Q. Never mind; when I ask you not to state a fact, don't persist in it. Go on. A. Then the next after that that I recall was my remark that those regulations really were very useful; that they had been devised when the factory system first started in Waltham, and had been transferred from Waltham to Lowell, and from Lowell to Lawrence, and most of the other places except Fall River; and that the result was that the standard of morality was generally considered higher in those cities where this system of factory police existed than in Fall River where there was no such system, and thereupon she said: "Well," says she, "this is all a part of the same system of treating women as inferiors—as inferior to men;" and I remarked that morality—the morality—the virtue of the mass of the people depended more upon exemption from temptation than upon any innate virtue of their own, and that those regulations did protect them, protected their morality, inasmuch as it exempted them in a great measure from temptations; and she said that really the only true way was to treat women and men just alike; to let them learn habits of self-dependence and self-reliance—to take care of themselves; they would tumble sometimes, so would men; but they would learn by experience to take care of themselves; and Mr. Tilton joined in that and made the remark—

Q. No; what did he say? A. He said—that is all he said, "It is all a part—it is all a part of the same system; women are treated as inferiors."

Q. Was that all the conversation in regard to Lowell? A. I don't recollect at this moment any more of it. I think that Gen. Butler was mentioned in that conversation—a resident of Lowell—and his identification with the corporations of Lowell.

Q. Well, anything further you recollect, in regard to the conversation concerning Lowell or its factories or regulations please state it now. A. I don't recollect at this moment except I know there was more.

Q. Yes; but you don't recollect it. A. I don't recollect it.

Q. And you have given all that you recollect in regard to it? upon this cross-examination. A. I think I have; I don't know that—I may have omitted—

Q. Do you recollect of a remark being made by Mr. Tilton in the course of that conversation, that those same regulations ought to be equally applied to boys as to female children? A. No; I do not.

Q. What? A. I do not.

Q. You say a remark was made by Mrs. Woodhull that the male children should receive the same treatment as the female children? A. She wasn't speaking of children, but of adults; these regulations applied to adults.

Q. You say she didn't make the remark in connection with those factory regulations? A. Yes; but the remark had relation to adult operatives, but not children.

Q. The regulations had? A. The regulations had.

Q. Well, was the remark made that those same regulations ought to be applied equally to males and females, that no distinction should be made? A. I don't remember that it was—still—so many things have—

Q. Didn't you state, a moment ago, that Mrs. Woodhull advanced that opinion? A. No; not that the regulations should apply.

Q. You didn't? A. Not that the regulations should apply; but that males and females should all be treated alike; there should be one uniform rule: they should be all taught habits of—

Q. Wasn't that while you were discussing these regulations? A. It was in connection with the regulations.

Mr. Beach—Yes; very well; that is all upon this subject. I can proceed if you wish.

The Court here took a recess until a quarter past two o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and the cross-examination of Charles Cowley was resumed.

THE LOWELL REGULATIONS DISCUSSED.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Cowley, what was the regulation of the factories in Lowell, about which this conversation took place? A. The principal regulation was that relating to the hours—the hours, at least, in the evening, after which boarding-houses were closed, and prior to which the boarders in the houses must be in their homes.

Q. Well, what was the hour? A. Nine o'clock; the boarders—the houses to be locked, the doors closed, and no one admitted after ten.

Q. All persons were to be in at nine o'clock? A. The regulation required them to be there, and required the boarding-house keeper to lock the doors at ten. That is what I understood the regulation was.

Q. Did you understand that regulation to apply to males as well as females? A. They don't have males in the boarding-houses.

Q. Then there were only females—the factory employes in these boarding-houses? A. What?

Q. It was a restriction upon females? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was there any qualification to this regulation? A. I don't know that there was.

Q. Don't know that there was. Was there any penalty attached to a violation of the regulation? A. No, except this, that if the—if such an occurrence was repeated several times they would be discharged from the corporation and from the boarding-houses.

Q. A violation of the regulation, then, was attended with a loss of service? A. A single violation was attended with no other consequence, as far as I am aware, than that they had to find other quarters for that night, and if the violations were repeated—

Q. It resulted in a discharge? A. It resulted in a discharge; yes, Sir.

Q. Do you not recollect that, in the course of that conversation, the injustice of such a regulation as applied to female and not applied to male operatives was spoken of? A. I don't remember anything—I think that that was the subject of the criticism, but I do not remember any particular remark bearing upon that.

Q. Oh! I don't suppose that language was used, Sir; but was not that an object of remark and censure? A. That was the grievance; certainly.

Q. What was the next topic of conversation in which Mr. Tilton participated, that you now recollect? A. The next that I now recollect was the discourse which the gentleman gave there, and which Mr. Tilton reported phonographically. I would not say that there were no others, but I do not now recall anything between those two.

Q. At that portion of the conversation did you yourself, Mrs. Woodhull and Tilton occupy the same positions you have given them in the preceding remarks? A. Well, I have given two positions.

Q. Well? A. Which one do you refer to? I can tell the positions.

Q. Either of them. Well, tell me what the positions were. A. The first one, the same that we occupied when we were discussing Lowell and its institutions. As near as I can remember, that was the position.

THE MEDIUM AND HIS WORDS.

Q. You do not recollect the gentleman who acted as medium on that occasion? A. I do not remember his name now; no, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect anything that he said? A. Anything in his discourse?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. No; there was nothing definite.

Q. Well, how long was the revelation? A. He must have occupied fifteen minutes or more in the mediumistic address.

Q. And can't you give me the phrase which he used in any part of it? A. I don't think I could give you a single one. I remember some of the comments that were made on it afterwards, and the subject of it.

Q. Well, I will get at those. Well, what was the subject of it? A. The subject of it was—it was a rhapsodical—

Q. Oh, I don't ask that; I ask you what the subject of it was? A. It was the condition of disembodied spirits.

Q. The subject of it was the condition of disembodied spirits? A. Yes, Sir, and the communications—

Q. Well, I will get at that in a moment. A. Well, this is a part of the answer to the question.

Q. Well. A. The communication between disembodied and embodied souls.

Q. Can you relate to me the substance of anything this medium said? A. I could not; it was very much wanting in substance.

Q. I didn't ask you that, and don't you know that that is not responsive to my question? A. I did answer more than your question asked, I see.

Q. Yes. Well, be good enough not to repeat it. Well, there was an idea about it, wasn't there? A. I don't remember whether there was or not.

Q. You don't remember whether there was or not? A. No, Sir; there was a very great mist about it.

Q. What? A. There was a very great mist about it.

Q. Well, that I don't ask you for; I asked you if there was any idea in it? A. There may have been, for aught I know, but I don't recollect anything that took hold of my mind or memory at the time, or now.

Q. Well, you didn't recollect that there was any thought expressed by the revelation? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, I understood you to say that there was some poetical or flowery language? A. Yes, Sir; there was.

Q. And I understood you to say some well-turned sentence? A. Some very handsomely turned sentences.

Q. Handsomely turned sentences. Well, then, it was not a mere jumble of words? A. Jingle, I said.

Q. Well, was it a mere jingle of words? A. That is all that it occurred to me as being.

Q. What? A. That is all that I considered it as being.

Q. You did not consider that any idea, or thought, or sentiment, during that address, was communicated by the language which the speaker used, did you? A. Well, I don't know as I would go so far as that.

Q. You don't go so far as that? A. No.

Q. Well, then, do you think that there was some idea, or thought, or principle, expressed? A. Well, I don't know that I am prepared to say that either. My recollection of it—

Q. You have answered my question? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you willing to say as a witness that that flowery and poetical language, of which you speak, and those well turned sentences, did not communicate any idea or thought or principle? A. I don't mean that there was a vacuity—perfect vacuity—but there was no argument developed.

Q. I didn't ask you about argument; I asked you if there was a thought, an idea. A. Well, there was no body of thought in it.

Q. Well, I didn't ask you about a body of thought.

Mr. Evans—He is answering you.

The Witness—It was a sentimental—

Q. I didn't ask you that. A. Well, I can't better answer your question than I do.

Q. But you don't recollect a single idea that was contained in it. A. I do not—not a single one.

Q. Nor a single expression? A. No. I do not, that I could identify as being used there.

Q. Well, Sir, you may relate the conversation which occurred at this period of the intercourse? A. I will relate such fragments as my memory retains of it. I remember that after he got through and sat down, that Mr. Tilton noticed some parts of it—turned back over the pages and read from his phonographic notes some passages, and what those were I could not recall, any more than I could the rest of the discourse, now; and he made the remark that if this had been published as a discourse or an essay, that it would attract great admiration. He made some remarks in addition to that, but they have gone from my memory; and others made some remarks, and Mrs. Woodhall turned to me and asked me what I thought of it, and some expression of my countenance led her to make the remark—

Q. Oh, you don't know about that? A. Yes; it is a matter of observation.

Q. No. A. Well, she made the remark—

Q. I didn't want to get the expression of your countenance; I wanted to get what was said? A. Well, she made the remark that I might speak with perfect freedom; she said, "for he does not know—he is entirely unconscious of anything that he has been saying while he was in this state;" and then I made the remark that I mentioned this morning.

Q. Well, you may mention it again. A. I will—that I didn't see anything particular in it, beyond some very finely rounded periods, and a combination of mellow and musical words, which made some very jingling sentences, but that there was no argument conveyed; that there was no body of thought presented; there was nothing new contributed; and I remember I made this remark. Said I: "What advantage is it in having intercourse with a disembodied spirit unless we get something that an embodied spirit does not present; if we get nothing new, if there is no new contribution to our stock of ideas?" And I had not gone any further than that when I observed, as I thought, that my criticisms were not altogether palatable to the medium, and I desisted.

Q. What did you observe? A. Simply an expression of his countenance, which I thought indicated that my words were not flattering.

Q. Can't you give us a description of that expression? A. No, I could not, any more than I could describe a dew drop.

Q. Well, we can give some little description of that. A. Well, I can't; all dew drops are alike to me.

Q. Well, what else was said? A. I don't now recall anything said in that connection.

Q. What was the next topic of conversation? A. There may have been other remarks made, but I don't recollect anything. Well, that is more than I can tell you, what the next topic was that was talked of. There were various topics introduced and discussed and dropped, and the conversation passed to other things.

AN IMAGINED REVOLUTION IN JOURNALISM.

Q. The next that you recollect? A. The next that I recollect is the one that I mentioned this morning, the relation to the pneumatic tube, in which Mr. Brisbane led off and he mentioned that he had presented a paper, or prepared a paper, sometime, which demonstrated the entire practicability of a pneumatic tube between Washington and New York for the transmission of letters, packages and persons. I could not relate all that he said. I remember that, and he made some other remarks on that subject.

Q. Well, all that you remember I want to get. A. Well, that led—whether I was the first one that introduced the question of its effect on journalism, or Mr. Tilton, I do not now remember, but Mr. Tilton and I together spoke of the effect which the introduction of such a contrivance would have upon journalism, and Mr. Tilton made the remark that it would substantially destroy all the press, except the metropolitan press. If THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE could be packed in a bundle and sent to Worcester or to Boston, it would interfere seriously, and probably ultimately change the entire character of Boston journalism and of local journalism everywhere outside of the metropolis. There were some further remarks in that line, and that is about the whole of what is lodged in my memory.

MR. BEECHER AND THE "SOCIAL REVOLUTION."

Q. Well, during that portion of the conversation were the three parties, yourself, Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull, occupying the same positions that you have described? A. No, I was sitting very near to Mr. Tilton then, and Mrs. Woodhull—I don't remember where she was. She was moving about and changing her position from time to time. I was sitting very near to Mr. Tilton at that time, and my—

Q. Well, that is all that is important, Sir. Now, what was the next topic of conversation you recollect? A. I do not remember now, at this moment, any other except—until it came to the question of—the matter of the social revolution which she said was impending.

Q. Now, what was the position of these three parties at that time? A. At that time Mr. Tilton sat on the lounge or sofa.

Q. The lounge at the same point? A. Yes, Sir, and Mrs. Woodhull sat on one side of the little stand that I spoke of and I sat upon the other.

Q. Pretty much in the order of the first conversation? A. No, I was on a different—I was at the end of the table when the first conversation took place, and she was on the side where I sat when this conversation about the social revolution took place.

Q. Did she sit between you at the time of the social revolution discussion—did she sit between you and Mr. Tilton? A. No, neither was between.

Q. You were at opposite ends of the table? A. On opposite sides of the table, and both fronting towards Mr. Tilton.

Q. And both fronting towards Mr. Tilton: and about how far distant from him? A. It could not have been more than five or six feet at the outside.

Q. Was any one at that time sitting with him upon the sofa? A. I think not.

Q. Well, is your recollection so accurate that you can swear that there was not? A. No, Sir; I would not. I think that Mrs. Middlebrook sat in a chair at about the end.

Q. At the end occupied by Mr. Tilton? A. No; the other end.

Q. And where were the other guests? A. In different parts of the room. Some had gone. A good many did not stay but a few minutes, paying their respects to Mrs. Woodhull, and leaving.

Q. Was there conversation among the other guests while this discussion about the social revolution was going on? A. I think there was. I think that Mr. Brisbane and another gentleman were there, pretty near to where Mrs. Middlebrook sat; that is my impression. Mr. Andrews was there in the course of the evening, but whether he was there at the time or not—

Q. Well, at this particular point, if you please. A. Well, I am coming to that. I don't remember where Mr. Andrews was at that time.

Q. Do you remember what other conversation was going on among the other guests at the time of this one to which you allude? A. I do not.

Q. Do you remember whether Mr. Tilton participated in any conversation with any of the others? A. Occasionally; as he was appealed to or referred to.

Q. That is, during this conversation as to the social revolution? A. Yes, Sir, and references were made to Mrs. Woodhull also.

Q. Now, will you repeat that conversation? A. The first that I remember was the remark from Mrs. Woodhull that she did not know whether I realized it or not, but we were on the eve of one of the greatest revolutions that society had ever experienced. This whole subject, she said, of the marriage relation—that was where she struck to start with—the whole subject of the marriage relation was to undergo a complete revolution. She used the word "evolution" a part of the time, and part of the time "revolution." And she said that some of the best minds in this country were enlisted in it. She spoke in that connection of—I don't think I mentioned this this morning, of Woman's Suffrage, and of Gen. Butler's labors for it, or of being friendly to it, and of Mr. Sumner's being friendly to it. I think that did not occur to me this morning. I remember that she spoke of that, and also especially of Mr. Beecher. She said that Mr. Beecher was coming out, and going to be the champion of this movement. I told her that I did not think that was so; that I thought that, in the present condition of society, that a man of eloquence and genius like Mr. Beecher might found a new sect and reconstitute the institution of marriage as it had been done by others. I don't think I mentioned that this morning; I remember that I alluded to that, and to the great disparity between the number of women and the number of males in the United States, caused by the war and other causes. I think that I referred also at that time, in my conversation with her, to the great readiness with which the women of Eastern countries received Mohammedanism in lieu of Christianity. She said this was coming; she could see it; she could realize it, and she mentioned Mr. Tilton as being a great acquisition to the cause, and Mr. Beecher was coming in, she said, to champion it.

Q. Proceed, Sir. A. Shall I go right along, there?

Q. Upon the subject of this social revolution. A. Well, that led to my expressing the views which I reported this morning, that I had a general idea of what her system was, and said I—I remember putting this question—says I: "What do you propose to do when marriage is broken—make it dissoluble, make marriage a matter of contract, made by contract, to be dissolved by contract, at the will of the individuals—how do you propose to take care of the children?" Why, she said, have public institutions, have them provided for, as the Communists of Paris do, perhaps, and save women from the degradation and the domestic slavery in which they were now involved, each woman having a house to take care of, all this drudgery to do; having labor saved, time saved, and the children brought up in public institutions. I told her that that had been tried and society had lived under it and developed some very fine traits. "But," said I, "we have generally the opinion that Spartan society was characterized by such ferocity and savageness that it is not worth while to go back to it, and that our superiority is due largely to these domestic institutions that we have." And she said society would be a great deal better off if these relations were left to be shaped—to be regulated by the individuals themselves; and she again—she continually referred to Mr. Tilton in that connection.

Q. Oh! I don't want that. I want you to state the order of the conversation as near as you can recollect it, and what was said? A. I give you the fragments as they occur to me.

Q. Very well, I want you to give me the fragments, and not give a general statement? A. I wish to state distinctly that I cannot undertake to detail the conversation just as it occurred.

Q. Well, you have stated that a number of times, and I understand it. I only want you to give me your recollection of the conversation as near as you can give it? A. Well, I will go on and do that. The next part that occurs to my memory now was where she spoke of Mr. Beecher's position. She referred to that continually.

Q. I don't want that declaration, that she referred to that or to anything continually. I am asking you, Sir, as a lawyer, and a witness, to give me the best of your recollection of what was said. A. Well, it is so exceedingly difficult to do that in that precise way, to even detach my own recollections from my impressions and the comments.

Q. What? A. I say it is so extremely difficult to detach my recollections of particular things said from the impression—the general impression which the conversation produced upon my mind.

Q. Yes, well I don't want the general impression produced upon your mind? A. Well, I know you don't, and that is the very great embarrassment of giving the fragments of the conversation.

Q. No, it is not very difficult to give what you recollect? A. Well, it is somewhat so.

Q. I don't see it. A. I do.

Q. Very well; I am sorry for you. A. Well, I will go on, and give you the best I can.

MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON DECLARED FREE-LOVERS.

Q. That is all I ask you? A. I told her I didn't believe that Mr. Beecher would do anything of the kind, and she said he would have to; says she, "He will have to do it, he will have to do this; he accepts our principles; it is known, and he privately acknowledges himself as a believer in the great principle of social freedom, and it is only a matter of cowardice—it is only a matter of cowardice, and the fear of public opinion." "Well," says I, "I don't believe you will ever find him doing that. A man at his time of life ain't likely to take a new departure," I said, "of that kind." And she said, "Well, Mr. Beecher has adopted our principles, and has proclaimed them in private circles, and has practiced upon them, and he has got to come out and champion the movement, or his hypocrisy has got to be exposed, and he cannot maintain himself;" and then she spoke of her relations with Tilton—Mrs. Tilton; she said that for a long time Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton had been—had adopted this doctrine of free love.

Q. Had what? A. Had adopted the doctrine of free love, or "the principles of social freedom," I think was the expression she mostly used, but frequently used the other.

Q. Which expression did she use in speaking of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. She used the expression mostly, "The principles of social freedom;" that was her general mode of characterizing her principles, but sometimes "the doctrines of free love."

Q. I don't ask you now "sometimes;" I want you to go on and complete the conversation? A. I answered your question directly.

Q. Well, you was going beyond the question, therefore I stopped you. A. Well, I will stop.

Q. Proceed with the conversation. A. Well, I thought I had answered.

Q. Sir? A. I thought you said I had gone beyond the question.

Q. Well, that particular question. I asked you the question, what particular phrase she used when speaking of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; you want me to go on with the general narrative.

Q. Yes, Sir; the general narrative. A. Well, she said that Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher had been living in the relation of husband and wife, to all practical purposes, for a long time; and that Mrs. Tilton, since she had embraced these principles of social freedom had expressed—had confessed her practice, and her regret at the hypocrisy of concealment from Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, then, will you allow me to interrupt you here, Sir? A. Certainly.

Q. To ask you the question why, upon your direct examination, you said that the remark of Mrs. Woodhull was that Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton had been long enamored of each other?

A. She used that expression.

Q. Now, you say that her remark was that they had lived as husband and wife? A. She used that expression.

Q. Well, why didn't you give the expression, on your direct examination, of husband and wife? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Could not tell me? Well, go on. A. I suppose that it did not occur to me. Matters occur to me at one time that do not at every other time.

Q. Therefore your testimony is uncertain? A. No, Sir, it is not. I state distinctly that I do not exhaust the conversation. I cannot; I am unable to.

Q. Now, will you begin again with the portion of the conversation which related to Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, and repeat it. A. She said that Mr. Beecher had accepted these principles. That she said first independent of Mrs. Tilton, and then afterwards in speaking of Mrs. Tilton she mentioned Mr. Beecher again in connection with her as one who accepted the principles of social freedom, and who had practiced upon them; and she said that Mrs. Tilton, being unwilling to practice the hypocrisy upon her husband which she had been practicing, had written a letter confessing that she loved Mr. Beecher more than any other man that she ever knew, and more than Mr. Tilton; and she said that Mr. Beecher had got that letter, and that a friend of Mr. Tilton had got it from him; and there I made the remark, says I, "Mrs. Tilton is still living, isn't she?" I have skipped one matter. She spoke of its being got at the point of a pistol. That is what led to my remark; says I: "Mrs. Tilton is still living. That don't look probable at all. If you put your logic to work on it you will see that that story cannot be true." She said that that was what she understood from Mr. Tilton, and I said: "If Mrs. Tilton is living she could write another letter, and she could refer to the fact that the first letter had been cabbaged from Mr. Beecher and put out of the way," and she said that perhaps—either perhaps or probably—I don't recollect the precise word—perhaps Mrs. Tilton would not write another letter; that at the time that this was written it had some connection with some business dispute in which Mr. Tilton was involved.

Q. Now, Sir, so far, in the last repetition of this conversation which you have given, you have not repeated the remark which you had previously made, that Mrs. Woodhull said that Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton were living as husband and wife. A. She said that.

Q. Now, will you please begin the portion of the conversation which related to Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, and give it to me as near as you can as it occurred. A. It was right in connection.

Q. I don't want that now, Sir. I ask you to begin again and let us have it? A. I could not swear to the remark that first preceded that, nor to the remark last but one preceding that, nor to the remark next but one following that.

Q. No? A. I cannot do that; my memory does not serve me in that way.

Q. That is, you cannot give the narrative in substantially the same form twice following? A. I don't know that I could.

Q. You don't know that you could? Well, go on. A. You can see whether I can or not. I give such fragments as occur to me—such parts of it.

Q. Go on now and gather up the fragments. A. Well, I don't remember at this moment anything more in connection with Mr. Beecher that was said.

Q. Well, do you recollect anything more of this discussion in regard—or conversation in regard to this social revolution? A. Oh! yes; I remember she went on—

Q. Well, let us get it all. A. She said that the whole system of treating women, and of dealing with women, was false, that it started on the fundamental error that woman was inferior to man, and she has such a training at school, from childhood to girlhood, and from girlhood to womanhood, that by her training she becomes inferior, and, says she: "We shall never get to the true plane until she is treated from the beginning to the end as man's equal, and made to take the responsibility, run the risks, and take her share of the burdens, and take care of herself." I remember I made this remark right in that connection; said I: "How much of this after all is only a matter of education. Look at the Hindoos. There are eighty millions of very enlightened people, who are living under the domination of the British Crown, and their great grievance—the greatest grievance that they have, is that women are treated as equals, that they are recognized as proper subjects to be made parties to actions, or witnesses in Court; and," says I, "I understand that all their popular literature, so far as it bears on their grievance, of Great Britain, relates to the wrong that Great Britain does in treating women as proper subjects for judicial jurisdiction, and for punishment for crime, or to be brought in as witnesses in court." Says I, "That is the way with both sexes." Says I, "It is, after all, a matter of pure education." I don't think that that occurred to me this morning, when I was going over that, but I remember I made those remarks in connection with the discussion. I don't know of anything at this moment; nothing strikes my memory at this moment.

Q. Upon the subject of this social revolution? A. No, I do not; nothing but what I think—

Q. Or its connected topics? A. At this moment nothing occurs to me.

MR. TILTON'S OBSERVATIONS ON DIVORCE.

Q. Now, Sir, you have not stated a word about Mr. Tilton, or anything that he said during the whole discussion? A. Yes, Sir, I have.

Q. No, Sir, not one word. A. Certainly I have said that Mr. Tilton said that the whole system was false and indorsed Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Oh, Sir, wait one moment, wait one moment. I want you to tell me what he said? A. I will tell you what he said.

Q. Very well. Let us hear it? A. I think I have told you already.

Q. You have not in this last narration of the conversation; you have not mentioned his name. Perhaps it is, the record will show. Now, then, you may supply the defect if you want. A. Mr. Tilton said distinctly this, I remember, that the whole system of treating women as man's inferior, having such regulations for her was false, was erroneous from the beginning; that the only way to do it was to treat the sexes exactly alike, as equals, coequals in all respects as to the law, as to legal rights and legal liabilities; that their relations, their sexual relations, should be determined by contract; the Legislature had no right to create any other relation than the parties created for themselves by contract; they should make it by contract and dissolve it by contract and that any other regulation, any deprivation of the power to change their contracts, to make new ones or dissolve them, was an invasion of the reserved rights of the individual; that last expression he used repeatedly.

Q. Do you remember anything else that he said? A. I have related so much already that I think I have related all that occurs to me—all that occurs to me at this moment I have related.

Q. About how long was this topic of social relations under discussion? A. Oh, they must have been under discussion as much as half an hour.

Q. As much as half an hour? A. Yes, Sir; Mrs. Woodhull talked very rapidly and with animation.

Q. Do you think you could use the language of any expression made by Mr. Tilton during that discussion? A. Some detached expressions. I could not any more than that.

Q. Well, give me the detached expressions? Well, I remember this expression, that any laws on the subject of marriage, or divorce which took away from the individual the power to regulate it by their own will by contract was an invasion of their reserved rights—he used that expression.

Q. Was the question discussed in that part of the conversation of the law of the State, or of any State? A. Oh, yes, Sir, the law of divorce.

Q. The law of divorce was discussed? A. Yes, Sir; I don't know whether you intended to include that in your question or not?

Q. Yes, Sir, it is well enough. I was going to ask you about it. A. Yes, Sir, I remember he spoke of a lecture

Q. Was this feature of the law of the State of New-York spoken of which regards marriage as a civil contract, was that talked of? A. I think it was; I think that was spoken of; there was one matter that your question recalls to my mind: whether he mentioned it first or whether I mentioned it if I don't remember; I remember the comment he made on it—that New-York had followed the English system—adultery in the husband was no crime; it was not treated as a crime here as in the New-England States.

Q. Well, do you recollect that the subject of divorce as connected with the law of the different States upon that subject, was spoken of? A. Yes, Sir, that was mentioned. He said that he had—he was to lecture that Winter in Boston, and was going to give a lecture on divorce, I think that was—he was going to give a lecture on divorce, and I think he said he was going to give it in Boston, or expected to give it in Boston, in which that subject was treated, and I remember that he mentioned that he had made an examination of the laws of the different States, and of the difference between the laws of the different States on the subject of divorce. I remember he mentioned this fact, that some of the smaller—some of the smaller German States—I think he mentioned the names, but I have forgotten them—there was a law to this effect, and he thought a monstrously absurd one, that no divorce should be granted for any cause during the first year following the marriage, nor after the expiration of the tenth year, and I remember I remarked that I thought I could see a reason for that law; that the reason for the first limitation was to require them when they had made a marriage to try to accommodate themselves to each other during one year, and after they had lived together ten years the other limitation was based upon the presumption that if they had lived together ten, they could live together twenty and thirty or a lifetime. I think he made a note of the occurrence, which I related this morning in that connection, of Chief Justice Chapman's experience. I think—I knew he had a paper—he was writing—and I think he made a note of it.

Q. Now, do you recollect whether or not, in the course of that conversation he spoke of the contrast between the law of New-York upon the subject of divorce and the New-England and Western States? A. Yes, Sir—I cannot give the remarks that he made, but I remember he did make some remarks on those—

Q. Well, do you recollect that he maintained in that conversation that the laws of New-England and the Western States upon that subject were more rational and natural and just than the law of New-York? A. I think he did, yes, Sir, that they were a nearer approximation to right, but he did not approve of them, he did not speak of them as approving them absolutely, only as being comparatively—

Q. Well, you are giving now your conclusions; I would rather you would give what he said? A. That is very difficult to do. I know I can answer your question; that he did contrast the laws of New-England and of some of the Western States with the laws of New-York, and expressed a preference for them rather than for the laws of New-York.

Q. Are you quite sure, Sir, that in relating these conversations you have not confounded your opinions, or impressions derived from the conversation, with the conversation? A. Well, I remarked before that that is a very difficult thing to do—not to in some instances.

Q. Well, you are not certain but you have mingled them? A. Of course, that is the embarrassment I feel, that there is a danger; I have endeavored to avoid it as much as possible.

Q. But whether you have fallen into it or not, you cannot say certain? A. If I had fallen into it I should correct it, if I was sure I had fallen into it.

Q. Are you certain whether you have or not? A. On the points I have said; I have stated I was positive I have not.

Q. What? A. On the points where I have undertaken to give Mr. Tilton's language—where I have said Mr. Tilton said this, or Mr. Tilton said that; I know that I have not confounded an impression of my own mind with the remarks that he made.

Q. Well, have you given more than one expression that you remember to have been used by Mr. Tilton? A. It is very difficult—

Q. Well, have you given more than one? A. Well, I don't know that—I have given but very few—

Q. No, no; but have you given more than one? A. I don't remember anything now except what he spoke about—he spoke about—that which I repeated; I have repeatedly stated.

Q. Well, you can answer the question. A. I think I have given you two.

Q. What were they? A. One was that this was—all these laws on this subject, which treated otherwise than as a contract were an invasion of the reserved rights of the individual, and another was, when I made the—when I related the experience that Chief Justice Chapman had related to me, I remember he made an exclamation there, that the whole system was infamous; says he—"Well, how can any man"—I remember he put this question; says he, "How can any man justify a system which promotes and fosters such perjuries and frauds as those;" and he said also, right in that connection, "How much," said he, "how much better it would be to leave that with those parties to settle it for themselves rather than to require them to go through that farce of a legal proceeding, and fortifying it by the perjury which you have related."

Q. Well, was anything said upon this feature of the subject, that if marriage was a contract, was to be regulated by the contract of the parties, that either party could insist upon a performance of the contract, or if it was broken that either party could insist upon the breach of it? A. Yes, Sir; there was something said on that subject.

Q. And that was about the sentiment, I suppose? A. That was one of the opinions which Mr. Tilton expressed, leaving it to be settled by contract.

Q. Leaving it to be settled by contract? A. Yes, Sir; yes, Sir.

Q. And, in the view in which I have just expressed it to you, by the law as applicable to ordinary contracts? A. Yes, Sir; I remember—I remember he put it in that form, that that would be very much preferable; I also—

Q. Yes; now you have answered my question, unless you want to argue this point? A. No; I don't want to argue it.

Q. Very well, then; content yourself with answering my question.

Mr. Evans—He also said what he had a right to state.

The Witness—I was going to add what Mr. Tilton added.

Q. Well, I didn't ask you to add what Mr. Tilton said. A. Well, I won't do it.

Q. Well, as you are so anxious to do it, you may. A. No; I am not.

Q. Well, you may state it. A. I don't wish to have it put in as a matter of anxiety on my part.

Q. Well, I think you manifested some. A. No; you have been quite sharp in stepping me sometimes when I was overstepping the bounds; and I don't want to overstep them; I don't mean to overstep them.

Q. Now, did it occur to you in the course of that argument or discussion that after parties entered into a contract of marriage, if either party insisted upon the maintenance of the contract, so long as it was unbroken it could not be set aside? A. I don't remember that—in that form; I don't remember.

Q. What? A. I don't remember it in that form.

Q. It did not occur to you in that light? A. No; it didn't. Mr. Tilton didn't present it in that light.

Q. No; I ask if it occurred to you in that light? A. No, Sir.

Q. If marriage was a civil contract—matter of contract—that the contract must be maintained so long as it was fulfilled and either party insisted upon its being maintained? A. Did not—

Q. That didn't occur to you? A. Occur to my mind? How do you mean, did that occur to my mind, or did Mr. Tilton state that?

Q. No, Sir; I ask if that occurred to your mind as one of the results of the proposition that marriage was a civil contract? A. No, Sir; it occurs to my mind that that would not be the result.

Q. What? A. It occurs to my mind that that would not be the result.

Q. That is, if a contract of marriage were entered into by parties and recognized by the law of the locality as a matter of contract, that that contract would not be upheld by the law so long as it was fulfilled, and the party or either party insisted upon its maintenance? A. Yes, Sir; that is just what we have now, as I understand it; the result is that a man can run away or a woman can run away; the law don't enforce the contract; there is no specific performance; the only remedy is divorce.

Q. There is no specific performance, do you mean to say that? A. The law provides for no specific performance of a marriage contract.

Q. The law don't provide any means for enforcing the duties arising out of the marriage contract? A. I know of none; there is a remedy, there is a penalty, that is divorce.

Q. You don't know any law, then, which enforces the duty of a husband to take care of his family? A. We have one in Massachusetts, and I think—since you put the question, I think there was one—I heard of one being enacted in New-York some time ago; we got one last Winter in Massachusetts.

Q. Yes; well, did you ever hear that it was a principle of the English law that the duties of the marriage relation in that respect could be enforced? A. No, Sir; I don't understand it to be the principle of English law.

Q. Don't? A. Or even to have been. What I do understand, if you will allow me, is that where the marriage contract is entered into and is not fulfilled that there is a punishment for the breach of the contract, but nothing in the nature of a remedy enforcing specific performance.

Q. But, I am not talking about specific performance? A. I thought you were.

Q. You cannot lay a bill in equity, force a man or woman to love? A. Or to live together.

Q. What? A. Or to live together if they won't do it.

Q. Doesn't the law afford a remedy? A. Yes, a penalty.

Q. No; doesn't it afford other remedies besides penalties?

A. It is a penalty, Sir; I understand it so; I understand the whole theory of the law of divorce—

Q. I am not talking about the law of divorces? A. Yes; you are.

Q. No; I am not. A. Well, then, we don't understand each other.

Q. It is very likely. A. I am talking about the law of divorce.

Q. Well, I am not; I am talking about the law of marriage.

A. I am talking about the law of divorces.

Q. Now, do you not understand, Sir, that there are legal means by which the marital duty of the husband to support his wife and family can be enforced? A. Oh, yes; that is another thing; I understand that part can be enforced.

EMINENT ADVOCATES OF WOMAN'S EMANCIPATION.

Q. Very well; did you in that conversation notice any reference which was made to an essay of John Stuart Mill upon the subject of the subjection of women? A. Yes, Sir; that was referred to.

Q. Was it talked of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was it in that conversation a matter of conversation that Mr. John Stuart Mill advocated social freedom in that respect, or condemned the subjugation of women? A. Well, I know that that is the—that was John Stuart Mill's position in the book, and that was referred to in this conversation by Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton as—

Q. You regarded John Stuart Mill as a very eminent authority and philanthropist? A. Yes, Sir; I don't agree with him in everything.

Q. No. It is unfortunate for him, I think— A. Yes, Sir. very unfortunate for him. Yes, Sir. [Laughter.]

Q. Now, do you recollect, Sir, that in that conversation the opinions of Chief-Justice Chase upon that subject were talked of? A. I could not say; I remember Chief-Justice Chase's name was mentioned once or twice by Mr. Tilton, and very likely in that connection, but I don't recollect it. I won't say that it was not, but I don't recollect that it was.

Q. Well, did you at that time understand that Chief-Justice Chase was an advocate of woman suffrage? A. Woman suffrage; I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Yes— Well, in that conversation did you also understand that Mr. Greeley had been in early days—1868, 1867 or 1869—had also been in favor of that movement? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Woman suffrage—1848, I mean? A. I never heard of that; it may be so.

Q. Well, various distinguished men, represented and known by you as favoring that idea, were alluded to and spoken of upon that occasion? A. Woman suffrage?

Q. Yes? A. Oh, yes, Sir, quite a number.

Q. Perhaps you were in favor of it? A. I was.

Q. Did you ever lecture on that subject? A. Never.

Q. Or upon the subject of social freedom? A. Never.

Q. Did you ever deliver a lecture in New-York? A. Yes, Sir; never on that subject.

Q. What was the subject? A. I delivered a lecture on Trades' and Labor the same Summer.

Q. Third-ave? A. No.

Q. Where? A. Up at Wood's Grove—it was an outdoor lecture.

Q. Yes, I have heard of such a place. A. I don't know that I can give you the name; there was an entertainment, and I was—

Q. In the course of that lecture, did you have occasion to commend Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you mention her? A. Never mentioned her at all in public.

Q. Never mentioned her in that lecture? A. Never.

Q. You don't mean to say that you never mentioned her in public? A. Never mentioned her in any public assembly whatever. I never had occasion to, even while I was counsel for her.

Q. Counsel for her? A. Yes.

Q. When did you become counsel for her? A. About a year after this conversation.

Q. Well, we are getting a little off from the subject.

Mr. Everts—He has mentioned that.

Mr. Beach—I am aware of it—I will ask him by and by. Now, will you proceed with any further conversation which you had that evening with Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull? A. I think I have gone over everything.

Q. Well, I didn't know whether you had or not, Sir— A. I mentioned several this morning. I think I have mentioned some this afternoon.

Q. Well, I differ from you very greatly, Sir; it is not necessary for you to make a statement of that kind, it only imposes upon me the duty of dissenting from it? A. That is unfortunate.

Q. Yes; probably for me—you had a subsequent meeting with Mr. Tilton at Mrs. Woodhull's? A. Yes, Sir; a very brief one.

Q. Yes, Sir; how long after this first occasion? A. Several weeks, but I could not state nearer than that.

Q. Well, about how many weeks, Sir; give it as near as you can? A. Well, I think it was on the Sunday evening prior to the argument in the case of the Siren, but I am not sure about that.

Q. Pardon me. A. I think it was on the Sunday evening prior to the delivery of the argument in the case of the Siren, in the Supreme Court, at Washington.

Q. Oh! I don't know anything about that; I care nothing about that. A. Well, I fix it by that event.

Q. Well, fix it in your own mind; but give me about the length of time this second interview was after the first. A. Well, not less than three weeks, and it could not have been more than five weeks, I think— I should think—

Q. That is near enough, Sir. A. But I am giving you only a vague recollection.

THE BEHAVIOR OF MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. I understand that, Sir; I accept that—I believe I have omitted one subject—do you remember of any occasion that evening when Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull conversed apart? A. There were occasions when they did converse apart, but I do not recollect anything that was said—there was nothing that was apparently private.

Q. No, nothing apparently private; there may have been remarks made as between themselves? A. Yes, Sir, as between any other two in the company.

Q. Yes, Sir; but nothing that attracted your attention? A. Nothing that I remember of, no, Sir, at all.

Q. Did you see them sitting together that evening? A. Not—There was nothing specially noticeable about them.

Q. Just answer my question. A. Simply sitting together?

Q. Yes, sitting together. Don't you know what sitting together means? A. If you mean close by each other's side I should say no, but they were very near to each other repeatedly.

Q. How near? A. Well, she sat on the lounge with him a short time, I remember.

Q. Well, how near? A. Within a foot of him.

Q. Within a foot of him, and where was you? A. I was in the—I was in the chair very near them; that is, a few feet distant from them.

Q. Conversing with them? A. Not particularly with them any more than with others, but with them as much as with others.

Q. Well, did you notice any caresses between them that evening? A. None at all.

Q. And you noticed no more than ordinary salutations between them, did you? A. There was nothing in the language

Q. Just answer my question. A. No, Sir, nothing at all.

AMOROUS GLANCES BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Well, did you notice any amorous glances? A. I thought I did, Sir.

Q. Thought you did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, please tell me their position when you thought you noticed that? A. Well, that was repeatedly during the—

Q. Well, now answer me. A. Well, Sir; I will answer you in various positions.

Q. Well, give them to me. A. In the position in which we conversed on Lowell and its institutions; in the position in which she related the Tilton-Beecher liason, and in other positions where they were; that was all that attracted my attention to that subject.

Q. The amorous glances? A. The glances and the tones of their voice in which they addressed each other more than anything that was said.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE AMOROUS GLANCES DECLINED.

Q. Now, can you give me some description or illustration of an amorous glance? A. No, Sir; I could not. [Laughter.]

Q. Did you ever practice one in your life? A. I have made them, Sir—

Q. Now, cannot you put one on for the occasion? A. I don't know that I could.

Q. You can't give any other description of it than that it was an amorous glance? A. No, Sir; I cannot describe to you.

Q. Well, was it a sheepish kind of look? A. No, Sir; there was nothing sheepish about it.

Q. Were the eyes half closed? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, what was the peculiar expression about the eye? A. I cannot—I cannot describe the physiognomy.

Q. No, now answer my question.

Mr. Evans—You have asked him a question, and he is answering it.

The Witness—I will answer you—I am answering you by telling you.

Q. Well, I am putting a question to you upon a specific subject? A. Well, I am giving you a specific answer, trying to.

Q. Well, I am sorry that you cannot be more fortunate in your effort? A. I regret it.

Q. I was limiting myself not to the general physiognomy of the countenance but to the expression of the eye? A. Well, Sir, I cannot describe to you what you mean—

Q. I don't ask what you can describe. Can you give to me the expression of the eye, or describe that? A. No, Sir; I cannot do that.

Q. No, I cannot do that—well, can you tell me whether the eyes were fully open or partly closed? A. I didn't observe that it was fully open at all or partially closed, nor that it was wholly closed.

Q. Then did you notice any change in any other feature of the countenance than the eye from its natural expression—ordinary expression; answer me that? A. I can't answer that.

A. You can't answer that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, then, you can't say that you did notice it, if you can't answer it? A. I can say this—

Q. No, I don't want what you can say; we have had enough of that.

Mr. Evans—Why don't you want it?

Mr. Beach—Simply because it is not an answer to my question.

Mr. Evans—The witness is answering.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is not an answer to my question.

Mr. Evans—That don't answer the question.

Mr. Beach—I know what I am asking, and I know when I get an answer to my question. [To the witness.] Now, Sir, can you give me any description or any illustration of what you call an amorous glance, you having now confined it to the expression of the eye? A. I don't confine it to the eye.

Q. Don't think you can? A. No.

Q. And then you undertake to say, without any change of feature other than the eye— A. You misunderstood my answer to the last question.

Q. One moment; did I? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, what is your answer? A. I said I did not limit it to the eye.

Q. Didn't limit what? A. I did not limit the expression to the eye.

Q. Well, upon what other feature was there any peculiar expression? A. I can't answer you beyond this—

Q. No, I don't ask you that; my question to you was— A.

The expression of the eye is only a part of the expression of the whole face, the whole man.

Q. Now, I don't want a lecture on that subject, I want an answer to my question. A. I don't propose to give you a lecture; I am trying to give you an answer.

Q. Now, can't we avoid these discussions by you understanding the question as a lawyer, and answering it as a lawyer; do try to do it now. A. There are certain questions—

Q. Now, we have got all we can get of the eye; now, was there any other feature of the countenance in which you noticed any change different from the ordinary expression of Mr. Tilton? A. Nothing which I could describe; it is too evanescent to be described by my powers of description.

Q. Nothing that you can describe—well, didn't he have a gentle and loving smile on his lip? A. I didn't observe any special—any special smile.

Q. You didn't observe any? A. No special smile.

Q. No, no smile, and yet you thought the glance was amorous? A. I say—

Q. No, no. A. Yes, Sir; I will put it in your words, if you choose; I would rather put it in my own, but if you want it in your words I will give it.

Q. I don't want it in my words, Sir, if they are not true in their expression. A. They are true, Sir; but still they don't express the whole truth as I would like to express it.

Mr. Beach here asked permission to read a note from Mr. Fullerton's office, after which he continued the examination.

Q. I understand you that this was a fleeting and evanescent expression of Mr. Tilton's face? A. No, Sir; I didn't say that.

Q. What? A. I said that the expression of the countenance is too evanescent a thing for me to describe by my powers of description; that is what I said. I can tell you, Sir, what was meant by the countenance.

Q. Well, now, don't. A. But I cannot analyse it.

Q. Very well. How long did this expression continue on Mr. Tilton's countenance? A. This expression?

Q. Yes; this amorous glance. A. A glance was a glance, and was done with; that is the work of a moment.

Q. Yes. A. But what I said was this, in answer to the question this morning, what I say now—

Q. Oh, I don't ask you what you said this morning. A. Well.

Q. Well, what? A. Well, what is it? You stopped me; you started me to answer your question as to what I saw and as to what I understood.

Q. Oh, no; I didn't ask any such question as that. A. Then there is no question before the Court; all right.

Q. I think not either. A. If I have answered you, I am satisfied.

OTHER PLEASANTNESSES BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Now, was there anything else except this amorous glance that led you on your direct examination to say that those parties acted as if they were enamored of each other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was it? A. The tones of their voices as well as the glance of the eye—the expression of the eye towards each other.

Q. Well, now, what was the character of the tones of Mr. Tilton's voice when they became enamored? A. When they became enamored?

Q. Yes; or enamoring? A. During the whole evening—

Mr. Everts—He don't say they became enamored.

The Witness—During the whole evening when they addressed each other, when either one addressed the other, I observed that there was a tenderness.

Q. Oh, a tenderness? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A tenderness in the tone? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not in the subject upon which they were talking? A. Oh, there was no love-making there by anybody.

Q. That is, there was a softness and gentleness in the tone? A. Yes, Sir; that was not exhibited when they addressed other people; I observed that, Sir.

Q. Well, from those two indications you undertake to express the judgment that Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were enamored of each other, do you? A. Not from those alone; I should though; I had other things besides that.

Q. Let us have them—anything that occurred that you know. A. The language which Mrs. Woodhull used to me about Mr. Tilton corroborated what I should have inferred without that language.

Q. Well, what language did she use to you about Mr. Tilton? A. She told me that Mr. Tilton was the nearest approach to her ideal of a man that she had ever met.

Q. Yes. A. And I answered, and said I, "He seems"—says I, "I think that your estimate is reciprocated; I think he reciprocates your estimate of him;" that was the remark I made, and she says, "Indeed he does."

Q. Yes; now, anything else? A. I don't recall anything else now beyond that. Yes—the enthusiasm with which he spoke—which he mentioned as his having over writing her life; that was an additional circumstance.

Q. Yes, Sir. Well, Sir, now we will pass from that topic to the consequent conversation some two or three weeks afterwards.

Mr. Morris—[To the defendant's counsel.] Gentlemen, I wish you would not talk quite so loud back there; it is quite annoying; it is not quite the thing.

THE SECOND CALL AT MRS. WOODHULL'S.

Mr. Beach—Some few weeks afterwards, upon a Sunday evening, you called upon Mrs. Woodhull and met Mr. Tilton there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was that conversation? A. I am unable to give anything more than the fragment which I gave this morning; we did not have much conversation, for my visit was a very short one.

Q. Well, as I don't recollect that scattered fragment in the morning, suppose you repeat it. A. I will repeat it.

Q. Well? A. Shall I state the circumstances under which it was introduced, or go right to the subject itself?

Q. I ask you for the conversation; I don't know— A.

Well, Mrs. Woodhull first adverted to Mr. Beecher's connection with her—wth the impending revolution, and she said that she was going to give a lecture in New-York soon—whether she gave me the galley proof then and there of it, or sent it to me subsequently, I do not remember.

Q. I was asking for a conversation? A. Well, I am coming to it.

Q. I wish you would get at it a little more directly. A. She said that Mr. Beecher was going to preside at the meeting, and I told her I did not believe—I doubted whether Mr. Beecher would go in and preside at the meeting where a lecture in favor of the principles of social freedom was to be delivered, and she said yes, he would.

Q. Proceed, Sir. A. She said that Mr. Tilton had spoken with him about it, and that Mr. Tilton would bring it about. The only thing that Mr. Tilton said that I recall is this: in reply to my doubts that Mr. Beecher probably would not make any speech indorsing Free Love, but he would make a few introductory remarks, and indorse this question as a legitimate question for public discussion, and indorse her so far as concerned the exercise by her of the right of free speech on that question; that was the way Mr. Tilton limited it.

Q. Well, have you given it all? A. I don't remember anything more—oh, said by him? Mrs. Woodhull said that if Mr. Beecher did not come out—I don't mean to say that she said that if he did not introduce her at the lecture, but that if he did not come out on the side of the great revolution that was impending, that he would have to; that he could not maintain himself—he could not sustain himself without doing so, as he was known as a believer in these principles, as privately expressing his adoption of them, as practicing upon them, and he must have the courage of his opinions, or he must—she did not use that expression that I know of, but he must either come out and identify himself with them, with the friends of the cause, or he could not maintain himself.

Q. Now, Mr. Cowley, when did you first repeat these conversations after their occurrence? A. Very shortly after their occurrence I had a talk with Mr. Cummings, who introduced me to Mrs. Woodhull, and I gave him the general substance; I did not undertake to give a detailed narrative, but he was the first—

Q. And when was that? A. That was very shortly afterwards; I think it was within a week afterwards.

Q. Whom next did you communicate it to? A. I don't remember that I spoke to any one else for some time afterwards; I remember being with Mr. Sumner one afternoon, and he made some allusion to it, and I mentioned that I had heard this story.

Q. Well, never mind, what was said; I wanted to know to whom you mentioned the fact of this conversation? A. Mr. Sumner.

Mr. Evarts—You mean Charles Sumner? A. Mr. Charles Sumner—Senator Sumner.

Mr. Beach—Did you detail to him the subject of this conversation? A. No; only gave him a general idea of it, and he said—

Q. Never mind, I don't ask you what he said; next, who else? A. I don't remember now any one—yes, Charles Levi Woodbury; he was with me in the Siren case; I remember mentioning it to him.

Q. Who? A. Charles Levi Woodbury.

Q. When was that? A. That was the time I went to Washington; it was within two or three days; that was within two or three days I think of the second interview.

Q. Well, did you detail to him? A. No, not all the particulars, but generally the fact.

Q. Simply the general fact—well, who else? A. Mr. Redpath.

Q. When was that? A. That was a long time afterwards; I don't remember that I spoke of it to Mr. Redpath until about the time of some Congregational council or church court.

Q. Here? A. Yes, Sir; here in New-York, where the matter was talked about in the newspapers.

Q. Well, did you rehearse to him the details of the conversation? A. Not the details; no, Sir; not at that time; in the cars—while the Ecclesiastical trial, while the Ecclesiastical Court was sitting—the Ecclesiastical Committee.

Q. Do you mean the Church Committee? A. The Ohnrrch Committee this last Summer, July or August; it may have been September; at any rate, while the papers were full of paragraphs about the doings of the Church Committee. Gen. Butler and Mr. Redpath were going to Lowell together, and I mentioned it to Mr. Redpath.

Q. Who is Mr. Redpath? A. He is a journalist and lyceum—he is manager of a lyceum bureau.

Q. Where does he reside? A. Resides in Malden, and has a place of business in Boston; just now in Washington, clerk of some committee, I think.

Q. Did you repeat to him the conversation? A. A portion of it only.

Q. A portion of it? A. Only the general outline of it.

Q. Only the general outline of it? A. Only the general fact.

Q. Well, I want to get at some time, Sir, if there is any period when you undertook to relate to any one the particulars of this conversation first? A. Where I related the particulars?

Q. Yes? A. Let us see; I must reflect upon that.

Q. Do, Sir. A. I have mentioned it since the investigations generally, to quite a number of people—

Q. I was not asking you about general mention? A. Yes, Sir; I don't remember that I ever gave any one a detailed report of that conversation—I don't think I ever did until July last.

Q. Well, to whom did you then communicate it? A. I then gave it to two gentlemen, by the name of Hunt Brothers, publishers of The Lowell Times, a paper I have taken some interest in, and I wrote an article at that time on the subject, which they published, and I there related—I think that is the first time I ever gave a detailed—ever undertook to give a full detailed report of the conversation.

Q. Well, in that article did you undertake to give the details of the conversation? A. No; I gave some of the incidents.

Q. Merely some incidents? A. Yes; I will send you a copy, of the article, if you would like it.

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, I have no particular curiosity about it, though I would be very much indebted to you for a courtesy of that kind.

The Witness—I will send it to you. I really could not tell what particulars I did put in; I put in some, and made an article about as long as a newspaper would care to use, and then dropped the matter.

HOW MR. COWLEY BECAME A WITNESS.

Q. How did you first come to know that you would be wanted as a witness in this case? A. Well, in this way; my law partner in Lowell, David O. Allen, is a nephew of Oliver Johnson. Last Summer, when the statement of Mr. Tilton, and later, when the statement of Mr. Moulton were published containing something—

Q. Never mind what they contained. A. Well, they contained certain matters, and I called Mr. Allen's attention one night to them.

Q. I am not asking for any communication which passed. A. You will pardon me. I related then, to him—

Q. Well, it is through him then, you suppose? A. Yes, Sir; later than that, after Mr. Tilton's testimony and after Mr. Moulton's testimony, in this trial came in THE TRIBUNE I called his attention again to it, made some comments on it and the result of it was, that he said—

Q. No, no. A. It was through that, I presume.

Mr. Evarts—You asked him how he came to know that he was to be a witness.

The Witness—Through the communication from Mr. Johnson, I presume.

Q. When did you first receive any notice that you would be wanted as a witness? A. I have forgotten the date. I have a notice from Mr. Shearman referring to a note—

Q. I don't ask anything about referring; when did you first receive notice that you would be wanted as a witness? A. I guess it is about a month ago; it may have been a little less.

Q. That is the first intimation that you had that you would be required as a witness? A. Yes, Sir; a letter from Mr. Shearman.

Q. Did you reply to the letter? A. I did.

Q. And when did you come on? A. Night before last.

Q. With whom have you had interviews upon the subject of your conversation? A. Here?

Q. Yes. A. Mr. Evarts, Mr. Tracy, Mr. Hill, and Mr. Shearman; Mr. Shearman first.

Q. You made no memoranda of this conversation? A. No, not the slightest, except on the tablet of my brain.

Q. Except where? A. On the tablet of the brain.

Q. Yes, on the tablet of your brain; that is difficult of transcription; I can't get at that. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You made more anywhere else? A. Never made any.

Q. Then your relation of these conversations is founded entirely upon your general recollection of them? A. Well, some things were so striking that I could not forget them.

Q. I didn't ask you that; I asked you if they were founded upon your— A. I think I am answering your question.

Q. I think you ain't; my question is, Sir, whether your narrative of these conversations is founded upon your recollection?

A. Of course it is on recollection, but not general recollection.

Q. Not general recollection? A. No; you qualified your question.

THE WITNESS'S PERSONAL HISTORY.

Q. You mentioned, I think, Sir, to Mr. Evarts, that you were a candidate for the office of Attorney-General of Massachusetts? A. I have twice had that misfortune.

Q. Well, did you ever encounter the greater misfortune of holding the office? A. No, Sir; I never expected to.

Q. What? A. Never a possibility of it—running on a third party.

Q. What third party was it? A. That was the Reform party—Labor Reform party in Massachusetts.

Q. Yes, Labor Reform party? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is you led a foghorn hope? A. Yes, Sir, took it, repudiating the movement.

Q. What? A. Took it, partially repudiating it; I accepted the nomination, but expressed in my letter, which was published, doubts about the expediency of moving in that line, but I concurred in the general objects which they sought, all of which have been accomplished in legislation.

Q. Well, it is happy for Massachusetts. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Perhaps you remember the number of votes you received? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many? A. Got more than anybody else on the ticket.

Q. Well, how many? A. 14,000.

Q. How happened it that you failed then? A. Because there were two regular parties running in opposition, each of which polled about—well, several times more than our—the smallest—several times more than our party.

Q. Well, what is the law of Massachusetts in regard to the question? A. They don't elect the lowest candidates there. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, as it happens that you were the highest candidate why didn't they elect you? A. I say I was the highest on that ticket.

Q. And that is just the ticket that I was inquiring about. A. But there were two others that were ahead of me for the office—the other tickets—a scattering vote of about a hundred thousand.

Q. Oh, you were the highest candidate upon the ticket upon which you ran? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But not the highest as between the competitors for that office? A. No, Sir.

Q. Oh! I misunderstood you and gave you occasion for a happy joke; now, when was it that you ran for that office? A. 1869 and 1870.

Q. In both years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have been a practicing lawyer for about nineteen years, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where has your practice been conducted? A. Lowell chiefly; Lowell, more than anywhere else; I have had an office in Boston since I came home from the navy at the close of the war.

Q. Did you ever have any personal legal difficulties? A. Yes, Sir; several of them.

Q. Several of them. Well, were they connected in any degree with charges of criminal offense? A. One was what purported to be a charge of criminal offense; I never could get it tried; it accomplished its purpose when it was started and appeared in the newspapers.

Q. Ahem! Are you the guardian of a lady who is confined in an insane asylum, or were you ever? A. No, Sir, never of one confined in an insane asylum; I am guardian of a lady who is living in Lowell, but who is not living in any insane asylum.

Q. Never was? A. Never was; I have been guardian of several insane persons; there is only one now that I remember of; never one that was in any asylum during my guardianship.

Q. You say that no person over whom you were guardian—no woman over whom you were guardian, was confined in an insane asylum? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you ever arrested for the charged offense of perjury? A. No, Sir; I was never charged with perjury by anybody.

Q. Were you upon a charge of false pretenses, connected with a woman? A. Never; I never was arrested upon any charge, except a charge of libel in accusing a man of forgery; the man who sent you those papers, I presume.

Q. Who was he? A. Lawrence McLaughlin.

Q. Sent me what paper? A. You hold in your hand a paper which was spread out before me, and if I read its title, it is a paper I understood was to be sent here by McLaughlin. I heard of it two weeks ago.

Q. What paper? A. A copy of the matter you refer to—a charge of fraud.

Q. A copy of what? A. A copy of the record of a charge of fraud.

Q. A copy of that indictment? A. Yes, Sir; the one I refer to. I say I could never get it tried.

Q. Was that not a charge of false pretenses practiced upon a woman? A. No, Sir. You said "an insane woman."

Mr. Morris—No.

Q. No, I didn't. A. You said where I was guardian.

Q. No, I didn't. A. There was a charge of false pretenses.

Q. Practiced upon a woman, I said? A. There was a woman and a man—an abortionist, and the nurse of one of his patients. That was the allegation, but it was false. I could not get it tried. It was found and published in the newspapers and nolle prosequit.

Q. The indictment was found? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is Farrington the name—Laura A. Farrington? A. Yes, Sir, she is the one; she was the nurse of the patients of Dr. James Harmon and Isaac F. Morse, who were the moving parties in that. I don't mean to say she was the nurse of Morse's patients.

Q. You say it got into the papers? A. Yes, Sir, and was nolle prosequit. I had a quarrel with Isaac F. Morse, the District Attorney, and he formed a conspiracy with Dr. James Harmon, the abortionist, and Laura A. Farrington, the nurse of the abortionist's patients.

Q. Were you present when that was formed? A. No, Sir; but I know it.

Q. How do you know it? A. I know it by their confessions, and asking my forgiveness since.

Q. Who? A. Laura A. Farrington, her husband. Dr. Harmon and his son.

Q. Did you ever proceed against them for malicious prosecution? A. No, Sir; I dropped it where they dropped it.

Q. They confessed that they had sworn falsely against you in obtaining the indictment? A. They apologised to me for having been "roped in" by this Morse into this conspiracy.

Q. That explanation involved the fact that they had sworn falsely before the jury? A. Yes, Sir, it did.

Q. And you didn't proceed against them? A. I did not.

Q. Nor against this District Attorney? A. I proceeded against him in another way; I followed him up last year.

Q. How did you follow him up? A. I followed him up in the newspapers, exposing his perjury, and had a legislative investigation and had him exposed.

Q. Was this accusation of keeping a woman in an asylum, or in some insane institution, discussed in the newspapers at all? A. No; no such accusation was ever made against me. No such accusation was ever made by anybody, so far as I ever knew.

Q. Did you have any difficulty in Washington at any time? A. Never.

Q. None as connected with pension or soldiers' claims? A. Never. I had difficulty in getting some cases where I was counsel.

Q. I don't want to go more than is necessary into this. What was your position in the navy? A. I was on the staff of Admiral Dahlgren as Judge Advocate.

Mr. Beach—I believe that is all, Sir.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. CHARLES COWLEY

Mr. Evarts—Who is this McLaughlin that you speak of? A. He was a man who, on the confession of his accomplice, committed a murder on one occasion.

Mr. Beach—Is that proper to be stated?

Q. What is his position now? A. He is now under indictment on four indictments for forgery.

Q. Now pending? A. Now pending.

Mr. Morris—What have we to do with McLaughlin?

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will go on.

Mr. Morris—I guess we won't go on until we understand it.

Mr. Evarts—You understand now who McLaughlin is.

Mr. Morris—I guess we won't have anything to do with him. What has he got to do with this case?

Q. Did you—He sent the information.

Mr. Morris—No, he did not send the information. We have the letter here, and it was no such person; we know no such person.

The Witness—I heard of it from him two weeks ago.

Q. How long ago was this alleged difficulty in your conduct that was made the subject of indictment? A. That was in 1857.

Q. Eighteen years ago? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were then a young lawyer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In Lowell? A. The first year after I was admitted to practice. If I had not been young I should not have been involved; I should not have had anything to do with such people.

Q. What was the accusation against you? A. I never could make out, except it was a general allegation that I had gotten $100 for services for which I ought not to have got anything. That was the accusation.

Q. In regard to your receipt of a lawyer's fee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of $100 from this man and woman, was it not? A. Yes, Sir, where I had been concerned in preventing—seeking to prevent—a prosecution against them for perjury and conspiracy against the Judge of the Lowell Police Court.

Q. Now, for that you were subjected to an indictment, were you not? A. Yes, Sir; I don't remember that I was ever called to answer to it, but I heard of it in the newspapers and went up and saw it, and I presume that is a copy of it.

Q. What happened to that indictment? A. It was nolle prosequi.

Q. Did you demand a trial, or to have it nolle prosequi? A. Gen. Butler did for me.

Q. As your counsel? A. Yes, Sir; and the District Attorney would not bring it to trial, and when he found Gen. Butler was going to the Court with it he nolle prosequi it. He dropped it, but I would not drop him until I got him exposed.

Q. You thought that Mr. Morse was at the bottom of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What has happened to him? A. He has been exposed as the leading defaulter and peesulator in the county frauds in Massachusetts in a legislative report.

Q. In a legislative inquiry? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Who is this?

Mr. Everts—Morse.

The Witness—The man that got that indictment.

Mr. Beach—I object to this indictment.

Mr. Everts—I am satisfied; that is enough for Morse. Now, we will go on with the case.

Mr. Beach—If you will go on with the case I will be content.

Mr. Everts—You introduced the subject of the charge against this gentleman.

Mr. Beach—I have not the slightest objection to this gentleman making an explanation with great liberality as to any circumstance to which we have alluded, but I do not think it is proper to have these loud denunciations against persons who are not involved in this controversy, and who are not here to answer for themselves.

Judge Neilson—I don't think it is quite proper that he should pronounce judgment upon several persons.

Mr. Everts—It depends upon what evidence he has, and what part he has in it.

Judge Neilson—No; it depends on whether it was involved in the cross-examination of the learned counsel.

Mr. Everts—It depends on whether I can reinstate this witness.

Judge Neilson—You are at liberty to reinstate him.

Mr. Everts—By showing who his accusers are, and what they are, and what his position is.

Mr. Beach—Not founded upon his judgment and opinion, but founded in hostility.

Judge Neilson—There is no need of discussion about it. This gentleman has a right to reinstate himself, and you have a right to a liberal examination to that end.

Mr. Everts—Have I exceeded that?

Judge Neilson—I have not said you had; but it is improper for the witness to pronounce judgment upon A, B, C or D and say they are guilty of frauds, when perhaps they are not at all.

Mr. Everts—Well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Proceed with your examination.

THE CHARGE AGAINST THE WITNESS EXPLAINED.

Q. Now, you may explain, as my learned friend, Mr. Beach, has suggested, in the most liberal manner, this accusation and the parties who were concerned in it. A. The parties concerned in that accusation against me were, first and principally, Dr. James M. Harmon, whose business for many years has been that of an abortionist. The next was Laura A. Farrington, who was a nurse of his patients. The next was Isaac L. Morse, the District Attorney, with whom, prior to this, I had another difficulty, growing out of his not paying over—

Mr. Beach—I object to this.

Mr. Everts—That is his accuser. His accuser was a person whom he had a prior difficulty with about not paying over money.

Mr. Beach—I object to it.

Mr. Everts—That is not within the line of liberality.

Mr. Beach—No; it is beyond the line of liberality.

Mr. Everts—Go on.

The Witness—They commenced this persecution, and brought the suit. When my counsel insisted on having it tried, or he would go to the court, then the District Attorney nolle prosequi it. I never could get it tried, and I never understood, either from my own knowledge or from the advice of Gen. Butler, that there was any offense charged there known to the law. There was a general accusation of fraudulent dealing in and connection with—

Mr. Beach—I have a great respect for Gen. Butler's opinion, and for this witness, but—

Mr. Everts—You said he might explain.

Mr. Beach—I think he is getting beyond the bounds of all reasonable or liberality of explanation.

Q. Was this the same District Attorney that found the indictment? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That nolle prosequi it? A. Yes, Sir, the same one.

Q. When did that matter come to an end? A. Very shortly after it was found.

Q. In the year 1856-'57?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; in 1858, I think. Mr. Cowley is mistaken in the year.

The Witness—I think it was 1857; it may have been 1858.

Q. And it has slumbered ever since, has it? A. I never could get it tried. It was nolle prosequi, and then he ended.

Q. It was nolle prosequi at that time? A. Yes, Sir, and that ended it. It is the last accusation I ever heard against me, and the first.

THE WITNESS COUNSEL FOR MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. You have stated that at some time you became counsel for Mrs. Woodhull, in some matter. When was it? A. That was the year following these conversations that she came to Boston to lecture, and she had difficulties; she was refused the hall.

Mr. Beach—We object.

Q. You became her counsel in reference to some matters then that arose in Boston? A. Yes, Sir; and got them settled.

MR. TILTON'S OPINION ON THE LAWS OF MARRIAGE.

Q. Now, Sir, did Mr. Tilton, in conversation with you, comparing the laws of the different States on the subject of divorce, express to you any approval of any of those laws as suitable to what he regarded the marriage relation and its government?

Mr. Beach—I object to that question as leading.

Mr. Everts—This is in reference to your cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—I cannot help that.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

The Witness—I didn't understand him to express an absolute—

Mr. Beach—Is this witness to give his understanding on the subject?

Judge Neilson—He may state if he recollects, and, if he does, he may state his recollection.

The Witness—I will state Mr. Tilton did say that the laws of New-England, certain of the New-England States that were specified, Connecticut in particular, were preferable to those of New-York; that the laws of Indiana and Illinois were also preferable to those of New-York; and he also said that this whole matter was a matter—that any legislation on this subject was an invasion of the reserved rights of the individual; it was a matter that should be left with the individuals; they should make their contracts and terminate them at their will.

Q. Did you discuss with Mr. Tilton any of these questions of law respecting the restitution of conjugal rights, or the remedy against a husband for the support of his wife? A. Well, these things were spoken of; yes, Sir.

Q. In what way were they spoken of? A. I spoke of the great difficulty—I said what seemed to me to be the worst feature of divorce, was the effect upon the children, where there were children, leaving them without paternal care; that I didn't know that I should care much where people had no children, where there was no one but themselves, and they were able and had means to take care of themselves, if it was left for them to decide; but when there were dependent children, or when there was a dependent woman or wife who might be deserted by a vigorous husband, and left without any support, that I could not conceive that any right-minded man would want to have the laws changed which would deprive them of this protection.

Q. What did he say to that? A. He said the only way was for them to learn habits of self-reliance and self-dependence; they should learn to rely upon and depend upon themselves.

Mr. Everts—That is all.

Mr. Beach—That is, educated to rely upon themselves in regard to the making and dissolution of contracts? A. That was not the way he put it. That if they were educated and taught to rely upon themselves—learn to rely upon themselves, and take care of themselves—then any contract which might be made should be left to be enforced by the—

Q. Carrying out the idea that they should be competent to make and dissolve contracts? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Didn't it carry the idea that they must learn to submit to their fate if their husbands deserted them? A. Yes, Sir; it carried that idea too.

Mr. Beach—Carried the idea that they must learn to submit to their fate if their husbands deserted them? A. Yes, Sir; marriage being the subject of a contract, being dissoluble by contract as well as made by contract.

Q. Exactly? A. If the elements—if the love, which was the essence of marriage, ceased, it was the misfortune of the one who had ceased to be loved, and that was one of the inevitable misfortunes of life.

Q. That is if parties were rendered competent to make a contract, and competent to dissolve it, you understood that one party could dissolve it? A. I stated so; that makes it dissoluble.

Q. Did you understand that that being made a matter of contract, to be entered into and dissolved at will, that one party could dissolve a contract? A. I did; yes, Sir. I do, too, now—a contract of that kind.

Mr. Everts—You understand the remedy to be by damages for its dissolution? A. Precisely, and no other.

Q. Was, or was not, the proposition of Mr. Tilton that the marriage relation should be of that kind? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That it might be commenced and dissolved when the parties did not agree to keep it longer? A. That was the way he put it.

Mr. Beach—And I understand you to say that if they did dissolve this contract the same as any other contract, there would be an action for damages for a breach of it? A. To be left for the law to provide a remedy, just as any other contract.

Q. Just as any other contracts. Then you understood that if a husband should break the marriage contract and assume to dissolve it (if that term can be applied to it), that it should be left to the law to afford a remedy in damages? A. I could not conceive how there could be any remedy where a party has nothing.

Q. Did you understand that? A. I understood that to be his position; and I combated that position on the ground that it left—

Q. Never mind; wait a moment; I didn't ask you about your combating of it. Now, if a contract of marriage could be made and could be broken and dissolved at will, don't you say that you didn't understand that if it was put upon the footing of any other contract, that there would not be an action for damages for the breach of it? A. I understood there would be; there might be penalties for the breach of it.

Q. Well, now, let us take the case of a marriage formed by contract of a graceless husband deserting what you call a worn-out wife in his service; you understand the doctrine of Mr. Tilton to be that that wife, she having fulfilled the obligations of the contract, and the husband breaking it, could maintain an action against the husband for the breach of it? A. I don't know as I quite get your question; what I understood was this—

Q. Didn't you understand that if the husband broke the contract against the will of the wife, that she could maintain an action for damages? A. That there would be some remedy provided—some penalty?

Q. Yes? A. I did, but still the contract would be broken, and the marriage at an end.

Q. Yes, Sir; and, so, if a husband or wife does an act which, according to the law of New-England would justify a divorce you understand that would be a breach of the contract? A. Certainly.

Q. Which either could break at their will? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that the law of divorce affords the only remedy which is given? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Sir.

The Court then adjourned until Friday morning at eleven o'clock.

FORTY-THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT EXPLAINED BY SAMUEL WILKESON.

THE SUGGESTION FOR THE DOCUMENT—INTERVIEWS CONCERNING IT DETAILED—MR. BOWEN'S PAYMENT TO MR. TILTON ASSERTED TO HAVE BEEN CONNECTED WITH THE COVENANT—WHAT MR. TILTON SAID TO MR. WILKESON IN REGARD TO THE SCANDAL—ALLEGED CONFESSIONS BY MRS. TILTON TO MRS. H. B. STANTON AND MISS ANTHONY—TESTIMONY ABOUT MR. TILTON'S ATTENTIONS TO A LADY NOT NAMED.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1875.

The trial was a few minutes late in opening to-day on account of the tardiness of a juror. During the time of waiting, Judge Neilson inquired concerning the health of Mr. Fullerton, and was told by Mr. Beach that Mr. Fullerton was too weak to attend the Court, but expected to be able to resume his duties on Monday. Clerk Mallison then announced, "jury present," and the defense entered upon their part of the day's work by calling Samuel Wilkeson. Mr. Wilkeson began to testify concerning a conversation which took place in 1861 at Washington between Mr. Tilton and himself in reference to a service done by the latter for a son of Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beach promptly objected, and the Judge ruled out the evidence, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the senior counsel for Mr. Beecher to have it included. Mr. Evarts complained that the ruling was cruel to his client, but Judge Neilson answered, almost sorrowfully: "The hardship is that I should learn from the counsel that it is unjust and cruel to the defendant to rule out this evidence, which is utterly immaterial, and could not be of service to him." The witness then proceeded with his testimony, which, in the main, was a minute account of the circumstances of the celebrated tripartite agreement, the first suggestion of which was made by the witness, who also drew up the original document. Mr. Wilkeson testified on this point that Mr. Tilton called upon him at his office on March 20, 1872, and showed him the original draft of the paper known as the personal statement, which Mr. Tilton said he should publish in the next number of The Golden Age unless Mr. Beecher did him justice. The only thing of which Mr. Tilton then complained was that Mr. Beecher did not help him in his troubles with Mr. Bowen, and, according to Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Tilton declared that he "would pursue Mr. Beecher to the grave." On the day following Mr. Moulton called upon Mr. Wilkeson, and the latter then said that he thought it would be well to bring the three, Henry Ward Beecher, Henry C. Bowen, and Theodore Tilton, to unite in a covenant in writing which should prevent at least two of them from circulating scandals. Mr. Moulton agreed to this, and Mr. Tilton afterward assented. At a subsequent interview between the witness, Mr. Moulton, H. B. Clafin, and Mr. Tilton, it was decided that Mr. Bowen should be induced to pay Mr. Tilton whatever amount of money was due to him, and should use The Independent to restore Mr. Tilton to the position which he had lost. It was also determined that the scandal papers in the hands of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton should be destroyed, after the tripartite agreement should have been signed and the money paid. It was also stated by Mr. Wilkeson that at another interview between the four persons mentioned, Mr. Clafin reported that Mr. Bowen had consented to pay the money, provided that arbitrators were appointed. Mr. Tilton, on hearing the draft of the tripartite agreement read, declared that he "would sign it twelve times over if Mr. Bowen would sign it once."

