yes, Sir; well, Sir, I talked with Mr. Bowen, and I am sure with these other gentlemen.

Q. Well, one moment, Mr. Claffin. Mr. Bowen was not at Mr. Moulton's house? A. No; but at his house.

Q. We have gone away from Mr. Bowen's and gone back to Mr. Moulton's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Don't get out of that house too suddenly. Tell me all that occurred after you returned to Mr. Moulton's house from Mr. Bowen's? A. Then it was proposed to have an arbitration, and Mr. Tilton, I think, proposed Charles Storrs; I think he had mentioned the name before.

THE NAMING OF THE ARBITRATORS.

Q. Now, who proposed the arbitration? A. I am not certain, Sir, but I don't know whether it was spoken of by me or by Tilton or Wilkeson first; I think it was by one of us—either Wilkeson or myself.

Q. Can you give the language that was employed in making that proposition? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it something like this, whoever used it: "I now propose that the difficulty between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton be submitted to arbitrators?" A. Probably it was, Sir; that would be about the language that would be likely to be used.

Q. Well, does that square with your recollection on the subject? A. I have no recollection about the language at all, not the slightest.

Q. How? A. I have not the slightest recollection what the language was.

Q. Well, have you any recollection of what Mr. Tilton's reply to the proposition was? A. No, Sir; except that it was agreed to.

Q. Well, did he say in substance, "I will agree to that?" A. Yes, I think he did; he or Moulton said, or both.

Q. Who named the first arbitrator? A. I am not certain, Sir. I think I named Mr. Freeland to Mr. Tilton and Moulton, and to Mr. Bowen when I went to see him.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, I move to strike that out, Sir; I don't want the witness to interject anything.

Mr. Tracy—The answer evidently is not completed.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will strike out as far as it has got, any way.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it becomes responsive if the witness adds, "and I repeated his name there at that meeting to these parties."

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he has not added it, and I don't think he will, under your suggestion.

Mr. Tracy—You don't give him any opportunity to add it. You interrupted him, as is customary, in the midst of his answer.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness can answer very directly. Repeat your question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I want that stricken out.

Judge Neilson—That is stricken out.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well. Now, Mr. Claffin, will you be kind enough to tell me who named the first arbitrator at that meeting at Mr. Moulton's house? A. I couldn't do it, Sir; it is impossible.

Q. Did you name any one? A. I don't remember. I think there were half a dozen names spoken of.

Q. Did you name any one? A. I don't remember naming any one but Mr. Freeland.

Q. Did you name Mr. Freeland? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, who did Mr. Tilton name? A. I think he named Charles Storrs.

Q. Who named the third man? A. I don't know that he was named, Sir. I don't know how I came in there, I am sure. I went there at the suggestion—

Q. No, I beg your pardon. I don't want you to tell me at whose suggestion you went there; I am talking about what took place after you got there. A. Yes.

Q. You didn't name yourself? A. No, Sir; I didn't name myself.

Q. And you don't know who named you? A. I don't know.

Q. Well, were you named that night? A. It was certainly understood—

Q. No, were you named that night as an arbitrator? A. I certainly didn't name myself, and I don't remember either of these gentlemen saying—

Q. No, Mr. Claflin; won't you bear in mind the question; were you named that night as an arbitrator after you returned from Mr. Bowen's, or were you named at some subsequent period in the history of that arbitration? A. I don't remember being named at all, Sir.

Q. That does not answer my question.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, it does, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it does. If he don't remember being named at all, he certainly don't remember being named that night.

Judge Neilson—I think that is so, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, I don't want it a subject of reasoning, I want it as a positive fact.

Mr. Tracy—That would require very little reasoning.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason you are capable of doing it. [To the witness.] Now, will you tell me whether you were named as an arbitrator that night? A. I don't recollect; I can't tell you; it is impossible to tell you.

Q. You have no recollection of having been named? A. I don't remember of having been named, Sir.

THE DRAWING OF THE PAPERS.

Q. Were any papers prepared that night in reference to the arbitration? A. The paper that I have spoken of; no other paper.

Q. Do you refer to the Tripartite Agreement? A. Yes, Sir; I don't remember any other papers. Mr. Tilton spoke of his agreements with Mr. Bowen.

Q. But I am speaking of the others. Mr. Claflin, you don't pay attention to my question.

Mr. Shearman—I beg pardon, Mr. Fullerton; you are asking about papers, and now he has been answering about papers. Agreements are papers.

By Mr. Fullerton—Were any papers prepared that night in reference to the arbitration after you returned from Mr. Bowen's? A. No, Sir; there were no writings in relation to the arbitration.

Q. That is what I want to get at. None whatever; I don't think there were.

Q. There was no submission drawn up and signed that night? A. No, Sir, not for the arbitration; there certainly was not; I think not.

Q. That is just the point of my inquiry. Were you present at a subsequent period when the arbitration papers were drawn up and signed? A. Yes, Sir; I was present when the arbitrators met.

Q. That doesn't answer my question. A. No, Sir; I was at no other meeting; there was no other meeting between that and the meeting in which the arbitrators met; there was no intermediate meeting, Sir.

Q. You don't answer my question, Mr. Claflin; were you ever present when arbitration papers were signed? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir. There were no papers of that kind that I remember. I thought I answered that before, Sir.

Q. Wasn't there a submission to arbitration signed by both parties? A. No, Sir.

Q. By Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; it was a verbal affair, Sir, entirely, as I remember it.

Q. How? A. It was a verbal affair entirely, as I remember it.

Judge Neilson—It would seem from that to have been a mere common law operation.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it seems from that.

Mr. Shearman—[Sotto voce.] "Seems, madam, nay, it is."

Q. Don't you recollect that after the arbitrators made their award that the written submission was given to Mr. Bowen, and he took it away with him? A. Written submission?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Of the case to the arbitrators?

Q. Yes. A. I don't remember it, Sir.

Q. You have no recollection upon that subject? A. I haven't any recollection about that.

Q. Well, when did the arbitrators meet to hear the statements of the respective parties? A. They met the night following this Tuesday night, or else the next night Wednesday or Thursday night, I think, Sir.

Q. Well, did they meet the next night after that second meeting of which you have spoken? A. I am not certain, Sir; it was the first or second night after; I think the second.

Q. And where did they meet? A. At the same place.

Q. Who were present at the meeting of the arbitrators? A. Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Bowen, Mr. Freeland, Mr. Charles Storrs and myself.

Q. Statements were made by the respective parties, I understood you to say? A. Yes, Sir; they were their own lawyers, and we got through quick. [Laughter.]

Mr. Tracy (to Mr. Beach)—That was an unkind remark.

Mr. Shearman—I think we ought to move to strike that out.

THE WRITING OF THE CHECK.

Mr. Fullerton—How long after the award was made before Mr. Bowen drew his check? A. It was immediately, Sir, as I remember.

Q. Had he a blank check with him? A. I don't know whether he had, or whether he borrowed one; I am uncertain about it.

Q. Did you lend him the money to pay the award? A. No, Sir, I did not; he did not need it; I agreed to; I remember his asking me. It was done so quick he said he didn't know what the state of his finances were, and he wanted to draw a check, and said he: "Will you lend me the money if I haven't the money?" and I said, "I will, with pleasure."

Q. He did not borrow it, or any part of it, from you? A. I think he came to my office the next morning and said he didn't want it.

Q. Do you recollect whether anything was said, when he drew that check, about dating it ahead? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Tax your recollection, now, please? A. It might have been dated the next morning; it very probably was.

Q. No, I want your recollection upon the subject; I am not inquiring as to the probabilities of the case? A. I am quite sure that it was not dated ahead, for he certainly had the money; there was no occasion for dating it ahead, for I was going to give the money if he hadn't it.

Q. Now, I sincerely hope that you will answer my question, and not indulge in any reflections upon the subject. A. I was giving the reason why I supposed it was not dated ahead.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that the witness has answered.

Judge Neilson—The counsel asked him if anything was said about dating it ahead.

The Witness—There was not.

Mr. Tracy—He said there was not.

Mr. Fullerton—And he said a good deal more than that, and he added, it could not be possible because, and so on. [To the witness.] Now, I ask you what he said; do you recollect a suggestion of this kind, "I don't know whether I have got the money or not, and I will date my check ahead"? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see the check which was drawn? A. I don't think I did; I know it was drawn; I saw him drawing the check.

Q. Do you know whether or not the date was then and there inserted as of the date when it was drawn? A. I think it was.

Q. Do you know, I ask you? A. I don't know that I saw the check; I couldn't say.

Q. Very well; that is what I want you to say. Was anything said to Mr. Tilton at the time of delivering that check as to when it should be deposited for collection? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you mean by that that you don't recollect, or that you have a positive recollection that nothing was said? A. I don't remember that anything was said, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Claflin, have you stated all that was said between the parties, that you recollect of, in reference to the arbitration of the difficulties between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen, on your cross-examination? A. No, Sir; I cannot have stated all that was said, for we talked about—

Q. Have you stated all that you can recollect that was said? A. All that I remember, Sir.

Q. I come now to the execution of the "Tripartite Agreement." You were present when some of the parties signed it, I understand you to say? A. I think I was present when Mr. Bowen signed it and when Mr. Beecher signed it; I was not when Mr. Tilton signed it.

Q. Which of the parties signed it first? A. I am not quite certain; I think Mr. Bowen signed it first—Mr. Bowen or Mr. Tilton; Mr. Beecher signed it last, I know.

Q. What became of this printed slip which you saw at the first meeting? A. That was attached to this agreement.

Q. The very one which you saw then was attached to the agreement? A. I think the very one, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect the fact that it was attached when you procured the signature of one of the parties to it? A. I think it was, Sir.

Q. And formed a part of the document, did it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that paper read over during any one of these conversations that you have related? A. I don't know whether it was read, Sir, aloud, but it was passed around and each one looked at it; I remember reading the paper myself, and I think it was read by the whole. I don't know but it was read aloud; I am not certain.

Q. Did not Mr. Tilton assert in those conversations, whenever that paper was alluded to, or upon some one of the occasions when it was alluded to, that its statements, so far as he was concerned, were true? A. I don't remember of his saying anything about it, Sir; I don't think he did, Sir.

Q. Was the truth of the statements discussed at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not, nor did any one there, charge that they were untrue, did you? A. We did not go into that, I think.

Q. How? A. I don't think we went into that much, Sir

Q. That was not discussed then at all? A. I don't think it was, Sir.

Q. Do you know what became of the original draft of that proposed "Tripartite Agreement" which Mr. Wilkeson produced and read at the first meeting at Mr. Moulton's house. A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see it after that first meeting? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know what became of any proposed alteration, which Mr. Tilton prepared, to that agreement at any time, if he did prepare one? A. I don't remember about that, Sir. Mr. Tilton—the agreement that he interlined, when I spoke of his attaching another paper, and which was to be incorporated—that was at the second meeting.

Q. My question embraced any of these meetings? A. Yes, Sir; the second; I don't know what became of that paper, Sir.

Q. What did you do with the paper thus emended; didn't you take it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. I took that paper to Mr. Wilkeson; yes, Sir.

Q. When did you take it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. The next day, to have it complete.

Q. Well, did you take this printed slip also? A. Yes, Sir; I took the whole thing.

Q. Did you take the proposed amendment of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In his own handwriting, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you give those to Mr. Wilkeson? A. I did.

Q. Did you leave them with him. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And have you seen them since? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know now where they are? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have no knowledge, then, I understand you, of either one of those papers after you handed them to Mr. Wilkeson to engross? A. No, Sir.

Q. And never saw them afterward? A. I never saw them afterward.

Q. Or either of them? A. I never saw either of those original papers.

TO WHOM THE COMPLETED COVENANT WAS SHOWN.

Q. Now, Mr. Claffin, I will take up another subject: Was anything said at any one of these conversations as to who should be the custodian of the "Tripartite Agreement" when executed? A. I think Mr. Tilton proposed to leave it with Mr. Moulton.

Q. Is that all that was said upon that subject? A. I think that was objected to. I proposed that Mr. Freeland or Mr. Storrs take the paper.

Q. I want the whole that was said upon that subject. A. That is all I remember, Sir.

Q. Well, who did finally take it? A. I took the paper, Sir.

Q. Well, did you take it without anything being said upon the subject? A. No, Sir; it was agreed that I should take the paper.

Q. Well, I ask you all that was said upon the subject of the custody of the paper? A. Well, it was agreed that I should take the paper.

Q. Well, who agreed? A. Mr. Freeland and Mr. Storrs.

Q. And did you in consequence of that take the paper? A. I took the paper; yes, Sir.

Q. Was there any arrangement entered into between you as to whether it should be kept a secret? A. No, Sir, nothing said about a secret.

Q. Was no obligation imposed upon you as to letting persons see it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or giving a copy of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, did you give a copy to any one? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long did it remain in your custody? A. All the while, Sir.

Q. How? A. It remained all the while in my custody. I don't know—I think Mr.—

Q. Up to what time? A. I think Mr. Storrs had the paper once a little while.

Q. When did he get the paper? A. I am not certain, but I think Mr. Storrs borrowed the paper this Winter some time.

Q. Did it remain in your custody up to that time? A. Yes, it was in my custody. I am not certain but Mr. Beecher might have borrowed the paper one day for a little while.

Q. Well, don't you remember whether he did or not? A. I remember his asking me—

Q. No, no; I don't ask about that. Did he borrow the paper? A. I am not certain, Sir, whether he did or not. When he asked me for it—

Q. No, I don't ask you that. A. If he asked me for it—

Q. Well, I don't ask you that. A. My recollection is rather that he sent and asked me for the paper.

Q. No, I don't ask you that; I asked you whether he ever got the paper from your possession. A. I don't remember, Sir, certain; I am not positive.

Q. What is your best recollection upon the subject? A. My best recollection is that I sent him the paper one day, and that he sent it back in a short time.

Q. Now, when was that? A. I don't remember, Sir, when that was.

Q. About what time was it? A. I think it was before Mr. Storrs borrowed the paper.

Q. That don't aid me in getting at the time at all. A. No! I have no recollection when that was; I could not say.

Q. What year was it in? A. I think it was not long after the paper was made; I am not certain about that.

Q. And the paper was made, was it not, in March, 1872?

Mr. Morris—April.

The Witness—Made in April, 1872.

Q. And your recollection is that Mr. Beecher sent for it, got it, and returned it soon after that. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did he keep it? I think a very short time; I think it was sent back.

Q. Do you recollect when it was published in the newspapers? A. No, Sir; I have no remembrance.

Q. You recollect the fact that it was published in the newspapers, do you not? A. Yes, Sir; I remember it was published.

Q. And don't you recollect the year in which it was published? A. No, Sir, I could not; I could not say when it was published; I remember—

Q. Well, it was published in 1873, was it not? A. I am not sure, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. Don't you recollect that it was published the year prior to the appointment of the Investigating Committee? A. That would be 1874, wouldn't it, Sir?

Q. 1874, the appointment of the Investigating Committee? A. That would be 1874.

Q. The Investigating Committee was appointed in 1874. My question is, Do you recollect that the "Tripartite Agreement" was published the year prior to the appointment of that Committee? A. I do not remember, Sir, when that was published.

THE WITNESS'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Mr. Clafflin, do you know Victoria Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir, I know her a little.

Q. Well, how little or how much? [Laughter.] A. I have seen her on two or three occasions; she has called at my office once or twice.

Q. Did you return the call? A. Yes, Sir; I did once.

Q. Where did you call upon her? A. I called upon her in Broad-st.

Q. What number? A. I have forgotten the number; I could not say.

Q. When did you make your call? A. I think soon after she came here.

Q. That don't aid me in getting at the time. A. Well, I don't know when she came, I am sure.

Q. How? A. I don't know when she came. I remember calling there. Mr. Vall, of the Bank of Commerce—

Q. Now, don't, I beg, take anybody with you. A. I was going to say, Sir, that I could fix it from him, Sir, for he called with me.

Q. Well, we haven't time for you to go over there now and fix it. A. Yes.

Q. Have you no recollection of the year? A. I could not say the year, Sir.

Q. Was it soon after she established herself in Broad-st.? A. It was pretty soon after that, I know, because it was rather of a novelty—lady bankers there.

Q. Well, had you no other object, except to satisfy your curiosity in that regard, in calling there? A. She had been to my house and spoken to Mrs. Clafflin about their opening an office in New-York, and wishing to form an acquaintance; and as she urged very much that she would ask me to call and see her, Miss Clafflin said she—

Q. You were not pressed, were you, when Miss Clafflin said this? A. No.

Q. Then we won't have any hearsay? A. That is what I was going—

Q. How long afterward did you call after she called at your office? A. She wrote me, I think, before that.

Q. I don't ask you about the letter; I ask you when she called? A. I could not say.

Q. How long after she called at your house, as you state? A. I think she called at my house—I am not certain whether it was the Winter or the Spring, but I was about to say, Sir, what I cannot say—

Q. How long after she called at your house did you call on her? Now, if you are about to say that, it will satisfy me? A. I think some weeks; perhaps months.

Q. How long after she called at your house was it that you called upon her? A. It was a good while.

Q. How? A. It was a good while; she called very soon at the office.

Q. Did you subscribe for the paper? A. She sent me the paper.

Q. Did you subscribe for the paper? A. No, Sir; she came to the office; I never subscribed for it.

Q. Did you pay for it? A. I don't know, Sir, whether I did or not.

Q. How? A. I don't know whether I did or not.

Q. Why, don't you recollect whether you paid for the paper? A. I remember there being an advertisement in the paper.

Q. No; did you pay for the paper, Mr. Clafflin? A. I am not certain.

Q. How? A. I am not certain whether she ever sent a bill.

Q. Did you ever pay for the paper? A. I don't know, Sir; if she sent a bill, I did.

Mr. Tracy—I submit he has answered that question.

Judge Nelson—He has answered, "I don't know whether I paid it or not."

The Witness—I don't know; if she sent the bill, I probably paid it. The paper came to the office and I saw the advertisement in the paper, and I sent down to ask them to stop the paper, and the advertisement had been put in gratuitously.

Q. You did not advertise in it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, did you see the advertisement in it of your business? A. Yes, Sir; it was a card simply.

Q. Simply a card? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know how many times it was inserted? A. I do not; it was stopped immediately.

Q. Did you go to Mrs. Woodhull's office at the suggestion of any one?

Mr. Tracy—I don't think much time should be wasted on such questions as those.

The Witness—I went in at the suggestion of Mr. Vall we were passing along and Mr. Vall said, "Let us go in and see the lady bankers," I think.

Q. Did you go in at the suggestion of any one else? A. No, Sir; not at that time.

Q. You have heard it stated when Mr. Tilton made the acquaintance of Mrs. Woodhull, haven't you? A. No, Sir; I don't know that I have; I may have; I don't remember.

Q. Haven't you heard it stated that he made her acquaintance early in 1871? A. I have not; I have heard it, no doubt, but I don't remember it, Sir.

Q. And do you say that you had no connection with the insertion of this card, as you call it, in her paper? A. No, Sir, I did not; I had no idea it was ever published there until some of the clerks called my attention to it.

Q. Well, did you ever visit Mrs. Woodhull at the house? A. Yes, Sir; I went there with Mr. Bowen once.

Q. How often did you visit her at the house? A. That is the only time, Sir.

Q. But once? A. But once.

Q. Do you recollect when it was? A. No, Sir, I do not; I have nothing to fix it by.

Q. Do you recollect the year? A. I know it was the week that Lewis Tappan died, because Mr. Bowen came down to attend his funeral.

Q. Don't you know the year? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. What time in the day was it you visited her? A. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, I think; we met by appointment there, Sir, at 4 o'clock; we were to see some documentary evidence that she was going to show us.

Mr. Beach—Oh! well; we did not ask that at all; we move to strike it out.

Mr. Tracy—I object to that; the witness has a right to state his purpose and his object in going there.

Mr. Beach—He has not a right to state it on our examination.

Mr. Tracy—It is due to the witness to state it on your examination.

Judge Neilson—I don't think it is material to say it was to see some documents.

Mr. Tracy—Is it material to show that he went there, your Honor?

Judge Neilson—I don't doubt that being material.

Mr. Tracy—If it is material to show that he went there, is it not material, also, to show why he went there?

Judge Neilson—Well, the learned counsel has not asked that question.

Mr. Tracy—But it is due to the witness to state that he went there.

Judge Neilson—He has not been asked that question yet.

Mr. Beach—Is that part of the answer stricken out?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—At which meeting of you gentlemen was it that it was first suggested that the papers connected with the scandal should be burned? A. I think it was suggested at all the meetings; I think we began with that.

Mr. Shearman—[Repeating]. I think it began with that.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. CLAFIN.

Mr. Tracy—At whose request did you go to see Mrs. Woodhull at her house?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—The question is, at whose request did you go to see Mrs. Woodhull at her house?

Mr. Beach—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take that, Sir—at whose request, if at the request of any one?

The Witness—I went at the request of Mrs. Woodhull's lawyers, and of Mr. Bowen; I met those lawyers there, Mrs. Woodhull's lawyers, and three or four other friends of hers.

Q. That was the only time you say you were ever in her house? A. That is the only time, Sir.

Q. Where was it, Mr. Clafin, that Mr. Tilton proposed that this "Tripartite Agreement" should be left in the possession of Mr. Moulton? A. I think it was at—I think the last meeting, Sir, the meeting when the paper was finished—that is, when it was finally settled and agreed upon.

Q. What difficulties were submitted to the arbitrators, Mr. Clafin?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Mr. Beach—The objection is that it calls not for what took place—for the language, for what was said—but for a conclusion.

Mr. Tracy—I call for a statement; that calls for him to state what difficulties were submitted.

Judge Neilson—You can inquire what was said on that subject.

Mr. Tracy—I do call for what was said on that subject.

Mr. Beach—That is but a mere reopening, Sir, of the subject matter, about which we have inquired nothing on our cross-examination.

Mr. Tracy—Oh, yes you have.

Mr. Beach—Not a word except for the conversation.

Judge Neilson—I think he might state generally what he can of the conversation in regard to the difficulties or the questions to be submitted, not his inference, but the conversation.

Mr. Beach—Well, is it admissible, your Honor, after the conversation had been gotten by each party on direct and cross-examination, to open the same subject again for re-direct?

Judge Neilson—Perhaps not; I think, however, in this instance he may ask that question.

Mr. Tracy—Go on.

The Witness—What is the question?

By Mr. Tracy—State what was said concerning—state what was said at any of these meetings touching the difficulties that were to be submitted to you, and what difficulties, and between whom. A. Well, Sir, the difficulties between the whole three.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; no, Sir; it is calling upon you to state what was said, not your conclusions.

Judge Neilson—State what was said and by whom, Mr. Clafin.

The Witness—Well, it was said that the difficulties were to be settled in this way by arbitration; the paper was to be signed.

Q. Well, what difficulties and between whom? A. The papers—

Q. What difficulties and between whom?

Mr. Beach—"What was said about the difficulties?" I submit, is the question.

Mr. Tracy—That is the question I call for.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]—Relate what was said.

Mr. Tracy—What difficulties, and between whom, was it stated were to be submitted to the arbitrators?

Mr. Beach—That is not a proper form of question; the question is, What was said in regard to the difficulties that were to be submitted.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—And between whom?

Mr. Beach—Yes, between whom?

The Witness—Well, the conversation was between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Moulton, if you refer to the last—

Mr. Tracy—Who were the parties to the difficulties that were to be arbitrated.

Mr. Beach—I submit, Sir, that that is to be derived from what was said.

Judge Neilson—No; what was said?

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Clafin was going on; you did not hear him.

Mr. Tracy—Proceed.

Mr. Shearman—Go on, Mr. Clafin.

The Witness—Well, at the first meeting—do you refer to the first meeting, or all the way through?

Mr. Tracy—Yes; I refer to any of the meetings—any of the two first meetings? A. Well, Sir, Mr. Wilkeson said that the difficulties must be settled between—the whole difficulties between Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Bowen; I quite agreed with him in that, and then the question was how they should be settled; Mr. Tilton said he would settle nothing until he got satisfaction from Mr. Bowen by the payment of the sums due him.

Mr. Shearman—If the jury hear, you can do without me.

Mr. Tracy—We have got to a point now where Mr. Clafin speaks louder.

The Witness—I am improved.

[The examination was then continued without the aid of Mr. Shearman to repeat the answers.]

Q. Now, you have stated who the parties were, Mr. Clafin, between whom there were difficulties to be settled; now, what were the difficulties to be settled, what were stated as the difficulties that were to be settled, and where were those difficulties referred to or stated—where had the difficulties been referred to or stated by any of the parties that were to be settled and compromised? A. Well, Sir, it was this—

Mr. Beach—No, Mr. Clafin.

Mr. Tracy—State what was stated by the parties, or referred to by either yourself or Mr. Wilkeson, in regard to the difficulties that were to be arbitrated? A. Well, Sir, the difficulties—

Judge Neilson—Give the conversation, Mr. Clafin.

The Witness—I could not give the language, Sir—the conversation—but the difficulties to be settled were the—

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; that is not the question—an answer to the question that is put.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it is.

Mr. Beach—I submit it is not.

Judge Neilson—The question is as to what was said about difficulties. If you cannot remember the precise words give the substance, not your inference, but the conversation—what was said.

Mr. Tracy—That is another form of answering, simply.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I think I have stated all that was said, that I remember.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I know; state again what was said in regard to the nature of the difficulties that were existing between Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Bowen, to be settled?

Mr. Beach—When the witness answers that he has stated and told all that was said, is it admissible, your Honor, on the redirect examination to take him over the conversation? It only results in a cross-examination going over that again.

Mr. Tracy—It is entirely competent, I submit, for me to ask the witness to explain any ambiguity that has crept into his evidence on cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—There cannot be any ambiguity when the witness has confined himself to the conversation; there can be none now if he does that. [To the witness.] The counsel objecting understood you to say that you had stated all you could, Mr. Clafin; is that so?

The Witness—I think I have stated the substance, Sir, of the—Judge Neilson—You have a right to ask him if anything more was said.

Mr. Tracy—My question to the witness is this: What difficulties between Mr. Beecher, Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton were you talking about at either of these meetings that were to be settled by arbitration?

Mr. Morris—That is objected to, and I understand the Court to intimate that that is not proper.

Judge Neilson—I think you should ask him for the conversation.

Mr. Tracy—I ask him for the conversation—what was stated in regard to the difficulties that were to be settled.

Mr. Fullerton—That ground has been all gone over on the direct and cross.

Judge Neilson—Yes, I think so; but still I think he may state what was said.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall go over it again, also.

The Witness—The difficulties arose from this paper that was to be published—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Tracy—Was that paper—I put this question, Sir—was there any paper referred to in that conversation, as stating the difficulties that existed between Mr. Bowen, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Beecher, that required to be settled by arbitration? A. It was the "Personal Statement," Sir.

Q. It was the difficulties set forth in the "Personal Statement," was it? A. Yes, Sir, that is the only—that is it, Sir.

Q. What was said by either Mr. Wilkeson, or yourself, in regard to the nature of the difficulty set forth in that "Personal Statement?"

Mr. Morris—Now, that we object to.

Judge Neilson—Well, your witness has said that he has stated all he remembers or can state on the subject.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I am now asking—calling his attention to the specific point in the conversation, and ask him what was said on the subject, if anything was said on it.

Judge Neilson—Well, what can you say to that, Mr. Clafin?

The Witness—Well, Sir, what I said before, that I said it was a great scandal and shame that that should be published to the world, and that an agreement, a settlement, must be made; that Mr. Bowen—

Mr. Tracy—A settlement of what?

The Witness—A settlement of all difficulties between them.

Q. Difficulties as stated where? A. As stated in that "Personal Statement."

Judge Neilson—Now, we have had that several times.

Mr. Tracy—I think the other side discover the point of the examination.

Mr. Morris—No, we don't; we haven't discovered it yet.

Mr. Tracy—I didn't say you did.

Mr. Beach—Yes, we have made that happy discovery.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, I thought you did; so did I.

Judge Neilson—Proceed to something else.

Mr. Tracy—In that conversation, either of those first conversations on Sunday night, or on Tuesday night, Mr. Clafin, was there anything said by Mr. Tilton, and if so what, in regard to his having commenced a suit against Mr. Bowen?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Sir, that subject has already been exhausted.

Mr. Tracy—I know it has, and I propose to re-exhaust it so far as that question is concerned.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor permits it why of course we—

The Witness—I think he said a suit had been commenced.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will observe that the counsel took the witness over all that was said at these conversations and asked him if he had repeated on his cross-examination everything that was said. Now, the witness omitted on his cross-examination to notice about the suit's having been commenced.

Judge Neilson—Well, it was equally omitted on your direct.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! no, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, if it were omitted on the direct I don't think it need be repeated; I don't think it was stated on the direct that a suit had been commenced.

Mr. Tracy—My recollection differs with your Honor's on that subject, and it is the form of the cross-examination that now makes it necessary for me to recall this subject to the attention of the witness; that is all. [To the witness.] You said, Mr. Clafin, on your direct examination, that your best recollection was that you saw Mr. Bowen between Sunday night and Tuesday? A. I think—

Q. On your cross-examination you say that you have an impression that you saw Mr. Bowen between Sunday night and Tuesday; now do you mean to say that it is your best recollection that you saw him, or that it is a mere impression? A. Yes, Sir, it is my best recollection, but I am not quite certain; I think I expressed that both times.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—I have nothing more.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Clafin.

The Court then took a recess until 2 o'clock.

TESTIMONY OF LOUISA J. WROEGER.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Louisa Johanna Wroeger was called on behalf of the defendant, sworn and examined as follows:

Mr. Hill—What is your business? A. Telegraph operator.

Q. Were you a telegraph operator in the employ of the Western Union Company at their general office in New York in the month of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you a message which you received from Brooklyn that day now in your possession? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please produce it. [The witness produced the paper.]

Q. Miss Wroeger, be kind enough to state the course of business in receiving a message at the general office, transmitted to you for the purpose of transmissi-ther on. What is the first thing that you receive? A. The number of the message from the place it is sent from.

Q. Now, what was the number of that message? A. Number 8, from Brooklyn.

Q. What would come next? A. The figure "2," signifying the date of the month.

Q. What next? A. The person the message was sent to.

Q. And his address? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then what? A. The body of the message.

Q. Then what? A. The signature thereon.

Q. What else? A. The check—that is, the number of words and whether paid or "collect."

Q. Then these other characters—what are these? A. The signature of the operator sending the message to me, and my own.

Q. "D" is there signifying the other operator, and "W" signifying your own signature? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I notice that upon this paper the date is written out in full. First, there occur the words, "Brooklyn, 2," and then "3" is written in the blank, making it "1873;" did you receive that "3," or did you put it on yourself? A. No, Sir; I put it on; that is understood.

Q. Who put upon that message the date "June 2," written out? A. I did.

Q. That you do after you receive the figure indicating the day of the month? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what time was it received? A. At 8:58 in the morning.

Q. And handed to some one else to transmit it to Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, are you enabled to swear that you received that message from Brooklyn on the second day of June, at 8:58? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—I propose now to read it in evidence. It is as follows:

Dated Brooklyn, — 2, 1873.

Received at — June 2.

To Thomas T. Turner, Peekskill, N. Y.:

Send for us to train leaving New-York at 2 p. m.

H. W. BEECHER.

10, paid. Dr. W.

[The message was marked "Ex. D. 124."]

Q. There are figures in the corner: "1 Pe;" what do they signify? A. The number of the message sent to Peekskill—it being number one sent to Peekskill on the 2d of June.

Q. That is the first Peekskill message sent from the general office to Peekskill that morning? A. Yes, Sir.

[Counsel for plaintiff did not cross-examine.]

TESTIMONY OF MARY C. JOSEPHS.

Mary C. Josephs was sworn on behalf of defendant and testified as follows:

Mr. Hill—Where do you reside? A. At Peekskill.

Q. What is your business? A. Telegraph operator.

Q. Were you the telegraph operator in charge of the Western Union office at Peekskill in the month of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Look at the paper now shown you and state whether you received a message from Henry Ward Beecher to Thomas J. Turner, on the 2d day of June, 1873? A. This is the message.

Q. Is that the message itself, or a letter-press copy of it? A. A letter-press copy of it.

Q. Was it written on a blank? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—I offer to read it in evidence; it is as follows, [Reading.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., June 2—8:28 a. m.

Thos. J. Turner: Send for us to train leaving New York at 2 p. m.

H. W. BEECHER.

15 pd. Z. C.

[The paper was marked, "Ex. D. 125."]

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE F. WILLIAMS.

George F. Williams was called on behalf of defendant, sworn and testified as follows:

Mr. Hill—What is your present business? A. Editor on a newspaper.

Q. On what newspaper? A. The New-York Herald.

Q. What is your position on The Herald? A. Law editor.

Q. How long have you been an editor or a journalist? A. I have been a journalist for 18 years.

Q. Mr. Williams, did you see the publication of Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, under date of Nov. 2, 1872, which contained the article known as the Woodhull scandal about Mr. Beecher? A. I have seen that paper, Sir.

Q. Now, I desire to ask you if you saw proof-slips containing the substance of that article at any time before it was produced?

THE TESTIMONY OBJECTED TO AS IMMATERIAL.

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Hill—Before it was produced publicly, I mean, in the Woodhull & Claflin Weekly?

Mr. Beach—We would like to know, Sir, what the counsel propose to prove?

Mr. Hill—I propose to prove by this witness and two others that proof-slips containing the substance of the article which was published in Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, under date Nov. 2, 1872, were distributed among newspaper men, to this gentleman and the other two witnesses in particular, one of them in the Spring, and another about May, 1872, and the third before the Summer of 1872 was over, and I suppose that they were the same publications which the witness Woodley has spoken of.

Judge Neilson—How do you connect the plaintiff with it?

Mr. Hill—Woodley connected the plaintiff with it.

Mr. Shearman—We should like to know what is the ground of objection.

Mr. Beach—Why, that it is totally immaterial, and that it is secondary, and calls for the judgment of the witness.

Mr. Shearman—You can dispose of that last ground, Mr. Hill, by another question.

Mr. Hill—Very well. [To the witness.] Did you receive some proof-slips, Mr. Williams, or printed matter from galley proofs, the subject matter of which was a scandal about Henry Ward Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Shearman—Then we may as well get at the merits at once. We were trying to obviate your objection that it was secondary.

Mr. Hill—I propose to show the last of them in a moment.

ARGUMENT OF MR. SHEARMAN.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, the witness Woodley has testified that he saw these slips and had them in his hand at some time previous to Nov. 2, 1872. I suppose we ought to produce our confirmatory evidence on that point before waiting for the rebuttal. We cannot tell, of course—no doubt, if the gentlemen are wise, they will not attempt to disprove that statement; but they may not be wise, and they may attempt to disprove it, and then, I suppose, if we come in with testimony in reply to their rebuttal they will say that that testimony ought to have been put in at this stage of the case. Now, we propose to show that those slips were in existence long before the publication of the Woodhull scandal; that they were known in newspaper offices. We have connected the plaintiff with those proofs six weeks or two months prior to their publication. We propose to show that such slips were in existence in order to make our story reasonable and to sustain the statement of Woodley that some of those slips were in his hands.

Mr. Beach—Show that they were in existence!

Mr. Shearman—Certainly we must show that they were in existence, in order to connect him with it; and now we propose to show that they were in existence, and thus to make reasonable and probable the story which Woodley told of their being in existence and in the plaintiff's sight some two months before the publication. All we are trying to show now is the existence, a considerable time prior to the publication, of proof-slips of these articles.

Mr. Beach—Showing the existence of them necessarily shows the contents.

Mr. Shearman—We propose to show their existence a considerable time prior to the publication of these articles and prior to the time when Woodley says he saw them in the possession of the plaintiff. It seems to me that this is entirely material.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not at all to be wondered at, Sir, that they have a desire to bolster up the witness Woodley, but at the same time they cannot do it in this way. They start off with the proposition that Woodley swore that he had seen slips of this article, called or known as the Brooklyn scandal. Now, Sir, there is no such proof as that in this case. Woodley did not swear, as I recollect his testimony, to any such thing at all; but even if he did, it would not make this evidence admissible in this case. In the first place, Sir, in order to prove that these were printed slips of that scandal, they must prove the contents of the paper to which the witness's attention was called. And again, they do not propose to prove that these printed slips contained the scandal as it was published, but they propose to take the judgment of this witness upon the subject whether those slips did not contain "the substance" of the scandal, and therefore the proof is entirely irrelevant. The plaintiff has been connected in no way with the publication of what is proposed now to be proved by the witness as to the existence of these slips. If we should indulge in inferences, the inference would be that the paper which was put into the hands of this witness, and which he saw some time in 1872, was quite a different thing from what Woodley undertook to swear was in existence. At all events, Sir, before they can affect the plaintiff in this case by anything that was printed in the shape of a slip of this scandal, whether it contained the scandal itself or "the substance" of the scandal—whatever it may have been, they must show that he had some connection with the publication over and above what has been sought to be established by the witness Woodley.

ARGUMENT OF MR. HILL.

Mr. Hill—Now, may it please your Honor, we have this connection established—this connection of the plaintiff with this publication by the Woodhulls. First, the conversation in his presence in 1871, which Cowley heard and has testified to, wherein he listens approvingly—at least silently—while a scandal of that description is being circulated about his own wife. Secondly, we have the statement of Cook, at another time, I think at an earlier time than Cowley (the order, however, can make but little difference), in which the same thing is established; and then again, in 1872, we find from the testimony of Mr. Woodley that Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull are in the office together talking about this scandal, as I understand his testimony, and my learned friend strove very hard to get the witness into confusion with reference to this point—whether they were reading from manuscript or from proof-slips. Your Honor cannot fail to recollect the examination of Woodley upon that very point. Now, Sir, as confirming Woodley's statement about the existence of proof-slips at that time, we offer to show that they had been distributed among newspaper men, and were perfectly well known to newspaper men. We cannot, in any way that I know of, show that these papers were the identical papers which were there present, and which Woodley referred to, but it is competent for us, as it seems to me, to show the existence of proof-slips at that time, as well by Woodley as by some one else. Having shown Mr. Tilton's animus in relation to proof-slips by these three witnesses, coming to a point and culminating with Woodley, it seems to me that then the onus at least is thrown upon the plaintiff to explain them. I have the examination of Woodley before me, and I read:

Q. Now, James, at the time of this conversation, was there present any paper of any kind with these parties? A. Oh, yes, Sir, there were. The proofs were all ready there to go to the press for their publication.

Q. Who had them in hand? A. Miss Claflin, Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton. Col. Blood had gone off.

Q. Now, were you or not before that time familiar with proofs and printed slips—I do not mean on this subject—this or any other subject—was that any part of your employment? Oh, yes, Sir, I was usually taking them up to the printing office."

Then in another place we find this question and answer:

Q. I am now speaking of the particular time when the conversation took place, and you said there were some slips there. Did you have those very ones in your hands in any way? A. I did have printed slips in my hands, but I don't know what they were or what they contained at all.

Q. And did you have those that you have spoken of as having been in their hands? A. Yes, Sir.

Then a step further, my learned friend, re-examining the witness, said:

"I understand. I am talking of the time when it was really published and when you were arrested? A. I did not look at all at the scandal. I heard them talking about it—the Beecher scandal."

So that they were, as I understand his testimony, talking about this Beecher scandal, and about proof-slips which were then present. Now, I can show by these three witnesses the contents of the proof-slips, and that they were identical in substance with the article subsequently published by Mrs. Woodhull.

GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Judge Neilson—I understood from the testimony of that witness that it was part of his business to carry from the office in Broad street up to the printing establishment the slips and proof-sheets of various papers, and he speaks there of carrying some up to be printed the next day. But I did not understand from his evidence that the Woodhull scandal, as it has been called, or the "True Story," or the publication about Mr. Beecher, or the "Beecher business," as it was called, was there in print. I understood those to be proof-slips having to do with the current business of the newspaper, and that he carried them to and from the office, as usual—

Mr. Shearman—That was the latter examination, your Honor, to show his familiarity with proofs and printed slips.

Judge Neilson [Continuing]—And he says that he did not read them and did not know the contents of any of them.

Mr. Shearman—Speaking generally.

Mr. Hill—I understood the evidence of Woodley to point directly to this very matter—that they were speaking of it. Why, Sir, let me remind you—

Judge Neilson—They were speaking of it, of course.

Mr. Hill—Well, they had these printed slips in their hands, and they were speaking about Mr. Beecher and this scandal, and their publication of it; and Col. Blood had gone away.

Mr. Tracy—Had gone away and taken the slips with him?

Mr. Hill—Had gone away, I believe, and taken the slips with him. So that there was this discussion, and unless I fail to remember Woodley's testimony, there was a statement that Plymouth Church was rich, and all that sort of thing.

Judge Neilson—Oh, yes; that it could pay $100,000.

Mr. Hill—Now, that related only to this Beecher matter.

Judge Neilson—They were discussing this subject, but, for aught we know, it might have been discussed in the same way if there had been no slips there whatever; and, for aught we know, the slips that were there at the time of this discussion were for the current use of the paper—matter entirely different from the Beecher matter. I do not see the connection myself.

Mr. Hill—Let me suggest another thought in this connection, your Honor. If we show that they had proof-slips before them, and if we show that they were talking then about the Beecher matter, "the Beecher article," as Woodley called it, and then if we show by three witnesses that proof-slips relating to this matter beyond question were then and prior to that time in existence, it seems to me that the plaintiff will then be called upon at least to explain.

Judge Neilson—That may be; but it does not show the contents of the slips that the witness Woodley speaks about. They were the current slips of the newspaper, which he says he usually carried to and fro, between the office and the printer's, and he expressly says he did not know the contents of any of them.

Mr. Shearman—Allow me one moment, your Honor. Mr. Hill read the examination of Woodley up to a certain point, but on the cross-examination this is brought out very clearly. On Mr. Fullerton's cross-examination it appears that when they were having this conversation in the down-town office in 1872, when, as had been shown on the direct examination, they held these proof slips in their hands, they discussed the "Beecher matter" and the "Beecher article." I will read:

Q. The Beecher matter, was it? A. Yes, Sir, "the Beecher article" they called it.

That was the phrase they used while those papers were in Mr. Tilton's hands. And there is a good deal more on the cross-examination showing that that was the very subject that was under discussion—"the Beecher article"—while Mr. Tilton and Miss Claflin divided the copy or the proofs between them; they looked upon these slips and talked about "the Beecher article" and discussed with Col. Blood the propriety of publishing it.

THE TESTIMONY RULED OUT.

Judge Neilson—I don't see the connection: I think I must rule that out. Slips may have been circulating in all the newspaper offices, and yet they may have been very different papers from those that were in Mrs. Woodhull's office, and very different papers from any that Mr. Tilton ever saw.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, my learned friends asked me the object of this proof, and I stated it, I believe, in full. Will your Honor enable us to save time by permitting me to make an offer to prove what I then stated?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; consider that offer made and an exception taken, if you wish.

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Williams.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES STORRS.

Charles Storrs was then called on behalf of the defendant, sworn, and examined as follows:

By Mr. Tracy—Where do you reside? A. In Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. About 25 years.

Q. What is your business? A. Commission merchant.

Q. Where have you carried on business? A. In New-York City.

Q. How long have you carried on business in New-York City? A. Some 25 years.

Q. What is your line of business? A. Commission merchant.

Q. What kind of business, dry goods? A. American staple dry goods, and—

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I do.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I should think a dozen years or more.

Q. Have you been on friendly and intimate terms with him during that period? A. Yes, Sir; most of the time.

Q. Have you had business relations with him? A. I don't know as I can say exactly business relations; some times when he has been lecturing he has remitted his money to me for safe keeping, and paying out as he might direct.

Mr. Tracy—A little louder, Mr. Storrs, if you please. Mr. Storrs is not very well to-day, and I had designed to excuse him if I could.

Judge Neilson—You can repeat the answer.

Mr. Tracy—Just repeat the answer, Mr. Storrs, and repeat it a little louder.

Mr. Shearman—Let the stenographer read it.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the answer, as follows: "I don't know as I can say exactly business relations; sometimes when he has been lecturing he has remitted his money to me for safe keeping, and paying out as he might direct."

Mr. Tracy—What years were those when he remitted money to you? A. I should think in the Winter of 1867-8, and '68-9, and perhaps previous years.

Q. During any portion of the period of your acquaintance, were you in the habit of seeing him frequently, and if so, how and where? A. Well, he was frequently at my house, but perhaps I saw him oftener in New-York, at lunch and in other ways.

Q. Where are you in the habit of taking lunch? A. At Delmonico's, at the corner of Chambers-st. and Broadway.

Q. For how many years has it been your habit to lunch there? A. I should think 16 or 17 years.

Q. During all the time you have known Mr. Tilton? A. Nearly; yes, Sir.

Q. Did he frequently lunch there? A. He did.

Q. Have you frequently lunched together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently should you say you saw him on an average, Mr. Storrs, either at your house or in New-York, or elsewhere? A. Well, sometimes two or three times a week; sometimes perhaps oftener, and sometimes not that when we were in town.

Q. Were you in the habit of being with him elsewhere than at lunch or at your house? A. Oh, sometimes we would take a walk up Broadway to the bookstores or the picture galleries.

Q. Did you in that way come to be on intimate terms with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that you were in the habit of talking together concerning private affairs? A. Well—general affairs.

Q. During the time of your acquaintance with him was he employed on The Independent? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at any time did he hold any other position on any other newspaper? A. He was a while on The Union.

Q. When did you first learn that he had been discharged from The Union and Independent? A. I think it was the 2d of January, 1871, the day that was termed New Year's; Sunday, I think, was New Year's Day.

Q. From whom did you learn it first? A. I think, Mr. Freeland.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton on that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where? A. At his house in Livingston-st.

Q. How did you come to call there? A. I was making New Year's calls, and I was intending to call upon Mrs. Tilton.

MR. TILTON TELLS HIS TROUBLES TO A FRIEND.

Q. Well, did you call on Mrs. Tilton? A. I called at the door and the servant said she was sick, and said Mr. Tilton was in; and I said I would like to see him.

Q. Did you see him? A. I did.

Q. Where? A. In the parlor of his house.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was anything said about his having been discharged; and, if so, what? A. I asked him if he had been discharged from The Independent and The Union, and he said he had.

Q. What was the manner in which he said that? A. Well, he bowed his head this way [illustrating]; he seemed somewhat depressed and dejected.

Q. Covering his face with his hand at the time he said he had been discharged? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State whether or not he manifested feeling when speaking of his discharge from The Independent and Union. A. Well, he seemed depressed and dejected.

Q. What further was said? A. He rose, and said he wanted me to go right around to Frank Moulton's with him.

Q. Did you go? A. I did.

Q. With him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation on your way there? A. We did.

Q. What was it? A. I asked him what the trouble was. Well, he said that Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse, had been talking against him to Mr. Bowen, and influencing him against him; and he also said that they had influenced his wife against him; and he said that a lady had made false charges to Mr. Bowen about him; but he said that the reverse was the truth, that the lady had made solicitations to him—he said it was Joseph and Potiphar's wife over again. I asked him who it was. He said he would not give the name, but the first letter of her name was "M." He said he would not say that they could not say some things against him, but he wanted justice; and he said that if he had seen me he should have come to me, but he had seen Mr. Moulton—Frank Moulton—and that he had put his matters between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher into his hands for settlement, and that Mr. Moulton did not want him to say much about it.

Q. When you got to Mr. Moulton's house whom did you see? A. I saw Mr. Moulton.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was anything said there in regard to Tilton's difficulty with Bowen? A. Mr. Tilton repeated, as he had said on the way, about Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse having influenced Mr. Bowen; and Mr. Tilton also then stated that Mrs. Morse and Mrs. Beecher had also influenced Bessie Turner to tell some things about him.

Q. About whom? A. About him, Tilton. And Mr. Moulton stated that it was all wrong, his being discharged, that it was a mistake; and that he, Tilton, should be reinstated. He said that Mr. Tilton was the same to The Independent as Mr. Greeley was to THE NEW YORK

TRIBUNE; and that he should see Mr. Bowen, to have him reinstate him. I think then Mr. Tilton left the room—Mr. Moulton I mean—and Mr. Tilton stated that Mr. Beecher said "he humbled himself before him as he did before his God;" says he, "and he shall." Mr. Moulton returned, and said he, "What have you been saying here? What have you been saying here?" "Oh!" said Mr. Tilton, "not much of anything; but I said that Mr. Beecher said that he 'humbled himself before me as he did before his God;'" and said he, "and he shall."

Q. Was anything further said? A. Not that I recall, except I expressed to him my regrets and sympathy, and told him if there was anything I could do for him I would be happy to do it, and he said he would like to see me again, and I think that is all I recall at this moment.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton again soon after that? A. I did, within a day or two.

Q. Had you any further conversation with him on the subject of his difficulties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say to you? A. Well, he repeated about Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse having influenced Mr. Bowen against him, and then he said that he had told him about improper proposals by Mr. Beecher, and he said when he learned that, that he sent for Mr. Beecher by Mr. Moulton, to come to Mr. Moulton's house to see him, and he said that Mr. Beecher came there, and when he came there he made this charge against him of improper proposals to his wife, and he said Mr. Beecher seemed to be astonished, and said that could not be so, and Mr. Tilton made a motion as though he was taking something out of his pocket, and he said: "I took out a piece of paper;" I forget whether he said he read it or gave it to Mr. Beecher to read, and he said Mr. Beecher seemed surprised and said, "That could not be so;" said Elizabeth could not have said so, because it was not true; "Well," he said, "if you don't believe it, go and ask Elizabeth;" he said that Mr. Beecher did go and see his wife, and got from her a retraction, that there never had been any improper proposals, and said, "When I found it out I was very angry. I told Mr. Moulton, and he was very angry, and," he says, "Mr. Moulton went to Mr. Beecher with a pistol, and made him give it up and make an apology."

"IMPROPER PROPOSALS" THE ONLY CHARGE MADE.

Q. In the first conversation, on the 2d of January, either at Mr. Tilton's house or at Mr. Moulton's house, did Mr. Tilton assign any cause of complaint against Mr. Beecher except what you have stated? A. No, Sir, not that I remember.

Q. In the second conversation, when he spoke of Mr. Beecher having made improper proposals to his wife, did he assign any other cause of complaint against Mr.

Beecher than those that you have now stated? A. Not that I now remember.

Q. Did he charge him in any manner with adultery with his wife? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or make any such intimation? A. No, Sir.

MR. TILTON CONSULTS WITH MR. STORRS.

Q. Soon after this last conversation in January, 1871, did any person call upon you in regard to starting a newspaper scheme—a newspaper in New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who was that person? A. Mr. Tilton and Franklin Woodruff.

Q. What was the paper to be started, and for whom?

Mr. Beach—Well, you had better let him tell what was said.

Mr. Tracy—State what was said. A. I think it was the name of The Golden Age, but I am not certain; it was a paper Mr. Tilton was about starting; whether he had got the name or not I won't be positive; and then I remember Mr. Woodruff wanted me to take some stock; I told him I had no money to take stock; but I would like to see Mr. Tilton succeed in his enterprise, and, to show him my friendliness in the matter, that I would give something out and out, but I didn't wish to subscribe to the stock.

Q. Did you afterward give anything to Mr. Tilton for The Golden Age? A. I think I did; I think the next day I sent him a check for $250, as a gift toward it.

Q. In the Spring of 1872 did you see Mr. Tilton and have a conversation with him in regard to his troubles with Mr. Bowen? A. I did.

Q. Did he bring any paper to you at that time? A. He did.

Q. What was it? A. It was an article that he had prepared for his paper, The Golden Age.

Q. What was it called—how was it headed? A. "Personal Statement."

Q. Did you have a conversation with him at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that conversation, Mr. Storrs? A. I should think it was in the middle or last of March, 1872.

Q. Now, will you state what occurred and what was said between yourself and Mr. Tilton on that occasion? A. Mr. Tilton called and said that he had been out West on a lecturing trip, and he had been received rather coldly and indifferently, and the people didn't seem to understand why he had been so suddenly discharged from The Independent and The Union; and he said he didn't know as I understood about his writing the biography of Mrs. Woodhull, and he said he thought he must write a personal statement of the matter, and then he handed me an article he had prepared and wanted I should read it, and see what I thought of it.

Q. Did you read it? A. I did.

Q. Did you tell him what you thought of it? A. I did;

he wanted to know what I thought of it, and I told him I thought it was not a proper article to publish; I thought it would injure him more than anybody else, and I told him I thought if Mr. Bowen could be satisfied that he had wronged him in any way, that he would do what was right with him; and then I said to him: "I see Mr. Beecher denies all these charges." "Yes," he said, "he always did; I don't know that they are true, but Mr. Bowen told me so."

Q. To what charge did you refer when you said that? A. The article purported—that is, it included the letter that he wrote to Mr. Bowen of Jan. 1, 1871.

Q. You referred to the charges that Mr. Tilton said Mr. Bowen had made against Mr. Beecher, and which he had recounted in the letter of Jan. 1, 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You said to him that you saw what? A. I told him that I saw that Mr. Beecher denied all the charges. "Yes," he said, "he always did; I don't know whether they are true, but Mr. Bowen told me so."

Q. Was the fact stated in the article, that Mr. Beecher denied all the charges? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was.

Q. You called his attention to that paragraph in the article itself? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. STORRS EMPLOYED AS AN ARBITRATOR.

Q. Well, when you told him you thought Mr. Bowen could be induced to do him justice, what did he say to you? A. Well, Sir, it was either he or myself; I forget which, but something was said about arbitration; I insisted that I thought if Mr. Bowen could be satisfied he had wronged him, that he would settle it, and he finally suggested that he desired I should see Mr. Bowen, and I told him I would do so.

Q. See Mr. Bowen for what purpose? A. I thought he would settle with him in regard to the claim Mr. Tilton had against his papers.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton state to you what claim he had against Mr. Bowen at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What claim did he say he had against him? A. Six months' service, according to his agreement.

Q. Do I understand you to say that Mr. Tilton desired you to see Mr. Bowen and see if he could be induced to settle with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he leave with you anything to show Mr. Bowen when you might see him? A. He left that article I set up called the "Personal Statement."

Q. The "Personal Statement"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He left that with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For what purpose?

Mr. Beach—Let us hear what was said.

Mr. Tracy—For what purpose did he say he left it with you?

Mr. Beach—This is a very unusual mode of examining a witness.

Mr. Tracy—My modes are all unusual; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. Beach—If the gentleman's modes are all unusual, he had better make them a little more usual.

Mr. Tracy—I cannot.

Mr. Beach—Then if you cannot, the Court must make you.

Mr. Tracy—I ask you what he left with you, and for what purpose he left it with you? A. He said I could show it to Mr. Bowen.

Q. Did you see Mr. Bowen in pursuance of Mr. Tilton's request? A. I did.

Q. How long after that conversation? A. My impression is the next night, but I am not quite clear about it.

Q. Did you show him that "Personal Statement"? A. I offered to show it to him, but my remembrance is that he said he had seen it, or knew what it was.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Bowen on the subject of Mr. Tilton's claim against him? A. I did.

Q. What was said?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—I cannot take that.

Mr. Tracy—Why not? The question is this: The witness has already testified that Mr. Tilton requested him to see Mr. Bowen, to see if he could not be induced to settle his claim, and he says he went and saw Mr. Bowen in pursuance of that request, and had a conversation with him about the settlement of Mr. Tilton's claim against him.

Judge Neilson—That states precisely what you will be at liberty to prove—that general summary of the business.

Mr. Tracy—But when the plaintiff has constituted the witness his agent—

Judge Neilson—For that purpose?

Mr. Tracy—To negotiate the settlement with him, it seems to me that we are entitled to what was said between the principal and the agent.

Judge Neilson—Don't you see how utterly you put a party at the mercy of a third person—Mr. Bowen or any one else—who, on being applied to, proceeds to make various statements, arguments, conversations, or charges?

Mr. Tracy—But that is a risk which all parties run when they employ agents to transact their business. If Mr. Tilton had gone and had this conversation with Mr. Bowen about the settlement of his claim, there would be no doubt it would be admissible.

Mr. Beach—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—Can there be any doubt, when he made Mr. Storrs his agent to go, and Mr. Storrs does go and have a conversation with Mr. Bowen about the settlement of his claim, that we cannot show what was said between the parties? I submit, your Honor, that we can.

Judge Neilson—Why should you show it? Nothing that Mr. Bowen could say on that occasion would be evidence against the plaintiff, or for the plaintiff, either way.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; but what this witness might say would be received.

Judge Neilson—No, not all. He would say, "Mr. Tilton sent me to see if we cannot adjust this matter." No, Sir, we cannot take it.

Mr. Tracy—I will put this question and take your Honor's ruling. [To the witness.] What was said between you and Mr. Bowen on the subject of the settlement of Mr. Tilton's case against him at that interview? [To Judge Neilson.] That I understand is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Yes, and ruled out.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—You are at liberty to show by this witness that he did see Bowen, and show the general result, whether a failure or not.

Mr. Tracy—You say you saw Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him in regard to the settlement of Mr. Tilton's claim against him? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I repeat my last offer, to show what was said on the subject, and we will take your Honor's ruling on it.

Judge Neilson—The same ruling.

Mr. Tracy—Please note our exception. [To the witness]—Did you afterwards see Mr. Tilton; after you had your conversation with Mr. Bowen, did you see and talk with Mr. Tilton on the subject? A. I did.

Q. Did you tell him what transpired between yourself and Mr. Bowen? A. Not all, but nearly all.

Q. Repeat what you said to Mr. Tilton of the conversation which had transpired between yourself and Mr. Bowen on this subject? A. I told Mr. Tilton I called on Mr. Bowen, and I said to him that Mr. Tilton had been West, lecturing, and found the people received him rather coldly, and didn't understand why he had been so suddenly dismissed from The Independent and Union, and that Mr. Tilton felt that he had not done him justice about his agreement, and that he had prepared an article to publish, and I offered to show this article to Mr. Bowen, but Mr. Bowen said that he had either seen it or read it, and I told him Mr. Bowen said that he never had received any such letter as that of Jan. 1, 1871, and that he had not said the things that were stated in that letter, and that Mr. Bowen said he felt he didn't owe him anything, and his lawyer said he had told him he didn't owe him anything, and I said to Mr. Bowen, "Suppose that you feel that you do not owe him, legally or morally, a dollar, would it not be better to settle with him? It will cost you something to litigate it, and he may beat you in the end, and you have got two public papers here, and it would make a scandal, and," said I, "would it not be wiser and better to settle with Mr. Tilton?" and he thought not; but after some talk with Mr. Bowen, either said, or I received the impression from him—

Mr. Fullerton—Did you tell this to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes,

Sir; I received the impression that he would arbitrate it or settle it.

Mr. Tracy—And you so told Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what did Mr. Tilton say to that? A. He said he hoped he would, as he wanted his money—he wanted a settlement.

Q. Was there anything said in this conversation about your acting as an arbitrator for him? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was in that same conversation he said if there was an arbitration he wanted to know if I would act as an arbitrator if he wanted me to. I told him I would.

THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE ARBITRATION AGAIN DETAILED.

Q. Did you afterward act as an arbitrator?

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With whom? A. Mr. Claflin and Mr. Freeland.

Q. Where was the arbitration held? A. At Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. How soon after this last conversation that you then had with Mr. Tilton do you think that arbitration occurred? A. I could not state exactly; it might have been three or four days, or might have been four or five. It was not long.

A. How did you go to Mr. Moulton's house the night of the arbitration—do you know? A. Do you mean with whom I went?

Q. Yes, Sir, with whom you went? A. I think I went around with Mr. Bowen.

Q. When you arrived there, who was present? A. Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton, Mr. Bowen and myself.

Q. Was any one sent for Mr. Claflin and Mr. Freeland? A. Mr. Claflin and Mr. Freeland had not arrived, and it was suggested that I should go around and have Mr. Claflin come around, and I did so, and found Mr. Freeland there, and went around with them.

Q. So you three went together? A. Afterward.

Q. On your second appearance there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. After you got there, what was said by you on the subject of Mr. Beecher being a party to that arbitration?

Mr. Fullerton—When Mr. Tilton was present?

Mr. Tracy—Yes.

The Witness—I said that I had just learned from Mr. Claflin that Mr. Beecher's matters were to be brought in, and I said that was the first that I had heard of it; that if Mr. Beecher's matters were to be brought in, I felt that etiquette required me to retire; that I could not sit in judgment upon a man who had not asked me to do so.

Q. Well, what answer was made to that, and by whom? A. Mr. Claflin replied that Mr. Beecher understood it—that they all understood it—that all the difficulties and matters between the three men were to be arbitrated, and he said there had been a paper prepared to that end, and then he took what is known as the "Tripartite Agreement," and, I think, read it, or at any rate we read it; I think he read it; I am not quite clear whether he read it or whether we read it; at any rate, we read it.

Q. What did you say after that? A. I said, if that was so understood, why I would remain.

Q. That you say was in the presence of all the parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What then was done? A. Mr. Claflin and Mr. Bowen went into another room, and when they were out I said to Mr. Tilton and to Mr. Moulton that I thought that that was not a fair paper, and I advised Mr. Tilton not to sign it; I said I thought that if what Mr. Tilton had told me was true, that Mr. Beecher was the most to blame, and I said: "This paper seems to be one-sided;" and I said I would not sign it, and I told Mr. Moulton to go into the other room and tell Mr. Bowen not to sign it, from what he had himself told me.

Q. Well, what occurred after that? A. Then Mr. Bowen and Mr. Claflin returned, and the papers between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen—their contracts—were offered there were some statements made in regard to it; principally, so far as I remember, it was in relation to a percentage that Mr. Tilton was to have from The Brooklyn Union from Mr. Bowen.

Q. Well, go on. Did Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton make a statement before the arbitrators? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was done after they made their statements? A. They withdrew.

Q. Well, then, what was done? A. Then the arbitrators discussed the questions that had been presented.

Q. Did they come to an agreement? A. They did.

Q. After the arbitrators had come to an agreement, what was done then? A. Mr. Claflin called them in.

Q. Who came in? A. Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton, and Mr. Bowen.

Q. After they came in, what was done? A. Mr. Claflin made known to them the award.

Q. State what he said? A. He stated that the award was that the three parties, Mr. Bowen, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Beecher, were to sign a paper called the "Tripartite Agreement," and that all the papers were to be burned that the three parties had that were likely to make any trouble hereafter, and that Mr. Bowen was to pay Mr. Tilton $7,000.

Q. When Mr. Claflin was speaking of burning any papers, were any papers particularly enumerated that were to be burned? A. That was a little later in the conversation.

Q. Ah! very well. After Mr. Claflin had announced his award, or the award of the arbitrators, what was said? A. Mr. Tilton objected to signing the paper, and Mr. Claflin says, "Why, Theodore, you have agreed to it." "Well," Mr. Tilton says, "I know I have, but I wish to change it." And there was considerable discussion on that point for some 15 or 20 minutes, as I remember, and finally Mr. Tilton was allowed to amend the paper, and whether Mr. Bowen did I don't remember, and don't know but he did. At any rate, Mr. Tilton wanted to make some alteration, and he was allowed to do so by the arbitrators.

Q. Were any further amendments to the award suggested? A. Mr. Bowen said he wanted what is termed the Woodstock letter, which, I think, was in June, 1863; he wanted that returned to him, and the arbitrators assented to that.

Q. That that letter should be returned, instead of being burned? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When those two amendments had been made, what was said or done? A. Then the understanding was that Mr. Claflin was to take back what is called the Tripartite paper to Mr. Wilkeson and have it engrossed or re-written, and then they were to sign it.

Q. What then? A. Then there was a discussion who should be the custodian of that paper, and the understanding—they didn't come to any agreement, but the understanding was that they should agree, all three, upon some one party to keep it, and he was to keep it and not destroy it or give it up to either one of the parties without the consent of the whole; then Mr. Bowen said he wanted to close up the matter, and he gave his check to Mr. Tilton.

THE AGREEMENT TO BURN "ALL THE PAPERS."

Q. Now, I repeat the question again, whether at any time during that time any papers were particularly named that were to be destroyed? A. Yes, Sir, previous—after the paper had been amended, Mr. Claflin then asked them if they all agreed to the arbitration, and if they would burn all the papers; asked Mr. Tilton and Moulton, and I think Mr. Bowen said he had no papers.

Q. What did Tilton and Moulton say about burning the papers? A. They agreed to it.

Q. They agreed to it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now I repeat the question: Were there any papers particularly named that were to be destroyed or burned? A. I am not clear; the papers were named while the arbitrators were in discussion, several times, and my impression is they were, but I am not clear whether Mr. Claflin specified; he did several times, in the course of our talk together, and when they came in he said "all the papers," and I think he named what is termed "Mr. Beecher's apology," and Mr. Tilton's letter to Bowen of January 1, and I think some others, but they were discussed so many times in the arbitration that I am not so clear about it; but at any rate all the papers that were liable to have trouble. Mr. Claflin was very tenacious about that point.

Q. Do I understand you to say that your best recollection is that the letter known as "Mr. Beecher's apology," and Tilton's letter to Bowen of January 1, were particularly named as two papers that were to be burned? A. They were particularly named in the discussion, and think they were in the award, but I am not quite positive.

Q. What did Tilton and Moulton say to this proposition to burn the papers? A. It was agreed to.

Q. Was any check drawn that night by Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember seeing Mr. Bowen and Mr. Claflin engaged in private conversation just before Mr. Bowen drew that check? A. I don't know whether it was private; I knew they did have a conversation about the check.

Q. Could you hear what was said between them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said? A. Mr. Bowen said he didn't know exactly how his bank account stood, and wanted to know if Mr. Claflin would loan him the money in the morning to make his check good if it was not—if he hadn't money enough, and Mr. Claflin said he would.

Q. And thereupon did Mr. Bowen draw his check? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was done with the check after he drew it? A. He gave it to Mr. Tilton.

Q. What further was done that night after the delivery of the check to Tilton? A. I don't call to mind anything at this moment.

Q. The parties separated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see the check that night? A. I saw the check, but did not have it in my hands.

Q. Does the date of this check, April 4, 1872, enable you to fix the time of that arbitration? A. Only by inference; it would be only assuming; he spoke about loaning money to make the check good in the morning, but I didn't.

Q. Do you know Mr. Bowen's custom in regard to drawing checks and dating them, after three o'clock, one day ahead? A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. Well, you separated, I take it, after that check was drawn? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON WANTS MR. MOULTON TO BE CUSTODIAN OF THE COVENANT.

Q. After you separated that night, did Mr. Tilton make any request to you, and if so what, in regard to the custody of this "Tripartite Agreement?" A. Mr. Tilton said to me that he thought Mr. Moulton should be the custodian of the paper, that he had known more about the matters than anybody else, and wanted me to speak to Claflin, Freeland, and Bowen to that effect.

Q. Did you speak to them in pursuance of that request? A. I did.

Q. Did they assent or dissent to that arrangement? A. They dissented.

Q. And who did become the custodian of the paper? A. I only know by hearsay, Sir, that it was Mr. Claflin.

A. After this arrangement, did you have a conversation with Tilton and Moulton, at Mr. Moulton's house, on the subject of the arbitration? A. I did.

Q. How soon after the arbitration? A. I couldn't state exactly; I think it was ten or fifteen days.

Q. What was said there about it? A. Well, we were discussing the arbitration, and I said to him that Mr. Bowen felt that we brought in too much as the award—$7,000—and that his sons felt aggrieved about it, as they were interested in The Union, and during this conversation Mr. Moulton said that Sam. Wilkeson, as he called him, had either seen him or written to him and requested him particularly to burn Mr. Beecher's "apology" and the papers, and Mr. Moulton said: "Oh, yes, I have burned the papers," and laughed, and he says: "Mr. Beecher thinks I have." Then he remarked: "If Sam. Wilkeson thinks I have burned all these papers he is mistaken. What would Theodore do in case of trouble?"

Q. Can you remember anything further that was said in that conversation? A. Not that I call to mind.

MR. TILTON REGRETS WRITING THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Q. Do you remember the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal in November, 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Tilton after the publication of that scandal, upon the subject of the scandal? A. I did.

Q. When was that conversation? A. I think that was the 12th of December, 1872.

Q. How are you able to fix that date? A. Well, mainly as my wife's brother had died very suddenly and she was away.

Q. What? A. My wife's brother had died very suddenly, and she was away, and from a letter that I had from her.

Q. Your wife was away attending the funeral at the time of this conversation? A. The funeral had passed, but she was away.

A. Had not yet returned? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where was that conversation between yourself and Tilton? A. In my house, in what is known as the "sleeping room."

Q. What was said; how did the conversation begin? A. Well, I think the conversation began—it was just after Mr. Greeley's death, and we were speaking about him and THE TRIBUNE, and then he spoke—

Q. Was the subject of Mr. Greeley's will also talked about? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you an executor of Mr. Greeley's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it began by talking about Mr. Greeley and THE TRIBUNE? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you know it was after Mr. Greeley's death, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did Mr. Greeley die? A. It was the last days of November or the fore part of December: I forget the exact date.

Q. Do you remember the date of the funeral? A. Not absolutely; I think it was the 4th of December, though.

Q. And it was after the funeral that you had this conversation with Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; it was the 12th. I am quite confident, Sir.

Q. Now what was said by Tilton to you in that conversation in regard to this Woodhull scandal? A. Well, he referred to the Woodhull scandal, and said it was an infamous article, and he said there had been so many lies and misrepresentations about it, about Mr. Beecher and his wife, that he was writing a true story of the whole matter. He said that he would not state but what Mr. Beecher had made improper proposals to his wife, but there never was anything criminally wrong. He said there was not a purer woman living than Elizabeth. Then he referred—

Q. Can't you speak a little louder, Mr. Storrs? We want the jury to hear. A. I will try to; I am not feeling very well.

Q. He said there was no purer woman living than Elizabeth? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What followed that? A. Then he spoke of regret at having written the life of Mrs. Woodhull—the biography.

Q. Spoke regretfully of having written the life of Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say about that life? A. Well, he said that it damaged him more than $10,000, and he wished he hadn't done it.

Q. Did you see him again after that conversation? Mr. Beach—What year is that?

Mr. Tracy—1872; the 12th of December, 1872, the conversation that he is now speaking of.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON THREATENS MR. CLAFLIN.

Mr. Tracy—How soon after this conversation of Dec. 12 did you see him again? A. I cannot think; it was within a few days; it might have been ten and it might have been less.

Q. Was there anything said in regard to the true story on that occasion? A. Yes, Sir; he handed out a manuscript and said he had written it, and offered to let me take it and read it. I told him I would not take it then; perhaps I would at another time.

Q. Did you ever read it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You never saw it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now after this conversation that you have last mentioned between yourself and Tilton did you have an interview with Carpenter—Francis B. Carpenter or F. B. Carpenter? A. I did.

Q. You know Mr. Carpenter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I think I have knew him personally until about that time—within a month.

Q. Well, did he come to you and invite you to join in a scheme of starting a new paper in New-York? Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—We object to that, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Did you have an interview with him and other gentlemen upon that subject? A. I did.

Mr. Beach—We object to that last answer, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think that last answer might be taken; it don't go into the particulars. It has been ruled that you could not go beyond that, you know, in reference to the same matter.

Mr. Tracy—I shall not trespass upon the rule of your Honor, at least not intentionally. [To the witness.] Did you have more than one interview with Carpenter on that subject? A. Several.

Q. At any time did you meet other gentlemen than Mr. Carpenter upon that subject? A. I met at Mr. Bowen's; yes, Sir.

Q. Who was present at Mr. Bowen's? A. Mr. Claflin, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Bowen, and myself.

Q. How came you to go to that interview? A. I went at the request of Mr. Carpenter.

Q. To meet whom? A. To meet some gentlemen, he said.

Judge Neilson—No, that won't do. Strike that out.

Mr. Tracy—I was not going into the details, or to ask him whom he was to meet, only he was to meet gentlemen.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take Mr. Carpenter's declaration that he was to meet Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—He was not to meet Tilton.

Judge Neilson [to the witness]—What was the answer you made?

The Witness—I said I did; I don't remember exactly his question; he wanted to know if I met gentlemen, as I remember.

Judge Neilson—And you told them you met?

Mr. Tracy—I asked, "to meet whom," and he said, "gentlemen."

Judge Neilson—I thought you said Mr. Tilton.

The Witness—No, I said gentlemen.

Judge Neilson—Very well. Go on. I think you have enough about that.

Mr. Tracy—Now, did you four gentlemen have a conversation upon the subject of that newspaper scheme at Mr. Bowen's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did that interview continue? A. I couldn't tell exactly; I should think three hours, nearly.

Q. Did you afterward see Mr. Tilton and talk with him upon the subject of that interview at Bowen's house that night? A. I did.

Q. What transpired between you and Mr. Tilton relative to that interview? A. Shall I state all the conversation?

Q. Yes, state, as far as you are able, all that you said to

Mr. Tilton about what had transpired between yourself and others at Bowen's house, relative to that newspaper scheme. A. Well, I said to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Carpenter had called on me to go around to Mr. Bowen's to meet some gentlemen about starting a paper in New-York for his benefit; that when I got there I found nobody but Mr. Claflin.

Q. Whose benefit? A. His benefit.

Q. You say "his benefit;" whose benefit? A. Mr. Tilton's.

Q. When you got around there you found nobody but Claflin? A. Yes.

Q. Well, go on. A. I asked Mr. Tilton—says I, "What is the matter with Claflin?" Says he, "Why?" Says I, "He didn't seem favorably disposed to the project, and rather talked against it than for it." Mr. Tilton says, "Claflin better look out; perhaps something can be said about him," and then he wanted to know what Bowen said. I told him Mr. Bowen seemed to be friendly, and favorably disposed to the enterprise; and I stated to him that Mr. Carpenter's scheme, or plan, was that he thought there was a great opening for a New-York daily paper, and that his scheme was to make Mr. Beecher an editor, and him (Mr. Tilton) a foreign correspondent, to go abroad and be gone two or three years, and then come back, and be an editor or the editor, I forget which, and that Carpenter was to take some business interest in the paper, and I told him that Mr. Bowen said if they were going to start a paper they had better buy some New-York paper, that it would be of great importance to be in the Associated Press news; that that was of great value; and Mr. Bowen said he thought The New-York Express was for sale, and could be bought at a reasonable price, and that Mr. Bowen had agreed to see the owners of the paper, and see if it could be bought, and at what sum, &c. and that after we got through that subject, The Commercial Advertiser was spoken of; and then I told him that Mr. Bowen would sell—wanted to sell—The Brooklyn Union, and said if he could do that he would take, as I remember, $30,000 of the stock in it, and in that case Mr. Tilton was to be the editor-in-chief; and then Mr. Bowen said he didn't like the idea of starting a new paper; that he would rather go in and buy The Eagle; he would take some stock in The Eagle; and then Mr. Carpenter said if all these things failed, he wanted to know if he could not buy out The Golden Age, and have Mr. Tilton go abroad and be foreign correspondent for The Independent and Christian Union, and write an article once a week; I told him Mr. Bowen said he had some foreign correspondents, and didn't think he could take an article once a week, but he thought he could take one once a month; and as we rose to leave I told him Mr. Carpenter said that Mr. Beecher had said that he would take $20,000 in the New-York paper, if that succeeded.

Q. What did you say that Bowen said on that same subject! A. Mr. Bowen said that he would not be outdone by anybody in Brooklyn, that he would do as much toward it as anybody.

Q. Do I understand you to say that you told Tilton that all these various schemes that you have mentioned were discussed there that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. One after the other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. If you did not succeed then, the other was suggested as feasible? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what did Mr. Tilton say to that? A. Mr. Tilton said Mr. Carpenter had told him all about it. He said he thought there was a good opening for a paper, but he didn't know whether he would like to go abroad or not.

Q. Do I understand you correctly to say that in case you had determined to buy a Brooklyn paper, Mr. Tilton was to be editor-in-chief of that paper? A. Of the Brooklyn paper; yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Beecher was not to have anything to do with it? A. Nothing said about that.

Q. Mr. Beecher's connection with the paper was in case it was a New-York paper? A. A New-York morning paper.

Q. What further did Mr. Tilton say on the subject of his connection with the newspaper scheme than what you have stated? A. I don't at this moment call to mind anything.

Q. But do I understand you to say, Mr. Storrs, that as a matter of fact, these various schemes were talked about at Bowen's that night? A. Yes, Sir, more; more in detail.

Q. More in detail than you have stated here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you were engaged in that conversation at Bowen's, how long do you say? A. As near as I can remember it was some three hours.

WHO WAS REPRESENTED AT THE MEETING ABOUT A NEW JOURNAL.

Q. Whose friend was Mr. Claflin known as or understood to be in that interview?

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—Who did Mr. Claflin represent in that interview?

Mr. Beach—Objected to. Your Honor has ruled out the interview and taken only what this gentleman said to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—If I remember correctly, they proved by Mr. Moulton, whom I said I represented on a certain important interview.

Mr. Beach—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—And then they got in the interview, or Mr. Moulton's version of it.

Judge Neilson—It appeared previously that Mr. Moulton, in that instance, had authority to represent.

Mr. Tracy—That Moulton had authority?

Judge Neilson—Yes; in the instance that you refer to.

Mr. Tracy—The question there was whether I had authority to represent Mr. Beecher at that interview.

Judge Neilson—I recollect that very well.

Mr. Tracy—And Mr. Moulton said that I claimed to have authority from Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Well, this is a very different matter.

Mr. Tracy—Now, we have given some evidence, if your Honor please, on the subject of Mr. Carpenter's authority to represent Mr. Tilton on the subject of this negotiation for a newspaper, and it is drawn out from Mr. Moulton's evidence on that subject. We have also shown not only that this witness repeated to Mr. Tilton the most that transpired at that interview, and he approved the scheme and the substance of what was done, the only criticism being that he did not know whether he would care to go abroad, or whether he would like to go; and we have shown further, if your Honor please, that the plaintiff said that Carpenter had told him all about it—all about that interview. Now, that evidence taken together—first, the evidence that we have given touching Mr. Carpenter's authority; second, the fact that he assumed to act for him and did act for him, that this witness reported much of what was said approvingly to Tilton, and that Tilton said that Carpenter had told him all about what had transpired at that interview, I submit so far connects Tilton with what had transpired there as to enable us to prove what in fact did transpire there.

Judge Neilson—I think not, Sir. All that might occur and Mr. Carpenter be a mere intruder. It don't appear that he had any authority to represent the plaintiff.

Mr. Tracy—And this witness, your Honor will remember, said to Tilton that Carpenter had consulted him on the subject of starting a newspaper for his benefit.

Judge Neilson—Yes, and Mr. Carpenter might have done that voluntarily, of his own volition.

Mr. Tracy—Of course he might, but if the plaintiff afterward approved and adopted it, he adopted the agency.

Judge Neilson—He did not approve or adopt any agency. He did not disapprove or condemn the scheme, but there was no approval and no adoption?

Mr. Tracy—Well, your Honor will allow me to ask a question and take a ruling upon it.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Storrs, will you state what was said between yourself and Carpenter and Claflin and Bowen at that interview at Bowen's house in regard to the starting of a new paper in New-York. That is the question.

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S SHARE IN THE TRIBUNE.

Mr. Tracy—Your honor will be so good as to note our exception. [To the Witness]. Now, Mr. Storrs, do you know anything on the subject of the one share of TRUSTEES stock which stood in the name of Mr. Tilton? A. Nothing only what I have heard him remark.

Q. Well, Sir, that is what I want to inquire about; what have you heard him say on that subject? A. On what particular point?

Q. As to the ownership of the stock, who owned it, in fact? A. Well, I understood it from him that his father owned it.

Q. How did you understand it from him? A. Well, in conversations, in talks with him; once I think he asked me, some time ago, when, my impressions are, it was selling at some seven or eight thousand dollars, and Mr. Tilton asked me what I thought of selling it, and investing it in other securities, and, as I remember, I advised him to sell it. There was some general talk of that—

Q. In that conversation did he say who owned it? A. He said his father owned it.

Q. Did you know of the transaction at the time the stock was purchased? A. No, Sir.

Q. You only knew it after it had been purchased, and from what he said to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know who in fact had the dividends on that stock? A. I know from what he said. I think once when he was away he left, or ordered the money—at least his sister came to me about it. I am not quite clear. At any rate his sister came to me about it, and my impressions are that he ordered me to pay it.

Q. To whom? A. To his sister, for his father and mother.

MRS. TILTON AND MR. BEECHER TO BE "SMASHED."

Q. Did you have a conversation with Tilton in July, 1874, at Mr. Ovington's house? A. I did.

A. Was it before or after his wife had left him? A. It was just after.

Q. Do you know how soon after? A. I think one or two days.

Q. What was said on the subject of his wife's having left him, and what he should now do to his wife and Mr. Beecher? A. Well, the conversation on that point was that his wife had left him, and he said he had not said anything about it, but he thought he must now smash Elizabeth and Mr. Beecher.

Q. What did you say to that? A. Well, I said to him at least I was sorry, and it was unfortunate.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Moulton the first of January, 1873, on the subject of this newspaper enterprise at his house? A. A little.

Q. What was said?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Haven't we laid a foundation for that?

Judge Neilson—No.

MR. MOULTON INCENSED AGAINST MR.
BEECHER.

Mr. Tracy—I will withdraw that question for the present, your Honor, until we can show—there seems to be a little doubt whether we have connected Mr. Moulton sufficiently on that subject. [To the Witness.] In August, 1874, were you sent for at any time to come to Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What message did you receive that called you there?

Mr. Beach—Well, wait.

Mr. Tracy—From whom?

The Witness—Franklin Woodruff.

Q. On receipt of a message from Franklin Woodruff, what did you do? A. The next morning I waited at my house until about 9 o'clock, and, as I did not hear from Mr. Moulton, I sent around word to him, saying that I had received, the day before, a line from Mr. Woodruff, saying that he wanted to see me, and told him I was in readiness to see him.

Q. Well, what reply—did you get a reply to that note? A. He sent back a message saying that he had just arrived in town and would esteem it a favor if I would come there at his house.

Q. Did you go there? A. I did.

Q. Did you see him? A. I did.

Q. Who went with you? A. Mr. Proctor—John C. Proctor.

Q. Did you have an interview with Mr. Moulton that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did that interview take place? A. Up-stairs, over the parlor, front room.

Q. What was said by him on your going into the room up-stairs?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—They interrogated Mr. Moulton on that subject.

Mr. Beach—Sir!

Judge Neilson—They interrogated Mr. Moulton as to this interview.

Mr. Beach—Did they?

Judge Neilson—I think they did.

Mr. Beach—Let us see; where is it? Oh! Yes, Sir, I remember.

Mr. Tracy—Do you withdraw your objection?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; I had forgotten it for a moment.

Mr. Tracy—What was said, Mr. Storrs? A. Well, Mr. Moulton bade me the compliments of the day and explained why he sent for me, and laughed, and said he didn't know as I would come to see a blackmailer, and went up stairs, and he said he wanted me to tell my brother that he must not sign the Plymouth Church Committee's report; he said that Mr. Beecher had confessed his adulteries to him, and he could prove it; he said he was going to drive Mr. Beecher out of Plymouth Church and out of Brooklyn; he says, "I have always—"

Mr. Hill—Speak louder.

The Witness—He said, "I have always stood up by Mr. Beecher, but he has now called me a blackmailer, and said if Mr. Beecher had followed his advice it would have been all right; he said he had done what he could to oppose one of Mr. Tilton's statements, and he named the one, but I cannot tell you what one it was—and said that my brother must not sign that report; in some connection he said he wanted to be cross-examined or make some further statement to the Committee, and I said I supposed the evidence was all in, and that the report had been made. Well, he said I must tell my brother he must not sign that report; he says, "If he signs that report I shall make another statement, and," he says, "if I do, it will ruin a lady, a friend of yours"—he says, "somebody that will break your heart." I asked him if he meant so and so—

Judge Neilson—Don't mention any names.

The Witness—I will try not to. He said somebody would break my heart, and I asked who it was, and he said he wouldn't give any name, and I forgot whether—and I said to him that—

Mr. Hill—A little louder.

The Witness—That I had had nothing to do with the Plymouth Church report, and that I didn't intend to have; that they had urged me very strong to appear before them, but I would not, and I should have nothing to do with it; and I told him that I should not influence my brother to sign it, or not to sign it—I should have nothing to do about it; I told him any message he had for my brother I would take to him, but I should not influence him to sign it or not to sign it.

Q. Anything said to him by you as to the probability that your brother had already signed it? A. Yes, I told him—I told him I thought—I presumed, but I did not know—that I understood the meeting was to be held that night, and that I thought very likely he had. He said that he did not want him to stultify himself; that is the word he used.

Q. Did he explain why he did not want your brother to stultify himself? A. Didn't state, only as I have stated.

Q. What did he say, if anything, about Mr. Beecher having called him a blackmailer? A. Well, I cannot recollect definitely, but he said considerable upon that point—seemed to have some feeling on that point, but I cannot recollect all the—just all that was said.

Q. State whether or not he spoke of Mr. Beecher in this connection—of his having called him a blackmailer, with a good deal of feeling? A. Well, he seemed to have more feeling on that point than anything else.

Q. What was said, if anything, on the subject of his having been a friend of Mr. Beecher until Mr. Beecher had called him a blackmailer, and now he intended to protect himself—was there anything said on that subject, and if so, what? A. That is all that I call to mind about it; he did talk, I think, more than what I have stated, but I cannot recollect clearly enough to—

Q. Well, do you mean to say that he said that Mr. Beecher having called him a blackmailer, he now intended to protect himself? A. That is the substance of the words, I forget which.

Q. And was it in that connection that he said he meant to drive him out of Plymouth Church and out of Brooklyn? A. Well, he said it in that connection, I think, just before, and then afterward he said it.

Q. What did I understand you to say that Moulton said about having been Mr. Beecher's friend up to the time he had made that charge? A. Well, he said he had always been a friend to him, and acted as his friend, and that there would have been no trouble if he had followed his advice, and then he said that he was opposed to some—I think he specified the article that Mr. Tilton made, or letter—I can't tell you exactly what, whether it was a statement or letter, and he said he was opposed to it, and did what he could to prevent Mr. Tilton's making it—something to that effect.

Q. Well, what did he say about his having been a friend to Mr. Beecher up to the time Mr. Beecher charged him with being a blackmailer? A. Well, that he should now take care of himself, or defend himself, or—

Q. Well, did he say he had been his friend up to that time? A. He so said—said he had been his friend and acted his friend up to that time.

Q. Do you know what time in August this interview was with Mr. Moulton? A. I can tell. [Referring to papers.] That was Aug. 28; Mr. Woodruff's letter is dated the 27th; it was the next day.

Q. Do you know how long that was after Mr. Beecher had published his statement before the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, was it after? A. I can't tell you.

Q. It was on the 28th of August? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Moulton had been absent from Brooklyn just previous to this conversation? A. I think he had; he so stated, I think.

Q. Where did he say he had been? A. I don't think he said—down East; I don't think he stated any more definitely.

MR. TILTON TALKS OF SUING PEOPLE FOR SLANDERING HIS WIFE.

Q. Any particular place— Now, Mr. Storrs, when, if ever, did you hear Mr. Tilton charge that Henry Ward Beecher had been guilty of adultery with his wife? A. Well, I don't know from him that I ever did unless it was by inference in that conversation at Mr. Ovington's in last July.

Q. When he said that, his wife having left him, he should now smash his wife and Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is the only thing you ever heard him say looking in that direction? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I am requested to ask you, Mr. Storrs, whether you ever had a conversation with Mr. Tilton on the subject of suing any person for slander for having made a charge against his wife of having committed adultery with Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—What was that, please?

Mr. Tracy—Whether he ever had a conversation with Mr. Tilton in which Tilton threatened to sue a party for slander for having charged that his wife had been guilty of adultery with Mr. Beecher. A. I think there was something of that sort.

Q. Do you know when it was? A. I do not exactly.

Q. Well, can you tell about when it was? A. Well, I should—my impressions are it was the last of 1871 or in 1872.

Q. The last of 1871, or the first of 1872, that Winter?

A. That is my impression.

Q. Winter of 1871-72. Now, what did Mr. Tilton say? I don't ask you to name names, but what did Mr. Tilton say about suing a party for slander for having said that? A. Well, he said he thought of suing a party for having slandered his wife—that she had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Where was that conversation? A. Well, I can't tell you the place.

Q. After the termination of a certain law suit against Mr. Moulton last fall, did he send for you again to come and see him? A. He did.

Q. Do you know when that was? A. I can tell. [Referring to papers.] I think it was Dec. 10, 1874.

Q. How soon was that after the termination of the suit of Miss Procter against him? A. I can't tell you definitely, but soon after.

Q. Soon after? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go and see him? A. I did.

Q. Who went with you? A. My brother went in with me.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did that conversation occur? A. Up stairs in his house, front room.

A QUESTION OF FACT DISCUSSED.

Q. Who was present at that conversation?

A. Nobody but Mr. Moulton and my brother and myself.

Q. State whether or not in that conversation he gave any expressions of feeling against Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know as there is any foundation for it.

Mr. Tracy—Oh, yes; we examined on that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, point it out.

Mr. Tracy—At least that is my memory.

Judge Neilson—I think the conversation was inquired into both when Mr. Storrs was there and when they asked Mr. Moulton if he didn't say he would drive Mr. Beecher out of Brooklyn, and the like of that.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, that was it. You will find it on page 277—that conversation was inquired into.

Judge Neilson—Now you want to shape your inquiry with express reference to what was asked Mr. Moulton.

Q. In that conversation did Mr. Moulton say that "Mr. Beecher is a liar and a libertine, and, damn him, if personal violence would do any good, I would shoot him down," or something to that effect?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment—no objection.

A. I could state it better by stating what was said.

Mr. Fullerton—No; the question is whether he said that.

The Witness—He only used, as I remember, one of those words; he used other words, but only—he said he was a liar, and then went on and used other words, but not exactly the words he asked me.

Q. Well, in substance, those words?

Mr. Fullerton—That won't do.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! no.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that that is the rule in substance; that has been a ruling often enforced.

Mr. Beach—That was not the form; that is the objection.

Judge Neilson—You will first ask him a leading question with reference to the exact inquiry as made in respect to Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Tracy—If the objection was as to the form of my question—

Mr. Fullerton—The objection is not to the form.

Mr. Tracy—What did Moulton say in substance about Mr. Beecher's being a liar and a libertine?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Well, the suggestion I made about the form of the question is this—you did not understand it—I think you first ought to ask in the very words put to Mr. Moulton, "Did he state so and so," and you are at liberty then to follow it up by asking him if he stated so in substance.

Mr. Tracy—I take your Honor's suggestion.

Judge Neilson—That last may not be necessary; the witness may remember it without.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir [To the witness.] I ask you now if, in that conversation, Mr. Moulton said, "Mr. Beecher is a liar and a libertine?"

The Witness—Well, am I to state what he did say?

Mr. Tracy—No; you are to answer that question whether— A. He said that in substance, Sir.

Q. What? A. He said that in substance.

Mr. Beach—That I object to; it was not put to Mr. Moulton in that form.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that I read from the book, and do you mean that I did not read the whole question?

Mr. Beach—No, I don't—I don't mean that you did not read the whole question; I said no such question was put to Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Tracy—Why, the question is this: "Did you say to him within a month or thereabouts in your house, 'Mr. Beecher is a liar and a libertine?'"

Judge Neilson—Now, you are at liberty to ask that.

Mr. Beach—Now, I object to the answer because the witness replies in answer to the question calling for the exact language, that Mr. Moulton said that in substance, whereas Mr. Moulton was not interrogated as to the substance.

Judge Neilson—Whereas Mr. Moulton was not interrogated as to the substance.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; he was asked as to the very words, the precise words.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Tracy]—Well, you are confined to the words; go on.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—So far as he says he used it in substance.

Mr. Beach—To strike out the whole answer.

Mr. Tracy—I ask your Honor not to decide that tonight. When we have put the very words, we may nevertheless ask the witness whether the party did not say that in substance and we will support that proposition by authorities in the morning.

Mr. Morris—Well, you ask for the very words, and the witness answers that he said that in substance; that is the difference.

Mr. Tracy—We may ask the witness, notwithstanding we have asked the original witness, whom we are seeking to contradict, "Did you not say thus and so?"—we may nevertheless ask the impeaching witness or the contradicting witness whether he did not say that in substance.

Mr. Morris—But that is not your question; your question asks whether he said those precise words, and the witness answers that he said it in substance; that is the difference.

Mr. Tracy—I have put my question in pursuance of the suggestion of the Court, and if the witness gives a negative answer to that, then I shall put the question whether he did not say that in substance.

Judge Neilson—Well, that was my suggestion, as I supposed the examination ought to be, and I think you may put the question as to its being the substance because—

Mr. Morris—That is not the question he did put.

Judge Neilson—I know it is not the question, because many witnesses when interrogated would not be able to answer to the very precise words, to a syllable, and therefore you are obliged to fall back upon an answer in substance.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—A degree of fairness is required in treating the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—But they take the responsibility of incorporating in their question the precise words to which they wish a response. Now, the witness must say either yes or no. He is not at liberty to say, "I said that in substance;" that is not an answer to what. Now, if they put the question to this witness whether Mr. Moulton did not say that in substance, why, they are putting a question to him that was not put to Mr. Moulton at all, and placing the witness in a false position. Non constat but that the witness Moulton would have said "Yes" if they had asked him if he had said that in substance.

Judge Neilson—And they did not ask him that!

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; they did not give him an opportunity to say that he said that in substance; all that they asked him was whether he didn't say this, embodying in their question certain words; he says, "No, I didn't say that;" that is all the answer he could give, and if they then wished to put him in the attitude of having decided that he said it in substance, they should have followed it up with another question, "Did you say that in substance, Sir?" Then, if he had said "No," they would have been prepared to put the question which they now put to him.

Mr. Tracy—Then, supposing we did. Reading—"Q. Did you say anything in substance like that. A. No."

Mr. Fullerton—That we haven't got to yet; that has not been developed at all.

Mr. Morris—The question is on the motion to strike out.

Mr. Tracy—I am just developing it.

Mr. Fullerton—You develop it after the argument.

Mr. Tracy—Certainly.

Mr. Beach—And the question and answer which the gentleman now reads has application to a different question from the one which was addressed to the witness.

Mr. Tracy—I understand that

Mr. Beach—You understand that, and you misapply it.

Mr. Tracy—I suggested five minutes ago that we should suspend that until morning, and find what we did ask the witness.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will see the great impropriety there would be in permitting the witness to answer, or for them to ask the substance as inquired, to which they have directed his attention, when you learn that this further question was put to the witness and this answer given: [Reading]:

Q. Did you express any hostile sentiment toward Mr. Beecher in their presence? A. I think I did, Sir; I will tell you all I said as near as I recollect, if you would like to have it.

The witness was willing to tell what he remembered of the expression of hostile sentiment he then made toward Mr. Beecher; but they would not receive it; they rejected it.

Mr. Tracy—All I have to say is, if your Honor please—

Mr. Beach—Excuse me. They put two questions to him. In the first place, "Did you say to him [that is Mr. H. S. Caldwell]—Did you say to him within a month or thereabouts, 'Mr. Beecher is a liar and libertine, and damn him,' &c.;" and the gentleman has put that question to Mr. Storrs upon the supposition that it was one which had been addressed to Mr. Moulton, while the question to Mr. Moulton was in reference to Mr. Caldwell. But, when you come to the question that was put in reference to the declaration of Moulton to Mr. Charles Storrs in the presence of his brother, it is modified in this form: [Reading]:

Did n't you say in their presence, at your house—since the termination of the libel suit of Miss Proctor against you—did n't you say to them in your house, that Mr. Beecher was a sneak and liar, and that if they said so, damn him, you would shoot him? A. That if what?

Q. If they said so? A. If they said so, I would shoot him!

Q. Yes.

Judge Neilson—Did you say that? A. I do n't exactly understand the form of the question. No, I did n't say that.

Mr. Tracy—Did you say anything in substance like that? A. No.

Q. Did you express any willingness to commit violence against Mr. Beecher in their presence. A. No.

Q. Did you say that he was a sneak and liar in their presence? A. I don't recollect that I said that.

Q. Did you express any willingness or disposition to commit violence against Mr. Beecher? A. No.

Q. Did you express any hostile sentiment toward Mr. Beecher?

And then came the declaration of the willingness of the witness—saying, "I think I did, Sir; and I am willing to tell you all I said."

Judge Neilson—Then I understand from your reading that the question now put applied not to a conversation with Mr. Storrs, but with Mr. Caldwell?

Mr. Beach—With Mr. Caldwell. I think the gentleman will see that. (To Mr. Tracy.) You read from the top of the page.

Mr. Tracy—[Reading]:

Do you know Mr. Caldwell? A. Yes, Sir; I know him.

Q. H. S. Caldwell? A. Yes, Sir; I know him.

Q. Did you say to him, within a month or thereabouts, in your house, "Mr. Beecher is a liar?"

Mr. Beach—You made a mistake.

Mr. Tracy—Yes; I did; of course, I did.

Mr. Beach—Then Mr. Hill has it his own way; I don't care about it.

Mr. Tracy—I made a mistake there.

Judge Neilson—Well, this last question and answer is stricken out. We shall start anew.

Mr. Tracy—I did put that question to Mr. Caldwell in the first instance; and then, after putting that question,

I asked him if he didn't express similar sentiments to Mr. Charles Storrs and Mr. Augustus Storrs.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is too vague; you cannot impeach a witness on "similar sentiments."

Mr. Tracy—What?

Judge Neilson—You cannot impeach a witness on "similar sentiments;" that is too vague.

Mr. Fullerton—We can adjourn, however, if your Honor pleases.

Judge Neilson—Do you think you can?

Mr. Fullerton—With your Honor's permission.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CHARLES STORRS AND MR. REDPATH TESTIFY.

EXAMINATION OF CHARLES STORRS CONCLUDED—

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARY F. PERKINS REGARDING MRS. TILTON'S VISITS TO MR. BEECHER'S HOUSE; JAMES FREELAND, CORROBORATIVE OF MR. STORRS; MR. AND MRS. ROBERT T. MOORE, IMPEACHING KATE CAREY; AND JAMES REDPATH AS TO THE MANNER IN WHICH HE OBTAINED THE "TRUE STORY."

WEDNESDAY, March 31, 1875.

The testimony of Charles Storrs was unfinished on Tuesday, and nearly the whole of to-day's morning session was devoted to the further elucidation of the facts within his knowledge. Mr. Storrs was for many years the consistent friend of Mr. Tilton. Mr. Storrs's evidence was in keeping with the theory of the defense that the original offense of Mr. Beecher against Mr. Tilton was the former's advice to the wife of the latter to separate from her husband; that it was subsequently advanced to a charge of "improper proposals," and after that to the graver one of actual adultery. The examination of Mr. Storrs was throughout directed to the development of facts and conversations bearing out this theory. He swore that in January, 1871, Mr. Tilton had told him that Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse had influenced Mr. Bowen to discharge him by retailing flanders by women—one of whom was Miss Bessie Turner—against him, and had further influenced his own wife against him. Mr. Tilton further stated that he had then charged Mr. Beecher with making improper proposals to his wife, which Mr. Beecher had denied. Mr. Beecher had subsequently gone to Mrs. Tilton, who had written a denial of the story; but Mr. Moulton had compelled Mr. Beecher, at the mouth of the pistol, to deliver it up and write an apology.

Mr. Storrs's attention being called to his action, jointly with Mr. Clafin and Mr. Freeman, as arbitrator in the Bowen-Tilton-Beecher matters, which were closed by the signing of the tripartite agreement, he corroborated Mr. Clafin in all the essential particulars of the affair. He swore that the conditions precedent to the signing of that covenant were the destruction of all the papers connected with the scandal, the return of the Woodstock letter to Mr. Bowen, and the payment of the $7,000 award to Tilton. But Mr. Storrs on this point went further, and swore that, while Mr. Moulton was a party to the agreement, to burn all the papers, he had subsequently told the witness that he had not burned any of them, so that in the end only the Woodstock letter was suppressed by its being returned to Mr. Bowen. The substance of this was subsequently made public by Mr. Tilton through Mr. McKelway's agency.

A third important point in Mr. Storrs's evidence was the development of the fact that Mr. Tilton, as late as Dec. 12, 1872, a month after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, had declared that while he would not deny that Mr. Beecher had made improper proposals to his wife, there never was anything criminally wrong between them.

A still more striking piece of evidence was the threat of Mr. Moulton to shoot Mr. Beecher, if only Mr. Storrs so advised, and the further threat that if Augustus Storrs signed the Plymouth Church Committee's report, a statement would be made dragging in the name of a member of Mr. Storrs's family. Mr. Storrs also swore that Mr. Moulton threatened to drive Mr. Beecher out of Plymouth Church and Brooklyn.

The cross-examination of Mr. Storrs, which was conducted by Mr. Beach in the absence of Mr. Fullerton, was a labored effort to break the great force of this important testimony.

Mrs. Mary F. Perkins, a sister of Mr. Beecher, was called just before recess to testify to two points. In one of the statements published last Summer appeared what purported to be a letter from Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton, saying that his wife would soon leave for the South. Mrs. Perkins testified that never during the absence of Mrs. Beecher in the Winter of 1871-2, and 1872-3, had Mrs. Tilton called at Mr. Beecher's house. Mrs. Perkins also testified to her constant attendance with her brother in Massachusetts from June 5 to June 12, 1873, a period covering a week subsequent to the time Mrs. Moulton swore he had confessed to her, and the week during which she said she had again seen him.

Mr. James Freeland, the next witness, was called to confirm the testimony of Mr. Storrs and Mr. Clafin as to the circumstances of the arbitration. His testimony did not differ from theirs materially; he was firm in his recollection that all the letters connected with the scandal were to be destroyed. The cross-examination had a very comical vein running through it, but was unimportant.

The impeachment of the witness Kate Carey, or Kate Smith, was begun by the calling of Mr. and Mrs. Robert T. Moore. They swore that they would not believe her under oath; and further, that Kate Carey had told them that while living in Mrs. Tilton's family she had never seen anything improper in the relations of Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton.

James Redpath of Boston gave an account of the manner in which he obtained possession of the original of the "True Story." He had been a frequent visitor at Mr. Tilton's house during the latter part of the year 1872 and the beginning of 1873, and Mr. Tilton had showed him the MS. of the True Story. On one occasion when he called there he met Mrs. Tilton in the entry. She was looking very sad, and her face wore an expression of resolution, he said, which he had never noticed before. He went to Mr. Tilton's room and found him lying on the bed, and apparently suffering from great mental distress. Mr. Tilton had the MS. of the True Story in his hand. Mr. Tilton said that Mrs. Tilton had threatened that if the True Story was published, she would come out and deny it. Mr. Redpath then said, "You have not told me all," and Mr. Tilton replied, "No." The witness then tried to get the MS. into his own possession in order to prevent Mr. Tilton from publishing it. He told Mr. Tilton that if the latter desired the True Story to be made public he (Mr. Redpath) could easily get it published for him. Mr. Tilton, the witness said, refused to give him the MS., but had finally laid it down where the witness could get it.

The cross-examination of Mr. Redpath was very brief, Mr. Fullerton remarking that he would ask him no more then, as the witness was subpoenaed for Monday.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES STORES RESUMED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tracy, will you proceed now?

Mr. Tracy—Yes, your Honor. Mr. Storrs take the stand.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Storrs, in the conversation between yourself and Mr. Moulton, in the presence of your brother, at his house in August last, did Mr. Moulton say to you in substance, speaking of Mr. Beecher, that Mr. Beecher was a sneak and a liar, and that if they said so, damn him, you would shoot him, or words in substance to that? A. Do you mean August or December?

Q. In December—in December, I mean. A. Well, he only used part of the words; he said that in substance, but not that exactly.

Q. Well, what part of the words did he use? A. Well, he used the word "liar."

Q. And did he say that if you said so he would shoot him? A. He said so.

Q. State whether or not he expressed a willingness to commit violence against Mr. Beecher in your presence?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Mr. Beach—The objection is that it calls for the conclusion of the witness instead of the language.

Mr. Tracy—The question I put to the witness was, "Did you express a willingness to commit violence against Mr. Beecher in their presence?" That is the question I put to the witness on the stand, and he answered "No."

Judge Neilson—Well, now put that—

Mr. Beach—That does not authorize them to ask this witness for a conclusion.

Mr. Tracy—I ask him in the language of the question first; this is my first question in the language of the question. [Reading the question.]

Mr. Beach—That is not admissible, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—I think you ought to put to him the precise question you put to Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Tracy—I do; I read it from the book.

Judge Neilson—Take his answer.

Mr. Tracy—Do I understand the witness can answer.

Mr. Beach—They cannot, Sir, by putting a leading or other question to the witness they intend to assail, justify calling upon the contradicting witness for a conclusion. This does not call for language, for an expression of Mr. Moulton; it only calls from Mr. Moulton for the expression of a conclusion from what he might have said. That was inadmissible, and that will not justify them in pursuing the same course with the impeaching witness.

Judge Neilson—For the reason that what Mr. Moulton might think was in substance this witness might not so understand.

Mr. Beach—Certainly.

Mr. Tracy—There was no objection to the question put to Mr. Moulton, and he answers. Now, I have the right, I submit, to put to the impeaching witness the precise question which I put to Mr. Moulton, and have an answer.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is your first duty.

Mr. Tracy—That is my first duty. Now, I put that.

Judge Neilson—Now, what foundation have you laid for the next question?

Mr. Tracy—This question. I read the question. The question I put to Mr. Moulton was this: [Reading.] "Did you express any willingness to commit violence against Mr. Beecher in their presence?" He answers: "No."

Judge Neilson—Well, what else did you ask Mr. Moulton?

Mr. Tracy—I asked him [reading]:

Did you say that he was a sneak and a liar in their presence? A. I don't recollect that I said that.

Q. Did you express any willingness or disposition to commit violence against Mr. Beecher? A. No.

Q. Did you express any hostile sentiments toward Mr. Beecher in their presence? A. I think I did, Sir; I will tell you what I said.

Judge Neilson—Now, my ruling is that you must put your question in the precise form and terms of those questions.

Mr. Tracy—Exactly what I read to the witness.

Mr. Beach—But, your Honor, it was not necessary for us to object to the question that was put to Mr. Moulton. It was their duty to lay a proper foundation for impeaching contradictory evidence.

Judge Neilson—Yes. Well, now, so far they have a right to interrogate the witness, and not beyond that.

Mr. Beach—But I submit to your Honor that they have not laid the proper foundation when they ask the main witness a conclusion from acts or language which he may have done or used; that they must put the words or language which they intend to assert that he used before, the substance of it, and it was not necessary for us to object, because our time for objection is just this, when they come to their impeaching witness.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Tracy, continue and put the very questions you have there seriatim.

Mr. Tracy—I will.

Judge Neilson—One after the other.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir. [To the witness]: Did Mr. Moulton express any willingness to commit violence against Mr. Beecher in your presence?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question, as calling for the conclusion of the witness and not asking for the language or the substance of the language used by Mr. Moulton.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I except.

Mr. Tracy—What is your answer? A. He did.

Q. Did he say in your presence that Mr. Beecher was a sneak and a liar! A. He said he was a liar, but did not use the word "sneak," that I remember.

Q. That is all on that subject. In expressing a hostile sentiment toward Mr. Beecher what did Mr. Moulton say? A. He said he would go and shoot him, if I said so.

Q. What further did he say than you have already stated on the subject of Mr. Beecher's being a liar? A. He said he was—

Mr. Beach—Of course they have not laid the foundation for that, Sir, but I don't care about it.

The Witness—He said he was a liar and a perjurer and an adulterer, and he knew it.

MISTAKES IN THE TESTIMONY CORRECTED.

Q. Now, I desire, Mr. Storrs, to call your attention to a few verbal errors that have crept into your evidence, either by being misunderstood, or otherwise, and I will ask you to correct them, and that will close my examination. In one part of your evidence, speaking of what Mr. Tilton said with regard to improper proposals, you are made to say that he had told him about improper proposals by Mr. Beecher. Did you mean to use the pronoun "he?" A. That his wife had told him.

Q. That his wife had told him about improper proposals by Mr. Beecher? Yes, Sir.

Q. In that connection—well, just repeat now, for the purpose of correcting it, what he said on that subject, not all of it, but in that connection, that sentence? A. Well, he said that his wife had told him Mr. Beecher had made improper proposals to her.

Q. And then followed what you detailed yesterday. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Again, you are made to say, speaking of the life of Woodhull, that Mr. Tilton said "he didn't know as I—" that is you, witness, understood about the writing of the biography; did you so state? A. No, Sir; that the people did not seem to understand.

Q. He spoke of that in connection with his Western tour? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Lecturing tour—again, speaking of the "Personal Statement" which you said Mr. Tilton left with you, you answer he left that article "I" set up called the "Personal Statement." Did you so state? A. If I did I did not intend it—that was set up; that he showed me.

Q. What? A. That he set up; the one that was prepared for the paper.

Q. The "Personal Statement" that he had set up is what you said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Again, you are made to say that a certain conversation which you describe as occurring at your house between yourself and Mr. Tilton occurred in "the sleeping room." Did you say sleeping-room? A. Smoking-room, Sir.

Q. Speaking of the various newspaper schemes that were canvassed in that meeting at Mr. Bowen's house between yourself, Carpenter, and Claflin and Bowen, you are made to say if you did not succeed then, the other was suggested as feasible; do you mean to say that one of these schemes was first canvassed, and then if you didn't—if you could not succeed in establishing that, that the other was suggested? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As a possible, feasible scheme? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. One was canvassed after the other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. First canvassed one and then canvassed the other; again, in speaking of Mr. Tilton's having threatened to sue some one for slander for having charged that his wife had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher, your expression is not quite clear. Will you repeat what you said yesterday on that subject? A. Well, I said that he threatened to sue some one for having reported that his wife had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Threatened to sue a person whom he named? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF CHARLES STORRS.

Mr. Beach—You spoke yesterday, Sir, of your long intimacy with Mr. Tilton; has that continued up to this time? A. Not quite as formerly, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect, in the Spring of 1873, meeting him in the streets of this city and failing to recognise him? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. In the Spring of 1873, did not your feelings change towards Mr. Tilton? A. They did, Sir.

Q. From the Spring of 1873 until the accidental meeting of which you spoke, at Ovington's, had you met Mr. Tilton? A. Not that I am aware of, Sir.

Q. That meeting, I understand, at Ovington's was in July, 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Storrs, you have given a narrative of various conversations; in doing so, do you assume to use the language of the various parties to them? A. As near as I could remember, Sir.

Q. Did you assume to remember the precise language they used? A. Part, and part the substance.

Q. Did you give the exact language, in so far as you recollected it, upon your direct examination? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Can you discriminate as between the portions in which you give the exact language and give only the substance? A. I probably could a part, and part perhaps not.

Q. Well, when you assume to give the exact language of the speaker, you can designate that part of his remarks which you so intend to repeat, can't you? A. I could by going over, probably.

Q. Well, you did that, I understand, on your direct examination, so far as you recollected the exact language? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What do you mean by giving the substance of language? A. Well, the truth—the spirit of it; it might be changed in words.

Q. Well, do you mean anything more than that you give the impression which you have preserved of a conversation, without being able to give the exact language? A. Well, both.

Q. No, Sir; in this part of the conversation, where you do not assume to give the exact language, do you mean by the term "giving the substance" anything more than giving the impression which you have preserved from your recollection—a general recollection—of the conversation? A. My impression—my remembrance.

Q. Remembrance. Well, you say you don't remember the exact language in the parts to which I am now asking your attention? A. Probably not every word; no, Sir.

Q. If you don't remember the precise language, you give, then, only the impression which was produced upon your mind? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Yes, I suppose so. Can you take any one of the conversations you have narrated, and discriminate between those parts where you give the exact language, and those portions where you relate only the substance? A. I think I could.

Q. Well, take the first conversation then, that you spoke of—where was that? A. That—you mean on the New Year's, 2d of January?

Q. First conversation you spoke of on your direct examination? A. That was the 2d of January, 1871.

Q. And where was it? A. At his house—parlor, in his house.

Q. Well, now, Sir; give me that portion of that conversation in which you remember the exact language used, either by yourself or him, and give it in the words and in the order as near as you can in which it occurred? A. Well, after the compliments of the day, I asked him if he had been discharged from The Independent and Union. He said he had. I think these—

Q. Well, that is not the exact language, is it? A. Well, it is as near as I can remember.

Q. Well, do you say that that was the exact language? A. To the best of my recollection I believe it to be so.

Q. You must know, Sir, whether you recollect sufficiently to give the exact language? A. Well, I should not want to say absolutely every word, but that is the best of my—

Q. Very well, you don't mean to say that is the exact language? A. As near as I can.

Q. I don't ask that.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that is an answer to the question.

Mr. Beach—I submit it is not.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir; this is a cross-examination.

Mr. Tracy—I know it is.

Judge Neilson—And this witness is a very intelligent gentleman.

Mr. Tracy—I know he is.

Judge Neilson—And his recollection can be sifted, and that is to be done by the cross-examination.

Mr. Tracy—I know that, your Honor, but I submit that when a witness has said that "that is my best recollection, I have given you the substance of his words as near as I can," that that is a sufficient answer.

Judge Neilson—I understand; he is not asked as to the substance of the words; that is not the question.

Mr. Tracy—He has stated he has given the exact language as near as he can remember.

Judge Neilson—The counsel will proceed.

Mr. Tracy—I object to the question on the ground that the question has been once put and answered; your Honor will note my exception.

Judge Neilson—I do not think it has been answered, and I think the cross-examination ought to proceed.

Mr. Beach—In so far as you have now given that conversation, do you say that that was the exact language used? A. I could not state better than I have; that is my best remembrance; I think it was, Sir.

Q. Is your remembrance so clear upon this point that you will swear that that is the exact language? A. I should think if I swore it was not—should think I lied, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that answer.

Judge Neilson—Yes. Answer as well as you can, Mr. Storrs.

The Witness—Well, that is the best—

Q. If you will be kind enough to answer my question, Sir, we will get along very amicably and speedily. A. I am trying to do so, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, perhaps so. In so far as you have given that conversation, is your recollection of it so accurate that you are willing to swear that you have given the exact words used? A. I would not say the exact words; no, Sir.

Q. Very well; you have answered that. Now, go on. You asked him if he had been discharged from those papers, and he said he had. What next? A. Then he got up, and said that he wanted me to go right around to Frank Moulton's with him, and we started and went there.

Q. Is that all of that conversation? A. That is all that moment.

Q. How long was you conversing with him? A. Well, he got right up, and we went right around.

Q. How long was you conversing with him? A. But a very few minutes, Sir.

Q. Well, you went then to Mr. Moulton's? A. Yes.

Q. You recollect that conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, give me the portion of that conversation so far as you are willing to swear that you can repeat the exact words used by any party to it; omit all the rest; just give me that portion which you will swear you can repeat in the exact words of the parties. A. I would not want to say the exact words, because I might use a preposition, a "be," or an "of," or an "in" that would be different, but I can give it—what I believe the exact words.

Q. I am not asking for that, Sir; I am asking if you can give any remark made in that conversation in the exact language used by any of the parties? A. Well, I say I think I can.

Q. You think you can—now give it! A. Well, I asked him what the trouble was.

Q. Is that the exact language? A. I think it is, Sir.

Q. Well! A. He said that Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse had been talking with Mr. Bowen against him.

Q. That is the exact language is it? A. I believe it is.

Q. Do you swear it is! A. I swear to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Ah! Sir; but do you recollect it so distinctly that you will swear positively! A. No, Sir.

Mr. Porter—One moment; I object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think it is proper.

Mr. Porter—I submit that it is fully answered in the last answer.

Judge Neilson—No; I think it is proper.

Mr. Porter—Well, I ask your Honor to have my objection noted, and my exception, and I ask to have the question and answer read by the stenographer.

Judge Neilson—I understand it. My view of a cross-examination may differ from yours.

Mr. Porter—That may be, Sir; and that is the reason that I propose to take an exception.

Judge Neilson—The counsel has the right to test the recollection of the witness, no matter how respectable the witness is, and to make him distinguish between his recollection of the language actually used and his recollections of conversations in substance. I don't see any objection to the question.

Mr. Porter—Well, your Honor evidently does not appreciate my objection. I submit that the witness gave a direct, affirmative, clear, intelligent, and full answer to the last question; and I submit that the repetition of that question is improper, and I ask your Honor to have the previous question and the answer and the new question read, in order to see whether I am or am not right.

Judge Neilson—I think this question is proper, Mr. Porter.

Mr. Porter—I except.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that because a question is repeated with a slight difference of language, it is to be excluded as improper. I think this is within the scope of a cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—Now, Mr. Storrs, if you will please understand my purpose, I think we will get along more easily. I want to draw your attention to those portions of either of those conversations you have related, in regard to which your recollection is so clear and precise that you will swear that you can give them in the very words used by the parties! A. Well, I would.

Q. I don't want you to give those parts where you assume to give it to the best of your recollection, but those parts where your recollection is so accurate and clear that you can give the precise language. A. Well, I would swear that he used the words, "Mr. Beecher," "Mrs. Beecher," "Mrs. Morse," and that they had been talking about him, and telling stories to Mr. Bowen.

Q. Now—

The Witness—[Continuing.] Excuse me; I can not explain myself any better; now, just in that relation, the names of the persons I am willing to swear to, but as to all the other parts, perhaps an hour hence I could not state the words exactly the same.

Q. That is just what I was trying to impress your mind with. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, if there is any remark made by any party to that conversation, the precise language of which you can give, I ask you to do it. A. Well, I could go right over and state the evidence I did, and state the best I could. Some words I would remember absolutely, and others—perhaps I could not remember the exact words; and so it would be all the way through.

Q. That would be the way all the way through that conversation! A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, Sir, that is satisfactory and intelligent. So that in relating these conversations, some words in the remarks you recollected positively to have been used, and you have given your impression of the substance in the remainder! A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Storrs, when did you first hear of any arbitration as between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton? A. I think from Mr. Tilton.

Q. When, I ask you?

A. Well, I cannot state the exact date. The conversation that we had, I think, was about the middle or the latter part of March; and then, as to the arbitration, it was merely discussed between him and me that night—I suggested whether there could not be some settlement. After that, when he came to me, and it was decided to have an arbitration—

Q. Wait a moment. You are getting beyond my question. I was endeavoring to get at the time when the first suggestion of an arbitration came to your knowledge! A. Well, I am not able to give you the exact date.

Q. You think it was in the latter part of March! A. It was when Mr. Tilton finally announced—

Q. Do you think it was in the latter part of March! A. Well, I think it was, or on the first of April. It was just before the arbitration.

Q. How long before should you judge! A. It might be two or three or three or four days. I could not state.

Q. And that was one of the conversations with Mr. Tilton which you have related! A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where was that conversation! A. At my house.

Q. Will you please relate that! A. When he first came to me afterwards—

Q. You have told me, Sir, that you first heard of the arbitration a week or a few days before it was held—yes heard it from Mr. Tilton at your house; now I ask you for that conversation? A. Well, I reported then that I had seen Mr. Bowen and reported to him what I had learned from Mr. Bowen, and he said he was glad to hear it, and then it was suggested, if there was an arbitration, whether I would be an arbitrator, and I told him I would.

Q. When next did you hear of the arbitration? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Well, when next that you recollect? A. I have not a distinct recollection of it, only until we met.

Q. Well, you have a recollection of an arbitration after this conversation. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you to give me the first recollection you have upon that subject. A. I cannot now tell you.

Q. You can give me your first recollection, can't you? A. I cannot tell you whether Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton notified me that they were to meet.

Q. I am not asking you that. After this conversation with Mr. Tilton, when he asked you if you would be an arbitrator, if any arbitration was held, when was the next time that you now recollect when you heard anything about an arbitration? A. I cannot give you the date.

Q. About how long after this conversation with Mr. Tilton? A. That I cannot tell you, whether it was one day, two days, or three days.

Q. What was the next thing you heard about the arbitration that you recollect? A. Well, that we met.

Q. That was when the arbitrators met? A. Yes.

Q. That is the point I wanted. Was you aware that there was a written submission to an arbitration as between Tilton and Bowen? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you hear anything about it? A. I have no recollection of it.

Q. Was you aware that between Tilton and Bowen there were any papers executed in regard to an arbitration, or any papers executed in regard to an arbitration? A. No; only I think during that arbitration there was something said about papers being put in the papers.

Q. About what? A. I think there was something said at that arbitration, as I remember, I am not clear about it—something said about something that should appear in The Independent and The Golden Age—an exchange of courtesies, and so on.

Q. That is not the point. The question I ask you is, whether about the time of the award you had heard anything of any paper or papers having been executed as between Bowen and Tilton with reference to an arbitration? A. I have no recollection of that.

Q. Well, did you know of any papers being executed by them, or any writings passing between them, subsequent to the award? A. None, only those editorials that I have spoken of.

Q. Those are not papers passing between them, signed? A. No others that I remember.

Q. In the meeting of the parties and the arbitrators was there anything said in regard to any charge made by Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher, beyond those which appeared in the "Personal Statement?" A. Not that I remember.

Q. Upon that occasion was there a word said in regard to the relations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. Not that I remember.

Q. So far as you recollect the "Personal Statement," was there anything said in it with reference to Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. Not that I remember, Sir.

Q. Then the subject of those relations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton was not in any way suggested before those arbitrators? A. Not that I call to mind, Sir.

Q. You understood that this "Personal Statement" did implicate Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

THE PAPERS IT WAS AGREED TO BURN.

Q. And you understood that all the papers relating to the charges, or matters contained in the personal statement were to be burned, destroyed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you understand anything further in regard to the destruction of papers? A. That all papers—as I said yesterday, during the conversation, Mr. Claflin specially mentioned the Beecher "apology," and the letter of Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen of Jan. 1, 1871, and, I think, others; but when he came to announce the award, my impression is that he named those—I am not positive that he did, but he said all papers that were likely to make trouble, and I think he named those, but I would not swear to it positively.

Q. "Papers that were likely to make trouble?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There are a great many papers that would be likely to do that? A. Well!

Q. Is that the language that he used? A. I think it was that language Mr. Claflin used.

Q. Well, you understood him, being one of the arbitrators, to refer to those papers which related to the subject-matter of the arbitration, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; and—

Q. You did not assume to go beyond the matters which were submitted to you? A. Only what he named.

Q. Well, you are not quite certain that he named those? A. I am, in our discussions.

Q. I am not asking about your discussions; I am asking about the announcement of the matters submitted. A. I say I am not positive.

Q. Well, unless he named those papers, you, I suppose, as an arbitrator, understood him, by the phrase "all papers that were likely to make trouble," to refer to the subject-matter which was submitted to you as arbitrators, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir.

THE AWARD TO MR. TILTON A JUST ONE.

Q. Was the award which you made in favor of Mr. Tilton the result of your conscientious judgment? A. [Pausing] Well, I perhaps would have to explain.

Q. Please answer me that question? A. Well, it was.

Q. Very well. Did you award to Mr. Tilton what you believed to be due him under the contracts? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Just that and nothing more? A. Well, we jumped at it a little.

Q. Well, Sir, did you award to Mr. Tilton anything more than the amount you believed to be due him under the contracts? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. You have stated that Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen both made addresses to the arbitrators? A. Made some remarks.

Q. Well, presenting on one part Mr. Tilton's claim, and on the other Mr. Bowen's defense? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What defense did Mr. Bowen present? A. He did not oppose the contracts at all, as I remember; but the discussion mainly was, as I remember, about the percentage that Mr. Tilton was entitled to on The Union.

Q. Exactly. A. Mr. Tilton, as I remember, claimed a little more than Mr. Bowen thought he was entitled to; that was the substance of it.

Q. Then the only point of difficulty between the two parties, in presenting their case to the arbitrators, was the amount of the percentage that Mr. Tilton was entitled to from the proceeds of The Brooklyn Union under the contract? A. Mainly, Sir.

Q. Mainly. Was there anything else; I want to know? A. Well, I don't recall.

Q. You do not recall anything else but that? A. No.

Q. Did Mr. Bowen make any charge of improper conduct against Mr. Tilton? A. Not at that arbitration.

Q. At that arbitration I am speaking of? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he claim at that arbitration that Mr. Tilton was entitled to less on account of any incapacity or impurity of conduct? A. I don't think he did.

Q. Did not Mr. Bowen at that arbitration state that he had been willing a year ago to arbitrate? A. I—

Q. Please tax your recollection upon that subject? A. I should not dare to say yes or no. He might or might not; I don't remember it.

THE CONVERSATION AT THE ARBITRATION.

Q. Will you please state any conversation, and the whole of it, when Mr. Tilton was present at the meeting of these arbitrators? A. That Mr. Tilton stated that!

Q. No; any conversation at which Mr. Tilton was present. A. At this arbitration?

Q. Yes. A. Well, do you want me to come back to the absolute language again?

Q. Well, as far as you can, Mr. Storrs, but I have exhausted that as far as I wish. I want you to commence with that interview. A. And to go right through?

Q. Yes, go right through. A. Well, when I got there the first thing I said was that I had just learned from Mr. Claflin that Mr. Beecher's matters were to be brought into arbitration.

Q. Who was present then; all the parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well? A. I said that was the first that I had heard that Mr. Beecher's matters were to be brought in, and that if his matters were to be brought in, étiquette would require me to retire; that I could not sit in judgment upon a man who had not asked me. Do you now wish me to go right on and repeat it all?

Q. Yes, if you will permit me to interrupt you once in a while. A. Mr. Claflin then said that Mr. Beecher understood it, and that all understood it, and that a paper had been prepared to settle all disputes and matters between the three men; that the paper had been prepared between the three men; and then he took this tripartite paper and read it, or portions of it, and it was handed around; and after that Mr. Claflin and Mr. Bowen went into another room, and then I said to Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—If you will please pause there a moment!

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—When you made the remark in regard to Mr. Beecher's matters, and when Mr. Claflin made his reply, did you by that refer to the matters of Mr. Beecher which were contained in the "Personal Statement?" A. I referred to all the difficulties that might exist between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen—all three of the parties, so far as Mr. Beecher was concerned.

Q. You didn't say so? A. No, Sir, I don't know that I did.

Q. There were matters of Mr. Beecher contained in the "Personal Statement?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And those were the only matters talked about upon the arbitration? A. I think they were.

Q. And yet when you made that remark you meant something else? A. All I could judge about was what Mr. Claflin said.

Mr. Beach—No; I am talking about you, and not about Mr. Claflin.

The Witness—I can only state that he said that all the matters between the three men, and then he said a paper had been prepared to that end, and so on, and I said, "If that is the case I will remain."

Q. In the tripartite statement there was nothing said in regard to the relations of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, was there? A. No, Sir; not that I remember.

Q. And yet you say that when you made the remark about Mr. Beecher's matters being brought in that you referred to something beyond what was contained in the "Personal Statement," and the "Tripartite Covenant?"

A. No, Sir; I only said that Mr. Claflin said that all matters were brought in.

Q. I am asking you! A. No, Sir; I didn't know unless except—

Q. Did you refer to anything else in making that remark, except the matters relating to Mr. Beecher contained in the "Personal Statement" and the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. Yes, Sir; I had in my own mind the difficulty that Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher had together; that was his improper conduct with his wife.

Q. Why didn't you express that? A. I didn't express about anything because Mr. Claflin said it was "all matters."

Q. All matters between the three men? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The matters in the "Personal Statement" were between the three men? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The matter between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher was not between the three men, was it? A. Not directly, unless it was—

Q. Was it at all? A. Not that I know of; no, Sir.

Q. Then Mr. Claflin said that the matters relating to Mr. Beecher, and all matters as between the three men, were to be submitted to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then you went on and considered the matters in the "Personal Statement" and in the "Tripartite Covenant," and not a word was said in regard to the relations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't think there was; I don't remember.

Q. Now, if you will please proceed. "They went into the next room," you said? A. Yes, Sir; then I stated to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton that I thought that was not a fair paper, and I advised him not to sign it; I told him if what he had told me was true that Mr. Beecher was the most to blame, and I told Mr. Moulton to go into the other room and tell Mr. Bowen not to sign the paper; I said that I would draw up a paper, that the three men misunderstood the trouble, which I said would be fair, but I didn't think that that one was.

Q. Please proceed. A. Then we all met together, and these contracts were submitted, and then occurred the conversation.

Q. What contracts were submitted? A. Between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen in regard to the paper, and then they made the statement to which I referred, and then they retired, and then we had the terms of the arbitration.

Q. Now, can you give the announcement of the award as it was made by Mr. Claflin, in the language in which he made it? A. That I believe to be just like the other; I would not swear absolutely.

Q. You would not swear absolutely to the precise language? A. No, Sir.

Q. You give the precise language to the best of your recollection? A. Yes, Sir; the fact I can state.

Q. Now, give the announcement made by Mr. Claflin? A. Mr. Claflin, when he called them in, said the award was that the three parties—Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen—were to sign this paper, and that all papers that the three parties had that were liable to make trouble were to be burned, and that Mr. Bowen was to pay Mr. Tilton $7,000.

Q. Is that all of it? A. That is all up to that point.

Q. Well, that was the award as announced? A. Yes, Sir, that is as I remember it.

Q. Well, proceed? A. Then Mr. Tilton objected to signing the paper, and Mr. Claflin says: "Why, Theodore, you have agreed to it." He says: "I know I have, but I wish to change it," and that led to a discussion of some fifteen or twenty minutes before he altered it and it was accepted, and then I think the next thing was, Mr. Bowen said he wanted his letter called the Woodstock letter, which I think was in June, 1863. That was assented to, and then the understanding was that Mr. Claflin was to take what is known as the "Tripartite Agreement"—

Q. If you have got through with the conversation I want to ask you a single question. When Mr. Tilton, as you say, declined to execute the Tripartite Contract as it was, did he not make amendments to it? A. Yes, Sir, he made alterations.

Q. He made alterations? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he, upon a separate slip of paper, draw an amendment or alteration to it? A. I think he did.

Q. That was attached in some form to the original paper? A. I believe it was.

Q. And Mr. Claflin took that paper, the original paper, with these amendments, or additions, or alterations, whatever they were, to carry to Mr. Wilkeson? A. Yes, Sir, that was the understanding.

Q. Did anything more take place there? A. Then the next talk was who should keep—who should be the custodian of this paper. It was not agreed upon, but the understanding was that they would agree—that they should get the consent of all the parties as to who should keep it, and that the party who should be the custodian of it should agree not to destroy it or give it up to any of the parties without the consent of the whole. Then Mr. Bowen, I think, drew his check.

Q. Was there anything said in regard to keeping the "Tripartite Agreement" secret? A. I don't think there was, Sir.

Q. What was done, Mr. Storrs, with the contracts that were submitted to the arbitrators? A. Well, Sir, I cannot tell you, but only my impression. I think Mr. Bowen took them, but I am not positive.

Q. Did you think Mr. Bowen took them? A. That is my impression.

Q. Was there any indorsement made on them at the time? A. I would not like to state.

Q. Did Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton execute any paper at that time, or make any writing except the check, I mean? A. Either a receipt—Mr. Bowen said he wanted to close the matter.

Q. I am not asking what was said; I am asking whether there was any paper executed at the time between the parties except the check. A. My impressions are that there were, but I would not be positive about it.

Q. Do you think that a receipt or release was then executed by Mr. Tilton? A. Well, that is an impression, but I say I am not positive.

Q. You were all sitting around a table? A. Yes, Sir, or standing.

Q. Or standing. Such an act would not be likely to escape your observation, would it? A. It might, and might not. My impressions are that there were some form of receipts passed, because Mr. Bowen said he wanted to close the whole matter that night.

Q. Do you draw that conclusion from what Mr. Bowen said, or from any observation which you made of such an act? A. From the act and from my impressions.

Q. Now, Mr. Storrs, have you any recollection? A. Not positive.

Q. Of any receipts or releases being executed between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen? A. Not positive.

Q. Have you any recollection? A. I say I have an impression that there was, but I am not positive on that point.

Q. Well, Sir, I don't know that I can make that any more distinct. There was no award in writing made, I understand? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was there any mode appointed or suggested in which the award should be carried out? A. Nothing further than I have stated.

Q. That was as to the execution of the "Tripartite Agreement," and its position? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in giving this award, and in relating this conversation, you have not stated any reference made to the "Letter of Apology." A. I don't know as I quite comprehend the question.

Q. In now giving your history of the transaction, you have not said anything in regard to any remark, or statement, or reference made to Mr. Beecher's "Letter of Apology." A. Yes, Sir; I stated we talked it over together.

Mr. Beach—I am not asking what you talked over together. [To Judge Neilson.] I move to strike out, "We talked it over together."

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Q. In the award? A. As I said, my impressions are that Mr. Claflin named it, but I am not positive.

Q. I want you, according to the best of your recollection, to give me the award as it was announced by Mr. Claflin? A. I can only repeat just what I have stated, so far as the award is concerned, and afterward Mr. Claflin asked all these parties about burning the papers; when he made the award he did not.

Q. How long was it after the award was made that Mr. Claflin suggested to the parties about burning these papers? A. It was said after, according to my remembrance, Mr. Tilton had amended his portion of the "Tripartite Agreement;" it was right following that, as I remember.

Q. Right following it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had Mr. Bowen executed his check before that? A. No, Sir.

Q. About how long should you think that was after Mr. Claflin had announced the award? A. That he had spoken to him about it?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I should think it was anywhere from 20 minutes to half an hour.

Q. That was after Mr. Tilton had finished his amendments to the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was said upon that subject by Mr. Claflin or any party? A. Mr. Claflin asked Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton if they had accepted the arbitration, if they would burn all the papers, and, as I say, I think Mr. Claflin mentioned the Beecher "apology," and Mr. Tilton's letter to Mr. Bowen of January 1st, and some others, but I am not clear about that.

Q. As to be burned? A. To be burned; that is, I am not clear as to this specific paper; he said all the papers.

Q. Do you mean to say he mentioned the Woodstock letter as a paper to be burned? I understood you to state this now. A. No, Sir.

Q. It was a mistake, then? A. Yes, Sir; that was what we talked of in the arbitration.

Q. I want you to give me, as near as you can, what was said on that subject by Mr. Claflin? A. When we came to that point, Mr. Claflin asked Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Bowen if they accepted of the arbitration, and if they would burn all the papers; and then, as I tell you, I think he named this paper, but I would not like to say positively; I would not say positively, but that is the best of my impression, that he did.

Q. Is that all that was said on that subject? A. That's all I can recollect for the moment.

MR. TILTON'S WORDS ABOUT HIS WIFE ALWAYS KIND.

Q. Mr. Storrs, in all these conversations, so far as an allusion was made to Mrs. Tilton, did Mr. Tilton always speak of her in the highest terms? A. As a rule; yes, Sir.

Q. No, Sir; in all these conversations of which you have now spoken, whenever any reference was made to Mrs. Tilton, did Mr. Tilton always speak of her in the highest terms? A. I think he did. I shall have to qualify it. Virtually he always did; I don't know but he might sometimes have said—

Mr. Beach—I don't want what you don't know.

The Witness—That is the best of my recollection.

Mr. Beach—The best of your recollection is what?

The Witness—That he always did, but I cannot say that in some conversation he had not—

Mr. Beach—I don't ask what you can't say.

The Witness—No, and I am not saying it.

Mr. Beach—And I don't want you to force it upon me.

The Witness—I don't want to do so; I am trying as near as I can to answer your question, and that is, as a rule he always did, but I would not state that in some conversation he had not spoken some trifling thing—

Q. Do you recollect of a single word said by Mr. Tilton in either of these conversations to which you have alluded in the slightest degree disparaging of his wife? A. No, Sir; I don't recall it now.

Q. And to the best of your recollection he never used any such word? A. Not that I remember.

Q. And he always spoke, when referring to the relations between Mr. Beecher and his wife, of improper advances? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Approaches, or whatever they were? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Improper proposals made by Mr. Beecher to his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And didn't he state that his wife indignantly rejected them? A. I think he did.

Q. Didn't he state that those proposals or advances were repeated more than once? A. I don't think he ever stated to me but once.

Q. He never stated to you but once. Well, did he state with any particularity as to when the proposals were made? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he specify them with any more particularity than as impure or improper proposals, whatever term you used? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you know what part of the "Tripartite Agreement" it was that Mr. Tilton objected to and altered? A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. You didn't understand it to be Mr. Bowen's part? A. No, Sir, Mr. Tilton's part, of course, as far as he was concerned.

Q. You didn't understand it to be Mr. Beecher's part? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was a part, you understood, relating to himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see the changes which he made? A. I think I heard them read, but I could not tell you what they were.

Q. Did you see the alterations he made as between the original paper? A. No, Sir, I could not.

Q. And his alterations. Well, with the amendments which he supplied at that time he avowed his willingness to sign the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And, as you understood, it was signed in the form in which it was then committed to Mr. Claflin? A. I heard so; yes, Sir.

Q. Have you ever seen it since? A. I saw it about twenty seconds once; that is all.

Q. But not to read it so that you— A. No, Sir.

Mr. Tracy [to Mr. Storrs]—It is requested, Mr. Storrs, by the reporters, that you should speak louder; they cannot hear you.

The Witness—I am not feeling well, but I will do the best I can.

Mr. Beach—Did you understand from Mr. Tilton in what way this TRIBUNE stock was purchased? A. He may have said, but—

Q. No, not what he may have said? A. I don't call to mind.

Q. And then you didn't understand from him with whose means the stock was purchased? A. Well, I understood him—

Q. You understood that it was his father's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But did he say anything to you in regard to the means furnished? A. My impression is that he did say it was his father's.

Q. Do you recollect it? A. I would not be positive.

Q. Do you recollect of his saying anything more to you upon that subject than that the stock was his father's, and you paying over, upon the occasion you speak of, the interest? A. I don't call to mind, Sir.

Q. And you don't understand, or know, the details, or manner of the purchase? A. No, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S THREATENED SUIT FOR SLANDER ON HIS WIFE.

Q. You spoke of an occasion when Mr. Tilton threatened to prosecute some one. When was that, Mr. Storrs? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. What year was it? A. Well, I think it was in the last of 1871, or the fore part of 1872, but I am not absolute about that. I remember the conversation very well.

Q. The latter part of 1871 or the early part of 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was the conversation? A. I think one conversation was on Broadway.

Q. The one you spoke of on your direct examination is the one I mean? A. I think he spoke to me twice.

Q. I only want the one you referred to on your direct examination? A. I could not tell you, only my impressions.

Q. As near as you can, Sir? A. I say one conversation, I think, was when we were going to lunch at Delmonico's; it was in Broadway.

Q. I am only asking for the one you referred to on your direct examination, or did you embrace the two in what you said? A. I am clear about the conversation, but not as to when it occurred, or where it occurred.

Q. Whether it was one or the other, you don't recollect? A. No, Sir.

Q. Will you please relate to me that conversation, and all of it, as near as you can? A. Well, Sir, I should not like to give names.

Mr. Beach—Well, I am sorry, but I shall have to ask for them.

The Witness—I am willing to give them to you outside, or to the Court, but I think you or the Court would say I should not give them, if you knew the facts. I have no objection to give them to the Court or to yourself outside, but I think I should not give the names. [The witness here communicated the name to Mr. Porter in a whisper, and Mr. Porter communicated it to Mr. Beach.]

Q. You may omit the name, Sir, but give me the conversation. A. He said that a person had made a statement to another person in regard to Mr. Beecher and his wife of improper relations, and that he felt very much offended by it, and he thought of suing the party for reporting it.

Q. Do you recollect that the name of Mr. Curtis was mentioned—Mr. Curtis's family. See if you cannot refresh your recollection and tell. Did not Mr. Tilton in that conversation tell you that this nameless person went to the family of Mr. Curtis and reported that his wife was a lewd woman and had contracted a loathsome disease? A. I think he stated that.

Q. And that he went to the husband of this lady and told him of the statement, and that he knew no way but to prosecute for it. A. I think that is very near correct.

Q. Now, Mr. Storrs, recollecting that, I ask you to refresh your recollection, and see whether you have not confounded this conversation with some other one by introducing the name of Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. You say that Mr. Tilton told you that this person went to Mr. Curtis and charged his wife with being a lewd woman, and having contracted a loathsome disease? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Beecher's name was used in connection with it.

Q. Give it to me in the connection? A. I cannot tell you definitely, but it was used in the connection.

Q. I want you, to the best of your recollection, admitting that Mr. Tilton told you what I have repeated, to connect the name of Mr. Beecher with it intelligently? A. I cannot tell you, only his name was used.

Q. But in what connection it was used you cannot tell me? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. Have you given all of that conversation so far as you recollect it? A. All that I think of at this moment.

Q. Sir? A. All that comes to my mind at this moment.

Q. All that you now recollect, I ask you? A. Yes, Sir.

THE CONVERSATION WITH MR. MOULTON.

Q. I will trouble you, Sir, a moment or two further in regard to Mr. Moulton. You say that was in December, 1874—Dec. 10, I think you said, 1874, when Mr. Moulton indulged in those threats against Mr. Beecher. Who were present at that conversation? A. Mr. Moulton, my brother, and myself.

Q. Mr. Moulton, your brother, and yourself. And how was that conversation introduced? You and your brother went there together, I understand? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was the conversation introduced? A. Shall I go on and give the whole conversation?

Mr. Beach—If you please.

The Witness—Mr. Moulton then went on to state to me that a part of his statement which he last published, that Mr. Tilton was opposed to it, that he never approved of it, and it was commenced in that way, and then he spoke of Mr. Beecher. In regard to that portion, he said—

Mr. Beach—Before you go to that—

The Witness—Excuse me, I will go on. He said he didn't believe it himself, but that Mr. Beecher said so, and Gen. Butler said he must put it in, but Mr. Tilton was opposed to it, and then he denounced him, and said Mr. Beecher was a liar, a perjurer and an adulterer, and he would go and shoot him if I said so.

Q. When you refer to this portion of the last statement you mean that portion of it which related to other parties than Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Moulton said that Mr. Tilton was opposed to that? A. Yes, Sir, to that part of it.

Q. To that part of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But that it was true that Mr. Beecher had said so in regard to that third person, and Mr. Butler, as his counsel, insisted upon its going into his statement? A. Yes, Sir; he said he never believed it himself, but Mr. Beecher said so.

Q. He never believed it, but that Mr. Beecher said so? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long was that conversation? A. Oh, 15 minutes or half an hour. It was not a long conversation; it was a short one.

Q. There was more said, I suppose? A. There was; yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Moulton complained that Mr. Beecher had publicly called him a blackmailer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He said that he had always been a faithful friend to Mr. Beecher? A. I don't know as he did in this conversation; it was in another conversation where he used that; he may have in this conversation, but it was in another conversation he used that.

Q. I will get it, then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But in this conversation, when Mr. Moulton alluded to the fact that Mr. Beecher had publicly charged him with being a blackmailer, did he not speak of the injustice of that accusation? A. Well, I think he did, but that part of the conversation I am not clear about.

Q. You think he did. When he did speak of it he spoke of it with feeling, didn't he? A. If he did, I am not clear about that portion of the conversation; I would not state he didn't state it, but I cannot recall it.

Q. You say you think he did. You said so while ago? A. He may have said so, but I don't recall it.

Q. You said a while ago you thought he did? A. It would be quite natural from his former conversation.

Q. Mr. Moulton, at any rate, was very much excited in regard to that charge, was he not? A. He was, in—

Q. No, in this conversation? A. It would only be by inference.

Q. Why, a man threaten to shoot another without being excited, do you mean to say, Mr. Storrs? A. Well, he would naturally be excited, I presume.

Q. I am asking you, Sir, from your recollection of that conversation? A. No; he was not as much excited as he was the other; no, he was pretty cool.

Q. Well, was the other before or after? A. Yes; the other was in August, and this was in December.

Q. The other was before then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at the former conversation he manifested a great deal of excitement, you say, upon that subject of being charged a blackmailer? A. More than on any other portion of the conversation.

Q. And protested that he had been a true and steady friend? A. On the former conversation; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, in which conversation was it, or was it in both, that he said if Mr. Beecher had followed his advice this dispute would not have occurred, and did he not say it in both? A. I am not sure; it was in the August one, I think, that he said that.

Q. Well, are you certain whether or not he said it in the December conversation? A. I don't remember it then.

Q. You don't remember whether he did or not? A. No.

Q. Well, Sir, you considered it the threat of an angry man? A. Well, partially.

Mr. Tracy—Which threat are you speaking about?

Mr. Beach—I have heard of but one.

Mr. Tracy—Well, you are talking about two conversations.

Mr. Beach—No, I ain't.

Mr. Tracy—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Beach—No, I am not, I insist upon it; I know what I am talking about.

Mr. Tracy—You asked him if it was the threat of an angry man. You had last been talking about the conversation in August.

Mr. Beach—I have not heard of but one threat.

Mr. Tracy—You were last talking about the conversation in August, and the threat was made in December.

Mr. Beach—I am asking about a threat, and nothing else.

Mr. Tracy—It is fair to the witness that he should know what threat you are asking about.

Mr. Beach—[To the Witness]—Have you spoken of but one threat?

The Witness—Not of shooting.

Q. Have you spoken on your examination of more than one threat? A. No; not certainly about shooting.

Q. Well, have you spoken of any other? A. I don't call to mind.

Q. Very well, then; I am talking about that one.

Mr. Tracy—The witness certainly has, whether he calls it to mind or not; for the witness in the August conversation did say that Mr. Moulton said that he would drive Mr. Beecher out of Plymouth Church and out of Brooklyn. That is a threat.

The Witness—Well, in so far—

Mr. Beach—We are speaking, Sir, of a personal threat—a threat of personal violence. These interruptions only waste time. The witness knows what I refer to. [To the witness.] Did you not consider that threat to shoot Mr. Beecher, if you said so, as the threat of an irritated and angry man? A. Well, I hope he didn't mean it; I can only to state what he said.

Q. Mr. Storrs, that is not an answer to my question. You was there; you knew the feeling Mr. Moulton had in regard to the charge against him of being a blackmailer; you saw and heard him, and I ask you to say whether you did not understand that to be the threat of an irritated and angry man. A. Well, I did understand it as a man irritated, but whether he meant it literally or not I do not know.

Q. No? A. I say I hope he did not.

Q. No. Well, what did you say in answer to that? A. I did not make any answer.

Q. You hoped he did not mean it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And yet when he told you that he would go down and shoot Mr. Beecher if you said so, you did not feel that there was any cause for you to reply to that? A. No, Sir.

Q. What? A. I did not.

Q. Well, did you think he would do it? A. Well, I cannot say.

Q. Mr. Storrs, did you think he would do it? A. Well, I don't know as I could say I thought he would, and I don't know that he would not. I can only say what he said.

Q. I know you don't know that he would not, but you did not think he would; you did not see any occasion to make any remark, at any rate? A. I did not, I think.

Q. Well, you did not see any occasion to make any—did not feel that there was any occasion for you to say anything, did you? A. I probably thought it was better—

Q. Did you feel that there was any occasion for you to say anything? A. I cannot say how I felt; I did not make any.

Q. So far as you now recollect, did you feel that there was any occasion for you to make any remark? A. No, perhaps I did not.

Q. I think you have substantially answered what I desire in regard to the conversation in August, that Mr. Moulton was very considerably excited over the charge of being a blackmailer? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. MOULTON'S VERSION OF THE CONVERSATION INCORRECT.

Q. I think you may repeat that conversation, if you please, Sir. A. The whole of the conversation!

Q. Yes, you may give the whole of it. A. Well, as I said, when we went up stairs Mr. Moulton apologized for sending for me; said he didn't know as I would call on a blackmailer.

Q. Well, is that the way he apologized? A. Well, that is as near the words as I can remember.

Q. Well, did he apologize to you in any other way than that? A. Well, he spoke of the reason why he did not come to see me.

Q. What did he say which you construe into an apology for sending for you? A. Well, he said he had just returned from East, and that he had not had his breakfast, and that he esteemed it a favor that I came around there, or he would have come and seen me.

Q. And then said that he did not know as you would call upon a blackmailer? A. Yes, Sir; it was said in a laughing way.

Q. Well, go on. A. Then when we got upstairs he said he wanted me to tell my brother not to sign the Plymouth Church Report, that Mr. Beecher had confessed his adultery to him and he had the proofs of it, and that he was going to drive him out of Plymouth Church and out of Brooklyn.

Q. Well, anything more? A. Yes, Sir, and then he said he had always been a friend of Mr. Beecher, but when Mr. Beecher called him a blackmailer he was going to take care of himself—defend himself.

Q. Anything else? A. Yes, Sir; shall I go on and give all!

Q. Certainly; I want all that conversation. A. And then he said—repeated several times—that my brother must not sign that report; and during this connection some time—I forget exactly where it came in—that he wanted to be cross-examined, or to make a further statement to the Committee, and I told him that I supposed the Committee's report—that the Committee had received all the evidence, and that the report was made; that I didn't know about it, but I presumed so; then he said that my brother must not sign that; if he did, he should be compelled to make another statement, and then went on and referred to another party, as I have stated.

Q. Give it all, Sir! A. He said if he did, he would have to mention the name of a lady; that would ruin a lady who was a friend of mine, or would break my heart; and I asked him who he meant, and he said he would not give any names; and I told him I knew nothing about the Plymouth Church investigation; that I had had nothing to do with it, and would not have; that I had been urged to come before it, but would not come before it, but any communication that he had for my brother, I would take it to him, but I would not use any influence for him to sign that report, or not sign it

Q. Well, is that all? A. All, I think, for the moment, Sir.

Q. Was your brother present at that conversation? A. No, Sir.

Q. Let me read a version of that conversation, and see how it corresponds with your recollection?

Mr. Tracy—What page do you read from?

Mr. Beach—When I find it I will tell you, Mr. Tracy.

Mr. Tracy—It begins at the bottom of page 278.

Mr. Beach—Yes, I have my eye upon that; it is something else that I want. I read, Sir, from page 280, the second column, near the bottom:

I said to Mr. Storrs that I understood that I was not to be cross-examined by the Committee; that I had come from Lowell for the purpose of that cross-examination, and that I did not want his brother to sign that report until I had an opportunity of being cross-examined by the Committee; for if his brother did sign that report without giving me an opportunity to be cross-examined, he could not possibly know the truth, and if that report was signed and it was against me, as I understood it should be, I should make a publication of facts in reply, and that publication, as I understood my counsel advised it, would perhaps cross the threshold of his family, and came to see him as a personal friend, telling him that I did not want to do any such thing, and I said to him: "I want you, Mr. Charles Storrs, to put it only upon the ground of my being cross-examined. Tell your brother that I don't want him to sign that report until I have had an opportunity for cross-examination, in order that the facts which I have stated in print may be fully known." That is what I said. I went to see Charles Storrs as a friend, Sir. I have given it as nearly as I recollect it.

Q. Now, was that substantially said in that conversation? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. What? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. What, not said in addition to what you have given? A. Not in that way.

Q. Not in that way; I ask you if that was substantially said? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. It was not, eh? Didn't he tell you that he wanted to be cross-examined? A. There was something said, but not one-tenth part of what he has down. There was very little said on that point.

Q. Didn't he tell you that he wanted to be cross-examined further? A. He did, or to make another statement.

Q. What? A. Or to make another statement; I don't know which.

Q. But did not he tell you that he wanted to be cross-examined? A. Or to make a statement.

Q. No, you said that he wanted to be cross-examined, or he should have to make a statement? A. Or make another statement; I said I didn't know which; one or the other.

Q. Well, it was substantially that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And if he was not further cross-examined, didn't he say that he would have to make a statement? A. He didn't say whether "if he was further cross-examined;"

he said—well, he might in that connection; he said he would have to make another statement.

Q. Exactly. A. He would have to make another statement.

Q. That is, if he was not permitted to go before the Committee on further cross-examination, or to make a further statement before the Committee, he would be compelled to make a statement? A. Well, he virtually said that, but he did not say it to that length.

Q. Well, that is just what I want "virtually;" and didn't he say in substance that, under the advice of counsel, that statement would cross the threshold of your family? A. No, he did not use that word.

Q. No, he did not use that word; but was not that the idea? A. Well, it referred to a party; yes, Sir, but he did not say anything about—

Q. That he would have to make a statement in regard to a party that would break your heart? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that he did not want to do any such thing? A. Well, I don't call to mind that.

Q. Will you swear that he did not say so? A. No, I would not swear that he did not.

Q. What, in addition to what you have now stated, did he say? A. Well, I don't call to mind this moment.

MR. MOULTON'S REFUSAL TO BURN THE PAPERS.

Q. No, I think not. Now, Sir, in what conversation was it that Mr. Moulton told you that he would not or had not burned the apology; when was that? A. That was ten or fifteen days after the "Tripartite Agreement," as we call it.

Q. Ten or fifteen days after the award? A. Yes, Sir, as near as I can remember; it might have been a little more or a little less; I would not be positive.

Q. And at that conversation your brother was present? A. No.

Q. Wasn't he? A. No, Sir.

Q. I misunderstood; when he said that he had not burned? A. No, Mr. Tilton was present, Mr. Moulton and myself, nobody else.

Q. Well, I misrecalled. Well, that was ten days after the award, or fifteen, that Mr. Moulton said that he had not burned the apology of Mr. Beecher. Will you please repeat it? A. Well, this was the conversation as I said. It commenced about the tripartite settlement; as far as I now remember, I had not had any talk with him before, and I was telling him that Mr. Bowen felt that we brought in too large a sum, and that his sons felt aggrieved, and then Mr. Moulton during this conversation—Mr. Moulton said that Sam Wilkeson had either seen him or written him, I wouldn't be positive which.

Mr. Tracy—Speak a little louder, please, if you can.

The Witness—That Sam Wilkeson had seen him or written him that he wanted me to burn—to be sure to burn Mr. Beecher's apology and all the papers, and Mr. Moulton says, "of course," says he, "I have burned all the papers," and laughed; and he says, "Mr. Beecher thinks I have;" and then he says, "if Sam Wilkeson thinks I have burned all the papers, he is mistaken. What would Theodore do with his trouble?"

Q. You told him that Sam Wilkeson had written to Mr. Moulton to burn the apology and all the papers?

Mr. Tracy—Oh, no; he has not said any such thing.

The Witness—No; that Moulton—

Mr. Beach—Will the stenographer read the answer?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the answer, as follows:

"That Sam Wilkeson had seen him or written him"—

Mr. Tracy—Begin just back of that.

Mr. Beach—No, begin just there.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]:

"That Sam Wilkeson had seen him or written him ~~that~~ he wanted him to burn—to be sure and burn Mr. Beecher's apology and all the papers."

Mr. Beach—Exactly.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that you read just back of that.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]:

As far as I now remember I had not had any talk with him before, and I was telling him that Mr. Bowen felt that we brought in too large a sum, and that his sons felt aggrieved, and then Mr. Moulton during this conversation—Mr. Moulton said that Sam Wilkeson had either seen him or written him, I wouldn't be positive which—

Mr. Tracy—Speak a little louder, please, if you can.

The Witness—That Sam Wilkeson had seen him or written him that he wanted him to burn—to be sure and burn Mr. Beecher's apology and all the papers.

Mr. Beach—Will you look over that letter of Mr. Wilkeson and see if there is anything said about "all the papers?" [Handing witness a letter.] A. I have never seen that.

Q. Well, I want to convince you that you made an inaccurate report. A. Well, I don't know anything about the letter; I can only state what Mr. Moulton said.

Q. Well, will you swear that in giving that remark you used the exact language of Mr. Moulton? A. I think I did, Sir, the exact language.

Q. The exact language of that remark? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, repeat it in the exact language? A. Well, the whole conversation?

Q. No, Sir, that remark which you say you give in the exact language of Mr. Moulton; repeat it? A. Mr. Moulton said that some—

Q. He didn't say it in that language? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He did; precisely that language? A. He called him "Sam Wilkeson."

Q. Mr. Moulton said that in that exact language. Go on? A. Well, I am only telling you our conversation this morning; I wouldn't state that every identical word was the same.

Q. Very well; then don't say that you can; that is the reason that I asked you to repeat it, because you said you could? A. The most of it I can state absolutely; he says: "If Sam Wilkeson thinks"—

Q. The only point I want to know is, you stated that you gave that remark in the precise language in which Mrs. Moulton uttered it? A. Well, I think I did.

Q. Then I want you to give me the precise language of that remark? A. He says: "If Sam Wilkeson thinks I have burned all those papers he is mistaken;" that I believe to be exactly the way he said it.

Q. Sir? A. I believe that to be exactly the way he said it.

Q. Well, is that all in regard to the paper that you can give his precise language? A. Well, the whole that I have named I believe to be—

Q. No; I don't want what you believe, Sir. A. Well, as I said this morning—

Q. Well, if you put it on that ground, Mr. Storrs, I am perfectly satisfied. Now, you have not given quite all of it; will you follow out the conversation a little further. A. He says, "What would Theodore do in case of trouble?"

Q. Do you recollect anything more? A. I don't call to mind this moment.

Mr. Beach—That is all, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—One word, Mr. Storrs.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. STORRS.

Mr. Tracy—You have stated on your cross-examination that you think you got notice of the arbitration; do you know from whom you got that notice? A. Not absolutely. That is not the talk that Mr. Beach refers to.

Q. You were referring to a conversation that you and Mr. Tilton had, when Mr. Tilton invited you to be an arbitrator, in case there was an arbitration. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, were you invited by anybody to meet at Moulton's house before going over that night? A. I must have been; but I cannot recall to mind from whom I received the notice.

Q. You know you received a request from some one to go there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But from whom you don't know? A. I could not remember.

Q. When you said on your cross-examination that the matters between the three men were to be settled, what matters did you intend to be understood? A. Well, all matters that were in dispute.

Q. What? A. All matters that were in dispute between the three men.

Q. Between the three men or any two of them?

Mr. Beach—Well, that will not do, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it will.

Judge Neilson—The objection is that it is your suggestion. Put a question to your witness.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman insists that he should testify for the witness.

Mr. Tracy—No.

Judge Neilson—That is the suggestion.

Mr. Tracy—Did you understand that it included all disputes between the three men, or between any two of the three men?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Take it? A question leading like that?

Judge Neilson—It is leading, but still—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, will your Honor take that on direct examination?

Mr. Tracy—It is cross-examination upon matters that you brought out. I am only asking him what he meant to be understood by the question that you put on cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—If you had asked him that there would be no question raised, that would be a proper question; but your question is leading.

Mr. Beach—That is all I insist upon.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think the witness may answer as it is put. There is a doubt about the propriety of it; still we will take it.

Mr. Tracy—Will the stenographer read the question?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Did you understand that it included all disputes between the three men, or between any two of the three men?"

Q. You have stated, Mr. Storrs, that when you reported to Mr. Tilton the result of your interview with Bowen, when you had gone to him to see if Mr. Tilton's claim should be settled, that Mr. Bowen told you that he did not think he owed Mr. Tilton anything, and he always said he didn't owe him anything. Now, at the arbitration, state whether or not Mr. Bowen waived the question of his liability to Tilton and only raised the question of the amount of the liability?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question, Sir, as leading and not calling for what was said and done.

Judge Neilson—It is leading, and yet it covers a point that came out very clearly on your cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—I know it does.

Judge Neilson—There is no occasion for the question. It sufficiently appears, I think, but it is a leading question that you ought not to put. You might well ask him what Bowen did or said. It is a leading question. It is upon a point about which I think there need be no solicitude, because Mr. Beach examined him very closely upon that subject.

Mr. Tracy—Was there anything said by Bowen at that time, and if so what, as to whether he would raise the question or submit the question to the arbitrators as to his liability to Mr. Tilton? A. I don't think he raised the objection.

Q. You don't think he raised the objection there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Although he had raised it in your interview as you had reported it to Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—[To the witness.] Do I understand you?

Judge Neilson—That appears.

Mr. Tracy—Well, that is all.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Storrs told us before that Mr. Bowen presented to them a question about the commissions on The Union. That was the burden of his plea.

Mr. Tracy—Now, you say that Mr. Bowen requested that the Woodstock letter might be returned to him instead of being burned. At what stage of the interview was that request made? A. Just after, I think, Mr. Tilton had finished his amendment to his portion of it.

Q. Well, it was at the same time that the question of the burning the papers was brought up, after Mr. Tilton had made his changes in the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. It was after Mr. Claflin had made known the award, and then Mr. Tilton made his objection, and then Mr. Bowen made that request, before Mr. Claflin further interrogated him.

Q. Did you have more than one conversation with Mr. Tilton about his bringing an action against this person for charging his wife with criminality? A. I said, I think, I had two conversations.

Q. Do you know where the two were? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where the second was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, in any one of these conversations was the charge for which he was to sue that Mrs. Tilton had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Judge Neilson—Leading.

Mr. Beach—It is leading, and calls for a conclusion instead of calling for what was said.

Mr. Tracy—What was said as to the nature of the charge that he was intending to sue this party for? A. Adultery, as I understood it, Sir.

Q. With whom?

Mr. Beach—He asked what was said, Sir; and that answer is not responsive to it at all.

Mr. Tracy—What was said; what did he say about the charge that had been made against his wife?

Judge Neilson—What did he say in respect to the subject matter of the suit he might bring. Isn't that it? Go on, Mr. Storrs.

The Witness—Well, it was the improper relations between—

Mr. Tracy—What did he say about it? A. Well, I cannot repeat all the conversation; but he said a person had made a charge of adultery between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, and some other things, that Mr. Beach alluded to.

Q. But the charge was a charge of adultery between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—That I object to, Sir—a mere repetition by the counsel.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

RECROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. STORRS.

Mr. Beach—Did you tell me, Sir, that you could not tell in what connection the word "Mr. Beecher" was used in that conversation? A. Not—

Q. Did you not tell me that, I ask you? A. Very likely.

Q. Don't you remember to have so answered? A. I don't remember exactly, but I could not tell you; that is, I could not tell you the exact conversation.

Q. I did not ask you that, Sir; don't you remember my asking you the question whether you could tell me the connection in which the name of Mr. Beecher was used? A. I say I cannot now.

Q. You cannot now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you answer that Mr. Tilton told you that this lady, which we do not name, had been to Mr. Curtis's family and reported that his wife was a lewd woman and had an impure disease, and that he did not know any remedy but to sue? A. And also the further—I said further.

Q. No; did you answer to me that he said that? A. He did; I think he did; yes, Sir.

Q. And, then, don't you remember my asking you to bring in the name of Mr. Beecher, and that you said you could not do it—do it, in the conversation? A. Well, not the exact conversation; I know—

Q. Didn't you say that you could not bring that in?

Mr. Tracy—I submit that the witness should be permitted to answer the question.

Mr. Tracy—He will not, Sir, so long as his answers are irresponsible.

Mr. Beach—Will the stenographer read the question?

Mr. Beach—The stenographer need not trouble himself to read it; Mr. Beach will speak it. [To the witness.] Didn't you, in answer to the question which I put to you after I had related these facts which you say Mr. Tilton stated—did you not say that you could not connect Mr. Beecher's name in the connection in which it occurred in that conversation? A. What I meant—

Q. I don't ask you what you meant; did you not say that? A. Perhaps I did.

Q. Don't you remember that you did? A. Likely, I did.

Q. Wait a moment. Don't you remember that you said it? A. Well, I think I did say it; but I wish to explain.

Q. Well, I don't want you to explain just now. A. Well.

Mr. Porter—I submit that he is entitled to explain.

Mr. Beach—I submit that he is not, Sir, in the midst of my examination; he may afterwards, if he chooses.

Mr. Porter—Elas he not the right, in answer to such a question, to say, "What I meant to say was—"

Mr. Beach—Yes; but he will not say what he meant, on my examination.

Mr. Tracy—Yes.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—They can ask him for the occasion.

Mr. Beach—Now, as your Honor has decided in my favor upon that point, you may state the conversation.

Mr. Tracy—Ah!

Mr. Beach—Ah! or Oh!

The Witness—Well, during this conversation, as I remember, it was the charge of adultery that he was going to sue for.

Q. Well, that is all the explanation you want to make, is it? A. That is all.

Q. Now, I understood you to say that Mr. Claffin, somewhere about the opening of this arbitration, said, in answer to the remark which you made about acting, that all the difficulties between the three men were to be submitted? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the language he used? A. I think it was.

Q. That is the substance of it, as near as you recollect? A. Yes, Sir.

A. And you understood that Mr. Beecher's name was involved through the "Personal Statement" and the "Tripartite Agreement"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, have you any other reason for saying that you understood the difficulties between any two of the men were to be settled, except that declaration of Mr. Claffin which you have just made, and that conversation which you have related? A. Nothing only the impression made upon me; that is all.

Q. Certainly—the impression made upon your mind? A. That is all.

Q. But that was an inference derived from what you have stated? A. Yes, Sir.

RE-RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. STORRS

Mr. Tracy—One word. Now, you say that it was the charge of adultery that he was going to sue for; the charge of adultery committed with whom.

Mr. Beach—Is that proper upon a re-direct examination?

Mr. Tracy—It is a further explanation of the explanation that you asked for, or he has sought to give in answer to your question.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, upon the direct examination they inquired of this gentlemen in regard to that conversation; I cross-examined him. They then re-inquired upon the same subject, and I have cross-examined him again, and developed nothing new. Now, I submit that there should be an end to the direct examination, upon that point, of this gentleman.

Judge Neilson—I think so. At the same time, Mr. Storrs, you are at liberty to make any explanation that occurs to you.

The Witness—Well, he said it was with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Tracy—And was the language about the loathsome disease in connection with that charge—used in connection with that charge? A. It was all in one conversation; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Storrs, you understood when you read the "Personal Statement" and first went to Mr. Bowen, that Mr. Beecher's name was involved in that Personal Statement, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you knew, when the arbitration was made concerning the matters therein stated in that Personal Statement, that Mr. Beecher was involved; you knew it then, as well as you know it at the time of going to the arbitration, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, wasn't it the further fact that you learned that matters between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher were to be submitted at that arbitration that led you to say that, if that was so, etiquette required you to retire?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question as leading—very offensively leading.

Judge Neilson—We have been over the subject and over it again. He stated before this why he assigned, suggested, that he might feel called upon to retire; it was that Mr. Beecher's name was mixed up in it, and he had not been requested by Mr. Beecher to act; and I think that is sufficient on that point.

Mr. Tracy—He has said that!

Judge Neilson—Oh! undoubtedly. Why repeat it?

Mr. Tracy—But counsel has sought to draw a distinction from the cross-examination of the witness that Mr. Beecher was mixed up only as a third party; and it was only so far as Mr. Beecher's matters were connected with the two other parties that they were to be submitted.

Judge Neilson—Now, the only way this witness could correct that, if he corrected it at all, would be by giving the conversation. Both counsel have interrogated him as to the conversation quite at large.

Mr. Tracy—Well, that is true; but he has not only been asked for the conversation on cross-examination, but he has been asked for what he understood at the time.

Judge Neilson—Well, if proper on cross-examination, would that be proper on your part?

Mr. Tracy—I submit it would be proper in explanation of what he said he understood. When they ask the witness what he understood by such a fact, that entitles me to ask a further question in regard to what he understood concerning the same subject matter.

Mr. Beach—That was asked, Mr. Tracy, upon my first cross-examination, and you re-examined in regard to it.

Mr. Tracy—And you re-examined in regard to it again on your last cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—I haven't.

Mr. Tracy—You have, Mr. Beach.

Mr. Beach—You are mistaken.

Mr. Tracy—You asked him as to what differences he understood were referred to in that arbitration.

Mr. Beach—I have not.

Mr. Tracy—I think you have.

Mr. Beach—I haven't, Sir; I only asked him if what I called his attention to, as to the declaration of Mr. Clafin—

Mr. Tracy—It is not of sufficient importance to have a dispute over; I will waive the question.

Judge Nelson—Very well; I think that is the correct course, Mr. Tracy. That is all, Mr. Storrs.

Mr. Tracy—That is all, Mr. Storrs.

TESTIMONY OF MARY F. PERKINS.

Mary F. Perkins was then called on behalf of defendant, and being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Mr. Shearman—Where do you reside? A. At present, in Boston, Sir.

Q. At present in Boston? A. That is my home at present.

Q. Where did you reside previously? A. Hartford was my home.

Q. Hartford, Conn.? A. Yes, Sir; many years.

Q. Will you speak as loud as you can; it is necessary to speak so loud as to seem a little painful to you in order to be heard. How long did you reside in Hartford? A. I resided during my married life there, Sir—about forty-six years in Hartford.

Q. Forty-six years? A. I think so.

Q. What was the name of your husband? A. Thomas C. Perkins.

Q. You are a sister of Henry Ward Beecher, I believe? A. I am, Sir.

Q. Are you an older or a younger sister? A. I am older, Sir—I am older.

Q. Older than Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the Winter of 1871 and 1872 did you visit your brother's residence, Mrs. Perkins? A. I spent most of the Winter, indeed, the whole Winter, at that time, with my brother.

Q. You spent most of the Winter? A. I spent the whole of that Winter.

Q. The whole of that Winter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From what time until what time? A. I went there the last of December, and left, so far as I recollect, the last of April.

Q. 1872? A. 1872.

Q. You went the last of December, 1871, and stayed until the last of April, 1872? A. Yes, Sir, 1872, and the same afterward the next year.

Q. Mrs. Beecher was absent during a part of that time, was she not? A. She was, during most of that time.

Q. Where was she? A. In Florida.

Q. She went for her health? A. For her health.

Q. Did you remain in that house during the whole period of Mrs. Beecher's absence? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. What was the state of your health at that time, Mrs. Perkins? A. My health was delicate; I was not strong.

Q. What were your habits with regard to going out of the house during that period? A. Very seldom, indeed.

Q. Did you go out alone? A. I occasionally took a short walk for my health, but I never visited alone at all.

Q. On these short walks how long were you ever absent alone? A. Well, not more than ten minutes.

Q. Not more than ten minutes? A. No, Sir.

Q. When you went out on other occasions, with whom did you go? A. I went with my brother.

Q. Your brother, Henry Ward Beecher. A. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Was that your invariable practice? A. It was.

Q. Then, with the exception of these short walks, none of which exceeded ten minutes at a time, you were either in the house the whole time or in Mr. Beecher's company when you were absent from the house during that period? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Were you in the habit, during the period of Mrs. Beecher's absence in that Winter, of receiving Mr. Beecher's guests? A. Yes, Sir; I was.

Q. Now, Mrs. Perkins, during that entire Winter, did you ever see Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were there again, were you not, some part of the Winter of 1872-'73? A. I was, Sir.

Q. How long were you there at that time? A. About the same length of time; I went the last of December and left some time in April or May; I do not recollect precisely.

Q. You did not leave in either Winter until Mrs. Beecher had returned, did you? A. The first Winter she had returned the first season; the second season she either had returned or was on her way home.

Q. I didn't hear that? A. The first Winter she had returned.

Q. And the second Winter she had been— A. It might have been a day or two before her return; I cannot recollect precisely.

Q. And the second Winter she either had returned, or was on her way home? A. On her way home.

Q. The last occasion you refer to was the Winter of 1872-'3? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You remember that that was after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, that last Winter? A. Yes, Sir, it was.

Q. Now, Madame, did you, on this last Winter, ever see Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you on either Winter ever hear of Mrs. Tilton having been at the house? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have seen Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that you can identify her? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S ABSENCE FROM THE CITY
IN JUNE, 1873.

Q. Now, do you remember June, 1873—the incidents of June, 1873? A. I think I do, some of them.

Q. Some of them. Can you recollect where you were in the first week of June, 1873? A. So well as I can recollect I was in Roxbury, at my son's, and about that time my brother came for me with Mrs. Claflin—

Q. Your brother, Henry Ward Beecher? A. My brother, Henry Ward Beecher, came with Mrs. Claflin to invite me to make a visit at her house with him and with Mrs. Beecher.

Q. Who is Mrs. Claflin? A. Mrs. Gov. Claflin.

Q. The wife of ex-Gov. Claflin of Massachusetts? A. The wife of ex-Gov. Claflin of Massachusetts.

Q. And where does Mrs. Claflin reside; where did she reside then? A. At Newtonville.

Q. Newtonville, Mass.? A. Newtonville, Mass.

Q. Is that near Boston? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About how far? A. I don't know; six or eight miles, as far as I recollect.

Q. Well, did you go with Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Claflin? A. I did.

Q. And how long a time did you spend with your brother on that occasion? I should think more than a week; I think we went on Thursday, so far as I can recollect; I think it was Thursday, and I remained there with him; he preached on Sunday at Park Street Church.

Q. Is that Mr. Murray's church—at that time? A. Exchanged with Mr. Murray.

Q. Rev. W. H. H. Murray? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was the pastor of that church? A. Yes, Sir; exchanged with him; and I remained there and heard my brother preach that Sunday.

Q. This Thursday to which you referred was the 5th of June, was it not? A. I am very poor on dates, but so far as I can recollect I should think it was.

Q. The first Thursday of June was the 5th of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was that first Thursday in June? A. I think so; I think so.

Q. You know it was the Thursday before Mr. Beecher preached in the church of the Rev. Mr. Murray? A. I know that; I am very sure of that.

Q. And that was the second Sunday of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You stayed with your brother on that Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, did you not? A. I did.

Q. You heard him preach? A. I heard him preach.

Q. Then you stayed with him during part or all of the next week, did you not? A. During part of the next week; I cannot remember definitely how many days, but several days.

Q. Certainly Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of the next week? A. I think so, certainly.

Q. Well, was Mrs. Stowe with you any part of that time? A. Mrs. Stowe was with us most of that time; she came after I did to Newtonville, and remained with us during the time that I was there.

Q. Now, Madam, was your brother ever absent during that period to which you have last referred—from the Thursday on, was he ever absent from your sight, long enough to have gone to New-York? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was he ever absent long enough to have gone half way to New-York? A. No, Sir.

This closed the direct examination of Mrs. Perkins.

Mr. Fullerton—I have nothing to ask, Madam.

Judge Nelson—That is all, Madam.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, the witness we have counted upon next stepped out, thinking he would not be wanted until after recess.

The Court here took a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2, pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Nelson—Proceed, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Tracy—Is Mr. Freeland in Court?

Mr. Freeland—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Take the stand, Mr. Freeland.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES FREELAND.

James Freeland was then called on behalf of defendant, and being duly sworn testified as follows:

Mr. Tracy—Where do you reside? A. No. 140 Columbia-st., Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you been a resident of Brooklyn? A. Thirty odd years.

Q. Are you a member of Plymouth Church? A. I am.

Q. How long have you been such member? A. Twenty-five or twenty-six years.

Q. Do you know Mr. Beecher? A. I do.

Q. And Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Bowen? A. And Mr. Bowen.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Bowen? A. Well, thirty years.

Q. Were you formerly a merchant, engaged in business in New-York? A. I was.

Q. You are now Collector of Internal Revenue of the First District? A. I am.

Q. How long have you been such Collector? A. Six or seven years. I am not exact, you understand, as to dates.

Q. It has been stated that you were one of the arbitrators in this difference between Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen? A. I was.

Q. You met at Mr. Moulton's house? A. We did.

Q. How long before that arbitration actually occurred were you informed that you were to act as arbitrator? A. I could not tell.

Q. You went around to the house that night with whom? A. Mr. Claflin and Mr. Storrs.

Q. When you arrived there whom did you find there? A. I don't remember exactly. I know that shortly after I got there I noticed that Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton were there, and Mr. Claflin and Mr. Storrs and myself.

THE HACKNEYED STORY OF THE ARBITRATION.

Q. What was done after you arrived? A. Well, Sir, I think we prepared to go to business.

Q. Do you remember anything said by Mr. Storrs about his not acting as an arbitrator? Yes, Sir, I think I do.

Q. What did he say on the subject of declining to act as an arbitrator?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; we object to that.

Judge Neilson—It is proper, if it was in Mr. Tilton's presence.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! he has sworn that Mr. Tilton was present, and the whole evidence shows that he was present.

Judge Neilson [to the witness]—What did he say? A. Well, now, I cannot repeat the language, but I remember that he spoke of retiring in consequence of Mr. Beecher—some words in regard to Mr. Beecher—that he did not understand that he was to come into this arbitration—something of that kind, something of that nature, I don't remember particularly; and then Mr. Claflin spoke up.

Q. What did Mr. Claflin say? A. Mr. Claflin said that it was all well arranged—it seemed to be, from him—that Mr. Beecher and the whole matter was to come in the arbitration before us. I cannot remember the language that he used, but that was the effect of the whole thing—all that was said. Then Mr. Storrs, as I understood, excepted. Mr. Storrs said a good deal, but I could not repeat fifteen words, or ten words, that he said.

Q. But whatever it was, it was said in the presence of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Bowen, was it? A. All the parties.

Q. After that did the arbitration proceed? A. It did.

Q. What did the parties do before the arbitrators? A. I think Mr. Tilton made a speech, but I don't remember a word he said. [Laughter.] And I think Mr. Bowen made a speech, but I can't repeat a word they said.

Q. Well, we have not asked you to repeat anything they said yet? A. No, Sir.

Q. We want to find out what they did. After they had made their speeches, what was done? A. I think they withdrew, and we went on with the arbitration.

Q. The arbitrators? A. Yes, Sir, the arbitrators.

Q. And made up your award? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you agree upon your award that night? A. We did.

Q. After that award was agreed upon, what was done? A. We came in and asked the parties, I believe, to come before us again.

Q. Was the award announced by any one of the arbitrators? A. Yes, Sir, Mr. Claflin was the spokesman.

Q. Mr. Claflin announced the award? A. He did.

Q. What did he say the award was? A. Well, in substance, he said first that the papers were all to be burned relating to the scandal.

Q. Well? A. The next was—let me see, I don't exactly —that was the first, I remember, that was spoken of. Then the award, I think, came.

Q. What was the award? A. $7,000.

Q. Well, what next? Was there anything said about signing any paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said about signing a paper? A. The Tripartite—that hard name that I cannot pronounce very well.

Q. Very well; we know what you refer to. A. That was to be signed.

Q. By whom? A. Henry Ward Beecher, and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen, I think.

Q. Bowen? A. Yes.

Q. After Mr. Claflin had announced the award, what was said by either of the parties, if anything? A. I think they were satisfied; I think they seemed to be pleased; I recollect that Mr. Tilton laughed and smiled.

Q. Well, Tilton probably smiled at the amount; but what did he say about signing the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. Well, he said there was something there that he wanted to change—the phraseology or something—something in regard to that.

Q. Well? A. Well, I think Mr. Claflin replied—let me see now, I am a poor hand to recollect conversations, very.

Q. Well? A. I will give you the substance as near as I can. He said, "Mr. Tilton, you agreed to sign that—all satisfactory."

Q. What did Tilton say to that? A. Well, I think he said that he did, but he wanted it altered. Well, the amount of it at the end was that he did alter it. I think Mr. Claflin wanted to know if he was satisfied after it was done. I think he took a piece of paper and wrote on it, and it seemed to be attached to it.

Q. He did alter it, any way, and the alteration was accepted? A. I so understood it. It was all quiet; we were all very good-natured after we got through. All pleasant all around.

Q. No doubt of it; you were a very pleasant set of gentlemen. What was done about the Woodstock letter? A. I remember Woodstock was mentioned, and about a letter, and I think that Mr. Bowen wanted to have that returned to him.

Q. And not burned? A. And not burned.

Q. Well? A. And I think there was something about a letter of apology that was to be burned.

Q. What was said about a letter of apology that was to be burned? A. I think that was to be burned. All the papers as I understood were to be burned connected with the scandal.

Q. What particular papers were mentioned, if any? A. I think the apology, if I remember right, was mentioned, and this Bowen letter, and there was another letter, I think, but I don't remember what it was.

Q. Whose apology was it that it was said was to be burned? A. Mr. Beecher's.

Q. Mr. Beecher's letter of apology? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect that Mr. Claflin—Mr. Claflin was the spokesman.

Q. Where was that said, that that letter of apology was to be burned? A. Right there on the spot.

Q. In the presence of whom? A. All of them.

Q. What did Moulton and Tilton say in regard to burning the letter? A. I understood that they assented to it; I didn't hear any objection, not a word.

Q. Well, did they, or did they not assent to it? A. Yes, I understood so.

Q. Well, after that was done, what occurred. After you had altered the "Tripartite Agreement" to suit Tilton, and it was agreed that Bowen should have the Woodstock letter returned to him, and that the papers were to be burned, what then occurred? A. Then, I think, Mr. Bowen wanted to settle the matter up and give his check.

Q. Well? A. And he spoke to Mr. Claflin—I heard the conversation—he asked Mr. Claflin, says he, "Mr. Claflin, suppose I should not have money enough in my bank account to-morrow morning, will you lend it to me for this check? I want to close this matter up;" and Mr. Claflin said he would.

Q. What was done then? A. Well, I saw the check passed around, but I did not see who it was delivered to.

Q. Was the check filled out there? A. I think it was, I saw it lying on the table, but I did not take it in my hands.

Q. Did you actually see it pass to Tilton? A. No, I don't think I did.

Q. After the check was filled out, what was done or said? A. Well, I have got pretty near the end of my rope.

Q. Did you separate then soon after the filling out of that check? A. Yes, Sir; we had a pleasant chat.

Q. How long were you there, at Moulton's house, from the time you went there until you left it? A. I am not well versed in time; about three or four hours; I could not state.

Q. You don't remember? A. I don't remember the time; there was considerable time.

Q. Don't you remember about the time that you broke up that night and went home? A. Well, I think it was pretty late; it was late for me, surely.

Q. Do you remember whether you were afterward consulted by Mr. Storrs in regard to this "Tripartite Agreement" being deposited with Mr. Moulton? A. Oh, yes; there was some talk about that, and I said right off, "Mr. Claflin must keep that Tripartite"—I remember now I suggested Mr. Claflin.

Q. What was said, if anything, about Mr. Claflin's taking this Tripartite Agreement, after it had been altered by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Wilkeson, to have a fair copy made of it? A. Yes, Sir, that is so; Mr. Claflin was to take it and have a fair copy made of it.

Q. And did he take it away with him that night? A. Yes.

Q. When did you next see it? A. I don't think I ever saw it after that.

Q. You don't think you ever saw it? A. No.

Mr. Tracy—You may examine, gentlemen.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. FREELAND.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Freeland, when was this arbitration? A. Well, now, the best I can get at it is that it was the 3d of April, 1872—the 3d of April, 1872; it might have been—well, I think it must have been that time. I would not swear to it positively; it might have been a few days more or less, but that is my impression, as far as I can get at it.

Q. It might have been a few days before or a few days after? A. It might have been, but that is my impression. Well, I get at it in a measure from that check—the 4th.

Q. Have you seen the check? A. I saw the check there; but I heard it spoken about—I will tell you exactly—

Mr. Fullerton—Ah!

The Witness—Oh! I will stop, Sir, when you say so; I don't want to tell more than you ask.

Q. You say you will stop, but you don't? A. I'll shut my mouth up.

Q. But you don't; you are at it again. Did I understand you to say that you saw the check? A. I think I saw it on the table.

Q. Did you read it? A. I did not.

Q. Or any part of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then how does that enable you to get at the date? Now you can talk. A. Will you allow me?

Q. Yes. A. Well, Sir, I heard there was a check of Mr. Bowen's—I will tell you another thing—

Q. No; tell me that first. [Laughter.] A. I will; I am glad to see you laugh; I don't like to see cross folks; that is the best way to get along.

Q. Well, laugh after you explain that. A. I will.

Q. If you did not read the check, how does the check enable you to fix the date? A. I am afraid you will stop me if I undertake to tell you.

Mr. Tracy—Well, try it.

The Witness—[After a pause.]—I know Mr. Bowen very well, and I never knew him to give a check after 3 o'clock that he didn't date it the 4th; now, that is one of the strongest points in the matter.

Judge Neilson—That is, he would date it the next day!

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! your Honor—

The Witness—Yes; the next day.

Mr. Fullerton—He always dates them the 4th! A. So far as I know him.

Q. If he draws a check after 3 o'clock, he always dates the check the 4th? A. From my experience in business with him; I have had a good deal of experience with him in business.

Q. You say if he draws a check after 3 o'clock he always dates it the 4th? A. Yes; after 3 o'clock.

Q. Suppose it was the 30th day of the month, would he date the check the 4th? A. I guess he would take the day after, then.

Q. And not the 4th? A. I cannot say as to that. I want to tell you what is right. Don't ask me to talk too much if you please.

Q. Did you ever see him draw a check? A. Oh! yes.

Q. And you read it? A. He and I have exchanged checks.

Q. Have you seen him draw a check? A. Yes, and he and I have exchanged checks a great many times.

Q. Have you seen him draw checks after three o'clock? A. Yes, Sir, I think I have.

Q. Is there any other way that you can get at the date of that arbitration except by the date of that check which you did not see? A. My memory is very poor for dates; I cannot remember dates; it is the most difficult thing for me.

Q. That will be a good reason for your saying that you cannot do it? A. Well, I cannot say.

Q. That is an answer to the question. Is your recollection good in other respects than dates? A. Associations, they are my best—

Q. How? A. My remembrance comes through associations.

Q. Is that the way you recollect what took place before the arbitrators? A. No, not that; I am sure I was at the arbitration; that is firm in my mind.

Q. That you are sure of? A. I am.

Q. Are you equally sure of what took place after you got there? A. I am equally sure that I know the verdict we brought in.

Q. Are you quite sure that you remember what was said after the arbitrators came in? A. No, Sir; I could not say that I could repeat the language at all; I could give only the substance.

Q. What papers were before you as arbitrators? A. I think the article of agreement between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton.

Q. What other papers were before you? A. I think the Tripartite.

A. The Tripartite was before you? A. I think it was—yes, I am sure it was.

Q. Was it signed? A. I don't remember.

Q. Can't you tell me whether it was signed or not? A. I don't know whether it was or not.

Q. You looked at it? A. I saw it, but I didn't read it.

Q. Didn't you see whether it was executed? A. I did not.

Q. They did not sign it there in your presence? A. That I cannot say.

Q. How? A. They might have signed it there, but I not see them sign it.

Q. You have no recollection on the subject of signing it at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. One way or the other? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton draw what purported to be an alteration of the Tripartite, there? A. I saw him take a pen and write there.

Q. Did you understand at the time that he was drawing an amendment to the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. I heard him say what he wanted to do, and he took his pen, and I saw him writing.

Q. What did he do with that which he wrote? A. It was on a paper, and it was put on that paper that he was examining—this Tripartite.

Q. It was annexed to the "Tripartite Agreement," was it? A. Yes, Sir; as I saw it.

Q. How was it annexed? A. I cannot say as to that. It seemed to be a piece of paper put on the larger paper.

Q. Was it pinned fast? A. I cannot say as to that.

Q. Was it annexed to that paper? A. I cannot say.

Q. Now, were there any other papers before the arbitrators? A. Not that I remember.

Q. The agreement between Bowen and Tilton, and the "Tripartite Agreement" were the only papers? A. I think they were, so far as I know. There may have been other papers that I did not see.

Q. You recollect none other? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, were there any papers relating to the scandal there? A. No, I don't remember that there was.

Q. How? A. I don't remember that there was.

Q. Was there nothing attached to the "Tripartite Agreement" relating to the scandal? A. Not that I remember.

Q. Was that read over after you met? A. I think part of it was by somebody, but I remember very little about the papers; I don't think I took them in my hands.

Q. What part was read over? A. I cannot say.

Q. Cannot you repeat anything that was read over? A. I could not repeat one word.

Q. Not a single word? A. Not a single word, because I didn't read the paper myself or take it in my hand.

Q. Well, it was read over for the purpose of having you hear it, was it not? A. Very likely it was.

Q. So that you might know what it contained? A. Possibly.

Q. But whilst you can recollect the conversation, you cannot recollect anything that was in the paper? A. What conversation do you speak of?

Q. After the arbitrators came in? A. No, Sir. The substance of it I remember.

Q. Answer my question. Why can't you remember the substance of the paper as well? A. Because my memory is not good for repeating language; words I cannot use I have no faculty, I think, in my head for words.

Q. I think you have a pretty good one. Won't you tell me the substance of that paper? A. I could not tell you.

Q. You cannot tell the words nor the substance of it? A. No, Sir; I cannot—I cannot tell what the substance was; I didn't take the papers in my hands; I only know that the papers—it was said all—should be burned and destroyed; all that had this scandal—that related to this scandal in any form.

Q. The scandal between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher? A. All the parties, Mr. Beecher, Mr. Bowen, Mr. Moulton, and so forth.

Q. Mr. Moulton, too? A. I don't know that Mr. Moulton's name was mentioned about the scandal papers, but all the papers were going to be burned.

Q. That you remember very distinctly? A. I do; because it was impressed very strongly on my mind.

Q. Yes. Now, what was said about signing the paper there in your presence? A. Mr. Claflin repeated that remark, as I said to you he did in my direct. When they came to sign it, Mr. Claflin said—

Q. But you don't recollect that they did sign it? A. No, Sir; I do not recollect, but, so far as regards—no, Sir; I do not recollect any signing of a paper; it was not signed there, as I understood it—the Tripartite—because the conversation was only about Mr. Claflin getting it—

Q. Taking it to Mr. Wilkeson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said about the Woodstock letter? A. Mr. Bowen or somebody said something about the Woodstock letter.

Q. Was it delivered up that night? A. I don't know.

Q. Didn't you see it delivered up? A. No, Sir.

Q. If it had been delivered up you would remember it, would you not? A. No; I don't think I should. I paid very little attention to the papers in any form.

Q. Did you hear any scandal spoken of there that night except the one that was contained in the letter of Jan. 1, 1871, called the "Personal Statement"? A. What we arbitrated upon so far as the scandal was concerned—

Q. What you arbitrated upon— A. So far as we arbitrated, you observe, Mr. Fullerton—

Q. I observe that you don't answer my question. A. Well, Sir!

Q. Was there any scandal talked of there that night, except that— A. No, Sir; I don't remember that the scandal was named.

Q. You have not heard half the question yet. Was there any scandal talked about there that night except that which was embodied in the "Tripartite Agreement," and contained in the paper called the "Personal Statement"? A. I don't think there was.

Q. Was it not the papers relating to that scandal that were to be burned? A. I did not so understand it—all papers.

Q. Relating to that scandal? A. To the scandal, so far as it had been going on.

Q. Had you heard of any scandal at that time? A. I think I had, before I came there.

Q. What was it; anything except what was in the letter of January 1, 1871? A. I cannot say as to that; I did not read it.

Q. You did not know what was in it that night? A. Mr. Fullerton, I have avoided reading everything I could.

Q. Now, you are sure that they spoke that night of the apology being burned? A. I am sure.

Q. You recollect that distinctly? A. I think it was called for, and seemed to come in some form—I think Mr. Bowen—

Q. Mr. Beecher was not there, was he? A. He was not.

Q. Who asked you to become an arbitrator? A. I don't know.

Q. Have you no recollection upon that subject? A. Not a word.

Q. Do you know how you came to go there? A. No, I do not. I only know that somebody sent word to me—whether it was Mr. Claflin, or Mr. Storrs, or whoever it was—the first thing I knew I was notified to meet at Mr. Moulton's, and I do not know who nominated me; I cannot say.

Q. You say you have been a member of Plymouth Church for about twenty-five years? A. Yes, Sir; I think I have.

Q. Have you filled any offices in that church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What offices have you filled during that period? A. I have had the honor of being President of the Board of Trustees; I think that is all of the offices I ever held there.

Q. Were you ever a Deacon? A. Never; ain't fit to be a Deacon. [Laughter.]

Q. Were you ever a member of the Examining Committee? A. I think I was for the first one or two years.

Q. A member of any other committee during that period? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Can't you recall the fact now whether you were a member of any other committee? A. No, I really could not.

FUN BETWEEN COUNSEL AND WITNESS.

Q. Do you recollect being at Mr. Tilton's one night in company with Andrews—Pearl Andrews? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. You have forgotten that, eh? A. Yes, Sir; I have.

Q. Do you recollect being there one evening when Stephen Pearl Andrews was there, and Miss Augusta Moore? A. Very likely I was; but I do not remember it.

Q. That is what I asked you? A. I don't remember it; very likely I was; I have been to Mr. Tilton's a number of times.

Q. But you don't recollect that occasion? A. I don't; still I might have been there.

Q. Well, have you ever attended any of Mr. Stephen

Pearl Andrews's lectures? A. I don't remember that I ever did.

Q. Did he ever lecture at your house? A. Never to my knowledge.

Q. You cannot tell me now whether you ever heard him deliver a lecture? A. I really don't remember.

Q. You cannot remember? A. No; I cannot.

Q. Mr. Andrews is a noted lecturer, somewhat? A. He may be, as far as that is concerned.

Q. I don't ask what may be; I ask the fact whether he was or was not, within your knowledge? A. No, not within my knowledge, he has not.

Q. You never heard that he was a noted lecturer? A. Oh! I heard of his lecturing, and I may have heard him—may have heard him two or three times, but I don't remember at this moment of having heard him lecture, but I have heard him talk quite frequently.

Q. Where? A. He has talked at my house.

Q. At a gathering of people there? A. No.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, did he deliver a lecture at your house? A. No, not to my knowledge; he never did.

Q. Can you not recall the fact that you were at Mr. Tilton's one night when there was a talk upon the subject of affinities, and spheres, and atmospheres, and all that sort of thing, when Miss Augusta Moore was there? A. I don't wish to swear as to that. I can remember that I have been to Mr. Tilton's house several times.

Q. I want to know about that particular occasion? A. Mr. Fullerton, I cannot accommodate you in that matter; my memory won't consent to it. [Laughter.]

Q. Have you no impression upon the subject? A. I have not, not a particle.

Q. Don't you recollect your son was there that night? A. My son—no, I don't remember that; I have not the least conception. Since I have heard Miss Moore testify here I have tried with all my might to bring that to my mind, and found it an impossible thing to do it. I never tried harder to do a thing in my life than to bring that to my mind, but I could not do it.

Q. Is it not your best impression that you were not there? A. Now, what do you want I should say in answer to that question? [Laughter.]

Q. I want you to answer according to your best impression. A. Haven't I given it to you?

Q. Your best impression is that you don't remember it. I want to know if you don't think you were not there at all. I will put the question in another form. A. Now, my dear friend—[Laughter.]

Q. Don't you think if you had been there that you would have remembered it? A. I would be just as likely not to remember it as to remember it. I discovered that things do slip out of my mind wonderfully.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—I want to tell everything just as it is exactly. If I could remember it, I would give you the pleasure of remembering it, if that would be any pleasure to you.

Q. Do you remember whether or not you are a Spiritualist? A. Yes, Sir; I am a Bible Spiritualist.

Q. A Bible Spiritualist? A. Yes, Sir; I believe in ministering spirits—guardian angels—I believe in.

Q. Do you believe that you communicate, or that any one else communicates, with the spirit world? A. Now, had you better go into that subject? Is it wise now to go into that subject? What is the benefit of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—I may be wiser by having your explanation of the matter.

The Witness—You won't be; you have got to experiment for yourself, if you want to be wiser.

Mr. Fullerton—Let me ask you this question.

The Witness—My dear friend, you can ask me any number of questions you choose. [Laughter.]

Q. Do you think you can communicate with the spirits in the other world? A. I have not made up my mind fully on that subject; I believe that spirits do communicate with this world; ministering angels are about. Most certainly I do; I certainly do, and I think it would be well for you to— [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am communicating with a spirit of this world now, and that is quite enough for my present occupation.

The Witness—The time will come when you will want a better one.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to ask you—

The Witness—My dear friend, the way for you to do is to go. Your friend Tilton there will take you. He has had some experience.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I shall not go until I get through with you. Have you visited Spiritualists in the City of New-York? A. I don't know that I have visited a Spiritualist in a good many years.

Q. I didn't ask you within what time; I ask you if you have visited a Spiritualist in the City of New-York? A. I have; I believe in the phenomenon of Spiritualists.

Q. According to the significance of the term as now held. A. Not exactly.

Q. In what respect does your belief differ? A. Don't ask me to explain that, if you please; you don't want me to go into that.

Q. Why not? Why can you not explain it? A. I could not satisfy you or myself either.

Mr. Evans—If your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—I think, Mr. Fullerton, I would not pursue that any further.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will try another subject. Do you believe in the divinity of the Savior? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you always believed in it? A. Now, you will want to ask me to go into a definition. I could not answer you that.

Q. Do you believe in the divinity of the Savior? A. I do.

Mr. Evarts—We submit that that is not a proper subject of inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—It was a proper subject of inquiry when our witnesses were upon the stand.

Mr. Beach—It was a proper subject of inquiry when Mr. Tilton was on the stand.

Mr. Evarts—It was a proper subject of inquiry bearing upon his wife's feelings.

Mr. Fullerton—And bearing on his connection with them.

Mr. Beach—It was a proper subject of inquiry when Mr. Moulton was on the stand.

Mr. Fullerton—It was a proper subject of inquiry then for the counsel.

Mr. Evarts—I didn't inquire of Mr. Moulton in regard to that.

Mr. Beach—Yes, you did.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you believe in the deity of the Savior? A. Yes, Sir, I do.

Q. And has that been your belief for some years past? A. My belief has varied very much.

Q. In what respect? A. I cannot answer that.

Q. Why not? A. Because I cannot explain it to myself. I cannot answer you what I cannot explain to myself.

Q. Do you believe in the deity of a Savior as it is held by orthodox churches?

Judge Neilson—I think he has answered that; still I think you may pursue it.

The Witness—I have answered all I shall.

By Mr. Fullerton—Answer that question. A. I cannot answer it.

Q. Why not? A. I am a Liberal Christian. As to orthodox churches—when you come to talk about them, I believe in loving your neighbor as yourself.

Q. I am not talking about that. A. I have answered all I can on that subject.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is a matter of some importance, but may not be in this case.

Mr. Fullerton—Inasmuch as Mr. Freeland cannot tell us, that is a good objection to not proceeding any further.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]—That is all, Mr. Freeland.

The Witness—I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—You are very welcome, indeed. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Officer Rogers, you will have to take charge of this audience; I cannot permit this to continue. Perhaps the reporters had better all retire, and we will then have a little more quiet time.

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Moore.

TESTIMONY OF JENNIE MOORE.

Jennie Moore, called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Shearman—What is your husband's name? A. Robert F. Moore.

Q. Where do you reside? A. Hoyt-st., Brooklyn.

Q. Have you formerly resided in Smith-st.? A. No, Sir, Pacific-st.

Q. Where is your husband's place of business? A. Corner of Smith and Pacific.

Q. What is his business? A. Tea and grocery.

Q. Grocery business? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been married? A. Eighteen months.

Q. Did you ever have a woman in your employ by the name of Kate Carey, or Kate Smith? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Under which name was she employed by you? A. When she came to me first she gave her name as Smith-Kate Smith.

Q. When she came to you first she gave her name as Kate Smith? A. Yes, Sir; and afterward told me—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—No; she won't go on.

Judge Neilson [to the witness]—Tell what she told you! A. Afterward she—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Shearman]—You can shape the question so that the witness can understand, if you want the name simply.

Mr. Shearman—She first came by the name of Kate Carey, and afterwards tells the witness—

Judge Neilson—If she afterwards gave some other name, that you can ask.

Mr. Shearman—Talk about technicalities!

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you will learn something every day you live.

Q. Did she give any other name after? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What name did she give? A. Carey.

Q. Kate Carey? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she ever say anything to you about having been employed by Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she ever say anything to you upon this subject as to whether there was anything wrong between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Shearman.]—Do you find that in the book?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Turn to it, and put the precise question to her.

Mr. Shearman—Did you ever ask her whether there was anything wrong between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Shearman. Page 755. [To the Witness.]—Did you ever ask her that question?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—How does it read?

Mr. Shearman—It is printed "Mr. Moore." That is mistake. [Reading.] "Do you remember telling Mr. Moore while there that you never saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. The same never was mentioned at Moore's."

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Shearman]—I think you can put that question.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—That question was put to the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—If it was put as he read it he has no right to ask it. The question was put to Kate Carey as to whether she had ever told "Mr. Moore" about it.

Mr. Shearman—We will satisfy you on that point by calling Mr. Moore also.

Mr. Fullerton—The more you call the better.

Mr. Shearman—We intend to call him.

Mr. Fullerton—If we are to abide by the record—

Mr. Beach—There is no doubt about it; it was asked.

Judge Neilson—The question was asked as to Mr. Moore.

Mr. Fullerton—Then they cannot give any evidence by this witness.

Judge Neilson—I don't know whether counsel believes it was a mistake or not.

Mr. Shearman—The witness went further. If there is any question about this, I won't dispute Mr. Beach's word, if he is positive, but the witness says the name never was mentioned at Moore's. [Reading.] "You are quite sure of that? A. I am sure of it, Sir. Q. You did not say anything of that kind? A. I did not, Sir." The natural person for a servant to converse with is a lady. The presumption is it would be Mrs. Moore.

Mr. Fullerton—Then you should not have asked her about Mr. Moore.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Shearman]—I think you will have to pass that. It is a very technical point.

Mr. Beach—I submit it is not technical.

Judge Neilson—I say pass it. It is a thing that ought to be technically adhered to, the question put to the former witness.

Mr. Beach—If I am sought to be impeached as a witness, and am asked if I made a declaration to A B, can they prove that I made one to C D?

Judge Neilson—No; therefore I suggested Mr. Shearman should pass it; that it must be technically adhered to.

Mr. Evarts—It is purely a question of fact. Our proposition is that the question was whether she had so stated to Mrs. Moore.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—And the print does not conclude us from proving that fact if there be a mistake in the print as to Mr. and Mrs. Moore, as well as upon anything else.

Judge Neilson—Do you see any way to correct it? I don't.

Mr. Evarts—By appealing to the recollection of counsel.

Judge Neilson—I have no recollection.

Mr. Evarts—By appealing to the recollection of counsel?

Our friends don't profess to say that they recollect it was Mrs. Moore and not Mr. Moore.

Mr. Beach [to Mr. Evarts]—Do you pretend to say you recollect it?

Mr. Evarts—I don't personally recollect it.

Mr. Beach—They don't make any stronger pretensions than we do.

Judge Neilson—That leaves us on the record, therefore.

Mr. Evarts—The answer, however, is given that nothing was said at the house to anybody. I agree that we must lay the foundation for asking the question.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that general statement lays the foundation.

Mr. Evarts—I agree that we must lay the foundation for asking the witness the question. It is a question of fact we will have to look at the record for.

Mr. Shearman—In case it should turn out that this should not be Mrs. Moore, we will make an offer to prove by this witness that Kate Carey or Kate Smith did say to Mrs. Moore, when in her employ, that she never saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, and that whoever said so was a liar. We make that offer.

Judge Neilson—If you find on the record the question was put to Mrs. Moore, instead of her husband, you can recall the witness at any time.

Mr. Shearman—But otherwise it is ruled out!

Judge Neilson—Yes.

THE WITNESS, KATE CAREY. IMPEACHED.

Mr. Shearman—Are you acquainted with the character of Kate Carey, or Kate Smith, for truthfulness and veracity? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is her character?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Q. What was her character at the time she was employed by you?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it.

Mr. Beach—That calls for personal knowledge.

Mr. Evarts—It is the ordinary question.

Mr. Beach—No, it is not.

Judge Neilson [to the Witness]—The character inquired about is the speech of people.

Mr. Fullerton—The general character.

Judge Neilson [to the witness]—Not your own knowledge—but what you heard other people say about her.

The Witness—As to her truthfulness?

Judge Neilson—Yes, the question is whether you know what her general character for truth and veracity is among other people? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Independent of your own personal knowledge? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Shearman]—Go on, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—What is her character in that respect?

Mr. Morris—She has not said she knows it yet.

Mr. Beach—Yes, she has.

The Witness—What was it?

Mr. Shearman—What was it at that time? A. Those that I have talked to about her would not believe her under oath in regard to her truthfulness.

Q. Would you yourself believe her under oath? A. No, Sir.

Q. You say No? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That is not the question.

Mr. Shearman—It is the uniform question.

Mr. Beach—It is not the uniform or the legal question. [To the Witness.] The question is whether, judging from that reputation, you would believe her under oath.

Mr. Shearman—Then I will ask her that now.

Mr. Beach—You have got it now.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Shearman]—I have been studying practice under you, Mr. Shearman, a long time. I think you understand it, if any one does.

Mr. Fullerton—He wrote that practice for others.

Mr. Shearman—I asked each time the precise question which has been ruled a good many times by the Court to be the proper question, and the only proper question. [To the Witness.] When Kate Carey, or Kate Smith, was in that place—was employed by you—was she intemperate?

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—That is immaterial; besides she cannot testify at large.

Mr. Fullerton—When did she come to live with you, Mrs. Moore?

Mr. Porter—There are some authorities on the subject of the former question, your Honor. In Abbott's recent addition to the Digest there is an abstract of a decision in the 36th New-York. [Reading.]

It is not strictly necessary that the name of the person to whom he is alleged to have made the inconsistent declaration should be mentioned. While he is under examination it is enough if his attention has been called to the time, place and circumstance of the alleged conversation.

Rockwell agt. Brown, 36 New-York.

Judge Neilson—Yes; I see it.

Mr. Porter—Your Honor will remember that the witness was specifically interrogated as to her conversation upon that subject while she was in the employment of Mrs. Moore; she stated that there was no such conversation; that the name of Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton was not mentioned. Now, we offer a witness in the person of the lady who employed her, with whom the conversation occurred, and ask her to state it. We submit that, according to the decision, we are entitled to the benefit of the rule.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, that decision announces, preceding the statement which is made by Mr. Porter, that the name of the person must be given; but if that is impossible, it is then admissible to ask the question without it. [To Mr. Porter.] Do you remember what number you read from, Mr. Porter?

Mr. Porter—Here the name is given.

Mr. Beach—Given wrongly.

Mr. Porter—The question is whether the inquiry was made by the husband or by the wife, and, if made by either, or both included, we are not concluded as to the witness, but we may prove the contrary. It may have been on a public occasion. We may only name the occasion and identify it sufficiently to call the attention of the witness to it, and then we may prove by every bystander that on that occasion the declaration was made.

Judge Neilson—Doubtless; but when you do name the particular person—Mr. Moore—and get your answer in respect to that question, can you depart from it? I don't know how the record is, in fact. Anything more from this lady?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I am inclined to waive the objection, Sir, and let them take the evidence.

Judge Neilson—If you think the inquiry was made of Mrs. Moore—

Mr. Beach—It would only result in this, that Kate Carey would be recalled, and she would deny it, the same as she does to Mr. Moore. It seems to be making unnecessary trouble.

Judge Neilson—Then repeat your question, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Moore, will you state whether you ever asked Kate Carey, or Kate Smith, whether she ever saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did she answer to that question? A. She answered me that she never had seen anything wrong, and whoever said so were liars.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. JENNIE MOORE

Mr. Fullerton—When did Kate Carey commence living with you, Mrs. Moore? A. In the Fall of 1873.

Q. In the Fall of 1873? A. Yes, Sir; October.

Q. October, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How do you recollect the month? A. Well, it was just after I was married.

Q. How long did she reside with you? A. Two months, and two days over her two months.

Q. Did she come with a recommendation? A. She had several recommendations.

Q. Several? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go to make inquiries in regard to her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did she have one from Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; not that I saw.

Q. Didn't she refer you to Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. You are quite sure of that? A. Yes, Sir; she told me she had been living with Mrs. Tilton after she had been there a week or so.

Q. And she left in November some time, did she? A. Left where?

Q. Left your employ—or December? A. December.

Q. Of the same year? A. Yes, Sir; two months she was with me.

Q. Did you know her before she came there? A. No, Sir. I answered an advertisement in the paper, and got her.

Q. Did you make any inquiries in regard to her whilst she lived with you? A. Whilst she lived with me!

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you make any inquiries in regard to her after she left you? A. After she left me!

Q. Yes. A. In what way? I don't understand you.

Q. Did you make any inquiries in regard to Kate Carey in any respect after she left your service? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you go to see any of the persons who had given her recommendations? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. You made no inquiries in regard to her, then? A. No, Sir.

Q. How did you learn her general character? A. I didn't trouble myself. She had three or four written recommendations, and that was all.

Q. How did you learn her general character when she lived with you, if in any way? A. I don't understand you.

Q. I understood you to tell the Judge that you knew her general character. A. Why, I found her out myself.

Q. How did you find her out? A. Through different parties.

Q. Through different parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whilst she lived with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Name the different parties. A. Well, I cannot; I don't understand you exactly.

Q. You say you found her out through different parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. My question is, how you found her out? A. Well, by telling me that was on account of the reason she left.

Q. No; my question is— A. I didn't understand you.

Q. I will put it in a different form so that you will understand it. You found her out, you tell me, through different parties—through different persons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I want you to name those persons through whom you found her out. A. Well, through my own relations; through those in the house.

Q. Name the persons, please, Madam? A. It would not do you any good, I don't believe.

Mr. Fullerton—You must not stand upon whether it does me any good or not.

The Witness—My own friends.

Mr. Fullerton—Won't you name them, please? A. My aunt for one.

Q. What is her name? A. Mrs. Leahy.

Q. Where does she live? A. In Nassau-st.

Q. In Nassau-st., Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; and my brother-in-law.

Q. What number in Nassau-st.? A. 47.

Q. Did she know Kate Carey? A. She knew her through me.

Q. And your brother-in-law, you say? A. Yes, Sir; lived in the house.

Q. Lived in the house with you, or with your aunt? A. With me at Pacific-st. A while she was living with me and the parties that lived up-stairs in the house.

Q. Who were the parties that lived up stairs? A. Mrs. Sweetser; they live there now; they own the house.

Q. And your brother-in-law? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He found her out while she was in the house? A. Through stories; I cannot tell you exactly; I don't understand exactly what you mean for me to say.

Q. You say you found her out through parties? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is a very simple thing for you to name the parties through whom you found her out? A. I have.

Q. Your aunt, and people in the house, and the Sweet-sers, who lived in the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did the Sweet-sers know her before she came to live with you? A. No, Sir; we found her out while she was in my employment.

Q. All you know about her you found out while she was living with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Through those persons whom you have named? A. Yes, Sir; and myself.

Q. That is all you know about her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is the way you learned her general character, was it? A. In regard to her truthfulness.

Q. That is the way you learned her general character? A. Yes, Sir; and what she said herself.

Q. And you have no other knowledge of her general character, except what you learned through those people? A. And what I know myself.

Q. What you know yourself and what you learned from those people? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You judge in a great measure from what you know yourself? A. Yes, Sir; and in connection with myself in regard to her truthfulness.

Q. You judge in a great measure from what you observed and found out? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. While she lived with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And do you not judge mostly from that, from what you observed yourself? A. Certainly; because I didn't know anything else about her, except what I judged from my friends.

Q. What church do you attend, Mrs. Moore? A. I am not a member of any church; I attend the Methodist Church when I do go to church.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Beach—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—Robert T. Moore. [A new witness.]

Mr. Beach—For the purpose of saving our right, your Honor, we don't think the evidence of this last witness ought to stand in regard to impeachment upon the ground of general character. Her testimony shows she was not sufficiently acquainted with her general character.

Judge Neilson—I think that will be a subject for instruction to the jury.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir. I make that motion and take an exception to your Honor's ruling.

Judge Neilson—Yes; let the motion be entered.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT T. MOORE.

Robert T. Moore called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Moore, you are the husband of the last witness, I believe? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember Kate Carey, or Kate Smith? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She was employed in your family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have any conversation with her on the subject of Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. On several occasions, and one occasion in particular.

Q. On several occasions, and on one occasion in particular? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ask her whether she ever saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, or anything to that effect? A. I asked her if she ever saw any familiarity between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, or anything she considered wrong. She answered, "No, indeed."

Q. Now, Sir, is that all? A. I asked her also if she had seen Mr. Beecher there in the first place; she said yes; I then asked her if she saw him there often; she said, "Yes, quite often when Mrs. Tilton was sick," and spoke of him bringing a bouquet of flowers on one occasion; I then asked her in regard to the familiarity, and her reply was, "No, indeed."

Q. Are you acquainted with the general character of Kate Carey or Kate Smith as to truth and veracity? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is her character in that respect? A. For veracity, I should say it was very bad.

Q. Would you believe her under oath? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ROBERT T. MOORE.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Moore, will you tell us how you learned her general character? A. From stories that she told while she was in my employment—stories that I heard her make.

Q. Falsehoods she told whilst she was in your employ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that the only way? A. That is the only way.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all. [To Judge Neilson.] Now I move to strike that out, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Let the motion be entered, and let—

Mr. Tracy—We have not got through with the witness yet.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION OF ROBERT T. MOORE.

Mr. Shearman—Have you heard other people talk about her character for truth?

Judge Neilson—That is a question you should have put before you got through on the direct.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—Yes; I have heard my wife and brother talk in relation to that matter.

Mr. Shearman—Have you heard other people talk about the stories she told whilst she was living with you? A. Yes, Sir, I believe I have.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

RECROSS-EXAMINATION OF ROBERT T. MOORE.

By Mr. Fullerton—Now, what people did you hear talk about the stories she told whilst she was living with you? A. My wife's relations, in Nassau-st.

Q. How did they hear the stories? A. She had been in their employ a short time.

Q. She had been in their employ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know that of your own knowledge? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Saw her there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was their name? A. Lahy—spelled L-a-h-y.

Q. Which of them told you? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. How? A. I don't recollect; I remember that there were some stories told, and I remember what the stories amounted to.

Mr. Beach—That is not the question that is put to you.

By Mr. Fullerton—I want to know the name of the person who talked to you about the stories she told when she lived with you? A. I cannot tell you just now.

Q. How many are there of them? A. There is quite a large family; I cannot tell you the number.

Q. How many talked to you? A. Probably two or three.

Q. Don't you know? A. As near as I recollect, two or three of them.

Q. Can you recollect the fact that two or three of them did talk with you about it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When? A. After she left me.

Q. After she left you? A. Yes, Sir, and after she left their employ.

Q. Whom else did you talk with? A. My own brothers.

Q. Your own brothers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did they live? A. They are living with me at present; we all live together.

Q. Where did they live at the time Kate Carey was living with you? A. No. 176 Pacific-st.

Q. How did they know her? A. They were living with me at the same time.

Q. They were living with you at the same time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In your family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who else did you hear talk about her? A. I can't recollect just now.

Q. Did you hear any one else? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, who were they? A. A party that she had been boarding with.

Q. How? A. A party that she had been boarding with.

Q. Who was that? A. I can't remember her name just now; she lived in the immediate neighborhood of my store.

Q. Where did you see her or him? A. I saw her on my way from the court one day—on my way from this court.

Q. This court? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Since this trial commenced? A. Yes, Sir—on Pacific-st.

Q. She was here as a witness, wasn't she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she talked with you about it? A. She was in the court; I can't say, of my own knowledge, whether she was here as a witness or not; but I saw her.

Q. When did you talk to your brother about it? A. Some time ago.

Q. How long ago? A. I cannot tell you exactly how long.

Q. About how long? A. It might be eight, or nine, or ten months ago.

Q. But you cannot state how long? A. No, Sir; I have had conversations with him since the commencement of this suit.

Q. Been to see them? A. Well, I see them every day; they are living in the house with me.

Q. Were you requested to talk with them? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir, the conversation came around in the usual way.

Q. And did you go to see your other relatives? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you talked with them? A. No, Sir.

Q. Haven't seen them upon the subject? A. Yes, Sir; I have seen them this morning, but not on this subject.

Q. Not upon this subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. So that her general character you have learned in the way that you have now described, have you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you know it in no other way? A. No other way.

Q. Well, what did they say—these people that you talked with?

Mr. Beach—What did they say in regard to Kate Carey or Kate Smith?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, her truth. A. Well, I recollect particularly what one of my brothers said, that if the evidence that she gave was allowed to go uncontradicted it would be an outrage; the evidence in the court he had reference to.

Q. Yes; just repeat that, please. A. If the evidence she gave in this Court was allowed to go uncontradicted it would be an outrage.

Mr. Beach—This is what your brother said? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—What is your brother's name? A. My brother's name is William.

Q. William Moore? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is he here as a witness? A. No, Sir, he is not.

Q. Where does he live? A. He lives with me.

Q. He lives with you? A. At least, in the same house.

Q. Now, what else did any other person say in regard to Kate Carey? A. I can't recollect exactly now what else.

Q. Can you recollect anything that was said? A. I recollect in one instance—

Mr. Beach—Oh! oh!

The Witness—I don't remember which of the—who the party was that told me, but it was one of my wife's relations, that she was an awful liar; she couldn't be trusted to—

Mr. Fullerton—When was that said? A. That was probably a year ago, or from nine to twelve months ago.

Q. Now, what else have you heard said against her? A. That is all that I recollect, Sir, at present.

Q. You cannot recollect anything else? A. Not at present.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Shearman—James Redpath.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES REDPATH.

James Redpath called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Redpath, where do you reside? A. Boston.

Q. What is your occupation? A. I am a lecture agent and lyceum manager.

Q. A little louder, Mr. Redpath. A. I am a lecture agent and lyceum manager.

Q. Still we cannot hear you.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Redpath, won't you speak so that the farthest juror can hear you?

The Witness—I am a lecture agent and lyceum manager.

Mr. Shearman—Are you acquainted with the parties to this suit? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Theodore Tilton? A. I have no memory for dates, Sir; I have known him since, I think, when he was an editor of The Independent, when Mr. Beecher was the editor, when Oliver Johnson was the editor of The Anti-Slavery Standard; I think 15 years, perhaps.

Q. About 15 years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You knew him before the war, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; before the war.

Q. Speak a little louder, Mr. Redpath. You have also been acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton, have you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Moulton? A. I have known Frank since the Winter of 1873, I think, after Mrs. Woodhull's story was published.

Q. You mean the early Winter of 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The Winter of 1872-'3? A. I think I first became acquainted with him in January, 1873.

THE "TRUE STORY" SHOWN MR. REDPATH.

Q. Did you, about that time, have any conversation with Mr. Tilton on the subject of a narrative which he was preparing concerning Mr. Beecher's affairs and his own? A. Yes.

Q. By what name if any did Mr. Tilton describe that narrative? A. I don't remember that he described it all by any name. I went there one Sunday after being at Plymouth Church; I think it was early in January, or about that time; possibly it might have been in December. Moses Coit Tyler was there.

Q. Moses Coit Tyler? A. Yes, Sir—was in the house at the time. I was thoroughly drenched; it was raining very heavily, and I stayed there all night.

Q. Stayed where? A. I stayed at Mr. Tilton's all night.

Q. Mr. Tilton's house? A. Yes, Sir; I read the story that night, I think.

Q. What story do you refer to? A. The "True Story," the one that is called the "True Story."

Q. Who gave it to you? A. Mr. Tilton.

Q. What conversation, if any, did you have with Mr. Tilton at that time on that subject? A. I don't remember any conversation at all at the time. I went there, and of course that subject came up; and as far as I can recollect, Theodore said he would tell me the facts in the case, to answer the scandal, but then I don't remember the words, at all.

Q. But that is the substance? A. That is the substance, as far as I remember.

Q. And then he handed you this paper? A. No; yes, he handed me the paper to read after I went to bed—went to my room.

Q. Speak a little louder. He handed you this paper after you went to bed, do I understand? A. After I went to my room.

Q. Did you read it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you after that have any conversation with Mr. Tilton on that subject? A. Well, I say we; I suppose I must have paid twenty or thirty visits, perhaps more, to the house, during the months of January and February.

Q. 1873? A. 1873; and while I do not distinctly recall any one conversation, I know that the subject was repeatedly mentioned; that is all.

Q. Do you recollect any conversation in which he referred to this story which he had prepared, and said anything about Mrs. Tilton's views or wishes concerning it? A. When he gave me the story to read he said that he did not want Elizabeth to know that I was reading it, because she did not like to have people know about it.

Q. Did he say anything as to what she would do if it were published? A. Not at that time.

Q. Did he at any other time? A. I beg your pardon; one day I went over early in the forenoon, and as I was—as I passed up-stairs I passed Elizabeth in the entry—in the passage, up-stairs, coming out of one room on the right-hand side; she had an expression of extraordinary determination and resolution in her face that I had never seen there before, and I thought there had been some domestic row. I went into Theodore's room; he was lying on the bed stretched out, I think with a coverlid over him, without his coat or vest; I think his pantaloons were on; and he had a look of extreme sorrow, as if he had been stricken by some terrible blow. I was startled at the expression on his face, there was so much sorrow on it, and I went forward, and he had the roll of the "True Story," lying this way. [Illustrating.]

Q. Open? A. I think it was open. I said, "Theodore, what is the matter with you this morning?" He said, "I have had a talk"—or "conversation;" he did not use the word "talk," he used some word like "controversy"—"with Elizabeth." He said it was wonderful, the amount of resolution that that little woman had. "Well," I said, "What is the matter?" During this I was observing his face very closely, and was very much pained by the look of almost agony that there was on the face; I had never seen it there before. He said, "Elizabeth threatens if I publish it," or, "if it is published," I am not sure which, I think, "If it is published, that she will come out and deny it." I said suddenly, "Theodore Tilton, you have not told me the whole truth in this case, have you?" He dropped his eyes and said, "No." I said, "My God!" I went forward and put my hand on his head, stroked his hair. I found that his head was burning, his temple throbbing. I sat with him; I think neither of us said much—possibly ten minutes or a quarter of an hour—passing my hand over his head, and I thought then that the extreme mental strain that was on him was going to render him insane. Now, I had no cause for thinking that from anything he said, but simply from knowing his face well and from watching its expression then. Well, I acted on that belief for one whole week afterwards. He said either there or down stairs, "It ought to be published." By and by after he very soon became quieted, when I sat with him for a while, and I asked him to rise and go out and have a walk. He rose, and I noticed that as he walked across the floor he staggered. I got him down stairs as soon as I could, coaxing him to hurry up, and that about the 1st of and went down stairs with him. We went over to Boston—to New-York together, and during—in going over the ferry, and in the distracted manner that he had, my impression was confirmed that this thing—that he was either in a fever or was going to become insane; he said in going—of course we talked a good deal; I am only saying now all that I am able to recall, because I have tried to think of it for the past few weeks; he said he was going—I think it was that same day, or the next day, perhaps—he was going on some lecture engagement, I think in Indiana or Kentucky as nearly as I remember, and he said that he was in such a state, his head—he was feeling so badly or his head was in such a state that he did not think he would go; I went over, and I think he spoke to Mr. Clark about it—Mr. Clark, the editor of The Golden Age.

Q. It is no matter. A. Well, I said that Theodore ought not to go, that if he did—I said to some one that if he did the first interviewer that he met would get the document out of him, and I believed it would ruin him and ruin his family. He did not go, and in the course of a few days I saw Frank Moulton, and said to him—

Q. No, this we have not a right to ask.

Mr. Beach—We have no objection.

The Witness—Well, I haven't told the story.

HOW THE COPY OF THE "TRUE STORY" WAS MADE.

Mr. Shearman—We only want to know whether you got that paper again? Well, I think either that day or the next day, with that belief, I wanted to get that paper out of his hands in order that he might not publish it. He said, I think, in the back parlor downstairs, that it ought to be published. I said: "Well, Theodore, I can easily get it published; let me have it." He said: "No, I could not; it would not do for me to give it to you. You might take it." I went over to The Golden Age office with him; I think that was the same day, and he left it in his desk, in the inner room of The Golden Age office, and pointed it out to me, as he went out, saying nothing, or saying "There it is." I took it and kept it as long as I could, making different pretenses for keeping it, until I could see Frank.

Q. Yes? A. Then I copied it; that is all.

Q. You took a copy of a portion of it, or the whole of it? A. No, Sir. I copied it until I got tired—until I could say that I had copied most of it. I know I did not copy nearly the whole of it.

Q. Will you look at the book which I now show you, and state whether that is the copy which you made of that "True Story" so far as you made one? [Handing witness a small blank book.] A. Yes, Sir; that is the copy.

Q. Have you read the paper purporting to be the "True Story," published in THE NEW-YORK TRIBUNE of Saturday, March 6, 1873, which is "Exhibit D 114" in this case? A. Yes, Sir; I have seen that.

Q. Is that a correct copy of your copy, so far as it goes? A. I examined it to some extent and found it correct; yes, Sir.

Q. As far as your notes go? A. As far as it goes; yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman [to Mr. Fullerton]—You can examine.

Mr. Beach—Do you give that copy in evidence?

Mr. Shearman—I will mark it for identification.

Mr. Beach [to the stenographer]—Has this "True Story" been printed in the case?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer—I don't remember, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—It has been marked "D 114," and to avoid all further question, though I am certain it was put in evidence, we put it in evidence now under that same number, "D 114."

Mr. Beach—They cannot put it in evidence under this witness's testimony.

Mr. Shearman—It was put in evidence before.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't remember.

Mr. Shearman—We will now offer this book in evidence. [Referring to book shown the witness.]

Mr. Morris—It was not put in as a whole. [Referring to the "True Story."] It is in, but not as a whole. Mr. Evarts, in his questions, read the whole.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, it is in that form, and then it was supposed it came in under Mr. Harman's testimony.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Beach—I want it on the record; I want it printed.

Mr. Tracy—Is it marked?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, it has the stenographer's mark.

Mr. Beach—It cannot be printed as long as you keep it in your pocket. I am not talking about the mark. I am talking about delivering it and getting it into the record and printed. It has not been printed in anything that I have seen yet.

Judge Neilson—In other words, you have no copy?

Mr. Beach—No, we have no copy of it.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Shearman]—Have you two copies of that particular paper?

Mr. Shearman—They will print it now in the record, your Honor. It is not our fault; it is in evidence—the point to which he recognized it. A part of it was proved by the production of the original paper. I don't believe it has been printed in the record. You will find it in the proceedings referred to and marked "D 114."

Mr. Beach—Well, it was not given in evidence before.

Mr. Shearman—It was not printed.

Mr. Beach—It was not given in evidence.

Mr. Shearman [to the witness]—You will see that is as far as you have copied, [showing witness "D 114," and also the small blank book.]

The Witness—It is all copied down to there, [pointing to a part of "D 114."]

Mr. Shearman—Suppose you put your initials there,

[The Witness marks with red lead pencil his initials "J. R." immediately following the words, "the friendship which I profess for him."]

Mr. Beach—I think it ought to be put in evidence now, for I am sure it was not before.

Mr. Tracy—It was put in evidence, but not read.

Mr. Fullerton—Is the book in?

Mr. Beach—No, it is printed in THE TRIBUNE.

Mr. Evarts—The fragments were produced by you.

Mr. Beach—Well, the whole of it was produced.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! yes, no doubt about that.

Mr. Shearman—Perhaps I better ask that one question. [To the witness]. The point at which you have marked this printed paper with your initials, in blue pencil, indicates the extent to which your copy makes a part of this paper.

The Witness—Yes, Sir. It is in red pencil.

"THE TRUE STORY."

One day last month, when I was in the north of New-Hampshire, a scandalous publication burst like a cloud over my home in Brooklyn, and shed a sudden shadow on my wife's good name. A week afterward, when I returned and first saw the libel, I wrote a card denouncing the outrage, but acting on the advice of friends withheld it from the press and maintained a contemptuous silence. Moreover, no form of card that I could devise, though I drafted two or three, seemed an adequate answer to the circumstantial details of the calumnious indictment. Instead of a card, I then proposed an explanatory narrative, meeting the false heads point by point, but this also I was advised against, particularly by Mrs. Tilton, who from the beginning begged me to publish no vindication of her whatever. The ingenious and plausible statement put forth against her could be thoroughly refuted only by a plain recital of the True Story to contradict and refute the false one; and as the True Story involves a disagreeable reference to other names, some of which have not hitherto been mentioned in the case, she prefers to suffer obloquy herself rather than fling it off to fall as a stain upon others, and withholds from me her permission to unvell the whole facts. But even against her will I am going to put them in writing, not, however, for the use of the public, but only of a few personal friends. I do this for two distinct purposes: first, for her sake, because a constrained silence will permanently injure her reputation; and next, for my sake, because I owe to these friends a frank explanation of what they have deemed erratic in my public course for the last two years, or since my retirement from The Independent and The Brooklyn Union.

About 10 or 11 years ago, Henry C. Bowen, for whom I was then working as a subordinate in The Independent office, told me one evening while crossing the Fulton Ferry that Henry Ward Beecher was guilty of adultery, a practice begun in Indianapolis and continued in Brooklyn.

Between the years 1860 and 1870, Mr. Bowen repeated the accusation not less than a hundred times, frequently exhibiting the deep sense of a personal injury, and sometimes saying that if he were so minded he could drive Mr. Beecher from his pulpit. During part of this time, Mr. Beecher was editor in charge of The Independent, and I was his lieutenant. Afterward he retired, and I succeeded to the chair. Both before Mr. Beecher's retirement and afterward, Mr. Bowen was in the habit of saying that the pastor of Plymouth Church was a dangerous visitor among the females of his congregation. These charges were not made to me in confidence, nor to myself alone. This gossip I always heard with unwilling ears, having no more taste for scandal then than now, and I would not note it here except that it is one of the pivots on which the ensuing history turns.

As a further statement still more unwillingly opened, yet necessary to an explanation of the subsequent complication of circumstances, I must say that in the Summer of 1870, a few months after I had undertaken, in addition to editing The Independent, to edit also The Brooklyn Union, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, my wife, made to me a communication concerning Mr. Beecher, which, to use her own words, lest I should wrong him by using mine, she afterward noted down in a memorandum as follows: "Mr. H. W. Beecher, my friend and pastor, solicited me to be a wife to him, together with all that this implies." I borrow the above fact from my wife's handwriting, and forbid myself from pausing at this point either to blacken it with an epithet or to lighten it with an explanation. The subject of my wife's recital was communicated a few weeks afterward by me to Oliver Johnson and Francis D. Moulton, and by my wife to her mother, and thence to some relatives. Mr. Beecher was absent from the State at the time, it being his vacation. During the Summer and Fall of the year 1870 I spoke of the case to a few friends, exhibiting more anger than charity toward Mr. Beecher, though to Mr. Bowen, whose two papers I was then editing, I was silent—unwilling to add any fuel to his indignation against the man whom he seemed preparing to destroy. At the same time, by other persons and from other quarters, stories were set afloat concerning Mr. Beecher of the same damaging kind; for instance, there came from Washington a statement, traceable I knew not to whom, that "Mr. Beecher preached every Sunday to a dozen of his mistresses."

My wife's mother now began to play an important part in my relations to Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher, and in the relations of these two persons to each other. This lady has been for years a chronic subject of manias and frenzies, and notoriously irresponsible in her tirades on any subject that excites her morbid feelings. One of her physicians, the late Dr. Barker of Brooklyn, recommended several years ago that she be treated in an institution for the insane. Among her eccentricities which I allude to, not to reprobate their author, whom disease may largely exempt from censure, she attempted, about that time, to take the life of her husband, the Hon. N. B. Morse, by clutching his throat and strangling him with such powerful energy that her grasp was loosened with difficulty by the inmates of the house, and her fury quenched with chloroform, a circumstance speedily followed by a legal separation between her husband and herself. In a less degree she had used violence toward other persons connected with her by blood or marriage, and had frequently written letters to me threatening my life. Her ingenuity of statement against her relatives during the spasms of her insane hysterics is cunning and malleous in the extreme. At the same time, in saying this, I bear testimony to the innate kindness and beautiful affection of her nature. By those who knew her well, her perversities are understood, but to her casual acquaintances they generally remain successfully hidden in the demeanor of one of the most peaceable and fascinating of persons.

The unhappiness which she has occasioned to every member of my own family had increased year by year, until, at last, Mrs. Tilton and I had been compelled to forbid her to enter our house. As illustrations of the mischief which Mrs. Morse had wrought against us, she spoke of Mrs. Tilton two years ago to our oldest daughter, Miss Florence Tilton (then 13 years old), in terms of criminality revolting to any pure girl's mind, and most terrible when spoken to such a girl against her own mother, being nothing less than the central accusation in the great scandal, which another mad woman afterward published to the world. Mrs. Morse once went to a lawyer in Brooklyn and with a plausible air consulted him about a divorce between my wife and me—a fact which we only learned by accident, not until it had spread its bat's-wings and gone flying abroad. She wrote to sundry journalists anonymous letters to prejudice me in their estimation, and I trace to her fertile brain the tale that I once took my wife by the hair of the head and kicked her during illness. But I forbear to narrate a hundred instances which come to my mind of her mischief-making propensities. It is sufficient to say in reference to my case with Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher, and to the case of each against the other, that she made a careful and malicious use of the few facts in her possession and of the many fancies which these engendered in her diseased and unhappy mind.

Mrs. Morse, in plotting her insane mischief, chose a confederate for a brief time in Mrs. H. W. Beecher, another lady of abnormal type, whose peculiarities, having less aggravation, are also less pardonable than Mrs. Morse's. For 11 years Mrs. Beecher and I have not been on speaking terms, nor have I ever had so relentless an enemy. Strange it is, the cause of the hostility was an act of kindness which I performed for one of her children—an act for which her husband has never ceased to speak gratefully, and which he commemorated at the time by sending me a beautiful gift in bronze. She never spoke to me afterward. To the readers of these manuscript pages, which are chiefly for Brooklyn use, she needs no description here.

In the Fall of 1870, Mr. Bowen urged me to support in The Union Mr. E. D. Webster for Congress, a Republican nomination which many of the best citizens of that party had publicly repudiated, against one a meeting at the Academy had made, Judge George G. Reynolds being the chief speaker. I declined to support Mr. Webster, though, as I know nothing against him personally, I made no war on his character. Mr. Bowen repeated his plea in Mr. Webster's behalf, and I repeated my refusal. Mr. Bowen then said there was one way in which The Brooklyn Union could be made to support Mr. Webster, and that was by dismissing its editor. I answered: "Yes; but that is the only way." This was the first instance, in all my relations with Mr. Bowen, covering fifteen years, in which I had ever known him to attempt to bend the integrity of my mind. Mr. Webster was defeated, and he credited his misfortune to me, and maligns me for it to this day.

After this difficulty Mr. Bowen gave me to understand that as he owned two newspapers, he meant to edit at least one of them; accordingly he chose the lion's share, taking The Independent for himself and leaving The Union for me. He said that he could not reasonably hope for more than ten remaining years of active life, and that if he was to win any fame or position to bequeath to his children, he must do it within that time. So, without a murmur, I took off my crown and laid it at his feet, and said, "Live the King!" We then made a treaty, and two contracts were drawn up between us, by which Mr. Bowen was to be editor-in-chief of The Independent, as I had been, and I its leading special contributor, as Mr. Beecher had been in the days of the Star Papers—this arrangement to last two years at $5,000 a year. Furthermore, I was to be also the editor-in-chief of The Union, giving up my lectures, an arrangement to last five years at $5,000, together with ten per cent of the net profits, which promised to be $5,000 more, making, all told, my yearly income $15,000.

When these negotiations were accomplished, I stated them privately to Oliver Johnson, my assistant on The Independent, and sent him my gold watch as a parting tribute to the faithfulness with which he had toiled at my side, and to the love which I cherished for the man. In answer to this token, there came the following fragrant, precious letter from his pen. [Here was inserted Mr. Johnson's letter.]

In addition to the above letter, which is the chief literary memorial I now cherish of long editorship of The Independent, I received from Mr. Bowen a gift of a gold watch, to replace the one I had given away. Then under date of Dec. 22, 1870, The Independent contained the following valdictory and response. [Here followed the articles of that date.]

Two days later, namely, Saturday, Dec. 24, Mr. Johnson mentioned to me that some strange tales concerning me had been planted like seeds in Mr. Bowen's ears, and that Mr. Bowen, without specifying them, was annoyed by them. Later on the same day, Mr. Johnson said that Mr. Bowen had received a report that I was about to abscond to Europe to join Mrs. —, who was already there. On the following Monday, Dec. 26, 1870, in a conversation with Mr. Bowen, Mr. Johnson being present, a budget of Mrs. Morse's ingenious fiction, together with some other gossip, was referred to and discussed, and Mr. Bowen dismissing the subject, said that as I was to be for five years the editor of The Brooklyn Union, he hoped hereafter that I would devote more attention than I had previously done to Plymouth Church.

He instanced my not attending service there any more, and begged me to be a constant witness of all the proceedings, with a view to make them topics of remark. I then informed him that I had not been at the church for months past, and should probably no more be seen inside its walls; whereupon I stated to him in a few words, in Mr. Johnson's presence, my wife's communication concerning Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Bowen's indignation at Mr. Beecher was extreme. He arose from his chair, talked vehemently, gestured angrily, and said that Mr. Beecher must be made to quit the pulpit. He then reiterated all the charges that he had made many times before, and said, in addition, that Mr. Beecher had, in February, 1870, confessed his adulteries to Mr. Bowen, and implored his forgiveness with tears. The interview at which this confession took place I think he said was held at Mr. James Freeland's house. "I forgave him," said Mr. Bowen, "but he still goes on with his crimes and criminal attempts just the same as ever. You ought to proceed against him instantly. Don't let him preach another Sunday. If I were as free to take action as you, I would expel him from his pulpit, and he should never write a word again for The Christian Union." I then said, "Mr. Bowen, why are you not still more free than I am?" "Because," said he, "Mr. Beecher made a confession to me and asked my pardon, which I granted, and I cannot reopen a settled quarrel; but if you will make a charge I will furnish the proof." At a later period of the conversation, and after Mr. Johnson had left, Mr. Bowen rose to a still higher heat, brought me pen and ink, and challenged me to write to Mr. Beecher, demanding that he should retire from the pulpit and The Christian Union. "I will bear a letter to him," said Mr. Bowen, "and will sustain the demand with proofs."

There will be no resistance. Mr. Beecher will not deny, cannot deny, dare not deny them."

Mr. Bowen put his case with such energy, and with such a passionate plea in it, that I would enable him, without his breaking his treaty with Mr. Beecher, to reopen his old warfare upon him, and excited within me such a revived remembrance of the wrongs which Mr. Beecher had done to my own heart that I wrote a draft of a note, which I altered and rewrote and left finally changed as follows:

DECEMBER 26th, 1870, BROOKLYN.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

SIR: I demand that, for reasons which you explicitly understand, you immediately cease from the ministry of Plymouth Church, and that you quit the City of Brooklyn as a residence. (Signed.) THEODORE TILTON.

I put the above letter in Mr. Bowen's hands, to be immediately delivered by him in person to Mr. Beecher, and then I went home. During the afternoon Mr. Moulton called on me, and I mentioned to him the occurrence of the morning, ending with the letter. He called my act foolish, "because," said he, "you ought never to have written a letter at all; but if written, it ought to have had Mr. Bowen's signature to it as well as your own. You have left him a chance to play you a trick. You have made your demand all alone. What if he leaves you to support it all alone?" Mr. Moulton then took a sheet of paper and entered on it the following memorandum: "Brooklyn, Dec. 26, 1870.—T. T. informed me to-day that he had sent a note to Mr. Beecher, of which Mr. H. C. Bowen was the bearer, demanding that he (Mr. Beecher) should retire from the pulpit and quit the City of Brooklyn. The letter was an open one. H. C. Bowen knew the contents of it, and said that he (Bowen) would sustain T. in the demand. 3:45 p. m."

A day or two afterward, prompted by my wife's wish and Mr. Moulton's advice, I resolved that I would send for Mr. Beecher to meet me at a personal interview, either in their presence or with me alone. I dispatched to Mr. Bowen a messenger with a notification of this intention. On the receipt of this intelligence by Mr. Bowen, which I supposed would gratify him, he came into my editorial chamber, and with a look of desperation on his countenance such as I had never seen there before, and with an anger and passion to which I had never dreamed him liable, and with the manner more of an insane than of a rational man, began to threaten me that, if in any interview I might have with Mr. Beecher, either then or at any other time, I should divulge to Mr. Beecher what he (Bowen) had said against him, or should intimate that he (Bowen) had any hand in the letter requiring Mr. Beecher to vacate his pulpit, I would be cashiered from The Independent and The Union, and that the police should be called to cast me into the streets. After some words of indignation which I uttered in reply, Mr. Bowen abruptly retired from the office, leaving me in as great a state of astonishment as I ever experienced.

I informed my wife and Mr. Moulton, and afterward Mr. Johnson, of this incident, concerning which Mr. Moulton remarked that it did not surprise him in the least; and then, by the joint advice of all, I determined to summon Mr. Beecher to the contemplated interview. To this end Mrs. T. wrote a brief note, addressed to Mr. Beecher through me, stating that she had given me the disclosure of July 1, 1870, concerning him, and that her husband would speak to him face to face.

On Friday evening, Dec. 30, I went to Mr. Moulton's house. Mr. Moulton went after Mr. Beecher, and brought him. This was early in the evening, Mr. Beecher leaving his prayer meeting usual on that evening to go without his leadership. My interview was with Mr. Beecher alone. I read to him my wife's letter, and said to him what I shall not here repeat. He sat like a statue under my brief remarks, and at the close bowed to me and said, "This is all a dream." He affected to disbelieve that Mrs. Tilton had written the letter, and denied everything with a royal negative. I then said, "It is but a few squares to my house; go and ask Mrs. Tilton for yourself whether or not she wrote the letter;" he went and returned in half an hour. I did not see him. Mr. Moulton asked him what had taken place at Mrs. Tilton's! He remarked that he had seen that lady; but he did nothing more, and left. This was about 11 o'clock at night.

Shortly after he left I left. On reaching home I found that Mrs. Tilton, who was then seriously ill and in bed, was agitated and distressed. She said that Mr. B. had been there, telling her that she had pursued and slain him; that he would be tried by a counsel of ministers and his career ended, and that he was a dead man unless she would save him from his fate. She said, moreover, that, after talking to her in this strain, and exhibiting great and terrible feeling, Mr. Beecher went to her writing desk, and taking out pen and paper, brought them to her bedside, and putting them into her nervous hands, dictated to her what she copied—a paper of which she could not recall the phraseology nor to a certainty the substance and meaning. Shortly after narrating to me the above occurrence she resumed her pen and ink and wrote the following statement: [Here follows Mrs. Tilton's letter to her husband, of midnight, Dec. 30, 1870.]

The next morning, in response to a note from me, Mr. Moulton came to my house, and, after an interview with my wife, received from her, in writing, a request to procure the return of the paper which, in her agitation, she had given to Mr. Beecher the night before—a paper all the more important, for, as it is seen, she was uncertain of its real design. That evening, which was Saturday, brought to me a new surprise, closing a week of sensations with one which fittingly capped the climax, namely, a notification from Mr. Bowen that my engagements with The Independent and with The Union would then and there terminate, and that he was ready to settle with me in full of all demands. In these words Mr. Bowen broke those two contracts which he had just made with me, and which were also then a week old, and to each of which was attached a provision that it could be terminated by death, or by six months' notice, or immediately on paying a forfeit of $2,500; but in no other way. Mr. Bowen thus suddenly laid himself liable to pay $5,000 for breaking his two contracts, together, of course, with 10 per cent. of The Union's profits due to me up to date, from May 1 to December 31, 1870—eight months.

I received this notification late in the evening of the last day of the year, after which I first informed my wife of it, and, bidding her not to be troubled, she sought Mr. Moulton's house; I invited him out of doors and placed with him the wintry streets, till the chimneys of St. Ann's rung out the old and rung in the new year. The next day I fashioned a New-Year's gift for Mr. Bowen in the shape of the following letter:

[Here follows the letter of Jan. 1, 1871.]

After writing the above letter, I gave it to Mr. Moulton to be by him delivered to Mr. Bowen; and, as I wished speedily to settle my affairs with my late employers, I asked Mr. Moulton to be one of the three arbitrators for the purpose. Mr. Moulton desired me to commit the whole case to his hands, lest in the hands of myself I should be tempted to do injury to Mr. Beecher. I consented to write the following:

BROOKLYN, Jan. 27.

HENRY C. BOWEN—Sir: I hereby authorize Mr. F. D. Moulton to act in my behalf in full settlement with you of all my accounts accruing out of my contracts for services to The Independent and The Brooklyn Daily Union.

THEODORE TILTON.

On the night of Jan. 1, 1871, Mr. Moulton called upon Mr. Beecher, and after a protracted interview returned and immediately gave me an account of the interview, which I took down from his lips in phonographic notes; these notes, after a lapse of two years, I now reopen for the first time, and digest therefrom the following report:

"I called at Mr. Beecher's. He was not at home. I left my card. Presently his son came running after me, saying his mother knew where his father was, and that he would go for him. I went back to the house, and Mr. Beecher came in; he invited me up stairs. I told him he would probably consider it the strangest interview he ever had with mortal man. Said I: 'Mr. Beecher, I wish to tell you first how minutely I recollect your conversation of last evening. I came to you as a friend, meaning to do you as good service as ever any friend did to another. On our way to my house I asked you if any one had seen the letter besides yourself, the letter of Theodore Tilton demanding your retirement from the pulpit; you said none, save one, besides myself. I asked if that one was Henry C. Bowen. You made no reply. You recollect it, do you not?' He said, 'I do.' 'I do not press any answer from you now; so far as you do not answer me you do not respond to the friendship which I profess for you.'"

Mrs. Davis, in The Springfield Republican, Dec. 9, 1872:

A WITNESS WHO REPUDIATES.

"Mrs. Paulina Wright Davis of Providence was given as a chief witness in Mrs. Woodhull's scandalous Beecher-Tilton libel. But in a note just received from her in Europe, Mrs. Davis thus utterly repudiates, in gross and in detail, the statements concerning her relation to the case, and gives the most damaging direct blow to the whole libel that has yet been rendered." [This appears to be quoted.] "In relation to the Tilton versus Beecher affair, I have only this to say: I was never on any terms of intimacy with the families of either party; I never visited at Mrs. Tilton's but once in my life, and that was ten years ago, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Johnson. A year or two ago I called at Mr. Tilton's house for some books which I had lent to Mr. T. I then saw Mrs. Tilton for 10 or 15 minutes. I have met Mrs. Tilton two or three times at the house of mutual friends; but at no time has there been the slightest approach to a confidential conversation between us, nor have I insinuated that there had been. If Mrs. T. has ever in my presence spoken of Mr. Beecher, it has been in terms of respect, as a man of honor and her pastor. I did believe that Mrs. Woodhull was going to do a great work for woman; I am grieved that she has failed in what she gave promise of doing."

"I have not seen the original manuscript of Mrs. Davis's letter, as above printed, nor do I know to whom it was addressed; but a similar letter was sent by her from Paris to Oliver Johnson, which I have seen and here transcribe as follows."

Mrs. Stanton, in a letter to a friend in New-York, dated Boston, Nov. 5, 1872 (a few days after the Woodhull publication appeared) says:

[MRS. STANTON'S STATEMENT.]

"I have had a grand time visiting friends here, but my pleasure has been fearfully marred by this Woodhull paper. I thought it dead. 'False in one point, false in all.' is a good old Latin motto. The filthy language she puts into my mouth is utterly false. I never spoke to that woman but once on the subject, about five minutes, fortunately in the presence of one witness, a gentleman, and simply replied in general terms to a question that I had heard the rumor. Say this to T. T., and tell him I shall stand by him in the hour of need. With kind regards, ever yours, MRS. H. B. STANTON."

[Note.—I possess the original of the above letter.—T. T.] In addition to the testimony of Mrs. Davis and Mrs.

Stanton, above given, my wife's own solemn and truthful declaration is as follows:

[MRS. TILTON'S STATEMENT.]

The statement that Mrs. Davis was ever intimate with me, or a frequent guest at my house, is a fabrication. Many years ago, nearly a dozen, when we lived in Oxford-st., she once spent a part of a day with me, in company with Mary Ann Johnson. Two or three years ago she called for a few minutes with Mrs. Stanton at our house in Livingston-st. With these two exceptions, certainly ten years apart, Mrs. Davis has never been under our roof. I know her very slightly indeed. I never had a confidential talk with her on any subject, and never told to Mrs. Davis or to any other person the preposterous and wicked slander put upon me in Mrs. Woodhull's libel.

ELIZABETH R. TILTON.

My family and others by flinging these stories broadcast to all the world as she has since done. . . . To complete the chain of documents belonging to this case, I now insert the two of chief importance, namely the direct testimony of Mrs. Tilton and of Mr. Beecher as to the alleged criminality of their relations.

[MRS. TILTON'S STATEMENT.]

MR. MOULTON—My Dear Friend: For my husband's sake, and my children's, I hereby testify with all my woman's soul that I am innocent of the crime of impure conduct alleged against me.

I have been to my husband a true wife. In his love I wish to live and die. My early affection for him still burns with its maiden flame; all the more for what he has borne for my sake, both private and public wrongs. His plan to keep back scandals long ago threatened against me I never approved, and the result shows it unavailing. But few would have risked so much as he has sacrificed for others, ever since the conspiracy began against him two years ago.

Having had power to strike others, he has forbore to do it, and allowed himself to be injured instead. No wound to me is so great as the impression that he is among my accusers. I bless him every day for his faith in me, which swerves not, and for standing my champion against all adversaries.

ELIZABETH R. TILTON.

[MR. BEECHER'S STATEMENT.]

MY DEAR MR. MOULTON: I promptly comply with your suggestion of giving an explicit denial of the stories which connected my name criminally with Mrs. Tilton's. The very thought of being obliged to say anything to clear her fair fame shocks me. And I have hitherto acted under advice in refraining. Very truly,

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

BROOKLYN, Dec. 29.

I solemnly deny the scandalous charges made against me and Mrs. Eliz. R. Tilton. Especially and emphatically I deny that there has been any criminal intercourse or any color or reason for such a charge.

My acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton has inspired me with the highest esteem for her modesty, propriety, and womanly grace.

I authorize her or her husband and children to use this declaration.

I desire to state in addition that Mr. Tilton, during the whole of this shameful scandal, has uniformly spoken in the highest terms of his wife, and has shown to me the strongest proofs of friendship.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. REDPATH.

Mr. Fullerton—When did that conversation take place between yourself and Mr. Tilton, a part of which you have related upon your direct examination?

A. I spoke of two conversations; which one, Sir?

Q. The first, please. A. The one in which I first read the statement—the True Statement?

Q. I refer to the first conversation with Mr. Tilton that you have related on your direct examination. A. I think it was early in January.

Q. Of 1873 or 1874? A. 1873, Sir.

Q. 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it took place at Mr. Tilton's house, did it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect whether any one else was in the house at the time? A. Moses Coit Tyler was there.

Q. Was he in the room where the conversation occurred? A. No, Sir, I think not; I think I spoke to Theodore in the evening about it.

Q. What evening, please? A. In the evening of that day; it was a Sunday.

Mr. Tracy—We cannot hear you, Mr. Redpath.

Mr. Evarts—These gentlemen complain, Mr. Redpath, that they cannot hear.

Mr. Fullerton—The reason is because there are other people making more noise than Mr. Redpath does.

Mr. Evarts—That may be.

Mr. Fullerton—Which they should not do. [To the Witness.] You say you spoke to him the evening before about it? A. On the evening of that day, of that Sunday, the first visit that I had made to Theodore since the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's story.

Q. It was on a Sunday? A. On a Sunday.

Q. And you spoke to him the evening before; Saturday evening, do you mean? A. No, Sir; on that same evening.

Q. Then it was the evening after the conversation up in his room, wasn't it? A. No, Sir; the conversation up in his room that I have described occurred perhaps five or six weeks, or three or four weeks, at least, after I had read the story.

Q. Well, what I want to get at, Mr. Redpath, is the first conversation that you had with Mr. Tilton, which you have described in your direct examination.

Mr. Beach—That I understand was in January, 1873; that was the first conversation? A. Yes, Sir; the first conversation was only a few words, you know; the other one, the long one, was much later on.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I come to January, 1873, when you entered his room and found him lying upon the bed? A. Well, I don't think that was in January; that probably was in the first week of February, somewhere about that time; it was later on after I had been—

Q. Well, is that the first conversation that you spoke of in your direct examination? A. No, Sir, it is not.

Q. Well, that is the point I am inquiring about—the first conversation you spoke of in your direct examination?

Mr. Beach—That was the fore part of January or the latter part of December.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I want you should say so—when he says that, I ask him the question if that is the first one he spoke of in the direct examination, and he tells me no. Now, let Mr. Redpath and me get along with this.

The Witness—The first conversation I spoke of was in reply to Mr. Shearman's question about when I first read it; I think I first read that story on my first visit to Theodore's house after the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's story; that, I think, was early in January, or it possibly might have been in December: I could find that out from the business records. The last conversation in which I described him being sick on the bed, occurred several weeks afterward; that is what I mean.