The remainder of Mr. Wilkeson's testimony was in relation to Mr. Tilton's early statements of the cause of his troubles with Mr. Beecher. After the tripartite covenant had been agreed upon, Mr. Wilkeson asked Mr. Tilton if there was any truth in the scandalous stories about Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Tilton replied, "The charges are wholly unfounded," adding that the utmost that Mr. Beecher had done was to address improper language to Mrs. Tilton, and that ample apology in writing had been made by Mr. Beecher. Toward the close of his testimony Mr. Wilkeson asserted that, when Mr. Tilton, on April 8, 1872, refused to sign the tripartite covenant as it then stood, he (Mr. Tilton) declared, "I will never sign that or any other paper that will prevent me from pursuing Henry Ward Beecher."

During the first part of the cross-examination of Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Beach put a series of questions about the precise language used by Mr. Tilton on occasions referred to by the witness. The course of inquiry then turned to what Mr. Tilton had said concerning the stories about his wife and Mr. Beecher. The witness said that he had made a memorandum of these conversations, because he "thought the whole matter would end in a great legal controversy." "When did you think that?" asked Mr. Beach. "When," answered the witness, "I heard the movement that Theodore Tilton had organized against Henry Ward Beecher." Mr. Beach caused a laugh in his expostulation with the witness for this answer by addressing him as "Mr. Frothingham." The rebukes of the senior counsel for the plaintiff produced little effect on the witness, who, in reply to the question, "How did you think a charge of improper language could get up a great legal controversy?" answered very emphatically, "I thought the time would come when Henry Ward Beecher and his friends would become tired of paying money to The Golden Age to stop a scandal against the greatest preacher and the greatest man of the age." This expression of opinion was greeted with laughter and some applause. Mr. Wilkeson denied that he had uttered the expression attributed to him, that "the publication of these scandals would knock the 'Life of Christ' higher than a kite," and seemed very anxious to tell what he did say on this point, but Mr. Beach did not care to hear it. The witness was very unwilling to mention the names of ladies in his testimony, and appealed to the Judge to be excused from so doing. Judge Neilson refused this request, and in answer to Mr. Beach's questions Mr. Wilkeson stated that Mrs.

H. B. Stanton had told him that Mr. Tilton had declared to her that Mrs. Tilton had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher. The witness added that Mrs. H. B. Stanton had also told him that Miss Susan B. Anthony had informed her that Mrs. Tilton had confessed the offense to Miss Anthony. Mr. Wilkeson informed Mr. Tilton of this, and he, among other uncomplimentary remarks, declared that "Susan B. Anthony was a morbid old maid."

The conclusion of Mr. Wilkeson's examination was more pleasant than its beginning. The witness declared that he only desired to tell the truth. "And I," said Mr. Beach, "wish to help you." "I like your help, Mr. Beach," replied Mr. Wilkeson. "Well, I would be glad to coöperate with you in all your little schemes—especially in that of the Northern Pacific Railway," said the lawyer. "Well, that will come out all right," rejoined the witness. Mr. Wilkeson was asked about his relation with Mrs. H. B. Stanton. "That was the accident of marriage," answered the witness. "Marriage isn't an accident," retorted Mr. Beach. "Bless the accident," exclaimed the witness. In regard to Miss Anthony, the witness said with a patient smile, "She has for years crossed my orbit of life."

On his redirect examination, Mr. Wilkeson was allowed to tell what he did say about the "Life of Christ." The words which he used were these: "If these stories are true their publication will knock the 'Life of Christ' higher than a kite." Mr. Wilkeson left the witness stand with a triumphant expression, and made the remark—which was emphasized with a vigorous slap on his knee—that the whole matter ought to have been brought into court at the start.

At 3½ p. m. Mr. Shearman called the Rev. Edward Eggleston as the next witness. His testimony was very brief, and related mainly to attentions paid by Mr. Tilton to a lady whose name was not mentioned in the evidence. The cross-examination was short. In the course of it Mr. Eggleston described himself as "a Methodist clergyman preaching in a Congregational Church and lying around loose generally."

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. FULLERTON STILL ABSENT.

The Court met at 11 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Beach, did you learn this morning how Mr. Fullerton is?

Mr. Beach—Mr. Fullerton is very much improved, Sir, but he is still in such a weak condition that it is not safe for him to appear in Court. I have no doubt that he will be entirely restored by Monday.

Judge Neilson—Proceed, Mr. Hill.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Wilkeson, will you take the stand?

Q. Do you recollect an occasion when Theodore Tilton visited Washington and had an interview with respect to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

THE TESTIMONY OBJECTED TO.

Q. Please state what occurred. A. It was in the Fall of 1861. Mr. Tilton came to me early in the morning one day, I think it was at my hotel, Willard's, and brought me a letter from Mr. Beecher, in which Mr. Beecher said that—

Mr. Beach—Wait one minute, witness.

Q. Do you know what has become of that letter?

Mr. Beach—What do you propose to prove?

Mr. Hill—I propose to prove a conversation with Theodore Tilton respecting Mr. Beecher at that time. Proceed.

Mr. Beach—When was that, do you say? A. In the Fall of 1861.

Mr. Hill—Proceed, Mr. Wilkeson; you may omit the statement of the letter at this time.

Mr. Beach—It seems to me, your Honor, that is going very far back in the intercourse of these parties—1861.

Mr. Evarts—It was introduced by Mr. Tilton, as a transaction of his in Mr. Beecher's interest.

Judge Neilson—Was that the time he went on about the son?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; about the son.

CONFLICTING DEFINITIONS OF COLLATERAL MATTER.

Mr. Morris—They cannot contradict that; it is collateral.

Judge Neilson—In that view, we will see what it is.

Mr. Beach—I don't know. I submit, your Honor, that it is totally immaterial. How does it become material to this issue, any conversation with Mr. Wilkeson in regard to that matter, or any action of Mr. Tilton in regard to any service he may have performed to the son of Mr. Beecher?

Judge Neilson—As to the latter, it may be of no moment; and Mr. Tilton himself rather ignored the extent of the service.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir.

Judge Neilson—But yet I can suppose a conversation might be held that might be material; we had better see what it is.

Mr. Beach—I submit to your Honor, that if it is upon that subject, it is an entirely collateral matter; and it is not the subject of an examination upon their part.

Judge Neilson—So far as reinstating the son is concerned, yes, Sir; that is so.

Mr. Beach—That is as far as I object to it.

Mr. Hill—Proceed, Mr. Wilkeson.

Mr. Morris—No; the Court has not said so yet.

Judge Neilson—I have said that there may be a conversation that we ought to take.

Mr. Morris—But I understand your Honor to intimate that the conversation with reference to that matter is collateral.

Judge Neilson—The service as to the reinstating the son, if that were so—

Mr. Hill—I propose to go to nothing else.

Mr. Morris—Well, I understand your Honor has held that to be collateral.

Mr. Evarts—I don't so understand it; his Honor says he may give the conversation and see what it is.

Mr. Beach—Now, it appears in the evidence that Mr. Tilton rendered a favor of a greater or less degree to Mr. Beecher in some action which he took concerning some difficulty which encompassed a son of Mr. Beecher. Mr. Tilton has disclaimed any particular merit on account of that service; has said that Mr. Beecher expressed more gratitude to him than the service deserved. Now, is not that purely a collateral matter, and are we to examine in regard to that issue as to whether the service was greater or less on the part of Mr. Tilton?

Judge Nelson—Certainly not.

Mr. Beach—And as the counsel avows that this examination to this point is only with reference to that service, I submit to your Honor that it is incompetent.

Mr. Evans—It is difficult for me, if your Honor please, to understand the appropriateness of the phrase "collateral," as applied to inquiry into relations between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. It is not collateral; it may be unimportant or subsidiary or secondary, but it is not collateral. Collateral inquiries are when a witness, who is only a witness, is inquired of respecting what is in the nature of impeaching imputations, and in regard to them you take his answer as collateral and do not pursue it. That is because you cannot try causes between other people. But all that reasoning and all the authority and the doctrines of the law have no application to the question whether or not this passage in the life of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, as towards each other, is or is not the proper subject of inquiry. Now, it being a matter in the cause, and between the parties, the question whether or no we are at liberty to show by this witness what the transaction was, is the same question as whether it is competent to show it by any witness; and we are not concluded by Mr. Tilton's version of the transaction. There is nothing in Mr. Tilton's testimony that imports absolute verity, or closes our mouths against the production of witnesses concerning any matter that is the proper subject of proof in the cause. Now, this incident furnishes a particular and important portion of the sentiments and relations of Mr. Beecher towards Mr. Tilton—whether rightfully or wrongfully has nothing to do with the question. It was a matter in which, as has been shown by the testimony, Mr. Beecher regarded himself as under great obligations to Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Tilton has disclaimed the magnitude of the obligation, though he has not shared the service with anybody else that I have understood.

Judge Nelson—He was not inquired of as to that.

Mr. Evans—I am not imputing any error to him, or fault. I am only stating his testimony as it is. Now, this gentleman is asked to give that transaction as conducted by Mr. Tilton there, and it is to serve also as a part of subsequent evidence between Mr. Tilton and this gentleman in regard to those nearer matters of this affair which are proper evidence. We have said that the present inquiry is limited to what passed between Mr. Tilton and this witness concerning this affair of Mr. Beecher's. It is not a loose and general conversation concerning other matters; it is a very brief affair, and it is an element, a link, in our testimony. We regard it as important. It is not collateral; it is direct and it is competent evidence. My learned associate, Mr. Abbott, refers me to the case of Carpenter and Wall, 30th of New-York, as recognizing the rule that matter brought out by a statement of plaintiff's witness on direct may be contradicted whether material or not. That is an additional bearing of the inquiry.

Mr. Beach—It is the first time I have understood, Sir, that the law confined the definition of collateral issues to those subjects which were inquired of on the impeachment or attempted impeachment of a witness. There is a main issue, and perhaps more, in every case—whatever is, in the language of the gentleman, unimportant or subsidiary to that, is, in the sense of the law, collateral. Whatever does not bear essentially upon the true issue to be determined by the jury is collateral. This action involves, as the principal issue, the question of the seduction by the defendant of the plaintiff's wife. It is competent as a part, perhaps, of that issue, to inquire into the relations which existed between the contending parties and, possibly, their families. That may be regarded as a material portion of the main inquiry in the action. Now, so far as any incident of the kind to which the attention of this gentleman is directed reflects upon the relation of the parties, the terms of confidence, respect and intercourse, why it may very well be regarded as competent upon the main issue of the case, although this transaction is so remote in period, so far from the occurrences connected with the main issue, that it might well be doubted whether it has any relevancy to that issue in consequence of that remoteness. But, Sir, suppose it had been proved either upon the direct or cross-examination that Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, in the year 1867, had a business transaction, an exchange of property, or any other of the ordinary affairs of business intercourse, would not that, I submit to your Honor, be collateral to the main issue so far as the details of that transaction are concerned, and would it be competent, in a trial of this character, to enter into an examination of all the minutiae of a business affair between those parties at that remote period of time? I don't recollect, Sir, whether the attention of Mr. Tilton was first directed to this subject upon the direct or the cross-examination, and should prefer to refer to the minutes of the stenographer upon that point, unless some of my associates recollect. I had the idea, Sir, that it was disclosed in the first instance—

Mr. Morris—It was referred to incidentally on the direct, too.

Mr. Beach—Referred to incidentally on the direct by the introduction of a letter of Mr. Beecher expressing gratitude to Mr. Tilton for the service he rendered in that matter.

Judge Nelson—Sending him a present of an inkstand.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; sending a present of an inkstand, and that was for the purpose of introducing the kindly relations which then existed between these parties. I am corrected, Sir, by my associates as to the fact of the introduction of that letter; it was introduced upon the part of the defense, I understand.

Mr. Morris—And they went into particulars, you recollect, as to the—

Mr. Beach—If there was any reference in the direct examination of Mr. Tilton to that transaction, it was very indistinct and remote. None of the details were inquired of on the part of the plaintiff, and all that was said material upon that subject was upon the cross-examination. Now, I submit to your Honor that this is an entirely collateral and a very remote transaction, which can reflect no light upon the main and material issue in the case, and they, having made Mr. Tilton a principal witness upon that subject, it is not competent to contradict him, and I therefore submit, Sir, that the proposed evidence is incompetent.

Judge Nelson—Mr. Hill, will you state distinctly what you expect to prove?

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I understood Mr. Hill to avow that it was entirely with reference to that event.

Mr. Hill—I expect to show this transaction, which has been referred to, which we have been talking about here, the service which Mr. Tilton rendered at that time as it actually occurred, by the parties who were concerned in it; I mean actually upon the ground.

Mr. Beach—Then, Sir, it will resolve—

Mr. Shearman—Wait, Sir; we have not finished.

Mr. Hill—And I propose, also, to show, Sir, how that transaction was represented to Mr. Beecher, and thus show—thus lay a foundation for showing the state of Mr. Beecher's feeling at a later period with reference to Mr. Tilton, and with reference to his correspondence which they put in evidence.

Mr. Beach—Then the question resolves itself into this, Sir, that they introduce a letter from Mr. Beecher expressing gratitude to Mr. Tilton for this supposed service, and they now propose to show that that service was not rendered, or that the extent of it was misrepresented to Mr. Beecher as calling—as an inducement to the expressions which he used in that letter. They proved the letter themselves, and now propose to show that the foundation upon which the letter was written was inaccurate.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tilton did not in his testimony state what he did in Washington, or give any details about it, or refer to this gentleman as having met him, or give any other indication in regard to it, except that he went on in reference to that subject, and it is very plain to me that it is not the proper subject of inquiry, that it is not material. Suppose this gentleman at Washington rendered the service, it would be immaterial to offer such an inquiry. I must rule out that much of his evidence. If you can prove anything else you can take the advantage of it.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, how are we to judge of the materiality of evidence until we know what it is?

Judge Neilson—That would let in everything; there would be no limit then.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that. The object of an inquiry is to get at pertinent truth, and when it is introduced, the first question is whether you have a competent witness. The second question is, whether the subject is a proper one of inquiry, and then, you must take the evidence and see how important it is. Now, our proposition is precisely this: To say that Mr. Tilton is made our witness for anything that he has testified to, is as unsuitable to any rule of a party examined on an issue in a cause as any observation can be. My learned friend says this is collateral, but he makes a new definition of collateral, and that is, subordinate. Subordinate is not collateral. And important items of testimony are not made collateral by their unimportance. They are often made important by other items of testimony which give them that significance; and if every item of evidence adduced was to be excluded because it did not decide the issue what progress should we make in the trial of a cause. Now, if your Honor please, this subject was introduced by the plaintiff on direct evidence of the plaintiff himself. It was made the subject of further inquiry on cross-examination on our part, and now we propose to show what the actual dimensions, and the order of occurrences, and their significance in this transaction were, at different stages of it, to wit: in what occurred at Washington and what afterwards occurred on the return of Mr. Tilton, and to what subsequently occurred at a later stage, which I do not now further indicate. Mr. Tilton, you remember, speaks of this in his testimony as being the date of Mrs. Beecher's resentment against him, to wit: the favor he had done to her son. Your Honor shakes his head.

Judge Neilson—You got that impression. I did not get that impression.

Mr. Evarts—He stated so. Whether it made an impression or not as to its truthfulness or its weight, I do not know. Now, it certainly is a very grave matter if we are not permitted by our witnesses to give the actual character of transactions that have been imperfectly introduced in the testimony of the plaintiff, either to correct or contradict, either to correct in the sense of imperfect testimony given against us by the party, or to correct—contradict in the sense of false testimony given. And it is that view of our right to show by a competent witness, under the laws of evidence, the actual occurrences that have been introduced from the plaintiff's mouth.

Judge Neilson—My own judgment is that we cannot investigate these remote matters of service, if they were of service; that they are remote and immaterial here—utterly immaterial—and that if we are to investigate every such transaction it would expand the cause beyond the proper boundary that belongs to it. There would be no end to it. With that view, I rule out this testimony offered by this witness.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—The reference made to the service, if it were one, by the plaintiff, was very slight indeed. I did not understand him to take to himself any particular merit in regard to it. He did not say whether on going to Washington he committed this subject to this witness or to anybody else, and let them do the work, or that he did any work at Washington, or did anything requiring discretion, or requiring influence. It is utterly immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—Because he has not shown the actual character of the transaction, is that the reason that we are precluded from showing it? It is a part of our case to show it.

Judge Neilson—It is too remote and too immaterial, I think.

DEFENDANT'S COUNSEL COMPLAIN OF HARDSHIP.

Mr. Evarts—Well, your Honor will see the hardship upon us.

Judge Neilson—No, I don't see any hardship.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will see the hardship upon us of shutting out evidence in advance of its statement, by a pre-judgment that it is immaterial.

Judge Neilson—The hardship that I see, if I must say so, is this, that when I think a transaction so remote and so utterly immaterial should be ruled out, the hardship is, that I should learn from counsel that it is cruel and unjust to this defendant, when it can do the defendant no good any way, and has done him no harm—utterly immaterial—and when I am bound simply to exercise my judgment in regard to it, and do nothing more. I think, upon every consideration, this evidence should be ruled out as immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—Well, but if your Honor please, I have stated the general proposition of excluding evidence in advance of knowledge of what it is upon a prejudgment that it will turn out immaterial. Now, that shuts out the truth without any knowledge of what the statement is to be.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor permit me to say—

Judge Neilson—One moment.

COUNSEL FOR PLAINTIFF RESENT THE REFLECTION.

Mr. Beach—Allow me to say one word, if your Honor please. This is a reflection upon the intelligence and justice of the Court. It may be well enough to recall the circumstance under which your Honor rules. I objected to this evidence, knowing its general character in advance. Your Honor called upon the counsel for the defense to state what they proposed to prove. They made that statement of the substance which they proposed to give, and your Honor, in the exercise of your judicial judgment upon that statement by the counsel upon their own knowledge of their proof, pronounced it immaterial and incompetent, and it is said by the counsel upon the foot of that decision that it is a hardship to prejudge the materiality of the proof before it is given, when the counsel themselves give to your Honor the basis upon which your decision is founded; and it is the only way, Sir, in which we can exclude immaterial evidence where the question itself is general like this, as to what occurred in that interview, and does not point to the particular substance of the evidence proposed to be given. It is the way established by the law, Sir; and permit me to say that the decision of your Honor is in accordance with the practice and the principles of law.

Judge Neilson—To avoid the possibility of prejudging or passing upon evidence without knowing what it was or might be, I availed myself of the right to ask the counsel what he expected to prove on this subject, and he very frankly stated what he expected to prove.

Mr. Evarts—But let me ask your Honor's attention to the terms in which it was stated, that we propose to prove that transaction at Washington as it existed.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is ruled out, Sir. Proceed to something else.

Mr. Hill—Note our exception, if your Honor please.

THE USE MADE OF THE PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. Hill—Do you recollect an interview with Theodore Tilton, in the month of March, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At your office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was your office then? A. In the Equitable Life Insurance Company's building, in Broadway.

Q. Who was present when the conversation occurred? A. Only Mr. Tilton and myself.

Q. Please state now when it was. Give me the date, if you please? A. On the forenoon of the 29th of March, 1873.

Q. Do you recollect what day of the week it was? A. Friday.

Q. Please begin now and detail that conversation as fully as you can to his Honor and the jury? A. Mr. Tilton came into my room, greeted me, and took out of his pocket a well worn press-proof of a newspaper article and laid it on my table, and told me that he wanted me to read it; he said that he brought it to me because I was the common friend of Henry Ward Beecher and himself, and that I was a copartner in the house of Ford & Company, who were the publishers of Henry Ward Beecher's books, and because I was interested with him in the ownership of The Christian Union newspaper. He said that he intended to publish that article in the next number of The Golden Age unless Mr. Beecher did him justice. I read the article; it is what has been called—

Q. One moment; just look at this printed matter attached to the "tripartite covenant," that is to say, "Exhibit D, No. 25."

A. It is what has been designated in this trial as the personal statement, including the letter of Henry C. Bowen of January 1st, 1871.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what precedes and follows it? A. I read it through. I asked him if he really purposed to publish that article.

Mr. Beach—What was the last remark, Mr. Wilkeson? A. I asked him if he really purposed to publish that article.

Mr. Hill—Let me ask before going to that—you stated that this whole article was present at that time, produced by Mr. Tilton. A. The personal statement?

Q. The personal statement. A. The printed article?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And read through? A. I read it.

Q. As well what follows the letter as what precedes it? A. Yes, Sir; I read it.

A THREAT TO PURSUE MR. BEECHER INTO THE GRAVE.

Q. Now, you were going on to state if he really intended to publish. A. I asked him if he really intended to publish that article. He said he did, unless justice was done him by Mr. Beecher. I remonstrated with him against the publication of that article. I told him that it would be enormously mischievous; that it would produce a scandal which would extend throughout Christendom; I told him it would do infinite wrong and work infinite mischief. He said that it was his purpose to publish it unless justice was done him. Then he went on to speak of Mr. Bowen; he said that Mr. Bowen had dismissed him from his employment on The Independent and on The Christian—and on The Brooklyn Union, and that he had violated his contracts with him to render editorial services for certain salaries on each paper; that he had—that Mr. Bowen had deprived him of his income; that his dismissal from those papers had ruined his reputation, and had destroyed him; and he went on growing in excitement, and he said that Mr. Beecher had not come to his help; that he was a man of such power that he could with his little finger have lifted him up in his troubles; but that as he laid on the sidewalk in Brooklyn, crushed and ruined by Bowen's treatment of him, and by the consequences of his loss of employment on those two papers, and the injury done to his reputation, that Mr. Beecher, who with his little finger had the power to lift him up and reinstate him, had passed him by indifferent and had not helped him, had left him lying there; and moving across the room back and forth, in great excitement, he said he would pursue Mr. Beecher into the grave.

Mr. Beach—Into what? A. Into the grave.

THE SURMISED PURPOSE OF MR. TILTON'S CALL.

Mr. Hill—What else occurred Mr. Wilkeson? A. I thought that Mr. Tilton's immediate want was money.

Mr. Morris—Oh! oh! never mind what you thought, Mr. Wilkeson.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Well, it was not inquired of.

Q. Did you say anything about that? A. I told him that he was going the wrong way to work to restore himself; that what he wanted was help, and that warfare would not give him that which he desired. I told him that his interest lay in— Before this, however, he said to me that he had been compelled to bring a suit to collect the amount of money that Mr. Bowen owed him on his contracts, and that that suit was pending, and he did not know when it would be ended; and he also said that he was in pressing need of the money that Mr. Bowen owed him. I told him that his true way was to take such steps as would terminate that suit and get his money; and then that he ought to secure and control the influence that would enable him to restore his relations with Mr. Bowen, and to restore his reputation to the world at large, and I shadowed to him how that could be done. I told him that Mr. Beecher was sincerely attached to him; that he was his friend; and that Mr. Beecher was surrounded with people who had strength and influence, and that that could be brought to bear in his behalf; and that Mr. Bowen could undoubtedly be influenced to do him justice; and that it was not, it seemed to me, an impossible or difficult thing to bring Mr. Bowen to feel, that if he really owed the money to Mr. Tilton, which Mr. Tilton told me that he did, and which I believed that he did, on his statement of the contract that he had with Bowen, that Mr. Bowen could be induced to pay that money and terminate the suit; and I promised him the aid of The Christian Union to help him in his Golden Age enterprise—I thought that I could do that; and I told him that undoubtedly Mr. Bowen could be induced to help him with The Independent; and this thing could all be arranged, he could be effectually helped, and that the necessity for the publication of scandals of the character such as he had shown to me in press, and the initiation of a warfare which that foreshadowed, could all be avoided, and the whole thing amicably adjusted.

Q. Proceed with what else occurred there? A. Mr. Tilton grew happy, calmed down, looked pleasant and sweet, and he told me that he was very glad that he had come to my office, that it was a fortunate thing for him that he had done so; that he had been walking down Broadway with his troubles, aimlessly thinking over his affairs, and when he got to the Equitable Life Insurance building, sudden inspiration came to him to go up and see his old friend Samuel Wilkeson, and that he had come there with no object in view whatsoever, and didn't know how he happened to lay that paper down before me to read; he thought that a good angel must have sent him there; the spirits must have sent him there.

Q. The what? A. The spirits must have sent him there. He congratulated himself heartily upon having come there, and upon the result of his interview with me; and I told him that I would take hold of the affair heartily and immediately, and address myself to the accomplishment of everything that I had told him I thought ought to be done; and he went away.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say anything with reference to his desire that you should aid him in that particular? A. He only expressed satisfaction that I was going to do it, I think, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect, Mr. Wilkeson, whether anything was said of Mrs. Tilton in that interview? A. Of whom?

Q. Mrs. Tilton? A. Not a word, Sir.

Q. Now, did he speak of any injury which Mr. Beecher had done to him, or of any damage which Mr. Beecher had inflicted upon him, other than neglecting to help him when, as he stated, he lay crushed upon the sidewalk in Brooklyn? A. Not one word, Sir.

RESULTS OF THE TILTON-WILKESON INTERVIEW.

Q. Now, Mr. Wilkeson, did you, soon after that, see Mr. Beecher? A. I saw him that night, I think.

Q. It is suggested that I ask you now, did you retain that press proof that you spoke of? A. I surrendered it.

Q. At a later period? A. That day.

Q. You surrendered it to whom that day? A. Tilton.

Q. And he carried it away with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you think you saw Mr. Beecher that day? A. That night.

Q. Whereabouts? A. At his house.

Q. And— A. Told him this interview.

Q. Exactly?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think he can state that—"told him this interview."

Q. Stated this interview. Now, Sir, did you call upon Mr. Francis Moulton in consequence of anything that occurred at that interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or did he call upon you? A. No, Sir, he called upon me.

Q. When was that, Mr. Wilkeson? A. The next morning—Saturday.

Mr. Beach—Do I understand Mr. Wilkeson to say that Mr. Moulton called upon him in consequence of this interview?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, with Mr. Beecher; in consequence of the interview with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Wilkeson, state what occurred at that interview?

The Witness—Which interview?

Mr. Evarts—Between Mr. Moulton and yourself.

Mr. Beach—What foundation have you laid for that?

Mr. Hill—Do you object to that?

Mr. Beach—Why, of course we do.

Mr. Evarts—Why, we have proved, if your Honor please, directly by Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, that Mr. Moulton was the representative of Mr. Tilton in every matter relating to this money collection. We proved as early as the second day, I think, the second day of January, 1874, a written authority to him, and now it is said that Mr. Tilton is not affected, concerning the transaction of the collection of this money, by what Mr. Moulton said or did.

Mr. Beach—They have proved authority, and we have proved authority from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Moulton to collect this claim as against Mr. Bowen. It does not authorize, Sir, the proof of the declarations of Mr. Moulton, or conversations with Mr. Moulton with a third party, Mr. Wilkeson.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir; I think we will take it.

Mr. Hill—Proceed, Mr. Wilkeson—

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will note our exception.

Mr. Hill—With the interview that occurred between you and Mr. Moulton that you have just referred to. A. On Saturday forenoon Mr. Moulton brought me a letter of introduction from Mr. Beecher. I had never seen Francis D. Moulton, although I knew him by reputation.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, it appears that that interview between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Wilkeson was on the part of Mr. Moulton as the representative of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Let us see.

Judge Neilson—A note of introduction.

Mr. Beach—Sir?

Judge Neilson—A note of introduction.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir; but he came as the emissary of Mr. Beecher, and as his representative, and not acting within the agency which had been conferred upon him by Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—The witness had given assurance to Mr. Tilton that he could act in a certain line to promote his interests in reference to Mr. Bowen and otherwise. That the witness should take a letter of introduction from Mr. Beecher, or from anybody else, would be necessary, because he didn't know Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Beach—Surely, Sir, if your Honor please, because Mr. Tilton may have been gratified by the assurance of Mr. Wilkeson that he would act in aid of his supposed restoration, does not authorize the conversation which Mr. Wilkeson may have had with third parties, to be given in evidence against him. There was no such conferment of agency, Sir, as would bring in the acts and declarations of Mr. Wilkeson as against Mr. Tilton, arising from that conversation. That, surely, Sir, would be an extravagant and overstrained construction of that interview. There was no authority conferred upon Mr. Wilkeson by Mr. Tilton. Mr. Wilkeson gave the friendly assurance that he would exert himself to promote his interests, but there was no constitution of an agency which would authorize proof of the acts or declarations of Mr. Wilkeson.

Judge Neilson—He left Mr. Wilkeson under some sense of obligation to act if he could.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir; but the point is, that there was no such relation established between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Wilkeson upon that occasion as concluded Mr. Tilton or affected Mr. Tilton by anything which Mr. Wilkeson could say or do. Those declarations and those acts were voluntary upon the part of Mr.

Wilkeson, in the exercise of a friendship which he felt, perhaps, for both of these parties. If Mr. Wilkeson had undertaken to conclude any arrangement with reference to those matters, if he had assumed to act on behalf of Mr. Tilton by compromising or arranging any difference as between Tilton and Bowen, or Tilton and Beecher, or Mr. Beecher, why, surely, Sir, it would not be covered by any agency which had been conferred by Tilton upon him. Your Honor has admitted declarations and conversations between third parties to affect and conclude Mr. Tilton, and there must be some relation, such relation established between Mr. Tilton and those third parties as the law recognizes as an agency before that evidence can be given. I submit to your Honor it is a subject of serious consideration whether conversations between Mr. Wilkeson and others—

Mr. Evarts—And Moulton.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Moulton or anybody else, Sir, should be given. Surely there must be some evidence to show that Mr. Wilkeson acted as the authorized agent of Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton in that particular conversation before it can be given in evidence; and there is no proof, Sir, I submit, of any such authority.

Judge Neilson—I admit the question is not free from doubt, but still I think, on the whole, the testimony should be received. Go on.

Mr. Hill—Proceed with the interview, which you were about to give, with Mr. Moulton at your office.

Mr. Beach—We will except, Sir.

The Witness—After reading the letter of introduction which Mr. Moulton brought I outlined to him the arrangement that I thought that ought to be made.

Q. Give the conversation.

Mr. Beach—Perhaps I ought, Sir, to specify the further objection, that if this evidence is offered in anywise as a contradiction to Mr. Moulton, that his attention has not been drawn to the subject.

Judge Neilson—It has not been offered with that view.

Mr. Beach—It is not collateral.

Mr. Beach—No matter whether it is collateral or direct.

Mr. Evarts—Does my learned friend say that when they proved what is not collateral that I must ask the witness before I prove by another witness the contrary?

Mr. Beach—I didn't say any such thing.

Mr. Evarts—Well, Sir, that is the proposition.

Mr. Beach—No it ain't. This is the proposition: that when it is attempted to contradict a witness by showing a conversation or declaration which he has had with third parties, his attention must first be drawn to the subject. It is a proposition, I think, that will not be denied.

Mr. Evarts—That we agree to.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Proceed, Mr. Hill.

THE FIRST SUGGESTION OF A COVENANT.

Mr. Hill—Give the conversation, Mr. Wilkeson.

A. I told Mr. Moulton that my plan of suppressing the scandalous publication which had been threatened in my office, and avoiding the warfare which it foreshadowed, was to have Mr.

Bowen persuaded, as an act of justice to Mr. Tilton, to pay him the money which he justly owed him, and to stop the litigation, and to not make Mr. Tilton have to drag along that suit through a court of justice indefinitely. I told him also that I thought Mr. Tilton should be helped in his Golden Age enterprise, to make it profitable. I told him that I was not only willing, but desirous that The Christian Union newspaper should be used to that end, and I hoped that influences should be found to persuade Mr. Bowen to use The Independent to that end; and then I told him that for the purpose of harmonizing difficulties which seemed to exist between Mr. Bowen, Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, that I thought that it would be wise to bring the three into a covenant, to be executed in writing, which should at least stop two of them from the repetition of any of these scandals which were floating through the community. Mr. Moulton accepted my plan as being judicious; he complimented it, and I think that he asked me if I purposed to act in this matter beyond the line that I had indicated. I thought that that betrayed a desire that he should handle it exclusively himself.

Mr. Beach—One moment, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Not what you thought, but what you said.

Mr. Evarts—Not what you thought.

Mr. Hill—The substance of the conversation? A. I told him I should limit my agency in this whole business to the preparation of that agreement, and to the use of my influence to give the aid of The Christian Union newspaper to the restoration of Mr. Tilton's standing in the community not only, but to the up-building of his newspaper enterprise, and he expressed himself satisfied with that, and then he appointed with me an interview at his house on Sunday night, the next evening, and then he went away.

PLANNING FOR PEACE.

Q. Now, did you meet him at his house on Sunday evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what time? A. I think it was about eight o'clock in the evening.

Q. Where was the interview held? A. In his studio, in the third story of the house.

Q. Who was present? A. Theodore Tilton, Frank Moulton, and I think before the close of the interview, Horace B. Claflin.

Q. Now, state what occurred there? A. The subject matter of the harmonization of the troubles between the three men, Bowen, Tilton and Beecher, was generally talked over. My plan of managing the trouble was generally talked over. I think that I produced the draft of an agreement to be signed by the three men, and read it.

Q. A single moment. Just look at that paper and see if it is the draft which you so produced? [Handing witness a paper.] A. This is not the draft. This was the—this was the—this was the final result of the draft, and the amendments of the draft.

Q. What has become of the original draft, the one that you just referred to? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Is it in existence, do you know? A. I am not aware that it is, Sir.

Q. Have you looked for it? A. I have diligently searched for it.

Q. And cannot find it? A. I cannot find it.

Q. Proceed, now, with the interview. A. It was arranged at that interview that Mr. Bowen should be induced, if possible, to pay the money to Tilton that he owed to Tilton, or that Tilton had claimed in the suits which were pending, and that he should be induced to use The Independent newspaper editorially to help Tilton, to restore him in his influence and good name, as also to speak kindly and favorably of The Golden Age enterprise. It was also understood that I should use The Christian Union newspaper to the same end; and it was also understood—

Mr. Beach—I object, Sir, to this mode of relating that conversation.

Judge Nelson—Mr. Wilkeson, the inquiry is as to what was said on that occasion.

The Witness—And it was said on that occasion, I think, all round, that a paper should be drawn substantially like that, the draft of which I had taken there and which I read, that should be signed by Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton. It was also said at that interview that the papers in the possession of either Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton connected with the scandal in circulation against Mr. Beecher should be destroyed after the money was paid to Mr. Tilton by Mr. Bowen, and after the agreement, which we then called the "Tripartite Covenant" among ourselves, was executed.

Q. If anything else occurred at that interview, please state it. A. I recollect only that Horace B. Claflin said that he had no doubt that Mr. Bowen would readily agree to perform anything that had been indicated there, and that he should see him without delay, and would be ready to report, I think, the next day, or the day after.

THE PLANS AGAIN DISCUSSED.

Q. Now, when did you see either Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton again? A. On the night of the 2d of April.

Q. At what place? A. The same place.

Q. That is, in the study? A. In the study.

Q. Who were present then? A. Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton Horace B. Claflin and myself.

Q. Was that meeting by appointment? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Before proceeding with that interview, I desire to ask you if any amendments or changes were made in the rough draft of the "Tripartite Covenant," which you had at the first meeting in the study? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There were some made? A. Yes.

Mr. Evarts—At that time.

Mr. Hill—At that time.

Mr. Evarts—And at the first interview.

Mr. Hill—Yes; at that first interview on Sunday evening, were they made at that time? A. I do not know whether—I think they were made at that time.

Q. Well, Sir; now, prior to that second interview, had you prepared a draft of the "Tripartite Covenant"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A fresh draft? A. A fresh draft from the original.

Q. That is containing — A. From the amended—the altered—the changed original.

Q. A copy of the original, with the amendments? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. [Handing a paper to witness.] See if this paper is the one which you so —

[To the TRIBUNE stenographer: I show the witness Exhibit D, 25. No; I beg your pardon; it is not Exhibit D, 25.]

Q. The Witness—That is the paper which was taken at the interview on the night of the 2d of April, 1872.

Q. Please state what occurred at that interview, narrating it in your own way, without waiting for questions? A. Or, rather — what did you say, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Go on; I was speaking to counsel.

Judge Neilson—[To the Witness.] He asked you to state what took place at the second interview.

The Witness—Mr. Horace B. Claflin reported that Mr. Bowen had agreed to pay the money that Mr. Tilton claimed from him in case, I think he said, that arbitrators should determine the amount; and he said that it was but fair that the form of arbitration should be gone through with, in order to satisfy Mr. Bowen that he was justly bound to pay that amount of money; and then the subject of the "Tripartite Agreement" was introduced. I read what I had finally prepared, and what had been agreed upon at the previous meeting, with certain amendments and certain changes.

Q. Read this paper? A. I read that paper.

Q. [Handing a paper to witness.] Let me ask you if the yellow paper there was then attached to one of these sheets? A. No, Sir.

Q. Examine this paper, and see if you discover certain lead pencil amendments and changes in it? A. I do.

Q. Were these upon it at that time? A. They were not.

Mr. Hill—Now, Sir; I desire to have these papers marked for identification.

Mr. Evans—No.

Mr. Hill—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Mark them as read in evidence; I shall read them presently.

Mr. Evans—Mark them as Exhibits.

Mr. Shearman—Exhibit D, 11a.

[The three sheets of paper composing the "Tripartite Agreement" were marked Exhibit D, 113.]

Mr. Morris—[To Mr. Hill]: I suppose we have a right to see these papers before you read them in evidence?

Mr. Hill—Yes; if you like to.

Mr. Morris—We should like to.

[Mr. Hill handed the "Tripartite Agreement" to Mr. Morris for inspection.]

THE COVENANT AS ORIGINALLY DRAWN.

Mr. Hill—[To the Witness.] Will you be good enough to read that paper to his Honor and the jury, as you read it at that interview?

1. I, Henry C. Bowen, having given credit, perhaps without due consideration, to tales and innuendoes affecting Henry Ward Beecher, and being influenced by them, as was natural to a man who receives impressions suddenly, to the extent of repeating them (guardedly, however, and within limitations, and not for the purpose of injuring him, but strictly in the confidence of consultation), now feel that therein I did him wrong. Therefore I disavow all the charges and imputations that have been attributed to me, as having been by me made against Henry Ward Beecher, and I declare fully and without reserve that I know nothing derogatory to his reputation as a clergyman or a man.

And I expressly disavow the charges, imputations and innuendoes, imputed as having been made and uttered by me, and set forth in a letter written to me by Theodore Tilton on the day of January, 1871 (a copy of which letter is hereto annexed); and I declare that those charges, imputations and innuendoes are without any foundation in fact, to the best of my knowledge and belief. And I covenant, that for all future time, I will never, by word or deed, recur to, repeat, or allude to, any or either of said charges, imputations and innuendoes.

2. I, Theodore Tilton, returning of my free will to a man whom I have revered and loved as a father, thus renew and confirm my faith in Henry Ward Beecher as a grandly good and generous man. I, too, disavow each and all the imputations and charges in the said annexed letter repeated and contained. And any and all other imputations upon his character and conduct which have been said to come from me, if I have made them, I covenant never to repeat or to renew.

3. I, Henry Ward Beecher, put the past forever out of sight and out of memory. I deeply regret the causes of suspicion, jealousy and estrangement which have come between us. It is a joy to me to have my old regard for Henry C. Bowen and Theodore Tilton restored, and a happiness to me to resume the old relations of love, respect and reliance to each and both of them. If I have said anything injurious to the reputation of either, or have detracted from their standing and fame as Christian gentlemen and members of my Church, I revoke it all, and heartily covenant to repair and restate them to the extent of my power.

Brooklyn, April 2d, 1872."

MR. BOWEN DISTRICTED.

Q. Proceed now with the statement of that interview. What occurred when you produced this paper? A. I produced and read that paper at that interview on the night of April 2d, 1872. When the reading of it was finished, Mr. Tilton said that he was ready to sign that document twelve times over, if Henry C. Bowen would sign it once; Mr. Claflin expressed himself satisfied with it, and said he had not any doubt but that Mr. Bowen would accept it and execute it quickly. Mr. Moulton was satisfied with it.

Q. Did he say so? A. Mr. Moulton said he was satisfied with it; Mr. Tilton repeated his declaration that he would sign that twelve times over, if he could thereby induce Mr. Bowen to sign it once, but he expressed a doubt whether Mr. Bowen could be got to sign it, and Mr. Tilton reached forwards to the inkstand and to the pen in it, and took the pen out of the inkstand and drew the paper to him to sign it, and Horace B. Claflin put his hand forward and pushed his pen back, and said, "I would not have you sign that before Mr. Bowen signs it. It may be necessary for me to say to Mr. Bowen, that his signature may be necessary in order to get yours, and I would rather that you would not sign that before he signs it;" and Mr. Tilton put the pen down and did not sign the paper, although he had expressly agreed to sign it; and then Horace B. Claflin took the paper and put it into his pocket to go to Mr. Bowen's to get his signature to it.

Q. Do you remember whether Mr. Claflin returned that evening or not? A. Mr. Claflin returned that evening and reported that he had read the paper to Mr. Bowen, and he said that Mr. Bowen said that the paper was perfectly acceptable to him, that he could cheerfully and conscientiously sign it, and he desired to sign it as the termination of these misunderstandings and all these troubles. I asked Mr. Claflin if he had signed it, and if he had got the paper with him signed. He said no, that Mr. Bowen had said that he would like to look it over just once more, and that he had come away leaving the paper in his possession.

Q. Did you make any reply to that? A. I told him that when he got hold of that paper again it would either be altered, or else it would never be signed. I told him he committed a mistake in not bringing the paper away from Mr. Bowen executed.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say to that? A. Mr. Tilton expressed regret that Mr. Bowen had not signed it.

Q. On the spot? A. On the spot.

Q. Now, did anything further occur at that time in the presence of Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton with reference to this "Tripartite Agreement"—this paper—anything further that you now recall? A. I do not recollect, Sir, that anything did, except that I made the point that all the papers in the possession of either Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton should be destroyed. I again pressed that they should be destroyed.

Q. What was said then about that? A. There was not much said about that—not much said. I only pressed the point.

Q. It had been spoken of before and assented to? A. It had been, and they agreed to sign it. That was a part of the general understanding, that the papers in the possession of those two men concerning those scandals should be destroyed.

MR. TILTON DISCREDITS THE CHARGE OF ADULTERY.

Q. Had you an interview with Mr. Tilton apart from Mr. Moulton or Mr. Claflin that evening? A. Mr. Claflin went away. Pretty soon a servant came to the door and told Mr. Moulton that one of his copartners, whose name I don't remember, was down stairs, and desired to see him, and Mr. Moulton went down stairs. That left Mr. Tilton and I alone, and I turned to Mr. Tilton and said: "Now, that this discord is composed, and these troubles are all arranged, I would like, for my own satisfaction, to know if there is any truth whatsoever, and if so what it is, in those slanders that have been aimed at Mr. Beecher's reputation in connection with Mrs. Tilton." I particularly mentioned to him what had been told me by one lady representing to me that Mr. Tilton made the statement to her about Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; I specifically stated to him what the same lady told to me, that another lady had mentioned to her—

Q. As coming from Mr. Tilton? A. As coming from somebody else. I called his attention specifically to the point of adultery.

Q. Adultery with whom? A. Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Now proceed. A. He said that there was not a particle of truth in the charge—not a particle—that it was wholly unfounded, that Mr. Beecher had done him no wrong in that direction whatsoever. He said that the utmost that he had ever done was to address improper language to his wife, and that for that he had in his possession Mr. Beecher's written apology, and he repeated it over to me that Mr. Beecher had never done him any wrong whatsoever, except in the way of addressing improper language to his wife, and stated again that the stories to the effect that he had committed adultery with his wife were false and scandalous.

MR. TILTON PRAISES MR. BEECHER.

Q. Proceed with any further conversation that you had with him, Mr. Wilkeson? A. I told him that I was very happy to hear him say that, because I had always supposed Mr. Beecher to be absolutely innocent of the wrongs charged; I had always felt it, always believed it, and I told him that I was very happy to get this denial from him, and then I recurred to the future provided for by the arrangement that had been made that evening—consummated that evening. I told him that Mr. Beecher loved him, and that Mr. Beecher was disposed to serve him greatly. Well, he said that Mr. Beecher had great qualities, and that he loved Mr. Beecher, notwithstanding all that had happened; that he was a man of grand qualities with great weaknesses, and that he did believe that Mr. Beecher loved him, and was disposed to serve him, and "he will serve me," he said, "because I have rendered him in my day a great service." Said he: "Did I ever tell you what I did for his son Harry?" He said: "Did I ever tell you that story?" Said I: "No; you never told me that story." Then he went on.

MR. TILTON'S INTERCESSION FOR MR. BEECHER'S SON.

Q. Give what he said? A. He told me that in the first year of the war, Harry had fallen into a deep trouble by some misconduct which he would not characterize, but which he subsequently did characterize—had fallen into deep trouble in a Brooklyn regiment in which he was an officer, and that it became necessary to transfer him from the volunteer service into the regular army to save him from ruin, and that the father had come to him in tears and had told him of the trouble in which his son was and his own grief and anxiety, and the sorrow and anxiety of the whole family about the boy, and he said: "I wish you to go on to Washington immediately and get him into the regular army," "and he gave me $50," says Mr. Tilton. "and without waiting for a change of clothing, I crossed the ferry and took the first train to Washington. On my way over," said he, "I read in a newspaper that there was to be a meeting of the Governors of several of the loyal States, and some leading members of Congress and some Generals, at the house of the Secretary of War the next morning, to have a conference about the condition of the country, and the idea occurred to me that I would go to that meeting, and that before I left that meeting I would get that commission for Mr. Beecher's son. I got to Washington early in the morning," he said, "washed myself up, brushed my hair, and at the proper hour I went to Simon Cameron's house, whom"—by the way he said—"I had never seen and didn't know," and he said it was not difficult, with strangers entering the house for the purpose of that reunion, that conference, for him to get in; the servant let him in without obstruction, and he went in, and he asked which was the Secretary of War, and Mr. Cameron was pointed out to him, and he went up and introduced himself to Mr. Cameron as connected with The Independent newspaper, I think he said, and Mr. Cameron was polite to him and invited him to breakfast, which had been appointed, and he he said went and took his place at the breakfast table with the Governors of the States and the leading members of Congress, and some generals in the army; he participated in the conversation, took his share, and bore his part, and had devoted himself directly to winning Mr. Cameron, and that he got out of himself everything there was of the best of judgment, everything there was of the best of anecdote; the wittiest things he could think of he said, and he fascinated the Secretary of War; he won him, he thought, completely, so that when the breakfast was over, and the party broke up, it was an easy thing for him to take him one side and state to him Mr. Beecher's extreme need of the salvation of his son from some disgrace in a Brooklyn regiment, by his being immediately transferred into the regular army, and, said he, "I asked him to give me that forenoon a commission for Harry in the regular service," and he told me he would do anything for me whatsoever, and asked me to take his arm and go with him up to the War Department, and he said he took his arm and he went up to the War Department with him and he handed him a commission for his [Mr. Beecher's] son in the regular army; and Mr. Tilton said he took the next train for New-York and put into Mr. Beecher's hand the commission for his son, and that Mr. Beecher drew him to his bosom, and, with tears in his eyes, kissed him on both cheeks and said, "As long as I lived, if I ever wanted anything from him I should get it from him for that supreme service of his life that I had rendered him." I told him that that was a very great service to render a father, and soon thereafter I went out of the house.

Q. Where did you go then? A. I went to Mr. Bowen's.

Q. Did you communicate to Mr. Bowen the interview which you had with Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Bowen was in the hall—

Mr. Beach—We object to that, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Hill]: Will you read that question to me?

Mr. Evarts—It is not material.

Mr. Hill—I don't care to press it. [To the witness]; Now, Mr. Wilkeson, do you know who performed that service for Mr. Beecher, and how it was performed? A. I do.

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Hill]: It is immaterial, Sir. I will rule it out.

Mr. Evarts—We offer to prove, Sir, the actual transaction was—

Judge Neilson—I understand it perfectly.

Mr. Evarts—Performed by Mr. Wilkeson.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—In obtaining from Secretary Cameron this favor to Mr. Beecher and his son.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—And that there was not a word of truth in this statement of Mr. Tilton's.

Judge Neilson—In other words, you call out a conversation with Mr. Tilton upon a service performed at Washington which has been incidentally referred to, and which is very remote from my present inquiry, and, having called that conversation out, you propose to contradict him. It is utterly immaterial. I rule that out, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, upon the question as to immateriality we may differ upon the matter. That is our offer, and your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—I rule it out. I would like to say that this transaction, as we had it originally from Mr. Tilton, was very slight; was referred to but incidentally, without his taking to himself any credit at all in the matter, and it is given a new face now upon your examination, and yet it is still immaterial, and if Mr. Tilton did unduly boast about it, it is equally immaterial even then. I feel constrained to rule it out. I must rule it out.

Mr. Evarts—Comments on the evidence we shall have occasion to make when we come to sum up.

Judge Neilson—You will have no comments to make on evidence that I exclude, and I am making this remark by way of excusing myself from the apparent duty of excluding it. I am weak enough to do that at this moment. Proceed, Mr. Hill.

Mr. Evarts—All we ask is to have the facts of this case disclosed.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; I am not excluding the facts of this case in any sense, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Evarts—We fail to see that we are concluded by the opposite side's views of any facts that are introduced by them.

Judge Neilson—I don't see the importance of that remark. Go on, Mr. Hill.

Q. Mr. Wilkeson, when did you next see this paper which I have shown you—when did you next see this paper after that long conversation about the important service which he had rendered his son at Washington? A. About five o'clock on the afternoon of April 3d, 1872.

Q. Who brought it to you? A. Mr. Horace B. Claflin.

Q. Where? A. At my office.

Q. Please state whether the interlineations in pencil, and the yellow paper, which now appears upon it, were then attached to it as it now appears? A. They were.

Mr. Hill—I ask to have this yellow paper marked. [The yellow paper attached to the "tripartite agreement" was marked "Exhibit D 114."]

Mr. Morris [to Mr. Hill]—Let us see that last paper.

Mr. Hill—It is the same one I showed you before Judge Morris.

Judge Neilson—The yellow cover.

Q. Please state if the manuscript of that "tripartite covenant" is in your handwriting, with the exception of the signatures? A. It is, Sir; that is my handwriting.

Q. Prepared after Mr. Claflin had delivered you this draft?
A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Engrossed from it? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON DISPLEASED WITH THE COVENANT.

Q. Let me ask you, Sir, whether you had had an interview with Theodore Tilton prior to the receipt of this paper from Mr. Claflin upon the morning of the 3d of April, after your interview of the night of the 2d? A. I had, Sir.

Q. Where did it occur? A. In my office.

Q. State what occurred there? A. Mr. Tilton came in about 11 o'clock in the forenoon of the next day after the "tripartite agreement" had been accepted by him, and he had promised to execute it in Frank Moulton's study.

Mr. Beach—Well, that repetition, Sir, of past agreements and promises, when they are not referred to by the question, I think should be omitted by the witness, because we have a right to call for the conversations and the language.

The Witness—I will omit them hereafter, Mr. Beach; that was an error, Mr. Beach; I ask your forgiveness; I shall not do that again.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Hill]: Keep your witness upon the line of examination. Go on.

The Witness—It was eleven o'clock in the forenoon of April 3, and he came into my office. He was angry. He said: "I want a copy of my portion of the 'tripartite agreement.' I am not going to sign it. It has got to be altered before I sign it." I asked him what happened. Well, he said enough had happened to induce him to come to that determination, that he should not execute it. I asked him what happened to change his purpose. He said Mr. Bowen had been well taken care of by Mr. Claflin in this affair, and that Mr. Beecher had been well taken care of by me in this affair, but no one had taken care of him, and he was to be left out in the cold, and his money unpaid, and he said: "I won't sign that agreement." He said: "Let me have my portion of it to alter." I took the agreement out of my safe, and I made a copy of his portion of it and handed it to him. He sat down at a table in my room and commenced to scratch it and alter it. I remonstrated with him for going back on his agreement.

Mr. Beach—Please tell what you said, Mr. Wilkeson.

The Witness—I said that he ought not to change the arrangement that had been made; that he ought to adhere to it like a man. He said that he would never sign that agreement nor never sign any other agreement that prohibited him from pursuing Henry Ward Beecher, and he kept at his work of scratching and erasing the manuscript copy that I gave him of his share of the "tripartite agreement," but without concluding it he grabbed the work up in his hand, put it in his pocket, and stalked out of the room, and went away.

Q. Now, Sir, when the "tripartite agreement," as it now appears in evidence, came to be executed—came to be submitted to you for draft—for engrossing, were Mr. Tilton's amendments attached or submitted to you, so that you engrossed them altogether? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And this paper which you have in evidence as the "tripartite covenant" was drawn—was engrossed by you from that paper, and from amendments which Mr. Tilton had thus made? A. Yes, Sir; that is, as I understand that he had made them, because Mr. Horace B. Claflin brought them to me.

Q. Do you know whether they were in his handwriting, any portion of them? A. I don't recollect.

Q. I mean his part of the tripartite covenant? A. I don't recollect that, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Let me ask you, Mr. Wilkeson, if anything was said upon the evening of the 2d of April, at the study in Mr. Moulton's house, in characterization of any of the informants whom you named? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON DEPRECIATES HIS WIFE.

Q. Mr. Wilkeson, do you recollect a conversation which you had with Theodore Tilton at Washington prior to 1870, a conversation at dinner in regard to Mr. Tilton's wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. I think it was in 1864 or 1865.

Q. Please state it to his Honor and the jury. A. I was in the dining-room of the Ebbitt House, and he came to my chair, occupied a seat next my own after dinner, talked with me—after his own dinner—talked with me while I was eating mine. I think that he took out of his pocket and gave me a photograph of his children with their mother. He asked me if I knew his wife. I told him that I had never seen her. He told me that I would be disappointed in her; that she was a small woman, without presence, without port, not a woman of society, not a woman of culture.

Q. What? A. Not a woman of culture. He said that he had married her young, and that he had grown and developed, and that she had not, and that there was a disparity between them which would probably astonish me if I knew her. And he said that he mentioned that so that I could appreciate it if I should ever become acquainted with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Appreciate what? A. Appreciate the difference between them understandingly, or appreciate the character of the choice that he had made in a partner for life; I suppose that is what he meant.

Mr. Beach—Oh, I would a little rather be spared your suppositions, Mr. Wilkeson.

Mr. Hill—State anything further that was said by him. A. No, Sir; that was not a subject which invited lengthy conversation.

MR. OLIVER JOHNSON AND THE CHRISTIAN UNION.

Q. Mr. Wilkeson, do you know Oliver Johnson? A. I know him well.

Q. Do you know how Oliver Johnson came to be employed upon The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please state to his Honor and the jury how it happened. A. Well, in effect, I persuaded Mr. Beecher to hire him.

Mr. Beach—I submit to your Honor that that is wholly immaterial.

Judge Neilson—I think we will have to take it, although he must speak to facts and not conversations.

Mr. Hill—How did it happen? A. I persuaded Mr. Beecher to employ him.

Q. And who spoke to Mr. Johnson first about it, so far as you know? A. I did.

Q. Where did you meet him and when? A. On Broadway, in the Winter of 1871 and '72.

Q. That is prior to the time that you had the conversation with Theodore Tilton about the tripartite and about this personal statement? A. Let me see—I think that that was in 1872.

Q. What time—the “tripartite” was in 1872. A. Yes, I know; I think that was in the Winter of 1872 and '73; I am not certain about it.

Q. Do you recollect when Mr. Johnson entered upon the service? A. I do not, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Do you recollect the occasion of his going on, the fact that he did go on? A. Oh, yes; yes, Sir; that I know.

Mr. Hill—How long before he actually entered the service was it that you had this conversation with him? A. Oh, months.

Q. Months before that? A. Yes, Sir, months.

Q. Had you then, at the time of first speaking to Mr. Johnson upon the subject, spoken to or done anything—had you spoken to Mr. Beecher upon the subject of having Mr. Johnson employed upon the paper, or of having The Christian Union favor Tilton in any way? A. Oh, no, Sir.

Mr. Morris—One moment. We object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take the answer. [To the witness.] Do you say you had or had not? A. I had not, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You had not? A. Not a word, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Now, Mr. Wilkeson, was it in consequence of anything that Mr. Tilton ever said to you, or anything that you ever said to Mr. Tilton, that Mr. Johnson was applied to by you to go upon The Christian Union? A. Oh, no, Sir; not at all. I simply wanted to get a good managing editor for the paper; that is all.

Q. Well, Sir, please state what you did with Mr. Beecher in connection with employing or persuading him to have Mr. Johnson employed upon The Christian Union?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Tilton has made the subject of his employment on The Christian Union a part of the direct transaction of suppression and confession argumentatively of Mr. Beecher. We propose to show, as we have shown in part by another witness, so by this witness, the actual facts concerning the employment of Mr. Johnson, which consists of this witness's (this witness being a partner and part owner of The Christian Union) speaking to Mr. Johnson about it with a view of getting a good editor for it, as he says, and then speaking to Mr. Beecher, and then of the consummation of the transaction, which, if the testimony is given, and is credited, excludes the idea that it forms any part of Mr. Beecher's transaction through Mr. Tilton, and with Mr. Tilton, as testified to by Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I understand that, and therefore this witness can state whether that editor was employed at his intervention; the general fact is what we want.

Mr. Beach—He has stated that he first spoke to Mr. Johnson about it, and then that he persuaded Mr. Beecher to employ him; it is pretty broad. It is in evidence; we will see what it amounts to by and by.

Mr. Hill—Now, Mr. Wilkeson, please state if the mode which you have given was the only mode, so far as you know, or the only means by which Mr. Johnson and Mr. Beecher were brought together, and he finally brought into the employ of The Christian Union?

Mr. Beach—I object to that, Sir, as immaterial.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Hill—What is the answer?

Judge Neilson—So far as you know.

[Question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

The Witness—It was the only mode.

Judge Neilson—Well, what he wants is the general fact, of course.

MR. BEECHER'S PART OF THE AGREEMENT KEPT.

Mr. Hill—Have you “Exhibit No. 78,” Judge Morris—Plaintiff's “Exhibit No. 78?”

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—I will use this copy of it; it is just as well. [Handing witness a paper.] Mr. Wilkeson, please look at the paper now shown you, “Exhibit 73,” by copy; state whether you recognize that as an article which you prepared and wrote? A. Yes, Sir, I wrote that article.

Q. And it was published in The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By your solicitation? A. No, Sir; I gave it to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Prepared it yourself for publication? A. I prepared it myself; I didn't want him to do any writing like that.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out the balance—the latter paragraph.

Judge Neilson—That is stricken out. “I prepared it myself” is the end of the answer.

Q. Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, did Mr. Beecher have anything to do with the publication of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he request or suggest that it be prepared by you?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

The Witness [answering]—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It is considered by the prior answer.

The Witness—That was in carrying out, if you please; just carrying out the “tripartite” understanding; that is all.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment, Mr. Wilkeson, please.

Mr. Hill—Why did you write this article, “Exhibit 73?”

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You can ask him whether he can suggest any circumstance that led him to write it.

Mr. Hill—Yes, state any circumstance. A. The arrangement made between us all when the “tripartite covenant” was executed—I complied with my part of the bargain; I used the paper for it.

THE COVENANT GIVEN TO THE PUBLIC BY MR. WILKESON.

Q. Mr. Wilkeson, did you know of the circumstance of the publication of the "tripartite covenant" at the time it occurred? A. To the extent to which it was published?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know who caused the publication of that document? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So far as it was published? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, please state who did it. A. I did it.

Q. Had any other person anything to do with the publication of it, or with the furnishing of that document, or the contents of it, to the press for publication? A. One of my co-partners, of the house of Ford & Co., was associated with me in the publication of it; to that extent only did any other person have anything to do with it.

Q. Was that Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; Mr. Beecher is not in the house of Ford & Co.

Q. Now, Sir, so far as you know, did Mr. Beecher know anything about the publication of the "Tripartite Agreement?"

A. I am not aware that he knew anything about it, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. WILKESON.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Wilkeson, in the narrative of the conversation at which Mr. Tilton was present, how far have you assumed to give the language used by him, or by the other parties to the conversation, except yourself? A. As closely as I can recollect.

Q. Well, is your recollection so accurate that you have, in your judgment, succeeded in giving the precise language used? A. The precise language in part and the precise language in effect; because I have turned this over in my memory, Mr. Beach, ten thousand times; I am very familiar with it.

Q. How do you say that it is the precise language in effect, if you do not recollect the precise language? A. I may use a word—

Q. Please answer that question.

Mr. Everts—He is going to.

The Witness—Repeat that again.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Everts] I know as much about that as you do, whether he is going to.

Mr. Everts—He has opened his mouth; that is all I know.

The Witness—Repeat your question, please, Mr. Beach.

Mr. Beach—I asked you how you can say, where you do not use the precise language, that you give the precise language in effect, when you do not recollect what the precise language was?

Mr. Everts—Has he said he did not recollect what the precise language was?

The Witness—I recollect both; I recollect, combined, the precise language and the language in effect, as I have given it; I recollect it distinctly.

Mr. Beach—The question is put behind me, whether you have said that you did not recollect the precise language; do you recollect the precise language of all the conversation? A. About all, Sir.

Q. About all? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, can you discriminate between the parts which you have given, which represents the precise language and those which do not? A. Well, Sir, I—I can't say about that.

Q. Can't say? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then you are not able to tell me what portions of those conversations are given by you in the precise language used by Mr. Tilton and what portions are not? A. I think, Sir, that the—

Q. Well, can you do that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You can? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, will you give me—

The Witness—[Continuing.] Pretty much entirely.

Q. What? A. Pretty much entirely.

Q. Well, then, you mean to say that pretty much the entire part of your narrative of these conversations is given in the precise language used by the parties? A. Yes, Sir; as accurately as conversation can ever be reported, Mr. Beach.

Q. Well, that is a very important qualification. I was not asking you with reference to any such qualification, but for the simple fact whether you undertake to give the precise language used by Mr. Tilton in the conversations you had with him? A. Precise in parts, and the whole of it in effect.

Q. Yes; that is, in parts you give the precise language, and in other parts what you understand to be the substance of what he said? A. Yes, Sir; the substance and effect of what he said.

Q. Now, I ask you whether you can discriminate between the parts of your narrative which employ the precise language used by Mr. Tilton and those which are merely given in substance? A. Well, Sir, I don't divide it; I don't disconnect it.

Q. What? A. I don't divide it.

Q. I don't think that is responsive to my question; at least it does not meet the question entirely. I understand you to say that portions of your narrative employ the precise language used by Mr. Tilton, and portions are only expressive of the substance and effect of what he said, and now I ask you whether you can, from recollection, now discriminate between those two classes of the narrative? A. Well, Sir, I don't think that I can do that.

Q. Don't think you can do it? A. No.

FEATS IN MEMORY.

Q. Then you are not able to point out to me, now, what portions of these conversations you have given in the precise language of Mr. Tilton, if you cannot discriminate between them? A. I could give you portions of those.

Q. Well, do so, if you please, Sir. A. I recollect the precise words that he used in the interview with me on the morning after he had agreed to sign the "tripartite covenant" as it was originally prepared.

Q. Well? A. The precise words that he used in a portion of that interview were, "I will never sign any agreement which will prohibit me from pursuing Mr. Beecher"—"from pursuing Henry Ward Beecher." Those were his precise words. [Applause.]

Q. And when was that interview? A. On the morning of April 8, 1872.

Q. And at this distance of time your memory is so accurate that you can swear positively that those were the precise words he used? A. Positively.

Q. Can you give any other parts of his language in that conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, give it? A. "Mr. Bowen has been well taken care of by Mr. Claflin; Mr. Beecher has been well taken care of by you, but nobody has taken care of me, and I have been left out in the cold, and my money is not to be paid."

Q. Any other? A. Of the precise language I think that is all that I am qualified to—that I am qualified now—

Q. And you, of course, are a gentleman who understands the force and effect of the phrase "precise language?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The very words you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in any other part of these conversations which you have given, can you detail the precise language used by Mr. Tilton? A. I can.

Q. Well, give it? A. An evening before, in Frank Moulton's study, he says: "I am willing to sign that agreement twelve times over, if that will induce Henry C. Bowen to sign it once."

Q. Well. A. He also said: "I can conscientiously and cheerfully sign that agreement."

Q. Yes. A. That was his precise language.

Q. Anything else, any more of that conversation can you give in his precise language? A. He said in precise words that there was not—

Q. Oh! no, he didn't say it in that way. A. He said, to use his words precisely—he said that there was not a particle of truth in any of the statements that had been made about Mr. Beecher's adulterous connection with his wife—not a particle of truth in them; that the utmost that Mr. Beecher had ever done was to address improper language to Mrs. Tilton, and for that an ample, a written, apology was in his keeping; those were his precise words.

Q. Had a written apology in his keeping? A. An ample written apology in his keeping I think he said; I think he used the word "keeping."

Q. Well, are you sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you give any further of his precise language? A. Well, that is with the exception of what I have already testified to, Sir—

Q. Oh! no; I ask you now, Sir; now. Can you give anything further of his precise language in any of these conversations? A. [After reflection.] Well, I don't—I can't say, Sir, that I can give precisely his language in the other interviews between them, and shall limit myself to the language in effect.

Mr. Beach—It is suggested, Sir, that the hour of recess has arrived.

The Court here took a recess until two o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment. Samuel Wilkeson was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

A MEMORANDUM OF THE CONVERSATIONS.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Wilkeson, upon your direct examination, did you assume to give, so far as you then recollected, the precise language of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; the precise language, and the language in effect.

Q. No, but the precise language, so far as you recollected the precise language, is my question? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you aware upon your cross-examination, in giving the precise language as you recollected, that you varied in any particulars from the narration which you gave on your direct examination? A. I am not aware, Sir, that I did; I may have done so.

Q. How can that be, Sir, if you gave the precise language at both times?

Mr. Everts—Don't reason with the witness.

The Witness—Well, Sir, it is exceedingly difficult, for me at least, to repeat a conversation twice in precisely the same terms.

Q. I suppose so; it is for anybody. A. It is for anybody, Mr. Beach.

Q. But to some extent you have undertaken to give the precise language positively, haven't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have assumed to do it both upon the direct and cross-examination, you said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How do you account for variations, if there are any, in relation to the same particular expression? A. The inherent infirmity of human memory.

Q. Then, from the inherent infirmity of human memory, you may have varied from the precise language, even when you undertake to give it? A. In words, but not in effect.

Q. Ah, yes, in words, but not in effect; that is, in effect as you understand it? A. In effect as all men understand it.

Q. Oh, no; all men don't understand what you have been saying here. A. All men who have heard me do.

Q. How? A. All who have heard me do, Mr. Beach.

Q. No, they don't understand it to be the effect of the precise language you heard; that is, where you have given the effect of the language you have given it according to the best of your recollection? A. According to the best of my honest belief Sir, under oath.

Q. Yes, and yet, by reason of the infirmity of recollection, you may possibly be mistaken? A. In immaterial words I may be mistaken. I may change words, but the ideas—the ideas I do not change.

Q. The ideas that were impressed upon your mind, you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But not recollecting the precise words, it is not impossible that you may have derived an imperfect idea, is it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you make any memorandum of these conversations? A. I did make a memorandum of his conversation of the morning of April 2.

Q. Of the morning of April 3? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where is that memorandum? A. It is at my office, at No. 23 Fifth-ave.

Q. Well, it would be a great gratification to us if you could produce it. A. I can't produce it now.

Q. No, of course not. Will you produce it on the next meeting of the Court? A. I will, if I can find it; I suppose I can find it.

Q. Is it in ink or pencil? A. Ink.

Q. Do you now recollect any of the phrases of that memorandum? A. A general statement—

Q. No, no; I asked you if you now recollected any of the phrases of that memorandum? A. That he said that he never would—

Q. Well, won't you— A. Yes, Sir; I do; I do recollect; yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. I don't ask what is in it; it is not proper for me to ask what is in it? A. Yes.

Q. You recollect some of the phrases. Do you recollect the concluding phrase of the memorandum? A. The concluding phrase? I do not recollect the concluding phrase.

Q. Or any part of the concluding words? A. The concluding words? I cannot say that I do recollect any part of the concluding words. The vital part of the memorandum in my mind, I can give you, if you want it.

Q. I would rather have the memorandum, with your pardon. That is made upon an ordinary sheet of paper? A. Upon a half sheet of foolscap paper, made within ten minutes after he left the office.

Q. About what length was it—is it? A. A page of foolscap.

Q. Covering the whole page? A. Pretty much the whole page.

Q. Well, quite to the bottom of the page? A. Well, we will give up two lines at the bottom, if you please, Mr. Beach.

Q. Why didn't you bring it with you? A. It didn't occur to me. I am inexperienced somewhat in giving testimony in Court. It is the second time in my life that I have ever been on the witness stand. It did not occur to me that it was necessary to do it.

Q. Why did you make it? A. I felt that the occasion—I felt that this—I felt that this thing was going to drift into a great judicial contest, Sir, and I felt the importance of making that memorandum.

Q. When did that feeling supervene—when did it occur? A. It occurred within fifteen minutes after he laid down on my table the proof slip of the article called the "Personal Statement," which he threatened to publish in the next number of The Golden Age, if Mr. Beecher did not do him justice.

Q. Well, that was on March 29? A. That was March 29.

Q. Did you make any memorandum of the conversation of March 29? A. No, Sir, I only treasured it in my memory.

Q. Yes. Well, if you had this apprehensive feeling upon that occasion, why did you make any distinction between the importance of these conversations in making a memorandum? A. Because that last—his conversation with me in that interview of the morning of the 3d of April I felt to be critical.

Q. Critical. Now, will you please give me that conversation? A. He told me that he wanted a copy of his portion of the "Tripartite Agreement." He said that he was not going to sign it. He said that Mr. Bowen had been well taken care of by Mr. Claflin, and Mr. Beecher had been well taken care of by me, but that he had not been taken care of by anybody, but was left out in the cold, and the money that was due to him from Bowen was not to be paid to him.

Q. Is that all of it? A. And he would not sign any agreement whatsoever that should prohibit him from pursuing Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Is that all of it? A. That is all of it, until I handed him a copy of his portion of the "Tripartite Agreement."

Q. Well, anything that was said at that interview, please state it. A. He stated at that interview that Mr. Bowen was not going to pay him the money that was due to him, and that the suit would have to go on.

Q. Yes, well; anything else said at that interview? A. That was about all, Sir.

Q. Are you aware that at that time arbitrators had been agreed upon? A. No, Sir; wait a moment.

Q. This is April 3d, at 11 o'clock a. m.? A. Yes, Sir; I knew the arbitrators had been agreed upon; yes, Sir; I knew that they had been agreed upon.

Q. How did you understand the suit was to go on if arbitrators had been appointed? A. I didn't understand that—that the suit was to go on.

Q. You say that he told you that the suit would have to go on? A. That is all; he told me that; I had no other knowledge of it than that.

Q. Well, you understand it from him then? A. Only from him.

Q. And yet you knew at the time that arbitrators had been appointed? A. I had heard that they were appointed.

Q. Do you happen to have heard that on the night of April 2d the arbitrators had not only been appointed, but had made an award? A. No, Sir; I had not.

Q. Had not heard that? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you had not heard that on the night of April 2d not only had the award been made but Mr. Bowen had given his check for the money? A. No, Sir; I had not heard that.

Q. And yet you are positive that on the morning of April 3d Tilton said that Bowen was not to pay him the money, and that the suit would have to go on? A. I am perfectly positive on that point.

Q. Perfectly positive? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beach, you forget that the check is dated April 4th.

Mr. Beach—I know it is dated April 4th, but it was given April 2d, as we have shown, and as we will show more completely. [To the witness]: The precise expression, as I understand you, which was used by Mr. Tilton in the interview on the 3d of April, was that Mr. Bowen was not to pay him his money and that the suit would have to go? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. WILKESON ANXIOUS FOR OPEN WAR.

Q. Then you say you made this memorandum because you feared or apprehended that this matter was to drift into a judicial controversy? A. I did not apprehend it, Sir, nor fear it; I desired it, but I knew—

Q. Wait. Well, go on. A. I felt that this—I felt that his refusal—

Q. Oh, I don't want to ask you what you felt. I understood you to say in an answer or two back that you made this memorandum because you feared or apprehended—I don't use the precise words— A. Felt.