Q. Well, now as to the first conversation; what took place on that first conversation? A. What do you mean by that, Sir?

Q. What was said by either of you? A. I went there and found Moses Coit Tyler there. Theodore was lying on the sofa looking very weary. He welcomed me very cordially.

Q. A little louder, please. A. Theodore was lying on the sofa looking very weary. He welcomed me very cordially. I was very wet and changed my clothing, I think and stayed there all night. My impression is that Mr. Tyler went away about 5 or 6 o'clock, or at least he did not stay. I have no recollection of his staying, and then, in the course of the evening, Theodore and I talked about the scandal. Well, all that I remember about it is that he would tell me—he would let me see the "True Story" about it. I think that was the time.

Q. Well, did he tell you what the "True Story" was? A. He did not say anything about it, Sir; the first that I knew about it, I don't think that Theodore ever spoke to me of it at all—that is to say, all our conversations were carried on from the knowledge that I had read his statement.

Q. His statement had then been published? A. No, Sir, his "True Story"—the manuscript of the "True Story."

Q. Did you read it that night? A. I think it was that night, Sir; that is the best of my recollection, but I stayed—I was very frequently at their house during the five or six weeks that I stayed in New-York at that time, and it possibly may have been at some other time, other than five or six weeks, although my recollection is that it was that first night.

Q. Well, now, when you read the "True Story" didn't Mr. Tilton at that time allege to you that it did not contain all the truth? A. No, Sir; Theodore said nothing about it at all—not at that time; it was afterward—it was afterward.

Q. Well, have you related all that you remember at that first interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between yourself and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, because—yes, I have.

Q. Now, the second was when you found him upon the bed? A. Yes, Sir, that is the second conversation.

Q. And, as near as you can tell, when was that? A. Well, I think it was—the only way that I have of recollecting is from my business relations; I was in New-York preparing for Mr. Bellew, the reader, to come out, and I was at—I was frequently over to Mr. Tilton's during the whole of that time.

Q. Well, was it some weeks after? A. Yes, Sir; that is my impression.

Q. Have you stated all that took place on that occasion as near as you can remember it? A. In the bedroom?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Yes, Sir, as near as I can remember it.

Q. When you asked Mr. Tilton if he had told you the whole truth, and he said "No," didn't he say something else?

Mr. Evarts—He has not said he did not tell him the whole truth. You asked him if he asked me that, and he said it was afterward.

Q. Well, what did you say upon that subject, Mr. Redpath—what did you say to Mr. Tilton in regard to his having told you the whole truth? A. I said, standing, looking at his face (that being the first time that I had any idea that he had any other theory of the "True Story"), I said: "Theodore, you haven't told me the whole truth!" I said it as a question.

Q. Yes? A. He dropped his eyes, and said in a low tone, "No."

Q. Did he tell you at that time what the whole truth was? A. He said no more; I did not ask any more.

Q. Was there no other conversation upon that subject? A. No, Sir; not at that time; not that I recollect.

DISCOVERY OF THE COPY OF THE "TRUE STORY."

Q. Now, you then were acquainted with the "True Story," were you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And knew what the change in the "True Story" was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For that reason was it that you asked him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whether he had told you the whole truth? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you understand at that time the change in the "True Story" was? A. Improper proposals.

Q. Now, was there no other conversation before you took him down stairs? A. That morning?

Q. Yes. A. Not that I recollect, Sir; of course there must have been more conversation than that, because at least half an hour must have elapsed from the time that he gave me that answer to the time we went down stairs; in the first time I must have sat stroking his hair for at least ten minutes; he was feverish and I was trying to magnetize him.

Q. Did he say to you that he had not slept for some time? A. I don't remember, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. Just tax your recollection, please, Mr. Redpath; say whether he did not say to you that he had not slept for many nights. A. I can't recall it, Sir.

Q. Didn't he tell you why he was in that feverish and excited state? A. No, Sir; I did not ask him.

Q. Well, whether you asked him or not, didn't he explain the reason that he was in such a mental and physical condition? A. I have no recollection of it, Sir; he may have done so; he may have done so, I say; I have no recollection at all about it.

Q. Did he give any reason for having prepared the "True Story"? A. At that time?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he say anything further in regard to what his wife had said about denying it if he published that statement? A. He said nothing further than what I have already repeated.

Q. But he did say that it ought to be published, did he not? A. Yes, Sir; he said that.

Q. But he gave no reason for saying why it should be published? A. He gave no reason at that interview, Sir; none at all.

Q. Did he at the second interview give any reason for desiring the publication of the "True Story"? A. Excuse me; I have been talking about the second interview now.

Q. Well, at that interview did he give any reason for it, for preparing the "True Statement"? A. No, Sir; the "True Story" itself contained the reason why he prepared it, and I don't think that I—I certainly had between—with Frank and Theodore I must have had 30 or 40 conversations that Winter, but I don't recollect that Theodore ever gave any reason, or that I ever thought of asking any. I thought the reason was perfectly satisfactory.

Q. Well, wasn't it elaborated in some of your conversations? A. I don't remember, Sir; I don't—it is possible—I don't.

Q. What did you do with your copy after you took it? A. I had it—I had a large number of papers; at the time I went to Philadelphia and Baltimore, I left them in New-York. On coming back I went to England, and sent it, with the other papers relating to Bellevue's accounts, to Boston. On my return I put it among other papers and forgot all about it; in fact, I never thought of it for—forgot all about it until it accidentally came up one time in that conversation with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, when was that? A. At Peekskill.

Q. When? A. It was in the Summer of last year.

Q. 1874? A. I think that was the first time; possibly it may not have been until I saw Mr. Beecher later on, at the White Mountains; at any rate, it was not at one of those times. In fact, it had passed out of my mind altogether.

Q. Mr. Redpath, is that letter in your handwriting. [Paper handed to Witness.] A. Yes, Sir; it is my handwriting. Shall I read it?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Oh! let him read it.

Mr. Fullerton—For your own information, of course.

The Witness—I don't—

Mr. Beach—Oh! read it.

The Witness—I don't desire to—

Mr. Fullerton—I have no objection at all; I thought you meant to read it out loud, and I did not mean that you should do that.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Can you tell when you wrote it. A. I wrote it after—I wrote it immediately after my return to Boston, after my visit to Peekskill.

Q. Please look at the date on the printed slip and see if it will refresh your recollection as to the month. A. That was about the time, Sir; July—in July, the middle of July.

Q. About the middle of July? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of 1874? A. Last year.

Q. Yes; where had you seen Mr. Beecher next before writing that letter? A. In his own house.

Q. Where, please? A. In Brooklyn.

Q. In Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I thought you mentioned Peekskill just now? A. Well, but you asked me where last before; I had seen him last before in Brooklyn, and on the day before that at Peekskill.

Q. Oh, yes; you saw him on two occasions, then, two consecutive days? A. Yes, two consecutive days.

Q. In the month of July, 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And about the middle of July? A. I think it was about the middle; but that is easily—

Q. Was it before Mr. Beecher made his statement before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I believe you are under subpoena, are you not, for next Monday, Mr. Redpath? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER THE NEXT WITNESS.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I won't ask you anything further.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Redpath.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Fullerton]—Will you allow me to see that? [i. e., the letter shown to Witness on cross-examination].

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you will excuse me, please, Mr. Evarts; it is not in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, I suppose it will be in evidence and I will see it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will not now.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is all, Mr. Redpath. Next witness.

Mr. Evarts—We propose to put the defendant now, if your Honor please, upon the stand. Perhaps it is as well it should be done to-morrow morning, as it is so near the hour of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—As you wish; whichever you should prefer.

Mr. Evarts—We should prefer in the morning, unless there should some accident intervene.

The Court thereupon adjourned to 11 o'clock on Thursday morning.

FIFTY-SIXTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. BEECHER'S TESTIMONY BEGUN.

MR. REDPATH AGAIN CALLED—HIS TESTIMONY FOR THE PLAINTIFF—MR. PORTER AGAIN DENOUNCES MR. MOULTON—MR. BEECHER TAKES THE OATH IN THE NEW-ENGLAND FORM, "I SWEAR BY THE EVER LIVING GOD"—NARRATIVE OF HIS EARLY LIFE AND STRUGGLES DOWN TO 1870, AND THE BEGINNING OF THE PRESENT TROUBLES—HIS LETTER OF ADVICE TO MRS. TILTON TO LEAVE HER HUSBAND.

THURSDAY, April 1, 1875.

The plaintiff's counsel called Mr. Redpath. Mr. Fullerton had abruptly dismissed him on Wednesday afternoon after calling his attention to a letter which they had refused to read or to show to the opposing counsel when requested. Mr. Redpath detailed two conversations with Mr. Beecher subsequent to the appointment of the Committee of Investigation in 1874, and relative to a message which Mr. Redpath was authorized by Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton to carry to Mr. Beecher, to the effect that they were to hurl against him before that Committee the charge of adultery. Mr. Beecher answered in differently, that the matter was out of his hands, and he should await the verdict of his church's Committee, resolved if it were adverse to him to resign his pastorate. In the course of this conversation Mr. Beecher said that he did not deny that he had given Mr. Tilton cause of offense; "but," he added, "his woes are such as money can assuage." The testimony finally led up to the point at which Mr. Fullerton was aiming; he asked in a very deliberate tone, "Now, Mr. Redpath, I ask you this question: whether at the interview at Peekskill of which you have spoken, or at the interview at Brooklyn of which you have also spoken, Mr. Beecher denied the commission of adultery?" Mr. Evarts was instantly on his feet with an objection which he stated at some length, but before the Judge could decide, John K. Porter rose slowly in his place at Mr. Tilton's side, and energetically began to address the Judge, growing more emphatic as he proceeded. The Judge overruled the objection; the stenographer had repeated the question, and Mr. Redpath answered, "No, Sir; I did not ask him, for I did not believe it."

The plaintiff's counsel immediately moved, but in vain—to strike out the answer. In a few minutes Mr. Redpath left the court-room.

Mr. Evarts, turning to Mr. Beecher, said :

"Mr. Beecher, will you be sworn?"

The officer presented the Bible for him to be sworn, but he motioned it aside, and, turning full upon the Clerk, lifted up his right hand. The Clerk, supposing he desired to affirm, had begun to administer that form of oath, when Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Beach objected, unless Mr. Beecher should declare that he had conscientious scruples against swearing upon the Scriptures. A brief discussion between the Judge and Mr. Beach was brought to an end by Mr. Beecher himself, who declared that he had such conscientious scruples. The clerk then began again : "You solemnly affirm and declare"—when Mr. Beecher dropped his arm, and Mr. Evarts at the same moment explained that Mr. Beecher took the oath in the New-England form. Again the Clerk began, this time in slower and more impressive tones

"You solemnly swear by the ever-living God that the evidence you shall give in this issue joined between Theodore Tilton, plaintiff, and Henry Ward Beecher, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Mr. Beecher, with most reverential bow, his eyes cast down, answered, "I do."

Mr. Beecher's manner was entirely uncontrained. He sat most of the time with the two middle fingers of his right hand thrust in his vest. At noon, when the striking of the City Hall clock interrupted the proceedings, he took out his watch, as if to see how accurately it kept time. Once when he had occasion to look for a memorandum book, the officer behind him offered to relieve him of his cloak, and he surrendered it with, "Thank you." He was perfectly at ease. Once when referring to his literary labors he called himself "a very voluminous author," he half smiled, half blushed at what he evidently thought might be regarded as an egotistical expression. And a moment later his eyes twinkled and brightened just the least, and his old half smile came back, when he had to say that during a certain period he had made many political speeches, and "preached not a few political sermons." This irrepressible humor bubbled to the surface still later, when he was asked if he had not written many letters—was not, in fact, a great correspondent. He smiled as he hesitated a second or two before answering: "I should say not, if I should judge from my impression; but if they should begin to hunt over my letters I presume it would be found that I had." This was the first allusion to his troublesome habit of writing long letters. Still later this humor found more extravagant expression. He had been asked if his first public discussion with Mr. Tilton had not been marked by considerable antagonism and asperity in the expression of their views. He answered, as if appreciating the joke: "Nothing that transcended what I see here in court." Even Mr. Beach unbent at this, and smiled with the Beecher party.

When asked about his early intimacy and companionship with Mr. Tilton, he answered, with great feeling, "It was common employments, companionship, and downright loving on my part;" and as he spoke these last words he glanced for the first time at Mr. Tilton. Still later in the morning, he evinced more feeling when questioned in regard to the occasion of the service rendered to his son in the army by Mr. Tilton. He said: "He was doing me little kindnesses that were very agreeable; but there was one that stood out beyond all others and was very specially valuable to me." After the word "very" there was a long pause; the words stuck in the witness's throat, and it was only with a great effort that he concealed the strong emotion which he felt. And on another occasion he was a long time in getting control of his voice so as to answer clearly the question as to the number of his children in the words:

"Four with me and five waiting for me."

The testimony of Mr. Beecher yesterday may be called preliminary. It was an outline narrative, an abridged history, of his early life and struggles, his subsequent religious and political services, his domestic relations, and his intimacy with Mr. Bowen, Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Moulton. It led from his birth down to the eventful period of December, 1870, when, according to the theory of the defense, the conspiracy began.

The growth of Plymouth Church from embryo to its present magnitude, with between 2,500 and 3,000 communicants; the building up of The Independent and The Christian Union (the latter from a circulation of 600 to 80,000 in a single year); the rapid production of thirty-five volumes—all these labors were merely mentioned as ordinary events. The great help which his wife had given him during all the years of their married life was, however, more fully dwelt on and emphasized.

A few minutes were occupied with the defendant's account of his early friendship with Mr. Tilton. Mr. Beecher's manner in giving the history of their former intimacy was entirely devoid of the humor with which he had answered the unimportant questions of the morning, and his voice hesitated at times as though he were deeply moved. He also told of his first acquaintance with Francis D. Moulton, and this part of his narrative seemed to arouse once more his sense of humor, and he laughed outright as he described him as "a worshiper of James Russell Lowell and Shakespeare's sonnets." Mr. Beecher's first acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton was then explained. He had known of her when she was a girl, but had no personal acquaintance with her until she was to be married to Mr. Tilton. Then he called upon her at her husband's request. This stage of the inquiry elicited from Mr. Beecher an explanation of the circumstances under which some of his presents were made to Mrs. Tilton. The first of these was a Brazilian topaz brooch, which he had brought to her from Europe in 1860, where he had also purchased little presents for as many as thirty other friends. He also explained how he came to give her the picture of the trailing arbutus. The questions in regard to this period of Mr. Beecher's acquaintance occupied only a short time, and the narrator passed rapidly to the year 1870.

Mr. Beecher narrated the circumstances which led him in December, 1870, to write to Mrs. Tilton the note advising her to separate from her husband, which the defense affirm was one of the grounds of the letter of contrition. As much of the note as contained Mr. Beecher's advice was put in evidence, but the latter part of it, which contained Mr. Beecher's reasons for his advice was not read. Mr. Evarts made a strong effort to have the conversations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton regarding Mr. Tilton's treatment of her admitted in the defendant's testimony. Mr. Beach objected strenuously, and arguments of considerable length followed on each side. About three-quarters of an hour were occupied with the discussion of this point, but after Judge Neilson had given his decision ruling out the conversations, Mr. Beach withdrew his objection, and they were admitted. Mr. Beecher was discussing this topic at the adjournment.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

FURTHER CROSS-EXAMINATION OF JAMES REDPATH.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I desire to examine Mr. Redpath somewhat further this morning.

Judge Neilson—Yes; is he present?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Call him.

James Redpath was then recalled and cross-examined, as follows:

By Mr. Fullerton—I show you the letter which you had in your hand yesterday afternoon, and I ask you whether you had an interview with Mr. Beecher just prior to the writing of that letter? A. On the evening before.

Q. A little louder, please. A. On the evening before.

Q. And can you fix the date of that conversation? A. I can do it in this way: I called at Mr. Tilton's on Sunday; on the day following that Elizabeth left him. On the next day I was at Peekskill; Monday or Tuesday afternoon I had another interview with Mr. Beecher at his house; on the same evening I returned to Boston, and then I wrote that letter on the following morning; it was on a Sunday morning.

Q. Which was—

Mr. Evarts—Do you mean his house in Brooklyn?

The Witness—In Brooklyn.

Q. Now, the date of the letter that you wrote from Boston? A. It has no date at all.

Q. By referring to the printed portion, can you tell the date or approximate to it? A. Well, I approximate to it in that way. You know the date at which Elizabeth left Theodore, which was in Summer, in July.

Q. It was soon after the 11th of July, 1874, then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I call your attention, in the first place, to the interview with Mr. Beecher at Peekskill; do I understand you to say it was on Monday? A. Well, in order to explain that I suppose I ought to tell my interview with Theodore Tilton and with Frank Moulton on Sunday.

Q. That would not be admissible, I suppose, Mr. Redpath, so you will have to confine yourself to the interview.

Mr. Beach—And state what he said to Mr. Beecher in regard—

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly if you detailed that interview or any part of it you can state it. A. I went to Peekskill on Monday forenoon, charged both by Theodore Tilton and Frank Moulton—

Mr. Evarts—No matter about that; you went there! A. Yes, Sir, I went there; I had an interview with Mr. Beecher in his study at Peekskill. He was seated at his table; I went forward and asked him if he was prepared to talk business; I went on business. He said, "Try me." Just at that time he was called out of the room by some one. As he went out I turned around in my chair, and, without intending to do so, saw a telegram, which I read at one glance, that determined me to deliver a message that Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton had each given for me—given to me. The telegram said—

Mr. Evarts—No matter about the telegram.

The Witness—I said: “Mr. Beecher, would you like to know what that business is?”—the telegram referred to business—and was from a lawyer; he said, “yes.” I then told him that I had spent Sunday with Theodore, Elizabeth and Frank; that I saw Theodore at his house in the morning, Elizabeth about noon, and Frank and Theodore together at Mr. Tilton’s in the evening. Now, can I describe the conversation?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, state what occurred between you and Mr. Beecher, if you remember it? A. I said that in the morning I went to see Theodore and found him alone in the back room, lying on the lounge, and I went forward and struck him and said: “Hollo, Theodore;” he didn’t notice that I had entered; I suppose I told all this to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is only what you told Mr. Beecher that you are permitted to tell here.

The Witness—Yes, well—

Mr. Fullerton—It is all that I ask,

The Witness—I suppose that I—

Mr. Evarts—If you have no knowledge whether you said it or not, why, we would not like you to give it.

The Witness—I do not remember how much of the occurrences of that day I detailed to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—It is only what you do so remember that you can state.

The Witness—Well, I said, after describing the interview, I think: “Theodore says he is going to charge you with adultery with Elizabeth, extending over two or three years.”

Mr. Beach—Speak a little louder. A. I said: “Theodore says he is going to charge you with adultery with Elizabeth, extending over two or three years.” Then I think I described the scene—

Mr. Beach—Well, give the description that you gave? A. Well, I am a little embarrassed; I don’t remember how much of that conversation I related to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, tell us according to your best recollection what you related to Mr. Beecher? A. I told him that Theodore—I think I told him that Theodore asked me—Oh! that—after I saluted him in that way he sprang up and greeted me very cordially and said: “James, I am glad to see you; tell me how to fight this battle.”

Mr. Fullerton—Who said this? A. Theodore.

MR. TILTON SENDS A CHALLENGE TO MR. BEECHER.

Mr. Evarts—And you said it to Mr. Beecher, I suppose? A. I think I did, Sir; I think I did; I don’t—and that after some further conversation (because I am not sure that I related that to Mr. Beecher) he said: “Do you know how bad this case is?” I said: “No; I know what you have always told me.” “Well,” he said, “it is adultery going over two or three years.” I think I then told him that I saw Elizabeth at Mr. Ovington’s in the forenoon; that in the afternoon Frank Moulton came to Theodore’s, and then I am pretty sure that I described the scene there.

Mr. Evarts—Well, unless you did, unless you remember that you told—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he says he is pretty sure he did.

The Witness—I am not going to swear to what I don’t positively remember; I think I did.

Q. Well, Sir, then go on and describe it. A. Theodore was lying on the lounge, Frank was sitting near the fireplace, and I was sitting at the end of the lounge. Theodore said, “Redpath is going up to Mr. Beecher’s to see Mr. Beecher to-morrow.” Frank said, “Is he? What are you going up about?” to me. I said that I was going to try to get Mr. Beecher to arrange dates for lecturing. Theodore said, “Tell him that I am going to charge adultery.” Frank said, “No, don’t, Redpath.” I said, “I am not a fool, Frank; that would be a pretty way of introducing a business conversation; I have no intention of telling him that.” Theodore said, “Yes, you had better tell him.” At this time Frank had risen and was walking uneasily about the room, and suddenly he stopped before me—before us, and said, “Theodore was mad at me yesterday for saying that I loved Mr. Beecher more than”—then he stopped, “as much as I love you. I don’t care a damn, but much as I love both of them, Redpath, I would smite either of them to the earth,” or, “to the ground, if either one of them attempted to crucify the other. Tell Mr. Beecher that.” “No, I won’t;” I said, “you seem”—Yes, “you better, you better tell him.” He said, “Take that message from me.” I said, “Frank, you seem to forget that although Mr. Beecher—

Mr. Evarts—All this you told Mr. Beecher?—all this you told Mr. Beecher we understand; otherwise it has no place in your evidence.

The Witness—I beg your pardon; I am not sure that I told him.

Mr. Evarts—Well, how far back in this narrative? A. I think I did, Sir; but I am not sure about it.

Mr. Fullerton—Is it the best of your recollection that you told Mr. Beecher these messages? A. Yes, Sir; it is the best of my recollection.

Q. Very well, then, we will take it. A. Then Frank said—I said “You seem to forget that I have never spoken to Mr. Beecher on this subject, and I certainly should not introduce it.” He said, “You will find him ready enough to talk.” That is all I remember of now. Then they went to prepare that note, Frank Moulton’s first statement.

MR. BEECHER TALKS OF HIS TROUBLES.

Q. Now, tell us if that is all; what Mr. Beecher replied, if anything, to this communication of yours? A. When I was talking, as near as I remember, at this time, Mr. Beecher and I were sitting very close together—as near as I am to this gentleman, and he was fixing his mind upon me; I said, “I am nervous, and tired, and pained,” and I said, “Don’t fix your mind upon me, Mr. Beecher, I cannot think;” he said, “Try and think,” and he rested his hand upon the table; he began, after I had got through, “Well, I suppose you know all that Theodore has had to say on this subject;” I said, “Yes, Sir, I have known it for two or three years; I read the ‘True Story;’” he said—I think as I remember, or later in the conversation—I think upon this occasion, “Yes, he is probably very glad Elizabeth tore it up;” I said, “I have got a copy of that, I think, somewhere;” it had occurred to me that I had; I had forgotten all about it until that remark; I don’t remember the intermediate conversation; I think I said something then, but I cannot recall it; he went on: “I don’t deny that I have given Theodore cause of offense,” or “just cause”—I don’t remember the words; I had told him—oh! I had told him that Frank wanted him to do something—it was something about a card—I have forgotten exactly—but he said, “I shall be a party to no—but the matter is out of my hands now; I have put it in the hands of a committee composed of men—” I cannot recall his language, but the substance was this, that he had put it in the hands of men of high character who could not afford, by their social position, to be influenced at all to bring in any verdict other than in accordance with the facts; that he had left them absolutely free—had given no instructions whatever. Then he described one or two of the men; I didn’t know the men, and therefore the descriptions have left no impression upon my mind. He said: “If, in accordance with the facts and truth and honor, they find a verdict of acquittal, I shall go on. If there is the slightest or least censure, I shall resign my pastorate in 24 hours; but I shall be a party to no further compact—to no further compact that depends on the truthfulness, honor, good faith, or magnanimity of Theodore Tilton; he is a scoundrel.” He said—the language of the following I cannot recall—but this was the substance, that in this affair there had been a dozen crises; that whenever there was the least show—the least indication that the scandal would cease, Theodore was sure to do something to revive it. He gave one or two instances, but I only remember the “letter to the Complaining Friend.” Then he said, “But Frank, I think, is my friend;” it was pronounced as if an interrogation. I said, “Yes, Sir; I have no doubt of that.” “No,” he said, “I should have to revise, or reverse my theories of human nature if Frank Moulton should prove false,” or “prove a traitor”—“prove false,” I think was the word. Then he went on—he talked very rapidly—with a great deal of emotion, with tears in his eyes part of the time, and said that he had all his life tried to do good to his kind; that he loved his kind, and that he had certainly never put himself above any man that his only ambition had been in life, that perhaps after he was dead he might leave something that would be—I don’t remember the words; the idea was a consolation to those in sorrow; that for four years—

Mr. Fullerton—A little louder, if you please.

The Witness—That for four years the windows of his soul, or heart, had been closed; the shutters closed, the blinds drawn up. Oh! that part occurred—I am mistaken there; that part occurred not at that time.

Mr. Evarts—Then we will strike that out. It is not to be given here.

TOKENS OF SYMPATHY RECEIVED BY MR. BEECHER.

The Witness—Yes, he said about that time that he had been—that in this furnace he had gone through, or affliction—I don’t remember the words—that he had been very much touched by receiving so many proofs of the good will of his countrymen.

Mr. Fullerton—A little louder, please.

The Witness—That he had received hundreds of letters from all parts of the country, and from people in all conditions of life, expressing their sympathy for him in his trials, and that only two or three of them were of an insulting character; he said what made it more touching to him was that so many of them, or the majority of them—I don’t remember which—were written as if the writers believed there was some truth in the stories against him; that he was particularly touched (he pointed to a bag, I think, or a large number of letters), but he said there was one he had received from a clergyman in New-York—an Episcopal clergyman. I think—that was particularly grateful to him; he looked for it, and went out of the room and brought it back, and read it to me, or that part of it. Well, we went on talking until dinner. Oh, I remember an incident.

Mr. Fullerton—Please a little louder; don’t drop your voice, or the jury will not hear you.

MR. BEECHER’S ESTIMATE OF MR. TILTON’S WOES.

The Witness—During this conversation three of his little grandchildren came to the window and cried, “Grandpa!” and he rose and went to a closet and got three oranges, and said some pleasant words—I remember the immense control of his face—and threw them out to them, and they went away; we went to dinner; he retired before the dessert; after a while, staying in the middle room, I went in, and he was lying on the bed, and his aspect had entirely changed; he looked up with laughing eyes; I said, “What are you reading, Mr. Beecher?” and he said, “Oh, I am reading one of Dumas’s novels; whenever I get bothered or worried, and tired, I go to one of these and forget myself;” that is all I recall of the conversation; no, in the course of this conversation, talking about Theodore, he said, "Oh! yes, his woes are such"—he said, "his woes are such as money can assuage;" that and calling Theodore a scoundrel were the only bitter remarks he made in all the conversation.

Q. Did he say anything in that conversation about making a statement? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, when did you see him next? A. When we went down in the cars together; Mrs. Beecher also went down, and Mrs. Beecher left at the depot; we rode down in the horse-cars, and he talked nearly all the way down on the platform; the only part of the conversation I remember was his reference to the Woodhull scandal—to his interview with Mrs. Woodhull at Tilton's; I think he said that he had only met her twice; that he went around one day and saw her at Tilton's, and she was all smiles; he said, "Let me show you," and he took both my hands in his and put them together in this way, and imitated a sentimental woman very funnily, and he said that she evidently expected him to say something about the scandal, but he made some commonplace remark and left. Then I went down, and he introduced me to Mr. Cleveland. That was the last. I had conversation with Mr. Cleveland, but that is all I had with Mr. Beecher that I remember.

Q. Did you have an interview with him at his house in Brooklyn? A. Well, I went over and stopped at Theodore's, and next morning I was feeling so badly about the whole case and Theodore's determination to prosecute it I thought I would go and see Frank Carpenter.

MR. BEECHER RESOLVES TO "VINDICATE ELIZABETH AND THEODORE."

Mr. Fullerton—Just omit that part. We cannot hear that. Did you see Mr. Beecher? A. At his suggestion and Mr. Cleveland's, I went to see Mr. Beecher at his house; I went there, I think, about three o'clock; I didn't see him for an hour or an hour and a half afterward; he was up stairs asleep; then we went down—then we went down to tea. Oh, I asked in the parlor—I asked him if nothing could be done to stop this yet.

He placed his hand on my knee and said: "O, that is all right now," or some expression like that; "I have made up my mind;" we went down to tea, and after tea he took me into the garden or yard, and went to the front part and talked a little about the cellars a minute, or the vaults underneath, and in going back he said—I forget the remark I made that led to it—he said: "I was with some of my friends until 2 o'clock this morning, and my mind was not clear."

Mr. Fullerton—Speak a little bit louder, if you please.

The Witness—"But when I awoke this morning I saw my way clear; I shall make a clean breast of it: I shall tell the whole truth; I shall take the whole blame on myself; I shall vindicate Theodore and Elizabeth." I said: "Well, Mr. Beecher, without any reference whatever—without any reference to what the truth is, I am very glad of it." Then he asked me something about what the effect—what effect the scandal would have on the lecturing. I don't know how the question was phrased; I think it was then that I replied, "That without any reference to what the truth was he would find a stronger and better class of friends around him than he ever had before." By that time we were in the entry, and he simply said in going up, "I shall always feel very grateful for your sympathy." I then left the house, and finding that I had not time to see Theodore—

Q. Is that the end of your interview with Mr. Beecher?

A. That is the end of the interview.

Q. Did you see Mr. Beecher after that? A. I think I did not see Mr. Beecher after that until I saw him at the White Mountains—I think three times I saw him there.

A BRISK DISCUSSION OVER A QUESTION.

Q. Now, Mr. Redpath, I ask you this question, whether at the interview at Peekskill of which you have spoken, or at the interview at Brooklyn of which you have also spoken, Mr. Beecher denied the commission of adultery?

Mr. Evarts—I object to that question, if your Honor please. He has told us all that Mr. Beecher said, and has told us all that was said by him (the witness) that led to any answers of any kind, and this witness has no such relation toward Mr. Beecher as that there should be behind, in his knowledge and in Mr. Beecher's consciousness of his knowledge, anything that does not appear in the conversation itself. The question may be a harmless one, but the legal right of putting it is the question we are now discussing.

Judge Nelson—I think we will take it on the cross-examination.

Mr. Evarts—Then your Honor will please note our exception. This is not a cross-examination as to any interviews that we have introduced. This is their own evidence entirely.

Judge Nelson—Repeat your question, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Please repeat the question, Mr. Stenographer.

Mr. Evarts—If the Court please, we have got all that was said. Now, whether in that conversation, proceeding from the other party, or interchanged between them, there was any occasion for denying, is apparent from the connection and statement of the conversation, and this is their own interview that they bring in evidence, not a cross-examination concerning any interview that we have touched upon; and now they propose to ask a question which, on the general rules of evidence, is not admissible. It would answer for a cross-examination on our part if the situation were reversed.

Mr. Porter—Will your Honor permit me to add that the inquiry is as to the construction by the witness of the language he has given. That is a matter for the jury.

We shall insist that in the language he has given there is the clearest and the most emphatic denial of adultery. If he is permitted to give a construction, and it should be adverse to ours, what have we to call for, Sir? He has told all that was said; but who made Mr. Redpath juror in this case, to determine the issue that belongs to these twelve men? Is he to say whether certain words which he has repeated do or do not constitute a denial? He never charged Mr. Beecher with adultery. Mr. Beecher was not called upon to deny any such charge to him. All that he said is given. All that Mr. Beecher said has been repeated to the jury. It is for them to determine whether it was an admission or a denial of the foul accusation, imputed to him by Tilton, transmitted with Moulton's cunning, false, treacherous, message, and for a business purpose, to extort that money which might assuage Tilton's griefs.

Judge Neilson—The question is quite equivalent to asking if anything more was said upon a given subject; which is a common form of interrogatory.

Mr. Evarts—That we shall not object to.

Judge Neilson—It is equivalent to that, although it is in a different form.

Mr. Fullerton—Like questions have been put on the other side again and again, and answers have been given to them.

Mr. Beach—Under our objection.

Mr. Fullerton—Under our objection; and I suppose that the same rule is to be administered that has been applied to the other side.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor says that this question is equivalent to the form your Honor has stated, then we should like to have the question put in that form.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not propose to fashion my question to please my adversary.

Mr. Evarts—No; it is the Court.

Mr. Fullerton—No; his Honor says my question is equivalent to that, and I will put the equivalent.

Judge Neilson—I mean in substance it is equivalent. I will allow the witness to answer your question.

Mr. Fullerton—Commentaries upon the evidence will be more appropriate by and by.

Judge Neilson—Of course I concur with Mr. Porter that this whole matter goes to the jury for their construction, and I have not now nor shall I at any future time make any expression of opinion in regard to it. It is not my practice to do so.

NO ACTUAL DENIAL MADE BY MR. BEECHER.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Stenographer, please read the question.

The Tribune stenographer read the question as follows: "Now, Mr. Redpath, I ask you this question, whether at the interview at Peekskill of which you have spoken, or at the interview at Brooklyn of which you have also spoken, Mr. Beecher denied the commission of adultery? A. No, Sir; I did not ask him, because I did not believe it.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out.

Mr. Porter—And I insist that it shall not be struck out.

Judge Neilson—I think I will let it stand.

Mr. Fullerton—I did not ask him for his opinion, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—I know you did not, but I think we will let it stand.

Q. You did, however, convey to him the message that he was charged with adultery? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—He has already sworn to that.

Mr. Fullerton—He has sworn to it now again.

Mr. Porter—I object to his swearing to it again.

Mr. Fullerton—You are too late, Sir.

Mr. Porter—It is not a question now.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it is.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Q. Have you given all the reply that Mr. Beecher made when you said that he was to be charged with adultery? A. As nearly as I can recall it, Sir; I suppose if—

By Mr. Fullerton—That is an answer. The conversation at Brooklyn, if I understand you correctly, was after the conversation at Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir; the conversation at Peekskill occurred about noon, or 1 o'clock, on Monday; the conversation at Brooklyn occurred on the afternoon of Tuesday.

Q. The allegation of Mr. Beecher, then, that he should vindicate Theodore and Elizabeth, and take all the blame on himself, was after you had conveyed to him the message that he was to be charged with adultery? A. Yes, Sir—yes.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

By Mr. Evarts—This jurymen asks what date these interviews were; I think you have fixed them as soon after the 11th of July? A. I think the—

Mr. Beach—The 11th of July was the date that Mr. Tilton left the house!

The Witness—Then the interview was on the following Monday and following Tuesday.

Mr. Evarts—The Monday and Tuesday following the 11th of July.

Mr. Fullerton—Were they not all before the 14th of July? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—He says they were on the 11th and 12th—no, the 13th and 14th, Saturday was the 11th.

The Witness—Then Monday was the 13th, and on that day I was at Peekskill.

Q. On the next day too? A. On the next day I saw Mr. Beecher at his own house in Brooklyn.

Mr. Evarts—They were on the 13th and 14th of July of last year.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Evarts—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—One question. State what the business was upon which you went up to see Mr. Beecher on that occasion. A. I had a contract—a verbal contract, with Mr. Beecher for a lecturing engagement in the following Fall.

Q. It was in reference to that? A. It was solely in reference to that.

Mr. Evarts—You stated, I think, that one part of your employment is that of a lecture agent? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I want to call attention to an error on the record as printed, which might be of some importance. In the testimony of Mr. Tilney, he stated that he was married about 7 o'clock in the evening, and it is printed 7 o'clock in the morning.

Judge Nelson—I think he said evening.

Mr. Shearman—It is a mere clerical error, but I call attention to it now.

[Here there was a consultation between Mr. Beecher and his lawyers.]

HENRY WARD BEECHER CALLED TO THE STAND.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, will you be sworn?

HENRY WARD BEECHER, the defendant, here took the witness stand. The officer offered him the Bible in the usual manner, but Mr. Beecher waved it away and rested his right hand as if to swear with the uplifted hand.

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir.

The Clerk [to the Witness]—"You solemnly swear that you"—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Beach—I object to this form of oath, Sir, unless Mr. Beecher shall declare that he has conscientious scruples against swearing upon the Scriptures.

Judge Nelson—Any form that Mr. Beecher says will bind his conscience.

Mr. Beach—That is the statute, Sir, that a witness shall be sworn upon the Scriptures unless he declares that he has conscientious scruples against swearing upon them.

Mr. Beecher—I have conscientious scruples against swearing on the Bible.

Mr. Beach—Very well.

The Clerk. [To the Witness.]—You solemnly affirm and declare—

MR. BEECHER TAKES THE NEW-ENGLAND FORM OF OATH.

Mr. Evarts—No. He swears; he does not affirm and declare—he swears by the uplifted hand.

Mr. Beach—By the ever-living God.

Mr. Evarts—The New-England fashion is to swear by the uplifted hand, but it is the oath; there is the same distinction in New-England between the oath and the affirmation that there is with us.

Mr. Porter—The oath is, "You swear in the presence of the ever-living God."

The Clerk then read the oath to Mr. Beecher as follows:

"You solemnly swear by the ever-living God that the evidence you shall give in this issue joined between Theodore Tilton, plaintiff, and Henry Ward Beecher shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Mr. Beecher—I do.

MR. BEECHER'S PARENTAGE AND EARLY LIFE.

Mr. Evarts—Where were you born, and when? A. I was born in Litchfield Conn., in 1813, as I am informed.

Q. Was your father the Rev. Lyman Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At what age did your father die, and when? A. He died in the Fall, if I recollect right, Sir, of 1863, at the age of 86.

Q. And your mother at what age? A. My mother died when I was about three years old.

Q. How long did your family, and you as a part of it, live in Litchfield after your birth? A. My father removed from Litchfield in 1836, if I recollect right, making me about 13 years old when we went away.

Q. And where did your family and yourself, as a part of it, thereafter live? A. In Boston for eight years—the family lived.

Q. Was your father a clergyman of the orthodox faith in New-England? A. He was.

Q. And settled in Litchfield while you were there? A. He was.

Q. As a minister; and in Boston over what? A. He was first settled over the church that was called the Bowdoin Street Church. When that was burned down and rebuilt in another street it was called then the Hanover—no; it was called first the Hanover Street Church, and afterward the Bowdoin Street Church.

Q. It was rebuilt in Bowdoin street? A. Rebuilt in Bowdoin street—yes, Sir.

Q. It is now standing there. How numerous a family of children had your parents? A. Thirteen were born to them, and eleven were raised to man's estate.

Q. How many of those were men and how many women? A. Six boys and four girls.

Q. Besides yourself? How do you make out eleven? A. [After a pause.] I have never been able to tell it right without counting, Sir. [Laughter.]

Judge Nelson—Mr. Rogers, you must see to this. I won't have any applause of an answer to a question.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, were your brothers all clergymen as well as yourself? A. All of them.

Q. When did you go to college, and where? A. To Amherst College in the year 1830.

Q. And graduated in due course? A. In due course, in 1834—August.

Q. And thereafter did you pursue professional studies, and where? A. Three years at Lane Seminary, with the exception of about six months, when I took charge of The Cincinnati Journal.

Q. Was Lane Seminary a theological seminary? A. It was.

Q. Was it under your father's charge? A. He was President of it.

MR. BEECHER'S ORDINATION AND FIRST PASTORATE.

Q. And where were you ordained as a clergyman? A. I was licensed as a clergyman, I think, in 1837.

Q. And when were you first settled over a charge? A. I was settled over a charge also the same year.

Q. Where? A. In Lawrenceburg, Indiana, Dearborn County.

Q. That is within how many miles of Cincinnati? A. Twenty miles below Cincinnati, on the Ohio River.

Q. Was it a small, inconsiderable town then? A. I should think it was a town of perhaps from a thousand to 1,500 inhabitants.

Q. Were there several religious societies there? A. There was a Baptist church, a Campbellite—no, there was a Baptist, a Methodist, and this Presbyterian church when I went there. Just at the close of my ministry there was organized an Episcopal church.

Q. How large a congregation was this of yours over which you were settled? A. The communicants of my church when I went there were 19, I think, possibly 20.

Q. And the attendance? A. Well, the attendance—the house, I think, would hold 300, possibly, if it was crowded; but I should say that from 150 to 200 was my audience.

Q. Were you in whole supported by your congregation, or was it a missionary field? A. I was a beneficiary under the care of the American Home Missionary Society.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. Two years and a fraction.

MR. BEECHER'S SECOND PASTORATE.

Q. And from there where did you go, and where have you been since? A. I went to the capital of the State, Indianapolis, in Marion County, Indiana.

Q. Were you settled over a congregation there? A. I was settled over the Second Presbyterian Church there.

Q. Was that a more considerable congregation and church, in numbers? A. No, Sir. It was a small church. It was at the time of the division, between the Old and the New Schools, and this was an offshoot from the First Presbyterian Church, which was called the Old School, and it was a comparatively small church; I cannot tell the number.

Q. And there, were you supported by your congregation, or continued as a missionary? A. I was supported by my congregation, at a salary of $300 a year.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. About eight years—a little more or less.

Q. That brought you to about 1847 or 1848? A. The year 1847.

Q. From that time where have you lived, and in what service as a clergyman? A. I have lived in this city of Brooklyn, and as pastor of the Plymouth Church.

MR. BEECHER'S MINISTRY IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Were you the first clergyman of that church? A. Of the Plymouth Church?

Q. Yes. A. I was the first, and have been the only pastor.

Q. Was it founded, and were you called to it at the beginning of its existence, as a church with a pastor? A. I was called to the church by the gentlemen that purchased the property, and I told them that they could not call, that they had no authority; they therefore proceeded to form a church in order that they, having authority, might call me.

Q. And you were then called by the church? A. I was then called by the church.

Q. How large a congregation—how large a community of church members was this society when you were called? A. It think it was, perhaps—the church proper that called me—I should think had 20 members, or 25, perhaps, not over 25.

Q. Has there been any break or interruption in your service as pastor and preacher at that church from that time to the present? A. I have preached continuously from that day to this.

Q. Has there been any occasion of interruption on account of your strength or health during that whole time? A. The first year that I came to Brooklyn, and while the church in which we now worship was building, I exposed myself a little in visiting the church, and was sick with erysipelas, which enfeebled me for several months; but, with the exception of that sickness, I don't think I have lost five Sundays in 27 years.

Q. Have you within this period of your settlement, Mr. Beecher, had any absence abroad? A. Twice.

Q. At what times and for what length? A. In consequence of the continued weakness of the first sickness which I mentioned, I made a voyage with Capt. Knight, in the ship New World, to England, in 1850—the summer. I was gone not over three months, and inside of two, I think.

Q. You went out and back in a sailing ship? A. I went out expecting to come back in a sailing ship, but, in fact, returned on board the steamer Asta.

Q. Now, your second absence in Europe? A. My second absence in Europe was in June—if I recollect right—1863, and I returned the last of November of the same year.

Q. And your time was passed in England and on the continent of Europe, except during the voyages? A. Yes, Sir.

A. W. Keeler

Q. What was the occasion of that visit? A. I had been worn out, in preaching, lecturing and editorial work incident to the coming on of the war, and the first years of the war, and my friends advised me to take the summer for recruiting, and be ready for the Fall and Winter campaign.

Q. Then you were not an invalid during that absence? A. No, Sir; nor before it—not exactly an invalid.

Q. It was a recreation? A. It was a rest, preparatory to larger labors.

Q. And you had occasion to make public demonstrations and perform services while you were abroad, had you not? A. Do you mean whether I did?

Q. Did, in fact? A. At first I refused, and with the exception of a few "breakfasts," as they are called in England, took no public service. I then went on to the Continent and spent one or two months there, and returned to England in September, determined to come home, but was led to agree to a line of public orations or discourses on American affairs.

Q. In some of the principal cities of England? A. In Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Liverpool and London.

Q. And all those occasions had to do with the public situation of our affairs here and the war. A. They did.

Q. How large is the congregation and how large the number of church members in Plymouth Church now, about? A. I cannot speak with positiveness, Sir; but I should say the congregation is limited only by the building, and has been so for 25 years; the number of communicants is, I suppose, over 2,500—between 2,500 and 3,000.

Q. And for how long has that number, or a similar number, been the list of your church members? A. I could not say definitely, Sir; it has been over 2,000, I suppose, for 10 years or more.

Q. What are and what have been your habitual labors as a clergyman in the direction and charge of this church and congregation? A. I have preached morning and afternoon, and conducted for a series of years a Wednesday-night lecture, a Friday night prayer-meeting, and what was called the Social Circle, or social meeting of the church.

Q. Where was the latter held? A. In the parlors of the church.

Q. And more recently have your services there been reduced in amount? A. The social meeting I have remitted to the charge of the young people.

Q. For how far back? A. O, I should say for 15 years.

Q. Well, the Wednesday evening lecture? A. The Wednesday evening lecture I dropped not far, I think, just before the time of the war; I may be inaccurate about that; I have no special memory.

MR. BEECHER'S EDITORIAL WORK.

Q. Now, within the period of your services as a clergyman here, what other public or literary employment have you had? A. I have been connected with journalism ever since I was in the pulpit; I have been connected with The New-York Independent, after my first year, not as a member of the staff, but as a contributor, having a column of my own; that was the understanding.

Q. And furnishing a paper for every issue? A. For every week.

Q. For every issue of that paper? A. For every issue of that paper. That was the contract arrangement. Afterward, in 1870, I took charge of The Christian Union, which had—

Q. Well, we will first go on with the time when you became the editor of The Independent? A. Yes, Sir, I think it was—I am not definite—I think it was the latter part of 1860 or early in 1861, the editors that had conducted The Independent, Dr. Bacon, Dr. Storrs, and the Rev. Dr. Thompson, resigned. I then made an arrangement with Mr. Bowen to conduct the paper editorially.

Q. And up to what time did you continue the responsibility of chief editor of that paper? A. Until the Fall of 1863, and a nominal editor until the fall of 1864, I think, Sir; a contributor, however, all the time.

Q. And up to what time thereafter, if at all, did you continue to be a contributor? A. Until the Fall of 1866.

Q. A constant contributor—a regular contributor? A. I cannot praise myself for constancy in that regard, Sir, but it would be considered a regular contributor.

Q. And then your connection ceased? A. My connection ceased.

Q. With that paper in 1866? A. In 1866.

A. And in the interval between your assuming the editorship of The Christian Union, had you any connection—responsible connection—with any public newspaper? A. No, Sir; there was a movement set on foot by the Congregational brethren to establish a journal, which, in view of other arrangements that were also in prosecution, was dropped, as these others were—I declining to take any position that would seem to put me in antagonism with The Independent.

Q. And how did your connection come about with The Christian Union—when did it take place? A. The Christian Union was called in its origin The Church Union, a paper that was founded to bring all Christian Churches together on one foundation, with the understanding—

Mr. Beach—I don't think—

The Witness—That is the—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evans—It is not necessary to go into the details. That was the purpose? A. That paper passed into the hands of an intimate friend of mine, at a time when I was under contract to write "The Life of Christ." He came to me at Peekskill—

Mr. Beach—I think these details are inadmissible, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir, it is not necessary. You were applied to. A. I was applied to to take it, and declined, except conditionally at a future time, and circumstances arose which forced me to that position in the year 1870.

Q. And how early in that year? A. January.

Q. Now, when you took that paper, what was the extent of its subscription? A. Said to be 3,000, but it probably had 600 to 1,000 bona fide subscribers.

Q. Only? A. That is my impression, Sir; I never saw the books; that was what was told me.

Q. Very well. Now, during the first year—for I am limiting all inquiries now to a period anterior to December, 1870—during the first year, to what extent had the circulation of The Christian Union increased? A. I cannot give you the exact figures; it was over 30,000.

Q. Over 30,000? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Besides your services as a clergyman, having a charge, and these editorial services, during the period of your residence in Brooklyn, have you had other literary labors? A. I have, if you include lecturing as a literary labor.

OTHER LITERARY LABORS.

Q. Well, what has been your habit in that regard—lecturing? A. I have been a very large lecturer, from—

Q. During a considerable period of years? A. From the second year of my settling here. I began in 1849 to lecture, I think—1848-'9—the Winter of 1848-'9, I think. I lectured for the Mercantile Library Association, of Boston, and got $25 for it.

Q. Well, from that time until about when? A. From that time until this trial began I have been lecturing, principally Autumn, Winter, and Spring, seldom in Summer.

Mr. Evarts [to the Court]—Here is a letter asking a gentleman to be introduced into the Court, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Officer, hand it here, please.

Mr. Evarts—It is addressed either to your Honor or myself.

Judge Neilson—It was very proper to give it to you first, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I lost your answer, Mr. Beecher, to that.

The Witness—I have lost your question.

Mr. Evarts—Well, then, we will go on. I suppose the stenographer has them both.

The Tribune stenographer here read the last question and answer.

Q. During this period of your settlement over the Plymouth Church has there been any regular interval of vacations, and if so, at what part of the year, and for what length of time? A. My contract with the church called for the month of August as my vacation. That has, however, been extended, first by the fact that

I am subject to hay fever, which comes on the middle of August, and I seldom get so far free from it as to be fit to preach until toward the last of September; and gradually, by the force of circumstances, my vacation extended from the first of August to the middle of September; within the last five years, perhaps, the church, by special vote from year to year, has enlarged a little my vacation, sometimes sending me off in the middle of July, until the first of October, or as the case might be.

Q. And for what period of time have you had a fixed country residence for some part of the year? A. I should say 16 or 17 years; not in the same place always.

Q. No. How long has that been at Peekskill? I should say 13 or 14 years.

Q. Are your vacations passed at Peekskill for the most part? A. Just as much of them as I can get there.

Q. And then when the hay fever comes on, have you had any fixed habit of seeking a special climate? A. Until within four years I always stayed there only. Within the last four years I have gone to the White Mountains.

Q. Mr. Beecher, when were you married? Oh! I beg your pardon, I have not gone through with the literary labors. The lectures we disposed of. A. I omitted to state—

Q. Have you been the author and publisher of any works? A. Will you allow me to correct, by addition—I ought to have included in the answer to your question about lecturing, that I have, particularly in 1856, I think, by vote of my church, been set free as much as I thought it to be necessary to go into the field and lecture on politics, and that during all those stormy times immediately preceding—or from the time of the Kansas troubles, I was in the habit of making many political speeches and preaching not a few political sermons.

Q. Well, now, the authorship of books, Mr. Beecher? A. I have been a very voluminous author; I think there are about thirty-five volumes that stand in my name now.

Q. And all dating from within the period of your residence in Brooklyn? A. No.

Q. Some before? A. Some before.

Q. When was your engagement in reference to the work, "The Life of Christ," made; when was that undertaken? A. I think that was undertaken in the year—I have got a memorandum of dates, if the gentlemen will allow me to look at it.

Mr. Beach—Certainly Sir, certainly.

The Witness—I will submit my memorandum, as it covers pretty largely the whole ground, to your inspection, gentlemen, if you wish to see it.

Mr. Beach—No desire for it, Sir.

The Witness [After referring to memorandum]—I signed the contract for "The Life of Christ" in December of 1867, and the first volume was issued in the Fall—in September of 1871.

Q. Did the preparation of that work occupy your time and attention and studies to any definite or appreciable extent during this period? A. Very largely, Sir.

Q. The work is still incomplete? A. Yes, Sir; the first volume is published; the second volume is two-thirds done but not published.

Q. Now, when did you write your work of fancy. "Norwood?" A. That preceded this, Sir; it was [referring to memorandum]—appeared in The Ledger in 1867, and in a book form in 1868.

MR. BEECHER'S MARRIAGE.

Q. Mr. Beecher, when were you married?

A. The same year that I was settled; in 1837, I think it is, Sir.

Q. For how long a period before your marriage had you been acquainted with your affianced bride? A. Half as long as the patriarch for his two; I had been engaged to her for seven years. [Laughter.]

Q. And how old were you when you were married? A. I think I was 23; I am not good at figures.

Q. And what was your wife's age at that time? A. I think she was 23 also. A part of the year she is 24 when I am 23, and the rest of the year we are of the same age. [Laughter.]

Q. So that your engagement dates from the early age of 16 or thereabouts? A. I was engaged, I think, when I was between 16 and 17.

Q. You were in college then, or was it— A. I was in college; I think I was a freshman.

Q. How many children, Mr. Beecher, have you had of this marriage? A. I have four with me and five waiting for me.

Q. And now how many grandchildren have you? A. Eight.

Q. During the period of your marriage has there been any interval of absence or separation between yourself and your wife, except these that you have named of going to Europe? A. Except when I have been gone to Europe or out on lecturing tours.

Q. Of late years has your wife had occasion to visit the South in reference to her health? A. Yes, Sir, for—I think since the Winter of 1870 or 1871.

Mr. Beach—Each Winter, does he mean?

Mr. Evans—Since the Winter of 1870 or 1871? A. 1870 or 1871; I don't remember exactly in which it began.

Q. Every Winter? A. What, Sir?

Q. Has she gone South every Winter until now? A. Until this Winter, yes, Sir.

Q. While you were at Indianapolis was there any occasion when your wife went to Connecticut in consequence of sickness? A. Not to Connecticut; she went back to her home.

Q. In Massachusetts? A. In Sutton, Mass.

Q. And with those exceptions, there has been no interval? A. I do not recall any.

Q. Of break in your residence together, under the same roof? A. I do not recall any.

ALL MR. BEECHER'S SECULAR AFFAIRS IN-TRUSTED TO HIS WIFE.

Q. In regard to the conduct of domestic affairs, Mr. Beecher, what was the habit of your life in respect to your wife or yourself having charge of them? A. From a very early period I remitted to her almost entirely my secular affairs, so much so, that until within two years, since my son came to live with me, who was in business, I never even drew my own salary.

Q. Your wife did it? A. All checks were made out to her, and all the Treasurer's accounts were "Mrs. Beecher, Dr.," and I knew neither what money came nor what money went out, so far as my salary was concerned.

Q. Until within a recent period, was your wife's health and strength sufficient for all occasions of that kind? A. She had, for her, poor health, but it was with a strength and an amount of purpose that gave her, in effect, the strength of ten women, and until an accident which befell her, namely, being thrown from a runaway team against the stone steps of the bank in Brooklyn, she was in every respect, I always thought, sound and efficient far beyond the measure of ordinary women.

Q. What was your habit in regard to your correspondence being known to or managed in any respect or any degree by Mrs. Beecher during this period? A. Well, in the earlier period of my life, I had a very sensitive feeling in regard to the sacredness of letters; I would never open my children's, nor suffer anybody else to do it; I would never open hers, neither did I wish her to open mine; but within the last 15 years correspondence has so multiplied, and I grew careless through over-occupation, that that, little by little, passed into her charge, and for the last 15 years, if I was gone, or if there was any reason why, perhaps, somebody might suffer, she has always opened my letters, and to a very considerable degree answered them; if there were any about which she had any doubt she waited until I came home.

MR. BEECHER NOT A VISITING PREACHER.

Q. Mr. Beecher, during your settlement here, what has been your habit in regard to personal visits or intercourse with your parish at large, or with any narrower circle among your parishioners, or among other residents of Brooklyn? A. In my earlier years I attempted a good deal of visiting. As outside demands wasted my time, I made arrangements by which I could be seen at my house or at my church by whomsoever wished. Still, subsequent to that, I found it impossible either to visit or to receive multitudinous calls, and for the last twenty years I may say, with the exception of weddings and funerals, I have done very little visiting; now and then a paroxysm of visitation, but in general it may be said I am not a visiting preacher.

Q. Has there been any circle of intimacies between your family and other families of your congregation, or of your Brooklyn neighbors? A. Yes, Sir; I was cautioned against that, but I always stood for my rights on that subject. I have always said that because I was a minister I was not one whit less a gentleman, nor a citizen, and that I would have my circle for my enjoyment. I did not care who was jealous nor who made remarks.

Q. And these intimacies, were they of the whole families and with your whole family? A. Almost in every case.

Q. Were these intimacies entirely or principally confined to families of your own parish? A. I think of but a single exception.

Q. Had you any intimacies with any family of your brother clergymen? A. That is the exception—Dr. Storrs's family.

Q. Otherwise these intimacies were in your own parish? A. Altogether.

Q. During all this time—

Mr. Beach—I suppose he means by that the family intimacies.

Mr. Everts—Yes, I mean these family intimacies. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were confined to your parish? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I was just proceeding to ask a question. During this time have you had a large personal acquaintance with men engaged in public affairs or in the affairs of religion and the Church? A. You mean in the nation at large?

Q. Yes, in the community at large? A. Yes, Sir, I have met very many; I have never formed particular intimacies or acquaintances with many.

Q. Has your correspondence been extensive? A. I should say not, if I should judge from my impression; but if they should begin to hunt over my letters I presume it would be found that I had.

Q. Now, during the last 20 years, Mr. Beecher, what has been the average of public occasions on which you have spoken during the period not embraced by vacation? A. I do not understand that last remark, Sir.

Q. During, say, running back to a time 20 years ago, what has been the average number per week of your public appearances during the times of the year not embraced in vacation? A. Yes, Sir; I should say that from the year 1844 until the year 1873 I have averaged about six times full-grown addresses a week.

Q. That counts two on Sunday and four—? A. During the week; yes, Sir.

Q. During the week? A. Oftentimes two a day, in different periods.

MR. BEECHER'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH MR. BOWEN.

Q. When did you first come to be acquainted with Mr. Henry C. Bowen? A. In the year 1847, if that was the year when I came to Brooklyn.

Q. And what relation had he to the religious society—to the charge of which you were before called? A. He was one of the constituent members, and a leading man.

Q. A leading man of the— A. The nascent church.

Q. Of the new project? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you any business relations with him, and in what connection, otherwise than as pastor of the church of which he is a leading member? A. In connection with The Independent, and, in one instance, with the equipping of a regiment, which the Plymouth Church substantially did.

Q. At the outset of the war? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Bowen the proprietor, or part proprietor, of The Independent during the whole period of your responsible connection with it? A. He was one—a co-proprietor during all the earlier period, but when I took the editorial charge I think he had become the sole proprietor.

A. And so continued until— A. This time.

Q. You left—until this time, as you understand? A. As I am informed.

Q. Were you intimate associates and friends, and if so, for what period of time? A. The first two weeks that I came to Brooklyn I was the guest of his house, and, subsequent to that, we worked hand in hand for years together in the establishment of the Plymouth Church, he more than any other one man being useful in the fiscal affairs of the church.

Q. During the period of your connection as editor with the paper of which he was proprietor, how close and familiar was your intercourse? A. I saw him almost every day, and was—I may be said to have been very intimate with him.

Q. And in his family also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And his family in yours? A. Not so much.

Q. When was your connection of any joint interest with Mr. Bowen dissolved, and in what manner? A. Do you mean when my business relations with him ceased?

Q. Yes. A. I should say in—, I gave notice according to the contract of the end of the contract in September, 1866.

Q. Prior to that time had any attitude of that paper towards yourself made a difference in your disposition toward Mr. Bowen and the newspaper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. Well, do you ask me what led me finally to break up from the paper?

HOW MR. BEECHER CAME TO LEAVE THE INDEPENDENT.

Q. Yes, I ask what situation arose between the paper and yourself that led to a dissolution of your connection? A. During the period of the "Reconstruction Measures," as they were called, and after I had left The Independent as editor, it pursued a line which obliged it to criticize me with more or less decision, and in 1866, when I wrote the "Cleveland letter," as it is called, which was written in August of 1866, The Independent criticised me in a manner so severe at a time when the whole public pretty much, with the exception of the Democratic party, were down on me that I felt that a paper that I had helped fashion from its birth was now being used to destroy me, and that I could not, with self-respect, maintain my connection with it; I terminated, therefore, or gave the notice of termination, according to the contract, and left.

Q. At that point, what was the form and extent of your connection—what publications did they make of your— A. I was under contract to furnish one sermon a week, and, I don't remember precisely, but I have an impression that I was also to furnish an article, either editorial or Star Articles, as they were called; I am not positive about that last, but that is my impression.

Q. And that was a definite contract, with pecuniary compensation? A. It was.

Q. And you dissolved it on this occasion? A. It was terminated according to the terms laid down in the contract.

Q. Now, from that time onward, Mr. Beecher, what were your personal relations with Mr. Bowen onward to 1870—to December, 1870? The questions are limited now to that period? A. From what, Sir; from 1866?

Q. After that dissolution of connection with him, what were your personal relations with Mr. Bowen up to December, 1870? A. Well, Sir; they were very much diminished, and there was a very considerable degree of coolness.

Q. Mr. Bowen continued all this time a prominent person in your church, I suppose? A. He was a pew-holder in my church; he was not an active man in the church affairs.

Q. He was a prominent pew-holder? A. Yes, Sir.

THE FIRST MEETING OF MR. BEECHER AND MR. TILTON.

Q. Mr. Beecher, when and how did you first form the acquaintance of Mr. Tilton? A. I recollect him, if I recollect aright, while he was an employe of The New-York Observer. If I recollect it aright, I became acquainted with him first in his office of reporter—he was a short-hand reporter.

Q. And in what connection with yourself did that employment of his bring him into your acquaintance? A. I don't remember whether he was reporting anything from Plymouth Church Pulpit for other papers; but my first recollection is that Daniel Burgess, then a member of my church and a publisher in New-York, procured him to report sermons for him.

Q. Your sermons? A. My sermons—he having the intention to publish a volume.

Q. And was the young man introduced to you in that connection, as you understand it? A. As I remember—I am—I cannot say about the special time of introduction—

I have known him so long that it seems as though I had known him always since I have been in Brooklyn; it seems as though it runs back very far to my beginning here.

Q. And what was his age and position in life at the time that you knew him first? A. I cannot say what his age—he was extremely—he was youthful, very youthful, and of an engaging manner, and a very comely appearance, and one that—whose address, I know, won my sympathy from the first.

Q. Now, from that time onward, in what forms and to what degree did you come to be associated with him in intercourse or employments? A. I saw him a great deal; I saw him for a year or two before 1860, because he had transferred his relation from The Observer to The Independent; then I used to see him after that several times a week, when I was in town.

Q. In connection with The Independent? A. In connection with The Independent.

Q. And how were your personal relations? A. Very cordial.

Q. On both sides? A. On both sides.

Q. How much were you and he in the habit of conferring together in regard to your common interests, or his prospects or purposes? A. Well, we—he was witty and amusing in conversation, and I always chatted with him on such matters before; but I did not come in to what may be called very close personal relations till I assumed the management of the paper in 1861; thereafter, for two years, or three, we were together almost every day.

Q. And was this intimacy of companionship as well as of common interests and employments? A. Well, it was common employments, companionship, and downright loving on my part.

Q. During all this time, how soon did you become aware of any desire or purpose of his to succeed you in The Independent? A. Succeed, or supersede, did you say, Sir?

Q. No; succeed? A. Succeed?

Q. Succeed. A. Oh, I don't know that—I have an impression it was my desire that he should, rather than his, that he should.

Q. And you so expressed it to him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you first begin to plan and prepare for that position for him? A. It was in the year 1863, Sir.

Q. At that time was he definitely and publicly known as assistant-editor? A. Yes; oh, yes—it was one of the conditions on which I agreed to take the paper, that he should be my assistant.

Q. Made by you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When and how was the arrangement made by which you were to decline the place entirely, and in his favor? A. When the proposition to send me to Europe came up, my church were desirous that I should go, but it was necessary that I should have the consent of Mr. Bowen, with whom I had a contract; and at that time an arrangement was made between me and Mr. Bowen by which I was to give up to him certain vested rights, in regard to that paper, and I was to have the liberty of absence, on condition of corresponding with it. I then also (since we were breaking the old arrangements) entered into one by which I agreed that if Mr. Tilton would take my place on my return, to carry on the paper for the year (my absence being a kind of probationary period of managing it), I would allow my name to stand for a year as nominal editor, and then he was to continue the editorship of it under his own name.

Q. And you withdraw? A. I was to withdraw.

Q. You were to withdraw as editor? A. I to withdraw my name as editor, and to withdraw my services as editor.

Q. But I understand you continued to have certain contracts for literary services? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But you were to terminate, and did terminate that relation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This then was 1863 or 1864? A. Yes, Sir; I returned in the Autumn of 1863, and I was only nominal editor in 1864, though I had the right at any time in 1864 to put whatever I chose into the paper, editorially.

THE DEBATE BETWEEN MR. BEECHER AND MR. TILTON IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Now, prior to this time, Mr. Beecher, had there been an occasion when Mr. Tilton and yourself had come into some competition or collision in a public debate? A. Yes, Sir, in 1860.

Q. What was that occasion? A. The occasion was the question in Plymouth Church whether we should contribute funds to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions—a debate, I think, of three days, terminated by a general meeting in the church; I don't know but it was two days—two nights in the lecture-room and a third in the church; but that is not important.

Q. It was an occasion of publicity and interest? A. Yes, Sir; I can give you a brief statement of it, if you wish it.

Q. The point of controversy was what? A. The general point in controversy was whether Plymouth Church, which had signalized its devotion to the Anti-Slavery cause, should contribute to the American Missionary Association exclusively, which was an Anti-Slavery Missionary Society, or to divide its contributions between that Society and the American Board, which was then accused of being Pro-Slavery, or trimming. That gave rise to a very animated discussion among our people; and I did not speak on the subject during the time it was in the lecture-room, I think; but I did in the church, and was replied to by Mr. Tilton.

Q. And on that occasion there was a considerable antagonism between you and Mr. Tilton, in views, and in their expression, was there? A. Yes, Sir; nothing that transcended what I see here in court at all. [Mr. Beach smiled.] A perfectly kindly feeling, expressed sometimes rather positively.

Q. Now, on this question, which side were you on, and which side was Mr. Tilton on? A. Mr. Tilton was in favor of throwing over the American Board; I was in favor of maintaining the right of my people to contribute to it if they wanted to.

Q. And had your society a habit of contributing to that? A. That was the old standing Board with us, and it was through my grace and favor that the other one ever got its ears inside the church; for it was a most unpopular thing at that time to pay a cent publicly for abolition purposes.

Mr. Beach—It was the old standing Board that was pro-slavery, I understand.

The Witness—It was alleged to be.

Mr. Evarts—And Mr. Tilton was on the other side, for the exclusive contribution to the new Anti-Slavery organization? A. I don't think that the debate showed that, Sir; that of course would be the moral effect; if I recollect right, Mr. Tilton confined himself to showing that the American Board was in complicity with Slavery; I think that was the drift of his argument.

Q. That was the matter agitated between him and you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the result in the church? A. O, the vote was in favor of maintaining the American Board; both of the societies were the beneficiaries of the church, and that state of things was to be continued by the church just as it had been.

Q. Just as it had been? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The proposition was to cut off the old Board? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the resolution was to continue it? A. Yes, to continue it.

MR. TILTON'S SERVICE IN BEHALF OF MR. BEECHER'S SON.

Q. As before. Now, on that occasion, Mr. Beecher, at or about that time did you perceive in Mr. Tilton any growing views of rivalry or superiority on his part in respect to you?

Mr. Beach—I must object to that.

The Witness—No, Sir; I didn't believe in any such thing; I heard it often said, but I never believed it.

Mr. Beach—I don't think that is proper, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—It has all been up in Mr. Tilton's examination.

Mr. Beach—I know you cross-examined him on that point, but you cannot ask this witness's observations or conclusions. We must have instances and facts.

Mr. Evarts—Now, at or about this time—this was about 1860, I think—did there come to be any interruption of Mr. Tilton's intimacy or visiting at your house? A. In 1860, during the debate, do you mean?

Q. About this time; I am not speaking of this in connection with the debate; I am not referring to this; but I am only referring to the time of 1860 or 1861? A. Yes, Sir; I cannot say there was any very great interruption, because Mr. Tilton was never very much at my house; it was not a regular resort of his; we met at his house (but somewhat later) and at the office, or in the street, or in the picture shops, or wherever we had agreed to meet.

Q. Well, did there come to be an occasion or period after which he ceased entirely to be a visitor or caller at your house? A. Yes, Sir; but I cannot fix the date.

Q. And from that occasion, or that occurrence, it so continued until—? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. 1870—without any renewal of his habit of visiting at your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About this time, early in the war, was there any occasion in which Mr. Tilton performed any act of kindness or friendship to you or your family that specially impressed you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was the occasion of your feeling and expressing gratitude? A. Yes, Sir; he was always doing me little kindnesses that were very agreeable; but there was one that stood out beyond all others and was very specially valuable to me.

Q. And that was in reference to your son? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It has been sufficiently referred to. Did you feel it very much? A. I did, and I do.

Q. And did you so express yourself toward him? A. I did, Sir.

The hour of recess having arrived, the Court adjourned until 2 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

After the recess Mr. Beecher was recalled to the witness stand.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is somewhat important to us in reference to Mr. Cleveland to have that matter of his testimony definitely understood, either by stipulation or by your Honor's order. We had expected it was to proceed this afternoon about 5 o'clock. I see that our friend Mr. Morris is not at this moment in court, and I may have to interrupt the witness perhaps when he comes in. As your Honor sees this afternoon, it is desirable to have us proceed, of course.

Judge Neilson—The last mention made of it here was that Saturday would be preferred.

Mr. Evarts—Here in court!

Judge Neilson—I think so.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, no, Sir—Saturday the examination of the Court—

Mr. Evarts—I say in court.

Judge Neilson—The last mention made here on the subject.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, in court; but there was an idea that we were to begin this afternoon because the witness's health perhaps requires several, at least two, sessions to take his testimony.

Judge Neilson—The only order I could make would be upon an affidavit which Mr. Shearman might prepare.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that we understood; but that we supposed was not considered necessary.

Judge Neilson—No, I suppose not.

Mr. Evarts—So we would like to have it understood one way or the other, whether it is necessary or not. Will the stenographer read the last question and answer, so that we may know where we left off?

The Tribune stenographer's notes, taken before recess, not being in court, the question and answer were read by an Eagle reporter.

MR. TILTON DENIES INSINUATIONS IMPUTED TO HIM.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, I remember the subject. [To the Witness.] Now, in 1865, Mr. Beecher, or 1866, when the Cleveland letter and the comments of The Independent, which have been given in evidence on both sides here, were made public, did that affect, in any way, the relations between Mr. Tilton and yourself personally? A. Undoubtedly it produced some effect, Sir; but it did not produce any such effect as socially to separate us.

Q. Now, do you remember about that time in the year 1865, perhaps it was, an interview with Mr. Tilton, that had something to do with an interview he had had with Mr. Judson? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Mr. Judson was a witness on the stand, you remember, in this case? A. No, I was not present when he was—

Q. Well, I mean that Mr. Judson who has been a witness here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what occurred between you and Mr. Tilton in that connection? A. I went over to The Independent office with some excitement, and told Mr. Tilton that Mr. Judson—

Q. You had seen Mr. Judson? A. That Mr. Judson had been at my house that morning and had reported that he, Mr. Tilton, had, as I recollect now, at a restaurant, while dining, made some statement respecting me—which bore an imputation of immorality; as I now recollect it was a statement of certain loose conduct with women.

Q. Yes; well? A. But, I will not be perfectly certain about it; and I came right to him with the matter, with some strong exclamations—he said that it was not true; that Mr. Judson either had—there was some mistake; that he would go right out and see Mr. Judson and know what the matter meant. He went, and after a time returned, or, at any rate, within a short time I saw him; he said that it was all a mistake; that Mr. Judson had explained the matter, and that the whole thing was an utter mistake; that he had never made any such use—made use of any such language in respect to me.

Q. Did that end the matter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between you and him, and remove the impression from your mind that he had said so?

Mr. Beach—I object to that, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S GRATITUDE FOR MR. BEECHER'S BENEFITS.

By Mr. Evarts—Well, it is not material.

Now, was this the time, about the time that he wrote you a letter—[handing witness a letter.] Look at that letter, and say if you received it from Mr. Tilton at or about the time it bears date. A. Shall I state the circumstances under which it was written?

Q. So far as they proceed from Mr. Tilton. A. We had some conversation afterward, Mr. Tilton and I, about that matter and about whether it was friendly or not friendly, and our terms of intercourse; and it was a very cordial meeting to me and very satisfying one; and it was said between us that there might be misconceptions on either—the part of either's friends. "Suppose you write and express to me your feeling, and I will express my own to you," and with that kind of lovers' quarrel, he wrote me this letter; and that was the end of it.

Mr. Evarts—You received it? [Reading.]

MIDNIGHT, BROOKLYN, Nov. 30, 1865.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Returning home late to-night, I cannot go to bed without writing you a letter. Twice I have been forced to appear as your antagonist before the public, the occasions five years apart. After the first I am sure our friendship, instead of being maimed, was strengthened; after this last, if I may guess your heart by knowing mine, I am sure the old love waxes instead of wanes. Two or three days ago, I know not how impelled, I took out of its hiding place your sweet and precious letter written to me from England, containing an affectionate message which you wished should live and testify after your death. To-night I have been thinking that in case I should die first, which is equally probable, I ought to leave in your hand my last will and testament of reciprocated love. My friend, from my boyhood up you have been to me what no other man has been, what no other man can be. While I was a student the influence of your mind on mine was greater than all books and all teachers. The intimacy with which you honored me for twelve years has been, next to my wife and family, the chief affection of my life. By you I was baptized; by you married; you are my minister, teacher, father, brother, friend, companion. The debt I owe you I can never pay. My religious life, my intellectual development, my open door of opportunity for labor, my public reputation—all these, my dear friend, I owe in so great a degree to your own kindness that my gratitude cannot be written in words, but must be expressed only in love.

Then, what hours we have had together! What arm-in-arm wanderings about the streets! What hunts for pictures and books! What mutual revelations and communings! What interminglings of mirth, of tears, of prayers!

The more I think back upon this friendship, the more am I convinced that not your public position, not your fame, not your genius, but just your affection has been the secret of the bond between us. For, whether you had been high or low, great or common, I believe that my heart, knowing its mate, would have loved you exactly the same. Now, therefore, I want to say that if, either long ago or lately, any word of mine, whether spoken or printed, whether public or private, has given you pain, I beg you to blot it from your memory and to write your forgiveness in its place. Moreover, if I should die leaving you alive, I ask you to love my children for their father's sake, who has taught them to reverence you and to regard you as the man of men.

One thing more; my religious experiences have never been more refreshing than during the last year. Never before have I had such fair and winning thoughts of the other life. With those thoughts you stand connected in a strange and beautiful way. I believe human friendship outlasts human life. Our friendship is yet of the earth, earthy; but it shall one day stand uplifted above mortality, safe, without scar or flaw, without a breath to blot or a suspicion to endanger it.

Meanwhile, O, my friend, may our Father in heaven bless you on the earth, guide you, strengthen you, illumine you, and at last crown you with the everlasting crown. And, now, good night; and sweet be your dreams of your unworthy but eternal friend,

THEODORE TILTON.

Mr. Evarts—What is the number?

Mr. Shearman—D, 126. [Letter marked "D, 126."]

Mr. Evarts—From the period onward from 1866 to the month of December, 1870, Mr. Beecher, what were the habits as to meeting or associating in one another's company between you and Mr. Tilton? A. Will you mention the dates again?

Q. From 1866 onward to the month of December, 1870? A. Well, Sir, we were in quite frequent association up till, perhaps, the year 1870; I met him in New-York, I met him at his own house, and I met him at divers meetings and on public occasions.

Q. Do you remember in the year, or after you took charge of The Christian Union in the beginning of 1870, and on through that year of 1870 did the fact of your being then an editor of a religious paper in the same sphere make any difference either in the frequency or the occasions of your meeting with Mr. Tilton, who was editing The Independent?

Mr. Beach—I think, Sir, that that calls for a judgment of the witness; that we should have the facts in regard to their intimacy or intercourse, or otherwise, without asking the witness to determine what was the cause of it—without giving us some statements of fact.

The Witness—I will state the fact, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Subsequent to your becoming an editor of another newspaper, did the circumstances of your intercourse change in any way? A. I had no connection with him from July, about, until the end of the year—from January to that time; I have no recollection about either particular intimacy or the absence of it.

THE FRIENDS' RESPECTIVE ATTITUDE ON WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

Mr. Fullerton—You speak of 1870? A. Of the year 1870, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember in the Winter of the year 1870 any situation you were brought into with him in regard to the different Women's Suffrage Associations, or was that in 1869? A. That is in 1869, Sir.

Q. Well, how was that matter of these women's suffrage societies in the year 1869? A. In reference to him and me, or with reference to themselves?

Q. Yes, with reference to him and you, and your relations to the two societies—what were the two societies? A. My association—

Mr. Beach—I don't see, Sir, how his connections with the suffrage societies are important here, except so far as he had connection with Mr. Tilton concerning them.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is all I propose.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is with reference to that.

Mr. Evarts—It is very brief, and only in this connection.

The Witness—We co-operated on the subject up till 1869, he having meetings at his house of what was then the Equal Rights Association; there were several forms which it took in difference of names, but in 1869, what is called the Boston wing of the Female Suffragists had a convention in Cleveland, and formed a National Society, of which I was elected President, not knowing that there claimed to be another National Association in New-York by the New-York wing, and I thus found myself between two Female National Societies—I a President of the one, and I don't remember who was the President of the other; that after I had consented to let my name go before the Convention I recollect having discussions with Mr. Tilton, and that he was very urgent that I should not do it, and almost persuaded me to send a telegram withdrawing my name. After the formation of that society, and before the next May, a more thorough organization into a National Society by the absorption of the Equal Rights Society into a National one was formed by the New-York wing, and Mr. Tilton was elected the President of that, and in the May anniversaries of 1870 we appeared respectively at the head of our charges in two contiguous halls in New-York, and exchanged letters of courtesy, the overture proceeding from him to us, and then there was a courteous reply from us to him and his associates.

Mr. Beach—May anniversaries of 1870? A. May of 1870, I think it was.

MR. PAIGE'S PORTRAIT OF MR. BEECHER.

Mr. Evarts—There has a letter been put in evidence already, Mr. Beecher, from you to Mr. Tilton, on the subject of religious opinions or religious experience. [To plaintiff's counsel.] Have you got that letter? [Letter produced.] That is "Exhibit D, 64," as already marked; just look at that, if you please, so as to recall the nature of the letter to your mind. [Handing letter to witness.] A. I recall the letter.

Q. Now, that started by referring to a conversation, does it not? A. Yes.

Q. I will ask, however, another branch of the matter before I bring that in in that connection; I will go on now with these personal matters. You remember the occurrence of sitting for a portrait, to the artist Mr. Paige? A. I do.

Q. When was that? A. If you will allow me to look at my memorandum; I have got it here.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose there is no objection to his referring to his memorandum.

The Witness—It was this—1868-69; the Fall of 1868, and the Winter-Spring—early Winter—season of 1869.

Q. How did that come about between you and Mr. Tilton? A. I have no distinct recollection, except that he was desirous of having me go to Mr. Paige to sit for my portrait.

Q. Was Mr. Paige a friend of his? A. Yes, I suppose so, Sir; he spoke—he talked a good deal of him.

Q. Was he of yours before that time? A. Only in—he had married a woman from Hartford in whom all our family were interested, and I had met him a few times.

Q. Yes, and during what period, of what number of sittings, did you give this attention to that request? A. I can't give you the number.

Q. Well, was it considerable? A. It was a very great number; I should not—I would not be willing to say that it was more than fifty, but I should hardly be willing to say it was less.

Q. And was Mr. Tilton there at any times? A. Not unfrequently; several times, at any rate.

Q. And after that was finished, that portrait, did you see it in Mr. Tilton's house? A. I cannot say; my impressions are that I did.

MR. TILTON'S SERVICES IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, what was the relation between Mr. Tilton and yourself, and Plymouth Church, from your early acquaintance with him onward: when did he become a member of the church, and how was he as to sharing in the religious duties of the church, and its benevolent action in the early days? A. In the early days, Sir—I cannot say when he joined; it was early—my impression is that he joined the church before he was married, and he was married in 1851.

Q. 1855? A. No; his wife joined the church in 1851; I don't know the—I have no record or anything else of his joining it.

Q. Previous to his marriage? A. She joined it.

Q. Previous to his marriage? A. Well, I have very little recollection, Sir, of his connection with the church previous; I only know that at a very early day he was, for a limited period either the Superintendent or Second Superintendent of the Sunday-school, and I recollect that he used to be in our Friday night prayer meetings, which were conversation meetings, or conference meetings, as they call them in New-England, and used to take part both in speaking and in prayer, and I looked upon him as one of the men in the church that was destined to be very useful, and he continued to be useful, particularly in Sabbath-school work—well, I know not how many years.

Q. And up to about what time did this cordial or devout relation to the church continue? A. I think, Sir, that about the time Mr. Tilton began to be a public speaker he found himself so much absent and so much called upon that he gradually fell off from attending church—I should say somewhere before 1860—not that he absented himself or was regarded with disfavor, but that in the number of his employments, and in the nature of them, it was not in his way to be at church constantly as persons were that lived in town all the time.

Q. Well, when did you first know of any modification or changes of his religious opinions, on matters of faith or of church organization and action? A. Well, I think it was after he and I were on The Independent together, Sir.

Q. And were those matters among the subjects of your conversations and conferences? A. Not in the form perhaps which your question implies; the general themes of religious life and beliefs was a matter of conversation a great deal with us, more particularly in its relations to psychology, the practical development of it, and its adaptation to the times, the present time in which we live; I never recollect to have had a strictly doctrinal conversation with him—very likely my fault.

Q. Well, prior to the time at which this letter was written, which you perceive is 1867, had you become aware of changes in his religious faith or doubts in his mind concerning the substance of his former faith? A. I had.

Q. And in what way had you become aware of that? A. I found that his wife was distressed on the matter; I was called as pastor to confer about it; I never expostulated with him and so brought it out, and I accounted it simply that drift which a fruitful young mind takes often when passing through the transition from traditional beliefs to personal, and his own beliefs, and I believed that time and experience would certainly rectify it.

Q. And it was in that period that this letter was written? A. In that period, but the special occasion, if I do not misremember—I state it subject to correction—after assuming the responsibility of The Christian Union there appeared one or two articles—The Independent, I should have said. There appeared one or two articles which excited very great alarm, and, to my personal knowledge, excited distrust of him, which I thought was in over measure, and also was injuring the paper (and The Independent was always dear to me), and it was brought home to me, because in the North-West, where my brother, Dr. Edward Beecher, lives, I was held responsible for his aberrations.

Q. For Mr. Tilton's aberrations? A. For Mr. Tilton's; yes, Sir. That led me to have some conversations with him; I don't recall them individually; I only recall them as connected, partly with the anxiety of his household, and partly as connected with his success in the conduct of The Independent, and my general idea was not in the slightest degree to circumscribe his liberty of investigation, but to put him upon his guard against accepting and acting upon unripe conclusions.

Q. But it was in that stage of the relations on your part and his opinions, that this letter was written? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. CLEVELAND'S TESTIMONY TO BE TAKEN THIS EVENING.

Mr. Shearman—Will your Honor allow me to interrupt the proceedings to say that I understand that Mr. Morris is willing to go to-morrow afternoon, if that will suit your Honor, to take Mr. Cleveland's testimony, and we now stipulate in open court that the testimony may be taken at 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon; to proceed from day to day if necessary.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is not the stipulation, to proceed from day to day. It will be under your Honor's control when it gets before you.

Mr. Shearman—Oh, I didn't mean literally from day to day.

Mr. Evarts—From time to time.

Mr. Shearman—"From time to time" is preferable.

MR. BEECHER'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH THE MOULTONS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, did you form the acquaintance with Mr. Moulton at the time of your sittings for your picture at Paige's? A. I don't know that I can say exactly that, Sir; I had seen him before, but I really did not know who he was until I met him there.

Q. How did it come about that you fell into his company in that relation? A. Mr. Moulton had already sat to Paige for a very excellent likeness, and Mrs. Tilton had been sitting for one also, and several of the family friends, and Mr. Moulton was interested in them all—his partner, Mr. George Robinson, and his wife, I think, were among them—and he went up as one familiar there, and I think perhaps twice or three times we were thrown together, and on going out from the studio we walked all the way down to Fulton Ferry together, and the conversation was very pleasant to me, and created each time a desire to see more of him.

Q. Did you walk more than once in that way? A. I remember once significantly; but my impression is that there were several—

Q. Several times? A. I won't be sure.

Q. Did you find him to be an educated, cultivated man?

A. Yes, Sir; and an acute man, with a good critical turn of mind, fond of art—a connoisseur rather than an artist, and passionately fond, apparently, of literature—able to quote a great deal, a worshiper of James Russell Lowell, and of Shakespeare's sonnets.

Q. And you found him an agreeable companion? A. Most agreeable, Sir.

Q. And formed a respectful opinion of his abilities and culture? A. I did; a very high opinion.

Q. Now, up to the end of 1870, was that the extent and form of your acquaintance with Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir, as I remember.

Q. Prior to December, 1870, had you in any way formed an acquaintance with Mrs. Moulton? A. I knew her as I know a thousand persons, as seeing her in church and knowing her to belong to that set or neighborhood, but without being able to call her name, or more than that. My memory of names is poor, and I see so many people in so many places and am so little a pastor that I think it probable that one-half of my church whom I know to be my church members I could not call by name, and am acquainted with them only to that extent.

Q. You would recognize them as being members of your congregation, but not beyond? A. Yes, Sir; I should place them there.

Q. And that was all that you knew or saw of Mrs. Moulton prior to the time I have inquired about? A. Yes, Sir; I think it is; I don't remember anything else.

MR. BEECHER'S FIRST MEETINGS OF MRS. TILTON.

Q. Did you know Mrs. Morse, or Mrs. Richards as she then was, or her daughter Elizabeth, prior to the marriage of the latter? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. At the time of the marriage between Miss Richards and Mr. Tilton, of which the ceremony was performed by you, had you any knowledge of, or any personal acquaintance with, Mrs. Tilton? A. I only knew that she belonged to a set of girls that went to school together, and who associated with my daughter—not far from the same age—and that I used to hear Lizzie Richards spoken of among the girls—Annie Freedland and Hattie Beecher and Annie Howard, and all that class of young ladies that were growing up together, but I don't remember that I knew more than that.

Q. What is the age of your daughter, to whom you now refer? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Well, you know about it? A. No; I could not tell, I don't believe, within ten years. [Laughter.] She was born before I went to Indianapolis.

Q. Well, that will give us some idea. A. Yes, Sir; she was born before 184—what time did I say I went to Indianapolis?

Q. About 1840? A. No, 1836—

Q. About 1839, according to your chronology, you went to Indianapolis? A. Yes, Sir; well, she was nearly a year old then—if you will be kind enough to cipher.

Mr. Fullerton—She is about thirty-five.

Mr. Evans—Thirty-six or seven.

Mr. Beach—Oh, you are making her older than she is.

The Witness—That is a part of the domestic economy that I spoke of as being remitted to my wife's attention entirely. [Laughter.]

Q. And that is all that you knew about this young Miss Richards, that she belonged to that set of girls? A. That is all that I now recall.

Q. At the time of the wedding, therefore, your interest in the affair was mainly, so far as personal acquaintance went, in Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I remember that wedding as I would a beautiful picture; I was interested in Mr. Tilton, of course, and I was interested in the young lady, who was a member of my church, but I recall their coming into the church and their coming forward, and I recall distinctly feeling that it was one of the fairest pairs that I had ever married, and I had very strong sympathetic hopes for their future.

MR. TILTON SOLICITS VISITS FROM MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, after their marriage, when first did you come to be brought into their home? A. I could not say—not immediately.

Q. When they lived in Oxford street how much? A. I visited twice, I think, only, there.

Q. Only twice there? A. I think only twice. I remember once, and I have an impression of again.

Q. And that visit, was it upon invitation or upon a suggestion? A. I have no recollection about the circumstances.

Q. Nothing occurred that is of any moment? A. No, Sir; the circumstances are gone, except the fact that I did.

Q. After they removed to Mrs.—after they returned from Oxford street to Mrs. Morse's house, and before they went to their own house in Livingston street, did you then visit them? A. Yes, Sir; I visited them there quite frequently.

Q. That brought them nearer to your home? A. Nearer; and I had been also gently and very kindly urged by Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, in what form and at what time was it that Mr. Tilton began to invite or desire your visits to his house? A. I have not particularly looked back, but I should say, from my general impression of it, that it was as early as 1860, or about that time—when we began to be together a good deal in our editorial relations—perhaps it might have been a little earlier than that.

Q. But, as a matter of fact, not until after they went to Mrs. Morse's from Oxford-st. were you in the habit of visiting there? A. I don't think I was, Sir.

Q. How did Mr. Tilton speak on the subject of desiring your visits at his house, or your better acquaintance with his wife? A. Well, he spoke very admiringly and simply of her; I mean by simply, I recollect having a pleasant feeling of how every man thinks that he has found the one woman of all the world; I recollect once, when he had been talking to me, thinking what a blessed constitution that was; and I recollect another time when he spoke of himself as being the fortunate diver of all others—he had brought up the pearl—and I recollect his speaking in this wise on one occasion: "You have no idea what a wife I have got;" and I have heard him say—he said to me on divers occasions: "Why don't you come down and see me just as you do your other friends?" I made the same reply to him that I make to a great many that have given me such invitations. He said: "We will do just as much for you as they will." And I replied: "I am afraid you will do too much; that is my great trouble in visiting where there is excitement; I cannot bear it in addition to my other work, and I must go where there is quiet." "Well," said he, "you shall be just as quiet as you are a mind to; we won't do anything for you." And on other occasions I recollect he said of his wife: "There is one little woman down at my house that loves you more than you have any idea of." And I heard him say on another occasion: "Lib"—no, something to this effect: "You have as fast a friend in Lib as one needs;" or something to that effect.

MR. BEECHER'S GIFTS TO MRS. TILTON.

Q. When did you first come to have a personal acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton, so that you understood her qualities of mind and character? A. I think it must have been subsequent to 1860; I have no very vivid recollection of visits made there, although I—that is, no special recollection; I have a general recollection that I was there more and more frequently, going there—

Q. Up to what period is it that you have no recollection? A. Up to the period 1863.

Q. Yes? A. On returning from Europe I recollect distinctly thinking of the personal friends to whom I should like to give a little souvenir of my foreign journey, and her name occurred to me, which could not have been unless I had been more or less in the habit of frequent, or quite frequent, intercourse.

Q. Did you on your return from Europe bring a variety of souvenirs for various persons? A. Yes, Sir; I brought moss-agates and garnets and various wood carvings—all that bric-a-bac folly that travelers that have never been abroad but once bring home with them.

Q. And on that occasion did you make a gift to Mrs. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. Of what? A. A topaz—a Brazilian topaz brooch.

Q. And you remember the fact and the occasion? A. I do. When I gave it to her she thought it was a pill-box that I had brought home from her husband, with pills. [Laughter.]

Q. Spoke of it in that way? A. Yes, Sir; I gave it to her and she did not look at it, and I was going away and I said to her, "Hadn't you better look at that?" and she opened it and burst out laughing—an immoderate laugh—and said I, "What is the matter?" I was a little abashed. "Well," she said, "I asked Dorey to bring me home some pills, and I thought he had sent them home by you." [Laughter.]

Q. Before that time do you remember any occasion of any gift or remembrancer from you? A. No, Sir. I had made presents to her husband, but not to her that I remember.

Q. When was it that the picture of the trailing arbutus was given—was that before this? A. That depends—that was about the time that they moved into their new house.

Q. They went into new house in 1866? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was my impression. Now, during the period while they were living at Mrs. Morse's, before they moved into the present Livingston-st. house, had you become an habitual visitor at their house, or was it subsequent to that after they went into the Livingston-st. house? A. I visited them a good deal at their house at Mrs. Morse's; I don't know but that I visited them as much there as I did subsequently.

Q. After their moving into their house, 174 Livingston-st., as it is now called, I think, do you remember an occasion of the gift of a picture and to whom that gift was made by you of a picture? A. I do not recall at this moment any picture but that of the trailing arbutus.

Q. Well, that was a picture? A. Yes, Sir; that was a very beautiful picture.

Q. Yes. Well, what was the presentation of that? A. Do you mean what was the history that led to it?

Q. What was the manner or form in which it was given? A. I was—I had written "Norwood," and in the earlier chapters of it I was about in despair, and I needed somebody or other that would not be critical, and that would praise it, to give me courage to go on with it, and I recollect going down to Mrs. Tilton once or twice in the opening chapters and read them to her, to see what impression they would produce. She was good enough to speak very enthusiastically of them, and was particularly delighted with that scene in which the heroine was born, when the old doctor had gone out into the fields and gathered a crown of trailing arbutus, and laid it by the side of the bed, that when the child was born she should find her crown, or he, as the case might be. She was especially delighted with that idea; and when the subsequent—the next time I visited Boston, and saw this by Miss Robbins—

Q. This picture? A. This picture—a charming one—it recalled her admiration of that chapter, and, partly as a contribution to the new house, and partly as a souvenir of that literary interview, I took it down and gave it to her.

Q. In what form or manner was it given? A. I don't remember in any other way than I would give a picture to anybody.

Q. Well, did you put it yourself where it was hung? A. I have some recollection of counseling about that—I think, though, I set it upon the mantelpiece in the back parlor, and subsequently it was hung—I do not—

Q. Hung in that parlor? A. Yes.

Q. It was a framed picture? A. Yes, Sir; a picture about two feet long and about eight or ten inches wide, one of these long, side-long pictures.

Q. And it was a decoration on the wall of the house? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect its hanging there, and I recollect being afterwards there when it was not there.

Q. These presents that you brought from Europe were not confined to your own family? A. Oh! no, Sir.

Q. They extended to— A. I presented I suppose thirty or forty.

Q. Among your acquaintances? A. Yes, Sir; among the children of the families where I had been intimate, and among persons that I had frequently met, and with whom I had, in various ways, labored.

MR. BEECHER'S VISITS TO THE LIVINGSTON-ST. HOUSE.

Q. Now, during the period of the residence of this family at their last house in Livingston-st., what was the manner of your visits there, Mr. Beecher, say on to the year 1870? A. I cannot exactly tell the manner, because I don't know as there was any special manner, one way or the other. I know that the Post-Office used to be on the corner—near the corner of Washington-st. and Court, and that my habit was then to go down and take my letters—after I had got through my morning study—to take my letters in my hands, and read them as I went along, and drop in there for a half hour in the morning, or along there, and then make any little calls that I wanted to make, and frequently I rounded—I went over the ferry to New-York, and came back home to my dinner. It was a little exercise—a walk after my literary work of the morning.

Q. Was your habit then to complete your work in the morning? A. I have always been an early riser and an early worker.

Q. And you completed your literary work early? A. Yes, Sir; by ten o'clock I usually am done with my study.

Q. And then you went out for recreation or exercise? A. Yes, Sir, for exercise, or on errands, or to my editorial work, or any other.

Q. So that whatever calls you did make at this house were, as you understand, at that time of day, and in that connection? A. In the immense majority of instances.

Q. Now, have you any recollection, Mr. Beecher, of any habit of calling there in the evening, or of calls there in the evening? A. No, Sir; I do not, except when there was company, or some consultation committee; in the years 1867, 1868, and 1869 I may have been there a few times, but it was not only contrary to my habit, but it was impossible; my evenings are mostly engaged in speaking, or in equivalent work.

Q. So that you had no habit of making calls in the evening anywhere? A. No, Sir.

Q. Your familiar calls with others—with other families of your intimates, were they in the daytime usually? A. Almost always, unless I strolled up to friend Howard's in the evening, after meeting with him, but the ordinary little neighborhood calls that I made usually, I made about 5 o'clock in the afternoon—I mean near people, near calls.

Q. How frequently did you see Mr. Tilton at his own house, do you think? A. I should think as often—he was there as often as he was not there; that is, I should think that half the time he might have been there, and half the time not, just as the case would be. When he worked in his own house—wrote, as he often did—then he would be at home.

Q. At those hours of your calls? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, early in the year 1870, taking Mrs. Tilton out to drive? A. I do.

Q. And how did the first occasion of that courtesy arise? A. I don't know how it arose; I only know I had bought a pair of fine grays, and it was not yet time to go up to my place, so I was keeping them here for a week or two; I went down one bright morning in the buggy and took her out to the Park; the only other time I recollect was—I don't know whether a fortnight later, but I met Mrs. Morse in the meantime, and she praised me, and begged that I would give Lib a ride, for I had no idea how much good it did her; and before I took the horses up to the farm—

Q. You went there a second time after this conversation with Mrs. Morse? A. I did.

Q. Whom did you see there then? A. Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And Mr. Tilton? A. Him first; I think he was in the window when I drove up, and he saw me come up; I did not get out of the buggy; he talked with me there on various things, that I don't remember; I said to him, "I have come to take Lib out to ride," or "your wife out to ride;" and he called her to the door; she was within the house; I then spoke to her and said, "Mrs. Tilton, I have called to see if you would not like to ride;" she declined, and he playfully reproached her and said: "Go, get your things—go! go! and get your things and take a ride;" thereupon she went in and came out, and I took her to ride.

Q. Did you say at this time anything about what her mother had said? A. I do not recollect.

Q. Now, during that year, 1870, prior to December, do you remember an occasion of being sent for to visit Mrs. Tilton—in August of that year is the time I refer to? A.

August of 1870 I was at Peekskill, and I received a little note from her, saying—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Evarts—Have you that note? A. No, Sir.

Q. What became of it? A. I do not know, Sir.

Q. Is it lost or destroyed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was not preserved? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, what of it? A. At her request I went to see her.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, Mr. Beecher. [After consulting with Mr. Beach.] There is no objection.

Mr. Evarts—I don't ask you what was in it? A. It was simply a request, that being sick she wished I would come and see her.

Q. Did you know she was sick before? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect that I did.

Mr. Beach—Did he say when this was?

Mr. Fullerton—August, 1870.

Mr. Evarts—August, 1870? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was the 4th of August.

Q. You were at Peekskill during vacation. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In your vacation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long was it since you had seen her, do you remember? A. I do not remember.

Q. How long had you been up to Peekskill then? A. I can't say from any positive remembrance; I can only judge from my habit.

Q. And you knew nothing to the contrary of your having left here at the usual time that year? A. No, Sir, I had been probably there a fortnight or three weeks.

Q. Did you visit her when you came to town, or did you come to town on purpose? A. I had some other errands, but I came principally on that account, to see her.

Q. What time did you visit her, and how did you find the condition of her health? A. I found her lying in the up-stairs, second story, front room—the receiving room of the house, on the sofa, and she looked very pale and sick, and seemed to be very despondent, and she made some statements to me of her— No, it was not then; I do not recall any particular conversation we had then, except that she said that she was very much depressed in spirits, and she seemed to me like one that wanted to talk, and didn't.

Mr. Beach—I must object, Sir, to such remarks as that. I move to strike all that out.

Judge Neilson—I think the last remark must be stricken out.

Mr. Evarts—It is not important.

[To the Witness]—Well, did she confer with you? A. She conferred with me; not at any considerable length; and I then prayed with her and cheered her the best way I could.

Q. And left? A. And left.

Q. Did you see her again? A. I called the next day.

Q. Well, did you then see her? A. No, Sir.

Q. What occurred in respect of that visit? A. I sent my name up, and the girl brought down a little bit of paper—a scrap—in which she said something like this, that it was best she should not see me to-day, but that she believed that the future would—that all would be right, or something, in the future.

Q. And that scrap of paper you did not keep? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, during that Summer and Fall, prior to December, had you any—did you make any visits to or have any interview or meeting with Mrs. Tilton prior to December, 1870—after this August? A. Prior to December?

Q. Prior to December? A. No, Sir.

Q. What time did you return to the city yourself—the usual time? A. I suppose so.

Q. That would be about—? A. October.

Q. October. You have spoken of your coming back after your hay-fever, in October. Do you recover entirely from that malady when you return, or how long does it trouble you? A. Nobody is said to be themselves again until after they have had a very hard frost; but I got so that I could preach the last of September, but I was all the month of October so much invalidated that I always refused lectures, or, as a general thing, I refused lectures until after I went to the White Mountains; I refused to do anything in September and October.

Q. Did the impression of the disease remain upon you during October? A. Yes, Sir; it was all I could possibly do to go through my Sunday services.

Q. During that month? A. During the month of October; although I was gaining gradually every week, all the way.

Q. After clear weather? A. After November set in I always felt I was myself again.

MR. BEECHER SEES MRS. TILTON AT HER MOTHER'S.

Q. Now, in December, at, or about, or before the middle of December, 1870, did you have an interview with Mrs. Tilton, and if so, where and under what circumstances? A. I don't know; I have an impression that I did not see Mrs. Tilton after my return; I have an impression that she was out of town; but the first distinct recollection which I have of seeing her is somewhere about the middle of December, and in consequence of a request from her mother.

Q. And by what message and by what messenger were you apprised of her wish to see you? A. Bessie Turner came to my house.

Q. Came to your house, and did you learn where Mrs. Tilton then was? A. I did; that she was at her mother's.

Q. Did you know it before? A. I did not.

Q. Had you before that heard or known of any disposition or purpose of her separating from her husband in any way? A. I never had.

Q. Then what Bessie Turner said to you then was the first intimation or information on the subject that you had? A. It was a revelation; I never dreamed of it before that I know of.

Q. Now, what did Miss Turner say to you on that occasion?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Sir. [Consults with Mr. Fullerton.] We object to this question, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Consulted with Mr. Tracy and Mr. Shearman. Judge Neilson—How is that evidence, Mr. Everts?

Mr. Everts—My learned friends were in considerable doubt whether they would object, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—We have no doubt, however, about the validity of the objection.

Mr. Everts—I suppose so; nor of the validity of the evidence, if you had not objected.

Mr. Fullerton—No, if we had consented.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor thinks it is not admissible!

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Everts—I suppose it is admissible, at least to the extent that in consequence of what was said to him by Miss Turner he went to see Mrs. Tilton?

Judge Neilson—Oh, yes.

Mr. Everts—Well, the details of the conversation, not being allowed to be given, was the result of that, that you visited Mrs. Tilton? A. It was.

Q. Did you, before going, confer with any one else on the subject, or take any one with you? A. Not that I recall; I do not recall speaking to any one of it, and I know I did not take any one with me.

Q. You went to Mrs. Tilton's? A. I went to Mrs. Morse's, and found Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And Mrs. Morse also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see them together, or Mrs. Tilton alone? A. Both; on the first visit, I think, I saw them together.

Q. And not Mrs. Tilton apart? A. That is my impression, Sir.

Q. Now, what was the interview between Mrs. Tilton and yourself on that occasion?

A CONVERSATION BETWEEN MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir. [Consults Mr. Fullerton.] We object to that evidence, Sir.

Mr. Everts—I suppose, if your Honor please, the intercourse between the defendant and Mrs. Tilton is the very issue in this case, concerning which any witness that saw them together could testify; and by the same necessity Mr. Beecher himself, being a witness of what passed between them, within his hearing and under his eye, can testify to any intercourse between himself and Mrs. Tilton, during the period of their acquaintance and before the period of this accusation in the end of December, and afterwards, I suppose, also—but certainly before then, as a direct matter in issue in this cause.

Judge Neilson—Even to the extent of their conversation?

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir; that is, their intercourse; if a witness had heard it he could testify about it here.

Mr. Beach—That is a proposition we dispute.

Mr. Everts—It has no relation, as we understand it, to the question of hearsay evidence. It does not prove that anything Mrs. Tilton said was true, but it proves the intercourse between this defendant, who is accused of improper relations with this lady, and the lady herself, and we have a right I suppose to prove every single act and word that passed between them.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to prove every act, and you can also prove that this witness called on her, saw Mrs. Tilton, either with or without her mother, upon the subject of this separation, or any other subject, and you can add to that whatever did not occur. It seems to me that that is the extent of the interrogatory.

Mr. Everts—The definite way of ascertaining what did occur, affirmatively, and what did not occur, is by showing all that did occur; and I suppose that in this conversation, or others, so far as I know or understand the matter, what your Honor has referred to is all that is substantially material. Mrs. Tilton's statements to this witness, any more than to any other witness, would not be evidence against Mr. Tilton, against her husband here.

Judge Neilson—My only difficulty is the conversation.

Mr. Everts—But as an interview between this defendant and Mrs. Tilton, as a matter of direct affirmative proof of the relations between them, this interview, in common with every interview, it seems to me, may be portrayed in all its circumstances and all its interchanges and words.

Judge Neilson—Can it be done without the conversation; can it be done by the conversation? I think not.

Mr. Everts—The conversation is substantially the action of these two parties towards one another.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—I understand the gentleman to have conceded, Sir, that the declarations made by Mrs. Tilton to the defendant at that time would not be competent evidence of the truth of the facts alleged. If not, upon what principle is it that her declarations are receivable? Why does the gentleman say that all the intercourse between these two parties by the nature of this litigation becomes competent evidence unless that evidence of such intercourse proves the facts which it covers? Now, I deny, Sir, the proposition that the nature of this action, or any rule of evidence, authorizes the defendant to give proof of his intercourse, conversation or actions as connected with Mrs. Tilton. We may give them in evidence; it is admissible upon our part as a portion of our accusing case; but they can give no part of that intercourse—especially no part of the conversation which occurred between these parties in the absence of Mrs. Tilton. Unless the gentleman can furnish us with some authority, or present to your Honor some principle upon which your Honor can see that this general intercourse and these general conversations may be given in proof, in violation of the ordinary rule, why we submit to your Honor they should be excluded. Certainly the ordinary principles of evidence will exclude them; and I can see nothing in the nature of this action, as yet at least, which will justify the defendant accused of adultery, to exonerate himself by showing conversations he may have had with the victim of his adultery, and producing her declarations in exoneration of himself, if they have been made. Now, I am not disposed to deny, Sir, that where an accusation of this kind is made, the general association of the accused parties, their habits of intercourse when they meet, may be given in evidence, because they are acts which to a very great degree might enable one to draw inferences in regard to the nature of the intercourse or fellow feeling which existed between them; and that, I think, is a very considerable concession in favor of the defense; but I shall not be inclined to deny the admissibility of evidence to that extent. But beyond that I submit to your Honor it is not competent.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—We are entitled, if your Honor please, aside from the ground I have stated (and I do not perceive that my learned friend answers the proposition), that all the conduct between Mr. Beecher and this lady, if it could be portrayed by witnesses, from the time of their first knowledge of each other down to this period of which I am now inquiring, can be given before your Honor and the jury as bearing upon the question; that every act, every word being disclosed, then the conclusion was to be drawn whether there had been guilt, or whether there was innocence. Now, no one would doubt that, if that were possible in human evidence, we should have the perfect means of determining what the relation between this defendant and this lady was and has been from the first time he saw her until the last moment when he was accused. That is not possible; but it is possible, under the present rules of evidence that permits parties to interviews, although they also may be parties to the suit, to be witnesses of what occurred under their own observation, and in their own hearing—to wit, interviews in which they took part, to bring before a court and jury whatever human memory can remember and human language can reproduce; and I apprehend that there never has been any doubt, since this trial was commenced, that what did occur between this defendant and this lady, during the period of their acquaintanceship, was the very matter out of which was to be drawn the conclusion of the jury, whether or no there had been at any moment a guilty act, a guilty word, or a guilty purpose. Now I produce this interview as under that common and general head, and I have heard nothing in the observations of my learned friend that tends to shake my confidence in that proposition. Of course counsel would not produce anything unless they thought it had some significance, either for or against the charge of guilt. It is not to occupy time nor to spread trivialities before the jury; but in an entirely different relation this evidence is admissible. We are entitled to show it, or else justice never can be administered in respect to this defendant toward this plaintiff, unless in approaching their intervention on this direct field of accusation, such as it may have been, the regrets or explanations, such as they may have been—the actual dealings between this defendant and this lady, known to the plaintiff, are also spread before this jury. So that when you come to the crisis of determination—what conclusions are to be drawn from what passed on the 30th of December, or the 31st of December, or the 1st of January, the attitude, the relation, moral, intellectual, actual, between these three parties may be in your Honor's mind, and in the jurors' minds, and before their eyes, as it was in the mind and before the eyes of this defendant, and form the subject and the inspiring cause of whatever he said or did, whatever he lamented, whatever he regretted. Now, if the matter that passed in the action of this wife, resenting her husband's treatment, and unfolding to her pastor her relations with him (her husband), and then what passed between the pastor and the wife, cannot be brought into evidence, why, then, they who are to judge over both Mr. Tilton in what he knew and what he did, and Mr. Beecher in what he knew and what he did, are to have excluded from their mind their intelligence, their power of appreciation, their power of analysis, their power of intellectual conclusions—what enters into the very marrow of the matter they are here to determine. Now, I have said, and it is too familiar to repeat, that what is recited to a person in the absence of another person does not bind that other person; but it is, nevertheless, just as distinct a fact in its being said to him, and producing upon his mind impressions and results, whether it binds third persons or not. If a messenger from the street rushes into the parlor of a peaceful citizen, and accosts him by saying that he has seen his neighbor coming out of his store with a sword red with the blood of the son of the man to whom he is talking, and that man rises and goes out with a pistol and meets this neighbor with the bloody sword and slays him, it may have been all a lie in respect to the information that was conveyed, or all a mistake; but upon the mental and moral fact that the conduct of the man in going into the street, and meeting and slaying a supposed enemy, whose sword was red with the blood of his son, is to be given in evidence, and has nothing to do with the question of hearsay evidence as affecting third persons—the question is on what statements and on what conclusions or actions from those statements is the conduct which is the subject of inquiry.

based. Now, your Honor and the jury are sufficiently familiar with the general nature of this important fact and state of the relations between Mr. Beecher and this plaintiff at which we have now arrived, and every one sees that the conduct of a wife in thus voluntarily making an issue and a separation from her husband, and resorting with complaints against him to the advice of Mr. Beecher, who stood in the relation of a friend of both, and her pastor, is a fact of grave import, as bearing upon the conclusions which rational men will draw upon the evidence that bears in the direction that at that time this wife was conscious of continued criminality on her part as toward her husband, or continued criminality on her part as with Mr. Beecher. Now, if the fact is an important fact, why then this is a clear mode of proving that fact, and it is the highest mode; it is the highest to this trial; it is the highest to Mr. Beecher, because it shows exactly what the situation was, and what its impression upon his mind, and is in place to have a due operation upon it, and subsequent interviews between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, in which the whole matter of the general relations between Mr. Beecher and the wife of Mr. Tilton forms the only subject and occasion of the interviews, and everything antecedent to the night of the 30th of December that is significant in respect to the dealing or the intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, in the relation of his family, of his interests, whatever they may be in his family, or in his business, is necessarily a composite part of the affair concerning which the interview of the 30th of December was held and about which it is to be judged. And I confess I am quite surprised at hearing an objection on the part of this plaintiff and his counsel to spreading facts which were operative upon Mr. Beecher's mind, and operative upon Mr. Tilton's mind, in this family crisis of Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Beecher's relation to it, and Mr. Tilton's resentments at it, that would exclude that from a trial which has for its purpose to get at the truth, without fear and without favor, as to whether there has been a great crime committed on the part of Mr. Beecher, or whether there has been either a combination of errors and delusions, or of malignant purpose, that has set up the show and appearance of criminality for the purposes of the prosecution. Now, give us the facts; and no man can feel that he can deal justly with the situation between these parties, as it is presented on the 30th of December, when they come together, without being put in possession of what constitutes in the mind of each the relations of each to the other in respect to the family of Mr. Tilton. In the case of Gilchrist agt. Bale, (8 Watts, 366; Penn. Supreme Court Reports):

In an action for enticing plaintiff's wife from him, defendants, to disprove the allegation in the declaration that she deserted her husband by their advice and solicitation, offered to prove by her physician that about ten days before she left her husband she complained of his ill-treatment and showed marks on her arms which she said she received from his beating her, and asked what she should do, and he advised her to leave her husband. Held, that these declarations of the wife were admissible in connection with the advice given her by the witness. The general rule that the declarations of a husband and of a wife cannot be received in evidence against each other ["which was the only ground taken against it there,"] either civilly or criminally, cannot be extended to all possible cases, for where no confidence has been violated the law admits of some exceptions.

Now, there you have the precise situation.

Mr. Fullerton—The doctor was not the defendant there, I believe.

Mr. Evarts—That don't make any difference.

Mr. Fullerton—It does make all the difference.

Mr. Evarts—What difference does it make?

Mr. Fullerton—We will tell you soon.

Mr. Evarts—Not in the least. Here is a witness, who is a good witness; whatever he knows, he can swear to. Argument for allowing him to testify, in that he is the party out of whose lips or from whose pen is to be drawn inferences compatible only with guilty relations, when the actual situation of this party to this wife and this husband, and this husband to this wife, is to constitute the determining gauge as to what the relation was, only adds to the importance, and an independent ground why he (this defendant) should be heard. In the 21 Barbour, in our own reports (Bennett v. Smith, 21 Barbour, 439; Supreme Court Reports, 1856; opinion by T. R. Strong, J.):

In an action for enticing away plaintiff's wife, Held that the main question being whether defendant prevented the return of the wife to her husband at a certain period, within a few days after the marriage, the declarations of the wife then made expressing her wishes in relation to living with plaintiff as his wife, were admissible as part of the res gestæ in connection with other circumstances tending to prove that she was not then under restraint.

[Reading from Hadley v. Carter, 8 N. H., 40, 1835; opinion by Upham, J.]

Action by master for enticing away servant. Held, that though declarations of a servant, generally, would be inadmissible as hearsay, yet when they were made at the time of his leaving plaintiff's employ and expressive of motive for so doing, they were part of the res gestæ, and admissible. In this case his declarations were his communications to the witness of his design to leave, stating his reasons and asking advice.

I don't myself see the force of the other objection. A party can testify like any other witness anything he knows, I suppose.

ANSWERING ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—I should have been content to have left this question to your Honor's decision without any argument, had it not been for the labored effort of my learned friend, and for the general reflections which he has made in the address to your Honor. Let us first see, Sir, what is the principle announced by the counsel, and what would be its effect upon the general rule of evidence; because, except so far as the doctrine of cotemporaneous complaints, referred to in the last authorities produced by my friend, this question is to be determined in its application to this case precisely the same as to any other issue. My friend says, Sir, and I agree with that proposition, that if we could spread before your Honor, as by a vivid picture of art, all the intercourse between these parties from the time of its commencement to its iniquitous consummation, your Honor and the jury would be able more accurately to judge of the truth of the accusation made by this issue. Well, Sir, that same remark may be made in regard to any issue, no matter what the controversy may be between parties. If it could be presented in all its ramifications and incidents with the clearness and vividness of high pictorial art, why a court and jury could judge perhaps with more accuracy than under those rules of evidence which the wisdom and experience of the past have established. Now, Sir, that vague and dreamy and general way of arguing a legal proposition does not belong to this place and occasion. We are acting under fixed and established rules. It is impossible for us to get that perfect conception of any case which the gentleman supposes, and he admits the impossibility. We must get, then, our conceptions of this case in subordination to those rules and principles established for the administration of justice; and, applying those rules, what part of my friend's address has any application to the question before your Honor? They propose to give in evidence the declarations of this gentleman upon the stand and his alleged mistress, the wife of this plaintiff, in hostility to him. He was not present; they were not repeated to him; in no form have they received his approbation or acknowledgment; yet the accused party will be, if my friend's proposition succeeds, permitted not only to give the conferences and the confidences between himself and his alleged mistress in opposition to the husband, and in violation of a known and acknowledged principle of evidence; what more, Sir! This is to be done, Sir, after, under this proof, the fact of this seduction is established. They propose to give these communications between these guilty parties six months after the wife made her confession of the adultery. They are to be given in evidence two years after the witness on the stand made that confession, or a confession of an adultery committed two years before; and what is your Honor asked to authorize and approve? The parties against whom this evidence of adultery has been given, sufficient to carry this question to the jury, and upon which your Honor must judge, they are to be permitted to give in proof the conferences and confidences as between the guilty parties, in the absence of the accuser, to answer the charge. Well, now, my friend may be surprised that the objection should be made to testimony of this character on the part of the plaintiff; but, Sir, the proposition appears to me to be astounding. Upon what principle will you do it? Are all the interviews, and is all the spoken intercourse between these parties open to examination upon this issue, as different from any other issue as between the parties? Does a different rule of evidence apply to cases of this kind, except in the particular to which the authorities presented by my friend allude—that is, cotemporaneous complaints, where the wife has been enticed from her husband, or deserts her house? I admit them to be competent, but this class of evidence now offered, Sir, falls under no such exception; but in the cases presented by my learned friend, the declaration is made that these communications between the parties and the declarations of the wife are not to be admitted generally, but only with the limitation of the particular circumstances to which they are applied. Now, your Honor has been appealed to, Sir, upon the ground of truth and justice, and my friend makes loud sounding interrogatories as to why we should be opposed to presenting to this court and jury all the facts. It hardly becomes the counsel, Sir, after the history of this trial, to indulge a reflection of that character. There has been very little effort upon the part of this plaintiff to exclude the facts. There have been very persistent and continual attempts upon the part of this defense to accomplish that object. We ask not to exclude the facts. We are perfectly willing that they should prove the fact of this gentleman's visit to Mrs. Tilton. If he chooses, he may prove any other fact which may be material to this issue, which will enlighten this jury in their deliberations. What we object to is, Sir, that these antagonistic parties, standing together in communion and confederacy in this court, co-operating against this plaintiff, shall be permitted to give their own declarations, made in our absence, in antagonism to us, and we ask your Honor to reflect whether that will be either in the pursuit of law or in the pursuit of truth or justice. I object to this evidence, Sir.

JUDGE NEILSON'S DECISION.

Judge Neilson—There is no doubt but that the defendant can testify in this matter precisely as any other witness can testify, and that it is competent for him to state the occasions of his visits, what called him there, and other circumstances connected with them, whom he saw, what occurred, and finally to add anything, upon interrogatory, that did not occur, and so give the jury, as far as that will enable him to do so, the character of the interview and of the intercourse. My only doubt from the first has been about receiving evidence of the independent conversations, conversations that do not form a part of any particular act. I was aware that there had been cases where on the occasion of a wife deserting her husband, her declaration assigning a cause was to be received, because it was a part of the act; and the cases cited are quite as apt. I should be very sorry indeed to make any extreme ruling in this matter; but I think it leaves you free to prove what occurred to prove visits, and sufficiently to indicate their character, sufficiently to meet the imputation that anything wrong occurs, and all that without giving the conversation. That is how I feel as to this evidence.

THE OBJECTION WITHDRAWN AND THE CONVERSATION RECEIVED.

Mr. Beach—I now withdraw the objection and permit the conversation to be given. [Stir in the audience.]

Judge Nelson—Will the audience please be quiet!

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, you were down at the house, and saw Mrs. Morse and Mrs. Tilton, and you were alone with them, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, be so good as to state what occurred there. A. The conversation was very little with Mrs. Tilton; it was almost entirely on the part of Mrs. Morse, in Mrs. Tilton's presence. It consisted in the general representation to me of the great unhappiness of that family.

Q. Of Mr. Tilton's family? A. Of Mr. Tilton's family; of his treatment of his wife, which she had borne, as the mother thought, with angelic patience, until it was no longer tolerable; and that, at last, she had been driven to the resolution of leaving him, and they wished counsel of me as it respects the propriety of such an act as that. I made comparatively few remarks; the interview was not long; I said, "This is a case in which I feel that a man can't give the best counsel; it is a case, it seems to me, where a woman is needed; and if you will allow me I shall be glad to bring my wife and let her hear, for I think much of her judgment about such things." Mrs. Morse—they both seemed quite excited, pleasantly; Mrs. Morse said, "Will she come? I will bless her, if she will come, as long as I live;" I said, "Surely she will come if I wish her;" and that constitutes—about that—the first interview.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I ought to say that, having withdrawn my objection and permitted this conversation to be given, that the same principle of action will lead me to withdraw the objection which I made to an interview between the witness and Miss Bessie Turner. I do withdraw that objection, and offer to the counsel the privilege of proving all that was said at that interview.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. The relation of what took place there ought to be stated with particularity, not in general terms, that Mrs. Morse made great complaints against Mr. Tilton in regard to the family.

Mr. Beach—We will get at that.

Mr. Evarts—You have a right to cross-examine on that. I have no objection. I will ask him [to the witness], can you state more particularly, Mr. Beecher, that conversation? A. I don't think I can, Sir; I have only a general recollection of it.

MRS. BEECHER'S ADVICE TO THE TROUBLED WIFE.

Q. Now, when did you next see Mrs. Tilton in connection with this subject, and with whom, and what occurred then? A. I think it was the next day, Sir; with my wife I visited them.

Q. You communicated to your wife what had happened, I suppose? A. I did.

Q. And then you went together? A. We went together.

Q. And whom did you see? A. Mrs. Morse and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. What occurred then? A. I am not clear as to the whole. The two circumstances that I recall are that after a few general remarks—and what they were I don't remember—Mrs. Tilton went up stairs with my wife, and they had an interview by themselves, Mrs. Morse staying with me, and repeating—

Q. Well, no matter. A. Charges and so on. Then after, I should think, about a half hour, Mrs. Tilton came down, and Mrs. Morse—

Q. Did Mrs. Beecher come with her? A. No, Sir; and Mrs. Morse went up to see her by herself, leaving her—

Q. Went up to see Mrs. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir—and myself. I have a recollection of only one single thing that I said to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. When alone? A. When alone. "How is it," I said, "that I have been so long with you and you never alluded before to me about distress in your household?" And she said that she—her general answer—I cannot give her words—was that she sought to conceal, in the hope that the difficulty would pass away; and then I talked to her in respect to the household relations. I recollect giving her some counsel as to bearing and continuing patient. "Let patience have her perfect work," and I joined with her in prayer, and most of the time that I was with her I was praying with her.

Q. On this occasion? A. While my wife and Mrs. Morse—their interview was not a prolonged one—up stairs.

Q. Well, did your wife and Mrs. Morse return to the room where Mrs. Tilton was? A. I don't remember about Mrs. Morse. My wife came down stairs, and after some few general remarks we said—I said, in behalf of myself and wife, that we would think this over and in a very short time give them some final word, that probably we would see them again.

Q. And then you left? A. Then I left, and the day, following that we had talked it all over between ourselves—

Q. That is Mrs. Beecher and yourself? A. Mrs. Beecher and I, and we agreed substantially in regard to the whole duty of the household and the relations of husbands and wives, and I said to her: "It is better that you should"—

Mr. Beach—To whom?

The Witness—What, Sir.

Mr. Beach—To whom did you say?

The Witness—The relation of husbands and wives—

Mr. Beach—To whom did you speak?

The Witness—I was talking to my wife at home after counselling with her.

Mr. Beach—I think we had better not have that conversation in detail.

Mr. Evarts—No; that I agree.

The Witness—After that consultation with my wife she was to go down again, and she went down while I was in company.

Q. That is, when you had company at your house? A. Yes, Sir; I was talking with several; she had her things on; she came and asked me—told me that she was going down. I could not allude to the subject without betraying it. I went to my table and wrote a little scrap, saying—

Mr. Beach—That has been put in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Beach—I thought it had.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no; it has not.

Mr. Evarts—Well, here it is. It is in our minds, you know, because it is in the statement.

Mr. Beach—Well, I should be very sorry to believe that was evidence.

Mr. Evarts—How do you suppose it got in there?

Mr. Beach—It must be through you, I think.

The Witness—[Taking the note]—I wrote her this note.

Q. You gave that to your wife to take to— A. I gave that to my wife, not to be read to them, but as my judgment to her as to what I thought was best to be done—in that sense sent to them.

Mr. Beach—Do you know whether this was presented to Mrs. Tilton from your own knowledge?

The Witness—Only from my wife's statement.

Mr. Beach—We must object to that, gentlemen.

Mr. Evarts—You did not go with your wife, Mr. Beecher? A. I did not.

Q. Were you detained by your company or—? A. No Sir, not altogether; I was by my company, but I felt as though she—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Evarts—Whether you would have gone but for your company, or was Mrs. Beecher—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. I object to the question.

Mr. Evarts—Did you give this to your wife as your conclusion upon the right and duty of Mrs. Tilton? A. I did.

A. And this expresses the conclusion that you then came to? A. Yes, Sir.

[Mr. Beach and Mr. Evarts here consulted together, looking at the letter.]

Mr. Evarts—Well, you may state as far as this—if that expresses the conclusion you came to and the advice you gave so far as that goes—without reference to the latter part of it. [Showing witness a portion of the letter.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was the conclusion and advice as to what ought to be done? A. That was the conclusion, and the balance is the reasons that I gave.

Q. Exactly. Leave that out. The conclusion as to the advice, what was best to be done? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Now, you can read that part of it without objection.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]—"I incline to think that your view is right and that a separation and a settlement of support {underscored} will be wisest." [To the witness.] By "your view," you mean Mrs. Beecher's view? A. I do—did.

Q. And this is a memorandum of the conclusion and advice you then came to? A. It is.

Q. And was written at the time? A. It was.

Mr. Fullerton—It ought to be understood that the paper is in evidence only so far as it is read.

Mr. Beach—The paper is not in at all.

Mr. Evarts—It is not necessary to put the paper in evidence at all.

Judge Nelson—You will have it on the minutes; that is all that is necessary. Get ready to retire, gentlemen.

The Clerk [Mr. Mallison]—The jurors can obtain their fees for the month of March by calling at the office of the County Treasurer in the room below, between 9 and 10 o'clock.

The Court then adjourned to Friday morning at 11 o'clock.

FIFTY-SEVENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. BEECHER'S SOLEMN DENIAL OF GUILT.

THE FIVE GREAT EVENTS OF THE SCANDAL DESCRIBED BY THE DEFENDANT—THE FIRST CHARGE OF MR. TILTON AND HIS WIFE'S RETRACTION OF IT—THE PISTOL SCENE WITH MOULTON—THE CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH THE LETTER OF CONTENTION WAS WRITTEN.

FRIDAY, April 2, 1875.

Mr. Beecher's testimony in his own behalf in the suit of Theodore Tilton against him was continued throughout to-day's session of the City Court of Brooklyn. The defendant was called upon during the day to deny in specific terms the commission of any offense against Mr. Tilton or of any crime with his wife. He did so in the most positive and emphatic terms. He also described from his point of view the remarkable scenes which occurred during the Christmas week of December, 1870.

Mr. Beecher is the most deliberate of all the witnesses thus far called, he is also the most animated, except Miss Turner, in his manner of reciting the facts relative to which he is called to testify. He not only imitated yesterday the voice and illustrated the manner of Mr. Tilton, but when he came to describe the scene with Mrs. Tilton on Dec. 30, 1870 (when she made the retraction of the charge of improper proposals), his voice changed to the appealing tones of a weak and almost dying woman. He even threw back his head, closed his eyes, and folded his hands over his breast, as he described the position occupied by Mrs. Tilton. In detailing the conversation with Mr. Tilton on the same evening, Mr. Beecher took from his pocket a sheet of paper to show the size of the one which Mr. Tilton had produced as containing a copy of the charge of improper proposals, and as he went on describing Mr. Tilton in the act of tearing the paper to pieces, Mr. Beecher mechanically tore his slip into fragments and threw them upon the floor at the feet of the foreman of the jury.

The most dramatic scene of the morning session was Mr. Beecher's solemn assertion of his innocence of any and all of the charges brought against him from time to time by Mr. Tilton. Mr. Evarts led him by slow degrees to the culminating point, and the effect of the final declaration of innocence was thereby heightened. He was first questioned as to the scene described by the nurse, Mrs. Carey, wherein Mrs. Tilton was represented as sitting on Mr. Beecher's knee and as calling him "Dear Father." He gave a brief and emphatic denial to that statement. Again, as to Mr. Richards meeting them under suspicious circumstances, he declared that he could not recollect of ever having seen Mr. Richards while on a visit to Mr. Tilton's house. Mr. Brashier might have seen him on the stoop of Mr. Tilton's house at an early hour of the morning; but if so, the witness had no recollection of the visit. He denied the truth of Mr. Tilton's allegations concerning his acts on Oct. 10 and 17, 1868. Then Mr. Evarts, slowly and with marked deliberation, put the following questions:

Q. During your entire acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton, Mr. Beecher, and up to this month of December, 1870, had there ever been any undue personal familiarity between yourself and her? A. Never!

Q. Had you at any time, directly or indirectly, solicited improper favors from her as a woman? A. Never!

Q. Had you ever received improper favors from her? A. It was a thing impossible to her—Never!

Between each of the three questions there was a long pause, as if Mr. Evarts wished the jury to take in the whole force and meaning of the emphatic denials which came in response to each. The last was given with increased emphasis.

After brief inquiries as to Mr. Beecher's early life, his regard for Mrs. Tilton, the circumstances of the death of the child Paul and the repetition in part of Bessie Turner's statements to him, which had been touched upon the day before, and the emphatic denial of the plaintiff's charges, as described above, Mr. Beecher was brought directly to the narrative of the main incidents which clustered around the eventful holidays of 1870-71. His task yesterday embraced mainly the rehearsal of the following incidents:

I. Mr. Bowen's delivery of Mr. Tilton's letter demanding his resignation.

II. Mr. Tilton's accusation against him on the night of Dec. 30, 1870.

III. The retraction by Mrs. Tilton on the same night.

IV. The pistol scene with Mr. Moulton.

V. The writing of the letter of contrition on the afternoon of Jan. 1, 1871.

The narrative did not differ materially from that of his elaborate statement before the Church Investigating Committee. At the close of the narrative of each incident Mr. Beecher's attention was called to the testimony of Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton, and many facts and assertions sworn to by them were directly and positively contradicted. His denials of all assertions implying guilt on his part, as quoted by Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton, were particularly emphatic, and the usual "No, Sir" of a witness was frequently varied by additional and stronger forms of negation. For instance, when Mr. Evarts asked: "Did you say that your sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton was a natural expression of your love for her?" Mr. Beecher answered "No, Sir,"—and then, as though the full meaning of the question had suddenly come upon him, he added, with increased warmth and a flushed face, "It is impossible that I could have ever used such language." At another time he repeated a like question, half aloud, as though in surprise, "Did I say that?—No, Sir; no, Sir." When asked if Mr. Moulton had accused him of criminal relations with Mrs. Tilton, he replied, looking directly at Mr. Moulton, who sat almost at his feet: "Moulton is not a fool, Sir; he is a sagacious man." Here Messrs. Beach, Fullerton, and Morris interposed the customary, "One moment! one moment, Mr. Beecher," and the witness added quietly, "Well, I only meant that as a form of negation."

The scene with Mr. Bowen, which was first in the order of time, was described with great minuteness. It occurred on Dec. 26, 1870, in Mr. Beecher's present residence, and the conversation was opened by the delivery of Mr. Tilton's letter requiring Mr. Beecher to resign and leave Brooklyn. Mr. Bowen, in delivering the letter, had taken pains to represent that he was a voluntary messenger and ignorant of the contents of the letter. Mr. Beecher's first remark on reading it was: "This is sheer insanity; this man is crazy." Mr. Bowen on reading it was as indignant as Mr. Beecher, and a conversation followed, in which it was revealed that both gentlemen had heard of many matters discreditable to Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Beecher emphatically declared to Mr. Bowen that the retention of Mr. Tilton on The Independent and Union could not but be injurious to both journals. This, according to Mr. Beecher's testimony and the theory of the defense, was the first and only offense committed against Mr. Tilton, and the injury to him professionally which followed in his discharge by Mr. Bowen a few days later was the only injury which the plaintiff received, although Mr. Beecher was led at the time of signing the apology to imagine that there were other grounds of complaint. Mr. Evarts supplemented this recital with only two questions, to draw from the witness the statement that the delivery of this very threatening letter did not lead Mr. Beecher to seek an interview with either Mr. or Mrs. Tilton.

The description of the scene with Mr. Tilton at Mr. Moulton's house next followed. This event took place on the night of Dec. 30, 1870. Mr. Moulton (and not Mr. Tilton, as asserted by the plaintiff and his witness) locked the door and placed the key in the drawer of the hat-rack in the hall. Mr. Tilton had first of all recalled the letter sent by Mr. Bowen, with the remark that "it was a grand thing to write that letter; it would have been grander if I had not." He then recited his troubles with Mr. Bowen, charged Mr. Beecher with abetting in his removal by Mr. Bowen, then with having superseded him in his family, with alienating the affections of his wife, with corrupting his wife and teaching her deceitfulness, and finally, with having solicited her to immoral relations. Mr. Tilton here declared that the original of the paper which he produced had been destroyed "for shame and for pride's sake," and he then deliberately tore up the copy "that there should never be a line or letter against the reputation of his wife." Mr. Tilton in his testimony swore that the destruction of this copy was a mechanical act; in his excitement he had picked it to pieces. Mr. Beecher also contradicted Mr. Tilton's statement that the latter had first suggested that he should go to Mrs. Tilton for verification of the accusation.

Accompanied by Mr. Moulton, who had volunteered to go with him, Mr. Beecher went at once to Mr. Tilton's residence. The whole conversation with Mrs. Tilton was admitted after an objection by the plaintiff, and the scene was described with great minuteness by Mr. Beecher. Mrs. Tilton, after hearing Mr. Beecher's story of what her husband had told him, had declared that "she could not help it;" that she "had been wearied out with his importunities," and that she knew the charge was "not true." At his suggestion, but not at Mr. Beecher's dictation, she had taken pen and written the letter of retraction, and had of her own volition added the postscript, which is a specific denial of the charge of "improper solicitation." Mr. Evarts plied Mr. Beecher with questions as to assertions made by Mr. Moulton on the stand relative to the conversation on the way home on that stormy night. The witness admitted that he might have said, "This comes upon me as though struck by lightning," and he might have used the expression, "This will kill me," but nothing was then said about the confession which Mr. Tilton had read to Mr. Beecher on the evening of Dec. 30. "Was anything said about sexual intercourse between yourself and Mrs. Tilton?" asked Mr. Evarts very slowly and solemnly. "No, Sir; no;" replied Mr. Beecher in his most earnest tones.

Mr. Beecher then passed on to describe his interview at his house with Mr. Moulton on Dec. 31. This was the "pistol scene." Mr. Moulton, according to the witness, reproached Mr. Beecher with having taken an unfair advantage in getting a retraction from Mrs. Tilton, and read a letter from her, asking that both her confession to her husband and her letter of retraction should be returned to her, in order that she might destroy them. Mr. Beecher hesitated to give up the paper, saying that he would be without defense; but Mr. Moulton represented that it would conciliate Mr. Tilton, and promised to be Mr. Beecher's friend. He assured Mr. Beecher that there would be no further trouble if the letter was given up. On these representations Mr. Beecher gave up the letter to Mr. Moulton. Mr. Beecher explained that the room was warm, and after the conversation had lasted half an hour or more Mr. Moulton took off his overcoat, and as he did so Mr. Beecher noticed the hilt of a pistol in the pocket. Mr. Moulton took it out and laid it on the bureau, where it remained during the rest of the interview.

Mr. Beecher's testimony now reached its most important point in the description of the interview between himself and Moulton on Jan. 1, when the "letter of contrition" had its origin. Mr. Beecher described the grief which had overwhelmed him at that time as coming from three sources, his sorrow at having spoken evil of Mr. Tilton, who had done him a noble service and been his friend, his remorse at having believed the scandalous stories against his friend, and his self-reproach when Mr. Moulton assured him that they were false; and, lastly, his mortification and sorrow on coming to the conclusion, to which Mr. Moulton's declarations urged him, that through his want of foresight and prudence he had won the affection of Mrs. Tilton and come between her and her husband. His agitation over these thoughts, he explained, was the greater because his former conversations with Mr. Moulton had been diplomatic, but at this interview he had for the first time given vent to his pent up feelings. And his self-accusations were especially bitter when Mr. Moulton declared to him: "Mr. Beecher, Elizabeth loves your little finger more than all of Mr. Tilton." He broke forth in self-reproaches and expressions of sorrow. Mr. Moulton at this stage suggested that if Mr. Tilton could only hear him talking in that strain there would be peace once more between them. Mr. Moulton at length asked permission to make a memorandum of what Mr. Beecher said, so as to read it to Mr. Tilton. Mr. Beecher said that he was in too much of a whirl to write. It was nearly 5 o'clock, and in the dim light of the Winter twilight Mr. Moulton wrote some sentences on separate slips of paper. The supper bell rang at 5 and the interview had to come to an end. Mr. Moulton asked Mr. Beecher to sign what he had written. Mr. Beecher refused, saying that it was not his letter. Mr. Moulton then asked him to put his name to it so as to let Mr. Tilton know that it really came from him. And then, without reading or knowing what was on the paper, he wrote as near the bottom of the sheet and as far as possible from the other writing, "I have intrusted this to Frank Moulton in confidence," and signed his name to this separate note. This concluded Mr. Beecher's account of the manner in which the letter of contrition was written.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

OTHERS OF MR. BEECHER'S INTIMATES.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Beecher took the witness-chair.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher—

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, I wish to make a slight correction in my statement of yesterday. When you asked me whether the families in which I was intimate were, all of them, within the circle of my own congregation, I replied that they were, with the exception of Dr. Storrs's family; I should also have said the family of the Rev. Prof. Conant of the Baptist denomination, in whose family I was very intimate.

Q. And whose family came within that circle of intimacy with yourself and your family of which you have spoken? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He is still a resident of Brooklyn, isn't he? A. They are—he is.

Q. Your relations are still—? A. Of the most intimate character.

Mr. Beach—Does he include Dr. Storrs and his family in that statement—

The Witness—I mentioned Dr. Storrs yesterday as the only one; I add this morning one other.

Mr. Beach—What I asked was, if he included in the statement that these family relations still continued intimate—Dr. Storrs and his family? A. I was not speaking of Dr. Storrs at all; but only, in answer to Mr. Evarts's question, said that my relations with Prof. Conant's family are as intimate as ever.

MISS TURNER'S INTERVIEW WITH MR. BEECHER.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, a subject which we introduced—but objection being made, the evidence was inadmissible—the objection now being withdrawn, I will call your attention to it; do you remember Miss Bessie Turner coming to see you in the early part of December, 1870? A. I do.

Q. Did she call more than once upon you in—at that period? A. She may have called once, but I—more than once, but I remember only once.

Q. Do you remember about when it was in December? A. I should say it was not far from the middle of December, rather earlier than later.

Q. You have already stated it was before your call at Mrs. Morse's. A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. In consequence of that. It is already in evidence you went to Mrs. Morse's; now, will you state, as you recollect, the interview between you and Miss Bessie Turner giving the words as you can, or the substance as you remember? A. Allow me to say that in every interview that I shall narrate I profess to give only the substance, and if there be an exception, I will mention it. In regard to the visit of Miss Bessie Turner, she called upon me, I should think, about the middle of the forenoon as I recall it, and said that she was requested—she was sent to ask that I would go down and see Mrs. Tilton at her mother's house; that she had left her husband and did not intend to return, and that she wished to see me; I expressed amazement, and she then—perhaps I asked, "What is the occasion of such a step?" She told me that she was worn out with ill-treatment in her family; that Mr. Tilton had been for a long time, to her personal knowledge, treating her with great severity. She was not a little excited—

Q. You mean Miss Turner? A. Miss Turner was not a little excited in narrating to me some few incidents of this treatment. She spoke of—when I rather expressed a surprise, she replied, as if interpreting it into a doubt of her, that she was herself cognizant of his violence; I think she told me that he had struck her, but she certainly told me that he had on two occasions sought her company in her own bed or in his, and that he had told her that such expressions of love were as natural as kissing or as caressing; that, I think is the substance of her interview in a few words.

Q. Had you heard from any source anything of this kind concerning Mr. Tilton and Miss Turner before this?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Evarts—Why is that objectionable?

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, because it is immaterial what he may have heard from other sources.

Mr. Evarts—I ask whether he had heard; that is what I am asking him for.

Mr. Beach—I don't know what you are asking him for.

Judge Neilson—I think it is immaterial. Besides, he very clearly indicates that he had not.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is all I want. He may answer yes or no; I don't call for what he heard.

Mr. Beach—You do in your question.

Mr. Evarts—No, I don't ask for what he had heard; his answer is yes or no.

Judge Neilson—I do not think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we suppose the state of knowledge of the witness is a matter of fact, and that while evidence is not introducible that comes through hearsay, yet that the witness had received no knowledge or information otherwise is an admissible fact.

Judge Neilson—Knowledge is an important fact, unless it is derived from hearsay, which may be scandalous and false.

Mr. Evarts—I wish to prove that he had not received any knowledge, and it is for that reason that so frequently, not only in this trial, but always in the production of evidence, the right of inquiry is properly limited to the answer "Yes" or "No" without drawing further upon the sources of evidence, and it is on that point that I ask this question.

Judge Neilson—I understand. I think we won't receive it.

Mr. Beach—I think the gentleman's object can be accomplished by a proper question. The objection to this question is that it asked for the witness's knowledge from other sources, of the same character as the communications made to him by Bessie Turner, and the answer, if it should be in the affirmative, would be giving hearsay of accusations made of unkindness against Mr. Tilton in his family. If the object of the counsel is simply to prove that this witness had received no communications of that character, that can very easily be reached, I think, by a question that would not be objectionable, as, for instance, whether he had heard any communication from any other source in regard to the relations of Mr. Tilton with his family; in some such form it might be gotten.

Mr. Evarts—That is too broad an inquiry; other matters are embraced in that. My point, and the only point to which I desire the information, is whether he had heard anything affecting this matter between Mr. Tilton and Miss Turner from any other source.

Mr. Beach—I don't make any objection to that.

Mr. Evarts—Well, of course.

The Witness—I had not.

MR. BEECHER'S SURROUNDINGS WHILE A CHILD "PURE AS CRYSTAL."

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, I take up a few general points that I passed over. When did you become a professor of religion, and what church did you join, and with what church have you continued connected? A. I joined the Hanover Street Church, in 1828, about.

Q. In Boston? A. In Boston.

Q. Your father's church? A. My father was then pastor of that church.

Q. You were then about 15 years old? A. About 15.

Q. And from that time onward have you continued connection with the church until your more important connection with it as a clergyman? A. I have—not always with the same denomination, but either with the Presbyterian or Congregational Churches I have been in communion ever since.

Q. And maintained an active connection with the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As a communicant? A. I have never been anything else but active.

Q. Now, in regard to the bringing up as a youth in your father's family, and up to the period of your marriage—engagement and marriage—in what degree of strictness of personal morality and purity had you been in the family instructed? A. I never was instructed at all; the thought never entered my head to do anything else; the atmosphere of the household was as pure as crystal, and it was—I needed no instruction.

THE FUNERAL OF THE CHILD PAUL.

Q. Now, do you remember the occasion of Paul's death and funeral at the house? A. I do.

Q. When was that? A. I think in 1848—in 1868.

Q. Midsummer? A. In midsummer.

Q. Did you come down from your place to attend? A. I think it was in August; my impression is that I came down; I think of it because I was beginning to suffer hay fever, and I came down on account of my friendship for the family, though I usually did not do pastoral work in that manner.

Q. And attended and conducted— A. I conducted the funeral service.

Q. You then saw both Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, I suppose? A. I did.

MR. BEECHER'S PRESENTS OF FLOWERS.

Q. Now, in the subsequent Summer in June, the birth of the youngest child Ralph, as is in evidence, occurred, and something has been said in respect to flowers sent by you, and some visits made by you in the sick chamber; what, Mr. Beecher, is your recollection or knowledge on the subject of any such visits? A. I don't recall any specific visits; very likely—very probably I made them; I don't recall any of them.

Q. And how in regard to gifts of flowers at that particular occasion or time? A. Neither do I recall any of them; it is most likely that I sent flowers.

Q. Was sending of flowers to this family or to others an ordinary occurrence with you during the season of flowers? A. During all seasons.

Q. Well, you keep up the flower conservatories then through the Winter, I suppose? A. No, Sir; during the Summer I used to bring down bushel-baskets full of flowers from my grounds and distribute them right and left, and in the Winter season I not unfrequently bought flowers and sent to friends.

KATE CAREY'S STORY DENIED.

Q. Now, mention has been made in the evidence to the visit you made to that household while the wet-nurse for that new-born child was in attendance, Mrs. Carey or Smith—do you remember any visit that you made at that time? A. I don't.

Q. Did any scene occur between you and Mrs. Tilton in which she sat on your knee, or in your lap? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton on any such visit at that period address you as "Dear Father?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Or "Father Dear?" A. No, Sir; I don't recollect that Mrs.—I have answered your question.

Q. In what form of address did Mrs. Tilton in your visits accost you? A. "Mr. Beecher" and "My friend."

Q. Was there any other form of address between you? A. Not that I recollect.

Q. Between you—on her part towards you—than that? A. Only "Sir," "Mr. Beecher" ordinarily, but if we were talking and discussing, she frequently would turn and say, "Well, my friend," and go on with it.

MR. JOSEPH RICHARDS NEVER SEEN BY MR. BEECHER AT THE TILTONS.

Q. Do you remember any occasion of an interview between yourself and Mrs. Tilton at which her brother, Mr. Joseph Richards, intervened in any way? A. Do you mean hindered us, or—

Q. No, I mean came upon you in any way that you noticed or remember? A. No, Sir; I don't remember any time when he was present at any visit of mine there.

Q. Now, Sir, something has been said of your being seen on the stoop of that house between seven and eight o'clock one morning; a gentleman, Mr. Braashier, a passer-by in the street, spoke of it. Have you any recollection or knowledge on the subject of that visit? A. No, Sir; I have no recollection of the visit; if I made one, and Mr. Braashier was passing by and looked at me, I have no doubt he saw me.

Q. There was no errand or occasion of such a visit that impresses itself upon your mind? A. There might have been, but nothing that I remember.

FREQUENCY OF MR. BEECHER'S VISITS AT THE TILTON'S.

Q. During the period, say from the residence in the house 174 Livingston-st. up to the year 1870, with what degree of frequency are you able to state that you made any visits, either upon invitation, set occasion, or ordinary calls, at the house of Mr. Tilton? A. Do I understand you to limit it from 1867 to 1870?

Q. Yes, I will take it from 1866 on to 1870. They went into the house—I think it was in the Fall of 1866 they went into the house—during their residence at 174 Livingston-st. (which seems to be the period), down to the Summer of 1870, or down to the Spring of 1870—until you went into the country in the Summer of 1870? A. I should say, Sir, that, speaking of averages, I saw them once—from once in 10 days to once in three weeks.

Q. As averaging during the times that you were— A. That I was in town.

Q. That you were in town? A. Yes; my visits there were not more than about 13 times a year, according to the best computation that I can make of them; but that leaves out my Summer vacations, and my lecturing, and so on.

Q. Now, during these visits, what was the manner of them, and what were the subjects of conversation—in general, I mean? A. You ask two questions in one.

Q. Well, then, we will take the answer of both. A.

May I ask you to explain what you mean by the "manner?"

Q. I mean what was the manner between you and Mrs. Tilton during the visits, and what were the topics of conversation? A. Well, the manner was very much such as is my manner in my own house with my own family; it was very simple, and without the slightest formality; they kept an open, hospitable house, and left all their friends the utmost personal freedom; there was great propriety, with as little conventionality as I ever saw in a family; and therefore I felt perfectly free to go in and out as I chose, almost.

Q. How was it in regard to the presence of the children and their participation in your visits? A. They were almost always present; at any rate, I felt I had lost a visit if they weren't.

Q. And were your visits in part devoted to them? A. No, in considerable part of many of my visits, and sometimes altogether.

Q. Now, the subjects of conversation? A. As various as the interests of the church; of the phases of Bethel experiences; of the movements, the reformatory movements of the time, in which we are all engaged; of books, of literature, and, above all, of Theodore Tilton. [Laughter.]

MRS. TILTON'S GRIEF AT HER HUSBAND'S DEFECTION.

Q. Now, was the subject regarding her husband's religious opinions on any particular point, or, in general, a matter of conversation between Mrs. Tilton and yourself? A. It was, to my surprise, Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir. We object to these conversations.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't care for the details of the conversations; I don't care to reproduce the conversations.

Judge Neilson—He is free to state the subjects.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; the subjects.

The Witness—I was only about to say, in explanation of my word "surprise," that Mrs. Tilton's habitual speaking of her husband was so eulogistic and so fond that I felt that she was but a shadow that he cast, and at that time—

Mr. Beach—This is inadmissible, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; well—

The Witness [continuing]—When, therefore, she disclosed to me a very serious difference between her and him, I was surprised—

Q. Difference in religious opinions? A. On religious subjects.

Q. Yes? A. I found her very firmly grounded—

Mr. Beach—I do not think, Sir, that this is admissible.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the matter has been gone into very fully, if your Honor please, and I wish to show by this witness how far he participated in this grief and grievance on the part of Mrs. Tilton (which has been abundantly shown by Mr. Tilton himself), in regard to Mrs. Tilton's departure from the orthodox.

Judge Neilson—I think he can state generally.

Mr. Evarts—The orthodox faith, or on the subject of the divinity of Christ. Your Honor remembers that Mr. Tilton has gone into that very distinctly, and presented it very fully, no doubt.

Judge Neilson—He went into it largely on your examination, however; but still, Mr. Beecher can state the general features.

Mr. Evarts—Now, what passed, Mr. Beecher, between yourself and Mrs. Tilton at any of those interviews on that subject? A. I cannot tell you the detail; I can only say that she consulted me as to her duty, and as to her duty toward her children, on account of the growing defection of her husband from those views which are called orthodox. Her mind was seriously troubled as to her duty, and I attempted to enlighten her.

Mr. Beach—You attempted to what, Sir?

The Witness—Enlighten her.

Mr. Evarts—And did she ask you distinctly on any point for your advice and opinion? A. She did.

Q. How was that?

Mr. Fullerton—That is descending into particulars again, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I mean of this matter. I don't want to go any further.

Judge Neilson—If she asked for advice, I think he may say whether or not he gave it to her.

Mr. Evarts—Well, was it in regard to the conduct and supervision of her children? A. It was specially with reference to the children.

Mr. Beach—I think we should have, upon that subject, what complaints Mrs. Tilton made, and what advice he gave her.

Judge Neilson—Very well.

Mr. Evarts—That is exactly what I am trying for. It is very brief.

The Witness—She asked me whether I thought it was right for her to bring up her children under the influence of a parent who had given up the divinity of Christ and who seemed to be losing faith in the Bible; and I said that I thought she should not on that ground make any difficulty; that I believed that time and growth and the guidance of God would bring things right.

Mr. Beach—We object to this, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—This conversation?

Mr. Beach—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—Can you fix the period of these consultations or conferences? A. I cannot fix them with very great definiteness; I think it was in the year—not far from the year 1867.

MRS. TILTON'S DEEP RELIGIOUS DEVOTION.

Q. During this long acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton did you come to have, as you supposed, an intimate knowledge of her character, her temperament, and her intelligence? A. I think I did.

Q. Now, what estimate did you form concerning her mental and moral character? A. At first I thought she was a woman of great simplicity and purity, and of fair intelligence. As I became better acquainted with her I admired her domestic traits; and that which only after some considerable acquaintance I found out, was a very deep and unusually religious nature, developing itself so differently from what we see ordinarily, that it struck me very much.

Q. In what regard did it strike you—what form of development? A. Well, it was—I don't know that I can tell it exactly unless by saying what are the usual forms that I perceive. Some religious characters develop themselves in ethical strength and conscientiousness in all duties; some persons develop themselves in their religious nature more largely in social enthusiasm and generosity, and some persons develop themselves in veneration and awe. Now, in her case it was a very unusual sight for me to see a person whose religious character developed itself in the two forms, of ecstatic devotion, serenity, peace and trust in God, and also in the form of generous social sympathy and excitement.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton, under your observation, actively engaged in benevolent work? A. Incessantly.

Q. Were you aware of it all the while it was going on? A. Hardly a visit that she was not talking to me about some case that she had in hand, some poor man, or some family, or something of the class of married women of which she was then superintending in the Bethel, or at some period of the time was in connection with.

MRS. TILTON ALWAYS A DEVOTED WIFE.

Q. During this period of your acquaintance did any alienation of affection from her husband disclose itself to you? A. The very contrary; the very contrary. It was the matter of some gentle ridicule, her excessive addiction to her husband. It was the theme above all others that she seemed to love to talk about.

Q. Now, during this acquaintance of yours, did you at all become—did you become aware in any way, from Mrs. Tilton's manner or conversations with you, that her feelings or affections were specially enlisted toward you? A. Yes, Sir, I thought they were.

Q. In what form and degree? A. As her pastor, and as her friend.

Q. Did you observe, or did you entertain any surmise, that she had any other sentiments toward you of affection or regard than those you have thus described? A. Never—not in the slightest.

MR. BEECHER'S REGARD FOR MRS. TILTON.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, from this acquaintance, did you form sentiments of regard, esteem, and affection for Mrs. Tilton? A. Life-long sentiments of affection and respect for her.

Q. In what regard did those affections form themselves in your mind and feelings? A. In—I don't understand you.

Q. What character or form of affection, as you have named it, had you toward her? A. I had the utmost affection and respect for her as a Christian woman, and a mother, and a wife, surrounded by a lovely family—I felt proud of her confidence and affection.

Q. Had you any sentiment of affection or love toward her, as a woman, otherwise than in these connections? A. [Emphatically]. No, Sir; no, Sir!

WHERE MR. BEECHER SPENT OCTOBER 10 AND 17, 1868.

Q. The two dates of the 10th and the 17th of October, 1868, Mr. Beecher, have been specially referred to; are you able to say whether you were in the City of Brooklyn on both those days? A. On one of them I am pretty sure I must have been, namely, on the 10th.

Q. What occurred on the 9th, that you remember, as fixing any date? A. The Friday night prayer-meeting, and a meeting in the Academy of Music, to which I went after that.

Q. Yes, Sir. Now, do you remember seeing Mrs. Tilton at that meeting at the Academy? A. I think it was at that meeting—that is my best recollection—that I saw her after the meeting.

Q. And did anything occur between her and yourself then that fixes it at all in your memory? A. If that was the meeting, she spoke to me about being present at either a dinner or a reception that was to be given to the Rev. Morley Punshon, the English Methodist clergyman, that was then living in the country.

Q. Living in this country? A. I don't know; I think—

Q. Visiting this country, or living here? A. I think he was living here for a time.

Q. What was the suggestion as to your taking part in it, or attending it, or what? A. It was the expression, or a statement, that there was to be such, and an inquiry if I had been invited, and a hope that I would go if I was.

Q. He was known to you, was he? A. I never had met him, except to shake hands with him after a public preaching. I think it was in my own church that he stopped and shook hands with me; but besides that I had never met him. I much desired to do so.

Q. The 10th and 17th of October; of course the 10th was the Saturday, as you have now fixed it, after that Friday night lecture. Now, as to your being in town on the 17th. Have you any recollection of that? A. I have no recollection about that, Sir; I presume I was.

Q. You were at that season—that month—still living in the country, were you? A. In October—yes; my family were there still, and I spent usually a portion of the week, at any rate, at Peekskill, coming down on Friday afternoon to my Friday night conference meeting, usually.

Q. And remained over the Sabbath, of course? A. Usually; only in very busy seasons there did I go back again Saturday morning.

Q. And then you returned, if you went back Saturday? A. If I did; but there was seldom a busy season in the Fall.

Q. You mean busy at Peekskill? A. Busy on the farm.

Q. So that, so far as you have any recollection, on both those days, the 10th and the 17th, you were in the city? A. It is probable that I was, Sir.

Q. Now, what is the ordinary mode in which you spend your Saturdays? A. Well, it is my day for rambling in New-York, usually, or making excursions to the Park or to the green-houses, or something of that kind; I always make it the vacation day of the week.

Q. And that period of recreation—that day of recreation—how was it usually spent by you? A. I said either in—most generally in New-York, in the book stores or print shops, or up and down the street in matters of curiosity; and if not that, very frequently at the Park, or at Flushing, or at some place where there were green-houses.

Q. Was Saturday a day in which you made these usual or ordinary calls among your circle of friends here, or was it otherwise employed? A. Well, as a general thing, not.

A SQUARE DENIAL OF ALL MR. TILTON'S CHARGES.

Q. Now, Sir, have you any recollection of seeing Mrs. Tilton, either at your own house or at her house, on either of those days? A. I do not remember it.

Q. Did anything occur between you and her on either of those days, or during either of those weeks, that has impressed itself upon your mind at all? A. Nothing.

Q. During your entire acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton, Mr. Beecher, and up to this month of December, 1870, had there ever been any undue personal familiarity between yourself and her? A. [Emphatically] Never!

Q. Had you at any time, directly or indirectly, solicited improper favors from her as a woman? A. [Emphatically] Never!

Q. Had you ever received improper favors from her? A. [With great emphasis] It was a thing impossible to her—Never! [Applause.]

Judge Neilson—Wait a moment, Mr. Evarts. This must not occur again. Mr. Rogers, you will see to this. If you find any gentleman disturbing the peace of the court, you will have your men remove him, no matter who he is.

Mr. Evarts—Did you ever, during this period, have carnal intercourse, or sexual connection, with Mrs. Tilton? A. [With great emphasis and energy] No, Sir! Never!

THE LETTER DEMANDING MR. BEECHER'S RESIGNATION.

Q. Do you remember, Mr. Beecher, on or about Christmas day, or the day celebrated as Christmas that year, the 26th of December, a call from Mr. Bowen, and the presentation of a letter to you? A. I do, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Exhibit No. 4, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris produced the letter [Exhibit No. 4].

Q. Did you receive that letter, Mr. Beecher? [Handing witness a letter.] A. I received such a letter; I cannot say that this is the very one; I received a letter in Mr. Tilton's handwriting.

Q. This is all in Mr. Tilton's handwriting? A. Yes, Sir; I don't know whether that is a copy.

Mr. Evarts—I think this was produced. This is understood to be the original.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—That I suppose to be the original.

The Witness—If it is the original, I received it. I received a letter of this purport.

Mr. Evarts—This is the one that has been in evidence; I suppose it is the original.

Mr. Beach—No, that is the copy.

Mr. Evarts—I think this is an original. Well, it passes for an original, and I think Mr. Tilton spoke about it.

Mr. Fullerton—That is an original way of saying it.

Mr. Evarts—Yes [Referring to the record]. Yes, Mr. Moulton proves it. Mr. Moulton says:

In your testimony yesterday you spoke of a letter—Dec. 26, 1870—written from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher, and of which Mr. Bowen was the carrier. Look at the paper I now show you and say whether it is the letter to which you then referred [handing witness a letter]. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to read it.

Then he reads it, and it is marked "Exhibit 4."

Mr. Beach—I think from the indorsement on the back of it by Mr. Moulton that this was the original letter.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, there is no doubt. I remember exhibiting to Mr. Tilton the envelope, showing him that it had been sealed, and asking him if he did not give it open, and he stated that he did. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Beecher, when and by whom was that letter brought to you? [Handing witness the letter]. A. By Mr. Henry C. Bowen.

Q. Where were you? A. At my present residence on Brooklyn Heights.

Q. Please state what Mr. Bowen said in bringing in and handing you the letter? A. He said that he had a letter for me from Mr. Tilton—that he was not aware of its contents, but as he was coming home, or coming this way, he had offered to bring it to me for Mr. Tilton.

Q. And did he sit while you opened it? A. He did.

Q. You opened it and read it? A. I did.

Q. What did you say to Mr. Bowen on reading it? A. I said substantially this: "This is sheer insanity; this man is crazy."

Q. Well, what did Mr. Bowen say to that? A. Well, he said he didn't know exactly what was in it, and with that I handed it to him and he read it.

Q. He took it and read it? A. He did. (Sotto voce). No doubt with surprise.

Q. Then what passed between you? A. I made some expression, but I cannot recall even the substance of it, except an expression—a sort of indignant surprise that Mr. Tilton should write me such a letter as that; and he then proceeded to say—

MR. BOWEN'S ATTACK ON MR. TILTON.

Q. Mr. Bowen? A. Mr. Bowen then proceeded to say that he and Mr. Tilton had had some differences themselves, and, without standing on the order in which the conversation went, he proceeded to give me an account of the—

[The town clock here commenced striking.]

Mr. Evarts—Wait.

The Witness—In consequence of the strength of my—or rather following the strong impressions that I used, Mr. Bowen fell in at once with me and commenced talking about Mr. Tilton, and not favorably; it gave rise to a conversation in which he said that he had—as I was aware—dismissed Mr. Tilton from the editorship of The Independent; he had become only a contributor to that paper; that when he had made up his mind to do that, it was on account of business reasons; Mr. Tilton's views were not acceptable, and that the paper was suffering in consequence of them, or was liable to suffer, I don't remember which; that, however, as soon as he had reduced him to a subordinate position on the paper, that man after man—multitudes, he said—came in to him with stories affecting Mr. Tilton's moral character—clouds, he said—and that he was amazed, he said; he never was so astonished in his life, and on making inquiry of one and of another, he said they seemed to grow thicker and thicker. He gave me an account, or rather he made a reference—he said there was a case of a woman and Mr. Tilton at Winsted; he made no particulars. He said there was another in the North-West. I have forgotten if he mentioned the place, but he said that in his own office, and in reference to a lady that was employed by him, when the contract was settled and she went into the office, she had informed him that Mr. Tilton turned the key upon the door and said: "Now, the opportunity has come that I have long wanted," and instantly made advances toward her of an improper nature. I was astonished, as you well might think, but not so much so as I should have been if I had not seen Bessie Turner, and told him so. He wanted to know what that was. I then narrated to him the substance of what Bessie Turner had told me. I also stated that there was another lady, about whose name in connection with Mr. Tilton rumor had been very busy; and some other incidental conversation of that kind took place between us, but I think—I say this with less confidence—I know that I said to Mr. Bowen: "I wish you would talk with my wife; she knows more about some things of this matter—some matters of this thing—than I do." I alluded to the interviews that she had had with Mrs. Tilton. He expressed some repugnance, thinking that my wife would not like to talk with him. I cannot say whether there was an interview, though I have a strong impression that he went into the back parlor and spent some moments talking with her about the matter; but of that I will not—

Q. Talking with her? A. With my wife.

MR. BEECHER'S ADVICE ABOUT MR. TILTON.

Q. Did you then—? A. I then said to Mr. — during the course of this conversation Mr. Bowen said that he had made up his mind that Mr. Tilton could not stay on The Independent in any relation, and that he was in grave doubt whether he could have him upon The Brooklyn Union; I said to Mr. Bowen that The Independent was dear to me, no matter what had come and gone between us—that it was the paper with which I had begun my life here in Brooklyn, and I felt a warm side toward it, and it was my judgment that a man that was tainted as Mr. Tilton was could not properly be retained on such a paper as that without doing it damage; as it respected The Brooklyn Union, I did not say anything to that, as it was a political paper, only that I thought Mr. Tilton an impracticable man, that he was not apt to agree with parties or with movements, except so far as he led them, and that I thought that as the editor of the Republican organ in Brooklyn he would be found to be a man that would get his paper into trouble.

Q. Did you mention to Mr. Bowen at this time anything regarding Mrs. Tilton's separation, or application in reference to separation, that had been made to you? A. I did; that was the point on which I referred him to my wife.

Q. Now, Sir, did anything more occur at that interview that you can rehearse to us? A. Nothing, except that Mr. Bowen grew more and more friendly, and in view of this attack, or rather this warning to send me out of town, I was not ready to go then, and expressed myself so to him—he said that he would stand by me as a friend.

Q. Do you remember what time of day this was? A. Well, it was just before dark, I should say.

Q. And the 26th? A. Yes, Sir; not far from five o'clock.

Q. Did Mr. Bowen, in presenting you the letter, say whether or no he had recently come from Mr. Tilton, or immediately? A. I will not say that he said that, but that was the impression produced upon me by his language, that he had had a session with Mr. Tilton, and that he had—that this letter had been given him by Mr. Tilton, with a request that he would take it to me.

Q. Between this interview, terminating thus, and the night of the 30th of December, Mr. Beecher, did you either have or seek any interview with Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you have or seek any interview with Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see or hear in any way from Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

MR. MOULTON'S UNCEREMONIOUS INVITATION ON DEC. 30.

Q. Now, Sir, on the 30th of December, what occurred, and how was the matter begun, and by whom? A. Not far from 7 o'clock in the evening Mr. Moulton called and was shown into my front parlor. I went in, the ordinary courtesies passing. He said that Mr. Tilton was at his house, and desired an interview with me immediately. I said to him that it was my prayer-meeting night, and that it would not be convenient for me to go down that night. He replied that it would be—it was a matter of so much importance that he thought I should do well to put somebody else in my place for the night and go with him. I sent or called upon—I don't remember which—Mr. George A. Bell, to take my place, and went with him.

Q. Did he live near you? A. Close by, a little below, in the house where I formerly lived—and went down to his house. When I had reached about the corner of Clinton and Montague streets, in that neighborhood, I said to him, "What is the subject upon which Mr. Tilton wishes to see me?" And he said, "He will better inform you himself." I went to the house—

Q. Did anything pass between you and him until you reached Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir; there was some conversation passed between us, but it has left no important impression—the going down there does not leave any important impression on my mind.

Q. Was there any further conversation during that walk respecting the subject, or the reasons of or for the interview that Mr. Tilton sought? A. My impression is that there was something—some allusion made to Mr. Tilton's difficulties with Mr. Bowen, but I cannot recall any detail of the conversation. I reached the house. He then lived about five doors below St. Ann's, on Clinton-st., one of those little brick houses.

Q. Very well. Now, before Mr. Moulton saw you in your parlor that evening, had he ever been in your house, to your knowledge? A. I have an impression that he had called upon me upon the first of January calls, but I cannot affirm that.

Q. Otherwise than that had he ever been there? A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Before you entered his house that night had you ever been in his house? A. No, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S VERSION OF THE MEETING AT MOULTON'S.

Q. Now, what occurred after you entered? A. We entered the house and he locked the door, the front door, and said, "Mr. Tilton is in the room above the parlor, front room, waiting for you." I said to him—supposing, wishing a witness, believing that we were going to have a business discussion—I said to him, "I would rather you would go up with me, Mr. Moulton." He said, "You had better see Mr. Tilton alone;" I went up stairs, knocked, and opened the door; Mr. Tilton was standing—two windows fronting out on to Clinton-st., a bureau, I think, between them, and the gaslight there, and he was upon the far side of the bureau, and met me in the most stately manner. He pointed to a chair and asked me to sit down, which I did, near the door. He drew out from his pocket a little paper, very much that shape [producing a piece of paper about five inches by three], just about that size, a little narrower, and, on sitting down, said: "I have requested" or "I have summoned you," I think he said, to this interview on matters of importance. I suppose that you received from me, by Mr. Bowen, a letter demanding your resignation and departure from Brooklyn." "Yes," I told him, "I had received it." "I wish now to recall that letter, and I wish you to consider it as not written. It was a grand thing to write that letter; it would have been grander if I had not." He then began—

Q. At this part, Mr. Beecher, did you respond to this notice to you of the recall of the letter? A. Of course, with a bow.

Q. Well? A. He then began to allude to Mr. Bowen, the bearer of that letter, and of Mr. Bowen's treatment of him—not going into it in any considerable detail, but characterizing it as very base and very treacherous; he then charged me with having an understanding with Mr. Bowen in these matters and furthering them; I am not using his language, but only the substance of the things urged upon me by him—that I had accepted injurious stories of him, and that I had reported them again; that I had advised against him, and much more to that purport, which I cannot recall in detail; he—I think that at this point I was disposed to make some explanation, when he warned me silence—to be silent, and I was silent; and then he proceeded to say that I had not only injured him in his business relations and in his reputation and prospects, but that I had also insinuated myself into his family, and that under a covering of friendship I had wrought him worse mischief there. He said that I had in a sense superseded him and had taken his place, so that in matters of religious doctrine, and in matters of the bringing up of his children and of the household, his wife looked to me rather than to him; that I had caused her to transfer her affections from him to me in an inordinate mea-were; that I had—that in consequence of the differences which had sprung up by reason of my conduct, his family had well nigh been destroyed; that I had suffered my wife and his mother-in-law to conspire for the separation of the family; that I had corrupted Elizabeth, teaching her to lie, to deceive him, and hide under fair appearances her friendship to me; and that I had made her to be—that I had—that he had married her one of the simplest and purest women that he ever knew, and that under my influence she had become deceitful and untrustworthy; he said that I that had tied the knot in the sanctuary of God, by which they were to be bound together in an inseparable love, had also reached out my hand to untie that knot, and to loose them one from the other; he then went on to say that not only had I done this, but that I had made overtures to her of an improper character; and again I expressed some surprise, probably, by my attitude—I don't recollect that I talked—but he drew from his pocket a strip of paper about that [producing a paper about five inches by one and a half]—like that, and read to me what purported to be the statement of his wife to him that Mr. Beecher had solicited her to become his wife, to all the intents and purposes which were signified by that term, or substantially that.

MRS. TILTON'S WRITTEN CHARGE DELIBERATELY DESTROYED.

He said that she had made a statement to him on the July before of her inordinate affection for me, or her exceeding affection; the phrase was not "inordinate"—but that he had, from the love he bore her, and from a general feeling of doubt or hesitation—I don't remember exactly the form—that he had suffered that to go on without meddling with it, but that recently she had renewed to him not only that statement but also had given him in writing the statement which he had just read; that he had for shame and for pride's sake burned up the original, and that now he would tear up the only copy that there was in existence, that there should never be a line or letter against the reputation of his wife; and with that he took the fragments in his hand and stepped to the side of the room and threw them down, in that way. [Mr. Beecher here tore the paper into pieces and threw the bits upon the floor.] "And now," said he, turning toward me, "I wish you to verify these charges by going down and seeing Elizabeth yourself; she is waiting for you at my house." I said—that last blow staggered me—I said to him: "Mr. Tilton, this is a dream. She never could have made in writing a statement so untrue."

MR. BEECHER INVITED TO SEE MRS. TILTON.

Said he: "It is but a few blocks off; go down to her yourself." I turned and went out of the door and walked down stairs, meeting Mr. Moulton at the foot of the stairs. He said to me: "Are you going down to see Mrs. Tilton?" "I am," I said to him. "I will go with you." He took his hat—I think he had his overcoat on—at any rate, my impression is that he had—and he went to the door to let me out, and it was locked, and he felt in his pocket for the key and it was not there, and he turned and went back to the clothes-stand in the hall, and took it from the drawer or from the table—from somewhere there, saying—a sort of sotto voce—that they did not want an interruption during this interview, and unlocked the door, and we went out, and went on our way.

Q. Did you in any manner invite Mr. Moulton to go with you to Mrs. Tilton's? A. No, Sir; I didn't want him.

Q. Did you in any manner inform him before he asked you whether you were going to Mrs. Tilton's, that you were going there? A. I did not.

Q. Now, he attended you to the door, did he? A. He did. To what door?

Q. To Mrs. Tilton's? A. He did.

Q. And on the way down did anything pass between you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. I cannot recall it, Sir. I remember speaking something of the storm that was just breaking in the sky, and clearing away—Winter snow-storm, and there was other conversation. He said many things, but I was not in a state of mind to register, just then, a conversation that didn't relate to what had passed.

Q. Now, when you reached the door, what passed between you and Mr. Moulton in regard to his going in, or not going in? A. I don't know that there was anything said about his going in, or not going in. He asked me: "Will you call on your way back? Will you call at my house?" and I said I would.

Q. Have you answered? A. I told him I would.

Q. You told him you would. You then— A. I rang—

Q. Rang the bell. What happened then? A. It was opened by a woman, whom I supposed, by her dress and appearance, to be their housekeeper; I knew they had one.

Q. Was she a lady whom you personally knew? A. I do not know; no, I think not.

Q. Well, Sir? A. She told me to go up-stairs to Mrs. Tilton's room.

Q. Did you communicate to her any purpose, or make any inquiry about seeing Mrs. Tilton? A. I did not; I had no occasion to; she told me to go right up-stairs.

Q. Can you give any description of this lady who opened the door, so that we may be able to identify her in any way? A. No, Sir, I cannot; I only recollect that she seemed to me to be a nice, tidy-looking woman, with a kind of authority in her face and manner, and well dressed.

Q. It was not Mrs. Mitchell, the nurse? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, what did she say to you? A. She said either to me to go up, right up, to Mrs. Tilton's room, or else that Mrs. Tilton was in her room up-stairs; something to that effect.

MRS. TILTON'S RETRACTION.

Q. And you went up? A. I went right up and knocked.

Q. Was the door opened? A. The door was opened.

Q. From within? A. I believe so, Sir; I will not be positive.

Q. Well, what occurred then? How did you go in? A. There are two front rooms in Mr. Tilton's house, one of which is a sitting and receiving room, and communicating with the other one by folding doors, which usually stood open. Mrs. Tilton was in the one where the bed was placed, and which was the nearest to the stairs.

Q. When the door was opened were you left alone by the person that opened the door? A. I was; I went in from the door of the hall, and came, therefore, almost immediately to the bed, instead of going around through the other room.

Q. You came through the door that went immediately into the room where the bed was? A. I did.

Q. Were the folding doors closed at that time? A. No, Sir, they were open.

Q. They were then open? A. Yes, Sir; I think they were open then.

Q. Did they remain open? A. They remained open, I think, all the time.

Q. Was any person other than yourself and Mrs. Tilton in either of the rooms, to your knowledge, during the time of your interview with her? A. No, Sir; there was not.

Q. Describe the scene, as you saw it, as you entered the room? A. The bed was dressed in pure white; Mrs. Tilton was dressed in pure white, and her face as white as the bed, lying a little above a level, reclined on pillows, her hands in that form on her breast [the witness here placed his hands palm to palm], in a very natural way. I drew a chair, or there was a chair by the bedside. I sat down in it.

Q. Did she accost you in any way before she spoke? A. Not at all; her eyes were closed.

Q. Did you observe whether she was asleep or not? A. She was as one dead, and yet she was living. I sat down by her side, and said to her—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

[Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Beach and Mr. Pryor held a consultation together.]

Mr. Beach—We object, Sir, to the conversation between this witness and Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think you will have to take it. We have in evidence that the witness received from Mrs. Tilton that evening a letter. That fact has been proved pretty clearly, though somewhat indirectly, and as part of that transaction, I think, we ought to take it; it is part of the act of receiving the letter.

Mr. Evarts—[To the Witness.] Proceed, Sir.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I don't think the conversation is any part of the res gestæ. The only doubt I have had in my mind upon the admissibility of this evidence was that, according to the testimony of Mr. Beecher, he was requested by Mr. Tilton to go down and see his wife, and whether your Honor should hold that that was an adoption of what transpired between the parties, when—

Judge Neilson—It has some bearing on the point, doubtless.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton stated it in the same way.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton didn't originate the interview, but he commences the matter by saying: "Go up and see Elizabeth." There is not the least difficulty on this point.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tilton says the witness requested permission to go, and he gave it.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but on the part of reference, it is a mere agreement between the parties.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; but one relation would in some degree, perhaps, tend to constitute Mr. Beecher an authorized party from Mr. Tilton to hold this conversation with his wife, but I submit to your Honor that still there is not such a relation by that direction or consent of Mr. Tilton created as would authorize the details of conversation which passed between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. But, Sir, without discussing the question, I see your Honor is disposed to admit this evidence, so we must record our objection and exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, proceed now. You drew a chair to the bedside and sat down? A. I said to her: "Elizabeth, I have just seen your husband, and had a long interview with him. He has been making many statements to me, and charges, and he has sent me to you in respect to some of them, that you should verify them." I then said: "He has charged me with alienating your affections from him. He has charged me that I have corrupted your simplicity and your truthfulness. He has also charged me with attempting improprieties—" it is a hard thing (shedding tears) for a man to speak to a woman whom he reveres such things, and I could not express myself very clearly. "Are these things so, Elizabeth?" She—there was the faintest quiver, and tears trickled down her cheek, but no answer. I said to her: "He says that you have charged me, Elizabeth, with making improper advances. Have you stated all these things, and made the charges?" And she opened her eyes and said: "My friend, I could not help it." "Could not help it, Elizabeth! Why could not you help it? You know that these things are not true." "Oh, Mr. Beecher," said she, "I was wearied out. I have been—I have been wearied with his importunities," or something to that effect. "He made me think that if I would confess love to you it would help him to confess to me his alien affections," or words to that effect. "But," I said to her, "Elizabeth, this is a charge of attempting improper things. You know that that is not true." "Yes, it is not true," she says, "but what can I do?" "Do! You can take it back again." She hesitated, and I did not understand her hesitation. "Why can you not take it back? It is not true." She said something about she would be willing to do it if it could be done without injury to her husband, which I did not at all understand. "But," said I, "you ought to give me a written retraction of that written charge." She said she was willing to do anything if I would not use it against her husband. I said, "Give me paper." She pointed to the secretary in the other room, which stood between the windows. I went there; I knew it, and took from the secretary some note paper, pen and ink. I brought them to the bedside. She raised herself up a little and wrote the first part of the retraction. She signed it.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Morris]—Will you give me that exhibit?

Mr. Morris—Which one?

Mr. Evarts—No. 4.

Mr. Morris—No. 4 you have got.

Mr. Evarts—No. 6—5.

[Mr. Morris hands the exhibit to Mr. Evarts.]

Q. Look at that paper and see if it is the one which was there written [Showing paper to the witness]. A. This seems to be the one, Sir; I suppose it to be.

Q. Well, how far did she write in the first instance? A. Shall I read it?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, if you please.

The Witness [Reading]—

December 30, 1870.

Wearied with importunities, and weakened by sickness, I gave a letter inculcating my friend, Henry Ward Beecher, under assurances that that would remove all difficulties between me and my husband. That letter I now revoke. I was persuaded to it, almost forced, when I was in a weakened state of mind. I regret it and recall its statements.

E. E. T.

Q. During the writing, Mr. Beecher, did you in any manner dictate or suggest any of the language used? A. No, Sir; I suggested that she ought—in the beginning I suggested that she ought to make a recall of those charges that should cover them.

Q. Very well. Now, when she had written so far? A. She read it over, and then—

Q. To herself, or aloud? A. No; to herself. She looked it over, and then held out her pen for some more ink, which I had in my hand, and added this:

I desire to say expressly, Mr. Beecher has never offered any improper solicitation, but has always treated me in a manner becoming a Christian and a gentleman.

And this she signed with her full name, "Elizabeth R. Tilton."

Q. Did you in any manner suggest or request that additional writing? A. I did not; it was of her own mind.

Q. Did you in any manner dictate, or indicate any form of expression, or substance in that? A. I did not.

Q. Did you during this conversation, Mr. Beecher, say anything to Mrs. Tilton as to the form and manner in which injury might come to you from this charge? A. I did.

Q. What was that? A. When she spoke as objecting that it would make difficulty between her and her husband, I said to her that there should be no difficulty of that kind, so far as I was concerned, and I desired this in no sense as an offensive thing; but that some rumor of this matter might come to mischief-makers, it might get into the church, there might in the future be a call upon me, and that I wished something in my possession that in any such exigency as that would be a defense—in substance that.

Q. Did you say anything to her in regard to the injury to herself and her family that the prevalence or knowledge of such relations would occasion, as she had charged? A. I did; I said to her that it was not an injury to me that she had done alone—that no woman could make such a statement without injuring herself, and that it would be an injury both to herself and to her children should it be brought out and believed.

Q. When Mrs. Tilton was speaking to you of the view presented to her by her husband which induced her to yield and give this paper—accusation against you—did you or did she say anything more or further in regard to any comparison between himself and herself that Mr. Tilton had made? A. I don't recall, from your question—I don't recall anything.

Q. Have you stated, as far as you now recollect it, what she said in regard to the reasons or suggestions of her husband which had produced that written accusation? A. She said something more of them, Sir; but I cannot—I cannot recall them all or state them all.

Q. And the substance is as you have given? A. The substance is as I have given it.

Q. How long was this interview, Mr. Beecher, do you think? A. Time passes very fast when people are under great excitement—it seemed to me about ten hours—it was probably a half-hour.

Q. Now, this paper that you—after it was completed, in what form did you receive it from Mrs. Tilton; was it in an envelope or was it simply the paper? A. I think it was just in this form; I don't remember enough about that; I only recollect putting it in my pocket.

Q. And did you take leave of her? A. I did. There was some little conversation further—I spoke some—I am afraid with severity sometimes; and in the converse preceding, and when I went away, I felt very sorrowful; I was sorry that I had said so, and I said to her that I hoped my visit would be for peace, and that it would not be the means of throwing her back in her sickness, and some other kind expressions.

Q. Did she reply to that? A. I don't know, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S MOVEMENTS AFTER LEAVING MRS. TILTON.

Q. And you left the room and the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did anything pass between you and any one else as you went out? A. Nothing.

Q. Now, did you go back to Mr. Moulton's? A. I went right back to Mr. Moulton's; it was only half a dozen steps out of my way home.

Q. Well, what happened then? A. I rang and went in, and I sat down a moment in the parlor; and nothing was said of any consequence. I think Mr. Moulton, perhaps, asked me had I seen Mrs. Tilton, and I said yes.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton there when you went in, or did he come in? A. As I recollect it he was in the parlor.

Q. Mr. Tilton was not there? A. I don't remember him; I don't recollect seeing him again.

Q. And Mr. Moulton asked you if you had seen Mrs. Tilton? A. I think that is all.

Q. What did you reply? A. I won't be very sure that he even asked that, but I have an impression that he asked me if I had seen Mrs. Tilton; there was only a single syllable said, but I said that I would—I thought I would go home.

Q. And you either answered him that you had seen her, or you informed him that you had seen her? A. That is my impression, Sir.

Q. And then you said you would go home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was then said or done by Mr. Moulton? A. Well, he rose and said he would see me home again.

Q. Did you suggest his going with you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he attend you to your house? A. He did.

Q. Did anything pass between you and him on the way? A. There was some conversation; I cannot report it accurately, however. I was not in a mood to think of anything else except the central matters in that figure; but there was some conversation between him and me about—I think the letter was mentioned of Mr. Bowen to me—Mr. Tilton's letter through Mr. Bowen to me—I think there was something said about Mr. Bowen's conduct toward Mr. Tilton; I think Mr. Moulton talked pretty much all the way home, and I answered him in monosyllables.

Q. That is, he did the talking? A. He did most of the talking.

Q. And your answers were only monosyllables? A. They were answers of courtesy to show that I was attending, when I was not attending very much.

Q. And do you remember what time of night you reached your house? A. I think, Sir, it was between nine and ten; I think it was not later than ten.

Q. Have you any mode of fixing the hour, or recalling it to your mind? A. Only as by computation of the time taken to walk the various distances, and my memory, about, of the time that it was—that it occupied.

Q. The length of the interviews? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the hour of recess has arrived.

The Court then took a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2, pursuant to adjournment. Henry Ward Beecher resumed the witness-stand.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we subpoenaed Mr. Isaac H. Bailey to attend, merely to give definitely some dates, the events occurring on which were referred to in the testimony of Mr. Schultz, I think, and perhaps other witnesses; and our learned friends have been kind enough to take Mr. Bailey's note, giving us the information, to the same effect as if he appeared and were sworn.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—It will therefore, I suppose, be properly stated by the stenographer that the defendant put in evidence the fact that Mr. Isaac H. Bailey sailed for Europe in the steamship Oceanic, on the 3d day of June, 1871, and that the dinner given to him in reference to his expected departure was on the first day of that month of June.

Mr. Fullerton—The understanding was, as my friend will admit, that the letter of Mr. Bailey fixing those dates was to be taken with the same force and effect as if he appeared as a witness and swore to them?

Mr. Evarts—Exactly.

Judge Neilson—And no more?

Mr. Fullerton—No more.

Mr. Evarts—But then I supposed there was no doubt about the date.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know that there is.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps the letter had better be marked.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we have it in the form I have stated, that this is to appear in the evidence to the same effect as though Mr. Bailey had testified to it.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

AN EXPLANATION OF MR. REDPATH'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Evarts—The note is addressed to Mr. Fullerton. It is a mere personal matter. I wish to call attention also to a matter appearing in the evidence yesterday upon the cross-examination of Mr. Redpath. Mr. Redpath had occasion in giving his evidence to make a part of it an interview between himself and Mr. Beecher, at Peekskill, and a part of that interview was a recital to Mr. Beecher of what had been said to Mr. Redpath, the witness, by Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, or one or both of them, as may be, and I observe a little indistinctness in the report that we are accustomed to rely upon, for the present at least, as the authentic report, though I suppose it is correctly enough stated here; but another publication on the matter has clearly shown that there may be ambiguity, by putting into Mr. Beecher's mouth what was said by Mr. Redpath to Mr. Beecher as coming from the mouth of Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton, and in a very important particular. I will now read the passage. Mr. Fullerton is cross-examining. [Reading.]

Q. Well, tell us, according to your best recollection, what you related to Mr. Beecher? A. I told him that Theodore—I think I told him that Theodore asked me—oh, that—[the witness hesitated, as we all remember, or as I remember]—after I saluted him in that way he sprang up and greeted me very cordially and said: "James, I am glad to see you; tell me how to fight this battle."

Mr. Fullerton—Who said this? A. Theodore. [This is what Mr. Redpath was telling Mr. Beecher as coming from Theodore.]

Mr. Evarts—And you said it to Mr. Beecher, I suppose? A. I think I did, Sir—I think I did; I don't—and after some further conversation (because I am not sure that I related that [the further conversation] to Mr. Beecher), he said: "Do you know how bad this case is?" I said: "No; I know what you have always told me." "Well," he said, "it is adultery, going over two or three years."

Now, that was part of Mr. Tilton's statement which Mr. Redpath repeated to Mr. Beecher, and one of the papers has stated it as part of the interlocution between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Redpath—which, of course, makes a difference. [To Mr. Beach.] I suppose there is no misunderstanding about that?

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know, Sir. I do not think it is necessary for us to correct all the false statements of outside newspapers; we should be pretty busy if we undertook it.

Mr. Evarts—I do not wish that. I only call attention to the evidence itself, which is a little involved, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. Beach—We cannot correct the evidence, Sir. There it stands.

Judge Nelson—The matter being somewhat delicate, it was desirable that you should call attention to it, of course; but this report of the testimony is being corrected by Mr. Bigelow, upon whom the responsibility rests, and eventually it will be in proper shape.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; but the fact that a newspaper has put a misconstruction upon it shows that there was some little obscurity or involvement about it, as there is. The correct version is that this came from Mr. Tilton's mouth and was reported to Mr. Beecher, and not out of Mr. Beecher's mouth.

Judge Nelson—Yes.

MR. MOULTON CONTRADICTED.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, this night of the 30th of December, which we have gone through with in your narrative, I wish to ask you some questions connected with what has been stated by another witness. Mr. Moulton has testified that you asked him on that night if he had seen ("have you seen") Elizabeth's confession; did you ask Mr. Moulton that question? A. I did not.

Q. Or any question of similar import? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or on the subject? A. No, Sir; nothing.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton ask you such a question, or one of similar import? A. No, Sir; there was nothing said between us about it.

Q. Was there anything said by you to him, or by him to you, about any confession of Mrs. Tilton's? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you on that night, in conversation with Mr. Moulton, at any part of the evening, use any such expression as this: "This will kill me?" A. I don't recall any such; I might have done it.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Moulton that Theodore, or Mr. Tilton, had given you permission to go to Elizabeth for a confirmation of the story? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. On that night was anything said by Mr. Moulton to you, or by yourself to Mr. Moulton, on the subject of sexual intercourse between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; no, Sir!

Q. Was anything said concerning any confession of sexual intercourse between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. Not a word.

Q. On that night, did any one speak to you of, or did you speak to any one of, the subject or the fact of sexual intercourse between Mrs. Tilton and yourself? A. No, Sir; no, Sir! It is loathsome and odious stuff, that I don't talk about.

Q. On that night, Mr. Beecher, did you use any such expression, or make any such observation to Mr. Moulton, as this: "That this came upon you as if struck by lightning?" A. I may have; though my impression is that that was a phrase that I used on the 1st of January, but it may have been on that night.

Q. Did you on this night ask Mr. Moulton to be a friend to you? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. When next did you see Mr. Moulton, or Mr. Tilton? A. I did not see Mr. Tilton again that I remember until the 3d of January

Q. And you saw Mr. Moulton when? A. I saw Mr. Moulton on the 31st of December, the next night following this interview of the 30th.

MR. MOULTON GOES AFTER THE RETRACTION.

Q. Where was any interview between Mr. Moulton and yourself on the 31st? A. At my house.

Q. At what hour did it begin? A. Early in the evening.

Q. After dinner? A. Oh, no, in the evening; I dine at Christian hours.

Q. Was it late in the evening? A. About seven, I should think, or half-past.

Q. How did that interview occur and go on? A. He came to my house, rang, came in, called for me; I went up stairs with him, into my bedroom, and shut the door. He then went to the bureau where the gas-lights were burning, and took his position on the left hand side, and I stood on the other—that is as we went up to it, and he made some introductory remarks, which I now cannot give, but he drew a letter from out of his pocket from Theodore Tilton—purporting to be, in which Mr. Tilton stated that after going home last night he found that I had taken advantage of my interview to procure from his wife a retraction of the charges that had been made against me. That was the substance of it. There was some little more which I do not remember. He then proceeded to say in substance that he presumed that that was so. I said it certainly—that I had. He said that he thought I had acted a very indiscreet part—a dishonorable one; that I had no right to take advantage of such a situation, and to obtain such a retraction; and I claimed the right of self-defense. He then said that such a course was indiscreet and inexpedient on my part, no matter what my reasons were, that it tended to increase the difficulty between Mr. Tilton and his wife, and between Mr. Tilton and me, and that instead of leading to peace and quiet it tended exactly the other way, and that I ought to give up her retraction. I argued with him on that matter, and for some little time there was an interchange backward and forward of thought. He then drew from his pocket a letter purporting to be from Mrs. Tilton, requesting me or him—

Mr. Evarts—Wait a moment. We want that letter—Exhibits 1 and 6, Mr. Morris.

[Mr. Morris produced the letter.]

Mr. Evarts—This note that you are now proceeding to speak of, which Mr. Moulton took out and read, did you have it in your hands, or did he read it? A. I did not.

Q. Look at that and see if that is it as you remember? [Handing witness a letter.] This is, I think, the letter that was read to me.

Q. You did not at that time read it yourself, or have it in your hands? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, he read you that note? A. I am quite sure, Sir.

Q. Please read it—it is short! A. [Reading.]

SATURDAY MORNING.

MY DEAR FRIEND FRANK: I want you to do me the greatest possible favor. My letter which you have, and the one I gave Mr. Beecher at his dictation last evening, ought both to be destroyed. Please bring both to me, and I will burn them. Show this note to Theodore and Mr. Beecher. They will see the propriety of this request.

Yours, truly,

E. R. TILTON.

Q. Well, is that it? A. I recognize it by one single word.

Q. Well, he read that to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What succeeded? A. Well, I was perplexed a little at the existence of that letter, for Mr. Tilton had told me that the letter was destroyed, and Mr. Moulton, and Mrs. Tilton's note, implied the existence of that letter containing charges.

Q. The accusation? A. The accusation.

Q. Yes? A. However, that was a mere transient thought in my mind, and then, the end of the conversation being what would tend to peace and reconciliation—

Q. Go on with the conversation, please? A. There was considerable said; I said to Mr. Moulton that my objection to giving up that retraction was that I should be left open, without defense, if I were in any way brought to account on such a charge as that. He said in substance that he would stand between me and any such renewal of the accusation, that he would defend the documents, that he would burn them both in my presence, if I wished—

THE PISTOL SCENE.

Q. If you wished? A. If I wished, or he would keep them. After some little further parley I went to the drawer where the letter was, brought it out, and handed it to him. He had been sweating, and had his overcoat on, and about this point—perhaps as I came back with the letter—he took off his overcoat, and in doing so I saw the hilt of a pistol in the pocket, which he took out and laid on the bureau, without word, as I remember, and put his overcoat on the foot of the bed. After he had the documents he put it in his pocket, and we fell into a little conversation thereafter, not of any considerable duration. I have an impression that something that night made it necessary that our interview should be short, but there was some further conversation about Mr. Tilton or some of his affairs, but very brief.

Q. What was the tone and tenor of this latter conversation in regard to Mr. Tilton's affairs or their prospects, or future, or what not? A. He spoke of Mr. Tilton as a wronged man—that he was his friend and he meant to right him—that was the tenor of it; that was the general tenor.

Q. What was said, if anything, as to the wrong and from whom the wrong had come? A. I understood the wrong to be from Mr. Bowen at that time; but, of course, after the scene of the night before, there was not excluded from my mind my own participation.

Q. In the injury? A. I did not enter into it.

Q. Now, this further letter, Mr. Beecher, was that also there? A. I do not recollect either seeing or hearing this; part of it is very much like the tenor of Mr. Tilton's letter; I am not sure but that he quoted something of this in his letter; but I remember no other letter from Mrs. Tilton except the one that I have spoken of.

Q. Now, this letter from Mr. Tilton that Mr. Moulton read was a letter to Mr. Moulton, I suppose? A. To Mr. Moulton.

Q. Not to you, and that you did not read or have in your hands? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, after this promise—was it after this promise of Mr. Moulton that he would either burn the two papers, if you chose, or keep the two papers and defend you against the renewal of an accusation, that you gave him up the retraction? A. It was.

Q. When Mr. Moulton represented to you, as he did in some form, that it was an improper or dishonorable thing for you to take advantage of your visit to get this paper, what did you say to him on that subject as to your visit and your getting the paper? A. I don't remember that any particular words—I know, in general, that I said I thought I had a perfect right to procure a retraction from the source where the charge had come.

Q. Was anything said by you about Mr. Tilton's having invited you to go there? A. No, Sir; nobody at that time would have thought of making—

Q. No; that Mr. Tilton should have invited you to go to see his wife that night? A. I beg your pardon, Sir; I did not understand—

Q. Was there anything said about Mr. Tilton's having invited you to go down to see his wife that night? A. Oh, that was the very basis—

Q. Well, I mean the 30th? A. What?

Q. Was anything said at the interview, anything said by you, at the interview on the 31st, about Mr. Tilton's having invited you on the 30th to go down and see his wife? A. Mr. Moulton introduced it, that Mr. Tilton had sent me down to see his wife; there was no difference of opinion about it—if there is any, it is of later origin.

Q. Was anything said about its being dishonorable to keep the paper, whether it was so to get it or not? A. Yes, there was—there was, in the course of conversation (which was somewhat emphatic in spots) an unwillingness on my part to be convinced, and he tried to show that it would be a mean act in me to keep a paper procured under the circumstances from a sick woman; but I do not remember precisely the ground on which the pinch was made, but that there was such an imputation of meanness—of course it was not conveyed in a very bald way; it was done very gentlemanly; Mr. Moulton's conduct toward me was always that of a gentleman—I mean his manners, his address.

Q. Now, this matter of a pistol didn't figure in the scene, so far as it attracted your attention, any more than you have now stated? A. I did not see the pistol at all; I just saw him take it out on taking his overcoat off, and laying it on the bureau.

Q. Laying the pistol on the bureau? A. It was not fired off.

Q. On your giving up the paper, and before leaving, was anything said by Mr. Moulton as to your present conduct about the paper being this or that? A. Yes, Sir; he complimented me; he thought I had behaved very sensibly, and that he had no interest in this except as peace and harmony between us, and that he was very much gratified about it.

Q. Was anything said by him as to what effect toward peace or harmony this act of yours— A. He thought, he said, it would be a work of conciliation, and that it would tend very strongly—he represented that Mrs. Tilton was under the impression that I was an active enemy, and that any course on my part that was a course of self-defense, aggressively, in any way, or as holding a defense of myself in such a way as would be a rod over him, would be—it would strengthen that impression, and that every conciliation that I could make would weaken that impression and help him, Mr. Moulton, to hold Mr. Tilton to kindly thought and feeling about me.

NO SUGGESTION MADE OF UNTRUTH IN THE RETRACTION.

Q. Was anything said by Mr. Moulton to you that night about your having procured from Mrs. Tilton what you knew to be a lie? A. No, Sir; nothing.

Q. Was anything said by him about your having procured from her what he, Moulton, was justified in calling a lie? A. You mean, did he make any such expression?

Q. Yes, to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was there any charge or expression of that nature made to you that night? A. None whatever; it was the next day that we had a full interview on those points.

Q. Was anything said that night by Mr. Moulton to you in reference to your having obtained this letter, or anything that had passed between you, that that would not save you? A. There was—there was a distinct, and, if I recollect aright, repeated statement on his part that this was bad policy to obtain it, if peace and harmony between us two was the end in view; but if you mean by "save me," according to the later theories—

Mr. Beach—That I object to. I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—He wishes to know—

Mr. Beach—One moment, if your Honor please; I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Strike that out. [To the witness.] He wishes to know, Mr. Beecher, whether that expression was used. A. No, Sir; I don't think that that expression was used.

Mr. Evarts—"That won't save you"—anything like that? A. No, Sir; I don't think any such expression.

Q. Was anything said at that interview about Mr. Moulton's not seeing much of the guidance of God in what you did? A. I don't know but there was something said toward the close about that, but I rather confuse that with expressions of that general character which occurred a great many times in our subsequent interviews.

Q. Do you mean that precise expression? A. No, but an expression in regard to a guiding Providence.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton say to you that night what I shall now read to you, or anything like it? [Reading.] "Mr. Beecher, I don't think that now you ought to take merely selfish counsel of yourself; the truth is the truth; you have got to abide by that!" A. The first sentence I think was one of the arguments that he used when I said that I should retain that for self-defense, and his statement was that I ought to take a generous view, and act so as should be for the interest of all the parties concerned; not stand selfishly merely on my own technical defense; he was after a reconciliation and harmonization of the discordant interests.

Q. Well, the latter part, the truth— A. Read it again, if you please, Sir.

Q. You have answered as to the former part; the latter part, "The truth is the truth, you have got to abide by that." A. I don't remember that, Sir—I think it is true.

Q. As a general fact? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you say anything to him of these words, or of this nature, that your defense would be the technical one of general denial? A. No, Sir, I did not.

THE OVERTURES OF FRIENDSHIP ALL ON MR. MOULTON'S PART.

Q. Did you say anything about your defense being a mere denial? A. I don't recollect that I said anything about my defense at all, except in connection with the paper; that I retained that for my defense, should ever occasion require it; I can remember nothing in that interview that would call for such a remark.

Q. Did you say anything to him like this: "Since you know the truth, I will throw myself upon your friendship, and what I believe to be your desire to save me?" A. No, Sir; the overtures of friendship at this time were not on my part.

OTHER CONTRADICTIONS OF MR. MOULTON.

Q. At this interview that night was there any talk about your relation or intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was anything said at this interview about the love you had for Mrs. Tilton, or Mrs. Tilton for you? A. Not that I recollect, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, did you use any figure or expression of this kind—did you say at that interview anything about being on the brink of a moral Niagara? A. I hope not, Sir.

Q. Well, as matter of fact? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Any figure like that, or that could be confounded with that? A. I think not, Sir; I don't remember any. It was a business interview, turning on the retraction—the return of that paper; there was a mere pendant to the interview about Mr. Tilton's condition, and that was the whole thing that was embraced in that conversation.

Q. Did you, in connection with the statement about a moral Niagara, say anything about your having no power to save yourself, and call upon him to save you? A. No, Sir, I didn't.

Q. Any expression of that kind in that interview? A. No, Sir; nothing that had that significance as you ask the question; at the close, or in the closing remark of the conversation, Mr. Evarts, there was something said by him of his power to serve both of us, he thought, if we were amenable to good sense and reason, and in reply to some such suggestion as that I may have said I should be very glad of his services.

Q. Did you in this interview with Mr. Moulton say to him that you considered your sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton as natural an expression of your love for her as the words you used? A. No, Sir; nothing of the kind; such language is simply impossible to me.

Q. Did you say you felt justified in it on account of the love you felt for her—

Mr. Morris—One moment—

Mr. Evarts [Continuing]—And which you knew she held for you? A. No, Sir; no such language; the topic did not come into conversation.

Q. Did you, at the close of the conversation, or otherwise, or at any other part of it, say that your life was ended? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, did you say on this occasion to Mr. Moulton, or anything like it, that you had loved Elizabeth Tilton very much; that through your love for her, if you had fallen at all, you had fallen? A. No, Sir.

Q. That the expression, the sexual expression of that love was just as natural, in your opinion—you had thought so, as the language that you used to her? A. Did I say that?

Q. Yes, did you say that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you then, either a first time or a second time, say that if you had fallen at all, you had fallen in that way—through love, and not through lust? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, was anything of this kind said to you by Moulton [reading]—"Mr. Beecher, I don't see how you have erred as you have; I don't understand it. You have had criminal connection with Mrs. Tilton, and you go down and you get this paper; I don't see how you could have performed two such acts!" A. What is your question; whether I—

Q. Whether he said that to you? A. No, Sir; of course he didn't; Mr. Moulton is not a fool, Sir; he is a very sagacious man—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Mr. Beecher, please.

The Witness—Well, I merely mean that as a form of negative.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is not necessary for you to swear to that fact in order to have it understood. [To Mr. Evarts.] He has no right to make use of such an observation as that.

Mr. Evarts—No; so I say. [To the Witness.] Did Mr. Moulton use either branch of this observation that I have put to you—"You have had criminal connection with Mrs. Tilton?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, on that night, Mr. Beecher, was there by Mr. Moulton any accusation, imputation, or insinuation that you had had carnal intercourse with Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question as leading and as calling for a judgment instead of the conversation that occurred.

Mr. Evarts—I have a right to exhaust the negative that nothing was said on the subject or tending or referring to the subject.

Mr. Beach—It is very easy to ask whether anything more was said, but to put into the question what the gentleman has embodied in that question is utterly inadmissible, I submit to your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—It strikes me not, if your Honor please, so. I have given the conversation, and they have given the conversation on their part, and I don't want any room for suggestion—

Judge Neilson—That is understood.

Mr. Evarts—That this witness has not negated every form of imputation of his having had sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—I suppose it competent for the gentleman to ask, Sir, whether anything was said upon a given subject, or whether anything more was said upon an introduced subject than has been given by the witness; but I beg your Honor to listen to that question from the records of the stenographer, and see how much it requires of judgment and conclusion and construction on the part of the witness. If the gentleman merely intends or wishes to negative any declaration upon any subject in that interview by any party, it is very easy to do it, Sir, without any offensive question of this character.

Mr. Evarts—Read the question, Mr. Stenographer!

The Tribune stenographer read the last question.

Mr. Beach—I persist in my objection, Sir, to that question.

Mr. Evarts—I think I have a right to put that question, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think you could improve it by adding a few words to it—"and if so, what was said?"

Mr. Evarts—And if so, what was said?

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

Mr. Beach—I object to the question, and except to its admission.

The Witness—There was no such insinuation, or imputation, nor implication; and there was nothing said by him or by me on that supposition nor on that subject. [Applause.]

MR. MOULTON PRAISES MR. BEECHER'S GENEROSITY.

Q. At this time, Mr. Beecher, before you separated, was anything said about any future visit or appointment? A. There was an understanding that I should see him the next day.

Q. There was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He was to call upon you the next day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How did that arise—by your request or by his suggestion? A. I don't remember; I only know that I expected him.

Q. Now, the next day was Sunday? A. It was.

Q. The first day of January. How and where did an interview occur between yourself and Mr. Moulton? A. After dinner, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the 1st of January, Mr. Moulton came to my house; we repaired together to the study, which is the back room of the third story, looking out over the bay.

Q. Well, Sir? A. After the salutations, Mr. Moulton introduced the subject of the effect of the mission of the last night upon Mr. Tilton, and his feelings—

Q. What did he say? A. He said that it had been an eminently wise thing in me to comply with his request, and that Mr. Tilton was—that he had received it very kindly; words to that effect.

Q. Now, during this interview, Mr. Beecher, how were you and Mr. Moulton disposed in this apartment; were you sitting, or standing, or walking, one or both of you? A. All ways, by turns.

Q. That is, yourself? A. I sat a part of the time, and part of the time I walked; and a part of the time he sat, and a part of the time he stood; I don't remember his walking much.

Q. Now, will you proceed with the interview as far as you call it to mind? A. Yes, Sir; although I can't give it exactly in the order, I will give it in such order as I can remember it—that is, in an order which assists my memory. I think that Mr. Moulton made some allusion, after finishing the immediate subject of the result of my returning the retraction—I think he proceeded to speak about Mr. Tilton and about his exacerbad feeling, not apologetically, but in, nevertheless, a courteous explanation of his insistence upon me of the last night's action, and so on, and spoke of the great trouble that had come upon him by the treachery of Mr. Bowen, or by his misconduct, and said—

Q. Mr. Bowen's misconduct, you mean? A. What, Sir?

Q. Bowen's misconduct you mean? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Bowen's misconduct; and that it was not in human nature for a man to lose at once his position and his reputation and his livelihood, and not labor under great excitement, and it was perfectly natural that he should extend that to me, if he had reason to think, as he had, that I had in some sense assisted in it. That gave rise to a conversation in regard to my whole relation, from the 26th, when the letter was brought to me by Mr. Bowen. I told Mr. Moulton that I certainly had been accessory to some part of the trouble, and that as far as in me lay I found—I thought it was my duty to retrace my steps and apologize, or to do anything that I could to repair the mischief; that I had had time for reflection about the matter. He then—or—he then went on to say that Mr. Bowen had dismissed Mr. Tilton upon false accusations, or something to that effect, and that they were lies, and that he could prove them to be lies, many of the charges that were made.

Q. He, Moulton? A. That Mr. Moulton could. He asked me, I think, what Mr. Moulton told me in the interview of the 26th. I gave him a description of that interview, and, as it was then quite fresh, probably more literally and full than I have given it here, but to the same general purport. I said that Mr. Bowen had brought that letter, and said that he brought it casually, as a kindness to Mr. Tilton, at his request; then Mr. Moulton said, using very strong language—expletive—that Mr. Bowen had proved treacherous, that Mr. Bowen was coupled with Mr. Tilton in the making of that letter, and that he had promised, if Mr. Tilton would send it to me, that he would back him up in the charges—and he spoke with emphasis upon that matter; I think that he then asked me what Mr. Bowen had charged to me were Mr. Tilton's offenses; I said that Mr. Bowen had represented to me that Mr. Tilton's opinions were becoming so loose that he found it was injuring or was likely to injure The Independent, and that he had found it necessary to dispossess him of his editorial position and put him in a subordinate position; that up till that time he had never heard a whisper—that is, Mr. Bowen never had—against the moral character of Mr. Tilton; but no sooner was it known that he had reduced Mr. Tilton, than there came in, pouring in upon him, stories from one and from another; he said he could not hardly cross the ferry, but somebody came to him, and congratulated him upon having put Mr. Tilton out of that position, and telling him some reason, in the form of a charge against Mr. Tilton, why he should have done it; I told him that he also said that, as a result of that first step, charges had been made against Mr. Tilton of the most shocking character; he instanced one or two cases—the Winsted, and one in the North-West, and one in—somewhere else—I have forgotten where, but stated as one that was fresh in his mind, and with some particularity of detail, an event that occurred in his own office of The Union—The Brooklyn Union; I then told him that it was a singular coincidence; I told him that I told Mr. Bowen that it was a singular coincidence that there had come to my knowledge, within a very brief period, charges of a similar character; I related to him the interview between me and Bessie Turner; I related to him the interview between me and Mrs. Tilton and her mother; I went into detail about that; I narrated to him that there were current reports and rumors, which now seemed to me to gather force, in respect to another person; there was something—a considerable conversation around about that point; Mr. Moulton told me that, of his own personal knowledge, many of these stories were false; that he believed Mr. Tilton to be a man absolutely chaste and faithful to his marital relations, and asseverated that in various forms—pressed it upon me; the conversation occupied in this direction, perhaps, nearly an hour, going over the relations of Mr. Tilton's character and his standing.

MR. BEECHER'S REMORSE FOR HIS ADVICE TO MRS. TILTON.

I told him, however, that that was not the matter that hurt me the most; I felt very acutely that I had done wrong even in those respects toward Mrs. Tilton; on his assurances that Mrs. Tilton was blameless in these respects brought upon me a sense of wrong that was very hard to bear; if there was anything, I told him, in this earth that I abhorred, it was scandal, and talking, and rumors about people; that I had kept myself clean from them, and that there were few persons in the world dare tell me such things; and to find that I had been caught in the alum of them myself, was very hard for my pride; that I had listened to these stories, and that I had believed them, and that I was ashamed and mortified about it, and that it was all the worse because it was toward a friend whom I had known and whom I had loved, and whose household was to me like my own home, and that it was not the way that Mr. Tilton had treated me when I was in adversity; he dropped everything, and went for the service of me because it was my son, which was more than me; he dropped everything and went to Washington, and did a great office of kindness for me; but when he was in trouble I found that the first thing that I had done was to take sides against him, and add to the weight that was threatening to crush him, and that I could not bear that; and that as it regarded his household, I did not know hardly what to say; I could not understand it; how Elizabeth should have called me to a meeting to counsel her about a separation, without letting me know either before or at that interview that there had ever been discrepancy in the household, of such a kind as there had been, I could not understand; I was absolutely bewildered by 't, but that it seemed to me that if she had been led to transfer her affections from her husband, by reason of my presence, I could not but feel that I was blameworthy; that she was a woman, so quiet and so simple, her exterior life was so far from that, that I had never suspected it, but that her conduct seemed to be now such as led me to feel that there had been—that the allegation was not untrue, that I had warped her affection, which her husband had made, in the interview of the 30th, and that it seemed to me that she must have been broken down in her moral nature, that such charges and retractions, and withdrawal of retractions—it was a pitiable thing, and indicated that great mischief had been done in that household, and that I had been the occasion of it was very plain and very evident, though I had not suspected it, and that led to some conversation in which I expressed my doubt of whether—this was the first time that I had given vent to all my thought and feeling. The other interviews had been, as it were, diplomatic, but I felt that Mr. Moulton was a friend to both sides, and for the first time I gave air to the pent-up feelings that I had; I walked about the room in great agitation and great self-condemnation. I said to him that I could not conceive of anything for which a man should blame himself more utterly than to intrude upon a household and to be the means of breaking it up; that my idea of friendship and love was that it gave strength, and that I had always supposed that my presence in their family was giving strength to all of them; that it was a blessing to the children; that it was a help to his wife in her duties, and that it was not without a beneficial influence to Mr. Tilton, in the long run, and that this came upon me like a thunder-clap, and I was amazed and bewildered by it; I think it was, perhaps, in that relation where I was somewhat doubting whether it could possibly be true that Mr. Moulton said to me, sitting in his chair [here Mr. Beecher put his leg over the arm of the chair in illustration], with an intelligent look, "Why, there is no doubt about that, Mr. Beecher; Elizabeth Tilton loves your little finger more than she does Mr. Tilton's whole body;" I accepted it; I had no means of contradiction; I said to myself, "It has been a smoldering fire, burning, concealed, and I knew nothing of it." I felt ashamed to say, "It is not my fault." I felt rather the impulse, I suppose which every gentleman will understand, to say, "I ought to have foreseen; I was the oldest man—the oldest person; I was the one that had had experience; she was a child. If she did not know that the tendrils of her affection were creeping up upon me, I ought to have known it;" and I expressed myself without measure, on that subject; and I alluded in the conversation to the conflict which I had, the sense of—the feeling that I had always had for her as of a saint-like person, and the conflict that now was in my mind in respect to her as one that had been broken down, and had brought these false charges against me, and taken them back, and was acting in a manner almost like one that was bereft of reason, and that the two images—I couldn't understand it.

MR. BEECHER'S HISTORY OF THE "LETTER OF CONTRITION."

Much conversation passed backwards and forwards turning on this, that Mr. Tilton was set against me; that he felt that I was his enemy, and that I had done wrong to him, both in his business relations, and that I had sought to undermine his influence in the community. It was the harder because the implication was, or the statement, that I had made use of my acquired reputation, and my position as the head of a great church, and my relation to the community—that all those, aside from my mere personal action, had gone to overshadow and injure him. I protested against any such idea. That he had occasion to think that I had done him wrong in the matters of Mr. Bowen, I was ashamed to be obliged to admit. That I had done him intentional wrong in his family, I denied; but that I had wronged him there, it was very evident, it seemed to me, from the present condition and action of Mrs. Tilton. Well, we went over the same ground a good many times, running out a line and going into something else, and that bringing us back again, and, on the whole, I—Mr. Moulton was far less severe with me than I was with myself, and at times, as it were, deprecated my own strong language against myself, and said, as the interview drew toward a close, that I would only—that if Tilton could only hear what he had heard, he was satisfied that it would remove from his mind animosity and the conviction that he had that I was seeking his ruin. "Well," said I—I said to him, "State what you see and hear; I have opened my heart to you." Said he, "Write—write these statements, or some of them, to Mr. Tilton." and at first I thought I would, but I was in a whirl, and I couldn't. I said—I declined it. "Well," said he, "let me write it," or something to that effect, and I said: "I have no objection to your writing it," and he sat down at the table, but the conversation didn't stop. I amplified and went on, and finally he said to me, "Well, I will say to him"—and he made something—looked up and said, "I will tell Mr. Tilton so and so," as a sort of interpretation of what I had been saying. I said, "All right," and he made a memorandum of it. Then I went on from point to point, and sometimes he would say, "What about so and so?" and I would go on talking profusely and long, and he would jot down a memorandum about it; and that went through the whole memorandum. When he had gone through with it, it was about 5 o'clock; the bell rang for my supper. On Sundays I take tea at 5 o'clock, in order to have time to prepare my notes for the evening, and the bell rang for 5 o'clock. He rose up from the table and gathered up the papers; they were on separate sheets, and a sort of after-thought came to him, and he said: "Sign this"—"You better sign this." I said, "No, I cannot sign a letter that I have not written." "Well, but," said he, "it won't have the influence with Mr. Tilton that it will if it has your name." "But," said I, "this is your memorandum; you take that and talk on those points to Mr. Tilton, and tell him what you have heard me say, and he believes you; you are his friend. "Well," he says, "it will be a great deal better if you just put your name to this in some way, to let him see that it is authorized," and so, on the edge of the paper, and remote as nearly as I could from the text, I signed my name to the statement that I committed this to Mr. Moulton in confidence; and at that stage I think that he gathered the papers up, made some remark of gratification, and went down stairs. It was about the time of gas-lighting when he went out; and that ended the interview.

Mr. Evarts [To plaintiff's counsel]—Give us Exhibit 2. Exhibit 2 was produced.

Q. Mr. Beecher, during that interview, was this memorandum read to you or read by you? [Referring to Exhibit 2.] A. Neither.

Q. Was any part of it read to you or read by you? A. No part of it; it was the last thing that was done.

Q. Say if that is the writing which you put upon the sheet? [Indicating.] A. I think that is, Sir.

Q. Now, this memorandum of Mr. Moulton—when did you next see it? A. In Court here.

Q. At this trial? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you next see what purported to be any copy of it, either in print or in writing, or partial copy? A. I think perhaps in the "Bacon Letter," in the Summer of 1874.

Q. But the paper itself or a full copy of it—the paper itself you have answered distinctly. When first did you see or know of—see or read or hear read any copy of this paper? The paper itself you never saw until this trial? A. No, Sir, never.

Q. When did you ever first see or know of the full text, or what purports to be the full text, of this paper? A. Not until the Summer of 1874.

Q. Not until the publications of the last Summer? A. No, Sir.

Q. As a part of some of the proceedings of last Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

[Defendant's counsel here consulted among themselves, and Mr. Evarts held the paper up toward the light and looked at it.]

MR. MOULTON'S PICTURE OF MR. TILTON'S WRONGS.

Q. During this conversation of this day did Mr. Moulton lay before you the condition of misfortune and disaster in which Mr. Tilton and his affairs were placed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Give, as near as you can, what he then depicted to you? A. He spoke of Mr. Tilton as being a man of great ability and of great reputation, standing among the highest in the land, and that he had suddenly, by the ill-will or the misconduct of Mr. Bowen, been precipitated from, perhaps, the proudest position a literary man could aspire to; that he had not simply lost that place, but lost it under circumstances that damaged his reputation, and that not only had it, the means of his reputation, or, rather, not only had the means and influence gone with his reputation, but that, suddenly, with a large family on his hands, or expensive family—some word to that effect—his means were cut off, and he had no prospect in life except to rebuild, but all the accustomed channels were suddenly shut up to him. He then said that the man had no home to which he could fall back; that there was discord there and alienation, and that he not only thus lost all public position, but his domestic position was also stormed. He described the condition of his family and of the little children piteously.

Q. During this interview, was anything said by Mr. Moulton as to your blaming yourself more than you ought—anything of that kind? A. Yes, Sir; on several occasions he said he thought I was putting it too strongly; that the matter was not so severe as I had laid it upon myself. He thought that the family relationship might with kindly care be repaired.

Q. Did he, while you were stating to him what you understood to be the fault or misfortune from your connection with his family affairs, say that it was anything different or other than what you stated it? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; he did not. It was not a condemnatory interview; it was a sympathetic and most friendly interview between him and me. There was nothing in his tone, nothing in his manner, nor in his language or charges, that savored of that.

Q. What point or aim did he have in the interview, as you understood?

Mr. Fullerton—No; what did he say?

Mr. Beach—Oh, well.

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—"Did he say?" I think, was the question.

Mr. Evarts—How did he express himself as regards any object, or the result of the interview? A. He was laboring to bring to pass such a reconciliation between Mr. Tilton and me—such a better understanding, each of the other, as should avail for the peace of that family and the restoration of Mr. Tilton to prosperity and to good name.

MR. MOULTON MAKES LIGHT OF BESSIE TURNER'S STORY.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton attempt or offer any explanation of Miss Bessie Turner's story? A. Yes, though not at as much length as he did at a subsequent interview. That was—

Q. What? A. I was trying to prevent the fuller form in my mind; but he said that it was a harmless thing, misunderstood by the child; she was a mere child and she didn't understand; he didn't think if she had been left to herself she would ever have put any such interpretation upon it.

Q. Did he name any one else as having inflamed it? A. He did.

Q. Well, who did he say? A. Mrs. Morse.

Q. Did you say anything in this interview with Mr. Moulton about your feeling or thinking that you ought to write to Mr. Bowen? A. I did.

Q. What was that? A. I told him that as the result of the conversation that passed between him and me on the street, that had been told by me to Mr. Bowen, and on his assurance of the falseness of them, I said I felt that I was bound to call them back—at any rate that I would not stand on any statements that I had made, and that I would do it immediately.

Mr. Evarts—That letter, I think, is in evidence?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That was written the next day?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It is in evidence, is it not?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what is its date?

Mr. Fullerton—Third.

Mr. Shearman—January 2, Exhibit No. 3.

The Witness—I wrote it early the next morning.

Mr. Evarts—Early the next morning you wrote the letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Where is that? Let us have that, No. 3.

Mr. Morris—That is not the right number.

Mr. Evarts—Is it not No. 3?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—He is mistaken.

Mr. Shearman—There are two threes.

Mr. Abbott—There are two threes; one is distinguished by a letter. It is on page 66 of the pamphlet.

Mr. Evarts—I will take it in this form, Mr. Morris, from the testimony.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, look at the testimony; it is not convenient to find the paper. [Showing witness printed testimony.] There is the first part of the letter, and there is the rest of it, with the date in between.

The Witness—I don't need to read the debate.

Mr. Evarts—No, read the letter—those two fragments—and say if that is the letter which you spoke of intending to write, and afterwards did write.

Mr. Morris—Here is the letter, Mr. Evarts, No. 4 1-2.

Mr. Evarts—Here is the letter. This is the draft, I suppose, that we produced, is it not?

Mr. Morris—We produced it.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, you offered it in evidence.

Mr. Morris—And we produced it.

Mr. Evarts—Did you? Oh, yes; it is one of Mr. Moulton's archives.

The Witness—Well, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—This is the letter; I suppose that is the draft. Mr. Bowen would have the original.

The Witness—I was going to say I doubt if I sent this.

Mr. Morris—That is not the one that was sent.

Mr. Evarts—No, that is the draft or copy. [To the Witness.] That is in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it is the draft or copy of the letter which you sent? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Morris]—This is 4 1-2, you say?

Mr. Morris—January 2d?

Mr. Evarts—January 2d.

Mr. Evarts—When Mr. Moulton went off—before he went off with this memorandum which he had made—was anything said by him about his burning or returning it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. He said—treated it as a mere memorandum to be read, and said after he had used it he would either return it to me or burn it.

Q. Was it taken from you after that statement by him? A. Yes, Sir. Well, excuse me.

Q. I mean taken away from the house? A. It never was in my hands—it could not be.

Q. I mean taken from the house? A. He had it in his possession all the time, and made that remark concerning it before he left.

Q. Before he left? And the use of it, with whom and to what end was it stated to be? A. It was to remove from Mr. Tilton's mind the impression that I was indifferent to his welfare, and that I was inimical to him.

Q. And was it to be used otherwise, or with anybody else?

Mr. Beach—I object, Sir.

Judge Neilson—What was said, if anything, I think.

Mr. Beach—I desire to be excessively indulgent.

Q. You said after using it he would burn it or return it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What use, and with whom? A. The understanding between us was—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Mr. Beecher. I must insist that you state what was said, or the substance of it.

Mr. Evarts—That is right. What "use" was spoken of by him or by you? A. He said he wished to make a memorandum from which he could represent my feelings, as he then perceived them, to Mr. Tilton; for which purpose he wished me to write, and I declined; and then he suggested that he would take a memorandum of points which he would expound to him.

Q. Now, when he left, what was the hour of day? how was the light? was the gas lit? A. Not in the study.

Q. Not in the room where you were? A. No, Sir.

Q. And was the sun set? A. I don't know; I don't know about that. It was mid-Winter, and I only know the hour by the fact that my 5 o'clock tea-bell rang.

Q. Now, was there any further statement in regard to this paper, its preservation, its return, or its use, made during that interview than what you have stated? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. During this interview, Mr. Beecher, was the word "crime" used, either by yourself or by Mr. Moulton, in regard to any conduct of yours? A. No, Sir.

Q. And was there anything said at that conversation, either by Mr. Moulton or yourself, in regard to any reparation you were ready to make, than as you have stated, for the wrong, or misfortune as you expressed it?

Mr. Beach—One moment. Mr. Stenographer, will you please read that question?

The Tribune stenographer read as follows:

And was there anything said at that conversation, either by Mr. Moulton or yourself, in regard to any reparation you were ready to make, than as you have stated, for the wrong, or misfortune, as you expressed it?

The Witness—Nothing that I remember. You ask me whether there was anything—you say, anything other than what I had already stated?

Q. Anything said in regard to the reparation, or wrong, or misfortune in Mr. Tilton's affairs or family that you were ready to make, except the wrong and misfortune as you had stated it? A. I do not still understand you quite—whether you mean—whether anything more than what I have stated that I would do was stated, or whether I would do something about other wrongs than those that are stated?

Q. Yes; the latter question. A. No, Sir; there was not.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton on this Sunday say to you, or did you say to Mr. Moulton on this Sunday, that Elizabeth Tilton had sent for you to come to her house, and told you that she believed that your relations were wrong, and you told her or you told Mr. Moulton that you told her, "If you believe these relations wrong, then they shall be terminated;" and did you then further, tell Mr. Moulton that you prayed with her—prayed to God with her for help to discontinue your sexual relations? A. Pooh! No, Sir; I made a statement in respect to my visit with Mr. Moulton—in respect to that visit of July; I stated to Mr. Moulton, in regard to the allegation, that it was made by Mr. Tilton, that in the July preceding a conversation between his wife, or a written statement somewhat similar to the one made in December had occurred; and that when I went to see her in August, during her sickness, there was no word or hint of any such thing; that it was a matter of depression and mental trouble; and that I talked with her and prayed with her as I would with any other parishioner; and I marveled that if there had been any such statement, that I had got no word of it or hint of it.

Q. Was there any other allusion to an occasion of prayer between you and Mrs. Tilton than that that you have now given? A. I do not know, but I may have stated that I prayed with her when I went down to see her at her mother's, but I don't remember that I did; it is quite possible.

Q. Was anything said by you or in your hearing by Mr. Moulton on that Sunday that was of the nature of this statement that you and she prayed for help to discontinue your sexual relations? A. [Very decidedly] There was no such thing whatsoever, in any manner or shape, by Mr. Moulton or any other human being. [Murmurs of applause.]

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is so near the hour of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Will gentlemen keep their seats until the Jury retire. [To the Jurors.] Gentlemen, please return at 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. Mallison [Clerk of the Court]—This Court stands adjourned until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

FIFTY-EIGHTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CONTRADICTIONS TO TILTON AND MOULTON.

MR. BEECHER'S VERSION OF SEVERAL INTERVIEWS WITH THE PLAINTIFF AND MR. MOULTON—NO INTERVIEW WITH MR. MOULTON ON JAN. 2—NO REFERENCES EVER MADE BY MR. TILTON TO THE OFFENSE NOW CHARGED—INDIGNANT AND EMPHATIC DENIALS AND CONTRADICTIONS BY THE DEFENDANT.

MONDAY, April 5, 1875.

Resuming at the point at which he had left off on April 2, and continuing the examination of Mr. Beecher, Mr. Evarts called his attention once more to the occasion of the writing of the letter of contrition. An introductory question or two led up to the denial that that document was in any sense the work of the witness; in no proper sense of the word had he dictated it; and then taking it up clause by clause, he went over it, declaring no single sentence of it to be his, and asserting in the most emphatic manner that nothing said by him resembled or warranted the expressions therein contained, except in three instances, and in these the words did not adequately express the intensity and passion under which he had uttered these reproaches against himself for having slandered Mr. Tilton and unwittingly come between him and his wife, and thus destroyed the peace of his house and family. Mr. Beecher's manner during this passage was full of feeling, and his expressions were intensely emphatic. Mr. Evarts closed this part of the examination with an attempt to explain Mr. Beecher's expression in a letter written in June, 1873, in which he spoke of this document as "my letter." Mr. Beecher explained that, down to June, 1873, he had never seen the document, and had always heard it referred to as his letter; and carelessly spoke of it as such. To explain the policy of suppression and silence subsequent to 1871, Mr. Beecher, in answer to Mr. Evarts's question, if in 1871 he had taken the blame upon himself of alienating Mrs. Tilton's affections from her husband, declared: "I continued to take it to myself until the year 1874."

SPECIFIC CONTRADICTIONS OF MR. TILTON.

In the desire to present a narrative of the events of Dec. 30, 1870, in unbroken connection, Mr. Evarts omitted on April 2 to call Mr. Beecher's attention specifically to the declarations of Mr. Tilton in reference to their interview on that stormy night. The omission was remedied to-day. Mr. Tilton had sworn that on that night Mr. Beecher, after hearing the accusation of adultery, had said, "Theodore, I am in a dream; this is Dante's Inferno." Mr. Beecher answered that he did not recollect using such language—did not use it; and he was proceeding to repudiate the style and metaphor, when Mr. Beach checked him promptly. Mr. Beecher then went on to deny in emphatic terms that there was any accusation of adultery, or any question of adultery raised; nothing but the charge of improper solicitation, which he pronounced false. Mr. Beecher's language to each question on these points—they were put one after another—were in nearly the same language, but the manner of delivering them varied. One was deprecatingly answered, as if the absurdity of the question ought to be apparent; another was with a shrug of the shoulder, as if he had suddenly become reconciled to the necessity of answering the catechism; and the last was indignantly repeated over and over again. But it was not until later in the day that his denials burst forth into indignant protest against the shame of having to answer insulting questions.

Mr. Moulton, in his direct testimony testified in regard to an interview with Mr. Beecher on Jan. 2, 1871, in his study up stairs, lasting some time and closing at 5 o'clock. In this interview Mr. Moulton swore that he told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton was preparing for publication a letter to Mr. Bowen charging Mr. Beecher with adultery, and that the latter asked Mr. Moulton's advice about stopping the sale of Plymouth Church pews. Some testimony was taken early in the case for the defense, bearing upon the fact that Mr. Beecher received New Year's calls on the day in question from 10 a. m. until 7 p. m. Mr. Beecher, touching upon this point, said that he indistinctly remembered Mr. Moulton as among his ordinary callers, but he had no private talk with him. He positively denied that there was on that day any conference as to the sale of Plymouth pews or any reference to Mr. Tilton's letter.

AN INDIGNANT OUTBURST.

Mr. Beecher's attention was next called to the interview on Jan. 2, at which both Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton were present, and concerning which each has testified. Mr. Beecher was first called upon to give his version of the interview. His attention was then called to specific statements by them in regard to the language used during the interview. He never heard the remark which Mr. Tilton swore was employed when he refused to speak to Mr. Beecher, "as a man who has ruined my wife, broken up my home, and who then gets my permission in a sad and serious hour to visit that woman, and uses that permission for the purpose of dictating to her and making her write down a lie." He denied more emphatically still that any reference was made by Mr. Moulton to Mr. Beecher as one who had "humbled himself before you as he does before God." The sworn statements of Mr. Tilton that he had admitted his "great wrong done you and Elizabeth," and the assertion of the same witness that he had offered to retire from his pulpit, met with the sweeping denial that "the imputation of such language to me is a fiction." He denied that he had said that the renting of the pews should stop. The testimony of Mr. Tilton that Mr. Beecher had begged an opportunity before exposure to go abroad or commit suicide was contemptuously denied as a "foolish statement." When asked if he had ever begged the plaintiff not to let Mrs. Beecher hear of his crime, as she was Mr. Tilton's enemy and might readily become his own, he said calmly that there was no such statement as that, and that he had "never had one dread in his life" of his wife's becoming his enemy. But it was near the close of this part of the examination that Mr. Beecher expressed his greatest indignation, when called upon to deny the conversations sworn to by Mr. Tilton, in which the details of the alleged intimacy were talked over as a common every-day topic. "No, Sir," he exclaimed, "odiously false!" And when the question was put in another form he broke out with the interruption, "It is intolerable, almost, to be asked that question; but before Almighty God, no such question ever, by anybody, at any time, under any circumstances, was put to me, or, in conversation with me, alluded to."

CONTRADICTIONS OF THE PLAINTIFF'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Evarts then reverted to the scene on Jan. 7, 1871, between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton. Mr. Moulton testified among other things that on this day he read to Mr. Beecher a copy of Mr. Tilton's letter to Mr. Bowen, subsequently made part of The Golden Age article and attached to the Tripartite Agreement. In this letter Mr. Beecher's various alleged offenses against others than Mr. Tilton were fully enumerated. Mr. Beecher denied that such a letter was read to him or that it was seen by him until 1872, after the close of the Tripartite Covenant. He also swore that instead of admitting Mr. Bowen's charges, he defied him to his face before all the world. Mr. Beecher also stated that the object of this interview was to help build up Mr. Tilton's fortunes, to induce Mr. Bowen to pay him his dues and to restore peace to his family, but in the end he discovered that Mr. Moulton was also endeavoring to restore Mr. Tilton to the editorship of The Independent. Mr. Beecher, at the close of this part of his testimony, was called upon to quote Mr. Moulton's report to him of what the latter had said to Mr. Bowen, and did it with close imitation of Mr. Moulton's gestures. Mr. Evarts said it was the hour of adjournment, though it lacked a few minutes of it, and the Court adjourned for recess.

The whole of the afternoon session was devoted to drawing from Mr. Beecher his version of various scenes and facts and letters respecting which Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton had testified.

In regard to the story that Miss Bessie Turner was sent away to school through Mr. Beecher's influence in order that she might not be able to repeat the scandal concerning him and Mrs. Tilton, Mr. Beecher swore in contradiction of Mr. Moulton that the latter never told him that he thought that it would be better to have her away. Mr. Beecher had never said that he "thought so too," Mr. Moulton never told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton considered Bessie Turner as dangerous from her knowledge of Mr. Beecher's relations with Mrs. Tilton. And finally Mr. Beecher swore that he never knew anything about Miss Turner's going away to school until called upon to pay the first installment for her schooling.

When the subject of Mrs. Morse's letter declaring that Mr. Tilton intended to publish his story as soon as Mrs. Tilton was dead was introduced, Mr. Beecher swore that it was agreed among them that her letter was merely the hallucination of a woman laboring under a monomania.

Mr. Beecher also contradicted the testimony of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton in regard to the existence of any understanding among them at that time that he was charged with having had criminal relations with Mrs. Tilton, or with preaching to forty of his mistresses. He also denied that he was told that Joseph Richards had gone to Mr. Tilton and asked him "if Mr. Beecher's visits to Mrs. Tilton were altogether of a pastoral nature." Mr. Beecher's manner in making these denials was calm but emphatic.

A LETTER TO MRS. TILTON EXPLAINED.

Mr. Evarts now passed on to February 7, 1871, the day on which Mr. Beecher wrote the letter to Mrs. Tilton, beginning, "When I last saw you I did not expect ever to see you again—to be alive many days." Mr. Beecher said that Mr. Moulton represented Mr. Tilton as toiling hard to recover his lost position, but suffering from great annoyance at home from the sullenness of Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Moulton urged Mr. Beecher to write a letter to each of them. He had seen Mrs. Tilton last on Dec. 30, when she lay upon her sick bed. Mr. Beecher explained the opening sentence of the letter by saying: "I referred to the shortness of our days. She looked like one already spoken for by the angels, and after the fiery ordeal to which I had been subjected I did not expect to live long." Mr. Beecher spoke solemnly, with pauses between the words, and evidently his nature was stirred by the remembrance. Mr. Beecher accounted for the fact that he had not sent the letter to Mrs. Tilton by her husband by saying that Mr. Moulton suggested that if this were done Mrs. Tilton would have no faith in it, and the effect of the letter as a peace offering would be lost. The clause to the effect that it was written by Mr. Tilton's permission was also, Mr. Beecher said, a suggestion of Mr. Moulton. "Mr. Moulton was the engineer of the whole proceeding," was Mr. Beecher's emphatic summary of his explanation.

He further denied that there was any arrangement by which he and Mrs. Tilton were not to meet or correspond, but explained that there were two reasons that prevented him from cooperating openly to secure harmony in the Tilton family. His presence, as he then thought, would increase Mrs. Tilton's regard for him, and he thought that Mr. Tilton's pride would take offense at becoming reconciled with his wife through the instrumentality of the man for whom, as he then believed, she had confessed an affection.

Mr. Beecher then gave an account of an interview at Mr. Tilton's house about the middle of February, 1871. This it will be remembered was the date given by Mr. Tilton of an alleged conversation concerning the parentage of the boy Ralph. Mr. Beecher in his account of the conversation made no mention of any such discussion. His talk with Mr. Tilton, he said, was in reference to the stories about the latter. Mr. Tilton repeated to him the stories of the Winsted and other scandals, denied them, and asseverated that he "had never violated his marriage vows, but had always preserved an immaculate chastity." Mr. Beecher again expressed his sorrow for believing in the scandalous reports. They had another reconciliation and then went to Mrs. Tilton's bedroom, where Mr. Tilton said to his wife, "Mr. Beecher has acted the part of a man and has taken all the blame;" and then turning to the witness had added, "and Elizabeth has done the same to you, Sir." Mr. Evarts then read from Mr. Tilton's testimony passages from an alleged conversation on the subject of Ralph's parentage. Mr. Beecher seemed restless as the reading of this testimony continued. He seemed impatient to speak and made several gestures of remonstrance. When at length the question was put, "Was there any conversation on that subject?" he answered: "Never, between me and Mr. Tilton alone nor in the presence of his wife. It is an absolute and monstrous falsehood." Mr. Fullerton was on his feet almost before the applause had ceased, and made some bitter reflections on the conduct of the spectators generally and the friends of the defendant. Mr. Evarts replied, and Judge Neilson ended the discussion by ordering a reinforcement of court officers, and threatening to punish the next offenders for contempt.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

ANOTHER DEMAND FOR BETTER ORDER.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—I wish to say a word to the reporters—first that the suggestion about order which I now wish to make, and the fact that there may be interruptions hereafter, and that the Judge may scold the audience, be omitted from your notes—utterly omitted. I am admonished in that respect by a long letter received from a distinguished Judge in Toronto, covering three pages, and telling me how they arrange the courts there and wondering we haven't power, by the aid of the Sheriff, to remove persons who interrupt the proceedings. Therefore, I think, the record would appear much better if any casual interruption that may possibly occur (and I hope none will) may be omitted from the evidence, and that my requests for order may be omitted. In the same connection I wish to say to Mr. Rogers, the officer who has charge, that if he has not policemen enough here to aid him to keep order, he must order more. In case of any interruption such as did occur the last afternoon you were here, he must remove the person or persons who interrupt the harmony of the proceedings, and that must be done without respect to persons, no matter who it is. These interruptions are unpleasant to the witness—unpleasant to each of the counsel on both sides; they distract the attention of the jury. Such persons are wanting in respect to the Court, and it must cease; that is all I have to say about it. Proceed, gentlemen.

Mr. Beecher was then recalled and his direct examination continued.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Morris, have you Exhibit No. 2?

[Exhibit No. 2 produced by plaintiff's counsel and handed to witness.]

MR. BEECHER'S INJUSTICE TO MR. TILTON.

Mr. Evarts—Recurring now, Mr. Beecher, to the scene and date of the interview at your house in the study, when that memorandum you have in your hands was made, I now ask you when Mr. Moulton made the statements which you have given regarding Mr. Tilton's innocence in respect of the matters that had been imputed against his morality, the stories that had been told—what effect did those statements of Mr. Moulton produce upon your mind in regard to your belief on that subject, of those immoralities? A. Do I understand the question to mean whether Mr. Moulton's statements cleared my mind in regard to Mr. Tilton?

Q. Yes, what the effect of them was upon your mind in that regard? A. Why, I earnestly and with overgladness believed that they were true, and that his statement about Mr. Tilton was the truth about him, and I felt all the worse for believing it, because it made me, in some sense, an injurer of Mr. Tilton's innocence.

THE BASIS OF THE LETTER OF CONTRITION.

Q. Now, Sir, is that paper which you hold in your hand in any sense your composition?

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The paper is the memorandum made by Mr. Moulton, as testified to.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take that, though it substantially appears already.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, whether that is so or not will appear from the facts that he has already detailed; it is not his judgment that is to prevail upon that subject, it is the judgment of the jury.

Judge Neilson—Not to prevail, to be sure; but I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Whether in any sense that paper is his composition?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Note the exception.

The Witness—In no sense whatever was it any composition of mine?

Q. Was it a copy or production of any dictation of yours? A. In no proper sense of the word "dictation," did I dictate it.

Q. I ask your attention now to the part, first clause in that memorandum, which reads thus, I suppose; I read from a print:

I ask through you Theodore Tilton's forgiveness, and I humble myself before him as I do before my God —

Q. Did you express that sentence in those words or their equivalent to Mr. Moulton that night? A. I did not. I did say that in view of the statements made I felt that I had wronged him and I had wronged his household, and that I would—I had humbled myself before God for it; and I was willing to humble myself before Mr. Tilton.

Q. This clause:

He would have been a better man in my circumstances than I have been—

Did you express that clause in those words, or any equivalent meaning or expression? A. I did, substantially that, a good many times over.

Q. In what connection and in reference to what topic concerning which you were speaking? A. In reference to the fact that I had, as it were, almost on the first blush, sided against Mr. Tilton and with Mr. Bowen. When I was in difficulty Mr. Tilton had instantly and with a most generous spontaneity dropped everything and gone to my service and help, and when he was in trouble I at once took sides against him.

Q. Was that your feeling at that time in comparing your conduct as it stood before you with his conduct, as you remember it, toward yourself? A. I remember it very distinctly, Sir; I shall not forget it to the Judgment Day.

Q. Did you express in these words this—what is—what appears as this clause in the memorandum:

I can ask nothing except that he will remember all the other hearts that would ache—

A. No, Sir; I did not make any statement which is expressed by that formula—I did, in that conversation, repel the idea that I was acting selfishly; and I did call up in various forms, and at different times in the conversation, and repetitiously, the relations which I sustained to other persons in my household and to his household, and to the friends in the church that loved me as if I belonged to their household.

Q. Did you express in these words, or in any equivalents, this—what is printed as this clause of the memorandum—what appears as this clause of the memorandum:

I will not plead for myself; I even wish that I were dead. But others must live and suffer.

A. Oh, that is not my phraseology, and it is a very pale and poor and feeble interpretation of the intensity with which I expressed my sorrow to lie in the sorrow of other people.

Q. What did you express carrying the idea that not for yourself but for others were you concerned? A. I don't take your question, Sir!

Q. What can you state as having been said by you carrying the idea that not what yourself would suffer, but what others would suffer, gave you concern? A. Well, Mr. Evarts, it should be recollected that I was not in a logical mood, and I did not measure my words, nor finish all my sentences, and I am afraid even mixed my metaphors. There was no intensity that I was capable of that I did not pass through in the various expressions of my feeling. Sometimes it was the laceration of my own heart at what it seemed to me I had done toward Theodore; sometimes it was the intense feeling that I had had at what my presence in the household had done toward Elizabeth; sometimes it was indignation that Elizabeth had done what she had toward me, and there was just that oscillation and vibration which takes place in a very highly excited state of mind; for if I had expressed indignation I was sorry for the indignation at the next mood, and went perhaps to the other extreme of excusatory statements.

Q. Did you dictate this clause:

I will die before any one but myself shall be inculpated. In those words or in any equivalent expression? A. Well, no, no such phrase as that. I have looked through this and I do not think I see a phrase in it that is mine, and yet I think I see the sources from which a good many of them were drawn. I did say that in certain—I cannot recall it definitely and certainly, but that I did express myself very strongly, that I had rather die than to have brought such trouble or than to increase such trouble; that so far as myself alone was concerned I counted life very small if I could make reparation, but it was not as anything practical and definite; it was the strong expression of surging feeling of regret and remorse at the mischief that seemed to have been committed by me.

Q. I ask your attention to the next sentence that appears in the memorandum:

All my thoughts are running toward my friends, toward the poor child lying there and praying with her folded hands.

The Witness—Yes.

Q. Did you express what is there—there appears as a clause? A. Very likely in substance, only this is a very poor expression, very meager.

Q. What did you say, and in what connection, on that subject? A. I don't know exactly what I said. I know that I felt like a father that was standing over the dead body of a child. I remembered her; she was like death when I saw her, and she had been a dear child and friend to me, and I seemed to have destroyed her, her reason, or her moral sense, and perhaps her life, for she was hovering on the edge of life and death; and I spoke as one would speak of the intensity of my distress.

Q. During this conversation were there any suggestions made by Mr. Moulton in regard to your feeling for others and not being exclusively concerned about your own position? A. He reasoned the night before, on the 31st, with me, on that ground, when I refused in self-defense to give up the retraction at first, and thought that that selfish consideration would be mean; and he very likely also at some point of the conversation may have dealt with me in the same way on Sunday afternoon. I do not now recall distinctly any passage of that kind; it is very likely to have happened.

Q. Did you use these words, or their equivalent, as contained in the next clause of the memorandum:

She is guiltless, sinned against, bearing the transgression of another?

A. Very likely, very likely; but I had lived in their household a life of intimate friendship for many years, and if I had alienated her affections in such a degree and manner as that it brought discord and such distress as even had paralyzed her moral sense, or rather her reason—if I had been the occasion of that, that mischief I took to myself. How could any man stand there and see this trouble—

Mr. Beach—This is matter of reasoning. One moment, Mr. Beecher.

The Witness—Well, I won't reason.

Mr. Beach—No; one moment, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The blame of that you took to yourself? A. I took the blame to myself, and I continued to take it to myself until the year 1874.

Q. And the following clause, Mr. Beecher—are these your words or the expression of what you stated, in substance:

Her forgiveness I have; I humbly pray to God that He may put it into the heart of her husband to forgive me!

A. No, Sir; that sentence must go with all the rest—it is not of my parentage; the question came up of Mr. Tilton's feeling—the severity of his feeling; the drift of the interview was such a statement on my part, or such an exhibition of my mood and purposes, as should lay the foundation for a kind interference between us and a reconciliation, and Mr. Tilton's feelings, the strength of them, was justified; and when I had shown what my real feeling was, it led to conversation in respect to the feeling all around.

Q. Between you and Mr. Moulton? A. Between me and Mr. Moulton led—

Q. On that occasion? A. Yes, on that occasion; and it was in connection with Mrs. Tilton that I said, in many repeated forms, that I felt that I had done her an incalculable wrong, but that I had no doubt whatever of her forgiveness; but it was Mr. Tilton whose kindness and reconciliation I very much doubted, whose next friend, Mr. Moulton, was talking with me, and he was assuring me, too, that the difficulty with Mr. Tilton was that he had it firmly fixed in his mind that I was his mortal enemy—had been; and he himself was satisfied that if he could see how I did feel, as he believed I felt, that it would work a very different state of feeling in Mr. Tilton.

Q. If Mr. Tilton could see— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How you felt, as he (Moulton) saw, it would work a difference? A. Yes, Sir.

A REMARK ABOUT THE CONTRITION LETTER EXPLAINED.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Morris]—Please give me "Ex. 26."

["Ex. 26" was produced.]

Q. I call your attention, Mr. Beecher, to a phrase in your letter of June 1, 1873, which is "Ex. No. 26,"—this phrase: "The agreement was made after my letter through you was written." This is a letter to Mr. Moulton, of the 1st of June, 1873. [Showing witness a letter:] this single phrase, "made after my letter through you was written." Calling your attention to that phrase, in that expression, "letter through you," were you referring to this memorandum, or this occasion of Sunday, in which you had written—in which the memorandum had been written?

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir; I submit that that question is leading. It should be, what he referred to.

Judge Neilson—If you would ask him what he referred to it would be doubtless correct.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is only introductory, to know whether he was referring to it. I was going to ask him further.

Mr. Morris—What is the question?

Mr. Evarts—The question is—his Honor suggests—

Mr. Morris—The suggestion is that you should put it in another form.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, I agree. [To the witness.] The question is, in that clause what had you reference to when you speak of "my letter through you?" A. I had reference to this same memorandum that I have just had in my hands.

Q. Had you, up to that time, seen it in any form? A. I never saw it until I saw it here. I did not hear of it, as I now recollect; it never came up in conversation that I recollect; and I think the first time that I heard of it again was when Mr. Tracy, in December of 1872, I think it was—at any rate it was after he had been called in by Mr. Moulton—saw me, and he spoke of a letter that I had written. Afterward Mr. Claflin asked me about a letter that I had written. I think my brother Edward came to me about a letter, but the document had gone almost out of my mind; I had never seen it, and I used the same phraseology that I heard used.

ADULTERY NOT SUGGESTED ON DEC. 30.

Q. I recur now, for a moment, Mr. Beecher, to your interview with Mrs. Tilton on the 30th of December, before I pass to a later stage. Did you in that interview use any expression, or make any reference of any kind on the subject of Dante's "Inferno?" A. I recollect none, and it don't agree with—

Mr. Beach—I object to that system of argument, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, didn't you on that occasion? A. I should say I did not.

Q. During that whole interview between Mrs. Tilton and yourself, Mr. Beecher, which you have given your narrative of, and he has, did Mr. Tilton, in any form, accuse you of the crime of adultery with his wife? A. Most certainly he did not.

Q. Did he, by way of recital, or otherwise, say to you or intimate to you that his wife had ever accused you to him of adultery? A. He did not.

Q. Was there, at any time, during that conversation, raised between you, on his part, or on your part, the question whether you had committed adultery with his wife? A. There was no such question, no such allusion, no such topic, by intimation or by express language, or in any manner whatsoever.

Q. Was there any statement by him of either verbal or written accusation of or imputation against you by his wife, except the memorandum read about improper solicitations? A. Nothing but that.

Q. Was there during that conversation any reference to, recital, or suggestion of the arguments by which you had overcome her virtue and triumphed over her chastity? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; nothing.

ONE OF MR. MOULTON'S INTERVIEWS DECLARED FICTITIOUS.

Q. I come now, Mr. Beecher, to the 2d of January. How was that observed that day? A. According to the custom of years past in my congregation, as in others; my house was open to receive calls on that day from 10 o'clock until 7.

Q. And how were you personally occupied or taken up that day by that custom of visiting? A. I can't recall that specific day; I can recall the custom of those days; I am usually busy—

Mr. Beach—I submit, Sir, that that is not admissible.

Mr. Evarts—Well, according to your recollection of that day, Mr. Beecher. A. I have looked to see what memoranda I could find of the day, and according to my knowledge and belief I received about 800 callers that day.

Q. And through what hours of the day did that occupation run? A. Nominally from 10 until 7, but about from 11 to 7.

Q. Now, have you any recollection of any interview with Mr. Moulton on that day? A. Only the most shadowy impression that he called upon me as a caller.

Q. But as a conference, or interview with him, what recollection have you on that subject? A. There was no conference of any—there could have been no conference of any magnitude; there was none.

Q. Did you go up stairs away from your parlors into your study with Mr. Moulton that day? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Was there on that day any conversation between you in which you asked Mr. Moulton if he thought it would be safe to have the sale of Plymouth pews go on? A. No, Sir, nothing of the kind; it would have been simply absurd; I had nothing to do with the sale of Plymouth pews; that belongs to the Trustees.

Q. When was the sale for that year to take place? A. The sale takes place on the first Tuesday after the first Sunday in the month of January.

Q. Then it was to take place the following day? A. The next day.

Q. The following day? A. The next day.

Q. And it did take place, did it? A. I presume it did, Sir; I have never known a year in which they were not sold.

Q. What length of preliminary notice had been given of the sale? A. Two weeks always.

Q. Two weeks? A. Two Sabbaths in advance; the church is always open on the day of sale from morning to night for persons to come in and make a selection, and that is always advertised two weeks in advance.

Q. Was there anything discussed between you and him on that day in regard to any letter that Mr. Tilton was writing, or was to write, to Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir; none.

MR. BEECHER'S ACTUAL APOLOGY.

Q. Now, Sir, on the following day was there an interview between you and Mr. Moulton—the 3d day of January, or thereabouts? A. Yes, Sir, there was, there or thereabouts.

Q. Within what time? A. Within a few days, but I think it was on the 3d.

Q. Where did it occur? A. At Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. Were you there by appointment or by chance? A. I cannot say.

Q. Where was it held? A. In Mr. Moulton's chamber.

Q. What was his condition of health? A. He was, I think, then—he was in bed, and I think it was on account of sickness. Sometimes he was in bed from late hours the night before, and sometimes from rheumatism, but I think this was the beginning—indeed, I know now—I am thinking—

Q. You think it was illness? A. I know it was illness now.

Q. But not such as to preclude him from seeing visitors? A. No, Sir; I never have seen him too sick to receive a call from me.

Q. While you were there with Mr. Moulton, did Mr. Tilton come in? A. He did.

Q. Had you seen him before since your interview on the 30th of December? A. I think not, Sir; I am pretty sure I had not—certainly not to have any intercourse.

Q. As he came in, what form of salutation, if any, passed on his part? A. With me!

Q. With you? A. None.

Q. And how did any conversation proceed in his presence? A. I think Mr. Moulton began by referring to my conversation, which I had—which had been passing between him and me; that was the beginning of it; Mr. Moulton was proceeding to tell something to Mr. Tilton, when I struck in myself.

Q. You had been talking with Mr. Moulton before Mr. Tilton came in? A. I had.

Q. What had you been saying to him? A. I had been speaking in respect to Mr. Tilton, and what he must have suffered, and what I regarded as the hardship of his position, and saying that I thought his self-restraint and his carriage of himself had been remarkable under the circumstances, as they then had been revealed to me. There was some—not a prolonged, but something of a conversation of that kind.

Q. Now, after Mr. Tilton came in, how did Mr. Moulton open the conversation—after Mr. Tilton came in? A. Well, it was in general that I had been saying very kind things of Mr. Tilton.

Q. He said this to Mr. Tilton? A. He said this to Mr. Tilton. Mr. Tilton was distant and gloomy in his aspect. I turned toward him—shall I give the conversation?

Q. Yes; what passed between you and him then? A. I turned to Mr. Tilton, and with far more words than I am using now—I epitomize now, and state the substance—I turned to Mr. Tilton and spoke to him of the profound regrets that I felt that I had in any way been a party or subsidiary to the injuries inflicted upon him by Mr. Bowen, and I also said that the disturbance in his household which had been occasioned by me was without intention and without my recognition at the time, but that I did regard it now as being very serious, and that I had the most profound sorrow for the disturbance that I had occasioned, the rupture between him and his family, and the miseries that he must have suffered; that I asked his pardon for the one, and for the other—that I felt I had been in the wrong, and that I ought to ask forgiveness for it.