Q. Oh! because you felt? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Felt that the matter would drift into a judicial inquiry? A. I felt that the proceeding would go on.

Q. Did you state in a previous answer that you made this memorandum because you felt that the matter would drift into a judicial contest? A. Yes, Sir,

Q. And you say you did not fear that contest, but desired it? A. I did not, Sir; I desired it; indeed, and I—if you care to know that I will tell you. Do you desire that, Mr. Beach?

Q. No, I do not, Sir. A. I had tried—

Q. I don't desire it. A. I ask your pardon, Sir.

Q. There is no necessity for that. What matter was it that you feared would drift into a judicial contest? A. I did not fear that any matter would—

Q. That you felt, felt, felt. Excuse me. A. Yes, felt.

Q. What matter was it that you felt would drift into a judicial contest? A. The movement that Tilton had organized against Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Well, now please excuse me, Mr. Frothingham. [Laughter.] I must have an answer to my question. I ask you what matter it was you felt would drift into a judicial contest.

Mr. Everts—Is not that an answer?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Why, I don't know any better answer than that. Will the stenographer read the answer?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question and answer referred to, as follows: "Q. What matter was it that you felt would drift into a judicial contest? A. The movement that Tilton had organized against Henry Ward Beecher."

Mr. Everts—Now, that is an answer.

Mr. Beach—I want to know, Sir, what matter it was you feared, or felt would drift into a judicial contest? A. His charges against Henry Ward Beecher for conduct unbecoming a clergyman, having in view the purpose of driving him from his pulpit.

Q. Well, that is not the question. A. And from the editorship of The Christian Union newspaper.

Q. Will you wait? I must insist that when I object to your answer you must stop, at any rate until the Court overrules me. A. You will pardon my inexperience under cross-examination, Mr. Beach, if you please. [Laughter.]

Q. I am inclined to think, Sir, that does not result entirely from inexperience. A. Wholly from inexperience, Sir; it is the first time in my life I have been under cross-examination.

Q. Now, the matter that you felt would drift into a judicial conflict was the charges that were made by Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher? A. The charges made by Tilton and Bowen against Mr. Beecher.

Q. By Tilton and Bowen against Mr. Beecher; and how did you apprehend that the charge made by Mr. Tilton of improper language used by Mr. Beecher towards Mrs. Tilton would assume the form of a judicial contest? A. Repeat that again, if you please.

AGGRESSIVE WORDS FROM THE WITNESS.

Q. How did you apprehend or understand that the charge which you now represent as made by Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher, being simply an accusation of improper language used to his wife, would drift into a judicial contest? A. I thought the time would come when Henry Ward Beecher and Henry Ward Beecher's friends would get tired of paying money to Tilton's Golden Age newspaper for the purpose of suppressing a scandal against the reputation of the greatest preacher and the greatest man in this world. [Sensation.]

Q. Yes. Well, you have been a lawyer, haven't you, Mr. Wilkeson? A. Well, nominally. I was educated to the bar; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you was admitted to the bar, wasn't you? A. Yes, Sir; admitted, and practiced for a very short time.

Q. How long? A. Oh, three or four years when I was young.

Q. Now, I ask you how you supposed that charge, of which I have spoken, against Mr. Beecher, made by Mr. Tilton, could become the subject of judicial investigation? A. Because I knew that it would grow in its pertinacity.

Q. I asked you how you, as an educated lawyer, could understand that that subject-matter could become the subject of a judicial contest? A. Oh, simply from the instincts of an intelligent man that knew that plaintiff [pointing to Mr. Tilton]. [Sensation.]

Q. How did you suppose it could be done? A. How did I suppose it could be done?

Q. Yes, Sir; did you suppose that was actionable, that Mr. Beecher addressed improper language to his wife? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not suppose it was? A. No, Sir; I knew that that cause of action, which is no cause of action—I knew that it would grow.

Q. Grow? A. Grow.

Q. Oh, grow? A. Grow. [Laughter.]

Q. Now, you spoke about the tribulations of Mr. Beecher and his friends to the support of The Golden Age. Had you any personal knowledge of any such contributions? A. His visit to me on—

Q. Oh, answer me, if you had any personal knowledge of any such contributions? A. I had, Sir. On April 3d I had personal knowledge of it. He came to me for money.

Q. Who? A. Tilton.

Q. You have not said so in your relation— A. I have said so, and you tried to exclude it. I think you had it struck out of the evidence, that I knew that his object in coming to me was to get money from Bowen.

Q. Have you related in any narrative of the conversation of April 3d, any application or solicitation for money on the part of Mr. Tilton? A. No application and no solicitation at all, except that it was involved in the very visit, and the handing to me of the article which he threatened to publish in the next number of The Golden Age. That put the screws to me.

Q. That put the screws to you? A. That put the screws to me [Laughter,] and he got out of me what he wanted; he got money out of me.

Q. What money did he get out of you? A. He got the money that Bowen owed to him.

Q. Got it out of you? A. Yes, Sir; he got it out of me because I initiated the influence that brought it about.

Q. I don't want your reason. Had you any knowledge that at the time of either of these interviews, either Mr. Beecher or any friend of Mr. Beecher had contributed any money to the support of The Golden Age? A. No, Sir.

Q. And at either of these interviews was there any suggestion or solicitation on the part of Mr. Tilton toward any such contributions? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was that the paper which he showed you on March 24th? [Handing witness a paper.] A. I cannot tell if that is the particular paper, but it is a paper just like that; I think so.

Mr. Morris—Look at the bottom.

Mr. Beach—Would you recollect that slip in Johnson's handwriting being at the bottom? A. No, Sir; I do not; I have no recollection.

Q. A paper just like this? A. I don't say with that attachment at the bottom. It was a personal statement—the personal statement. I recollect now distinctly that there was no writing appended to the bottom of it, none at all; that I recollect distinctly. It was simply a press proof, and very well worn, showing industrious circulation and use and exhibition to other people. [Laughter.]

Q. Oh! very well, Sir; I don't care. I am perfectly willing to indulge those expressions upon your part, although I consider them entirely inappropriate and unjustifiable. A. You will pardon them all, Mr. Beach, if you please, to my inexperience.

Q. I cannot pardon them, Sir; they are so often repeated, and evince a feeling which I cannot pardon. A. I think the feeling is justifiable.

Q. I know you think so, Sir; I do not. This extract from the "Tripartite Covenant" you have identified as a transcript at least of the paper which was shown you? A. I think that is the personal—a personal statement like that. I think that is it.

Q. Well, it is that part of the "Tripartite Covenant" which follows the title, "A Personal Statement"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And only that part? A. I think that that was what he showed me; not that particular paper. I cannot identify a proof slip taken off an ordinary proof press in a printing office, Sir; I can't do that.

Q. Do you recollect whether or not that paper contained any reference to any supposed relations as between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. I cannot recall, Sir, that—the statement—the allegations in that personal statement; I cannot recall them, Sir. I never read that from that day to this.

Q. Well, Sir, the point I ask your recollection to is whether you remember that the paper shown to you contained any allusion whatever to the supposed relations or alleged relations between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. I think it did not, Sir; I think it did not.

Q. It was composed, so far as any accusation against Henry Ward Beecher was concerned—it was composed entirely of the allegations made or supposed to have been made by Mr. Bowen?

A. That is my present recollection, Sir, but I won't be positive about it; I never have seen that paper from that day to this; never have read it.

Q. Well, you are correct, Sir, in your recollection of it. Had Mr. Tilton ever shown you that paper before? A. Never, Sir.

Q. Had you before that ever had any conversation with him in regard to that paper? A. Never, Sir.

Q. Or any in regard to the publication of any other paper? A. Never, Sir.

Q. Prior to that time there had never been any conversation between you and Mr. Tilton in regard to these charges against Mr. Beecher of any kind? A. Never, Sir.

Q. Of no kind? A. Never, Sir; of no kind.

Q. And never any communication between you in any form in regard to the publication of any paper? A. No, Sir, to the best of my knowledge and belief—recollection and belief.

MR. WILKESON ENCOURAGES MR. TILTON.

Q. Well, I see that you are very confident in your memory. Is that a letter of yours [handing witness a letter]? A. "January 11, 1871."

Q. Wait a moment. Read it to yourself. A. That is my letter, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I introduce it in evidence.

Mr. Evans—Let us look at it. [Taking the letter.]

Mr. Beach—[Reading]:

JANUARY 11, 1871.

DEAR TILTON: You are in trouble. I come to you with a letter just mailed to Jay Cooke, advising him to secure your services as a platform speaker, to turn New-England, Old England and the great West upside down about our Northern Pacific. Pluck up heart. You shan't be trampled down. Keep quiet. Don't talk. "DON'T PUBLISH" [underscored with three lines]. "Bide your time, and it will be a very good time, take my word for it."

[Marked "Exhibit 114"]

Q. In using the term, "Don't publish," what did you refer to? A. I referred to rumors that I heard that he was going to attack Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Yes; and you underscored the words "Don't publish" with reference to parol attacks? A. Parol attacks? No; written attacks.

Q. Well, what did you expect he was going to publish? A. Charges against him that embodied the slanders that I had heard circulating through the community.

Q. And that was on the 11th of January, 1871? Is that the date of the letter?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; I wrote that letter.

Q. I know you did.

Mr. Evans—He says so.

Mr. Beach—Yes, I know he says so. [To the witness.] And when did you hear that he was going to publish those charges against Mr. Beecher? A. I don't know.

Q. Whom did you hear them from? A. I cannot tell that.

Q. Quite certain you heard them? A. I must have heard them to have written—

Q. Oh, now, you are reasoning. A. Yes, Sir, I reason.

Q. I ask your recollection? A. You cannot draw on that now, because it will fail me.

Q. I shall draw on it. A. You may draw all that there is, you know, but I can't recollect now. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, I am going to try. Have you now any recollection that prior to January 11, 1871, you had heard any rumor that Mr. Tilton was going to publish these charges against Mr. Beecher; have you now any recollection? A. Yes, Sir, I think I must have heard that.

Q. Oh, that is reasoning; I am asking you for your recollection? A. Well, Sir, I cannot recollect.

Q. You don't recollect it? A. No, Sir; yet I must have heard that.

Q. Well, do you recollect of having had any interview on the subject of these charges, with Mr. Tilton, prior to Jan. 11, 1871? A. I never did, Sir.

Q. Quite sure you never did? A. I am certain of that, Sir; at least I think I am. Human memory is very imperfect. I simply try to be absolutely honest as I go through life. My memory may be defective; my integrity is not defective. [Laughter.]

Q. You are a member of the firm of Ford & Co., publishers, I understand? A. I am a member of it; yes, Sir.

Q. And how long have you been? A. Since its organization; five years.

Q. Is that firm publishing The Life of Christ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The first volume published? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is the second volume published? A. Not published, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Do you speak of this date?

Mr. Beach—Oh! no, Sir, the question did not refer to this date. [To the witness.] You married the sister of Mrs. Stanton, who has been spoken of in this investigation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Stanton is a lady of refinement and position, is she not? A. Yes, Sir; high position and refinement, and great intelligence.

Q. Very unusual intelligence for a lady? A. Unusual intelligence for a woman, Sir.

Q. Did you say to her that these scandals would "knock The Life of Christ higher than a kite?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you say it in her presence, in words or substance? A. I did not.

Q. What? A. I said in her presence not that, Sir.

Q. In substance? A. No, Sir. Do you desire to know what I said?

Q. No, not just now, unless you desire to do it. A. I will tell you, if you wish to know, precisely what I said.

Q. No. I will listen to it if you desire; I do not ask for it. A. Mrs. Stanton and two others of her sisters were in the room; we were talking; one of them had introduced this subject—

Q. I really don't want to open that whole conversation, A. It won't be large, Sir; very short, very short.

Q. Well, I don't know but it may relate to matters which would not be very interesting. A. Well, I will make it perfectly safe for you by telling you a question that one of the sisters put to me; in case that these charges and imputations against Henry Ward Beecher should prove upon investigation to be true—

Mr. Beach—I don't take this as a part of my examination, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You had better stop it then.

Mr. Everts—Stop it if you wish to.

Mr. Beach—I was perfectly willing to receive it as an explanation on the part of the witness, but not drawn out on my examination.

Mr. Everts—Well, but it comes in answer to the question—very likely the counsel is not obliged to take it—it comes in answer to the question whether he said that, or that in substance, and then the witness said: "I will tell you what I did say, if you wish." It is not an improper statement of the witness at all.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no; there is nothing improper on the part of the witness.

Q. Now, you had a brief private conversation, I think, on the 3d of April, with Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton and others having left the room. Will you please repeat that conversation, Mr. Wilkeson? A. I said to Mr. Tilton, now that the trouble between him and Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher had been happily concluded and arranged for, that I would like to get from him the truth of the statements that I heard that Mr. Beecher had committed adultery with his wife. I spoke of a statement that had been made to me by a particular lady whom I named.

Q. Well, I want you to give me what you said about that statement? A. To the effect that—

Q. No; I want you to begin and give the narrative of what you said to him upon that subject? A. That lady told me—

Q. Give me the name, and all? A. That Mrs. Elizabeth—I thought the names of women were not to be brought into this controversy.

Mr. Morris—They brought them in on the other side.

Mr. Everts—[To Mr. Morris.] The ladies on your side are not to be brought in, but those on our side are.

The Witness—I will bring them in only on compulsion. I don't think gentlemen ought to bring in the names of ladies—of reputable women into this case.

Mr. Beach—We have had several very reputable and distinguished ladies whose names have been introduced in this case.

The Witness—[To Judge Neilson.] Have I got to mention the name of this lady?

Judge Neilson—Not absolutely, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Not got to! I asked him what he said in connection with the names to Mr. Tilton.

MR. TILTON DENOUNCES MISS ANTHONY.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Go on and answer it. A. I told him that Mrs. H. B. Stanton had told me that Mr. Tilton had told her that Henry Ward Beecher had committed adultery with his wife. I told him that Mrs. H. B. Stanton had told me that Susan B. Anthony had told her that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to her that she had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher. I asked Mr. Tilton if there was any truth in either of those allegations—those statements. He told me, in reply to my inquiry about Susan B. Anthony, that she was a morbid old maid. [Laughter.] That she was an old maid in whom the suppression of the sexual instinct had bred morbid disease of the imagination [Laughter]; that she had morbidly imagined what she said; that there was not a word of truth in it; that it was only a fabrication and imagination, wholly so; and he said, as for Mrs. Stanton, he was astonished that a woman of her intelligence and truthfulness, and of her general character throughout the United States, should ever have said such a thing; he said that she must have been wholly mistaken. Any way, he said that he had never told her any such thing—never—and he repeated it over.

MR. BEECHER'S OFFENSE THE USE OF "IMPROPER LANGUAGE."

Q. Well, what else? A. Then he said—this is drawn out of me on the cross-examination; I did not testify to this on the direct, you know—then he said that Mrs. Tilton—Mr. Beecher had never committed any offense against him, except to address improper language to his wife, and that for that he had an ample, written apology in his keeping.

Q. Now, you are sure the term he used was "improper language"? A. I am perfectly sure of it, Sir; because I weighed these words well, as I imagined what they might be, and I have subsequently been called to account in about fifty newspapers in the United States for telling the story.

Q. This was on the 2d of April? A. The night of the 2d of April, 1872.

Q. The night of the 2d of April? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. [Handing a letter to the witness.] Is that another letter of yours? A. That is my letter. In writing that letter I evidently mistook the date; that letter is wrongly dated; it should be dated April 3d.

Q. Why do you say it should be dated April 3d? A. Because I recollect distinctly writing it the morning after the interview of April 2d, after the whole thing was concluded, and the "Tripartite Agreement" was settled.

Mr. Beach [Reading]:

NEW-YORK, April 2d, 1872.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach.] Do you propose to read it?

[Mr. Beach here handed the letter to Mr. Evarts for inspection, and he and Mr. Morris held a whispered consultation.]

Mr. Beach—While the gentlemen are looking at this letter, I will ask another question.

Q. What time, on April 2d, did you write this letter? A. The first thing in the morning after I got to the office.

Q. How early was that? A. What, Sir?

Q. How early was that? A. My habit was to get to the office at nine o'clock in the morning.

Q. You wrote this letter before your interview of April 2d with Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach [Reading]:

—, April 2d, 1872.

MY DEAR MOULTON: Now for the closing act of justice and duty.

Let Theodore pass into your hands the written apology which he holds for the "improper advances"—[quoting]—and do you pass it into the flames of the friendly fire in your room of Reconciliation.

Then let Theodore talk to Oliver Johnson.

I hear that he and Carpenter, the artist, have made this whole affair the subject of conversation in the clubs.

Sincerely yours,

SAMUEL WILKESON.

[Letter marked "Exhibit No. 115."]

Q. Why did you attach to these words, "improper advances," quotation marks? A. Repeat that.

Q. Why did you attach to these words, "improper advances," in this letter, quotation marks? A. I don't know.

Q. [Handing the letter to the witness.] Look at the letter. A. I cannot tell you; it is so long since.

Q. You can recollect the precise language, "improper language," that was the term used before that, on the 29th of March? A. Well, they are convertible terms, any way. What is the use of making a distinction between them?

Q. I do not think they are exactly convertible terms. You understand them to be so, then. In the testimony you give, you understand them to be convertible terms, do you? A. "Improper language"—"improper advances."

Q. Yes. A. Well, no; they are not precisely convertible terms, when I come to think upon it.

Q. No? A. I cannot tell, Sir, why I used quotation marks on these words; I cannot tell that.

Q. Have you any idea where you got that expression from—"improper advances"? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you talked with anybody else prior to that, except with Mr. Tilton, in regard to the nature of the language or advances which had been made by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

THE INFORMATION AGAINST MR. TILTON.

Q. Is there any source now within your recollection from which you could have derived that term except Mr. Tilton? A. The women's rights women, in the midst of whom I happened to live by the accident of marriage.

Q. It aint an accident, then? A. Bless the accident! [Laughter.]

Q. Where had you become acquainted with Mrs. Anthony?

Mr. Evarts—Miss Anthony.

Mr. Beach—Miss Anthony?

The Witness—She had for years crossed my orbit of domestic life through Mrs. Stanton—my connection with Mrs. Stanton.

Q. Is she a lady of intelligence? A. Yes, Sir; a woman of strong common sense.

Q. And quite an intimate associate with your sister-in-law, Mrs. Stanton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And co-editors of The Revolution, have they not been? A. I understand so; yes, Sir.

Q. A lady of high respectability, is she not? A. I think she is, Sir.

Q. You have been thrown considerably into the circle of these ladies of advanced notions upon the subject of Woman Suffrage and the Rights of Women? A. Only on the outer edges of the circle.

Q. You didn't get into the whirlpool? A. No, Sir; that was never my unfortunate privilege.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Miss Anthony in regard to these scandals? A. Never, Sir; not a word.

Q. Mrs. Stanton in her communication with you had not used the term "improper advances?" A. No, Sir.

THE OBJECT IN PUBLISHING THE COVENANT.

Q. Now, you say you published this "Tripartite Covenant" in connection, or upon consultation, or in conversation in some way, with a partner of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What partner was that? A. Edward L. Ford?

Q. Who? A. Edward L. Ford.

Q. From whom did you obtain the copy which you had? A. Out of my safe I took it.

Q. Had you conferred with Mr. Tilton or Mr. Moulton in regard to its publication? A. Not with a human being except Mr. Ford.

Q. Not with a human being except Mr. Ford? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had anything been said by you to Mr. Cleveland, or between you, in regard to the publication? A. I think not between me and Mr. Cleveland; no, Sir.

Q. Are you quite sure of that? A. Yes, Sir; I think so, up to the time of the publication.

Q. I mean at any time before the publication? A. That is my impression, Sir.

Q. Well? A. What I mean to say is—

Mr. Beach—No, no, wait a moment.

The Witness—I simply want to be true about this thing; I want to be perfectly truthful.

Mr. Beach—I will get at it, I think, Mr. Wilkeson.

The Witness—I would like your help.

Mr. Beach—I would like to coöperate with you in all your schemes, especially the Northern Pacific.

The Witness—That will come out right soon, to the satisfaction of both of us.

Mr. Beach—I hope so.

Q. Now, is your recollection so accurate upon that subject that you can say positively that before the publication of the "Tripartite Agreement"—covenant, there had been no communication between you and Mr. Cleveland upon the subject? A. It is so accurate that I can say there had been no communication between him and me or any other person when I had resolved to do it, and put the thing in motion. It was an act of my own personal responsibility—

Mr. Beach—Wait.

The Witness—exclusively and solely.

Mr. Beach—I don't think that is responsive to my question, Sir; but let it stand.

Q. Now, will you please answer my question, whether your recollection is so accurate that you are able to say there had been no communication between you and Mr. Cleveland upon the subject of the publication of that instrument before it was published? A. There was no communication between him and me after I prepared it and gave it out for publication.

Q. That does not answer my question. A. I cannot tell how much time intervened between the issuing of the prepared matter and putting it into type, and publishing it. In that time he may have seen it.

Q. You are reasoning, and, besides that, without intending to be offensive, you are evading my question. My question asks you whether your recollection is so accurate that you are willing to state that Mr. Cleveland and yourself had no communication upon the subject of the publication of that instrument before it was published? A. Before it was actually published? I cannot answer that question, Sir. I know he had nothing to do with its publication.

Q. Wait one moment. I understood you to say that you do not recollect what time elapsed between the period when you delivered the prepared article for publication and its actual publication; have you any recollection upon that subject? A. I think the matter was prepared in the afternoon of the day preceding the morning of the publication.

Q. Yes, preceding the morning of the publication. Now, are you quite sure that you had the possession of the paper for any time previous to its publication? A. Possession of the paper?

Q. Had you had possession of the paper from which you prepared the publication for any length of time prior to the publication? A. Why, yes, Sir; it was for months in my safe; took it out of my safe; the material out of which that publication was made was taken out of my safe.

Q. And it had been there for months? A. For months; yes, Sir; for a long while.

Q. What paper was that you took it from—the "Tripartite Covenant" itself—the original? A. I didn't have possession of the original.

Q. Sir? A. I did not have the original in my keeping.

Q. What was it you had in your safe? A. Either a draft or a copy; I don't know which.

Q. Can't you by reflection inform me which? A. I cannot, Sir.

Q. Did the publication which you made embrace the whole of the tripartite paper—covenant? A. I think not; I think it only covered Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton; I am not even certain about that, because I have never seen it from that day to this.

Q. No. Can you by referring to the instrument itself indicate to me what portions of it you published? A. I published Mr. Bowen's portion of it, certainly; I think I also published Mr. Tilton's, but I am not certain.

Q. That is, you published Mr. Bowen's covenant, or promise, or undertaking contained in it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not the heading? A. I cannot answer that question. I never saw that paper from that day to this, since it was published.

Q. You are certain you published Mr. Bowen's portion of the covenant? A. Indeed I did, Sir.

Q. And you think you did— A. I think I did—

Q. Mrs. Tilton's? A. My specific object was to publish—

Q. Oh, wait now. But you didn't publish Mr. Beecher's portion? A. No; that was—

Q. Never mind; you didn't publish it? A. I think I did not publish it. My recollection of that is indistinct.

Q. And you didn't publish the personal statement which follows the covenant? A. No, Sir.

Q. I wish you could, by taxing your recollection, state to me what the paper was that you had in your safe, whether it was a perfect transcript or duplicate of the "Tripartite Covenant," or fragmentary? A. I cannot do it, Mr. Beach.

Q. At the time when this personal statement was first submitted to you by Mr. Tilton, did you read it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you, of course, noticed the opprobrious, severe character of the imputations made in it against Mr. Beecher by Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was the character of those accusations discussed as between you and Mr. Tilton at all at that interview? A. Only the shockingness of the publication; that is all, Sir.

Q. What you said upon that subject? A. Yes, Sir, what I said in controverting it; the mischievousness—

Q. Yes, we have that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything to Mr. Tilton in that connection to the substance or effect that Mr. Beecher should be protected from him? A. Only to the—yes, Sir, I did, but I want to qualify that.

Q. Anything, Sir, that you please to say. A. Protected against the publication that I believed to be absolutely false and incapable of proof before any tribunal.

Q. Yes. A. Outrageous slanders.

THE WITNESS A FIRM BELIEVER IN MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Mr. Wilkeson, you are a firm believer in the innocence of Mr. Beecher? A. An absolute believer in his innocence.

Q. And have been from the first? A. From the first, Sir.

Q. And you have been, whenever occasion required, a firm and ardent defender of his character, have you not? A. A great defender of his character, Sir.

Q. Have you had occasion to talk somewhat frequently upon the subject? A. The matter has been pushed on me very frequently; yes, Sir.

Q. Had a considerable many discussions upon the matter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And whenever those occurred, you have taken the opportunity, to the best of your ability, and in the firmness of your belief, to vindicate him, have you not? A. I have vindicated him, either fully or briefly, according as I had patience with the theme; it is a theme I have not got much patience with.

THE EXECUTION OF THE COVENANT.

Q. Were you present at the execution of the "Tripartite Agreement"? A. No, Sir.

Q. After you had prepared it in the form in which it appears, to whom did you deliver it? A. Horace B. Claflin.

Q. Did you ever see it afterwards until this trial? A. No, Sir; never saw it until to-day.

Q. Did you make more than one copy of it? A. I made only one copy at that time from the material in my hands. I subsequently made another copy—of that? No, Sir; I never made another copy of that; I think not. That is, to the best of my knowledge and belief, I think I did not.

Q. I understand that you made this copy or original, as it is executed, from this Exhibit marked 118 from the yellow paper attached to it, and from a copy of Mr. Tilton's undertaking furnished you? A. Which Mr. Claflin brought to me when he brought that back?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Yes, Sir; I so understand it.

Q. What became of that slip, or copy, or original of Mr. Tilton's part of the covenant which was given to you by Mr. Claflin? A. I do not know.

Q. Did you keep it? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. Did you make any copy of that except what was in this original executed? A. I think I did not.

Q. You think you did not? A. I think I did not.

Q. Well, now, not having made a copy of this original, and not having made any other copy of Mr. Tilton's part of this— A. I may have made a copy; I may have kept Mr. Tilton's—

Q. I don't ask you what you may have done? A. You ask me what has become of it. I don't know where it is now.

Q. You answered me that you didn't keep it—that you thought you didn't make a copy of it? A. I didn't copy it, that is, to keep—put it in a safe and preserve it. I have not got it now. I may have made a copy of it after Mr. Claflin went away with these papers.

Q. I don't ask what you may have done. You answered me you thought you didn't keep a copy of it? A. I may have taken a copy after Mr. Claflin went away; I may have made a copy of it.

Q. Have you any recollection of it? A. No, Sir; my recollection is very vague about that. Indeed, Sir, when the original agreement was modified my interest in it got to be very feeble.

Q. When you answered me that you thought you did not keep a copy of Mr. Tilton's portion of this agreement, you answered me as you then believed, I suppose? A. Well, Sir, my recollection is imperfect about it.

Q. Did you answer me as you then believed? A. Well, Sir, that was a hasty answer, I think.

Q. Well? A. That was a hasty answer.

Q. You believed it at the time you answered it? A. Yes, Sir; but it was a hasty belief.

Q. Have you any recollection now from which you had reformed that belief? A. I think that I kept—

Q. Are you speaking now from recollection? A. Yes, Sir; now I speak from recollection; I think that I kept for a short time the paper that Mr. Claflin brought me back from Mr. Tilton in my possession. What I did with it I don't know; I don't know but that I used that for the publication in the "Tripartite Agreement;" whether I copied it I don't know; I only know that I have not got it; I must have copied it, or must have used it. These newspaper men have got pretty much out of me all the papers I ever had in the case; I have not got any others.

Q. What papers have they got of you? A. Oh, copies and drafts.

Q. Drafts of what? What drafts have they got out of you? A. After the meeting of the Church Committee there was an immense curiosity—

Q. I didn't ask you about the public curiosity. I asked simply what drafts they got out of you. A. They got out of me pretty much all the papers that I had in this case.

Q. I asked you what drafts. Drafts of what did they get out of you? A. I don't know; but that is the use I made of this paper. I have not got it. That is all I know. I am trying to account for the use of this paper.

Q. Will you answer me what draft you recollect of any paper they may have got out of you? A. I cannot specify at all, Sir. I only know that all these papers in this case are out of my possession.

John K. Porter,

Mr. Beach—A single further question, Mr. Wilkeson, which you will pardon me; was you present at the examination of Mr. Beecher before the Church Committee? A. I was, Sir.

Q. What? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Was you present at any examination of him before that Committee prior to his submission of a written statement? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was you present upon more than one occasion when Mr. Beecher appeared before the Committee and made a statement? A. I was not.

Mr. Beach—That is all, Sir.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. WILKESON.

Mr. Evarts—I wish to ask Mr. Wilkeson a question. Mr. Wilkeson, you have spoken of a memorandum on a foolscap page which you made immediately after the conversation of the 3d of April; how lately have you seen or looked at that memorandum, as you recollect? A. Within a month.

Q. Now, Sir, you have been asked in respect to a conversation with Mrs. Stanton as to whether you then said that the publication of these charges, or charges against Mr. Beecher, would "knock the Life of Christ higher than a kite," or anything to that effect, and you have answered that you did not to that effect. Now, what was that conversation?

A DRY TECHNICAL ARGUMENT.

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think when he answered the question to that effect, that was all the question called for.

Mr. Evarts—I should think not, if your Honor please; I am entitled to show by the witness what the conversation was.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You would be if he took any part in it.

Mr. Evarts—What?

Judge Neilson—You would be if he took any part of that conversation.

Mr. Evarts—But I understand it was with him.

Mr. Beach—I am quite willing that the witness should be asked to state what he said upon that subject in that conversation, but I am not willing that he should give the conversation of the other parties to the interview.

Judge Neilson—Will that be content, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—I dare say that will do to begin with, and then we will raise the question as to the rest hereafter.

Q. Now, Mr. Wilkeson, what did occur in connection with the question of the publication of those slanders, those scandals or charges, in this interview between Mrs. Stanton and yourself, and who were present?

Mr. Beach—I object, Sir, to that question.

Judge Neilson—The question is broad enough to qualify what the others said, as well as what he said.

Mr. Evarts—Well, as a part of the conversation in which he said it.

Judge Neilson—I thought you proposed to take what he said, and that perhaps would suffice.

Mr. Evarts—In reference to what others, to which what he said was applicable? Can't very well have — until you know what was said, whether you know what the witness said is by itself alone a complete exposition of the subject.

Judge Neilson—Well, where your opponent calls the witness' attention to a certain conversation, and asks him whether in that conversation he did not make the expression mentioned or something to that effect, and the witness says he did not, is not that an end of it?

Mr. Evarts—No.

Judge Neilson—He has not opened the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir; and they call a witness to contradict him. I have a right in defense of that contradiction to show what he did say by a cross-examination by a re-direct examination.

Mr. Beach—I asked the witness, Sir, whether upon a certain occasion he made a particular expression in words or substance as it is presented to him, and he says he did not.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I give no part of the conversation, and now it is contended by the gentleman that upon the footing of that inquiry, upon my part, which extracted no conversation, no declaration of the witness whatever, that they are permitted to give a conversation which occurred between these gentlemen and a third person, that being a conversation to which he supposes I referred in my question. That is the proposition, and I submit, Sir, that there is no principle of law upon which it is to be allowed.

The Witness—There is a something of untruthfulness, Judge, in my answer to that question which I do not like to sit under here.

Judge Neilson—I did not—

The Witness—I would like to tell the—

Judge Neilson—I didn't recognise it.

Mr. Evarts—The evidence is allowable certainly—

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, it was from favor to the gentleman upon the stand, that I was willing to concede that he might give what he said in that conversation, without drawing in the declaration of the other parties to it. I think it was a concession, Sir, which was not required by the law of evidence.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, I will briefly state what I suppose to be the law. The witness is asked by the cross-examining counsel whether he did not in a conversation with Mrs. Stanton, when the subject of the publication of these scandals or charges against Mr. Beecher was moved between them, say that the publication would "knock 'The Life of Christ' higher than a kite," or something to that effect. Now, the witness answers that he did not say that the publication of the scandals would "knock 'The Life of Christ' higher than a kite," or to that effect. Now, they may call a witness to prove what he did say in impeachment—this is collateral impeachment. Now, it never was heard that as the law requires them to lay the foundation of taking the witness's statement before they are allowed to call a witness to impeach or contradict—that the witness was not allowed to say what he did say in that conversation, and they must impeach him, if they impeach him at all, by the contradiction being made between what he did in fact say and—that is, according to his own statement and what they prove contradictorily against him. Now, if the witness had used the qualifying words that the publication of these slanders, if they were true, would “knock ‘The Life of Christ’ higher than”—these charges—if they were proved true, would “knock ‘The Life of Christ’ higher than a kite;” why, that is a qualification that he is entitled to make and say if you call that a statement, that the publication of these charges would “knock ‘The Life of Christ’ higher than a kite.” “I did say all these words, and some other words, if they were proved to be true.”

Judge Nelson—You could then call for the other words—no doubt of that.

Mr. Evarts—Now, they cannot call a witness, if your Honor please, to contradict a witness who has spoken himself concerning a conversation until the witness has had his say about the conversation; and the whole rule is based upon the substantive proposition of fairness and justice that the witness is to be called upon and permitted to say what he did say at the imputed conversation before they can raise the question of contradicting him. To say otherwise would permit, merely, a trap for a witness. The proposition is, and it is fundamental and familiar, that the witness is to say what he did say, and then if you find occasion and power to contradict him, you have done him no injustice.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Q. Mr. Beach—I submit to your Honor that there can be no precedent, no declaration of any elementary authors produced to your Honor to sustain the assertion of the counsel in regard to the practice, to wit: that where a witness is asked as to a declaration out of court as a foundation for an impeachment, and he denies having uttered the declaration imputed to him that it is competent for a witness before the attempt at a contradiction, to declare what he did say, and it must follow, Sir. I have asked this gentleman if he made this declaration so often repeated to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Stanton; he says he did not. There is no trap with reference to the witness into which he can fall. There is no necessity for his making an explanation or giving a qualified relation of the conversation, because if I call a witness for the purpose of contradiction I must confine the testimony precisely to the words—the language which I have called the attention of the impeached, or attempted impeached witness to. I must prove, for the purpose of impeaching this gentleman, that he made, in language or in effect, the precise words which I put into his mouth by the question, and then, Sir, the witness is at full liberty, after that evidence is given, to appear with his qualified or explanatory statement. Suppose it should happen, Sir, that I give no evidence upon that subject at all. I have not proved any part of that conversation; I have not made any portion of it evidence, and yet if the proposition of the gentleman is sustained he may give in evidence against us, the declaration made by this gentleman upon that occasion unfriendly, unfortunately, towards us perhaps, and upon what rule of law, Sir, shall they be made evidence. Another answer, Sir, to it—this is a matter which is entirely collateral—suppose the gentleman had made the declaration that these publications would have the effect upon the “Life of Christ” which is supposed by the inquiry, it only affects his recollection, perhaps it bears upon the question of his interest in the subject-matter of this litigation, but it is not a vital and important question to this issue, and it is quite questionable, I submit to your Honor, whether you would allow contradictory evidence upon that point, and whether we are not concluded by the answer of the witness upon that subject. But until we take some step for the purpose of attacking his interest upon this question of contrary declaration, it is not competent for them to give in evidence any part of that conversation, or any other declaration of the witness, than that to which we have asked his attention.

ONE OF THE JUDGE'S OWN DECISIONS CITED.

Mr. Evarts—I ask your Honor's attention to your own ruling in this case. I read from page 299 of the book, Mr. Beach on re-direct—this was of Mr. Tilton, I suppose—“Then he was asked, ‘when that card was presented or shown to Mr. Beecher’”—it may have been Mr. Moulton—yes, it is Moulton—“did you not say thus and thus,” Mr. Beach proceeds. “Suppose the witness answers that he did say that, on re-examination, are we not permitted, his memory having been refreshed by that specific question, he having added to the conversation—may we not ask him, ‘What else did you say in that conversation.’” Your Honor replies, “yes, Sir.”

“Mr. Evarts—in that connection.”

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—We have not objected to that.

“Mr. Beach—If he says he did not answer thus and thus, as inquired of, ‘But I will tell you what I did say,’ are we not permitted to ask him what it was?”

Judge Nelson—You are.

Mr. Beach—That is the course we are pursuing.”

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, so far I have conceded that they may ask what this witness did say.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; now that is the—

Mr. Beach—I object to the conversation otherwise or beyond that.

Mr. Evarts—I require no other conversation than to show what he did say, and of course what he said it to, otherwise it is not what he said.

Judge Nelson—Well, allow me to say that the peculiarity of the argument, one peculiarity, seems to be that it is addressed very largely to a contingency that may occur, to wit, an attempt to contradict this witness. In the second place the argument proceeds upon the assumption that this witness has given part of a conversation, and that therefore, upon your re-direct you have a right to call for the residue of that conversation, whereas I do not understand that this witness did give any part of the conversation whatever. On the contrary—

Mr. Everts—Your Honor has omitted the last part of your ruling.

THE CONVERSATION ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—On the contrary—one moment, one moment—on the contrary, he was asked if he didn't make a specific statement, or words to that effect, and he says no. That, in my judgment, is not taking any part of the conversation. But still within the rules of justice, you may ask him what he did say on that occasion, leaving out the conversation of the other persons, if you elect to do so.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor will remember that both forms were presented to your Honor, and received your decision. Mr. Beach put first the case of part being given, whether they could not bring out the rest.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir, now one moment; a part was given. Here no part has been given. There is a distinction.

Mr. Everts—Very well, and then he puts this case to your Honor, and the one then pending. "Mr. Beach—If he don't answer thus and thus as inquired of; but I will tell you what I did say, are we not permitted to ask him what it was?"

Mr. Beach—I concede that.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor's answer is, "Yes, Sir." Now, that is all we want to ask.

Judge Neilson—He gave some part of what was said.

Mr. Everts—He did not, if your Honor please, on this portion of the proposition that was put to your Honor, the proposition was supposing he said he did not, "but I will tell you what I did say." Now, that is our situation here. Your Honor answered him that that was right. I supposed it was, and I acquiesced. There was no exception taken to your Honor's ruling. Now, Mr. Wilkeson—

Judge Neilson—It must have been a very remarkable circumstance. Now, if you will interrogate this witness as to what he said in that connection, you are at liberty to do so.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Wilkeson, your attention has been called to a conversation in which something is supposed or suggested as having been said in regard to the effect of the publication of the charges against Mr. Beecher on the "Life of Christ." Now, Sir, was there a conversation in which that subject was mentioned? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said by you and to whom, and in answer to what?

Mr. Morris—No.

Judge Neilson—That calls for the whole conversation.

Mr. Morris—That is the objection.

Mr. Everts—Well, I will take what you said, and to whom, and who were present? A. Three sisters in the room, one of whom was Mrs. Stanton.

Q. Who were the others? A. Well, I guess that you— Just release me from bringing my sisters into this case.

Q. Very well, Mrs. Stanton was one of them? A. Mrs. Stanton one; two others being present, and in reply to an inquiry addressed to me by the younger of the two—

Q. Not Mrs. Stanton? A. Not Mrs. Stanton, she being an auditor. I said in reply to her inquiry, if these imputations and charges against Mr. Beecher are true, and if they become public, the "Life of Christ," of course, is knocked higher than a kite. [Snapping his fingers.] [Laughter.]

The Witness—Mrs. Stanton utilized a part of that.

Judge Neilson—Well, no matter.

Q. Did you suit the words with the gesture that you have just made? A. I think I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—Have the gesture in as an exhibit. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, I think you will have to be more quiet.

Mr. Everts—Well, let me have that letter, the last letter. Do you know whether you received any answer to that letter from Mr. Moulton? A. Not a word.

Q. And that letter of—that first letter; you remember that letter of the 11th of January, 1871; did you receive any answer from Mr. Tilton—I will show you that? A. No, Sir, that was simply filed against me.

Q. You received no answer to either of these letters? A. No answer.

THE WITNESS'S INTERPRETATION OF "IMPROPER LANGUAGE."

Q. Now, Mr. Wilkeson, you were asked as to the phrase, "improper advances," which is there in quotations, from what source—you have been asked from what source that phrase that you thus quoted had come to you. Can you, saw now from what source it had come? A. No, Sir; no, Sir I cannot.

Q. You have spoken of the phrase used by Mr. Tilton in his interview with you, referred to as improper language? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "Used improper language to his wife?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the phrase? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, as used by him, that phrase, "improper language to his wife," as used by him in his statement to you, did you understand it as equivalent to improper advances, as used there?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—I did, Sir—I ask your pardon, Sir; I ask your pardon; and take that back.

Q. Well, it is a proper question, I suppose—well, you answer that you did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, it is a fair question.

Mr. Beach—No; I think not.

MR. WILKESON FORCES THE HOSTILITIES.

Mr. Everts—Well, that is my view of it. Now, Mr. Wilkeson, with whom did the purpose that you carried out, of making a publication of some part of the "Tripartite Agreement," originate? A. With me, Sir.

Q. In what paper was it published by your procurement? A. I think the four great morning papers.

Q. By your procurement? A. Yes, Sir; I gave my personal indorsement to the statement, in writing in notes communicating the thing to each of those papers.

Q. Do you remember whether, after you had formed the purpose of making this publication, and had set at work to procure it, Mr. Cleveland saw you, or talked with you on the subject, with a view of preventing the publication?

Mr. Beach—Well, that—that would necessarily call, Sir, for a portion of the conversation between—

Mr. Evarts—Well, you have talked about Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. Beach—What if I have talked about him? That don't authorize you to give any part of the conversation.

Mr. Evarts—I have a right to call his attention to those interviews, and then when I offer the conversation it is for you to object to it.

Judge Neilson—The objection is that you characterize Mr. Cleveland's purpose.

Mr. Evarts—In relation to the subject.

Judge Neilson—In relation to the subject.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no, Sir.

The Witness—I recollect that Mr. Cleveland objected to the publication.

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—Do you recollect that Mr. Cleveland saw you on that subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between the time of your planning the publication? A. Yes, Sir; and the publication.

Q. And the publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Saw you on the subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember what time of day, or night, it was? A. I think about between four and five o'clock in the afternoon.

Q. That he saw you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. May it not have been later than that in the evening, or night; take your best recollection upon the subject? A. I think he saw me twice about it; saw me between four and five o'clock in the afternoon; and I think he came to my house in the evening; he saw me in the evening somewhere. I know he was quite persistent about it.

Mr. Beach—Oh, don't; don't; don't! [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Now, Sir, did anything pass between you and Mr. Cleveland, wherein he suggested or aided the publication, or the contrary?

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Mr. Evarts—We will take his Honor's decision upon that. I understand the object of the inquiry of our learned friends was to show that Mr. Cleveland had something to do with this publication.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that.

Mr. Beach—Why, your Honor, please consider we have given no evidence of any declaration of Mr. Cleveland's.

Judge Neilson—No; but you inquired, Sir, as to his action—

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; I inquired simply whether he saw this gentleman—I did not ask for anything he said or did, except simply whether they were seen. Now, does your Honor rule that that gives them the right to prove what transpired as between Mr. Wilkeson and Mr. Cleveland? It seems to me a most astonishing proposition, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Evarts, that being so, how is it receivable? I don't think it is.

Mr. Evarts—The nearest ruling we have in this case is handed to me by my associate, Mr. Abbott:

Defendant, on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, Moulton, having put in evidence Mrs. Tilton's letter of denial, but no conversation in regard to it: Held, that this entitled plaintiff, on re-direct, to prove what was said to defendant about the letter.

Judge Neilson—Oh, yes; a part of the act of delivery.

Mr. Beach—That is quite another thing.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that was what was said about the letter.

Judge Neilson—That was on the occasion when you happily illustrated the rule, showing us that such an act is double in its character, first, the manual act of handing the paper; and second, the verbal act of the delivery—the one as much the act as the other.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I offer to prove by this witness—

Judge Neilson—Well, well, I think we cannot take this.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will give me the ruling upon it, no doubt. I offer to prove by this witness that the visits of Mr. Cleveland to him in the interval of inaction—between the action of the planned publication and the actual publication, was to prevent the publication, if possible.

Judge Neilson—Well, I rule it out as immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—We except to that ruling.

Judge Neilson—The ground not opened by the other side.

Mr. Evarts—Now, Mr. Wilkeson, what was your object in making that publication?

Mr. Beach—That I object to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think I will take that, Sir, with a view to the witness—it is going a good ways.

Q. What was your object in making that publication.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, we will except to your Honor's ruling.

The Witness—I was sick and tired of seeing that great and good man dragged under the harrow of imputation, and I determined to force this fight. That is why I published it.

Mr. Evarts—That is all, Mr. Wilkeson.

The Witness—I wanted this case to be brought either into a court of criminal or civil law, where it ought to have been brought right from the start.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is all Mr. Wilkeson; that is all, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD EGGLESTON.

Q. Edward Eggleston was next called on behalf of defendant and sworn.

Mr. Shearman—Where do you reside? A. Brooklyn, Sir.

Q. What is your occupation? A. Well, Sir, I am a clergyman, author and lecturer; I don't know which to set down.

Q. Have you ever been employed on The Independent-New York Independent? A. I was, Sir.

Q. At what time, and in what capacity? A. I was on The Independent from about the 1st of May, 1880, until the retirement of Mr. Tilton—I don't know which would be my proper designation; I was an associate editor, and also called literary editor; after Mr. Tilton's retirement I, in part, succeeded him, Mr. Bowen being nominal editor, and I being called superintending editor, but discharging the function of chief editor, limited only by Mr. Bowen's overruling occasionally.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. Tilton? A. Excuse me, Sir. I did not complete my answer to you; I retired from the paper in July, 1871.

Q. Have you been acquainted with Mr. Tilton, and, if so, when did that acquaintance commence? A. I am acquainted with him, Sir; became acquainted with him by sight; I had corresponded before I became acquainted with him by sight; I am pretty sure, Sir, that it was in 1867; it is a little difficult for me to fix the exact time.

Q. When did you become at all intimately acquainted with him? A. Well, Sir, I at that time lived at the West, and was Western correspondent of The Independent; on my occasional trips to New-York I several times stayed over night at his house, or dined with him, some such courtesy as that; he took tea at my house one evening when he was West; after I came East, I was, of course, more intimately associated with him as his associate editor.

Q. How long have you been acquainted with Mr. Beecher? A. I met Mr. Beecher, Sir, on the same Sunday morning that I met Mr. Tilton, in 1867; it didn't—it scarcely amounted to an acquaintance; I brought him a note of introduction; I have known him, to say acquainted with him, along in the last three or four years, I believe, Sir—four or five, perhaps.

Q. Do you recollect calling at Mr. Tilton's house one morning in the Winter of 1868 and 1869 when Mrs. Tilton was about going out; when she was about going to Mr. Paige's studio? A. I did not call there, Sir; I am hesitating to fix—be sure of the date, Sir; it was, I should say, judging by my trips to the East, as nearly as I can recall them, in the Fall of 1868, or the Spring of 1869, that is March, 1869; I was at the East at that time; I was at the house; I think, Sir, I had either remained over night, or had taken dinner; I was there as a guest. If you wish me to tell the circumstance—

JEALOUSY SHOWN BY MR. TILTON.

Q. Well, I will interrogate you; you recollect Mrs. Tilton preparing to start for Mr. Paige's studio? A. I think she was not going that day, Sir, but talking of going the next day.

Q. Well, did any conversation take place between you and Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton with reference to Mr. Beecher and your introduction to him at that time? A. Yes, Sir, I was talking with Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton; we were speaking admiringly of Mr. Beecher—at least I was, and I think the other two also, and Mrs. Tilton asked me if I was acquainted with him. I said I had presented a note of introduction and shaken hands with him at the close of the service, and had been accustomed to go up and ask the stranger's privilege of shaking hands when I went to Plymouth Church, rarely, on my trips East, but that I did not know him otherwise. She said: "Wouldn't you like to know him better?" I said I would, and she then extended an invitation for me to go with her to Mr. Paige's studio on the next day, as I remember now, on which occasion she said she was to go with Mr. Beecher to have a sitting for a portrait, and that Mr. Beecher would be very glad to converse with me during the sitting, and I would have an opportunity of acquaintance. Mr. Tilton objected—said that Mr. Beecher didn't like to be annoyed with conversation, and thought that Elizabeth had better go alone—some such remark as that, upon which I, of course, withdrew and declined to go.

Q. Do you recollect an occasion in the early Summer of 1870, on which a reception was given at Mr. Tilton's house when you and your wife were present? A. Soon after I went on The Independent, Sir, there was a reception, or gathering of some kind, I forget the title of it, of the Brooklyn Women's Club, to which I received an invitation, and at which I was present with my wife.

Q. Wasn't this about June, 1870? A. It seems to me, Sir, that it was in the first week of June; I will not attempt to be positive; I remember Mrs. Tilton was talking of going to the country to Newburgh, or near Newburgh at that time, and it must have been almost immediately before her leaving her home at that time.

Q. Do you remember a certain lady being present, whose name I will show you, but I do not desire to bring out her name? [Showing witness a paper.] A. Yes, Sir, the lady in question was present.

Mr. Beach—Well, I want to look at it. [Paper shown to Mr. Beach.]

Mr. Shearman—It is a lady whose name—a lady that has been referred to, but whose name has never been mentioned.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know, Sir; it may be necessary for us to know the lady for the purpose of using her with reference to any evidence which this gentleman may give.

Judge Neilson—Well, if in your judgment it becomes so you must require it.

Mr. Everts—Well, if your Honor please, this is the same name, and the same lady, that was excluded by your Honor's direction against our objection on the inquiries that we made earlier in the case.

Judge Neilson—I think you acquiesced in this.

Mr. Beach—Under quite different circumstances.

Mr. Everts—I did, and we now acquiesce.

Mr. Beach—It was under quite different circumstances.

Judge Neilson—You can presently see whether this becomes material.

Mr. Beach—Well, what is the question?

Judge Neilson—If this lady was present?

Mr. Beach—What lady?

Judge Neilson—A certain lady not yet named.

Mr. Beach—Well, let us have the question; I want the question on record.

Judge Neilson—He has not put it yet.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor is mistaken; he has put a part of the question.

Mr. Shearman—Whether the lady whose name I have shown him was present on that occasion.

Judge Neilson—And he said she was present.

Mr. Morris—He has exhibited the name of the lady to the witness and in a manner to cast a reflection on the lady.

Mr. Shearman—I am not going to throw any reflection on the lady at all.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Beach—Well, I can get at it.

MR. TILTON SLIGHTS HIS WIFE.

Mr. Shearman—I ask whether Mr. Tilton showed any such attentions to that lady on that evening as excited comment on that occasion?

Mr. Beach—Now, your Honor, to that we object.

Judge Neilson—Go on; she can be named hereafter.

The Witness—He did, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, that last question and answer does involve a reflection upon the lady, and it will rest with you, I think, to reveal the name if they require it.

Mr. Beach—I desire that that question should be read.

[Question read by THE TRIBUNE Stenographer.]

The Witness—I beg pardon. I perhaps ought to correct the answer, for Mr. Shearman said “excited comment on that occasion.” I cannot say that I heard comment on the occasion, during the evening while we were actually in the company.

Mr. Shearman—Well, it was the wrong shape of my question.

Mr. Beach—Well, then, strike it out. Let us have it right.

Mr. Shearman—You may strike it out.

Mr. Beach—Strike out the question and answer, then, and let us get it in proper form.

Judge Neilson—Now, the better way would be to let him state what he observed.

Mr. Beach—Oh! well, I don't insist upon that if the gentleman can put a question that will be satisfactory to me without it; I certainly have no objection to it.

Mr. Shearman—I will put the same question in a correct form. Did Mr. Tilton show such attentions to that lady on that occasion as excited comment by others?

Mr. Beach—No; not comment afterwards, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I mean immediately afterwards.

Mr. Beach—No—excited observation, if you please, then.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I am not particular—as excited observation.

The Witness—He did, Sir.

Judge Neilson—On that occasion?

Mr. Shearman—On that occasion.

The Witness—He did, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask whether those attentions were afterwards the subject of conversation by other persons with you?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Shearman—I do not propose to go any further.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—I simply offer to show these attentions without attempting to throw any imputation upon the lady, for the simple purpose of showing that this was one of a series of events, some of which were small, some of which were of more importance, which help to bring about that state of public scandal which Mr. Tilton afterwards imputed to other causes, and for which he blamed Mr. and Mrs. Beecher and others, and to show such a state—and this is part of the chain of evidence which shows that there was such a state of public scandal against Mr. Tilton as to make it necessary for him to do something; and that this was the motive—the public scandal thus excited by his own acts—this was the motive which led him afterwards to bring this charge against other people in order to cover up himself. In that light, I offer this question.

Judge Neilson—Well, you ask him as to the comment by the other people in the absence of Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Shearman—Simply for the purpose of—

Judge Neilson—And subsequently. That is ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—Simply for the purpose of showing the public scandal. Your Honor excludes it?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Shearman—Note our exception.

Judge Neilson—I do not exclude anything that occurred on that occasion, or any like occasion.

Mr. Shearman—Well, do you recollect making a subsequent call in the evening upon Mr. Tilton, when you waited for him some time—I mean that same Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton at home at that time? A. Mrs. Tilton was absent, Sir, as I remember. I say she was absent, not of personal knowledge, but of the common understanding between Mr. Tilton and myself, in my inquiry about his family, etc.; of course I could not swear that she was not in the house, but she was understood to be absent in the country at the time, of course.

Q. You didn't see her? A. I did not see her at all; no, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, I move to strike out that answer, that she was understood to be absent.

Judge Neilson—I think it was proper.

The Witness—I could not investigate the house and see whether she was in.

Mr. Beach—I don't know how important this is; but if this gentleman understood it from Mr. Tilton, it is competent evidence; if he understood it otherwise, as it stands now, it is not of the slightest importance, but I don't know what is going to be proved hereafter.

Judge Neilson—Oh! it is a mere incident in the call at a house where I think any witness could say, having called, he understood the lady was absent; it was a mere incident.

Mr. Beach—Well, must he not say, Sir, that he understood it from some person at the house, or give what was said in answer to his call or inquiry. Is it for him to give not only hearsay but his understanding of what the hearsay was.

Judge Neilson—I think a person calling at a house, and learning from any person that the lady is absent, could very well, as a mere incident of the call, say that she was absent.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That is all there is of it.

Mr. Beach—I beg your Honor's pardon, it is not all there is of it. This gentleman does not pretend to say that any person informed him at the time of that call that Mrs. Tilton was absent. If so, he can say it. We submit to it, but for him to say that he understood she was absent, I submit is only giving his conclusion from something which may have been said.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

The Witness—I think, Sir, that Mr. Tilton may be said to be the author of it.

Mr. Beach—Well, will you wait a moment?

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—What were you going to say? A. I was going to say, Sir, that it was my common custom to ask Mr. Tilton about his family, and that I understood from him habitually the periods of Mrs. Tilton's absence during that Summer, owing to the ordinary courtesies passing between us; it was a matter of—

Judge Neilson—Well, the inquiry as to this occasion do you remember?

The Witness—This occasion was during (as I should say in any ordinary conversation, and certainly say now, on my conviction)—during Mrs. Tilton's absence in the country.

Judge Neilson—The inquiry is whether you learned from Theodore Tilton on this occasion that she was absent.

The Witness—I did not, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—At what—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment. I move to strike out his answer, that he understood.

Judge Neilson—Very well; the word "understood" is objectionable in that respect. Go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—At what hour in the evening did you make your first call that time? A. About eight o'clock, Sir.

Q. Did you find Mr. Tilton in? A. He was absent, Sir.

Q. Who did you see at that time. A. I saw the housekeeper.

Q. You need not mention names; describe persons. A. I saw a middle aged woman—I am afraid I shall have to use that word "understood," for I can't swear who told me; she was housekeeper, Sir, who told me that Mr. Tilton was absent. I also saw a gentleman at the door inquiring—

Q. You did not go inside? A. I did not go inside.

Q. That is all about that; at what time did you return? A. I came back once or twice, Sir, before nine o'clock, I think, and finally at—came back at nine and went in.

Q. How long did you stay at that time? A. I stayed until ten, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton come in? A. Mr. Tilton came in at ten.

Q. Now, did he come in with the same lady whom I have referred to before? A. The same lady.

Q. Was there any relative of that lady there at that time? A. There was a young lady who told me that she was a relative of that lady and that she was waiting for her.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, we object to that.

Mr. Shearman—Wait a minute and see.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I move to strike it out.

Mr. Shearman—Wait and see if I don't connect it.

Judge Neilson—The counsel says wait and see.

Mr. Beach—I only want to get my motion in time.

Mr. Shearman—Did that young lady go home with the other lady afterwards? A. She did, Sir.

Q. And did they appear to be on intimate terms? A. She did, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Now, I move to strike out the declaration of "that other lady" that she was a relative of "that other lady."

Mr. Shearman—It seems to me it is pretty fair evidence, but I care so little about it.

Mr. Morris—Well then, I wouldn't offer it.

Mr. Shearman—Perhaps you wouldn't.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, it is manifestly improper evidence.

Judge Neilson—Yes; strike it out. I think you will have to give us the name before you get through.

Mr. Shearman—The gentleman can ask the name if he chooses; we are not going to have it said afterwards—

Judge Neilson—Well, they are not obliged to ask; you can't give a conversation of this kind and throw upon them the burden of exacting the name; you will have to give the name, if required.

Mr. Beach—Oh! there is no objection to another lady being there, who told them that this other lady was a relative. We only object to what was said.

Mr. Shearman—Now, what did Mr. Tilton say, or what did this lady say in his presence? A. The lady with whom Mr. Tilton had been walking apologized to the other lady for her—for the lateness of their remaining out, by saying that both their watches had stopped, the other lady having remonstrated that they had kept her waiting until that late hour for them.

Q. Was anything said as to where they had been? A. Not at the time, Sir.

Q. Oh! I omitted to ask whether on the occasion of that reception in June—which you supposed to have been in June—if Mrs. Tilton was present? A. She was, Sir.

Q. Did you, at a later period in the Summer of 1870, have any conversation with Mr. Tilton on the subject of marriage and divorce, or of partners in life—anything in respect to the marriage relation? A. I recollect, Sir, a certain day when we crossed the ferry together—stood upon the front end of the ferry.

Judge Neilson—The ferry boat you mean? A. The ferry boat, yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—On which you did have such a conversation? A. On which we did have such a conversation.

Q. Now state what that conversation was? A. Well, Sir, Mr. Tilton, who seemed to be in some agitation—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—It is proper for me to say that.

Judge Neilson—The question is what the conversation was.

Mr. Shearman—I think Mr. Tilton's manner is very proper.

Judge Neilson—Your question was what the conversation was, and the witness must attend to your question.

Mr. Shearman—What was Mr. Tilton's manner at the commencement of that conversation? A. Mr. Tilton seemed a good deal agitated on that afternoon, Sir, in the office, and after we left the office, and on the ferry boat.

Mr. Morris—When was this? A. The latter part of the Summer of 1870.

Mr. Shearman—Now, state what the conversation was? A. Mr. Tilton asked me after conversation on other subjects—he turned to me and asked me earnestly what I thought on the subject of marriage. I replied that I had never had occasion to think on the subject of marriage—some such evasive reply. He then asked me—let me get the order of conversation as nearly as I can, Sir—he asked me whether I thought there might be more than one human love, and I confess the expression puzzled me. I replied that I didn't know what he meant by more than one human love. Said he: "What do you think in the case of people who find themselves uncongenially married?" I said: "Mr. Tilton, I think where men are conscientious—where people endeavor to do their best under such circumstances they grow together." If I may describe his manner he said very suddenly and impulsively: "It seems to me that they grow more and more apart." The conversation made a — did not go any further with that. He then asked me what I thought of John Stuart Mill, if I did revere him a great deal as a philosopher. I said I did. He told me that John Stuart Mill was never married to his wife, that he had it from an intimate friend of Mr. Mill that he never was married to his wife, legally or any other way, I believe I replied, "A man who lived with his wife faithfully as long as she lived, and lived over her grave after she was dead, is not the man you can quote on your side of this marriage controversy," and that is all I remember, I believe, at this moment, Sir, of the conversation.

Mr. Shearman—That will do.

Mr. Evans—It is after four.

Mr. Beach—Well, it will take me but a moment to dispose of this gentleman. My own inclination was not to ask him anything.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. EGGLESTON.

Mr. Beach—I understand you to say that the first interview of which you have spoken was in the Fall of 1868 or March, 1869? A. That is my recollection, Sir.

Q. Well, at which date was it, according to your best recollection? A. It is impossible for me, Sir, to give you the date accurately of that conversation.

Q. Then in June, 1870, were you at the house upon an occasion of the meeting of some society or committee of some society? A. Yes, Sir; it was not a committee, it was a reception, I think it was called a reception of the Brooklyn Woman's Club—a social gathering.

Q. The Brooklyn Woman's Club? A. That is my recollection, Sir. I was not a member of the Club, but I was invited.

Q. What was the object of the Club? A. I think it was a Woman's Suffrage Club, if I remember; I am not sure about the Club—the only occasion I was ever present.

Q. How many persons did you meet there? A. I don't know, Sir; quite a company.

Q. Quite a company of ladies? A. Ladies and gentlemen, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher there? A. He was, Sir, a short time during the evening.

Q. Well, these attentions on the part of Mr. Tilton to this unmentionable lady were in the presence of the company? A. In the presence of that portion of the company that was in the back parlor, Sir, where he sat.

The Witness [continuing]: A small room at the rear.

Mr. Beach—How many were there? A. I was trying to finish my first answer, Sir.

Q. You had finished it. A. I did not; I beg your pardon.

Q. So far as my question called for any answer. A. How many were in that room, is your question?

Q. Yea, Sir. A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. As near as you can state. A. There were—well it is a small room, Sir; there were a good many people in it; however, it is impossible for me to estimate them.

Q. Well, who was in that parlor? A. How do you mean—of the company?

Q. In that back parlor at the time of these attentions which attracted your attention? A. I don't remember but the two figures, Sir, Mr. Tilton and the lady distinctly; during the evening there were others coming and going.

Q. No, no; at the time you noticed these attentions of which you speak, who were in that back parlor? A. Why, Sir, the attention went on nearly the whole evening.

Q. I didn't ask you that. A. Well, Sir, I gave you that as a reason why I can't possibly reply definitely to your question.

Q. Were there several persons in the back parlor? A. There were, Sir.

Q. Can you state whether or not Mrs. Tilton was there in the back parlor? A. I did not see her in the back parlor during that evening; I saw her in the dining room.

Q. Wait one moment: can you tell whether or not Mr. Beecher was in the back parlor? A. He was not that I remember, though I ought to qualify that answer, because I must say that Mr. Beecher was in the dining room, which opened into the back parlor, which was somewhat the same as being in the back parlor.

Q. Well, did you make any remark in regard to those attentions that evening while at the house? A. Not while in the company, Sir.

Q. Did any person in the company while there make any remark to you, or that you overheard? A. They did not, Sir.

Q. Then there was no observation in words made upon these attentions at that time? A. Not at that time.

Q. Then do you know whether or not they were observed by any person but yourself? A. I do know at least one other person who observed them, Sir.

Q. Who was that? A. My own wife, Sir.

Q. Oh! your own wife. Do you know whether any other person except yourself and your wife observed them? A. I do.

Q. Wait one moment; you answered my question. Now, you speak of another meeting, Sir, in the same Summer, a third meeting; when do you say that was? A. I don't know to what you refer, Sir.

Q. You gave this last meeting of which I have spoken at Mr. Tilton's house; I understand you gave the date of the last meeting of which I have spoken at Mr. Tilton's house as June, 1870, when the society met there? A. That is to the best of my recollection.

Q. I understood you to speak then of a call you made subsequently the same Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that—how long after this June call? A. It was not very long after, Sir.

Q. Well, about how long, as near as you recollect? A. I should say, Sir, that it was toward the latter part of June, while the other was probably in the early part; that is only to the best of my recollection, however.

Q. Well, then, did you not speak of a subsequent call there? A. I think I was not asked as to a subsequent call, except these calls—those several calls on that evening.

Q. Three calls—you named three. A. Did I name three calls, Sir?

Q. Yes, Sir; there was one in March, 1869, or the Fall of 1868; another, June, 1870, the early part, and a third the latter part of June, 1870. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what occurred at the time of this latter call—June—latter part of June, 1870? A. This occurred that I called about—

Q. The two ladies. A. Oh, at the time when they came in do you mean, Sir?

Q. Yes. A. Or do you mean the whole evening?

Q. No; I mean whether that was the—. A. That was the occurrence.

Q. Latter part of June, 1870. A. That is my recollection; I don't want to be definite to those dates because my memory of dates is not very good.

Q. I want to get you as close as I can. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then you had a subsequent interview with him, I understand, on the ferry-boat later in that Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How late was that, Sir; how long after this call of the latter part of June, 1870? A. That is less definite than any other in my mind, Sir.

Q. Well, give me, as near you can, Sir, the length of time it was after the call you have mentioned of the latter part of June, 1870? A. I have stated my supposition to be August, 1870, but I am not at all confident of the date.

Q. Then you think it was in August, 1870? A. I think so, Sir.

Q. And you say Mr. Tilton was very much agitated? A. Seemed so, Sir.

Q. Seemed very much agitated; was his conversation somewhat abrupt? A. It was during this portion of it.

Q. During this portion of it. Well, do you recollect any other subject upon which you talked? A. We talked a little after we left the office; I tried to engage him in conversation; he seemed abstracted.

Q. He seemed abstracted? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Seemed moody? A. Somewhat so; I remember one subject we discussed. He said he wished there was some sensation going on, something to give the papers a little more interest than there was; it was a dull occasion.

Q. Very brief, that was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect any conversation that occurred on the ferry-boat before he introduced this subject of the marital relation? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. So far as you recollect, was that the first topic that he mentioned after you entered the ferry-boat? A. That is the only topic I recollect, Sir, on the ferry-boat.

Mr. Beach—[To the counsel.] He says that was in August, 1870.

The Witness—Probably.

Q. That is probably in August of 1870; had you noticed this abstraction, or moodiness, on the part of Mr. Tilton for any length of time preceding that interview? A. Only that after noon as we left the office, Sir; only that afternoon.

Q. And how do you recollect that conversation opened on the ferry-boat? A. It opened, I recollect distinctly, by Mr. Tilton's asking me what I thought—I cannot give the exact words—what I thought on the subject of marriage; that is my recollection now, or of the question of marriage; I can't give the phrase precisely of the question.

Q. Will you please proceed with that conversation, Sir? A. I responded that I had never had occasion to think of the question of marriage; I am now giving only the substance, for I don't remember conversations literally; I remember some phrases.

Q. Were you married at that time, Sir? A. I was, Sir—that I had never had occasion to think on the question of marriage; I don't know but that I added, "being very well satisfied myself with my condition."

Q. I didn't ask you that; I was asking about a conversation. A. Your question suggested that, Sir. I think I said that on the occasion.

Q. Please spare me your suggestions. A. Then Mr. Tilton responded that—Mr. Tilton asked again the question what I thought; I cannot give his words, but the substance of his question was what I thought of those cases in which men and women found themselves uncongenially mated; that was the idea, I quite distinctly remember; and I replied that if they acted conscientiously and faithfully toward one another they would grow together; I think I used the expression "grow together"—I am pretty sure of that phrase—when Mr. Tilton replied in a phrase that I remember pretty distinctly: "It seems to me they grow more and more apart," with an abrupt and exceedingly strong expression when he said it.

Q. Anything else? A. That is all, excepting the remark about John Stuart Mill. He asked me if I did not revere Mr. Mill as a philosopher, and I said I did. I remember now a sentence or two which I did not remember in the opening. He said that Mill had—he understood from an intimate friend of Mill's that Mill had not been married; or he did not say that at this moment. He said that Mill was not married to his wife. I said: "I understand you mean G. H. Lewes," but he said, "No." I understood from him the fact that Mr. Mill was not married to his wife. I answered, "Well, Mr. Tilton," or "Well, Theodore"—I don't know which I called him—"Mr. Mill, a man who lived with his wife faithfully until her death, and who lived over her grave after her death, is not the man to be quoted on your side of the marriage question." I don't remember anything further said.

Q. And you did revere Mr. Mill, I suppose? A. I did.

Q. You stated that you was a clergyman? A. I am a Methodist preacher to a Congregational Church, lying around loose generally in that regard.

Q. Well, Sir, that is sometimes the best way of doing good. But, did you understand that Mr. Mill was anti-Christian in his sentiments and publications? A. At that time, Sir, I do not remember that Mr. Mill had published anything distinctly anti-Christian. He has now, but I still revere Mr. Mill, if that is a part of your question.

Q. Yes. Well, what did you understand the sentiments upon the subject of Christianity of Mr. Mill to be, as indicated by his publications? A. I thought it very likely that he was not a believer in Christianity. I revered him because he was sincere and noble.

Q. You revered him because he was sincere? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. If you find a man sincere and noble in his disbelief of Christianity you revere him? A. Profoundly, if he is sincere and noble; always.

A PROPOSITION TO HOLD COURT TO-DAY REJECTED.

Judge Neilson—Will the audience please be quiet? [To counsel.] Gentlemen, can we attend and work to-morrow? It is very desirous to get this testimony closed before you go to Washington, Mr. Everts.

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir, that is so; and we will accomplish that better by adhering to our rules.

Judge Neilson—[To the jurors.] Gentlemen, get ready. We separate now until Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Beach—[To Judge Neilson.] Did your Honor conclude to sit to-morrow?

Judge Neilson—No, Sir. [To the jurors.] Eleven o'clock on Monday morning, gentlemen.

Mr. Mallison (Clerk)—The Court stands adjourned until Monday morning, at eleven o'clock.

The Court then adjourned until Monday morning, at eleven o'clock.

FORTY-FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

FOUR WITNESSES AND A DEPOSITION.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN W. HARMAN IN REGARD TO THE TRUE STORY AND MR. TILTON'S COMMENTS THEREON—TESTIMONY OF JACKSON S. SCHULTZ IN REGARD TO THE NEWSPAPER PROJECT AND THE CHARGES OF BLACKMAIL—TESTIMONY OF CHARLES G. JUDSON—MR. MOULTON'S CONVERSATIONS WITH ARCHIBALD RAXTER—DEPOSITION OF J. HAYNES DRAKE.

MONDAY, March 15, 1875.

The great trial entered upon its eleventh week to-day. John W. Harman was called as the first witness and examined by Mr. Hill. His testimony related in the main to statements made to him from time to time by Mr. Tilton regarding his relations with Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher. Mr. Tilton had told the witness that he had received notice to give up his position as editor of The Brooklyn Union, and that Mr. Bowen had deserted him and joined Mr. Beecher against him. In a conversation in 1873 Mr. Tilton had told him that he wanted to collect the $7,000 which Mr. Bowen owed him, but an old matter would be revived were he to do so. The witness asked what that old matter was, and Mr. Tilton then told him that Mr. Bowen had slandered one of the best of men. He added that Mr. Bowen had written a letter from Woodstock charging Mr. Beecher with adultery. Mr. Tilton also said that Mr. Bowen declared that Mr. Beecher ought not to preach, and that if he (Mr. Tilton) would write an open letter to him telling him to resign, he (Mr. Bowen) would deliver it. Mr. Tilton did write such a letter, but Mr. Bowen sealed it up and gave it to Mr. Beecher as the work of Mr. Tilton alone, and then joined Mr. Beecher. Among other communications which Mr. Tilton made to the witness was one to the effect that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to her husband that Mr. Beecher had made improper proposals to her, and that when he had charged Mr. Beecher with having used such language to Mrs. Tilton, he had been overwhelmed with shame, had wept, and said: "Theodore, Theodore, how could I do this thing? You are my children. I married you." Mr. Beecher had apologized. Soon after the Woodhull publication the witness asked Mr. Tilton his reason for not denying the scandal, and Mr. Tilton had replied: "Suppose I can't deny it."

On cross-examination Mr. Harman testified that Mr. Tilton had always spoken in the highest terms of his wife, and had never charged her with any fault. The witness explained the way in which Mr. McKelway got possession of the MS. of the "True Story." Mr. McKelway called upon him and told him that they had employed eminent counsel to sift the matter and see whether the story would hold water, and the witness then gave the papers to Mr. McKelway without a written order from Mr. Tilton. Mr. Harman further testified that he had offered Mr. Tilton $5,000 for the "True Story;" he did not mean necessarily to publish it, but wished to do what he pleased with it; but Mr. Tilton had refused the offer. He afterward told Mr. Tilton that "the whole world wanted to know about that scandal, and 1,000,000 copies of the 'True Story' could be sold at 25 cents a copy."

Gen. Tracy next called and examined Jackson S. Schultz. His testimony was also in the main a recital of conversations with Mr. Tilton. The first hint that the witness had had that Mr. Tilton was not on friendly terms with Mr. Beecher was derived from a statement of Mr. Tilton that if Mr. Beecher were asked to subscribe to The Golden Age he would do so, and that he would contribute also to that paper if he were permitted. Mr. Schultz in one of his conversations with Mr. Tilton had reproached him for the publication of the "Life of Victoria Woodhull," and Mr. Tilton had justified his course on the ground that he always stood by the weak and down-trodden. At a dinner party he had heard Mr. Tilton speak very warmly in praise of Mrs. Woodhull. Mr. Tilton came to him on one occasion in 1873, and told him that Francis B. Carpenter had informed him that Mr. Schultz had said that he (Mr. Tilton) was a blackmailer. The witness then repeated that part of the conversation which he had had with Francis B. Carpenter, but which he could only give in evidence as he had told it to Mr. Tilton. The substance of it was that Mr. Carpenter came to him with a plan for starting a new paper, of which Mr. Beecher was to be the editor-in-chief and Mr. Tilton a foreign correspondent, and Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Johnson were to be engaged in the business department. A part of the plan was that the scandals were to be suppressed. It was on the ground that Mr. Tilton was trying to make use of certain scandalous stories to secure for himself a position, that the witness had called him a blackmailer. Mr. Schultz also told of an interview between Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton and himself, during which the charge of blackmail was discussed. During this part of the testimony, Francis D. Moulton, who had entered the court-room a few minutes after 12 o'clock, sat at the table occupied by the plaintiff and his counsel, within a few feet of the witness, upon whom he fastened his eyes, stretching his head forward. Mr. Schultz leaned forward in his chair and emphasized his testimony by striking his hands together.

Mr. Beach's cross-examination of Mr. Schultz was very brief. The witness admitted that he had conversed during the recess with his partner and Mr. Tracy in relation to his testimony.

Mr. Shearman then called Charles G. Judson and questioned him in reference to a conversation between Mr. Tilton and himself in 1865, in which Mr. Tilton had said, "I have lost my faith in man." Mr. Beach objected to the questions on the ground that the matter was remote and immaterial. A discussion followed which drew forth a stern rebuke from Judge Neilson, who declared that too much time was wasted over unimportant matters. When the witness had finished, Mr. Beach moved to strike out all his testimony. "Let it stand," said Judge

Neilson. "It will be as harmless as a lamp-post in the street. It is perfectly idle and trivial to occupy time with such evidence."

The defense next called Archibald Baxter for the purpose of contradicting Mr. Moulton's testimony. Mr. Baxter testified in regard to various conversations with Mr. Moulton, in which the latter had declared Mr. Beecher was innocent. On cross-examination, Mr. Baxter testified in regard to a conversation with Mr. Beecher in which the latter had said, "Moulton is a noble fellow;" and had eulogized him highly. The proceedings were closed with the deposition of J. Haynes Drake, which was read by Mr. Shearman.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN W. HARMAN.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, can we proceed now?

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Everts has not arrived. He will be here soon.

Mr. Tracy—I presume he is delayed by fog.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Everts don't wish you to wait where you have a general class of witnesses.

Mr. Shearman—We will decide in a moment.

Mr. Hill—[After consultation.] John W. Harman.

John W. Harman called and affirmed on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Harman, where do you reside? A. I reside in Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you lived here? A. About ten years.

Q. Have you held office in Brooklyn? A. I have.

Q. What office? A. Supervisor.

Q. Or offices? A. Supervisor of the 20th Ward.

Q. Have been Supervisor how long? A. Four years. I am not Supervisor now.

Q. What is your business? A. I am in the dry goods business.

Q. And have been in the dry goods business how long? A. Since 1862.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. Since 1865.

Q. Are you acquainted with Theodore Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you form his acquaintance? A. In 1870; I think in the Fall.

Q. Are you at all acquainted with Mr. Beecher? A. I am not, only by repute and sight.

Q. You say you formed Mr. Tilton's acquaintance in December, 1870—in 1870? A. In 1870.

Q. State under what circumstances, Mr. Harman, about the time Mr. Tilton became editor of The B I was crossing the ferry on my way—return from the evening, and Gen. Woodford and Mr. Tilton were on the ferry boat; and just as we were coming out o house on this side, Gen. Woodford called me up and introduced me to Mr. Tilton as the future editor of The Brooklyn Union.

Q. From that time were you quite intimately associated with Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, for some considerable time after that, during the campaign that was just about—I think this was, perhaps, in October, perhaps a little earlier, that I became acquainted with him. The Fall campaign—the Congressional election was just coming on, and at that election I became very intimately acquainted with him.

Q. And how long did your intimacy with Mr. Tilton continue? A. Well, after the campaign was over I did not see him so frequently as I had before, but we were always intimate when I met him. He was very—he was kind in his disposition, and I had—there was nothing to interrupt our friendship, although we did not meet so frequently as before.

MR. TILTON DISCUSSES HIS TROUBLES.

Q. Do you recollect an occasion near the end of 1870, when Mr. Tilton mentioned to you his troubles with Mr. Bowen in regard to The Union, and his editorship of it? A. In 1870, do you say?

Q. Well, near the end of 1870; whether it was the beginning of 1871 or the end of 1870 I do not know? A. I remember the circumstance, though I cannot speak positively as to the date.

Q. Yes. Please state now what occurred between you at that time upon that subject? A. It is very difficult to recollect and give the language, because I—

Q. But the substance of the interview? A. I think it was after Mr. Tilton's discharge; he told me about the notice he had received to quit the editorship of The Brooklyn Union, and recited the circumstances that brought it about. I asked him why it was or what the cause was, why Mr. Bowen had discharged him. I said to him: "I hope it has not been brought about by taking my advice." Mr. Tilton knew what I referred to—in regard to the Webster campaign. He said: "That, perhaps, among other things." And he said something about this open letter that he bore to Mr. Beecher—or that Mr. Bowen bore to Mr. Beecher, and that Mr. Bowen had deserted him, and joined Mr. Beecher against him, and he was made to appear as being the offending party, and stated that Mr. Bowen had dismissed him without the six months' notice, which was part of the agreement. There was a clause in his agreement that Mr. Bowen should give him six months' notice, or either party, indeed, should give six months' notice if they wanted to terminate the relations. Mr. Bowen had not done that, but had summarily dismissed him four days after he had renewed his contract.

Q. Now, Mr. Harman, do you recollect meeting Mr. Tilton after that upon an occasion when you went to lunch with him? A. Oh, yes; I remember that circumstance very well, although I cannot give the exact date.

Q. Where did you meet him? Just begin and give that narrative in your own way? A. In my former testimony I said it was April; I think it must have been before that; I cannot fix the date; it may have been as early as February.

Q. Very well? A. I met him, as I frequently did—Mr. Tilton, going the ferry, going back and forth, and I met him on a certain day, and he said to me, I think: "What time do you go to lunch?" I said, "About one o'clock." He said, "Come down to-morrow"—I think it was—"come down to-morrow, and we will go to lunch together." I did; I met him by appointment.

Q. At what place? A. We went to Bang's restaurant, down town—a down-town place, up-stairs.

Q. On Broadway, near the new Post-Office? A. On Broadway, right about opposite the new Post-Office, I guess, or nearly so.

Q. Then you went into a public saloon and had lunch with Mr. Tilton? A. We went into a saloon up-stairs, or rather a private place, and sat down, and he ordered the lunch, whatever it was.

Q. Were you in a private room? A. No, Sir; no, it was up-stairs; it was not down in the saloon. There is an eating place down-stairs, and another up-stairs more private, but still it was not private. We had a private table to ourselves.

Q. There were some persons there? A. There were some persons in the room, but none in our immediate vicinity.

Q. Now please state what occurred between you and Mr. Tilton there? A. The old matter came up of his being dismissed from The Union.

Q. Go on. Give what he said and what you said, or the substance of it, as nearly as you can? A. Mr. Tilton told me that he was going to collect the $7,000—I think he claimed—he thought of collecting it, or, indeed, had determined to, but there was one obstacle, or one thing that he regretted—one obstacle in the way, or one thing that he regretted, it would revive an old matter—I am not sure whether he designated it as a scandal, but I think he did—that had been settled.

Q. Did he say anything about Bowen's having slandered him? A. I was going to tell you.

Mr. Morris—Ask what he said.

Mr. Hill—I am simply calling his attention.

The Witness—I was going to tell you just what occurred, as nearly as I can remember it.

Q. Very well. A. He said it would revive an old scandal, or old matter, whatever it was. I didn't expect then I should be called upon to testify, and I cannot remember the language. I said: "What is it?" Well, he said, Mr. Bowen had been slandering, I think he said, one of the best men in Brooklyn, or a good man, something to that effect, and it would necessarily bring those to the surface. I said, "What is it?" He then recited the story about Bowen's writing a letter in 1863, from Woodstock, Conn., in which he had charged the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher with being a bad man and an adulterer. I expressed my surprise at any such charge as that, and he went on then and said that it was not only in one instance, but Bowen had charged him with numerous ones, and cited some, although he did not name anybody; that is, he named no ladies, I am glad to say, but he instanced two or three cases where Mr. Bowen had charged Mr. Beecher with having committed this offense against good morals, &c.

Q. Well, what next? A. And he then said that Mr. Bowen declared that Mr. Beecher ought not to preach, and that if he (Mr. Tilton) would bear an open letter to him, making a demand of him—I mean if he (Mr. Tilton) would write a letter demanding Mr. Beecher—a demand of Mr. Beecher to vacate his pulpit, and quit Brooklyn, he, Mr. Bowen, would bear an open letter to him. He said he wrote the letter and Bowen took it, but when he came to Mr. Beecher, instead—I think he said instead of delivering it as an open letter he sealed it and professed ignorance of its contents, and then joined with Mr. Beecher against him, and he was put out of his place, and said he was badly treated; but now he was determined to recover his money, but in doing so he would revive this old scandal, which he regretted. He said Mr. Beecher had also committed an offense against him and his family.

Q. State what he said about that. A. He told me that at one time Mrs. Tilton came to him and stated that she had something very serious to tell him, and he asked her what it was; and she said that her pastor, in his pastoral visits to their house, in her husband's absence, had taken advantage of his position and made dishonorable proposals to her repeatedly, and she felt it her duty to tell her husband, which she had done, to his surprise.

Q. Anything further said upon that subject? A. I expressed, of course, my surprise at such a thing, because it was new to me—

Mr. Hill—A little louder, Mr. Harman.

The Witness—He said, I understood, immediately—in that I may be in error, but he said he went to Frank Moulton and laid the matter before Frank, and Mr. Beecher was summoned to Frank's house. They went into a private room, the three; I think it possible he said Frank left after they got in there, and he remained and looked the door and put the key in his pocket, and accused Mr. Beecher of this grave offense.

Q. What grave offense? A. Of making these dishonorable proposals, as I understood it, violating the—making dishonorable proposals to his wife in his absence, thus taking advantage of him—

MR. TILTON FORGIVES MR. BEECHER.

Q. Position? A. —position as pastor.

Q. Well? A. He said Mr. Beecher confessed that he had done wrong, and said, "Theodore, Theodore, how could I do this thing! Why, you are my children; I married you;" and, he said, "By the grace of God I hope to live a purer life hereafter." He said he wept like a child, and he said he had forgiven him. He said, "I forgave Mr. Beecher; I believe he is trying to live a truer life."

Q. Did he say anything about an apology? A. A written apology?

Q. Yes. A. Not at that time, I think; he spoke of the verbal apology.

Q. Was anything said by Mr. Tilton to the effect that his wife had exacted a promise from him— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. —not to injure Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; before she laid—before she introduced the subject at all, she exacted from him a promise that he should not offer personal violence to the party that it involved. I think she said it was a personal friend, or a friend of the family, or something to that effect.

Mr. Beach—Please repeat that; my attention was called away for a moment.

The Witness—She exacted a promise from her husband that he would not offer personal violence to the gentleman, or to the party, that this involved, when she should tell him the story, which he readily gave—he told me.

Q. Anything further at that interview, Mr. Harman? A. Oh, there was a good deal said; but it was all to that effect. I cannot pretend to recite any of the language exactly, or very little of it, at least, that occurred. We sat there, perhaps, two hours or more.

Q. Anything said about his wife being annoyed at those proposals, so that she was compelled to go to her husband about it? A. Yes, Sir; he said it was annoying to Mrs. Tilton; and she, finally, in the simplicity of her heart, proposed to tell him—her husband—all about it, first exacting this promise, that he would not offer personal violence—

Q. To the party that it involved? A. To the party that it involved, because she had not named anybody up to that time?

Q. Now, what was Mr. Tilton's manner during the interview? A. He seemed to be very cool and self-possessed.

Q. Let me ask you, Mr. Harman, although you have not been acquainted with Mr. Beecher, had you been a supporter and friend of his up to that time? A. I went to church there very frequently, from 1832 to 1835—from 1832 to 1835 frequently; when my family came to Brooklyn I went less frequently because we went to another church.

Q. The point of my inquiry is, were you up to that time an admirer of Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—A what?

Mr. Hill—An admirer of Mr. Beecher, a special friend of his; that is, although not being acquainted with him personally—

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know that that is a competent line of inquiry; we have had several enthusiastic admirers of Mr. Beecher here, and we don't want any more.

Mr. Hill—What does your Honor say about it?

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer it.

Mr. Hill—What do you say? A. Had I been an admirer of Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes; as a public man? A. I certainly was.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Tilton knew that fact from anything you said? A. I do not; the question of Mr. Beecher never came up before.

MR. TILTON HINTS THAT THE WOODHULL STORY CANNOT BE CONTRADICTED.

Q. Now, Mr. Harman, let me ask you if you had any conversation with Mr. Tilton at any subsequent time when the subject of a written apology was spoken of for this offense of improper proposals or advances? A. Yes, Sir; when the—after Mr. Tilton wrote what was termed the "True Story," he read it to me; and in that was incorporated, I think, this apology of Mr. Beecher, which he read with the balance of the "True Story," as part of it.

Q. Before we come to that, let me ask you this question: Do you remember the occasion when the Woodhull and Claflin scandal was published? A. I don't remember the date; but I remember the occasion very well.

Q. Very well. Now, had you an interview with Mr. Beecher soon after that? A. Yes, Sir; I had; I met him—Mr. Tilton, if I remember correctly, was in New Hampshire at the time this thing made its appearance, and I was very anxious to see him.

Q. Well? A. I was coming down Fulton-st., New York, one afternoon or one evening, and I met him on the corner of Fulton and, perhaps, Cliff—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

The Witness—Fulton and Cliff, I think.

Mr. Hill—Proceed, Mr. Harman.

The Witness—I said to him: "I am very glad to meet you, because I have been wanting to see you for several days," and I said: "Have you seen this monstrous story of the Woodhulls?" I think he said to me that he had just returned to the city; I don't know whether he said he saw it or not. I told him what it recited, and said: "Now, Theodore, for God's sake and your family's, contradict it, give it a broad denial, because I take it you can." He stood there, and he says: "But suppose I can't?" "Well," I said, "I assume that you can; you have never charged any such offense against your wife as that, and your first duty is to your wife and children, and I think that you ought to lose no time in coming out to contradict the monstrous story." "Well," he said, "I don't know; suppose I can't?" I think he repeated that again; and he said Elizabeth—he always called her Elizabeth—was opposed to saying anything about it; she was willing to suffer herself if she could only save the church; her theory seemed to be—he said she was fanatical; either on that or some other occasion, he said that she was fanatical, and she seemed to think her duty was to save the church, although she might suffer herself and might go down; and the policy, her policy, seemed to be to say nothing about it; I said: "If I were you I should contradict the story, as I believe you can—as I think you can," or "understand you can;" something to that effect. We had but a short interview, and we left.

Q. Did you refer to a former conversation that you had with him? A. Only by implication, I think; I do not remember. I simply said: "I think you can do it from what you told me before," or something to that effect—words to that effect.

ADULTERY NOT CHARGED.

Q. Did he in the former conversation make any charge whatever of guilt on the part of his wife?

Mr. Morris—He has stated what he said.

Mr. Beach—Yes; he stated what he said.

Judge Neilson—Counsel asked him very clearly what he said.

Mr. Beach—I think he went over it very fully.

Mr. Tracy—I suppose we have a right to ask in this connection what he did not say.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Tracy.] You can ask whether he said anything further or anything different, but you can not ask him to draw a conclusion as to what he said, whether it amounted to one thing or another.

Mr. Hill—I don't ask him whether it amounted to anything.

I asked him if he said anything on that occasion—if he mentioned or intimated guilt on the part of his wife.

Mr. Beach—The question counsel put was whether on that occasion Mr. Tilton made any charge of guilt against his wife. Now, we have had a narrative of what was said according to the best recollection of the witness.

Judge Neilson—It has been very substantially answered in the very full recital the witness has given, but I think the counsel can ask if anything was said on a given subject.

Mr. Beach—Undoubtedly.

Judge Neilson—Now, ask him what he knows.

Mr. Hill—Now, after having heard his Honor's views on the subject state whether anything was said on the subject of guilt on the part of his wife? A. He did not accuse her with any criminal offense.

Q. Speak louder. A. He did not accuse her with any criminal offense, as far as I remember.

Mr. Beach—That is the conversation at the lunch-room you inquire about?

Mr. Hill—Yes.

Q. You say he did not charge her with any criminal offense? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he charge her with adultery at all? A. No, Sir, he did not.

Q. Let me ask you if, in the first conversation, he produced a paper—a printed paper—the conversation I mean at Bang's restaurant? A. He gave me a paper at my request; he read it to me in the first place—

Q. Well? A. I do not remember whether it was at our first interview; I have been trying to refresh my memory on the subject, but for the life of me I cannot remember where I got it. After reading it to me I got it from him, or rather, after reading it, I asked him for it, as I wanted to show it to Dwight Johnson. It was a monstrous charge, and I wanted to show it to Dwight Johnson.

SILENCE ENJOINED.

Q. Let me ask you if anything was said either at that interview at Bang's restaurant, or at any subsequent interview, with reference to your omitting to tell anybody of that communication? A. At the first interview Mr. Tilton did not enjoin secrecy at all; he did not say that I should say nothing, or whether I should, but I met him perhaps in two weeks after—as I frequently met him on the street or crossing the ferry—and he said to me, "John, I guess you had better not say anything about what I said to you the other day," so I carried this secret from that time until the time I met him on Fulton-st.

Q. After the publication of the scandal? A. After the publication of the scandal. Then he said to me: "Now, I would prefer you should tell your friends what I told you last year, or last Spring; I would prefer you should tell your friends, or a few of your friends," and I think he indicated some by name.

Q. Do you remember who they were? A. I am quite sure he named Dr. Storrs, and I said I had not the honor of knowing Dr. Storrs. I didn't know him personally, and I should not care to tell him. I said I should like to see Dwight Johnson—I think I probably named Dwight Johnson; at all events, I think I said to him Dwight Johnson would like to see this whole story as it appeared.

Q. Please state who Dwight Johnson was—whether he was a friend of yours? A. He was a colleague of mine in the Board of Supervisors, and we met very often.

Q. A prominent member of Dr. Storrs's church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And a prominent citizen of Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir. And we were often together, as I was anxious to show that to him. It was, I think, after the first interview that I borrowed this proof slip of The Golden Age to show it to Dwight Johnson, and perhaps one or two others. I don't remember whether I showed it to a living soul, but I think perhaps I did, for I got it for that purpose.

Q. Please look at the printed slip which is attached to this paper [Exhibit D 85, shown witness] and state, if you can, whether or not the printed paper you borrowed from Mr. Tilton was the same, or the same in substance, as that?

Mr. Morris—No use spending time about that; we concede it is.

Mr. Hill—Well, it is conceded it was the same paper.

The Witness—Yes, the same paper.

Mr. Hill—And the witness now recollects it.

The Witness—The same paper.

Q. Now, Mr. Harman, did you show that paper to various individuals? A. I just stated that I had no personal recollection of showing it to any one individual; and yet I think I did show it to two or three, because I got it for that purpose. I asked Mr. Tilton to let me have it.

Q. For that very purpose? A. He didn't volunteer to give it to me. I said, "Let me take that paper; I would like to show that;" I think I said, to Dwight Johnson. He consented, and I had the paper at my house and carried it for perhaps two weeks before I met Mr. Johnson. I expected to meet him in the Board of Supervisors, without going to his house on purpose, and I presume I had shown it to him; and I think I still had it in my possession when Mr. McKelway and Mr. Tilton came to my house; that is all my recollection of it.

THE TRUE STORY SHOWN.

Q. Now, Mr. Harman, do you recollect whether you ever saw, or read, or heard read what has been called the "True Story," during the progress of this trial? A. Yes, Sir; I heard Mr. Tilton read it.

Q. Please state when that was, and under what circumstances it was? A. It was in December, 1872; I think it was the Sabbath evening preceding Christmas—the Sabbath evening preceding Christmas, I think, at my house; Mr. Tilton came there.

Q. State what occurred; state all the circumstances? A. Came in and had a large portfolio under his arm, and said: "I have got something here I would like to read you; I think you would like to hear it."

Q. What did he say it was? A. I don't know that he told me then what it was; I said to him that there was some friends at my house; we would adjourn to a neighbor's, which we did. Then he told me that it was a history of the case from 1863 to the present time; named all the persons connected with it; all the letters; every incident, so far as he could remember, he had incorporated in that "True Story," and he would like to read it to me. I said I would like to hear it, and he read it to myself and friend, which occupied at least an hour and a half in reading.

Q. Well, let me ask you this, Mr. Harman; was that friend's house to whom you went an acquaintance of Mr. Tilton? A. He was an acquaintance of mine, but I had introduced him, at the gentleman's request to Mr. Tilton some weeks before that. I think it was at the church Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton and his mother—

Q. They had only been introduced to each other? A. They had been introduced, but under circumstances that might—that is, the gentleman said, "I would like to know Mr. Tilton; I am a subscriber of The Golden Age."

Q. I don't care about that. I want to know if they were intimate friends? A. No; not in that sense, because they had not met each other before, except this one time, so far as I know.

Q. Comparatively recent acquaintances? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, have you read the statement of the "True Story" as published in THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE? A. Yes, Sir; I read that.

Q. Please state, Sir, whether you recognize that as the substance of the "True Story" which he read to you, so far as it goes? A. I think it is, so far as it goes, as near as I can remember.

Mr. Beach—I object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Both papers are in, are they not? I think we will let it stand, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Let me ask you this question.

Mr. Beach—Well, wait one moment, Sir. What was this last question and answer?

Judge Neilson—It calls for a comparison of the two papers.

Mr. Beach—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—One the "True Story" as read, and the other as published in THE TRIBUNE.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, we lent a copy to Judge Fullerton, and he carried it off with him, and I find the gentlemen have not got it here. I have sent down to my house for another copy. I suppose there will be no objection to identifying that through this witness.

Judge Neilson—No; of course there is a difficulty in asking a witness at this lapse of time to form a judgment about the comparison of the two papers. That is the only objection made, and perhaps you had better recur to it when you get the paper.

Mr. Shearman—Better produce the paper.

Mr. Beach—I do not wish that question and answer to stand.

The Witness—I would like to correct my answer, if it is in order.

Judge Neilson—In what respect?

The Witness—I would not pretend to swear that it is entirely a verbatim copy by any means.

Mr. Beach—I suppose not.

Judge Neilson—I think we will strike out the last answer.

The Witness—[Continuing.] Cannot do that possibly.

Mr. Hill—I submit that my friend waited until the answer was fully given before he stated any objection to the question.

Mr. Morris—That don't prevent the motion to strike out.

Mr. Hill—I submit that it does, because there is no foundation for the motion. But the question was the thing objectionable—the question went directly for the point which he now makes against it.

Judge Neilson—It has this qualification, that the witness on second thought cannot be certain about the similitude of the two papers, and it has this materiality, that you propose to bring in by and by the printed paper. It may as well be struck out for the present.

Mr. Hill—We except, may it please your Honor.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, it is quite competent for the witness to qualify any answer.

Judge Neilson—Yes; perhaps so.

Mr. Everts—And if he does that we may perhaps be better able to judge whether to strike out the whole, or not. We have not at present the qualification in, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—I think it had better be struck out, and you can refer to it when the paper comes.

Mr. Everts—We, as your Honor knows, do not recognize the right to strike out evidence that is once properly in.

Judge Neilson—The motion to strike out cannot be entertained unless it is in.

Mr. Everts—Yes; but if it is properly in, not on the ground that it is not good—or anything of that kind, your Honor. Evidence that has improperly forced its way in, why, of course, it can be properly struck out. But that seems hardly to be the case with this evidence. The question was not objected to; the answer is responsive to the question, and now if it is less determinate than it might be, or less important than it might be, that is not ground for striking it out, because a good deal of evidence would go out if its weight was to be criticised too closely after the production of it. If your Honor thinks this should be struck out—

Judge Neilson—I think it should, Sir.

Mr. Everts—We will be obliged to except to your Honor's ruling.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Hill.

THE MEETING WITH MR. MCKELWAY.

Mr. Hill—Do you know Mr. McKelway of The Brooklyn Eagle? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember meeting him soon after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, when you had a conversation respecting that publication? A. Very distinctly.

Q. State whether or not you made an arrangement for Mr. McKelway to meet Mr. Tilton? A. I met Mr. McKelway at the Woodruff & Robinson fire. The Board of Supervisors had just adjourned, and we went from there to see the fire, and I met Mr. McKelway there.

Q. I don't care for the conversation; I merely want to know if you made an arrangement? A. I made one—I made a suggestion; I made no arrangement of—on Mr. Tilton's part; that is to say, I had made no arrangement with Mr. Tilton. I simply said to Mr. McKelway, "You go and see Mr. Tilton; he has shown me some"—then he had shown me this 1871—this letter of January, 1871—of January 1st, 1871, I mean.

Q. The proof slip, you mean? A. Yes, Sir; the proof slip. I said, "You go and see Mr. Tilton; I think he will show you something that will astonish you." I used, perhaps, pretty strong language—

Q. I don't care for the—

Mr. Hill—That is all at present, reserving, with your Honor's permission, the privilege of producing the printed copy of the "True Story."

The Witness—Mr. Hill, I would like to explain how that letter—as it involves my honor to some extent—the publication of that letter—I would like to have a chance to explain how McKelway got that letter.

Mr. Hill—Presently.

The Witness—If you please.

Mr. Hill—There is something else I have to ask you.

Mr. Beach—I will give you an opportunity, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. HARMAN.

Mr. Beach—In the first place, Mr. Harman, I would like to get as near as you can at the date of this interview at Bang's restaurant. A. Well, I have tried to refresh my memory; I cannot possibly; there is no date by which I can fix it except that it was in the Spring of 1872; I did at one time think it was in April, but I think now it must have been considerably before that, because in April I am very busy generally at the store, and that is the only circumstance; I don't think that I should have been absent from the store three hours in the busy season, so I think it must have been as early as March, or the last of February. That is the way it seems to me now.

Q. February, 1872? A. In 1872.

Q. Well, was it at that interview that he first exhibited to you any document? A. As I said in my examination-in-chief, I don't remember whether he there showed me this proof slip, or whether it was at a subsequent time; I am inclined to think it was at a subsequent time; I am not sure, and yet it might have been at that time.

Q. Well, I understand that the first paper he showed you was what is called a personal statement, embodying the letter to Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir, it was; yes, Sir, the letter of Jan. 1st, 1871.

Q. And then in December of that year of 1872, he exhibited to you what is called the "True Story"? A. At my house; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, can you get at the date in December? A. Yes, Sir; that I can fix from a circumstance; it was the Sabbath evening preceding Christmas.

Q. What, Sir? A. It was the Sabbath evening preceding Christmas; that would make it the 18th of December, I guess. I will tell you why if—

Q. Well, you are positive about that date? A. Positive of it, because my wife—I called in a physician—my wife had a severe attack of neuralgia, that is the way I fix the date, and was sick for six months that she didn't leave her room, and I date it from that evening.

Q. Well, that fixes that date. And was it at that time, according to your present impression, that you obtained the "True Story" from Mr. Tilton? A. It was that evening; he came there and read it to me.

Q. And it was that evening that you asked him permission to take it and show it to Dwight Johnson? A. I never asked him for the "True Story."

Q. Oh, it was the other paper? A. It was the letter of January 1st, 1871, that I got long before that.

Q. Well, there is a little confusion in my mind now; pardon me, Mr. Harman, I understand you, you are uncertain whether he exhibited to you the Bowen letter of January, 1871, at Bang's restaurant, or subsequently? A. I will state what my impressions are, Mr. Beach, if you please. I think at the first interview he showed me the letter that he wrote to Mr. Bowen embodying these charges—

Q. Well, by the first interview, what do you mean? A. That at Bang's Hotel.

Q. Yes. A. I think so. He also showed a letter that Mr. Bowen wrote him from Woodstock, Conn., covering four pages, referring to the political campaign—the Webster campaign, as we call it. He also exhibited one or two copies of The Independent, in which the complimentary—hold up—complimentary notices were passed, I guess all in a body, I think it was at that interview, and yet I would not swear positively, because I did not charge my memory with dates, for I did not expect ever to be called upon again to testify—nothing of that kind. But I know he exhibited them all at one time—the Bowen letter, the letter of Mr. Bowen from Woodstock referring to politics, where Mr. Bowen commanded him, or almost commanded him, to support Mr. Webster, and I was on the other side, and so he knew I was interested, and he showed me that, with other things.

Q. Now, you made an expression in your direct evidence referring to your former testimony; what testimony was that? A. Before the Committee—the Church Committee.

Q. Oh, before the Church Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you seen that testimony of yours published? A. No, Sir; I see in THE TRIBUNE an interview—what purported to be—but I never saw it published; I saw the comments on it in the report.

MR. TILTON PRAISES MRS. TILTON.

Q. Well, you have seen this book, issued by The Graphic Company, I think? A. I think not, Sir; I have read very little on the subject.

Q. Seen the report of the Committee referring to it. Now, did any paper as connected with Mr. Bowen, the letter to Mr. Bowen or the "True Story," or any paper submitted to you at any time, contain any imputation on the part of Mr. Tilton against his wife? A. He never charged her with—

Q. Never at any time made any imputation upon her at all? A. Not upon her honor as a wife, charging her with any adultery—nothing of that kind.

Q. The offense which he charged was wholly on the part of M<sup>r</sup>. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he always speak in the highest and most complimentary and affectionate terms of his wife? A. Always.

Q. And he represented her as entirely pure and innocent? A. Well, he never said that, because I never questioned him; it is a subject that I would not question—

Q. Well, whenever he spoke of his wife— A. He spoke kindly of her.

Q. He spoke of her as a pure and innocent woman? A. He spoke kindly of her; he said she was intensely religious, even to fanaticism, and thought it was her duty to save the church, even though she went down herself.

Q. Now, the "True Story," when it was read to you upon the occasion of which you speak at your friend's—what became of it? A. That I am not able to tell you. I don't know.

Q. You never saw it after that? A. Not after that, until—not in manuscript; I know I never saw it after that.

Q. Well, this letter of Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen, which you think you exhibited to Dwight Johnson, how long was that in your possession? A. Oh, I must have had it several weeks. I think I must have carried it in my pocket two or three weeks, that with the letter of Bowen's on the Webster campaign; I wanted to show that to some political friends, to show them what a battle we fought, and what the odds were against us, etc., and so I showed them I think to two or three friends; I cannot swear positively, but I think—I had a letter, and right here, if it is in order, I would like to state how it got out of my hands.

Q. Well, state it? A. I think the day, perhaps, after the Woodruff & Robinson fire, when I told Mac that he should go to Mr. Tilton; that I thought Mr. Tilton would show him something that would interest him; I think the very next day, in the evening, when I returned from my business, a member of my family said, "Mr. Tilton and Mr. McKelway have been here to see you." I said, "What did they want?" The answer was, "That I don't know, but there is a note for you." Mr. Tilton left a very short note, and I opened it and read it; saw that it was not of much importance, and before I got through with my dinner, or about the time, McKelway returned; he said "I want these papers." I think the papers that they brought up were two copies of The Independent, that contained those complimentary letters that passed between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Tilton, but my impression is that I had the January letter in my possession at the time Mac and I differed as to that, honestly, undoubtedly—he may be right, or I may be right; I don't know which is right; but at all events, in this large envelope were these two Independents—copies of The Independent, with a short note from Mr. Tilton, saying that they should be returned to him, all the papers, when I got through with them. Mac says, "I come for those papers." I said, "Why, I have just got a note from Mr. Tilton saying that they are to be delivered to him." "Oh!" he says, "That is all right." He says, "We have decided to submit those papers to counsel—eminent counsel." "We," I said; "who?" "Well, The Eagle, The Eagle," he says; "we have employed eminent counsel, and we are going to submit those papers, the story, the whole story, and see what is in it." Said I, "Who is your counsel?" He said, "Gen. Tracy." "Well," I said, "Mr. Tilton, I have no authority to give you up—"

Q. Mr. McKelway? A. Mr. McKelway, "I have no authority to give you these papers without an order from Mr. Tilton." He says, "That is all right, that is all right. We have decided upon that; we want to see whether that story will hold water"—he used that word, I recollect very distinctly—"we are going to see if the story will hold water, and if it does," he intimated that they were going to publish, and I was as curious as he was to know whether it would hold water, so I said: "If you will pledge me your word of honor—you have got to go to Mr. Tilton's house, or very near his house, in going to yours—if you will go to Mr. Tilton's house and tell him you have got these papers I will deliver them to you without an order." He says, "I will." I delivered up the papers to him and he went away with that understanding, that he was to go—to pass Mr. Tilton's house—and tell him that he had got them from me, and they were to be submitted, as he said, to Mr. Tracy, to see whether the story would hold water, etc.

$5,000 OFFERED FOR THE TRUE STORY.

Q. Did you repeatedly urge Mr. Tilton to publish that paper? A. I did on that occasion; I said this: "Mr. Tilton, if that is the 'True Story,' as you have stated it there, your wife is certainly innocent, and your first duty is to your wife and children; you ought to publish that story and let the world know exactly what the extent of her offending is; you would save your wife and children, because he did not charge any adultery there," and I told him, besides, that I thought he could make money out of it, if that was his object.

Mr. Hill—Was that at this same interview? A. Yes, Sir; at the same interview.

Mr. Beach—Did he assent or refuse? A. He said he would not publish it under any circumstances.

Q. Would not publish it under any circumstances—well, did you at any time make him a liberal pecuniary offer for the liberty of publishing it? A. I did.

Mr. Hill—One moment.

Judge Nelson—Counsel can ask what further was said between them.

Mr. Hill—The objection is, they don't, Sir.

The Witness—I said at that interview at my friend's house, after hearing the whole story, and what decided me more than any one thing, I think—I think there was a letter of Mr. Beecher's sister, Mrs. Isabella Hooker-Beecher, or Beecher-Hooker, whatever it is, in which she emphatically charged the crime upon her brother; I think that that decided me, perhaps, as much as anything else. I said, "If these things are true—you know whether they are true or not—I should publish them." I will confess right here that Mr. Tilton was an enigma to me, and I did want to see what there was of it, or what there was in it, and I said to him, "I will give you a check for $5,000 for that 'True Story,' if you will"—I think I made no conditions other than that he should part with it; that is, should make over the ownership to me, and swear to it. Said I, "I will give you $5,000 for it."

Q. Well, did he accept or decline? A. He declined it.

Q. Now, I want to ask your attention to the interview of which you have spoken in Fulton-st. immediately after Mr.

Tilton's return from New-Hampshire. Will you please repeat that again, Mr. Harman? A. I met him and said to him: "Mr. Tilton, I am glad to meet you. I have been wanting to see you." I said: "Have you seen this monstrous story of the Woodhulls?" He said he had just returned. I think he said he had seen it, but had not seen it until he returned to the city. "Why," I said, "what do you think of it?" "Well," he said, "it was an exaggeration, of course; it was a lie, so far as the charge of adultery; I understood him to say it was a lie out and out. Then I appealed to him in as strong language as I could command to contradict it, and save his wife and children. He remarked, says he: 'But suppose I can't?'" "Well," I said, "I assume you can, because you have charged no adultery against your wife. I should contradict the story, write a broad denial and contradict it; and there was something more said, I have forgot to what effect exactly, except that he said he could not—would not contradict it, that his wife was opposed to that policy—that she thought—she was willing to suffer if she could thereby save the church. There wasn't much more said. I think I went to his house very soon after that and spent an evening at his house for the same purpose—begged him to contradict the story.

Q. Well, I am requested to ask you whether at these interviews at the time that you offered $5,000 for the control of this "True Story," whether you at the same time told Mr. Tilton in substance, that he could make $5,000 out of the publication of it? A. I don't think I said so; at the same time my object was to get, as I said to you—

Mr. Hill—One moment; we don't want your object.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't know; perhaps I do whether you do or not.

Mr. Hill—No doubt you would like it.

The Witness—I don't want it understood that I offered him the $5,000 because I wanted to publish it; that was not it; I wanted control—to get it out of the way; I don't know what I should have done with it, but I wanted to understand Mr. Tilton; I wanted to know—I wanted to see whether he would sell it or not; I did, at a future time, say to him that the whole world wanted to know about this scandal, and I thought a man could sell a million copies of it at 25 cents a piece; that is what I said; he said he knew it.

Q. At the time that Mr. Tilton was rehearsing to you the causes of his discharge by Mr. Bowen, did he say anything in regard to his wife that connected his discharge in any way with imputations upon his wife in any shape? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. He confined it entirely to the charges which had been made by Bowen against him? A. I think so.

Q. And did you understand from him, in that conversation, that the demand upon Mr. Beecher to vacate his pulpit was grounded upon the accusation which had been made by Mr. Bowen against Mr. Beecher? A. I understood so from Mr. Tilton; yes.

Mr. Evans—Understood from what?

Mr. Beach—Understood so from Mr. Tilton. That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. HARMAN.

Mr. Hill—I don't know that I quite correctly understood the last answer which you gave, except one; did you say that the charges which Mr. Tilton made were confined entirely to those which Mr. Bowen had stated at the first interview? A. As against—the charges as against Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; I was not questioned as to that at all; he made charges—he made charges against Mr. Beecher—

Q. Well, you stated, then, that the procedure of Mr. Bowen was based entirely upon the charges which Mr. Bowen had made? A. I understood from Mr. Tilton that when this—

Q. I am striving simply to get at the answer which you gave Mr. Beach.

Mr. Beach—The statement he made in answer to my question was, that the demand upon Mr. Beecher to retire from his pulpit, he understood from Mr. Tilton, was based entirely upon the charges brought by Mr. Bowen against Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Hill—Oh!

The Witness—Mr. Bowen proposed it, as he told me, and he acceded to it.

Q. Let me be clear about another fact; when was it, if you are clear, that the proof slip was handed to you by Mr. Tilton? A. At what date?

Q. Yes; I don't mean the precise date, but I mean the time with reference to the Woodhull publication. A. My impression was that the proof slip was handed me at the first interview, as I stated before; that is my impression.

Q. The first one after the publication? A. No, no; the first at Bang's Hotel; I am not sure as to that, but that is my impression.

Q. Now, you had an interview with him very soon after the publication; was that before or after the interview with Mr. McKelway? A. It was before, unquestionably; it was on the street.

Q. Now, when did you get the papers, the proof slip, The Independent article, and the documents of that description? A. I think I had had—

Mr. Beach—There is no proof sheet he had got then.

The Witness—I think I had had those long before; I won't undertake to swear positively, because I cannot reconcile the dates.

Mr. Morris—He said he thought he had had them about two weeks.

Mr. Evans—Not them; he thought he had the proof slips.

The Witness—I may have returned it to Mr. Tilton again, and he sent it up there; yet I don't know, I cannot say positively how that is.

Q. Well, was it after the Woodhull publication, and before you saw Mr. McKelway? A. Oh! my impression is that I had seen the proof slip, The Golden Age proof slip, embodying the "Personal Statement," and the letter of January 1st, 1871, to Mr. Bowen before the Woodhull publication; that is my impression, yet I am not sure.

Q. But when did you get it to show it to Dwight Johnson, that is the point of the inquiry? A. Well, that I can't tell you; I can't tell you; it is very— In some of my going ferths on the ferry-boat I think I met Mr. Tilton and asked him for it but I cannot for my life tell you the date.

Mr. Beach—He fixed it before April or March, 1872.

The Witness—That is when he read it to me first, I think.

Mr. Hill—Was that the first time you had it—March or April, I mean? A. My impression is that Mr. Tilton at the first interview at Bang's Hotel read me this letter, but I don't think I took it from him then; I think at some subsequent time during the Summer I asked him to loan it to me, as I wanted to show it to Dwight Johnson.

Q. Now, can you say whether that delivery to you to show it to Mr. Johnson was before the Woodhull publication or after it? A. Whether the delivery to me?

Q. Yes. A. Of the January first letter?

Q. Of the proof slip, as you call it. A. My impression is that I had it before the Woodhull publication; that is my impression; I won't be positive.

Q. Now, when you got it to show Mr. Johnson, was that the first time that you had it in your possession? A. The first time I had it in my possession; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you keep it from that time until you gave it to Mr. McKelway? A. Well, my impression is I did, and yet I am not sure; Mac and I differ as to that; I don't know which is right.

Q. You might have given it back? A. I might have given it back, and they may have delivered The Independents and the Bowen letter and all up there that day; I am not clear as to that.

Q. You have mentioned a statement to Mr. Tilton, in which you offered $5,000; was that in reference to these proof slips and that set of papers, or did it relate wholly to the "True Story?" A. When he read me the "True Story," embodying all the correspondence, I think, so far as I remember—

Q. Well, did the offer relate to that or the other set; that is all I wanted to know? A. The offer related to the "True Story."

Q. Wholly? A. Yes, Sir; and all that it comprised.

Q. Now, when and where did you make him that offer of $5,000? A. After he got through reading; I never had thought of it a moment, and after he got through reading; as stated before, Mr. Tilton was an enigma to me; I said right then and there: "Mr. Tilton, I will give you $2,500 for that manuscript." I think the only condition I made, possibly, was that he should swear to it, and make the ownership of it over to me. He declined it. I went to The Golden Age office next day, and increased the offer to $5,000. I said to my friend: "I am going to see whether this man wants money," or something to that effect. I went over to The Golden Age office, and says: "Mr. Tilton, I will give you a check for $5,000 for that." He asked me what I wanted to do with it. I told him I didn't know what I would do with it; I wanted control of the story; he declined it.

Q. Well, did you bid higher for it? A. No, Sir, it ended right there; it was a kind of a sudden matter, a thing that I had never thought of before, but it came upon me like an inspiration, and I made him the offer.

Q. What was done with the "True Story," Mr. Harman, after Mr. Tilton had finished reading it at the friend's house? A. I never saw it after that in my life.

Q. He took it away? A. Oh! he took it, undoubtedly.

Q. Now, will you state what friend that was?

The Witness—If your Honor please, must I name the gentleman at whose house we were?

Judge Nellson—Oh, I think so; yes.

The Witness—Mr. Dinsmore; he is in Europe now.

Mr. Evarts—It is of no consequence.

The Witness—Curran Dinsmore.

Judge Nellson—Oh, it is perfectly safe, if he is in Europe.

The Witness—Yes. [Laughter.]

Q. Just look at this publication of the "True Story," in the triple sheet of the New York Daily Tribune, of March 6th, 1876. A. I have read that, Mr. Hill; I think it is the same story in substance; I would not pretend to say that is a verbatim copy, but I think it embodies, so far as it goes—I don't think it is so full as the one he read me, because I judge so from the length of time that Mr. Tilton occupied in reading it.

Q. Well, do you remember the statement of facts contained in it? A. Oh, yes, Sir; I think, so far as the main statement of facts, it is the same thing.

[Tribune copy of the "True Story," marked "D, 114."]

Mr. Hill—That is all.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. HARMAN.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Harman, have you read this [D, 114] with sufficient attention to be able to say whether all the statements contained in this publication were in the "True Story," as it was read to you by Mr. Tilton? A. Well, that would be impossible; of course—two and a half years have elapsed since, or thereabouts—it would be impossible for me to remember distinctly; I remember the beginning of it to be the same; I think there were some things in the "True Story" that were not in that, if that is of any account.

[Messrs. Morris and Beach here consulted for a time over the paper.]

Q. Do you recollect whether in the "True Story," as read by Mr. Tilton, there was an extract from a statement made by his wife to be submitted to Rev. Dr. Storrs, in which she said that Mr. Beecher had solicited her to become a wife to him with all that that term implied, or in substance that? A. I don't remember whether that occurred or not; my impression—I have scarcely any impression on the subject; I could not say.

Mr. Beach—It is very singular it is not here; I had supposed that that was here; I understood it to have been read to Mr. Belcher.

Mr. Evarts—Nothing about Dr. Storrs in that?

Mr. Beach—No; nothing about Dr. Storrs in that, but I don't find that part that was read to Mr. Belcher on his examination.

Mr. Morris—That first paragraph, that first extract was in it.

Mr. Beach—Now, see if you can find it.

Mr. Morris—Well, it ought to be there.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness]: Do you recollect that in the "True Story," was this statement—

[Reading]: "In July, 1870, prompted by my duty, I informed my husband that H. W. Beecher, my friend and pastor, had solicited me to be a wife to him, together with all that this implied?"

A. I think something of that kind was in the "True Story."

Q. And, that this followed—[Reading]:

"Six months afterward my husband felt impelled by the circumstances of a conspiracy against him, in which Mrs. Beecher had taken a part, to have an interview with Mr. Beecher?"

A. I don't remember that part of it; I remember that Mrs. Beecher was introduced in the "True Story," but in what connection I cannot remember at this minute.

Q. In what shape was the manuscript from which Mr. Tilton read on this occasion? A. I think it was in loose sheets.

Q. Loose sheets? A. That he would turn over or pull out and lay over, rather.

Q. Did you notice whether it was apparently a draft, altered, with interlineations or not? A. I did not; I was opposite him, on one side of the room, and he was at the table, I think; I could not identify a single sheet.

Q. Did he say anything at the time, as to how recently he had drawn the paper? A. I understood him to say that he had done it since his return from—

Q. New-Hampshire? A. New-Hampshire, at the instance of Dr. Storrs, if I remember correctly.

Q. Yes. A. That Dr. Storrs had asked him to collate the facts, suggested that he do so, in case—for future use. Now, I think I am correct in saying that he said that it was at Dr. Storrs's suggestion.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, that is probably correct; that appears to be so now by the evidence; that is all, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF JACKSON S. SCHULTZ.

Jackson S. Schultz was then called and sworn.

Mr. Tracy—Where do you reside? A. City of New-York, 308 Madison-ave.

Q. What is your business? A. Leather.

Q. Leather merchant? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been engaged in business in the City of New York? A. Since 1837 on my own account.

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I do.

Q. How long have you known him? A. Since 1864 or 1865.

Q. What was his position when you first knew him? A. I can't say, Sir, what—he was on The Independent after I knew him; I don't know whether he was engaged as early as that on The Independent.

Q. What were your relations with him from the time of making his acquaintance in 1868 or 1864, down to 1873? A. Very pleasant.

Q. And friendly? A. Friendly.

Q. And intimate? A. Moderately so.

Q. Were you in the habit of seeing him frequently, and conversing with him on topics of the day? A. I think I was; Sir.

Q. And your relations were cordial, were they? A. Yes, Sir.

THE CAPITAL OF THE GOLDEN AGE.

Q. After January 1st, 1871, state whether or not you were applied to by him to become a subscriber to the capital to found The Golden Age? A. I cannot speak as to dates very specifically; a few weeks or months previous to the issuing of The Golden Age, whenever that was, I was applied to by him to assist him in that enterprise.

Q. Did any one come with him to see you? A. Mr. Moulton came with him.

Q. Mr. who? A. Mr. Moulton—Franklin—Mr. Woodruff, Franklin Woodruff.

Q. Where was the interview? A. At my house.

Q. Will you state what occurred? A. Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Tilton came up to my room, where I was temporarily confined by illness. The subject of this enterprise was generally spoken of. Mr. Woodruff left, leaving Mr. Tilton in the same room with me alone. He remained there, I should think, an hour to an hour and a half, and we talked over very fully this enterprise, and its general nature.

Q. Was this the first time that it had been brought to your notice? A. No, Sir, I had heard of the enterprise, and I had heard from friends that I was to be applied to to help.

Q. Yes, but this was the first interview you had had with Mr. Tilton or Mr. Woodruff on the subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what was said generally about the enterprise and about your aiding it? A. I remember having discussed the probabilities of the success of the enterprise, and I asked him whether Mr. Beecher would subscribe. He said he would if he asked him. I asked him then whether Mr. Beecher would contribute afterwards for it, and he said if he would permit him—if he permitted him; those were the remarks which attracted my attention most, because I had up to that time supposed that they were very friendly—intimate and friendly.

Q. Well, what further occurred there? A. Well, we talked over the subject of newspapers and the economy of conducting them, etc.

Q. Well, did you conclude then to aid him? A. I did not.

Q. It was left for a further interview? A. Left that for a further interview.

Q. Did you have further interviews with him? A. I did.

Q. Where? A. I think at my office, and I think at other places; I met him frequently at the Club.

Q. What Club? A. Union League Club.

Q. Did you frequently see him at the Union League Club? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In company with any one? A. Generally Mr. Moulton.

Q. Francis D. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how frequently should you say you conversed with him on the subject of this paper before you agreed to aid him? A. Well, I think I agreed to aid him the very next interview after—

Q. Next interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To what extent did you agree to aid him? A. I agreed to discount his notes, or contribute to the extent of $1,500 to the enterprise; on condition it succeeded he was to pay me.

Q. Was your partner, also, to contribute a like amount? A. He was.

Q. Who was that partner? A. Mr. Southwick—John C. Southwick.

Q. If it did not succeed, what then? A. We were to lose the money.

Q. How soon after your agreement to aid him, according to your recollection, was the first number of the paper issued? A. Well, it was a few weeks, I should judge—it might have been—it may possibly have been a month, or six weeks.

Q. From that time on, did you have frequent interviews with Mr. Tilton? A. Well, I had interviews; I don't know how frequently—several interviews.

Q. Well, did your relations and his become more intimate after that than they had been before? A. I think we met more frequently; they were no more friendly than I know of.

A NEGATIVE OFFENSE CHARGED ON MR. BEECHER.

Q. Did you afterwards talk with him in regard to his relations with Mr. Beecher? A. Very frequently; whenever we met almost.

Q. What was said about his cause of grievance against Mr. Beecher, and in connection with Mr. Bowen, if anything? A. His statements then were that Bowen had committed a great wrong to him, and that Mr. Beecher had failed to reach out his hand and save him, as he could have done; that he failed to manifest that interest in him which he had a right to expect; that was about the substance of the statement.

Q. Well, when did he say he failed to manifest this interest in him, on what occasion? A. On the occasion of Mr. Bowen's having a difficulty with him and turning him out of the paper, as I understood it.

Q. Was that referred to more than once? A. Yes, Sir; several times.

Q. Several times, you say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was his statement of his cause of grievance against Mr. Beecher substantially the same; did he repeat that more than once, that cause of grievance? A. I think he did several times, but knowing as I did at this later time, of this difference between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, I constantly made inquiries to find out what that trouble was.

Q. Yes? A. More than I did the other.

Q. When did you come to hear that there was a difference between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton? A. I cannot name the time, Sir. It was after—after my subscription to the paper, along some months afterwards, weeks certainly.

MR. TILTON DEFENDS MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Soon after the starting of The Golden Age, were you present at a dinner given by Isaac H. Bailey before his leaving for Europe? A. I was present at a dinner given to Isaac H. Bailey.

Q. Yes, given to Isaac H. Bailey. How many gentlemen were present on that occasion? A. Fifteen or twenty, I should think.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton of the party? A. He was.

Q. Did you hear any conversation between Mr. Tilton and other gentlemen at the table that night in regard to Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did.

Q. What did you hear? A. As near as I can remember the question of these ladies, Woodhull and Claflin, came up, and Mr. Bailey, I think, suggested that there was a gentleman present could tell him something about these ladies. The gentleman of Wall-st. was appealed to, and he made some statements in regard to them, and Mr. Tilton defended them with a great deal of zeal and warmth, and the conversation became so animated and so personal that I interfered to modify the statements as much as I could, as did one or two others present.

Q. How did he speak of Mrs. Woodhull? A. In a most exalted manner.

Mr. Beach—I think it would be better for us to have what he said.

Mr. Evarts—The substance of what he said.

Mr. Tracy—The substance of what he said? A. I am giving the language.

Q. Well. A. The substance was, that they were high-toned and honorable ladies, had undertaken an honorable business, and that he meant to stand by them, and that every good man ought to stand by them; and that the insinuations, &c., against them were unbecoming the persons who made them—words to that effect.

Q. Do you know when this was? A. It was one or two evenings previous to the sailing of Mr. Bailey, and I believe it was in the early part of June; I think so, but I won't be sure on that point.

Q. 1871. Wasn't it the 3d of June, 1871, that he said? A. I think it was, but I prefer not to be particular about that.

Q. Well, you know it was early in June? A. Yes, Sir; it was in the early Summer.

Q. Was it the same season after The Golden Age was started? A. I think it was.

Q. Now, Mr. Schultz, do you remember the occasion of the publication of the Life of Victoria Woodhull by Mr. Tilton? A. I do.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton soon after that publication and converse with him about it? A. I did.

Q. What did you say to him and what did he say to you? A. I expressed my disgust at the proceeding, and substantially told him that he had ruined himself and the enterprise—the paper.

Q. What enterprise did you refer to? A. The Golden Age.

Q. State fully what you said to him? A. I cannot pretend to give the language, except that I expressed myself very strongly as against the judgment which he had manifested in doing that thing.

Q. What did he say? A. He justified himself on the ground that he had always, through his life, stood by the weak and the down-trodden, and that he would stand by those two women, and did it as a matter of principle.

Q. Did he say anything further in regard to their character, indorsing them? A. I think he spoke of them as pure women, high-toned persons in every respect, that he was thoroughly satisfied in regard to that.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. I do not.

Q. Do you remember when the Life was published? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. Was it then a recent fact—was the publication a recent fact at the time of that conversation? A. It was within a few days, or a week or two anyhow.

MRS. TILTON PURE AS AN ANGEL.

Q. Now, during this time, did your acquaintance with Mr. Tilton continue, after this publication of the Woodhull Life? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you continue to have conversations with him in regard to his affairs, and he with you? A. I did.

Q. At any time was the subject of Mr. Beecher's relations with—was the relations of Mr. Beecher with Mrs. Tilton the subject of conversation between yourself and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you state when it was? A. During all these meetings that we had I was constantly, as I remarked before, at tempting to draw from him what the specific difficulty—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Sir; I object to that.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Evarts. We have that statement down already.

Mr. Tracy—Well, my attention was attracted in another way, and I did not hear what the witness said—what was objected to.

Mr. Evarts—No matter.

Mr. Tracy—Go on, Mr. Schultz, I repeat my question, whether the relations of Mr. Tilton—Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher were ever the subject of conversation between yourself and Mr. Tilton? A. There was such conversation in my private office with Mr. Tilton, in which I attempted to draw—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment! I object.

Q. What did you say to him? A. I said to him: "Mr. Tilton, do you mean to say to me that Mr. Beecher has had improper or criminal relations with your wife?" His answer was: "My wife is as pure as an angel," or words to that effect.

Q. What was the manner in which he said that? A. Very theatrical. [Laughter.] He rose from his seat (and made a declaration— and swung his hand [indicating]—that she was as pure as an angel.

Q. Can you state when that conversation was? A. I cannot.

Q. Do you know whether it was before or after the Woodhull Life? A. I think it was after.

Q. You think it was after? A. I think it was after.

Q. Can you state whether it was before or after the Woodhull publication—the scandal? A. No, I cannot.

Q. You cannot say whether it was before or after that? A. No; my recollection as to dates is very poor.

THE NEW JOURNALISTIC ENTERPRISE.

Q. Now, do you recollect the Woodhull publication—the Woodhull scandal? A. I do; but I don't recollect the date.

Q. After that did you have a conversation with Frank B. Carpenter? A. I did.

Q. [After consultation with counsel.] Did you have a conversation, do you say, with Frank Carpenter at that time—after the Woodhull publication? A. Oh! yes, Sir; it was in December, 1872, that I had this conversation with Carpenter.

Q. How long had you known Carpenter? A. By sight, several years.

Q. And personal intercourse with him how long? A. Not much; not to have—more speaking acquaintance, that is all.

Q. Had you seen him at the club frequently? A. I had.
 Q. Did you know him as a friend of Tilton's? A. I did.
 Q. Before that? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. How long had you known him as a friend of Tilton's?
 Judge Neilson—He answered, some months.
 The Witness—Well, it was before the Presidential election.
 Judge Neilson—He answers your question.
 The Witness—It was before the Presidential election of the Fall before.

Q. Did you state whether or not you had a conversation with Carpenter on the subject of a newspaper enterprise in December, 1872, in which Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher were to be interested?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

A BRIEF DISCUSSION.

Mr. Evarts—We only ask the question, yes or no; we don't ask what the conversation was.

Judge Neilson—Well, answer yes or no.

Mr. Beach—No; wait one moment, Sir. I beg your Honor to consider the question.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take the interview between them.

Mr. Beach—Well, but he is stating it in answer to the question: "Did you have a conversation with Carpenter in regard to starting a newspaper in which Tilton and Beecher were to be interested?" That is a part of the conversation, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is calling his attention to the subject of the conversation?

Mr. Beach—The starting of a newspaper will be sufficient to call his attention to the conversation, without asking him to modify it.

Judge Neilson—Modify your question.

Mr. Tracy—I will change my question. [To the witness]: Did you have a conversation with Carpenter in December, 1872, in regard to a newspaper enterprise in the City of New York?

Mr. Pryor—What have we got to do with that conversation?

Mr. Evarts—That is to be shown by subsequent proof.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! to the gentlemen say—

Mr. Evarts—Say? Of course we will produce it.

The Witness—I had such a conversation.

Q. Did you have more than one such conversation? A. I did have two.

Q. Did you afterwards see Theodore Tilton and have a conversation with him in reference to the conversation that you had with Carpenter? A. I had.

Q. On that subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you repeat to Tilton the conversation that you had had with Carpenter touching the newspaper enterprise? A. I think I did, about.

Q. Now, will you tell us what the conversation between yourself and Carpenter was?

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has ruled repeatedly during this trial that it should be what was said by the witness to the party.

Judge Neilson—We have taken it both ways. That has been the usual way.

Mr. Beach—You have repeatedly so against us, Sir, and consistently ruled that—have never permitted us to give the conversation, if I recollect aright, had between the witness and a third person.

Judge Neilson—Except in one instance; except in one instance.

Mr. Beach—And that has escaped my recollection.

Judge Neilson—[To defendant's counsel]: I think it will do as well, won't it, to go right to the conversation?

Mr. Tracy—I think there are several instances.

Judge Neilson—Only one, Sir; but won't it save time to go directly to your conversation? At any rate, this is a subordinate matter, and therefore you take the conversation between this witness and Mr. Tilton—

Mr. Tracy—Do I understand your Honor to rule that we have a right to go on?

Judge Neilson—Yes; and give the conversation with Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—Now, we offer to give it with Mr. Carpenter.

Judge Neilson—I direct you to take the other course, because it is a secondary and immaterial matter.

Mr. Tracy—Well, the ruling has been entirely different, against us, in one or two instances where your Honor has permitted them, on the witness stating that he had repeated the conversation to the party—you have permitted them to give the evidence of the conversation between the witness and the party.

Judge Neilson—I recollect perfectly well what my ruling has been, and I stated a moment ago, in answer to Mr. Beach, that there was an exception, that exception relating to the interview when you and Mr. Woodruff were present.

Mr. Tracy—Will your Honor permit me to call your attention to another ruling—that is, in regard to the West charges, where Mr. Moulton said that he had stated the substance of the charges to Mr. Beecher, but had not produced them. There was no evidence that the charges were ever produced to Mr. Beecher, and yet your Honor permitted them to state what the charges were, and put them all in.

Judge Neilson—The paper being in court. That don't apply. I am perfectly willing to be convicted on my own rulings, as I was on Saturday, under a grave mistake, but I think in this instance, as this is a collateral matter, of secondary importance, that you ought to accept the suggestion of the Court, and give the conversation between this witness and Mr. Tilton.

MR. TILTON CALLED A BLACKMAILER.

Mr. Tracy—[To the witness]: Mr. Schultz, then, you will proceed to the conversation that occurred between yourself and Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—In respect to what had passed between you and Mr. Carpenter.

Mr. Tracy—In respect to what had transpired between yourself and Mr. Carpenter. State when it was, and what occurred? A. About the first of January, within five or eight days, I think, 1872, Mr. Tilton—

Q. 187—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment! Let him go on.

The Witness—It was after the Presidential election in 1872.

That would be in 1873. It was after the Presidential election. Mr. Tilton came into my private office and says to me, "Schultz, I understand you charge me publicly with being a blackmailer." Says I to him, "Who says so?" "Frank Carpenter tells me so." "What else did he tell you?" "He told me that he had an interview with you and other gentlemen at the Club, in regard to a matter in which you made those charges against me." After some further conversation I became satisfied that he knew—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Morris—Never mind.

Judge Neilson—Only give the conversation, Mr. Schultz.

The Witness—I admitted to him that I had made that charge and then repeated to him with some particularity—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; wait one moment; tell what you said.

The Witness—I am going to, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—He is doing so.

Mr. Beach—No, he is not.

The Witness—I repeated to him with as much particularity as I could recollect, what had occurred with these gentlemen which induced me to make that—

Mr. Morris—Now, we object to that.

Mr. Evarts—He has a right to state what he stated to him as well as he could, the conversation that he had had.

Judge Neilson—That is preliminary matter merely. Now go on.

The Witness—Do you want me to state the conversation we had—that I had with Tilton, or—

Q. With Tilton. What did you repeat to Mr. Tilton as having transpired at this interview with you and other gentlemen, and Mr. Carpenter? A. I told Mr. Tilton that Mr. Carpenter met me at the Union League Club, and said to me that the friends of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton in Brooklyn were about to take some action in regard to their matter, which was somewhat of a public character, and desired me to meet two gentlemen, naming them, on the following evening at the Club, representing on our behalf the friends of those gentlemen in New York, to consult in regard to this matter. I told him that we did so meet, and we had a very long conversation—do you wish me to tell that?

Q. Yes, go right on and repeat everything you said to him?

Mr. Beach—Everything you said to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I told this to Mr. Tilton in justification of my course—

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—Yes.

The Witness—I said to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Moulton opened the question at the Club somewhat in this way: "You understand, gentlemen, I suppose, that there is a scandal in Brooklyn in regard to Mr. Beecher"—

Q. Do you mean Mr. Moulton? You said Moulton.

The Witness—Did I say Mr. Moulton—Mr. Carpenter—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Moulton—(Who was present.) I thank you.

The Witness—He says: "There is a scandal in Brooklyn in regard to Mr. Beecher which, probably, will take him out of the pulpit. His friends, and the friends of the parties"—that was the word I think he said—"the friends of the parties have concluded that the best way to get over this difficulty is to start a morning paper in New York for the purpose of settling this whole trouble." He then stated what the plan was, that Mr. Beecher was to be editor—

Q. Mr. Beecher, you stated?

The Witness—I was stating to Mr. Tilton what I said to Mr. Moulton—Mr. Carpenter—I beg your pardon again.

Mr. Moulton—I grant it.

Mr. Beach—I think Mr. Moulton had better get out of sight.

Mr. Moulton—Out of mind, I think.

The Witness—I cannot pretend to state that I repeat everything that was said at this conversation, but I tried to explain to Mr. Tilton, by way of apology for what I stated to him, the circumstances under which I stated it, and I stated it very fully to him, and I don't think it is hardly necessary for me to go over it again.

Mr. Tracy—Oh, yes; we have not had it yet.

Judge Neilson—Now, you said to Mr. Tilton what? A. I said to Mr. Tilton: "Those gentlemen, claiming to represent you, said that you were to go abroad to be the foreign correspondent, and that you and Mr. Bowen had certain documents in your keeping—in the keeping of those gentlemen, which would, if exposed, do him great damage, and that they were disposed to suppress the whole thing if this arrangement could be carried into effect." I said to him: "Now, that being true, of course I could come to no other conclusion than that you were a blackmailer, because you had in your keeping a paper which in itself you could destroy, but failing to do that you wanted a situation." He then said to me, during that interview, that Mr. Carpenter had no right to send him to Europe.

Q. Well, go on. A. We had a very lengthy discussion on the question whether I was justified, under the circumstances, in calling him a blackmailer. Mr. Isaac H. Bailey was called in by his suggestion to hear the argument, and to decide between us whether I was justified or not. Mr. Bailey was called in, and we repeated the whole thing over again—repeated as much as I could the conversation, and somewhat argued it, and Mr. Bailey decided that I was right; that there could be no other conclusion, from the facts stated, than that it was a blackmailing job.

Q. What reasons were stated why it was a blackmailing job? A. Why, that these two gentlemen had in their keeping a secret which they proposed to get—as I understood them—to get this paper afloat; and when it was afloat, one of them, at least, was to be employed upon it, in some indirect way.

Q. Anything said about Mr. Carpenter having an interest in that paper, or being connected with it? A. Mr. Carpenter told me—

Q. No; any conversation with Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Evarts—Give the whole conversation.

The Witness—The whole conversation had relation to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Tell what you said to Mr. Tilton? A. In the conversation I repeated the whole circumstances. Mr. Carpenter placed himself as—

Mr. Beach—I don't think this is correct.

Mr. Tracy—That is the way he told it to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—He said he told the whole circumstances, and then proceeded to state what he told Mr. Tilton Mr. Carpenter said to him.

Mr. Evarts—What circumstances did he repeat?

The Witness—I stated all these circumstances to Mr. Tilton; I stated the occasion—

Mr. Beach—I object to this general statement of the witness that he stated everything to Mr. Tilton.

Q. What did you state to Mr. Tilton about Mr. Carpenter in connection with the paper? A. I stated to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Carpenter had provided himself with a place on the business department, and also Mr. Johnson—

Mr. Evarts—What Johnson?

Mr. Beach—Oliver Johnson.

The Witness—Mr. Oliver Johnson. He mentioned Mr. Oliver Johnson as a gentleman he thought could be induced to go into the enterprise.

Q. In what enterprise? A. He was to be connected with the business department.

Q. Oliver Johnson was to be connected with the business department? A. That was as I understood it.

Q. And Mr. Beecher the editor? A. The editor-in-chief.

Q. And Mr. Tilton foreign correspondent? A. Foreign correspondent.

Q. Was there anything said about how long Mr. Tilton was to remain abroad? A. I think it was placed at several years; I cannot recollect how many years; it was several years he was to be abroad. This was to be one of the considerations, that it was to change the scenes and relieve his mind.

Q. Whose mind? A. Mr. Tilton's.

AN AVALANCHE OF QUESTIONS.

Q. Now, what did you say to Mr. Tilton, if anything—what did you repeat to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Carpenter had said about their ability to destroy these papers and suppress the scandal if the newspaper enterprise was carried out? I will waive that question and put another, Mr. Schultz. Did you say to Mr. Tilton, as to the question you had asked Mr. Carpenter in that conversation upon this subject, that if Mr. Beecher could not stay in the pulpit, how it would help him to leave the pulpit and go in a newspaper? Did you say nothing to Mr. Tilton on that subject? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. Repeat what Mr. Carpenter had said to you, and that you repeated to Mr. Tilton, on that subject, and what you said to Mr. Carpenter. A. I think I said to this effect, that it would be a sorry experience to come down out of the pulpit and take an editor's place, where he would be more subject to an attack than he would be in the pulpit.

Q. You said that to Mr. Carpenter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that Mr. Carpenter's reply that you repeated to Mr. Tilton?

Judge Neilson—You said that to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Beach—What is the question now?

Mr. Evarts—What he repeated to Mr. Tilton as Mr. Carpenter's reply.

The Witness—I don't recollect his reply to that; not particularly.

Mr. Tracy—Did you repeat to Mr. Tilton anything that passed between you and Mr. Carpenter about the destruction of these papers in any contingency? A. I don't know that I did at that interview.

Q. Was there anything said upon the subject that Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton held these papers which they could publish, or which they could destroy, just as they choose? A. That was a subject—

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Tracy.] It is quite offensively leading, Sir.

The Witness—That subject was frequently mentioned, and always conceded as a fact that that was the situation in all our conversations between Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton, myself and Mr. Carpenter, that the few papers—the few documents—

Mr. Beach—Well, now, we object to this.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Tracy.

Q. What was said about the case of Mr. Beecher being reduced to a few papers, if anything?

Mr. Beach—By whom?

Mr. Tracy—By Mr. Carpenter, which you (the witness) repeated to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—He says he didn't repeat it to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—I understood him to say so. A. I repeated that to Mr. Tilton—I repeated everything that was said to Mr. Tilton—everything stated by Mr. Carpenter in response to every question I put to him, and, as near as I can remember, at the time. I remember distinctly asking Mr. Carpenter—

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—The question is what you said to Mr. Tilton. A. I related to Mr. Tilton the whole of the conversation as near as I could, and whatever I stated was stated by me to Mr. Carpenter, or by Mr. Carpenter, was repeated, as far as I could do it, faithfully to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] What did you say to Mr. Tilton on that subject, if anything? A. I stated to Mr. Carpenter—

Mr. Beach—The subject of it.

Q. What did you state to Mr. Tilton that you had said to Mr. Carpenter?

Judge Neilson—On that subject.

A. I don't know whether I could say I stated it to him in that form, because it being conceded—

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out—about it being conceded.

Judge Neilson—Yes, strike that out.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out about it being conceded.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir, that is struck out.

Q. State, as near as you can, the substance of what you said to Mr. Tilton—had passed between you and Mr. Tilton—

Judge Neilson—Mr. Carpenter.

Mr. Tracy—And Mr. Carpenter; I mean on the subject of the papers which they held against Mr. Beecher? A. I have a very Indistinct recollection what I said to Mr. Carpenter on the subject; my recollection is, of course, that I repeated the same thing to Mr. Tilton, but when you ask me to specify whether I did at this interview repeat that, I cannot say.

Q. I will go on to another interview. Did you subsequently have another interview with Mr. Tilton on this subject? A. Yes, Sir, several.

Q. Where was one? A. One, I say, not several. At the Union League Club, where Mr. Moulton was present, and we substantially—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Q. Well, what occurred between you and Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton on that occasion? A. Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton were sitting in the room about half-past ten to eleven o'clock in the evening. I was passing the door, and was attracted by their presence, and, I think, was invited in, or, at all events, I did go in and sat down by the table with them, and Mr. Moulton says: "Mr. Schultz, it is too hard that you should have made this statement against Mr. Tilton, and I think, on reflection, you ought to apologize for it; you ought to take it back." We then rehearsed this whole thing, restated, as near as we could, part in the way of statement and part in the way of argument, all that occurred between this man and—

Q. Mr. Carpenter? A. Mr. Carpenter and myself.

Mr. Beach—I object to a general statement.

Mr. Tracy—We are coming to that.

Mr. Beach—I submit this is not competent evidence. State what was said.

Mr. Tracy—I am going to have him do so. That will be my next question. [To the witness.] Now, what was stated between yourself and Mr. Tilton then in the presence of Mr. Moulton? What was talked over and what was said? A. As I said before, we restated—

Q. Repeat here what you said there. A. You remember that this was all for the purpose of justifying—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—We understand that.

Mr. Tracy—We understand that.

The Witness—Do you want me to repeat—

Mr. Tracy—Yes, to repeat what was said between Mr. Moulton and yourself in Mr. Tilton's presence.

Judge Neilson—On that occasion.

The Witness—I stated that the logic of the statement brought me to that conclusion. I said that Mr. Carpenter had invited me to an interview in the Club on the subject of this paper enterprise, and I said that we had discussed the thing thoroughly, fully, as they knew, because we had talked that thing over.

Mr. Beach—Never mind that.

The Witness—Do you want me to repeat the exact statement again?

THE APOLOGY FOR THE CHARGE OF BLACK-MAILING.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; the substance of what you said there.

The Witness—Well, I will go right over it back again. I met

Mr. Carpenter in the Club the evening before, and he said that Frank—

Mr. Morris—No; never mind what Mr. Carpenter said before.

The Witness—That is what I told these gentlemen.

Mr. Tracy—Go right on.

Mr. Beach—You are confounding the interviews.

Mr. Tracy—No, he is not; he was right and you were wrong. He was telling what he said to these persons.

Mr. Beach—He didn't say it in that way.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] You were there on this occasion, and you were all three seated at the table? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evans—We have an introductory question as to what Moulton said on that occasion to the witness about his statement against Mr. Tilton, and that he (the witness) ought to apologize.

Judge Neilson—Yes, continue on from there.

A. I said: "Before you decide, Mr. Moulton, do you know about this case?" He said, "I think I do." I said, "Have you heard my side of it—my belief about it?" He said, "I don't know that I have," and I then went on and stated it as I have stated it here.

Mr. Beach—One moment.

Mr. Tracy—Go on and repeat what you said to Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that: "And then went on and stated as I have stated here."