Q. Did you say anything as to what you could do or would wish to do in respect to repairing it? A. I said that anything that lay in my power consistent with truth and honor I would be more than glad to do, to repair the mischief; and at that Mr. Moulton, with great emphasis, said to him: "Theodore, that is an apology which any gentleman can offer to another—that is, with self-respect, and that is an apology which any gentleman ought to accept."

Q. What did you observe then on the part of Mr. Tilton? A. Mr. Tilton was reluctant, and began to say something appealingly, as "How can I?"—"How can speak"—well, referring to what he had borne from me—"How can I be reconciled?" was the idea. Mr. Moulton, with almost severity, and with an emphasis the most intense, said: "You ought to accept that apology. What can you expect of a man to do more than he has done, to express his regret for that which has passed, and his willingness in the future to repair the mischief?" And after some conversation between them, back and forth, Mr. Tilton did accept the apology.

Q. How did he indicate that? A. We shook hands.

Q. And the rest of the interview, what was the character of it? A. There was but little more. Mr. Tilton withdrew, I think—one of us withdrew.

Q. At this interview, Mr. Beecher, was any reference made by either of you to the charges or accusations made by Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't think there was, Sir. I do not recall any. I think we were talking of the matter in its whole, and did not go into particulars.

Q. Now, after Mr. Tilton left, Mr. Beecher, was there any between you and Mr. Moulton? A. There was, I think (a pause)—I don't recall anything that is special to that interview. Our interviews at these times—that is, what was said in earlier ones was resaid in many forms in the successive—the immediately successive and later ones. I do not—

WHAT WAS NOT SAID ON THE OCCASION OF THE ACTUAL APOLOGY.

Q. Do you remember in the observations that Mr. Moulton made to Mr. Tilton after you came in in which he spoke of what you had done, and that it ought to be satisfactory—do you remember any such phrase as this being used by Mr. Moulton?

He has, in my opinion, done everything that a man could do—up to the point of making a public statement of the facts.

A. No, Sir; there was no such thing said.

Q. Was there at any time during that interview, or before that time, any desire for, or propriety in, a public statement of the facts—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—The question is—what was said?

Mr. Evarts—Was there at any time, between you three, up to that time, a suggestion from anybody that a public statement of the facts ought to be made? A. So far from it, that the whole of every interview, and of this in particular, was that a public statement of the difficulties in that family ought to be concealed.

Q. Now, Sir, did Mr. Tilton at this interview, after Mr. Moulton had addressed him, say anything of this kind:

How can you expect me to speak to a man who has ruined my wife, broken up my home, and who then gets my permission, in a sad and serious hour, to visit that woman, and uses that permission for the purpose of dictating to her and making her write down a lie?

A. Was there anything like that said by Mr. Tilton to me?

Q. Yes, to you. A. Not a word of it.

Q. Now, did Mr. Moulton, following that, use expressions of this kind:

But, Theodore, you must remember that Mr. Beecher has sent you a letter through me, humbling himself before you as he does before God?

A. No, Sir; no, Sir!

Q. Now, Sir, at this interview did anything of this kind pass between you and Mr. Tilton—an observation of this kind, which Mr. Tilton imputes to you:

I know it was but words, and words are little or nothing, and no words of mine nor any act of mine can ever undo the great wrong that I have done to you and to Elizabeth?

And did you then say anything of this kind:

I do not put in any plea for myself but only for her. Indeed, if you wish to carry out the demand which was communicated to me in your letter of Christmas Day, that I should retire from my pulpit, you have only to say the word and I will retire!

A. The imputation of any such language as that to me is a wholesale fiction. It is absolutely false.

Q. Did you say:

The renting of the pews shall not go on—I will bow my head and go out of public life?

A. Nothing of the sort. You might as well—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, wait.

Mr. Evarts—Well—

The Witness—Yes, I know I did not say it.

Q. Did you then proceed, in any such wise as this, to say further as I shall read, or anything equivalent to it:

I have this request to make, that if it be necessary for you to make a public recital of this case, that you will give me notice in advance of your intention to do so, in order that I may either go out of the world by suicide or else escape from the face of my friends by a voyage to some foreign land?

A. No, Sir, I made no such foolish statement as that; nothing of the sort, nothing on which any such statement can be founded.

Q. Was there any intimation or suggestion that anybody expected or wanted publicity given?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Evarts—Why?

Mr. Beach—Because it is leading.

Judge Neilson—Was there anything said upon the subject of publicity?

Mr. Evarts—Was there anything said by anybody on the subject of publicity being expected or desired by Mr. Tilton? A. Not at that interview, anything on that subject.

Q. At all? A. Nothing at all on that subject, that I recall.

Q. Did you say this, or anything of this import or effect?

And furthermore I ask you to do me this favor, that whoever else in the wide world is to be informed of the facts of this case, at least my wife shall not know anything on the subject, for she is not only your enemy, but may very readily become mine.

A. Do I understand that this question was put after my statement that I was going to commit suicide or going on a foreign voyage?

Q. This comes next? A. No, Sir; there was no such statement made.

Q. Was there anything of the kind said about informing your wife, or that she might become your enemy? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; I never had one dread of that in my life.

Q. Did you say this:

If you can spare her the pang of having these facts communicated to her, I will consider that it is an additional occasion of gratitude?

A. No, Sir; nothing of the sort.

Q. During this interview of this 3d of January, in Mr. Moulton's chamber, was there anything said of this kind—said by you to Mr. Tilton; and if so, what:

I do not beg at all for myself, but for her [meaning Elizabeth]; she was not to blame; I was altogether at fault; my sacred office and my years should have combined to have made me her guardian, not her tempter?

A. There was something of that sort said.

Q. In what way, or in what connection? A. I said that my feeling was not for myself alone; that my sympathy and feeling was for Elizabeth; that my age and experience should have enabled me to have seen and foreseen any mischiefs such as had taken place—such as I then thought had taken place.

Q. Such as had been reported to you? A. Such as had been reported to me, and such as the conduct of Mrs. Tilton led me to suppose must have taken place.

Q. Did you say to Mr. Tilton this—that the relationship which had existed between yourself and Elizabeth had not always been marked by sexual intimacy? No, Sir; no, Sir; odiously false!

Q. That the earlier years of it were free from any such taint and crime, and that only during the last year, or a little more than a year, and that year shortened by a country vacation, had that sexual intimacy existed—did you say anything of that kind? A. It is intolerable, almost, to be asked that question; but before Almighty God no such question ever, by anybody, at any time, under any circumstances, was put to me, or, in conversation with me, alluded to.

Q. Or any such statement made by you? A. Or any such statement made by me.

Q. Did you also say, or did you say, that you did not know how you could offer any mitigation or excuse for yourself, and yet you wanted him, Mr. Tilton, to believe for Elizabeth's sake, and also for his own, that you had never sought her for any vulgar end, but that your sexual commerce had been through love and not through lust? A. I never used any such language as that, Mr. Evans. It seems—

Q. Was there any such topic at that interview? A. No such topic at that interview, nor at any other, was, or was possible. I am obliged to hear these questions put in court. Such questions could never have been put in any of the interviews between the parties concerned.

Q. Did you, following this or at any time, say anything of this kind that you had sought companionship in her mind, that you had taken manuscripts to her that she might be your critic, and that the blame belonged to you and not to her? A. That there may have been conversation respecting my reading to her is very likely, though not at that interview. At other interviews I spoke of my—of the pleasure that I had derived from my intercourse with her. I never spoke of her being my critic.

Q. On that occasion, did you say to Mr. Tilton, this, or anything like it?

Tell me before you go, can you possibly ever reinstate Elizabeth in your respect and love?

A. I remember no such thing. It very likely may have been, but I remember no such thing.

Q. Do you remember burying your face in your hands, as you sat near the bed, and using a figure of this kind, in respect to which Mr. Tilton says:

I won't undertake to quote the exact words, but the picture was like this: He drew the figure of a man sitting on a brink, and said that he was dizzy, and was like one on the edge of hell.

Q. Did you use an expression of that kind? A. I did not. I might well have done it.

Q. During that conversation was this subject spoken of, in words like these, that you spoke to the effect that you were in great grief through Mr. Bowen's action in his case—the termination of his engagements with Mr. Bowen's papers—and that you felt that Bowen's suddenly changed mind had been largely owing to statements which Mrs. Beecher had made to Mr. Bowen, and to statements which you yourself had made, though you said that Mrs. Beecher had been more mischievous in her utterances than yourself—was there any talk of that kind? A. I think that is a very garbled statement of the early part of the interview, when I expressed my regrets for the interference with his affairs with Mr. Bowen; but so far as it regards my wife, I did not say that I regarded her interference as more mischievous than mine.

Q. Did you mention to him at this interview that you had voluntarily written a letter to Mr. Bowen that day or the day before, in which you had taken back some of the unkind utterances or injurious statements? A. I may have stated it; I don't remember. I had written the letter.

Q. And sent it? A. And sent it. I don't remember mentioning it in that interview.

Q. The day before you did that, the 2d? A. I did, early on New-Year's morning; that is, the secular new year, the 2d of January.

Q. How soon after this, Mr. Beecher, did you have an interview with Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton? This was on or about the 3d? A. On or about the 3d, I take it. I suspect there was not any time until the 13th or 14th, in which I didn't see Mr. Moulton every day; sometimes they were short—conversations brief; sometimes they were long and serious; but this was the last interview, Mr. Evarts, I think, until some time in February, in which the subject of my relation to Mr. Tilton's disaster in business and distress in his household was discussed again. From this time forward our interviews concerned themselves, in reputation.

Q. In regard to Mr. Tilton's affairs? A. To rebuild—to restore Mr. Tilton to his position and to prosperity, and "to rebuild the household," were almost the catch-words.

Q. Now, did you have, about this time, between the 3d and the middle, or whatever limit you fix now your almost daily interviews—did you have a definite conversation with Mr. Moulton, about the 7th, or thereabouts, of January, in regard to Mr. Bowen? A. I did; I had several preliminary or sequential interviews; but there was one that stands out very distinctly in my remembrance; one before the interview of Mr. Moulton with Mr. Bowen, and one immediately following it, I think the very next day.

Q. What was the course of the interview between Mr. Moulton and yourself when this topic of Mr. Bowen was the prominent one? A. My impression is that it was a conversation in which Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton and myself were present in the parlor of Mr. Moulton's house. I know I had some conversations with Mr. Moulton separately; and I think they led to this very general conversation in the presence of Mr. Tilton; I think that they were the reasons of those; and they turned—the conversation turned on the subject of Mr. Bowen's treachery toward Mr. Tilton and toward me.

Mr. Beach—Do I understand that Mr. Tilton was present? A. I do think so.

Q. Is that the date, the 7th? A. It was somewhere before Jan. 10, I think.

Mr. Evarts—On or about Jan. 10? A. On or about. My only way of fixing landmarks is by my lecture engagements. I know by the situation of those about what the topics were, and then I have, on part of my lecture, the dates where I was and when I was out of town, and so I throw these conversations into the periods where they must have come. The dates I could not fix, except in some such way as that; and they are liable, most of them, to shift a day or two, except those of the 26th of December, 30th of December, 31st of December, and Jan. 1. Those are not movable feasts in the calendar.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Beach—That is an interview concerning which Mr. Moulton testified. I can refer you to the passage; it is one of Mr. Moulton's narratives. I suppose all the interviews between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton during this period ought to be in evidence; but this is one about which Mr. Moulton spoke.

The Witness—All interviews were not with Mr. Tilton—not all.

THE MEASURES FOR FORCING MR. BOWEN TO DO JUSTICE.

Mr. Evarts—Whether Mr. Tilton was present or not, they ought to be in evidence; but this is one about which Mr. Moulton has spoken. [To the witness.] Now, Sir, how did Mr. Moulton introduce this interview, or the topic about Mr. Bowen? A. Well, Mr. Moulton's mind was not resting any more upon me. He had secured a passable peace between Mr. Tilton and me, and we were all joining forces, in some sense, taking counsel how Mr. Tilton's mishaps might be repaired. I was earnestly desirous to do anything that—

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the conversation; that is objected to.

Mr. Evarts—How did the matter come up; how did Mr. Moulton introduce the matter? A. I cannot say how he introduced it; I can say what were the topics that were discussed, not precisely in their order, but the substance of the conversations; I can give the discussion, or rather the substance of the matter discussed, if you wish me.

Q. Well, was the subject of your previous relations with Mr. Bowen introduced by Mr. Moulton in any way? A. It was very thoroughly brought into view; he wanted me to give him an account of my difficulties and my relations with Mr. Bowen; he wanted to explore the ground, and see exactly where Mr. Bowen stood and where I stood, and I gave him therefore a succinct view of what I thought of Mr. Bowen; and then I went back and gave him a view of the principal points of the difficulty that had sprung up between Mr. Bowen and myself, and I gave him an account of the interview for the purpose of reconciling all difficulties that had taken place between Mr. Bowen and myself in January and February of 1870.

Q. At Mr. Freeland's house? A. At Mr. Freeland's house.

Q. Spoken of before? A. I answered all the questions that were put to me as to what Mr. Bowen's nature was, and how he was accessible, and what would be likely to follow, and if he would not be likely to fall with an endeavor to make him do justice to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, at that interview, was anything said to you about any letter that Mr. Tilton had written or was writing to Mr. Bowen? A. I understood that Mr. Tilton was preparing a documentary exhibit which it was hoped would bring Mr. Bowen to a discharge of his obligation; but no letter was ever shown me until the year 1872, but some of the subject matters contained in this exhibit, or document, or whatever it might be, were talked of between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton in my presence; but it was rather the discussion—I heard it as something between them rather than anything addressed to me.

Q. That is the letter of January 1, from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen, which you say you never saw until 1872? A.

I never saw the letter. I cannot say that letter is what they discussed, but I never saw any letter at that time, nor any written document at that time.

Q. On that subject? A. On that subject, and the letter which is included in what is called The Golden Age article I didn't see until after March of 1872.

Q. That letter, then, was subsequently appended with The Golden Age article, or as a part of The Golden Age article in the "Tripartite Agreement?" A. In the "Tripartite Agreement," yes, Sir.

Q. And before that time that letter you had not seen? A. No, Sir; I had never seen it.

Q. Had it been read to you, or had it been in your presence? A. I never saw any manuscript of that kind that I recollect. I heard that he was preparing a business document, and I heard of the topics that, more or less, were going into it discussed between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton. I may have had single questions or answers put to me; if so I do not recall them as separable from the conversation about it between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—But was the paper read in your hearing? A. The paper never was read in my hearing.

Mr. Everts—Never was in your presence? A. Never was in my hands, nor in my presence, nor read, nor any part of it read, although the contents that were to be were discussed in my presence.

Q. Now, what was said to you—was anything said to you by Mr. Moulton as to Mr. Bowen's motives or reasons for making any such charges against you? A. I don't recollect in that precise form anything of the kind. Mr. Moulton asked me distinctly whether the stories that Mr. Bowen had told Mr. Tilton, and which Mr. Tilton had read in some instances, whether there was any truth in them, and whether I was afraid of Mr. Bowen on account of those stories; and I told him, "No, I defy him to his face before the whole world." These stories I was not afraid of in the slightest degree?

Q. Now, Sir, in what terms did Mr. Moulton express himself after your conversation with him on these topics in regard to Mr. Bowen's conduct toward you and toward Mr. Tilton? A. Well, Sir, he exhausted language in the intensity of his condemnation of Mr. Bowen's course. He thought it to be dishonest and cruel and treacherous, and in every way mean, and these words were not spoken but fulminated; that is, they had adjectives before them.

Q. Did he say anything as to his view of Mr. Bowen's purposes in using Mr. Tilton against you, and you against Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; then and oftentimes.

Q. Well, what did he say? A. He said that he meant to employ Mr. Tilton to destroy me, and me to destroy Mr. Tilton. We were to have eaten each other up and left the track clear to him.

Q. Did you at this interview give Mr. Moulton a full account of your interview with Mr. Bowen at Mr. Freedom's? A. I did.

Q. And of its results? A. I did, and he was horror struck with the narrative that I gave; he questioned me whether it was possible.

Q. Did you mention to Mr. Bowen and Mr. Moulton at that time the conclusion in your public statement at the church of the settlement between Mr. Bowen and yourself? A. Yes, Sir; I gave him a very graphic account of the interview and its sequences, and of the reconciliation ratified in Plymouth Church at the close of the Friday night prayer-meeting between Mr. Moulton and myself.

MR. BEECHER LAUGHS AT MR. BOWEN'S CHARGES.

Q. Now, in whatever statements Mr. Moulton made to you containing any contents or proposed contents of the letter or document that Mr. Tilton was preparing for Mr. Bowen, were there any names or details given you concerning any of the charges against you? A. You will have to repeat that sentence again, Sir.

Q. In the conversation which occurred, in which Mr. Moulton said more or less about what was in or was to be in a letter or document Mr. Tilton was preparing for use with Mr. Bowen, were the particulars or names of the instances of charges against you mentioned? A. I do not know that it was mentioned in regard to their being included in that document; while we were talking about that we were also talking about Mr. Bowen and about his charges, and it was a general conversation, not historically and logically arranged at all, and in that conversation, which was part and parcel of his preparing this document, his charges were mentioned and discussed; they were not mentioned, however, to me first, as they appeared afterward in the letter.

Q. Well, did Mr. Moulton say that Mr. Bowen charged that you had confessed adultery to him? A. I—he did—yes, he said so. I was only hesitating as to whether it was in that interview or not. He said so at some one of the interviews and about that time.

Q. At about this time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what did you reply to that? A. I think I laughed. I denied it. When I confess adultery to Mr. Bowen I am sure it would be impressed upon my mind.

Q. Did you say to him on that subject whether or no Mr. Bowen had ever made any such charge or imputation to you personally? A. I said to him that from the origin of the difficulties between Mr. Bowen and me, down to February, or January and February, 1870, and, again, December 26, there had been several adjudications, arbitrations, that is; there had been many conversations, but Mr. Bowen had never had any difficulty with me except business difficulties, and that he never under any circumstances had made a statement which implicated my moral character.

Q. Now, Sir, in this conversation what was said by Mr. Bowen in regard to the treatment or management of Mr. Tilton's pecuniary claim against Mr. Bowen—about its being carried into court, or what not? A. He spoke of it, I recollect distinctly, as a thing which was inevitable; that he was bound to see justice done to Theodore Tilton. He spoke of it with an intensity and an enthusiasm that I admired, that excited my admiration for his fidelity to his friend, and as I am inexperienced in business I felt unbounded confidence in his resources to carry out a business arrangement, and listened to him with admiration.

Q. Now, did Mr. Moulton during this interview, or at any interview, say to you that he, Moulton, did not wish you to carry the claim of Mr. Tilton against Mr. Bowen into court if taking it into court was going to rip up your relations with Mr. Tilton's family? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; nothing—

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. Nothing of the kind; if you think of it when you come to another interview—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Evarts—That is enough. One interview is enough in itself.

The Witness [to Mr. Beach]—I shall gradually learn to behave, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton tell you that he would rather pay Mr. Tilton what Mr. Bowen owed him than to rip up your relations with Mr. Tilton's family, or anything to that effect? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect, Mr. Beecher, during this conversation, when you were discussing the points and difficulties that had existed and been adjusted between you and Mr. Bowen, whether any memorandum of those points was spoken of and brought out in any way? A. Yes, Sir, it was spoken of. I told Mr. Moulton that I had at home somewhere (for then I kept a few of my own documents)—that I had a memorandum of the points which were in discussion at the interview between Mr. Bowen and myself—the last interview.

Q. At Mr. Freeland's? A. At Mr. Freeland's.

A. Well? A. He wanted me to bring them to him, and I think the next day probably, but immediately after, or very soon after, I hunted them up and brought them to him.

Q. Did you deliver that paper to Mr. Moulton at or about that time—at that interview, or soon after? A. It was at about that time that I began to put all my documents into his hands, and I put that in. It was the first fruits.

Mr. Evarts—That is Exhibit 107. It is marked only for identification.

Mr. Morris—Marked by you. I do not find it. You had it, and did not put it in. I have not seen it since. The original was marked for identification by you.

Mr. Evarts—That paper was in Bowen's handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Just look at that [handing paper to witness] and see if that is your recollection of the contents of the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The original paper, if your Honor please, was before us in court and was marked for identification, but between the counsel on one side and the other, it is not to be found.

Judge Nelson—Have you a copy, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—We have this printed copy, which we all know to be a copy.

Judge Nelson—I presume there will be no objection to your using that.

Mr. Evarts—We now put it in evidence, it being one of the papers which passed between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—Subject to correction if we find the original.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes, Sir, of course. This memorandum is this—I believe it has been read, hasn't it?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading.]

First—Report and publish Sermons and Lecture-room Talks.

Second—New edition Plymouth Collection, and Freeland's interest.

Third—Explanations to Church.

Fourth—Write me a letter.

Fifth—Retract in every quarter what has been said to my injury.

[To the witness.]—The words "use" and "my" mean Mr. Bowen there? A. I understand it so.

Q. Yes, it is his memorandum? A. It is his memorandum.

Q. Of the topics—and did those form the topics of the conversation had between you and Mr. Bowen, as you described it to Mr. Moulton? A. They did; I took each one of those and told Mr. Moulton what the substance of the conversation between Mr. Bowen and me was on each point.

Mr. Morris—The one following, Mr. Evarts, was marked for identification also. If you do not find it, we had better have it understood that either party may use that one also. It was marked by you for identification. [Showing book to Mr. Evarts.] We had better have it understood that, in case the original is not found, either one can use it.

Mr. Beach—I have a recollection that there was something else attached to this, [i. e., the document just read by Mr. Evarts.]

Mr. Morris—I am calling his attention now to the fact that they were marked for identification by them.

Mr. Beach—We want the same liberty you have to use it.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes; if the paper cannot be found.

Mr. Morris—There were two papers; I have not found them; whether you returned them or not I do not know, but they were both marked by your side for identification; I don't know whether we have them or you have them.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, substitute the original when Mr. Shearman produces it.

MR. MOULTON AVERSE TO ARBITRATION.

Mr. Evarts—Now, after going through this matter of your and Bowen's affairs with Mr. Moulton on this occasion, do you remember then the subject coming up of your feelings in regard to any injury you had done Mr. Tilton? A. In that order of time do you mean?

Q. I mean after this conversation about Mr. Bowen with you was over between you and Mr. Moulton, whether that topic suggested any expression by you of your feelings in regard to having taken sides against Mr. Tilton with Bowen? A. I do not recall anything, Sir, at present.

Q. Was anything said by Mr. Moulton as to the occasion or propriety of you and Mr. Tilton combining? A. Yes, Sir; oh, yes, Sir; that was the—that flowed through every conversation, and was the leading idea—"you and Mr. Tilton must stand together."

Q. As toward or against whom? A. For the sake of the family and for the sake of his restoration, and for the sake of justice—justice from Bowen to him. Well, as I remember it—I suppose I can't tell, though, what I thought.

Q. No; only what passed between you. Now, did Mr. Moulton at this stage of the conversation, or during the conversation, state to you what he proposed to do and to what result or what effect he proposed to bring matters with Mr. Bowen? A. He spoke with the utmost confidence of compelling Bowen to disgorge. Mr. Bowen, as I understood from him, wanted to arbitrate; he did not want to.

Q. Mr. Moulton? A. Mr. Moulton; he did not tell me why.

Q. But he told you that he didn't wish to? A. Yes. that Mr. Tilton didn't want to, and, as I understand it, he did not, as his adviser; I understood that it was the—

Q. Well, do you remember the expression at this conversation that Mr. Moulton used on the subject of being able to bring Bowen to terms; do you remember any particular expression that he used as to what he would bring him to—bring Bowen to? A. Yes, Sir, a good many of them.

Q. Well, at this interview I am speaking of now? A. I think it was at this interview—it was at one, and I think it was at this—that he said that he would bring him to his marrow-bones; he spoke at this interview of their purpose being to bring Mr. Bowen into such a situation that he would do him justice of himself, without arbitration or legal proceedings; that was the point that they were aiming at, as I understood it.

Q. Now, was anything said—do you remember, Mr. Beecher, at this interview, anything of this kind being suggested by Mr. Moulton in regard to this letter to Mr. Bowen, if you named it:

Mr. Tilton wants to publish this letter, and feels that he has taken out of it all that concerns you and your relations with his family; he wants to leave, and he is willing to leave you and Bowen in conflict—

Do you remember his expressing Mr. Tilton's purpose in that way? A. No, Sir; no, Sir, he did not; there was no letter shown to me; there was no discussion that could have taken place.

Q. Do you remember his saying that he did not approve of such a course—he, himself, Moulton, did not approve of any publication? A. I do not remember it.

MR. MOULTON UPBRAIDS MR. BOWEN.

Q. Now, Sir, in that same month of January and at a somewhat later period, did you have an interview with Mr. Moulton at his house, concerning an interview he had had with Mr. Bowen? A. I did, next day.

Q. The next after the interview with Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whenever that was—how did this interview between yourself and Mr. Moulton come about, and where was it held? A. I suspect it came about by my own wish to hear what happened between him and Mr. Bowen. I knew that he was going to see him; intermediately I had given him the document that he asked, and I knew of the interview.

Q. Now, do you remember whether he sent for you or not? A. No, I do not.

Q. Now, it was at his house, was it? A. It was.

Q. And where? A. In the parlor, down-stairs; he was, I think, in his dressing-gown and slippers; he was unwell, and he was not much out of his house during all of those days.

Q. About what time is this—about how long after? A. Well, I should say it was somewhere along the 12th or 13th of January, but I will not be certain of the date.

Q. Toward the middle of the month? A. Toward the middle of the month.

Q. Now, what did Mr. Moulton tell you at this interview as to what had passed between him and Bowen about Mr. Tilton's claim—where had he seen Mr. Bowen? A. At his house.

Q. Well, at whose house? A. At Moulton's.

Q. At his own house—Bowen had come there? A. He had already told me that Mr. Bowen had been invited to come two days before, and appointed the day after tomorrow as I understood at first; and on that night he told me that he was present and that a long and full conversation had passed between them, which conversation he described minutely and dramatically.

Q. Did he show you where Mr. Bowen sat? A. He did, and how he looked and what he said.

Q. Well, just give us this as far as you recall it, Mr. Beecher? A. He detailed to me with some particularity—with more particularity than I can rehearse it—the statement which he made to Mr. Bowen of his treatment of

Mr. Tilton, of the infamy of his conduct in procuring Mr. Tilton to write the letter of the 26th, and promised to back it, and then stepped from him to go over to my side; he went into that with relish and effectually. He then also opened, he said, on Bowen in regard to his treatment of me as a parallel instance of infamy that was almost without example. He rehearsed to him the different stories that he had reported of me, and that when I had had interviews with him, at one and another and another time, that he had never dared to mention one of those stories to my face, but only behind my back, and that they never came up except it was to settle some money difficulty between us, and that he then told Mr. Bowen that the last and grand settlement that had taken place between him and me at Mr. Freeland's, in the Spring of that year, or in the early season or months of the year—

Q. That is, of 1870? A. Of 1870—that at that time he says, “you went over the ground with Mr. Beecher, and you took up every cause of offense that you had against him, professedly, and you, after every one of them had been discussed, and had been settled amicably, and after Mr. Freeland had come out and shaken hands with both of you, and after you had walked with Mr. Beecher through the streets discussing how you might work together afterward in amity and peace, and after Mr. Beecher, in fulfillment of his promise, had gone to the house of God and had there, in the presence of his people, rehearsed the reconciliation that had taken place between him and you, and you went down and shook hands at the altar with him—how then, within 48 hours, you told a friend, his friend, that you had that that would drive Mr. Beecher out of town in less than 24 hours, if you should speak it; and,” said he, “I took that document in my hands,” said he, “and I shook it in his face, and he turned as pale as a ghost, and he said, ‘What, what shall I do?’ and I told him, said I, ‘It is not for me to tell you what to do,’ and he said, he looked up at the portrait that was hanging on the wall and said: ‘Why, I shall never be reconciled to that man; I shall never be able to be reconciled to that man again.’”

Q. The portrait of whom? A. My portrait; the Paige portrait, I think, was then hanging there, and he said that Mr. Bowen was ready to do anything. “Well,” said I, “why didn’t you get the money out of him?” Well, he said the time was not come—the time was not come. Said he, “What Bowen ought to do is to put Tilton back into The Independent—that is what he ought to do.”

It being now 1 o’clock, the Court took a recess until 2 o’clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The court met at 2 o’clock, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled, and his direct examination resumed as follows:

Mr. Ryarts—Mr. Beecher, when Mr. Moulton said, in answer to your inquiry of, why in the mood he found Mr. Bowen he did not exact the money or bring him to the point of paying it—you said that Mr. Moulton said the time had not come yet; did he further explain or state what he meant by that, or did you understand in any way what he did mean? A. I did not understand; I was perplexed by it.

Q. Now, when in this interview he said to you that the proper thing for Bowen to do—to be accomplished with Bowen, was that Bowen should put Tilton back on The Independent—A. It was a part of the same—

Q. I say, when that was said—A. Oh, I beg pardon.

Q. When that was said, in that connection, or otherwise, in that conversation, was anything said by Moulton as to whether Tilton could work on The Christian Union? A. Not at that interview, I think, Sir; at one not far removed from that; it belonged to that period, and to that state of things.

Q. In the month of January? A. He never said exactly that; he spoke of what a grand thing it would be if Tilton and I could join forces on The Christian Union.

Q. Well, what did you reply to that? A. Well, my reply was that that was an absolute impossibility; the circumstances surrounding that paper, and the feelings of the persons engaged in it, would not permit such an association.

THE HARMONIZING EFFECT OF MR. MOULTON'S SICKNESS.

Q. Mr. Beecher, do you remember anything of a visit you made when Mr. Moulton was seriously ill, and meeting Mr. Tilton there, and having some passage between yourself and him? A. Well, I remember several; it was not an infrequent thing.

Q. Do you remember being there at a time when Mr. Moulton was regarded by you as seriously ill—dangerously ill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When, about, was that? A. It was in the—I think it was in—I cannot say whether it was January or February.

Q. Before he went South? A. Yes, Sir: it was before he went; it was partly in consequence of that sickness that he went; or mainly in consequence.

Q. During that illness, now, do you remember meeting Mr. Tilton there at the house during such a visit of yourself to Mr. Moulton when he was very sick, anything passing between you and him? A. I do not seem to recall anything more than that we met there, Sir.

Q. Mr. Tilton has spoken of it as an occasion in which you kissed him on the forehead. A. Oh!

Q. Do you remember anything concerning that? A. Yes, Sir; he is right by about four inches; I kissed him on his mouth. We came down—I came down from above where I had seen Frank—Mr. Moulton; he was suffering from rheumatism of the chest and of the heart, as I understand, and was in great suffering; and I was very apprehensive; I don't know that it was the physician's judgment, but I was very apprehensive that in one of those attacks he might suddenly go off; and I felt very deep sympathy and concern, and when I came down stairs Mr. Tilton was in the parlor, and I met him, and spoke of him as a friend to both of us, and of what I felt to be—

Q. Spoke of Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; and what I considered to be his critical condition, and there were some words interchanged, I don't know what, but in the warmth of that sympathetic moment we kissed each other.

Q. Do you remember using any expression like this: "Theodore, Frank has saved my life, and I would willingly to-day give my life to save Frank's?" A. No, Sir, I don't remember any precise language like that; I may have said that I would be willing almost to give my life to save his.

Q. Do you remember any expression of this kind to Mr. Tilton on that occasion:

Frank is very sick; he is at the grave's edge; I am afraid he will die, and if he dies, Theodore, what will then become of your case and mine?

A. No, Sir, I don't recall any such.

Q. Mr. Beecher, I understand you to have said distinctly that the letter of Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen was not shown to you or read to you at any interview at this time? A. It was not.

Q. And then there was no interview at that time at which Mr. Tilton was present at which any such occurrence took place? A. No, not within my remembrance; I am sure I should have remembered it.

Q. Did any interview occur with Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton at this period, during January—this middle part of January, from the 7th onward—in which any relation that you had to that letter, or any connection which Mr. Tilton's and your affairs had with that letter, was the subject of conversation between you and either of these gentlemen? A. I did not know that there was any such letter until the Spring of 1872. I knew that there were steps in progress, documents forming, which were to bring a statement before Mr. Bowen, and an influence to procure a settlement, but that it took on the form of a letter, or that it was a letter that I had anything to do with, or that concerned itself with my affairs, I had no more idea of it than I had of things transacting in China.

BESSIE TURNER NOT CALLED A PRATTLER.

Q. Do you remember, Mr. Beecher, whether at any of the interviews spoken of, about this middle period of January, or at any time thereabouts, at any interview between Mr. Moulton and yourself, anything of this kind occurred on the subject of Bessie Turner. Did Mr. Moulton tell you that Mr. Tilton thought Bessie Turner was a dangerous person to have about; that she was what Mr. Tilton termed a prattler, and knew of the facts as between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir. Shall I give a full knowledge of Miss Bessie Turner?

Q. No, not at the moment; I will inquire. A. No, Sir, nothing of that sort.

Q. Did anything of that kind occur? A. Nothing of that kind; that is, I am speaking with reference to her removal.

Q. This period in January? A. How?

Q. This period in January? A. During January Bessie Turner was spoken of, and her stories were spoken of.

Q. Yes? A. But I understand your question with reference to her necessary removal on account of her knowledge of my relations to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Yes; the question was this— A. There was no such knowledge ever, in any way, brought to me.

Q. And did Mr. Moulton say anything of this kind to you: "I thought she was better out of the way than here!" and did you reply that you thought so too? A. He never said it, nor I never answered it in any such way.

Q. And was it represented to you by Mr. Moulton at any such interview that Mrs. Tilton said, as Mr. Tilton told him, that the best place for her was out West at school? A. No, Sir; I know nothing about her going out West to school.

Q. And did he tell you at that time that Mr. Tilton could not afford to pay her expenses, and did you say, "Well, I will pay the expenses," or, "I will do anything that is necessary to keep the story down," or anything of that kind? A. Nothing of that sort; there was no consultation with me of any sort or description in respect to the disposal of Bessie Turner. The first knowledge that I had of her whereabouts was when I was called upon to pay her first installment.

MRS. MORSE'S LETTER OF CHARGES.

Q. In the latter part of January of that year, Mr. Beecher, an interview has been spoken of both by Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, at which a letter of Mrs. Morse was brought under consideration. [To Mr. Shearman.] What is the exhibit?

Mr. Fullerton—9.

Mr. Shearman—7.

Mr. Evarts—7?

Mr. Shearman—7.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, 7, on page 9; that is it.

Mr. Evarts—Do you remember a letter of that kind, received by you, and handed by you to Mr. Moulton? A. I do.

Q. In the end of January—toward the end of January? A. I think it was that, Sir.

Mr. Morris—Did you state that it was "Exhibit 9"?

Mr. Evarts—7.

Mr. Fullerton—7, on page 9 of that book.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Shearman]—Are you sure it was 7? Mr. Morris—That must be it. [Producing "Exhibit 7."]

Mr. Evarts—Please look at that, Mr. Beecher, and see whether you remember that. [Handing witness "Exhibit 7."] A. I recollect this letter.

Q. Well, Mr. Beecher, you remember that letter? A. I remember that letter, Sir.

Q. Now, on receiving that letter what did you do with it, or about it? A. I carried it to Mr. Moulton.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him on the subject? A. I did.

Q. Did he read the letter? A. I presume he did, Sir.

Q. You handed it to him? A. I gave him the letter and he kept it.

Q. Yes, but as to your interview about it? A. Oh! Yes.

Q. Did you have a conversation about it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did he read the letter? A. Yes, he read the letter.

Q. In your presence. What—

Mr. Beach—He didn't say so.

Mr. Evarts—Well, is that so? A. What, Sir?

Q. Did he read the letter in your presence before this conversation? A. He did.

Q. What then was said about it; did you ask him any advice, and did he give you any suggestion? A. I did; I asked him how the letter better be treated, and he said he thought it would be better that it should be treated mildly and kindly.

Q. What did he say, if anything, about Mrs. Morse? A. Well, he said Mrs. Morse was half crazy; he said that she imagined a great many things, that she hated Theodore Tilton, that she was in the habit of either telling stories or magnifying incidents so as that they did not represent the truth; that she was unrestrained except by her love of her daughter.

Q. Was anything said about the credibility of her charges in that letter, or his belief of any of them? A. There was—I don't think that there was then a specific denial; I received that at a subsequent interview with Mr. Tilton; but I think there was—it was assumed that these were to be treated—this whole letter was to be treated as the hallucination of Mrs. Morse; the charges were denied in so far as they respected Mr. Tilton's talking about affairs.

Q. Yes. Mr. Moulton said that that was not true, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S ANSWER TO MRS. MORSE.

Q. And afterward did you write an answer to that letter? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And did you show it? [To Mr. Morris.] Is that it, Mr. Morris?

[Mr. Morris produced the letter called for.]

Mr. Evarts—Was this written in Mr. Moulton's presence or shown to him, or how otherwise? That seems to be a draft. [Handing witness the letter.] A. I suspect this was written in his presence, Sir; it is not my paper.

Q. It is your writing. You mean— A. This is, I suspect, the sketch that I drew up of the letter, and which he approved, and that I then went home and sent the letter to her; that I judge it to be; I never use ruled paper; I am particular in my paper.

Q. It is written in pencil? A. In pencil; yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—This is Exhibit E. [To the witness.] At this interview, or at any other interview where this letter was the subject of conversation, was Mr. Tilton also present? A. He was at one; I don't know whether it was one and the same or whether it was a subsequent one.

Q. At this interview was anything said about one passage in that letter which imputes to Mr. Tilton having stated that you preached to forty of your mistresses? There is a passage in that letter of Mrs. Morse which charges that Mr. Tilton stated it. A. Well, Sir, is that charge made in that letter?

Mr. Beach here shook his head negatively.

The Witness—[Sotto voce.] So I thought.

Mr. Evarts—I believe there is nothing in that letter, Mr. Beecher, on this subject? A. What, Sir?

Q. I believe there is nothing in that letter on that subject? A. That letter contains simply a charge of repeating the story of his domestic difficulties and troubles, as I recollect it.

Q. Now was there any conversation at this or either of these interviews at the end of January, if there were more than one, at which these topics were up, of Mrs. Morse, or her letter—was there anything said about whether or no Mr. Tilton had told more or less persons, 12 persons, I think is mentioned, of your (Mr. Beecher's) criminal relationship with Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; there was nothing in the letter of that, and nothing in the conversation.

Mr. Beach—It is entirely irrelevant. I think the forepart of that answer, Sir, should be excluded.

Judge Neilson—Well, it may be excluded.

Mr. Beach—Strike it out.

Judge Neilson—It goes to the contents of the letter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the letter will speak for itself.

Mr. Beach—It was not called for.

NO CHARGE OF IMPROPER RELATIONS BEFORE JANUARY, 1871.

Q. Well, at that interview and when that letter—was anything said—

Mr. Beach—Well, he has said that there was nothing said.

Mr. Evarts [continuing]—about your having told—about Mr. Tilton having told any number of persons, 12 or any other number, of your criminal relationship—it is printed here; it should be "relations"—with Mrs. Tilton? A. There was no such conversation about criminal relations to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Was—at any time in any of these conversations, from the beginning on to the period we have now reached, say the end of January, 1871—any mention made in your hearing by Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton that there were any criminal relations, or ever had been, between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, no mention and no implication.

Q. Was any word "crime," in regard to your conduct, used by either of those gentlemen, or any one else in your presence? A. No, none; no such term.

Q. Now, did anything of this kind occur at this interview, or either of these interviews at the end of January; did Mr. Tilton say to you:

I then said that after Mrs. Tilton had made her confession to me in July, 1870, that I had shortly after that informed Oliver Johnson and Mrs. Martha Bradshaw that during the Summer I had informed no other person, but I told him possibly 12 did know of that fact.

Was there any conversation of that kind that had anything to do with any criminal relations between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, nothing.

Q. Nothing? A. Nothing.

Q. No suggestion?

Mr. Beach—It seems to me, your Honor, that this is inadmissible.

Mr. Evarts. [To the witness.] Now, was there anything—

Mr. Beach—One moment. It seems to me that that question calls for the judgment of the witness. The question is whether anything of that kind was said, having anything to do with criminal relations. If the question is whether anything of that kind was said, that may be proper, but I submit that it is not proper to call for the judgment of the witness by asking what it related to.

Mr. Evarts—The examination of the witness, Tilton, makes the confession apply to criminal relations.

Mr. Beach—That follows from what was said.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Mr. Beach—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—The question is whether that subject was mentioned, and I have asked him about that, and he says nothing was said of that kind about any criminal relations.

Judge Nelson—You purpose, I suppose, to confine yourself to the specific statements of the other witnesses.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; that is my point.

Mr. Beach—That is very well, to confine himself to the specific statement of the other witness, but to ask whether that specific statement related to any criminal relations, is to ask for the conclusion of the witness, without calling for what was said.

Mr. Evarts—I think not. The conversation opens by the statement by Mr. Tilton that Mr. Moulton wanted to know whether he told 12 persons of Mr. Beecher's criminal relations with Mrs. Tilton, and Mr. Beecher says that no such question as that was asked, nor was that subject spoken of. Then there is considerable narrative by Mr. Tilton, of which there is no importance, at least for any purpose that I have in view, except to show that whether it occurred or not it had not anything to do with criminal relations; and I asked Mr. Beecher, therefore, whether at that conversation anything was said about any communications that had been made to any other persons concerning any criminal relations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That is not the question. If it had been, I probably should not have objected to it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is perhaps my fault. Now, Mr. Beecher.

The Witness—No, Sir, there was no such—whatever it may be. [A pause.] Mr. Evarts, your question was so long, and it hung fire so while the discussion was going on, that I do not know that my answer fits exactly to it.

Mr. Beach—No, but your former answer did, Mr. Beecher. You answered the question before I got on in my objection.

Mr. Evarts—Now, were the names of Mr. Oliver Johnson and of Mrs. Martha Bradshaw, as persons to whom anything had been communicated, introduced at those conversations, or either of them, in the end of January? A. I think not, Sir; if they were, I do not remember it. Both of their names came in later, but I do not recall them as being mentioned as early as this.

Q. At either of those conversations was there anything said about Mr. Tilton having said or reported that you preached to forty mistresses, or any number of mistresses, in your church? A. No, Sir; not as late as the last of January.

Q. When did any conversation occur about that? A. I should think it was somewhere about during the first two weeks of January. I went to Mr. Moulton with a statement that Mr. Tilton had made that statement, that it had been brought to me by credible authority; and this was after things were in a train for harmonious adjustment. He denied it in behalf of Mr. Tilton.

Q. Moulton did? A. Yes, Sir; subsequently he explained to me that he had seen Mr. Tilton, and that Mr. Tilton had rectified the statement which he had made in the quarter it was likely to do injury.

Q. That is the conversation on that subject as you recollect it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was anything said at these conversations, or either of them, in regard to information given by Mr. Tilton concerning relations between you and Mrs. Tilton to her mother, Mrs. Morse; were you informed at either of those conversations by Mrs. Tilton—by Mr. Tilton—that Mrs. Tilton had informed her mother, Mrs. Morse? A. I do not recall it.

Q. Was anything said about Mr. Joseph Richards, Mrs. Tilton's brother, having come to him (Tilton) and asked him whether or not he had noticed Mr. Beecher's visits to his house, and whether he was quite sure that they were altogether of a pastoral character—was there any conversation of that character? A. Between me and whom?

Q. And Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Was there anything said to you by Mr. Tilton of this nature, that Mrs. Morse was propagating the statement in this way, namely, that she was saying among her family and relatives that Theodore made such and such charges against Elizabeth, and that her method of denouncing Mr. Tilton for making such charges was a very fatal way of propagating the charges themselves! A. I shall have to hear that again, Sir: I did not get exactly the hang of the question.

Q. The question is whether, in this conversation, Mr. Tilton said to you— A. All these things!

Q. Anything of this kind. Whether he told you that Mrs. Morse was propagating the story in this way, namely, that she was saying among her family and relatives that Theodore made such and such charges against Elizabeth, and that her method of denouncing him (that is, Tilton,) for making such charges, was a very fatal way of propagating the charges themselves; that is, that Mrs. Morse's denunciation of him for making these charges against his wife was a mode of giving publicity to the charges themselves! A. I don't remember any such conversation. I think it is impossible for such a statement to be remembered, had it even been made; but I do not think that the substance that I seem to gather out from that question came into conversation between us. Various and divers were the conversations in respect to the animosity that Mrs. Morse had against him, and there may have fallen out, incidentally, one thing or another bearing upon it, but it was scattered up and down in the conversations in such a way that it has escaped my mind so that I cannot give it definiteness.

Q. But whatever may or may not have been said in regard to any propagation or statement of any story, was it said to you by either Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton that any such story was a story of criminal relations between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. Never. Mr. Tilton nor Mr. Moulton never stated to me that Mrs. Morse was circulating that I had had criminal intercourse with her daughter.

Q. Nor anything of that kind? A. Nor anything of that kind.

Q. You remember, Mr. Beecher, that there are three letters in evidence, all bearing date on the 7th of February, 1871? A. I do, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S AID ASKED FOR THE GOLDEN AGE.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember an interview shortly preceding that date, and with whom? A. With Mr. Moulton.

Q. Where was that? A. At his house.

Q. Was the subject of whether or no Mr. Bowen would restore Mr. Tilton to The Independent brought up by Mr. Moulton?

Mr. Fullerton—That is a leading question, and very objectionable.

Mr. Evarts—Why?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, because the witness recollects the interview, and should state what it was before a leading question is put.

Mr. Evarts—I don't want the whole of the interview.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't want that part of it in that way.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is the part I do want, and I have a right to it.

Mr. Fullerton—Will the stenographer please read the question?

The Tribune stenographer read the question as follows; "Was the subject of whether or no Mr. Bowen would restore Mr. Tilton to The Independent brought up by Mr. Moulton?"

Mr. Fullerton—You cannot find a leading question, if that is not one.

Mr. Evarts—It is a question that indicates the subject about which I asked whether it was or was not brought into the conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—And hence it is leading.

Mr. Morris—It calls for an answer yes or no.

Judge Nelson—You might ask whether anything was said on that subject, and if so, what. It is rather leading, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Was anything said at this conversation, as to whether or no Mr. Bowen would restore Mr. Tilton to The Independent? A. I don't recall it in connection with that interview.

Q. What was the commencement of that interview, as you do recollect it? A. I don't know; I don't remember what the commencement was. I remember the substance of it.

Q. Well, was Mr. Tilton's relations or expectations in regard to The Independent made the subject of conversation?

Mr. Beach—At that interview.

Mr. Evarts—At that interview.

The Witness—At that interview!

Q. Yes. A. My own impression is that they were not.

Q. Well, was anything said about any other paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. Well, The Golden Age was then under discussion. "Tilton is going to have a paper for himself," was the key-note, and it was desirable—shall I go on?

Q. Yes; you may go on. A. I don't pretend to give the order of thought, nor the language; but the body of the interview, or the discussion, was that Mr. Tilton must have an organ for himself, that he shan't be voiceless nor put out, and that with my influence and that of my friends, and that of his friends, a journal could be established; and if we were to stand together unitedly and if I would sincerely and cordially aid, everything might be accomplished that was desirable. At that interview he expressed more fully what he had intimated at several interviews, that one great hinderance to Mr. Tilton's happiness and ease of working, was that Eliza beth did not do her part at home; that she was discontented and sullen, and that it was impossible to expect a man of genius (and Mr. Moulton spoke of Mr. Tilton as a man of genius), to work all day—"for," he said, "isn't it grand that he has just gone over there and taken off his coat and gone to work right at the bottom again, as if he had never had a position, and is trying to earn his bread?" He spoke of it as impossible for a man of genius to return home at night and find his wife crying or sitting at the head of the table sullen and unconvertible; and that it irritated him. He said, "Theodore is the easiest man to be led by his affections that ever lived. Elisabeth can do anything with him, and she must do her part, and you must help to make her." That was the general form of the counsel, and then he suggested that to unify ourselves and take away all friction, and to give to this new enterprise the advantage of perfect unity of feeling and counsel, it would be a good thing if I should write a letter to him, Moulton, for him to show to Mr. Tilton, expressive—committing myself on paper to the expression of my cordiality toward him, and also a letter to Mrs. Tilton (with whom I had more influence, he said, than any living being,) in order to bring her under Mr. Moulton's counsel, which would be concurrent with my counsel and judgment, and so the family would be brought in, Mr. Tilton would make a happy home for him—I would help him, Frank would help him, our friends would help him; and, with his power and experience and skill, he would have a journal that would be heard of all through the land; I thought that it was not an unwise plan; I wrote the letters to him and to her, and put them in Mr. Moulton's hands.

Q. Now, you have spoken heretofore, Mr. Beecher, of Mr. Moulton saying that the principal thing to be done or to be aimed at was that Mr. Bowen should put Mr. Tilton back on The Independent. Previous to this conversation that you now speak of, had you heard in any way from Mr. Moulton whether that expectation or plan had or had not been abandoned? A. He told me in the interview following the interview with Mr. Bowen that he had made that suggestion to Mr. Bowen, and that Mr. Bowen had not rejected it, but said he did now see how it could be—how he could put him back.

THE DESPONDENT LETTER TO MRS. TILTON PARTLY DICTATED BY MOULTON.

Q. And this had preceded your conversation about the new paper? A. That was the conversation somewhere about the 12th or 13th, and this was in February, just before the 7th.

Mr. Evarts—Now, these letters—what are the numbers of them, Mr. Morris?

Mr. Morris—I think a more convenient way will be to read the letters from the case.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps we have them here on our notes, Mr. Morris—They are in, and have been read.

Mr. Evarts—Two of them are in; I do not know that all three are. [To the witness.] Mr. Beecher, there was a third letter of Mr. Tilton's to Mr. Moulton. [To Mr. Morris.] I think if you can get those letters conveniently it will be better.

Mr. Morris—What are the numbers?

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Fullerton]—What are they?

Mr. Fullerton—9, 10 and 11.

[Mr. Morris produces the letters.]

Q. Please say if these are the two letters that you wrote? A. Yes, Sir; that is the one to Mr. Moulton, and this is the one to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Now, there is a third letter from Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Moulton, of the same date. Please look at that and say whether you saw that at or about the time of its date, or when for the first time? A. I cannot say certainly whether I saw it immediately after that. There was no concurrent interview following the writing of these letters.

Q. No interview in which the three met, you mean? A. No, Sir; none.

Q. And your two letters were written independent of seeing this? A. Yes, Sir; without seeing that at all.

Q. This letter, Mr. Beecher, to Mrs. Tilton begins in this way:

My Dear Mrs. Tilton: When I saw you last I did not expect ever to see you again, or to be alive many days. God was kinder to me than were my own thoughts.

Q. When was the last time, prior to this 7th day of February, that you had seen Mrs. Tilton? A. I suppose I had not seen her since the interview of December 30.

Q. Well, that is your recollection? A. That is my recollection of the purport of this opening sentence.

Q. And of the fact that you had not seen her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you used this expression: "When I saw you last I did not expect ever to see you again or to be alive many days;" now what was there in your situation that led you to have an impression of that shortness of your life? A. That was the shortness of both our lives, Sir. She looked to me as one already bespoken for by God's angels; and in the terrible whirl to which I was subjected—the fiery excitement—it did not seem to me that I could live long.

Q. And in that view it was of her life, and your own feelings, that you wrote that expression? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In concluding this letter, Mr. Beecher, you say, "This is sent with Theodore's consent, but he has not read it." Was that the fact, as you understood it, that Mr. Tilton had not read the letter? A. Yes, Sir; I understood it so; but that close was the suggestion of Mr. Moulton, and—

Q. I was going on to the next sentence:

Will you return it to me by his hands? I am very earnest in this wish, for all our sakes, as such a letter ought not be subject to even chance of miscarriage.

Was that clause the subject of conversation between you and Mr. Moulton in the preparation of the letter, or in advising the letter? A. It was, Sir.

Q. And was inserted in the letter? A. It was a suggestion of his, which I carried out. I can give you the reason stated.

Q. Stated by Mr. Moulton—well, what did he say in that connection? A. I cannot give you what he said, but I can give you what he suggested.

Q. Well? A. That Elizabeth would not likely receive a document from Mr. Tilton's hands, in—the idea was that if she thought that Mr. Tilton and I had got up this letter together, it would not have any influence with her.

Q. Yes! A. And that we had better suggest to her that he had not seen it, and therefore it was my letter, and was my judgment.

Q. And that was the fact? A. That was the fact; at least, so far as I know.

Q. And then as to the return of the letter—you left the letter with Mr. Moulton? A. I gave the letter to Mr. Moulton for disposal.

Q. To be sent by Mr. Tilton, apparently?

Mr. Beach—No, to be returned—

Mr. Evarts [Reading]—"This is sent with Theodore's consent?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how did you know, or how were you advised as to that? A. Mr. Moulton—that is, Mr. Tilton—consented that I should write a letter to his wife with this general design, but he did not see the letter.

Q. And it was through Mr. Moulton that you received that information? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That Mr. Tilton consented, and by his advice this letter was written? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you request of Mr. Moulton to get Mr. Tilton's permission to write that letter? A. No, Sir.

Q. From whom did the communication on that subject first proceed? A. Mr. Moulton was the engineer of the whole proceeding.

Q. Now, in regard to any arrangement or agreement that you should not hold any communication with Mrs. Tilton—any correspondence with Mrs. Tilton—how did that arise if there was anything of that kind? A. It did not arise; there never was any such arrangement.

Q. What was said or done by you in that connection, if anything? A. I always said it was not—it was an improper thing for me personally to act in this matter with Mrs. Tilton; I was on several occasions—it was suggested as a natural thing by Mr. Moulton, that I should see her, and I declined always.

Q. What was suggested by Mr. Moulton? A. That I should bring my personal influence to bear upon Mrs. Tilton for the harmonization of our different interests.

Q. Yes! A. And my reply to Mr. Moulton was twofold; first, that if, as I then believed, Mrs. Tilton had transferred to me an undue measure of affection, my presence would make matters worse; or if, using that influence, I brought her into more harmonious relations to her husband, the sensibility of a proud man would accept such services at the hand of another very ill, and it would make matters worse on that side, and that, therefore, for both reasons, I better not go.

MR. BEECHER'S INQUIRIES ABOUT MRS. TILTON.

Q. And so about any writing to her, were you put under any advice or restrictions? A. Under none.

Q. Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton says in the course of his direct testimony, in answer to this question [reading]:

Before going to that interview, I propose to ask you did you learn from Mr. Beecher why you were made the bearer of that letter from himself to Elizabeth [meaning this letter of the 7th of February, Mr. Tilton says] Mr. Beecher, whenever we met, particularly at that time, always asked after Elizabeth, after her state of mind, asked whether or not she could endure to live, asked whether or not I was restoring her in any degree to my respect; he put such questions as these, if that is an answer to your inquiry.

And Mr. Fullerton says "Yes" to that. Now, what did pass between you and Mr. Tilton on the subject embraced by that question and answer? A. Well, Sir, I always asked after Elizabeth with affectionate interest and respect.

Q. His statement is, you asked after her state of mind, "asked whether or not I was restoring her in any degree to my respect?" A. No, no; while yet her illness continued, I always asked whether she was ill, whether it seemed—she seemed likely to run down; there was a fear, at that time, that this illness would terminate in rapid consumption, and I had great solicitude, and I asked after her with that in my mind; and as to the other question, whether she was rising in his respect, I do not remember ever to have asked him that.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton adds to this answer that I have already read to you, referring to you:

And he [meaning you] wanted me to be assured that Mr. Moulton, who was endeavoring to keep peace between us all, held her in kindly regard, and did not frown upon her because she had forfeited her honor. He was very anxious that Elizabeth should be assured of that fact.

Now, what passed on any such subject, or in any such connection? A. There was nothing; it is simply untrue.

MR. TILTON DENIES THE STORIES TO HIS DISCREDIT.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, from and after this 7th of February, was there any disturbance, or discord, in the relations between yourself and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, during that season or up to the Summer? A. On the contrary, they were very much bettered between me and Mr. Tilton.

Q. Better than they had been— A. Any time previous?

Q. Prior to December? A. Yes, Sir, or had been for a year nearly.

Q. And at any of the interviews thereafter was the subject of any fault or wrong that you had done renewed as a subject of complaint or controversy? A. There was a memorable interview in the forepart of February; I cannot give any special date, but it was in the first half of the month, I think, in which our—

Q. Where was this? A. At Mr. Tilton's house.

Q. Well, I now proceed to that, then.

Mr. Beach—What year? A. 1871.

Mr. Evans—Well, in this month of February, or toward the middle of it? A. Yes, Sir, somewhere in that vicinity.

Q. Now, Sir, did you go to Mr. Tilton's house, and, if so how were you induced or held to go there? A. I don't know how; evidently by arrangement, but whether by his invitation or Mr. Moulton's suggestion I cannot recall; I remember going there about breakfast time in the morning.

Q. Now, you can go on and narrate what occurred. A. The conversation and the interview is rather more distinct than the external motion of things; we retired to his study, which was in the third story front room at that time.

Q. Well, you found them at breakfast? A. I did not go into the breakfast room, if I recollect, but I have an impression they were there.

Q. At breakfast? A. At breakfast; and Mr. Tilton met me as if he had expected me, and he—without being able to state precisely the language he employed—he introduced his conversation, by the recognition of the fact that we were to act harmoniously together, and that it was necessary, therefore, for a more perfect effectuation of that, that we should have a conversation in regard both to himself and to myself; there was a renewal—some renewal of the conversation in respect to the manner in which Mr. Bowen had treated him in a business point of view; I cannot recall that very distinctly; the other part impressed itself more upon my mind; he passed on from the statement of Mr. Bowen's having slandered me, to the statement that he himself had experienced a like treatment at the hands of Mr. Bowen. He proceeded to instance the stories that had been told by Mr. Bowen, if I recollect right, one by one.

Q. About you? A. No, about himself. It was an interview far more clearing himself than clearing me. He said that the story of his having made improper advances to a lady in the back office of The Brooklyn Union was an absolute falsehood; he denied it explicitly. He said that the story of his going with a woman to Winsted, in Connecticut, was absolutely false, and had no foundation in fact, and that he could not understand how it should have started except that there was another Tilton, bearing nearly the same initials as his, who was a dissolute man, and an intemperate man, and that he had been about the country, and that this story probably was true of him, and had been transferred by those who did not know the difference of personality to him. He said that the stories told of him by Mr. Bowen, or hinted, in respect to his improprieties in the West and North-West, he defied anybody to prove—they were absolutely false; he then went on to say that my wife was not altogether guiltless in the matter of propagating stories; that she and Mrs. Morse had joined hands against him; that Mrs. Morse had repeated stories of his intemperance, and of his improvidence, and of his neglect of his family, and one by one he gave to them explicit denial. What else did he say? [Reflecting.] He stated then to me, in regard to his family that, while he acknowledged that perhaps he had been at times hasty or inconsiderate, or something to that effect, he had never violated his marital vows; he declared that he had from his youth up been immaculate in chastity; he narrated to me the scene that took place between him and his father when he first began to launch out alone into the city, who took him and talked with him about the great dangers that he would have from the other sex, and from an undue intercourse with them; I cannot recall it; there was a considerable and very specific in that counsel of his godly and patriarchal father, as he represented to me, and he said that that made such an impression on his mind at that time that it had held him up ever since; he stated then that he did not know but that his life had come to a premature termination; his usefulness seemed clouded, his opportunities seemed shut up; his household seemed desolate. I spoke then words of sympathy and words of courage to him, and was profoundly impressed with his truthfulness, and I felt worse than I had ever felt before, that I had lifted my hand against a man who, whatever might have been his weaknesses or his follies, had not deserved any such treatment, and I expressed myself so to him, and we had a kind of recognition again; and he said that in view of what had taken place through the kindly offices of Mr. Moulton, through interviews with me, that, as we were to co-operate in the future, he wanted to have this conversation to say what he had said, and so on, and he wanted also to say that he should desire me to visit in his family again just as I had done in former days—before any of these troubles arose. This was not said just as I have said it—that is to say, it was much more largely opened rhetorically, and yet this is the substance of it. We left the study and went down stairs. I have forgotten exactly how it came to pass that I found myself with him in the bed-room with Mrs. Tilton—in the back bed-room on the south side of the house; but there I recollect there was a supplementary conversation between us three, or rather there was a supplementary discourse to us two, in which he stated again to his wife that he had had a long and satisfying interview with me; he said that he did not know that he should ever again be put in such prosperity as he had lost, and spoke tenderly and sadly about that, and yet terminated with a kind of reassurance—he was young, and he was energetic, and he meant to recover himself; he spoke also in respect to his family—he said that he thought it only right to say to Elizabeth, addressing himself to her, that “Mr. Beecher, in all this difficulty, has acted the part of a man of honor toward you, and has taken in every case all the blame to himself; and I feel bound also to say to you, Sir,” said he, “that Elizabeth has pursued the same course toward you, and said, ‘If there is any blame it is mine.’” He said, then, that he did not know that he should ever be happy again—his home seemed to him to be a divided and a desolate home, but he did not know but that out of this very condition of things there would spring up again an affection that would be purer and stronger than if it had not been tried by these difficulties; and with that—we all kissed each other (laughing) and I departed.

MR. TILTON FINDS FAULT WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, thereafter, Mr. Beecher, were you again at the house in May, some time in May? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was in May.

Q. What part of May? A. Well, if nobody would question me sharply I should say about the last third, somewhere about the 20th.

Q. Past the middle, I suppose? A. Yes, I think it was; I think it was about that time; but I cannot swear to the date accurately.

Q. Well, what was there about that interview? how did that come? was that by invitation, or— A. Well, of that interview I have less recollection of the details of it. There was—I don’t know what difficulty had sprung up, some little—

One of the Court officers having opened one of the windows, Mr. Beach said, addressing the Court: We cannot stay here if that air blows on us in this way.

Judge Nelson—Let the window be closed, then. [To the reporters.] The reporters will not put that on their notes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Evans—Well, Mr. Beecher, who were parties to this interview, this visit at the house? A. Well, first and last, Mr. and Mrs. Tilton and myself.

Q. Well, what occurred, do you recollect? A. No, I cannot exactly recollect what it was. There was some—there had been some—either they had not fulfilled some agreement, or there was some kind of dissatisfaction with me, but I cannot recall it, what it was. I only know that when I went in Mr. Tilton received me moodily, and then after a little conversation and explanations which took place, he became gracious, and we fell into an easy and unbusinesslike chat, and that in the course of it, sitting there in the old-fashioned way in his house, I went up and argued—sat down on his knee, as it were to make the appeal closer, and when I was sitting there, Mrs. Tilton came into the room and burst out laughing. I recollect that interview, and I think when she came into the room she came up and kissed me very cordially. That is but a skeleton interview, but I don’t remember the topic which had brought me there, only that it was something with which he was dissatisfied with me, as if I had not done the duty that was expected of me, and I have tried to remember it, but it won’t come.

Q. Now, during this Spring, and up to this time that you have now named, the latter half of May, did you understand that the ill-feeling between you and Mr. Tilton, or misunderstanding, was removed? A. I did; I thought the difficulty was all dissipated, and that the only thing remaining was the performance of the undertakings in which we had engaged.

Q. In regard to the future prosperity of Mr. Tilton? A. Of Mr. Tilton, the exoneration of his name from any imputations, as far as I could, of blame, and of upholding him by my influence as far as I legitimately could.

MR. BEECHER'S LAST VISIT TO THE TILTONS.

Q. Now, Sir, during this interval did you have any other visit to Mr. Tilton’s house in February of that year except the one that you have stated? A. I don’t recall any, Sir; I don’t recall but one other visit I made to the house from that day to this.

Q. And when was that? A. I cannot fix the date, Sir; it was an interview in which I saw Mrs. Tilton alone.

Q. How late was that—in what year? A. It was in the year 1871.

Q. In the Fall, was it? A. It might have been in the Fall; I have an impression that it was, but still I will not hold myself bound to that time.

Q. You don’t connect it with this period—with this Spring? A. Yes, it had connection with the difficulty that ran through that period.

Q. Yes, but you don’t connect it in date with this Spring—this period. If you do, I will inquire about it; if not, I will postpone it until that season is reached. A Well, my impression is that it was an interview in the November of 1871, but that is a corrected impression.

THE INTERVIEW ABOUT THE CHILD RALPH A "MONSTROUS FALSEHOOD."

Q. Well, we will so treat it now; we won't inquire about that now. Now, Sir, I will read to you a passage in Mr. Tilton's testimony of an interview in February:

Mr. Beecher came to my house one morning about the first or second week, probably the second week, yes, certainly the second week in February, 1871; he had come in pursuance of a request which I had sent to him through Mr. Moulton; Mr. Beecher came in the morning while I was at breakfast; I rose from the table, and met him in the parlor, and told him to go up stairs into my study. He immediately went up, and I followed him. I closed the door behind me, and, after he took his seat, I said to him: "I have called you hither, Sir, in order that you may remove, if you can, a shadow from the future life of the little boy, Ralph. His mother has assigned to me a date at which your criminal intimacy with her began. This little boy was born a few months after that. If the date which his mother has given is correct, it will save a dishonor attaching to his name. I want you to tell me, as before God, whether or not that date is right. I want, if possible, to shield him, but I want, more than that, to know the truth. Tell me the truth;" and he [that is, you] told me on his word of honor, as before God, that the date which Mrs. Tilton had assigned was the correct date. At that moment Mrs. Tilton herself, who had followed me up stairs, came into the room, and when I stated to her the point of conversation, she burst into tears, and asseverated, as she had once or twice done before [but that was struck out, as she had once or twice done before] asseverated that the date she had given was correct.

Now, Mr. Beecher, did any such interview, in which that topic, that subject, of the spuriousness of the boy, or the adultery of the wife, was mentioned, ever occur? A. Can you not divide that question, and let me be asked whether a father asked the seducer of his wife—

Mr. Beach—One moment, if your Honor please; I must object to this.

Mr. Evarts—The question, Mr. Beecher, is simply for your answer whether any such interview, any such conversation, any such topic of conversation, was ever raised between you and Mr. Tilton. A. Never between me and Mr. Tilton alone, in the presence of his wife; never any such conversation, or anything out of which such a conversation could be made or imagined took place. It is a monstrous and an absolute falsehood. [Loud and continued applause.]

BITTER REMARKS ON THE FEELING SHOWN BY THE AUDIENCE.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, I think that a few words can be appropriately said at this juncture in regard to these unseemly and disreputable manifestations of applause. Your Honor's admonitions are entirely disregarded. The friends of the defendant seem to be determined to emphasize this dramatic part of the scene here with their heels and their hands. I suppose are manifesting great pleasure that Mr. Beecher is enabled to deny these allegations, as if they were taken by surprise at his ability to do so. Now, Sir, however appropriate things of this kind may be in the church where they belong, their habits ought not to be brought into this Temple of Justice. It is wrong in every respect; it is an outrage. It seems that your Honor, by anything you may be able to say, cannot prevent this; but I think if officers were stationed in this room for the purpose of arresting and bringing to the bar of this court any person who committed such a violation of propriety, and having them punished for contempt, would put a stop to it. It is heralded forth to the world, through the public press, that there are manifestations of great applause and approbation whilst the defendant is giving his testimony and denying the allegations brought against him. I am perfectly willing that Mr. Beecher's testimony shall have what effect it is entitled to; I am willing it should be considered properly, calmly, and the truth or falsity of his statement, or the statement of any other witness in this case, determined in a proper and in a legal way; but to have people come here for the purpose of indulging in applause, that it may reach that jury box, and affect the minds of the gentlemen there, is not to be tolerated for a single moment, and we had either better break up this court and abandon this trial or else have order preserved.

Mr. Evarts—I believe, if your Honor please, the public judgment gives your Honor the credit of having preserved in an unusually meritorious degree, decorum, quiet, and order through this trial, although it is a trial that touches the sensibilities of men and affects greatly the dividing judgments of the friends or adherents of opposing opinions, and I believe, either in an illustration of the fickleness or of the division of sentiment, that there has been a somewhat impartial manifestation of applause for the eloquence and points of my learned friends, and now and then for some proposition of a witness successful in pleasing the attention, and finally in great and important asseverations of this witness, the defendant. I believe that the audience has been very temperate in all these manifestations in every form; that it has been but an instantaneous, as I suppose it was a wholly unpremeditated demonstration, whether it was drawn forth by the eloquence of my friend Mr. Beach, or by the wit of my friend Mr. Fullerton, or by the energy of the witness Mr. Moulton, or by the sharpness of Bessie Turner, or by the solemnity of Mr. Beecher. And you cannot suppress, on one side or the other, in a crowd of intelligent and feeling human beings, some natural indication of this kind; and if it is limited, as it seems to me in all candor we should believe, on both sides, to a mere momentary expression doubtless regretted and repented of by the offending portion of the audience when it has occurred, that we really should not disfigure this trial that has been so orderly and creditable, as it seems to me, to your Honor's administration of the Court, by a suggestion that real and important infractions of decorum and impropriety take place.

Mr. Fullerton—This is the first instance, Sir, I ever knew in the administration of justice where the evidence of a witness has been the subject of repeated applause against the admonition of the court. I don't believe any, thing in the experience of my learned friend on the other side, or of your Honor, can call to mind any such occurrence. If your Honor had not admonished these people over and over again that it must not be repeated, then what the learned counsel says might be true, that it was involuntary and unintentional, repented of immediately after the thing occurred. But your Honor sees perfectly well that it is persisted in; it is repeated in the teeth of your Honor's threat to have them ejected from the room. They pay no more attention to what your Honor says upon the subject; they seem not to care what your Honor's wishes are in that regard; but it is repeated, and it is repeated for the purpose of having it go forth to the world, and to exercise an influence there, and by its reflex action to reach the jury-box. That I don't believe they can affect, but that is their object, and, inasmuch as it mars the harmony and propriety of the occasion, I hope and trust that your Honor will exercise all the power that is in your possession, and use all the force that the law puts within your Honor's reach, for the purpose of having this trial conducted throughout with that quietness and that decorum, and, I may add, with that decency which should always characterize proceedings in a court of justice, whatever may take place in a church, in the City of Brooklyn.

Judge Neilson—I feel indebted to counsel for calling attention to this circumstance, this disorder; I have myself on my own volition complained often, and have got tired complaining. I will endeavor to-morrow morning to make such arrangements as to effectually silence such interruptions.

Officer Rogers—I suggest to your Honor that I have made one or two arrests.

Judge Neilson—To-morrow morning you will bring in some additional officers for a day, by way of experiment, and, instead of making two or three arrests, if necessary make a dozen. Let us make a signal day of it.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, subsequently, by a few questions, a further statement was made by Mr. Tilton, which I now ask your attention to :

Mr. Beecher asked me the date Elizabeth had named. I told him Elizabeth had named as the date at which their criminal intimacy began October 10, 1868. He replied that he had no faculty for dates, and had made no record, but he believed in his soul that she had told me the truth.

Did you say anything of that kind? A. No, Mr. Evarts, nothing of that kind.

Q. Were you asked any such question? A. No, Sir, I never was asked any such question.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we will not take up another subject.

LADIES REQUESTED NOT TO ATTEND THE TRIAL.

Judge Neilson—I ought to say to the ladies who are now present, and who are not immediately connected with the suit or the parties, that it would be well not to attend to-morrow morning. Friday morning and this morning I refused admission to a great number of ladies with regret. I think in some of the weeks to come there may be an opportunity, but just at present I think the ladies who are here, and who for one day have seen the place, might as well be content. Members of the Bar complain that they cannot get in. [To Officer Rogers.] See that the gentlemen keep their seats until the jury retire.

The jury will attend at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. The Court then adjourned until Tuesday at 11 o'clock.

FIFTY-NINTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

LETTERS AND INTERVIEWS EXPLAINED.

MR. BEECHER'S ADVICE TO MRS. TILTON TO LEAVE HER HUSBAND COMMUNICATED AT THE TIME TO GEORGE A. BELL—MR. MOULTON'S FIRST SUGGESTIONS THAT MONEY WAS NECESSARY TO KEEP PEACE—BESSIE TURNER'S EXPENSES AGAIN—AN INTERVIEW WITH MRS. TILTON SINGULARLY DESCRIBED—THE CLANDESTINE LETTERS EXPLAINED—MR. BEECHER'S INTERPRETATION OF A PECULIAR WORD.

TUESDAY, April 6, 1875.

Mr. Beecher's attention was first called to several minor and disconnected matters which had been previously overlooked. The object was to fill up little gaps in the evidence for the defense. The first inquiry was relative to Mr. Beecher's action in December, 1870, when called in by Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Morse, to give advice as to the former's separation from her husband. It will be remembered that after some hesitation and consultation with his wife, Mr. Beecher finally suggested to Mrs. Tilton in writing, that she should separate from her husband, and not procure a divorce. Some objection was made to further inquiry on the subject yesterday, but finally it was brought out that Mr. Beecher had consulted with George A. Bell on the subject. Mr. Bell, who was at that time Superintendent of Plymouth Bethel, advised him that it was "not a case for meddling."

Inquiry was next directed to the occasion of Mr. Moulton's first suggestions to Mr. Beecher that he should lend aid in money to Mr. Tilton. Mr. Beecher replied that it was among the first suggestions made by Mr. Moulton after the storm of January, 1871, had passed—within that month, in fact. Mr. Moulton told him that there was a mortgage of $7,000 on Mr. Tilton's house, and that it ought to be paid. Mr. Moulton knew of the existence of this mortgage, according to the defense, from the fact that his business firm held it. Mr. Beecher said that in answer to this suggestion he had offered to do his share whenever any movement was made to raise the amount.

Mr. Moulton's next demand for money was made in the Summer of 1871 for the amount of Miss Beatie Turner's school bills. He represented that he was paying out large sums of money for Mr. Tilton, and that he thought Mr. Beecher ought to help. Without any formality or arrangement as to paying other bills, Mr. Beecher paid the sum asked for, and when other bills were sent to him paid them without question or account of the expenditures. The only positive "Beecherism" of the day was uttered at this point, when the witness declared that he did not think he "had ever kept an account or a memorandum of any money on the earth."

In his testimony, Mr. Moulton swore that early in January, 1871, Mr. Beecher had suggested that Mr. Tilton ought to go to Europe for a few years. Mr. Beecher swore yesterday that there was some remark of that sort made by Mr. Moulton, casually dropped in ordinary conversation, but it made no serious impression on the witness's mind.

A part of Mr. Tilton's testimony was read relative to the scene at which he alleged the parentage of the child Ralph was talked over, and Mr. Beecher's attention called to the fact that, at the close of that interview, Mr. Beecher burst into tears, and expressed great grief and misery. Mr. Beecher not only denied that the conversation in any way referred to the child, but also asserted that it was a pleasant, hopeful interview, and at its close the "last thing that was done was to kiss each other, all three around, and," he added, "I did not burst into tears for that."

ADVICE TO MRS. TILTON IN 1871.

The next offer of Mr. Evarts was of a singular character and led to a long argument of an hour's duration. It was a proposition to give the incidents and conversation at an interview in the Fall of 1871 between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton at the house of the latter. Objection was made, of course, but not until Mr. Evarts had brought out the fact that Mr. Beecher had gone thither at the request of Mrs. Tilton on a pastoral visit of advice. Mr. Fullerton sprang to his feet, declared this to be a new interview, before unheard of by the plaintiff and beyond his power to dispute. Mr. Evarts again proposed to give the whole scene "in its innocence and solemnity." Judge Neilson ruled out the conversation and permitted the facts of the interview only to be given. During the argument Mr. Beecher had turned to the clerk's desk at his left elbow, and taking up the Bible on which witnesses are sworn, had opened, read, and with his pencil marked a passage in the volume. Finally, when the decision was made, and Mr. Evarts had asked him what occurred between him and Mr. Tilton, Mr. Beecher answered, with great deliberation, still holding the open Bible in his hand, "I went into the parlor; I sat down; I listened; I marked a passage in the Bible; I got up; I bowed, and went home." There was an immediate attempt on the part of Mr. Evarts to have the passage read; but Mr. Beecher protested against "any scenic effects," and after a general dispute, the Judge ruled out the passage, recommending Mr. Evarts to use it in his summing up. The marked passage, 13th chapter, I., Corinthians, verses iv. to viii., read as follows:

- (4.) Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up;
- (5.) Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;
- (6.) Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;
- (7.) Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things;
- (8.) Charity never faileth.

THE CLANDESTINE LETTERS.

Mr. Beecher was next called upon to explain as far as he could the meaning of what have been called the clandestine letters. The first to be explained was the one in which the word "nest-hiding" occurred. Mr. Beecher said this was in no sense his word. He had never used it in conversation with Mrs. Tilton, and understood it at the time he received the letter to mean that the writer was hiding the troubles of her household.

Mrs. Tilton's letter beginning, "My dear Friend: Does your heart bound toward all as it used," was next explained. Mr. Beecher said that the date of this letter was March 8, 1871, and that this was the first letter that had passed between them since Feb. 7,

It was written by Mrs. Tilton to communicate to him the happier condition of affairs in the Tilton family, which had resulted from the efforts of Mr. Beecher, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton to restore harmony to the family. The last clause in the letter—"When dear Frank says I may once again go to old Plymouth, I will thank the dear Father"—Mr. Beecher explained by saying that he thought at the time that it referred to some understanding between Mr. Moulton and Mrs. Tilton.

At this stage of the proceedings Mr. Beach requested leave to look at the memorandum of dates, which Mr. Beecher has had with him for reference thus far in his examination, and which at the beginning he offered to submit to the counsel. After glancing through it, Mr. Beach declared that it contained other matter than dates, and that the subjects of the witness's examination were classified there. Mr. Evarts insisted that it was proper for him to have it and handed it back to Mr. Beecher, who turned appealingly to the Judge and held out the papers for his Honor's examination; but Judge Neilson waved it aside and declared that the witness was free to use it.

The examination thus interrupted was then renewed, and Mr. Beecher was then questioned regarding the letter from himself to Mrs. Tilton, beginning: "The blessing of God rest upon you." It was written, he said, while his sister, Mrs. Perkins, was keeping house for him. By the expression "true inwardness" he meant Mrs. Tilton's religious experiences, of which he wished her to write to him fully. The words "it is permitted" had reference to the common understanding between himself, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, that he (Mr. Beecher) might renew his social relations with Mrs. Tilton. When he used the words "it will be safe for you," he merely meant that he would reveal to no one the outpourings of her inner nature.

The letter to Mrs. Tilton, dated Jan. 20, 1872, which was next inquired into, was written soon after the death of Mr. Tilton's brother. There was some objection to Mr. Beecher answering Mr. Evarts's questions as to whether or not the sentence, "My wife takes boat for Havana and Florida on Thursday," had any reference to a meeting with Mrs. Tilton in Mrs. Beecher's absence, but the witness was finally allowed to deny any improper meaning in the letter.

Mr. Beecher explained his note to Mrs. Tilton in which occur the words, "If I do not see you to-morrow night, I will next Friday," by saying that Friday was his lecture night, and it was his custom to make appointments with and meet his parishioners on that evening after the lecture. As nearly as he could remember Mrs. Tilton wished to see him about her mother, and he had suggested that time as convenient. Mr. Beecher, in a few words, here gave a vivid picture of the scenes after lecture at Plymouth Church.

Mrs. Morse's letter to Mr. Beecher dated Oct. 21, 1871, which contained the question, "Do you know I think it strange you should ask me to call you son?" and which was signed "Mother," was the last of the letters explained to-day. These expressions, Mr. Beecher said, referred to an occasion when, on Mrs. Morse telling him her troubles, he had asked her to take counsel of him as of a son.

MR. BEECHER'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

The explanation of the documentary evidence against Mr. Beecher was then suspended to allow the defendant, by giving at this point his account of his acquaintance with Mrs. Woodhull, to keep up the perfect chronological order in which his testimony, thus far, has been given. Mr. Beecher accordingly began his testimony on this point. He said that soon after the publication of Mrs. Woodhull's card, on May 23, 1871, Mr. Tilton came to him and said that the card referred to his (Mr. Tilton's) family. Mr. Tilton declared that he had been to see Mrs. Woodhull, and, by using his utmost efforts of persuasion, had induced her not to continue her attacks upon him. Mr. Beecher's account of nearly all that Mr. Tilton said on this subject to him was in direct contradiction of the testimony given on this point by Mr. Tilton. Mr. Beecher testified that he had nothing to do with Mrs. Woodhull, except when she intruded herself upon him, or when he had to listen to eulogies of her from Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton. His denials of ever agreeing to conciliate her were especially earnest, and he explained this part of the testimony of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton by declaring that they had put into his (Mr. Beecher's) mouth things which in reality were said only by themselves. Mr. Beecher explained his meetings with Mrs. Woodhull in a manner which seemed to convey the idea that the two first meetings were brought about by Mr. Moulton. The second occasion of his seeing her was on the afternoon of the excursion to witness the yacht race. He was invited by Mr. Moulton to dinner, and found Mrs. Woodhull there. She sat beside him at the table. At this point Mr. Beecher broke off his narrative, and, looking around the court with a comical expression, added, "and the dinner was very good."

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

STERNE MEASURES FOR ENFORCING ORDER.

Owing to the tardiness of plaintiff's counsel, the day's work was not begun until 11:15 o'clock.

Judge Neilson—I wish to say to the people in the gallery that, unless there be perfect order there to-day, those doors will be closed to-morrow morning. It has not been our custom to have the gallery used, and in many trials here, civil and criminal, where there might be excitement, the galleries have not been opened; and if the officers cannot keep order, they will not be opened hereafter. I wish to say to people on this floor that the officers think there are too many chairs here, and too many people seated, and that better order could be observed if some chairs were removed, and fewer persons let in; and that course will be observed to-morrow morning, provided there is not perfect order to-day. The two officers stationed in the midst of this court will please observe the faces of the people, and make an example of any who offend. I have sometimes thought even the reporters might be a little more sedate; they are engaged in a very serious business, and if they were a little more sedate and attentive, I think their reports would read better. Will you proceed, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, in regard to the report of a few observations made at the close of yesterday, in what I had occasion to say, I came into the court with an intention of correcting what I supposed was an error of the report in making me ascribe some applause to Mr. Tilton when I supposed I had conferred it upon Mr. Fullerton. But upon seeing that all the papers have it Mr. Tilton, I suppose the slip was in my tongue and not in the report.

Judge Neilson—I thought not, Sir; I did not understand you to say that.

Mr. Evarts—I thought I very distinctly said the eloquence of my friend Mr. Beach, and the wit of my friend Mr. Fullerton; but all the papers have it my friend Mr. Tilton. I should not venture to allude in so familiar a manner to the opposing party in this suit.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I divide the honor with Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—The only thing I observe in reference to your remark, which was very appropriate and very happily expressed, was a want of regret and disapprobation. I had at the moment thought of asking you to continue your observations with that view.

Mr. Evarts—Until I had reached that point.

Judge Neilson—Yes; but I assume there was regret and a sense of disapprobation.

Mr. Evarts—I did not intend to favor the matter in the least, but simply I put it that I thought all through the trial that it has been done in an instantaneous manner, and not a persevering or a continuing one.

Judge Neilson—Something in the nature of spontaneous combustion.

Mr. Fullerton—It was too instantaneous after your Honor's admonition.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—And of course I wish to add any authority or influence that I may have in securing entire immunity during the progress of the trial from any such manifestations on one side or the other.

TROUBLE ABOUT TAKING MR. CLEVELAND'S TESTIMONY.

Judge Neilson—That I have no doubt of at all. Mr. Morris, in this matter of closing Mr. Cleveland's evidence hadn't you better take an order of reference—to Judge Greenwood, for instance? I am really not well enough to attend to that. I go out of court tired and come in tired in the morning.

Mr. Morris—I will consult with my associates.

Mr. Beach—We will consult about that; of course it is merely for the cross-examination. [After consultation.] If your Honor please, there is some little difficulty in the proceeding for the examination of Mr. Cleveland, arising, I think, from a misapprehension between the gentlemen who are conducting it, and we wish to understand from your Honor whether the order, the informal order, under which he is examined is of such a character as to make his deposition, when it is offered, absolute evidence, although the witness may then be in a condition of health to appear and testify orally before the Court. I had supposed that the examination was to be taken the same as if an order for a de bene esse investigation had been made.

Judge Neilson—It stands so. I suggested to Judge Morris this morning, however, that with a view to close that, perhaps it might be referred to Judge Greenwood to take the testimony.

Mr. Beach—Oh, I think there would be no difficulty, Sir, in closing the examination, with the understanding that whenever the deposition shall be offered it shall be their duty, as in the ordinary case of an order, to show the incapacity of the witness to appear in Court.

Judge Neilson—Yes; that will be the course.

Mr. Morris—And that we can proceed in the cross-examination as the direct was proceeded with—where an objection is made to the question the objection is noted, and let the question be answered, and your Honor can pass upon the relevancy or propriety of the question and answer, when it is presented in court.

Judge Neilson—Or, to save delay in court, I might hear counsel in Chambers as to those particular questions.

Mr. Morris—And there is another point of difficulty that arose between us; that is, the counsel for the defendant insists upon the right of the witness to correct his testimony by simply striking out and inserting. We contend that any corrections that he has to make should be made in the same way as if upon the stand here, by subsequent question and answer, so that the record should appear complete, and not corrected in that way, because it takes away a great deal of the force of testimony.

Judge Neilson—Isn't it the usual practice to make corrections in that way?

Mr. Morris—The same as the witness upon the stand.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Morris—Well, I insist that should be the course pursued in the examination of Mr. Cleveland.

Judge Neilson—I think that should be so, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Well, if your Honor please, we should very much desire to have your Honor's attendance, or the attendance of some Judge of the court, because Mr. Cleveland's health will not permit of four or five days' examination consecutively.

Judge Neilson—I will attend if you desire me.

Mr. Shearman—We will be very much obliged if your Honor will attend this afternoon, some time.

Judge Neilson—I will do so.

Mr. Shearman—At what time—half-past four?

Judge Neilson—At the time you agree upon, Sir, I will attend.

Mr. Shearman—What time will suit you, Judge Morris—five, half-past five?

Mr. Morris—Five o'clock, yes, Sir; but it will not be concluded to-day.

Mr. Beecher was then recalled, and his direct examination continued as follows.

GEORGE A. BELL ADVISES ABOUT MRS. TILTON'S TROUBLES.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, I passed over by inadvertence an inquiry that I intended to have put to you when we were considering the occasion when Mrs. Tilton, toward the middle of December, raised the question about separation from her husband—that period. Did you, in connection with that resort of Mrs. Tilton to you for advice, besides introducing your wife into consultation, also refer to any gentlemen of the church or apply to any gentlemen of the church in the matter?

Mr. Beach—It seems to me, if your Honor please, that that question assumes various propositions which we contend are not established by the proof.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't care for including any of them. I suppose that the evidence we have given, in the witness's view of it, at least, covers them.

Judge Neilson—The inquiry, then, is whether—

Mr. Evarts—It is simply whether at that time you and Mrs. Beecher did, in fact, on occasion presented, see Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Morse at her house—whether, pending that inquiry, you did or did not apply to any gentlemen of the church to take part in the matter? A. I did.

Q. Who was it? A. George A. Bell.

Q. What position did he then hold in the church? A. I can't say what position he held in the church; he had been an official member in one way and another almost since I could remember, and was then Superintendent of the Bethel, a near neighbor, and an intimate friend, and one of my chief counselors.

Q. And did he take part in the matter, in the conference with you? A. I made a suggestion to him that the deaconesses—

Mr. Beach—One moment.

Judge Neilson—Your answer would seem to give the conversation.

Mr. Beach—Very well; I am instructed by my associate to withdraw that objection.

Judge Neilson—Well.

The Witness—I made to him a statement of the facts, and made the inquiry what had better be done in regard to Mrs. Tilton; she was under circumstances, it seemed to me, that required near and close counsel, and I thought that it was a case in which the deaconesses of the church, perhaps, would be in the exercise of their proper function; he dissuaded me from it peremptorily and emphatically, and said it was a case for silence.

Q. And that was the end of— A. That was the end.

Q. Of that matter? A. I do not use his words, Mr. Evarts, when I say "silence;" I do not mean that he said that word, but that it was a case for not meddling—silence and letting alone, so far as they were concerned.

THE FIRST HINT THAT MR. TILTON NEEDED MONEY.

Q. Mr. Beecher, how early after these first weeks of the year 1871, did any questions arise between Mr. Moulton and yourself in regard to the use or the application of money in connection with Mr. Tilton's affairs? A. Do you ask me how early his first suggestions were, or the first suggestions after a given time?

Q. Well, I say after these early weeks in January that we were speaking of, or if it was during those early weeks in January, 1871? A. Among our earliest counselings was how a standing ground should be gathered—got for Mr. Tilton, for his household, so that he could be at ease, and go on with his work, so that his household should be in an assured position. I remember in a conversation his saying to me quite early, within the first two or three weeks, that there was a mortgage upon Mr. Tilton's house; that he thought that that ought to be removed, and that he thought he could then persuade Mr. Tilton to transfer that property to his wife, or make it over to her, and I said whenever any movement of that kind was made, should wish to be counted in; that I should do my share.

Q. Did he mention to you the amount of the mortgage? A. I understood it to be about $7,000, Sir.

Q. Did anything further become of that subject or conversation—that particular point or item? A. He never, that I recall, mentioned it to me again, but I did to him once or twice; but I can't tell how long spaces after; it was in a later period; that is, I asked him if anything had been done, or anything was going to be done.

BESSIE TURNER'S SCHOOL BILLS.

Q. Now, do you remember how any matter came up between you and Mr. Moulton in regard to any bills, or any payments on account of Miss Beattie Turner's education? A. I do remember the first one.

Q. Well, about when was that, or how in reference to any bill that was present? A. My impression is that it was some time in the Summer of 1871; I will not be at all certain about that; I could refresh my memory, probably. He said to me one day that he was paying a great deal of money out for Mr. Tilton, and that there was a bill that he thought it would be well if I would pay; he thought it would be a great help to Mr. Tilton—assistance to him, or something to that effect. There was no formality and no arrangement about it; he presented it to me, and I said: "Certainly, I will do that, or any other thing that you think will help the family; you let me know, and I should be glad to do it."

Q. Was there then present a bill, and was it connected— A. It was in connection with a—

Q. A bill that he had in his hands? A. I don't remember about that, Sir; it was in connection with a—some statement or account which—there was a definite sum, I remember, and whether I saw the account or not—I know I did not see the account, but whether I saw the papers I don't know.

Q. Now, before this introduction of the matter to you in this form of contribution by you, had you known or heard anything about Beattie Turner's arrangements? A. Nothing whatever; I should, perhaps, say that there was—that Mrs. Morse had made some allusion to it, either orally or by letter; I think it was in her letter of her being absent, but I did not know where she was gone, nor whether it was a mere visit, or for good or for long, and I knew in detail nothing about her being away to school until this came up.

Q. Had you taken any part in providing or arranging for her departure or location, wherever she was? A. None whatever.

Q. Now, in regard to any payments in the future on this account of Miss Turner, to be applied in this way, how did the matter go on, as you recall it? A. There was no arrangement made about it; from time to time, at intervals, Mr. Moulton would say, "Send me," or, "I wish you would give me so much;" sometimes he wrote it, and sometimes he said it; and when it was in a dry season—that is, when I was not lecturing—I did not always give it promptly; I sometimes paid two sums together; when it was in the Winter season, and I was lecturing at all, I most always sent him a check, or something of that kind, immediately; I made no inquiries about it, and I did not know anything about it, except that I understood that it would be a relief to Mr. Tilton not to be obliged to make this provision.

Q. Now, did you receive or have rendered to you any account of these expenditures? A. I don't recollect, any Sir.

Q. Did you keep any account or memorandum of them as an aggregate or otherwise? A. I don't think I ever kept an account or memorandum of any money on the earth that I ever had. I certainly did not make an exception in this case.

THE SUGGESTION ABOUT MR. TILTON GOING ABROAD

Q. During the early period and in connection with the talks about money, either about the mortgage or otherwise, was anything said between Mr. Moulton and yourself about Mr. Tilton going to Europe? A. Oh, nothing serious, Sir. I recollect to have heard the subject dropped.

Q. How do you mean? A. Spoken about.

Q. Spoken about? A. Yes, Sir; dropped by accident, as it were, in conversation, among the very many things that were talked about as to how to open the future—what to do.

Q. What did Mr. Moulton say, if anything, on that subject? A. Very early, I can't report, except I have a recollection that that subject came up, but it made no special impression on my mind. At a later period I do recollect what he said.

MR. BEECHER'S "MISERY" AT THE MEETING ABOUT THE CHILD.

Q. Well, I won't go on with that at present. There is a single further item of testimony in connection with that visit at Mr. Tilton's house, which I was last inquiring about at the adjournment yesterday. I read to you passages from Mr. Tilton's testimony, and asked you if anything of the kind occurred. You remember the interview where there was said to have been a discussion about the child? A. The interview of early February—the first two weeks!

Q. The first few weeks of February? A. Yes, Sir, I remember.

Q. Now, there was only one further observation, I think, in Mr. Tilton's testimony, and that perhaps not very important, but I will ask your attention to it. After the evidence had been given, to the whole of which I called your attention—given by Mr. Tilton—he is asked whether anything further took place, in this form:

Q. Omitting, then, that part of the interview to which you have made reference, state what else occurred at that interview? A. Some remarks were made which I cannot exactly recall, which fell from Mr. Beecher's lips, expressing grief, misery, and he burst into tears; that was the actual remainder of the interview.

Now, Sir, on the occasion of that visit at his house in February, was there any occasion during the interview with him, or with him and his wife, in which you expressed grief or misery or burst into tears? A. I can't say that I did not express regrets, because in part the interview—the earlier part—passed over the Bowen difficulties, and I will not say that I did not cry; but I made no record of my tears in my memory, Sir, and I do not think, as the interview on the whole was a very hopeful and a very reassuring interview, I do not now remember any occasion to cry.

Q. Well, at the close of the interview, at any rate, was there any such— A. Do you mean of the interview in its first part or in its second?

Q. The interview just before you left the house, in the close of the interview. A. Why, Sir, the last thing that was done was to kiss each other, all three around, and I did not burst into tears for that. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts, allow me to suggest, if you think it is proper, to instruct the witness, who perhaps is not very conversant with this kind of proceeding, to answer, when he can do so, simply yes and no; it would perhaps be better received by the audience.

Mr. Evarts—The point, Mr. Beecher, is that when "yes" or "no" sufficiently disposes, as matter of evidence, of the truth, in answer to the question addressed to you, that that is the proper answer that the law requires; and expressions of amplitude or emphasis are extraneous. I suppose that is your Honor's view.

Judge Neilson bowed assent.

A NEW INTERVIEW OFFERED.

Q. Mr. Beecher, you mentioned in the course of the testimony yesterday that you had had one other interview at Mr. Tilton's house with Mrs. Tilton, and that it was alone with her. You remember that? A. I do.

Q. And supposed it was, as near as you could recall it, in the latter part of the year 1871, perhaps. I think you so stated? A. That is my supposition.

Q. Now, Sir, how did that interview arise? A. I cannot say, Sir, from any knowledge, but only I have an impression that I was sent for—

Q. By whom? A. [Continuing] from the nature of the interview, by Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Sent for by Mrs. Tilton, and went there and found her? A. Yes, Sir; she was there alone.

THE NEW INTERVIEW OBJECTED TO.

Q. Now, Sir, what passed between you and her on that visit?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that. If I understand correctly, that is not an interview that we have inquired into at all.

Mr. Beach—It would not have been permitted.

Mr. Evarts—No, I suppose not.

Mr. Fullerton—We have made no inquiry.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—I propose at least to offer to show everything in the shape of intercourse between this defendant and Mrs. Tilton that comes within my range of accusation or imputation, and so of exoniation, within the issues of this trial. Now, your Honor will remember that certain letters passing between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton during a period subsequent to this trouble raised, and forming so serious a matter of consideration, had been given in evidence, and something is said—something was said to considerable length, and with considerable point, in the opening of our learned friend, Judge Morris—on the subject of those letters, and that subsequent intercourse. We have no concern with anything that has been said outside of the limits of this trial, of course, on that subject; and I propose to show every interview that took place between Mr. Beecher and this lady, and to take up the subject of every note or paper that passed between them, that comes within this period which has been made the subject of imputation and of evidence on the part of the plaintiff. And I may say to my learned friends that I do not desire, nor have I any fact that would lead me to expect, to introduce any conversations of the wife that are in the nature of recital or hearsay concerning anything. It is the interview that took place ~~in present~~, and on the matter then in hand, that I propose to give; and if the generality of my question shall be objectionable, I of course can reduce it—

Mr. Morris—Oh, no, that is not objectionable.

Mr. Evarts—But it would seem to us a suppression of legitimate evidence, if, when subsequent intercourse is made the ground of accusation, I am not permitted by this witness to show what occurred between him and Mrs. Tilton on any visit that he made.

Judge Neilson—What occurred independently of conversation.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir, I suppose that the conversation was pretty much, as in general it is, all the intercourse that takes place between people.

Judge Neilson—Well, is not the objection as to confidential communications as binding and pressing upon you now as it was upon the plaintiff when he presented his case?

Mr. Evarts—Well, if that objection is raised—that is, you mean the confidential relations between a parishioner and a clergyman?

Judge Neilson—Confidential communications in respect to Mrs. Tilton, who is not here, that were under restraint.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, that I suppose is between husband and wife, if your Honor please. I know of no confidence between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, except that of clergyman and parishioner.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—And that has not been such, nor does the topic that I should advert to come within any such matter of evidence.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to account for every interview, and for every letter, and show what took place, or what did not take place.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think that is so.

Judge Neilson—You can do that without giving the conversation. The counsel for the plaintiff have been quite liberal, I think, in the progress of this examination so far.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; I think so. I have every reason to recognize, in behalf of my client and ourselves, that disposition on the part of the counsel for the plaintiff. They have given a very great latitude to exculpation by disclosing all the facts bearing upon the case.

THE GROUND OF OBJECTION.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose, if your Honor please, that the counsel claims to prove what occurred at the interview to which the witness's attention is now called, upon the strength of your Honor's ruling when the question came up as to what occurred at the interview somewhere about the middle of December, when Mr. Beecher was called in by Beadie Turner to the house of Mrs. Morse, and there had an interview with Mrs. Tilton; but your Honor will perceive that the reasons for admitting the particulars of that interview do not apply to the one to which attention is now drawn. That was an interview before the charge was made. It called for what occurred between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton with reference to a separation of Mrs. Tilton from her husband. It was admitted for the purpose of showing what her state of mind was as to her husband, and what the domestic condition of the family was at that time, anterior to the charge made by Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher, which was on the night of the 30th of December following. Now, your Honor will perceive that the charge was then and there made, whatever it was—a charge implicating Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; and it certainly would be a novelty if the interviews between these two persons, when the charge was then resting upon them, and there was every motive to vindicate themselves, or to put themselves in an attitude where they could vindicate themselves, could be given in evidence on the trial of this case. Certainly, if the evidence is admitted, it must be on a principle entirely different from that which enabled your Honor to decide that the interview of the 14th or 15th of December, whichever day it was, was admissible in this case. I cannot see for my life upon what principle this evidence can be admitted. The interview is said to have been in the Fall of 1871. It is an interview that I never heard of before; I do not know how it was brought about, nor do I know what the object of the interview was; but surely it ought not to affect the rights of the plaintiff in this case, because, I repeat, the charge was then made, the difficulty then existed, and it became Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, whether the charge was the greater or the less offense, so to demean themselves when together, that they might vindicate themselves against that charge. Mr. Tilton ought not to be held responsible for, nor ought his rights to be affected in the slightest degree by what took place between these parties in the Fall of 1871, nearly one year after the charge was made. As a matter of course it would be very easy for parties, under these circumstances, to manufacture a state of things which would result to their benefit, and to the injury of the accusing party. The law does not favor such things, and therefore we object to the evidence.

WHAT IT IS PROPOSED TO SHOW.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt, if your Honor please, in the trial of causes items of proof are introduced, and properly introduced, which, in certain aspects only, are justifiably introduced, and only in those aspects are to have their weight with the jury and their consideration by the Court. The way that law protects the interests of justice in such cases is not by suppressing the evidence, because all of its aspects and every form of its consideration are not justifiable; but by introducing it, in order that it may have its application and its authority so far as the law allows its application and its authority; and, by the instructions of the Court, the minds of the jury are protected from those side influences which cannot properly be allowed to the evidence. Now, it is undoubtedly true that the situation of accusation and of suspicion on the part of the husband is definitely marked by the month of December, 1870, and it is quite true that this interview was later than that; and perhaps if by the plaintiff and his counsel, in the trial of this cause, in the opening of the cause—of their rightful grounds of accusation and of proof, and in the production of evidence, had limited themselves entirely to imputations and to facts that were bounded by this as the latest date of their evidence—to wit, December, 1870—there might have been more reason for the defendant and his counsel, when the explanation or exculpation supposed to have been rendered necessary by the force of the undisturbed evidence for the plaintiff makes it in turn for us to take up the case, to limit ourselves equally to that as the latest period of our evidence; but they have gone on further, and have intimated a removal of improper relations, and have supposed that they found, in some written correspondence, some equivocal, obscure, or concealed meanings of disastrous import, and they thus have opened this line and this scope of evidence and imputation, and have made it material to the very issues and the evidence that they introduce in support of the issues (to wit, of the antecedent fault), that this subsequent period which is resorted to to furnish evidence, should be met by us by the only testimony in our power to give where Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher alone were witnesses, and by such explanations or statements concerning any written documents which have been introduced, as the writer of the documents can furnish. Now, this interview is first described by the witness as the only visit at that house in which he had an interview with Mrs. Tilton (other than those he has already described), that took place after this December trouble, the publication of the strife between the parties. How that interview came about and what occurred at it I propose to show; and I can only say that it is not for the purpose of showing any recitals or statements on either the one side or the other concerning this alleged difficulty or guilt between these parties, but the interview is to be shown in its innocence and in its solemnity; and the law allows it, as I suppose.

Judge Neilson—Will you be kind enough to repeat your question?

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will be kind enough to hear us before passing upon it.

Mr. Fullerton—Let the question be read by the stenographer.

The Tribune stenographer then read the question as follows:

"Q. Now, Sir, what passed between you and her on that occasion?"

Mr. Beach—We desire to be heard, Sir, on this question.

Mr. Morris—We have the closing argument.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; we close the argument.

Judge Neilson—The only trouble I have is this, and this is the point I want to submit to you, Mr. Beach: While I think it may be competent for the defendant to state that he was present on a certain occasion and date, and did see Mrs. Tilton, and, without giving the conversation, to state what occurred—what was done and what was omitted to be done; I should not feel inclined, as at present advised, to go beyond that; and the question is whether even that is proper.

CLOSING ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—The proposition, if your Honor please, is to prove not only the declarations and the acts of Mrs. Tilton in the absence of her husband, but to prove the declarations and acts of the adversary party, in his absence. That is the simple proposition; it means that and nothing else. Now, upon what exceptional rule of evidence is that admissible? The general rule is that the declarations or acts of a party, in the absence of his antagonist, are not evidence unless those declarations and acts are connected with a subject which makes them a part of the res gestæ, explanatory, significant of an act, and therefore admissible. Will your Honor settle the rule that the declarations of Mrs. Tilton upon the subject matter of this litigation are evidence against Mr. Tilton; that the declarations or acts of Mr. Beecher in the absence of Mr. Tilton are admissible as evidence against him? From the peculiarity of this action, the law allows certain declarations of the wife to be given in evidence, declarations of complaints, declarations exhibiting the state of the household, of the matrimonial relations, complaints of unkindness, or brutality, or neglect, accompanying her acts of desertion, or separation, or the act with which he is accused, as explanatory of that; but it is an indulgence which the law, from necessity, and with reluctance and qualification, extends even to that condition of things. But where, Sir, has it ever been heard, under any singular condition of circumstances, that the declaration of an adversary party in regard to the subject of litigation can be given in evidence when made in the absence of the opposing party? And upon what principle is it that Mr. Beecher, after the point of accusation made against him, shall be permitted, as I am entitled to suppose, to fabricate, by his declarations and by his acts, excusatory and exculpatory evidence against his adversary? And what has your Honor heard of principle or of reasoning on the part of my learned friend which justifies that departure from the cardinal rule of evidence and of justice? Why it is said, Sir, that we have not been content with our original accusation located about December, 1870, but in an obscure and indefinite and inexplicit way have charged a renewal of improper or criminal intercourse. We have done nothing of that kind, Sir; but in support of our original accusation against this defendant we have produced his own recorded letters written to Mrs. Tilton after that occasion, and it is true that we rely upon those letters as confirmatory of our accusation of primary and original offense. The gentleman says he is at liberty to explain them. I grant it. The gentleman says he is at liberty to show the circumstances surrounding those publications. I grant it. The law gives him that liberty, but under fixed and settled rules of evidence which shall secure the immunity of his adversary from improper proof. He cannot explain them by his declarations; he cannot explain them by the declarations of Mrs. Tilton; but the law does allow certain explanatory circumstances, those which immediately surround the transaction; those circumstances existing as facts—as a condition surrounding the acts, for the purpose of explaining their import, effect, and origin. But has your Honor ever heard that for the purpose of explanation the parties inculpated by the accusation made in the action may, by a conference between themselves, and by a communication of certain facts as between themselves, not cognizant to the opposite party, produce explanation, or answer the accusing evidence? Why, Sir, it is forbidden by the fundamental maxims of the law. It is abhorrent to our sense of justice that these two inculgated parties, Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, after the offense which we charge, shall be permitted to give their declarations, their own fabricated statements possibly, for the purpose of resisting the accusing evidence which we produce. Now, it is said that evidence of an interview between these parties was given with reference to advice submitted by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton upon the difficulties between her and her husband, advice looking to a separation. Well, that was proper, Sir—proper for the purpose of proving an act explanatory of the letters, and, as we say, the confessions of a higher offense made by Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beecher says he was applied to by Mrs. Tilton for advice upon that subject, that he gave the advice favoring a separation, with provision of allowance. Now, that evidence is made proper by the circumstance that that subject of a separation, as Mr. Beecher testifies, was a matter of communication between himself and Mr. Tilton. He says the onus of repeated conversations about that period, as between him and Mr. Tilton, referred to that very subject, and that the revelation was made by him to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton of the fact of this advice, and therefore it became competent evidence. How far it would have been admissible in reference to the interview and the details of the interview between Mr. and Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, except for that fact, has not been a question raised or discussed, because it could not well be under the circumstance to which I have alluded. Now, the counsel has very kindly conceded to us a liberal disposition in our indulgence upon the examination of this witness. For various reasons, Sir, not necessary to enumerate, we have been inclined to indulge that liberality, but when it comes to the details of interviews and conversations as between these two inculpated parties, not immediately surrounding the event of the original offense and its communication—our knowledge of it, to Mr. Beecher, we must, Sir, in the interests of justice and of legal propriety object. We have no means of answering it. We were not there. It was never revealed to us. What it may be we don't know. We have never had the opportunity of presenting against it our dissent and protest, or our explanation and qualification, but it stands, if given at all, as made by these two parties, without any possibility of answer. It places us in a position of injustice, which I think your Honor will not permit. Now, your Honor has intimated that conversations cannot be given. I suppose that must be clear. But your Honor has also said that it is possible that the acts of the parties in that interview may be admissible. Well, for myself, Sir, I am not particularly inclined to object to that. It is at the will of this defendant to deny the improper intercourse charged, and I suppose that covers all his acts and all his relations to this lady; and whether it shall be done by a general declaration of denial or by a relation of the physical communication—the acts, as between these two parties when they met, it seems to me, is a matter of entire indifference. To that extent, so far as the conduct or the acts of the parties separate from their declarations made at the time, I see no particular reason for objecting.

JUDGE NEILSON ADMITS THE CIRCUMSTANCES.

Judge Neilson—In cases of this character, as intimated at earlier stages of this case, the correspondence between the husband and the wife, and her correspondence with other persons, is deemed admissible, either to be introduced by the plaintiff to show the harmony of his household and to indicate what is lost in the supposed disturbance; or, on the other hand, the defendant is equally at liberty to show, by correspondence and conversations prior to the supposed offense, want of harmony and a disturbed household; all of which goes to the mere question whether the plaintiff in the supposed disturbance, assuming it to have occurred, assuming the wrong to have occurred—whether the plaintiff really suffered much damage; and as I have on one occasion intimated, that class of evidence goes to the question of damage. I understand that to be the condition of the law of evidence; and one reason why acts and correspondence and conversations prior to the supposed offense are to be received, showing the condition of the household which the plaintiff alleges to have been disturbed, and therefore characterizing the damages either as great or little. And as to events and conversations and acts subsequent to the alleged offence, the law makes a marked distinction, and for a very obvious reason. But still, where the defendant is charged with improper conduct, alleged here to have taken place in October, and on divers days afterwards, I think he is at liberty, in reference to any interviews with this lady at any time, to state what occurred and to be interrogated as to what did not occur. Perhaps the general statement would cover it; and yet the learned counsel, as Mr. Beach seems to concede, might, if he deemed it necessary, inquire particularly as to each interview. But I cannot see that the conversation can be received. There is no authority of law nor rule of evidence nor principle, that would admit it. As, for example, as intimated the other day, when a wife abandons her house and determines to live apart, her declarations made at the time of leaving are a part of the act, and may be received in evidence in her favor, to show why she left; but it is because it is a part of the act, and proceeds upon the same principle that events and conversations may be received, because they are a part of the res gestæ; but if the wife, having left her home, is absent for days and weeks, and then has a conversation in the absence of the plaintiff, I cannot conceive that it is admissible. And moreover, this rule saves, in my judgment, the rights of the defendant perfectly. It leaves him at liberty to refer to any interview at which he met this lady, and, without giving the conversation (which could not be evidence, and ought not to influence the jury, of course), to state what occurred, and, therefore, what did not occur, and thereby to help us upon the question of guilt or innocence, the only question that really concerns us, and to that extent I think I will allow the communication, but only to that extent.

Mr. Evarts—I will proceed within your Honor's ruling, and then raise my point in the form of a question. [To the Witness.] Mr. Beecher, do you remember what time of day this visit was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it in the hours of daylight or in the evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was in the hours of daylight? A. It was in daylight.

Q. Now was the subject or occasion of that interview suggested to you, or suggested by you? A. To me.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; I did not understand the question. "Was the subject?"—

Mr. Evarts—Was the subject or occasion suggested to him or by him. [To the Witness.] It was suggested to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the occasion and what the subject thus suggested to you?

ANOTHER FIGHT OVER THE INTERVIEW.

Mr. Fullerton—That comes within our objection, Sir, and your Honor's ruling.

Mr. Evarts—I think not, if your Honor please.

Mr. Morris—That calls for what was said to him.

Mr. Evarts—The point that we have in view, and about which it seems to me that there should be no difference of opinion, is that this interview, in its nature and occurrences, as separated from any reproduction at it of antecedent affairs, or of prospective arrangements—anything that characterizes this interview in its present occurrences as an act between the parties—may be disclosed. If it may be disclosed at all, it may be accurately disclosed, so as to be explicitly understood. There is no rule of evidence that puts us off with inaccurate and inexplicit productions of scenes. I shall confine myself to the exclusion of anything that is in the nature of recital, if anything of the kind occurred, and I am not advised that anything did—on the contrary, that it didn't at all; and I propose to show that this interview, in its whole character, was separated from any notion of its being a renewal of confidential, or affectionate, or social, relations in any form or degree; that it occurred after this period, according to this witness's evidence, in February, 1871. Mr. Tilton, in the presence of his wife, had expressly desired that the relations and the visits and the intercourse should be as it had always been before, and I don't know any evidence to the contrary on the part of the plaintiff; and yet I propose to show that this interview on both sides was of the utmost and distinct reserve from anything like an encroachment upon the situation produced between them by this trouble that had been raised, and that that interview was only the resort for advice in moral troubles that the wife was in, and of the religious advice or instruction that was given at the time. Now, that is the mode of showing, without infringing upon the idea of conversation as distinguished from acts and intercourse of the parties then presently determining the character of that intercourse—of showing both what did take place and what didn't take place within your Honor's rule; and I apprehend that a strict protection of all the rights of this plaintiff will be maintained by a production of the scenes and the action of these two parties.

Mr. Beach—No.

Mr. Evarts—And the exclusion from it, if their comes out anything in the matter of recital or conversation that your Honor thinks is outside of your admission.

Judge Neilson—The counsel, of course, who have given attention to this subject, understand its bearings, and also the force of the principle involved, better than I do, of course, that question coming up to me suddenly; but apart from any artistic design in the examination of the witness, and looking at it from my simple manner, as if I were proceeding under this rule, I think I would be at liberty, under my ruling, to give in evidence what time of day this interview was, and where it was, how long it was; whether any act indicative of special affection occurred then and there, or was refrained from; whether any act questionable in a moral sense occurred, so characterizing it throughout, and then, as I understand your last argument, Mr. Evarts, the question will remain whether you could ask the general question whether the interview was simply upon a moral and religious subject, or otherwise. Have you not got it all, then?

Mr. Beach—Your Honor's suggestions are very practical and simple.

Judge Neilson—They are simple; there is no doubt of that.

Mr. Beach—And very practical, and I think in their simplicity and practical nature they embody a very considerable legal perspicuity and learning, and I think, if there was no artistic design on the part of my learned friend, it would be very easy to follow the line of inquiry which your Honor has suggested. But what is the question? Your Honor has ruled that the declarations of these parties called under these circumstances cannot be given in evidence for very obvious reasons, that their act may be, so far as there conduct and personal relation is concerned, was connected with that interview; but the gentleman now calls upon the witness, a party, to characterize that interview, its subject, the matter discussed, presenting in a still more odious form the evidence to which we object, because it would be a great deal better and surer evidence, and address itself more to the approval of the law, to have what was really said than to have an interested party give a construction and a conclusion upon what was said. The latter would be the more objectionable, of course. The former your Honor has excluded. But will you look a little further at this, Sir? We have given no evidence of this interview; and what is the real situation presented by the proposition of the learned counsel? We charge that upon a certain precedent occasion there was an improper connection between these parties. We charge that it was confessed by both the parties, and to a great degree the confession standing in their own written words which cannot be erased or forgotten, and which we say cannot be explained. They come in with the answer that a year subsequent to those events they had a moral and a pious interview. They fabricate and introduce the interview in our absence, without any communication to us, as an argument, and for the purpose of answering the accusation they produce their own interviews and their own acts introduced by themselves, to which we have made no reference, directly or remotely, to conclude our rights. Now, there is a great deal in the idea, if your Honor please, that this interview is offered by themselves in the first instance. How does it reflect upon any letter that Mr. Beecher has written or upon any expression that he has used? How does it tend to explain or connect itself with any antecedent act of his, except as a conjoint and reciprocal act as between him and his inculpatory colleague, happening a year after the acts which we charge upon him? And is it possible, Sir, is there any rule of evidence which justifies accused parties in getting up an interview between themselves and giving evidence of their own acts in that interview for the purpose of answering a charge and accusation made against them? And upon what principle shall it be? Why, my friend says you must receive all evidence. Everything which reflects light upon the given transaction is to be presented to the court and to the jury, and under the instructions from the court the jury are to be protected from any injurious influence. That is not the law of evidence, Sir. Everything which by possibility might circumstantially affect a given transaction is by no means admissible. The law requires evidence of a certain character. The law imposes limitations upon proof which shall protect the rights of the opposite party, which shall put parties upon an equality of right, and wherever accusation or explanation is made, it shall leave to such the means of proof to answer the inculpation of another. And how do you place this plaintiff, Sir? Permitting these parties to give in evidence a private interview between themselves, a private act as between themselves with which we have no connection, and of which we had no knowledge, shutting our voice and our means of presenting the truth in regard to the alleged transaction. The law by no means, Sir, permits any such injustice. Parties cannot themselves manufacture evidence, nor can they thus introduce their own acts, although they may be truthful and accurate in their representation. The law does not permit them to make proof in the absence of their adversary by which the just rights of that adversary may be overthrown, and yet that is the character of this evidence, Sir. In 1871, nine months after the accusing transaction, they ask the liberty to present to your Honor what they have done in private as between themselves to reflect light upon the prior transaction. I can perceive no rule, Sir, of equity or of law in such a proposition, and I very much doubt whether any of the details, so far as the acts of the parties are concerned, is competent or material evidence, except as it may be in connection with the inquiry whether there had been the criminal connection between the parties charged. And it is a novel way, Sir, it seems to me—[To Mr. Morris]—up to what time does our complaint charge seduction?

Judge Nelson—October, and on divers days afterward.

Mr. Morris—August, 1868.

Mr. Evarts—The commencement of the action.

Mr. Beach—We have given no proof of it, no matter what the complaint may charge, no matter what the pleadings in this case are, or what the opening of my learned colleague was. Their answering proof is confined to the accusing evidence which we have given. Now, we have attempted to give no such evidence. True, we have given the letters of Mr. Beecher, and to some extent the letters of Mrs. Tilton, in evidence, but not reaching over, I think, that period at which this conversation is located. Now, it seems to me very singular, Sir, that parties charged with adultery, where the proof locates the adultery in the year 1868, and reaching up possibly into the year 1870—it is very singular that the law should allow the parties accused to give proof, in answer to that accusation, that after the discovery and the charge of the wrong their intercourse has been perfectly proper and virtuous. And upon that principle I suppose they might reach their evidence up to this very instant, during the pendency of this trial, upon the same principle. Interviews between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton might be shown perfectly decorous and proper in their conduct. It is immaterial evidence; it don't tend to reach the point of accusation; it does not contradict or reflect upon the proof which we have given. We might say with great propriety, in answer to this evidence, "Why, of course, after a discovery of your criminal connection, and after they are charged upon you, we do not expect to find the illicit intercourse continue; we suppose your subsequent communications will be proper and decorous;" and I think your Honor will perceive that in this essence, independent of other considerations which have been urged upon your Honor, this evidence is improper.

Mr. Evarts—My friend does not bear wholly in mind the opening of his learned associate upon the subject of this renewal of intimacy, but at any rate now we have a disclaimer that it continued incontinent, at least as thus charged.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't charge that.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Judge Nelson—I think you are quite at liberty to prove, and that is as far as you can go, what occurred and what did not occur at this interview, or at any other interview you choose to call attention to.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, it is all a part of showing that there are no other interviews, and that at this interview only matters quite outside of any confidence of affection occurred.

Judge Nelson—Show the acts independent of the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I suppose, Sir, I could show that at such an interview as this, answering what the subject is, it is a very familiar mode of introducing a conversation, and going no further, that answers the whole question. If the witness answers the whole conversation was about the weather, and nothing else was said, why, that gives an innocent view to an intercourse, to know what it was; or if the question were whether it was about the sickness of a child, anything of that kind—and I am not supposing now cases of what did actually occur, but as illustrations of a right of a party, which is to put before court and jury the actual course of conduct between parties implicated, accused, during a period from which evidence, at least, is sought, by the line of my learned friends' preparation of the case, to throw light back upon the antecedent accusation; that I must be at liberty to show, and, if I can show in general, I can show in everything that took place that nothing from which imputation or a support of accusation could be rightfully drawn, in the judgment of sensible men or in the judgment of law, by the witness who can speak of it.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not charged.

Mr. Beach—The persistence of my learned friend, Sir, after the regular order of debate is closed, in presenting the subject to your Honor, compels me to add a word. Distinction is made, Sir, by the law and by your Honor's ruling, as between affirmative proof of what occurred at an interview and negative proof as to what did not occur, and there is a very clear distinction in principle between the two lines of proof. The one is giving inadmissible declarations made by parties; the other is simply proving a negative fact, and the latter is often admissible where the former would be excluded. Now, as to my friend's remark that the object is to show that in this interview there was no reference to precedent transactions, or to future contemplations, or preparations, or arrangements. If that is his only object, how easy it is to ask the witness upon the stand, in the manner suggested by your Honor, whether in that interview there was any reference to prior events or to subsequent arrangements, to prove the negative fact, to establish the very idea which he says it is his object to prove by his inquiry! Now I don't think I should object to that, Sir; I am rather inclined to think it would be proper to ask this gentleman whether in that interview there was any reference to their relations, personal, or to contradict any other possible assumption as to what that interview may have been carried in its terms. I see no special objection to that, if the purpose of the gentleman is that which he has avowed it to be to me, that in addition to his proof within your Honor's ruling of the acts which transpired between the parties, I shall not object to his proving that certain subjects or matters were not referred to in that interview.

Mr. Fullerton [To Mr. Beach]—Would that be proper?

Mr. Beach—it would be proper if this was introduced by us, but I am inclined to concede its propriety in the present aspect of the question.

Judge Nelson—Well, Mr. Evarts, proceed and examine your witness as to what occurred, independent of conversations.

A SUCCINCT NARRATIVE OF THE INTERVIEW.

Mr. Evarts—What occurred between you and Mrs. Tilton on that interview as separated from any conversation between you, Mr. Beecher? A. I went into the parlor; I sat down; I listened; I marked a passage in the Bible; I got up; I bowed, and went home.

Q. What passage in the Bible did you mark?

Mr. Beach—That I object to.

Mr. Evarts—That is an act.

Judge Nelson—I think so; I think we will take that.

The Witness—I marked a passage in the I. Corinthians, xiii., from the fourth to the seventh verses.

Mr. Evarts—Will you read the passage that you marked?

Judge Nelson—Did he read it?

Mr. Evarts [To the witness]—Will you read it?

Judge Nelson—We are familiar with it.

Mr. Evarts [To the witness]—Will you read it? A. I will read it; I did not read it.

Mr. Evarts—No, I understand. You marked the passage and handed it to her, and that is his act.

Judge Nelson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts [To the witness]—Now, will you read the passage, or shall I read it?

Mr. Fullerton—That is something that took place.

Judge Nelson—I assume the counsel has read it elsewhere.

Mr. Evarts—We have read it, of course, but I don't think we read it by verse and chapter.

Judge Nelson—It can be read hereafter as a part of the case.

Mr. Evarts—It can be read here as part of the evidence.

Mr. Beach—I don't suppose we are to have any scenic effect.

Mr. Evarts—There is no scenic effect about it. I have been permitted to prove the act, and the act was not marking the Bible in general, but marking the particular passage and handing it to Mrs. Tilton, bowing and leaving without conversation.

Mr. Beach—That gets in, Sir, the whole acts of the parties at the time within your Honor's ruling, and it does not make the passage which he marked evidence in this case to be read as evidence by the witness on the stand.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Evarts—Mark a passage and you cannot show what the passage was!

Mr. Beach—Exactly.

Mr. Evarts—That is a law of evidence with a vengeance.

Mr. Beach—It is a law of evidence with a vengeance, with truth, and with justice too. The communication was made by the marking of that passage to Mrs. Tilton, and the argument of the counsel, if it amounts to anything, is that by the marking of that passage those verses and the sentiments of those verses were communicated by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton at that time, and it is precisely the same as if he had repeated them from memory to Mrs. Tilton upon that occasion and is giving a part of the conversation.

Judge Neilson [to Mr. Evarts]—I think we won't read it now, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Have you marked in this book the verses—is this your own book? A. No, Sir, it is the swearing Bible.

Mr. Evarts [handing Bible to the Judge]—I hand to your Honor the book that he has thus marked, and I offer to read to the jury the passage as in proof.

Mr. Beach—I object to its being read as in proof.

Judge Neilson—It cannot be read now, Sir; you can read it hereafter. You say I. Corinthians!

Mr. Evarts—It is marked there with a pencil.

Judge Neilson—It will do you no harm to read that as a part of your argument.

Mr. Evarts—I dare say, Sir, I shall do so.

Judge Neilson—It is immaterial to read it now.

Mr. Evarts—I also claim the right to read it as a piece of evidence which is introduced in this matter.

Mr. Beach—I object to it.

Mr. Evarts—And your Honor excludes it, and I shall take an exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes; the stenographer has the verses.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, chapter and verses. [To Mr. Beach.] Have you read it?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; it is one of the most beautiful passages in the Bible.

Mr. Evarts—That closed the interview! A. With only the ordinary courtesies of gentlemanly farewell.

Q. Now, Sir, were you ever in the house since that time that you remember? A. I don't recollect any other visit there, Sir.

LATER MEETINGS OF MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON.

Q. Under what circumstances have you met or been in the company of Mrs. Tilton since this period of December, 1870, other than those that you have already given, of course; don't repeat them? A. I don't recall but two; there may have been others; I don't at this moment recall any others; I recollect once of meeting her at Mr. Moulton's house in December of 1872, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that has been spoken of by the other witness.

The Witness—November of 1872; I met her once last Summer, 1874; I think that is the only time that I can now recall.

Q. How as to meeting her in the street, or at your church or lecture room, or anything of that kind? A. I remember to have met her twice upon the street; I do not recollect other meetings than that.

Q. And do you know at what period of time, what year or months— A. I could not tell you.

Q. —either of those were? A. No, I could not tell you. I have merely the picture in the air of meeting her, and some transient conversation, without any special impression so far as my memory is concerned.

Q. Did you accost one another and converse in the street? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For what length of time either of those interviews? A. In one case I think that I walked about a block with her; I met her on the Heights, and I think I walked out about as far as—I don't know, two blocks to Hicks-st.; she went one way and I the other; my impression is about that. In another case I was somewhere—my impression is I was going down Clinton, somewhere below or near Montague, in that vicinity, and then I walked around as far as her house, but I did not go in.

Q. Now, in connection with the Sunday-school, in the Fall of 1871, do you remember any meeting between you and her? A. Don't recall any.

Q. At the Sunday-school or— A. Don't recall any—very possible.

Q. Was it your custom to attend the Sabbath-school? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or did you occasionally attend it? A. No, Sir, except on rare festive occasions.

Q. And on no such occasion do you recall anything that passed between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. I do not recall anything, Sir; there may have been; I do not recall anything.

Q. Now, at your Friday evening meetings, do you remember any occasions in which there was any interview between yourself and Mrs. Tilton? A. I do not remember any interview, and yet I have an impression that I did meet her there; but it is only an impression, and I could not—

Q. Well do you mean an interview in which you spoke to one another? A. Nothing more than simply greetings.

Q. And on Sundays at the church? A. I don't recall meeting her to speak with her, and yet it may have happened; it was the habit in our church, both at the end of the Friday meeting and at the end of the Sabbath morning meeting, for persons having little errands with me, or little greetings, to speak; I sometimes am detained half or three-quarters of an hour, meeting from 10 to 40 or 50 persons, as it may be.