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—Then I must go over the whole thing again.

Mr. Beach—Perhaps you didn't go over it all then.

The Witness—I don't suppose I did.

Mr. Beach—Therefore I want you to state what you said to them.

The Witness—I cannot give the language.

Judge Neilson—No; you cannot, perhaps. What did you state there? A. I said this interview between Mr. Carpenter and myself, at the Club, had developed such a state of facts as justified me, I thought, and I asked him if he knew what the facts were, and he said he did not; he supposed he might know them generally, but not particularly. Then I insisted on relating them, and I did relate them.

Mr. Beach—I object to that, and move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you repeat? State what you recollect, just as if you were telling it the first time. A. If you want me positively to relate it as it took place, in the language I am going to state now, I cannot do it.

Q. No; in substance? A. That Mr. Carpenter had invited William Orton and Henry Clews and myself to meet him to consider a matter of public interest to the friends of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, that he had proposed to purchase The New York Evening Express; to place at the head of that paper Henry Ward Beecher; to place Mr. Tilton as foreign correspondent, and himself and Oliver Johnson, as I remember, the business managers; and that this was to be done, as I understood him, upon the strength of some secret or some information which Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton and Mr. Johnson held, to compel this course. That being true, I said to Mr. Moulton I saw no other way out of it, except to denunciate it a blackmailing job, and he then said: "You have not heard the whole of the story."

Mr. Everts—Mr. Moulton said?

The Witness—Mr. Moulton said, "You have not heard the whole of the story." We said much more to the same effect, and talked the whole thing over fully; we had a little lunch together, and we separated. I said to him then, "Now, if—" I think Mr. Moulton said for Mr. Tilton, in his presence, "He had no right," Frank's partner had not, "to send Tilton abroad at all." I said, "If that is so, if he is wrong in regard to Mr. Tilton, he is perhaps wrong in regard to the whole thing; and if all is false, why, then, what I have said goes for nothing, of course, and in that sense, and to that extent, I apologise."

Judge Nelson—I think you are right, Sir. Now, we will take a recess. [To the jurors.] Return at 3 o'clock, gentlemen.

Mr. Beach—A little after 3 o'clock, if your Honor please, it is now ten minutes after 1 o'clock.

Judge Nelson—[To the jurors.] Return at ten minutes past 3 o'clock, gentlemen.

The Court then took a recess until 3:10 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2:15 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Nelson—[To the jury.] Gentlemen, after you had retired, on suggestion, a change was made, adjourning to ten minutes after two o'clock, but you were too late to be notified; that is, you had retired and could not be notified. Call your witness, Mr. Tracy.

Jackson S. Schultz was recalled, and the direct examination resumed.

MORE OF THE CARPENTER INTERVIEW.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Schultz, when you asked Mr. Carpenter how Mr. Beecher's changing from the pulpit to the press would help him, did Mr. Carpenter make any reply?

Mr. Morris—We object to that.

Judge Nelson—It depends upon whether he communicated that to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—Certainly. I don't ask him what the reply was. I want to get the fact first, whether he made any reply.

Judge Nelson—Did he make any reply?

The Witness—He did make a reply.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Tilton what reply Mr. Carpenter made to that question? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What was it? A. It was to the effect—he stated this, that the complaint in this case was all reduced to a few documents, and that they were held in escrow by Mr. Moulton, and could be destroyed at any time; and that the public scandal would cease after a very little while, and that no legal proceedings could ever come by reason of these papers.

Q. State whether or not Mr. Carpenter said that Mr. Moulton had been consulted about this enterprise?

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—I don't ask what he said. [To the witness.] Did he say anything on the subject of Mr. Moulton being consulted— A. He did, Sir.

Q. Did you repeat that to Tilton? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. What did you tell Tilton Carpenter had said to Moulton? A. That Moulton occupied this medium position that he did between the two parties.

Q. Well? A. Was trying to act a friendly part to save both of them from the scandal.

Q. What was he doing?

Mr. Beach—Oh, now, these questions are very objectionable as leading.

Q. Anything further said?

Judge Nelson—What further did you say to Mr. Tilton, if anything?

The Witness—Well, I cannot recollect, Sir, the exact language. I talked with him for an hour at a time. I reviewed all these facts.

Mr. Beach—Oh! wait one moment, Mr. Schultz.

Judge Nelson—Now, interrogate him. Did you say anything to Mr. Tilton on this subject?

Mr. Tracy—Did you say anything to Tilton on the subject of Moulton having been consulted about the newspaper enterprise? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. What did you say to him? A. That he was one of the Brooklyn parties who represented the Brooklyn people—the Brooklyn interest.

Q. Did you say anything to Tilton on the subject of Carpenter's claiming to represent—having authority to represent himself, Tilton, and Beecher to the New York friends whom he desired to consult? A. I stated to him distinctly that Mr. Carpenter so represented himself.

Q. Yes. Well, what did you say to him on that subject—to Mr. Tilton? A. I said to him that Mr. Carpenter claimed to represent the Brooklyn friends, mentioning him and Mr. Moulton, and I think he mentioned another gentleman.

Q. Well, what did Tilton say to that? A. He didn't make any reply to that, that I remember, except at one of these interviews at the club; he said, or Mr. Moulton said for him, that he had no right to place him in Europe, or send him as foreign correspondent.

Q. Was that all that he said on that subject of his authority? A. So far as I can recollect; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you at any time ever receive a letter from Mr. Beecher on the subject of this newspaper enterprise? A. I never did.

Q. Or on the subject of your having called Mr. Tilton a black-maller? A. Never.

Q. Who were present at these interviews between yourself and Mr. Carpenter? A. Mr. William Orton and Mr. Henry Clevs.

Q. Did you have more than one interview with Mr. Carpenter? A. Two.

Q. Did you state that fact to Mr. Tilton, that you had had these two interviews with Mr. Carpenter? A. I did.

Q. And that these persons were both present? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON CHEERFUL OVER THE SETTLEMENT.

Q. Now, I want to call your attention, Mr. Schultz, to a conversation in the Spring of 1873, at the time when Mr. Tilton showed you a check—did he ever show you any check from Mr. Bowen? A. He did.

Q. State what occurred on that occasion? A. He came in my private office and says: "I have settled all my Brooklyn difficulties; I have made them come down on their marrow bones," I think, was the words, and took from his pocket a check, which purported to be drawn by Henry C. Bowen, I think, for $7,000, and exhibited it to me as the result of the settlement which he had effected. He also pulled out of his pocket a manuscript article, which he proposed to publish in his paper as a sort of statement of the settlement. He told me, and I think he read to me—I won't be sure about that—but he told me the substance of an article that Mr. Bowen was to print in his paper to the same effect. But he read me the article which he was to publish.

Q. What did he say that $7,000 check had settled? A. His Brooklyn difficulties.

Q. What did he say about going to work on his newspaper then? A. He said, "Now I can take off my coat and go to work with a good will, cheerfully."

MR. TILTON MAKES BIG THREATS.

Q. Did he at any time have a conversation with you when he spoke about blowing the roof off Plymouth Church? A. He did; or that he had the power to do so.

Q. Well, what did he say about that? A. That was at the interview in which I asked him distinctly about whether he charged any criminal relations with his wife; he told me then—he spoke of the Plymouth crew, and he said he could blow the roof off of that concern.

Q. Was your question to him whether he intended—whether he charged any criminal relations between Mr. Beecher and his wife—did it follow that remark of his? A. Yes, Sir; it was in that same interview.

Q. It was what lead to it, was it? A. I asked him very distinctly whether he meant to say to me that there was any such relation, and he then said that his wife was as pure as an angel.

Q. Now, did he ever say anything of this to you in substance? [To the Court.] This is to contradict Mr. Tilton as I understand; the question was asked Mr. Tilton. [To the witness.] Did Tilton say to you in that conversation in substance that he could and would blow their roof off unless they came to his terms and settle with him on his terms? A. Well, I don't say those exact words, but the substance.

Mr. Beach—Oh! wait.

Q. Did he say that in substance? A. He said that in substance; yes, Sir.

Q. And you say your question to him about the criminal relation with his wife followed that remark of his? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then what did he say in reply to that—in reply to your question whether he intended to charge that any criminal relation had existed? A. He said that his wife was as pure as an angel.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. SCHULTZ.

By Mr. Beach—Now, Mr. Schultz, for the purpose of availing myself of your freshest recollection, I ask you to repeat the whole of the last interview to which you have alluded with Mr. Tilton, in which he said he had the power to blow off the roof of Plymouth church. Where was it, in the first place? A. It was in my private office; in my room—in my store.

Q. And when was it? A. I cannot recall the time.

Q. Tell me the year? A. I think it was about a month, perhaps, before he exhibited to me the check which he—

Q. The Bowen check? A. The Bowen check; perhaps a month or six weeks before that, I should think.

Q. Did you look at that check? A. Not particularly; I didn't take it in my hands; I saw it.

Q. You saw it. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, when was it that you saw it? A. Well, I cannot give you the date, Sir.

Q. Give me the year? A. He represented to me—

Q. No, no! Stop now!

Mr. Everts—Well, we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. Beach—You are? You are not entitled to an answer that is irresponsive to my question.

Mr. Everts—It is responsive.

Mr. Beach—It is not.

Mr. Everts—You asked him when it was, and he has a right to answer the best way he can when it was.

Mr. Beach—He was going on to state something that Mr. Tilton told him.

Mr. Tracy—Not a bit of it. He was going to state when it was.

Mr. Beach—Let us see. [To the Stenographer:] Mr. Stenographer, will you give me the question and the answer, as far as it was given.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question and answer.]

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, I stopped him there, and the counsel denied that I was right, and he is in the habit of reading me lectures.

Judge Neilson—Your question was, "Give me the year."

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now strike out answer that the witness commenced. Did he give you the year? He can say whether he can or cannot. [To Mr. Everts:] Is that right.

Mr. Everts—Oh, I didn't rise to object, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The question is, "Give me the year."

The Witness—I cannot recollect Sir; it was on that occasion, within a few weeks of the—

Q. I don't ask what occasion it was. A. I cannot recollect the year.

Q. You cannot recollect the year? A. No, Sir, I cannot at this moment; I presume I could by going to my office.

Q. During the interval—during the intermission of the Court, has your recollection been refreshed upon any subject? A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. Have not conversed with anyone about any fact connected with your testimony? A. I think I have, Sir.

Q. Who? A. My partner and Mr. —

Q. Tracy? A. — and Mr. Tracy.

Q. Yes; I suppose so. Can you tell me the month in which that check was exhibited to you? A. No, Sir, I cannot; I made no memorandum of it.

Q. Did you make any memorandum of any of these conversations? A. I recollect certain transactions from certain events.

Q. Did you make any memorandum of either of the conversations you have spoken of? A. No, Sir; not at all.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton came into your office and showed you a check? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, give me the conversation, and all of it, that occurred between you and him at that time? A. He came in, and he says, "I have settled with those Brooklyn fellows my whole controversy; and I have brought them down to their marrow-bones;" and he pulled from his pocket this check, which he exhibited to me as the result of what he claimed to be that settlement, and then read to me an article which he had prepared for his paper, in manuscript; and I think he read me also a copy of what Mr. Bowen was to publish in his paper, but I am not sure on that; he told me the substance of that; it was to be a match to this one, at all events; it was to be in the same spirit.

Q. Well, did anything else occur at that interview? A. Yes, Sir; we had a long talk, and a very cheerful one.

Q. Tell me what was said, all that you recollect. A. He then remarked that he should now work more cheerfully, and I congratulated him for his relief from all these troubles, and I said, "Now I hope you will devote yourself to business more than you have and have less occasion to be troubled than you have heretofore." We had a long—not very long—perhaps half an hour—a very pleasant conversation.

Q. Well, have you stated to me all that you recollect of it? A. I think I have.

Q. Now, Mr. Schultz, I drew your recollection to the last conversation you alluded to on your direct examination for the purpose of getting your freshest memory upon the subject. Hadn't you better tax your memory a little and see if you cannot remember anything else that was said at that time? A. If you will call my attention to it I will try to recollect; I don't recollect now anything else.

Q. Was not there something said about blowing the roof off Plymouth Church? A. No, sir; not at that interview.

Q. It was not at that interview? A. No, sir; it was the previous.

Q. Wait one moment. It was not at the interview when the check was shown to you that he said that? A. No, sir.

Q. When was it? A. It was previous to that, Sir; perhaps four or six weeks, I should think.

Q. Well, do you remember when that was? A. No; I cannot; I could only recollect by the check: if you will show me that check, the date of it, I will then tell the time.

Q. Yes. Well, where was this interview that you are speaking of now? A. In the same place, Sir.

Q. In the same place? A. Yes.

Q. Was any one present at that, but yourself and Mr. Tilton? A. Not in that office; there was in the outer office, I think.

Q. Who? A. I suppose the usual clerks, &c., there.

Q. What? A. The usual clerks and employes were there.

Q. You don't remember anybody else? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long was he there on that occasion? A. The interview when he showed me the check, do you mean?

Q. I am not speaking of that interview, Sir. A. The one previous?

Q. I am speaking of the interview that you spoke of last, in my cross-examination? A. At the time he said he would blow the roof off, or could blow the roof off?

Q. You must straighten that all out to suit yourself. A. Well, Sir, if you will ask me any question, I will try to answer; I don't know what you are alluding to now.

Q. Well, Sir, you spoke of an interview at which he showed you a check? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You then spoke of an interview from four to six weeks prior to that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, that is the interview I am speaking of. A. Well, now, I will answer any question about that.

Q. And that, you say, was at your office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You recollect that distinctly? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time of day was it? A. I think it was in the afternoon, Sir; I think it was in the afternoon; I would not be sure about that.

Q. Pretty sure about that? A. I think I am sure about that; I am not positive.

Q. You said by seeing the check you could fix upon the date; do you recollect that you saw the check about the time of its date? A. My impression was, and my thought was, that he had come right from Brooklyn with the check; that was my impression; that is the impression he gave me in regard to it; that he had just settled it, that he came over and told me; I don't know, but it might have been the same day; I don't know; that was my impression that I had got, that he just settled it, and the check was a fresh check that he showed me.

Q. Yes, you are quite sure that this interview of which we are now speaking was some four or six weeks prior to that date? A. I think so, Sir; I would not be sure about that.

Q. I want you to fix the year? A. I made no memorandum, and I cannot be particular as to dates; but it was previous to that, because up to that time—

Q. I don't want any reasoning on the subject. A. All right.

Q. Are you still pretty confident it was four to six weeks before that? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. Perhaps you could remember whether it was in the Summer or Winter season that you had this conversation? A. No; I could not.

Q. Well, the check bears date April 2d, 1872.

Mr. Tracy—April 4th.

Mr. Beach—April 4th—I mean—1872. A. Then it was probably from four to six weeks previous to that; I say probably, because I am all the time assuming that I saw the check while it was fresh.

WRANGLING OVER THE TESTIMONY.

Q. Oh, I don't want you to assume anything, now; I want you to speak from your recollection, because this is somewhat of an important point, and I wish you to recollect if you can? A. I cannot recollect, Sir, anything more than I have told you.

Q. Well, if it should happen, Mr. Schultz, that up to the very last days of March that Mr. Tilton had been West, and had not been in this neighborhood for some months, how could that affect your recollection? A. It would not affect my recollection at all, Sir; I should—

Q. You would still say it was from four to six weeks? A. I should think from four to six weeks; yes, Sir.

Q. Before the date of that check? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Even if he was not in this part of the country? A. Well, if that was established to my satisfaction, why I certainly should think I was mistaken.

Q. Well, now, we will go to this conversation which was four to six weeks before the check was exhibited to you; will you please relate that conversation? A. Well, Sir, he came in with his usual temper and disposition—

Q. Oh, I don't ask about that. A. Well, do you want me to state the language?

Q. Why, I want you to state the substance of that conversation, I didn't ask anything for his appearance or his temper? A. Well I don't know, Sir, that I can recollect the exact language, except what I have repeated.

Q. Well, cannot you surround the occasion with any of the circumstances; can't you tell how it happened—how the conversation opened? A. I don't know that I can, Sir. I remember distinctly—

Q. Well, wait a moment.

Mr. Evarts—Well.

Mr. Beach—Well, what?

Mr. Evarts—He began to say: "I remember distinctly." You have asked this witness if he could not surround this conversation with any circumstances, and he begins to tell you—"I remember distinctly."

Mr. Beach—Well, you are just a question behind as usual.

Mr. Evarts—I am not a question behind.

Mr. Beach—Yes, you are. I asked him if he could recollect how the conversation began. That was the question.

Mr. Evarts—Now, he tells you that he recollects distinctly.

Mr. Beach—Well, he told me he didn't recollect, and then proceeded to say something else and I stopped him.

Mr. Evarts—How are you to know what a witness recollects unless you let him state?

Mr. Beach—I don't know how I should know, and I don't want to know.

Mr. Evarts—If you ask a question that draws it from the witness, it is not to be imputed to him afterwards that he is a dumb witness.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman is reasoning an abstract proposition which I do not care to discuss with him.

Judge Neilson—Then your question is repeated.

Mr. Beach—There was no question; he answered the question and was proceeding to state something else.

Judge Neilson—Put something else to him.

Mr. Beach—You cannot tell me how the conversation began? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or upon what subject it opened? A. No, Sir; the substance—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Tracy—He was going on to tell the substance.

Mr. Beach—No, he was not; he said he could not tell the substance. Now, will you tell me the first thing that was said that you recollect? A. I cannot speak—I cannot give you the exact language of anything that he said.

Q. Mr. Schultz, I am perfectly well aware of that; I do not ask you for that. You give me now the substance of the first remark that you recollect, which was made by either of you on that occasion? A. I cannot recollect only the substance.

Q. That is, you cannot give the substance of the remark that you recollect? A. Why, I can recollect that he said to me—

Q. Allow me to interrupt you, because I am trying to get, if I can, now, the first remark, the opening remark, so far as your recollection goes. Give me the substance of the first thing that was said between you so far as you recollect? A. I cannot recollect the first remark at all; I can recollect the general conversation and the conclusions to which we came, but I cannot tell you the conversation in detail, nor can I recollect the first words that were used.

Q. I did not ask that? A. You asked me to state the first one that I recollect.

Judge Neilson—The first remark.

The Witness—That I cannot give you.

By Mr. Beach—If you say you cannot give it, that is enough. Now, give me anything that was said. A. But you want the words, and that I cannot give you. If you ask me to give the substance of that conversation, I will do it, but I cannot give you the words.

Q. Well, start on it as early as you can. A. Mr. Tilton came in and opened the usual topic, which was his Brooklyn difficulty, and being very—

Q. Well, stop there. What was it he said? "Opened the usual topic"—what did he say? A. That he was being greatly wronged and broken down in his domestic and business relations by this delay in getting this matter settled.

Q. Then you do remember that he came in and opened the subject in that way? A. I remember the subject; I do not remember the language at all, no portion of it; I could not give you any word that he used; after carrying on that conversation for a while I became—

Q. I asked what was said? A. I asked him, "Do you charge Mr. Beecher with having criminal relations with your wife?" He says, "My wife is as pure as an angel."

Q. I understood you to say that in using that expression I thought you gave an illustration. A. I say he rose up and swung his hand around and said, "She is as pure as an angel."

Q. It was his theatrical manner? A. Yes, Sir, that was the theatrical part of it.

Q. Anything else—anything more said, then, that you recollect? A. Yes, Sir; there was a good deal.

Q. Well, that you recollect, I asked you? A. No, Sir, not that I recollect.

Q. You have given now all of that conversation that you recollect? Yes, Sir.

Q. Hadn't you better tax your memory now a little again and see if you have not omitted anything? A. Well, if you will suggest anything I will try and recollect it. If you will remind me of any idea—

Q. During the intermission, was anything suggested to you in regard to Mr. Tilton stating that he could blow the roof off. A. That was previous to that.

Q. No, no! During the intermission was any suggestion made to you on that subject? Didn't you talk about that with somebody? A. With somebody?

Q. With somebody, or somebody to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not during the intermission? A. No, Sir; you mean the intermission here?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Oh, no, Sir; no.

Q. Didn't talk to Gen. Tracy about that? A. Not about that; No, Sir.

Q. Suppose you do put into that conversation somewhere that remark about blowing the roof off of Plymouth Church. It was in this conversation, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now get it in somewhere, so that we can see its connection. A. I don't feel that I am able to give the connection.

Q. Can't give the connection? A. No, Sir; he was speaking of his difficulty.

Q. Wait a minute. Well, will you commence with that conversation and relate all that you now remember of it? A. I don't remember anything but these two—

Q. Now, I don't ask you what you don't remember; will you commence with the conversation and give me all you remember of it? A. If you insist upon my giving the words I cannot do it.

Q. Well, do the best you can. A. As I said before—

Q. I don't want what you said before, I want you to say something now. A. Well, I cannot say anything more about it than that.

COURTESIES BETWEEN COUNSEL AND WITNESS.

Q. Can't you state it to us now? A. Why, I have.

Q. I want you to state it again. I want you to give me now all of that conversation you can recollect? A. I cannot relate the conversation, as I told you before. Mr. Tilton, I say, came in my office in his usual way—

Q. Well, I don't want that; I am asking for the conversation? A. I can't give you the conversation.

Q. There were certain—

Q. Wait one moment. We will get at it, Mr. Schultz. A. Yes. I hope so.

Q. Will you now give me what you recollect of the conversation between you and Mr. Tilton upon that occasion? A. I can't give you anything but what I have given you.

Q. But that is no answer to my question; I ask you to give me now— A. I am so unfortunate as not to be able to give you anything.

Q. What? A. I am so unfortunate as not to be able to give you anything.

Q. Oh, I guess we will get an answer. A. Perhaps so.

Q. You can tell me, Sir, what you now recollect was said between you and Mr. Tilton upon that occasion? A. I cannot, Sir.

Q. Can't tell me what you recollect? A. Yes, Sir, I can tell you. I told you what I recollected.

Q. I don't ask what you have done; I ask you now. A. I can't tell you anything more.

Q. Repeat now what you do recollect?

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, has counsel a right to do that?

Judge Neilson—I think he has, on cross-examination.

Mr. Evarts—It is the second time that it has been repeated.

Judge Neilson—Without success.

Mr. Evarts—I have nothing to say about that; that is for the witness. The witness has answered, and there is an end of the right of inquiry when the witness has fully answered. He has told him the conversation as he recollected it—told him he could not recollect any more, and is now asked to recollect it again and repeat it again. Now, that I submit is beyond the authority of cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—The counsel, I think, is perfectly regular in his cross-examination.

Mr. Beach—I am aware of that, your Honor, but you will permit me to say that the witness having attempted to relate this conversation, and having given it in different forms, it is out of a spirit of entire fairness to this gentleman, whom I greatly and personally respect, to see if I cannot make it consistent in some way. [To the witness.] Now, Mr. Schultz, it is with no intentional disrespect at all, Sir, but I would be glad if you would state to me now—repeat to me now all of the interview between you and Mr. Tilton upon this occasion, so far as you recollect it? A. Well, Mr. Beach, the difficulty between you and me is this: you want me to state the language.

Q. Oh, no I don't; I have disclaimed that ever and over again? A. Well, but every time I undertake to tell you the substance of it you stop me.

Q. You are mistaken now. [Laughter.] A. Well, I think so.

Q. You are mistaken; altogether mistaken.

Judge Neilson—The officer will, please see that order is kept. There is no occasion for all this.

The Witness—[To Mr. Beach.] That is where we differ.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, you are entirely mistaken. I have not stopped you at all when you attempted to give the substance of the conversation; on the contrary, I have asked for it again and again, and I am waiting for your narrative, whenever you choose to give it? A. I have given you all the answer that I can think of, Sir.

Q. Very well; then we will pass that, Sir, if I cannot get anything more. Did you not state, on your direct examination, that when you talked with Mr. Tilton on the subject of what Carpenter had said to you concerning this newspaper project, that Mr. Tilton told you that Carpenter had no right to represent him? A. No—to represent him as a foreign correspondent.

Q. No, Sir; didn't you testify on your direct examination that Mr. Tilton told you that Carpenter had no right or power to represent him? A. I think I said that Mr. Carpenter told me—he told me that Mr. Carpenter had no right to represent him as a foreign correspondent.

Q. I understand you said that, Sir. I am asking you whether you did not testify to the other also? A. I think not.

Q. You think not? A. I think not, in that connection. I don't recollect it, Sir.

Q. Did not Mr. Tilton tell you that Carpenter had no power or right to represent him? A. I don't think he said that, Sir.

Q. Will you swear that he did not say it to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. No. Did not Mr. Moulton, in the presence of Mr. Tilton at the interview at the Union League Club, of which you speak, distinctly say to you that Carpenter had no right or power to represent Tilton? A. I think—he may have said that; he may have said that, Sir. He said that, or words to that effect.

Q. Now, did not Mr. Tilton in the first interview which you had with him on the subject, say the same thing in substance to you? A. Yes, Sir, after the—he said what I stated.

Q. No; but did not he say the same thing in substance to you, that Mr. Carpenter had no power or right to represent him? A. I don't recollect it in that form, Sir.

Q. Didn't you get that impression, Sir? A. Well, I got the impression that he—

Q. Didn't you get that impression? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that the witness ought to be permitted to answer.

Mr. Beach—Well, he has answered “no.”

Mr. Tracy—You stopped him.

Mr. Beach—I say that he has answered. [To the witness.] You did not get the impression that Mr. Tilton disclaimed the authority of Carpenter to act for him? A. To place him in the position that he was placed in. He said nothing about the newspaper enterprise.

Q. But he did at the Union League Club? A. He may have said it. I don't recollect what he said.

Q. Who were present at that conversation at the Union League Club? A. I thought no one, but I understand there was a gentleman present.

Q. Yes, fortunately. Who was it? A. Mr. Butler.

Q. What is his first name? A. Charles. Mr. Butler and Mr. Watrous; Mr. Watrous, I think.

Q. Yes; what is his first name? A. Charles.

Q. Now, did not Mr. Tilton and Moulton both, in the presence of Mr. Watrous, at that conversation at the Union League Club, distinctly tell you, and emphatically tell you, that Mr. Carpenter had no power or authority to represent Mr. Tilton in regard to that newspaper matter? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect that they did, Sir; not with the emphasis that you speak, certainly.

Q. He told you that, you say? A. I say that Mr. Moulton may have mentioned that Mr. Carpenter transcended his authority.

Q. No, no; didn't you say a moment ago that Mr. Moulton may have told you that Carpenter had no power to represent Tilton? A. I say he may have said so; I have no distinct recollection on that subject.

Q. Will you swear that both Moulton and Tilton did not say that to you, and as emphatically as I before expressed myself in the question, in the presence of Watrous? A. Yes, Sir; I will say, not so emphatically as you have expressed it.

Q. Not so emphatic? A. No, Sir; distinctly not.

Q. Didn't they both say it to you in the presence of Watrous? A. That I won't say; not so emphatically; it made no impression on my mind and therefore I know it was not so emphatic as you are.

Q. Oh! you mean the tone of voice? A. Yes, Sir; I mean the manner and tone of voice.

Q. I don't mean the tone of voice or the manner, I mean the language. A. My impression is as I have said to you, that Mr. Moulton disavowed—

Q. I don't ask for that; we have had that repeatedly; I don't ask for that. Which Watrous is that? A. My recollection is indistinct in regard to it. He was there some portion of the time.

Q. Oh! he was the man; he was there, Sir; we understand that. Do you remember his first name? A. Charles.

Mr. Evarts—It was not Butler?

Mr. Beach—Butler is a mistake.

The Witness—Butler was there, too; I didn't know it, though, at the time; he was sitting off in the corner.

WHAT WAS NOT SAID AT THE INTERVIEW

Q. Now, at that occasion at the Union League Club, did not Mr. Tilton expressly decline to have any connection with such a newspaper enterprise? A. I don't think the conversation—

Q. Just answer that question? A. I have no recollection of it.

Q. Will you swear that he did not? A. No, Sir; I won't.

Q. Did not Mr. Tilton say that he would have no connection with any paper with which Mr. Beecher was associated? A. I don't think he said that, or at least I don't recollect that he said that. The conversation was not of that character.

Q. Is your recollection so accurate that you would be willing to swear that he did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. It is not. Now, in the conversation that you had privately with Mr. Tilton, didn't he tell you that he could not be connected with any newspaper with which Mr. Beecher was associated? A. I don't think he ever said—

Q. Now, didn't he tell you that in the presence of Franklin Woodruff? A. No, Sir.

Q. You swear to that positively? A. Yes, Sir; I will swear to that positively.

Q. And reflectingly swear to it positively? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That he did not tell you that in substance, in the presence of Franklin Woodruff? A. I will, Sir. At my house, you mean? That is the only interview we ever had.

Q. Yes? A. I say positively, no.

Q. Now, did not Mr. Tilton, at that interview at your house, in the presence of Franklin Woodruff, in words or in substance say to you that he could not accept any aid from Mr. Beecher ?

A. No, Sir.

Q. That you swear to positively ? A. I do swear to it positively.

Q. And in no part of that conversation did he say that to you ?
A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, or did he put it in the form, either in words or in substance, that he could not put himself under any obligation to Mr. Beecher ? A. He did not put it in that form, exactly, but it might be construed into that form, for when I asked him the question whether Mr. Beecher would take an interest in the paper he said: "He will if I ask him." "And will he write for the paper?" "He will if I will permit him." Those were the words that he used, and you might infer that he didn't want to be connected with Mr. Beecher. To that extent he did say so, and to that extent only.

Q. Didn't he, in addition to what you have just told—didn't he say that he could not be put under any obligation, or put himself under any obligation ? A. No, sir, I think not.

Q. Or in words or substance that ? A. The only language used in connection with Mr. Beecher in that interview is what I have stated; I remember it very distinctly.

Q. Now, who was present at the conversation which you say you had with Carpenter ? A. Mr. William Orton and Henry Clews.

Q. That was at the Union League Club, was it not ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether that was a meeting by appointment as between Mr. Carpenter and Clews and Orton ? A. I understood Mr.—

Q. Well, I ask you if you know ? A. I understand that there was an agreement all around that they had been all invited, and that they all came.

Q. Was you invited ? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Who invited you to come ? A. Mr. Carpenter.

Q. Are you quite sure that it was Mr. Carpenter ? A. I am positive.

Q. When was that meeting ? A. It was between the 20th, I think, the 20th of January—the 20th of December and the first of January, 1872.

Q. Yes. A. I think the 24th, 25th, 26th; somewhere along there; that is my impression.

Q. It was the 26th, Sir ? A. Well, I have not got the exact date.

Q. Yes, very near it ? A. I remember that from the discussion—some subjects that came up—

Q. Well, never mind; we have got it. How long after that was it before you saw Mr. Tilton ? A. I think a few days; I cannot say how long.

Q. And where was it that you saw him ? A. In my office.

Q. And that was when you conversed with him about the subject that you had seen Carpenter upon a few nights before ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was any one present at that interview ? A. The first half hour was spent alone; afterwards Mr. Bailey was called in.

Q. Well, that was to decide the question ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you please commence and relate as near as you can all that was said between yourself and Mr. Tilton at that time ? A. Mr. Tilton opened the conversation by saying, "You charged me in public with being a blackmailer;" and I said to him in reply, "Who says so?" He says, "Frank Carpenter." Says I, "Under what circumstances—did he tell you the circumstances?" Says he, "I suppose he has." I then drew out from him—I don't recollect what he said in reply. He satisfied me—

Q. Oh, I don't want that. I want you to state all that you can recollect of that conversation. A. He stated to me enough of the conversation to satisfy me that he knew—

Q. I want to know what he stated to you. A. Well, he said that Frank Carpenter had told him that we had had a meeting at the Union League Club, and mentioned the names of gentlemen present, and in which they had had up a project for starting a newspaper, and in the course of that conversation I had charged him with being a blackmailer, and he wanted to know if I thought that was just towards him; and I then told him that if he would hear my side of the question that I would then submit it to him whether I was right or wrong, and we discussed the question.

Q. No, no; wait one moment. State what was said ? A. We reviewed the whole subject.

Q. Wait one moment. I don't want any answer of that kind to a specific question that I put to you, asking you to relate the conversation. A. I think—I will state to you again what I stated to Mr. Carpenter, and I stated the same things—

Q. Wait one moment. I don't wish any general declarations of that kind. A. Well, Sir, repeat your question, I will try and answer it.

Q. I have asked you, Sir, to relate, as near as you can recollect, the conversation between you and Mr. Tilton on that occasion ? A. I told him that Frank Carpenter had called us three gentlemen together to take into consideration the establishment of this newspaper, that he had represented to us that the friends of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton had agreed upon it, that Mr. Beecher was to be the editor-in-chief, that Mr. Tilton was to go abroad as the corresponding—correspondent of the paper, that there were certain papers which were held in escrow by Mr. Moulton, which, under those circumstances, could be destroyed, and this whole matter could be settled; and I said, under those circumstances, I felt justified in saying what I did, and he differed with me in opinion on that subject, and we discussed it.

Q. No. State, as far as you can, what was said ? A. Well that was about the substance of what was said, only it took longer to say it, and it was more in detail.

Q. Well, do you now recall anything else that was said at that time ? A. Yes, Sir, I do recall a good deal else that was said.

Q. Well, state it. A. He stated to me, and I stated to Mr. Tilton, that these papers had been before Dr. Storrs, and that Dr. Storrs had given an opinion on them; that they were damaging, and if published would stop—drive Mr. Beecher out of the pulpit. That is one of the facts that he stated to me, and he stated many others.

Q. State all that you recollect ? A. That is all I care to state now.

Q. What, Sir? A. That is all I care to state.

Q. All you care to state? A. If you will ask me any question—

Q. I asked you to state anything further that you recollected to have passed between you and Mr. Tilton upon that occasion. A. I don't recollect of anything now, Sir.

Q. You have now given on your cross-examination all you recollect of that conversation? A. Yes, Sir, I may recollect other things in five minutes.

Q. Well, if you do now, state them. A. I don't recollect them now, but I may. I don't wish to be charged with any inconsistency if I recollect them five minutes from this time. I have only recollected this Storrs business now.

Q. What? A. I say I only recollect this circumstance that these papers were submitted to Dr. Storrs, as a reason why the thing was conclusive.

Q. Never mind; we have got that. Well, it was after this conversation that you had, the one at the Union League Club, when Moulton and Tilton and Watrous were present? A. Which one?

Q. It was after this last conversation that you have related that you had the interview at the Union Club? A. Yes, Sir; that was the last conversation I ever had with him.

Q. Can you tell about when that was; can you give me the year when that was? A. I cannot, Sir. It was the last time I ever met Mr. Tilton, I know.

Q. At any of these interviews was the subject of Bowen's charges against Beecher talked over? A. Yes, Sir; very fully.

Q. Which one; the one that you have been giving? A. At which interview?

Q. I don't know; I am trying to find out. A. Well, at every interview, almost.

Q. Now, please, Mr. Schultz, don't answer me in that way. I ask you if at either of these interviews you have been relating the subject of the charges made by Bowen against Beecher was discussed? A. I think they were fully mentioned at my house.

Q. In Mr. Woodruff's presence? A. No, Sir; Mr. Woodruff did not remain there ten minutes; he went away and left Mr. Tilton with me.

Q. You are quite sure that he did not remain over ten minutes? A. I am; perhaps twelve or fifteen; only a few minutes.

Q. Did you have any interview at your house with Tilton and Woodruff upon any other occasion? A. No, Sir.

Q. Only that one occasion? A. Only one occasion.

Q. Was there anything said about those charges of Bowen's in the discussion at the Union League Club at which Mr. Watrous was present? A. None that I can repeat.

Q. Was there any? A. I cannot recollect, Sir.

Q. Well, is your recollection so accurate that you could say there was not? A. No, I could not say there was not.

Q. Well, you spoke of a dinner given to Mr. Bailey. Was Mr. Pierrepont present at that dinner? A. I do not recollect, Sir.

Q. Did you mention the person with whom the discussion was about the Woodhulls at that dinner? A. The discussion—I will do so if you wish.

Q. I don't care; I asked you if you did mention it? A. I don't know whether I did or not, Sir. I will if you wish.

Q. Well, that is not the name about which you hesitated to speak, I believe, was it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, who was it? A. Henry Clews.

Q. You don't recollect whether Mr. Pierrepont was there? A. No, I do not; Mr. Orton was there; I remember him.

Q. Who? A. Mr. Orton—William Orton.

Q. Do you remember whether anything was said in regard to that publication by other gentlemen than Mr. Tilton and Mr. Clews? A. I don't understand that question.

Q. Do you know whether anything was said upon that occasion in regard to Mrs. Woodhull besides Mr. Tilton and Mr. Clews? A. They had the conversation pretty much to themselves on that topic; as I remarked before on the direct, I tried to stop the severity of the—

Q. Yes, that we got before. Do you now recollect anything more of that discussion than you have stated on your direct examination? No, I don't know that I do, Sir. I could give the substance of it, but I cannot give you the language.

Q. I don't ask for that. A. I know you don't, and therefore I don't give it to you.

Q. I am satisfied with what you gave on your direct examination. You mentioned having had some conversation with Mr. Moulton in regard to the establishment of The Golden Age, did you not? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Moulton upon that subject prior to its establishment? A. I think not, Sir; I don't recollect any.

Q. I misunderstood you, then.

Mr. Evarts—He corrected himself; it was Woodruff.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no; I don't refer to that.

The Witness—I think I had no conversation with Mr. Moulton on the subject.

Mr. Evarts—He corrected himself; it was Franklin Woodruff; he began "Frank Moulton."

Mr. Beach—That was relating a conversation; it was not upon this point. That is all, Sir.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. SCHULTZ.

Mr. Tracy—I present "Exhibit D 108" to the witness. [Handing witness a paper.] Mr. Schultz, is that the check that Mr. Tilton showed you on the occasion when he exhibited to you Bowen's check? A. Well, Sir, I could not—I never saw Mr. Bowen's signature before, and I don't know anything about it, Sir. He exhibited me a check like that, but I could not say that that is the one, Sir. He simply took it out of his pocket, and held it in that way, and I saw it was Mr. Bowen's, and I saw it was a check of $7,000, but I could not identify it.

Q. As the precise check? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now the conversation which you had with him in which he said that he threatened to blow the roof off of Plymouth Church, you recollect was before the time that he exhibited this check to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But precisely how long before you cannot undertake to say? A. No, Sir; I cannot tell.

Q. Did you tell Tilton, in the interview at your house, when he asked you to subscribe, or at any time when talking with him about subscribing for The Golden Age, did you tell him that you thought the enterprise a good one, and would therefore subscribe? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—This is a re-examination, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—It is, your Honor, but it is a subject which I omitted.

Mr. Beach—It is very objectionable, as leading—the question which is put.

Mr. Tracy—I do it to contradict Mr. Tilton, because Mr. Tilton was examined on that question.

Judge Neilson—Counsel suggests that it is not re-direct examination.

Mr. Beach—I don't insist upon the objection; if counsel omitted, through inadvertency, a question, I don't object.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—What did you tell him on that subject? A. I didn't go into the enterprise willingly, or not cheerfully. I deferred the giving of an answer that day, and when I subsequently consented, it was in view not of a business transaction.

Mr. Beach—Oh! well, I object to that.

Q. Did you tell him at any of those interviews before subscribing that you thought the enterprise a good business transaction and would therefore go into it? A. Never; I never said so and never thought so.

Q. Now, in the conversation at the Union League Club, where Tilton and Moulton were present, and the subject of Carpenter's conversation was talked of—or the conversation you had had with Carpenter was talked of, you say that Moulton may have said that Carpenter had no authority. Now, do you recollect in what language Mr. Moulton spoke upon that subject? A. No, I do not.

Q. Do you remember whether he said that Carpenter had no authority, or whether Carpenter had exceeded his authority? A. I don't recollect, Sir; if I was asked—

Mr. Beach—Oh, wait. You don't recollect?

The Witness—I don't recollect, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The first point is, whether you have got any recollection? A. No, Sir; I have no recollection distinctly on that question. I could not say distinctly—use the language that he used.

Q. What is your best recollection on that subject?

Mr. Pryor—If he says he has got none, there cannot be any comparison.

The Witness—I have no recollection as to the language at all. I recollect the substance of the conversation, but I don't recollect the language.

Q. What is your best recollection as to the substance of what Mr. Tilton said on that subject?

Mr. Beach—If he has any recollection on that subject.

The Witness—Well, on the topic—the general topic, I have.

Mr. Moulton disavowed for Mr.—Mr.—

Mr. Pryor—Tilton?

The Witness—Tilton, any right that he had to send him to Europe, or connect him with this transaction, as I understood him.

Q. Now, was it to send him to Europe or to connect him with the transaction? A. I think the conversation between Tilton and myself was to the extent that he had no right to send him to Europe—never used any other language than that; but Mr. Moulton may have said that to me; I am not sure about it.

Q. This conversation with Moulton was after the conversation with Tilton at your office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long after? A. Well, a month or six weeks.

Q. A month or six weeks? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether in the meanwhile the fact that you had charged Tilton with being a blackmailer had acquired a good deal of circulation around the Club? A. I think it had.

Q. And created a great deal of talk?

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You have got that.

Q. The conversation to which you have referred as between yourself and Tilton and Woodruff about a newspaper related to The Golden Age entirely? A. Entirely.

Q. And was at your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was, you say, early in 1871—the conversation about The Golden Age at your house? A. It was about two or three weeks before The Golden Age started. I don't recollect.

Q. And the conversation with Carpenter about the newspaper enterprise was after the election in 1872, and from the 20th of December to the 1st of January, 1873? A. Yes, Sir; I remember that distinctly.

Q. And you think along about the 24th and 25th days of December? A. Between the 20th and the 1st; I think nearer the 23d, 24th or 25th, somewhere along there. I have a very distinct recollection about that from a circumstance which I could narrate.

Q. Now, in your conversation with Mr. Tilton, at the time you submitted to Mr. Bailey, did Mr. Tilton in that conversation limit Mr. Carpenter's authority in any way except to say that he had no right to send him to Europe as correspondent?

Mr. Beach—That is calling for the judgment or opinion of the witness.

Judge Neilson—Do you think it proper, Mr. Tracy, to put such a question in that form to your own witness?

Mr. Evarts—We except.

Judge Neilson—I asked the counsel if he thought it proper to put such a question in that form to his own witness.

Mr. Tracy—I may be wrong, but—

Judge Neilson—It is not in proper form.

Mr. Evarts—On what grounds is it not proper?

Judge Neilson—On any ground. It should have been asked on the direct, if asked at all.

Mr. Tracy—I am following their cross-examination. They have examined him as to what Mr. Tilton said in regard to Mr. Carpenter's want of authority, and I am pursuing that line of inquiry on my re-direct examination.

Mr. Beach—That is, the counsel examines the witness as to a conversation, I cross-examine him as to the conversation, and he is following my lead.

Judge Neilson—Yes, that is not the office of a re-direct examination.

Mr. Tracy—I am asking a new question.

Judge Neilson—There need be no discussion, because if you put your question in the common form, you can ask it.

Q. I will ask you this question, Mr. Schultz. Was there anything else said at that conversation in regard to Mr. Carpenter's want of authority, except what you have already stated? A. I have no recollection of anything else.

Judge Neilson—Very well. That is all, Mr. Schultz.

Mr. Beach—I want to ask a single question.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. SCHULTZ.

Mr. Beach—You say that your charge against Mr. Tilton of being a blackmailer acquired some celebrity at the Club? A. I didn't say "celebrity."

Q. Well, circulation? A. Circulation.

Q. Did the apology which you subsequently made for that charge acquire circulation also at the Club? A. Did what?

Q. Did the apology which you made for the charge—for the accusation—acquire circulation also at the Club? A. I stated the apology to—

Q. No; just answer my question? A. I judge it did.

Mr. Evarts—He was going on to state he stated the apology.

Mr. Beach—What if he did, I stopped him.

Mr. Evarts—That is an answer to your question.

Mr. Beach—No it ain't. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Call your next witness.

Mr. Shearman—Charles G. Judson.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES G. JUDSON.

Charles G. Judson, called and sworn in behalf of defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Where do you reside? A. In New-York.

Q. How long have you resided in or near New-York? A. Twenty or twenty-five years.

Q. Are you, or have you been, acquainted with the parties to this suit? A. I have.

Q. How long have you known each of them? A. I have known Mr. Beecher, I should think, about twenty years, and Mr. Tilton, perhaps, fifteen or eighteen years—a little less than Mr. Beecher.

Q. What is your occupation? A. A merchant.

Q. Where do you carry on business? A. In Worth street, New York.

Q. What line of business? A. India rubber goods.

Q. Do you recollect a conversation you had with Mr. Tilton in November, 1865; I ask simply if you recollect such a conversation in or about November, 1865? A. I cannot state the time so definite as November. I recollect a conversation with him in 1865.

Q. Cannot you recollect whether or not it was prior to the very end of November—prior to November 30th, 1865? A. I cannot positively. My impression is that it was in the latter part of 1865.

Q. Where did that conversation take place? A. At Delmonico's, in Chambers-st.

Q. State how you came to meet Mr. Tilton there? A. I cannot. I met him frequently there. I cannot state the special reason at that time. He dined with me very frequently—quite frequently.

Q. And did you dine then at Delmonico's? A. We did, Sir; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you have any conversation on the subject of Mr. Beecher, concerning members of Plymouth Church, on that occasion? A. We did.

Q. Please state what that conversation was, the substance of it?

Mr. Beach—I object to that as wholly immaterial.

Mr. Shearman—It is perfectly material, but the gentleman expects me to put a leading question for aught I see.

Mr. Beach—I don't expect such a thing from so accurate a gentleman as you are.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Shearman—You can answer what conversation you had with Mr. Tilton on the subject of Mr. Beecher, and other members of Plymouth Church.

Mr. Pryor—Other members of Plymouth Church! Has that anything to do with it?

Mr. Shearman—It is all introductory to matter in connection with Mr. Beecher, and is inadmissible unless connected with him.

Mr. Pryor—That may be, but that don't make it material. We don't object to the conversation with a member of Plymouth Church.

The Witness—I cannot state the conversation.

Mr. Shearman—The substance.

The Witness—I can only state one—

Q. A little louder. A. I cannot state any conversation in detail, except that we were discussing Plymouth Church, talking about it and its members, as I had formerly been an attendant upon that church.

Q. What was said upon that subject?

Mr. Pryor—If your Honor please, I object to what was said about the members of the church.

Judge Neilson—True; I infer it is drawing in Mr. Beecher in some form.

Mr. Shearman—It is all connected with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Pryor—What had the members of Plymouth Church ten years ago to do with this case?

Mr. Shearman—I take it Mrs. Tilton was a member of the church.

Mr. Pryor—She may be one member. You used the plural number.

Mr. Shearman—I am not going to confine it to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Pryor—What has that got to do with this case? Where will we end if we wander off into infinite space, if your Honor please?

Judge Neilson—I would answer that question with a great deal of pleasure if I could.

Mr. Pryor—It is in your Honor's power to determine the end of this case. It certainly won't end within the lifetime of any of us if this line of examination is to be followed.

Judge Neilson—Well, let him answer that question.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness.] Go on and state.

MR. TILTON WITHOUT FAITH IN MAN.

The Witness—I cannot state anything that was said of any member of the church, but can state a brief conversation in regard to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, state that? A. That conversation grew out of comment on the church and its members. I made this remark to Mr. Tilton, that I was glad that Mr. Beecher during his long connection there, had escaped all charges of anything improper, so far as women are concerned; I think that was the general remark I made, and Mr. Tilton answered by saying: "Mr. Judson, I have lost faith in man." I said to him: "Do you mean to intimate by that, that you believe Mr. Beecher has been guilty—criminally guilty with women?" He answered me again in the same way.

Q. State the words, please? A. He said: "I have lost faith in man." Well, it startled me a little.

Mr. Beach—Never mind what effect it had upon you.

Q. What did you say? A. I said, again, to him: "This remark, coming from you—his most intimate friend—means something. Now, I want to know whether you believe him to be guilty of criminality with women." He said, again—

JUDGE NEILSON ADVISES ECONOMY OF TIME.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir—

Mr. Shearman—This is—

Mr. Beach—What? I suppose I have a right to make an objection. I submit to your Honor that this is not admissible in any view of the case, and I raise the objection for the purpose of getting from your Honor an intimation whether, if it should be proved that any remark or accusation was made by Mr. Tilton imputing any moral wrong to Mr. Beecher as early as 1865, it is not such a fact proven by the defense pertinent and material to this case as will enable us to sustain it by proof—authorize us to sustain it by proof, if we can. If it is not, it is not admissible. They cannot prove a declaration here for the purpose of establishing a given fact, and close our mouths to proof of the existence of that fact, I submit to your Honor. If it comes in the form of an accusation against Mr. Beecher we must be permitted to sustain that accusation. We cannot, I submit to your Honor, be put in an attitude where we are accused of making a charge without having the liberty of maintaining that charge. Now, I doubt whether your Honor would permit that sort of proof in answer to evidence of this character, and, therefore, I submit that it is not pertinent and material to the issue, having such a relation to the question between these parties as makes it a relevant and substantial part of this trial. What relation has it, Sir, to this case? Supposing Mr. Tilton upon this occasion said, one way or the other, that Mr. Beecher was pure, or that Mr. Beecher was polluted? What sort of relevancy has it to this trial? The charge of improper conduct against Mr. Beecher originated three years after this, nearly; two years and a half and more. It was not discovered until four or five years afterwards, and now we are traveling back into this remote period to ascertain the declarations which may have been made by Mr. Tilton, where no circumstance relating to himself may have called for any exhibition of feeling for the purpose of influencing the result of this trial. I cannot perceive, your Honor, how it bears upon the issue; and if your Honor shall rule that it is so far connected with the relations of these parties as to be admissible evidence, I hope your Honor will concede the idea that we suggested, that we should be at liberty, by proof, to sustain any allegations which have been made by proof.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Shearman.] You can ask the question, Mr. Shearman. I don't see how it is material.

Mr. Evarts—Subsequent proof will satisfy your Honor that it is very material.

Judge Neilson—Probably.

Mr. Evarts—How can you foresee, if your Honor please, what our evidence is.

Judge Neilson—I do not assume to do so.

Mr. Evarts—I say, as counsel, we shall offer evidence to make it very material.

Mr. Beach—That is not sufficient where the admissibility of evidence depends upon its being connected with other facts; then if counsel aver that they will connect it with such facts so as to make it material, it is usual for the Court to accept the declaration of counsel.

Mr. Evarts—I shall connect it with other evidence on this very subject of this conversation.

Mr. Beach—Ahem!

Mr. Evarts—And you will find it out before you stop.

Mr. Beach—We are waiting for some marvelous revelations all the time. We take things as they come, without any great terror.

Mr. Evarts—I have not said "marvelous." I said it was pertinent and material, and it will be so considered by my learned friend, as well as by your Honor, I can answer for that.

Judge Neilson—And, at the same time, I think it is quite natural the learned counsel should call attention to what appears to him to be a valid objection, and what on the face of it appears to me to be a valid objection; and I think, and have said all along, that the learned counsel on both sides are taking the liberty of making this evidence extend to and include many matters entirely foreign to the issue we are trying, and that we might dispose of it without so much evidence extending so remotely to the rights of these parties. However, Mr. Shearman, proceed; and, when we do proceed, we proceed so deliberately in the ordinary terms of this Court, that we take twice as much testimony in a day as we take here. The simplest piece of evidence requires consultation of counsel, and deliberation, and delay. We don't spend half the time with a witness that is spent here. I think you might proceed more rapidly.

By Mr. Tracy—State, now, what followed after the last remark of Mr. Tilton, when, for the second time, he had said he had lost faith in man? A. I repeated; I said again to him that this remark, coming from him, meant to me a good deal, although I would place but little credence in it if it came from outsiders; from him, it meant a good deal to me; it was a serious charge for him to make, and I asked him again whether he meant to charge directly that Mr. Beecher was criminally guilty with women. And he said again to me: "Mr. Judson, I have lost faith in man;" that substantially ended the conversation, as far as I remember.

MR. BEECHER WARNED AGAINST MR. TILTON.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton again within a few days after that conversation? A. I did.

Q. Did he call on you, or you upon him? A. He called upon me.

Q. State what occurred between you at that interview? A. He came two or three days after that, if I recollect right, to my office and asked me if I had seen Mr. Beecher since we last met. I said to him that I had. He asked me what I said to him. I told him I had said to Mr. Beecher substantially what he said to me. He asked me why I went to Mr. Beecher. I said because I was his friend, and I went to him to put him on his guard against Mr. Tilton, whom I thought was not his friend. He said to me, "I am disappointed in you; I always thought you one of my best and most reliable friends." "This proves otherwise," I said to him; "I have been your friend always, and I should have done the same thing for you that I have done for Mr. Beecher under the same circumstances." He said, "I am mistaken in you; I have heretofore trusted you, but I find I am mistaken, and now we will part." I said that would suit me, and we did part.

Q. Was anything further said at that conversation? A. He left my office at that time, and we have never spoken since that time.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton at that interview in any way controvert or question the correctness of the statement which you had made of Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—That won't do; you examined him as to that. [To the witness]: That is all.

ACRIMONY BETWEEN COUNSEL AND JUDGE.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out this evidence, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—No, I think I will let it stand. It is as harmless as a lamp-post in the street.

Mr. Everts—It is proper I should say to your Honor, after that observation from the Bench, that we intend to give other evidence that will not leave it harmless.

Judge Neilson—It is perfectly idle and trivial to occupy our time with such evidence.

Mr. Everts—I suppose we must submit to your Honor's ruling before our case is completed, but we do not intend to leave it trivial or unimportant.

Judge Neilson—Will the counsel call the next witness?

Mr. Shearman—Archibald Baxter.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ARCHIBALD BAXTER.

Archibald Baxter was then called on behalf of defendant, and being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Baxter, where do you reside? A. Reside in the City of Brooklyn.

Q. And what is your occupation? A. Merchant in New-York.

Q. In what line of business? A. The export business.

Q. Are you a member of the church of the Rev. Dr. Storrs? A. I am.

Q. How long have you been a member of that church? A. About twelve years.

Q. Do you recollect the period of the publication of what is commonly called the Woodhull scandal, in 1873? A. I do.

Q. Did you, shortly after that publication, have an interview with Mr. Francis D. Moulton on the subject of that scandal? A. I had several interviews with him on the subject.

Q. Will you state the first interview, as it occurred, stating where it occurred? A. The first three interviews that I had with him occurred on the floor of the Produce Exchange. Mr. Moulton came to me, within a few days after the publication in question, and asked me on 'Change if I had a few minutes to spare for a conversation. I replied that I had. He took me aside, and said he wished to say a word to me about this publication; that he had learned that I had expressed an opinion as to Mr. Beecher's course, as to the course he ought to pursue; and he found that opinion, according to his judgment, was a right one, and wished to have a little conversation on the subject. Shall I tell you what that course was?

MR. MOULTON THINKS MR. BEECHER'S LIFE A GOOD VINDICATION.

Q. Yes; tell the conversation. A. He said he understood that I supposed Mr. Beecher ought to be silent under this charge, ought not to take any notice of it, and that that was precisely his own opinion and the opinion of many friends of Mr. Beecher, and that, on the other hand, there were a great many who were running after him, clamoring for a denial of the charge, and his answer to all such was that if Mr. Beecher's life of twenty-five years in Brooklyn was not a sufficient vindication of him from that charge, he did not believe that any denial that could be made by him would be of any value, and he supposed that that was my view, too. I replied that it was, with some—some modification. I said, "My view is that as long as the story in question is confined to the channel in which it now appears, which I understand to be a very disreputable one, Mr. Beecher's course, in my judgment, is to take no notice of it. But," I said, "if it should be otherwise later on; if respectable parties should take it up and discuss it, and appear to demand an explanation or a denial, then, of course, I should suppose Mr. Beecher would be called upon, either by himself or his friends, to make such denial." In the mean time I had no doubt myself that the charges were entirely foundationless; and I, as a friend and admirer of Mr. Beecher as a public man, I had no uneasiness on the subject. Well, he further said that he wanted to say that he knew all about those things; that he was acquainted with the whole matter; and that "It would be utterly impossible for him to write a letter to the newspapers denying the truth of the story unless he could deny it as a whole. Said he: "You know very well that if I undertake to write a letter, and do not cover every point that is embraced in that long story, then some sharp lawyer will pick out from the letter what I have not met, and will say very sharply, 'Ah, he has not denied this, he has not met that,' and so on. Therefore," said he, "I think it is better to take no notice of it." Said I, "Then, from that I infer that you are not in a position to say the whole story is a fabrication?" "Oh, no," he said, "people don't usually get up stories of any sort without there being some little truth in them; and, of course, there is some little truth in this; but," said he, "I want you—I know you have Mr. Beecher's reputation at heart, and I want you to be perfectly easy on the subject; all you have got to do is to wait patiently and when everything comes to light, you will find, then, that you will think as much of Mr. Beecher as you do now." I said, "That is very satisfactory to hear it from you." But he further said (and here I wish to say that I use his exact words, for I remember them very distinctly)—he said, "What I say with reference to this story is, that if the story is true, it is infamous to publish it; and if it is false it is diabolical to publish it." Well I was a little staggered by that statement of his; it was the only, the first thing that unsettled me at all. I did not want his assurance on the subject of Mr. Beecher's innocence; but, from the fact that he made a distinction between the guilt, or the error, or blunder, whatever you may call it, of publishing if it was true and publishing if it was false, rather staggered me. However, we had no—not much further conversation at that time; but I got from him that he gave me permission to make what use I should please of this conversation; and I inferred, although he did not say so, in so many words, that he was quite agreeable that I should make use of it among my friends in the Church of the Pilgrims.

OTHER INTERVIEWS WITH MR. MOULTON.

Q. So much for that interview. A. It was the first.

Q. Was there anything said on that occasion about Mr. Beecher's being a good man or not? A. Not further than I have stated.

Q. Now, we will pass to the second interview; state how that came about? A. The second interview came about precisely in the same way; he came to me on 'Change again and said, "By the way, you will perhaps have noticed that there had a prosecution been entered against those women by the United States authorities." I said I had. "Well," said he, "that makes it more awkward than ever for any denial to be given, or for any letters bearing on the subject; at least," said he, "we are so advised." Said I, "How is that?" "Well," said he, "if we write anything the probability is that the legal advisers of those"—he mentioned Mr. Beecher's name here—said he "if Mr. Beecher were to write anything now, the legal advisers of those ladies would probably subpoena them to appear—subpoena him to appear in Court, and that would be a very awkward thing; that is a thing that, of course, is to be avoided for many reasons;" and he further stated that all the charges that had been made against Mr. Beecher had originated with one individual, whom he did not name, and that individual, he said he had, if I remember rightly, seen sign a retraction of those charges.

Q. Is that all that occurred at the second interview? A. I think that was about what occurred at the second interview.

Q. Now, will you pass to the next interview, tell what happened then? A. On the third interview, which was probably a week after the second, Mr. Moulton came to me again on 'Change, and was somewhat excited in his manner—asked me to step aside, and on stepping aside he said, "Is it true that the Church of the Pilgrims scratched Mr. Beecher's name out of a public notice that was read in their church yesterday?" I replied, "It is not true that the Church of the Pilgrims did anything of the sort," but, said I, "I believe I know what you refer to;" said I, "There was a public meeting called, I think, of the Bible Society in our church for last evening"—this was Monday we were talking—"for last evening, and I had seen the notice of the meeting before it went into Dr. Storrs's hands, and I observed that Mr. Beecher's name was therein printed as one of the speakers."

Mr. Beach—[Interrupting]: Your Honor, I don't understand the propriety or materiality of those conversations.

Judge Neilson—Well, this may be introductory to something else. The statement is very natural and fair, I think; it may lead to subject-matter that he wants to show.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, that is not the mode in which impeaching evidence is given, to have a full relation of a conversation upon general topics. The answer to it is that Mr. Moulton has not been inquired of as to these particulars. But as this gentleman appeared to be entirely intelligent and fair I had no particular objection to it. But it seems to me it is wandering into a very long examination.

Judge Neilson—He inquired of him as to his conversation with Moulton.

Mr. Shearman—You can abbreviate that; give nothing more than is necessary to give the point.

Judge Neilson—Call his attention to the point you desire to introduce.

Mr. Shearman—The point is concerning statements in regard to Mr. Beecher's personal character.

Mr. Beach—Well, as we have gone so far now, as Mr. Shearman says it is short, we may as well take the remainder.

The Witness—It is in relation to the statement which was subsequently made by Mr. Moulton.

Q. Yes, you may as well go on. A. I said to him that that was not done by the Church of the Pilgrims, but that Mr. Beecher's name had been left out, whether by Dr. Storrs's own act, or by request of the Society in whose favor the meeting was to be held, I did not know, for I had not inquired. "Well," said Mr. Moulton, "all I can say is, that it is a confounded shame that such a thing should have been done by any one, for that is prejudging the whole case." "Well," said I, "Mr. Moulton, you will remember that while I agreed with you that Mr. Beecher should not take any notice of this matter, as long as it was confined to a certain channel, yet I distinctly told you that I did not think so if it went over that channel. Now," said I, "it seems to me that this story is spreading all around, and yet Mr. Beecher's friends are still maintaining this silence, and you are, therefore, compelling other people to draw what deductions they please from it." Said I, "I do not know that Dr. Storrs drew any deduction at all on the subject, but," said I, "you have no right to blame him if he adopted a certain course because, in consequence of, your silence." And then I said to him, further, that I had ascertained that Dr. Storrs had addressed a note to Mr. Beecher of sympathy, and that he had not replied to that note in any way, and that, of course, was rather strange. "Well," said Mr. Moulton, at last, "I see how it affects you; I see how you are being affected, but I want to say to you what I have never said to any other body yet in this matter, and that is that while I know all these things—know all about them, I know that Mr. Beecher is a pure man." "Well," I said, "Mr. Moulton, you have made several statements to me now voluntarily, and I have not asked you any questions: I desire to know if you have any objections to answer me a question or two now, so that I may be sure that I rightly understand what you mean?" Said he, "I shall answer any questions that are reasonable and that I feel that I can answer." "Well," said I, "You say Mr. Beecher is, according to your knowledge and belief, a pure man." Said I, "Do you mean by that that Mr. Beecher has not—or is not guilty, so far as you know, of any breach of the Seventh Commandment?" and after some little hesitation he answered, "I do." "Then," I said, "I want to ask you further: you say Mr. Beecher is a pure man according to that standard; now, do you also mean that so far as you know and believe he has always been a pure man?" and he hesitated again a little, but finally said, "Yes, I mean that." I said to him, "Then, that is all I want to ask you," and we parted.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Beach, do you wish to cross-examine?

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. BAXTER.

Mr. Pryor—Do you remember an excursion that you took down the river in 1871, October? A. Do you mean when Mr. Beecher—an excursion of Mr. Moulton's when—

Q. Yes, when Mr. Moulton was along? A. I do.

Q. Do you recollect the day of the month? A. Yes, I am able to fix the day of the month as the 23d of October, 1871.

Q. Did I understand you to say that Messrs. Beecher, Tilton and Moulton were along on that excursion? A. Mr. Moulton was the party who invited us to go, or rather his firm, Woodruff & Robinson; they invited a number of people from the Produce Exchange to go and inspect their Erie Basin warehouses, and in the course of his invitation he mentioned that Mr. Greeley would probably be there. Mr.

Beecher, Mr. Tilton, and sundry others; and that, after inspecting the warehouses, we would be in excellent time to go down and see the yacht race between the Sappho and the Lavonia settled.

Q. Well, Messrs. Beecher and Tilton were along? A. Messrs. Beecher and Tilton were.

Q. Well, Mr. Baxter, did you observe the demeanor and bearing on that occasion of Messrs. Tilton and Beecher, the one toward the other? A. I observed that Mr. Beecher appeared to hold himself aloof pretty much from the general party; he was not apparently in good spirits—at least I don't know that he was not in as good spirits, but he was not so enjoyable, I think; he did not enjoy himself so much as I expected he would.

Q. Did you observe any apparent estrangement of Mr. Tilton from Mr. Beecher on that occasion? A. I thought that they were not cordial, that there was no fraternal feeling between them.

Q. Did that fact, then, strike you, Sir? A. It did, and I mentioned it in my household when I got home in the evening.

Q. You returned that evening? A. Returned that evening.

Q. With whom did you ascend the hill from Wall-st. Ferry on your return? A. I ascended with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Did you have any talk with him? A. I had.

Q. About Mr. Moulton? A. I had some talk with him about Mr. Moulton.

COMMISERATION FOR MR. MOULTON.

Q. Will you, pray, tell the jury what that was?

A. Mr. Beecher and I had been previously speaking about the Reverend Doctor Taylor, who has since come to New-York, and who had previously been preaching in Brooklyn for some time, and I said to Mr. Beecher, "It seems to me a pity that Mr. Moulton cannot be brought under some better religious influences than he is under;" said I, "He seemed to be greatly impressed with Mr. Taylor's preaching while he was here; he heard him preach the last Sabbath that he was here, and was greatly interested—went to hear him preach morning and evening, and subsequently spoke to me very highly of him; said he hoped he would come to Brooklyn, and so on." "Yes," Mr. Beecher replied, "it is a pity, but," said he, "Mr. Moulton is young, and he is like a great many other young people affected with 'isms' of one sort and another, but he will cure of all that, and no fear of him; he is a noble fellow; it will be all right with him yet."

Q. Did he speak of him as "Moulton" or "Frank," when he said he was a noble fellow? A. I think he said "Frank is a noble fellow."

Judge Neilson—That is all with this gentleman. One more witness, gentlemen.

Mr. Shearman—One moment, Mr. Baxter. Were you present on this excursion when Mr. Moulton invited Mr. Beecher to come to his house after the excursion? A. I remember hearing such an invitation.

Q. Did you hear any intimation given to Mr. Beecher at that time that Mrs. Woodhull was to be at the house? A. I did not.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Baxter.

DEPOSITION OF MR. J. HAINES DRAKE.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, if the other side will not object to our reading the deposition of Mr. Drake, without proof of his absence, which is well known—Mr. Drake has gone to Italy—I think I could fill up a few minutes this afternoon. What do you say to that? Mr. Drake has unquestionably left for Italy.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think they will accept your assurance that he is absent.

Mr. Shearman—I read, then, the examination conditionally of Mr. J. Haines Drake, who, being sworn, conditionally as a witness before trial, in answer to questions, says—

THE WOODHULL STORY "A MESS OF FABLES."

Q. What are your occupation and residence? A. Staten Island. Grain exporter.

Q. Are you in any way related to, or do you have any pecuniary interest in either of the parties to this action? A. None whatever.

Q. Are you now, and were you in the year 1872, personally acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton? A. I am, and I was then.

Q. Did you, in or about the month of November, 1872, read or hear read a certain statement purporting to be made by Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull in a paper called Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly, in which this defendant was charged with having had improper relation with the wife of the plaintiff? A. I did not read it all; I read enough of it to gather the purport.

Q. Did you afterward have any interview with Mr. F. D. Moulton in which the subject of that statement was talked of between you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When and where, as nearly as you can state? A. Within two or three days, I think, after the issuance of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly containing that statement, and on the New York Produce Exchange, beside the desk at the north end of the corn counter.

Q. State what took place between you in reference to this subject? A. I asked Mr. Moulton in words about as follows, I think I can use the precise words: "Mr. Moulton, what about this Woodhull and Claflin scandal?" He responded in rather an incensed manner, "It is a damned mess of women's fables." (I think he said "old women's," but I am not sure) to which I responded: "It would take a deal of such testimony to convince me that Henry Ward Beecher is criminally guilty." Mr. Moulton then hurriedly said he was interrupted by some one come up at the close of the remark, "As to the criminality, it hasn't a shadow of truth, and if Mr. Beecher's career is not sufficient refutation to slander from such a source, you don't deserve to have your mind satisfied."

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. DRAKE.

Q. Are you an intimate friend or confidant of Mr. Beecher, the defendant? A. I do not know him, Sir, except by sight.

Q. Are you the intimate friend or confidant of Mr. Moulton? A. No; I have known him, however, for a long time.

Q. For how long? A. For five or six years from now.

Q. At this time you knew him for two years? A. I had known him three to four years.

Q. Had he ever made you a confidant in any matter? A. Not in anything except business matters.

Q. Were you the intimate friend or confidant of the plaintiff? A. I don't know him, Sir.

Q. Who broached the subject of this interview, in reference to Woodhull's statement? A. I did.

Q. Was there anybody present beside you and Mr. Moulton? A. Not at the early part. We were interrupted at the close, I think, by Mr. W. B. Barber. But I am not positive.

Q. Did his interruption terminate this interview, or was it carried on afterwards? A. It terminated it.

Q. In what respect did Mr. Moulton make you a confidant? A. Only in business transactions, between each other, naming to me private rates of storage; I did not think it was any display of confidence.

Q. Is that what you refer to as being a confidant in business matter? A. That is all.

Q. Did your intimacy with Mr. Moulton extend to your visiting his family, or he visiting your family, or was it a business acquaintance? A. Merely a business acquaintance; I never visited his family, and he never visited mine.

Q. Can you say what caused Mr. Moulton's indignation, of your own knowledge? A. I cannot say, of my personal knowledge.

Q. Can you say, of your own knowledge, that this indignation was not caused by Mr. Moulton taking offense at being questioned at all? A. He did not tell me that he was incensed, nor why he was incensed.

[Signed]

JAMES HAINES DRAKE.

Sworn to before me this 4th day of January, 1875.

A. McCUE,

Judge of the City Court of Brooklyn.

Mr. Shearman—It is not worth while, I should think, your Honor, to call another witness.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock Tuesday morning.

FORTY-FIFTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

EIGHT WITNESSES IN ONE DAY.

REUBEN W. ROPES, ABNER H. DAVIS, EDWARD A. BIDEN, WILLIAM B. BARBER, AND CHARLES H. CADWELL SWEAR TO MR. MOULTON'S DENIAL OF THE WOODHULL STORY ABOUT MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON—THOMAS N. COOK OF DETROIT TESTIFIES TO INTERVIEWS WITH MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL IN 1871, AND TO THE LATTER'S DECLARATION THAT MR. TILTON HAD SHOWN HER ALL THE DOCUMENTS AND LETTERS IN THE CASE—THE REV. S. B. HALLIDAY DESCRIBES HIS INTERVIEWS WITH MRS. MOULTON.

TUESDAY, March 16, 1875.

The Court was opened promptly at the usual time, all the counsel being in their places before 11 o'clock. Mr. Fullerton was congratulated by Mr. Evarts and the other counsel on his recovery from his recent illness, and was cordially greeted by the jury. He appeared entirely recovered and entered upon his regular task of cross-examination with all of his usual acuteness and wit. The defendant's counsel evidently appreciated Judge Neilson's remarks of the day before concerning the slowness of the proceedings. Reckoning their morning work by the number of witnesses called, they made commendable progress, for they called no less than seven witnesses during the first hour. Of these Mr. Reuben W. Ropes, Abner H. Davis, Edward A. Biden, William B. Barber, and Charles H. Cadwell testified to declarations made to them by Francis D. Moulton, to the effect that there was no truth in The Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly stories concerning Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Shearman also called John W. Mason and questioned him in regard to like statements alleged to have been made by Mr. Moulton to him, but it appeared that Mr. Moulton had not been interrogated on this subject, and the witness was accordingly excused from testifying.

The defense then turned again to Mr. Tilton's relations with Mrs. Woodhull, and called Thomas N. Cook of Detroit, who was a journalist in this city in 1871, and who testified to several interviews which he had about that time in his journalistic capacity with Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull. On several occasions he had known of Mr. Tilton being up stairs in Mrs. Woodhull's house in the evening, and he had met him frequently at her office in Broad-st. The witness testified that Mrs. Woodhull asked him to write up the scandal story about Mr.

Beecher, and told him that Mr. Tilton had all the letters and documents on the subject. She said he had shown them to her, and would let the witness use them for the daily papers. This was soon after the Steinway Hall meeting. The witness thought that Mr. Tilton had joined in this request. They had afterward asked him to write up the matter for Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly. Mr. Shearman then showed the witness photographs of Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Tennie C. Claflin, which were identified. Gen. Pryor remarked that he would like to take a look. Mr. Beach suggested that perhaps the jury might like to see them, and Mr. Fullerton created some amusement by examining them long and critically through his eye-glasses and then inquiring of the witness if he knew how long Mr. Shearman had had those photographs and where he had got them.

On cross-examination the witness gave a long account of his former life and calling. It appeared that he was now engaged in "winding up" The Detroit Union, which had previously "wound up" several persons. Mr. Fullerton questioned the witness very closely as to what he had received for his expenses in coming from Detroit to testify. The witness regarded his journey from Detroit and his stay here as a "trip." Mr. Fullerton took a different view of it. Mr. Evarts explained: "He means the trip that he made to New-York and his stay here." "Well," retorted his opponent, "it was a 'trip' of the witness, if you had not interfered," and the inquiry on this point ended.