Q. Well, in these interchanges between yourself and your parishioners, do you recollect any meeting between Mrs. Tilton and yourself? A. I do not.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton ever at your house after this period of December, 1870? A. Not with my knowledge.

Q. Not seeing you at your house? A. I never have seen her there.

Mr. Beach—Does that “never” apply to the time spoken of by Mr. Evarts, or embrace all times? A. What is that?

Q. Does the word “never” apply to all times, or to—
A. No; only to this time; oh, I have seen her at my house.

Judge Neilson—You mean never since?

The Witness—I understood Mr. Evarts to limit it in time.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, the question is marked.

Mr. Beach—I did not know but there might be some misconception.

THE “CLANDESTINE CORRESPONDENCE” TAKEN UP.

Mr. Evarts—No, the only antecedent period, I believe, has been in general spoken of. [To Mr. Morris.] I ask you for Exhibits 13, 15 and 18. [Papers produced by Mr. Morris.] Mr. Beecher, look at that letter and say if you received it? A. I do not remember receiving it; I presume I did, though; it is in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting.

Mr. Evarts—This is produced by Mr. Moulton, isn't it, and handed by him to the plaintiff?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, was that letter preceded by any communication on your part? Look at the letter, please, and say whether that letter from Mrs. Tilton was preceded by any communication on your part? A. That I know nothing about; I don't recollect.

Q. Well, it is for you to say. A. I have no recollection whatever in regard to the matter.

Q. Do you remember giving it to Mr. Moulton?

Mr. Morris—What number is that?

Mr. Evarts—That is No. 12, I think.

The Witness—No. 14, I think.

Mr. Evarts—No. 14, Mr. Morris.

The Witness—I don't recollect giving it to him, Sir.

Q. Do you remember any habit or suggestion about your giving letters? A. I remember a habit, but no suggestion—

Q. What was that habit—a habit on your part? A. The habit was on my part, Sir.

Q. Of carrying to Mr. Moulton the letters that you received? A. Whatever I considered proper; I did not carry him everything, but I carried him whatever I thought in honor I had a right to carry him, and that would throw light on the situation of which he was the man in charge.

Q. And if those letters were carried to him or given—this letter that I hold in my hand, No. 14, was given to him; it was given to him in that way. Was it? A. In that way, if I gave it; probably I did.

Q. Now, Sir, please read that letter through—please read that letter through, as I wish to ask you a question.

Mr. Fullerton—What is he reading?

Mr. Evarts—Exhibit 15. [To the Witness.] Do you remember receiving that letter? A. I do.

Q. Well, Sir, do you remember what you did with that? A. I gave that to Mr. Moulton.

THE WORD “NEST-HIDING” DEFINED.

Q. Was this letter from Mrs. Tilton to you—dated May 3d, isn't it, '71? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that preceded by any communication from you to her? A. I don't recollect any, Sir—do you mean anything to which it was responsive—or any communication?

Q. Yes; anything leading to it?

Judge Neilson—Anything that would lead to it.

A. That is what I understood your question to be.

Mr. Evarts—I read this letter: [Reading.]

BROOKLYN, May 3, '71.

MR. BEECHER: My future, either for life or death, would be happier could I but feel that you forgave while you forget me—

Mr. Beach—“Forgave?”

Mr. Evarts—Yes.

Mr. Beach—It is not “forgive me.”

Mr. Evarts—No; “that you forgave while you forget me,”—“forgave” underscored.

In all the sad complications of the past year my endeavor was to entirely keep from you [underscored] all suffering; to bear myself alone, leaving you forever ignorant of it.

My weapons were love, a larger untiring generosity, and nest-hiding! [Underscored and with an exclamation mark.] That I failed utterly, we both know. But now I ask forgiveness.

This word—compound word “nest-hiding”—was it a word of any use by you, or with which you are conversant? A. No, Sir; it is not my word in any sense or way.

Q. Had it been a word used between you and Mrs. Tilton in any way before this letter? A. Not that I remembered—it was certainly not a common word.

Q. What did you understand by that word when you received this letter?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—We except, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

The Witness—I understood it to signify simply the hiding of the troubles in our household.

Mr. Beach [sub voce—That is an error in law.

The Court here took a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled and the direct examination resumed.

Mr. Evans—Mr. Morris, will you give me those letters of Mr. Beecher's?

Mr. Morris—The ones you had this morning?

Mr. Evans—Yes, Sir.

[Mr. Morris produced six exhibits.]

Q. Look at this, Mr. Beecher, if you please, and say whether you received that letter, and if the memorandum of the date of its reception is yours. [Handing witness "Exhibit 12."] A. At first I thought the memorandum of date was not, but it looks like my writing when I write very poorly.

Q. Well, you think it is? A. I think it is, Sir.

Q. And made at the time, you suppose? A. I think so, Sir.

Q. The note itself has no date? A. No, Sir.

Q. You may retain that letter. This date of March 8, 1871, Mr. Beecher, is the month following these February letters of 1871. Is it not? A. Yes, Sir.

ANOTHER LETTER READ FOR EXPLANATION.

Q. You remember the letter of Feb. 7, 1871, which was spoken of yesterday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I will read this letter which you have before you, and ask you some questions about it. [Reading.]

WEDNESDAY.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Does your heart bound toward all as it used? So does mine! I am myself again. I did not dare to tell you till I was sure; but the bird has sung in my heart these four weeks, and he has covenanted with me never again to leave. "Spring has come." Because I thought it would gladden you to know this, and not to trouble or embarrass you in any way, I now write. Of course, I should like to share with you my joy; but can wait for the Beyond!

When dear Frank says I may once again go to old Plymouth, I will thank the dear Father.

Now, Mr. Beecher, had any letter passed from you to Mrs. Tilton except that letter of the 7th of February, prior to your receiving this letter? A. None that I know of, Sir.

Q. Well, what is your recollection? A. I don't think there had any.

Q. This, then, is the first letter, so far as you know, that you received from her after that letter of yours of the 7th of February? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which has been given in evidence—sent through her husband? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, in this letter—the expressions of this letter—is there any reference which you recognized then, or now, of any special or covert meaning? A. No, Sir, I understood it perfectly then, and do now.

Q. What was your understanding of that letter then and now?

MR. BEECHER'S INTERPRETATION OF THE LETTER OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Beach—Well, we object to questions of that kind.

Mr. Fullerton—This letter is to be translated, Sir, in the light of events proved, and in no other way.

Judge Neilson—Suppose the person it was written to, understanding it in a certain way, took a certain step in reference to it; I think he might show that.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, that understanding must come from some fact, some event.

Judge Neilson—It might come from a misconception of the letter.

Mr. Beach—Well, of what consequence is that, Sir? The question is, What does this letter mean—what is its significance? Now, is that to be determined by the party-witness on the stand, who receives it, or by the jury, from the language of the letter, accompanied by such surrounding circumstances and facts as may be given in evidence?

Judge Neilson—It will have to go to the jury in that light, of course, but the question now is, How did he understand it?

Mr. Beach—What difference does it make, Sir, how he understands it? The question is how Mrs. Tilton understood it; what did she mean by the phrases she used in this letter? It is not for this gentleman to give construction to the instrument and to interpret the meaning of Mrs. Tilton or himself. It is for the jury to say what the instrument means—first, from its language, and second, from accompanying circumstances.

Judge Neilson—Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir. I do not see upon what principle, then, your Honor shall permit this witness to say how he understood this letter when he received it.

Judge Neilson—I think he may say how he understood it or misunderstood it, either, with a view to any subsequent act of his.

Mr. Beach—Ah! yes, Sir. If he had made a reply to this letter, if there was any act of his which was founded upon this letter, why it might be admissible in connection with his act or with his answer.

Judge Neilson—It is immaterial unless there is something of that kind behind.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir; unless there is something of that kind shown, Sir; and it is immaterial I submit, if your Honor please, that it is not to be received. If evidence is in itself immaterial, the proposing party must show the circumstances which render it material, before your Honor will admit it. Now, I submit, Sir, with great respect, and with great earnestness nevertheless, that this witness's understanding of that letter, giving construction to its phraseology, and imputing to Mrs. Tilton a meaning which perhaps the language itself will not communicate, is utterly inadmissible.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend overlooks the principal fact that the letter itself could not by any possibility be evidence as the mere act and meaning of Mrs. Tilton; it was only by its communication to Mr. Beecher that it comes to be in evidence at all, and its significance, as conveying intelligence to him, and his action or his reception of it, is the only point that can make evidence at all against him. Now, no doubt the letter has nothing in it but the English language, and, so far as I appreciate it, it is as innocent a letter as ever was written; but there is a proposition that there is an equivocal, a covert meaning, a reference to private yet common intelligence between Mr. Beecher and herself, that carried an expression that is inculpatory of the two parties in respect to their relations; to use the familiar phrase, that it is a letter which is to be read between the lines. Now, I propose by the party who is to be affected by such an imputation, drawn out of the fact that it bears and carries such an import, not to be treated as its innocent expressions go, that he is entitled to say whether or no there was any such meaning conveyed to his mind, or how he understood it; and your Honor, I believe, accords that right.

Mr. Beach—Not yet; he has not. Now, I disagree with counsel entirely, Sir, in the proposition that this letter becomes evidence, and significant only from the manner in which it was understood and received by the party to whom it was addressed. That is not the question, Sir. To be sure the letter, as the act of Mrs. Tilton, is only made evidence by the circumstance that it was communicated to, made known to Mr. Beecher, or addressed to and received by him, but the important question connected with the letter is, what were the sentiments of Mrs. Tilton as expressed represented in the letter, as communicated to Mr. Beecher, not how he understood it, Sir, not how he felt when he received it, but how Mrs. Tilton felt, and what were her feelings at the time, as represented in the letter. That is the important question. And now this gentleman, when he received that letter, may give any act of his. I suppose, Sir, he might give any expression of dissent or approbation which was uttered at the time he received the letter as a part of the act.

Judge Neilson—Of receiving it.

Mr. Beach—But for him as a witness to express what he understood by the language in the letter, and to give it construction and effect, I submit to your Honor is inadmissible. And perhaps the statement I have made would go so far as this, toward an admission, and perhaps it may accomplish the object of my learned friend, to say by this witness, what he felt or what he expressed in regard to the letter when it was received. I do not believe, Sir, it is evidence; I think it is a violation of principle, unless there was some overt act, some declaration at the time, connected with the act of reception; I submit there is no principle upon which his understanding of the letter can be made admissible.

Judge Neilson—Was there any act connected with this letter?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—It is suggested by my friend—which I did not remember at the time—the fact—

Mr. Fullerton—Thus far in this discussion, Sir, we have lost sight of the fact that there is an answer to this letter from Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton in evidence, and I suppose that his interpretation of that letter is to be gathered from what he wrote at the time, and not from anything that he may utter now. Your Honor will bear in mind, Sir, that immediately after giving that letter in evidence, the reply was also proved and read; and, although there is no date to the reply, yet there is an internal communication or correspondence between the two productions which shows that the one is an answer to the other.

Mr. Evarts—That only shows the greater importance of ascertaining whether this note conveyed to Mr. Beecher any covert or secret meaning.

Mr. Fullerton—My reply to that is, that his answer at the time will show how he appreciated it and how he translated it.

Mr. Evarts—That answer is in evidence; that we shall deal with when we take it up. What we understand you claim is an answer.

Mr. Fullerton—But our claim is that they should deal with it alone, in order to get at his views of what the meaning of that letter was.

Judge Neilson—Certainly; both papers ought to be taken together.

Mr. Evarts—They are in evidence, if your Honor please, and they will each be taken up by themselves, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—And now you could show by this witness what he did or said on receiving the letter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You will get at your purpose in that way.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose so, and I know no indirections in the law. If I am entitled to get at it, I am entitled to get at it explicitly and plainly—

Judge Neilson—Certainly, plainly and explicitly.

Mr. Evarts—And straightforward.

Judge Neilson—But there are different modes of doing that.

Mr. Evarts—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I have pointed out that way to my friend, in the written answer to the letter.

Mr. Evarts—How do you know that that is a written answer to the letter? It is no part of my case, by which—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I know something that is not a part of your case.

Mr. Evarts—You know what you have undertaken to say, but I know what I am going to prove.

Mr. Fullerton—And I know what I have proved.

Mr. Evarts—What you think you have proved until another comes after and searches it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, don't get too scriptural.

Judge Neilson—Well, examine him first as to his answer.

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE NOTE RECEIVED.

Mr. Evarts—I asked him, if your Honor please, whether that conveyed to him any special or covert meaning, growing out of any previous relations between them.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, if that question had not been already answered, I should object to it.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that question.

The Witness—It conveyed to me a special, but no covert meaning. It was a letter which—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; let us have a question.

Mr. Evarts—What did you understand from the expressions of that letter?

Mr. Beach—That is just what we objected to.

Judge Neilson—There we come to the question of the construction of the English language, which you can judge of as well as the witness.

Mr. Evarts—I don't ask him what a word meant; I only ask him what the expressions of the letter meant in reference to subjects between them.

Judge Neilson—I rule it out, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Show the situation, and we can tell what it meant as well as he.

Judge Neilson—You have the vital thing.

Mr. Evarts—The imputation is made—

Judge Neilson—Well, now that imputation is denied by the witness. He says he understood no covert suggestion by that letter.

Mr. Evarts—An imputation is made of a meaning—

Judge Neilson—You can ask him then as to the imputation.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I ask him what meaning that letter conveyed to him.

Judge Neilson—He answered the last question, that it contained no covert meaning.

Mr. Evarts—Now, an imputation cannot be made and then withdrawn; we have a right to the meaning.

Judge Neilson—No doubt about that. Now, I needn't be told that.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I am arguing; I am arguing, Sir, not ad hominem; I am arguing points of evidence.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you have anything to complain of. You shall have my decisions without extorting them, demanding them, in a tone of complaint; I simply say this, that I think on the naked question of construction or meaning of the English language, and words, whether taken singly or collectively, you are to judge as well as the witness.

Mr. Evarts—That I agree.

Judge Neilson—Now, he says there was no covert meaning conveyed to him by that letter.

Q. Do any expressions of this letter, Mr. Beecher, refer to any matter of private intelligence between yourself and Mrs. Tilton? A. They do.

Q. Which are they? A. The whole letter.

Q. What? A. That she was—that the efforts made for—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir, if you please. I object to it.

Q. What were those matters?

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

Mr. Beach—What the letter referred to?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; what those matters of private intelligence between him and her were.

Mr. Beach—Is n't it the proper way to get that, Sir, and the only way to get it, to use the common phrase, to show the surrounding circumstances out of which the letter arose, and then leave the Court and the jury to render the letter with reference to this explanatory evidence?

Judge Neilson—In one sense he is doing that now.

Mr. Beach—Why, no, Sir, it is not. We have got no proof of any facts or circumstances giving a particular significance to this letter. Nothing is stated of that kind by the witness. It is very easy, if there is any special relation or special fact connected with the writing of this letter, to prove it; and with the letter and with that fact, it is within the competency of the Court and jury to give significance to the writing; and it is only in that way, and not by taking the judgment or opinion of this witness in regard to the meaning of these words.

Judge Neilson—That is an inquiry into the very circumstances you suggest, I think.

Mr. Evarts—So intended to be.

Judge Neilson—Will the stenographer read the last question?

The Tribune stenographer read the last question.

Judge Neilson—What were those matters, Mr. Beecher?

The Witness—There had been formal efforts made by Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, and myself to bring about a more wholesome state of feeling in the household. About four weeks had elapsed; I received this, the first letter from Mrs. Tilton, announcing the change that had taken place in her feeling. When Mr. Moulton returned from the South, I took the letter to him, and talked to him about the letter as indicating that there was a very happy state of things now existing, as the result of his pioneering efforts.

Q. Did you make any answer to that letter? A. I do not remember that I did, Sir.

Q. This last clause of the letter, Mr. Beecher, have you got it before you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. [Reading.] "When dear Frank says I may once again go to old Plymouth, I will thank the dear Father—" What did you know or understand about anything between Frank and herself? A. I did not know anything about it; that was their own business, that I do not recollect was communicated to me at all.

Q. Except in this letter? A. Yes; I saw there was something, but I did not know what it was.

Q. You were not a party to it? Did you speak to Mr. Moulton upon that clause of the letter? A. I do not recollect, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, this memorandum of yours—it is the same one? A. Same one; yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Beach]—It is the one that he offered to show you.

The Witness—It is a mere memorandum of the date and events, and of the years; I have likewise here the printed letters and documents that I may be supposed to be questioned upon.

Q. These are— A. These are printed documents and letters.

Q. That are in the case?

Mr. Beach [after inspecting the memoranda]—Well, Sir, I find, as I supposed, that this is something more than dates, and that it contains subjects classified and arranged, suggestions of subject-matter to be spoken under particular heads, and I think it is incompetent as a memorandum.

Mr. Evarts—How can it be incompetent?

Mr. Beach—Because it is not competent for the witness to reduce his testimony to writing, either in whole or in part.

Mr. Evarts—This is the paper that was spoken of at the outset, and offered to your inspection.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir; from delicacy I declined to inspect it, but when I began to think there was something in it of substance, I made an inquiry of Mr. Evarts in regard to it.

Mr. Evarts—Certainly, there is not any objection.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness can use it; it may be too full a memorandum, but yet I think—

Mr. Beach—Sir!

Judge Neilson—It may be too full for a memorandum, but I think he can use it.

Mr. Beach—Do you think he can use it if it is too full for a memorandum?

Judge Neilson—If he requires it; I think yes; he may use it for dates and such matters.

THE "TRUE INWARDNESS" LETTER EXPLAINED.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Please look at No. 13, which is a letter of yours; this passage: "I am now at home here with my sister"—does that refer to the period at which Mrs. Perkins was your housekeeper in your wife's absence? A. It does, Sir.

Q. Was that letter written during that period? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the period at which Mrs. Perkins was at your house—she has testified to it? A. She was with me two Winter seasons, or Winter and Spring seasons, and I think they were of 1862 and '63.

Mr. Fullerton—"72?"

The Witness—I meant—I beg your pardon.

Q. One of them, 1872 and 1873; and was the other one 1871-2? A. If I recollect right, though I am not prepared to state positively, but my impression is that she was with me in the Spring of 1872 and in the Spring of 1873.

Q. Very well, and not in the Spring of 1871? A. That is my impression—not.

Q. Well, it is in evidence; the evidence is explicit as to the times. A. Well, that is somebody else's evidence.

Q. Well, during this period of the interviews of the early Winter and Spring of 1871, between you and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, was your sister then your housekeeper? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, now this letter, then, that you have in your hand must have been written in 1872 or 1873?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is argument, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is an appeal to his memory.

Mr. Fullerton—But you say, "Then it must have been."

Mr. Evarts—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is passing an opinion upon the evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I do, upon the contents of the letter.

Mr. Fullerton—No, you may ask him—

Mr. Evarts—He writes in it, and he says, "I am here at home with my sister;" it was written during that residence of his sister as his housekeeper.

Judge Neilson—And then you make a remark which the counsel thinks might be the subject of question.

Mr. Evarts—Well, was it in '72 or '73 that that letter was written? A. In '72, Sir.

Mr. Beach—It might be the end of '71!

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beach suggests it might possibly be the very end of 1871; how is that? What are the dates of Mrs. Perkins's—

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Perkins was there from December, '71, until April, '72, and from January, 1873, to April, 1873, so stated, and these are the only periods when she was there.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I suppose that last is of no consequence.

Mr. Shearman—That was during the absence of Mrs. Beecher at the South.

Mr. Evarts—Has this letter which I have here any relation to that letter of Mrs. Tilton's to you of March 8, 1871? A. No, Sir, none.

Q. No connection?

Mr. Beach—Which is March 8?

Mr. Evarts—The one that has just been read.

Mr. Beach—No. 12.

Mr. Shearman—"Exhibit No. 12."

Mr. Evarts—This is not then an answer to that letter? A. It is not.

Mr. Evarts—I will read this letter, and ask some questions concerning it. [Reading.]

The blessing of God rest upon you! Every spark of light and warmth in your own house will be a star and a sun in my dwelling. Your note broke like Spring upon Winter, and gave me an inward rebound toward life. No one can ever know—none but God—through what a dreary wilderness I have wandered! There was Mount Sinai, there was the barren sand, there was the alternation of hope and despair that marked the pilgrimage of old. If only it might lead to the Promised Land!—or, like Moses, shall I die on the border? Your hope and courage are like medicine. Should God inspire you to restore and rebuild at home, and while doing it to cheer and sustain outside of it another who sorely needs help in heart and spirit, it will prove a life so noble as few are able to live! and, in another world, the emancipated soul may utter thanks!

If it would be a comfort to you, now and then, to send me a letter of true inwardness—the outcome of your inner life—it would be safe, for I am now at home here with my sister; and it is permitted to you, and it will be an exceeding refreshment to me, for your heart experiences are often like bread from heaven to the hungry. God has enriched your moral nature. May not others partake?

To what relation and situation between yourself and Mrs. Tilton and her family did that letter relate?

Mr. Beach—We object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—And I except.

The Witness—To that disturbed condition which Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton and I attempted to restore to order and to harmony again; that want of confidence between husband and wife which I thought I had been the occasion of impairing, and which I labored assiduously to restore, and encouraged her as her pastor, as well as friend, to use every endeavor within the compass of human nature to restore as the bright and particular object of her life.

Mr. Evarts—Now, there are—

Mr. Beach—One moment—no. [As if reflecting.] Very well; go on.

Mr. Evarts—Now, in the latter part of that letter, Mr. Beecher, there is a word underscored—"to send me a letter of true inwardness"—was there any special or conventional meaning of that word, as between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. There was a very special meaning in it on my part, but no conventional or understood meaning between us; I did not want to encourage her in the slightest degree—

Mr. Beach—Well, I object to that.

Mr. Evarts—We won't take it in that way—what special meaning did you— A. That she should write to me about her religious experiences to the exclusion of every other.

Q. As distinguished from her external circumstances? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, there is another phrase here: "true inwardness—the outcome of your inner life"—"it would be safe, for I am now at home here with my sister, and it is permitted to you," being underscored "permitted to you?" A. The permission was simply a reference to the fact that in—that by our past agreements, and by the understanding of all parties, there was—there need not be any hindrance to our social relations.

Q. This was subsequent to the interview you have given in February— A. That was in February, 1871, and this is in February, 1872.

Q. Now, on the subject of being safe, in what sense of safety did you use that expression? A. Well, Sir, when a woman is invited to pour out her innermost thoughts on religious subjects, it is—she has a right to the knowledge that it shall not be shown; it was to be one of those letters that I would not take to Moulton; there were several that I never did take to him, that I regarded—

Mr. Beach—This is not within the line of the inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—Well, this last observation. In that privacy—in that sense of privacy was the word "safe" used? A. Certainly.

Q. Can you now remember, Mr. Beecher, whether or not this letter was written subsequent to an interview which has been spoken of in Mr. Tilton's testimony—an interview which you had with him in the cars at Springfield? A. Well, I could not—I don't know that I could identify it in any such way.

Q. In January, 1872? A. January, 1872; I don't know that I could identify it in any such way.

Q. Well, you remember that you had an interview with him in the cars? A. Distinctly.

Q. And the date of that has been fixed, I think, by Mr. Tilton or by a letter? A. But there is no date to this, and I—

Q. No date to that, but this is while your sister was in your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you, or not, recall whether or no that letter was written in that Winter 1872, subsequent to your interview with Mr. Tilton in the cars or not? A. I cannot recollect anything about that, Sir.

Q. Do you know how early in the Winter of 1872 your wife left your house? A. No, Sir, I cannot recall it.

Q. Did she leave as early as the beginning of January to go South? A. I could not say, Sir; it varied in different years, and I have not looked to the point at all; I could very easily ascertain, if you thought it was important.

MR. BEECHER'S LETTER OF CONDOLENCE.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; that we can recall by some reference as to the date. [To plaintiff's counsel.] Have you that other letter of Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—Give us the date.

Mr. Evarts—January 20, 1872. [Paper produced.]

Mr. Morris—18 is the one you refer to.

Mr. Evarts—Please look at that letter.

The Witness—Do you wish this to be kept?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Mr. Morris, I will give you back that one. [To the witness.] Do you remember writing this letter, Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, I have a general recollection of it.

Q. I read it, as I wish to ask you some questions; it is dated the 20th of January, 1872, and commences with a quotation. [Reading.]

Now, may the God of Peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will, working in you that which is well pleasing in His sight, through Jesus Christ.

This is my prayer day and night. This world ceases to hold me as it did. I live in the thought and hope of the coming immortality, and seem to myself most of the time to be standing on the edge of the other life, wondering whether I may not at any hour hear the call, "Come up hither!"

I shall be in New-Haven next week, to begin my course of lectures to the theological classes on preaching.

Mr. Beach—Theological class or classes?

Mr. Evarts—Classes it is here.

My wife takes boat for Havana and Florida on Thursday.

I called on Monday, but you were out. I hope you are gaining strength, growing stronger and happier. May the dear Lord and Savior abide with you.

Very truly yours, H. W. BEECHER.

Q. Do you now see the time, or about the time, at which your wife left for the South? A. I do.

Q. So that the former letter, to which your attention was just called, was written after that date where you speak of your sister—being at home with your sister? A. Well, it would depend on whether my sister—oh! it must have been.

Q. Well, it is for you to say. A. I say now; I beg your pardon.

Q. Now, Sir, here is a slip of paper that has been put in evidence—No. 21; you see that slip of paper? A. I do.

Q. That is your writing? A. Yes, Sir; that is my writing.

Q. Now, by memory, or in any other way, can you connect that slip or memorandum with any other letter, or as being inclosed in any other letter, or what not? A. I do not remember any.

Q. It does not connect itself in your mind or memory with any other communication? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, will you state on what occasion, or under what circumstances, that letter of yours [showing witness letter]—it is the same letter which I have just read aloud to the jury—was written? A. Yes, Sir; why, I don't understand what you mean exactly, Sir; you mean what object—

Q. What occasion or circumstances in the family of Mrs. Tilton, or Mr. Tilton, had occurred? A. The death of his brother, Sir, had occurred not far from that time.

Q. The death of what? A. The death of Mr. Tilton's brother, I think, had occurred not far from that time.

Q. At their house? A. At their house, I understand, Sir; I did not attend the funeral.

Mr. Beach—Does he mean to say that this letter was written in reference to that circumstance?

The Witness—No; only it was with that—during that period.

Mr. Beach—I understood him to say that that circumstance gave rise to the letter.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that had just happened? A. That had just happened.

Q. In the household of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes; not within days, perhaps, but it was within that near time.

Q. Well, within what time? A. I cannot say, Sir.

Q. Was it very near in date? A. Well, I should say within a week or a fortnight.

Q. Well, in near proximity. Now, looking at that letter, do you recall any special circumstances to which that refers, which led to the writing of that quotation and the residue of the letter? A. Well, that was a letter written, as near as I can recollect, Sir, in furtherance of the same line of conversation that I have spoken of again and again and again, to keep heart and courage in Mrs. Tilton, and from time to time to let her know that I thought of her and prayed for her, and was looking to see the good fruit of her own endeavor; this was written on Saturday, and I was going to be gone week after week right straight along, and I wrote to tell her that I had called to see her—

Mr. Beach—I submit, Sir—

Mr. Evarts—Well, you did tell her that you had called to see her? A. That is in the letter.

Q. So stated in the letter? A. That is in the letter.

Q. Well, that speaks for itself, of course. Did you know, at the time of writing this letter, of the care and attention that Mrs. Tilton had given to the nursing of Mr. Tilton's brother? A. I did.

Q. You had been informed of that? A. I had.

Mr. Beach—How informed?

Mr. Evarts—How had you learned of that? A. I had learned it from Mrs. Morse, principally.

Q. But you had heard of it? A. I had heard of it.

Q. Was it a prolonged illness and nursing? A. I cannot say about that, Sir, definitely, but I remember his being a very feeble person, from—in and out. I had seen him there for years before, from time to time, and knew him to be a very delicate and feeble person, and I heard of his being in the hospital, or in the retreat, and I heard of his death, and I heard also of Mrs. Tilton's great kindness to him.

Q. Now you had called upon her, had you? A. When this letter was written?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; called at her house.

Q. And did not see her? A. I did not see her; she was out, as was said.

Q. Now, you have said that you were to leave town for a considerable absence? A. It was to be an absence that would run until Spring, taking out the heart of each week.

Q. It was a prolonged occupation of certain days of the week? A. I had twelve lectures to deliver at New-Haven, week by week.

Q. Now, there is a reference to your wife's leaving for Havana; was there any special occasion or purpose in mentioning that?

Mr. Beach—I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It has been made the subject of intimation here that there was a special occasion and purpose.

Judge Neilson—That fact could not have been the subject of any imputation, the mere circumstance that Mrs. Beecher left for Havana.

Mr. Evarts—I should think not; I should think not; but I cannot say what the imaginations of some parties here may lead them to.

Judge Neilson—He may state if that was the fact, that she was to leave.

The Witness—She was to leave.

Mr. Evarts—The imputation has been, if your Honor please, that this was an advertisement to Mrs. Tilton that it would be safe for her to make visits to his house, because his wife would be absent.

Judge Neilson—That would leave the event of Mrs. Beecher's going a clean, simple fact, nevertheless.

Mr. Evarts—That is the length and breadth of the imputation that has been made, and I ask him the distinct question whether that statement was made with any special purpose or intent.

Mr. Beach—And that is objected to because that is to be derived from the language of the letter.

Mr. Evarts—I think not. I do not see how the language of the letter—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, take the extreme instance, that Mr. Beecher had written a note in direct terms to Mrs. Tilton, inviting her to visit his house, for the reason that it would be safe, his wife being absent—can he come forward and deny the language of the letter by saying what his purpose or intent was, and are we not to derive that from his declarations and acts made at the time and not from any construction he may choose to place upon the language now?

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please. If the language has no possible application other than its own terms, then any statement concerning it will not vary it, and is not to be introduced. But when, in a letter from a gentleman to a lady, a statement of a domestic fact, and a fact of entire publicity, that Mrs. Beecher was to leave at a certain time, is brought into the seriousness of the trial for the purpose of making an imputation that it was advance information to cover an assignation, and the party who wrote it is on the stand, why then it is competent by every rule of evidence to show that he had no such meaning.

Judge Neilson—You could inquire for that last circumstance, certainly—that last circumstance.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and I ask your Honor's attention to this case of Michie against the Burlington Insurance Company, where, in a very intelligent opinion, the Supreme Court of Iowa says:

In his evidence, while admitting the statement of facts in the affidavit, he states the understanding he had of its language, and the idea he intended to convey in it. This is certainly not objectionable. If the language of the witness, either written or oral, is introduced to establish an admission, he has the privilege of giving his understanding of its import, and of stating its true meaning in the connection as used by him.

Judge Neilson—We have been doing that to-day in the other matters.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; we have been doing a great deal more than that. The question reaches much further than that.

Mr. Evarts—That is all that I have ever claimed, as I understand it. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Beecher, in this announcement of the fact of the proposed date of your wife's departure, was there any interest or purpose in respect of any visits of Mrs. Tilton? A. None whatever.

Q. And as a matter of fact was she at your house thereafter? A. No, Sir; she was not.

A NOTE APPOINTING A MEETING EXPLAINED.

Q. [Handing the witness a paper.] That little note refers to your seeing Mrs. Tilton "next Friday" if you "don't see her to-morrow." A. [Reading.] "If I don't see you to-morrow night, I will next Friday."

Q. Now can you, from that memorandum, recall any circumstance or date, or day of the week, on which that was written? A. I cannot fix it as to time definitely. I recollect the circumstance. I know Mrs. Tilton wished to see me about her mother, or some other matter, and I dropped this hasty note to say that if I did not see her on Friday night, I would the next Friday night.

Q. Yes. Well, the first Friday night mentioned was a future Friday night? A. Was to-morrow.

Q. So that your view is that that note was written on a Thursday? A. On a Thursday. I know there was such an occurrence, and I suppose this to be the note referring to it.

Q. And where on "Friday next" would you have seen her? A. In the lecture-room or after the lecture.

Q. Is that the reference to Friday night? A. That is what I understand it, Sir.

Q. Well, at that time, as now, Friday night was the regular lecture or prayer-meeting night? A. Yes, Sir; it never has been any other. It is the regular prayer-meeting night, and it is the night of errands, incidents, and so on, at the close.

Q. Now, what is the habit of these interchanges between you, as pastor, and those of your congregation who present themselves; is there any privacy about it? A. No, Sir; that all takes place in the front, in the cluster of people.

Q. In the public room? A. Always.

Q. And in the presence of such as are there? A. Yes, Sir. They stop, from twenty to fifty, or sometimes a hundred of them, but generally there were from ten to twenty little errands or engagements of people that want to see me and ask what day they can call; other persons to know if I can attend a baptism, or if I have received a note, or if I will come out to tea, and a thousand little things of that kind. I am out of town so much that it is difficult to get at me.

HOW MRS. MORSE CAME TO CALL MR. BEECHER "SON."

Q. Please look at this letter, a letter from Mrs. Morse of Oct. 21, 1871 [Exhibit 40], and say if you remember receiving it and delivering it to Mr. Moulton? A. Is it in '71?

Q. October 21, 1871, seems to be the date. A. This is her handwriting. If you will allow me to read it rather in print, it is so much easier? A. Yes; you can turn to it.

Q. The date seems to be— A. Conjectural.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it seems to have been fixed in some way, satisfactory to all of us, I suppose.

Mr. Morris—It was at the time.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, at the time. Oh, it is dated October 24, and the year only is wanting.

Mr. Morris—Yes; and the year was fixed with reference to other circumstances.

Mr. Evarts—Have you it before you in print? A. I have it, Sir.

Q. Well, at the very end of it she says: "Do you know, I think it strange you should ask me to call you 'son'?" Do you remember anything that passed between you and Mrs. Morse, before this letter was written, to which that refers? A. Yes, Sir; I do.

Q. What was that? A. A conversation that I had with her at a wedding. She was under a great deal of feeling, and felt that she was—

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Q. Well, she said something to you about her feelings? A. She did.

Mr. Beach—Well!

Mr. Evarts—It certainly is quite competent for us to show what passed between him and Mrs. Morse which led to that expression of hers, that she "thought it strange," &c.

Judge Neilson—Well, if the witness answers generally that it was an interview between himself and Mrs. Morse that led to this expression, would it be necessary then to take the conversation?

Mr. Evarts—To show what it related to. They introduced the letter for nothing else but this, to show that this entanglement or imbroglio in this family was in some way brought in, and that it gave rise to this. Now I only want to know what it was.

Judge Neilson—Well, the witness answers that it refers to an interview at a wedding. Now proceed.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what arose between you and Mrs. Morse? A. It was simply that she had no counselor, no one that she could go to—she could not go to her daughter even, and I said, "Take counsel of me as if I was your son." It was a complimentary and courteous statement, made offhand, without any consideration but that of kindness, but she seized upon it and—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Beach—One moment.

Judge Neilson [to the Witness]—Well, you understand that to be the origin of that expression between you and Mrs. Morse? A. Yes, Sir; that was the origin of it.

Mr. Evarts—What wedding was this? A. I cannot say.

Q. Do you remember whether it was Miss Bradshaw's wedding? A. I am disinclined to think it was. I thought it was at first, but I think not now, Sir.

Q. Well, you cannot fix it otherwise? A. It may have been that wedding.

Q. It may have been Miss Bradshaw's? A. Yes, Sir; but I cannot affirm it at present.

Q. You say Mrs. Morse spoke of trouble, and of having no counselor—you have intimated that. What trouble was it that she referred to? A. Trouble in the family of her daughter, and her own troubles came up also, in relation to support, and what not.

Q. Was it a question of pecuniary—were they matters of pecuniary consideration that she was referring to? A. It was only in part that, Sir—

Q. Well, that gave origin to the phrase used by you to her concerning which she writes to you?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—So far as you know?

The Witness—So far as I know.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the letter speaks of his having—says: "Do you know I think it is strange that you should ask me to call you son?"

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Morris—Yes, that is quite a different thing.

Judge Nelson—The witness now accounts for it.

Mr. Everts—That is all of that letter. [To the witness.] Did you at any time ever ask her to call you "son" in any other way than you have now stated—to counsel with you? A. No, Sir.

THE TROUBLE CAUSED BY THE WOODHULL CARD.

Q. Mr. Beecher, do you remember in May, 1871, or thereabouts, anything arising in reference to a card of Mrs. Woodhull that had appeared in some of the New-York papers? A. I do.

Q. How was that brought to your notice, and by whom? A. I don't know, Sir; I saw it in the paper.

Q. You saw it yourself in the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About the time that it appeared? A. Within a day or two.

Q. Now, when did it come to be a matter of conference between you and Mr. Moulton, or you and Mr. Tilton? A. I think—well, within a few days—within a day or two—I have an impression the day following, but I cannot say quite certainly.

Q. Now, what occurred between you and Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton, or both of them, consequent upon the appearance of this card? A. The only thing I recollect was an interview with Mr. Tilton a day or two afterward, in which he gave me an account of his visit to Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Well, state how he described that interview. A. Well, Sir, he said that as soon as he saw that card he was satisfied that it had reference to him and his household, and he determined that he would go right down himself personally, and, if possible, put a stop to that matter that it portended; he said that he prepared himself that he might see her at his best; he gave me an account, therefore, of how he got himself up, and went down and met Mrs. Woodhull, and asked if it was Mrs. Woodhull; she said it was; he told her who he was, and he proceeded to say that he had seen a card in the morning papers, and wished to ask whether that card referred to him and his family, and that she said it did; and then he said he never in his life brought to bear on any human being such an amount of personal influence as he did upon her; he was determined that he would carry her with him by his influence, and that after some considerable conversation he succeeded, and when he left it was with the understanding that all proceedings in the direction that were offensive to him of that kind should be adjourned or terminate—I don't know exactly which. That was the substance of the statement that he made to me.

Q. Did he mention any argument or inducement in regard to his own position in reference to her views that he had used with her? A. He did; he told me that he reproached her for attempting to make war on him, inasmuch as he, like her, was a sufferer from proclaiming substantially the same ideas of social philosophy and of divorce as she did. I didn't understand him to say the same full theories of social reorganization, but the same substantial theories of the liberty of the individual, and of divorce.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton ever give you any other account of any interview or visit to Mrs. Woodhull on this score, on this subject, than that that you have now given? A. You mean relating to that card?

Q. Relating to that card, or to an interview that he had had with Mrs. Woodhull in reference to that card? A. I don't recall any other.

Q. Did he tell you at any time that when he visited Mrs. Woodhull on the subject of the card that she turned to him after he had read the paper and asked him: "Do you know, Sir, to whom I refer in that card?" I said to him that I replied in a cavalier way, "How can I tell to whom you refer in a blind card like this?" I told him that she had then said, "I refer, Sir, to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and your wife." Did he give you a narrative of that kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor resembling it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he say to you that when she said that to him that this announcement filled him (Tilton) with astonishment, and that "Mrs. Woodhull instantly said to me: 'I read, Sir, by the expression on your face, that my charge is true.'" A. He never said anything of that kind to me.

Q. Did he then say to you this, or its equivalent: "I told him that I could not remember in what words I had met and endeavored to throw off her accusation; that she instantly followed it up with a recital in vehement terms, in most excited manner, of a dozen or twenty particulars, extravagant and violent, all of which, or a portion of it, she afterward gathered together in the card of November the 2d, 1872." A. No, Sir; he went into no such details with me at all.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Tilton says that the last statement, of course, that "she afterward gathered together in a card of November the 2d, 1872," was not a statement that was then made, but was a description of what she had told him. I will qualify my question. [To the witness.] Now, did Mr. Tilton on this occasion give you this narrative as having been told him by Mrs. Woodhull: "The substance of the story which she told me was that there had been a criminal relationship between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton."

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Mr. Everts—Why?

Mr. Morris—That is what Mr. Tilton testified to—conversations that he had with Mrs. Woodhull. He didn't testify he repeated that to Mr. Beecher. All that line of questions you have been putting is improper.

Mr. Everts—The previous one is not open to that objection.

Mr. Morris—Certainly; the same objection applies to them all.

Mr. Evarts—I will read it to you: “I told him that I had read it with a shudder, and that as soon as I had finished the reading of it and laid down the paper, she turned upon me and asked: ‘Do you know, Sir, to whom I refer in this card!’” every word said to have been stated by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher. Now, I will call your attention to this. I suppose this was all stated to Mr. Beecher. It came in under the motion that it was what was said to Mr. Beecher. “I told Mr. Beecher that I had left Mrs. Woodhull’s to go to Mr. Moulton—”

Judge Neilson—It is not the intention to take any evidence of conversations between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull.

Mr. Evarts—No; that is very plain.

Judge Neilson—That is an independent conversation. How any part of it got on the minutes, I don’t know.

Mr. Evarts—I am entitled to ask whether he did say it to him.

Judge Neilson—If you have got it there.

Mr. Evarts—And if the real intent of it is that he did not go, there is no harm. [To the witness.] Q. Did Mr. Tilton repeat to you, as of an interview, or the interview he had with Mrs. Woodhull, this, or anything like it:

The substance of the story which she told me was that there had been a criminal relationship between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; that Mrs. Tilton had confessed it on her door-steps, I believe, to Mrs. Davis of Providence, and to other persons; and that when I had received the intelligence from her, I had used some violence upon her; that I had taken her down to Greenwood Cemetery, and, in the presence of the graves of her children, stripped her hand of the wedding-ring which I had once put there, and trampled it with my heel into the sod of the grave of one of her children; that I had become a drunkard in consequence of that calamity, and had on numerous occasions struck my wife; that I had kicked her during pregnancy; that I had in every way vilified and abused her; that I had brought this crime to the attention of Mr. Beecher through Mr. Moulton, and that he had gone down—he, Mr. Moulton, had gone down—to Mr. Beecher, and with a pistol pointed at his head or breast, had demanded back some papers at the peril of his life. She went on in that strain. I will not undertake to give all the particulars, but as I said before, I may repeat that I saw them afterwards gathered together in the article of November 2, 1872.

Now, in his account to you of his interview with Mrs. Woodhull, did he give you a narrative of that kind? A. He could not.

Mr. Morris—One moment. Now, Mr. Evarts, does Mr. Tilton say he related that to Mr. Beecher? He denied it.

Mr. Evarts—I don’t say he did.

Mr. Morris—We object to it, then.

Mr. Evarts—You draw the distinction, but we let it in on the idea that you were showing it.

Mr. Morris—I object to it.

Mr. Evarts—There was no other point of view in which you had a right to introduce it.

Mr. Morris—[To Judge Neilson.] My recollection on the subject is that Mr. Tilton related no such interview to Mr. Beecher as has been related by Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher’s recollection will confirm it, perhaps.

The Witness—That is my recollection.

Mr. Morris—One moment. My point is that Mr. Tilton didn’t testify he related any such interview. That is the point of the objection.

Judge Neilson—If that is so, it would be a good objection.

Mr. Evarts—That is a matter to be debated hereafter.

Mr. Morris—No, it is to be settled now.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor understands that it is suggested to the counsel that except in that light there was no propriety in introducing it.

Judge Neilson—I don’t know how it came on the minutes.

Mr. Morris—We deny that Mr. Tilton said he testified so to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—It is right in the general narrative, preceded by what he stated and followed by what he said. It is his answer to a general question: “What occurred on that occasion?”

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps it had no more business there than Jonah had.

Mr. Evarts [Reading]—“Please state what occurred on that occasion?” That is of your interview with Mr. Beecher, and not of your interview with Mrs. Woodhull.

Judge Neilson—I am very clear we didn’t intend to receive evidence of any conversation between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Judge Neilson—I don’t recollect this that has just been read, though it may have been a part of what he said he told Mr. Beecher. That ought to be ascertained in some form.

Mr. Evarts—We understand it is all in under this question: “Please state what occurred on that occasion,” which was an interview between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, in the presence of Mr. Moulton.

Judge Neilson—Well, you take the answer subject to the correction. It is to be struck out if you find it is wrong.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose that is the proper way. Then the plaintiff’s evidence ought to be struck out.

Mr. Beach—I guess not.

Judge Neilson—We will make that correction as called for.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach]—Why not?

Mr. Beach—Because you cannot strike out evidence in that way. The Court has no power to do so.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading.]

I told Mr. Beecher that I had left Mrs. Woodhull to go to Mr. Moulton; that I had informed Mr. Moulton, briefly and hurriedly, of that strange interview; that Mr. Moulton had instantly said the woman must be crazy; she must be or Mr. Moulton, or both, with your knowledge, in regard to Mrs. Woodhull? A. None whatever; I had nothing to do with that woman, except so far as she intruded herself upon me, and so far as concerned me in it, to listen to her eulogies at the hands of Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton. She never in any way whatever, by my counsel, was brought into this matter, nor did I in any way whatever propose any counsel, method, mode, machinery, or anything else for the use of her.

Mr. Beecher

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, this is stated by Mr. Tilton to have occurred in an interview between you and him:

Mr. Moulton said that his method was—his proposition was—to treat her with kindness, do some service for her, put her under some obligation to us. Mr. Beecher said that he would very cheerfully coöperate in that plan, and he thought it was the best and the only plan. He asked me (that is, Mr. Tilton) if I would coöperate. I said I would; and we agreed, as part of the method by which we should deal with Mrs. Woodhull, that we would become personally acquainted with her.

A. No, Sir; that is false. In explanation of their conduct, they told me that they thought the way to deal with her was to lay her under obligations to them, and they did ask me on one occasion if I would not co-operate, and I absolutely refused to have anything to do with her.

Q. Now, at this interview, did anything of this kind occur:

We agreed, also, that as she was a woman we would put her under the restraint of womanly acquaintanceship; in other words, that she should make Mrs. Tilton's acquaintance and Mrs. Moulton's. Mr. Beecher said it was impossible for him to do anything in that regard with Mrs. Beecher; that she would never make any alliance with him to any such ends; she was a hard woman to get along with, and she must be left out of that.

Did any such conversation about your respective wives take place? A. No, Sir; the only consultation of which that is true in any degree was the fact that after some considerable time Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton told me that they regarded her as one of the most extraordinary women that they had ever met, and that, surrounded as she was by bad influences, she acted from the lower plane of her nature, that if she could be put in communication with the upper influences of life, and her noble nature appealed to, they thought she would lead a revolution in the times in which she lived, and their eulogies were simply extravagant of her. I never counseled her association with Elizabeth Tilton nor with Emma Moulton—a world too good. I never thought of her coming to my house.

Q. Did you express this feeling or opinion to Mr. Tilton:

Mr. Beecher told me that he hoped that the two ladies (referring to Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Moulton) would be able, with our help, to hold Mrs. Woodhull under kindly obligations to us, and that he hoped that neither of them would make any objection to her coming either to my house or to Mrs. Moulton's.

SIXTIETH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

VARIOUS LETTERS EXPLAINED.

THE ACQUAINTANCE AND RELATIONS WITH MRS. WOODHULL.—MR. BEECHER'S COMMENTS ON "SIR MARMADUKE'S MUSINGS"—THE EFFORT TO RESTORE MR. TILTON TO THE CHURCH—THE "RAGGED EDGE LETTER" EXPLAINED.—MR. BOWEN'S CHARGES UNKNOWN TO MR. BEECHER WHEN HE SIGNED THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

WEDNESDAY, April 8, 1875.

Resuming his explanations of the personal relations of Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton, and himself with Mrs. Woodhull, Mr. Beecher testified that his refusal to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting was positive, and that Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton both knew it to be absolute. His relations with her were not cordial, he did not agree with her social views and told her so, and refused positively to invite her to his house, although Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton received her at their homes. The relations of the last-named gentlemen and the wife of Mr. Moulton with Mrs. Woodhull were, on the contrary, intimate and affectionate; and on one occasion, at a dinner at Mr. Moulton's house, he had seen all three welcome Mrs. Woodhull with a kiss.

The poem by Mr. Tilton called "Sir Marmaduke's Musings" was next taken up, and Mr. Beecher testified that on seeing it in print he had expressed to Mr. Moulton his indignation at its publication, calling it "a dastardly thing," and declaring that it was "an ill bird that fouls its own nest." Mr. Beecher subsequently denied having said to Mr. Moulton, as alleged by the latter, "that it almost broke his heart to read it," and that he "considered it as virtually a telling of the story of himself and Elizabeth." He explained that he had said that it broke his heart to have such things said, "bringing Elizabeth's name out in such a way before the world; for it was an arrow shot at her."

Mr. Beecher's efforts to induce Mr. Tilton to return to Plymouth Church and the latter's refusal were next explained. After describing the interview, Mr. Beecher's attention was called to several statements in Mr. Tilton's testimony, and without exception he denied their correctness. In one instance Mr. Beecher, who had answered all the previous questions calmly, added emphasis by saying, "Never—purely imaginative—the whole;" and in another he varied the form by saying, "I know he did not say that." In effect, all of Mr. Tilton's declarations as to the details of that interview were called in question.

In narrating the particulars of an interview in the cars with Mr. Tilton in January, 1873, Mr. Beecher examined in the same way, used almost the same language employed by Mr. Tilton (except in a few instances), but the meaning given to the words as interpreted by Mr. Beecher was totally different from that ascribed to them by Mr. Tilton. Mr. Tilton had sworn, among other things, that Mr. Beecher had reproached him for publishing the poem, "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," but Mr. Beecher declared to-day that he had never spoken to Mr. Tilton on that subject.

THE "RAGGED EDGE" LETTER.

There was a decided sensation in court when Mr. Evarts called upon the plaintiff's counsel to produce the letter of Feb. 5, 1872, for many of those present knew that to be the date of the document which has come to be known as the "ragged edge" letter, and which all have looked upon as probably the most difficult to explain. It is the desponding letter in which Mr. Beecher refers to his "great year of sorrow," to "the Church, the newspaper, the book," to "suffering the torments of the damned," to his living on "the sharp and ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, fear, despair," and "of his being alone," if Mr. Moulton ceased to love and trust him. Mr. Beecher began his task by narrating circumstances which occurring on Saturday had reduced him to a state of extraordinary but not unusual depression, for it seems, according to his testimony, that the enthusiasm which accompanies Sunday's work is always followed by a reaction on Monday, and that his spirits on that day are always low and his moods despondent. But on this occasion he was still more depressed, from the fact that on the previous Saturday he had been reproached by Mr. Moulton "in a tone that was very cutting" for failure to pay regard to Mr. Tilton's interests as he had promised, for not fulfilling the understanding and the common agreement to aid Mr. Tilton. In the depressed mood which followed two days later Mr. Beecher wrote this long letter which he described "as an exhibit of what he had done during the past year for Theodore."

Mr. Evarts then took up the letter and began to read it, stopping only to ask the witness to explain the meaning of certain passages. Mr. Beecher had a copy of the letter in his hand, and occasionally made corrections in Mr. Evarts's copy.

Mr. Beecher's explanations of each and all of the passages of these letters will be found below, but for the convenience of reference those of the two most vigorous paragraphs in the letter are given below in parallel columns:

The Letter.

God knows that I have put more thought and judgment and earnest desire into my efforts to prepare a way for T. and E. than ever I did for myself a hundred fold. As to the outside public, I have never lost an opportunity to soften prejudices or refute falsehoods, and to excite kindly feeling among all whom I met. I am thrown among clergymen, public men, and generally the makers of public opinion, and I have used every rational endeavor to restrain the evils which have been visited upon T., and with increasing success.

The Explanation.

Q. Now, what facts in your own conduct or effort does that clause refer to? A. It refers to the prolonged endeavor which I had made everywhere to say that the stories that Mr. Bowen had bruited, and that I had given currency to—that I believed them to be false; that I believed Mr. Tilton to be an honest and a thoroughly chaste and temperate man; that I believed him to be neither a lecher nor a drunkard; that I believed him to be in many things weak, I often said; that I thought that—but everywhere I attempted to do that which I had undertaken to do, to restate him as he was when he sat a brilliant man at the head of The Independent.

The paragraph in which Mr. Beecher suggested that he should "step down and out" was next read and explained.

The Letter.

But the roots of this prejudice are long. The catastrophe which precipitated him from his place only disclosed feelings that had existed long. Neither he nor you can be aware of the feelings of classes in society, on other grounds than late rumors. I mention this to explain why I know with absolute certainty that no mere statement, letter, testimony, or affirmation will reach the root of affairs and renebrate them. TIME and WORK WILL. But chronic evil requires chronic remedies. If my destruction would place him all right, that shall not stand in the way. I am willing to step down and out. No could not undertake to do some things without bringing up the whole matter in such a way that that would be disclosed. I could not undertake to clear his character in regard to his sentiments on socialistic questions; that I could not do. But if, in regard to the other, if in regard to his household, in regard to Elizabeth and the children—if he wished that, on my part, to be dragged out and to be made a subject of investigation, my opinion then was, and was through the whole of the years, that that could never come into the church without destroying that church; and I would "step down and out" before anything should one can offer more than that. That I do offer. Sacrifice me without hesitation if you can clearly see your way to his safety and happiness thereby. I do not think that anything would be raised by it. I should be destroyed, but he would not be saved. E. and the children would have their future clouded.

The Explanation.

Q. Now, Sir, what did you refer to in regard to any step or conduct of your own in these clauses of your letter? A. I undertook to clear him from every imputation that affected his character, except those which belonged to his later associations with socialistic ideas and with the Woodhulls. It was a common ground between us that Elizabeth and the domestic troubles were to be shielded in silence. I over destroy Plymouth Church. I had an exaggerated idea, but it was a real idea that anything of that kind—I would suffer anything, but that church should stand. And then, as for him and her and the children—this is not exactly the language of a literal and logical statement, but it is language, as when Paul said: "I could wish myself accursed from Christ for my brother's sake!"—as David for Absalom: "Would to God I had died for thee!" If my going out of the church and out of the ministry, and so, the destruction of my professional life, would restore things as they had been before, I had the feeling when I wrote this letter that I would give them all up willingly to put things back where they were.

Then followed the passage containing the familiar allusion to "the ragged edge."

The Letter.

In one point of view I could desire the sacrifice on my part. Nothing can possibly be so bad as the horror of great darkness in which I spend much of my time. I look upon death as sweeter faced than any friend I have in the world. Life would be pleasant if I could see that rebuilt which is shattered. But to live on the sharp and ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, fear, despair, and yet to put on all the appearance of serenity and happiness, cannot be endured much longer.

Nothing can possibly be so bad as the horror of great darkness in which I spend much of my time.

The Explanation.

Q. Was that clause an expression of your views, your feelings, in view of the situation as you have narrated it? A. Yes, Sir. Feeble words! If there had been any stronger in the English language I would have put them in.

Q. What horror of great darkness did you spend much of your time in? A. I don't know; I cannot define it, nor describe it. I only know that I am subject to very profound darkness by times, and reactions: just as, at the other extreme, I am subject to very great exaltations. Mr. Evarts, I did not do right when I said, the most of my time. [With great emotion.] I lived very near to God then, and the most of my time I had peace. Most of my time I was above it; but there were days in which midnight came at midnight, and a horror of darkness.

THE TRIPARTITE AGREEMENT.

After further explanations of another letter, which was written in a depressed mood, and which contained several Biblical quotations, Mr. Beecher's attention was called to The Golden Age article, of which Mr. Tilton's letter embodying Mr. Bowen's charges against Mr. Beecher formed a part. Mr. Beecher said that previous to this interview in the Spring of 1872, he had never seen Mr. Tilton's letter of Jan. 1, 1871, to Mr. Bowen.

The continuation of the examination on this subject led Mr. Beecher to his account of the part which he had taken in the arbitration and the Tripartite Agreement following it. Of the arbitration he had heard very little. It was suggested to him that it would be wise for Mr. Tilton to have the difficulties with Mr. Bowen submitted to the judgment of others, and he had approved of the idea; but the first he knew of the result of the arbitration was when the Tripartite Covenant was brought to him for his signature. The whole affair, Mr. Beecher testified, was managed by others.

Mr. Beecher then testified in regard to a conversation which he had with Mr. Tilton in the Spring of 1872, immediately after the latter had broken off his friendly relations with Mrs. Woodhull, in consequence of her circulating what was known as the "Tit for Tat" letter. He contradicted Mr. Tilton's account of this interview by denying that he himself had then said that he thought Mr. Tilton had done an unwise thing in breaking off his acquaintance with her, and that there was no telling what she might do if they became her enemies. Mr. Evarts read a passage from Mr. Tilton's testimony, concluding with the following declaration: "But I say here, before God, that Mr. Beecher is as much responsible for my connection with Mrs. Woodhull as I am myself;" to which, almost before the reader had finished his question, Mr. Beecher replied: "I say before God that I was not responsible at all for it."

THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

The narrative of the witness now turned to the supposed attempts made by Mrs. Woodhull to blackmail him. He had a call from an unknown old gentleman one evening, not long before the publication of the Woodhull scandal, and his visitor told him that there was something awful going to be published about him. What else occurred between them was not given, the plaintiff's side objecting. Mr. Beecher, however, was allowed to testify that no blackmail was levied on him to prevent the publication, and that his idea that the stranger had intended blackmail was derived from Mr. Moulton.

The first that Mr. Beecher knew of the publication of the Woodhull scandal was from Mr. McKelway. At that time Mr. Beecher, Mr. Moulton, and Gen. Tracy agreed that it was best for him to keep silent about it. Subsequently, in the presence of Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton had taken Mr. Beecher's hands and urged him to deny the stories everywhere. Mr. Beecher had suggested that the persons implicated in the scandal would do well to join in a card of denial, but nothing ever came of the proposition. Mr. Beecher contradicted Mr. Tilton's testimony in respect to the proposed card in THE TRIBUNE, stating that the Woodhull scandal was only an outgrowth of the scandalous stories set afloat by Mr. Bowen. Nothing of the kind, Mr. Beecher testified, was thought of or suggested; nor had the witness ever told Mr. Tilton that since the publication of that story he had had no hope.

The narrative now reached December, 1872, when Mr. Beecher and Mr. and Mrs. Tilton had a conference at Mr. Moulton's house, for the purpose of coming to an agreement on separate cards denying the Woodhull scandal. Mrs. Tilton copied a card written for her by her husband. Mr. Beecher then asked to see Mr. Tilton's card, but Mr. Tilton declined to submit one, and Mr. Beecher then put his in his pocket, declining to contradict the story unless Mr. Tilton joined in the denial. The testimony of the defendant in regard to this interview was in direct contradiction to that of Mr. Tilton, who affirmed that Mr. Beecher was willing to join Mrs. Tilton in a denial, provided he had Mr. Tilton's word of honor that he would not overturn the denial by publishing anything to the contrary.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

A RESPITE GRANTED MR. CLEVELAND.

The Court met at 11, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled and the direct-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, your Honor was so good as to attend yesterday upon the further conduct of the examination of Mr. Cleveland out of court, but the result at present of consideration of the matter, in which my learned friends concur, is that it will, perhaps, be better in regard to this witness that he should be allowed an opportunity to recover his strength and health by going into the country, for five or six days, or so, in the hope that he may then be able to be examined in court; and your Honor's observation of the witness, may perhaps, concur in that view as a suitable one.

Judge Nelson—That is my impression, Sir; he seems to be somewhat improving, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, and with that view he will expect to return in a few days—say by the middle of next week—either to take the stand, or to complete the examination, if he is unable to come into court. That is satisfactory?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir, that is satisfactory, although it will be understood, I suppose, that our concurrence in that arrangement shall in no sense operate as a waiver of our right of cross-examination.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, that we understand. Mr. Cleveland is, and always has been desirous of coming into court, and we have been desirous that he should come in, and our learned friends on the other side naturally prefer that he should. We all wish that.

MR. BEECHER AND THE STEINWAY HALL MEETING.

Mr. Evarts—I will direct attention to the last question and answer, but it is not necessary that it should be repeated in the record. After speaking of the meeting with Mrs. Woodhull at Mr. Moulton's dinner table, you were asked:

Now, when again did you ever see her? A. I think the only time afterward that I ever saw her to speak with her was when she came to have me preside at the Steinway Hall meeting, in the Fall of 1871—November, I think, if I am not mistaken.

Then we broke off the examination and adjourned. Now, Mr. Beecher, will you say when and where that interview occurred? A. It took place in the morning of the day in which she delivered her address at the Steinway Hall, and took place in the front chamber, or second story front room, of Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. Who were present? A. She and I.

Q. And at any part of the interview were others present? A. No, Sir; I narrated the interview to others afterward.

Q. What passed between you? It is not necessary to go into details.

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Mr. Evarts—What was the subject of that interview, and had it any relation to the matter between you and Mrs. Tilton or Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton? A. It had reference entirely to presiding at the Steinway Hall meeting. I had an interview with her perhaps of twenty minutes, when she left, and I went down stairs and gave an account of the interview to Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton.

Q. Very well. Now, I will ask you—my learned friends will determine whether they will admit it or not—to state what occurred between you and Mrs. Woodhull?

Mr. Morris—We object to it.

Mr. Evarts—Did you afterward state it to Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, or either of them? A. I did, both of them.

Q. When? A. Immediately after the interview.

Q. At Mr. Moulton's house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What had become of Mrs. Woodhull? A. I think she got into a coach and went to New-York.

Q. Before this—before you had the conference with these others? A. I think that was it, Sir.

Q. Very well; at any rate she was not present? A. No, Sir; she had gone.

Q. She was not present at the interview? A. I either then immediately—it was immediately—

Q. Now, you may state what you said to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton on the subject? A. I said that she met me, with some formality, and said in substance that she was engaged in an unpopular cause, and that she felt that she had a right to the sympathy of progressive men, and that she desired to make an exposition of her sentiments that night in a public lecture, and wished that I should preside at the meeting. I told her that even in respect to causes that were very near to my heart I very seldom allowed myself to preside in public meetings, and that I did not see any reason why I should make an exception in her case. She said that she was conducting a kind of forlorn hope; it was not that phrase, but it was an enterprise in which she, as a woman, was laboring for a better state of things in society; that I was aware of her ideas, and that I sympathized with them, and that she thought I ought to give my assistance in the time of the minority of the cause. I replied to her that in so far as her sentiments were concerned on suffrage I did sympathize with her, not in all the arguments employed, but in the general end; that I was in favor of woman's suffrage, but that so far as her ideas upon social matters were concerned, without pretending to be well informed on the subject, so far as I did know or understand her views, I did not agree with them. She handed me a large roll, if I recollect right, a printed paper, and said that she wished I would read that over, and I should there see what her views were. I took the roll in my hand; the conversation went on; she urged me by various considerations to withdraw my denial and to preside. I told her that I could not under any circumstances; I utterly refused to do any such thing. She then charged me with cowardice; that I was afraid to lose my influence; and that I was afraid to avow my sentiments. I told her that I had no sentiments that I was afraid to avow; and as to the charge of cowardice, I supposed I must lie under that imputation in her judgment; and that, in various forms, turned over and over and over, was the interview, when I rose, and she rose, and I walked toward the door, and she walked after me toward the door. I shook hands with her there, and she went out. On narrating this to Mr. Moulton, he disagreed; he said, he was very sorry; he thought I had lost a great chance to ally that woman to my—to friendliness, friendly feeling; and I said to him: "I cannot preside at such a meeting; I will not identify myself with any of those movements; I will not." Well, I didn't need to do that, he said; I didn't need to do that; it was an opportunity—it was an opportunity to show my admiration, or rather my principles in favor of freedom of discussion of all subjects, and he made some such expression as this: that for me, for Henry Ward Beecher, to preside at the public meeting in which was discussed a great social revolution, whether he did or did not believe in it, in part or in whole, would go out over the nation, and it would be a sublime example. That was the substance of it.

Q. How did the matter end, as between you and Mrs. Woodhull, in respect to the definiteness or finality of your refusal? A. I made it absolute, and she knew it was absolute.

Q. Was there anything of this kind, as left by you with her, or stated by you to Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton, that you did not positively decline, but did not see how you could do it; nevertheless, if during the afternoon you came to a different conclusion, you would go and preside? A. No, Sir; there was nothing of that sort.

Mr. Beach—One moment. You put it whether, as occurring between himself and Mrs. Woodhull, or as stated to Tilton and Moulton. The first branch of that is—

Mr. Evarts—Well, did you state to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, or either of them, as a part of or the conclusion of your interview with Mrs. Woodhull, that you left it in that way—that you did not positively decline, but did not see how you could do it; nevertheless, if during the afternoon you came to a different conclusion, you would go and preside? A. No, Sir; that is altogether a mistake.

FAMILIARITIES BETWEEN MRS. WOODHULL AND THE MOULTONS.

Q. Now, on either of these occasions of meeting Mrs. Woodhull at Mr. Moulton's house, did you observe anything in regard to cordiality or familiarity in the intercourse between Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton, and Mrs. Moulton? A. I did.

Q. Which occurrence was that? A. I think I was in the chamber when Mrs. Woodhull came to dinner.

Q. On the occasion of the dinner? A. Yes.

Q. Who was in the chamber then? A. I don't know that any person was, unless it was Mrs. Moulton; I have an impression that she was there, and we were talking; Mrs. Woodhull came in; Mrs. Moulton went up to her and kissed her, and afterward Mr. Moulton came in, and he went up and also kissed her, shaking hands very cordially and pleasantly.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton come? A. I have an impression that he did, but I have not so distinct a recollection of that; I can see Mr. Moulton doing it.

Q. Very well. Now, Mr. Beecher, in this interview that you had with Mrs. Woodhull, in reference to the Steinway Hall meeting, was there in that conference, or during that interview, any reference on your part, or any reference on Mrs. Woodhull's part, to your doing as she desired in connection with any difficulties, or affairs, or position of your own? A. Not in the interview; in the letter that she sent to me there was.

Mr. Beach—One moment! one moment!

Mr. Evarts—Well, no matter about the letter. Not in the interview? No.

MRS. WOODHULL'S LETTERS TO MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, did you receive letters from Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did.

Q. At what times and how many? A. I received one in respect to going to Washington to speak at a meeting of women in favor of suffrage, during the session of Congress.

Q. Do you remember what year? A. It was—I can tell, with your permission, Sir. [Referring to memorandum.]

Q. Perhaps this?—here is a letter of 2d January, 1872, from you to Mr. Moulton, which is in evidence? [Handing witness a letter.] A. It was in the Winter—I was hesitating whether it was the Winter of 1870 or Spring of 1872.

Q. You mean the Winter of 1871? A. I meant 1871, or the Spring of 1872.

Q. Is that the letter which you now speak of as having been received from Mrs. Woodhull—is the letter of hers to which you refer in your letter to Mr. Moulton, and which you refer to and send him in your letter of January, 1872? [Handing letter to witness.] A. Is it what, Sir?

Q. Is the letter that you are now speaking of as having been received by you from Mrs. Woodhull the letter which you now refer to in your letter to Mr. Moulton of the 2d of January, 1872? A. No, Sir.

Q. Very well. Then we will pursue that inquiry in connection with this paper. You are speaking of the letter of suffrage? A. The letter of November, 1871.

Q. Was not the Steinway Hall letter about presiding at Steinway Hall? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were just now speaking of a letter asking you to go to Washington? A. That was in January.

Q. That is the letter I am desiring to talk about? A. I understood you to ask me if the letter I spoke of a moment ago, volunteering, was the letter that accompanied her invitation, or was in answer to which I answered about the Washington speech.

Mr. Evarts—No.

The Witness—Then I misunderstood you.

Mr. Beach—That was the question.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Mr. Beach—The question was whether the letter in reference to the Washington speech was the one he referred to in the letter to Mr. Moulton?

The Witness—I was mistaken, for whichever letter he asked me about I thought it was the other.

Mr. Evarts—You were speaking of a letter you received on the subject of your going to Washington? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was that letter of Mrs. Woodhull to you the one that you refer to in that letter to Mr. Moulton? [Handing witness a letter.]

Mr. Shearman—January 2d?

The Witness—I see; yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The letter referred to in Exhibit 42. Now, you did receive a letter in regard to the Steinway Hall meeting also? A. I did.

Q. The date of Mrs. Woodhull's letter was somewhere near the date of this letter of yours to Mr. Moulton, was it not? A. You mean the Washington letter?

Q. The one you refer to in your letter to Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was the day before, or the same day.

Q. Very well. Now, we will go to the Steinway Hall meeting. What was the date of that? A. November; if you will tell me the date of the—

Q. Was it the date of the meeting? A. I got the letter, I think, before.

Mr. Morris—The 20th; the meeting of the 20th!

Q. What was the time that you received that letter—how near the meeting? A. The first letter was within a day or two days, I cannot say which.

Q. Before the meeting? A. Before the meeting.

Q. And had reference to that meeting? A. It was entirely about that meeting.

Q. Did you receive any other from her? A. I did.

Q. At what time? A. It was later than either of these; was in the year 1872, I think.

Q. Was it after, or about the time of the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal? A. Not a great while before that; it was the Autumn of 1872 some time.

Mr. Evarts—That is already in evidence.

The Witness—Oh, no; it was June 3.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Morris, Mr. Shearman thinks it is not in evidence.

Mr. Morris—It is in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—If it is we will take it up.

The Witness—I call it the Gilsey House letter.

Mr. Evarts—It is dated at the Gilsey House.

The Witness—I doubt if it is dated there.

Q. This letter was some time in the Summer of 1872, was it not? A. June of 1872.

Q. And with these exceptions—these three letters—did you receive any other letter from her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, how many and what letters did you write to her, and what dates? A. I wrote to her in reply to her Washington letter of Jan. 2, and I replied to the Gilsey House letter—the letter I call the Gilsey House, because it was a letter on that subject.

Q. The letter in June, 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the Steinway Hall letter—was there any written reply to that? A. No, Sir; I had an interview.

MR. BEECHER DEPLORES THE SIR MARMADUKE POEM.

Q. An interview followed. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember the occurrence in the Fall of 1871, the publication of a short poem by Mr. Tilton under the heading of "Sir Marmaduke's Musings?" A. I do.

Q. How did you become aware of that publication? A. I saw it in the newspapers.

Q. Very near the time of its issue? A. I suppose so; I don't know.

Q. Now, Sir, did you have any conversation with Mr.

Moulton afterward concerning that publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how did that arise, and where? A. I don't know; it came up in the course of some visit or conversation.

Q. What was said between you about it? A. I said I thought it was a dastardly letter; it was an ill bird that fouls its own nest; and he said he thought himself it was very objectionable; he didn't attempt to make an apology for it.

Q. Did you in any interview with Mr. Moulton where this publication was the subject of talk, say to him that it almost broke your heart to read it, or that you considered it virtually a telling of the story of yourself and Elizabeth? A. No, Sir; I did not tell him that.

Q. Did you say anything bearing upon that point? A. I did.

Q. What did you say? A. I said that it broke my heart to see such things said, bringing Elizabeth's name out in such a way before the world; it was an arrow shot at her.

Q. Now, did you have any conversation with Mr. Tilton about this "Sir Marmaduke's Musings?" A. I don't recollect any.

MR. TILTON REFUSES TO RETURN TO PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. In the month of December, 1871, do you remember the subject coming up between yourself and Mr. Tilton in any interview as to his retiring from Plymouth Church? A. I do.

Q. Where was that interview held? A. I don't know, Sir; I only remember the conversation.

Q. Now, will you state what passed between you at that period and on that subject, or at any conversation raised in which that subject was spoken of? A. Mr. Tilton complained to me that there was an unfriendly feeling manifested by my friends toward him, and thought that—he blamed me in a degree for it. That was only a part of many and frequent conversations at that time. They ran along from time to time. I had undertaken to do what I could to restore Mr. Tilton to the cordial good will of my church.

Mr. Beach—It seems to me, Sir, that these declarations are not responsive to the question, and are general expressions which are not fitting evidence. What passed in the conversation?

Mr. Evarts—They are only introductory to what did pass in the conversations. [To the Witness.] What did pass between you and Mr. Tilton—what had passed between you and Mr. Tilton on the subject of the restoration of good feeling toward Mr. Tilton in the church, if anything? A. I had said to Mr. Tilton that I could not hold myself accountable for the opinions and prejudices which had existed beforehand, founded on like or dislike of him; that I could not be responsible for them; that, however, I felt satisfied that the beginning murmurs and complaints in the church might all of them have been overlaughed and removed, if he felt his way clear to come back, as he used to do; and take part in the affairs of the church, and show a cordial feeling toward the members; and in one of our interviews he showed, I thought, a leaning that way, Sir, and inspired in me some hope that it might come to pass. In such condition I said, "I think I may guarantee to you a welcome that will set you high and dry above all these annoyances." At a later conversation, when he seemed disinclined, I urged him again to take his letter, but he said he didn't consider himself a member.

Q. What do you mean by his taking his letter? A. Taking a dismissal to some other church by letter; but he said he had not for a long time considered himself a member of the church. Very well; I asked him then to communicate that fact to the church. He said he could not do that. I said, "You can announce; you don't need to ask; you simply can announce that you are not a member, and then the further action of the church will ratify that;" but he declined.

Q. During what period of time, so far as you recall, did these conversations on this topic extend? A. On the particular church relation?

Q. Yes, this matter of either restoring or dissolving his relations with the church? A. Oh, I should say they ran on through two or three months; my general recollection is that.

OTHER NARRATED CONVERSATIONS DENIED.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton has given a narrative of an interview which he puts in the early part of December, 1871, at Mr. Moulton's study, when you came there, and this subject of retiring from the church was spoken of as stated by him in detail. In that interview he says that you in the conversation used these words, or the substance of them:

That in view of the events of the Summer and Fall, by a publication of the Woodhull sketch [I suppose he means the Life], and my presiding at the Steinway Hall meeting, and the little poem called "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," there had grown up in the church a feeling on the part of the members and leaders that I had been an intense Spiritualist, that I had wholly abandoned the orthodox faith, and that I had not attended the church for a year or nearly two years, and as my name was being banded up and down the community, they felt that, as a church, there should be some inquiry made into the matter.

And then he says this:

Mr. Beecher said: You know, Theodore, how dreadful and distressing this is to my feelings, particularly as I understand how you have come into your disrepute; but what can I do? How can I explain to my church members? They are crowding me on every hand.

Now, did any such conversation as that take place between you and Mr. Tilton? A. Not between me and Mr. Tilton, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, in this conversation, or in any conversation about his fixing in one way or the other his relations with the church, did you say this to him or did he say this to you:

Mr. Beecher, in reference to any criticisms made upon me because I have made a sketch of Mrs. Woodhull's life, or presided at a public meeting on her behalf, you know perfectly well the reasons that have led me to do it, and you have no right to make these reasons a thorn in my side now.

Did he say anything of that kind to you? A. Not a word, or anything like it.

Q. Now, Sir, was there any conversation, either as part of the interview that I have called your attention to, as narrated by Mr. Tilton, or in this period in which he spoke of dealing with any offense at the little verses called "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," saying:

You have only to treat it as a farmer treats a nettle; clutch it in your right hand and crush it; handle it boldly; put it into The Christian Union, or read it at your prayer-meeting; treat it as if it had been written by Mrs. Stowe, or by some of your friends; treat as if it was a matter not dangerous to you at all.

Was there any conversation or suggestion of that kind as to the treatment of it? A. No, Sir, nothing.

Q. Now, did there occur as a part of this interview, or during this period of conversation, anything like this, as stated by Mr. Tilton:

As to the only remaining thing—my retirement from the church—get rid of that in this way: "Say I told you a year and a half ago, as I did at one of my earliest interviews, that I had then abandoned the church; it is known as a matter of fact that I have never crossed the threshold of the church since then; assume a power and take my name from the roll, or have a new roll printed, with my name omitted. If it is dangerous to call attention to the fact that my name is there, get rid of it."

A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evans—Did he at this interview or in any interviews on this subject, at about this period, say that if he asked for a dismissal or wrote a letter on the subject, "it will impugn what I have been doing for the last year and a half; and, therefore," as he says he said to you, "you will remember distinctly I told you I would never again cross the threshold of your church." Now, Sir, did he make any statement of that kind to you? A. No, Sir; he did not.

Q. Now, Sir, in stating any reasons why he could not consistently ask for any letter of dismissal, during either this special conversation, as he narrates it, or during the conversations at this period on the subject of his relations to the church, did he say this as among the reasons why he could not consistently ask for a letter of dismissal:

You put your request to me on the ground that my views are different from those of my childhood. Certainly they are. But allow me to remind you that my views are not different from the views of many members of your church in good standing. I am not more radical in any of my views than Deacon Freeland or Mr. Claflin or any other member in good standing in your church; and it would be a falsehood to say that I must retire from your church because of any liberality in my religious views, "for," I said, "your church is well known throughout Christendom as being an asylum for all looseness and liberality of Christian views; and if I retire from your church, particularly as criticisms have been made against me for verging toward liberality of Christian sentiment, people will say, well, if Theodore has grown so loose and liberal in his views that he must on that account leave Plymouth Church, where, then, will he go?"

Did he present views or arguments of that kind to you? A. Never—purely imaginative, the whole.

Q. Do you remember, as a part of this conversation, or of this discussion about terminating his relations to the church, his saying anything of this kind:

My views are liberal enough to entitle me to ask a letter of dismissal from an orthodox Congregational church, but they are too liberal to allow me to remain in good standing in the church; and on that ground I cannot ask any dismissal—but they are not too liberal to allow me to remain in good standing in the church, [your church, I suppose he means—your church, Plymouth Church,] and on that ground I cannot ask any dismissal.

Q. Do you remember his stating anything of that kind?

A. I remember that he did not.

Q. Now, this is also given as a part of the argumentation on the subject:

Furthermore, [Tilton says,] although you must remember I have been absent from your church for a year and a half, still my wife and daughters remain members, and their names are on the roll, and if I retire from the church leaving them in their membership, it will not produce upon the public the impression that family difficulties have been obliterated, but that family difficulties have been created.

Q. Do you remember any statement of that kind? A. No, Sir; there was no such—no such discussion.

THE INTERVIEW IN A RAILROAD TRAIN.

Q. Mr. Beecher, do you remember an occasion of meeting Mr. Tilton in a trip on a—on board the cars at Springfield, Mass., or on that road? A. I do.

Q. When was that? A. I think it was in January of 1872; somewhere in that neighborhood.

Q. Please state, Mr. Beecher, how that interview arose, and when it was? A. I was leaving Springfield for Boston; had not been a great while out before, sitting not far from the middle of the cars, I felt some one lay his hand on my shoulder, and, looking around, it was Mr. Tilton; and I was very much surprised and said, "How came you here?" He said that he had been lecturing the night before in, I think, Pittsfield, or some place back on the road, and had come right on after lecturing and took the morning train to Boston; he had an engagement in that vicinity; sat down by my side. We entered into some chat about lecturing, what he was lecturing on, what engagements he had in New-England, and how much he meant to go out, and all that kind of conversation; and that led insensibly to a conversation about affairs at home, his wife's health and children. We talked very pleasantly, for he was in one of his gracious moods, and he said, toward the close of the conversation, that if it would be any pleasure, he should be very glad to have me visit at his house, just as I had done in former times—make it a kind of home to myself, that was the idea, and perhaps talked ten or fifteen minutes with me in that way. He then went back to his seat, and after we passed Brookfield, I think it was, I thought it was proper to return the call, and went, as we came in, and sat down by his side in his seat. He was writing; I asked him what he was writing, and he said his editorials; and then I questioned him as to whether he could write in the cars, and whether it was not bad for his eyes, and whether he could think, and all that kind of literary chit-chat. He had a book which he seemed occasionally to be looking into, and I asked him what it was, and he said it was John Woolman's life. I am ashamed to say it was the first time I had ever heard of it, and I asked what it was. He said it was one of the most charming books—of one of the most charming men that ever lived, he thought, and made some remark expressive of the serenity and the peacefulness of that man's nature, and the effect that it had upon him; and I said, "Well, if that is the kind of book, I mean to have it," and I went on to speak about the peculiar effect which certain classes of books had on my mind, quite independent of the ability of them, or the line of thought, saying that I thought it was perhaps a transfused magnetism from the nature of the man himself that happened to agree with mine—mentioned De Tocqueville's Letters, and Arnold's writings, Matt. Arnold and some others, and said I should be very glad to get any book that would add to my very little library of peace; and after that conversation ran along half an hour—longer than the other, I think. That was the substance of that interview.

Q. In that conversation was anything said by you as to your purpose of getting this book? A. Yes, Sir; and I did get it; and recommend every man to get it, and read it; it is a beautiful book.

Q. In this interview, or either of these interviews in the cars, did you say anything of this kind, when you asked him what he was writing, or in connection with what he was writing, that you hoped it was not another Sir Marmaduke's poem? A. No, Sir; I don't think I ever made an allusion to that to him.

Q. Now, Sir, in reference to this book of John Woolman, his life, I suppose—Life of John Woolman; in that connection, or in that conversation, did you say anything or do anything of this kind—[reading] "He" [that is yourself] "drew a long breath and said a fountain of peace! Tell me where it is. I want to drink of it." And then he replied: "If there is peace—" and then you continued: "If there is peace in this book, in Heaven's name I must read it, for I have come to the conclusion that there is to be no peace for me any more in this life." Did you use any expression of that kind? A.

I don't know but I drew a long breath, but the rest of it, I think, is imaginary. I certainly said to him that I should like that book if it was a quieting book, for that that was the class of books, owing to the excessive occupation through which I went, that I had sought for; that whenever I was fretted or wearied nothing rested me so much as to lie down and read De Tocqueville's Letters, or some book that had that charm of peace-inspiring.

Q. Now, as part of either of these conversations, did he say to you—after saying to you, "Go on with your work; have no apprehensions on my account"—did he say this—or in a conversation did he say this: "Of course my anxiety is not for your safety, it is for Elizabeth's; but in protecting Elizabeth I necessarily shield you." Was that a part of either of the conversations? A. No, Sir; not a word like it.

MR. BEECHER CUT TO THE HEART BY MR. MOULTON'S COLDNESS.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, soon after this interview in the cars you wrote a letter to Mr. Moulton referring to it. [Showing witness a letter.] The letter of Feb. 5, 1872. Have you a copy of it here? A. I have it copied.

Q. Before writing this letter to Mr. Moulton of Feb. 5, 1872, a long letter, had anything passed between you and Mr. Moulton which induced or led you to write it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How did that occur, and what was it? A. I went on a Saturday morning over to the office to see Mr. Moulton; it had been a troublous time from week to week all along there; things were breaking out; I went to see him on some one of these occasions. I sat for some length of time—some little time before he came in, and when he came in he did not see me—on purpose—and went about his business, continuing for—kept me waiting for a considerable length of time, and then gave me rather a cold recognition; he was passing out and I got up and went out with him—I must say I forced myself on him; he was very distant; he seemed more nearly in the mood of anger with me than I had ever seen him before, and when I entered into some conversation with him he was very abrupt, and even more; I began to make some explanation to him of Mr. Tilton's demands upon me that I should—that I was not fulfilling the understanding and the intent of our cordial agreement, and that my friends were also doing me a great deal of damage—Mr. Tilton's representation by—doing him a great deal injudiciously, too; Mr. Moulton replied with a tone that was cutting to me—the substance of it was it was very well for me that I had all that I wanted—wealth, and a home, and a church, and my friends—it was very well for me to slight or pay little regard to Mr. Tilton's condition and feelings; that he was without support; that he was suffering poverty; that he was being injured by those that were flattering me, and he bore down with some severity upon me in the matter; the conversation was peculiarly trying to me; I was going to be absent the whole of the next week. I preached on Sunday, but on Monday morning I was in a profound reaction. Usually I do not feel the effect of the reaction till Monday night or Tuesday, if at all, but on Monday I was in a profound reaction, and I felt I could not go off and be gone a week without clearing myself in the court of honor for the fulfillment of every obligation that I had assumed. I determined that I would give him such a letter as would make him feel to his innermost man that I had done what a man ought to do for a friend in trouble, and under that condition I wrote this letter which may be considered as an exhibit—my exhibit of what I had done for the last year for Theodore and of my feeling of willingness to do whatever might become a man to fulfill every obligation that I had made, or every pledge of everything that love, friendship, or fidelity could require of a man; I was thoroughly indignant to be reproached for infidelity.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read this letter, as I wish to ask you some questions upon the subject.

MR. BEECHER ON THE "RAGGED EDGE" LETTER.

The Witness—You cannot understand it unless you understand exactly the gradually accumulating circumstances preceding which are the text of it.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading.]

MONDAY, Feb. 5, 1872.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I leave town to-day, and expect to pass through from Philadelphia to New-Haven. I shall not be here till Friday.

About two weeks ago I met T. in the cars, going to B. He was kind. We talked much. At the end he told me to go on with my work without the least anxiety, in so far as his feelings and actions were the occasion of apprehension.

On returning home from New-Haven (where I am three days in the week, delivering a course of lectures to the theological students), I found a note from E., saying that T. felt hard toward me, and was going to see or write me before leaving for the West.

Whom did you refer to under the initial E.? A. Elizabeth.

Q. Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton.

"She kindly added"—now comes a quotation from her letter, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [reading]—

"Do not be cast down. I bear this almost always, but the God in whom we trust will deliver us all safely. I know you do and are willing abundantly to help him, and I also know your embarrassments." These were words of warning, but also of consolation; for I believe E. is beloved of God, and that her prayers for me are sooner heard than mine for myself or for her. But it seems that a change has come to T. since I saw him in the cars—indeed, ever since he has felt more intensely the force of the feeling in society and the humiliations which environ his enterprise.

The Witness—"Limitations."

Mr. Evarts—"Humiliations"—it should be "limitations." A. I think it should be "limitations."

Q. Yes, this is a misprint in the evidence—

And the limitations which environ his enterprise; he has growingly felt that I had a power to help which I did not develop, and I believe you have participated in this feeling.

How had you learned or gained the impression that Mr. Moulton participated in that feeling? Q. Well, I think I had occasion to on Saturday before.

Q. That you referred to? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [reading]—

It is natural you should. T. is dearer to you than I can be. He is with you. All his trials lie open to your eye daily. But I see you but seldom, and my personal relations, environments, necessities, limitations, dangers, and perplexities you cannot see or imagine. If I had not gone through this great year of sorrow, I would not have believed that any one could pass through my experience and be alive or sane.

The Witness—"And sane."

Q. "And sane." Well, "and sane" there.

[Reading.]

I have been the center of three distinct circles, each one of which required clear-mindedness and peculiarly inventive or originaive powers, viz:

1. The great church.
2. The newspaper.
3. The book.

The first I could neither get out of nor slight. The sensitiveness of so many of my people would have made any appearance of trouble or any remission of force an occasion of alarm and notice, and have excited, when it was important that rumors should die and everything be quieted.

The Witness—"Where," I think, Sir.

Mr. Beach—"Where" instead of "when."

The Witness—"Would have excited where it was important that rumors—"

Mr. Evarts—"Where"—well, it seems a very imperfect print.

The Witness—There is an elision in the sentence—"would have excited in quarters where—"

Mr. Evarts [reading]—

The newspaper I did roll off, doing but little except give general directions, and in so doing I was continually spurred and exhorted by those in interest. It could not be helped.

The "Life of Christ," long delayed, had locked up the capital of the firm, and was likely to sink them—finished it must be. Was ever book born of such sorrow as that was? The interior history of it will never be written.

During all this time you, literally, were all my stay and comfort. I should have fallen on the way but for the courage which you inspired and the hope which you breathed.

My vacation was profitable. I came back, hoping that the bitterness of death was passed. But T.'s troubles brought back the cloud, with even severer suffering. For all this Fall and Winter I have felt that you did not feel satisfied with me, and that I seemed, both to you and T., as contenting myself with a cautious or sluggish policy, willing to save myself, but not to risk anything for T.

Had you observed any such indication on Mr. Moulton's part to which you there refer? A. I had; nothing that—it culminated in that.

Q. In that interview— A. I tried to make myself think that it was my impression, but on that Saturday's interview I gave interpretation to all the interviews going before from time to time.

Q. Through what period do you mean? A. I mean from the period of three or four months, or more, ever since—until after September, at any rate.

The letter proceeds: [Reading.]

I have again and again probed my heart to see whether I was truly liable to such feeling, and the response is unequivocal that I am not. No man can see the difficulties that environ me unless he stands where I do.

To say that I have a church on my hands is simple enough—but to have the hundreds and thousands of men pressing me, each one with his keen suspicion, or anxiety, or zeal; to see tendencies which, if not stopped, would break out into ruinous defense of me; to stop them without seeming to do it; to prevent any one questioning me; to meet and allay prejudices against T. which had their beginning years before this; to keep serene, as if I was not alarmed or disturbed; to be cheerful at home and among friends when I was suffering the torments of the damned; to pass sleepless nights often, and yet to come up fresh and full for Sunday—all this may be talked about, but the real thing cannot be understood from the outside, nor its wearing and grinding on the nervous system.

Now, Sir, what occasions, or subjects, or suspicion, or anxiety, or alarm, or disturbance, did you refer to in this passage? A. I referred to the anxiety which I had, these troubles in Mr. Tilton's family, and in which I had felt myself to be culpably careless—in their origination—should not (concurrently with his wishes and Mr. Moulton's)—that they should not be made a matter of publicity, and that they certainly should not be dragged into my church and be made the subject of church inquiry. It was that part of the trouble that throughout the letter was the occasion of poignant suffering. The preceding conversations and expostulations with me turned on this ground: that I had damaged Mr. Tilton's name, fame, position, and pecuniary resources; that I had given the weight of my great influence (as it was pleased to be called) to Mr. Bowen, and therefore to the propagation of these stories, which had tarnished him; and it was, therefore, only a reasonable thing for me to restore to him, as far as my influence went, the good name that he had—

Mr. Beach—It strikes me, your Honor, that this is argument instead of testimony, and I hope it will be restricted as far as possible.

The Witness—I can put it into the form of conversations with Mr. Tilton, if you please, because it was often and often talked of between us.

Mr. Beach—Well, I would rather have the conversations than have the ingenuity of your presentation by way of argument.

Mr. Evarts—The subject of the evidence is legitimate, but perhaps the witness may transcend, or escape from, the proper limitation.

Mr. Beach—I do not desire to be over-critical, but I desire it to be as restrained and moderate as may be.

Mr. Evarts—The letter proceeds: [Reading.]

God knows that I have put more thought and judgment and earnest desire into my efforts to prepare a way for T. and E. than ever I did for myself a hundred fold. As to the outside public, I have never lost an opportunity to soften prejudices or refute falsehoods, and to excite kindly feeling among all whom I met. I am thrown among clergymen, public men, and generally the makers of public opinion, and I have used every rational endeavor to repair—

Mr. Beecher—Restrain.

Mr. Evarts—Restrain!

Mr. Beecher [referring to his copy]—So I have it.

Mr. Evarts—It is not very material, though there is a difference in meaning. I am reading from the evidence in the case, which is likely to be correct.

Mr. Beecher—All right, Sir.

Mr. Evarts [reading]—"The evils which have been visited upon T., and with increasing success." Now, what facts in your own conduct or effort does that clause refer to? A. It refers to the prolonged endeavor which I had made everywhere to say that the stories that I had assisted—that Mr. Bowen had bruited, and that I had given currency to—that I believed them to be false; that I believed Mr. Tilton to be an honest and a thoroughly chaste and temperate man; that I believed him to be neither a lecher nor a drunkard; that I believed him to be in many things weak, I often said; that I thought that—but everywhere I attempted to do that which I had undertaken to do, reinstate him as he was when he sat a brilliant man at the head of The Independent.

Q. Before the occurrences of December, 1870? A. Before December.

Mr. Evarts—The letter proceeds: [Reading.]

But the roots of this prejudice are long. The catastrophe which precipitated him from his place only disclosed feelings that had existed long. Neither he nor you can be aware of the feelings of classes in society, on other grounds than late rumors. I mention this to explain why I know with absolute certainty that no mere statement, letter, testimony or affirmation will reach the root of affairs and reinstate them. TIME and WORK WILL.

But chronic evil requires chronic remedies. If my destruction would place him all right, that shall not stand in the way. I am willing to step down and out. No one can offer more than that. That I do offer. Sacrifice me without hesitation, if you can clearly see your way to his safety and happiness thereby. I do not think that anything would be gained by it. I should be destroyed, but he would not be saved. E. and the children would have their future clouded.

Now, Sir, what did you refer to in regard to any step or conduct of your own in these clauses of your letter? A. I undertook to clear him from every imputation that affected his character, except those which belonged to his later associations with socialistic ideas and with the Woodhulls. It was a common ground between us that Elizabeth and the domestic troubles were to be shielded in silence. I could not undertake to do some things without bringing up the whole matter in such a way that that would be disclosed. I could not undertake to clear his character in regard to his sentiments on socialistic questions; that I could not do. But if, in regard to the other, if in regard to his household, in regard to Elizabeth and the children—if he wished that, on my part, to be dragged out and to be made a subject of investigation, my opinion then was, and was through the whole of the years, that that could never come into the church without destroying that church; and I would "step down and out" before anything should ever destroy Plymouth Church. I had an exaggerated idea, but it was a real idea, that anything of that kind—I would suffer anything, but that church should stand. And then, as for him and her and the children—this is not exactly the language of a literal and logical statement, but it is language, as when Paul said: "I could wish myself accursed from Christ for my brother's sake!"—as David for Absalom: "Would to God I had died for thee!" If my going out of the church and out of the ministry, and so, the destruction of my professional life, would restore things as they had been before, I had the feeling when I wrote this letter that I would give them all up willingly to put things back where they were.

Q. The letter proceeds: [Reading.]

In one point of view I could desire the sacrifice on my part. Nothing can possibly be so bad as the horror of great darkness in which I spend much of my time. I look upon death as sweeter-faced than any friend I have in the world. Life would be pleasant if I could see that rebuilt which is shattered. But to live on the sharp and ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, fear, despair, and yet to put on all the appearance of serenity and happiness, cannot be endured much longer.

Was that clause an expression of your views, your feelings, in view of the situation as you have narrated it? A. Yes, Sir. Feeble words! If there had been any stronger in the English language I would have put them in.

Q. Now, here is an expression: [Reading.]

Nothing can possibly be so bad as the horror of great darkness in which I spend much of my time.

What horror of great darkness did you spend much of your time in? A. I don't know: I cannot define it nor describe it. I only know that I am subject to very profound darkness by times, and reactions; just as, at the other extreme, I am subject to very great exaltations. Mr. Evarts, I did not do right when I said, the most of my time. [With great emotion.] I lived very near to God then, and the most of my time I had peace.

Q. "Much of my time," it is. A. Yes. Most of my time I was above it; but there were days in which midnight came at midday, and a horror of darkness.

Q. Now, at the time of writing this letter, Mr. Beecher, what was the condition of your spirit or temper in this regard—of depression or exaltation? A. Oh! I was in the very depths of the depths. It was a Monday letter, after such a Saturday!

Q. Now, Sir, in these clauses, or any of them, of this letter, as I have read them to you, was there present to your mind any thought, idea, or memory, of any criminal intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir. None at all. None at all. I had no need of that. There was enough, to my thought, in hurting a friend, in destroying a household, in being unfaithful to the highest honor of obligations—there was enough in that to torment me with the torments of the damned; I know of no more horrible evil in this world than to betray or hurt a friend; I do not say that other things are not worse; but I say that I should suffer as much for that as I could for anything—as I had capacity to suffer.

Q. In this letter you say: [Reading.]

I am well nigh discouraged. If you, too, cease to trust me, to love me, I am alone; I have not another person in the world to whom I could go.

In reference to what relations with Mr. Moulton on this subject did you use these expressions? A. In reference to what, Sir?

Q. In reference to what relations to Mr. Moulton, or with this subject of your letter, did you use those expressions: "If you, too, cease to trust me, to love me, I am alone; I have not another person in the world to whom I could go." A. Oh, I could have gone to five hundred—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! oh!

The Witness— there were five hundred thousand that wanted me to go to them. It was simply a recognition that I was shut up by the circumstances, to him, my friend, whom I believed to be a man of wonderful fidelity in friendship.

Q. By what circumstances were you shut up to him, as the matter then stood? A. By that policy of silence that all of us had entered into league to maintain, and which I did maintain.

Q. The letter proceeds: [Reading.]

Well, to God I commit all. Whatever it may be here, it shall be well there. With sincere gratitude for your heroic friendship, and with sincere affection, even though you love me not, I am yours (though unknown to you).

H. W. B.

Now, Sir, in this expression, "With sincere gratitude for your heroic friendship, and with sincere affection, even though you love me not," what is the reference of that phrase, "even though you love me not?" A. It was the sting of that Saturday, in me, when he turned away from me as he did. "Though unknown to you"—that was an intimation that my inward life, he had no idea of it, that he should treat me so, and charge me as he did—that I was not the man that he thought I was.

Q. Now, in the earlier part of this letter, you used this expression:

If I had not gone through this great year of sorrow, I would not have believed that any one could pass through my experience and be alive and sane.

What sorrow had oppressed you during that year? A. Oh, the everlasting resurrection of this trouble, in one and another form of aggravation! It was a thing settled that never would rest! In one shape or another it was still, either by the intrusion of outside parties or by the restlessness of parties within, brought again to the surface. I—I settled it, and rejoiced over it many times, only to meet it again in aggravated forms; and from year to year the complications grew worse.

Q. Well, we are recurring now to the past year, prior to this letter, not to the future. Had you any other sorrow, or cause of sorrow, or any other remorse, or cause of remorse, or any other fear, or cause of fear, than what you have stated, in reference to your relations to Mr. Tilton, in his affairs, and in his family? A. Yes; I had abundant cause for fear and trouble about myself.

Q. In what connection?

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, Sir, we object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

The Witness—Because I had an unspeakable dread of an imputation resting on me. I was a minister, and therefore a woman. To be—to have this matter brought out in such a way, that mischief-makers would get hold of it and bring it into my church—I supposed that it would give rise to at least three parties in the church—expulsions and trials, for which a Congregational church is less adapted than any other church on earth to be a judicial body; and I did not have a doubt that it would result in a conflagration that would destroy that church, and leave me—one party and another party—leave my reputation such that it would end my usefulness for life. And I also was in the midst of a community where we had been going through great partisan conflicts, and I had been an active man in them, and I felt the moment that this thing is bruited and my church takes it up, it will fall into a quick soil all over the land, for political reasons, and for other reasons theological, and it will be—there will be a crop of thorns; and I felt that I did not see how I could get out of it if things should come to that pass; I did not see how I could get rid of the most damaging results, if to all the stories that had been—that had assailed me through Mr. Bowen was to be added a charge, specific, by the husband of an injured woman (as he claimed), and backed up by a charge on her part; I did not see any way out, and I felt that the future was all full of fiery dangers and difficulties. For their sake I did do a great deal, Mr. Evans, but I did a great deal for my own sake, too; and yet for my own sake I would not have done a thing, but that I happened to stand as a representative of certain views, and truths, and great religious interests in the community.

Q. By the charge, do you mean the charge of improper advances? A. I do.

Q. Had any other charge been made against you at that time by either of these parties? A. No; but that is enough, I take it.

MR. BEECHER'S GLOOMY HOURS, AND THEIR RESULTS.

Q. Well, that is all that was in your mind. Now, Sir, after this letter to Mr. Moulton, which I have read—before your note to Mr. Moulton of the 25th of March, 1872, which is Exhibit 56—[to Mr. Morris] I don't suppose it is necessary to look up that?

Mr. Morris—No.

Mr. Evarts—I call your attention—have you a copy of your letter of March 25, 1872, to Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose so. [Referring to memorandum.] Yes, Sir.

Q. Between this ~~even~~ on the 5th of February, 1872, and the letter now shown you of March 25, 1872, to Mr. Moulton, had any particular interviews or communications taken place between Mr. Moulton and yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What had occurred between you? A. Well, I think it was about that time, or preceding—just a little before that—that Mr. Moulton showed me, and I for the first time then read Mr. Tilton's letter to Mr. Bowen, what is called the "Golden Age article;" but that whole month was a month of agitation.

Q. What was the subject that was then talked about, or made the occasion of what you call agitation? A. It was the reinstatement of Mr. Tilton, but peculiarly some reinstatement in the matter of Mr. Bowen's difficulties with him, were in the mind at that time.

Mr. Beach—When was that?

Mr. Evarts—It was in the Spring of 1872.

The Witness—March, 1870. The "Tripartite Agreement" came in April.

Mr. Beach—The end of March, 1870?

The Witness—No, Sir; 1872. The "Tripartite Agreement" was made in April, 1872.

Mr. Evarts—This was the month of March preceding the early days of April in which the "Tripartite Agreement" was made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I will read this letter to Mr. Moulton of the 25th of March, and ask your attention to some parts of it:

MY DEAR FRIEND: I sent on Friday or Saturday the portrait of Titian to the store for you. I hope it may suit you.

What was this gift, in what form—the portrait of Titian? A. Mr. Moulton had been at my house, and looking over my portraits and things, and found some grand old heads that I had, and had expressed a wish for one, and I had it framed, and left orders at the store to have it sent to him.

Q. [Reading.]

I have been doing ten men's work this Winter—partly to make up lost time, partly because I live under a cloud, feeling every month that I may be doing my last work, and anxious to make the most of it.

Q. What was there that induced the feeling that you there expressed that you might be doing your last work, and anxious to make the most of it? A. Well, of course, there was some special relation to this difficulty; but, Mr. Evarts, that is a state of feeling that I have most all the time; I don't think that there is a month or a week in the year that I do not think that I am near to the end.

Q. You use also the expression, "Because I live under a cloud." A. Yes, Sir; that is the local difficulty that then—this constantly recurring matter.

Q. A cloud of gloom, or a cloud as to repute, or on your own mind? A. No, it was a cloud on my own mind. Q. [Reading.]

When Esau sold his birthright he found [now you quote] no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

Now, Sir, in reference to yourself, or any experience of yours, did you make this reference to Esau, and if so, what? A. It was a very natural reference for a minister to make; I had preached a great many times from it; and Esau sold his birthright time and time again to have it rein—to have himself reinstated, to have the matter bettered, and couldn't; I had tried over and over and over again to have the mistakes and errors I had fallen into in that family repaired, and they never would be repaired. I did not quote it as a literal matter, but rather as a sacredly ornamental passage.

Q. [Reading.]

But I have one abiding comfort. I have known you and found in you one who has given a new meaning to friendship.

This expression, Mr. Beecher, of your estimate and feeling in regard to Mr. Moulton in his relations to you, was it a true expression of your feelings and views? A. It certainly was; I regarded Mr. Moulton—I loved him like a brother; I do not mean by that that I saw nothing in Mr. Moulton to except to, but I thought him a splendid specimen of a man, in many respects, in his peculiar line, and he had qualities so utterly different from mine, and in which I thought that he surpassed; that, by the principle of counterparts, I suppose, I took to him very strongly; he did seem to me to have given a new meaning to friendship—and I think so still. [Laughter.]

Q. [Reading.]

As soon as warm days come I want you to go to Peekskill with me.

I am off in an hour for Massachusetts, to be gone all the week.

I am urging forward my second volume of the "Life of Christ," for "the night cometh, when no man can work."

With much affection and admiration, yours very truly,

H. W. B.

In this particular reference to the urgency of your second volume of this work—the reference, "for the night something, when no man can work"—was there any special occasion of that reference, or was it only as to the uncertainty of life? A. Well, Sir, it was to that serious view of things which a Christian and reflective man ought to take, and which happens in me to run with my temperament, and which I do take.

Q. Now, Sir, was there an interview with Mr. Moulton, at which the "Golden Age article," as it was called, was considered and present? A. There was.

Q. In what shape was that article or paper? A. What we call a galley proof, Sir.

Q. And consisted—you recall it, I suppose, and know what it consisted of? A. I recall it.

Q. Mr. Bowen's letter, and some prefix and subsequent observations? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It is before us, I think, Mr. Morris, only in the form of the "Tripartite Agreement"—annexed to the "Tripartite Agreement."

Mr. Morris—Oh, yes.

Mr. Evarts—Well, you have it in mind.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Morris—With Mr. Johnson's emendations, you recollect.

Mr. Evarts—Oh, yes. [To the witness.] Where was there an interview, and who were present at it? A. It was at Mr. Moulton's house; he was sick, in his back chamber and in his bed, suffering from this rheumatic affection to which he was liable.

Q. And how came you to be there? A. I have an impression that I had just come back from a lecture trip, and ran down to see him.

Q. Then you were not sent for, or came by appointment? A. I think not; I cannot say; I used to run down and see him most always when I had been gone.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton present? A. No, Sir; nobody present.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I won't open this, it is so near the moment of adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen will keep their seats until the jury retire. [To the jury.] Get ready, gentlemen.

The Court then took a recess until 2 o'clock.

MR. BEECHER SHOWN THE GOLDEN AGE ARTICLE.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled, and the direct examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, won't you proceed now and give us the interview at Mr. Moulton's house with Mr. Moulton, in which this "Golden Age slip" was introduced? A. It was in the forenoon, if I recollect right. After the greetings I sat down by the side of his bed; he took the article and threw it carelessly over, and said he: "Read that and tell me what you think of it," and I took the article and read it through, and I was so astounded at the idea of his putting such an article before me that I said: "Good Heavens! what do you mean, Frank?" He said he wanted to know what the effect would be of the publication. "Well," says I, "the effect will be inevitable—it will just defeat everything that we have been trying to do. The publication of this matter is the disclosure of the matters, and the whole thing becomes public." "Do you think so?" said he. "Well, I know so." Well, there was but very little conversation on the subject between us, but that was about the substance of mine. We didn't argue it at all. He propounded it to me to see, and that is about the whole that passed between us.

Q. Did you read the whole of this slip, including the Bowen letter? A. I read the whole of the Bowen letter, and I read cursorily only the last part of it.

Q. Before this time had you seen the Bowen letter? A. No, Sir; it was my first sight of it. There was something said more, I recall now; that was about those charges, the infamy of those charges of Bowen's.

Q. Well, what was said? A. Well, I don't know, Sir; I expressed myself as strongly as a clergyman and a Christian could, without swearing, on that subject, but it was an intense oburgation.

Q. What was said by Mr. Moulton, if anything, on that subject? A. I don't remember; I don't recall any conversation.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, I will ask you whether at that time, or at any other time when either the Bowen letter in its text, or any of its contents mentioned as a subject was up, you ever admitted, with or without qualification, any of the charges therein contained? A. I never did.

Q. Was there any one of those matters that you admitted in any form or degree? A. Not one—

Mr. Beach—That is calling—

The Witness [continuing]—In any manner or shape, form nor degree.

Mr. Beach—Well!

The Witness [Sotto voce—] Very well.

WHAT MR. BEECHER KNEW ABOUT THE ARBITRATION.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, how much knowledge, as they were proceeding, did you have of the arbitration, the "Tripartite Covenant" and the settlement, or payment to Mr. Tilton? A. Very little of it, Sir.

Q. Won't you narrate to us what you had to do with any of its preliminaries.

Mr. Beach—Had to do with whom?

Mr. Evarts—With any one concerned in that "Tripartite Agreement."

Mr. Beach—Well, with Mr. Bowen, do you mean?

Mr. Evarts—It has been proved as a transaction, resulting in the joint action of the three parties, in a final covenant—Bowen, Tilton, and Beecher—and including the pecuniary arbitration between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—The question calls for anything the witness had to do with any party—or person, rather.

Judge Nelson—It is too broad in that respect.

Mr. Evarts—Any party to that agreement.

Mr. Beach—Well, what he had to do with Mr. Bowen we have nothing to do with.

Mr. Evarts—What had you to do, if anything, Mr. Beecher, toward having such an agreement made.

Mr. Beach—I object to that question, Sir, unless it was with Mr. Tilton, or Mr. Moulton as his agent.

The Witness—I had something to do with it in regard to Mr. Moulton, nothing with regard to any other parties.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, now, what? A. I had something to do with it before I knew what I was about—what it meant, namely: Mr. Moulton talked with me about whether there could not be an arbitration, and a quiet settlement of all our difficulties, including the payment of the debt owed by Mr. Bowen to Mr. Tilton, and the burying of all difficulties finally and out of sight, and wanted to know if it would not be a good thing to ask some of my influential friends in the church to act in the matter as a consulting committee, as I understood it. I said I thought it would be very good, if he would manage it, and he mentioned—I mentioned names. "Well," I said, "Mr. James Freeland is a friend of Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Cleveland is a friend of Mr. Bowen, and they are both upright men and I will trust anything"—as far as I was concerned I didn't know that there was anything to be trusted, but I expressed that they, I had no doubt, would do the thing perfect justice. And that was the first dawn, I think, of the matter on my mind. Afterward, when the matter took some more form, I then learned more about it, namely: that it was to be—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—From Mr. Moulton? A. From Mr. Moulton I learned that there was to be—that there had been, as I understood him—some preliminary meetings, and that they meant to draw up articles which should include us all, and have a final settlement. I knew no more, that I recollect now, from any party until I was called to sign it.

Q. Well, what was brought to you, and by whom, for your signature? A. I suppose, from what I have heard here in the trial, the first draft was brought to me—that is to say, the draft unchanged—in the article that concerns Mr. Tilton, because I recollect reading that distinctly, and I was inquired of if I would sign it; I said I would. Afterward the draft was brought me again by Mr. Claflin, who said that Mr.—

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir; I object to what passed between Mr. Claflin and Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Well, brought to you with what? A. With reference to some emendations on Mr. Bowen's part, to which I assented. It was then, after a time, brought to me for signature, after the change had been introduced in Mr. Tilton's part of it, and I signed it. That is, I think, about my history in connection with that.

Q. And, personally, then, Mr. Beecher, you took no further part in that matter than you have now stated? A. No, Sir; I had no—I was merely a recipient, an obedient actor in it; it was managed wholly by others.

MR. TILTON CUTS LOOSE FROM MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember anything arising, or brought to your notice, in reference to what has been spoken of as the "Tilt for Tat Article," proceeding from the Woodhull and Claflin press? A. I never saw it; I heard it spoken of.

Q. Was anything said to you about it, about its character, or the purpose of its publication—of the intention of its publication—the intention that it should be published—by Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton? A. I don't think that he—I have heard allusion made to it by Mr. Tilton, but not under that designation; I never heard that designation until I sat in court here.

Q. Well, how was it designated? A. I merely heard him make a statement that the occasion of his breaking with the Woodhulls was an article which they—as I understood—they proposed to publish, but which was going about in slips, and included in it the names of a great many respectable men and women, against whom charges were made, and that, on seeing that, he had gone down in great indignation and broken his connection with her as gloriously as he had formed it.

Q. He so stated to you? A. He represented to me as breaking it with great dignity, Sir, and circumstance.

Q. And about when was that statement to you by Mr. Tilton? A. I don't know; I cannot tell you, Sir; I could find out, but I don't recall now.

Q. Now, Sir, when Mr. Tilton was making any narrative to you about this article, and the subsequent termination of his relations with Mrs. Woodhull, did you say to him that you thought that he had done an unwise thing to break his acquaintance with that woman; that she had been "sufficiently dangerous even when we were on friendly terms with her, but there was no telling what she might do if we became her enemies"—did he say anything to you of that kind? A. Did he say anything to me?

Q. Did you say anything to him? A. No.

Q. Of that kind during an interview when he was telling you of his break with the Woodhulls? A. I did not; I thought he did well to break the connection, but I don't remember ever to have said so.

Q. Did you urge him to continue with Mr. Moulton the same kindly services in order to strengthen the same influence with Mrs. Woodhull? A. Just the other way; I never urged them at all; they were perpetually praising her, and apologizing or explaining; I never urged them at all.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton has said this:

I wish to say distinctly to the jury that my relationship to Mrs. Woodhull was a foolish one and a wrong one, as the event has justified, and I don't ask any man to defend me for it, but to blame me for it; but I say here, before God, that Mr. Beecher is as much responsible for my connection with Mrs. Woodhull as I am myself.

Now, what share— A. I say before God, Sir, that I was not responsible at all for it.

Q. Well, any connection with it? A. It was a surprise to me in the beginning.

Mr. Beach—Well, you have answered the question.

MR. BEECHER AND THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, in reference to the occurrence in the end of October or the beginning of November, 1872, the publication in the Woodhull & Claflin paper of what has been known as the scandal—the Woodhull scandal—prior to the appearance of that paper, had you heard in any way or in any form the suggestion that there was to appear such a publication? A. I had.

Mr. Beach—Well, from whom?

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will take first the fact whether he had heard in any way.

The Witness—I had.

Mr. Evarts—In what way had that come to your knowledge?

Mr. Beach—Well, I object to that question, Sir. It may have come in some form which we had no connection with. I don't know.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think it is one of those general questions he might answer—if it came to his knowledge by speech or print. The only question will be whether it can be pursued afterward.

Mr. Beach—The question calls for rather more than that, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It is a simple question.

Mr. Beach—I shall have to stop the witness then; that is all.

The Witness—My first was a mere—I cannot give it, except that I had a vague impression, and from what sources derived I cannot say; my first definite knowledge was the visitation at my house of a tall, thin, lank old gentleman of about 60 years of age, who came to tell me that there was an awful thing a-going to be published about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Beach—One moment.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; it is too awful to tell here, I guess.

Judge Neilson—Well, we can dismiss the gentleman, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't know. I don't wish to pursue it against any indication of your Honor, but—

The Witness—He said they were getting up—

Mr. Beach—No; one moment.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if you saw it in this newspaper—this Woodhull & Claflin paper, that this announcement was made—I ask you whether it was in reference to a publication in this Woodhull & Claflin newspaper that this announcement by this stranger was made?

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir. That calls for the substance of the communication. We have nothing to do with that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We have nothing to do with this mysterious visitor.

Mr. Evarts—As it stands, perhaps.

Judge Neilson—I think we shall assume that there was no other but that paper.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton introduced the subject, if your Honor please, in his testimony. [Reading.]

Did you ever see or hear of that publication or any portion of it being in slips and proposed to be published before it was published? A. No, Sir; all I ever heard on that subject was after I got home, through Mr. Beecher, who said it had been presented to him, or, at least, he had been spoken to in advance of its publication, and, as I understood, some blackmail had been levied upon him.

Now, I want to show that he did not pay any blackmail in that transaction.

Judge Neilson—You can examine him on that statement, whatever is there.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher, did you tell Mr. Tilton what had happened on that subject? A. Very likely; I don't remember it.

Q. Did you tell him that any blackmail had been levied on you? A. No; none had.

Q. What did you say on that subject to him, about blackmail? A. If I said anything I said—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, one moment.

Mr. Beach—He says he don't remember it.

Mr. Morris—Mr. Tilton has not said that there was any blackmail. He said this: "And as I understood some blackmail had been levied on him." That is what he said.

Mr. Evarts—Well, this generally disproves that.

Mr. Beach—That the witness denies.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, he does deny it.

Mr. Morris—That don't disprove that Mr. Tilton so understood it.

Judge Neilson [to the Witness]—Do you recollect that you said anything on the subject? A. To Mr. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. I don't recollect anything, Sir. I think it more than probable that I did, but I do not recall definitely that I did.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Sir, I think it is competent for me to show what did occur in reference to any advertisement or notice to Mr. Beecher of any such intended publication.

Judge Neilson—The fact appears that he had notice from this mysterious visitor. Is not that sufficient?

Mr. Evarts—Except that it is not very definite or explicit.

Judge Neilson—We cannot make it very definite, as the person is a stranger and not connected with the suit at all in any form.

Mr. Fullerton—And from the description, probably a ghost; I don't know.

The Witness—Yes, there is something very curious.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know what he had to do with this world's affairs.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton has also stated this: [Reading.

My impression is that he made a statement to the effect, a few days before it was published, that some person had called upon him and notified him that such a publication was going to be made, and that he considered the call in the light of a threatening visit, and had rebuffed the man.

Q. Sent him away! A. Yes, Sir, that is the substance of it.

The Witness—If you ask me that question about Mr. Moulton, I think I could tell you that I did tell him.

Q. Well, now, in regard to Mr. Tilton, I will ask you this: Do you remember whether you told him that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or what he says made that impression upon him. Well, Sir, now did this call or this advertisement of the intended publication form the subject of any communication between Mr. Moulton and yourself? A. I rehearsed it to Mr. Moulton, Sir.

Q. What did you tell him about it? A. Well, I merely described the old gentleman, and told him that I saw from that that there was something coming; and that he seemed to be a great deal distressed, and said that he came over to see if the thing could not be stopped in some way.

Q. That is, this messenger, you mean? A. Yes, Sir; I told him that I saw no way to stop it; I thought the way was to let it go out; Mr. Moulton suggested that the man came over for blackmail; it hadn't quite occurred to me before, and then I fell in with that view; I supposed that the old man had come poking over there to find out whether I was disposed to compromise the matter.

Q. At any rate, that was the result of the transaction? A. That was the result.

Q. And communicated by you to Mr. Moulton; whether you told the thing to Mr. Tilton you have no recollection? A. I don't remember; my interviews were ten to one with Mr. Moulton.

Q. To what they were with Mr. Tilton? A. Mr. Tilton; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, when the publication itself took place, how was it first brought to your notice? A. I think the first that I heard of its actual occurrence was from Mr. McKelway, who came to me from The Eagle office, saying that—

Mr. Beach—One moment, if you please.

Judge Neilson—Well, he came to you from The Eagle office and gave you notice in reference to it; will that do? The Witness—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Go on, Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—We object, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Put a question that you regard as proper to be answered.

Q. The first notice that you had from Mr. McKelway, what did he advise you about this publication?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take his conversation, I think. If he gave Mr. Beecher notice, I think we could take that simple naked fact.

Mr. Beach—The witness has said that the first notice that he had of the appearance of this publication was from Mr. McKelway.

Mr. Evarts—How did he give you that notice?

Mr. Beach—That I object to.

The Witness—I would change, then, the word "notice" to "information."

Judge Neilson—He called on you, did he? A. He called upon me, assuming that I had seen it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, did he speak to you of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Called upon you and spoke to you of this publication, as already made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you then seen it? A. No, Sir.

Q. And before he thus spoke to you had you heard of its having been made? A. I don't think I had, Sir.

Q. Well, thereafter what did you have—how did you come into knowledge or action about it in any way? A. I repaired with him to Mr. Kinsella, and we had a conference.

Q. Was the article there? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Did you see it there? A. I did not see it; I understood it to be in the office.

Q. But you did not see it? A. I did not see it.

Q. And were you advised of its general nature or contents? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By these gentlemen, or one of them? A. I was; I asked Mr. McKelway to give me the substance of it.

Q. And he did so? A. He did so.

Q. Now, when did you first see or read the article itself? A. Never have yet. I am select in my reading.

Q. Now, when did any matter of conference come up, consequent upon this—

The Witness—I, perhaps, ought to correct that, Mr. Evarts, by saying that after this trial had begun, and I was counseled to read everything about it, I undertook to read it one day and got a little way along with it, but I have forgotten it, and never have resumed it.

Q. When and how did it first come up as a matter of conference or consultation between you and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, or either of them? A. I went directly from The Eagle office to see Mr. Moulton about it.

Q. Did Mr. McKelway go with you? A. He did.

Q. And saw Mr. Moulton in his counting-house in New-York, or where? A. In New-York—yes, Sir; he was busy when we went there, and after transacting his business, which took some little time, he then turned to me and we had some conversation about it behind the accountant's reticulated bar; and then we came out and walked toward home—we going over the Montague-st. Ferry, and Mr. McKelway going on, I think, over Fulton Ferry.

Q. Well, what was said between you then about that publication? Had Mr. Moulton seen it? A. I do not remember that he said that he had. He advised me to say nothing about it, and as that was a part of the errand of Mr. McKelway, to know what I thought or wished to say, I acted upon that counsel, and he left us.

Q. You so informed Mr. McKelway? A. I did.

Q. Was Mr. McKelway's errand in connection with the newspaper with which he was connected? A. It was professional entirely.

THE CONSULTATIONS ABOUT THE SCANDAL.

Q. Now, afterward was the question whether a publication or answer of any kind should be prepared the subject of consultation, and with whom, in which you took part? A. Not consultation, but of advice from many parties.

Mr. Beach—We object to what occurred with other parties.

Mr. Evarts—Did other parties offer you advice on the subject? A. There did.

Q. Voluntarily? A. They came to my house

Q. Voluntarily? A. Voluntarily.

Mr. Beach—We object to that

Mr. Evarts—I don't intend to show the advice.

Mr. Beach—But you do.

Mr. Evarts—I do not. You cannot see from anything he said whether he advised him or not to publish it.

Mr. Beach—You are mistaken. However, we won't discuss that.

Q. Did you receive advice from a variety of people? A. I did.

Q. Now, what part did you take, and with whom, in discussing or determining whether any answer should be made? A. With Mr. Moulton principally, and Mr. Tracy.

Q. Now, when did you see Mr. Moulton, and where? A. I saw him at his house, I suspect, the next day; it may have been that same evening—that evening or the next day.

Q. By a set appointment? A. I do not remember, Sir; I presume so.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton present at that? A. No; Mr. Tilton, if I recall it right, was not in town.

Q. What was the conference between you and Mr. Moulton on that subject, at that time? A. My own counsel was very little. He seems not to have had a doubt in his mind from the beginning; and his counsel was, first and last, to me, that the matter was to be treated with contemptuous silence.

Q. You have mentioned Mr. Tracy, Mr. Beecher; was he connected with Mr. Moulton in this conference in any way? A. No, Sir.

Q. In what way did he have any connection with this matter? A. You ask me with whom I consulted for that, as I understand. If you will read the question I will tell you why I put that answer in.

Q. Well, was Mr. Tracy in connection with these numbers of people that you have spoken of as having advised you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not with Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not with any conference? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is substantially all excluded, I suppose. [To the Witness.] When next, or further, did any matter come up as to whether an answer was to be made, or the policy of silence still maintained, in which you took any part? A. I cannot give you any detail of it. It was a thing that was agreed upon at once, and there was within the week, I should say, or ten days, various conferences, or consultations rather, between Mr. Moulton and me and Mr. Tilton, in regard to it, but all of them eventuating alike.

Q. Well, now, when did any interview with Mr. Tilton first occur? A. On his return from his New-Hampshire trip.

Q. That was soon after? A. Soon after; yes, Sir.

Q. And what conference was there in which he and you both took part? A. A conference in Mr. Moulton's study in the morning. He came there very much excited.

Q. Were you there already? A. I think I was there when he came in; I think I was first with Mr. Moulton. I may be mistaken about that.

Q. Was this meeting, Mr. Beecher, one by appointment? A. I don't know.

Q. You were there with Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Tilton came in? A. I think that was so.

Q. Well, that you have stated. Before Mr. Tilton came in was there any conversation between you and Mr. Moulton on this subject? A. If there was any I don't recall it.

Q. After Mr. Tilton came in, what then occurred? A. Mr. Tilton denounced the matter with indignation, and declared that he should, wherever he went, deny it as an infamous and an atrocious thing. He spoke to my heart's content about it; and he took me by the hand, and I think by both hands, and authorized me, in his name, everywhere—he enjoined it on me to deny it as an infamous and an atrocious falsehood, and that in the presence of Mr. Moulton. The question of making this contradiction in the public papers was something different. It was understood that we should adhere—we should refrain from publication.

Q. As a part of this interview or conference was anything said by you of a wish or preference in regard to denial? A. I said I was prepared to make a written denial if it was thought best, but that it ought to be a denial that should go out from Mr. Tilton, and from me, and from Mr. Moulton, as all of us were implicated in the statement, as I understood from what had been told me.

Q. How was that proposition received and disposed of by the gentlemen? A. Well, I thought that there was an inclination in the first interview—they took it into consideration; that is what I thought.

Q. That was the substance of the interview? A. That was the substance of the interview. It was to be denied, and if there was to be any card it must be something for further deliberation.

Q. How soon thereafter did any conference on that subject come up, and what occurred? A. Well, I cannot say exactly, but I should say in November or December, the last of the month or early in the month, there was a pressure which led Mr. Moulton to reopen the question whether something might not be appropriately done.

Q. In the way of publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how was that talked of, and what was the disposition to it? A. There was nothing came of it.

Q. Was there at any time any decision or agreement that there should be a publication? A. There was no agreement that there should be. We adhered still to our original purpose to let the thing die.

Q. Now, after this interview that you have spoken of, do you recall any further interview between you and these two gentlemen, or either of them, still on the subject of publication of denial or response? A. It was a matter of conversation, of course, every time we met. How frequently we met about that time I do not now charge myself to remember.

Q. Do you remember that it was a subject that was under consideration? A. It was.

Q. Several times, and several days? A. I told them what was said to me, and what was written to me, and they told me what they heard in their various perambulations, and we undertook to form a judgment of whether, or rather I deferred very much to Mr. Moulton's judgment in the matter; I always deferred as much as I could, and that was very generally, not always, to his judgment of things.

Q. And following this publication of the Woodhull matter, was there at any time a conclusion or decision to make a public response? A. There was something which I understood at first to mean that, but I was mistaken.

Q. Now, Sir, at either of these interviews, when Mr. Tilton was present, did this occur, as stated by Mr. Tilton:

Mr. Tilton said the reason why he felt that the best policy would be to say nothing on the subject in public was this, that if any denial was made it would only provoke the Woodhulls to reproduce the story in some other form, to reiterate it; that a denial would not quell it; that they evidently meant mischief, and that they would repeat it in one form or another; if it was denied once, it would have to be denied twice, and perhaps three times, and many times.

Do you remember anything of that kind occurring? A. No, Sir; I remember something akin, but different.

Q. How do you understand the matter? A. I only said this, as I recall it, that we had got to make up our minds not on a single fact, but on a system; that if we went into the newspapers to deny the newspaper reports, we would have to continue, for, having begun such a thing as that, we would have to follow it up, and it should be taken into consideration in forming our policy, not simply of this one, but of any.

THE PROPOSED CARDS RENOUNCING MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember expressing an opinion at one of these conferences, at a meeting a little later, that you said you had changed your mind in regard to the policy of having nothing said in public, and that you said you thought Mr. Tilton ought to publish a card? Do you remember that stage of the matter? A. I always said from the first that if anything was done it was not for me to do it alone, that it was peculiarly necessary that Mr. Tilton should publish it in the defense of his family.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember any consideration of the subject between you in which you expressed yourself in this way that—

That the time had passed when silence concerning the Woodhull scandal was a wise policy; there was so much clamor on the part of the public as manifested in the press, so much inquiry in the church and congregation—so many demands made upon you by your friends—that the pressure was getting to be unendurable.