The next witness, Mr. John Gallagher, a livery stable-keeper, testified that in the Summer of 1871 he drove Mr. Tilton and a lady in a carriage to Coney Island, where they got out of the carriage and remained for a short time. He did not see them bathing. He had then taken them to New-York, and brought Mr. Tilton back to Brooklyn that night. There was no cross-examination of this witness.

The assistant pastor of Plymouth Church, the Rev. Samuel B. Halliday, then took the witness stand. He gave his testimony in a very deliberate and careful manner, and appeared anxious to be very accurate on every point. The questions put to him regarding the actions of the officers of Plymouth Church during the time of the Woodhull scandal were objected to, and during the argument which followed, the plaintiff's counsel insisted upon the proposition that a record was necessary to constitute a valid meeting of the deacons and Examining Committee. Mr. Everts replied, "There is nothing in the Constitution of the Church which requires them to keep a record," to which Mr. Beach replied, "The counsel understands the Constitution of the State, and that of the United States, better than he does that of Plymouth Church." and the inquiry turned to another subject. Mr. Halliday testified to a conversation with Mrs. Francis D. Moulton, in which she had told him in answer to his question, "What does this Woodhull story mean?" "I do not know what right any one has to connect me with it," and later in the conversation she had said, "Mr. Beecher is my pastor, and has been from my childhood. I believe in him, and no one can say anything that will lessen my respect for him." Mr. Halliday had seen Mrs. Moulton at Plymouth Church several times after that conversation, and she always shook hands with Mr. Beecher when she attended. "I do not think I saw her there more than six times after that interview; it may have been not more than four times," was the cautious way in which Mr. Halliday expressed himself on this point, and it affords a very good specimen of the guarded and circumspect manner in which he gave all his testimony. Mr. Beecher's counsel then attempted again to show by Mr. Halliday other actions of the church officers tending to prove that Mr. Beecher had not suppressed investigation of the scandal. Mr. Beach argued most earnestly in opposition to this evidence, and took occasion to pay to Mr. Beecher, in his absence, the following compliment: "We do not want the doings of his underlings." Mr. Fullerton here made a gesture of remonstrance at the word. "Yes, underlings, I said" insisted Mr. Beach, turning toward Mr. Beecher's usual place, "for it is a compliment to be an underling to the greatest man on the face of the earth."

Judge Neilson finally ruled that the records of the church could be produced in court and used in evidence. But the hour for adjournment had arrived, Mr. Halliday's testimony not being completed.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

He replied, "It is a damned infernal lie."

Q. What next occurred between you? A. I then said to him, "Moulton, you appear to know as much about this, and a great deal more than I do; I want to ask you another question: Is there any truth in the reports that were made in the Woodhull-Clafin publication in regard to Mr. Beecher." He replied, "They are a pack of infernal lies."

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Nothing.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Ropes.

Mr. Shearman—A. H. Davis.

Judge Neilson—Will gentlemen please keep quiet.

TESTIMONY OF ABNER H. DAVIS.

Abner H. Davis called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Q. Well, in business for yourself? A. Ten years.

Q. And how long have you been in business for other people—altogether? A. Since 1844, but not for myself.

Q. Do you remember the period of the publication of what is commonly called the Woodhull and Claflin scandal? A. Very near it.

Q. That was in the Fall of 1873, was it not? A. 1873—1873. I beg your pardon; the Fall of 1873, in November, I think it was.

Q. Were you then acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton? A. I was.

Q. Were you in the habit of meeting him in business places? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what connection were you accustomed to see him? A. My acquaintance was formed with him when he used to do business with William T. Coleman & Co., with whom I was clerk. He used to be in there to arrange business. There is where my first acquaintance was made, and then occasionally they had business—William T. Coleman & Co.—with his firm, and I was sent down to Woodruff & Robinson's, and I occasionally met with him there and had various conversations on my business, whatever it was.

Q. Well, did you meet Mr. Moulton and converse with him on the subject of this scandal some time after the publication? A. I did.

Q. About what time? A. In November.

Q. 1873? A. 1873.

Q. Where did that interview take place? A. At the foot of the Custom-house steps in New-York, it commenced.

Q. Now, will you state what passed between you on that occasion? A. I will. I met Mr. Moulton, and I says to him—shall I repeat my own words?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. And his?

Q. And his. A. Well, I met Mr. Moulton, and I said: "For God's sake, Mr. Moulton, what does this mean, this report that is reported in this Woodhull-Claflin paper? I understand that your name is mixed up with it. Is there a word of truth in it in relation to Mr. Beecher?" His answer was: "There is not a word of truth in it; and I think it is a pity that if Mr. Beecher has lived here as long as he has, and the people don't know any better than to believe such a mass of stuff as that." That is everything I know about the matter. That is all that was said touching the matter.

Q. What was Mr. Moulton's manner in making this statement—careless and indifferent? A. It seemed to be an indignant, a reserved indignant and sarcastic answer, that he made to me. He seemed to think—

Mr. Fullerton—No, not what he seemed to think.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Beach—No questions, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Nothing at all.

Judge Neilson—That is all.

Mr. Shearman—John W. Mason.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN W. MASON.

John W. Mason called and affirmed on the part of the defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Mason where do you reside? A. 140 Hicks-st., Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. 30 years and more.

Q. What is your occupation? A. Shipping and general commission business.

Q. In New-York? A. In New-York.

Q. How long have you carried on this business? A. 25 or 30 years.

Q. Have you been acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton for some time? A. I have.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I suppose for 10 or 15 years.

Q. Were you well acquainted with his firm, his partners, Woodruff and Robinson? Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known them? A. Ever since they have been in business.

Q. You remember the time of the publication of what is called the Woodhull and Claflin scandal, do you not? A. I do.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Moulton after that publication upon that subject? A. I did.

Q. When did that conversation occur, and where? A. I should think within a month of the time of its publication, on the floor of the Produce Exchange.

Q. Well, Sir, will you state what that conversation was?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that now, Sir. Although we admit that Mr. Moulton didn't deny the truth of the Woodhull scandal—

Mr. Beach—Did deny.

Mr. Fullerton—Did deny the Woodhull scandal, yet we want to see where they called his attention to it now in the evidence. It is hardly worth while to spend time on it, any way.

Mr. Evarts—You mean upon our part.

Mr. Beach—Upon anybody's part.

Mr. Evarts—That is your judgment.

Mr. Fullerton—It is our judgment that we go by.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I feel a draught of air across here rather too fresh and strong.

Judge Neilson—Officer, close the window. [To Mr. Shearman.] The index of the bound book ought to help you.

Mr. Shearman—I do not think the index amounts to much.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not think it is in the book at all, and therefore it could not be indexed.

Mr. Shearman—[After searching for it.] Well, we are not able to find that Mr. Mason's name was specially mentioned; I thought it was, but on their own direct examination we find that they took the pains to draw out the fact that Mr. Moulton made these statements to a great many persons—altogether some hundreds.

Mr. Beach—Do they propose to contradict that now?

Mr. Shearman—Not at all; perhaps to confirm it.

Mr. Morris—We admit it is true.

Mr. Fullerton—You need not confirm anything that our witnesses have said.

Mr. Morris—Oh! no.

Mr. Shearman—I thought he was named; it appears that he is not specially named. If they object—

Mr. Beach—We proved a hundred and they want to prove a hundred and one.

Judge Nellson—[To the witness.] The reason why your statement is not taken is simply because Mr. Moulton had not been interrogated in respect to it.

Mr. Shearman—We will excuse you, Mr. Mason; sorry to have troubled you.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD BIDEN.

Edward Biden, called on behalf of the defendant and sworn.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Biden, where do you reside? A. 112 Willow-st., in Brooklyn.

Q. What is your occupation? A. I am engaged in the storage of grain, in Brooklyn.

Q. Where is your place of business? A. 17 South-st., New-York.

Q. How long have you been engaged in business? A. About 15 years.

Q. Do you remember the period of the publication of what is known as the Woodhull and Claflin scandal? A. I do.

Q. That was in—it was about the first of November, 1873, wasn't it? A. About that time.

Q. Were you at that time acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton? A. I was, Sir.

Q. How long had you known him? A. Known him—oh! I had ten years, probably.

Q. Did you meet him after this publication and have any conversation with him on that subject? A. I did twice.

Q. When and where, as nearly as you can? A. First time was a few days after the publication; I cannot say how many days; a day or two.

Q. And where? A. On the floor of the Produce Exchange.

Q. Now, will you state what took place between you in regard to that subject at the time?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—On what ground, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—On the ground that that is not the way to interrogate him as to that conversation, if any took place; he is not at liberty to state what took place between himself and Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Shearman—It seems to me that, Sir, is the proper way of asking the question, unless I make it leading, put words in his mouth.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you don't get your knowledge from the law books.

Mr. Beach—It is one of the cases, Sir, in which a leading question is permissible and proper.

Mr. Fullerton—And necessary.

Mr. Shearman—I don't suppose we are obliged to prove literally, word for word.

Judge Nellson—No; you call his attention distinctly to the very point, and ask him what was said on that subject—

Mr. Shearman—The point is, whether anything was said by Mr. Moulton and you on that subject of the truth or falsehood of this Woodhull scandal as affecting Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; that is not it—that is objected to—

Mr. Shearman—I refer it to the Court.

Judge Nellson—Yes; we will take it.

Mr. Fullerton—He must use the language incorporated in the question put to Mr. Moulton.

Judge Nellson—He must show his attention was called to a specific statement.

Mr. Fullerton—It is used on page 283; the question was put to Mr. Moulton, "Did you say to him" [referring to the witness] "it is false; there is not a word of truth in it as far as Mr. Beecher is concerned?" "A. I don't recollect that I used those words to him now, Sir."

Mr. Shearman—Well, one moment; the question next: "Did you use anything in substance like that?" Question next: "Did you say it was untrue as far as Mr. Beecher was concerned?" "Did you say that there was not a word of truth in that?" "Did you use any such language to him in substance?" Judge Nellson—Well, interrogate him in those forms, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—Did Mr. Moulton speak to you on the subject of this scandal at that time? A. I spoke to him first, Sir.

Q. And did he answer you? A. He did.

Q. Did he speak to you at any length about it? A. No; not at any length.

Q. Did he avoid talking with you about it?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; I object to that.

Judge Nellson—Oh, yes.

Mr. Shearman—I am taking Mr. Moulton's answers—I am proposing to take Moulton's precise answer. Mr. Moulton says that he avoided talking about it—did Mr. Moulton avoid talking with you about it? A. I asked Mr. Moulton a question—a distinct question; that was the way it was brought about.

Q. Well, what was that question? A. That question was, whether in this Woodhull and Claflin story, so far as Mr. Beecher was concerned, there was any truth in it.

Q. What was Mr. Moulton's answer? A. Mr. Moulton's answer the first time was: "Mr. Biden, I am as good a friend of Mr. Beecher as you are;" that I remember distinctly; he then went on to say that he was with Mr. Beecher a good deal, or had seen him a good deal lately, and I think he said that he was with him the night previous for an hour, and that when a proper time came—or, at a proper time, he was ready to answer that question, or ready to speak—somewhat to that purpose—and that is all I remember of that first interview.

Q. When did the second interview occur? A. The second interview occurred a week or ten days afterwards.

Q. Where was that? A. That was in the street; I met Mr. Moulton very suddenly, well, unexpectedly, I didn't meet him—I didn't seek him, and I very quickly again asked him—repeated the same question whether there was any truth in this story, and he then emphatically—I cannot use precisely the words—said that it was false, it was all false, or somewhat to that purpose—at any rate it satisfied me. I thanked him and said I was glad to hear it, and left. I guess that is about all that passed between us.

Q. That is all that you can recollect? A. That is all that I can recollect.

Q. Didn't he say in substance, "It is false; there is not a word of truth in it so far as Mr. Beecher is concerned?" A. Well, I could not say that distinctly—he used the word "false," and was very emphatic in denying the truth of it, that was the impression left on my mind.

Q. That is all? A. I told him that I was happy to hear it, and thanked him, and left.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Did he say in substance, "If the story is true it was infamous to tell it?" A. Not a word; I don't remember that.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't remember. Well, I don't care to ask you anything.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM B. BARBER.

William B. Barber was then called on behalf of the defendant, sworn, and examined as follows:

Mr. Morris—What page, Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Shearman—Page 283.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Barber, where do you reside? A. 233 Clermont avenue, Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you lived in Brooklyn? A. Since 1863.

Q. What is your business? A. Operator in grain mainly.

Q. Where is your office? A. I hold my office now at 19 South-st., in the office of Jesse Hoyt & Co.

Q. How long have you been in business in New-York? A. Since 1852.

Q. Do you remember the publication of the Woodhull and Claflin scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember that that was just before the 1st of November, 1872, or thereabouts? A. About the Fall of 1872; I don't remember what—

Q. Were you at that time acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long had you known him? A. I think since about the time he first went with Woodruff & Robinson; if my memory serves me right, since he was a kind of a stripling.

Q. Did you meet Mr. Moulton shortly after the publication of that paper? A. I did.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him on the subject of that scandal? A. I did.

Q. Where did that take place? A. Produce Exchange.

Q. Now, will you relate that conversation?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Shearman—Very well; I will ask a question. [To the witness:] Did you ask Mr. Moulton whether that statement was true, or anything to that effect? A. Yes, Sir; that is. I asked him if there was any truth in the statement?

Q. Did you ask whether it was true in respect to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was your answer?

Mr. Fullerton—No; I object to that.

Mr. Shearman—Very well; did he answer then? A. He did.

Q. Substantially in this form: "There is not a particle of truth in the statement as it relates to Mr. Beecher," or anything to that effect? A. His answer was in very emphatic—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, one moment; you must answer the question.

Judge Neilson—Repeat the question.

Mr. Fullerton—He will say, yes or no, to that question.

Judge Neilson—I ask Mr. Shearman to repeat the question.

Mr. Shearman—Did he answer in substance as follows: "There is not a particle of truth in that statement as against Mr. Beecher?" A. He did.

Q. Now will you give his words as nearly as you can remember them?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I take it, your Honor, we have a right—

Judge Neilson—I think he can do that—his words on that point.

Mr. Shearman—His words on that point.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, you will see that this would be doing injustice to the witness, Mr. Moulton. The question was this:

Did you say to him, speaking of the Woodhull publication, there is not a particle of truth in the statement as against Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; I did not say that to him; I recollect what I did say.

Now, they put the very words in the mouth of the witness in which he was to answer; and whilst he denied having used those words, yet he offered to say what he did—what words he did use in speaking with Mr. Barber—

Mr. Beach—That they rejected.

Mr. Fullerton—That was rejected.

Mr. Shearman—Counsel on the other side stopped him.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I read, now: "Mr. Fullerton—No, they don't want you to tell that." We did not say anything.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I spoke for you, in your silence. [Laughter.] When a man is silent, somebody must speak for him.

Mr. Shearman—Well, there is a precedent for that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I just heard the reply. Now, if your Honor please, the question was, whether Mr. Moulton used those precise words: his answer was, "No; not those words, but I will tell you what I did say." Now, they are not at liberty to show any other words proceeding from Mr. Moulton upon that occasion.

Judge Neilson—Did they not ask him also whether he did not say Mr. Beecher was a pure man?

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Did they not ask him also whether he did not say Mr. Beecher was a pure man in that connection?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; that is another question they may put if they choose.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Shearman; put your question with reference to what you asked him.

Mr. Shearman—First, I will ask, did Mr. Moulton then say that "Mr. Beecher is as pure a man as ever lived," or words to that effect? A. Words that would cover that; the substance of that question he stated.

Q. Well, now, I ask what he did say concerning the substance of that question?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—You may say this: In saying this, what words did he use? In saying that, what words did he use?

Mr. Fullerton—When the question was put to Mr. Moulton, his answer was: "No, Sir; I did not add that—shall I tell you what I said to him? I can give you that conversation." Then my reply was: "No, they don't want you to tell that." The witness says, "Can I not tell, your Honor, what was said?" Judge Neilson—"By-and-bye you will get a chance—" That was the close of the examination on that point.

Judge Neilson—Then he was cross-examined and did not get the chance.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Then he was cross-examined, and did not get the chance.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, your Honor supposed he would get the chance, but they didn't give it to him.

Mr. Evarts—No; I suppose your Honor supposed the plaintiff would give it; but they did not want to give him the chance.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I suppose your supposition is wrong.

Judge Neilson—You recognize the propriety of keeping pretty close to the questions which were asked?

Mr. Evarts—No doubt. We will be as brief as possible; when he answers, covering that, we have a right to see what words he used.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will perceive that in giving the conversation between the witness and Mr. Moulton, which Mr. Moulton was willing to give himself, but did not give, they will claim, "Why he is contradicted," when it is no contradiction at all.

Judge Neilson—Well, we have a general answer from Mr. Barber.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, covering the ground.

Judge Neilson—That he made a statement to that effect?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now, may they not ask what words he used in making a statement to that effect?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; because non constat, but that if Mr. Moulton had been permitted to give the conversation, he would have related it as the witness will relate it, and probably in the very words that the witness may employ in giving the substance of it; therefore, it is no contradiction.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that would be justice, though tardy justice to Mr. Moulton; I don't see any objection to that.

Mr. Fullerton—Simply because you did not permit Mr. Moulton to give the conversation, and learn from him what it was. Then you determined whether what the witness was about to say was a contradiction or not.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Shearman, you have two vital things.

Mr. Evarts—But if your Honor please, the witness on this last examination has said "yes" to what would cover the substance of that question. Now, we have a right to ask on our direct examination of this witness, what the language used was.

Judge Neilson—Well, my impression is that he can give the words which he supposes cover that—that very point, Mr. Barber.

Mr. Evarts—I think so.

Mr. Shearman—Now, give those words, Mr. Barber? A. He said that Mr. Beecher was entirely innocent, and that if his life record was not an answer to such charges, nothing further that he could say to me would cover the case; that is about the words that he used.

Judge Neilson—And that is what you regard as equivalent to saying that he was a pure man? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I am sorry I objected.

Judge Neilson—That is all.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES CADWELL.

Charles H. Cadwell was then called on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Beach—I submit to your Honor, that upon a subject of this character it is not permissible to allow cumulative evidence. In the first place, Mr. Moulton has not denied using the language which was imputed to him by the questions put upon the other side, and the state of the case is this: that while Mr. Moulton concedes, with explanatory circumstances, that he used the language which is imputed to him, they are now producing a number of witnesses for the purpose of establishing a fact which upon our side is conceded, and which was proved by the witness they seek to contradict; and, instead of a contradiction, they are producing cumulative evidence to prove the very fact which Mr. Moulton himself asserted in his evidence. I have never known such a course pursued, Sir, and I submit to your Honor that it is improper to present additional evidence upon that point. If they wish to go to a reasonable extent in producing witnesses to confirm the statement of Mr. Moulton, why of course we make no objection;—it is a matter within the discretion of your Honor. But it is a useless waste of time, I submit to your Honor, to produce a number of witnesses upon a point of that character.

Judge Neilson—I think it must be received, assuming that the learned counsel will limit the number, if he can properly do so.

Mr. Shearman—All I will say in reply to that, if your Honor please, it is rather an unfortunate incident.

Charles H. Cadwell was then sworn, and testified as follows:

Mr. Shearman—Where do you reside? A. City of New-York.

Q. In what business are you engaged? A. Provision broker.

Q. Where do you carry on business? A. 115 Broad-st.

Q. New-York? A. New-York; yes, Sir.

Q. What is your firm? A. No firm; I am alone, Sir.

Q. How long have you been engaged in business? A. In this business about seven years.

Q. Do you remember the publication of the Woodhull and Claflin scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember about what time that was published?

A. Yes, Sir; some time either October or November, 1872.

Q. Were you at that time acquainted with Mr. Francis D. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you meet him anywhere after the publication of that scandal, and have a conversation with him on that subject? A. Yes, Sir; I met him during—on about the 25th of November, 1872, in Boston.

Q. A little louder, please? A. About the 25th of November, 1872, in Boston.

Q. Who introduced the conversation on that subject? A. I did.

Q. Did you ask him whether there was any truth in that publication, or statement? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Or anything of that kind? A. I did, Sir.

Q. State in what language you asked him?

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment.

Q. As near as you can recollect?

Mr. Fullerton—You can answer that question.

Q. Have I covered your language? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What answer did Mr. Moulton make?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—We have asked the question whether the witness—the witness says he asked Mr. Moulton whether there was any truth in those remarks against Mr. Beecher. The question we put to Mr. Moulton was “Did you say to Mr. Caldwell that there was no truth in any of the rumors respecting Mr. Beecher?”

Judge Neilson—He has answered there was no truth.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness]: What did Mr. Moulton say in reply to that question? A. In words, “There is no truth in it.”

Q. Did Mr. Moulton say to you anything like this, that if Mr. Beecher should the next day tell Plymouth Church all the facts pertaining to his life, there would not be a single person in it who could impute a single blemish to the purity of their pastor? A. No, Sir; not in that language.

Q. Well, then, state the language in which he did express himself?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think he has gone far enough with that. You have covered the question put to him.

Mr. Shearman—What did he say to that effect, if anything to that effect?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; they chose to put language in Mr. Moulton's mouth.

Mr. Shearman—We asked him in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—We asked Mr. Moulton whether it was said in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Put the question in the very form you have before.

Mr. Beach—He has put it, and the witness answered “No.”

Mr. Shearman—Not in those words. Now I ask in what words he spoke, if he spoke at all to that effect.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Moulton's answer is, “I don't recollect having used that language.”

Mr. Shearman—The next question: “Did you use anything in substance like that?” A. I don't recollect any conversation with Mr. Cadwell at all on the subject.”

Judge Neilson—Very well; if he don't recollect, I think this witness can give it.

Mr. Shearman—Go on; what was said? A. We breakfasted in Boston, I think, on the morning of the 25th of November, at the American House, and either at the breakfast table or on our way to the main depot (Mr. Moulton was going to Portland), I asked Mr. Moulton: “You seem to be mixed up in this matter; is there any truth in this statement?” He said: “That is all a damned lie; Mr. Beecher's relations to Mrs. Tilton are no different from mine.”

Q. “Mr. Beecher's relation to Mrs. Tilton are” what? A. “No different to mine,”

Q. “No different to mine?” A. “No different to mine,” or language to about that effect.

Q. Is that all that was said? A. That is all, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; that question was not put to Mr. Moulton at all, Sir—nothing like it. That is all: I have nothing to ask.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Cadwell.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS M. COOK.

Thomas M. Cook called, and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Cook, where do you reside? A. At present I reside in Detroit, Mich.

Q. What is your occupation? A. Journalist.

Q. How long have you been engaged in journalism? A. From fifteen to twenty years.

Mr. Evarts—[To the Jury.] Do you hear him?

A Juryman—Not very well.

Mr. Shearman—Speak as plainly as you can. A. From fifteen to twenty years.

Q. In the year 1871 how were you engaged? A. I was connected with The New-York Sun.

Q. Were you during that year acquainted with Theodore Tilton? A. I think I became acquainted with him that year—during that year.

Q. About what time in the year? A. In the Spring or early Summer; I cannot fix the time.

Q. Did you, during that year, become acquainted with Mrs. Woodhull and her sister, Miss Claflin? A. I did.

Q. About what time did you form their acquaintance? A. A very short time before I had formed Mr. Tilton's acquaintance.

Q. Will you state the circumstances briefly under which you formed the acquaintance of Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is objected to, Sir, unless Mr. Tilton was connected with it.

Mr. Shearman—We don't propose anything except to show the mode in which the witness became acquainted, and I think it is due to the gentleman himself to give a brief explanation.

Mr. Beach—I object to it; that is all totally disconnected with Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Well, he became acquainted; that is the vital thing; now go on.

Mr. Shearman—What acquaintance had you with them, and how was it formed?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I don't see the materiality of that.

Mr. Everts—The degree of the acquaintance, if your Honor please, we have a right to show as the basis of what followed as substantive testimony—how long it continued and where it was, whether it was down on Broad-st., or whether it was up in their residence.

Mr. Beach—I think we are not to be led into an issue as to the manner in which this gentleman formed an acquaintance with Mrs. Woodhull, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It is merely introductory to something else, perhaps.

Mr. Beach—Well, perhaps it may not hurt us, and perhaps it may.

Mr. Fullerton—They can ask how long he was acquainted with her without asking the circumstances connected with the acquaintance.

Mr. Shearman—We want to show the extent of this gentleman's acquaintance.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Shearman—Answer that question.

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor allow that, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Yes, I think we will take it; see what it is.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness, who was holding a paper in his hand.] What are you referring to?

The Witness—Little memoranda that I have made of dates—of that date—of the date when I became acquainted with this—with Mrs. Moulton.

Mr. Shearman—With Mrs. Woodhull? A. Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Now, state the date, and what your acquaintance was, and how it was formed? A. On the evening of the 8th of June I was sent to their residence in Thirty-eighth-st. to make inquiries in regard to the brother—the death of their brother-in-law, one Dr. Sparr; I then introduced myself to them.

Q. And what was the nature of your acquaintance with them; was it for business purposes? A. Professional—interviewing them, if you please.

Q. In pursuit of your business as a journalist? A. Yes, Sir; for the newspaper.

Q. And under the direction of your employers? A. Under the direction of my employers.

THE INTIMACY BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND THE WOODHULLS.

Q. Did you visit them frequently during the next few months? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Where? A. Both at their residence and at their office.

Q. Where was their office? A. Their office, I think, was 44 Broad-st.

Q. New-York City? A. New-York City.

Q. And their residence was where? A. I cannot give the number; it was in Thirty-eighth-st., in New-York City.

Q. Where did you make Mr. Tilton's acquaintance, and when? A. I never knew Mrs. Tilton.

Q. No; Mr. Tilton? A. I became acquainted with him—I was first introduced to him by Mrs. Woodhull, at their office in Broad-st.

Q. State what passed between you and Mr. Tilton on that occasion? A. On that morning an interview with the Woodhull had—with Mrs. Woodhull—had appeared in The Sun.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Shearman—This is a mere incident of the narration of the conversation.

Mr. Beach—Well, he can state the conversation.

Judge Neilson—What passed between you and Mr. Tilton? A. In regard—we were talking of that interview when Mr. Tilton came into the office, and Mrs. Woodhull introduced him to me, and he also expressed—made some expressions in regard to that interview.

Mr. Shearman—To the published interview? A. To the published interview of that morning.

Q. Did you then, or soon after, have a conversation with Mr. Tilton, in which he spoke of the character of Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did have such a conversation with him, but I cannot say how soon after that; it was not a long while.

Q. Well, state what Mr. Tilton said on that subject. A. He spoke very highly of Mrs. Woodhull, rather eulogistic; I don't know whether he introduced the subject or I; I was feeling my way and very possibly he was feeling his way to a mutual understanding of her, what she was. He pronounced her, in his opinion, a most remarkable woman; I think he said a very superior woman, a woman that was greatly misunderstood; I think he said she was a very spirituelle woman; I cannot recall all the expressions.

Q. Did he say anything about her purity? A. I don't think he did, I don't think that—I don't recall that at this moment.

Q. Where was this conversation? This conversation—I won't say where it was—either in the Broad-st. office or walking from there up street.

Q. During that season, did you frequently visit Mrs. Woodhull's house or office, and meet Mr. Tilton there at this place?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that as a leading question.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we will withdraw that—not waste time.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you are wasting it.

Mr. Shearman—Did you meet Mr. Tilton frequently during that Summer and Fall of 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you meet him? A. I met him at the residence of Mrs. Woodhull, and at her office, and elsewhere.

Q. How often in a week do you think that, during that Summer, you went to Mrs. Woodhull's house in Thirty-eighth-st.?
A. Well, from two to three times a week.

Q. Did you usually go in the day-time or in the evening? A. Usually in the evening.

Q. How often do you think you met Mr. Tilton there on these occasions? A. I did not usually meet him—not perhaps more than once in a half or a dozen times when I was there.

Q. Did you frequently take lunch with Mrs. Woodhull in Broad-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Morris—One moment; what has that got to do with this case?

Mr. Shearman—We will see in a moment [To the witness.] Did you meet Mr. Tilton there on any of those occasions? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how often, compared with the number of occasions on which you took lunch with her, did he join?

Mr. Morris—Now, we object. What has that to do with this case, any branch of it? Does it tend to prove or disprove the charge of adultery? Or is it competent evidence upon the question of damages either? What earthly bearing has this upon the case, and all this testimony, what has it to do with the case? Mr. Tilton's opinion of this Woodhull—what has that to do with this case? What does that tend to prove? Certainly not the guilt or innocence of Mr. Beecher, nor is it of any weight whatever upon the question of damages. It is a mere waste of time, all this testimony of that character, the whole of it. Is there any evidence in this case, or any fact in this case, that makes his opinion of any more importance in reference to Mrs. Woodhull than in reference to any other lady in the land? What evidence is there in this case that makes his opinion of Mrs. Woodhull of any importance whatever? I submit there is not a particle, that it has no bearing whatever upon the question of damages, and certainly does not tend to prove or disprove the charge made against Mr. Beecher. How is it important? What earthly bearing has it upon either question in this case? I cannot see any connection. I would like to have it pointed out if there is any applicability whatever to this evidence.

Judge Neilson—I assume you will be brief, Mr. Shearman, and in that way you may go on. I am not competent, now, to pass upon the exact question presented.

Mr. Shearman—You will please answer that question as to how often you met Mr. Tilton at lunch with these ladies at their office.

Mr. Morris—Does your Honor hold that material?

Judge Neilson—Well, I cannot say; I am not competent, I say, to pass upon it now.

Mr. Shearman—Answer the question.

The Witness—I think he was quite generally there at lunch.

Q. During how long a period did this extend—these lunches?
A. During the entire of that Summer.

Q. Now, when you visited the residence of Mrs. Woodhull, where were you in the habit of spending your time? A. In the parlor.

Q. Were you, or were you not, in the habit of going up-stairs? A. I think I never was up-stairs but once.

Mr. Morris—Does your Honor hold that a proper question, proper evidence, in this case?

Judge Neilson—Oh, I think we will take this general evidence to see what it is. I don't see, as yet, that it amounts to anything.

Q. Did you ever see or hear Mr. Tilton up-stairs in that house when you were below? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did that happen more than once? A. I remember, several occasions, his speaking to me from up-stairs.

Q. What did he say, on these occasions, from up-stairs? A. I recall one occasion when he called to me from above and asked me to wait; that he would go with me.

Q. About what time of the day was that? A. That was rather late in the evening, possibly nearly midnight; on another occasion, I remember his calling to me and saying, "Don't go yet, I want to see you," or some similar expression; I don't know exactly; cannot repeat the words.

Q. What time of the night was that? A. Late in the evening.

Q. Was it past midnight, or near midnight? A. In the vicinity of midnight, I should think.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton and you leave the house together on any occasions after these calls? A. I cannot say, not in reference to these particular calls; we did leave the house on several occasions together.

Q. On these occasions, when he called to you from the head of the stairs to wait and he would go with you, did he then accompany you? A. I cannot answer as to that particular occasion.

Q. Do you remember whether you waited for him or not, on these occasions? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Do you remember, on any occasions, waiting for him until midnight or later, and then going over to Brooklyn together? A. I remember coming over to Brooklyn with him; and, undoubtedly, must have waited for him.

Q. Do you recollect any other occasions on which, before you were much acquainted with him, or at all, you and he went together to Brooklyn from the house, having left the house accidentally about the same time, but not recognizing him?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I think this thing is being carried too far. They are not only leading questions, but there are half a dozen of them incorporated in one.

Mr. Shearman—I was trying to save time.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you are very unfortunate in it.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we have not lost near as much time as the other side. [To the witness.] I ask you, then, whether you recollect any occasions on which you went with Mr. Tilton without your recognizing—that is, without your speaking to each other—from Mrs. Woodhull's house to Brooklyn? A. I remember two occasions before I was introduced to him, when we traveled to Brooklyn together; I cannot say that we traveled all the way from the house together.

Q. But he had been in the house?

Mr. Fullerton—How do you know?

The Witness—I had reason to know that he had been in the house.

Mr. Shearman—Had you both been in the house? A. It had been understood that he was in the house; I had not seen him in the house, possibly, that I can't say—

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that answer.

Mr. Shearman—Well, how did you learn that he was in the house? A. It had been a matter of conversation that he was in the house; that is all I know of his being there.

Mr. Beach—Will you be kind enough to wait a moment; I move to strike out that answer, that it had been understood that he had been in the house.

Mr. Evarts—If it didn't come from Mr. Tilton, it is not proper evidence.

Judge Neilson—Yes; it does not yet appear that it came from him; with that view it is stricken out.

FAMILIARITIES BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Do you recollect seeing Mr. Tilton at the house on any occasion or occasions when you left the house at a late hour, and he did not?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, that is a leading question, and I object to it.

Judge Neilson—We will take the answer.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, I came away and left him there.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor, please, it seems to me, considering this witness must have communicated with the other side what he knows about it voluntarily, that they ought not to put leading questions to him.

Judge Neilson—They ought not to.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman comes here with a memorandum in his hand prepared to testify to what he knows.

Mr. Shearman—[To Mr. Fullerton.] I suppose there is no objection to your seeing the memorandum.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the question, whether I have a right to see the memorandum. If your Honor will look at the question a moment, you will see what they have incorporated in it.

Judge Neilson—We will let that stand. Counsel ought not to put leading questions, and I presume he will not hereafter do so.

Mr. Morris—That is a violent presumption.

Q. How late was it when you left the house and left Mr. Tilton there? A. I cannot say how late—late in the evening.

Q. Cannot you say whether it was after nine o'clock or ten o'clock? A. Yes, Sir, it was after nine or ten, possibly eleven or twelve.

Q. Now, do you recollect any occasion on which Mr. Tilton and you had any conversation on the subject of getting up interviews for the newspapers? A. Yes, Sir, one.

Q. Where did that occur? A. At that residence.

Q. State what that conversation was? A. I had been preparing an interview for several evenings, intending to draw out from them who were supporting and sustaining—

Mr. Fullerton—No, no.

Q. Who were present when this conversation took place between you and Mr. Tilton? A. At the moment of the conversation Mr. Tilton was present; Mrs. Woodhull was present; Stephen Pearl Andrews and Mr. Blood; I don't think anybody else. Mr. Tilton had not been present during the entire preparation of this paper at this interview: he was called in.

Q. Who called him in? A. Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Well, what passed in Mr. Tilton's presence? At least, what did Mr. Tilton say first, if anything? A. I had asked a question as to Mr. Greeley's presence in the house—

Mr. Beach—When Mr. Tilton was present there?

The Witness—And Mrs. Woodhull said—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—In the presence of Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike it out.

Mr. Evarts—He was stating, if your Honor please, that Mr. Tilton was sent for. That is the occasion he came in.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out what he said in regard to his having asked a question in the absence of Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—That was the occasion, he says, on which Mr. Tilton was sent for.

Judge Neilson—He said Mr. Tilton was sent for, and, if he was present, he can give the conversation.

Q. When he came there was there any conversation between you and Mr. Tilton with regard to the preparation of this interview with him? A. There was a general conversation among all present.

Q. I don't ask what was said? A. But I cannot indicate any words or language.

Q. I don't ask it. A. There was a general conversation.

Q. With regard to the interview which you were then preparing to publish? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was an interview relating to Mrs. Woodhull?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; we object.

Judge Neilson—Ask him what was said.

Mr. Shearman—I want to avoid the necessity of going into this conversation.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman cannot jump to that conclusion without giving this conversation.

Judge Neilson—If it was a conversation in his presence he can give it, and you can interrogate him as to what it was.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton assist you in the preparing of that?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to. I submit, Sir, that it should be shown what was done on this occasion.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we waive that.

Q. Now, Mr. Cook, I pass to November, 1871, and ask you if you remember an interview between yourself, Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull, in November, 1871, just before the Steinway Hall meeting? Do you remember the occurrence; that is all I ask? A. No, Sir; no conversation with Mr. Tilton before the Steinway Hall meeting.

Q. I said an interview; I didn't ask about a conversation. A. There was an interview; yes, Sir.

Q. On that occasion did you visit Mrs. Woodhull and have a conversation with her? I don't ask what it was.

Mr. Morris—An interview with who?

Mr. Shearman—An interview with Mrs. Woodhull, at her office.

The Witness—I did.

Q. You had an interview?

Mr. Morris—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—It is preliminary to something else, I suppose.

The Witness—On the day of the Steinway Hall meeting.

Q. At or soon after the close of that conversation did you see Mr. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton do— Where did you see Mr. Tilton? A. At Mrs. Woodhull's office.

Q. You had not left the house after the conversation with Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull do? A. Mr. Tilton came into the office, and got out of a carriage, I think, at the office door and came in, and Mrs. Woodhull prepared herself and went out with him; they both drove away in a carriage.

Q. About what hour in the day was this? A. It was not far from one o'clock; I should say, a little after one in the afternoon.

Q. Did you, on the next day after the Steinway Hall meeting, have another interview with Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did.

Q. When? A. At the same place.

Q. At her office in Broad-st? A. At her office.

Q. Did you then have a conversation with Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did.

Q. Now, I ask simply this question, whether that conversation related to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—At this occurrence was Mr. Tilton present?

Mr. Shearman—I propose to show, by means of another subsequent conversation, that Mr. Tilton was connected with it. I don't want to ask another single question as to that conversation.

Mr. Beach—It don't make any difference; they cannot give the substance of the conversation without giving what was said.

Mr. Evarts—Are we not permitted to show the occurrence of a single fact, which is in itself immaterial, unless it is afterwards connected by other evidence, and which, of course, is harmless as it stands? It does not impute injurious consequences, but the fact that there was a conversation, and that Mr. Beecher was the subject of it, becomes competent just as if it was seeing a horse in the street, or anything of that kind, which is quite immaterial until we connect the horse with some relation of the accused.

Judge Neilson—Do you think, in this instance, you could go directly to the interview with Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Evarts—This witness don't speak as to the interview with Mr. Tilton, perhaps.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can give it unless he does.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor sees the difficulty, in the production of evidence, that we must take from witnesses what they know about a connected chain of facts at the time that we have them under examination, and of course it is proper that no rule of evidence shall be transgressed, as by showing that conversation under a rule which is sometimes applied to connect the defendant or the party to be implicated, but is to be shown hereafter. But we don't do that: we don't ask to know by this witness that he had an interview and the fact that the conversation between him and Mrs. Woodhull was about Beecher—that subject.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can show it.

Mr. Evarts—Of course it is quite material if it is left there.

Judge Neilson—It might be the subject of speculation, which I think ought not to be opened.

Mr. Shearman—I understand your Honor to rule it out.

THE SCANDAL DOCUMENTS SHOWN BY MR. TILTON TO MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Did you soon after that have an interview with Mrs. Woodhull at which Mr. Tilton was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was the name of Mr. Beecher brought in at that interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you on that occasion refer in conversation, in the presence of Mr. Tilton, to any other conversations you had with Mrs. Woodhull on that same subject.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to as leading, and as asking for a conclusion. We may as well have the conversation.

Judge Neilson—You will have to have it, doubtless.

Mr. Beach—I submit it is not admissible for them to ask those leading questions calling for the result of what was said at this interview.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take this answer as preliminary.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Q. In this conversation which you had in the presence of Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton were any previous conversations which you had with Mrs. Woodhull concerning Mr. Beecher referred to? A. They were continuations of—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Morris—Counsel averred a moment ago they didn't expect to make that material by this witness.

Mr. Evarts—I didn't know anything about that.

Judge Neilson—He can answer that question, yes or no.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, does not the hesitation of the witness demonstrate the necessity of having what was said at that time? Is he at liberty to say, as a conclusion from the conversation, that a previous subject matter or conversation was referred to.

Judge Neilson—It is merely introductory in what may follow.

Mr. Beach—Introductory, if your Honor please. They are now attempting to get a portion of the conversation. They asked this witness whether in that conversation, where they have the parties together, there was any reference made to a previous conversation. Now, I submit to your Honor, that can be ascertained only by taking what transpired at the interview where they have got them together.

Judge Neilson—That is true, and yet it is a proper question. You often ask whether an interview was had, and whether at that interview a pretended occurrence was referred to, and then ask for the conversation.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, we take it usually without objection, as we took it in this instance, and especially admonished somewhat by the hesitation of the witness in answering the question which was asked, it is not competent to take his conclusion on the subject; we should have the language by which the reference was made.

Judge Neilson—He may answer, and unless he gives the language it will be stricken out.

Mr. Shearman—The witness knows there were many conversations, and therefore his hesitation was natural.

Mr. Morris—Counsel a moment ago averred they didn't expect to make that material by this witness.

Mr. Evarts—Do you think it is right to state that again, when I apologized to you and to the Court and to the public for that Mr. Morris—I know you did, and I accepted it.

Judge Neilson—Let the stenographer repeat the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows;

In this conversation which you had in the presence of Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton were any previous conversations which you had with Mrs. Woodhull concerning Mr. Beecher referred to?

A. I cannot swear there was any direct reference to the former conversations.

Q. State the conversation which took place when Mr. Tilton was present. A. Do you want the words?

Mr. Shearman—The substance of the words.

Judge Neilson—The words as near as you can give them.

Mr. Shearman—The substance of them as near as you can recollect them.

The Witness—It would be pretty difficult for me to separate a series of conversations, and tell what occurred in each instance. They are all on one subject.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] The inquiry was what was said on this occasion, and you give the words as far as you can, and the substance of them when you cannot give the words.

Mr. Beach—I hope the gentleman will be instructed to discriminate between the conversations.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Confine yourself to this conversation. A. Mrs. Woodhull urged me to write up the Beecher scandal. She said: "Tom, why don't you take hold of this Beecher scandal?" I think that was substantially the language. I said to her then—

Mr. Shearman—A little louder, Mr. Cook. A. I said to her that if I should attempt to write up such a story on third parties' representation, I should involve my paper in a flood of libel suits; that no newspaper man would undertake such a job. She replied that it was not necessary to take third parties' statements. She says: "Theodore has all the letters and documents in the case. I have seen them, and he will show them to you." I then replied The Sun didn't want such matter, and would not use it under any circumstances, and there was no use of my undertaking the job. She replied that it was the greatest sensation of the age; that it would take the roof off Plymouth Church and shake Brooklyn Heights to its foundation; it would revolutionize modern society; that it was a sensation that any paper would be glad to get hold of; that I would have no trouble in finding a market for it. I replied that I was not in the habit of hawking my material around the streets, and I didn't care to take hold of this. I don't know that I can get more definitely at the conversation than that.

Q. I understand this to have taken place about the last of November, 1871?

Mr. Fullerton—No; he does not state yet when it took place.

The Witness—I cannot fix the date of it, excepting with reference to that Steinway Hall meeting.

Mr. Beach—What was the last answer?

Mr. Shearman—Except with reference to the Steinway Hall meeting.

The Witness—Except with reference to the Steinway Hall meeting is the only way I can fix any date. It was some days after that meeting.

Q. And near that period?

Mr. Fullerton—He does not state that.

Q. Do you not say it was some days after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. Some days; within a week after, I should say.

Q. About a week. Do you remember any more of that conversation? A. I think that is the substance.

Q. Was anything further said on this subject on any subsequent occasion in Mr. Tilton's presence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. More than once? A. Yes, Sir; I think after that occasion it was a matter—

Mr. Beach—Wait.

The Witness—of frequent conversation.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Q. It was a matter of frequent conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was anything said in the presence of Mr. Tilton, or by Mr. Tilton, about your writing up this story for any other paper? A. I think there was.

Q. For what paper? A. When I had refused to write it up for the general market, they wanted me to write it up for the Woodhull and Claflin paper.

Q. Who do you mean by "they." A. I say "they" in a general way, because after this conversation—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

The Witness—the two usually—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson. [To the witness.] He does not wish you to give the reasons.

Mr. Morris—We move to have that answer struck out.

Q. Do you mean by "they" to include Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—I object to that mode of inquiry.

Mr. Morris—I understood your Honor struck out that inquiry.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir. [To Mr. Shearman.] If you want him to give the conversation with Mr. Tilton call his attention to the fact.

Mr. Evarts—The witness used the word "they," and we have a right to his explanation of that word.

Judge Neilson—That expression is struck out. Proceed, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Evarts—That is not struck out.

Mr. Morris—Yes, it is.

Judge Neilson—The general speculative statement is unnecessary.

Mr. Evarts—I beg your Honor's pardon, it is only a question of fact as to what the answer was. This answer is made in regard to an interview, or interviews, at which Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull and this witness were present. Now, he has made an answer that after he had refused to write it up for his paper they wanted him to write it up—that is, after he had refused to write it up for the market, they wanted him to write it up for the Woodhull and Claflin paper. That answer was taken without objection, and there it stands.

Mr. Beach—No, it was objected to, and struck out on our motion.

Mr. Evarts—I do not so understand it.

Judge Neilson—It is unnecessary.

Mr. Evarts—Then we ask him what he meant by "they." Then this question arose.

Judge Neilson—That is an indirect way of getting at it; get at it direct.

Mr. Evarts—My point is, that it was to that question the objection was made, what was meant by "they," though not so much to the question as to the manner in which he was proceeding to answer it. I have not understood that the question and the answer preceding were stricken out.

Mr. Beach—I objected to it, and Mr. Morris asked to have it struck out.

Mr. Evarts—I don't understand that that question and answer have been stricken out, or that any motion has been made to strike them out. The stenographer will correct us.

Mr. Beach—I understand Mr. Morris's motion to relate to that question.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—And I object to it. It is stating the mere conclusion of the witness, without referring to the parties named by the pronoun "they," and it is objectionable, I submit to your Honor, in every sense, for him to make a general statement of that character, which may include various persons, independent of Mr. Tilton, and especially to tell what was a conclusion which he derived from a conversation, even if Mr. Tilton was present. We are entitled to have it more formally and directly.

Judge Neilson—It will arrive at the same result.

Mr. Evarts—I am speaking simply to the question of this record. I have heard no motion to strike out that question and answer, and no decision. If it is the fault of attention, of course I will be corrected by your Honor, and if your Honor should decide that there has been a motion made to strike out, and that it has been granted, I will take an exception.

Judge Neilson—My own view, and I think it must be yours, is that the statement by Mrs. Woodhull that she wished him to write it up for another paper ought not to be received.

Mr. Evarts—In the presence of Mr. Tilton. The fact that it was an interview at which Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were present—

Judge Neilson—Don't you think Mr. Shearman could go to such an interview, if he wanted?

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will find it on the record.

Mr. Evarts—I am addressing myself to the question whether such a motion has been made.

Judge Neilson—I think such a motion has been made.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Shearman, proceed directly to what you want to prove.

MR. COOK URGED TO WRITE UP THE SCANDAL.

Mr. Shearman—I thought I was doing so, if your Honor please. [To the witness]: Did you not say, in answer to my previous question, that this proposition that you should write up this story for The Woodhull and Claflin Weekly was made in the presence of Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—The record will show.

Q. Was the proposition—

Judge Neilson—[Interrupting]: That will be leading before you get the question. Was there any interview at which Mr. Tilton was present, and then give the conversation.

Mr. Shearman—I am very sure the record shows that.

Mr. Evarts—That has been struck out.

Mr. Shearman—Then five questions must have been struck out to which no objection has been made.

Q. State what, if anything, occurred in the presence of Mr. Tilton between you and Mrs. Woodhull with reference to this subject of writing up this story.

Judge Neilson—That is proper. [To the witness]: Go on, Sir.

The Witness—After my—

Mr. Shearman—After the first conversation.

Judge Neilson—Yes, go on.

The Witness—I cannot separate particular conversations after that first interview. When the ice seemed to have been broken there were—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—Frequent interviews.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, I say.

Judge Neilson—[To the Witness]: He objects to the ice. The counsel wants you to give the conversation.

Q. At any of these conversations, or interviews, was Mr. Tilton present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How often? A. My memory of it is that it was spoken of every time we got together; I cannot—

Q. Was that at this lunch? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, state what was said on this subject at any of those interviews when Mr. Tilton was present?

Mr. Beach—I submit that we cannot take, under one question, and at one time, what was said at several interviews. The attention of the witness must be confined to some one occasion.

Mr. Shearman—I do not see why that should be so.

Mr. Beach—Well, I can.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Cook, you mentioned an interview when the writing of it up for The Sun was spoken of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember any other interview, when Mr. Tilton was present, when the writing of it up for any other paper was spoken of? A. I remember there were other interviews, but I don't remember any other.

Q. Now, the counsel wishes you to state what was said on any such interview about writing it up for any other paper? A. I was asked and urged to write it up for Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly.

Mr. Evarts—By whom?

Mr. Shearman—By whom?

The Witness—I think I was asked by both Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton; if not by both of them, at least when they were both present.

Q. Did that occur more than once? A. Several times.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton make any proposition to you for your employment by him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State what was the nature of that proposition? State what occurred about it? A. Following out these our interviews—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—He asks you what was said. State what was said, or the substance of what was said, by Mr. Tilton? A. Mr. Tilton proposed to me to take a position jointly on The Golden Age and on The Woodhull and Claflin Weekly.

Q. How was your salary to be paid? A. To be divided between the two.

Q. What answer did you make? A. I think I told him I would be very glad to take a position on The Golden Age, but that I didn't care to link my reputation with The Woodhull and Claflin Weekly.

Q. Was there anything said as to what you were to do—what services you were to render for the two papers? Yes, Sir; I was to write local sensations.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

PICTURES OF MRS. WOODHULL IN COURT.

Q. Will you identify these photographs, if you please; say who they are portraits of? [Handing witness three photographs.] A. That is Mrs. Woodhull; and that also.

Q. Whose is this? A. That is Miss Claflin.

Q. Miss Tennie C. Claflin? A. Yes, Sir.

[The three photographs marked for identification Exhibit D 115, 116 and 117 respectively.]

Mr. Beach—Mr. Shearman, let us see those.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir, [handing photographs to Mr. Beach].

Mr. Evarts—They are marked for identification, Mr. Beach.

Mr. Beach—Well, they can be seen, I suppose.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! yes, you can see them.

Mr. Beach—And the jury want to see them. I have no objection to their looking at them. They are good looking pictures.

Mr. Evarts—We have not offered them in evidence yet; they are only marked for identification.

Mr. Beach—I understand it, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—We shall object to them on the ground that they are parole evidence. Introduce the originals. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—Are they by Sarony, Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Shearman—No, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. COOK.

By Mr. Fullerton—Do you know how long Mr. Sherman has had these photographs, Mr. Cook? [Laughter.] A. I do not; I never seen them before, Sir.

Q. You don't know where he got them? A. I do not.

SOME BIOGRAPHY.

Q. Where is your present residence? A. Detroit.

Q. How long have you resided there? A. Since last May.

Q. And what is your present occupation? A. Journalist.

Q. What journal are you connected with? A. I bought a journal in Detroit last Spring and am winding it up.

Q. Well, couldn't you answer my question? A. I am winding up that newspaper.

Q. How? A. I am winding up a newspaper business.

Q. You are winding up a newspaper? [Laughter.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could you tell what newspaper you are winding up? A. The Detroit Union.

Q. Well, when did you buy it? A. Last May—June; June, Sir.

Q. How? A. Last June.

Q. Well, was it in a condition to be wound up when you got it? A. I think it was; yes, Sir.

Q. And did you buy it for the purpose of winding it up? [Laughter.] A. No, Sir; I discovered that fact after I bought it?

Q. Well, did the newspaper wind anybody up before you got it? A. I think it wound up several.

Q. Who was connected with it before that time? A. Mr. John Atkinson was the principal proprietor.

Q. Is that a political or religious paper? A. It is a political paper.

Q. Before you went to Detroit to wind up that paper, where did you reside? A. In Brooklyn.

Mr. Evarts—He didn't say he went there to wind up, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, but he did go there to wind it up.

Mr. Evarts—He didn't say he went there to wind it up. That was your question; he told you simply that he did.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is the first point they have made on the other side, and we will acknowledge it.

Mr. Evarts—The witness must be treated fairly.

Mr. Beach—The witness did not say that he was treated unfairly.

Mr. Evarts—I do. He does not know his rights, perhaps, as well as I do.

Judge Neilson—Well, leave those words out of the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I have no occasion to put it again, Sir, so I won't disturb it.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—When did you leave Brooklyn to go to Detroit?
A. In the latter part of May.

Q. Last May? A. The latter part of May.

Q. Well, did you go to Detroit with any fixed object? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was it? A. I went to Detroit en route for Lake Superior.

Q. En route for Lake Superior? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then you did not contemplate stopping at Detroit permanently? A. I did not.

Q. That was accidental? A. That was accidental.

Q. And were you connected with any paper when you left Brooklyn to go to Lake Superior? A. Yes, Sir; I think I was connected with The Sun.

Q. At that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you dissolve your connection with The Sun? A. When I left Brooklyn.

Q. Before you left Brooklyn? A. When I left Brooklyn.

Q. Well, was it before you left Brooklyn? A. Will you allow me to explain that?

Q. I will allow you to answer my question, Mr. Cook; that is your privilege. A. When I left Brooklyn I dissolved my connection with The Sun.

Q. And then when you started en route for Lake Superior, you had no connection with any newspaper? A. No, Sir.

Q. Under what circumstances did you dissolve your connection with The Sun? A. I was not under a salary with The Sun, Sir.

Q. I didn't ask you that. A. I was merely to withdraw and go away at any time.

Q. I didn't ask you that. What was your connection with The Sun? A. I was a writer.

Q. Well, how were you paid, if you had not a salary? A. I was paid for the work that I did.

Q. By the piece? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whenever you got up a piece of news you sold it to The Sun; was that it? A. Yes, Sir; precisely.

Q. Then you had no connection with The Sun other than a gatherer of news and a vendor of news to that paper? A. Excepting for about three months, I never had a salary on The Sun. One period of three months I did have a salary on it.

Q. What three months were they? A. Those were the three months immediately preceding—immediately succeeding Mr. Cummings's retirement from The Sun, when I was put in charge of the paper as managing editor.

Q. During those three months? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when were they? A. I cannot fix the date.

Q. Can you fix the year? A. No, I cannot fix the year; I think it was about two years ago. It followed immediately after Christmas. I took hold, I think, on Christmas Eve, of the paper.

Q. Well, these articles that you wrote up—were they sensational articles? A. Generally.

Q. You went about to get up news, did you? A. Well, I usually went on assignment.

Q. Did they always assign you where you should go? A. Yes, usually; sometimes I volunteered,

Q. Well, were you discharged from The Sun? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was not a complaint made that you wrote articles that had no foundation, and were therefore discharged? A. No, Sir; never.

Q. Wasn't the proprietor of The Sun prosecuted for libel in consequence of articles that you wrote, ever? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never? A. Never.

Q. And you were not called to account or taken to task for writing such articles? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, whilst you were connected with The Sun, did you write for other papers? A. Occasionally,

Q. These sensational articles? A. Not always sensational.

Q. Well, were you under any obligations to vend your articles or offer them to The Sun in the first instance? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were at liberty to sell them then to whomsoever you pleased, were you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. Precisely so.

Q. And your connection with any other paper was the same as it was with The Sun? A. Yes, Sir; except that I kept a desk at The Sun office and made that my headquarters.

Q. Had the privilege of writing there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you first go to Detroit to live? A. I first went to Detroit to live in 1850.

Q. And how long did you reside there then? A. Between ten and eleven years.

Q. And what was your occupation there then? A. When I first went to Detroit I commenced keeping school.

Q. How long did you teach school? A. I taught school the better part of two years, I think.

Q. Then what did you go at? A. Then I began book-selling.

Q. How long were you engaged in that business? A. I was selling books until 1855 or 1856—1856; some time in 1858.

Q. An itinerant bookseller? A. No, Sir.

Q. Having a store there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In 1856 you gave up that business? A. I failed.

Q. You failed in that business. You made an assignment, did you not? A. I did.

Q. What other business did you go at? A. I then went into the newspaper business.

Q. What newspaper were you connected with there? A. With The Detroit Free Press.

Q. How long were you connected with The Detroit Free Press? A. Until the proprietors sold it and bought The Chicago Times.

Q. A little louder, Mr. Cook, a little louder. A. I think it was in 1861.

Q. Did you wind that up? A. Not exactly.

Q. Not exactly. How near did you come to it? A. We came so near that we sold it out.

Q. Sold it out? A. I had no personal—no proprietary interest in the paper. It was sold out and I went with the proprietor to another paper.

Q. Where? A. The Chicago Times.

Q. And how long were you engaged there? A. I cannot say; several months; until the war broke out.

Q. Then where did you go? A. Then I went distinctly advised ploy of The New-York Herald.

Q. In New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. New-York City? A. No, Sir, not in the city; as an army correspondent.

Q. And how long did you fill that place? A. Throughout the war.

Q. And when the war was over, what did you go at? A. I remained in the employ of The Herald.

Q. How long? A. I cannot say how long; several years.

Q. Well, how long, about how long? A. Perhaps three or four years.

Q. And when did you quit their employment? A. I quit their employment at the time of the agitation of the impeachment of President Johnson.

Q. And where did you go then? A. Then I took employment under the Government.

Q. In what capacity? A. As a special agent, first of the Post-Office Department, and afterwards of the Treasury Department.

Q. How long were you special agent of the Post-Office Department? A. I was special agent of the Post-Office Department month.

Q. And of the Treasury Department, how long were you connected with that? A. I think very nearly a year or quite a year.

Q. What duty devolved upon you as special agent? A.
Investigating whisky frauds and other matters of that

Q. When you ceased that business, what did you go at?

A. A short time connected with the Custom-House in New-York, and then went into the employ of The Sun.

Q. For a short time I was connected with the Custom-House in New-York.

Q. In what capacity? A. As an inspector.

Q. As an inspector of what? A. Of customs.

Q. How long were you engaged there? A. Not many months.

Q. About how long? A. I cannot say; four or five months, possibly, I don't think so long as that; perhaps four.

Q. Were you removed? A. I was removed.

Q. After you were removed from the Custom-House, where did you go? A. Then I went into the employ of The Sun.

Q. How? A. Then I went into the employ of The Sun.

Q. And you remained there until you went to— A. To Detroit.

Q. To Detroit, as you have spoken of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, to whom did you first communicate what you have testified to here? A. I cannot say.

Q. How? A. I have communicated it to various people.

A WITNESS'S EXPENSES.

Q. Did you correspond with anybody connected with this case? A. Have I corresponded?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I have.

Q. With whom? A. With Mr. Shearman.

Q. And when did you commence that correspondence? A. I think it was some time last Summer.

Q. About what time? A. I cannot say.

Q. Well, with reference to the investigation that was going on, what time was it? A. I cannot say.

Q. Was it before or after the Plymouth Church Committee made their report? A. I think it was before.

Q. Before? A. I am not positive on that point.

Q. How? A. I am not positive on that point, but I think it was before.

Q. What induced you— What did you see, if anything, in print—what was it induced you to write to Mr. Shearman? A.
The point of my letter to Mr. Shearman—

Q. No, no; what did you see in print that induced you to write to Mr. Shearman? A. A statement by Mr. Tilton.

Q. How? A. A statement by Mr. Tilton.

Q. You saw his statement, and then you wrote to Mr. Shearman? A. I think that was the time.

Q. How many letters did you write to Mr. Shearman? A. I wrote one.

Q. Not more than one? A. Not more than one.

Q. Did you have a personal interview with Mr. Shearman?
A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never? A. No, Sir; until this trial commenced.

Q. Well? A. I did here, after this trial commenced.

Q. Did you come on from Detroit to attend this trial? A. I did.

Q. At whose solicitation? A. At Mr. Shearman's.

Q. And when did you come on? A. I came on in—I think the second week of the trial.

Q. Well, where have you been since? A. I have been in Detroit.

Q. In Detroit since? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many times have you been back and forth? A.
Once.

Q. But once? A. But once.

Q. And how long were you gone from Brooklyn when you went to Detroit? A. I remained here a week and went back, and got here last Sunday.

Q. Last Sunday. Well, have you received any compensation?
A. I have not. I have received remuneration for my expenses.

Q. How much have you received? A. I think my expenses before down here were a little over $100. They gave me $100.

Q. They gave you $100? A. It didn't quite pay it.

Q. That included your fare down? A. That included my fare down and remaining here, and back.

Q. How long did you remain here? A. About a week.

Q. Did your expenses amount to $100? A. Yes, Sir; a little more.

Q. Where did you stay during the week? A. At the Metropolitan Hotel.

Q. How much is it a day there? A. I think their rate was $4 50 a day.

Q. That would not make $100, would it? A. Not quite.

Q. No. Well, how much would it make? A. It would make a portion of the $100.

Q. Oh, speak out, Mr. Cook, speak out. A. You want my hotel bill?

Q. I want you to tell me how much your bill at the hotel before you received the $100? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. About how much? A. Probably in the neighborhood of $30, I don't know.

Q. And your fare down here was what? A. My fare down here was—the attendant expenses of it—was about $25.

Q. Attendant expenses; what do you mean by attendant expenses? A. I mean sleeping-car berth and meals en route.

Q. Very well, that makes a good deal less than $100. What makes up the $100? A. I cannot say.

Q. How? A. There were little incidental expenses around waiting here.

Q. What were they? A. I cannot tell.

Q. Cannot tell me? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you told me that your bill amounted to a little more than $100? A. Yes, Sir; I mean by that, Sir, that I spent more than $100 on that trip down here, and I got $100—an even $100.

Q. You spent more than $100 on the trip down here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you tell us how you did so? A. I have told you the general items.

Q. Do you mean exclusive of board at the Metropolitan Hotel? A. I mean my general expenses here.

Q. You have stated, Mr. Cook, that you have spent $100 on your trip down here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you whether that was exclusive of your hotel bill? A. Including that?

Q. Including that. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was not a part of your trip expense down here, was it? A. Certainly.

Mr. EVARTS—That depends upon what you call a trip.

Mr. Fullerton—No; it depends upon what he calls a trip.

Mr. EVARTS—Exactly; he told you—

Mr. Fullerton—I know what he told me.

Mr. EVARTS—He told you that $100 included his coming down and staying here and going back.

Mr. Fullerton—Does the gentleman object to the evidence? That is his statement—that it was $100.

Mr. EVARTS—That is the trip.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; it would have been a trip of the witness, if you hadn't interfered, on the stand, instead of from Detroit down here. Now, we will see, with the aid that he has received—we will see how it will come out.

Mr. PRYOR—It is after one o'clock.

Mr. Fullerton—Before we adjourn I want to know what the $100 was given to you for. A. It was given to me for my expenses.

Q. Without reference to what you had expended? A. It was given to me in two items. When I left Detroit I drew for $50; they had asked me if they would send it to me, and I said that I would draw for it.

Q. Never mind what it was; you drew then $50? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long had you been here before you drew $50 again? A. When I got ready to go back, and got excused

Q. Well, were you in Detroit?

Q. Was not went to Mr. Shearman's partner and asked for and no get home again.

Q. How long had you been here when you did that? A. Very nearly a week, or about a week.

Q. Can't you tell me exactly? A. No; I cannot.

Q. Can't tell me how long you had been here then? A. I cannot any more definitely than that; very nearly or about a week.

Q. You cannot tell when you left Detroit, can you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You cannot tell when you returned? A. No, Sir.

Q. About a week. Did the newspaper wind itself up during your absence from Detroit? [Laughter.] A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not? A. The newspaper had been discontinued before that—many months.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Thomas M. Cook was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Cook, have you received no more than $100 since you were in correspondence with Mr. Shearman? A. Yes, Sir; I drew for another $50, to come down on this trip.

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir; I drew for $50 again, to come here, now.

Q. That makes $150? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I understood you to say, before the recess, that you had received but $100. A. You misunderstood me; I said I received $100 for that trip, that first trip; on the first trip I received $100.

Q. That squared the account, then, up to that time, did it? A. That was all that I had asked for.

Q. Did you render a bill? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you received $50 when you came down the second time? A. I drew for $50.

Q. Any arrangement that you should draw? A. No, Sir; I was asked if I—

Q. Never mind. You did draw for $50? A. I did draw for $50.

Q. And when did you come down the last time? A. I left Detroit a week ago last Wednesday.

Q. Been here ever since? A. No, Sir; I reached here last Sunday morning. If you will allow me to explain—I was detained by an affliction, the loss of my sister.

Q. No; I don't care about an explanation. Were you not mistaken in saying that The Sun didn't get involved in a libel suit in consequence of anything that you wrote? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you not write what was known as the McCue libel? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you no connection with it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you furnish the material? A. I edited the entire matter; directed it; wrote the introduction and wrote the principal parts.

Q. You wrote the principal part of the libel? A. Yes, Sir—no, Sir.

Q. What was termed the libel? A. No, Sir; the libel, Sir, was in the heading; not in the body of the article; I didn't write the heading—the body of the article. We were distinctly advised it was not libelous, and the Grand Jury so decided.

Q. Never mind; don't get before the Grand Jury too quick. You say that none of that article was claimed to be libelous except the heading? A. Yes, Sir; that is as I understand it, Sir; nothing beyond that; I was so advised.

Q. You never heard that any of the article itself was claimed to be libelous? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was The Sun indicted? A. The Sun was indicted.

Q. Exclusively on the heading, was it? A. That is as I understood it.

Q. You never heard that it was for anything contained in the article? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, was not your leaving of The Sun's employ, or leaving the position which you occupied with reference to The Sun, in consequence of the writing of that article? A. No; not in any way at all.

Q. Have nothing to do with it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, will you tell me, Mr. Cook, when you first saw Mrs. Woodhull? A. Will you allow me to refer to a scrap of paper I have in my pocket?

Q. Oh, certainly; and when you have referred to it, you may give it to me to refer to. A. Certainly. [Referring to paper.] The first time I saw her to speak to her—I presume you mean that?

Q. Yes. A. It was on the evening of June 8th, 1871.

Q. When did you make that memorandum? A. I made this memorandum on Sunday.

Q. Had you anything to assist your memory? A. Yes, Sir; the files of the—

Q. No, no — A. Of The New-York Sun.

Q. [Mr. Fullerton takes the memorandum.] And where was that first interview? A. At her residence in Thirty-eighth-st., New-York.

Q. Did you know Theodore Tilton at that time? A. I did not, excepting by sight and by repute.

Q. And how many times did you visit Mrs. Woodhull's residence before you became acquainted with Theodore Tilton? A. It might have been a half a dozen times; six or eight times possibly.

Q. And, when was it that you became acquainted with him? A. I became acquainted with him immediately after the second interview that I printed, with them.

Q. Now that is just as far from what I want as you could possibly put it. I don't know anything about this second interview; I want the date as near as you can give it? A. If you will allow me that memorandum, I will tell you when that occurred. [Memorandum here handed to the witness.] I was introduced to Mr. Tilton a day or two after June 23d, 1873—1871.

Q. Where was that introduction? A. At the office of Mrs. Moulton—of Mrs. Woodhull, 44 Broad-st.

Q. And how did you get at that date? A. By a second interview that I had with them.

Q. You got at that date by a second interview that you had with them? A. Yes, Sir; the second interview that I had with Mrs. Moulton—Mrs. Woodhull; after the publication of that second interview, I was introduced to Mr. Tilton at their office.

Q. Who introduced you? A. Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. What was your object in going to Mrs. Woodhull's the first time? A. To ascertain some particulars in regard to the death of her brother-in-law, Dr. Sparr.

Q. Did you go there more than once on that business? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, what did you go there the other times for? A. I went there, following that, at the request of the proprietors and managers of our paper to follow up that intimacy for a purpose—that acquaintance for a purpose.

Q. Which of the proprietors requested you to go there? A. I think Mr. Dana.

Q. Are you quite sure upon that subject? A. I am quite sure that he did; and also Mr. Cummings, the managing editor.

Q. Mr. who? A. Mr. Cummings, the then managing editor.

Q. They both requested you to go there? A. I am quite sure they did; yes, Sir.

Q. Are you quite certain about it? A. I am certain that one or the other instructed me to, and that the other assented and urged it.

Q. And you went in consequence of those instructions and that urging? A. Yes, Sir; I usually received my instructions from Mr. Cummings.

Q. And you continued to visit there, as I understand you, until you were introduced to Mr. Tilton at Mrs. Woodhull's office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you go to Mrs. Woodhull's office for? A. On the same general business.

Q. Did you write any articles with reference to your visits? A. Yes.

Q. For The Sun? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many? A. Well, Sir, I wrote some five or six, as you will see on that memorandum—general articles, and other short paragraphs, that are not there.

Q. What time in the day was it when you were introduced to Mr. Tilton at Woodhull's office? A. I should say it was in the middle of the day; that was the usual time that I went there.

Q. How long was Mr. Tilton there when that introduction occurred? A. That I cannot say; half an hour, possibly, or longer; I don't remember. He came in, I know, while I was there.

Q. Now, how often, did I understand you to say, you saw Mr. Tilton at Woodhull's office? A. At Woodhull's office?

Q. Yes. A. I can't say; it was very frequent; nearly—almost daily.

Q. Almost daily? A. Almost daily.

Q. For how long a time? A. Almost daily throughout that Summer and the early Fall.

Q. You saw him there first, I think you say, on the 23d of June? A. If that is the date that I mentioned, yes, Sir. No; that is not the first time that I saw him there, excuse me.

Q. You were introduced to him? A. That is when I was introduced to him. I had seen him there before I was introduced to him.

Q. How many times had you seen him there before you were introduced? A. That I cannot say; several times, a number of times.

THE LUNCHES AT THE WOODHULLS.

Q. And did those frequent visits that you speak of occur immediately after the introduction? A. Following right along, yes, Sir.

Q. For how long a period of time? A. I think away up to the time of the Steinway Hall meeting.

Q. Which was when? A. I don't know the date of it.

Q. In the Fall, was it not? A. In the Fall; yes, Sir, in the early Fall.

Q. Can you tell by referring to your memorandum? A. No, Sir, I have not a memorandum there of the Steinway Hall meeting.

Q. As near as you can recollect, when was it? A. It was some time in the Fall of that year.

Q. Just before the election, was it not? A. I cannot say as to that.

Q. Well, whenever it was? A. Well, Sir; at that time I followed it up.

Q. Whenever it was, the visits to Woodhull's office by yourself, when you met Mr. Tilton, was almost daily after the 23d of June, almost up to the time of the Steinway Hall meeting? A. Almost daily; I will not say every day.

Q. You will except Sundays, I suppose? A. It was an ordinary occurrence to meet him.

Q. You went there daily? A. Nearly so.

Q. Following out these instructions of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was necessary that you should go, I suppose? A. I don't know that it was necessary—it was necessary in the pursuit of my profession; yes, Sir.

Q. How many times did you lunch there? A. I used to lunch quite frequently there—not every day.

Q. About how often? A. Two or three times a week.

Q. Not oftener than that? A. Sometimes I declined to lunch if I had lunched before I went there, and sometimes I was too late for lunch.

Q. If you had your lunch, or it was too late, you were generous enough to decline it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you sure you met Mr. Tilton there almost daily after the 22d of June? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he seem to be doing there? A. Well, I cannot say; conversing with the ladies usually; more frequently he would go into the inner room, and the door would sometimes be closed, and they would be in private consultation; I considered him there—

Q. I beg your pardon, Mr. Cook, I didn't ask what you considered him in there for.

Mr. Evans—You asked him what he was doing.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, that is not giving him the privilege of telling what he considered, however.

Q. In private consultation with them? A. Sometimes.

Q. In the back room? A. In the back room.

Q. Were you there? A. Not always; as a general thing I was not in the back room when they were in private consultation.

Q. The door was closed? A. The door was closed.

Q. Do you know who else was in there? A. Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Do you know who else was in there besides Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton? A. Miss Claflin would go out and in, and Colonel Blood sometimes went in. I don't know that I could speak of anybody else.

Q. Did you know whether there was anybody else there, or not? A. Oh, there was always a great many people there; that is, a great many, I say. There were always other people there.

Q. In the back room? A. Coming and going.

Q. In the back room? A. I don't say in the back room, I say in their general range of offices.

Q. I am talking about the back room. A. Sometimes I was in the back room.

Q. I am talking about the occasions when you were not in there? A. Of course when their door was closed I don't know who was in there.

Q. One moment. Now, referring to occasions when Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were in the back room, and you were not there. I ask you who else was in there that you know of? A. I answered that question, that Miss Claflin would pass out and in; Colonel Blood might have passed in. I don't know who might have been in there—who was in there.

Q. You don't know who else was in there? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know but there may have been a dozen in there? A. Yes; I don't know—

Q. Do not? A. I do know in this way, that there was not a dozen people in the office.

Q. How? A. Only as I might know that there was not a dozen people in the office.

Q. How do you know that there was not a dozen people in the back office if you were not there? A. I might have been in the office immediately preceding the interview.

Q. I am not asking you whether they might have been. Do you know whether or not there was a dozen people? A. I cannot answer as to every interview in the back room, Sir, but waits quite frequent that I would be in the back room.