And then that you advised a scheme of this kind:

Now, suppose we should appeal to that sentiment in the community—that is, the sentiment that where there is so much smoke there must be some fire, as stated in this connection—suppose, for instance, that some reputable paper speaking semi-officially as authorized by the parties in the case—say THE NEW-YORK TRIBUNE—should publish an editorial to the effect that there was some ground for Mrs. Woodhull's publications, not the ground which she stated, but that that ground existed in certain stories which Mr. Henry C. Bowen had told a year or two previous against Mr. Beecher, and which Mr. Bowen himself had in a written instrument six months before—namely, April 2, 1872—retracted. "Now," said he "suppose we get some semi-editorial utterances, not signed by our own names, to that effect, that there was this ground for those stories. Let that be stated, and let us cut from the Tripartite Covenant the section which Mr. Bowen signed, retracting those stories, and let us put that into the newspapers. It will satisfy public curiosity; people will say: 'Well, we always knew there must be something in the Woodhull story, and now we know what it is; it is a collection of stories which Bowen has told, and which Bowen has retracted.'"

Mr. Tilton gives the narrative, and closes it by speaking of you as "having suggested that as a device in the middle of the Winter of 1872, to meet and counteract the Woodhull tale." Now, Sir, did anything of that kind occur on your part in the suggestion, or proposition, or statement, or conversation? A. Not one solitary sentence, or thought, or suggestion—not one. It's absolute fiction so far as I am concerned. I heard some parts of that suggested, but I was not the man that spoke it.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Morris]—Now, you have a card in evidence—the proposed renunciation of Mrs. Woodhull by Mr. Tilton in an unguarded enthusiasm. What is the number of that?

Mr. Morris—No. 23.

Mr. Evarts [to the Witness]—Is that among your papers?

The Witness—I don't know. What is the date of it?

Mr. Evarts—No date to it, but it is in December, 1872, I think, somewhere about that; November or December. [Handing book to witness.] There it is.

The Witness—Well, what do you ask me, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—I call your attention to it, and then I will ask you a question, Do you remember about that as coming up? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As a proposition for consideration at some one of these interviews? A. Not this card, but I remember cards.

Q. Were there various cards? A. Yes, Sir; that is to say, the conversation arose in Mr. Moulton's room, and I think Mr. Tilton was not present, and I said to Mr. Moulton, "It seems to me that Mr. Tilton will never get quit of this matter so long as he has among good people the reputation of believing in those women and in their doctrines, and my idea of deliverance is in a generous and manly act to cut himself loose from them." Mr. Moulton seemed to be struck with it, and said: "Well, suppose you draw up something such as you mean;" I sketched two or three forms, tentative forms, and one that I thought was pretty good, but that is not this one.

Q. Is that your sketch or not [handing a paper]? A. I cannot say; I made three or four little beginnings, and they were unsatisfying, and I finally fell on a form of statement that I liked better, and that was proposed and declined.

Q. Now, in reference to any—I will read this card—

Mr. Morris—Have you got the number of that?

Mr. Evarts—No; I will read this little one.

Mr. Morris—I will give you the original.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't care anything about it.

The Witness—I don't know whether this is one of those beginnings of cards or not, Sir; I cannot tell.

Mr. Evarts—Well, here is the original exhibit. [Handing paper to Witness.] That will show you whether it is your handwriting or not? A. I think this was the first attempt, the first idea, when it occurred to me.

Q. Well, that is your writing? A. Yes, Sir; I think that I wrote it in a blank book and tore out the leaf, and went to Mr. Moulton with it, and that that gave rise to something more, until something grew out of it.

Mr. Beach—Let me see that. [Taking the paper.]

Mr. Evarts—Now, this statement:

In an unguarded enthusiasm I hoped well and much of one who has since proved thoroughly unprincipled. I shall never again notice her, and now utterly repudiate her stories made concerning me and mine.

That was proposed to be signed by Mr. Tilton, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did Mr. Tilton, in reference to that card, and as an objection to its being published by him, say to you that you knew it was not an unguarded enthusiasm that led him, Tilton, to Mrs. Woodhull, but that he went for the purpose of protecting his family, and himself, and Mr. Beecher, from the result of a story which she originally threatened—was that said to you? A. No, Sir, it was not.

Q. Anything of the kind? A. Nothing of the kind. This was not designed, you know, to be a card of denial of the story.

Q. Well, it speaks for itself, that card does. Now, at any of these interviews, did you say to Mr. Moulton, after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, that you had come to consult with him, Moulton, as to what it was best to do with reference to the publication—what reply could be made, if any reply could be made—did you in that connection, or in any other way, say to him that you saw no hope for yourself since that story had been published? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything in connection with that subject, or how did you express yourself, if at all? A. I don't remember. I only remember what I didn't say.

Q. Nothing of that kind was said by you in regard to yourself? A. No, Sir.

FUN OVER THE DELIBERATENESS OF THE EXAMINATION.

Q. At this time, or during this period of interviews, do you remember—

[Mr. Evarts here consulted with Mr. Shearman.]

Mr. Evarts—Exhibit 47, gentlemen?

[Mr. Morris handed a paper to Mr. Evarts.]

Mr. Evarts—This is not the one that I refer to, Mr. Morris. That is the one. [Indicating on a memorandum.]

Mr. Morris—What is the number?

Mr. Evarts—I don't know.

Mr. Morris—If you will tell me the number I will get it.

Mr. Shearman—47.

Mr. Morris—47 is the one that I have produced.

[Consultation and delay on the part of defendant's counsel.]

Mr. Shearman—Try 46.

Mr. Evarts—46 is the one.

Mr. Shearman—Halliday's interview—it is 47. [Further delay.]

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps I had better cross-examine a spell, Sir, until they get ready to go on. [Laughter.]

Mr. Beecher—I am ready.

Judge Neilson—We will do that if you will agree to close this afternoon. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—We will close, as some flowers do, at 4 o'clock, and open again next morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—Have you found the number yet, gentlemen?

Mr. Evarts—In the evidence it is marked as 46.

Mr. Morris—You called for 47.

Mr. Evarts—I know.

Mr. Morris—I give you the ones you call for.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. This is 46, isn't it?

Mr. Morris—That is 46.

Mr. Evarts—I have just discovered that memorandum down there. [To the Witness.] Now, Sir, please look at that note and recall to your mind that period, if you can. That refers to an interview between Mr. Halliday and Mr. Moulton as having taken place, does it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Moulton reported to you that interview, didn't he? A. Yes, Sir; I believe he did.

Q. In connection with Mr. Moulton's reporting to you that interview, or any reference to these interviews taking place before it took place, did anything of this kind occur between you and Mr. Moulton—that Mr. Moulton was not to tell Mr. Halliday the facts? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; he didn't want to tell him any more than I did.

[Further consultation and delay.]

Mr. Morris [Impatiently]—The stenographer has got down that last answer, gentlemen.

Mr. Evarts—Look at that letter, Mr. Beecher, which is without date, and say how soon after this Woodhull scandal was made public that letter was written by you to Mrs. Tilton? A. Within three or four weeks.

Q. Was that written in pursuance of any conference or in any way? A. It was upon—no, not a conference; it was written—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, that was the question.

The Witness [Continuing]—Upon a suggestion, not a conference.

Mr. Evarts—Well, from whom did any suggestion come? A. I think Mr. Moulton said that it would be agreeable to Mr. Tilton if I would address to his wife a note of sympathy.

Q. Did you address it, and at that time? A. He said that if I wrote a note of sympathy, addressed to her, denying that I believed in the matters, he thought it would be agreeable both to Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton, and I wrote this letter and handed it to Mr. Moulton, who was not satisfied with it.

Q. Well, what became of it?

Mr. Fullerton—What is that number?

Mr. Evarts—"D, 103."

A. He said that he had sent it; he told me afterward that he had explained to Mr. Tilton the point of view from which I had written it, as I had explained it to him. I found after I had left it with him, and when I saw him again, that they had expected that I would write a letter of denial to Mrs. Tilton, and I wrote that.

Q. Well, you handed it to him and he sent it to Mrs. Tilton, as you understood? A. Yes, Sir; as I understood.

PLANS FOR A TRIPARTITE DENIAL.

Q. Mr. Tilton has spoken, Mr. Beecher, of an interview—toward the close of December—he gives it 1872—the period that we are now at. Now, toward the end of this month of December, or during this month of December, 1872, or November and December, 1872, do you remember any conference between Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton and yourself at which the matter of some public denial in some form was considered, and any papers produced or read or examined? A. Nothing in November. There was a conference the last of December.

Q. The last of December? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did that occur? A. At Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. And who were parties to that consideration—who were present? A. Well, Mr. Tilton, Mrs. Tilton, and myself, in the immediate consultation, and in the preparatory stage of it, Mr. Moulton; Mr. Moulton said to me that Mr. Tilton had got a plan, he thought, by which he could make some form of statement that would clear him of the imputations that were resting upon him, and, at the same time, that the whole matter could be set in such a way before the public as would be for the furtherance of the interests all around.

Q. Yes; very well. Now, at this time when Mrs. Tilton was present, Mr. Beecher, there were some letters, were there not? A. Yes, we had—I had been requested to prepare a letter of denial to accompany a statement, if such a one should be made; and Mr. Tilton was to make a statement, also, in denial, and Mrs. Tilton was to make a statement, or rather a denial to go into some sort of statement.

Q. But it was when some letters of that kind were up that Mrs. Tilton was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, prior to that, was there an interview between yourself, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, at which the paper or document that has been called the "True Story" was read? A. No.

Q. Was there an occasion at which that was read? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was it? A. Later than that.

MR. BEECHER INDIGNANT OVER THE "TRUE STORY."

Q. You think it was later than that? Now, we will take that interview where the "True Story" was read. Who were present at that time? A. Mr. Moulton myself and Mr. Tilton.

Q. Where did the meeting take place? A. In Mr. Moulton's bed-room.

Q. Now state what took place there? A. Mr. Moulton told me that Mr. Tilton would come around and read a statement that he had prepared; I had heard nothing of it, except that he was preparing something; I asked Mr. Moulton what it was; he said that he didn't know—he hadn't read it himself, but that Mr. Tilton was going to read it to him and to me that night; so I went there to hear it, and Mr. Tilton—shall I give you the interview?

Q. Yes; just state it. A. Mr. Tilton began, sitting on the sofa, to fix his papers, and opened the matter to me by saying that there was one single sentence that if I could stand, he thought I should be able to stand the whole document; and then he commenced reading; he did not read the sentence; he began reading what was called afterward the "True Story," and read on until he came to that passage in which I was charged with asking Mrs. Tilton to be a wife to me, with all that is implied in that term, and he looked up and said, "That is the sentence that if you can stand, the rest of the document won't hurt you;" I made no reply; I was lying on the bed, I think; he went on reading, I getting madder and madder, and when he had finished I got up and began to walk around the room, and said nothing; but finally I think he or Mr. Moulton asked me what I had to say. [Murmurs of applause among the audience.]

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, please be quiet there. I think I see a storm rising.

Mr. Beecher [in an undertone]—It is a mistake this time. A. [continued]—I walked up and down the room, and finally I turned to him and said—

Q. To whom? A. To Mr. Tilton. I said, very quietly, "Mr. Tilton, it is not for me to say what you shall or you shall not publish, but I want you to understand that if you publish that statement and that sentence in it, I will not stand it, nor agree to it, and it is the end. I will not have any such statement as that come out, and not meet it peremptorily." At that he gathered himself up, lion-like, his face flushed, and he began to storm very loud on the subject, and Mr. Moulton took him in hand instantly, and I drew back out of it, and the lion and the tiger had the fight by themselves. It was a good lively discussion, and in respect to the structure of the whole document, and in respect to the insertion of that part of the time Mr. Moulton was in the ascendancy, and part of the time I thought that Mr. Tilton had the best of it, and it went on so for a very considerable period and ended unsatisfactorily to all three of us, I am persuaded. That was the substance of that interview.

Q. As the result of that interview was there any determination to publish that "True Story?"

Mr. Beach—Oh, well! ask what was expressed.

A. Nothing said.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Evarts—Nothing further said? A. No.

Q. Did you understand that it was to be published?

Mr. Beach—I object to that. Wait a moment.

Q. Was the result of that interview in respect of whether that was to be published or not?

Mr. Beach—I submit that he cannot state the result, except by stating what was said.

Judge Neilson—Certainly, that is so. What was said on that subject, if anything?

Mr. Evarts—Well, what was said further? A. Nothing.

Q. Before you broke up? A. Nothing that I remember; there was nothing said about printing it at any rate, first, middle, nor last, that I recall.

Q. Was not that paper read as one that was proposed for publication?

Mr. Beach—One moment; I object to that.

Judge Neilson—What was said on that subject?

Mr. Evarts—How was the matter introduced? Why was the paper read to you?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, except so far as it calls for what was said.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what was said concerning that paper before it was read to you?

Mr. Beach—Why, I understood Mr. Beecher to say that in that interview before this he was requested to come there and hear a paper that was proposed to be published.

The Witness—Then I would like to correct that statement, Mr. Beach, so far as to say that I was to hear a statement that was drawn up by Mr. Tilton, and, while I understood that it was for publication, I should not be willing to say that that was stated as the object.

Mr. Evarts—I ask when was anything said about its being published?

Mr. Beach—He says there was nothing said.

Mr. Evarts—I now ask you the question when was anything said about this being published, to which you could reply if it was published, you would not endure it at all? A. I had the impression all the while—of course not because they said so, but why should they draw up a story but to publish?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, one moment.

The Witness—I said if this is published I will do so and so, but that don't follow that they said they were going to publish it.

Q. Well, when Mr. Tilton said to you, "If you can stand one passage in it, you can stand the whole"—A. Yes, sir.

Q. [Continuing] Did that convey the meaning to you that if you could stand the publication of it—

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; I object to that.

Judge Neilson—You cannot add to what was said.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly not.

Mr. Evarts—I understand perfectly.

Mr. Beach—I don't think anybody will deny that Mr. Beecher understood it was proposed for publication; I certainly don't.

Q. Well, now, that being so, then at the close, or before your interview terminated, in what position was the question of publication left?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir; there is one way of getting at that, and that is by what was said.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if nothing was said!

Mr. Fullerton—Then take that, and draw your own inferences.

Mr. Beach—The witness has told you that nothing was said except what he has related.

Mr. Fullerton—He cannot go on and add what position it was left in, if nothing was said.

Mr. Beach—What do you want to know?

Mr. Evarts—I want to know if that meeting broke up with that idea, or not? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, there was nothing said on the subject; so your knowledge will have to be derived from that.

Mr. Evarts—We are always permitted, I suppose, to prove the conclusion of a conference whether a word was said ending it—you don't end everything with a word—parties go off leaving the thing incomplete for further consideration without determination; that is all I wish to make out here.

The Witness—If you will allow me, Mr. Evarts; I left before the parties left.

Q. Before they left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, when you left— A. When I left they were at it.

Q. In a talk? A. Yes, Sir; more or less of it.

Q. Well, that disposes of the matter; then, you were not there at the end? A. I was not.

Q. Now, what was the last thing that you said on the subject of that statement— A. I think the first thing and the last thing were the same.

Q. Well, what were they, what was the last? A. That if that statement in it to which he had called my attention primarily, and which then, when he read the statement I heard, substantially this, was to come out in that document or to be published in that document, I would not stand it—that I should make fight.

Q. And was that all that was said during that interview by you on the subject? A. That was the substance of what was said during that interview by me. My remarks were not many.

Q. And you left then? A. Not then; I heard them—

Q. Well, you left? A. [Continuing.] Diplomitize for some time, and then I left.

Q. And left before they had concluded their discussion? A. Yes, Sir; it had become far more quiet and temperate, and I left.

Q. Well, now, did you ever see or hear read that paper again? A. Never.

Q. Was it ever brought before you or to your notice by Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton as a proposed publication? A. Never.

Q. Now, we will take the occasion, Mr. Beecher, at which Mrs. Tilton was present a part of the time? A. That was preceding this, Sir.

Q. Yes, and when was that—at the end of December? Do you know the date of it? A. It was not far from that, I think; the last or among the last days of December.

Q. Where was this interview held? A. The back chamber of Mr. Moulton's house, second story.

Q. Was an appointment—had an appointment been made for that meeting? A. Yes, Sir, there had.

Q. And by whom and in what manner had the appointment been made? A. I don't know in what manner; Mr. Moulton had made it.

Q. Well, made it with you? A. Had made it with me and Mr. Tilton, as I understood, but I cannot say anything about that.

A MEETING ABOUT THE TRIPARTITE DENIAL.

Q. Well, made it with you, had he? A. I went to an agreed appointment at Mr. Moulton's house for the purpose of exchanging, or rather comparing and adjusting letters.

Q. For publication? A. For publication, if it should seem the best.

Q. Now, what occurred there, and who were present at the first occurrence? A. I cannot recall whether Mr. Moulton was present at first or not, Sir—if he was, he left soon, and Mr. Tilton and I were left, Mrs. Moulton also being in and out; and I think it was desired to have Mrs. Tilton present, and Mr. Frank Carpenter, the artist, coming in about that time, he was sent around to bring her—to bring Mrs. Tilton; and I think that some conversation followed—rather, from Mr. Tilton to me there was some remarks made on the proposed document, or some statement that he was drawing up, which I did not altogether understand, for it was not read to me nor shown to me—

Q. At this time? A. At this time; nor was it in a state of entirety. I recollect his speaking of it as something that was in the process of formation, and when Mrs. Tilton came, I then drew from my pocket a letter that I had prepared in consonance with an arrangement with Mr. Moulton.

Q. What is that letter?

Mr. Shearman—Exhibit 74.

Mr. Morris—I cannot find the original, but there is a copy.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we can use that, I suppose. [Showing book to the witness.]

Q. Do you recognize that as the— A. I think that is it, Sir.

Q. Now, was there any other letter produced there, and if so, by whom, and under what form? A. When Mrs. Tilton came she came up into the room, and I think Mr. Carpenter retired, modestly, and Mrs. Tilton sat down at a little writing-table on a side of the room, and Mr. Tilton brought to her a paper written in his handwriting—I did not read the paper, but Mrs. Tilton turned and looked up at me and said, "My friend, ought I to write this? I said to her, "Elizabeth, if that expresses your sentiments—I don't know what is in it—but if it expresses your views, I don't know any reason why you should not copy it;" and with that she sat and copied the letter out from the paper in Mr. Tilton's handwriting and signed it in my presence. Then I asked Mr. Tilton for his letter—the understanding had been that there was to be a letter all round—and he said that he had not yet drawn up any; that he had not made up his mind. Then I said, putting my letter back in my pocket, "I will wait for further developments;" and that ended the interview substantially.

Q. Did you at that time read the letter of Mrs. Tilton, so that you can— A. No, Sir; I did not read it.

Q. Did not read it; you only saw her— A. I saw her copy a paper that was in the handwriting of Mr. Tilton; I neither read his paper, nor did I read her letter—her copy.

Q. So that Exhibit D, 44, you cannot say from your own knowledge that you have ever seen it? A. I don't know what Exhibit D, 44, is; I never saw the letter that Mrs. Tilton—

Q. Well, I only want to show you—I identify that for the purpose of the evidence. A. Well, I don't know anything about this, Sir; I never read it.

Q. At that time you never read it? A. Well, I don't know that I have read it since.

Q. Well, it has been in evidence. Now, at this interview at which Mrs. Tilton was present, the interview of the 29th at which Mrs. Tilton was present? A. Interview of what?

Q. Interview of the 29th? A. 29th; yes, Sir.

Q. Or thereabouts, at which Mrs. Tilton was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Get that interview separate from the other—did you say anything of this kind to Mr. Tilton:

And Mr. Beecher said that if I would never turn back upon him he would join with Mrs. Tilton in making a denial, but it will be idle for me to deny this story, leaving you at liberty at any time to publish my letter to you through Moulton; but if you will give me your word of honor that you will never, under any circumstances, make denial of no effect, I will join in such a card.

A. No, Sir, nothing of the sort; nothing.

Q. Now, did you then and there write a card at Mr. Moulton's table—this letter of yours, did you write it there? A. I brought it down there to the house in my pocket, written.

Mr. Shearman—You did not find No. 74?

Mr. Morris—No; you can use the print just as well.

Mr. Shearman—Not quite so well; we wanted to see that.

Mr. Evarts—Now, in this letter of yours to which I have just asked your attention, the letter brought there by you, occurs this sentence: "My acquaintance with Mrs.

Tilton has inspired me with the highest esteem for her modesty, propriety, and womanly graces." Mr. Tilton, speaking of that letter, says: "Mr. Beecher put in the phrase about Mrs. Tilton at my request, and I was the author of that sentence"—is that true? A. I put that sentence in from my own heart, and Mr. Tilton had no more to do with it than he had with the formation of the angels; it is absolutely my own.

Q. And it was in the letter as you brought it? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that paper, Mr. Morris, is made up of two notes; one is Mr. Moulton's and one—

Mr. Morris—Which paper are you speaking of?

Mr. Evarts—I suppose it is proper to call it a card; the card is preceded by a note to Mr. Moulton.

The Witness—Mr. Evarts, is not that in your own—among your own papers?

Mr. Evarts—No; that is their exhibit.

Mr. Porter—They introduced it.

Mr. Evarts—We produced it, and they put it in evidence; it was a paper in our possession, not in their possession; but it was produced by us on their call, and put in evidence by them, and so marked.

Mr. Beach—Well, I understand that this preceding letter to Moulton was on the same piece of paper?

The Witness—It was.

Mr. Evarts—That is the reason why I want to get at the original.

Mr. Morris—It is here; it has got in the wrong envelope. Is that it, Mr. Evarts? [Producing a paper.]

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that, I suppose, is the whole paper; that is it; all one paper. This is the paper. [Showing witness a paper.]

Mr. Morris—Will you let us have the other letter, Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Tilton's letter?

The Witness—I thought that this letter was a rewriting of one that I brought down there from my house; on seeing this there was a conference between Mr. Moulton and me as to the substance of the letter that should be written and the purport of it, what ground it was to cover, and I drew one up and went down there, and if I recollect right, read it to Mr. Moulton before he went out, and I think that there was some suggestion made that it should be addressed to him, or that there should be some change made, and that I went into his study, and copied off my own letter, my other letter, with this change suggested by him; that is my present impression.

Q. That is, with this note? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—You think now you did write it there, that particular paper? A. I think I wrote the paper in the house, but not in the presence of Mr. Tilton, nor under any suggestion; I recollect in sitting on the side of the bed and reading the letter to him while he took short notes on his knee, sitting on the other side, of the bed, of the letter; and that I took it away because I would not suffer that letter to go into his hand.

Q. Well, you took the letter away? A. I took the letter away.

Q. Wherever it was written?

Mr. Beach—Both of them?

The Witness—Well, they are on one paper.

Mr. Morris—No, there are two—the original draft.

Mr. Evarts—The original draft? A. Yes; well, about taking them away, I—the letter that I had prepared the final from I took away; I don't recollect anything about the original draft.

Q. And it was not left to be used, the other papers not being prepared? A. Furnished.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has expressed that.

Mr. Evarts—Now, was there any conversation of this kind, Mr. Beecher, at this interview, in reference to your card, or its publication? I read now from Mr. Tilton's evidence:

Mr. Beecher said to me in going away that there was only one danger in publishing his card (which I suppose means this paper), which was that, on some future occasion, if he and I should be at disagreement and I should publish his letter to me through Mr. Moulton, that his card would put him at a disadvantage before the public, because it would convict him not only of the original crime, but of a subsequent lie to hide it.

A. No, Sir; no, Sir; there wasn't a word of that kind—not a word.

Q. And as a part of that conversation, did anything of this kind occur on Mr. Tilton's part:

I told Mr. Beecher that the only possibility of his ever coming into collision with me, or of my ever coming into collision with him, would be in consequence of some injustice; that I should never lift my hand against him except in self-defense, and if he should refrain from striking me I should never do him any harm.

A. No, Sir, nothing of the kind.

Mr. Evarts having stopped to look among some papers, Mr. Morris said to the Court: It is near the time of adjournment, if your Honor pleases; I don't think the counsel will have time enough to ask another question to-night the way they have been going lately.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Morris is getting humorous.

Mr. Fullerton—They could put part of it, and finish it to-morrow.

Mr. Morris—They certainly cannot add another question in four minutes.

Judge Neilson—It is a good place to stay in; it is unpleasant outdoors—stormy.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—It is a good place to stay; it is unpleasant outdoors.

Mr. Morris—If another question gets started it will so far run over the time, I am afraid, that it will be an inconvenience to some one.

Mr. Evarts—It is not worth while to introduce any new topic this afternoon.

Mr. Morris—I knew you would agree with me.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Thursday.

SIXTY-FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

IMPORTANT TESTIMONY FOR THE DEFENDANT.

MORE OF THE EVIDENCE OF MR. TILTON AND MR. MOULTON CONTRADICTED—MR. BEECHER'S VERSION OF THE BLACKMAIL CHARGE AND "GRACE, MERCY, AND PEACE" STORY—FURTHER EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH THE ALIBI IN DENIAL OF MRS. MOULTON'S TESTIMONY OF THE CONFESSION—"THE DAY OF JUDGMENT" LETTER AND THE RESIGNATION EXPLAINED.

THURSDAY, April 8, 1875.

The proceedings opened quietly to-day, the odds and ends of the previous day's testimony being first taken up.

Mr. Beecher, in the first place, denied Mr. Tilton's testimony that he had repeated to the witness the details of the consultation with Dr. Storrs; that he had ever said to Mr. Tilton, as Mr. Moulton had sworn, that he "might just as well state the fact as to put it in that way"—as it was read to him in the "True Story;" that he had ever known of or consented to the consultations of Mr. Moulton with Mr. Tracy, as sworn to by Mr. Moulton. He corroborated Samuel Wilkeson and Oliver Johnson's statements in regard to the circumstances under which the latter was employed on The Christian Union, denying that Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton had suggested or been instrumental in making that engagement. Mr. Beecher's denials of these various matters were varied and emphatic.

Mr. Evarts next turned to the charge of blackmail, and elicited from Mr. Beecher his version of the payment of $5,000 to Mr. Moulton in 1873 and the receipt from Mr. Tilton, immediately afterward, of the communication which is known as the "Grace, Mercy, and Peace" letter. His explanation of the whole matter was very simple. His version of the circumstances under which the $5,000 was given did not differ materially from that of Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher adding only to the stock of information that the person tendering the stock and drafts was a lady, and that Mr. Moulton after showing them had said: "That's what I call friendship." Mr. Beecher, after thinking the matter over, had concluded that this language was intended to be suggestive, and after gently reproaching Mr. Moulton for not speaking plainly to him had given the money. The connection between this gift and the letter was not clearly established. Mr. Beecher met

Mr. Tilton's Sunday or two after the money was paid and found him in "a gracious mood." The letter breathing "Grace, Mercy and Peace," was found on his pulpit, but he could not tell when he received it; it might have been in 1873 for all he could say to the contrary. Mr. Tilton was called upon in his examination to fix the date of the delivery of this note, and put it about the 10th of June, or the Sunday following the publication of Mr. Beecher's card of June 2, 1873. The circumstances under which it was written were given in detail, and Mr. Tilton was committed to the statement that it was soon after the publication of the card of June 2. Mr. Beecher swore to-day that on the Sunday following the 2d of June he was preaching in Boston.

The card which was published in The Brooklyn Eagle on June 2, in the edition which goes to press at 8 o'clock, was introduced by a statement that it had been prepared the same morning; and Mr. Beecher swore to-day that he was with Mr. Kinsella from 10 to 11 o'clock preparing the card and arranging for its publication. This testimony for the defense covers the period named by Mrs. Moulton. Mr. Beecher, in giving his testimony to-day, claimed that there had been a brief interview between him and Mrs. Moulton on Saturday night, May 31, at which language similar to that testified to by Mrs. Moulton was used, but the meaning given was varied. This interview on Saturday night Mrs. Moulton does not admit. Mr. Beecher claims that it was the one at which she kissed him on the forehead—the only time she ever kissed him in the absence of her husband.

It was in connection with his recital of the above facts of his interview with Mrs. Moulton that Mr. Beecher gave his explanation of his letter of resignation. The original of this resignation has never been produced, but Mr. Moulton submitted a copy dictated to Mr. Tilton from memory and taken down by Mr. Tilton in shorthand. This alleged copy, which Mr. Beecher declared was not correct, reads as follows:

I hereby tender my resignation of Plymouth Church. I have stood among you in sorrow for two years in order to save from shame a certain household; but since a recent publication makes this no longer possible, I now resign my ministry and retire to private life.

Mr. Beecher endeavored to put in evidence his recollection of the letter as he wrote it, but Mr. Fullerton objected, and as proof of its destruction was not forthcoming, the witness's summary of its contents was ruled out under a familiar law governing evidence. But Mr. Beecher went on to explain that, instead of being, as represented, an expression of submission and virtually a confession of guilt, it meant to express his determination to fight the matter out. He explained that on the publication of the Tripartite Agreement, Friday, May 30, 1873, Mr. Tilton was gratified and well pleased until the afternoon papers came out, criticising him as allied with Mr. Bowen to defame Mr. Beecher who, according to the terms of the covenant, had generously forgiven both. Then Mr. Tilton had prepared for publication a card, in which the letter of contrition to Mr. Moulton was embodied in full, and threatened to publish it in The Brooklyn Eagle of the next day, Saturday. Mr. Moulton informed Mr. Beecher of this threat on Saturday morning, and the latter at once gave him notice that in that event he intended to fight the matter out to the end. On going home he immediately wrote his card of resignation, determined that his church should not be dragged into the fight with him—in fact in writing the letter of resignation he was stripping for the fight. Later on Saturday Mr. Moulton had stopped the publication of Mr. Tilton's proposed card, and on the same night the difficulties were once more patched up by the agreement of Mr. Beecher to publish the card to The Eagle, which relieved Mr. Tilton of any odium as the author of the various scandals then afloat.

Mr. Beecher's letter of June 1, 1873, sometimes termed the "Day of Judgment Letter," was next explained. Mr. Evans read it, and questioned the witness in reference to the meaning of its several passages. The expression, "one who has about finished his world life," was a reference, the witness said, to the feeling often experienced by him that he had not long to live. The words "devices by which we have saved ourselves" were declared to be a reference to the $5,000 given to Mr. Tilton in April, 1873, in order to give the latter an opportunity to remove the prejudices against him and regain public favor. "But the term 'save ourselves,'" interposed Judge Neilson, when Mr. Beecher had concluded his explanation of the clause. "It was a partnership. We were all in the same boat;" replied the witness. The phrase, "He had condoned his wife's fault," was written, Mr. Beecher said, in reference to the undue affection which he had been made to believe Mrs. Tilton had conceived for him. And by the words, "not to betray his wife or leave his children to a blight," he meant, he said, the unhappiness that would be brought upon Mr. Tilton's family should he—Mr. Beecher—reveal the supposed state of Mrs. Tilton's feelings toward him. Mr. Fullerton interrupted the explanation of this letter by frequent objections. "I shall write for the public a statement that will bear the light of the judgment day," was merely the expression, the witness said, of a determination which he had then formed. While writing the clause, "My last Sunday, and preaching my last sermon," Mr. Beecher declared he had no intention of making a reference to any thought of suicide. It was only the expression of the idea, often in his mind, that he had not long to live. In this connection Mr. Beecher spoke of the exaltation and depression of spirits which he often experienced. The latter in his youth had amounted almost to hypochondria, a disease with which his father and ancestors had suffered.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

VIGOROUS DENIALS RESPECTING THE TRUE STORY.

The Court met at 11, pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled and the direct examination continued by Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, before leaving this end of December, 1872, in regard to the notes and the "True Story," which we were considering yesterday, I call your attention now to a matter spoken of in Mr. Tilton's testimony, in which he gives an account of an interview between himself and you, in which he made statements concerning a visit or consultation on his part with the Rev. Dr. Storrs. Did any interview on that subject between you and Mr. Tilton take place? A. At any given date, do you ask?

Q. I mean at this time, in this month of December. A. I don't think there was any interview took place at any time on any subject.

Q. You remember about a letter or memorandum dated the 16th of December, 1872—I mean, that is, in evidence—of a communication made to Dr. Storrs? I call your attention to that merely to—[showing witness the article referred to.] A. What is it you wish?

Q. I don't intend to ask you anything about that. You remember it as in evidence? A. No, I don't remember it; I suppose it is in evidence in the book.

Q. Very well; that is all that I ask attention to; it is not anything in which you are concerned, according to the evidence; but after that date of the 16th of December, and during any of these conferences toward the end of December, or at any time, did you ever have any interview or conversation with Mr. Theodore Tilton concerning his visit to Dr. Storrs? A. I never did.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, when Mr. Tilton was reading what has been called the "True Story"—the paper that he read to you, as you have stated, and the reading of which he prefaced by a reference to a particular passage in it which, if you could stand all the rest—now, when he came to that passage, or at any time in that interview, did you say to Mr. Tilton in Mr. Moulton's presence, or say to Mr. Tilton on that occasion, "Theodore, you might just as well state the fact as to put it in that way?" A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did you say anything on that subject, or in that relation? A. No, Sir; not to Mr. Tilton, nor at that time to anybody.

Q. Did you afterward, at any subsequent interview with Mr. Moulton, say nothing to him concerning that passage or part of this "True Story?" A. I did.

Q. When was that? A. I don't know; it was afterward.

Q. It was afterward; well, in that season, or— A. Yes, Sir; in the immediate—near vicinity.

Q. Now, what was said between you and him on that subject? A. Well, I cannot give any detailed conversation; I only recollect but a single thing; I said that Mr. Tilton was a blockhead, or else he thought that I was, to suppose that I would stand that sentence.

Q. And was that the substance of what passed between you? A. That was about it; it was a protest on the absurdity of the thing.

MR. BEECHER SURPRISED TO LEARN THAT LAWYERS WERE ENGAGED.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton at or about this period, or in relation to the situation of this period, ever say anything to you in regard to any consultation with Mr. Tracy in any of these matters? A. He did.

Q. About when was that? A. I cannot give you very definitely; it was some time in December of that year.

Q. It was in the vicinity of the conferences that you have spoken of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In point of time. Well, Sir, what passed between you and Mr. Moulton on that subject? A. We were talking about—something about the matters, and he dropped out incidentally that he had—his lawyers had advised him so and so, and I started with surprise. "Your lawyers!" "Yes," said he; "I have—the fact is, the responsibility of this case is such that I will not carry it along any further without legal advice; but," said he, "Mr. Tracy—I called in Mr. Tracy; he is a friend of yours." And then the conversation went on; I said nothing more about it.

Q. That was all that passed on that subject? A. That was all that passed on that subject.

Q. Had you been consulted in any way in advance about Mr. Tracy being referred to or brought into the consultations? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was he in any way designated or pointed out or approved by you as a person to be consulted in your behalf or as your representative? There never was a word said to me about it, about him, or about any other body being called in.

Mr. Fullerton—No! One moment.

The Witness [continuing]—The universal understanding was that nobody was to be called in.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't go beyond answering the question.

Mr. Evarts—I call your attention now, Mr. Beecher, to some statements that Mr. Moulton has made on this subject:

I said to Mr. Beecher that my partner, Mr. Woodruff, was very anxious that I should make some statement with regard to the Victoria Woodhull publication, inasmuch as many of his friends and many of mine, or several of his friends and several of mine, had criticised my position in reference to the story; that they not only criticised me, but they criticised the firm for my relations to the story; and I said to Mr. Beecher that Mr. Woodruff recommended me, under the circumstances, to take counsel in the matter; and I said to Mr. Beecher that I had asked Mr. Woodruff whom he could recommend, and he said that he would recommend Mr. Tracy; and I said to Mr. Beecher that I thought Mr. Tracy was a good man to consult on the subject; that he had a good cool head on his shoulders, and I thought would give good advice; and I said to Mr. Beecher: "If you have no objection, I will consult with Gen. Tracy, but to consult with Gen. Tracy, and to get his best advice upon the subject, it will be necessary to tell him the truth. If you have no objection, then, I will assent to my partner's wish, and consult with Gen. Tracy;" and he said [that is, you said] that he had no objection if I thought it was best, and I said that I did not see that I had any other course to pursue; * * * I informed Mr. Beecher afterward—I said to Mr. Beecher afterward that I had told my partner that I was willing to consult with Gen. Tracy, and that he had made an appointment with Gen. Tracy.

Q. Now, Sir, did any conversation of that kind occur? A. Oh, no, Sir; it is all imaginary; the memory dead and the fancy very active.

Q. Now, after an interview, did anything of this kind occur; that is, after a supposed interview between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tracy? Mr. Moulton says:

I said to Mr. Beecher "I told Mr. Tracy the truth of the matter, I told him the fact in the case as it was, that you had been guilty of sexual intercourse with Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton, and he said in the presence of my partner that if that was true it must be concealed at all hazards!"

A. Who said?

Q. That was said to you by Mr. Moulton? A. That I said that!

Q. No; Mr. Tracy.

Judge Neilson—Commence your question anew.

Mr. Evarts—No, it is not; it is Mr. Beecher, said.

Judge Neilson—Better commence your question anew.

Mr. Evarts—Did Mr. Moulton say anything of this kind to you after, or in reference to a supposed interview he had had with Mr. Tracy?

I told Mr. Tracy the truth of the matter, I told him the fact in the case as it was, that you had been guilty of sexual intercourse with Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton, and he [meaning Tracy] said, in the presence of my partner, that if that was true it must be concealed at all hazards.

Did Mr. Moulton make any such statement as that to you? A. No such statement; absolutely false, through and through, from end to end.

Q. And did he continue, or further say:

And I said [that is, Moulton] that Mr. Tracy said, that although he did not recommend lying, this was one of the cases in which lying was justifiable.

A. He never told me any such thing.

Q. Now, at any subsequent interview, did Mr. Moulton state to you that

We have had a consultation at my house in my study between Gen. Tracy, Mr. Woodruff, and myself, and between Gen. Tracy, Mr. Woodruff, Mr. Tilton and myself; and that at that interview I told Mr. Tracy again the truth, and have laid before Mr. Tracy the letter of contrition.

A. He never told me anything like—that is, that, nor anything from which that could be, even by distortion, fabricated; I never said anything to him on the subject, nor he to me, except what I have narrated.

Q. Did he also say, or did he say at all, that he (Moulton) had communicated the facts to Mr. Tilton; that he had told Gen. Tracy the facts in the case, and that Theodore Tilton had denounced him (Moulton) for so doing, and had said to me that I had no business to reveal the guilt of Elizabeth to Mr. Tracy without his consent, and that I had pacified Mr. Tilton by telling him that I had considered it my duty?

A. Wholly artificial and false.

Q. Now, Sir, did you say, by way of reply, or at all, to Mr. Moulton, that you were glad that Theodore had consented to that conference, and that you hoped some good would come out of it, but that you did not see yourself what reply could be made, and that you considered, perhaps, the policy of silence was the best for all concerned? A. No, Sir; there was no such statement; it is part and parcel of the whole lie.

OLIVER JOHNSON'S EMPLOYMENT ON THE CHRISTIAN UNION.

Q. Mr. Beecher, how long have you been acquainted with Oliver Johnson? A. Oh, I should think 25 years, or more.

Q. And in the years 1872 and 1873 were you aware of his position and employment in connection with the press? A. I was, Sir—Oh, I have been aware of his position ever since I have lived in Brooklyn, pretty—

Q. Had you any personal intimacy? A. Well, that degree of personal intimacy which all anti-slavery men had when they were fighting the battle.

Q. Now, will you give us the history of your engagement of Mr. Oliver Johnson in regard to The Christian Union?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. That is not competent evidence in this case.

Judge Neilson—I think you ought to call specific attention to what Mr. Tilton said on the subject.

Mr. Fullerton—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Evarts—I do not, with great respect, if your Honor please, see that we need be confined to that. Your Honor will observe that we have introduced the subject of Mr. Beecher's employment of Oliver Johnson as for a purpose and object that bears upon the demonstration or confession of guilt.

Judge Neilson—And that there was some conference on that subject preparatory?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and Mr. Johnson has been examined on the subject, and as the whole point or the whole matter of the Johnson employment bears upon Mr. Beecher's share and motives in it, and otherwise it is an immaterial inquiry, it seems to me that we are entitled to show by this witness exactly what part he did take in the matter.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to show the fact, the method and mode of employment by way of accounting for it, without giving the conversation with Mr. Johnson in plaintiff's absence, and the right to call special attention to anything Mr. Tilton said on that subject.

Mr. Evarts—That by way of contradiction we understand. But the whole point of the episode is what this witness, in intent and purpose and action, did about it.

Judge Neilson—Did, yes—well, you can prove what he did.

Mr. Evarts—The fact of what he did.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no; it is not that.

Mr. Evarts—What is it?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is whether Mr. Tilton's relation of it was true. I take it for granted that is it. We have nothing to do with it in any other aspect of the case. Your Honor will bear in mind that upon objection you shut out the conversation between Oliver Johnson and Mr. Beecher upon that very subject.

Judge Neilson—As we do now, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; if Mr. Tilton has stated anything in that regard which is untrue, or which they urge is untrue, and they wish to prove it untrue, then that particular allegation is to be brought to the attention of the witness, to the end that he may disprove it. But to have the whole relation gone into between Mr. Johnson and Mr. Beecher as to his employment upon The Christian Union, would seem to be introducing into this case something quite foreign to the issue.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, my learned friend is quite out in thinking that the only materiality in this case is whether Mr. Tilton has told the truth on this question. How did it become material for him to introduce it at all? The question was what the fact was; Mr. Tilton had not said anything before it was introduced, so that was not the issue. And, now, another witness can tell the truth about an occurrence if Mr. Tilton could tell the truth about it, or was called to tell the truth about it. They introduced it in their own way, and told it in their own way, the whole point being not whether Mr. Johnson had this or that salary, or this or that employment—the whole point being the action and the motive, and so the inferences justly drawable from the action and the motive of this witness that is now on the stand; that is the essence—

Judge Neilson—It is very obvious, first, that you can contradict or correct anything Mr. Tilton said on that subject; and second, you can show, as has been shown, I think, by Mr. Johnson, the general fact, without giving the conversation, the general fact accounting for his employment.

Mr. Evarts—Of course; we don't wish to be prolix about it—

Judge Neilson—No, you would not be that, Sir, any way. But I only remind you that we excluded the conversation before, and yet let in the general fact how Mr. Johnson came to be employed or through whose instrumentality.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Sir, what part, if any, did you take in respect to the employment of Mr. Johnson on The Christian Union, and with whom? A. I think I can state it, Sir, without going into any conversation; I will try to. There was dissatisfaction with the editorial management of The Christian Union, which gave rise to many requests from the publishers to me that we should have a more experienced manager. I disregarded it for a long—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is more objectionable than the other, Sir, a good deal.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know why; it shows the situation on which he got a new editor.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is the introduction; it perhaps may stand as accounting for that. Now, the very fact, Mr. Beecher—

The Witness—In consequence of this, Mr. Wilkeson repeatedly mentioned to me the name—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I object to it.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Wilkeson took part—in consequence of this Mr. Wilkeson took part?

The Witness—Mr. Wilkeson took part.

Judge Neilson—Without giving his conversation.

The Witness—And Mr. Johnson's name was urged upon me.

Mr. Evarts—By Mr. Wilkeson? A. By Mr. Wilkeson.

Mr. Beach—Well—

Mr. Evarts—That is the very thing, and very proper.

Mr. Fullerton—And a very improper thing.

Mr. Evarts [emphatically]—Well, now, if your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—Proceed, let it stand. [To the Witness]—And he was employed? A. Not immediately; it ran along for months; at last, after Mr. Johnson had been sounded by Mr. Wilkeson, I went to see him.

Q. Well. A. As the result of my going to see him with sundry and divers motives, he agreed to go on to the paper. When the matter was on the eve of accomplishment I mentioned it to Mr. Moulton. He expressed himself as very much pleased, thought it would be a very good thing for the paper, and he thought it would be a very good thing all around.

Q. Now, Sir, had the employment of Mr. Johnson on that paper in your action, or in your motive, any connection with the troubles between you and Mr. Tilton? A. None whatever; I employed him purely on professional grounds.

Q. Had you at any time given any instructions to Mr. Johnson concerning the treatment of The Golden Age, or of Mr. Tilton, in that paper, having any relation to these matters? A. I told Mr. Johnson—

Mr. Beach—No.

The Witness—The instructions to the editorial—

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir; your Honor shut that out before.

Judge Neilson—Oh, yes, we had that up before.

Mr. Evarts—My question is a negative; Mr. Beecher, you will attend to it; the stenographer will please read the question.

[The Tribune stenographer read the question.]

The Witness—No, I did not.

Q. Now, Sir, I call your attention to some statements of Mr. Tilton on the subject of this employment of Mr. Johnson, page 420 of the printed book; did you at any time, Mr. Beecher, say to Mr. Tilton that in your judgment it would be necessary to have some one in The Christian Union, some editor of your paper who could handle that journal with more skill in reference to the scandal? A. I did not.

Q. Did you say to him, "I cannot trust any of my editors to do it; they are not friendly to you, and they do not know any of the facts in the case, and that is a great misfortune?" A. No, Sir; I did not say any such absurd thing.

Q. Did he reply, or in that connection say to you, that he could point out a way to remedy the difficulty, and proceed:

In the first place, your paper is dull and needs improvement, and if you will take my office-editor, who used to be with me on The Independent, namely, Mr. Oliver Johnson, who knows all the facts in this case, or at least who knows the central fact, from my having confessed it to him in the Summer of 1870, and if you will make him your managing editor, he will greatly improve your paper for one thing, and he will handle this business with necessary skill and kindness for another thing.

A. A very stupid lie and falsehood.

Q. Now, Sir, did you report to Mr. Tilton the progress, or any part of the progress, of your plans or consultations in reference to the employment, and then the final employment, of Mr. Johnson? A. No, Sir; he was not my counselor about it in any way whatever.

MR. MOULTON SOUNDS MR. BEECHER AS TO HIS FINANCES.

Q. Mr. Beecher, do you remember the fact of your giving to Mr. Moulton the sum of $5,000? A. I do.

Q. That I think was the— A. April, 1873—or May.

Q. The very end of April—or—

Mr. Morris—First of May, 1873.

Mr. Evarts—The actual payment or deposit.

Mr. Morris—That is the 1st of May, 1873.

Mr. Evarts—The actual payment of the money was, accurately, the 1st of May.

Mr. Morris—The 1st of May.

Mr. Shearman—The payment was the 1st or 2d.

Mr. Evarts—Well, thereabout. Now, preceding that act, Mr. Beecher, of the payment of the money, had anything been said to you by Mr. Moulton in regard to the pecuniary circumstances of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, there was—I was going to say there never was anything else said; there was a continuous stream—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, now, one moment; I don't want that continuous stream poured out upon us in that kind of way. I would like to know what was said, and we will see whether it is a continuous stream or not.

Judge Neilson—That question might have been answered yes or no.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly.

Mr. Evarts—That is what I intended.

The Witness—I understood you to ask me for what were the conversations that led up to this.

Q. No; my first inquiry was whether they took place? A. They did.

Q. That is sufficient, then, and we will go on with it. Now, as a part of these conversations, or in connection with them, did Mr. Moulton at any interviews inquire concerning your own affairs? A. He did.

Q. What did he say? A. Well, it was a friendly chat about my condition; it was not all at one time—how the paper was getting along—

Q. The Christian Union? A. How many subscribers we had, what was our advertising receipts, and what the value of the stock; spoke a little, either he to me or I to him; I cannot remember about that—for him to take some of the stock or something, but at any rate—

Q. Was anything said about your lecturing, and the prosperity of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said about that by him? A. Well, I don't recall any very definite conversation about it except that I was lecturing a considerable at that time, and with high prices, and he spoke of it as, doubtless, a source of a good deal of revenue to me.

Q. In that way? A. Yes, Sir, in that friendly way.

Q. And how did you reply on that subject? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, in the course of these conversations by Mr. Moulton in regard to Mr. Tilton's—

The Witness—I may, perhaps, correct my answer by one specification; I think that I did give him some more definite information as to sums that I had received for contract lectures, lecturing for the year; I had returned in that Spring from rather an extraordinary tour.

Q. Of lecturing? A. Yes, Sir.

THE GIFT OF $5,000 TO MR. TILTON.

Q. Now, in the course of these conversations concerning Mr. Tilton's pecuniary condition and needs, was anything said by Mr. Moulton concerning your bearing any part in helping him? A. Well, he rather spoke in this way, that unless there was some help extended, this matter would break down on Mr. Tilton's hands, and that if his friends could get him over the bar, the difficulty, and get him into a certain position, he thought he could carry on the paper; otherwise it would have to be abandoned; somebody would have to buy it.

Q. Well, Sir, in reference to such suggestions as that—that suggestion or conversations on that subject, what reply, if any, did you make to Mr. Moulton? A. I don't remember any special reply, except the reply that I always made to Mr. Moulton, and said that wherever I could be of any avail practically to help him by hand or voice I should be very glad to do it.

Q. Was anything said in regard to any participation by you in pecuniary aid? A. Yes, Sir, I always—it was always understood as I—

Mr. Fullerton—No; one moment.

Mr. Evarts—No, what was it you said? A. Oh, I said often—often: "If anything will be of essential help—if in your judgment, anything will be of essential help, of a pecuniary kind, I will always act—be one of Mr. Tilton's friends to help in the matter."

Q. Was anything said by you as to Mr. Moulton's taking a part, or your taking the same part as he? A. I don't recall anything very special about that, Sir.

Q. Now, previous to this payment by you of the sum of $5,000 to Mr. Moulton, was there any interview in which he had spoken about or shown you any contribution of any other person? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please state what occurred on that subject? A. It was one of several interviews which I had with him touching the present prospects and conditions—he had spoken of having to pay paper bills; he told me of cases where the exigency came and there was no money to meet it, and he had to advance it himself, and on one evening when I was in his house, in his back parlor, the subject came up, and in the course of some conversation he drew out of his pocket a letter and some checks, and he showed them to me, two of them were time drafts, and I understood from him that there had been a check which was payable on demand, and had been used for $2,000, and these were time drafts which, as I understood, were of the sum of two or three thousand dollars each, and he also handed me, or rather opened and read me, passages from a letter in which the donor, said that the check was all the money at present at their disposal, but presumed that these time drafts would be just as useful, and it would be in their power to meet them as they came around, and then he read—then he, reading that, brought his hand down on the table with a great emphasis and enthusiasm, and looking me in the face, says: "That is what I call friendship." Then he recurred to his letter again, or the letter, and read me a sentence—

Q. Perhaps that is not material about the rest of the letter; it don't relate to this money. Now, this person—was it a gentleman or a lady? A. Lady.

Q. What did Mr. Moulton say, if anything, or you to him—what did you say to him or he to you in regard to this money, or its use by Mr. Tilton? A. I understood it to be money to be applied to the furtherance of the interests of The Golden Age.

Q. Well, now, about this being taken or used by him, what was said? A. I understood him to say that the check was used, but that the other two—time drafts—would not be.

Q. Do you remember as a part of this interview between you and Mr. Moulton, what is here stated by Mr. Moulton:

I said to Mr. Beecher that I had spoken to Mr. Tilton about this gift, and that Tilton said he could not accept it; that he had no way of returning the money that he knew about; and I said also to Mr. Beecher that I could not honorably take this money from this person and apply it to Mr. Tilton's use without informing him about it, and I did not see how that money could be used, therefore.

That he gives as the substance of a conversation with you; do you remember anything of that kind? A. Not in connection with that transaction.

Q. Now, after this conversation what did you do in respect to this matter of pecuniary help? A. I went home and thought about it, and blamed myself for being so stupid. It occurred to me that is what I ought to have done—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; well—

The Witness—I made it a matter of gentle reproach—that if he wanted money afterward he ought to tell me so.

Q. Reproach to him? A. I reproached him; I said I thought he had been acquainted long enough with me, that if he thought I ought, at any time, to help—to join in with him in what he was doing, he should tell me so—that that kind of delicacy ought not to hinder him.

Q. Very well? A. And then I said to him, "I will give $5,000 if that will put him over this pinch;" and he didn't urge it; he was very delicate about it; and I at once set on foot the operation to get the money—I hadn't got it.

Q. You went to work and got the money by a mortgage on your house? A. I did.

Q. I suppose that is the long and short of the matter; it has been given in evidence heretofore; and did you take the money to Mr. Moulton? A. I did, in rolls—in bills.

Q. What occurred between you and him when you gave it to him? A. He was—he expressed himself as extremely gratified with it; he thought it was a very—a most friendly act.

Q. How soon after that payment of this $5,000 to Mr. Moulton did you have an interview with Mr. Tilton, and how did that occur? A. I think it was the following Sunday morning. When I went out of my house to go to church Mr. Tilton was waiting, apparently for me, on the opposite corner, and I joined him as I went over, and he walked down to the church with me, talking in the most affectionately cordial manner—went until we got to the corner this side of the church, just on the edge of the crowd, and he went his way and I went on.

Q. Can you give that conversation, or the substance of it? A. No, Sir; I cannot recall it.

[Mr. Evarts here searched among papers.]

Mr. Morris—Are you looking for that note?

THE "GRACE, MERCY AND PEACE" NOTE.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, that little note. It is our exhibit, I believe.

Mr. Morris—Well, it is simply the words "Grace, Mercy and Peace." That is the whole of it.

Mr. Evarts—That I understand. It is in evidence.

Mr. Morris—In evidence. "Grace, Mercy and Peace" are the words, and it is signed "T. T."

Mr. Evarts—Now, Sir, on that same Sunday, did you receive a slip of paper that has been made an exhibit here, with the words "Grace, Mercy and Peace" on it? A. I don't know. I received a slip of paper one Sunday, but I cannot identify the day.

Q. As the same Sunday? A. That was all there was of it.

Q. How did it come to your knowledge? A. I found it lying on my little table, on the platform, by my chair, inclosed in a sealed envelope, and on opening it—it was in Mr. Tilton's handwriting—on opening it there was simply that sentence.

Judge Neilson [To the witness]—Signed "T. T."

Mr. Evarts—I think it is, Sir.

Mr. Morris—It is, "Grace, mercy, and peace;" signed "T. T."

Mr. Fullerton—It is so.

Mr. Porter—It will show for itself.

Mr. Fullerton—It has shown for itself.

Mr. Evarts—It is in evidence.

Judge Neilson—I merely asked if the witness recollected that it was signed "T. T."

Mr. Evarts—My recollection is that it is signed "T. T."

The Witness [To Judge Neilson]—Do I understand you to ask whether I recollect it, from that Sunday, or from having seen it since?

Judge Neilson—Do you recollect whether it was signed "T. T." or not?

The Witness—Oh, I don't remember. I have seen it since, and it is signed "T. T."

Mr. Evarts—That is the same one you refer to? A. That is the one I refer to.

Mr. Fullerton—We don't claim for that reason that it is original, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Look at that, and say if that is the memorandum? [Handing witness a scrap of paper.] A. Yes, Sir; this is it, Sir. It is scriptural.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes. You need not swear to that to make it evidence.

The Witness—I didn't know that you were familiar with that work. [In reply to a remark by Mr. Beach.] I assured Mr. Fullerton of that, to save him the labor of investigation.

Mr. Fullerton—That was said for Mr. Evarts's benefit. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—The memorandum is: [Reading.]

H. W. B.: Grace, mercy, and peace. Sunday morning.
T. T.

We will have this marked now, Sir. It does not seem to have been marked before.

[The paper was marked "Exhibit D, 129."]

Q. Mr. Beecher, here is a pencil memorandum on the back of this. I don't know whether it is in your handwriting or whose it is? A. Well, if it is, it is of no account.

Q. Well, is it or not in your handwriting, do you know? A. I should think it was, Sir, but there is no reliableness in it; I have an impression that I was using the back of that for some dates—tentatively, in an investigation, without knowing now exactly what it was.

Q. There is no date to this paper itself? A. No, Sir, no date on the paper; and that on the back has no authority; I don't know the date.

Q. But you suppose that memorandum, "April 7, 1872," to be your memorandum? A. That is my memorandum.

Q. You did not receive but one of these? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Do I understand him to say that he does not think that is a memorandum made at the time?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, he says that, as I understand him.

The Witness—I did not make any mark on the paper at the time that I received it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, is that a memorandum made as at the time?

Mr. Evarts—I understand him the contrary. [To the witness:] It was not made at the time that you now say!

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, this memorandum—has it any connection with the time it was received, or was it intended to have? A. No, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton has given as the date of this letter—this note—being handed to you as the 10th or 12th of June, 1873. There was but one such paper? A. But one such.

Q. Now are you able to say from your recollection what part of June, or what part of May, or what time it was sent to you? A. I know it was not on the 10th of June, in 1873.

Q. How do you know that? A. Because I was preaching in Park-st. Church, in Boston.

Q. On that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or, at least, on the Sunday, if it was Sunday—Sunday was the 1st of June, and Sunday would be the 8th? A. Well, what would the next Sunday be?

Q. On the 8th of June you were preaching in Boston?

Mr. Fullerton—The 10th, he said.

The Witness—He made a mistake in the date. It was not on the Sunday that was nearest to the 10th, that is, it was not on the Sunday that the 10th would be the nearest to.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is agreed that it was on Sunday, and it is dated Sunday morning.

Mr. Morris—What page is that?

Mr. Evarts—432.

The Witness—I was at home on the 1st and on the 16th, and the intermediate Sunday I was in Boston.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is only of minor significance. We want to get at about the time it was. Do you think it was as late as the early part of June? A. I have no idea, Mr. Evarts. If they should say it was in 1872, I should not know but what it was; and if they should say it was in the Spring of 1874, I should not know but it was.

Mr. Fullerton. [Having referred to the record.]-Mr. Tilton did not fix it on the 10th of June at all.

Mr. Beach—You had better correct that, then.

Mr. Evarts—What does he say about it?

Mr. Fullerton—He says he cannot fix it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, he makes it near that. I don't mean to say that he says that it was exactly the 10th or 12th, and the record shows—

Mr. Fullerton—He says that he does not fix it on that day.

Mr. Evarts—I will read this. [Reading.]

I don't know that I could fix that little scrap of paper to the 10th or 12th of June.

Mr. Fullerton—Read the question before that.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading.]

Do you recollect anything that occurred between the 10th or 12th of June, soon after? A. The 10th or 12th of June?

Q. Yes; you recollect sending something to the church? A. Do you mean a little scrap of paper?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't know that I could fix that little scrap of paper to the 10th or 12th of June. The circumstances as they lie in my memory are these: the publication of this little card of the 2d of June, 1873.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, that is what he says.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I did not mean that he fixed it exactly.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is hardly worth while to prove that a certain thing did not take place on the 10th or 12th of June when it is not pretended that it did.

Mr. Evarts—It is stated, as I understand, by Mr. Tilton, as having occurred at or about that time.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Morris—No, Sir, not at all. He says he cannot fix it at or about that time.

Mr. Evarts—The question was asked him as of the 10th or 12th of June.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—And he says that he cannot fix it, but that it occurred in connection with, and in reference to, something that occurred on the 2d of June.

Mr. Morris—No, that is not correct; that is not the record.

Mr. Evarts—Well, certainly I can draw no other inference than that Mr. Tilton supposed it was some time in that month of June.

Mr. Morris—He did not pretend to fix it.

MR. BEECHER'S INTERCOURSE WITH MRS. MOULTON.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, subsequent to September, 1870, did you become more acquainted with Mrs. Moulton than you had been before? A. I did, Sir.

Q. In what way did your acquaintance with her arise, and on what terms of acquaintance were you after that period? A. It arose from my frequent visits to her husband at her house, and continued throughout all this period until late in 1874. I was at their house, at some periods, every day. Sometimes once a week only; sometimes once in ten days, sometimes once a month, and sometimes not for four months; so that it was an exceedingly variable intercourse; for, although the story is condensed into unity, the facts stretch out through four years, interrupted by lecture courses, and by long vacations, and by the subsidence of the difficulties; and my visits to the house were at the critical periods, and almost, or with rare exceptions, only then. And in those visits I gradually became acquainted more with Mrs. Moulton. She was a very lady-like, companionable, frank person, and made my coming a matter of no trouble to herself, so that I did not feel that I was intruding at all upon her time or hospitality, and, little by little, I came to esteem her, and finally, learning from Mr. Moulton that she was aware of the difficulties and troubles that were in existence, I conversed with her on those subjects, though but seldom, and—

Q. Now, to what degree of cordial reception and conversation did you—on what footing of cordiality did your acquaintance with Mrs. Moulton come to be, in the course of these visits? A. Well, I was received, I might say, as if I had been a connection or relation in the household; that is, while I was shown usually in the parlor, after a time I went right up into her chamber, which was in the second story front room, most of the time, and she received me, in the absence of her husband, with that strict propriety which you might expect of a lady; but, after a year or two—after a year, perhaps, I cannot be sure of the time—she not infrequently kissed me, when I met her, in the presence of her husband—never but once except in his presence; and she used to say very kind and cordial things of me to him.

Q. In your presence? A. In my presence—yes; I will not say that she made a pet of me, because she was not exactly a person that had pets, but I would say that she treated me with that familiarity with which a cousin or a sister would have treated a cousin or a brother with whom they had not had life-long acquaintanceship. Her whole intercourse with me was such as to raise in me the greatest respect and esteem for her, and I never knew her to do an unladylike thing.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Morris]—Exhibit 37!

Mr. Morris—37—here it is.

Mr. Evarts—Here is a letter of yours, Mr. Beecher, which has been put in evidence, dated at Peekskill, July 14, 1873, to Mr. Moulton. It is Exhibit No. 37. Now, Sir, there [indicating in the letter] is an expression which you used in writing to Mr. Moulton concerning Mrs. Moulton. I call your attention to it, that it may be in your mind, and then I will ask you a question about it. A. I see, Sir. Let me read this letter, please, I want to get the run of it.

Q. You can retain it and read it. A. Yes, Sir. [Reads the letter.]

Q. Now, I will read this passage. After speaking of your obligations to Mr. Moulton, you say:

Not the least has been the great-hearted kindness and trust which your noble wife has shown, and which have lifted me out of despondencies often, though sometimes her clear truthfulness has laid me pretty flat.

Now, what trait of your intercourse with Mrs. Moulton, and in her character, did you refer to in that— A. In that sentence!

Q. In that sentence? A. Well, her whole—my whole intercourse with Mrs. Moulton was one which inspired in me a sense of affectionate respect and of gratitude, because she was very sympathetic, without being sentimental, and I had the impression that she was not a sentimentalist, and did not quite like it.

Q. Like sentiment? A. No, Sir; and I suspected that in my moods of outpouring I oftentimes offended her taste, and she oftentimes made one of those incisive remarks which a woman knows how to make, and which, it is said, "lets the wind out of that bladder" [laughter] remember her saying something like this once to me—I was groaning and saying that it did not seem to me that I could live, and I didn't want to live—"H-m-m-m," said she, "you and Frank and Theodore are all agoing to die; first, Theodore is going to die, and then Frank comes home and he is going to die, and then you come and you are going to die—I notice you all like to live well enough;" that, and little things like that, which, when persons are "testing backward and forward, don't amount to anything, but when a man has been pouring out very strongly his sentimental feelings, and has a woman coolly take him up, or rather sharply take him up, don't feel good.

THE PUBLICATION OF THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember the publication of a portion of what is called the "Tripartite Agreement"—do you remember the publication in the public prints? A. I remember the whole of it being published.

Q. Well, the whole was published, as Mr. Shearman corrects me. You remember the publication? A. I do.

Q. Now, do you remember about what time that occurred? A. I do.

Q. When was it? A. On the 30th of May, I think, it was published; on Friday morning, the 30th, if that was the 30th—the 30th of May.

Q. Yes, Friday was the 30th. Now, subsequent to that publication, and connected with it, were there any interviews between you and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton? A. There were interviews between Mr. Moulton and me, and Mrs. Moulton.

Q. Was this in the morning papers of the 30th? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The morning papers? A. In the morning papers of the 30th.

Q. Well, Sir? A. I saw Mr. Moulton on that day.

Q. Did you seek him? A. No, I think not; I won't say about that.

Q. Well, where did you see him? A. I cannot say about that; I merely recollect talking with him.

Q. Whether it was at his house or not? A. Whether it was at his house, or whether we were walking, I cannot say.

Q. Very well. Now, what passed between you on that subject? A. Well, he wanted to know about it—how it came out; I told him that I could not tell him; that all I knew was that I was approached about the middle of the week by Ed. Ford, who asked me if I had any objection to the publication of that "Tripartite Agreement," and I had said to him, "Well, we are thinking the time is coming when it ought to be published;" "but," said he, "suppose it were to be published in New-York without your having anything to do with it, or any responsibility about it, would you like it?" "Well," I said, "there is not any copy there; they cannot make it;" I didn't care anything about that, but, said he, "Suppose it was published, would it interfere with any plan of yours?" I said to him, "I think it ought not to be published without some further consultation about the matter;" I told him further—I think on the same day Mr. Cleveland came to me, and I had turned the matter over in my mind, and said to him, "Now, Mr. Cleveland, you must go right over and stop that thing; it ought not to be published in any such way." I could not imagine—I didn't myself, but Mr. Cleveland seemed to know what the source of it was that it was published; well, I think I told him also of the interview that I had with Mr. Cleveland; I am pretty sure I did.

Q. Very well. If you told him so you may state it. A. He went to THE TRIBUNE office first, and tried to stop it, and then went on up to Sam Wilkeson's house, who was the man that was going to publish it, and who had sent it, and it was about midnight, and he woke him up, and told him what they had come for, and he said Sam got up in his red night shirt, and sat in the middle of the bed and swore till everything was blue in that room, and told them to go about their business; that nothing should hinder him; that it was his lookout, and he expressed my wish that it should not be published, and he said he didn't care a damn for Henry Ward Beecher, nor for any other man on earth; that that thing was going to be published. Well, Mr. Moulton said that he had rather not—some plans that they had in regard to the publication, but that it—they must let it go, and that was the general tenor of our conversation. I also understood from him to say it was a surprise to Mr. Tilton, but he was rather glad of it. That is what I understood Mr. Moulton to say.

Q. When you say "he" you mean Mr. Moulton? A. I understood from Mr. Moulton that the publication of it had been gratifying to Mr. Tilton.

Q. To Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; he had seen him, and I had not; I don't recollect seeing him on that day. Then the next morning I was sent for by Mr. Moulton.

Q. That would be the 31st? A. That would be Saturday morning the 31st. He told me that he had a devil of a time all night pretty near, as I understood him; that Mr. Tilton on seeing the evening papers had gone up to Curtis's, and that they had talked with him and told him that he never could stand it in the world, that that would kill him, that it would appear from that publication, as the evening papers had said, that he and Bowen had been in league together spreading dirty stories about me, and that they both agreed that they had been naughty, and promised they wouldn't do so any more, according to the reading of that "Tripartite Agreement." Well, I said to Mr. Moulton, he wrote his own article in it; it was written so as to cover every ground of difference between him and us; and when he found out that the money was sure, he slipped the article out, and, just like him, fixed it so that he could keep his little grievance to use when he wanted to use it, and have acquittance in regard to all the rest, and, "now, if there was any complaint, he ought not to make that complaint." He said the devil was to pay, and "something has got to be done." I said to him that I had come to about the end of my patience, that I didn't intend to stand this thing any longer, and that if matters must come to a head, it was just as good a time to come to a head now as at any other, and that I would not take one single step in that matter. Well, I was unduly excited for a clergyman, and he soothed me somewhat and said the matter could be got over; that he had influence, he knew, enough to hold Mr. Tilton, for he informed me that Mr. Tilton was going to publish a card that night, and that he was going to include in it a part of that memorandum, letter of apology, or whatever name you choose to give it.

Q. Of the 1st of January, 1871? A. Yes, Sir, and that it would be a very dangerous and very damaging affair. I said to Mr. Moulton: "Well, let him publish it; I am not agoing to try to patch this thing up and hold on any longer." I said a great many more things that were more emphatic than prudent, and finally he said: "He won't publish it to-night; now, you may depend on it he ain't going to publish it to-night." "Well, how do you know? I think he will. He is in a towering passion, as you say, and he will do it." "No," he said, "I can hold him; I have seen Tilton in that way before; I can hold him, and if he don't publish it to-night we can arrange it so that he won't publish it at all." "Very well," said I, "if anything of that sort is going to be done"—I gained the idea from him that he had gone down to see The Eagle folks about the matter.

MR. BEECHER'S CARD OF RESIGNATION.

Q. Who had? A. That Mr. Tilton had gone, or was going. At any rate, there was something that led me to say to him: "You ought to go right down and see Mr. Kinsella yourself; there ought to be some consultation." The reason of that was not confined to this case alone; there were other matters between Mr. Kinsella and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Bowen which led to familiar and constant intercourse and consultations, and, therefore, made it the more natural to suggest that he should have this interview with Mr. Kinsella, and he agreed to do it. He took his hat—I rather insisted upon it; one of the rare cases in which I ventured to insist upon anything—and went with me out of the house, not far from—it was between 10 and 11 o'clock on Saturday morning, and went down to my house, went up in my bed room, the same room where the pistol scene was, and we chatted, and he refreshed himself and went down the hill to The Eagle office, as I understood afterward from him—went down there. Meanwhile I turned it over in my mind, and sat down and wrote a card of resignation, which has not been put in exactly as I wrote it, but nearly that, and put it in my pocket. That evening I went down to his house, on Saturday evening, and went up into his study. He came up; I understood that Mr. Tilton was below, though I didn't see him, and we sat down and he gave me the account of the interview that he had had with Mr. Kinsella, and the general result was that nothing would be done certainly before Monday night, and he hoped before that time things could be arranged. I resumed the matter again and said: "Frank, I am not going to stand this matter any longer," and I drew out of my pocket that card, which was substantially this, that—

Q. It has been given in evidence, the substance of it.

The Witness—Never mind.

Mr. Evarts—Let him state it.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I object to him stating it.

The Witness—It was the card, that having—

Mr. Fullerton—No.

The Witness—You don't want me to state it!

Mr. Fullerton—No, I want to see the original.

The Witness—So do I, but I drew it out of my pocket and handed it to him, and said to him: "If that card comes out, and is as you say it is going to be, that is going to be my answer, my resignation to my church, and that is the reason." He took it in his hand, looked at it, and read it all the way through, and a sort of started back a little, and read it again. "Good God!" said he. He read it a third time. I took it from his hands as he rose; he left the room and told me to wait a moment, and went down stairs; then his footsteps had hardly ceased to be heard before Mrs. Moulton entered the room and closed the door, threw it back loosely, and we interchanged some words, but I was in rather a stern mood, and the conversation was not general at all; but after some few words, I sitting at the table with my back to the fire-place, I don't know—I was engaged in some paper, what it was I don't know, she came up behind me near my left shoulder and said: "Mr. Beecher, I don't believe the stories that they are telling about you; I believe that you are a good man." I turned a little toward her, and looked up, and said: "Emma Moulton, I am a good man, you may be sure of that; I am a good man," and with that she put her hand around my neck gently, so as to bring my head up a little, and kissed me on my forehead, and it was certainly a kiss of inspiration; still I thought it prudent not to return it, and I sat perfectly still at the table, and she sat down upon the sofa in a moment, and then after a little Mr. Moulton came back again, and we had some slight further conversation, and I got up and went home.

THE "DAY OF JUDGMENT" LETTER.

On the following morning I tried to write my sermon, but I could not, for the interview and state of facts was in my mind so that I could not keep it out, and I sat down and dashed off in a moment the letter called the "Day of Judgment" letter of the 1st of June. Knowing that he had been up for two nights, or would have been, I inclosed it in a little note to her, saying, "Don't wake him up; it is not important he should see it," and then sent it away, and then made out my notes and went and preached; I didn't see him again until Monday night, when there was the suggestion of a card that should be published by me that should take that load off from Mr. Tilton which his own article in the "Tripartite Agreement" had brought to bear upon him when it was published. I took it home for consideration. It was agreed that Mr. Kinsella should be sent for to see me in the morning, and confer with me. He came about 9 o'clock in the morning. I told him what I told them, that this matter had been fooling—

Mr. Fullerton—We don't want the conversation with Mr. Kinsella.

Mr. Evarts—You laid before him the situation! A. I laid before him the situation, and under his suggestion—

Mr. Fullerton—No, I object.

MR. BEECHER WRITES THE PUBLISHED CARD.

The Witness—And being advised, I drew up the card that I published, refusing to publish the card that had been sent, on account of one sentence in it. After a conversation that lasted about an hour, he left. Then being on the eve of an absence of two weeks, I made some little arrangements in the house and left, and went over to The Christian Union office. Monday was the editorial day when I went there habitually, and there was an absence before me, therefore I had significant duties to perform. I saw several members of the firm, and the boys, as we call them, and had an interview with Mr. Cleveland in respect to the affairs, for he by this time had become quite conversant with matters, and was intimate with me, in regard specially to the Bowen side of it, and made some arrangements that he should send my letters to Boston, and papers, and some other incidents of that kind, and then I went out on errands, and to lunch, and to meet my wife at 42d-st., and at 2 o'clock went with her to Peekskill; remained over Monday night; came down on Tuesday afternoon, getting in just in time to marry Mr. Tinley on Tuesday night; left the house at half past six the next morning; went to Boston and stayed there all the week and the next, and left Friday, and came home on Friday night. That is the little history.

Q. From Friday night of the following week, which would be the 13th? A. Yes, Sir, I was gone at Gov. Claflin's house the whole time.

Q. Now, Sir, look at that paper and say whether that is

Mr. Tilton's handwriting. [Handing witness a paper.] A. It is.

Q. Whether that is the card that was proposed to you on that Saturday night to be published by you? A. I think this is it, Sir.

A BITTER FIGHT BETWEEN THE ATTORNEYS OF RECORD.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Morris]—Exhibits 107 and 108, please, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Morris—I can't find them.

Mr. Evarts—We certainly need them; they are exhibits in evidence, and I would like to have them at recess.

Mr. Morris—You are entitled to them if I can find them.

Mr. Evarts—We are entitled to have them found.

Mr. Morris—I can't find them.

Mr. Evarts—You do not mean they are lost?

Mr. Morris—I don't know; I can't find them.

Mr. Evarts—We must have them; I would like to have them and have the testimony proved upon that basis.

Mr. Morris—I understand you would like to have them. I say I can't find them. I may find them after a mere thorough examination. Those envelopes have been out and passed around so frequently—

Mr. Evarts—We have not had anything to do with them at all.

Mr. Fullerton—If they can be found, they will be, and produced.

Mr. Morris—And if they can't, they won't.

Mr. Shearman—We asked for a paper yesterday, and Mr. Morris said it could not be found, and just as soon as Judge Fullerton asked for the paper yesterday it was found.

Mr. Morris—Mr. Fullerton didn't ask for it, and no such thing occurred as you state.

Mr. Fullerton [To Mr. Morris]—Don't say one word.

Mr. Evarts—We want those papers, and we are entitled to them, they being in evidence before the Court.

Mr. Fullerton—After the imputation of Mr. Shearman, I have nothing further to say about finding papers.

Mr. Shearman—The imputation is known to every one who sits here.

Mr. Morris—It is untrue.

Mr. Shearman—A paper we asked for yesterday was not produced, and he (Mr. Morris) said it could not be found, and within a few minutes afterward I saw Judge Fullerton lean over and ask for that paper, and it was produced instantly.

Mr. Morris—It is not true.

Judge Neilson—One moment, gentlemen; they will find them during the recess probably.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor understands that we are entitled to those exhibits. They are no more their property for the purpose of this trial than ours.

Judge Neilson—Still there is liable to be confusion among so many papers.

Mr. Evarts—I understand that.

Judge Neilson—They will find them if they can during recess.

Mr. Morris—I have found every exhibit that has been called for as readily as I could, and counsel has put me to unnecessary trouble in calling for exhibits here when they could use the printed exhibits as well, but they have not used them, seemingly for no other purpose than to give trouble, and when the counsel undertakes to make any imputation that we have withheld any exhibit, we repel it. It is untrue.

Mr. Fullerton—The imputation ought not to rest for a moment upon Judge Morris, because yesterday, when the exhibit which was called for was found, Judge Morris stated immediately that it had got into the wrong envelope, with another exhibit—an explanation which Mr. Shearman ought to have accepted at once. I don't know why he should attempt to cast any imputation of that kind on the gentleman who has the charge of those very numerous papers, and who has produced them from time to time when they were wanted, with the greatest possible alacrity, although at very great inconvenience.

Mr. Morris—The exhibit which was called for, to which reference was made, was in the envelope with another exhibit, marked in the lower part of the envelope, and misplaced in the package, as your Honor will see, not marked as the others were, and there were two in the same envelope, and I didn't find it at the time. I looked over them again, and found it, and when Mr. Shearman makes the imputation that he does, I say it is utterly and absolutely false.

Judge Neilson—In other words, that he is mistaken, and ought not to have made it.

Mr. Morris—No, Sir; I say it is untrue.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will leave it there.

Mr. Fullerton—Counsel clothes his language so as to make it offensive.

Mr. Shearman—It cannot be blotted out.

Mr. Evarts—Nevertheless, we cannot consent to be put in the position of asking favors when we desire original papers which are put in evidence against us to be present at the trial for use by counsel.

Judge Neilson—Some one must keep the papers, which are very voluminous. There will may be delay in finding for them a given paper. The counsel should do all he can in that regard, and that is all.

Mr. Evarts—We cannot be put in the position of asking favors.

Mr. Morris—And we don't want you to ask in that offensive way, either.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked for them in an offensive way.

Mr. Morris—Yes, you did; and you have been offensive in your persistency in reference to them, and casting an imputation that I didn't try to find them. I say it is offensive.

Mr. Evarts—Have you got the papers? if so, let me have them.

Mr. Morris—I will let you have them in due time.

Mr. Evarts—I will take them now.

Mr. Morris—You won't take them now.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the Court will direct you, the

Mr. Morris—Well, the Court will not direct me.

Mr. Fullerton—This ought to be enough. I stated to Mr. Evarts, in that courteous way I always try to address him, that if these papers were in existence, as doubtless they were, they would be found and handed to him. That is all he could ask of us. It is not an extraordinary thing, in handling so many papers as have been exhibited in this case, that some of them should be momentarily displaced; and after that was said, in a way which certainly gave no offense, and when it was given as an assurance of good faith, Mr. Shearman saw fit, purposely, to make a very offensive remark, entirely uncalled for, which did not facilitate the looking up of the paper or its production, but was calculated to annoy. Indeed, it was an insult, because the explanation which I have already said that Judge Morris gave yesterday, when that paper was found, ought to be satisfactory to any gentleman. Now, that Judge Morris is purposely keeping back exhibits in this case, is an insinuation that is absurd in the extreme. The paper has been given in evidence; it is on record, and what object could he attain by withholding it? None at all. As a matter of course he would feel as unpleasant as any person could possibly feel if one of these papers was lost. The paper, I say, they are looking for now, and which they desire, has been put in print, and although they may wish the originals, and are entitled to them, yet as a matter of course there would be nothing lost of advantage to the defendant if the papers were never found. But I repeat now, for Mr. Evarts's benefit, what I said before, that every exertion will be made to find these exhibits, and when they are found we will take great pleasure in passing them over to him. But to say that they want them now, and that they must have them now, and to make that demand, and to predicate that demand on what Mr. Shearman was pleased to say a moment ago in a very offensive way, and in language which I think he will regard when he comes to think of it, seems to me out of place.

Mr. Morris—I will say, further, that two of our exhibits, or one of our exhibits, has been lost. It was passed over to the other side, and marked by them for identification. Whether they have returned it, or not, I don't know; but I have looked through every paper connected with this case, and it cannot be found, and that is the statement made by Mr. Beecher (which it was understood could be referred to and put in evidence from the printed copy) of Mr. Bowen's terms, having been put in in that way by the other side a few days ago; these two papers have been lost. They were in their possession, passed over to them, and marked by them for identification, and whether they have been returned, or not, I don't know, but I cannot find them.

Judge Neilson—There seems to be some confusion.

Mr. Shearman—I am prepared, your Honor, with an affidavit from my clerk, if necessary, that he returned them to Judge Morris.

Mr. Morris—They may be. I do not say they were not returned, but I say they are papers of the greatest importance to us, and that we want them, and they cannot be found.

Mr. Shearman—They have been returned, no doubt. They have been found; as to that there is no doubt, for I made inquiry specially in regard to them. With reference to what has been said about myself, may it please your Honor, I think I have said nothing more than what is perfectly consistent with the truth. I notice my friend, Judge Fullerton, has not denied the statement I made about him, which casts no imputation upon him at all.

Mr. Fullerton—When you cast an imputation upon Judge Morris, you are casting it upon me.

Mr. Shearman—Judge Morris has repeatedly cast imputations upon me, to which I have not before replied, and I am not now going to reply; but there is no reason in the conduct of Judge Morris in this case from the opening, toward me, that should call from me any special forbearance toward him.

Judge Morris—I don't ask it.

Mr. Shearman—But there was a reason yesterday why that paper should not be produced when we wanted it; we all saw it.

Judge Neilson—I recollect an occasion at the close of our proceedings one day, when Mr. Morris was quite persistent that counsel on the other side should return a certain paper; and, after some inquiry and consultation, he was assured it had been returned; Judge Morris took part in this assurance, and there may have been some mistake here, or there may have been some confusion with regard to the paper, and it would not be at all surprising if there should have been.

Mr. Porter—There was no mistake, and he found the papers, and I returned them with my own hands.

Judge Neilson—It is an easy matter to misplace a paper.

Mr. Evarts—I am always ready, if your Honor please, to concede the largest freedom to accident and circumstances; but, nevertheless, we do not wish to have it put as a favor that exhibits are produced to us.

Mr. Morris—Nobody has pretended to do anything of the kind.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is all right.

Judge Neilson—We have proceeded hitherto so pleasantly, gentlemen, that I am quite persuaded counsel will, on reflection, understand each other, and that there will be no misunderstanding. Will gentlemen get ready to retire?

Mr. Morris [To Mr. Evarts]—Now, then, I ask you for the paper that you have now—I ask that it be returned.

Mr. Evarts—The witness produced it.

Mr. Mallison [Clerk of the Court]—The Court will now take a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE CARD MR. BEECHER REFUSED TO SIGN.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Beecher was recalled.

Mr. Evarts [To Mr. Morris]—Mr. Morris, have you those exhibits now?

[Mr. Morris produced the exhibits called for.]

Mr. Evarts—This exhibit, No. 75, Mr. Beecher, you say is the card that was shown to you [handing witness Exhibit No. 75]. Now, the next morning, was any card prepared that was actually published? A. Yes, Sir; the next morning after Sunday.

Q. The next morning after Sunday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Monday morning; and where was that card prepared that was actually published, and who took part with you in finally modeling it for publication? A. It was prepared in my study, at my house. Mr. Thomas Kinsella took part in it.

Q. And yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How came he to be there? A. On invitation through Mr. Moulton.

Q. In consequence of the call, as you understood, that had been made on Saturday? A. I understood Mr. Moulton would—

Q. Would call upon him? A. Would call upon him and suggest to him my wish.

Q. At any rate, he came to your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Without any direct invitation from you on the subject other than that? A. Other than that.

Q. And do you know whether he brought with him that card, or the text of that card, or whether you had it already there? A. My impression is that I had it from the night before.

Q. Now, with that before you, was finally a card prepared and published? A. There was.

Q. At what time of day was this interview between you and Mr. Kinsella at your house? A. At 9, from 9 to 10.

Q. How long a time was occupied in it? A. About an hour—a little more or a little less.

Q. Now, look at this paper of Monday evening, June 2, and say if that card, as there printed, is the card as settled between Mr. Kinsella and yourself? [Handing witness a copy of The Brooklyn Eagle of June 2, 1873.] A. This is it, I should think, Sir; I think I recognise it.

Mr. Evarts—We ask to put this paper in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir.

[The copy of The Brooklyn Eagle of June 2, 1873, was marked "D, 130."]

Q. Mr. Beecher, were you familiar with the hours of publication of the first issue of The Brooklyn Eagle at that time? A. I know generally. I don't know how long my knowledge has extended back.

Q. What hour? A. Between one and two, the first edition, the editorial page.

Q. And others later? A. The first form goes between one and two, I always understood; the others later, and continuously, in successive editions, third and fourth.

Q. Now, Sir, what clause in that card as prepared—suggested in that form to you, as you have testified—is omitted here? [Referring to Exhibit D, 130.] A. As I published the card it reads: "If that document," alluding to the "Tripartite Agreement," "should lead the public to regard Mr. Tilton as the author of the calumnies to which it alludes, it will do him great injustice." As it was proposed and I refused, it was: "If that document should lead the public to regard Mr. Tilton as the author of the calumnies to which it alludes, or any other calumnies against me—" I would not put my pen to that.

Q. Now, at the commencement of the letter—[showing witness the paper.]

Mr. Shearman—The last clause of the letter.

Mr. Evarts—The last clause of the card as you published it, and the last clause as proposed to you; read the first clause as you published it. A. "I am unwilling that he (Mr. Tilton) should even seem to be responsible for injurious statements, whose—;" "I am unwilling that he should even seem to be responsible for injurious statements whose force was derived wholly from others."

Q. What was the final clause as proposed in the card that you rejected? A. "Mr. Tilton's course toward me has been that of a man of honor and integrity."

Q. Well, how about that clause? A. I wouldn't sign it.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, when on that Saturday night you informed Mr. Moulton that your resignation would be published if this matter were proceeded with, and he went down stairs, did he say anything about seeing Mr. Tilton, or did you know that he was going to see Mr. Tilton in any way? A. I probably knew he was going; I don't recall any significant conversation respecting it.

Q. Did you know Mr. Tilton was in the house? A. I knew it, Sir, but I cannot say certainly whether I knew it before—at the beginning or after.

Q. Now, after he had seen Mr. Tilton, did Mr. Moulton report to you any observation of Mr. Tilton's in connection with this resignation of yours? A. No, Sir; he did not.

Q. This paper, which was a draft or proposal of resignation—proposed resignation—what became of it. Mr. Beecher—this paper that you had, that you took out and read to him; what became of it? A. I don't know, Sir; it went the way of pretty much all my papers which I try to keep.

Q. You are not able to find it? A. No, Sir; it is destroyed, I have no doubt.

Q. Now, here is a supposed contents of it, which has been given in evidence. Mr. Moulton has given this as the contents of that paper that you read. [Handing witness the book.]

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment.

Mr. Evarts—Isn't it!

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—Well!

[Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Beach consulted together.]

Mr. Fullerton—Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Is that a correct statement of it? A. Not quite.

MR. BEECHER'S PURPOSE IN THE PROPOSED RESIGNATION.

Q. What variation would you make in it, or how would you state the resignation? A. It reads, "I tender herewith my resignation of Plymouth Church." It is difficult to resign a church that way; it should be "pastorate," or something to that effect. "I have stood among you in sorrow for two years," he says, "in order to save"—"striving to save," if I recall it right, "from disgrace"—they have it "shame"—"a certain household; but since a recent publication makes this no longer possible, I now resign my ministry, and retire to private life." I think, with those inconsiderable changes, this is substantially the card. When you made that proposition to Mr. Moulton of your purpose of resignation, did you so intend to do if this publication was made? A. Just as sure as the Lord lived I should have done it.

Q. What was your purpose in that resignation, under that contingency?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir; that is not proper.

Mr. Evarts—What circumstances attended the situation which led you to plan and propose to execute the resignation of your place as pastor?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir; they are already given in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—No, they are not.

Judge Neilson—Well, if you ask what circumstances, if any, other than those already stated. Perhaps you have got it all.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, we have a great many circumstances that are given in evidence, but we have not as yet given in evidence what of those circumstances operated upon his mind. That is the only point of my inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—He has already stated, Sir, the reason why he proposed to resign; it was the publication of that proposed card. Now, that is in evidence, and that seems to cover the whole ground. Beyond that he certainly cannot go. Any hidden purpose or meaning in his mind is not competent proof at the time which was unexpressed; therefore we object to it.

Mr. Evarts—Whenever the intent with which an act is to be construed becomes a proper matter of evidence, and since the laws of evidence have allowed the party himself to speak, it has been well settled that he can speak concerning his intent.

Judge Neilson—As to all papers or contracts—papers or instruments which do not amount to a contract.

Mr. Evarts—Yes.

Judge Neilson—Or which do not create an estoppel.

Mr. Evarts—That we understand to be the limitation.

Judge Neilson—As to informal papers, I think he may state his intent. Well, let the witness answer this question.

Mr. Fullerton—Is he now permitted, Sir, to give a reason other than the one contained in the card itself?

Judge Neilson—There may be an additional reason. Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—One unexpressed at the time!

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will bear in mind the card alleges the reason in order to save a family from disgrace.

Judge Neilson—"I have stood for two years," and so on. I think he may answer it.

Mr. Evarts—You may answer, Mr. Beecher.

The Witness—I don't—

Mr. Evarts [To The Tribune stenographer]—Won't you read the question?

The Witness—The question is some way back, and there has been something said since.

The Tribune stenographer read the last question, as follows: "What circumstances attended the situation which led you to plan and propose to execute a resignation of your place as pastor?" A. The publication of that card would compel at once a consideration of the whole subject by my church, and put me upon trial in that church, and, as I believed then, would destroy that church, and, at any rate, any defense of myself that should be necessary on the publication of that card I could make better standing as a private man, fighting a private man, than standing hampered by the restrictions and relations and duties of a pastor in that church.

THE "POISON" INTERVIEW OF JUNE 2 DENIED.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, what is your ordinary lunch or midday dinner hour? A. At 12 o'clock in the country and 2 o'clock in the city.

Q. What length of time, in your visits to Peekskill, was it your habit to allow for passing between your residence here, with your wife, to the station at Forty-second-st.? A. It would depend upon whether we went by the cars or by a hack; if we went by—or whether I went alone or with my wife.

Q. Well, I have spoken now of with your wife? A. When I went with my wife, two hours was the time we usually allowed—about two hours, walking down to the ferry, and then taking a conveyance on the other side.

Q. Now, what was your habit in regard—was this 2 o'clock train a frequent train taken by you? A. A regular train.

Q. A usual train? A. No, there was no—it depended—

Q. I only ask you, was it a frequent train with you in going to Peekskill? A. It was not an unfrequent train; it was one of the convenient trains. When I wished to spend the day at Peekskill I took the 8 o'clock train; when I wished to spend the forenoon in Brooklyn I took the 2 o'clock.

Q. And it was a common thing for you to take the 2 o'clock train? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was your habit in taking that train as to having your lunch or dinner at your house after leaving, or taking it as a part of your trip across? A. There was no habit about it; it was a matter of convenience. If we went over to The Union office, on my way up—that is provided it was a Monday, I should go over to The Union office and look after my editorials, and take my lunch, and then go up to the train.

Q. Now, Mr. Cleveland—I don't know whether it has been stated or not, but Mr. Cleveland was the managing editor of The Christian Union? A. He was the managing business man.

Q. Managing business editor, do you call it? A. No editor, Sir.

Q. Well, business manager? A. He was the business manager of The Christian Union, had charge of the printing presses, and the type room, and the paper, and everything of that sort, and saw to the whole mechanical execution, and also had a certain relation to the advertisements.

Q. At that time it was so? A. At that time.

Q. Now, at what hour of the day and for what length of time were you in Mr. Cleveland's company on this Monday? A. I was there about 11 o'clock, and, as near as I can recollect, spent from three-quarters of an hour to an hour; it was not all with him.

Q. Was it at the office? A. At the office.

Q. Now, during the forenoon of that Monday, the 2d of June, were you at Mr. Moulton's house? A. I was not.

Q. On your return to Brooklyn on Tuesday night, when you married one of your parishioners, I suppose, were you at Mr. Moulton's house? A. No, Sir.

Q. And did you see Mr. or Mrs. Moulton on that Monday, or on that Tuesday night of that week? A. Neither of them.

Q. Now, how soon after your return, which was the 13th day of June, as you have stated it, Friday of the succeeding week—how soon after that did you have any interview with Mr. Moulton? A. I don't recall, Sir.

Q. How soon with Mrs. Moulton? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Now, that morning, before Mr. Kinsella came and you were engaged with him, did you make any call, or go out of your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember the time of sending the telegram? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who was the messenger that took that? A. My wife.

Q. And while she was away were you in the house? A. I was; I had my preparation to make for my absence—contemplated absence; I was going to have a little kind of vacation, which I looked forward to with great pleasure.

Q. What length of time does it take you, or do you allow usually in your movements, to go from your house to the office of The Christian Union, in New York? A. About three-quarters of an hour, varying. I could go there—if I was as young as I was 20 years ago—I could go there in 20 minutes.

Q. But as matter of fact? A. But as the dignity of age comes on, I make it longer and longer, until it takes now about an average of three-quarters of an hour.

Q. Now, on the morning of the 4th of June, following the evening of the marriage, by what train, and how, did you go to Boston? A. The 8 o'clock train in the morning, leaving my house at half-past six.

Q. And where and with whom were you resident during the whole period of your absence till your return? A. Gov. William Claflin's, at Newtonville, eight miles out of Boston.

Q. And what public occupations had you during that absence there? A. I went specially to deliver a sermon before the Society of Religious Inquiry in Harvard College. It was at the invitation of the students that I made that little trip, and then afterward, in order that I could preach it on Sunday and not a week day, I arranged an exchange with the Rev. Mr. Murray, then of Park Street Church. He preached for me in Brooklyn, and I preached for him in the morning at Park-st., and at night I went over to Cambridge and delivered the sermon before the students.

Q. The Monday following? A. No, Sir; Sunday night, of the same day.

Q. Oh! I beg pardon then. Now, on the 1st of June, which was Sunday, you left a letter there, with a note to Mrs. Moulton, you have stated? A. I did.

Q. Did you have any interview with Mrs. Moulton on that day? A. No, Sir.

AN ACTUAL INTERVIEW WITH MRS. MOULTON ON MAY 31.

Q. And on Saturday, the 31st, had you any other interview with Mrs. Moulton than that which you have stated, being in the evening of the 31st? A. Only a brief interview that I had with her in the morning.

Q. What time and under what circumstances? A. Well, it was waiting for Mr. Moulton to come in. He was out, for some reason, when I first went there.

Q. What hour of the day? A. Well, I should think it was between 8 and 9 in the morning.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton come in? A. He did.

Q. How long were you there with Mr. Moulton or Mrs.

Moulton, or both of them? A. Well, with both of them together I should think perhaps an hour. I left about 10 o'clock.

Q. And after that hour you were not there until the evening? A. No, Sir.

Q. What part of that hour was spent in Mrs. Moulton's company? A. I should think perhaps fifteen minutes or twenty.

Q. And how did that interview occur and go on, at their house—the interview with the one or the other? A. I don't remember the consecutive interview; it was an interview in which I did pretty much all the talking, and I spent my time in denouncing Mr. Tilton very largely.

Q. What was the subject of the interview between Mr. Moulton and yourself? A. Mr. Moulton!

Q. Mr. Moulton and yourself? A. Mr. Moulton and myself—the subject of the interview was the preparation—I mean the forthcoming card which I understood Mr. Tilton was preparing, and which I told him would be a finality, if it was to be such as he intimated it would be; and then came the discussion; he, as he often did, rebuked me for discouragement—that I never gave him any hope; that he had managed Tilton in many and many a passionate hour, and that he had it in his power to do it again, and he should do it; I won't say that it was at that interview—but no matter.

Q. Well? A. I don't recall it as belonging to that interview.

Q. Now, what part had Mrs. Moulton in any conversation or interview that morning? A. Only that which preceded this while I was waiting for Mr. Moulton.

Q. Well, what occurred at that time? A. There was nothing very significant, more than that I was more than usually angry rather than sorry, and I walked up and down the room, and said that this state of things was an intolerable state of things, that I had expended pretty much all the patience I had, and that I was not going to stand this thing much longer—that it was a living death, and a man might as well die at once as to be constantly ground and harrowed with these things—settled and never settled, arranged and never arranged; and that I believed Mr. Tilton kept this thing in hand all the time to make trouble, and that he leaked and leaked, and did it a purpose; and, when he was good-natured, made fair conversation and fair promises, but when the world went hard with him, or he fell into his passionate outbursts of anger, then he said ugly things, and they came to me, provoking my friends, and I would go to Mr. Moulton, and Moulton would smooth me down, and explain them away, and make me think there had been some mistake, and then it would come around precisely the same way again; and for my part I had borne it about as long as I intended to. It was about that.

Q. Mr. Beecher, here is a proposed card; it is in Mr. Tilton's handwriting, I suppose, is it not?

Mr. Morris—Is that the one you inquired about before recess?

Mr. Evarts—No; it is one you handed to me, No. 25. This is in evidence, as I understand. [To the witness.] Please look at that card and say whether that was shown to you, or considered by you, at this or any other period? A. I remember never to have seen this.

Q. That was not shown to you or made the subject of talk with you? A. No, Sir; I never saw that extract from what was called the "Apology" until I saw it in the "Bacon letter."

Mr. Evarts—That is all on this matter. There are two of those, Mr. Morris, [To the witness.] Oh, Mr. Beecher, this day, this 1st of June—2d of June, Monday—were your servants at the house, or had they already left? A. They went up the week before, on Thursday, to Peekskill. There was nobody in the house but my wife and myself.

THE LETTER OF JUNE 1 EXPLAINED.

Q. Mr. Beecher, have you a printed copy of this Exhibit 26, which is your letter of June 1, 1873? A. I have, Sir.

Q. I will read this letter, as there are passages in it that I wish to ask you about: [Reading.]

SUNDAY MORNING, June 1, 1873.

MY DEAR FRANK: The whole earth is tranquil and the heaven is serene, as befits one who has about finished his world-life. I could do nothing on Saturday—my head was confused. But a good sleep has made it like crystal. I have determined to make no more resistance. Theodore's temperament is such that the future, even if temporarily earned, would be absolutely worthless, filled with abrupt changes, and rendering me liable at any hour or day to be obliged to stultify all the devices by which we have saved ourselves. It is only fair that he should know that the publication of the card which he proposes would leave him far worse off than before.

The agreement was made after my letter through you was written. He had had it a year. He had condoned his wife's fault. He had enjoined upon me with the utmost earnestness and solemnity not to betray his wife nor leave his children to a blight. I had honestly and earnestly joined in the purpose. Then this settlement was made and signed by him. It was not my making. He revised his part so that it should wholly suit him, and signed it. It stood unquestioned and unblamed for more than a year. Then it was published. Nothing but that. That which he did in private when made public excited him to fury, and he charges me with making him appear as one graciously pardoned by me! It was his own deliberate act, with which he was perfectly content till others saw it, and then he charges a grievous wrong home on me!

My mind is clear. I am not in haste. I shall write for the public a statement that will bear the light of the Judgment Day. God will take care of me and mine. When I look on earth it is a deep night. When I look to the heavens above I see the morning breaking. But, oh! that I could put in golden letters my deep sense of your faithful, earnest, undying fidelity, your disinterested friendship! Your noble wife, too, has been to me one of God's comforters. It is such as she that renews a waning faith in womanhood. Now, Frank, I would not have you waste any more energy on a hopeless task. With such a man as T. T. there is no possible salvation for any that depend upon him. With a strong nature, he does not know how to govern it. With generous impulses, the undercurrent that rules him is self. With ardent affections, he cannot love long that which does not repay him with admiration and praise. With a strong, theatric nature, he is constantly imposed upon with the idea that a position, a great stroke, a coup d'état, is the way to success.

Besides these he has a hundred good things about him, but these named traits make him absolutely unreliable.

Therefore there is no use in further trying. I have a strong feeling upon me, and it brings great peace with it, that I am spending my last Sunday and preaching my last sermon.

Dear good God, I thank thee I am indeed beginning to see rest and triumph. The pain of life is but a moment; the glory of everlasting emancipation is wordless, inconceivable, full of beckoning glory. Oh! my beloved Frank, I shall know you there, and forever hold fellowship with you, and look back and smile at the past. Your loving,

H. W. B.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, the first sentence of this letter speaks of the earth as tranquil and the heaven as serene, "as befits one who is about to finish his world-life." Did you refer to yourself in that sentence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what sense did you refer to yourself and your world-life as about finished? A. Mr. Evans, I never am carried up by excitement very high, that I do not feel as though I could touch the heaven by reaching my hand out. It is not an expression just characteristic of this alone, but characteristic of almost my whole life, and Sabbath days especially, and, above all, such Sundays as I see, looking out over the bay, and over all the Orange Hills, and the great sleeping city on the other side. I am lifted up, and it seems sometimes as if I was there—

Q. Does that refer to any purposed termination of your life?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. The question remains unanswered. Let him answer the question.

Mr. Evans—Well, Mr. Beecher, you may answer further, then.

The Witness—What further?

Q. In what sense, I ask, do you there refer to yourself as one who has about finished his world-life? A. [Reading] "The whole earth is tranquil and the heaven is serene, as befits one who has about finished his world-life." I felt as though I was very nearly through for the hundredth time in that trouble.

Q. Has it any relation to any purposed or meditated termination of your life by yourself? A. Not the slightest. The last sentence ought to be an answer to that.

Q. Well, we will take the fact. Now, I ask your attention to this clause:

I have determined to make no more resistance. The doctor's temperament is such that the future, even if temporarily earned, would be absolutely worthless, filled with abrupt changes, and rendering me liable at any hour or day to be obliged to stultify all the devices by which we have saved ourselves.

Now, Sir, what situation and what devices had you in mind in that clause of your letter?

Mr. Fullerton—That I object to, Sir. There is no hidden or occult meaning in that passage at all which needs explanation. Surely this witness is not at liberty to go over this letter sentence by sentence, paragraph by paragraph, and give us some extraordinary poetic definition of terms used there, out of the ordinary sense, and violating the context. That is not admissible, Sir. It is very plain what this means. There can be no misunderstanding about it at all, and, therefore, I object to any translation of it into any other kind of language.

Judge Neilson—We had this question up on the direct examination of Mr. Tilton, and we did not confine ourselves to the mere question of ambiguity in reference to his letters; but, although the learned counsel opposed objected very strenuously, this doctrine was then applied of which he now takes advantage, and I ruled that Mr. Tilton, although he had written despairing letters, accusing himself and denouncing himself as unworthy, and closing with "Yours, despairingly," was at liberty to explain—to explain what he had reference to in using those extraordinary expressions, and I think I said something like this: that a writer could be allowed to state the circumstances and the state and frame of mind he was in when he wrote, as for example, that he had the gout, or had been three nights without sleep, or the like, and thereupon Mr. Tilton was allowed to explain those passages, and to explain his religious sensibilities in connection with them.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, if a man had the gout, that would explain everything that he might say of every kind, and it would not be necessary to put any questions on that subject; but your Honor will perceive that that is a different question from the one that is involved now, a very different question. Mr. Tilton was asked whether certain letters which he wrote were written at a period when his religious views were in a state of transition. That is all that he was asked upon that subject. I should have no objection to a kindred question being asked now; but that is not the question before the Court, and if your Honor will permit the stenographer to read it, you will see that it is a far-reaching question, and that it enables the witness to go out to the Orange Hills again—for aught I know, to go into an explanation entirely foreign from the real subject before us.

Judge Neilson—Take the expression in this clause, "the devices by which we have saved ourselves"—you agree that he could explain that?

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, we have been now six weeks ascertaining what the devices were; I and my friends on the other side, I think, all agree upon that subject. They are very plain. I do not think, at this late day, there is any doubt about what the devices were which were spoken of here.

Mr. Evarts—Very well. We may ask what he had in his mind when he wrote this letter.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose that the fair legal and natural inference would be that he had reference to those devices which had been practiced for several years prior, and which on very many occasions had been alluded to and had been the subject of conversation between these parties; and I don't think that he ought to be allowed to travel out of the record of these years to get at any other signification of the word "devices" or "device."

Mr. Evarts—I do not think my friend is right in stating, as a legal presumption, that a man always has in his mind everything that has occurred.

Mr. Fullerton—No; but if it is in reference to a lawsuit, then, perhaps, he had better keep it in his mind, if he is going to deal with it afterward. But here we have these parties meeting, day after day and week after week, closeted together, getting up scheme after scheme and device after device, to accomplish a given end. It goes on in that way for years and years, and then one party connected with the affair writes a letter in which he speaks of the device which they have resorted to, and now the witness is asked on the stand, if you please, what the word "device" means; when we have spent so much time here in proving these very devices—in showing what they were, who were the parties to them, and the objects to be accomplished by them. I think, Sir, that these transactions, running through these various years, ought to interpret themselves in the light of the surrounding circumstances which have been given in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Let the stenographer repeat the question.

The Tribune stenographer read the question as follows: Now, I ask your attention to this clause:

I have determined to make no more resistance. Theodore's temperament is such that the future, even if temporarily earned, would be absolutely worthless, filled with abrupt changes, and rendering me liable at any hour or day to be obliged to stultify all the devices by which we have saved ourselves.

Q. Now, Sir, what situation and what devices had you in mind in that clause of your letter?

Judge Neilson—We will take the answer, Sir.

The Witness—The situation was that of a man that had been bankrupted in every way, and whom we were endeavoring to recuperate and restore. The devices were, among others, $5,000 in April; $250 and $500 at different times, along through the period; and various other things that helped him—the devices of soothing the prejudices against him, and of preventing men's talking to his disadvantage, and everything else that would help him to become a man again—a man, I mean, that had overcome distrust and become apparently, again, a man.

Judge Neilson—Well, the expression, "saved ourselves," Mr. Beecher—the last clause, what of that?

The Witness—It was a partnership, Sir. We were all in the same boat together. He had his reasons why he did not want matters to come out about his family, and I had my reasons.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I ask your attention to this clause:

He had condoned his wife's fault; he had enjoined upon me with the utmost earnestness and solemnity not to betray his wife, nor leave his children to a blight.

What fault of his wife, and what fact—in respect of what fact had he enjoined upon you not to betray his wife nor leave his children to a blight?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, if your Honor please, that is asking for an interpretation of Theodore Tilton's language, and not his own; and therefore I object to it.

Judge Neilson—I think that question is objectionable.

Mr. Evarts—The writer refers to some matters of fact in the expressions which he uses in this letter. My inquiry was simply to ask him what matters of fact they were that he thus referred to.

Judge Neilson—Well, I should allow you to put that; but that is not the question.

Mr. Fullerton—It is what matters of fact Theodore Tilton referred to; the question involves that.

Mr. Evarts—What matter of fact Mr. Beecher referred to. [To the Witness.] What facts did you refer to in those statements?

Mr. Fullerton—That is more objectionable than the other.

Judge Neilson—It struck me it was an improvement.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is an improvement the other way, Sir. What facts did Theodore Tilton refer to?

Judge Neilson—No; what facts did the writer refer to?

Mr. Fullerton—Ah, Sir; but he did not refer to any facts. Your Honor will see by reading the letter that the objection must be well taken. "He had condoned his wife's fault"—that is, Theodore Tilton; "he had enjoined upon me with the utmost earnestness and solemnity not to betray his wife, or leave his children to a blight"—it is what Theodore Tilton had done, what Theodore Tilton had said, and not the witness.

Judge Neilson—That of itself would be a fair subject of inquiry independently of that particular clause.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, it is recorded there what Theodore Tilton said; it is recorded by the witness; it is just exactly what he is quoting, the language of Theodore Tilton upon those subjects.

Judge Neilson—I think the counsel can ask him what facts and circumstances he referred to in writing that clause.

Mr. Evarts—That is the point. Mr. Beecher, you will answer, please. A. I understood the matter to be simply that, as I then understood it, and assuredly believed it was, that his wife had transferred to me—

Mr. Fullerton—I understand it is what Theodore Tilton said to him.

Mr. Evarts—That is my inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; I understand that to be within your Honor's decision.

The Witness—He did not say anything of this kind to me; this is not Mr. Tilton's language; it is mine.

Mr. Fullerton—Borrowed, however, from him, as it appears by the letter itself.

Mr. Evarts—The second clause is the statement of the injunction that Mr. Tilton had—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, the answer of the defendant so far as it has gone seems to embrace all of his considerations growing out of what had transpired in a series of years, not what was said by Theodore Tilton in regard to matters involved in the question to him, and which led him to write that letter, or to employ that language in writing that letter, and therefore it is objectionable.

Judge Neilson—I admit it is not free from doubt, Sir; but I think we will take the answer; perhaps it is a nice question, and may need more consideration than has been given to it here.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Beecher!

The Witness—That was the fault that I understood—

Mr. Evarts—You haven't stated it yet.

Mr. Beach—Yes, he did.

Mr. Evarts—Well, read what he had stated. [To the stenographer.] Won't you read the witness's answer as far as it had gone!

The Tribune stenographer [reading]: "I understood the matter to be simply that as I then understood it, and assuredly believed it was, that his wife had transferred to me"—that is all.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness can go on from that point.

Mr. Evarts—From there, undoubtedly.

The Witness [continuing]—Her affection; that, in consequence of such transfer, she was led to the separation between herself and her husband, and to the almost breaking up of the household; that I regarded as her fault so far as he was concerned, and which he had forgiven.

Q. Now, in the next clause [reading]:

He had enjoined upon me with the utmost earnestness and solemnity not to betray his wife or leave his children to a blight.

A. That was a part of the interview of February of 1871, when we were in the study together, and when we had a very cordial interview in respect to his own character, if you will recall it, Sir.

Q. At his house? A. At his house, when he cleared himself before me of all the imputations and charges of impudicity and of intemperance, and of want of care of his household, and what not; and then alluded to the disagreement that had come up, and the misunderstandings that had passed between us, and desired in the most earnest manner that the state of things between him and his wife should not get out, and should not be known, especially that it should not be—anything get out that had reference to the fact that Mrs. Tilton had left him at all, and come back again, under the plea of ill-usage.

Q. Now, you say in another clause lower down:

I shall write for the public a statement that will bear the light of the Judgment Day.

Did that express a purpose that you had at the time? A. Most certainly it did; I had never kept any of the documents, nor any record, nor made explanations, and I meant to do it.

Q. Now, toward the close of the letter you say:

Therefore there is no use in further trying. I have a strong feeling, and it brings great peace with it, that I am spending my last Sunday and preaching my last sermon.

Now, Sir, what fact or feeling in regard to yourself, or your health or condition, did you refer to in that clause? A. Nothing whatever, except that I felt so; for I felt so, not that time alone—those conversant with my ministry know very well what that is—

THE SIGNIFICANCE MR. BEECHER GAVE TO DEATH IN HIS LETTERS.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, now, I object to that.

Q. Not that time alone; but state what fact about yourself you have to— A. I have no other—no fact about myself except that that is the way I felt.

Q. When you wrote that? A. When I wrote that—poetic, perhaps.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, in regard to temperament, in respect to depressions of spirits, what is the fact in regard to yourself? A. I have the very best and highest—I pity anybody that has any worse ones than I do at the other extreme, although good spirits predominate, but illness or overwork and exhaustion continued bring me down sometimes into a single day, and sometimes into a consecutive week, of the most profound depression.

Q. Does it go to the extent of hypochondria? A. It did in my boyhood; I think as I have grown older and tougher that it stops in that of profound sadness rather than in the more developed form of hypochondria, which my father had and my ancestors.

Q. Now, have you at any time during this course of things had in mind any purpose of suicide? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Have you ever expressed any such purpose to any one? A. No, Sir.

Q. In what sense, then, of death have you used expressions of being near the end of your life? A. In the sense of a sentiment or feeling, not of a purpose or a design.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, after the publication of the "Tripartite Agreement" to which we have been alluding, did anything of this kind occur at Mr. Moulton's house, on the part of Mr. Tilton saying to you:

Mr. Beecher, the publication of this "Tripartite Covenant" puts me in the position of a man having been forgiven by you for some crime. Now, you know that is not true; I cannot stand in any such position as that, nor I won't stand in any such position as that. Now, I want you to set that right, or I will publish this card.

And Mr. Moulton proceeds to say:

And he had a card for publication into which was incorporated a part of the whole of the "Letter of Contrition" of January 1st, 1870—it is a misprint—"1871."

Now, Sir, at any interview at Mr. Moulton's house, this that you have spoken of, or any other that followed this publication on the "Tripartite Agreement," did any such thing as that occur between you and Mr. Tilton? A. It did not; I never saw the card nor the thing that he published; I only heard of it from others.

Q. Well, this card which incorporated part, or the whole of the "Letter of Contrition," you have already stated you did not see? A. I never saw it.

Q. Well, I don't know that Mr. Moulton says that you saw that, but did anything pass between you and Mr. Tilton of that kind, his saying that you put him in the position of a man having been forgiven by you for some crime—A. No, Sir.

Q. Or what did pass? A. No, Sir—nothing.

Q. Now, after Mr. Tilton had left, if he had been there, did you say to Mr. Moulton:

If Theodore Tilton publishes that letter it would simply be his death—

That is, your death? A. I did not.

Q. Now, when you were proposing that you would make a resignation if the publication was made, did Mr. Moulton say to you that that was a virtual confession of the crime, and it was an "act of cowardice on my part to do it"—that is on your part? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have said, Mr. Beecher, that a proposed card which included what has been spoken of as the "Letter of Contrition" was not shown to you—that you remember? A. I do.

A. Well, now, I ask you this: At this interview, Mr. Moulton says—A. At which interview?

Q. At an interview at which, as he says, this card was present, he says this—being asked by Mr. Fullerton, I suppose:

Q. Do you recollect whether anything was said about the erasure in that letter of Jan. 1, 1871, which appears there? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Theodore Tilton said that the introduction of that clause, if I remember rightly, would be a virtual confession or statement of adultery between Mr. Beecher and his wife; and therefore it was stricken out.

Was anything of that kind said in your presence? A. I don't understand you, Sir—adultery between me and my wife! I—

Q. Well, Sir, if you will attend to my question. A. I attend to it, but I don't get the run of it, Sir.

Q. You have said that a paper that I have shown you (Exhibit No. 25), which was a proposed card which included a part of what is called the "Letter of Contrition," was not shown to you? A. Yes; I understand that.

Q. Very well, now! A. But you ask me now for something—

Q. Now, I ask you whether a certain thing was said in your presence? A. Well, Sir.

Q. Now, will you listen to that? A. I will.

Q. Was it said in your presence—was this said in your presence? A. I am all attention, Sir.

Q. [Reading.] "Mr. Theodore Tilton said that the introduction of that clause"—(being a clause of this "Letter of Contrition" which was embodied in his card)—"Mr. Theodore Tilton said that the introduction of that clause, if I remember rightly" (that is, Mr. Moulton's statement), "would be a virtual confession or statement of adultery between Mr. Beecher and his wife, and therefore it was stricken out." Now, my sole question is, whether anything of that kind was said in your presence? A. No, Sir, most certainly not—whatever it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—Well, do I understand you to say that that was stated?

MR. BEECHER TALKS WITH MRS. MOULTON ABOUT MRS. TILTON.

Mr. Evarts—No, I say it is a statement—I don't know that it is, but to exclude any conclusion that it was, I ask him if it was said in his presence; I don't understand him as having said it. [To the Witness.] Mr. Beecher, do you remember, if at all, how early there was any conversation between you and Mrs. Moulton concerning any of the matter which led to your visits to her husband? A. It was early in 1871, Sir.

Q. And when first and in what form was anything said between you and her? A. My impression is it was very soon after they moved into their new house in Remond-st., which would be May or June of 1871.

Q. Yes, and how did any conversation arise, and what was said? A. It arose in consequence of my asking her husband whether his wife was aware of the difficulties in the family—

Q. You had asked him—A. Whether it was—he thought it would be wise for me to say anything to her about it; he said he thought—he made no objection to it; rather encouraged it; I asked Mrs. Moulton when I met her another time whether her husband had spoken to her about the difficulties which existed in Mr. Tilton's family, and with which I was connected, and about which he was occupied, and she said he had, and I said to her that I was glad of it, because I was sorely distressed by the condition of Mrs. Tilton; that she was alone; there were reasons why her mother could scarcely see her much; she herself could not go out much; her health was feeble; I could not under the circumstances do much myself to alleviate her condition, and, besides, in such a matter as that, a woman's nature was needed for good counsel, and it would give me the greatest joy and I should feel the greatest gratitude if she would consent to be interested in Elizabeth and to do those things for her which one sister would do for another in the way of counsel and of sympathy and of the inspiration of hope and courage; the condition of things made it improper, I thought, so far as I was concerned, for I then, as for years after, labored under the impression that Elizabeth loved me in over-measure, and it was necessary that somebody should take care of her, and I had that opinion of Mrs. Moulton which led me to believe that she, under the circumstances, was, providentially, the very woman.

Q. Now, in any conversation with Mrs. Moulton, did you express any feelings of grief on your part in reference to this situation of Mrs. Tilton or the family? A. Very great.

Q. And in what way and how did Mrs. Moulton respond, if at all, to such a statement? A. She responded in a way that commanded my esteem and gratitude; she said that she loved Elizabeth, that she thought highly of her, that she would be very cheerful, that she would very cheerfully take upon herself any offices of kindness; I told her that if in the strife with trouble and want there were any of the things that a woman should perceive to be necessary for her comfort or for her children, and that could not be supplied through her husband, any things that a woman would think of, only let me know, and she should be furnished with funds at any time; all I wanted was that she should be looked after by some one that loved her and would take care of her discreetly.

Q. Do you remember, Mr. Beecher, any occasions on which you sent any messages of any kind by Mrs. Moulton to Mrs. Tilton? A. I have no—I don't single out any special instances; I did send words of encouragement to her, exhorting her to build her house again and to renew the love of her youth; not to be discouraged; that God would take care of her and of the children, and such counsels as a pastor and a friend might send to a woman bedeviled with such trouble.

MRS. MOULTON'S KISS OF INSPIRATION.

Q. You have spoken, Mr. Beecher, this morning, about one interview in which Mrs. Moulton kissed you on the forehead; you spoke of it as a kiss of inspiration; what did you mean by that expression? A. I meant—well, it was a token of confidence; it was a salutation that did not belong to the common courtesy of life; neither was it a kiss of pleasure, or anything of that kind, but it was, as I sometimes have seen it in poetry—if you will excuse me—it was—it seemed to me, a holy kiss.

Q. You have said something about your not returning it? A. Well, Sir, I felt—I felt so deeply grateful that if I had returned the kiss, I might have returned it with an enthusiasm that would have offended her delicacy; it was not best, under the circumstances, that she and I should kiss.

Judge Neilson—I don't think any excuse is necessary. [Laughter.]

The Witness—I would not, for the world, have it—

Mr. Evarts [To the Court]—Well, Sir, it is a matter to show, to save from any impression that it was a discourtesy or offense on his part not to recognize it.

Judge Neilson—It is apparent from his examination that the kiss was given on an impulse—a natural and impulsive thing, I suppose, as a kiss usually is.

Mr. Evarts—That is the proper view of the matter, I suppose.

MR. MOULTON SEVERE TOWARD MRS. TILTON.

Q. Now, in your frequent visits at that house, how frequently, Mr. Beecher, did you have any conversations beyond those of salutation with Mrs. Moulton? A. Not unfrequently, Sir. I often went when Mr. Moulton had gone down to the warehouses in the morning, for he got up early sometimes, and then waiting for him to come I would go up stairs and lie down on the lounge, and she would take her sewing, or what-not, and sit in a chair, and we would talk on whatever topic happened to be current, sometimes one thing and sometimes another, seldom—less often on this subject than any other.

Q. Now, were you aware, or did you conceive yourself to be aware of an ill-disposition or ill-feeling on the part of Mr. Moulton toward Mrs. Tilton? A. Oh! I was not left to any doubt about it; after May of 1871, he spoke of her to me in the severest terms.

Q. In regard to her treatment of her husband, or her disposition in the family, or what?

DISCUSSION UPON A NEW CONVERSATION.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think that is competent.

Judge Neilson—It is not competent unless the inquiry was made of Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no pretense that he did. This is the first time that this phase of the subject has appeared.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that. It is introductory to a question I am going to ask him as to what passed between him and Mrs. Moulton.

Judge Neilson—Even then you ought to refer to something in regard to which Mrs. Moulton was interrogated.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that, if your Honor please. Strictly, I suppose I am at liberty to make that inquiry. Indeed, the whole limit of my inquiry is as to the intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Moulton. They have got what part of it they have seen fit, and I suppose I am at liberty to give any other that arises.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly not, by any means. That would be an extraordinary rule.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed.

Mr. Evarts—Not falling within the same; however, we won't discuss that proposition.

Mr. Beach—You are making it practical.

Mr. Evarts—Well, when we come to the practical question we will discuss that. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Beecher, in your conversations with Mrs. Moulton had you anything to say to her in relation to her feelings toward Mrs. Tilton as compared with her husband's feelings, or her desire in that respect?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that. We might as well have the question settled now. They certainly cannot go into conversations with Mrs. Moulton other than those to which we have called attention, in regard to which we have made inquiries. The counsel on the other side seems, by the nature of his insinuations, to regard everybody here as on trial, and to regard himself as at liberty to prove anything that anybody ever said to anybody else upon any subject. Now, so far as we have opened the door, and given any part of a conversation between Mrs. Moulton and Mr. Beecher, the gentleman can draw it up and get at whatever there is of that conversation not revealed; but as to any inquiry into any other conversation, he is not at liberty to do it at all.

Judge Neilson—Unless he interrogated Mr. Moulton or Mrs. Moulton on the subject.

Mr. Fullerton—Of course; but that he has not done. It is not pretended he has done that, so it is not necessary to discuss that.

Judge Neilson—I think the first branch of his inquiry might be correct. [To the Tribune stenographer.] Read the question.

The Tribune stenographer read the last question as follows: "Now, Mr. Beecher, in your conversation with Mrs. Moulton, had you anything to say to her in relation to her feeling toward Mrs. Tilton, as compared with her husband's feelings, or her desire in that respect?"

Judge Neilson—Now, this witness did speak to her about her feelings in regard to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the subject of inquiry.

Judge Neilson—Of the first part.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a comparison as to their feelings toward Mrs. Tilton as between herself and her husband.

Judge Neilson—I think therein lies the objection to this question.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I made it.

Mr. Evarts—Do I understand your Honor to understand the indication I gave as to the point on which I wish the witness's attention? That is all I used that for. I had, of course, to show that the witness was aware, or conceived he was aware, of a certain disposition of her husband toward Mrs. Tilton, and that one part of the offices of his conversation with Mrs. Moulton was that Mrs. Tilton should be treated by the wife, in a situation in which she was placed, with such attention and comfort as one lady could furnish to another, and because of the manner of having any such regard shown to her by the action of Mr. Moulton. But it is only as drawing attention to the subject of the conversation, after all, that I have occasion to use this reference; but how I could do it without raising that situation I cannot perceive.

Judge Neilson—It already appears from this witness that at a certain time, or from a certain time, Mr. Moulton's regard for Mrs. Tilton had fallen off—he was not kind.

Mr. Fullerton—That does not help it.

Judge Neilson—So we have the answer to that.

Mr. Evarts—Yea.

Judge Neilson—Also he can suggest from his conversation with Mrs. Moulton any kind offices she might exert toward Mrs. Tilton—so we have all that.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt; but it is said Mr. Moulton complained of her as comparing Mr. Tilton's opportunities of restoring her position.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Judge Neilson—We had that yesterday, and we have a further answer to-day on that point.

Mr. Fullerton—We have an answer to-day from Mr. Beecher that he was left in no doubt on that subject. That left us in doubt, however, as doubts run. There is no affirmative evidence on that subject.

Mr. Evarts—We have a right to clear that up.

Mr. Fullerton—No, you have not. If Mrs. Moulton said anything in addition to what we said on that subject they have a right to it. Beyond that they cannot go, by the rules of evidence, and here is an attempt to introduce into this case conversations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Moulton to which we have not directed attention and we have not made any inquiries.

Judge Neilson—And to which they have not made any inquiries.

Mr. Fullerton—Even if they had they could not, for it would be a collateral matter, and they could not give it, but they have made no inquiries on that subject.

Judge Neilson—Yet the answer to be given now might go to Mrs. Moulton's credit, because she had not been interrogated on that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—It might be due to her that she should be asked, in the first instance.

Mr. Evarts—No, it is nothing to the discredit of Mrs. Moulton.

Judge Neilson—We might think it would not, and yet it might to the jury. Within the rule you have a right to interrogate her, and give her a chance in regard to a matter in regard to which she might be contradicted.

Mr. Evarts—I can state my views in regard to the right given to us by their introduction of the intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Moulton. I don't regard them as having put themselves distinctly upon definite conversations and interviews, defined in time and place and circumstances and language at all, either in respect of the intercourse between Mrs. Moulton and Mr. Beecher, or between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher, or Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. They have opened a general relation of confidence and common understanding and common conversation, establishing a relation and a system of intercourse out of which they have felt at liberty to draw such generalisations as these in Mrs. Moulton's language and in Mr. Tilton's language, and, I think, in Mr. Moulton's language equally; that is to say, Mr. Beecher would often say so and so, giving a result, an impression of a general attitude and feeling and expression on the part of Mr. Beecher which is not a reproduction of a particular interview, but is an assignment and definition of a general attitude of Mr. Beecher on this subject out of which they draw imputations injurious. Now, when that is opened in that way, your Honor will perceive that, unless being the same form by showing what the whole tenor and manner of intercourse was, or by showing what the character and manner of supplementary interviews were, that they had left out of view; if we cannot do that, then we are placed at a great disadvantage in not being able to qualify and present in due colors the entire tenor of the intercourse on this subject between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Moulton. Now, we can all agree that in a limited and defined interview that is described, within its own metes and bounds, which their light of dealing with this defendant as a party to it open to them and would exclude us from this as strangers, that the rule by which that does not give us an opportunity to introduce a separate and independent interview thus defined by its own metes and bounds is perfectly clear and understood; but your Honor understands how a particular interview that they should thus introduce might have had in it reference to previous interviews or previous relations, and that that would open to us a right to show what those private interviews and relations were, always under the control and discretion, to a certain extent, of the presiding Judge. Now, I do not conceive myself, in the inquiries that are opened to me as to the intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Moulton, any more than in other cases that I have referred to, to be limited to the mere definite interviews that they have shown, because they have been allowed to go on, but I don't think it is objectionable, provided that the liberality is extended also to us to come into court and compare the general result, or nature, or character of Mr. Beecher's dealings as between him and Mrs. Moulton with this question of trouble or guilt, as the case may be. And it is in that view I confess that I have thought I had a right to go beyond the definite limits of express interviews, because of the relation or intercourse, as a whole, being what I suppose is the important matter to be discussed to this jury. For instance, here is a question to Mrs. Moulton [reading]:

Did he say anything to you in respect to the length of time that Elizabeth had permitted him to be in ignorance of the fact that she had confessed? A. He did.