Q. You have stated that already. During these quite frequent private consultations in the back room, as you termed them, do you know that there were not a dozen people in there, beside Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull? A. I don't think there ever occurred a time when there was a dozen people in there.

Q. Do you know? A. I say that I don't think there ever occurred a time when there was a dozen people in there.

Q. I am not asking you what you think. I am asking you whether you know that there were not a dozen people in that back room? A. To my knowledge, there never was a dozen people in that back room at one time.

Q. Were you in there? A. Quite frequently.

Q. Were you in there when these private consultations were going on? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then you don't know who were in there, do you? A. Unless they come in through the windows.

Q. They might not have been in there when you went in, I suppose, and you not see them? A. If I had been in preceding the interview, I think they would not be in there without my knowing it.

Q. No, but were you in that back room preceding every interview? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then on those occasions when you were not in the back room, and had no means of knowing who were there, can you tell me that there were not a dozen people when Woodhall and Tilton were in there together? A. Of course, if I know nothing about it, I cannot tell you anything about it.

Q. Well, that is a candid acknowledgment. Now, why do you call them private consultations, therefore, in the back room, if you don't know how many people were there? A. Simply because the door was closed to admit of them.

Q. And that is the only reason? A. That is the only reason.

THE MEETINGS AT THE HOUSE.

Q. Now, how many times did you meet Mr. Tilton at Mrs. Woodhall's house? A. I cannot answer that.

Q. As near as you can recollect? A. I cannot give you the number of times.

Q. Well, as near as you can tell? A. I should say—I cannot swear that I have met him there over a dozen times.

Q. Very well. Now, when were those dozen times? A. During that Summer and Fall.

Q. The Summer of 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. After your introduction to him at Woodhall's office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And before the Steinway Hall meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well; you would see him then perhaps in the daytime, down at Woodhall's office and at night up at her house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was so, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have been up-stairs in that house I understood you to say? A. I was up-stairs once.

Q. In what room were you? A. I cannot say—I don't know that I was in any room.

Q. You were in the hall then, I take it? A. Yes, Sir; I remember being in the hall.

Q. Don't you remember being in the room? A. I do not.

Q. Don't you remember being in Colonel Blood's library at the head of the stairs? A. I do not.

Q. Don't you know that the library is at the head of the stairs? A. I do not.

Q. Were you ever in that library? A. I don't remember that I ever was.

Q. Who did you go up-stairs with? A. That I don't remember. It is merely a vague idea that I was up-stairs in that house once.

Q. Well, you came down again, I take it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That you know? A. I am agreeable to say.

Q. You don't know how you got there? A. I went up stairs.

Q. You remember that, do you? A. I do.

Q. And you know nothing about the library at the head of the stairs? A. I do not remember any of the circumstances of my going up the stairs; what I went up for. I remember distinctly that I was up stairs once, but why I went up there I can't tell you now. I can't tell who I went up with, nor the occasion.

Q. Did you ever go up more than once? A. I do not think I ever went up the stairs but that one time.

Q. Do you know whether you went up more than one flight or not? A. No, Sir; I know that I only went up one flight.

Q. That you are sure of? A. Very sure of it.

Q. Do you know how long you stayed there? A. I do not think I stayed there but a moment, and yet I am wholly uncertain about it.

Q. Now, as to the number of times that you have met Mr. Tilton up there; you think now you can say a dozen times, do you? A. I think I have met him a dozen times.

Q. Do you recollect on your direct examination of saying that you thought it was five or six times? A. No; I do not remember what I said then in regard to that.

Q. Well, is your recollection now any better than it was on your direct examination as to the number of times? A. I don't think it is any better; no better; it is very poor any time; I can't remember now.

Q. Can you say it was more than half a dozen times? A. I cannot; I could not swear that it was more than half a dozen times, but—

Q. Well, that is an answer. Well, if you cannot swear that it was more than half a dozen times, how were you enabled to swear about five minutes ago that you could say at least a dozen times? A. Because you pressed me for the number of times. I had been going there all Summer. I said that I thought I had seen him there at least a dozen times, and I think so still.

Q. I asked you how many times you could say that you had seen him there, and your answer was, "I can say I saw him there one dozen times." A. No; I think I can swear—

Q. "I can swear over a dozen of times." A. I think I can swear—

Q. Do you think so now? A. Yes, Sir, I do.

Q. You go back to the dozen now, do you? A. I think I can swear that I saw him there a dozen times.

Q. And yet you cannot swear that you did not see him there more than half a dozen times? A. I wouldn't swear positively that I had seen him there more than half a dozen times.

Q. When did you have the first conversation with him there? A. That I cannot say.

Q. Do you recollect who were present when you had the first conversation? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you absent from the City of New-York during the Summer of 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time did you leave? A. I cannot give you the date.

Q. As near as you can tell? A. I can with that memorandum, if you please; I think I can.

Q. Certainly. [Handing the memorandum.] A. I was absent from New-York early in September.

Q. How long a time? A. Within two weeks—less than two weeks, I think, altogether.

Q. Where did you go? A. I went to Cayuga County.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. It was less than two weeks, I cannot say how long. I went to Cayuga County and went on from there to Chemung.

Q. Where? A. To Chemung County then back to Cayuga, and then from there home.

Q. Now, were not you gone more than two weeks? A. I do not think I was; I am positive I was not.

Q. You think it was about two weeks? A. It was part of two weeks, I cannot say how I commenced—I can tell you why I know it was parts of two weeks.

Q. No. I only ask how long it was; parts of two weeks? A. Parts of two weeks. Whether it was the entire of two weeks or not, I cannot recollect.

Q. I mean weeks as measured by days; were you gone about fourteen days? A. Very nearly fourteen days, but I would not undertake to swear positively as to the time.

Q. Then I take it that during those fourteen days you did not see Mr. Tilton at Mrs. Woodhull's house? A. Certainly not.

Q. You will take out that fortnight, will you? A. I will; yes, Sir.

Q. Were you absent during any other time? A. Not that I now remember.

Q. Wouldn't you be apt to remember it if you had been absent? A. No; I wouldn't be apt to remember it, because I have a very poor memory.

Q. Now, I understand you to say that you had some conversation with Mr. Tilton soon after—a day or two after, if I understand you correctly, the Steinway Hall meeting? A. The interview I swore to was several days after.

Mr. Beach—Within a week, he said.

The Witness—Within a week.

Mr. Fullerton—Within a week? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you enabled to fix that within a week of that time? A. For the reason I fix it from several conversations preceding it and the occurrence of that conversation.

Q. Were you at the Steinway Hall meeting? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where did this first conversation take place, after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. In Tilton's presence,

Q. Yes? A. At Woodhull & Claflin's office,

Q. Office? A. In Broad-st.

Q. Now, I want you to fix, as near as you can, how long that was after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. If I am forced to fix a date, I should say it was five or six days after the meeting, not to exceed six, and possibly not more than five; it may have been a little less than five; I had had two previous interviews there to that.

Q. Can you say that it was a fortnight after? A. I cannot swear it was not a fortnight.

Q. Well, now, fix the time, as near as you can swear to it? A. Well, Sir, if I am forced to swear specifically to time, I say it must have been five days.

Q. And not beyond that? A. No, Sir; I say that it might have been six, but if I am forced to swear, it might not have been but five, it might not have been but four.

Q. You think it was not more than four? A. Four days to a week, that is as near as I can swear with any positiveness.

Q. You swear, then, that it was within a week? A. Within a week.

Q. From the Steinway Hall meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, are you aware that Theodore Tilton left the city of New-York the day after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. I am not.

Q. On a lecturing tour? A. I am not.

Q. Not aware of that? A. I am not.

Q. Can you swear now positively that you saw him within thirty days after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. I swear to that interview there at Woodhull's office.

Mr. Beach—Let him swear positively.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes. That you are sure of now? A. Yes, Sir; very sure.

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir; very sure of it.

Q. Within a week? A. Within a week.

Mr. Beach—Let him swear positively.

Mr. Fullerton—He does.

Mr. Beach—I don't understand him to.

The Witness—I swear positively to that.

Q. It was within a week after the Steinway Hall meeting? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who were present at that conversation? A. Col. Blood was present; Mrs. Woodhull was present; whether Miss Claflin was present or not I don't know, but I think quite likely she was; I won't say that she was.

Q. Who else? A. I do not think of any one else.

Q. You spoke of Col. Blood, who was he? A. He is the reputed husband of Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. He is the husband of Mrs. Woodhull, is he not? A. I don't know that.

Q. You were not present at the marriage? A. No, Sir.

Q. And what is his occupation, or what was it at that time? A. He was assisting them in their affairs, whatever they were.

Q. He is a writer, is he not? A. I think he is a writer.

Q. A journalist? A. That I don't know; he may have charge of their journal—I think he has.

Q. Don't you know that he is a man of education? A. I think he is a man of education; yes, Sir.

Q. You have conversed with him, have you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is he not a man of a great deal of intelligence? A. I don't think I could swear that he was a man of a great deal of intelligence.

Q. An educated man, is he not? A. I wouldn't care to swear that.

Q. How? A. I wouldn't care to swear that he was an educated man; he is a man of ability.

Q. Don't you think he is a man of education? A. It has not struck me in that sense, that he was a man of education.

Q. But a man of ability? A. A man of ability; yes, Sir.

Q. You know that he is a writer, do you not, by profession? A. Well, it has been a mystery to me what he did do.

Q. Well, my dear Sir, I am not talking about mysteries. You will involve yourself in trouble; I don't want to know anything about mysteries. I want an answer to that question? A. I never saw anything that he had written that I knew was his writing.

Q. Didn't you understand that he was a writer? A. Col. Blood?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir; I did not.

AN ESTIMATE OF MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Didn't understand that. Well, Mrs. Woodhull—is she a lady of intelligence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And of education? A. No, I don't think of education,

Q. You don't think she is educated? A. Not great education.

Q. Do you think she is a woman of ability? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A remarkable woman? A. I do.

Q. Well, that is what Mr. Tilton said she was I believe? A. That among other things; yes Sir.

Q. You agree with him in that respect? A. In that respect we agree.

Q. Is she a writer? A. She had the reputation of writing these articles; I don't know.

Q. I have not spoken about any article? A. I never saw her write an article in my life.

Q. Well, hadn't she the reputation of being a writer? A. She had the reputation.

Q. A somewhat accomplished writer, is she not? A. Well, you won't allow me to explain what I mean.

Q. I want an answer to my question. A. If that article imputed to her was hers, then she is a writer of ability.

Q. I am not talking about that article at all, Mr. Cook. Has she not the reputation of being an accomplished writer? A. You speak of her general reputation; I don't know her reputation.

Q. I am not speaking of her general reputation; I am speaking of her particular reputation, as a writer. A. Well, I don't know that.

Q. Well, answer the question as well as you can? A. I don't know her reputation.

Q. As a writer? A. As a writer.

Q. Don't you know that she has a reputation of being an accomplished writer? A. I do not.

Q. Did you ever hear her lecture? A. I cannot swear to that. My impression at the moment is that I have heard her lecture once; but I am not sure I have heard her lecture. I have heard her sister lecture once,

Q. Well, let her sister alone, if you please, now; I am talking about Mrs. Woodhull. You can't tell this jury whether you have heard her lecture or not. A. At this moment I don't know that I have ever heard her lecture.

Q. Have you ever read any of her lectures? A. Yes, Sir; I have read a good deal of them.

Q. Of her lectures? A. What have been reputed to be her lectures; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Cook, I understood you to say that you could not distinguish between what took place at these interviews between yourself and Mrs. Woodhull when Tilton was not present, and the interviews between yourself, Mrs. Woodhull and Tilton, when he was present, can you? A. I said something of that nature; yes, Sir.

Q. The interviews, I understand you, were frequent? A. Frequent.

Q. Between you and Mrs. Woodhull, when he was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And long in duration, were they not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you discussed various matters? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During those interviews? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A good deal interested in them, were you? A. No, Sir; I was not.

Q. Not a good deal interested; then they did not make much impression on your mind? A. Not a great deal.

Q. Perhaps that is the reason you cannot remember them? A. That may be some reason why I can't remember them.

Q. And that is a reason why you cannot distinguish between those where Tilton was not present and when he was, is it? A. The interviews that I testified to—

Q. No; answer my question.

Mr. Shearman—The witness never said so on his direct examination.

Mr. Fullerton—He has said so distinctly, and has said so on his cross-examination.

Mr. Evarts—He said he found difficulty in distinguishing, and it took time to consider.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, he found difficulty, and that is the reason he could not do it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is what he said; he didn't say he could not recollect.

Mr. Fullerton—Can you recollect now distinctly what took place between yourself and Mrs. Woodhull, when Tilton was not present, as distinguished from what took place between yourself and Woodhull and Tilton when he was present? A. Not in language, specifically; no, Sir, but in general matters, yes.

Q. One moment. Can you distinguish in subject? A. Certainly.

Q. Clearly, can you? A. I think I can, if you—

Q. One moment; you can distinguish now distinctly can you in subjects? A. In substance, I said.

Q. In substance; as to the subjects that were discussed at these various times, can you? A. On the subject of what I have testified to on my direct examination.

Q. No, I am speaking now generally. A. No, Sir; I cannot undertake to repeat all the conversation that I had with her.

Q. I didn't ask you that. A. Or with them, or to separate them.

Q. I am not talking about all the conversation. This is the question I put to you: can you now distinguish between what occurred between you and Mrs. Woodhull when Tilton was not present and what occurred between yourself and Mrs. Woodhull and Tilton when Tilton was present? A. I can testify to what did occur when Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were present.

Q. How? A. I can speak of what occurred when Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were present, and I can tell you what occurred when Mr. Tilton was not present.

Q. Then you have no difficulty in distinguishing, have you?
A. I cannot distinguish all the interviews on any subject.

Q. On any subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. But you can state now exactly what took place when Mr. Tilton was present? A. No, Sir; not exactly the substance, I said.

Q. And you are not confused at all by the fact that you had an interview with Mrs. Woodhull, when he was not present, upon the same subject? A. I say I can give you the substance of what occurred; not the particulars.

Q. You are quite sure that there was a conversation in Mr. Tilton's presence about writing up the Beecher scandal? A. I am.

Q. For Woodhull & Claflin's newspaper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did that conversation take place? A. It was subsequent to the conversation to which I have—

Q. Oh, tell me when it took place. A. I cannot any more directly,

Q. Tell me the year. A. During that year.

Q. What year? A. 1871.

Q. What month? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. What season of the year? A. It must have been in the Fall.

Q. How long was it before the publication of the Woodhull scandal? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. About how long? A. That I cannot tell you; I don't know when the Woodhull and Claflin paper published the scandal; I cannot fix that in my mind.

Q. Well, it was in the Autumn of 1872? A. It must have been then a year before that.

Q. A year before that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you hear anything about Mrs. Woodhull's card in The New York World? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never heard of that, did you? A. I might have heard of it; I don't recall it at this moment.

Q. Now, Mr. Cook, didn't you apply to Mr. Tilton for employment on The Golden Age? A. Never, not that I recall; I never did.

Q. You would be very apt to remember it if you did, would you not? A. I think I should.

Q. It was he that proposed that you should go upon The Golden Age, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was he that proposed that you should connect yourself with Woodhull's & Claflin's Weekly, was it? A. Certainly he proposed that, but whether he was the original proposer of it, I don't know.

Q. He proposed it to you? A. Certainly.

Q. That you are sure of? A. Certainly, but I won't swear that he was the first one that proposed it.

Q. I don't ask you that. Don't swear to anything more than you are asked. Mr. Cook, when you went to visit Mrs. Woodhull, did you take anybody with you? A. No, Sir.

Q. At no time? A. Oh, at no time; that I won't swear; I thought you alluded to my first visit there.

Q. Well, you say you won't swear? A. My first visit I went alone.

Q. I am not talking about your first visit; at any visit you made there did you take any one with you? A. That I cannot answer.

Q. Why not? A. Because I don't remember. I might and I might not have done so.

Q. Yes, that is so. A. I think it quite likely I did take somebody at times, but I don't recall anybody or anything. I have an idea I have taken people down there at their office.

Q. Did you ever take a child there at any time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How often? A. Once.

Q. Whose child was it? A. My own.

Q. How old? A. About ten, I think; from nine to ten.

Q. How long did that child remain there? A. About an hour; I don't know; it may have been more than an hour.

Q. Did you meet anybody on that occasion at Mrs. Woodhull's? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Now, see if you cannot recall some one else you took there? A. I do not; I cannot at this moment. It is quite likely that I did take people, but I cannot recall them.

Q. When did you see Mrs. Woodhull last? A. I saw Mrs. Woodhull last about—I saw her last two weeks ago last Sunday.

Q. Where? A. At Detroit.

Q. Detroit? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she call upon you, or you upon her? A. She was stopping at the same hotel. She sent for me, I think; I went into her room.

Mr. Beach—Speak up; there don't anybody hear you.

The Witness—She sent for me, and I went into her room.

Mr. Fullerton—Where was she when you was sent for? A. She was in her room,

Q. Did you go to her room? A. I did.

Q. Did you have an interview with her? A. I did.

Q. How long an interview? A. An hour.

Q. Was that after Mr. Shearman had written to you? A. Certainly it was; Mr. Shearman had written to me last Summer.

Q. Did you see her more than once there? A. No, Sir; only that evening.

Q. How? A. Only that evening.

Q. Now, are you sure that Mr. Shearman has not written to you but once? A. No, Sir; I am not sure.

Q. Have you received letters from anybody else connected with this trial? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From whom? A. Mr. Hill.

Q. Any one else? A. No, Sir.

Q. You are sure of that? A. No, Sir; I am quite certain of it, that I have not.

Q. When did you receive Mr. Hill's letter? A. I have had a series of letters from Mr. Hill since I was here before—since this trial has been in progress.

Q. About how many? A. Perhaps half a dozen.

Q. Did you answer them all? A. I think I did.

Q. Where were you when you received those letters? A. At Detroit?

Q. That is, after you were here. A. After I was here.

Q. And did you confer with Mr. Hill when you were here before? A. No, Sir.

Q. Only with Mr. Shearman? A. Only with Mr. Shearman. Gen. Tracy was present at one interview.

Q. How long did you confer with Gen. Tracy and Mr. Shearman? A. About an hour, possibly not so long as that.

Q. Did you receive any letters through Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir.

Q. Any message through Mrs. Woodhull? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long did Mrs. Woodhull remain in Detroit? A. I didn't know that she was there until I got this message from her to call on her, and she left the following evening; I think she was there possibly two nights and that day.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. COOK.

Mr. Shearman—I understood you to say that you were paid by the piece for work that you performed on The Sun. Will you state whether that is the usual mode of employment now among writers on the press? A. Quite common, Sir.

Q. Which is regarded as the more preferable position, a position of that kind or one upon a salary, among reporters? A. The position that I occupy and have occupied, is more preferable. I refused three salaries on The Sun to keep on in this style of work.

Q. That style of work is a more preferable class of business? A. Certainly.

Q. You were asked if you wrote sensational articles, and you replied that you did; will you please state what you meant by sensational? A. Articles of general interest; any article, any matter in which the public are particularly interested, I have been called upon to write.

Q. Did you mean any immoral articles? A. No, Sir, The Sun won't print immoral articles; we don't print them.

Q. You did not offer them any, did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you give an example of the kind of articles—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, I guess we had better not have any of his composition here.

The Witness—I have—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—One instance.

Mr. Fullerton—No; one instance I object to.

Judge Neilson—We understand the witness.

Mr. Shearman—They were perfectly respectable articles.

The Witness—I wrote editorials; I have written a great many editorials for The Sun, on popular subjects.

Q. In stating the conversations which took place in Mr. Tilton's presence, have you avoided stating anything which took place in Mr. Tilton's absence?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—I think we assume that; we certainly assume that to be so.

Mr. Shearman—I am satisfied if that is conceded; I am perfectly satisfied.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is a necessary result of any examination.

Mr. Shearman—Some doubt was sought to be thrown upon that fact by the cross-examination. [To the witness]: When you took your child to visit Mrs. Woodhull, I did not catch if you said whether it was at the office or at the house? A. At the house.

Q. What time of day was that? A. It was on Sunday, on the afternoon of Sunday; one Sunday afternoon.

Q. During daylight? A. During daylight; yes, Sir.

Q. What were you doing with your child; did you take your child out for the very purpose—for that purpose only, or for a walk, or for what purpose? A. No, Sir; I left my home to go there, and I took my child out; my wife wanted me to take the child out with me. I took the child.

Q. For a walk? A. I took it for the excursion more than anything else.

Q. When was this? A. It was during the Summer; I cannot fix the date more definitely.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Cook.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Cook, that is your property, Sir [handing the memorandum].

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN GALLAGHER.

John Gallagher was next called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Tracy—Where do you reside? A. I reside No. 60 Schermerhorn-st.

Q. What is your business? A. Livery-stable keeper.

Q. How long have you been engaged as livery-stable keeper? A. In or about seven years.

Q. At the same place where you now are? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long have you been in your present location? A. In or about five.

Q. About five years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where were you before? A. In Boerum-st.

Q. Near by? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. During the time almost that I am in the business.

Q. You have known him since you were in business. Has he often employed you in your business? A. No, Sir, not often.

Q. But he has employed you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Speak a little louder, Mr. Gallagher, so that the farthest jurymen here can hear you. A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S EXCURSION WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Were you employed by Mr. Tilton at any time to take him to Coney Island? A. I was.

Q. Did any one accompany him on that occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who? A. Lady.

Q. When was that, Mr. Gallagher? A. In the Summer of 1871.

Q. What time in the Summer? A. The latter part of the Summer.

Q. The latter part of the Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From what place did Mr. Tilton take your carriage?

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, we would like to know with what purpose this is offered. I suppose it is for the purpose of contradiction.

Mr. Tracy—It is in part, and for the purpose of showing an affirmative fact for another part. It is offered for the double purpose.

Mr. Beach—Well, what affirmative fact do you propose to show?

Mr. Tracy—The acquaintance and association of Mr. Tilton with Mrs. Woodhull.

Mr. Beach—Well, this does not tend to that.

Mr. Tracy—It will if you only wait a moment.

Mr. Beach—Well, we know what it tends to. There is no occasion to wait a moment. We have had an examination upon this subject, and the gentleman is not quite as mysterious as he may think.

Mr. Tracy—I never am mysterious.

Mr. Beach—I submit that it is entirely a collateral matter, upon which, having examined Mr. Tilton, he is not open to contradiction. We had an examination, which your Honor undoubtedly fully recollects, in regard to this excursion to Coney Island, and we had it in the distinguished opening of my learned friend. We have it all displayed, I think; at any rate it has been in the course of the discussion revealed to your Honor. The question is, whether that is so far pertinent and material to this issue, as to become the subject of contradiction, if Mr. Tilton's relation of it is unsatisfactory to the gentleman. I submit not, Sir. I submit to you that it is entirely collateral matter, and that therefore, they are concluded by the answers which have been given by Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Under the assurance made by Mr. Tracy, I think we will take the evidence and see what it amounts to.

Mr. Tracy—From what place did Mr. Tilton take your carriage? A. My memory is that he took it from his own house in Livingston-st.

Q. From what point did the lady take it? A. From there.

Q. The lady accompanied him from his house to the carriage, did she? A. That is my memory.

Q. Did you state whether or not you went direct to Coney Island from their house? A. My memory is that I went direct to Coney Island.

Q. What time of day was it that they took the carriage? A. It was in the afternoon.

Q. What time? A. I cannot give the exact hour.

Q. What kind of a carriage was it? A. It was an open carriage.

Q. What was done on arriving at Coney Island? A. I don't recollect anything, only they left for to go to bathe.

Q. Where did your carriage stop? A. I stopped at the beach, the planks where folks generally get out.

Q. Where they generally get out for bathing? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well.

Mr. Everts—For what purpose do people generally get out at that place?

Mr. Beach—Never mind. One moment.

Mr. Everts—The usual place for getting out for what?

Mr. Fullerton—For getting out.

Mr. Everts—The question is whether it is the usual place bathers get out, or the usual place to go to the hotel, or what?

Mr. Morris—There is no place there for bathers to get out.

Mr. Everts—I am informed that there is. The question is to describe the locality.

Judge Neilson—Well, ask him to describe it.

Mr. Tracy—Whereabouts was it that they got it? A. My memory is that it was opposite Green's, somewhere near those planks.

Q. Where is Green's? A. It is very convenient to the beach.

Q. How far from the beach? A. Well, I should say it was built on the beach.

Q. Well, did they—

Judge Neilson—What did they do?

THE FRIENDS BATHE AT CONEY ISLAND.

Mr. Tracy—What did they do on getting out?

A. They got out and went a little ways from the carriage, and turned back. Mr. Tilton said they were going to bathe, and asked me to hold his gold watch. The lady done the same thing; she gave me her gold watch to hold.

Q. Did you keep the watches? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What direction did they go then? A. They went down on the surf.

Q. Did you see them bathe? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Could you see them? A. No, Sir, I could not.

Q. They went out of your sight then. How long were they gone? A. That I could not say.

Q. Well, about how long? A. Probably an hour; it might be longer or shorter.

Q. What was done then? A. Returned—came home.

Q. They returned to the carriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you observe anything in their appearance—the appearance of their hair, or anything, on their returning? A. I did not, Sir; I did not look.

Q. Did not look? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did they take their watches on their return? A. Yes, Sir; I believe so.

Q. What did you do then? A. I drove back to Mr. Tilton's house.

Q. What did they do? A. Mr. Tilton went into his house a few minutes, and the lady sat in the carriage.

Q. Well, what then? A. Whilst Mr. Tilton was in the house the lady asked me—

Mr. Fullerton—No, no.

Q. How long was Mr. Tilton in the house? A. But a very short time.

Q. Now, either on their way to Long Island, or in returning. Mr. Gallagher, did you notice either of them having a roll of papers in their possession? A. I noticed Mr. Tilton having some papers.

Q. You noticed— Repeat that, please. A. I noticed Mr. Tilton having some papers.

Q. What kind of papers were they? A. Well, I could not exactly describe them, more than that they looked like a couple of sheets of note paper, something of that kind, large size; probably more.

Q. Were there more than two, or was it a roll? A. There might have been more than three, but I could not say there was.

Q. You could not say? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you first see those papers in the possession of Mr. Tilton? A. I could not identify what time I saw them first in his possession.

Q. Was it on their way to Coney Island, or return? A. My memory is it was on their way.

Q. On their way down to Coney Island. Now, after he returned to the carriage the second time, after you stopped at his house, where did you go? A. I went down to Remsen-st.

Q. What number Remsen-st. A. I don't know the number.

Q. Do you know whose residence? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. Do you know between what streets it is? A. It is between Hicks-st. and the river; that is my memory.

Q. What time of day was it that you drove to Remsen-st. between Hicks and the river? A. It was late in the evening or afternoon.

Q. Before or after dark? A. Well, it might have been dark.

Q. About dark.

Mr. Morris—He didn't say about dark.

Mr. Tracy—I understood him to say so.

Mr. Morris—No; he didn't say so.

Mr. Tracy—What did you say, Mr. Gallagher? A. I said it might have been dark.

Mr. Morris—Well, that is not about dark.

Mr. Tracy—Well, perhaps it is not.

Mr. Morris—Well, it is not.

Mr. Tracy—It occurred to me that it was.

Q. Did you know Mr. Moulton's house? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. What side of Remsen-st. was it you stopped on? A. On the right hand side, going towards the river.

Q. Do you know where Mr. Moulton's house is now? A. I do not.

Q. Well, what did you do then? What became of the parties when you stopped at this house in Remsen-st? A. Mr. Tilton told me I might go home and come at 12 o'clock with a close carriage.

Q. Well, what did you do? A. I done so.

Q. Where did they go? A. I went over to New-York.

Q. No; where did they go when they got out of your carriage in Remsen-st.? A. Went into the house.

Q. And you went back to your place? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At 12 o'clock did you come with a close carriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. 12 o'clock midnight, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you do with the close carriage? A. I took them over to New-York.

Q. From what place did you receive them? A. I received them in Remsen-st.

Q. The same place you left them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you took them to New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where in New-York? A. My memory is it was Thirty-eighth-st.; I might be mistaken.

Q. What did you do then? A. I don't recollect what I did then. I got out, and I believe Mr. Tilton came home with me in a little while after; I don't recollect clearly on that.

Q. What is that? A. My memory is not clear whether Mr. Tilton got out.

Mr. Beach—He says they got out, and he believes Mr. Tilton came home with him a little while after.

Mr. Tracy—Did Mr. Tilton get out and go in the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did he remain in the house? A. I could not state.

Q. You think he returned home with you that night? A. That is my memory; I might be mistaken; I don't know.

Q. Do you remember whether you waited for Mr. Tilton, or whether you were discharged and came away without him? A. I cannot answer that question; I don't recollect; it is some three or four years ago.

Q. Now, had you ever seen this lady before that accompanied by Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I never saw her before that time.

Q. Do you think you would recognise a photograph of her? [Showing witness a photograph of Mrs. Woodhull.] Look at that photograph which I present you. A. It seems to be the same one, but has a different appearance here; that is, the hair is differently arranged.

Q. How is the hair different? A. It seemed to me to be cut short around about the ear, or below it a little way, at the time I saw her.

Q. You think that is the same lady? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Mr. Tracy—A photograph of the lady. [To Mr. Fullerton.] You may examine.

Mr. Fullerton—I have nothing to ask.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] No question, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—[To Mr. Morris.] What Exhibit was that shown witness?

Mr. Morris—"D, 115."

Mr. Shearman—"D, 115." We offer that in evidence, as the one shown witness and identified by Mr. Cook.

[The Exhibit heretofore marked for identification, "Exhibit D, 115," was marked "in evidence."]

TESTIMONY OF SAMUEL B. HALLIDAY.

Samuel B. Halliday called and sworn on behalf of defendant.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, where do you reside? A. 60 Hicks-st.

Q. Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. I think ten years, Sir.

Q. What is your business—what is your calling in life, not business? A. I am a clergyman.

Q. What is your present particular occupation? A. I am Mr. Beecher's assistant.

Q. How long have you assisted Mr. Beecher in his duties? A. Five years, within a month; I think a month and a half.

Q. Have you held any other office in Plymouth Church? A.

My first office in the Church was that of a member of the Examining Committee; subsequently one of the Deacons—the Board of Deacons.

Q. And after that did you hold any other? A. I have continued ex officio a member of both those Boards by virtue of my office as assistant pastor.

Q. Were you not also clerk of the church for a period? A. I was, for two or three years.

Q. When you were clerk of the church you were, by virtue of your office, a member of the Examining Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Beecher? A. I cannot say that I have been acquainted with him more than twelve years. I was introduced to him some sixteen or eighteen years ago; I once attended with him some meeting years since, and he passed a day and a night, while lecturing in Providence, at my house, where I had resided some twenty years ago—possibly twenty-one, may be twenty-two years.

Q. To what extent have you been acquainted with Theodore Tilton? A. My acquaintance with Mr. Tilton is very limited. I never knew him to speak to him until within a very few years—within about five years. I think it is about four years since I was introduced to him at a meeting; at a reception of the teachers of the Sabbath-School, was the first time I had ever been introduced to him, or had ever spoken to him. That is within five years, I think.

Q. Was not that early in 1871? A. I could not state positively.

Q. That was a reception, you say, of teachers of the Sabbath-School? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of Plymouth Church? A. At the residence—Capt. Duncan gave the reception, who was then Superintendent of the Sabbath-School, and I was invited, and met Mr. Tilton, I think, up at Capt. Duncan's, or at the residence of Mrs. Thurlimer. There were receptions at both of those places, but at which of the two I was introduced to Mr. Tilton, I cannot say.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton there that evening? A. She was, I think; I am confident that she was.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton a teacher in the Sabbath-school? A. I am not able to say.

Q. Are you or not confident that it was later than January 1st, 1871? A. No, Sir, I am not.

Q. You were formerly engaged in some kind of work in New-York, were you not, at the Five Points? A. I was for about 11 years, I think, connected with the Five Points House of Industry. The first four years—three years, however, previous to that, I was engaged in connection with a similar institution, the Home for the Friendless, and I had been previous to that, previous to my going to Rhode Island, some 85 years ago, in the employment of that same society, my duties being principally as a missionary among the seamen; I came back from Rhode Island to enter the service—re-enter the service of that society; was with them three years, and was for eleven years in the employment of the trustees of the Five Points House of Industry; four years as a general agent, principally in connection with the finances of the house, I left a year for a pastorate in the country, meaning never to go into any such work again, but I was away but a very little time and was pressed by the exigencies of the house to come back again at the earnest solicitation of the trustees, where I remained until I entered into the service of Plymouth Church, in all about ten or eleven years in the employment of that house.

Q. Simply for the purpose of identifying it, I wish to ask whether that was the institution founded by the Rev. M. L. Pease, or the other? A. The one founded by Mr. Pease, or grew out, rather, of it first—grew out of this work at the Five Points.

Q. There are two institutions, I believe? A. Yes, Sir; one is a sectarian, or, at least, a denominational institution—the Methodist Mission, ladies Methodist Mission—and the other is not in any sense sectarian, gentlemen of all religious denominations, with the exception of the Roman Catholic, being interested in its management.

Q. Now, Sir, you remember the period, I suppose, of the publication of the Woodhull and Claflin scandal in October, 1872? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Can you recollect the exact date when that paper came out? A. I never knew when it came out.

Q. Very well. A. I can tell you when I first saw it.

Q. Very well; give us the date when you first saw it? A. I saw a copy of it on the last Tuesday evening of October; I think it is the 28th day of October.

Q. Did you see Mr. Beecher on that day? A. I did.

Q. Before or after you saw that paper? A. Before I saw it, or heard of it.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher on that occasion—simply answer my question yes or no—did Mr. Beecher on that occasion consult you with reference to the course it would be proper for him to pursue with reference to that scandal?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think he may say yes or no, he was consulted. The mere act of his having been consulted can be given in evidence, precisely as you meet a man in the street, or had been introduced to him.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! no, Sir; you can meet a man without saying something; you cannot consult him without saying something.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take the fact that he consulted; that is all.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness.] You can answer yes or no.

Judge Neilson—Modify your question—was consulted in respect to it.

Mr. Shearman—Yes. [To the witness.] Did Mr. Beecher consult you with respect to this publication?

Judge Neilson—Say yes or no, Mr. Halliday.

The Witness—I do not know how to answer the question. After a while Mr. Beecher talked with me about it—

Judge Neilson—Well, you know that you cannot give that.

The Witness—I know it; but I cannot say that he consulted me, or that he did not.

THE TESTIMONY OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Shearman—Did he speak to you about it? A. He did, definitely.

Q. Did you and Mr. Beecher have any conversation on that occasion with respect to the proper course for Mr. Beecher to pursue?

Mr. Beach—We object to the question.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—We offer this—

Judge Neilson—Yes; make your offer in any form you please.

Mr. Shearman—We offer to show that Mr. Beecher had a conversation with Mr. Halliday as one of the principal officers of the Church, for the purpose of consulting the brethren of the Church as to the proper course to be pursued in reference to this anticipated publication, and we do that for the purpose of meeting—

Mr. Fullerton—No; that won't do,

Mr. Shearman—Well, I will omit that last clause. We make that offer.

Judge Neilson—Is that objected to?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, sir.

ARGUMENT OF MR. SHEARMAN.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, the grounds of making that offer are that evidence has already been produced on the part of the plaintiff to show that a certain course was pursued by Mr. Beecher, and to show that Mr. Beecher endeavored to control his church, with reference to the course that he pursued, and as to the course which they should pursue, and a long line of evidence has been brought in on the other side which has no relevancy or materiality whatever, except it be for the purpose of showing that Mr. Beecher had the control of the church, and against its judgment, or irrespective of its judgment tried to conceal the facts in this case, and to suppress action by the church. A very large portion of the evidence which has been offered by the plaintiff is for that purpose. Now, if Mr. Beecher's declarations about the action of the church in one way are to be brought in, I fail to see any reason why the fact that his consulting the officers of the church, and neither giving them advice nor taking advice from them in regard to this matter, is not also legitimate evidence for the purpose of showing that Mr. Beecher did not undertake to control the action of the church, but from the first moment left the church entirely free to take its own action; that he consulted the leading members of the church on the question as to what was the right course for him to pursue; that he acted upon their advice rather than acting upon his advice, and that this whole course, which was decided upon almost instantly, of treating this scandal with utter contempt and absolute silence was the policy that was not so much resolved upon by Mr. Beecher for his church, as resolved upon by the church from its own instincts as to what was just and right, and that Mr. Beecher's own policy of silence was approved immediately by the brethren of the church upon consultation.

Now, I admit that I do not think that the evidence upon this subject that was offered by the plaintiff was anything very important; I do not think that it had much tendency to prove the plaintiff's case, but the plaintiff thought it had. The plaintiff's counsel brought that all in, and having brought it in I do not see why we should not be at liberty to rebut it, and to show that there is another side to this case, and that this action of the church for which Mr. Beecher is sought to be held responsible, was action which the church took upon its own responsibility and entirely independent of its pastor.

Judge Neilson—Of course, Mr. Shearman, you recognize the restraint I am under; a rule of evidence that is as binding as a statute can be, that conversations in the absence of the plaintiff cannot be received. I have no power to escape from that rule.

Mr. Evans—If your Honor please, we present this (if I may be allowed to add a word to Mr. Shearman's views), in the nature of the action of the defendant, not in the nature of hearsay evidence, or on the ground upon which that is to be excepted to and excluded, as we understand. Now, your Honor will see in the case of a criminal prosecution for some external crime like an assault—a murderous assault, or anything of that kind—if the Government should undertake to affirm imputations of guilt upon the accused person as being the author of this crime by his conduct afterward, or by showing that if he was admitted to be the author of the assault that he showed a guilty purpose or consciousness that made him amenable to the criminal law, and didn't excuse him by the course that he took after it, that would be legitimate evidence, so recognized in all our jurisprudence; and, by the same reasoning, if the Government undertook that—which it may undoubtedly on a certain plan different from that which I now appeal to—if the Government may undertake to show his conduct from the act of his carrying an impression of guilt and consciousness of guilt, why it is not so much the particular conduct that the Government thus brings in as the substantive fabric of conduct after the act, and then the criminal is entitled to rebut any such construction by showing that he presented himself and said so and so, or did so and so with parties that properly brought within the embrace of the inquiry. Now, it is in the nature of that that we present the inquiry, and I submit your Honor should dispose of the question upon that consideration and under that rule of law which we think will cover its admission. We submit it to your Honor with that view. They giving conduct after this, we say why, here is part of the conduct.

Judge Neilson—I still think I cannot receive this.

Mr. Evans—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Mr. Shearman—I now make a separate offer of proof, because I may as well do so as be asking questions. I offer to prove by this witness that at this interview Mr. Beecher informed him that this publication was to be made, and that it was an entire falsehood from beginning to end. [To Mr. Fullerton]; Do you object?

Mr. Fullerton—No, you are not serious about that.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir, I am quite serious. If you object, I will state my reasons.

Mr. Beach—Why, of course we object.

Mr. Shearman—I beg to read a few words from Mr. Morris's opening.

Mr. Fullerton—Then, if that has become the law of the case let us know it.

Mr. Shearman—I don't think it ever will, but I do take the ground, your Honor, that when a charge is made in an opening that we have a right to meet not merely the evidence as it stands without the opening, but the evidence as light is thrown on it by the opening. Now, here in Mr. Morris's opening there is a distinct assertion that Mr. Beecher made no denial. He does not merely say no denial was made in the newspapers; he says emphatically Mr. Beecher made no denial. He goes on to say: why did he not deny it? Because a denial would have provoked contest on her part. It would have increased the discussion; it would have led to an investigation on the part of his church, and an investigation would have been ruin. Anything that tended to investigation was a ruinous defence to him, and that is what he means in his letter, and so he remains quiet and allows this story to go on uncontradicted month after month for six months, and at last he is compelled to deny it; and only when he is compelled to deny it, because of fear of more serious consequences does he hold his peace and say nothing concerning the publication of the truth or falsity of the story. I read from page 41 of the printed book.

Mr. Morris—And very good reading it is.

Mr. Shearman—Now, we offer to show that Mr. Beecher made his denial immediately, and he made it to the proper person, to his assistant in the pastorate of the church, to the clerk of the church, and desired him to communicate it to the officers of the church in meeting assembled, and that this meets all the evidence that has been put in under this opening of Mr. Morris; it meets that precise point, and shows that Mr. Beecher did perform his whole duty by making that denial through the proper channel, to the proper persons, and leaving it to the discretion of the officers of the church whether to make it public or not.

Mr. Beach—Of course, your Honor, we cannot control the counsel making such offers as they may choose, and if reputable counsel, for the object of any demonstration which it will affect, or what they suppose to be a good purpose, choose to present a proposition of evidence totally without support, or pretext of support, in any law of evidence with which we are acquainted, why, of course, we must treat it with becoming respect. What is this proposition, Sir? We present Mr. Beecher, and produce evidence of his declarations and acts, and other proofs to sustain our cause of action. In the course of the investigation it turns out that an infamous publication was made imputing to Mr. Beecher the very offense which we charge against him, and they propose to show to your Honor, in answer to our action, that when that was brought to the knowledge of Mr. Beecher in our absence, and in a confidential interview between him and his pastoral assistant, he denied it, and that is seriously urged by counsel, whose opinion is entitled to respect, of course, as proper evidence before your Honor in answer to the evidence which we have produced. Now, that is a proposition, Sir, which I do not care to argue. If your Honor can find any principle or rule of evidence which justifies proof of that character, why, of course, we must submit to any ruling you make about it.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Everts I must make the same ruling.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—I must make the same ruling, Mr. Shearman.

GETTING TESTIMONY UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, did you call a meeting of the members of Plymouth Church, of a few of the members of Plymouth Church, at or about that time? A. I did, the very evening of the afternoon that the pastor called upon me.

Q. Where did they meet? A. In the parlors of the church.

Q. Who were present? A. I cannot mention the names, but from recollection, of but few. George A. Bell was one that was present; S. V. White, Abraham Hill, Deacon Hawkins; I cannot now recall. The meeting was not a large one; it was late when I saw the pastor, and I had but very limited time—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Shearman—That is sufficient. Among these were several deacons and officers of the church? A. There were, but—

Q. Was the subject of this Woodhull publication brought up for consideration in that meeting?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I would like to know, Mr. Shearman, a little further.

Mr. Shearman—This is not to show Mr. Beecher's acts at all; this is for the purpose of showing what the independent action of the Church was.

Judge Neilson—I know that, and in my judgment, you have a right to show—I was going to suggest to you, I would like to see a little further, whether this action was one which it could be said was within the policy of the church in its course of action, official in any sense. I don't know how you do such things.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor, it was not strictly an official meeting.

Judge Neilson—Well, let us see how far it approaches; because, the moment you make it an act, why the rule is different.

Mr. Beach—Why, Sir, your Honor does not intend to say that the proceedings of a gathering of the members, or the officers, of the Church, not in the course of the discipline of the Church—

Judge Neilson—Well, that is the point; I don't know about that.

Mr. Beach—[Continuing]: And not, the judicatory action is admissible here?

Judge Neilson—It was with that view that I called the counsel's attention to the exact character of this meeting.

Mr. Beach—I understand Mr. Halliday to say that it was a voluntary meeting, called by himself, of a portion of his associates in the Church, some of whom were officers and others members of the Church.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I think I can bring this out.

Judge Neilson—I don't know how far that has appeared.

Mr. Shearman—You are familiar with the rules of the church as they existed at that time, are you not? A. I think I am pretty familiar with them, Sir.

Q. Wasn't the rule of the Church, at that time, that three members of the Board of Deacons, or three members of the Examining Committee could at any time hold a meeting?

Mr. Morris—Objected to. The rules, I suppose, are in writing?

Mr. Beach—They have a manual, I believe, showing.

Judge Neilson—If there is a written rule—

Mr. Beach—I would like to see it.

Mr. Shearman—If that is all the ground of objection we can obviate it.

Judge Neilson—Have you the rules here?

Mr. Shearman—I have no copy here. [To the witness]: Well, was the meeting held—a meeting held? A. It was; yes, Sir; there was a meeting held on Tuesday evening of that week, as I said.

Q. Can you recollect whether there were as many as three deacons present; Hawkins was a deacon, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir; and Mr. Bell.

Q. Mr. Hawkins was chairman of the Board of Deacons, wasn't he? A. And I was a member of the Board of Deacons to all intents and purposes; that is, I, ex officio, stood precisely in the same relations to the Board that the other members did.

Q. How about the Examining Committee; weren't there three or more members of the Examining Committee present? A. I cannot state that they were—all the members of the Board of Deacons were ex officio members of the Examining Committee.

Q. Yes. A. But, whether there were three—there were—whether there were three—

Q. If there were three deacons, there were three members of the Examining Committee? A. Certainly there were; but there were others beside.

Judge Neilson—Is it not true that, if the rule provides that three deacons shall be present and at least three of the Examining Committee, that that has reference to persons occupying some the one position and some the other, and not the—

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor will allow me, it is not so, I suppose, by courtesy of the counsel, I can state for the purpose of the present occasion what the rule is.

Judge Neilson—Well, give us the rule?

Mr. Shearman—That the deacons, at that time, were all members of the Examining Committee, and a meeting of the Examining Committee could be held at any time, by usage, without any notice, upon any three members, (whether they were Deacons or whether they were elected as members of the Examining Committee) coming together and deciding to hold a meeting. That has been the usage of the church for years.

Mr. Beach—And, are not these meetings of the Examining Committee contained in any record or minutes?

Mr. Shearman—Sometimes they are, and sometimes they are not.

Mr. Morris—They are; if it is an official meeting, they have a record of it.

The Witness—A record is kept.

Mr. Morris—A record is kept of every meeting, if it is a meeting.

Mr. Everts—I am not aware that there is anything in the Constitution of the United States, or of this State, that requires the proceedings of such a body to be recorded; there is nothing in the constitution of such a committee as this that requires that there be minutes. There may be by-laws.

Mr. Morris—Better look at the manual.

Mr. Beach—The counsel understands the Constitution of the State and of the United States better than he does the Constitution of Plymouth Church.

Mr. Everts—Well, I expressly said so.

Mr. Beach—Well, we had better not reason until we get them.

Mr. Everts—There is not any requirement in the constitution of Plymouth Church.

Judge Neilson—Hadjn't you better pass to some other subject?

Mr. Shearman—I will reserve this to the morning then.

Judge Neilson—Yes, it is very desirable to proceed right in the matter.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, are you acquainted with Mrs. Moulton, wife of Francis D. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; not intimately.

Q. What was the nature of your acquaintance with her, and when was it formed? A. I think I never saw Mrs. Moulton to know her until I made a call at Mr. Moulton's residence. I think in the Spring of 1873, or else in the Autumn of the previous year; my impression is that it was in the Spring of 1873.

Q. For what purpose did you call on that occasion?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Sir; I object to that.

Judge Neilson—Well, he called, and you can pass over the purpose.

The Witness—It was a simple pastoral call, just such as I make twenty-five hundred of every year.

Q. On that occasion do you remember seeing Mr. Beecher's portrait at the house? A. My attention was directed to it by Mrs. Moulton; while we were conversing about the interests of the church, Mr. Beecher's name was mentioned, and she directed my attention to Mr. Beecher's portrait.

Q. Did she say anything on the subject of the portrait of Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; that is objected to,

Judge Neilson—Whatever interrogation you put to Mrs. Moulton, you will have to repeat to him.

Mr. Shearman—The interrogation we put to Mrs. Moulton was as to the number of interviews; Mrs. Moulton was only able to recollect one.

Judge Neilson—You interrogated her beyond that in connection with the subject, I think.

Mr. Shearman—The question was about this—she could not recollect anything about the interview when Mr. Halliday saw the portrait. On that occasion, did Mrs. Moulton speak to you about Mrs. Woodhull?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I believe I did not conduct that examination in which she was asked about it.

Judge Neilson—Was Mrs. Moulton interrogated on that subject?

Mr. Shearman—I will take the word of the counsel about that; it appears not to have been asked, so I will pass over it. I will pass meanwhile to another question. We will see if the record shows. I know that this was asked: Did you have a subsequent interview with Mrs. Moulton, and, if so, when and where? A. It was on Wednesday morning, the 29th of October.

Q. The 29th or 30th?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, one moment.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I want to know if he is sure.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, let him state his own word first—Wednesday morning, the 29th of October.

The Witness—It was the 29th or 30th. If Tuesday, I could

Mr. Shearman—I don't pretend to know myself, Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Morris—Well, then, don't state.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I want to know what he says.

The Witness—It was the last Wednesday in October, and I think it was the 29th; that is my impression.

Q. But you are sure it was a Wednesday? A. I know it was, and I can tell you how I know, if it is wished.

Q. How soon was it after this meeting? A. It was the morning after this meeting.

Q. And when was that meeting held—what day of the week?

A. On Tuesday evening; the last Tuesday evening in October.

Q. 72? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you say you called upon Mrs. Moulton at her residence? A. I did.

Q. Now, will you state what occurred between you and Mrs. Moulton on Thursday evening?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—That is the interview as to which you interrogated her.

Q. Who received you at the door? A. Mrs. Moulton herself, I think.

Q. Did you then speak to her on the subject of this Woodhull scandal? A. I did.

Q. What did you say?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Have you her examination there?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir; we examined as to that.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Shearman—Did you say to her, in substance or effect, "Mrs. Moulton, what does this Woodhull business mean; how is it that your name is connected with it?" A. I think those are almost exactly the words I used.

Q. Did Mrs. Moulton answer in substance or effect, "I don't know what right Mrs. Woodhull had to use my name; I have nothing to do with it."? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then did some continuous conversation follow? Don't give it, but state if there was some more talk? A. There was.

Q. After this further conversation did Mrs. Moulton say in substance or effect: "Mr. Halliday, Mr. Beecher is my pastor and has been from my childhood and I believe in him, and they can say nothing that will lessen my confidence in him or my affection for him one particle." A. I think that is her precise language, word for word.

Q. State what was the manner and demeanor of Mrs. Moulton in saying those words?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It is to be understood that she was in earnest of course.

Mr. Beach—Sir?

Judge Neilson—That is understood; it was in earnest of course.

Mr. Shearman—That is all that we want to know—was it earnest or not? A. I regarded it so, emphatically.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir, the very form of expression would indicate that, of course.

Mr. Shearman—I conclude Mrs. Moulton was not asked with sufficient precision about the first interview to give us a right to examine if there is an objection. Mr. Halliday, during that year, 1872, and at any later period, do you remember seeing Mrs. Moulton in attendance at Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir, several times—never before—I never knew her; I may have seen her, but did not know her if I did see her, but I never—I saw her several times at the Church subsequent to that period.

Mr. Morris—It is what she said on the stand.

Mr. Shearman—Was she in the habit of speaking to any one that you know of?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—On those occasions; if so, to whom?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I was trying to avoid a leading question, but I will put it in the leading form. Was Mrs. Moulton in the habit of speaking to Mr. Beecher and you?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—We will take that.

The Witness—I think I may have seen Mrs. Moulton at the church six times since the period of my call and interview with her at her house. I never saw her at the church except she came around at the foot of the pulpit stairs, where I used to stand at Mr. Beecher's request at the close of the service—came around and if Mr. Beecher was not where he could shake hands and speak with her she would wait until he came and did so, and I think I invariably shook hands with her on those occasions. I don't think that the number of times exceeded six; it may not have been more than four; I think certainly, six—as many as six times.

Q. On every one of those occasions did she shake hands and speak with Mr. Beecher? A. I think invariably; I think her object was not—

Mr. Fullerton—No; never mind her object, Mr. Halliday.

Judge Neilson—You have answered.

THE BOARD OF DEACONS AND THE SCANDAL.

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday, did you shortly after this meeting which you have spoken of attend a regular monthly meeting of the Board of Deacons of Plymouth Church? A. I did on the following Wednesday; on the same Wednesday evening that I saw Mrs. Tilton—Mrs. Moulton.

Q. Now, at that meeting can you recollect how many deacons were present? A. I cannot, Sir; it was a very full meeting of the Board of Deacons, I think.

Q. It was a regular stated meeting, was it? A. The regular monthly meeting held the last Wednesday evening in every month at that time.

Q. Now, at that meeting was the question of the policy to be adopted by the church with regard to this Woodhull scandal brought up for consideration?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Halliday, at such meetings is there a record kept of the proceedings—entry made? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You propose to bring that in in the morning, I suppose?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir, to bring in what?

Judge Neilson—The record. He says there is a record kept.

Mr. Shearman—Oh! well we can bring the record in, but that will not show. The record, of course, as in every properly kept record, only shows resolutions that were passed.

Mr. Morris—Is that all the record shows? I was not aware of it.

Mr. Shearman—Why, certainly.

The Witness—May I say to the court that at this meeting of the Board of Deacons, the regular business of the Board of Deacons was transacted and ended.

Judge Neilson—And that much of it would be on record? A. The regular meeting—the ordinary business of the Board of Deacons is recorded, and after this—

Mr. Beach—Please not state what occurred after.

Mr. Shearman—Now, Mr. Halliday, suppose we confine ourselves strictly to business, as I am afraid the gentlemen will object to something that you say.

The Witness—I was speaking to the Court, and supposed I had a right to.

Judge Neilson—Yes, you had a right to.

Mr. Evans—Yes, you had a right to speak to the Court.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, I think you did right, but I think we had better go on this way now. I understand your Honor to allow this question, whether this subject was brought up for discussion?

Judge Neilson—Well, I want to know whether he was there in such a relation to the church as to be in to any extent officially. You can show any official act freely right through.

Mr. Shearman—Well, that is one of the course of official acts.

Judge Neilson—I don't know.

THE ACTION OF THE DEACONS OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Beach—In what view of this case does your Honor hold that they can show any official act of Plymouth Church?

Judge Neilson—That is my present view; I may alter it when better advised.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor permit me to suggest to you that we have given in evidence certain proceedings before the church in regard to Mr. West's charges. We have given no other proceedings. The record of those proceedings has been presented to your Honor, and there has been parol evidence of the action that was taken upon several occasions upon the charges presented by Mr. West. Mr. Bell, also, has given considerable evidence upon the same subject by parol. Now, upon what principle are the defendants permitted to give in evidence the proceedings of Plymouth Church, or any of its officers or members upon any other occasions than those to which we have directed attention.

Mr. Morris—And at those Mr. Beecher was present. Mr. Beecher participated in those.

Mr. Beach—Oh! well, I think we have given evidence, I think, of proceedings at some of the meetings of the deacons, or the examining Committee when Mr. Beecher was not present, though not to any material extent. Our evidence was confined mostly to the action which was taken, or the non-action, the action which was refused upon the West charges, and nothing else. Our examination has been confined to that, and I ask your Honor to consider under what rule of evidence the defendants, in answer to that proof, may give testimony of the general action of the church, or its judicatory, upon the subject of this scandal. If upon the subject of the West charges, that presents a different consideration, which we will attend to if it ever arises, but upon the general action of the church manifesting any general disposition upon the part of the congregation or its officers, upon the general subject of this scandal, why, I submit with great confidence to your Honor that it is inadmissible. We were not present; we have given no evidence to which that sort of proof will be a legitimate answer. True, Sir, we have by our proof attempted to make the imputation upon Mr. Beecher that he was repressing examination, but it is not by general evidence; it is by proof of specific instances, of specific acts, of specific declarations made by Mr. Beecher, all which we could give in evidence. Your Honor has already ruled that they cannot answer this class of proof by evidence of other declarations at other times to which we have not directed attention and in the absence of Mr. Tilton. And this proof now proposed comes under the same principle, and is liable to the same objection. We have given no authenticity to those acts or proceedings of the members or the officers of that church, which they now propose to give; we have not referred to that in any mode; we have not adopted that in any form. The question as to the general subject of this scandal, and the action of the church in regard to it, has not been introduced by us in any form. It is only the West charges and the proceedings of Mr. Beecher with reference to these specific charges to which we have directed our proof, and I again repeat to your Honor that it is a subject which ought to be, I think, considered with some deliberation, whether we are to receive the general action of this church and its members with reference to these general charges. It opens a pretty wide issue.

Judge Neilson—Not the general action of the church, and its members, but the official act of the church as a corporation.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir; what have we to do with the official acts of the church or the corporation. We have to do with the action of Mr. Beecher, not with the action of the church, except so far as we have gone into it in connection with the action of Mr. Beecher. That is all the proof we have given, and that is all the materiality that the action of that church has to the issue in this case: they cannot give the declarations of Mr. Beecher upon any other occasion that we have referred to.

Judge Neilson—Oh! that is true of course.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has already ruled that. Well, upon what principle, Sir, do you allow them to give the declarations of the officers of his church, or his underlings in that institution—yes, underlings, and not offensively, either, Sir; it is rather a compliment to be an underling to the greatest man on the face of the earth! [Laughter.]

The Witness—It is.

Mr. Beach—I speak it in no offensive sense, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, the question is whether the distinction in this regard between acts generally which might indicate the views of certain members of the church or, on the other hand, acts, any official act, which indicates the action of the church itself and would bind the church—

Mr. Beach—The church, Sir? we are not contesting this issue with the church; it is not the action of the church, or its officers, which is to give character and complexion to this trial; it is the action of Mr. Beecher and Mr. Beecher alone, and his action could neither be excused nor colored by the action of his church, we charge him with an attempt to suppress all notice of this scandal upon his own action, upon his individual declarations, upon the course of conduct which he personally pursued, and we have not attempted to charge him with the action of the church, except so far as he has directly and immediately, through the proof which we have given, exerted himself to control that action. Now, it seems to me, Sir, the most monstrous proposition, that when this is an issue between individuals, and when Mr. Beecher is to be judged by his own declarations and acts, and nothing else—a monstrous proposition that the action of his church upon the general subject of this scandal—I mean the church in its official character, by its judicatories, can be given in evidence to bear upon the issue as between these two private individuals. And it is suggested, Sir, what limit will there be to this line of inquiry? If the gentleman can give the action of the Examining Committee, or the Board of Deacons, in any of the forms of their polity, what hinders them from proving also that there was a Committee—an Examining Committee—appointed in the course of the discipline of the church, and under the direction of the pastor, and proving what transpired before that Committee, and approving the exonerating report of the Committee? Where is to be the limit, if we are to enter upon the action of this official body in all the lines and courses of its discipline?

Judge Neilson—The Examining Committee and its report is not part of the corporate action of the church.

Mr. Morris—Yes; but they did take action upon it; the Examining Committee and the church did.

Judge Neilson—I know they reported upon it.

Mr. Morris—No; the Committee adopted it specially.

Mr. Beach—That is, this became a part—the report of this Investigating Committee became a part—of the regular and official action of the Examining Committee of the church.

Mr. Morris—Mr. Belcher swore to that positively and distinctly.

Mr. Beach—And that is but an illustration, Sir, of the impropriety of this kind of testimony. But I ask your Honor again to recur to principle and to find some doctrine, Sir, of the rule of evidence upon which Mr. Tilton is to be concluded or affected by the action of the officials of Plymouth Church. We are aware, Sir, that we are considerably affected by their unofficial action, but when it comes to proof of their official proceedings before this Court, we protest against its admission.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, this matter lies in a nutshell, and your Honor's ruling seems to me as plainly right as it does to my learned opponent monstrously wrong. The plaintiff first introduced evidence to affect Mr. Beecher as the defendant in this case, towards Mr. Tilton, the plaintiff, by making his conduct in question on the principal issue determinable in some degree by his conduct during the series of years following the alleged fault or crime, and the inquiry now brought into Court. And as a part of that conduct of the defendant, there comes to be a line of proceeding which, it is said, indicates consciousness of guilt, because of continued efforts of suppression, and that it was natural and suitable and moral that this religious society, through its appropriate channels, should initiate and prosecute and develop inquiries, and that I think my learned friends have gone so far as to intimate that it is presumable that they would do so, and the suppression must be charged to the pastor, who was said to be the master of their consciences and conduct. Something of that kind, a little redundant, no doubt.

Mr. Beach—Who do you attribute that to.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I attribute that to the plaintiff's counsel.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, it is not attributable to me, and I do not think to any of the other counsel.

Mr. Swarts—I think I can find it in the record. Now, if your Honor please, we have, then, their selection out of certain step, of the action of the church and society, or its subordinate committees, which, we think, carries that impression, and they give properly, we may suppose, for that is their present suggestion, the occurrences that surround the West charges, which were in the Summer first, and then the Fall of 1878. And all of that had its pertinence and its efficacy such as they might be from the relation to the disclosure of the Woodhull scandal to the public, and to the treatment or non-treatment of it in a way that would be consistent with the innocence of Mr. Beecher, and as they allege, was only compatible with his guilt. Now we take up, not the step necessarily that they produced, but we take up earlier and antecedent and immediate action of the church, laying down as the initial, and as the spontaneous, and as the independent action, a proposition of the church itself, unawed by Mr. Beecher's authority, unaffected by his influence, uninspired by his suggestions, and we introduce that as the action of this body, pronouncing against and suppressing inquiry as unnecessary in the vindication of their pastor. Now, our learned friends, when they introduce a remote line of inquiry which they think bears on their side of the case must not quarrel either with the limit or the range of the opposite inquiry, by which we establish that all this that they think is chargeable to the pastor is not chargeable to him, but is the action of others. Now, that is the proposition of law concerning which I understand your Honor to have ruled that we are entitled to that line or proposition of evidence.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor has not ruled that. It is very easy, Sir, for a logician by assuming his premises to reach a desired conclusion. The counsel assumes that we have adopted what he calls "a line of inquiry," for the purpose of sustaining the imputation which we make, that Mr. Beecher has persistently and continually struggled for the suppression of all investigation of this alleged scandal. What does he mean, Sir, by "a line of inquiry?" and what is the "line of inquiry," which we have adopted? When that is discovered, Sir, the gentleman will not find me objecting to any answer or to any range or extension of that line of inquiry. But when he assumes that by pursuing a particular line of inquiry that authorizes him to introduce incompetent and immaterial evidence in consequence of that which we have given, he must permit me to dispute that proposition. Now, Sir, we have given no proof of the action of Plymouth Church in any single particular.

Judge Neilson—Except the reception of the West charges.

Mr. Beach—Not in any single particular have we given a syllable of proof in regard to the action of Plymouth Church. We proved the West charges presented. We traced them to the presence of Mr. Beecher; we traced his action and his declarations in regard to those charges; and it was the other side who brought in the action of the church and the church records for the purpose of correcting the recollection of Mr. West upon an incidental inquiry which we made. The mere fact which we proved, that Mr. West presented those charges to the Examining Committee without pursuing that inquiry further, involved us in no degree with the action of Plymouth Church, even upon those specific charges. But, suppose it were otherwise, Sir. Suppose we had proven the presentation of these charges and the action of the Examining Committee upon them. Does that allow them—and your Honor will remember, for the purpose of correcting my statement, that we were permitted to prove nothing which took place before the Examining Committee, unless Mr. Beecher was present—that they stopped us with an objection, as the records will show, and that we were driven from proof upon that subject, under that objection. But suppose we had proven the action which the Committee—the Examining Committee, or the Board of Deacons, or whatever the authority may have been—upon the West charges; does that authorize them to go into a different character of proof, and a different action of the officers of that church, for the purpose of showing that they acted independently of Mr. Beecher? Our object was not to prove, and we did not attempt to prove, that the action of the official body of that church was controlled at all by Mr. Beecher. We proved his action and his declaration to individual members of that congregation. It was not upon or through the official bodies that he operated in their official character. It was by his private and confidential influence, exerted upon them as individuals, through which we endeavored to trace his object, and purpose and motive, and it is the only way in which we did do so, Sir. We did not complicate ourselves by any evidence with the action of the indicators of the church. Now, Sir, without pursuing this, will your Honor please find, in deciding this question, some rule or principle of evidence which will allow them to give in testimony as against Mr. Tilton the action of the official bodies of Plymouth Church upon the general subject of this scandal, whether that action was in subordination to the influence of Mr. Beecher, or whether it was irrespective of any suggestions upon his part. And, when your Honor has ruled that it is not proper upon the part of the defense to counteract the force of evidence which we give of specific declarations and acts of Mr. Beecher, by proving declarations and acts having a different significance and a different effect upon their actions when we were not present, how it is, if Mr. Beecher's acts in our absence and declarations may not be proven, the actions of his church can be?

THE RECORDS OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—My own view is this, that the defendant's counsel is at liberty to bring in to-morrow morning the official records of the church, and to put in evidence any record he may have touching this subject, either considering and favoring an investigation as to the Woodhull scandal, or determining not to investigate the Woodhull scandal, proposing silence, making that the action and policy of the church. But it cannot be done by informal conversations which might occur one evening and be forgotten the next. Mr. Shearman has such records; he will bring them in to-morrow morning.

The jury will attend to-morrow morning, please, at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please read page 389 of the record; and what follows.

Mr. Pearsall—Page 390, also.

The Court then adjourned to eleven o'clock Wednesday morning.

FORTY-SIXTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MR. TILTON AT HOME AND ABROAD.

THE PLAINTIFF'S INSINUATIONS TO MR. HALLIDAY ABOUT MR. BEECHER—TESTIMONY OF MRS. LUCY W. MITCHELL, REGARDING MR. TILTON DURING MRS. TILTON'S ILLNESS—THE REV. JOHN L. GAY GIVES MR. TILTON'S UTTERANCES ABOUT MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

WEDNESDAY, March 17, 1875.

There was a delay of about fifteen minutes in beginning the day's work, Mr. Shearman alone of the defendant's counsel being present at the opening of the court. The Rev. Mr. Halliday again took the witness stand and continued his testimony until requested to give way for Mrs. Lucy W. Mitchell, who could not conveniently remain in Brooklyn to testify, as she was taking care of a sick lady in New-Jersey. What testimony Mr. Halliday did give was about Mr. Tilton's statements to him in reference to the Woodhull scandal. On one occasion Mr. Tilton had said to the witness, "The story is just as false as it would be for me to go over to New-York and say that the tree in front of Mr. Halliday's house is covered with the flags of all nations." But later in the same conversation Mr. Tilton had thrown out insinuations about Mr. Beecher, and had declared that Francis D. Moulton had documents which would corroborate those insinuations. He added that Mr. Beecher was a coward, and that if he (Mr. Beecher) had courage to go to Plymouth Church and tell them the truth they would excuse him. Mr. Tilton declared that his wife was pure.

Mrs. Mitchell here took the witness stand. She gave her testimony in a very quiet, unembarrassed manner and in tones scarcely audible, except to those nearest to her. She had been Mrs. Tilton's nurse on different occasions between the years 1867 and 1871. After some general testimony regarding the condition of Mrs. Tilton's health, the witness told what she had seen and heard during the latter part of the year 1870. Mr. Tilton came home one day and declared that he was a ruined man, saying that he had been discharged from The Brooklyn Union, and upon hearing this Miss Bessie Turner fell down upon a lounge and appeared to the witness to be crying. The witness was here interrogated as to the effect which Mr. Tilton's excited talk produced on Mrs. Tilton. The plaintiff's counsel objected strenuously to these questions on the ground that the witness was not an expert, and obtained favorable rulings on this point. Mr. Evarts, however, kept putting cognate questions, and the discussion grew warm. When quiet was restored Mr. Evarts put another question of a like nature, and Mr. Beach rose with a flushed face to protest again, but something in Mr. Evarts's look stopped him, and the two lawyers, after eyeing each other for a few seconds, burst into a hearty laugh, and the dispute ended without further argument. The witness then related what had occurred on the evening of December 30, 1870. Mr. Beecher called and saw Mrs. Tilton in her room for about an hour, the witness going down stairs. Mr. Tilton was not at home at the time. After Mr. Beecher left, the witness went to bed, sleeping, as was her custom then, with Mrs. Tilton, who was in delicate health. Late in the night the witness was awakened by hearing Mr. Tilton talking with his wife. The witness then went into the study, on the same floor. She heard Mr. Tilton talking with Mrs. Tilton in loud and angry tones, and the latter answering with a voice of entreaty. Soon afterward Mr. Tilton came into the study, where the witness was, and got paper, ink, and pens, and went back to his wife's room.

Mrs. Mitchell was cross-examined rigorously by Mr. Fullerton. She remembered that Mrs. Tilton was very weak and low after this interview with her husband, but she did not remember noticing any change in her condition when she saw her after Mr. Beecher's call on the same evening.

The defendant's counsel then called John L. Gay, an Episcopal clergyman of Bloomington, Ind. He testified that in 1873 he was a professor in a college at that place, when Mr. Tilton delivered a lecture in the college chapel before the faculty and male and female students of the institution. The title of the lecture said the witness, was "Home, Sweet Home," but the subject was marriage and divorce. Mr. Gay then gave what he remembered of the lecture with a force and emphasis which indicated clearly what his own views of the lecturer's notions were. Mr. Tilton had inveighed against the Church and

State, and had declared that he would crush them if he had his way. On the marriage question he had expressed the view that the consent of the parties was the main thing necessary to constitute a valid marriage. "That's pretty good law," was Mr. Beach's parenthesis on this. The witness concluded with the positive and amusing statement that these views were expressed "before forty-two to forty-four female students."

Mr. Morris cross-examined Mr. Gay with a zest which, in connection with the replies of the witness, kept the court-room in a tumult of laughter during the last hour of the day. It appeared that the President of the college had presided at the lecture of Mr. Tilton, and that the latter had lectured before the same audience on the following day at the request of the students. The witness had protested against Mr. Tilton's lecture. Mr. Morris read a set of resolutions passed by the audience thanking Mr. Tilton and condemning the course of the professor. "Were these passed?" he inquired of the witness. "Yes, I believe they did pass some such indecent resolutions," was the reply. It also appeared that he was compelled to resign in consequence of his action. On the redirect examination Mr. Evarts proposed to put in the letters of the witness to Mr. Shearman. Mr. Beach objected. Judge Neilson remarked that he had looked them over, and did not think that the defense would wish to introduce them. "After that remark," said Mr. Evarts, "I am afraid the other side will wish them." "Oh, we have read them," retorted Mr. Fullerton, "and it appears that the reverend gentleman has been doing a little missionary work on the other side." The witness, who had kept his temper perfectly up to this, seemed somewhat angry, and appealed to the Court that he ought to be protected from sneers. "So you ought," said Judge Neilson. Mr. Beach, however, gave the day a pleasant ending by saying to the witness, "There was no sneer. A clergyman could not find a better field for missionary work than among the counsel for the defense," and the witness left the stand as cheerfully as he had come to it.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

ASSISTANT PASTOR HALLIDAY RECALLED.

It was ten minutes past eleven when the day's work was begun. The delay was caused by the tardiness of Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Morris—Are we not ready to proceed, your Honor?

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, can we proceed?

Mr. Shearman—I will proceed. Counsel will be here in a moment. Mr. Halliday.

Samuel B. Halliday was recalled, and the direct examination resumed.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I do not propose to go into the questions that were raised last evening until Mr. Evarts arrives. I will take up another subject with Mr. Halliday.

MR. HALLIDAY DOES JUSTICE TO MRS. MOULTON.

The Witness—If it please the Court, I would like to make an explanation, or at least an emendation, of my testimony yesterday.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

The Witness—Thinking that I did, or I might have done an injustice to Mrs. Moulton, not by anything that I said, but what I neglected to say, or had no opportunity to say—

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I said in my testimony that Mrs. Moulton directed me to Mr. Beecher's portrait, and that we arose and walked together to look at the portrait. While I was looking at the portrait, Mrs. Moulton turned to other pictures and to the lights near them, turning on the gas so that I could see those pictures as well as that of Mr. Beecher, directing my attention specially to those as pictures of great value. Leaving my testimony where I did, I felt that it was due to Mrs. Moulton that I should state that.

Judge Neilson—It is very proper, Sir.

THE TILTON-HALLIDAY-BELL INTERVIEW.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, do you remember an interview that you had with Mr. Tilton in November, 1872? A. I do, very distinctly.

Q. Will you state on what day, and at what time of day, and where that interview was held? A. It was at my house, 87 Hicks-st., on Monday morning, the 18th of November, not earlier than a quarter-past, nor later than half-past nine o'clock.

Q. Who were present at that interview? A. For the first few moments, Mr. Tilton and myself only.

Q. After that who? A. After Mr. Moulton had been in—Mr. Tilton had been in the house perhaps five minutes, Mr. George A. Bell called to see me, and was introduced into the room where we were.

Q. Now, will you state what took place on that occasion, of course only in the presence of Mr. Tilton? A. After Mr. Bell had finished the object, or at least had spoken to me of the object upon which he had called, he turned to go. Mr. Tilton said: "George, don't go." Mr. Bell looked at me as, though not speaking, as if inquiring, by the expression of his face, if he should remain; I answered: "Certainly, if Mr. Tilton desires it." Do you desire me to state the conversation?