Q. What did he say upon that subject? . . . Did you ever say anything to Mr. Beecher about returning to the church?

Then she goes on and gives a considerable answer, made out of a variety of occasions in which she had talked to him—perhaps conversation or items of conversation, but not limited to a set interview on that subject, or restrained within any bounds of any particular interview. "Did he ever speak to you about Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir. Q. Please state what he said in regard to her." Then I interposed, "At either of these interviews?" Then Mr. Fullerton says, "At any time." I again interposed that a time should be fixed. And then the witness goes on and says, "He nearly always spoke to me of Elizabeth with great love, and wanted me to respect her and have great regard for her," &c.

Judge Nelson—I think you are right in regard to the description of the interviews referred to by the witness, which had not metes and bounds of time and place; undoubtedly you are right as to that, but is not your remedy after all to investigate this witness before you can inquire as to any specific statement made in that manner? There is your remedy, and it covers your case and protects you.

Mr. Fullerton—It is the subject matter of the conversation which is to control the gentleman, as a matter of course, in his examination of the witness. I fix no time and I fix no place, but when the evidence is given there is a subject matter about which they may inquire. They may ask this witness whether any such conversation took place as that. If he says no, there is an end of it. If he says yes, then they may ask whether at any time, and at that place, whatever that time and place was, anything further was said upon that or upon any other subject which was germane to that under consideration. In that way they get at all that was said upon any one particular occasion, when any particular subject was under review, and the gentleman is not taken at a disadvantage at all. He is not deprived of any of his legal rights, and so he might follow it up from conversation to conversation, and get at whatever else was said upon any one of those occasions.

Judge Nelson—It can be no disadvantage when he has a right to turn to any particular statement made by Mrs. Moulton and interrogate this witness in respect to it, and correct and contradict it, as the case may be.

Mr. Evans—Well, Sir, perhaps I would be able to—

Mr. Fullerton—He will think better of it by to-morrow, Sir.

Judge Nelson—Gentlemen, get ready to retire. [To the jurors.] Gentlemen of the jury, you will return at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Court then adjourned until 11 o'clock on Friday.

SIXTY-SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A TEMPORARY ADJOURNMENT.

THE PROCEEDINGS SUSPENDED, OWING TO THE ILLNESS OF MR. BEACH.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1875.

At the opening of the Court to-day, Mr. Beach and Gen. Pryor were not present, and, after a brief consultation between Mr. Morris and Mr. Fullerton, the latter informed the Court that he feared the senior counsel for the plaintiff was too unwell to be present and requested an adjournment until Mr. Beach should arrive. The defendant's counsel assented very courteously to the delay. Mr. Evarts suggested that such an arrangement might be especially agreeable to Judge Neilson, who had just received a telegram announcing the death of the widow of the late Judge Samuel Nelson at Cooperstown, N. Y. The Court accordingly adjourned until April 12.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

AN ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

The court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Henry Ward Beecher was recalled.

Judge Neilson—Will counsel proceed?

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, we feel very much embarrassed this morning upon our side, in consequence of the absence of Mr. Beach, occasioned, I suppose, by his illness. He was exceedingly unwell all day yesterday—so much so that he could not participate in the incidental discussions of the day—in consequence of a very severe and painful attack of neuralgic headache. He did not join me this morning, as was his custom, and I presume he is confined to his house; he may be in, however, in a short time, and if your Honor will allow us to consult for a moment as to what we will do, we shall feel very much obliged.

[Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Morris, and Mr. Tilton here consulted together.]

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, the importance of this case, and the great responsibility resting upon counsel on the part of the plaintiff, seems to make it proper that we should ask that this case lie over until Monday morning, unless Mr. Beach comes within a very brief period. We are without the aid of our other associate, Gen. Pryor, and so far as Judge Morris and myself are concerned we feel unwilling to take the responsibility of conducting this case, unaided by either of our other associates. As a matter of course, the evidence of the witnesses upon the stand is of very great importance in this case, and the events to which his attention is hereafter to be called will have a very great influence upon the case, and we desire the presence of Mr. Beach before we shall proceed. Your Honor is probably aware that he is to present this case to the jury, and he would be taken at a great disadvantage if he were not present to hear the testimony given by the witness, and derive all of the advantages which flow from a presence in court when evidence is given. He may be here, Sir, within a short period; I don't know; I have had no message from him this morning, but if he is not, we shall ask the indulgence of the Court until Monday morning.

Mr. Morris—I feel quite sure, if the Court please, that Mr. Beach is detained at his house by sickness. Every day since the trial has commenced he has been very prompt, indeed ahead of time. I knew yesterday that he was suffering very severely; he was unable during the recess to partake of any food, and was in distress all day, and I hardly think that there is any probability of his arriving.

MR. BEECHER'S DIRECT EXAMINATION TO BE CLOSED IN ANOTHER DAY.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt, if your Honor please, the suggestions of our learned friends are quite suitable to their position, as any similar occurrence on our side might be to ours. Mr. Beach, unfortunately, from a draft, took cold day before yesterday, I think, or perhaps even earlier than that, and intimated to me that he felt fears of some serious consequence of this kind attending such an exposure, that is, the neuralgic pains to which he is subject, though otherwise a very strong man, as we all know. Now, it is proper that I should say that the expectation was that we should be able to conclude the evidence of this witness to-day; we might have been disappointed; we did not expect to be; and it is also proper that I should intimate that there may arise some questions of some pressure in regard to the admission of evidence. Under that view, the day would perhaps be one where the attendance of your associates might be more than ordinarily important, and if the evidence closed, it would be incapable of reconsideration; and when your Honor sent down to me that telegram of the afflictive intelligence of the death of Mrs. Nelson, the widow of our late friend the eminent Judge, I did not know but your Honor intended, perhaps, to intimate some desire or feeling in regard to holding court to-day on that account, but I have heard nothing from your Honor on that subject.

Judge Neilson—I have a strong impression myself that Mr. Beach will not be here, from what he told me yesterday.

Mr. Porter—It is very evident, your Honor, that he ought not to have been here yesterday. I presume that he would have been here to-day if it had been even possible for him, for I never knew him on any occasion to fail at the Post of duty unless it was an occasion of absolute and iron necessity.

Judge Neilson—The suggestion on his behalf is quite reasonable, and the kindly manner in which it is received upon the other side is very gratifying; and I think, that being the view of counsel, we will now adjourn. Will gentlemen get ready to retire? Adjourn to Monday morning at 11 o'clock, gentlemen.

The court then adjourned to Monday, the 12th inst., at 11 o'clock.

SIXTY-THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A DULL DAY AND AUDIENCE.

FURTHER CONTRADICTIONS OF MRS. MOULTON—NO AFGHAN, NO POISON, NO SUICIDE, NO CRIME, AND NO CONFESSION—MR. BEECHER IGNORANT UNTIL JULY, 1874, THAT ADULTERY WAS EVER REFERRED TO OR CHARGED—ATTEMPTS TO CONTROL THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE BY MR. MOULTON AND GEN. BUTLER—A HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED STATEMENT BY MR. BEECHER—HIS "TRUE STORY" AS ORIGINALLY WRITTEN FOR THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

MONDAY, April 12, 1875.

The day's testimony was dull and the audience was in perfect sympathy with the proceedings and with the weather. There was little to arouse interest, except near the close of the day, when Mr. Evarts offered a document written by Mr. Beecher which had not previously been heard of in the case. Preliminary references to it gave the audience the impression that it was the statement which Mr. Beecher had said he would write "to bear the light of the Judgment Day." But they were disappointed in this hope, for instead of a narrative of facts like Mr. Tilton's "True Story," it was general in character, a declaration of innocence, and a eulogy of Mrs. Tilton. Disappointment was manifested after the reading of this paper, and the day closed stupidly with Mr. Beecher still in the chair.

The audience was as large as usual, however, and several new faces were visible. Judge Sutherland from the General Sessions, New-York, sat on the bench with Judge Neilson. Ex-Senator Henry C. Murphy was in and out of the room during the day, as his wont has been throughout the trial. In the "Plymouth section" were Assemblyman L. Bradford Prince, Charles Gayler, H. B. Claflin, John T. Wood, who directed the excavations of the temple of Diana in Asia Minor, Dr. Gunn of the "Gunnery" school in Connecticut where Mrs. Tilton passed a few weeks in the Summer of 1874, Mrs. Jones, who is a sister of Mrs. Beecher, William Sprague, and Mr. Zundel, the organist of Plymouth Church. It was whispered that Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe was also in attendance, but this was not true. Mr. Beach looked ill, and was evidently afraid of the drafts of the court-room. Gen. Pryor was absent; he is suffering from malarial fever. Mr. Tracy was employed in another court. The proceedings were opened and continued in the usual way, and were closed at the usual hour.

Some surprise was expressed at the orders to the officers given by Judge Neilson at the close of the morning session to see that the jury were not spoken to while entering and leaving court. On inquiry of the Judge it was learned that Mr. Morris had complained that some of the Plymouth members had been needlessly polite in saluting the jurors.

FURTHER CONTRADICTIONS OF MRS. MOULTON.

The morning session was devoted to the completion of Mr. Beecher's contradictions of Mrs. Moulton's testimony of the "alleged interview" of June 2, 1873. This ground had been covered so closely on previous days that the inquiries yesterday attracted very little attention, except from Mr. Moulton, who sat throughout the session listening intently to the numerous and peculiarly emphatic denials of his wife's testimony. He smiled once or twice scornfully at the frequent compliments which accompanied the denials, and which jarred on the ears of others in the audience, coupled as they were with positive charges of perjury on the part of the lady. Mr. Beecher seemingly made these denials with the manner of a man who is doing a necessary duty of an obnoxious character, and he was apparently vexed at times when he was required to reduce his answer to a plain "No." Once or twice he warmed up, and became indignant, but this feeling passed away quickly as other questions attracted his attention. Among other declarations of Mrs. Moulton which Mr. Beecher denied were the assertion that she had tucked him up on a sofa and covered him with an Afghan; the statement that he had ever talked to her of suicide, by poison or otherwise, and that she had spoken freely to him of his "crime," "his adultery with Mrs. Tilton," &c. He testified that he had never said that it was on his account that Mr. Moulton cultivated the acquaintance of Mrs. Woodhull. There were many other contradictions, and many forms in which these denials were put. Almost every incident and form of expression detailed by Mrs. Moulton as belonging to the interview of June 2, 1873, was as positively rejected as the date and the interview itself. Mr. Beecher admitted that a few expressions repeated by Mrs. Moulton resembled the language used at the interview of May 31, two days before, when he saw her only for a few minutes. Once Mr. Beecher broke out in his blunt way to the effect that Mrs. Moulton could not have used the expressions attributed to her, and then, probably remembering that she had sworn to them in court, he added, after a long pause, "of her own accord." This was lost on Mr. Evarts for a moment, but being reminded of it by one of his associates, he called attention to it, and tried to introduce Mr. Beecher's explanation of his words; but Mr. Beach objected, and threatened to have it struck out, and Mr. Fullerton said the meaning was clear enough and improper; so Mr. Evarts desisted. The context shows that Mr. Beecher meant to imply that she had sworn in accordance with some other person's wishes.

Mr. Fullerton called THE TRIBUNE reporter's attention to the fact that in the summary of the evidence on this point in Friday's issue it was stated that Mrs. Moulton had sworn that the interview of June 2 was brought to a close by the ringing of her lunch bell. On closer examination of the testimony of Mrs. Moulton it was discovered that the interview was closed by a remark about lunch, and not the ringing of the lunch bell.

AN IMPORTANT DENIAL BY MR. BEECHER.

Once more Mr. Evarts returned to the question whether or not Mr. Beecher had ever heard his offense against Mr. Tilton designated by anybody, previous to the calling of the Investigating Committee of 1874, as his "crime" or as "his adultery with Mrs. Tilton." Mr. Evarts was apparently anxious to impress upon the jury that during the whole period while the "policy of silence and suppression" prevailed, Mr. Beecher had been accustomed to hear of his offense as "improper solicitation," and to think and speak of it himself as the estrangement of Mrs. Tilton's affections from her husband to himself. Mr. Beecher's declaration that no living being had ever talked to him about a charge of adultery until June 13, 1874, after the Committee was appointed, was reiterated for the fourth or fifth time. When his attention was called to the West charges against Theodore Tilton, in one specification of which Mr. Tilton was accused

MR. BEECHER'S EYES OPENED.

Mr. Beecher's attention was then directed to some of Mr. Moulton's statements relative to the Investigating Committee. It appears from Mr. Beecher's story that Mr. Moulton had hopes of managing the Committee, and that he called upon Gen. Butler for advice at that juncture. The design was to have Gen. Butler make Mr. Beecher's counsel, as he was Mr. Moulton's, and as preliminary to that step Gen. Butler sent Mr. Beecher word that he was afraid the witness's counsel were not competent for their work, and that he "could carry him through, no matter what the facts were." Mr. Beecher's positive refusal to see Gen. Butler on the subject or to change his advisers seems to have been the first notice to Mr. Moulton that his services were not satisfactory. At any rate, Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton were not in communication after that, and the "policy of silence and suppression" was abandoned.

During this part of the examination Mr. Beecher was asked when he had become convinced that during all these four years he had been laboring under the delusion that Mrs. Tilton loved him instead of her husband. He answered, without betraying any evidence that his vanity was wounded in the least, that his eyes were opened by the lady's testimony before the Committee of Investigation in 1874.

MR. BEECHER'S "TRUE STORY."

The only "sensation" of the day followed the offer to submit the statement of Mr. Beecher first prepared for the Investigating Committee, and read to

Mr. Moulton. It was surmised that it was a new document and that it was a plain narrative, written before any of the evidence before the Investigating Committee was submitted. Mr. Fullerton, first, and Mr. Beach and Mr. Morris next, read it before consent was given to its introduction. They spent about a quarter of an hour over it, during which Mr. Evarts waited patiently. Mr. Beecher left the witness chair and joined his brother Edward, and after a word or two with him began pacing up and down behind the jury box as if to rest his legs by stretching them. Mr. Evarts was handed a caricature of himself; he passed it to Mr. Beach and the jury, and finally it was handed to the Judge, who referred it to Judge Sutherland, who decided that it was a good likeness, and then it went the rounds of the reporters and audience.

When the document had been examined the counsel for the plaintiff admitted it without objection and Mr. Evarts read the story. It proved to be in no sense a narrative, and was disappointing to the audience, who had anticipated that in this way Mr. Beecher was about to pour out his whole soul unrestricted by the rules of evidence. It is published in full on another page.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

A RAPID SUMMARY OF EVENTS FROM 1871 TO 1874.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Beecher was recalled.

Mr. Evarts—Upon Thursday, if your Honor please, we were discussing some question of the admissibility of evidence when the adjournment took place, in regard to the form and manner in which there might be drawn from the witness statements concerning conversation or habits of intercourse between Mrs. Moulton and himself, in reference to this general subject, and precisely what the result was, if there was a result, I don't know that it was important now to consider, as perhaps the matter may come up upon questions as I shall ask them now. [To the Witness.] Mr. Beecher, I will ask you a question—I am not certain whether I have asked it in any form or not—as to the frequency of your visits at Mr. Moulton's house.

Mr. Beach—It has been gone over.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I won't spend any time.

The Witness—There was no regularity in the matter; at times I visited there every day, at times only once a week, or once a fortnight, and sometimes not for a month or two months, or three months even.

Mr. Beach—Four months, you put it!

The Witness—Well, I don't know but four months; I will admit one more. I should think there might be times, including my vacation.

Mr. Evarts—This is only introductory to a question I wish to ask you. Now, Mr. Beecher, there have been given in evidence occasions in which there was solicitude and conferences, and so forth, and letters, and cards. Now, during the three years, or three years and a half, from the 1st of January, 1871, to the Spring or middle of 1874, for how large a part of the time were there intervals in which there was no discussion and no trouble of any kind? A. Do you mean what proportion to the whole amount?

Q. Yes. A. Well, I cannot state it, Sir; I don't know that I have ciphered that out, but there were long periods; for example, in 1871, after May, I think there was comparatively little until in the Autumn; in 1872 there was very little all Summer after May, during the campaign; you recollect, Sir, there was a political campaign, and very little was done during all the Summer until Autumn, until after the close of the campaign—until after the November election.

Q. Well, after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, what occurred thereafter up to the end of 1872—after that period until June, 1873? A. Well, after the publication of the scandal it was a pretty busy time, and it ran over into the Spring of 1873.

Q. And to the June affairs? A. And clear up to June, and soon after came my vacation.

Q. And thereafter, in the Autumn of that year of 1873, occurred whatever there was in regard to what has been named in this trial as the West charges. A. Yes, Sir, the West charges, with the sequent action—consultations of the Committee and action of the church.

Q. And then between that and the Bacon letter publication, in the Spring of 1874, was there anything? A. Well, a great deal. There occurred at that time from the interpellation of the sister churches the corresponding meetings in our church, which gave rise to a good deal of consultation and of conference with Mr. Moulton on my part. Then followed the calling of the Council, and that also was accompanied with what was called a period of letter-writing between me and two gentlemen, the pastors of neighboring churches. And then the Council itself in March, if I recollect right; and during that Council were the letters of Mr. Tilton; he felt himself aggrieved at certain implications in the Council; and after that Dr. Bacon's article appeared, running, I think, through five numbers; and then the Bacon letter on the part of Mr. Tilton.

Q. And then the course of things until the constitution and session of the Committee of Investigation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Through that Summer? A. The Bacon letter was preceded by no inconsiderable conferences between Mr. Moulton and myself; but so soon as it was published then the end came substantially.

TALKS WITH MRS. MOULTON ABOUT MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Now, I recur to occasions of interviews between yourself and Mrs. Moulton, and ask you if you ever had any conversation with her on the subject of Mrs. Woodhull, and how that occurred, if there was such a conversation? A. Yes, Sir, twice; I recall two conversations; one was not exactly a conversation, either; she made some pleasant and sly remarks in respect to what she regarded as the exaggerated enthusiasm of Mr. Tilton and her husband for that woman. At another time she asked me, when we were together in her chamber—in the front chamber, which was a kind of receiving-room—what I thought about Mrs. Woodhull, and I cannot use her language, but the language was such as carried with it a wish to know what I thought as compared with what her husband thought and the others. My reply was that I had no means personally of knowing anything about her; I derived my information from others, and that I did not believe in her views; I hoped that she was what they thought she was; and as she asked me about herself in relation to her (Mrs. Woodhull), I told her that I did not think she would ever do her any hurt; I did not think—it was a very sincere compliment which I paid to her, that I did not think she could be hurt by such women.

Q. In what connection did she refer to herself at this interview; in what connection did she refer to Mrs. Woodhull and herself—what association? A. Well, the conversation arose from the fact that Mrs. Woodhull frequented their house, and that she—she told me that Frank had desired it, and that she had consented to it. It was in such language that it left in my mind—that I understood it to mean that she received her on Frank's account, and because he wished it.

Q. Well, did she make any inquiry of you as to what you thought of her associating with Mrs. Woodhull, or Mrs. Woodhull being received at her house? A. It was in connection with the idea of her being received at her house.

Q. Well, how did she put it to you, in what way? A. I have already stated. She said substantially that she had—she did not herself fancy the woman, but that Frank thought very highly of her, and that she received her at her house because he wished it; and it was accompanied at that time, I think, by some after conversation on the subject of—that she thought she began her married life with too stringent views, and that she had changed her idea and thought it was better for her as a wife to conform as much as she could to her husband's wishes.

Q. In this conversation or in any other conversation in which the name or the visits or association of Mrs. Woodhull was introduced, was anything said by Mrs. Moulton to you about her husband wishing her to associate with or receive Mrs. Woodhull on your account? A. Never a word, Sir.

Q. Was the subject of anything being done, or needing to be done, with Mrs. Woodhull in reference to you or your affairs, spoken of by Mrs. Moulton? A. No, Sir; nothing at all.

Q. Did you, in any conversation between you and Mrs. Moulton on this subject of the Woodhull's association, say to her, "I think it is a duty you owe to Frank to coöperate with him in trying to keep the story quiet?" A. No, not a syllable of it.

Q. Did you, in reporting to Mr. Moulton any conversation you had had with his wife on this subject of Mrs. Woodhull, say to him that you had told her that you thought it to be her duty to coöperate with Mr. Moulton for the suppression of these stories concerning him and Mrs. Tilton—that you thought it to be Mrs. Moulton's duty to coöperate with her husband for the suppression of these stories concerning you and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir: nothing of the kind; I talked with Mrs. Moulton on the subject of her—as far as it could be done with propriety—coöperating with her husband in his ordinary desires of company, and such things as that; it had no reference whatever to any—to this matter pertaining to me.

Q. That you have already spoken of. My present question is whether, in reporting to Mr. Moulton any conversation you had had with his wife on the subject of association with Mrs. Woodhull, you said to Mr. Moulton that you had told Mrs. Moulton that you thought it to be her duty to coöperate with her husband for the suppression of these stories concerning you and Mrs. Tilton? A. I never so talked with Mrs. Moulton, and I never told Mr. Moulton that I did.

MRS. MOULTON'S ATTENDANCE AT PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Mrs. Moulton on the subject of her attending your church, and, if so, what passed between you on the subject? A. Yes; I have talked with her on that subject of being in church various times and ways; I recollect her saying, telling me that—in 1871 it was on—I have forgotten how it was introduced, but I remember her speaking with some anxiety as it respects the securing a pew in that year; that Mr. Moulton had intended, or told her that he was going to have one, and she was solicitous to know whether—she thought Frank had forgotten it; she was afraid he had, or something to that effect; I know that in 1872 and in 1873 both she spoke to me of wishing seats; Frank did not want to take a whole pew, and wanted to know whether seats could be had; she wanted two; she did not think Frank would go with her much, but she might take her son, or, it might be, a friend would want to go; she wanted two seats; I referred her to Mr. Wells, the sexton of the church, saying that they could most always be procured in eligible pews, the owners of which sublet single seats; I also talked with her; she was kind enough to express herself complimentarily of me for improving, as she thought, in preaching and partly on her own judgment and partly on what was told her, as I understood from her; and I recollect seeing her not infrequently in church, not regularly; twice I distinctly recall her coming to the pulpit steps and waiting for me after the congregation, after I had got through and while they were dispersing, bringing some errand from Mr. Moulton; he wanted to see me, or something to that effect. I recall talking with her on one occasion, in which she said in a very pleasant way—she had a sparkling and a pleasant manner, very sincere and simple and pleasant way—and she said: “You did not see me at church yesterday.” “I did,” said I; said I, “You are never at church, Mrs. Moulton, that I don’t see you, and it is always a very pleasant thing for me to see you in church, too,” or words to that effect.

MRS. MOULTON SEEKS MR. BEECHER’S SOCIETY.

Q. Now, Sir, what passed between you and her on occasions of your visits to the house by the way of invitation or suggestion on her part that you should make visits to her? A. I recollect twice—twice distinctly—but with a less positive recollection of once or twice besides; but I speak this of certainty, that she said to me once from the head of the stairs, and once up stairs in the chamber, “You always come—” once she says, “You always come to see Frank; why don’t you come to see me?” and I turned it off, understanding it to be a courteous jest, a little conception of welcome, and so on. At one time she spoke from the top of the stairs, as I had gone down stairs, and was near the clock-stand; she spoke to me in the same way and said, “Mr. Beecher, when are you coming to see me? I mean,” said she, “when are you going to make a visit, a social visit, on me, and not a business one?” or words to that effect.

CONVERSATIONS WITH MRS. MOULTON ABOUT MRS. TILTON.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember any conversation you ever had with Mrs. Moulton in which the subject of your relations with Mr. Tilton, or his family, or his business was the subject of conversation? A. Yes; I recollect several; I do not know that I can separate them and tell what occurred in one and in another, and in another; I remember what the tenor of them and the—

Q. Won’t you be so good as to state that what did pass between you and her on this matter? A. The first conversation I had with her—have I related it?

Q. I think you have perhaps, where it was introduced? A. Yes.

Q. The inquiry whether— A. She was aware of the troubles that existed and the reason that I wanted her to talk with me?

Q. Yes, I think that has been given. A. Yes; at other times my conversations with her had almost, it may be said, four times out of five, had reference to Mrs. Tilton. I had requested her to act as her (Mrs. Tilton’s) next friend. I could not, her mother could not, and I wanted somebody that was interested and womanly. I thought Mrs. Moulton to be eminently a womanly and excellent person, and she would tell me that she (Elizabeth) had been around to see her on the day before. I would ask her how she seemed. Well, she seemed sometimes very cheerful and hopeful, and at other times very sad, desponding, so that the conversation would run upon that. She at times rather thought that she never blamed Elizabeth outright; I recollect conversations in which I thought that she, on the whole, felt that Elizabeth might do some better in some respects, but more often in the conversations that respected Elizabeth she spoke with some degree of severity about Mr. Tilton—gave me to understand in different conversations that she disapproved of his conduct and course.

Q. In respect of his wife, do you mean; in respect of his home? A. Well, I understood it to cover that, but not to exclude other—in other words I thought she thoroughly didn’t like him; and I recollect a conversation in regard to Mrs.—her—in which I spoke of her wants, her necessities.

Q. You mean Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton; and told her that I should be perfectly willing, if it might be done without indelicacy in any way—I should be very glad—to deposit funds with her, to be expended by her, when she saw any such wants as a woman’s eye would know—would recognize. I recollect on one case her speaking on the state of things that she found, which was very discouraging in the family, and she seemed quite sad about it, and said she, “I don’t see how Elizabeth can get along; I wouldn’t wonder much if she was to break out and go back to her mother;” and I told her that that, I thought, in the state of things, would be most fatal, and that she ought, by all means, to dissuade her from any such step as that; that it might be hard to bear, but it would be a great deal harder not to bear it—to that substance.

Q. Did you, at any time, have conversations with Mrs. Moulton as to how this trouble had arisen, and what degree of fault there had been on your part, and any discussion as to any fault on Mrs. Tilton’s part? A. Yes, Sir, I had a conversation with her on that subject; it was on the subject of having alienated from her husband, and won for myself, Mrs. Tilton’s affections, and it was an exposition of my feelings about it. I felt it very deeply, and I attempted, as far as I could, to let her know exactly how it was without any indelicate—without putting Mrs. Tilton in any relation that would be degrading or indelicate. I found it an embarrassing conversation to have, and it was much of it in that shadowy way in which we suppose an intelligent, intuitive kind of person understands what you mean, without any plain words or expressions, but I wanted her to understand distinctly that I had never consciously withdrawn Elizabeth's affection from her husband.

Q. Did you so express yourself? A. I did very distinctly, that—

Q. Did you in any of those conversations with Mrs. Moulton express to her the degree of grief or compunction that you had in reference to whatever had occurred? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And how did you express yourself in that regard? A. Well, I expressed myself as a man that was very sensitive on such, the honor of such a matter as that, would. I said that it was a grief as deep as my heart could feel; that I could not forgive myself seeing what mischief had been wrought, for I was all this time, as I was all the time, under the most profound conviction that I had done that, that I had, though unintended and unconscious, wrought in that quiet little woman a smoldering fire that had burned unknown to me within her, and finally broke out with such infinite mischief.

Q. What did Mrs. Moulton say in regard to the subject as you talked with her about it? A. Mrs. Moulton never said a great deal about it, about such conversations. She was not what, so far as I am concerned, a talker; she was a very patient listener, and she was very quick, apprehensive, but she did not generally talk one word to my twenty.

Q. Now, Sir, in any of these conversations did you say anything to her beyond the consideration, and your feelings upon that consideration, that mischief had been wrought in the family by your presence and intercourse in it? A. Did I say anything beyond it?

Q. Did you say anything beyond the consideration, and your feelings about that consideration, that your presence and intercourse in that family had brought this mischief upon it?

Mr. Morris—Well, one moment.

Mr. Beach—It is a pretty embracing question.

Mr. Evarts—You have spoken of the conversation which you had with her— A. Am I permitted to go on?

Q. Yes, you are permitted to go on. A. Yes; if by "beyond" you mean "other," I had a good many other conversations. If you mean by "beyond" if I talked with her in the direction of the theory of the plaintiffs, I did not.

Q. Now, what else passed on this subject in any other conversations that you had with her, that you can recall? A. I don't—I seem to myself to have covered the ground, unless some suggestion starts a new line of thought.

Q. Well, I have no suggestions to make on the subject; I only want to know whether you have covered the ground of the— A. This seems to me to give a fair, not an exhaustive by no means, but a fair inlook upon the tenor of our intercourse touching Mrs. Tilton, and the occasions of her trouble.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, during all your interviews with Mrs. Moulton at that house, was anything ever said by Mrs. Moulton to you on the subject of your having been guilty of adultery with Mrs. Tilton, or having been guilty of crime with Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Moulton was absolutely incapable of saying that in my presence, and never said it, neither by direct words nor by allusion—to her honor.

Q. Was there any conversation at any time between you and Mrs. Moulton in which that charge or imputation against you in respect to Mrs. Moulton, as made by anybody—

Judge Nelson—In respect to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Mrs. Tilton as made by anybody, was the subject of conversation? A. Mrs. Moulton and I never conversed on that subject in that aspect and in those relations; she was a lady thoroughbred, to my apprehension, and I never heard her say a word that jarred upon my sense of the delicacy and the propriety of a lady's tongue.

SOME CONTRADICTIONS OF MRS. MOULTON'S TESTIMONY.

Q. Now, Sir, you have said that you had no interview with this lady on the 2d of June, and I now ask you whether, at any interview, any of the matters to which I shall specially direct your attention were said between Mrs. Moulton and yourself. Did you on any occasion say to Mrs. Moulton that the conversation you had with her—were then having with her—was probably the last conversation you should ever have with her? A. Referring to death, or probable death?

Q. Well, referring to anything as terminating the possibility or prospect of further conversations with her?

A. No, I never did.

Q. Did you say to her:

I feel if Mr. Tilton publishes my letter of apology, it is useless for me any longer to live this down—to try any longer to live this down?

A. No, Sir; I didn't.

Q. Did you say anything of this kind:

I have never felt that I had much to hope for from Theodore; he has been faithless; he is a faithless man; he seems to lose sight of the fact that in striking at me, or in stating the truth concerning me, he sacrifices his wife, and if that letter of apology is published I might as well go out of life; it is useless trying to live it down?

A. I never felt so, and I never thought so, and never said so. [Applause.]

Q. Did she in any such conversation say to you.

Mr. Beecher, there is something better for you to do than that; I think that would be a very cowardly thing for you to do. Go down to your church and confess your crime; they will forgive you!

A. She never said anything of that kind [smiling]; no, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, did you say at any such conversation :

No, I can't do that for the sake of the woman who has given me her love, for her children, for my family, for my church, for my influence throughout the whole world—that I can never do; I will die before I confess it!

A. No, Sir; I never did. [Smiling.] Very triumphantly I affirm that.

Q. Did she say this to you :

Sooner or later the truth in this case will come out; it is much better that you should take your case in your own hands and state to your church, give to them a confession such as you could make to them, and I am sure they would forgive you!

A. Never, Sir; though I know something what that was made out of.

Q. Now, Sir, did you say in reference to this suggestion of hers, or in the conversation at all :

No, that I cannot do; I should be—my church would despise me; I could not go back to my house, and my church would not forgive me; they would not deal with me as you have done; there would be nothing left for me to do. My work would be finished; it would be better that I should go out of life than to remain any longer in it!

A. No, Sir.

Q. Anything of that tenor or effect? A. There was no such conversation; it was an impossible conversation for her or for me.

Q. Did she then suggest, or at all suggest, in any conversation :

You could write for your paper; you could go to your farm and write.

A. No, Sir; Mrs. Moulton never gave me such counsel, nor never entered into any diplomatic conversations with me of that kind whatsoever.

Q. And did you, in any conversation with her, say :

No; if they would not listen to hear me preach, they certainly would not read anything that I should write; besides, my position in life is that of a spiritual and moral teacher; if I can no longer hold that position, then there is nothing more left for me, and I am resolved to take my life; I have a powder at home, on my library table, which I prepared, which I shall take, and shall sink quietly off, as if going to sleep, without a struggle.

Did you have any conversation of that— A. That whole representation is preposterous and false.

Q. Had you any powder on your library table? A. I didn't.

Q. That you had prepared? A. The only powder that I know of was in gunpowder up-stairs. [Laughter.]

Q. And did you proceed to say in this connection, or say at all, in any interview :

I haven't any desire to live; I have nothing to live for; in fact, I pray for death as a happy release from all my trials and trouble, and I feel that if I publish now a card in The Eagle it will only be a temporary relief; that Mr. Tilton is likely to break out again at any other time, and I feel that physically and mentally I am unable any longer to bear this strain, and I probably shall never come to see you again!

I never had any conversation meaning what that did, of that intent or purpose, although I perceive in that representation the conversations that were had, but entirely different and for a different drift.

Q. Now, did, in this connection, Mrs. Moulton reply :

Mr. Moulton will still stand by you, and, no matter what comes to you, I will always be your friend, and I am convinced that the only way out of this trouble for you is by telling the truth!

A. I don't remember any such conversation; no such—

Q. Did you thereupon, or in any conversation, say to her that you would come to see her on the day following; that you had some gifts that you wished to dispose of, some little mementoes for different people, something which you wanted her to bear to Elizabeth, something to different friends with messages which you wanted her to bear for "him," and you would come on the day following to see "me?" A. No, Sir; not a word; it is a pure absolute dream or fiction.

Q. Now, Sir; did you at this interview or at any interview say this to Mrs. Moulton—did you tell her, either with or without tears streaming down your face, that you had suffered the tortures of the damned; that you were obliged to go home and wear a cheerful smile; when you appeared in church you must appear at your best; the slightest indication of weakness was a confession on your part, so that she was really the only person to whom you could go and act your natural self, to whom you could unburden your whole heart's trouble—did you say anything of that kind? A. I said something like that, Sir, but not in any such relations nor pointing in any such directions as that is pointing—

Q. Well, now, Sir, please state in what connection and on what subject you did say anything that was of this nature at all. A. It was in the conversation of whether I should endure any longer the strain and struggle to carry forward this trouble in concealment, or by silence, under the incessant provocations and dispositions of Mr. Tilton to leak at every side and raise up new difficulties, and the time had come, I told her, when the matter had got to come to an issue; that I would not stand the wear and tear under any conditions much longer; that I might as well—it would wear me out; and that I should meet the matter and should bring it to the surface and have a disclosure and have the thing settled—to that substance.

Q. Now, when, if you can state, was any such conversation in which what you have last stated bore a part? A. It bore a part on Saturday morning, May the 31st, I think, Sir.

Q. At their house? A. At their house.

Q. At Mr. Moulton's house, I think you have stated about that interview? A. I have, Sir; but the question took me over the same ground again.

THE ALLEGED CONVERSATIONS BETWEEN
MRS. MOULTON AND MRS. TILTON.

Q. Yes, Mr. Beecher, I call your attention now to some statements of Mrs. Moulton in regard to reports which she made to you concerning interviews she had had with Mrs. Tilton. Did Mrs. Moulton report to you any conversations she had had with Mrs. Tilton in these words, or of this nature and effect, that Mrs. Tilton had said that she felt very sorry for Mrs. Moulton, even more sympathy for her than for herself, because she, Mrs. Moulton, had lost faith in Mr. Beecher—because, she, Mrs. Moulton, was unable any longer to attend the church; and that she, Mrs. Tilton, begged her, Mrs. Moulton, to go back to the church and believe in Mr. Beecher; and Mrs. Moulton said “Elizabeth, how can you ask me to go back to the church; how can you ask me to take the communion from his hands knowing what I do of his life?” And she said, “I want you to believe in him, he is a good man; it was not his fault, he is not responsible for the crime; I am the one that is to blame; I invited it.” And Mrs. Moulton replied to Mrs. Tilton, “I think that I might hear Mr. Beecher preach, and perhaps derive some benefit from his sermons; but I can never go back to the church with the same faith I had in him years ago.” Did Mrs. Moulton report to you any such conversation, or interview, as having occurred between her and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; she never reported any such conversation as that; nor do I think that it was possible for her to have looked me in the face and said the half of it.

Q. Did she report to you any such conversation as this as having occurred between herself and Mrs. Tilton about the time, it is said, that Mr. Tilton appeared down at the church; I believe that was in 1873, was it not, Mr. Shearman?

The Witness—Friday night in October, was it not?

Q. Well, you remember the scene? A. Yes, Sir; in 1873.

Q. Did Mrs. Moulton report to you any such conversation as this as having occurred between her and Mrs. Tilton:

I called to see Elizabeth, and I said, “If you are called before the church, what are you going to do to save Mr. Beecher?” She said, “I shall sacrifice my husband and deny everything.” I said, “Will you allow your husband to go down with the truth?” She said, “I think I should be justified in stating falsely under the circumstances; I think, for the sake of Mr. Beecher, for the sake of the influence on the world, for my own position, for my children, I think it is my duty to deny it.”

A. Pure fiction, Sir; not a word of truth in it—not a word of truth.

Q. And did you, on any such report or in any way, say this to Mrs. Moulton:

Poor child, she is trying to repair the wrong she has done in confessing it—in confessing her sin. But it is too late.

A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Now, Sir, did anything of this kind pass between you and Mrs. Moulton; did you in any conversation with Mrs. Moulton use these words, or to this effect, that

It was very cruel that Elizabeth should have confessed at all; it was very unjust to him; he could not understand it; he didn't know why she should have done it. But that he should have allowed him to visit her for six months after she had confessed to her husband, was even a greater mystery to him—subjecting him to unpleasant greetings and meetings with Mr. Tilton; that he could not understand why she allowed him to visit her house without having told him that she had confessed to her husband.

A. No, Sir; in connection with confession, no such conversation.

Q. Did you in any conversation with her, in reference to any urgency or invitation on your part that she should come to your church, or in any other form or manner, say that you felt that you had repented of your sin and been forgiven, and that you were better fitted now than ever before in your whole life to do great good; do you remember anything of that kind? A. No, Sir, not from me to her; nor from me to anybody else.

Q. Did she ever say this to you, or anything to this effect:

I don't see how you can stand in your pulpit and speak to young men against the sin of adultery when you are implicated in it so deeply yourself.

A. Mrs. Moulton was a lady, and she never talked about adultery in my presence under any circumstances, nor made allusion to such a crime or such foul sins.

Q. Was there anything of the kind said by her respecting yourself? A. Never.

Q. And did you, in reply to any such observation or to any observation made, say:

Having suffered what I have, having passed through the experiences that I have, I feel that I am better fitted than ever before to preach!

A. I have said to somebody, whether it was to her or not, that my great troubles and trials, I felt, had deepened my nature, and brought me into such sympathy with suffering men that I felt I could preach better than I could before, and it seemed to me that God had led me through a dark way for that very purpose; but it was not with reference to the topic or the things that your question suggested.

Q. Was it in reference to any charge or imputation or any fact of adultery that you made any such observation?

A. To no such thing.

Q. Now, Sir, did this conversation ever occur, or anything of this nature, between yourself and Mrs. Moulton. I read now from Mrs. Moulton's testimony:

I once repeated to Mr. Beecher a conversation that I had had with Mrs. Tilton, when she felt that she could no longer remain with Mr. Tilton; that he was continually referring to this sin which she had committed; that he would not let it die out; that he would not give her an opportunity—and that she felt that she could not live with him any longer; that she was going home to live with her mother. Mr. Beecher said: Tell Elizabeth forme, that for my sake she must continue to live with Theodore, to be to him a good wife, to make his home happy and as attractive as possible. I know it is hard, I know she has much to endure, but she must do it for my sake, for her own, and for the children. I have a family; she has nothing to hope for with me, and the only way in which she can ever see me is by living with Theodore, and being to him a true and good wife.

A. False, Sir! false!

Q. Now, Sir, did anything of this kind occur, and, if so. what was it; Mrs. Moulton says:

When I repeated to him my conversation with Mrs. Tilton, when she said it was not Mr. Beecher's fault it was hers, he said it is not her fault; it is my fault, I am to blame, Elizabeth was not to blame: she is a good woman, and I want you always to love her and respect her.

A. That was what I said in substance to her respecting the alienation of her affection.

Q. In the conversation you had with her? A. In the conversations that I had with her; so long as I thought that the mischief had been wrought by my influence in transferring her love from her husband to me, I always said that my age and experience should have led me to foresee and prevent any such trouble.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, did you have a conversation with Mrs. Moulton, or in which she took any part some time in the first half of the month of July, 1874, this last Summer? A. Yes, Sir, there was; it could hardly be called a conversation.

THE INTERVIEW ABOUT MR. MOULTON'S STATEMENT.

Q. Be so good as to state what happened? A. I don't know that I know what you refer to; I only recollect having a conversation in respect to some—to a paper that Mr. Moulton was to read before the Investigating Committee.

Q. Well, just state what you have to say on that subject. There was an interview between you and Mr. Moulton? A. There was.

Q. And was his "short statement," as it was called, read to you by him? A. It was read in my presence.

Q. Now, what, if anything, passed between yourself and Mrs. Moulton on that subject? A. Nothing except that when he came down he says to her: "Emma, I have read this paper to Mr. Beecher, and he thinks it will do," or something to that effect, and she said then that she was glad of it, or words to that effect. That was about the substance of the conversation; it was casual and transient.

Q. Did any interview occur in the month of July last between you and Mrs. Moulton of this nature. She says:

I said, "Mr. Beecher, what have you done that has offended Frank? He is very angry with you." He said, "I don't know." I said, "I am very sorry; is he not angry because you have called the Committee?" Then he said, "I did not call the Committee; my people called the Committee; I certainly could not object to an investigation." I said, "I don't know what has happened, but Frank is very angry with you, and I am very sorry for it." He said, "I am very sorry; I have intrusted myself wholly to Frank throughout the case. I have been willing to be led by him, sometimes against my better judgment, but with relation to the church—I do not consider that he has anything to do with my management of the church affairs. Besides, I could not possibly object to have an investigation where my people wanted it."

Now, Sir, do you remember in the month of July having an interview with Mrs. Moulton of that character or tenor? A. I do not recall any such thing, and while there is most of that you have read to me that I could very easily have said, and very heartily; yet any statement made by her, or by any one, that the church had called the Committee, and that I could not prevent it, is entirely untrue. I never made such a statement to Mrs. Moulton.

Q. In fact, you had called the Committee, had you not? A. Of course, I had. I was the main starter of it. The Bacon letter no sooner came to my eye than I shot as quick as a man does that sees a partridge rise; I let fly at it instantly.

Q. Now, Sir, in regard to what you may have said about Mr. Moulton's statement, Mrs. Moulton gives this:

When I went up stairs I asked Mr. Beecher into the front room, and Mr. Moulton said to Mr. Beecher, in my presence, "Then you think my statement for the Committee an honorable one?" and Mr. Beecher said, "I do—perfectly so."

Did that occur? A. I said to Mr. Moulton up stairs that I thought that—he asked me if I thought that statement was honorable, and I said that he must be the judge of that himself; that I was not going to make any objection to it; and when he came down to the room below, Mr. Moulton said substantially this: "Emma, Mr. Beecher does not make any objection to my making that statement"—

Q. That you have given us. Now, Mrs. Moulton gives this narrative: that Mr. Moulton left and went down stairs, and then there was an interview between you and her, in which she said:

"Do you know what Mr. Tilton proposes to do—what he proposes in The Eagle to-night?" He said, "No." I said, "He proposes to give a statement of the facts to the public in 10 days, and if so it will ruin you." He said, "How so?" I said, "He proposes to publish your written confession." He said, "I have never put any confession in writing." I said, "But your letter to Frank?" He said, "If that letter is published it will be a breach of confidence." I said, "I don't know anything about that, but I think if the statement is published, as Mr. Tilton proposes, it certainly will ruin you, but if he falls in this he will take the case into court." He said: "He cannot take the case into court; he has forgiven his wife's offense, and has lived with her four years; he cannot convict me." I said: "He will—he can convict you;" and I said: "I don't think it is even now too late for you to go down and confess to the church; there is no other way out for you; and if you had done it when I first advised it, it would have been better." He said: "I don't consider it so; I think your advice from first to last has been bad; the public are not prepared for a confession such as I would have to make." I said: "If you had confessed it then, you would have been better off. Now you have the original crime and four years of perjury and lying to answer for." He said: "I never will confess it; I will die before I confess it."

Now, did any such conversation ever occur between you and Mrs. Moulton? A. No, Sir; no such conversation.

Q. At this interview, or at any time—I mean at this period of time, this July period—did you say this, that you had always regarded Theodore as a faithless man; that you never felt that you had much to hope for from him, and then did you say, "No, I have made up my mind to let them come in and do their worst; they cannot convict me!" A. No, Sir; I should amend any such conversation, which was possible, for I don't remember it as taking place at any one time. I did not hesitate to say that I thought Mr. Tilton was a foolish man very often, and at the latter stage of the matter that he was a faithless man, and that if the matter should come to an open discussion I should worst them, but I never spoke that they could never convict me, carrying the implication that there was a crime, and that I could conceal it, and they could not disclose it. All that is—taint.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. Nothing of that kind.

Q. Now, did anything of this kind, as given by Mrs. Moulton in connection with this same date, in July, occur? She states it thus:

After a conversation with Mr. Moulton in the front room, and after saying good-bye to us, he came to me and took my hand in his and said: "You are the best friend I have in this world; you are dearer to me than any sister I have, for you, knowing all the truth, knowing that I am guilty, still stand by me, while they believe me innocent!"

A. No, Sir, I never was guilty of making any such foolish speech as that.

Q. Did you say anything like that? A. I did not say anything—oh! I have told her that she was to me like a sister (if you leave all the rest out), and I have told her that in many respects I could come to her with matters that I could not go to any other one with—that is, in regard to the condition and feelings of the family of Mr. Tilton; as I had kept the vow of absolute silence, and with the exception of talking to Mrs. Moulton, I talked with no human being on the subject—in fact, but only with her, and it endeared her to me; I did feel for her the most sincere esteem and affection, and I therefore never marred that esteem and affection by permitting any such conversation to me, or making any such reply to her.

Q. Did anything of this kind occur between you and Mrs. Moulton? It is stated by her that once at her house you referred to the fact that you had brought so much trouble and sorrow to yourself and Elizabeth and the household; and thereupon she said, "I think a woman is as much to blame as a man. She was the mother of five or six children, and it does not seem to me possible that she could have done what she had done without knowing what she was doing, and she is certainly as much to blame as you are;" and you said, "No, she is not to blame; it is my fault. I take all the responsibility, all the blame on myself." Did anything of that kind occur? A. No such conversation, as that is put together, occurred. There were discussions in my presence, not by her—that I remember distinctly—but there were conversations in respect to the new doctrines of sociology and the relative positions, independence, or culpability of men and women in various relations in life. Such conversations I have heard in the household, though I do not recall them in connection with Mrs. Moulton particularly; but as that is stated with the implication that that carries, no such conversation ever took place between her and me.

MRS. MOULTON'S INTERVIEW WITH MR. G. C. ROBINSON NOT RELATED TO MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Sir, did Mrs. Moulton ever report to you an interview between her and Mr. George C. Robinson, in these words, or to this effect, or of this nature? Mrs. Moulton says:

I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. George C. Robinson had spoken to me of his frequent visits at the office to see Mr. Moulton, and that he thought it very strange that he should select Mr. Moulton, who was not a church man—that Mr. Beecher, the first man in the city, having a host of friends at his back, it was very strange that he should go to the office to see Moulton, that he did not understand the reason, that he thought there must be some great trouble—he did not understand what it was; that he realized that his brother Jeremiah Robinson knew the facts, and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Woodruff, and he felt that I ought to tell him what the trouble was; that he was a leading man in Plymouth Church and had been a deacon, and was still attending Mr. Beecher's church, and meeting him constantly, and it was rather embarrassing for him, and he felt perhaps it might be embarrassing for Mr. Beecher, and he would like to know the truth. He said that sometimes he thought that Mr. Beecher had appropriated the church money, or had been guilty of theft, or something of that kind; that he realized it was some great crime which he had committed. I said, "No; it is not that; he has been guilty of adultery with Mrs. Tilton." He said, "Well, that I can hardly believe; it does not seem possible—a man that I have believed in for years, under whose preaching I have sat for so many years, and who has preached against that one particular sin—I cannot believe that it is possible that he is guilty." I said, "I am sorry to have to tell you that he is." He said, "How do you know it?" I said, "From confessions from both parties—both Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher told me." I told Mr. Beecher that I had told Mr. Robinson, feeling that Mr. Beecher might be embarrassed, and that it might be easier for him to talk to Mr. Robinson, now that Mr. Robinson knew the truth, as he frequently met him in the office and at our house.

And Mrs. Moulton says that thereupon you said that you were very glad she had told him; that you were willing to abide by anything she considered best. Now, did Mrs. Moulton ever give you such a narrative? A. She never gave me a narrative with one single solitary particle of that in it that is absolute—that is, so far as reporting to me; I don't undertake to say that she did not say all this to him, or he to her, but that she never said a word of it to me, not a word.

Q. You know this Mr. George C. Robinson? A. Well, I think I do—George C. Robinson, one of the excellent of the earth.

Q. And did he, and does he, continue his attendance at your church? A. He does. He was there at the pew-renting this year, and bid off a pew, and expressed himself—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind. He expressed himself to the extent he was willing to give, I suppose. That is enough.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if you say that that is all he said, then I will get out what he did say.

The Witness—There was a good deal that he said—

Mr. Evarts—You need not state that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, at an auction a man says a good deal—

The Witness—No; this was in conversation afterward; he said—

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't ask you what passed between you and Mr. Robinson, nor what he said.

The Witness [in an undertone]—It will come out on the cross-examination, I suppose.

Mr. Evarts—But he continued all the while, and does continue his relations to your church? A. Certainly; Mr. and Mrs. George C. Robinson were there yesterday, I think, and have been all along regularly there—what I should call regular attendants.

OTHER CONTRADICTIONS REGARDING THE "POISON" INTERVIEW.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, I call your attention to some statements made by this lady on her cross-examination, being the same interview concerning which I have questioned you in respect to her statements on the direct examination—some differences in the statements which I will go through with—some matters of expression. Referring to an interview which she puts as of the 2d of June, as you remember, concerning which you have testified, had occurred; but at any interview do you remember saying anything of this kind—that you had had a sleepless night; that you were very much depressed; that you were utterly without hope; you felt you must have the sympathy or reconciliation of some friend, and as she was the only person who knew the truth in this case, you came to her? Do you remember any statement of that kind? A. That came pretty near being true, but it is not true.

Q. What did you say at any interview in regard to that? A. I expressed to her feelings that I had in fits of despondency and in great trouble, and especially where the trouble rose from seeing the progressive mischief and ruin that was going on in the household; that I had no one to talk to about that family, and about the affair, but her, and it was a great relief to me, when everything looked dark and gloomy, to talk to her, for she was cheerful and hopeful.

Q. Then did she say anything of this kind: "Mr. Beecher, I am very sorry for you in this great trouble; there is only one way out for you, and that is by a confession and telling the truth; you cannot continue in this life of deception and hypocrisy; the truth will come out sooner or later." Did Mrs. Moulton ever address you in that way? A. No, Sir; it was not in her nature to say anything of that kind, and she never did—[after a long pause]—of her own accord.

Q. Now, in reference to any such suggestion on her part, what did you mean by "her own accord?"

Mr. Beach—No; we move that that be struck out.

The Witness—I understand you to say she said—

Mr. Evarts—I asked you if she said it.

The Witness—She didn't say it to me.

Q. Now, you used an expression, in answering the question, that she never said it of her own accord.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Q. Did she ever say it at all to you? A. Only as I sat here in the audience; that was the first time I ever heard it.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not what he meant, by a good deal.

The Witness—It is exactly what I mean, by a great deal more.

Mr. Beach [to the witness]—We were contradicting the counsel in his construction of the matter.

The Witness—I beg your pardon; I thought it was addressed to me.

Mr. Evarts—I want to exclude the idea that she didn't say it spontaneously, but said it to him.

Mr. Beach—We understand what he meant.

Mr. Fullerton—There is but one meaning to be attached to it.

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Fullerton]—Are you satisfied?

Mr. Fullerton—I am perfectly satisfied. Let it stand as it is without further explanation.

Q. Now, in this supposed conversation, in any conversation with Mrs. Moulton, did you express yourself in this form, that you could not confess, because your work would be at an end; that if you could not continue in your position as a moral and spiritual teacher there would be nothing left for you to do; for the sake of your children—it would be a disgrace to them if you should confess this crime; that you would have no hope, and that your church would not forgive you—did you use any expression of that kind? A. There is a single expression in that, but that sentence collectively is a false representation. It is not true that any such conversation passed with any such intent. In discussing the question of editing a paper, I said in various conversations that I did not consider that to be my prime vocation; that I was a moral and religious teacher by the voice, but the idea of turning aside from my pulpit to edit a daily paper struck me as preposterous; I knew my function.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mrs. Moulton in which that formed a part? A. I doubtless had conversations in her presence on that subject, because it was talked of frequently between Mr. Moulton and myself. The proposition was made to me, at two several times, to turn aside from the desk and take a paper, and that gave rise to conversations on that subject.

Q. Now, did she in this supposed conversation, or in any conversation in answer to your suggestion that they would not forgive you—that people would not forgive, at all, say: "I said that I thought they would forgive him; that he had done a great deal of good in the world, and that his church were bound to him like as one man almost, and I thought they would stand by him," and you replied: "No; that is a crime that they won't forgive; they won't treat me as generously and as kindly as you have done?" A. No, Sir; I never said any such thing.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton gives as a part of her narrative of a supposed interview: "On his part it was one long account of what he had suffered, and how he was unwilling to try to go on and endure it any longer; that he felt on that morning that the truth would come out, and that he could not live to meet it; he had not the strength, either physically or mentally," and she said: "I remember that I did endeavor to encourage him; I told him I thought it was a very cowardly thing to do to take his life." Now, did anything of that kind occur? A. No, Sir.

Q. I think you said, Mr. Beecher, that you did not see Mrs. Moulton either on that Monday nor on the Tuesday evening that you were in town, following? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Do you remember any conversation in which Mrs. Moulton expressed the opinion that Mr. Tilton was treacherous? A. Yes, Sir. I don't remember conversations; I remember her to have used such phrases of him.

Q. That Mrs. Moulton expressed such an opinion? A. I recollect to have heard her express such sentiments of Mr. Tilton. I don't remember any particular conversations in which it came up.

Q. Now, in that connection of Mr. Tilton's treachery, did she say this to you: "I told him that I thought Mr. Tilton was filled with revenge and anger against him, and that often when questions were put to him he made a reply such as told the whole truth?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, you have spoken of seeing Mrs. Moulton on the 31st of May, in the morning, and also in the evening, and you were at the house in the evening also? A. I was.

Q. And saw Mr. Moulton? A. I saw them both.

Q. Now, Sir, on that 31st of May were you lying upon the lounge, with a pillow, and covered with an afghan or blanket? A. No, Sir; I was not.

Q. There was no interview on the 31st of May in which you were so disposed of? A. No, Sir; I never was so disposed of on the 31st of May.

Q. Now, Sir, there is a third statement about this interview—this supposed interview—in which she uses these expressions. Now, Mrs. Moulton states, after lying on the sofa a little while you got up and walked up and down the room in a very excited manner, with the tears streaming down your cheeks, and said—now I ask your attention to this—"He thought it was very hard, after a life of usefulness, that he should be brought to this fearful end; and I said that I thought it was—it was, very hard; there was only one way out of it for him, there was only one chance for him left, and that was by confessing it." Did any such conversation take place between you and her? A. No, Mr. Evarts; there was no such conversation between that woman and me then or at any time.

Q. [Reading.]

After walking up and down for some time he sat down in a chair. I stood behind him and put my hand on his shoulder: "Mr. Beecher, if you would only go down to the church, Frank will go with you; he will stand by you through everything; it does not matter what comes to you, he will always be your friend, if you would only go down to the church and confess, because that is the only way out for you; I am convinced of that; you can never cover such a crime as this and continue in the pulpit, except through a confession on your part. You have been guilty of crime, and you have got to take the responsibility on yourself, and suffer the penalty." And he said: "Well, I never gather much comfort from you; you are always to me like a section of the Day of Judgment."

Now, Sir, did you ever have such an interview? A. It is the last figure that I have, should ever have, appropriated to Mrs. Moulton, who was much more to me than a bank of Spring flowers; I never had any such interview with her; I never heard from her any such statements. They are absolutely inconsistent with the emotion of her nature and her disposition.

Q. Did it ever occur? A. It never occurred.

Q. And she proceeds:

And I said, "Well, I feel great sympathy for you; but I don't see how you can continue in this sort of life—living a lie—going into your pulpit and preaching Sunday after Sunday." I said, "I have never heard you preach since I knew the truth, that I even felt that I was standing by an open grave; I cannot express to you the anguish and the sorrow that it has cost me to know what I have of your life. I believed in you since I was a girl, believed you were the only good man in this world. Now it has destroyed my faith in human nature; I don't believe in anybody; I don't go to church—all my interest in the church and in you is gone, and I am sure I cannot respect you unless you manifest to me that you are sincerely repentant by going down to the church and confessing your crime."

A. Most melancholy falsehood.

Q. Nothing of the kind occurred? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; nothing.

Q. Now, the lady proceeds:

It is very hard for Mr. Tilton (she stating this to you) to be abused by your friends and to be charged with treating his family ill—his unkindness to his wife—while he feels that you are principally the cause of all his trouble. It is very hard for him; it is very hard for all concerned. If you are only amind to take this case into your own hands you can settle it by confession. Your people will stand by you; they believe in you; they will forgive this one crime that you say you have committed and which you have—which you say you have sincerely repented for, and you believe you have been forgiven, and you feel that you are better able now than ever before to do great good in this world if you can only be allowed to go on to the end of your life without all the particulars of this case being made known; that is all that you ask, and if the facts are to come out, you want to go out of life; that you cannot live; that you cannot endure it any longer; physically and mentally you are worn out; and it is only with great care that you have been able to preach from Sunday to Sunday!

Did she give you a statement of that character? A. No, Sir; nor none of it.

Q. Now, Sir, in connection with any such conversation, or as a part of it, did this occur:

Mr. Beecher then spoke to me of coming some time, either the next day—to bring me some mentioes which he wished to give to his friends—something to Mrs. Tilton—asked me always to respect her and care for her, and be kind to her; that she was not a bad woman at heart; that she had sinned through her affections.

Did anything of that kind occur? A. No, Sir; nothing.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton refers to a call made afterward by you in this form:

He came to me soon after; referred to his depression on that day, but said that he felt more hopeful; that he thought that his card in The Eagle was only temporary relief; he was living in a fear of—a constant fear and anxiety, not knowing at what time Mr. Tilton might break out with the truth.

Now, after this 31st of May, did you have any interview with Mrs. Moulton after you returned to New-York, or returned to Brooklyn from the East, or at any time in which that occurred? A. No, Sir; not with the words that are put in it; I often talked with Mrs. Moulton on the matter of the breaking out through Mr. Tilton of their domestic troubles, but I never spoke of it as a confession, or as a sin, or as a crime, or as anything of that kind.

Q. Breaking out of the truth? A. Nor the breaking out of the truth.

THE MESSAGES SENT TO MRS. TILTON.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton speaks of some messages that you sent to Mrs. Tilton, and speaks in this way in regard to the general subject:

Well, he always told me to say to her that she must refuse to talk with everybody of anything bearing on this case; while she was trying very hard to restore the damage she had done by a confession, she was all the time making it worse.

Did you say anything of that kind to Mrs. Moulton by way of message to Mrs. Tilton, or otherwise? A. I think quite likely something like that, communicating to Mrs. Tilton that she should avoid conversation on this matter, or allowing any one to come to her family and converse with her. I had heard that several persons intruded themselves upon her, and the conversation arose in consequence of that, and I sent messages by Mrs. Moulton when she was going there, and we talked the matter over—the impropriety of her doing it, and often told her to tell Elizabeth about it from me.

Q. Not to talk about it? A. Not to talk about it—not to allow people to talk.

Q. Did you say anything of the kind that, while she was trying to restore the damage that she had done by a confession, she was all the time making it worse? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, in all your intercourse with Mrs. Moulton did she at any time, in any conversation with you, either by words or by any implication, impute or suggest the crime of adultery or illicit sexual relations between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. She never did, neither by word nor by implication.

Q. Was that fact stated or imputed or supposed—was ever a topic of conversation or suggestion from you to her, or from her to you? A. It never was.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps, if your Honor please, I can use the five minutes between now and 1 o'clock as well as arranging the next topic.

Judge Neilson [to Officer Rogers]—Mr. Rogers, place your men so that no person shall speak to the jury as they pass out. [To the audience.] Gentlemen, keep your seats until the jury retire. [To the jurors.] Gentlemen, return at 2 o'clock.

The Court here took a recess until 2 p. m.

WHEN "CRIME" WAS FIRST CHARGED.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled and the direct examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—There was an interview between you and Mr. Moulton on the 31st of May, 1873, and with reference to any interview on that day with Mr. Moulton, without the presence of Mr. Tilton, or with Mr. Tilton, if Mr. Tilton was present, at any such interview, was there in any conversation between you and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, or with one in the presence of the other, any conversation regarding your affairs and their affairs, or what was to be done, or should be done, in which the word "crime" was used by either of those gentlemen, in regard to you, or the subject which was talked about? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, in all this matter between yourself and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton going on from December, 1870, until the Summer of last year, when was the first notice or intimation to you of a charge of crime, or of the use of the word "crime" in any conduct that you are charged with, on the part of Tilton or Moulton? A. It was conveyed to me through Mr. Redpath, at Peekskill, and there only, unless it occurred in the interview about the Bacon letter, but I do not think that the word was used in that interview.

Q. That the word "crime" was used in the interview about the Bacon letter? A. No, Sir, barely; but aside from that—and to the best of my recollection it did not occur then—my first hearing of it was through Mr. Redpath, at Peekskill.

Q. On the 13th of June, or about? A. I don't remember the date, Sir.

Q. Well, at Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When he saw you at Peekskill. He has fixed that. Now, was that the first notice or advertisement on the part of Mr. Tilton, or Mr. Moulton, that you were to be accused of adultery with Mrs. Tilton? A. It was.

INTERVIEWS CONCERNING THE BACON LETTER.

Q. Now, in regard to any conversation that immediately preceded or immediately followed the publication of what is known as the Bacon letter, were there such conversations in which you took part, and with whom? A. Yes; I had conversations with Mr. Moulton; I had ceased to have meetings with Mr. Tilton; they were very rare, if at all, but with Mr. Moulton I had conversations during all the time of the Council, in March of 1873, I think it was—of 1873 or 1874.

Mr. Beach—1874, Sir.

The Witness—1874, and in regard to the address which was reported in the papers, purporting to be Dr. Bacon's address to the Theological Class; and in regard to the five letters, if there were so many, or articles which Dr. Bacon published in The New-York Independent; and then in regard to the reply which Mr. Tilton was preparing to Dr. Bacon.

Q. Now, how was that matter introduced to you? Was the conversation to which you refer, or conversations, with Mr. Moulton? A. They were.

Q. With Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, prior to the publication of the Bacon letter, what interview between Mr. Moulton and yourself can you recall as bearing upon that meditative— A. Well, I cannot give any one single interview, but I can give you the substance, the drift, of several, for they were substantially reproductions, with very little variations, of the same train of thought; Mr. Moulton was extremely unwilling that Mr. Tilton should write and publish a letter of that kind, and labored, as he told me, in various ways to dissuade him from it—that is, from the publication of it; he told me that it would, perhaps, be best to let him write it out, repeating what he had said on a former occasion substantially; that that was the way to manage Mr. Tilton when he got into one of his violent dissatisfactions, to let him write out, and then when he had, in some sense, expended himself on the literary effort, to attack and to control him, and it was in one of those prior conversations that I learned from Mr. Moulton that it was Mr. Tilton's intention to introduce into his letter to Dr. Bacon the substance of the letter, or the apology—whatever name may be given to it—and we had several incidental conversations, one just preceding the publication, or, as it happened, though I did not—I think neither of us expected it would be published then, or I did not—in which he represented that Mr. Tilton and he had been in New-York the night previous at a friend's house, and that there had been several persons called in to consultation, and that they had all striven, as I understood, to prevent the publication of the letter, but that Mr. Tilton was confirmed in his determination to publish it; that when Mr. Moulton addressed himself to taking out of it some harsh expressions which he said were in the letter, and that he had finally succeeded, making it, he said, a great deal better than it would have been, there was an unnecessary severity in it, and that, I think, is the last conversation I had with Mr. Moulton on that subject until after the letter was published.

Q. Well, after the letter was published did you then have any conversation, with the letter before you, or in mind, between you, concerning what had been done by him in any change from what it would have been but for the change? A. I never read the letter from that day to this, Sir, as I recollect; I may have read portions of it since the trial began, but the letter was not written to me before.

Q. Was not shown to you? A. Was not shown to me; I knew nothing of its contents except as they were represented by Mr. Moulton, and after the letter appeared I was at Peekskill, and when it appeared, I think on Thursday, I telegraphed to Mr. Moulton immediately that I would see him the next day at 6 o'clock, at my house; and there was some telegraphing between us. I came down on the 2 o'clock train on Friday, called Mr. Cleveland to my house in consultation on my way, then announced and made the first steps toward the calling of an investigating committee, and telling him the plan which I meant to pursue.

Q. Telling Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir, Mr. Cleveland, and also telling him—

Q. Well, it is no matter what you told him? A. Announcing simply that Mr. Moulton was to see me at 6.

Q. Very well. A. And at that time Mr. Moulton came to my house, and we had a conversation, of which I recollect very little, for I had dismissed from my mind wholly the idea that Mr. Moulton could be successful any longer as a friend of both parties. He brought, however, with him, a document which was, I believe—has it been put in evidence ?—a document wishing me to admit that I had committed an offense.

Mr. Beach—Yes, it has been put in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know.

Mr. Beach—Yes, it has been put in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—It is known as the Carpenter card, isn't it?

The Witness—Yes, Sir; and I said to him, "I am going to have some friends here to-night, and I will confer with them, and I will see you again."

Mr. Evarts [to Mr. Shearman]—What is the number of that exhibit?

Mr. Shearman—34.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Morris, will you be so good as to let us have 34?

Mr. Morris produced Exhibit 34.

Mr. Evarts—Just look at that, Mr. Beecher, and say if that is the paper or proposed card or statement that was brought to your attention [handing witness Exhibit 34]? A. I think that this is the card. You don't mean that this is in my handwriting?

Q. No; it was not in your handwriting? A. No.

THE CARPENTER CARD.

Q. The card was brought to you, wasn't it?

A. The contents of this are familiar to me, and I suppose this to be the paper that was brought to me.

Q. Do you know the handwriting? A. I do not.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know whether— [To Mr. Morris.] Has it been stated?

Mr. Morris—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—It has been stated, I believe, to be in Mr. Carpenter's handwriting—Mr. Frank Carpenter's. Now, I will read this, as I wish to ask you questions about it:

This church and community are unquestionably and justly interested, through the recent publication by Theodore Tilton in answer to Dr. Leonard Bacon of New-Haven.

It is true that I have committed an offense against Theodore Tilton, and, giving to that offense the force of his construction, I made an apology and reparation such as both he and I at the time declared full and necessary. I am convinced that Mr. Tilton has been goaded to his defense by misrepresentations or misunderstandings of my position toward him. I shall never be a party to the reopening of this question, which has been honorably settled as between Theodore Tilton and myself. I have committed no crime; and if this society believes that it is due to it that I should reopen this already too painful subject, or resign, I will resign. I know, as God gives me the power to judge of myself, that I am better fitted to-day, through trials and chastening, to do good, than I have ever been.

There is an occasional change of ink here. I don't know whether it appears whose handwriting that is. [Consulting with Mr. Morris.] Now, Sir, with that before you, what was said by Mr. Moulton in regard to its publication by you? A. I don't remember much about what was said that first evening, Sir. My mind was running on other things, and Mr. Moulton had his plan, and

I had dismissed from my mind his generalship, and yet my personal relations were very cordial, and my confidence in him personally was very strong, and I didn't wish in any way to hurt him, or to be indifferent to what he really seemed to me to be laboring to accomplish; yet my mind was set; I had come to the end, and I meant to have no more intermediate stages, and I therefore, when this was first brought to my notice, said, "I will consider it; I will take it into consideration." That, so far as I recollect, was the first interview substantially.

Q. Now, can you fix the date of this interview? A. It can easily be fixed; I cannot in my memory fix it; I have got it in my pocket.

Mr. Evarts [to Counsel]—Well, has it been fixed.

Mr. Morris—I am not sure.

Mr. Evarts—June 26 it is said to have been fixed; is that so, Judge Morris?

Mr. Shearman—The "Bacon letter" was published Thursday, June 25.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it was immediately following the publication of the "Bacon letter," was it? A. It was [Referring to memorandum.] It was on Friday evening, June 26, according to my memorandum of dates.

Q. The "Bacon letter" was published on the 25th, it is said, and I suppose correctly. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You took this card, did you, to consult with friends? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How soon thereafter did you have any interview on the subject of the card, or its publication? A. I cannot fix the precise time, Sir, but it was not far off.

Q. What further passed between you and Mr. Moulton in regard to this card and its publication, and what could be done or would be done if you assented to it? A. At a later—at some interview later, Mr. Moulton urged me very strongly; as I recalled the conversation it was substantially this, that Mr. Tilton had bound himself in the presence of witnesses if I would publish that statement, that he would be content himself, and Mr. Moulton said if I would publish that statement he would burn every document that he had, and that if Mr. Tilton ever undertook to move again in the matter he would take sides with me and fight him. He expressed himself very strongly; I think the word he said, he would "smash" him.

Q. Did he say to you anything in regard to the power that he had over Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; many, many times, he said: "I have that—I can grind him to powder," he said imperatively, of his control over Mr. Tilton.

Q. Well, what was your answer in regard to your signing or publishing that card? A. I would never sign a card after the "Bacon letter" with that equivocal offense in it.

Q. Well, you told him that you would not, did you? A. I told him that I would not, and I did not.

Q. Well, what was the end of the matter about that card and about its publication! Was there anything further about it; was the subject renewed and pressed in any way? A. I cannot say definitely. There was still, up to the very sessions of the Investigating Committee, more or less of an effort on the part of Mr. Moulton to accommodate matters. He thought that the publication of the Bacon letter had not brought things necessarily to a crisis. I thought it had, and he, with great assiduity and vehement zeal, thought that there could be a way struck out between extremes by which we could all go clear, even at that stage. I said we could not—that the thing must be tried now and looked into the bottom.

Q. Was this card intended or proposed for newspaper publication, or for reading to your church, or otherwise presenting to this Committee? A. I don't know that the particular mode of issuing it was a matter of consideration. I don't remember anything about it. In form it looked rather like being read to the church, but as I did not particularly regard it in any way—that is, I did not give much thought to it, except that the opening phraseology was an effectual bar to its being used by me in any way.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember anything about this card, of this kind. Mr. Moulton says that he submitted that paper to the consideration of Mr. Tracy upon his own suggestion; he does not say it was upon your suggestion; and then being asked this question: "And what was said by Mr. Beecher in regard to that act," that is, submitting it to Mr. Tracy, Mr. Moulton answers: "He approved of it;" and it comes out in the next question and answer a little more fully:

Q. What did he say and what did you say to him? A. I said to him that I had submitted the paper to Mr. Tracy, and he said nothing further in regard to it; I don't remember that he made any reply.

Which perhaps does away—I don't know how that is—but do you recognize any conversation between you and Mr. Moulton as to this paper having been submitted to Gen. Tracy, and your approval of it having been done? A. It may very easily have been. Sir, but I don't recall any such circumstance. There were a good many meetings, and there were a good many stages. Before the Bacon letter there was a card, you know, prepared in anticipation—anticipatory card—which was afterward modified, and attempted, I think, to be made the basis of this other one, and I am not clear in my recollection about that. I know there were many interviews and many suggestions and tentative forms produced, and before the Bacon letter was published I was not indisposed to consider it, but after it was published I was indisposed.

Q. Now, Sir, do you remember Mr. Moulton reporting to you any such interview between himself and Gen. Tracy as this? A. I don't remember it, Sir.

Q. As this? A. Oh! I beg pardon.

Q. This which I now state to you:

I met Mr. Beecher on July the 5th, I think, and I said, "Well, Mr. Beecher, you have not uttered from your pulpit, or anywhere given utterance to the words that I prepared for you; at least I have not seen any such expressions;" and he said, "No, you advised silence particularly." "Yes," I said, "I advised silence, but I think you have had a good opportunity to make that expression;" and I said, "At the Friday evening prayer-meeting your church seemed to be in entire sympathy with you, and I think you might have availed yourself of that occasion to have made that expression." And he said, "Well, I am not to blame for that. You advised silence, and I have followed the course you advised."

And then this card is put in evidence that you have just had in your hands, and the witness proceeds, and it is to this part that I wish to call your attention particularly:

I had a subsequent conversation with Mr. Beecher about it, and I told him that I had seen Gen. Tracy concerning a reply to the Bacon letter, and that I had asked Gen. Tracy if he had submitted the paper to him, and I said to Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tracy's reply was that he had seen a paper in which he thought he detected my handiwork, and that Gen. Tracy had said to me that the words, "I have committed no crime"—which is a part of this card, quoted from it—really said nothing in denial of the fact as alleged by Mr. Beecher against—or as to the fact between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher—[the witness corrects himself]—or Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton's relations; that as nearly as I could remember the words he said, "I have committed no crime," did not mean anything, because adultery was no crime under the common law. That is as nearly as I could repeat it, and I said to him that I had told Gen. Tracy that I did not think that was a good objection; that I thought the community would accept that card as a distinct denial—that utterance, rather; that that utterance would be accepted by the community as a distinct denial, and that it ought to be made, or some such utterance should be made, since Beecher assented—since Mr. Tilton assented to peace, if that utterance was made, or if silence was kept.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember a conversation in which Mr. Moulton brought to your attention an interview that he had had with Gen. Tracy on the subject of the force and effect of this card? A. I have no distinct recollection of any such statement as is made there.

Q. What was the objection that you stated to the publication of that card? A. My objection was that after the publication of the Bacon letter nobody could understand the offense—or everybody was at liberty to understand the offense as they pleased; certainly, that it was that I had made improper advances toward Mrs. Tilton, and I wouldn't stand it.

Q. And you would make no publication that contained that admission? A. I would not agree to any such statement; I would not sign any such statement; I would have nothing to do with anything that could so mislead the public.

Q. Now, whether the word "crime" was used or not in either of the conversations that Moulton had with you, preceding or following the publication of the Bacon letter. Was there at that time any suggestion or intimation from Mr. Moulton that the charge against you was any other or different from what had been the subject of imputation—the improper advances? A. That was what he understood, and what he conveyed to me, and what I understood.

Q. So that the announcement made to you by Mr. Redpath as coming from Tilton and Moulton, that they intended to charge adultery, was the first notice of that imputation or charge on their part? A. It was the first statement to me; it was the first time, I suspect, that it was ever thought of.

Q. Well, the first statement to you? A. At any rate, I knew it then for the first time as a part of their plan.

THE WEST CHARGES.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, in regard to what have been known as the West charges. [To counsel.] Where are those papers? [Paper produced by Mr. Morris and handed to Mr. Evarts.] In regard to these West charges, was the text or form of them ever laid before you, or communicated to you? [Handing witness a paper.] A. No, Sir; I don't remember ever to have read them; I knew what they were; I mean at the time—that is, I knew the ground they covered, without knowing much about them particularly.

Q. Now, in the Spring, or early Summer, when the matter was first brought up, what did you understand the charges were confined to? A. I understood that they were charges brought against Mr. Tilton for having slandered me in reporting that I preached to forty mistresses, or some other number.

Q. Yes? A. And that they only related to what were called generally the Bowen slanders or charges.

Q. The Bowen slanders? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in the Fall, in regard to any third clause or item, how much knowledge had you on that subject? A. I don't think I had any; the ground I took was such that I could not very well have any knowledge about it.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't reason about it.

The Witness—I beg pardon.

Mr. Evarts—Now, in regard to the third charge or item that involved any relations with Mrs. Tilton—imputation against Mr. Tilton of having made charges in respect to Mrs. Tilton and yourself—was there any communication to you, in writing or otherwise, of any other charge in that relation than the charge of improper advances? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, I call your attention, Mr. Beecher, to some statements of Mr. Tilton's testimony. Mr. Tilton speaks of an interview that he had with you, I imagine somewhere about October of that year; at any rate it was in the Fall. [After some consultation.] Now, Mr. Beecher, in reference to these West charges, and in that Fall, that Autumn, did you have any discussion or conversation with Mr. Tilton, in which Mr. Tilton's conversation with Mr. West about these charges and about your guilt was talked of? A. I don't know.

Q. Mr. Tilton says that he said to you in some such interviews, "that during the Summer he (Mr. West) had changed his mind on that subject, and had come to the conclusion that Mr. Beecher was the guilty man"—that is—I must go back a little further—"Mr. West had visited me during the Summer, and had substantially indicated to me, though he didn't say it in plain words, that he (Mr. West) had originally instituted these charges against me, in June, because he thought I was really guilty of slandering Mr. Beecher; that during the Summer he (Mr. West) had changed his mind on that subject and had come to the conclusion that Mr. Beecher was the guilty man, but that, having brought his charges before the Church in the regular way, he desired that they should be called up in the Autumn," and he urged him (Mr. Tilton) to appear before the Church to answer the charges; "that in answering them I would throw the blame where it belonged and clear myself." Do you remember any interview with Mr. Tilton in that Autumn, after those West charges were brought upon the carpet, in which any conversation of that kind occurred? A. I do not; I heard rumors, but they were rumors, I cannot tell from whom.

Q. Well, the question is whether you had any such conversation? A. I recollect no such conversation with Mr. Tilton.

Q. Do you remember Mr. Tilton's saying this: [Reading.]

I told him, however, that Mr. West was guarded in his expression and would not say absolutely that he believed in Mr. Beecher's guilt, only that if Mr. Beecher was guilty he was acting during the Summer as a guilty man would act, and exactly as an innocent man would not act!

A. I remember no such language, Sir.

THE CHURCH MEETING RESPECTING THE CHARGES.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, the end of all this matter, I understand it, occurred at some church meeting, or meeting of the church or society where Mr. Tilton was present and made some observations, an address, and you also followed him? A. What is the date of this?

Mr. Morris—October 31st.

Mr. Evarts—October 31st, 1873.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Now, calling your attention to that scene, please state the matter as it occurred, as you recall it. A. Well, Sir, I cannot give you a very detailed statement of it—the question—certainly cannot without giving a statement of the position to which we had come in our church deliberations through the Committee. The Friday meeting was a meeting, if I recollect aright, to receive and act upon a report from the Examining Committee; and, as that report was essentially this, that the name of Mr. Tilton be dropped from the roll, and as I had talked with Mr. Moulton and with Mr. Tilton as to the progress of things, it was coming to that issue. He appeared in that meeting.

Q. Mr. Tilton did? A. Mr. Tilton; he went—asked permission of the Chairman to make some remarks, and as a courtesy it was granted, and he then proceeded to make some remarks in which that that I remember, and that which was the point of them, was, that he had not slandered the pastor of the church, or if he had—the pastor had—any charges to make on that subject against him, he was there to have them made then and there, or words to that effect—that was the substance of it; he assumed the position of a man not a member of the church, but declaring that he had not slandered the pastor, and if the pastor thought he had, he was there to receive those charges. I had not expected to speak in the evening, but I did; and, after making some remarks in respect to general principles of our church, I, in the close, alluded to the remarks that were made by him, and said that whatever differences had existed between Mr. Tilton and me had been honorably settled, and were, so far as I was concerned, buried; that I had no charges to make against him; and that I believed he had none to make against me; and with that the speech ceased, and then after the voting (I think he remained to the end)—after the voting in the meeting Mr. Tilton was congratulated on the successful termination of this difficulty and shook hands with my most intimate and cordial friends, and went home happy.

Q. Mr. Tilton? A. Mr. Tilton.

Q. In your observations did you— Mr. Stenographer, won't you read this last answer?

[The Tribune stenographer read the answer.]

Q. In what you said, Mr. Beecher, in regard to difficulties being buried, whatever they were, or however you spoke of them, was anything said by you to their being buried on Mr. Tilton's part? A. I cannot say—affirm—I said that they had been amicably settled between us, and, so far as I am concerned, they were buried; that I had no charges to make against him, and that I believed he had none to make against me.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, I call your attention to a statement of Mr. Tilton's in answer to this question, which will show you the subject. On the cross-examination by me the question was:

What was there in that situation that made Mr. Beecher responsible for any of those offenses against you that you find in Dr. Bacon's—it should be “in Dr. Bacon's statement? A. I will tell you, Sir. Mr. Beecher came out of his church one night, as I have described in my direct examination, meeting Mr. Moulton and me against the Iron rail—saying he could control his church; that they would do exactly what he wished; that he held them in his right hand; and any action which Mr.—I believe that is the end of what he says you said—“saying he could control his church; that they would do exactly what he wished; that he held them in his right hand”——

Q. Did you make a statement of that kind to Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. In reference to the situation after the Bacon letter, or any other time? A. I did not, Sir.

THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, did there come to be an Investigating Committee last Summer? A. There did.

Q. After it was appointed, was an application made to you from that Committee for a statement before it of your relations with Mrs. Tilton? A. There was.

Q. Did you prepare and present to that Committee a statement on that subject? A. I did.

Q. Is that the statement concerning which Mr. Moulton speaks as having been read in part, at least, to him—He is asked this question—

I saw him several times at his house, yes; Sir. Q. In regard to what? A. In regard to the report which he should make to the Investigating Committee of his church. Q. State whether he had it prepared? A. He read to me, Sir, from a paper, what he proposed to say in regard to Theodore Tilton. Q. Was that the paper? A. It was.

Q. From which you read to Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S STATEMENT.

Mr. Evarts—I offer that paper in evidence, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—We will have this marked “Exhibit D, 131.”

Mr. Fullerton—Inasmuch as it is disconnected, I think that every leaf ought to be marked.

Mr. Shearman—Very well.

[Accordingly each leaf of the paper was marked D, 131.]

Mr. Evarts—Please look at the date of this, Mr. Beecher, and then I will ask you a question. The date is “Wednesday, July 15, 1874.” Now, was this prepared by you after your interview with Mr. Redpath at Peekskill, which was on Monday, the 13th? A. Yes, Sir; what date does that bear.

Q. This bears date Wednesday, the 15th of July, 1874. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. According to Mr. Redpath's testimony, you, in that interview with him, spoke of a statement that you were going to make; is this the statement? A. Yes, Sir; that is the statement that I was going to make.

Q. And made after that interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I will now read it, if your Honor please.

Mr. Beach—You read from a copy.

Mr. Evarts—Yes. [Reading.]

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1874.

DEAR BRETHREN: When, at length, the time came that I could break the long silence of four years, I thought it proper, and in accordance with all the principles which Plymouth Church has defended, that I should speak to you, and through you to the Church, the only ecclesiastical tribunal whose authority I recognize as binding upon me. I asked the appointment of a large committee of able and impartial men, because, though my own statement was to be, in my judgment, the chief element, yet there were many incidental and collateral questions which I desired to have investigated and finally determined.

I do not propose to enter upon the details of a history running through four years. I shall state the facts which concern the original troubles and leave alone the tangled sequences.

My acquaintance with Mrs. Elizabeth Tilton dates from her childhood; my intimacy in her family, from about 1862-3. Her nature was strongly devotional. She had a genius of religious sentiment. Had she lived in other days, and in the Catholic Church, she has always seemed to me to be one of those who would have inspirations and ecstatic visions. My interest in her increased, and she deserved the respectful affection which she won from me. I loved her as one would his own child. She had grown up under my teachings. She had never known any other religious teacher, and she had associated with my name, and illumined it by her imagination, whatever was worthy of affection and trust. Nor did I dream, for a long time, that, in such a gentle and appreciative nature, my admiration and sincere affection might beget an enthusiasm which would mar the entirety of the love which a wife should cherish for her husband. It was at length the sight of the unhappiness disclosed in the family, and the indignant reproaches of her husband, that aroused in me the full sense of the wrong done in winning any part of that affection which should belong to her household. Leaving to others the unwelcome task of refined moral criticism upon this gentle and pure-minded woman, it is for me explicitly to defend her from any charge of criminality of conduct, and to dissipate even the shadow if a reproach upon her untempted honor, and to join with her husband, who has again and again, with loyal affection and with justice, defended the personal purity of his wife.

Although the sincere affection which grew up in me for Mrs. Tilton was honorable in intent, I none the less condemn myself with unsparing severity for bringing upon the most sacred of human institutions—the household—great harm and distress, which have since flowed like a river. I do not measure the blame by a light standard. That our relations were not criminal in the ordinary and legal sense of the term, does not exonerate me from blame, nor does it relieve me of the sharpest pangs of sorrow. My age, my experience, my knowledge of her sensitive nature, should have been a shield to her, and my long and affectionate relations with Mr. Tilton. When the full realization broke upon me of a household deeply wounded by my imprudence, of possible and threatened divisions and scatterings, and the long train of evils that might befall father, mother, and the beautiful group of children, and that instead of happiness I had brought upon two persons with whom I had been in the most affectionate relations a torrent of misery whose influence might widen indefinitely—my distress passed all bounds. To a mutual friend I poured out my soul like water. I did not measure words. I took upon myself immeasurable blame. I wished him to convey to Mr. Tilton, in language overcharged with feeling, my profound regrets and apologies. The apology was accepted, a reconciliation was made, and kind social relations were for a time continued—and would have continued until this day, had not malign external influences interfered, in various unlooked-for ways, and spread abroad exaggerations, perversions, and falsehoods, whose direct evil was aimed at me, but whose indirect influence was to place Mr. Tilton in a false position, as one attacking me rather than as one injured by me.

Nor can any one who only looks upon affairs at the present stage of development be in a situation to judge of the motives and influences which have acted at various stages of a history, essentially private and domestic, and which, for the sake of society, of the family, of childhood, and of womanhood, should have had the privilege of seclusion, which those most injured most earnestly sought. The policy of silence has failed. But it was the right one, and ought to have succeeded.

I was called, at the earliest moment in this history, to determine my duty in other relations. I was pastor of a large church, the editor of a religious journal, and was engaged in important literary enterprises, besides the multifarious public and private duties of a miscellaneous kind, not strictly clerical, which fall upon clergymen in our day.

Profoundly suffering, it would have been an unspeakable relief if I could have laid down my burdens. It was not honorable or right to others to seek personal relief at their expense. I therefore determined to accept my sorrow as a schoolmaster sent of God, and to let no one know that I carried burdens, but to rise to every emergency, not only, but to grow stronger by the severe discipline laid upon me. It was in this mood that I wrote the "Life of Christ," which may well be called Benoni—child of my sorrow. I was led by my own suffering to a profounder sense of moral evil, to a pity and sympathy for those doing wrong, that I had never before known. The divine nature, in its compassion, and in its healing power, which before was only as a star, has grown to the orb of a sun. And in no part of my life has my ministry sprung from so profound a sense of God's mercy, nor gone forth with such an unspeakable compassion for the sorrowing, struggling human kind. It does not befit me to speak of my own work, but it is right to explain why I continued it under circumstances of very great trouble. I did not think that because I had done wrong I ought not to do right.

I ought also, solemnly and gratefully, to bear witness to the mercy of God. Every hour of anguish has opened at length into peace. The strife of tongues, the sorrow for others, the suffering for myself, have brought to me the "God of all consolation," and He has, from time to time, ministered a peace which passeth all understanding.

In conclusion, I am yet in vigor of health, with powers unimpaired. I have no use for myself, except to labor for the best interests of my country and my kind. If it please God, I shall make the Autumn of my life as energetic as my earlier years. But in what fields, or through what channels, I leave to the Divine Providence.

Now, Sir, I call your attention to some statements of Mr. Moulton. He says that after your reading to him some portion of this statement, I (Moulton) said to him, "Mr. Beecher, I think I may be able to induce Theodore Tilton not to write the statement which he is writing, if I express to him fully the ground that you take with regard to it, because I cannot see that you can do anything more, unless you confess absolutely to the Committee the crime which you have committed against him and his family." Now, Sir, did anything of that kind occur between you and Mr. Moulton? A. Nothing of the kind that is included in that last sentence at all.

Q. He says he made to you the observation: "Because I cannot see that you can do anything more unless you confess absolutely to the Committee the crime which you have committed against him and his family." Did he say anything to you of that kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Mr. Moulton proceeds to state that he said to you:

And I will try to influence Tilton upon the basis of what you have told me, and he [Mr. Beecher] said, "I hope you will succeed in doing that; if Theodore publishes the fact, as he has threatened to, or my relations with Mrs. Tilton, it will ruin him and it will kill me!"

A. No, Sir; there was no such conversation—no such representation from me.

Q. Now, Sir, I call your attention to this. Mr. Moulton states that when you handed him this memorandum, which has been marked Exhibit 49, he said:

Mr. Beecher, isn't there any member of your Committee besides Mr. Tracy, or isn't there any one in that Committee besides Mr. Tracy to whom you can tell the truth, to whom I could tell it, or to whom Mr. Tracy could tell it, in order that they might guide the action of that Committee properly in reference to the fact itself?

Couldn't you tell Mr. Sage? and he [that is you] said "No, it would kill him;" he said that it almost killed him when he told him that he had been guilty of an offense, when he made the explanation that he did to him of that. "Well," I [that is Moulton] said, "that is too bad; if you have not got one friend in that Committee to whom you can tell the truth, what is the use of your friends?"

Now, Sir, did any such conversation occur between you and Mr. Moulton? A. The conversation, but no such thing as that.

MR. MOULTON'S PLANS FOR MANAGING THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Well, please state the conversation as it did occur? A. Mr. Moulton still had a multitude of plans and suggestions; they swarmed; his brain was fertile, and he brought them to me, one and another; sometimes I thought of them, and sometimes I didn't, but in regard to this he said to me he thought that Committee could be managed yet, so as that there should not be—there should not be a direct clash between Mr. Tilton and me finally—something to that effect, and he wanted to know whether there was not somebody in that Committee to whom I could introduce him, and with whom he could talk, and whom he could influence in the matter. I said no, I didn't think there was. He mentioned Mr. Sage's name, and I told him he was the last man I thought in the Committee that he could influence or would; that Mr. Sage loved me, I believed, as well as he did his life, but that he was not a man who on that account would swerve from the task which had been imposed upon him; that he meant business, and that the whole Committee meant business; that I meant to have them transact business. I told him that the Committee was appointed after all other things had failed, that there was nothing else for me but that investigation, and that I was determined to have it, and that I appointed the Committee of men that would stand before the community unimpeachable, and yet who had not been mixed up with any of the heated discussions in the church, and who would undertake to look at this whole question with a judicial investigation; I told him my purpose originally had been to have Judge Benedict on the Committee as the leading man on it, but that he had for private reasons (among others, that he was living on Staten Island at the time) declined the task, and that there had been appointed on it lawyers and others, besides these business men, who stood above all reproach, and that I had enjoined on them to make a thorough investigation, and I meant it, and they were going to do it, and that any attempt to turn them aside one way or the other would fail.

Q. Mr. Beecher, did you at this time, this month of July, stated to be somewhere between the 20th and 30th of July, have an interview between yourself and Mr. Moulton—have a conversation of this kind with him:

I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton never would have written that card if it had not been for the publication of his correspondence with the Committee and the desertion of his wife, and I said to Mr. Beecher at that interview, "Don't you know that you are doing yourself, or are liable to do yourself, a great hurt by keeping Elizabeth away from Theodore? Don't you know perfectly well the influence that that woman has had over him? If you keep her away from him it will only incense him, and you ought to send her back to him;" and he said, "That can be arranged if this other matter is fixed up properly!"

Did you have any such conversation as that? A. I did not, Sir; I did not.

Q. Was there any conversation in which your keeping her away from her husband was spoken of? A. No, Sir; of course there was not; I had nothing to do with her staying or going.

Mr. Fullerton—You have answered the question, Mr. Beecher.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton ever speak to you about, or impute to you the keeping of Mrs. Tilton away from her husband? A. He did not.

Q. Mr. Beecher, up to the time of your preparing and presenting this paper that has been read to the Investigating Committee, had you the opinion that you have heretofore expressed that this undue withdrawal of affection of the wife from the husband and attraction to yourself had taken place? A. I did.

Q. You retained that opinion up to that time? A. I retained that opinion; I retained that opinion some considerable time after that.

Q. When, if at all, did you change your view or opinion on that subject? A. Well, the feeling was so rooted and grounded in me that the change, after I was informed—

Mr. Beach—Oh, wait, wait!

Mr. Evarts—The question is the date.

The witness—It was after Mrs. Tilton's testimony before the Committee, and after representations were made to me by those who knew about her.

Mr. Beach—I object to this.

Q. When, in point of time, Mr. Beecher, was it? A. It was, I should say, in the August of 1874.

Q. Since that change have you—up to this time has that change continued? A. Yes, Sir.

GEN. BUTLER OFFERS HIS SERVICES TO MR. BEECHER.

Q. Mr. Moulton, Mr. Beecher, has spoken of a conversation on the 5th of July, which I will call your attention to, and ask you then to state the interview as you understand it. He says:

I told him I thought it was a mistake to have an Investigating Committee, but that we would try to get along with even that, and I told him that I thought I should take, or probably should have further counsel in the matter, and he said, "Who do you mean?" and I said "Gen. Butler." I had received a letter from him asking that there be silence, and he said, "Yes; I have heard something about that. A friend of him, or a Mr. Bowen of Washington, saw Gen. Butler, and he advises silence, and this Mr. Bowen told his father, and his father told me. He said he did not believe much in the moral sense of Gen. Butler; that he might be a good counselor, because he considered him a wise man, and that at all events his advice was good for silence," and Mr. Moulton adds, "and that is all that transpired at that interview."

Did you have an interview with Mr. Moulton at or about this time, early in July? A. I did.

Q. In which there was some reference to such a subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. If so, please state what that interview was? A. I think we were walking together up from his house, and the conversation, of course, was on this subject, and he expressed some regrets that I had, as he thought, precipitately called for this Investigating Committee, but as it was called, and it could not be helped, we must do the best we could, and then he said, putting his hand in his pocket, "I have a letter here; we are going to have another actor in this thing that will be a very strong man for us," and I said: "Yes, I suspect I know who you have allusion to." Said he: "Who?" I said: "Gen. Butler." "Yes," said he, "it is him." Says I: "I was advised of his intentions." Then he wanted to know what it was. I told him that Mr. H. A. Bowen had called upon me not a long time before, and had said that he came just immediately from Washington, and that Gen. Butler had sent word to me that he felt that I was not in the hands of good advisers, and that he felt a great interest in my case, and that he should be in New-York in about ten days, and that if I would like to see him he would meet me there, and that he thought he could carry me through the case no matter what the facts were [laughter; that was the message that was communicated to me by H. A. Bowen.

Q. And you told Mr. Moulton? A. I told Mr. Moulton—made that statement to him; and I also said to Mr. Moulton that it didn't seem to me necessary that I should see Gen. Butler.

Q. Well, Sir, that was the interview? A. That was the interview; that is, that was that part of it; there were some other things stated, I don't know what just now.

Mr. Beach [to Mr. Evarts]—Let us go; it is time.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beach suggests that we might as well adjourn now, your Honor.

Judge Nelson—Gentlemen will keep their seats a moment until the jury retire.

Mr. Mallison [the Clerk]—The Court stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock.

SIXTY-FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE DEFENDANT BEGUN.

THE LAST LINKS IN THE CHAIN OF DIRECT TESTIMONY—MR. BEECHER AGAIN CALLED UPON TO DENY IN SPECIFIC TERMS THE COMMISSION OF ADULTERY—MR. MOULTON ANXIOUS TO KEEP BACK ALL MENTION OF THE GIFT OF $5,000—MR. BEECHER ASKED TO EXPLAIN PASSAGES IN MRS. MORSE'S LETTERS—HE AGAIN RECITES MORE FULLY THE SCENES WITH MRS. TILTON AND THE INTERVIEW WITH MR. BOWEN IN DECEMBER, 1870.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1875.

Mr. Beecher's direct examination was concluded to-day at 12:15 p. m.; and Mr. Fullerton began the cross-examination. The direct testimony was fragmentary, including contradictions of ten or a dozen declarations by the various witnesses for the plaintiff. Mr. Fullerton carried the witness in his narrative, which is being repeated very fully, to the door of Mr. Moulton's house on the night of Dec. 30, 1870, and there stopped for the day.

CLOSE OF THE DIRECT EXAMINATION.

The dismal day had its effect on the number in attendance and the humor of the audience and actors. Mr. Beecher was somewhat disposed to be gloomy, if his temper could be judged by his manner. Mr. Evarts was late, and the proceedings were delayed for a quarter of an hour. When they were opened it was soon apparent that Mr. Beecher's direct examination had been virtually concluded the day before. A number of questions were asked him about matters in relation to which Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton had testified. By one series of questions and answers it appeared, according to Mr. Beecher, that Mr. Moulton had expressed anxiety that no mention should be made of the $5,000 given by Mr. Beecher for the benefit of The Golden Age, and had said that if mention were made of it he should deny having had it. Mr. Beecher denied that his card in the papers, calling on any person who had letters of his to publish them, was written at the suggestion of Mr. Moulton, and he affirmed that the original, which was intrusted to Mr. Moulton for publication, had been altered. Mr. Beecher, by another answer, intimated that Mr. Moulton had not produced in court all the letters which had been written to him by the defendant or intrusted to him. This was received by the plaintiff's counsel with indifference, as if little importance was attached to it. Mr. Beecher also explained, and Mr. Evarts insisted on his answer as material, that he had never read the Younger Dumas's novels, but had read in the Summer of 1874 the series of the Elder Dumas beginning with the "Three Guardsmen."

As has been his habit since Mr. Beecher has been on the stand, Mr. Evarts framed a climax; but as his final questions were repetitions of others asked at the beginning, and as the answers could be foreseen, the effect was rather tame. Mr. Evarts's art, however, was fully displayed even in this, for by his manner of putting the questions he secured their repetition in the hearing of the jury, which seemed to be his aim. The questions were those which were asked on the second day of his examination, as to whether Mr. Beecher had ever improperly solicited or obtained any improper favors from Mrs. Tilton, or committed adultery with her. After emphatic denials by Mr. Beecher, Mr. Evarts paused, as if to let the jury take it all in, and meantime glanced along the jury-box. Possibly he observed that the questions had been lost on one or more of the jury, for again turning to the witness he asked, as if preliminarily to another question, that THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question. The reporter began with the last, but Mr. Evarts insisted upon his going back again, and the whole series was again read to the jury. Then Mr. Evarts, in a more rapid manner than he had previously displayed, closed with a series of questions, the answers to which were denials of adultery at any time, denials of confessions of adultery or criminality, and denials of participation in conversations in which adultery was charged. "That is all," said Mr. Evarts, nodding to Mr. Beach and his colleagues, and the direct examination of Mr. Beecher, which had lasted 7½ days, was concluded.

MR. BEECHER UNDER CROSS-EXAMINATION.

There was just the slightest stir of interest to indicate the close of the friendly inquiry and the opening of the hostile dissection of the defendant. All eyes were, of course, turned upon Mr. Beecher, and there were signs of anxiety in some faces, and of interest in nearly all, to know what effect the change in his relations to the examiner would make in Mr. Beecher. It would be untrue to say that Mr. Beecher appeared as unmoved when the cross-examination began as he had under Mr. Evarts's "coaching," for, however confident he may have felt, the signs of nervousness were manifest. It may have been nothing more than the nervousness natural to a change of positions—to the knowledge that instead of being led to the development of all that was favorable to his view of the case, he was now to be drawn into expressions detrimental, into admissions which might be construed to his disadvantage, into explanations of the more compromising passages in his correspondence, and, if possible, into a vexed state of mind, which would leave him incompetent to hear correctly, analyze promptly, and answer truthfully the intricate questions which were to be leveled at him. Whatever may have been its extent or cause, the nervousness was evident at the beginning of the cross-examination, though little remained of it at the close when Mr. Beecher had had an opportunity to warm up in describing the scenes of December, 1870. It is more difficult to describe these indications of nervousness positively than negatively. There was no trembling of hands or fingers; Mr. Beecher once asked for his memorandum-book, and opened and held it without the slightest agitation or tremulousness; his bouquet was as tenderly handled as ever and as frequently carried to his nose. Frequent hesitation in answering, occasionally a guarded answer as if the witness suspected a hidden meaning in the question, a gloomy and reserved manner, these were the chief and most marked indications that Mr. Beecher dreaded, in some degree at least, an ordeal which he admitted was new to him. It did not continue long—at least not to the close of the examination—and when he had left the witness-chair at 4 o'clock he said jocosely that he did not feel that his "hide had been taken off," "though," he added, "there's no telling what will come to-morrow."

The cross-examination by Mr. Fullerton took a wide range, and for the first two hours was rather rambling and confusing to the audience if not to the witness. His first determined effort was an elaborate attempt to draw Mr. Beecher into an unqualified condemnation of Mr. Tilton's teachings as editor of The Independent, and an admission that, knowing that Mr. Tilton denied the divinity of Christ and was otherwise loose in his views on orthodox doctrines, and had indeed foreshadowed his views on marriage and divorce, the witness held him unfit to be the head of the paper. This was done with the intention, subsequently developed, of asking Mr. Beecher how he had come to place and sustain such a person at the head of a paper of which he was himself the nominal and responsible editor. But Mr. Beecher evaded the point by saying that he looked upon Mr. Tilton's as a crude mind passing through the state natural to all young reflective natures when traditional religious beliefs give way to personal beliefs. He did not think that Mr. Tilton was an unfit person to conduct such a paper as The Independent, which he described, in a dry, humorous way, as a secular, and "in some sense a religious paper." Mr. Fullerton passed to another topic.

First of all, he tried to commit Mr. Beecher to a positive statement as to when in 1871 Mrs. Beecher had left Brooklyn for the South. He could fix it no more definitely than "early in the year." The purpose of this was not seen until later in the day, when Mr. Fullerton read a letter from Mr. Beecher of Jan. 28, 1871, to Mrs. Morse, in which he spoke of Mrs. Beecher and himself still thinking a quiet course was wisest. The idea of Mr. Fullerton was doubtless to show that it was a false pretense that Mrs. Beecher was a party to the communication. But it was not shown that Mrs. Beecher had left Brooklyn for the South at this time.

A number of Mrs. Morse's letters were called up, and Mr. Beecher was asked to explain the meaning of certain passages in them, but he was unable to do so, saying if he had ever known their significance he had forgotten it. Rides and walks with Mrs. Tilton, visits at the house, the mode of salutation between minister and parishioner, and many minor matters of like import were made the subject of tediously minute inquiries. Mr. Fullerton then pierced the center of the case. He asked Mr. Beecher once more to narrate the incidents of Bessie Turner's visit to him, his conference with Mrs. Tilton, and his advice to her to separate from her husband, the visit of Mr. Bowen on Dec. 26, 1870, the threatening letter of Mr. Tilton, and the interview with Mr. Moulton which led up to the scene of Dec. 30, 1870, and the final accusation by Mr. Tilton. When he struck the first of these incidents Mr. Beecher's self-possession was fully restored, and he gave the scenes more in detail than he had done before, and with fewer interruptions. The descriptions differed in no material sense from those of the direct testimony, but there was not the same form of construction or a similarity in language which notably marked the repetitions of some of the other witnesses.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

GEN. BUTLER'S MESSENGER.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beecher was recalled, and his direct examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, this Mr. Henry A. Bowen that you have spoken of as having made some communication to you concerning Gen. Butler, which you had spoken of to Mr. Moulton—who is he; who is Mr. Henry A. Bowen? A. He is the oldest son of Mr. Edward Bowen, a member of my congregation.

Q. Was he a gentleman at any time connected with you in any way—Mr. Henry A. Bowen? A. No, Sir; I had known him since he was a boy, but he was in no way connected.

Q. And this communication that he volunteered to you is all that you know about what Mr. Butler had said? A. That is all; he was a messenger, and delivered his message.

MR. TILTON PLEASED WITH HIS WIFE'S STORY TO THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Mr. Beecher, I call your attention now to a statement by Mr. Moulton concerning an interview between yourself and him after Mrs. Tilton had given a statement before the Committee of Investigation. Mr. Moulton says:

I said to Mr. Beecher that after Mrs. Tilton had made her statement to the Committee Mr. Tilton was very much incensed, and that Mr. Tracy, in a subsequent interview with him—in an interview subsequent to Mrs. Tilton's report to the Committee, or statement to the Committee—had so presented to him the influence which her statement had had upon the Committee that it melted the anger all out of Theodore Tilton, and he was perfectly willing to make a statement to the Committee which should not contain the fact of adultery between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton.

Was anything said to you by Mr. Moulton at that interview, or at any interview, on this subject, that Mr. Tilton was willing to make a statement to the Committee which should not contain the fact of adultery between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; he did state to me the fore part of that conversation.

Q. Yes. I will get the conversation in a moment. Did he in any such conversation say to you that Mr. Tracy had said that it would not be hard to get from the Committee a report (unfavorable, it is true, to Mr. Beecher), on the ground of the offense, but which would really settle the whole business, and save all the parties concerned from dishonor in consequence of crime? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, will you be so good as to state that interview between yourself and Mr. Moulton, as you recall it? A. I do not remember the special circumstances under which it took place, Sir, nor where. I recollect Mr. Moulton saying to me that Mr. Tilton was wonderfully incensed that his wife should go down and make a statement before the Committee, but that after he saw Mr. Tracy, and found out what was the substance of her statement, he on the whole, seemed to be well pleased.

MR. MOULTON WANTS THE GIFT OF $5,000 KEPT SECRET.

Q. I call your attention now to a statement of Mr. Moulton of an interview with you, the circumstances of which will be sufficiently disposed of by my reading the statement itself. Mr. Moulton is asked:

"What did you communicate to Mr. Beecher?" and answers: "I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tracy wanted me to communicate the fact that I had received $5,000 from Mr. Beecher to give Mr. Tilton, in order to stop him from the publication of his statement. I said when Mr. Tracy wanted me to tell Mr. Tilton that, that that would be a serious embarrassment to me personally, in consequence of my having received that money, and I said to Mr. Beecher that I told Mr. Tracy that I was perfectly willing to be guided by him with sound advice—with any moral, good reason—with any good reason, and I would co-operate with him to induce Theodore Tilton not to publish his statement, but I would not, on any such ground as that, undertake to stop its publication. Mr. Tracy told me that that would cause me trouble if it was published"—

Though I believe this is not a statement of what he said to you.

Mr. Beach—Yes, it is.

Mr. Evarts—Do you think so? [Reading.]

Mr. Tracy told me that that would cause me trouble if it was published, and I told him if it caused me trouble, it must cost me trouble; that I had done no wrong, and I didn't fear any trouble that would come from that.

I don't know whether that clause is what he said to you, but I have read you the whole of it. Now, Mr. Beecher, do you remember a conversation had with Mr. Moulton in which this matter of the $5,000 was spoken of? A. I do.

Q. And how; please state how that occurred? A. I think it occurred, Sir, on that same Sabbath afternoon in which I returned from his house, but I will not be definitely certain about that time—in that neighborhood. He asked me suddenly, after we had been talking about one and another topic, whether I had mentioned that $5,000 to anybody, and I said to him I had, and he wanted to know who, and I mentioned. Well, he said that would not do any hurt there, but I must not mention that; that he should deny it; if anybody charged him with it, or stated it, that he should deny it.

Q. Did you tell him what you had said about it, and to whom? A. I did.

Q. What was it? A. What I had said about it!

Q. Yes; did you tell Mr. Moulton what you had said about it, and to whom you had stated? A. I did.

Q. What was it? A. I told him that I mentioned it to Oliver Johnson, and that I had mentioned it to Oliver Johnson because Mr. Johnson said that he had been visiting, as I understood it, at Mr. Curtis's in New-York, and heard censures upon my unwillingness to assist Mr. Tilton from time to time in his embarrassments and troubles, and I told him that it was not so—that I had always said, from the beginning, that I would do whatever would have any prospect—that is, within reasonable bounds—have any prospect of helping him in his difficulties, or out of them, and that I had recently advanced $5,000 on the representation that it would set The Golden Age quite afloat.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton in this conversation with you express himself as to what he felt about your having told that to anybody? A. He asked me with solicitous emphasis if I had; and when I told him who I had he said, well, that would do no harm; that he was content with that; I am not giving his words; I am conveying the substance of his statement to me.

Q. Now, Sir, in regard to this conversation about Mr. Tracy, what had passed between Mr. Tracy and Mr. Moulton about this $5,000 and his communicating it—and his (Mr. Tracy's) wishing that Mr. Moulton should communicate the facts about that $5,000 to Mr. Tilton; do you remember whether that formed a part of the conversation? A. Oh, no, Sir; it did not.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts, the reporters request that when you read a clause from the book you will take the trouble to give the page; they think it will facilitate.

MR. BEECHER'S CARD INVITING HIS ENEMIES TO THE FIELD.

Mr. Evarts—I have been reading from page 184 the last time, and from page 181 the former time—of the pamphlet. [To the witness.] Mr. Beecher, I call your attention to a card, "Brooklyn, June, 1873." There does not seem to be any other date to it—Exhibit No. 28. Just look at it and get the matter in your mind, and then I will ask you some questions about it. [Handing witness the exhibit.] This is on page 101. June 30 this publication seems to be. [To the witness.] Well, Sir, I call your attention to that card as it was prepared, and as it was published. Please state how that matter occurred. This is the card, if your Honor please, and the jury, in which Mr. Beecher says:

Application has been made to Mrs. Victoria Woodhull for certain letters of mine, supposed to contain certain information respecting certain infamous stories against me. . . . These and all letters of mine in the hands of any other persons, they have my cordial consent to publish.

Q. Now, please state, Mr. Beecher, how that matter came up. A. Well, it came up on a report, I think, in The Sun; I did not myself read it, but heard that there had been published in The Sun an account of a visit—

Q. The New York Sun? A. The New York Sun; yes, Sir; an account of a visit of Mr. Bowen, accompanied by Mr. Claflin, to Mrs. Woodhull, in search of certain documents supposed to be damnatory; and, upon seeing that, Mr. Cleveland dropped in a morning after—a morning or two—I have forgotten exactly how long—and suggested to me—

Mr. Beach—That is not proper.

Mr. Evarts—No, if it is objected to.

The Witness [continuing]—the subject matter of a card; I thought his suggestion, or general direction, to be wise; and I went right into the study at Mr. Beach's house and drew up, substantially, that card—

Mr. Beach—Whose house?

The Witness—Mr. Beach's. I was there.

By Mr. Evarts—Mr. Moses Beach? A. Mr. Moses B. Beach, 96 Columbia Heights.

Q. You drew this card? A. I drew this card, the substance of it, and after I drew it I read it to a friend, Mr. Ford, within a few—within half an hour after writing it, I think. I then took it down to Mr. Moulton. Mr. Moulton was delighted with it; he told me that he read it to several persons, and they spoke of it with pleasure, as being apt and sufficient, and so on. I left it in his hands then to be published, with discretionary power. He wrote to me after I left on Monday morning—I think it was published on Monday afternoon—he wrote to me on the publication of that—

Mr. Evarts—That letter is in evidence, is n't it?

Mr. Morris—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—No, the letter is not.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if it is a letter that is not in evidence you cannot refer to it. There is something about it—

The Witness—He repeated to me afterward the substance of what the letter contained; it was simply this, that if it was thought best that there should be a little prefatory matter put upon the card explaining the reason why there was something in it that I had not written.

Mr. Evarts—Well—

Mr. Beach—Oh, there is no objection to it.

Mr. Evarts—I understand you, then, that this card originated with yourself, and was carried by you to Mr. Moulton, and did not originate with him? A. It originated with me, and was carried to him, and then I left it with him to make in it unimportant changes—anything that would not invalidate the substance of the card.

Q. Mr. Moulton has said that he called attention to this publication about Mr. Bowen and Mr. Claflin going to Mrs. Woodhull, and that he saw you about it, and he says that he said to you, "I think, Mr. Beecher, we can make very short work of such business; I think and you think that Bowen has not any evidence in his possession against you, and we had better publish a card in The Eagle calling upon anybody with any papers or evidence against you to produce them; and Mr. Beecher prepared a card?" A. No, Sir; he is mistaken about that Sir. The suggestion of it came from Mr. Cleveland, and I carried it to Mr. Moulton.

Q. The first introduction of the matter between you and him was your showing him the card you had prepared? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, some alterations were made, which are apparent in the publication as actually produced and the card as originally prepared. Mr. Moulton says in respect of that:

I saw Mr. Beecher subsequently, and he said he approved of the alterations, and thanked me for my kind offices in the matter, and Mr. Beecher said to me furthermore, "Of course Mr. Tilton will not produce any documents." "Well," I said, "of course he won't; he has not got any that I know of, original documents, to produce, and of course I won't."

Did you ask any such question or receive any such answer? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did anything of the kind occur? A. No, Sir.

STOPPING UP THE CHINKS IN THE DIRECT.

Q. Mr. Beecher you have spoken heretofore of your having received, I think, three letters from Mrs. Woodhull; do you remember now having received another letter? A. I do.

Q. When was that? A. I don't know; it preceded another meeting at Steinway Hall. I received a letter from Mrs. Woodhull inclosing one, I think, from my sister, Mrs. Isabella Hooker, and it was that they were—

Mr. Beach—One moment. Produce the letter.

Mr. Evarts—We have got the letter here.

Mr. Beach—You had better produce it, then.

Mr. Evarts—He has spoken about letters before in a general way, and you did not require that they should be produced.

Mr. Beach—We had learned of the others.

Mr. Evarts—Please find that, Mr. Shearman. [After a search.] That letter is not in court, but I will show it to you afterwards; if you want it produced we will produce it. [To the witness.] Are you able to state the time of that letter? A. No, Sir, I could easily ascertain it, but I have not had my attention called to it so as to inform myself about it.

Q. Was it in reference to a public meeting at Steinway Hall? A. It was.

Q. Of what? A. It was with reference to a meeting in Steinway Hall—

Mr. Fullerton—The letter will speak for itself.

The Witness [Continuing.]—For woman's suffrage.

Q. Of what society? A. It was what we should call now the New-York wing of the suffrage movement, and woman suffrage movement.

Mr. Beach [To Mr. Fullerton.—Haven't we got a copy of that letter?

Mr. Fullerton—No, it is the reply.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton says in the course of some testimony about the letter to a complaining friend and another brief letter to a friend at the West—in that relation, or as part of his statement concerning that, he uses the expression to which I now ask your attention. He says: "I will also say that during that month of December I prepared another statement, a long document, which has become technically styled, I don't know why, the 'True Story,' for it was not a true story, it was a false one," and then he says: "Mr. Beecher said he could not bear the publication of that, that it would kill him." Now, Sir, did you ever use an expression to Mr. Tilton that the publication of the "True Story" would kill you? A. I think not, Sir. I did tell him that I would not bear it.

Q. That you have stated. A. It was not that I could not bear it, but that I would not bear it.

Q. You used no such expression, then? A. No, Sir; not in any such sense as it is there.

Q. I ask your attention now to a statement of Mr. Moulton in reference to the period after the publication of the "Tripartite Agreement," and a proposed or threatened letter of Mr. Tilton in reference to that publication. You remember that situation and that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Moulton says that at that interview you used this expression, that "if Theodore Tilton published that letter it would simply be his [Mr. Beecher's] death." He was asked, "whose death?" and he answered, "Mr. Beecher's death." Now, did you say that to Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; I said to Mr. Moulton in regard to that whole matter, that the publication of that card, as I understood its contents, would be—that it would be a publication that no man, if it were made and believed, could stand up under—no clergyman; and that if he made that publication, it should be the end; that I would not stand it; that I would fight it.

Q. Then Mr. Moulton speaks about your showing him the draft of the resignation that you had prepared, and says he said to you "that that would not do at all; that that was a virtual confession of the crime, and that it was an act of cowardice on his (your) part to do it." Did he use any such language as that to you? A. No, Sir. He dissuaded me from publishing that card—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. The question is answered.

Mr. Evarts—What did he say in any connection with dissuading you from the publication of that card? A. [Continuing.] As unnecessary; that the matter could be arranged, that by or through his influence with Mr. Tilton, and his restraining him, the matter need not come to such a crisis.

Q. Of your resignation? A. Of the presentation of that resignation or an equivalent.

Q. Mr. Moulton states an interview of this kind: he says that in this same connection of the resignation he had an interview with Mr. Tilton, and that he reported the substance of it to you, and he says, in answer to the question, "What did you say to him?" "I said Mr. Tilton strongly objected to the publication of the resignation, on the ground that it was a clear statement, in his opinion, of the shame of his wife;" and he says that you replied—no, he says he does not remember your reply, but that he said further, "Clearly that is the case, Sir; clearly, if the resignation should be published, it would be a virtual confession of the fact of your relations with Mrs. Tilton, and it ought not to be done." Did any such thing occur? A. No, Sir; that is, neither he nor I uttered any such words as that in my presence.

Q. Then he says further: "I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton was quite violent; Mr. Tilton said that he would shoot Mr. Beecher if he did it; I think that I mentioned that to Mr. Beecher; that is what Mr. Tilton told me, at all events." Did Mr. Moulton communicate that to you? A. I think he did not, and I know he did not.

Q. You never had any such threat as that communicated to you? A. Oh no, Sir; I had never any such warning.

Q. Please look at this letter, and see if it is the letter of Mrs. Woodhull that you referred to in your testimony this morning. A. Yes, Sir, I should think this is the letter; this is the contents of it; I am not familiar enough with her handwriting to say this is her handwriting.

Mr. Evarts—I will read this letter. [Reading.]

NO. 44 BROAD-ST., NEW-YORK, Feb. 7, 1872.

REV. H. W. BEECHER: From the inclosed letter you will perceive that Mrs. Hooker requests me to secure Steinway Hall for our May convention. I saw Mr. Steinway, who objects to letting our association have the hall, but will do so upon your recommendation, which, of course, you cannot object to giving, since it is for a cause in which many of your friends are engaged. Will you be kind enough to send me what you feel is right in the matter by the return mail, and very much oblige yours, sincerely, VICTORIA C. WOODHULL.

Have you any knowledge or recollection of any other letters than have now been referred to by you? A. I have not, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, Mr. Moulton has produced here in evidence various letters that you wrote to him during the course of these years of your association with him; did you write other letters than those that have been produced? A. Yes, Sir, I did.

Q. I now call your attention to a statement of Mr. Moulton's. Mr. Moulton mentions an occasion on which you and he being talking, Mr. Jeremiah P. Robinson came along, and in reference to that interview he is asked to state whether Mr. Beecher knew from him at that time that Mr. Robinson had been put in possession of these secrets, and Mr. Moulton says I told him that I had told both Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Robinson. Had you ever heard from Mr. Moulton that he had told them? A. He never told me any such thing about either of them. I had no knowledge in regard to either of them.

Q. Then he is asked, "What did you tell Mr. Beecher you had told Mr. Robinson," and he answered, "I told him that I had told him the fact concerning the relation between Elizabeth Tilton and himself." What did you tell him you had told Mr. Woodruff? A. The same.

Q. Had Mr. Moulton informed you before that time or at any time that he had told either of his partners? A. Neither before that time, nor at that time, nor at any time after.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, I call your attention to a statement of Mr. Moulton's of this kind:

I remember, Sir, having said to Mr. Beecher that I had been questioned by Mr. Baxter on the subject, and by others, whose names I don't now recollect, and that I had undertaken to mislead them by stating to them in the first place that if the story was true, it was infamous, and if it was false, it was diabolical; that if his life was not an answer to it, I didn't choose to make any, and that I didn't think it was necessary; but that being pressed close, I had denied the truth of the criminal intercourse with Mrs. Tilton, and said he was a pure man.

Then Mr. Moulton says, that in answer to that you thanked him—you said you thanked him for doing that, and you said there was only one way, since lying was necessary, and that was to lie sublimely. Did anything of that kind occur? A. I must dispute the parentage of that phrase, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything of that kind? A. I did not say anything of that kind. I never used that phrase at all, nor did I ever thank him for the special service which he alleged he rendered to me through Mr. Baxter. He did state to me that he had seen Mr. Baxter, and that he had told him that if my life of 25 or 30 years was not an answer to the Woodhull scandal, then character was good for nothing.

Q. Did you, in that conversation, or in any conversation, receive from him a statement that he had lied for you; and did you, in reference to any such statement, or in any manner, thank him for lying for you? A. No, Sir; I never did; nor did he ever say it, to give me an opportunity to do so.

Q. Did he ever say or intimate to you that in the statements of exoneration of you, which he had made to others, he had spoken falsely? A. No, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher, something was said by Mr. Redpath about his finding you reading a novel of Dumas's. A. It is a fact.

Q. Which of the Dumas, the elder or the younger?

Mr. Fullerton—Is that material?

The Witness—Dumas, the father; the old one.

Mr. Evarts—There is a very great difference between them.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; in age.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; and in the character of their novels.

The Witness—I have never read anything of the younger Dumas.

Mr. Evarts—Do you know what novel of the elder Dumas this was that you were reading? A. I only know that that Summer I read the "Three Musketeers—" is it? or the "Three Guardsmen;" the "Count of Braganza"—isn't there something—?

Q. Well, you may state. A. There are three stories, connected in a series.

Q. Well, one of them is what?

Mr. Beach—One of them is "Twenty Years After."

The Witness—One is "Twenty Years After."

Mr. Evarts—One is the "Three Musketeers," and one "The Three Guardsmen," is it not?

Mr. Fullerton [virtuously]—I don't know; I have never read them. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—I think he has given them correctly. I have read them more than once.

The Witness—I have read them; I have also read "Monte Cristo."

Mr. Evarts—Well, it was one of those novels that you were reading? A. Yes, Sir; it was one of those novels.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not prepared to cross-examine in regard to this. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Oh, you can read up; you can read up.

Q. Mr. Beecher, in the early stage of this examination, when I had brought the matter down to December, 1870, in your relations with the various parties who figure in this matter, I inquired of you whether there had been any improper relations between Mrs. Tilton and yourself, in various forms of question; I now have to ask you whether since the 1st of December, 1870, and until the commencement of this suit, there have been any improper relations between Mrs. Tilton and yourself? A. None at all, Sir.

Q. Have you asked from her any improper favors? A. None whatever.

Q. Or received any from her? A. None whatever.

Q. Have you had any sexual intercourse, or carnal intercourse, with her since the period I name until now? A. No, Sir.

[A pause.]

Mr. Evarts [To The Tribune stenographer]—Will you be so good as to read my last question,—I don't want to leave any gap!

The Tribune stenographer read the question as follows:

Have you had any sexual intercourse or carnal intercourse with her since the period I name until now?

Mr. Evarts—Read what I stated before that.

The Tribune stenographer read the four questions and answers, as follows:

Q. Mr. Beecher, in the early stage of this examination, when I had brought the matter down to December, 1870, in your relations with the various parties who figure in this matter, I inquired of you whether there had been any improper relations between Mrs. Tilton and yourself, in various forms of question; I now have to ask you whether since the 1st of December, 1870, and until the commencement of this suit, there have been any improper relations between Mrs. Tilton and yourself? A. None at all, Sir.

Q. Have you asked from her any improper favors? A. None whatever.

Q. Or received any from her? A. None whatever.

Q. Have you had any sexual intercourse, or carnal intercourse, with her since the period I name until now? A. No, Sir.

Q. I will now ask you, Mr. Beecher, whether, from your first acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton until the present time, you have ever had any improper relations with her, received any favors from her unsuitable for a woman to grant, asked any such favors from her, or ever had any sexual connection with her? A. No, Sir, I never have. There has been nothing between her and me answering to any of those questions.

Q. Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton was asked this general question at the close of his direct examination:

Now, I want to ask you this general question, whether from first to last Mr. Beecher ever denied the criminal intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? He answered, "No, Sir."

I ask you, in connection with that question and that answer, whether Mr. Tilton ever used to you, or in your presence, any language of accusation, or imputation, or of intimation, that there had ever been criminal intercourse between yourself and Mrs. Tilton? A. Never did.

Q. Now, the answer proceeds with this statement—the answer of Mr. Tilton [after a pause], as it is stated here:

I would like to amend that answer, Mr. Fullerton, by saying that whenever he spoke of it he always said that the criminality attached to him alone, and not to Mrs. Tilton; always insisted that she was not to blame; he was the person on whom the condemnation should fall.

Did you ever make any statement of that kind or effect in connection with any accusation, imputation, or intimation of criminal intercourse between yourself and Mrs. Tilton, or in any answer you made to any such accusation, imputation, or intimation? No, I never did, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Moulton was asked at the close of his direct examination:

There is but one other question, Mr. Moulton, and it is this: In any of the conversations to which your attention has been called on your cross-examination by the other side, with Mr. Beecher, or to which your attention was directed upon direct examination, did Mr. Beecher ever deny to you his sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? A. Never.

Now, Sir, did Mr. Moulton in all his intercourse with you, in any of his conversations with you upon the subject of your relations with Mrs. Tilton, or any of the subjects connected therewith that formed the topics of conversation between you at any time, make any accusation, or imputation, or intimation of sexual intercourse between yourself and Mrs. Tilton? A. He never did, Sir.