Q. Proceed and state the conversation. A. Before Mr. Tilton—Mr. Bell came in; Mr. Tilton had said about this, and I think scarcely more: "Mr. Halliday, I have called at the request of my friend Frank D. Moulton to speak to you"—I can't tell certainly whether he said "speak to you," or whether he said "to contradict the Woodhull scandal." When Mr. Bell had sat down to remain at the interview, he repeated in substance to Mr. Bell, and myself again, what he had already said to me. He commenced very deliberately and continued so to speak of the scandal, saying that it was entirely untrue, without a shadow of truth, closing what he had to say—if I remember, there was but little said about this subject after he used these words: "It is just as false as it would be for me to go over to New-York and say that the tree in front of Mr. Halliday's house is covered with 500 flags, representing all the nations of the earth," pointing with his finger to the tree, as he sat upon the sofa—pointing with his finger to the tree in front of the house.

Q. Go on; what else occurred? A. I cannot repeat very much more. Those were the words that struck me so particularly—or very particularly, at least, in connection with that part of his conversation. After perhaps talking about it—there were other things said that I cannot recall. I may recall them, and shall be glad to speak of them if I can.

Q. Was anything said by you? A. I don't think I said a single word at this period of the conversation.

Q. Very good. A. After Mr. Tilton had spoken very specifically in regard to the Woodhull scandal he said—I can't be positive as to the words, but it was equivalent to saying: "This is not all my case against Mr. Beecher. My wife is as pure as the light." I think he added: "Ask Mr. Beecher; he will tell you that she is as pure as gold, as pure as an angel." I am not positive; I think he added those words to the other phrase. Then he commenced a series of insinuations against Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Morris—Well!

Mr. Shearman—Give the substance. A. I cannot.

Q. As nearly as you can? A. I cannot.

Mr. Morris—We move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

The Witness—I said—may I say, your Honor, I don't know whether it is proper—that I said nothing at that stage of the conversation. There were repeated efforts on my part and on Mr. Bell's part to get—

Mr. Beach—These general declarations, Sir, we object to.

Judge Neilson—I think that will do.

Mr. Morris—Better answer questions.

Mr. Shearman—Is that all that you have to say about that interview? A. I have only to say that he would not specify any charge.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, one moment!

Mr. Shearman—Did you ask him to specify charges? A. I did.

Q. What did you say to him on that subject? A. I don't remember the language that I used.

Q. The substance? A. But repeatedly I tried to get him to specify something against Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Morris—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—The practice is—

Mr. Morris—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—[Continuing.] To state the conversation in the words, if the witness remembers, and if not, then to give the conversation in substance, as you remember it.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton said distinctly that Mr. Moulton had documents corroborative of all that he was insinuating against Mr. Beecher, and referred me to Mr. Moulton, desiring me to go and see Mr. Moulton and get sight of these. Mr. Bell spoke up and said: "Mayn't I go with Mr. Halliday and see Mr. Moulton?" Mr. Bell said, "No." Mr. Tilton said: "No; he won't want to see you, but he will show them to Mr. Halliday."

Q. You have stated all that you now recollect of this conversation? A. All that I can recall at this moment.

Q. All that you can recall without suggestion. Was anything said about the Woodhull scandal being a fabrication? A. He spoke of it as such. Now I can remember, since that question was asked, something that he said in the other part of the story, while he was making these insinuations. It was in reference to this Woodhull story, or rather in reference to the "Life of Mrs. Woodhull." He began to make an apology for writing the life, and said that he did that for the purpose of keeping Mrs. Woodhull still.

Q. Anything more said about that, or the Woodhull scandal, either? A. I don't recall anything more at the moment.

Q. Was anything said about his surprise when it appeared? A. Yes, Sir; he said that he was away campaigning in New-Hampshire when that made its appearance, and that when it came to light he was utterly astounded, and that he saw Mr. Beecher on the morning of his return from New-Hampshire, at Frank Moulton's house, and expressed to him his surprise and his sorrow at its appearance, and offering to do anything that he could to counteract the influence or the effect of the scandal; and said, in addition, that he sat down and wrote, if I remember right, three notes in Mr. Moulton's library, for publication. One not answering the purpose, another was written, and then another, and that that note was shown to counsel, and by their advice it never was published.

Q. He did not mention what counsel, perhaps? A. No, Sir. I think—I did ask him at one time, but he refused to give me the name; yes, at that interview he would not give me the name of the counsel.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton in that interview, in the course of what you have described as his insinuations, in any way allege that Mr. Beecher had committed adultery?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; one moment.

Mr. Shearman—Well, this is to show a negative.

Judge Neilson—Ask him if he said anything on that subject.

Mr. Shearman—Did Mr. Tilton say anything on the subject of adultery; if so, what? A. The word "adultery" was not used, but he spoke of the offense that Mr. Beecher had committed as comparatively venial, for he spoke of it in this way: he said Mr. Beecher was a coward; if he would go to the church—have a little courage and go to the church and state what occurred, that the thing could be settled at once, that the church would not hold anything against him, that they would forgive him; he spoke of it in this way.

Mr. Morris—I object, if your Honor please, to the witness characterizing the language. The word "venial" is not a proper word. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. Shearman—It seems to me that that is perfectly proper.

Mr. Morris—It is proper that the witness should give the language, but is it proper that he should characterize it?

Judge Neilson—No; the word is not necessary.

Mr. Morris—The jury will draw the inference. I move that that be stricken out—that word.

Judge Neilson—The word is not necessary to the understanding of the statement; the statement is sufficient. Strike that word out.

Mr. Morris—The remark that I object to is that he spoke of Mr. Beecher's offense as being "comparatively venial." I move that those words be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—They are. They are not necessary to the statement of the witness.

Mr. Everts—Counsel will be so good as to let us understand what the words are.

Mr. Morris—He spoke of Mr. Beecher's offense as being comparatively venial.

Mr. Everts—Just let me see the part that is left out and know just what that part was.

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Just fix it so that we may know what it is.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer [reading]—"The word adultery was not used, but he spoke of the offense that Mr. Beecher had committed as comparatively venial, for he spoke of it in this way."

Mr. Everts—Strike out the words "he spoke of it as comparatively venial for." The rest is good evidence.

Mr. Morris—The rest we don't object to.

Judge Neilson—"He spoke of the offense in this way," that is the way it reads.

Mr. Everts—I think it goes right, with the exception of what your Honor has very properly—I want to ask from the Court and from my learned friends permission to suspend the examination of this witness for the sake of calling Mrs. Lucy W. Mitchell, who is a nurse attending upon the sick, and leaving the sick for the purpose of being here.

Judge Neilson—I presume there is no objection; the witness can stand aside.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. LUCY W. MITCHELL.

Mrs. Lucy W. Mitchell was here sworn on behalf of defendant:

Mr. Everts—Mrs. Mitchell, where is your residence? A. 118 Prospect-place.

Q. In Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been a resident of Brooklyn? A. About twenty years.

Q. Are you a widow? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you—what has been your employment here in Brooklyn? A. Nurse, for the past twelve years.

Q. In what employment as a nurse? A. Monthly nurse.

Q. Monthly nurse. Have you had a considerable experience in attending women in confinement in Brooklyn? A. I have.

Q. In how many cases have you been thus employed? A. About fifty.

Q. And running through what period of years? A. Well, for about fifteen years.

Q. Fifteen years. Have you also attended ladies in confinement in other places than Brooklyn? A. I have.

Q. In New-York? A. Some in New-York, and Plainfield, and Orange.

Q. Are you now attendant upon a lady, and where? A. In Plainfield, New-Jersey.

MRS. TILTON'S HEALTH IN 1869-'70.

Q. When did you first become acquainted with Mrs. Tilton, and in what manner? A. In 1869; at the birth of Paul, in December, 1869.

Q. Did you attend her during that confinement? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And subsequently did you remain in attendance upon her during that confinement? A. I was there three months; I was there from the 17th of December to the 1st of April, at that time.

Q. From the 17th of December, 1869, to the 17th of April, 1870? A. 1869, yes, Sir; to the 1st day of April, 1870.

Q. To the first day of April, 1870. And when again did you attend upon Mrs. Tilton? A. In June, 1869, the 30th of June.

Q. Upon what birth? A. The birth of Ralph.

Q. And how long did you attend upon her then? A. I was there two weeks.

Q. From the day of the birth, two weeks onward? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then leaving? A. Then I had to—then I had to go to Orange to attend a lady there.

Q. Did you leave her in a comfortable condition then? A. Well, pretty comfortable; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you afterwards—were you afterwards sent for to return? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About when was that? A. Well, that was the week after the 4th of July.

Q. And did you remain in attendance thereafter, and for how long? A. About a week.

Q. About a week? A. At that time.

Q. When next were you in attendance upon Mrs. Tilton in illness? A. In December, at a miscarriage.

Q. Yes, December, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And were you with her? A. I was sent for on Saturday, and remained until the 2d day of January.

Q. Yes, you came on Saturday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The 24th day of December? A. Yes, Sir, and I was there until the 2d day of January.

Q. Yes; during the Winter of 1869-8, when you were so long an inmate of the house of Mrs. Tilton, was she an invalid all that time, or how otherwise were you retained so long? A. No, Sir, she was not an invalid all the time; I stayed and took care of the baby. The baby was brought up on a bottle, and then she had milk legs.

Q. Yes, a sickness following upon confinement? A. A confinement, yes, Sir—she was not very strong.

Q. And the child was brought up by your hand? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not by the breast? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mrs. Mitchell, you stated, originally, you had known Mrs. Tilton since 1867? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was at the birth of Paul? A. I think that was my first acquaintance.

Q. Yes, in December, 1867, Paul was born? A. Well, 1867—December, 1867—Paul was born the first day of December.

Q. 1867? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, then, the other is wrong.

Mr. Beach—She stated a different year.

Mr. Everts—Yes, she did afterwards, but originally she stated her first acquaintance was at Paul's birth, and that is the date of the acquaintance.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, then, she did not remain until April 1st, 1868.

Mr. Everts—No; you remained until April 1st, 1868? A. 1868; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, during all that period that you were with Mrs. Tilton in 1867 and 1868, were you in the house any great part yourself personally? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What part of the time was Mr. Tilton absent? A. I think he was absent from January—I don't remember what time in January—he went away until about the middle of March, as near as I can recollect.

Q. Of 1868? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, in your acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton, did you become well acquainted with her? A. I did, I think.

Q. Did you observe her disposition and conduct as a wife and a mother? A. I did.

Q. How was she in these respects? A. Why, I think she was a very superior wife and mother—very excellent.

Q. How in regard to disposition was she? A. Very good disposition; very kind and obliging; I think she was a very superior woman.

Q. And how in regard to her habit of domesticity, or being away from her home? A. She was generally at home.

Q. Did you notice in that regard? A. Yes, Sir; she always was while I was there.

Q. I mean, of course, when you were there. A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER NOT A FREQUENT CALLER.

Q. Now, during the period that you were in attendance, that you were living in the house after Paul's birth, during that three months, did you observe anything in regard to any calls by Mr. Beecher at the house? A. I did not.

Q. Was there any frequency in his calls at that time? A. No, Sir; there was not.

Q. Did you ever see during that period any intercourse between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, what was your habit, Mrs. Mitchell, as to being at home during the day, during the evening, and during the night, during that whole period? A. I was in the habit of being at home.

Q. All the while? A. Yes, Sir; very seldom went out.

Q. During Ralph's confinement, please say where the sick room was and how it was arranged in respect to any other room? A. It was one of the front rooms of the house, closed with folding doors, separated with folding doors.

Q. On the second floor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is up one flight of stairs? A. Up one flight of stairs.

Q. And what was the habit in regard to those folding doors? A. Generally had them open. In the Winter time we had the heat from the front room.

Q. From that room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Yes. A. Well, they were the same—about the same as one room, because we generally had the doors open.

Q. The fire-place or source of warmth was in the room other than that in which the bed was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you know anything about Kate Carey, or Kate, being there as a monthly nurse? A. I saw her there.

Q. At which of your attendances at confinements—the first or the last—did you see Kate Carey? A. The second, when Ralph was born.

Q. The second; to which you were there twice? A. Oh, the second time.

Q. The second time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you came back and spent a week, was it? A. Yes, Sir; she was there then.

Q. What, anything in Mrs. Tilton's health had called you back for that week? A. She had taken cold.

Q. And was sick? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you observe anything in regard to this nurse, this wet nurse, during this short time that you were there with her?

Mr. Fullerton—That is not evidence, Sir, I believe.

Mr. Everts—Why?

Mr. Fullerton—I can only say, because it is not. What she observed with regard to Kate Carey is not evidence in this case.

Mr. Everts—What she observed in her conduct?

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly not; you cannot impeach a witness in that way.

Mr. Everts—I am not impeaching her in any unsuitable way. It is not a matter—it is not any conversation—it is not a conversation of hers that I am attempting to bring in.

Mr. Morris—How does it impeach her?

Mr. Everts—Impeaches her by showing her conduct.

Mr. Morris—That is not the way to do it.

Mr. Everts—Not without asking her.

Mr. Beach—You cannot do it if you do ask her.

Mr. Everts—By contradicting her?

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Everts—Well, that depends on whether it is what is called collateral or whether it is part of this very business in which she was attending.

Mr. Beach—It is perfectly well settled, your Honor, that a witness cannot be attacked by showing particular acts of conduct.

Judge Neilson—You had better pass that, Mr. Everts.

Mr. Everts—Well, Sir, it is not of importance enough to—we won't insist upon it. [To the witness.]

Q. Now, at this confinement of Paul—of Ralph—and at either of your attendances, either the first fortnight or the second time that you were there a week, did you see or know of any call or visit of Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; I knew—at least they said he called at the door; but I did not see him.

Q. You did not see him? A. No; he left a basket of flowers.

Q. You know of a basket of flowers being brought up into that sick room, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They were brought up as coming from Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that—the first time you were there, or the last? A. The first.

Q. The first. How soon after the confinement—after the birth? A. I don't remember whether it was the first or second week.

Q. Now, during that attendance upon Mrs. Tilton, did you see Mr. Beecher in the house at all? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did you, in any way, know of his being in the sick room? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where were you generally, during that time, day and night? A. I was there in the sick room.

Q. No exception? A. I don't remember; I might perhaps have gone out for a few moments, but I am not in the habit of going out.

Q. It was your duty to be there? A. My duty to be always with the sick.

Q. Now, Madam, when and how did you come to attend upon Mrs. Tilton at the time of her miscarriage? A. I was sent for to come, one Saturday evening.

Q. And did you go immediately? A. I did.

Q. How far gone with child was she at this miscarriage? A. About three months.

Q. What did you find her condition of health and strength when you first commenced attending upon her at that time? A. I found her in a very weak—and seemed to be some trouble, I think, on her mind.

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment; I move to strike out that.

Judge Neilson—Strike out the word "seemed" and what follows.

Mr. Evarts—I don't care about it; I was not pursuing that inquiry; it was her condition of health and strength—her bodily condition of health and strength.

The Witness—Well, she seemed to have trouble on her mind.

Mr. Evarts—No matter about her mind; I am now speaking about when you first went there, what was her condition—

The Witness—Well, she seemed very weak.

Q. Had she suffered at that time when you first went there? A. She had.

Q. Had she suffered from loss of blood? A. She had.

Q. And please state to what extent of effect upon her strength and appearance? A. Well, she had not—she had been ill for a week, nearly.

Q. Yes, before you came? A. Yes, Sir, and she was in a very weak, critical condition. I considered her so.

Q. At the time you first commenced? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how ill was she during the following week, say from the Saturday that you commenced until the following Saturday? A. Why she was very ill; more so than I had ever seen her before.

Q. Comparing her condition of strength—her weakness at this time—how did it compare with what you had seen her in her confinements? A. Well, she was much more reduced this time; her sickness was much more severe.

Q. Now, during that whole week, how did you look upon her condition of health as respects difficulty or danger?

THE NURSE NOT AN EXPERT.

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—She has answered that; says she was in a very critical condition.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if she continued that through the week.

Judge Neilson—Whether that continued, I think she can state.

Q. How long did you consider her as continuing in a critical condition?

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor think she is competent to express an opinion upon that subject?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—She is not an expert.

Judge Neilson—She is somewhat of an expert.

Mr. Evarts—I think the witness is competent. She is a nurse.

Mr. Fullerton—[Turning to Mr. Evarts.] I know that you think so.

Mr. Evarts—How do you know I think so?

Mr. Fullerton—Because you said so; I take your word. If you don't think so, you should not have said so. But she is not competent to express an opinion upon that subject by any means.

Judge Neilson—The point presented is very simple. She is sick, weak, and supposed to be in a critical condition one week, and the question is whether that appears to continue the next week.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think the witness is competent to say that she was in a very critical condition; that is for a physician to say, if it were so, and the opinion of the physician is the only thing that would answer the law.

Judge Neilson—The opinion may have no great weight, but still I think it is competent.

Mr. Evarts—I think the physician would get a great part of his means of knowledge from a competent nurse attending upon the sick person.

Mr. Fullerton—It depends upon what kind of a physician he was. There are a great many of them that might be benefited by that kind of information, but the intelligent, competent physician would judge from symptoms under his own observation, not from what he heard told by the nurse.

Mr. Evarts—Well, when we have studied medicine or surgery we shall know better.

Judge Neilson—Well, you have both studied medicine somewhat.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—You have both studied medicine somewhat.

You could not fill your present positions if you had not.
[Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, that is the reason I make this objection. It is founded upon what knowledge I have upon that subject.

Judge Neilson—Yes; I think she can say whether, to her observation, the illness she mentioned as existing the first week appeared to continue the second; that is all.

Mr. Evarts—Did the critical condition you have spoken of continue during the week you were there?

Mr. Fullerton—That is not what your Honor has permitted.

Judge Neilson—No; I think I would drop the "critical." That is criticised by the counsel. Did the apparent illness, whatever it was, extreme or not, continue?

Mr. Evarts—Did the condition of which you have spoken, continue during the following week?

Judge Neilson—Well, she can answer that.

The Witness—Well, I was there but one week.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, but during that week did it continue? A. Yes, Sir; she was very weak and feeble.

Q. What did she require in respect to attention and nursing and quiet? A. She required to be kept quiet, that is what the doctor enjoined upon her.

Q. And how constantly did you attend upon and watch her yourself during that week? A. Oh, all the time.

Q. Did you sleep with her during all that time? A. I did.

Q. Were you in the room all the time, unless some occasion required you to be absent? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, during that week, an occasion when Mr. Tilton came to the house about the middle of the day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what part of the week was that? A. Well, as near as I can recollect it was about the middle of the week.

Q. Now, what did you hear or see in which Mr. Tilton spoke, or was observed, at that time; that time that he came to the house? A. Well, I remember his coming home and saying he was discharged from The Union office—saying he was a ruined man.

Q. Yes; what was his manner and demeanor at that time? A. Very much agitated and excited.

Q. How did he show this agitation and excitement? A. By talking; and I requested him not to; the doctor had told me to keep her quiet.

Q. To keep his wife quiet? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see him with his wife? A. I did.

Q. And what was said by him—was anything said by him in the sick room when you were there, in regard to this matter that you have spoken of? A. No, Sir; don't remember that there was.

Q. Where was it that he said this, that he was ruined? A. When he came up stairs in the sick room.

Q. That was in the sick room? A. Yes, Sir; that is as near as my memory serves me.

Q. The two rooms were open, I suppose? A. Folding doors open, yes, Sir.

Q. To each other. Now, who was housekeeper or had charge of the family at this time? A. Miss Dennis, Ellen Dennis.

Q. And were the children all there? A. I think they were, yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether or not, Mr. Tilton had or brought into the sick room—had in, or brought into, the sick room any papers at this time? A. Well, I don't remember whether he brought them in; he had papers there, and showing them to his wife.

Q. Yes, had them in his hands? A. Had them in his hands.

Q. Do you know what the papers were? A. No, Sir, I don't.

Q. Do you know whether they were newspapers or— A. Well, they were some kind of paper with writing on them; I could not tell you what they were, because I did not know.

Q. What effect did you observe upon Mrs. Tilton in regard to her nerves or health, produced by this visit of Mr. Tilton on this day?

A WRANGLE IN TRYING TO AVOID ONE.

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor intimates that the evidence is not proper. [To the witness]: What effect did this conversation of Mr. Tilton in the sick room produce upon Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—It is understood, it is objected to; I don't think it is proper.

Mr. Evarts—Why, if your Honor please, the question is upon her nerves and her—supposing she fainted away, would it not be a proper thing to prove? And I do not use that illustration as intimating that that was the fact. I am only saying to your Honor that the question is one of observation, and is a question of fact, and whether or not it is important, will depend upon the answer to it.

Mr. Morris—How is that important? Suppose she did faint away.

Mr. Evarts—Why, it shows the condition of this lady during that week as likely to become the subject of influences that, for other people's purposes, were to be operative upon her; that is what it shows. I do not understand what the force or point of the objection is.

Mr. Morris—It is wholly immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—The condition of a person who has been practiced upon is certainly a matter of evidence, and if that person is sick and in charge of a nurse, why then the nurse is competent to speak of it.

Judge Neilson—She can state anything that she saw.

Mr. Evarts—That is all I have asked her.

Judge Neilson—Oh no; you asked her a very nice question, which might possibly be put to a person of professional skill as an expert, which has to do with the ailment of the lady on her nerves, and which I do not think she is competent to speak to—it cannot be observed.

Mr. Evarts—Why, if your Honor please, physicians are not always attendant upon the sick, and if nurses could not speak of what took place in the sick room—

Judge Neilson—They can of any fact.

Mr. Evarts—That is all I have ever intended to ask her. I began by asking her what she observed of any effect upon this lady of this conversation.

Mr. Morris—We object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think you can ask her to state anything that she observed.

Mr. Evarts—I did.

Judge Neilson—Without indicating what you wish it to be; in other words, if she observed anything, and if so, what.

Mr. Evarts—That is right, undoubtedly, and I supposed my question was of that nature.

Mr. Morris—The question was not of that nature.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I won't wrangle with you, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Morris—Well, I don't propose to do it, but I propose to make any objection that I see proper and make any—

Mr. Evarts—I haven't asked you to defend your objection. I have simply asked his Honor's judgment about a question.

Mr. Morris—Your criticism and your manner will not deter me from doing it.

Mr. Evarts—I do not wish to do it in the least, but I wish to draw the distinction between personal wrangles and disputes about rules of evidence.

Mr. Morris—But I say that is not the purport of the question.

Mr. Evarts—But you made an observation after the question had been considered and accepted.

Judge Neilson—Now, if the stenographer will read the last question which was put—the stenographer will please read the last question.

THE TRIUMPH Stenographer [Reading]: "Mr. Evarts—That is all I ever intended to ask her; I began by asking her what she observed of any effect upon this lady of this conversation."

Mr. Morris—We object to that question"—treating it as a question.

Mr. Evarts—I don't treat it as a question; I was adopting your Honor's view; I didn't intend to depart from that view. [To the witness]: Now, Mrs. Mitchell, if I understand, you are asked and may answer as to whether you observed any effect upon Mrs. Tilton of this conversation, and what it was.

Mr. Morris—I object to that question.

Mr. Evarts—In this interview with her husband.

Judge Neilson—I will take that.

Mr. Morris—That is the question your Honor has ruled upon,—it is the same question; precisely the same question.

Mr. Beach—One moment, if your Honor please. By this question the witness is called upon to determine what was the effect of a certain state of circumstances upon the physical condition of this lady. I submit she is not competent to state.

Mr. Morris—You have just ruled upon it.

Mr. Beach—It would be entirely competent, I suppose, for those gentlemen to prove what, after this conversation, was the condition of Mrs. Tilton; I suppose that is a circumstance—so far as she observed.

Mr. Evarts—That is all I have asked her.

Mr. Morris—No, you have asked her more, Mr. Evarts, I beg leave to say.

Mr. Evarts—I don't understand so.

Mr. Beach—If you do not so understand it, I do, sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think that is a pertinent question. "Did you observe anything; if so, what?" is the question; modify it in that way.

Mr. Morris—That we don't object to.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on.

Mr. Evarts—Did you observe any effect of this conversation, and if so, what on Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—Leave out the word "effect"; that calls in the witness's view of it.

Mr. Morris—The very point your Honor has ruled upon two or three times.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Evarts, state the question in its simplest form. Perhaps it will answer, but if not—

MR. TILTON HEEDLESS OF HIS WIFE'S HEALTH.

Mr. Evarts—Did you observe anything in Mrs. Tilton after this conversation or visit of Mr. Tilton to the sick-room? A. Yes, I observed that she was very much excited.

Q. Can't hear; what? A. Excited.

Q. How did she show this excitement? A. Seemed nervous, restless and uneasy.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that the reporters can hear very well.

Mr. Beach—[Repeating.] She was nervous, restless, uneasy.

Q. Did you make any observation to Mr. Tilton on the subject of the effect on his wife? A. Yes, Sir; I asked him if he would not please not talk in the room; that the doctor told me to keep her very quiet.

Mr. Evarts—I understood her to say, "I asked him not to talk in the room."

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That the doctor had asked her to keep her very quiet?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say or do in reference to this observation of yours? A. Well, he walked out of the room, and sometimes he continued to talk.

Q. Yes, I am speaking now of this one day when he came to the house in the middle of the day; how many times during that day did you see him in the sick-room and engaged in talking? A. Well, I don't remember.

Q. Well, was it more than once? A. More than once; I think two or three times as near as I can recollect.

Q. Yes, two or three times; now during that week did you see Mr. Moulton at that—did you see Mr. Moulton there during that week? A. I did.

Q. How many times as you recollect—to the best of your recollection? A. Two or three times as near as I can recollect.

Q. In whose company and where? A. In company with Mr. Tilton in the sick room.

Q. In the front room? A. Well, they were both front rooms, but they were separated by folding doors.

Q. Yes; in this sick room or the room communicating with it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As you have described it—as you have described the rooms. What time of day or evening were these visits of Mr. Moulton, as you remember them? A. Generally in the day time.

Q. Generally in the day time; and was the conversation—was there conversation between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; usually.

Q. In this room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And within the hearing of Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there conversation with her? A. Part of the time.

Q. Now, did you hear the conversation between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; not to—

Q. So far as to know on what subject it was, or any farther? A. Well, I knew it was connected with The Union; his being discharged from The Union.

Q. You know that from hearing their talk? A. From hearing; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you make any objection to Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton together on the subject of their talking there in the sick-room? A. I think I did.

Q. And what did you say to them? A. Well, I told them what the doctor had enjoined on me—to keep her very quiet.

Q. Now, Mrs. Mitchell, were these visits and this talk a subject of attention by you as a nurse as affecting Mrs. Tilton's condition and health?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't understand you.

The Witness—They were,

Mr. Morris—One moment. That has been objected to.

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Oh! let it stand; go on.

Mr. Everts—It is an introductory question.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Everts—Did that affect her health or condition?

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—That she can answer.

Mr. Everts—[To the witness]: As you observed.

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—Let this lady describe, without being particularly assisted, anything that she observed in respect to her health.

Mr. Everts—I have not given the least indication of what the effect was, not the least. [To the witness]: Now, Mrs. Mitchell, what effect did these visits and conversations have upon Mrs. Tilton, as you observed?

Mr. Morris—No; that is objected to. I understand your Honor as suggesting that that is not a proper question.

Mr. Beach—That word "effect" is improper.

Mr. Morris—Certainly she is not competent to answer that question.

Mr. Everts—Because she is not an expert.

Judge Neilson—I think anyone could say whether a conversation disturbed a person or not.

Mr. Everts—I should think so.

Judge Neilson—As I could say whether two persons in any hearing conversing disturbed each other. It is very common; we don't take it in the artistic sense of skill, but a simple observation.

Mr. Morris—Yes, but the counsel has incorporated the same objectionable phrase that was ruled upon a moment ago, precisely, as to the effect.

Mr. Everts—Well, what should I ask?

Mr. Morris—Ask the proper question; the Court has ruled that that term is not proper; she is not competent.

Mr. Everts—"Effect" is not a proper English word to describe a consequence of an action?

Mr. Morris—Yes, but she is not competent to describe that.

Mr. Everts—I have given in evidence the action. I have shown a sick person to be affected and I have asked what effect she observed, if any.

Mr. Morris—Well, she can state what she observed; but what caused that, or produced that, I submit to the Court, she is not competent to speak upon. She may state what she observed, but whether it was produced by this conversation or not, I submit that that is utterly improper.

Judge Neilson—Of course that is the distinction; that is the point of trouble.

Mr. Everts—That is to say, if I prove a dagger thrust—

Mr. Morris—Oh! no.

Mr. Everts—And I ask what effect it had upon the victim, that is an improper question; that is, he may be asked whether the victim fell down, but whether it was the effect of the blow cannot be thus brought into the knowledge of a court or jury.

Mr. Morris—Yes, sir, it would require an expert then, as your Honor knows; always in regard to the effect of wounds inflicted upon the person and where death results, the question being as to whether it was caused by the wound or not, it requires the testimony of an expert.

Mr. Everts—I do not ask the question; that was not my illustration.

Mr. Morris—Now she may speak as to what she observed, as to what the condition of Mrs. Tilton was after the conversation, what she observed in her conduct, and in her manner, her actions, but as to what caused, what produced that, I submit to the Court it is not proper, and your Honor has distinctly ruled upon that element of this examination, in excluding the question before upon the precise ground that we make the objection to this question.

Mr. Beach—I suppose, your Honor, if one is seen to deliver a blow against the person of another, that a person observing could say what effect was produced, whether the person struck fell or staggered, because then the physical act is apparent and the physical consequence is observable by an ordinary witness. But where a lay witness is asked as to the consequence of an act which operates imperceptibly, through influences and organs which are not observable by the lay and ordinary mind, it is not competent to ask what effect it produced. That conclusion—that judgment is a matter of science and not of observation. But I suppose it would be very competent for the gentleman to ask what was the condition, what were the manifestations of the excitement, anxiety or repose, or otherwise, which were exhibited by Mrs. Tilton during or immediately succeeding these conversations. There does not seem to me, Sir, to be much difficulty in avoiding this.

Judge Neilson—That covers your ground, I think.

Mr. Everts—Why, it much more than covers my ground. If I had asked any such question, I should have had a hundred objections.

Mr. Beach—That is very easy for the gentleman to say, Sir, but it is altogether inaccurate.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Everts—What did you observe in respect to anxiety or disturbance, or condition in Mrs. Tilton, after those interviews, after those visits of Mr. Tilton alone, or Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton? A. Why she seemed to be very troubled, nervous, restless.

Mr. Beach—The first of that answer is objectionable, but it is not of importance enough to raise a question upon.

Judge Neilson—Let it stand; go on.

Mr. Everts—Where was the studio, as it was called, in the house; and how near this sick room? A. Across the hall—the back of the house.

Q. On the first floor across the hall? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything to these gentlemen, or either of them, in regard to the studio as a place of their conferences? A. Yes, Sir; I asked them if they would not go to the studio.

Q. And leave the sick room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did they do? A. Sometimes they went, and sometimes they did not.

Q. Did you say anything to Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton in regard to the dangerous condition of Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I told them what the doctor said—that he requested me to keep her very quiet; that she was very sick.

Q. Did you regard her as very sick? A. I did.

Q. Did you regard a disturbance of her as dangerous to her health?

Mr. Morris—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—The word "dangerous" is too broad—as unfavorable to her health.

Mr. Everts—Then as unfavorable to her health? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what degree?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—You have gone as far as you can go on that point. You have gone far enough, it seems to me.

Mr. Everts—I will ask this question, if your Honor please. In what degree did you consider disturbance of Mrs. Tilton as prejudicial to her health or perilous to her recovery?

Mr. Morris—We object to that question.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out. I think that that is a question which this witness does not appear to be competent to answer.

Mr. Everts—Be so good as to note our exception. The objection proceeds upon a principle, as I understand from your Honor, and is not to the mere form of the question.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Everts—Do you remember, Mrs. Mitchell, what you did say to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, or to either of them, on the subject of Mrs. Tilton's condition, and as to any danger she was in? A. As near as I can remember I requested them to go into the studio, as the doctor had told me that I must keep her very quiet. The precise words I do not remember.

Mr. Morris—That has been repeated half a dozen times at least.

Mr. Everts—I think it is proper.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not think it is proper to repeat it so many times.

Mr. Everts—During the period of your attendance upon Mrs. Tilton, this week, how much was Mr. Tilton in the house, and how much was he away? A. I do not remember.

Q. You do not remember about that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, during this week, any occasion or occasions of Mr. Tilton coming into the sick room, and reading to his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State what occurred in respect to that? A. I remember that he came in and wanted to read, or said that he would like to read.

Q. He spoke to you, did he? A. Yes, Sir. I told him that I was afraid to have him read; that the doctor told me not to allow it; but he said, "Oh! it would not do any harm;" and he did read, and closed the folding doors as he read.

Q. And you left, I suppose? A. I was in the other room.

Q. By the closing of the folding doors you were separated from them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he read? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember anything about locking the door? No, Sir; I do not.

MR. BEECHER'S VISIT ON THE NIGHT OF DECEMBER 30TH.

Q. Do you remember the night of that week on which Mr. Beecher visited that house? A. I do.

Q. What night was that? A. It was a Friday night, the 30th of December.

Q. Do you remember the night distinctly? A. I do; I remember the night because it was Friday night, and it was prayer meeting night.

Q. You knew that Friday night was prayer meeting night in that church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember about the weather that night? A. It was stormy.

Q. What kind of a storm? A. It was a snow storm.

Q. Where were you, and where and how did you first see Mr. Beecher? A. Some one knocked at the door, and I opened the door, and it was Mr. Beecher; and I invited him in; and then I went down-stairs.

Q. Where, and how disposed, was Mrs. Tilton at that time? A. She was weak, very weak.

Q. And was she sitting up, or in bed? A. She was in bed, reclining.

Q. Wholly lying upon the bed? A. She was in the bed;

Q. But was she supported in any way, or to any extent? A. Yes, Sir; partially by pillows.

Q. You left the room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you went down-stairs, whom did you see down-stairs; was there any one there? A. I saw Miss Dennis.

Q. Did you sit there while Mr. Beecher was in the room upstairs? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Did you know when he left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you then return to the sick room? A. I did.

Q. How was Mrs. Tilton then, in respect to health and strength? A. She was weak.

Q. At that time? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S INTERVIEW LATER.

Q. Do you remember after that, on that same night, Mr. Tilton's return? A. I do.

Q. When had he left the house, before Mr. Beecher's visit? A. In the early part of the evening, I think; as I was then with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And he returned to the house after Mr. Beecher left, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you know of his return, and how first did you know of it? A. The first I knew of it I was awakened in my sleep.

Q. Where were you sleeping? A. With Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Before you went to sleep had Mrs. Tilton gone to sleep or not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What excited your attention, or awakened you? A. A whispering or bustling sound. Mr. Tilton was talking to his wife; I could not tell how; he was down by the side of the bed, talking and whispering very earnestly; and it awakened me, and I said to Mr. Tilton: "Mr. Tilton, this will never do; Mrs. Tilton must not be disturbed so." She seemed to be very much agitated.

Q. Mrs. Tilton seemed to be? A. Yes.

Q. What did you observe in Mr. Tilton? A. I do not remember as I observed anything except I knew that he was talking very earnestly.

Q. Was anything said about— A. I do not remember hearing anything that was said.

Q. I was not intending to inquire as to that, but was anything said by you about Mrs. Tilton being exposed to that cold? A. Yes.

Q. How did you find her. Was she lying down, or sitting up? A. Partially up in bed, and partially sitting up.

Q. Was she exposed from her position, to take cold as you thought? A. Yes.

Q. And you spoke of it? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. You spoke to Mr. Tilton as you have said. What did he reply? A. I do not remember the remark he made, but I was requested to go out of the room. Mr. Tilton went out, and I put on my wrapper and went into the study, and sat down in front of the fire, and leaned my head on my hand, and Mr. Tilton went back to the room.

Q. After you came out he returned to the room? A. Yes.

Q. What time of the night was this? A. I should think it must have been about midnight; I did not know the time.

Q. Are you sure that it was late? A. Yes, Sir, I know that it was late, because it was late when Mr. Beecher was there, and this was after he had gone.

Q. How long did Mr. Tilton remain in his wife's sick room at this time? A. I could not tell. I think it was about an hour, as near as I can state.

Q. It was a considerable time? A. It was. He was talking loud, but I could not tell what he said.

Q. Did you hear voices, and, if so, in what tones were they? A. Yes, I heard voices, as though they were talking angrily.

Mr. Beach—Wait, wait; don't say "as though."

The Witness—They were talking angrily.

Mr. Everts—Whose voice was that? A. That was Mr. Tilton's voice.

Q. Did you hear Mrs. Tilton's voice? A. I did.

Q. In what tone was that? A. In a tone of entreaty.

Mr. Beach—I object to that answer, and move to strike it out.

Judge Nelson—I think we will let it stand.

Mr. Beach—I except.

Mr. Everts—When did Mr. Tilton come out from the sick room, and what did he do? A. He came into the study, and got a paper and pen and ink, and then returned.

Q. Did he return immediately? A. Yes, Sir; but I sat there a while longer in the study.

Q. How long after that was it before Mr. Tilton left the sick room again? A. I could not tell you.

Q. About how long? A. I should judge about half an hour, as near as I can remember.

Q. Where did he go when he came out? A. He retired to his room. He came to the study and told me that I could return.

Q. And he then went to his own room, as you supposed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you return? A. I did.

Q. In what condition did you find Mrs. Tilton when you returned? A. She appeared and seemed as though she had been weeping; she appeared to be very much agitated, and I stroked her head, and tried to pacify her, and I tried to calm her.

Q. How long did you thus treat her? A. For nearly an hour, as near as I can remember.

Q. Was her condition such as required this treatment? A. Yes, Sir; she was very nervous.

Q. Did she then go to sleep? A. She did after a time.

Q. And did you return to bed and go to sleep yourself? A. I did.

Q. Besides the voice of Mr. Tilton which you heard, did you see any movement by him while he was in the front room? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Do you remember whether he was sitting or walking? A. It seemed as though he was walking.

Q. You heard him walking, didn't you?

Mr. Beach—The witness commences by saying that she don't remember; and, then, the counsel leads her to say that he was walking.

Mr. Everts—Did you, or not, know by anything that your eyes informed you of, while he was in the room, whether he was seated, or standing, or walking. A. I should judge that he was walking.

Q. Why do you judge so? A. Because it sounded like that.

Q. Do you remember this occasion, when Mr. Tilton was there in the middle of the day, and he said that he was ruined—do you remember whether Bessie Turner was in the room, in the sick room, or came into the room? A. Yes, Sir; she was there.

Q. Was she there when Mr. Tilton came into it, or did she come in afterwards? A. She was there when he came in, sitting on the lounge, or near the lounge. I think she sank down on the lounge.

Q. What do you mean by "sank down"? A. She dropped down as though she had fallen.

Q. How otherwise was she affected, or what did you observe about her?

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Judge Neilson—The witness can state anything that she saw occur.

Mr. Morris—What! about Bessie Turner?

Mr. Beach—What have we to do with the condition of Miss Turner?

Judge Neilson—We are not inquiring into her condition. The witness is asked to tell what she saw; she was not asked about her condition.

The Witness—I merely stated that she was there, and she seemed to be affected by what Mr. Tilton said.

Mr. Morris—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—You may strike that out. The witness says: 'She seemed to be affected.' I don't think that is proper. It is speculative.

Mr. Evarts—It is the witness' mode of stating what she saw. Your Honor knows that we cannot pre-arrange the minds of witnesses or their habits of speech; they are such as belong to themselves. The question is only asked the witness as to the facts—what she saw Bessie Turner do at that interview.

HARD TWISTING TO GET AN ANSWER.

Q. What did you see on the part of Bessie Turner at that interview?

Mr. Beach—Our objection, Sir, goes to any evidence in regard to the condition of Bessie Turner, or the manner in which she was affected.

Judge Neilson—Yes, I don't allow that, but Mr. Tilton being present, and Bessie Turner being there, he may ask what she saw?

Mr. Evarts—Certainly, when the point of inquiry is the actual occurrence in a sick room, the action of all the parties as to the result of the conduct inquired about, may be given by a witness who saw it.

Judge Neilson—We will take all this witness saw except the nice judgment as to effects and conditions.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what did you see in Bessie Turner at that time? A. Well, I said she appeared to be affected—

Mr. Morris—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—Is that all you can say, Madam?

Mr. Beach—We ask that to be struck out, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is struck out.

Mr. Evarts—How did Miss Bessie Turner show to you any participation in this matter; did she hear what Mr. Tilton was saying? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She did. Now, thereupon what did you observe in her?

Mr. Morris—We object.

Mr. Evarts—What did you see in her, if my friend thinks there is a difference.

Mr. Morris—Well, we object to that. There is no difference.

Mr. Evarts—Just describe to us what you saw?

Mr. Morris—We object to that. Your Honor sees the object of the question.

Judge Neilson—I think you can ask her what Bessie Turner did, so far as she noticed, in the presence of Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; that is all I am asking.

Judge Neilson—Leaving out the scientific part of it.

Q. What did you see on the part of Miss Bessie Turner while Mr. Tilton was there at that time?

Mr. Beach—The counsel avoids your Honor's indication. You said that the witness might be asked what Miss Turner did, and we have made no objection to that.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what did she do? A. Well, she fell down on the lounge, and seemed to be very much—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—Don't say how she seemed.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor excludes it from the witness's mode of stating, because she has not stated it according to some cast-iron rule of statement, why very few witnesses would be enabled to make the truth known.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor, is it of the slightest importance how this matter affected Miss Bessie Turner? Are we to go into a side issue in regard to her conduct?

Judge Neilson—I think not.

Mr. Beach—And whether she was impressed or not?

Judge Neilson—I think counsel don't desire it.

Mr. Morris—That is what they do desire.

Mr. Evarts—We want to get a description of what occurred in this sick chamber, as it occurred, and we will judge of it when it is described. I suppose I have a right to describe it by a witness who saw it.

Judge Neilson—I allowed that, and you concurred with me, it seems, that we are to judge of the effect.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; that is entirely so.

Mr. Beach—But, Sir, if your Honor allows this counsel to trace the character of Mr. Tilton's conduct by its effect upon Miss Bessie Turner, why, we have naturally got to inquire in regard to her condition at the time, her condition of health, her nervous condition.

Judge Neilson—She may be a person that goes into those conditions easily.

Mr. Beach—Yes, and is it important, is it of very much consequence in this case? If there is a point in this inquiry it is as to the effect produced upon Mrs. Tilton. I do not see, Sir, except so far as that effect is indicative of the condition of Mrs. Tilton as being, as the counsel intimates, a subject for the practices of others—I do not see that the effect upon Mrs. Tilton is of any consequence; but your Honor has allowed that, and we have got all the evidence upon that point.

Mr. Everts—Well, we won't debate the importance or effect of evidence, but we are quite entitled to show this.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, we will debate it so far as to test the matter.

Mr. Everts—Well, I won't.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir. That is one case where you have refrained from debate, and I will give you my acknowledgment for it, Mr. Everts.

Mr. Everts—All the debates I will reserve to the time when they are appropriate, on the effect of evidence. I only desire to get in what the law allows.

Judge Nelson—Now, this witness can tell you anything she saw occurring there in the presence of Mr. Tilton, without giving her judgment or inference as to the effect.

Mr. Everts—How did she sink down on this couch? A. She partially fell down.

Q. Now, did you observe whether or not she was weeping? A. I don't remember that; I think she was, though.

Q. Well, the best of your recollection?

Mr. Beach—Well, wait a moment. The witness says: "I don't remember that, but I think she was."

Mr. Everts—Allow me to ask her further.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I don't know how you can ask her further upon that subject, when she says she don't remember it.

Judge Nelson—She says she don't remember it. Now, unless you can revive her recollection—

Mr. Everts—She says she thinks she was. Now I am going to ask her. [To the witness.] To the best of your recollection, was she or not weeping? A. Well, to the best of my recollection she was.

Mr. Fullerton—But she don't remember.

Q. Mrs. Mitchell, during this week did Mrs. Tilton continue to suffer from loss of blood; that is, from renewed loss of blood or not? A. She did.

Q. You left the 2d of— A. January.

Q. The 2d of January; that was Monday? A. Yes, Sir; Monday morning.

Q. At the time of this visit, or return of Mr. Tilton to the house in the middle of the day, that you have spoken of, and on this Friday night—at each time. I will ask you, separately, what was Mrs. Tilton's condition in respect to strength or weakness? A. She was very weak.

Q. At both times? A. At both times; yes, Sir.

Q. And how recently, in respect to either or both times, had she suffered a loss of blood? A. Well, all the week she did.

Q. All the week? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. MITCHELL.

Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Mitchell, I did not get clearly in my mind when you first went to Mr. Tilton's. A. It was in 1867.

Q. At what time? A. December, 1867.

Q. December 12th, 1867? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you remained until April, 1868, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir, 1868, I think it was; April the 1st.

Q. April 1st; then you went again, as I understood you, in June, 1868? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And remained a week? A. Two weeks.

Q. About a week? A. Two weeks first.

Q. Now, are you not mistaken about that? A. Two weeks the first time.

Q. How? A. Two weeks the first time.

Q. Did you return and spend that week at Mr. Tilton's in the same year that you had left, on the 1st of April? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then, are you not mistaken in the year? A. I think not; June, 1868.

Q. When was Paul born? A. December the 21st.

Q. Of 186— A. 7.

Q. Well, was Ralph born the June following? A. No, Sir. Then I must be mistaken in the date.

Q. Now, if you will correct that mistake, if you please.

Mr. Everts—I don't understand that there is any mistake.

Mr. Beach—She says she was.

Mr. Everts—I don't know that she does.

Mr. Beach—I know she does.

Mr. Everts—She takes it from you, that she is mistaken.

Mr. Beach—She says so herself.

Mr. Everts—She stated the birth of Ralph correctly—in 1868—I understand.

Mr. Beach—No.

Mr. Everts—Well, we all know when it was.

Mr. Fullerton—We don't know anything about it, except as we learn it from the witness.

Mr. Everts—Well, from other witnesses.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am talking about the testimony of this witness. She has said that Ralph was born in June, 1868.

The Witness—June, 1869.

Q. June, 1869? A. I copied it from my book. I keep a memorandum of all my births.

Q. Very well—I took it down.

Mr. Pearsall—I have got it down, too; June, 1868.

The Witness—Well, there I made a mistake.

Mr. Fullerton—I was quite willing you should correct it, of course? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were there about a week then, in July, 1869? A. I was there two weeks.

Q. Two weeks in July, 1869? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. June, 1869, was it? A. June, 1869.

Q. Were you there two weeks then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you keep an account of the day when you went and also of the day when you leave? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, the next time that you were in that family was in the month of December, 1870, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What day did you go there in that month? A. The 24th of December.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Fullerton, I only asked her when she was there at the birth. I did not ask her about any other date. I didn't know that she mentioned it. On the direct examination it was only as to her attendance on his birth.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. [To the witness.] On the 24th of December, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You went there in the capacity of nurse, then, did you?
A. I did.

Q. How long prior to that 23d of December was it that you were there, whether as nurse or on casual call? A. How long before?

Q. Yes; had you been there within the week before the 24th of December? A. No, Sir.

Q. When you stated, therefore, that she had been ill for a week, you stated what you had heard from somebody else, I suppose; you did not know it of your own knowledge? A. Mrs. Tilton—

Q. One moment. You did not know it of your own knowledge, did you? A. No, Sir; Mrs. Tilton told me.

Q. Well, I didn't ask you that. A. Well, all right.

Q. You had not been there to observe for yourself, had you, whether she was ill or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Very well. You say you found her weak and feeble? A. I did.

Q. Was she in bed? A. Yes, Sir, she was.

Q. Who was her attending physician? A. Dr. Skiles.

Q. And how often did he come to see her? A. Every day.

Q. I understand you to say, Mrs. Mitchell, that during this illness succeeding the 24th of December, 1870, you slept with Mrs. Tilton? A. I did during the week I was there; yes, Sir.

Q. Every night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Without exception? A. I did every night, without exception.

Q. That you are positive of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you laboring under no mistake, now, about that? A. Well, I don't think I can be.

Q. I wish you would reflect a moment. My question is whether, during the week succeeding the 24th of December, 1870, you slept invariably with Mrs. Tilton during the night? A. I did.

Q. After reflection you repeat that answer, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON AFTER LOSING HIS POSITIONS.

Q. Very well. Now, you speak of an occasion when Mr. Tilton came to the house about the middle of the day—have you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you make a memorandum of that? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. How do you recollect that it was about the middle of the day? A. Well, I said, as near as I could recollect, it was about the middle of the day.

Q. Well, how are you enabled to recollect the time of day at all when it occurred? A. I cannot tell you how I remember, but—

Mr. Evarts—A little louder, Mrs. Mitchell.

Mr. Fullerton—Repeat your answer, please. A. I say I cannot tell you how I remember, but that was my impression—that it was in the middle of the day—near the middle of the day.

Q. Did any one accompany him? A. No, Sir, he came alone.

Q. Where were you when he came? A. In the room with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And is that the time he said he had been discharged from The Union and was a ruined man? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you spoken in your direct examination of any visit of Mr. Tilton prior to that visit in the middle of the day when he made use of that language? A. No, Sir; I don't remember that I have.

Q. That is the first visit of Mr. Tilton to the house to which your attention has been called and in regard to which you have given evidence, is it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he then had been discharged from The Union at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And said he was a ruined man? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you know what day of the month that was? A. No, Sir, I don't remember.

Q. How? A. I don't remember.

Q. Have you no means of determining? A. Only it was during that week that I was there; that is all.

Q. Well, how long was it before you left? A. I left the 2d day of January.

Q. Yes, but how long before the 2d of January was it? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, was it soon after you went there? A. I think it was, near.

Q. How soon after you went there? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Can you tell the day of the week it was? A. No, Sir; I cannot. I did not set it down, so I could not tell.

Q. Are you enabled to fix, with any degree of certainty in your mind, during what part of the week that visit was made, and that language used by Mr. Tilton? A. Well, I think, as near as I can recollect, it was the middle of the week.

Q. The middle of the week? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what day of the week, if you recollect; do you recollect? A. The 24th.

Q. That is the day of the month? A. Oh! the day of the week; Saturday.

Q. You were there on Saturday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was about the middle of the following week? A. I think it was.

Q. Wednesday or Thursday? A. As near as I can recollect; I could not tell you what day.

Q. Is that the best of your recollection now upon that subject? A. Yes, Sir; that is the best of my recollection upon that subject.

Q. And you are sure he said he was discharged from The Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you give us his exact language? A. I don't think I can any nearer than that.

Q. Did he say The Union, or The Union and The Independent? A. The Union.

Q. Or from "the papers"? A. From The Union, he said.

Q. From The Brooklyn Union? A. From The Brooklyn Union.

Q. Have you told us anything else that occurred at that time? A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Was that the time that you made some observation in regard to Mrs. Tilton being kept quiet? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When he made that observation; what did you say to him them? A. Why, I told him that Mrs. Tilton—the doctor had told me to keep Mrs. Tilton quiet.

Q. How long did he remain in the room at that time? A. I don't remember.

Q. About how long? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Do you know where he went when he left the room? A. He went out of the room; I could not tell you where he went.

Q. How long was he gone? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Did he return to the room that day again? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you sure of that? A. I think so.

Q. Can you swear positively that he did return to the room that day? A. I could not swear positively.

Q. Could not swear positively? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, when is the next occasion that you have spoken of in your direct examination when Mr. Tilton came to that room? A. I don't know as I can remember the next time; I know it was a number of times.

Q. No, I beg pardon. Now, Mrs. Mitchell, how long was it after this visit in the middle of the day, when he said he was discharged from The Union? A. How long before he came in again?

Q. Yes. A. I don't recollect.

Q. How many days after? A. Why, it might have been in the same day.

Q. No, but how long was it after that, that you recollect, when he was there? You cannot say it was on the same day, I understand you? A. I don't remember whether he came in the same day; I presume he did; I don't know.

Q. I don't want you to presume; I want you to give me the best of your recollection? A. Well, to the best of my recollection—I don't remember.

Q. Very well. Well, do you know that some days intervened between his first and second visit? A. Why, he was in the room every day, some parts of the day.

Q. Well, I am speaking of those visits that you have testified to on the direct examination? A. Well, he was in the room every day, some part of the time.

Q. I am speaking of the occasions that you have testified to on the direct examination; I am speaking of no other. When was the next occasion that he visited that room when you admonished him about noise?

Mr. Everts—That is not the question, Mr. Fullerton, is it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; that is the question, no doubt.

Mr. Everts—He may have done so every day. I have not called her attention to every day, only to certain visits.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, my question is proper.

Mr. Everts—Well, the witness is entitled to understand it, I suppose.

The Witness—Well, I did not note his visits; I know he came into the room, and sometimes would be in two or three times a day.

Q. There were occasions then when he came in and went out, when you did not admonish him about noise? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or talking loud, wasn't there? A. When he came in and went right out again, of course, I did not speak.

Q. When he came in and did not go right out again, but did not talk, you did not admonish him? A. No, Sir.

Q. There were such visits as that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you have spoken of an occasion when Mr. Beecher was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. The 30th of June—the 30th of December.

Q. How do you recollect that it was the 30th of December? A. Because it was a prayer meeting night, Friday night.

Q. How do you know it was prayer meeting night? A. Because I know it was prayer meeting night in my own church, and that is the way I remember.

Q. Are you a member of Plymouth Church? A. No, Sir; not a member of Plymouth Church.

Q. Well, you say it was prayer meeting night in your own church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you reside? A. Where did I reside then?

Q. Yes, at that time? A. I resided then, when I was at home, at 4 Willow-st.

Q. In Brooklyn? A. Yes.

Q. What was your own church? A. Bridge-st. Church; Baptist Church; Mr. Sarles's.

Q. You know it was prayer meeting night in Plymouth Church because it was prayer meeting night in your own church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is the way you know it? A. Yes, Sir; I know Mrs. Tilton spoke about its being prayer meeting night.

Q. I did not ask you what Mrs. Tilton said. A. You asked me how I knew.

Q. Well, I asked if you knew it was prayer meeting night in Plymouth Church because it was prayer meeting night in the Bridge-st. Church? A. I don't know that it was on that account. I know prayer meeting night was always the same night.

Q. Where were you when Mr. Beecher arrived? A. I was in Mrs. Tilton's room, Sir.

Q. What were you doing, taking care of her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you engaged in any particular thing at that time? A. I don't remember as I was.

Q. You say there was a knock at the door? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At what door was there a knock? A. A knock at the door at the head of the stairs, the room she was in.

Q. And you opened the door? A. I opened the door.

Q. And saw Mr. Beecher there, did you? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Did he address you when he opened the door? A. I don't remember whether he did or not.

Q. Did you speak to him? A. I did; I asked him to walk in.

Q. Had you heard the door-bell ring? A. I don't remember whether I had heard the door-bell ring or not, but I—

Q. Did he come in when you asked him to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did any one accompany him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see any one in the hall or on the stairs at that time? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Well, you left, as I understand you, and went down-stairs? A. I did.

Q. Did any one request you to do so? A. I don't think there did; I think I went of my own accord.

Q. Well, one moment, you say you don't think there did? A. Well, there did not.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Nobody requested you to leave? A. I invited Mr. Beecher to walk in, and then I left and went down stairs.
 Q. Without being asked to go, by any one? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Did you close the door after you? A. I did.
 Q. Did any one request you to do that? A. No, Sir.
 Q. What time in the night was that? A. Well, it was after nine o'clock; I could not tell you the precise time.
 Q. Had you retired yet? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Mrs. Tilton was— A. Mrs. Tilton was in the bed.
 Q. Was she in the bed or lying on the bed? A. She was in the bed.
 Q. Was she bolstered up? A. Yes; partially.
 Q. Well, in a sitting posture? A. No, Sir; not exactly in a sitting; in a reclining posture.

NO WRITING MATERIALS SEEN AFTER MR. BEECHER'S VISIT.

Q. Now, when you opened the door to let Mr. Beecher in did you see Ellen Dennis? A. No, Sir.
 Q. She was not in view? A. I did not see any one.
 Q. Not in sight? A. I only saw Mr. Beecher.
 Q. How long did you remain down-stairs before you went up? A. I remained down until Mr. Beecher went away.
 Q. Well, that don't inform me. A. I couldn't tell you how long.
 Q. About how long? A. About an hour, I should think, as near as I could judge.
 Q. Did you hear him go away? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. And when you heard him go out you went up-stairs, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; I did.
 Q. You remained down-stairs, then, purposely whilst Mr. Beecher was up-stairs? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. You did not intend to return whilst he was there, did you? A. No, Sir.
 Q. How? A. No; I did not think anything about it. That is what I always do when company calls.
 Q. That was what? A. Leave the room and go down.
 Q. When he called?
 Mr. Evarts—When company called? A. When any one comes in.
 Mr. Fullerton—When any one comes? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. That was your habit, then? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Of leaving the room and going down-stairs when any one came? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Well, did you leave and go down-stairs when Moulton came? A. No, Sir; I did not.
 Q. You stayed there, then? A. That was in the day time; yes, Sir.
 Q. Then you only went down-stairs when company called in the night time; was that it? A. Well, I know I went down.
 Q. But I must repeat my question again, Mrs. Mitchell? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Did you go down-stairs when company came only when they called in the night time? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Well, why didn't you go down-stairs when Mr. Moulton called? A. Well, I don't know why I did not.

Q. Were you requested to remain? A. No, Sir.
 Q. How? A. No, Sir; I was not requested to remain.
 Q. Speak a little louder, if you please, Mrs. Mitchell. You were not requested to remain? Well, were you requested to go down-stairs, or to leave the room? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Now, Mrs. Mitchell, what did you hear just before you went up-stairs, after Mr. Beecher called, to indicate that he had left? A. I thought I heard the door shut.
 Q. And you concluded that Mr. Beecher had left, did you? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Then you went up-stairs? A. Then I went up-stairs.
 Q. When you went up-stairs did you find any writing materials in the room? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Did you see nothing of an inkstand, pen or paper? A. I did not, as I noticed; no, Sir, I did not notice anything of that kind.
 Q. Wasn't there a secretary in the room? A. A secretary in the front room.
 Q. In that room was not there a secretary, where Mrs. Tilton was? A. I think not.
 Q. Are you quite sure of that? A. I think there was not in that room. You know the rooms are all the same as one; there is a secretary in the front room.
 Q. Well, I am talking about the room in which Mrs. Tilton was lying at the time. A. Well, I don't think there was a secretary.
 Q. Now, there were folding doors between that room and some other room. A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. But they are two rooms, are they not, when the folding doors are shut, at all events? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Very well. Now, I ask you the question whether or not there were not writing materials in the room occupied by Mrs. Tilton? A. Well, I don't remember.
 Q. Don't you know that the secretary stood in that room? A. I know that the secretary stood in the front room.
 Q. In the front room? A. I think it was.
 Q. That is, you had to pass through the folding doors, did you? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. From the room occupied by Mrs. Tilton to the room where the secretary was? A. The folding doors were open.
 Q. Well, is that true that you had to pass from the room where Mrs. Tilton was into the other room, passing through the folding doors to get to the secretary? A. Yes, Sir; the folding doors were open.
 Q. Never mind the folding doors at present.
 Mr. Evarts—Do you mean to transcend the hour of adjournment, Mr. Beach?
 Mr. Beach—I don't mean to transcend anything, or anybody.
 Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Evarts moves an adjournment, your Honor.
 Mr. Evarts—I only asked counsel whether or not—it is as well to break here instead of any other time, and the jury have their habit of this hour.
 Mr. Beach—I suppose you mean to break bread.
 Judge Nelson—Prepare to retire, gentlemen.
 The Court here took a recess until 2 p.m.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 3 o'clock, and the cross-examination of Mrs. Mitchell was resumed.

Mr. Fullerton—Was that secretary which you say was in the adjoining room to the one Mrs. Tilton occupied, open or shut as a general thing? A. Shut as a general thing.

Q. You have seen it open, have you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see writing materials in it? A. Yes, Sir, I have seen writing materials in it.

Q. During that week did you see writing materials in it? A. Not that I recollect of.

Q. Did you see it open during that week? A. I do not remember whether I did or not.

Q. Did you have occasion to write whilst you were there? A. I did; but I always have my own writing materials with me.

Q. Did you see anybody write at that secretary whilst you were there, in that week in December, 1870, and the first of January, 1871? A. I do not remember.

Q. Did you see any one sitting at that secretary and writing? A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. And you do not remember having seen writing materials in it during that period, as I understand you? A. No, Sir; I had no occasion to go to it.

Q. You were in the room a good deal, were you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did not the secretary stand open, during that week, some part of the time? A. I presume it did; I think it did.

Q. Then you could see the writing materials without having occasion to go to it, could you not? A. Yes, if I took particular notice, but I did not take particular notice.

Q. How soon after this call of Mr. Tilton in the day time (when he said that he was a ruined man) was it, that you saw Mr. Moulton at Mr. Tilton's house? A. I think it was the next day.

Q. Was that the first time that you saw him there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But you would not state what that next day was, I suppose? A. No, Sir, I cannot, because I do not remember what day of the week it was.

Q. What time in the day was it that Mr. Moulton came there first? A. I do not remember.

Q. Was it in the day time or in the night season? A. It was in the day time, I think; I am sure it was in the day time.

Q. Are you quite sure that you saw him more than once there? A. Yes, Sir; I am.

Q. Were you present in the room? A. I was.

Q. When he was there the first time? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. And all the time that he was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You did not leave the room the first time that he was there? A. I do not remember. I may have gone in and out, but I do not remember that I did.

Q. What room was he in? A. He was in the room adjoining the room that Mrs. Tilton was in. The rooms were all in one.

Q. Do not repeat that, I understand how those rooms are.

They are not all in one; there are two rooms with folding doors between them? A. But they are open most of the time.

Q. Do the folding doors embrace the whole distance between the walls? A. No, Sir.

Q. He was in the adjoining room then to where Mrs. Tilton was? A. A part of the time, and a part of the time he was in the room with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Was that the first time that he called? A. I don't remember whether it was the first or the second.

Q. I am talking about the first time? A. I do not remember.

Q. Can you say that he was in the room with Mrs. Tilton the first time that he called or not? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. Can you say that he was in the room with Mrs. Tilton the second time that he called? A. I cannot say whether it was the second or the third time.

Q. Are you sure that he called more than twice? A. I think he did.

Q. Could you swear positively to it? A. I do not know that I could swear positively, but I am quite sure that he was there more than twice.

Q. Did you remain in the room during the time that he was there? A. Yes, Sir, I think that I did.

Q. Did you ever see him in the room with Mrs. Tilton more than once? A. I could not say.

Q. And you cannot say whether you remained in the room all the time when he was in that room, or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember anything that passed whilst Mr. Moulton was in Mrs. Tilton's room? A. Only I remember—

Q. No; do you remember anything that did pass? A. I remember their talking; that is all.

Q. You remember that they talked? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that is all you remember? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was it that Mr. Tilton said that he would like to read to his wife? A. I do not remember the day.

Q. How long was it after this day when he called in the middle of the day and said that he was ruined? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Was it before or after Mr. Moulton called? A. I could not tell you; I do not remember.

Q. Was it before or after Mr. Beecher called? A. I could not tell you.

Q. You cannot say? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have no way of fixing the time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you requested to leave the room then? A. No, Sir.

Q. You went voluntarily, did you? A. I went voluntarily.

Q. Where did you go? A. I went down-stairs. Are you referring to the time that Mr. Beecher called?

Q. No; I am talking about the time when Mr. Tilton said that he wished to read to his wife; where did you go then? A. Into the room adjoining.

Q. Into the library or study? A. Into the front room, and closed the folding doors.

Q. What is that room called? A. The sitting-room; it is the same room.

Q. You went through the folding doors, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were the folding doors shut? A. Mr. Tilton closed the folding doors.

Q. And you were upon the other side? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you hear his voice while you were in there? A. I do not remember.

Q. Then you do not know that he read to her, do you? A. I do not know, only from what he said; I do not know that he read to her.

Q. You heard him say that he wanted to read to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he have at that time in his hand, if anything?

A. He had a book in his hand.

Q. Do you know what book it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. A bound book? A. I could not say.

Q. Did it appear to be an ordinary bound book—a book with a cover on? A. I do not remember.

Q. Can you not remember that as well as you can remember that it was a book? A. I remember that he had a book in his hand.

Q. A book with a binding on it of some kind? A. I cannot say whether it was a book with a binding or whether it was a pamphlet; I could not say.

Q. But something of that character, was it? A. Something of that character.

Q. What did you say to Mr. Tilton when he proposed to read to his wife? A. I told him that the doctor did not wish to have any reading or conversation in the room.

Q. Are you sure that you told him so at that time? A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Q. Had you ever been present when Mr. Tilton read to his wife? A. No; I always left the room when he read to her. He requested me to leave.

Q. Always? A. Yes, Sir; most of the time.

Q. On these former visits of yours, did he read to her then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In 1837 and 1838? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He read to her then, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he would request you to leave the room then, when he read to her. A. Yes.

Q. Then this was a habit of his—of reading to his wife? A. I suppose it must have been; I do not know.

MR. TILTON'S MIDNIGHT INTERVIEW WITH HIS WIFE.

Q. You have spoken of Mr. Tilton's return, after Mr. Beecher's call; are you enabled to fix the time of the night when that return was? A. No, Sir, I am not.

Q. I must ask you again (because I want to get at the exact time) when he returned that night had you not gone to your own room? A. No, Sir, I was with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Did you open the door, and say to Mrs. Tilton that night, that Mr. Beecher wanted to see her? A. I was in the room and he came right in—

Q. I ask you if you said that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything like that to him? A. When the knock came to the door I opened the door and I said: "Mr. Beecher is here, Mrs. Tilton," and I asked him to walk in.

Q. And then he walked in? A. And then he walked in, and I went down-stairs.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton make any reply when you made use of that observation? A. I do not remember that she did.

Q. You do not remember that she did? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was the room lighted at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was the gas burning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are quite sure of that? A. Yes, Sir; because I had not retired.

Q. I understand you to say that you have no way of fixing the time when Mr. Tilton returned that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was it that you were awakened? A. I was awakened by a buzzing sound, as though he was talking very earnestly to his wife. He was talking very earnestly to his wife, and I was awakened by this sound.

Q. Did you make it known that you were awake, immediately on waking? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you say? A. I said: "Mr. Tilton, this will never do; it will disturb Mrs. Tilton."

Q. Did he stop then? A. I think he did. I was requested then to leave the room, and Mr. Tilton went out of the room while I put on my wrapper and went across the hall to the study.

Q. Who requested you to leave the room? A. I do not remember whether Mr. or Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Have you any recollection upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not Mrs. Tilton speak, and request you to leave the room? A. I do not remember.

Q. What is your best recollection upon that subject? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Have you no recollection upon the subject? A. No, Sir; it might have been Mrs. Tilton and it might have been Mr. Tilton.

Q. What were the words used? A. They asked me to leave the room.

Q. Have you given us the very words that were used? A. I do not remember.

Q. Were you told to go? A. Yes, I believe I was told to go to the study.

Q. Where was that study? A. Across the hall, in the back part of the house.

Q. Can you not remember that it was Mrs. Tilton who told you to go to the study? A. I cannot remember.

Q. Where was the study with reference to Mrs. Tilton's room, further in the rear, or nearer the front of the house? A. In the rear.

Q. You do not go directly across the hall then to it? A. No, Sir, not straight across.

Q. How long had you been in the study before Mr. Tilton came in there? A. I could not tell you; I should think for half an hour.

Q. Did you get asleep in the meantime? A. No, Sir; I don't think I did.

Q. On which side of the hall is the study? A. As you go up stairs do you mean?

Q. On the north or south side? A. I don't know how the house is situated; I think it is on the south side; it is a sunny room and on the south side I should say.

Q. Does the hall run between the study and the other two rooms of which you have spoken, one of which was occupied by Mrs. Tilton and the other of which you came into through the folding doors—does the hall run between them? A. The hall runs between the study and Mr. Tilton's room.

Q. Mrs. Tilton's room and the room immediately communicating with it by folding doors, is on the same side of the hall, isn't it? A. The study do you mean?

Q. No; I am not talking about the study. A. In the front of the house are the two rooms.

Q. The hall does not go through those two rooms? A. No, Sir.

Q. Those two rooms are on the front of the house? A. They take the whole front.

Q. And the hall does not extend to the front? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long after you got into this study was it, before Mr. Tilton came in there, as you recollect? A. As near as I can remember, it was about half an hour, I should judge.

Q. What did he do when he came? A. He came in and took paper, pen and ink off the table, and walked off.

Q. Did you see that pen and ink afterwards? A. No, Sir; I don't remember that I did.

Q. Did you see the paper which he got, afterwards? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know then what became of it or what use was made of it? A. No, Sir; I don't know anything about what use was made of it.

Q. When you returned to the room where Mrs. Tilton was, was it upon the invitation and suggestion of anybody? A. I think it was; I think Mr. Tilton said that I could return; I don't remember that.

Q. Can you swear positively that while you were in the study that night you heard any sounds from Mr. Tilton's room at all? A. I can.

Q. Positively? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And could you distinguish the voices? A. I could.

Q. You are sure of that? A. I could distinguish Mrs. Tilton's voice.

Q. Could you distinguish what was said? A. No, Sir.

Q. You could not hear the words? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor anything like that, could you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You could only hear the sound? A. I could only hear the sound.

Q. Was there anything except the loudness of the tone of the voices which you heard, which enabled you to determine as to the character of the conversation going on there? A. That was all.

Q. I understand you to say, Mrs. Mitchell, that you heard voices talking angrily; did you mean by that you heard a loud voice? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was all, was it? A. Yes, Sir; I heard Mrs. Tilton's voice, as though she were entreating her husband.

Q. Did you judge by the loudness of the tone? A. Yes, Sir, I judged by that.

Q. And by that alone? A. When I returned—

Q. I am asking what you heard while you were in the study? A. That is what I heard. I heard Mr. Tilton's voice in a loud anger, and I heard Mrs. Tilton's voice as though she were entreating.

Q. And you thought he was angry because he was loud? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you thought she was entreating because she was loud, didn't you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You determined then the character of the conversation by something beside the sound, didn't you? A. No, Sir; not besides the sound.

Q. Only by the sound, and by the loudness of it? A. Yes, Sir; by the character of it.

Q. I understood you to say that Mrs. Tilton was very weak when you went there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Feeble in strength? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she continue feeble during your whole stay there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she improve at all? A. Yes; she improved some.

Q. When did she commence improving? A. She did not improve very much while I was there.

Q. When did she commence improving? A. I don't remember the day she commenced.

Q. But she did improve while you were there? A. She did improve a little.

Q. Only a little? A. Only a little; I left her in a weak state.

Q. I don't ask you how you left her; did she improve by Saturday of the week that you got there? A. I think she did, a little.

Q. Did she sit up? A. No, Sir; she did not sit up.

Q. But she improved by Friday, after you got there? A. Yes, Sir; she improved a little; but very little.

Q. Are you sure she did not sit up any while you were there? A. I don't remember her sitting up while I was there.

Q. Will you swear positively that she did not sit up in her room, in her chair, while you were there? A. I do not remember that she did.

Q. Do you remember that she did not sit up in her chair while you were there? A. I don't remember that she did.

Q. Do you remember that she did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. You went away on the 2d of January, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir; on Monday morning.

Q. What was her condition then? A. She was in a weak condition. I left her in her bed. When I left on Monday morning, I left her in her bed.

Q. Had the hemorrhage ceased? A. No, Sir; it hadn't.

Q. Had it diminished? A. Somewhat.

Q. Have you ever been at the house upon any occasions, except when you were there in service? A. Yes, Sir; I have called there.

Q. Made friendly calls? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you staid, at any time when you made such friendly calls? A. I was there at the death of Paul.

Q. How long were you there then? A. I was there and watching with him the night before his death. I was there,

I think, two or three days at that time; I do not remember the exact time. I was there at one time and took care of a lady who was sick.

MR. TILTON KIND TO HIS WIFE.

Q. What was the general treatment by Mr. Tilton of his wife? A. He always appeared to treat her well.

Q. Why do you emphasize the word "appeared?" I ask you if he did not treat her well in your presence? A. Yes; he did in my presence always.

Q. Invariably, did he not, in your presence? A. Yes, Sir, in my presence he did.

Q. What was the condition of Mrs. Tilton, as to strength, the night that Mr. Beecher called? State particulars, if you please? A. She was very weak the night Mr. Beecher called.

Q. Was she more or less so than she had been? A. She was very weak and low.

Q. Did I understand you to say that she was weak and low? A. She was weak.

Q. Was she low? A. She was weak; I do not think I said "low."

Q. And had been during the whole day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was she more or less so that night when Mr. Beecher called than she had been? A. Well, she was very weak.

Q. Will you be kind enough to state who ever called there besides Mr. Beecher, when you left the room and went away, or went down stairs? A. Who called there?

Q. Yes; mention any person who called when that happened; mention names. A. I do not remember.

Q. You had been there a good deal; can you tell who ever called there? A. Mr. Moulton called there.

Q. Did you leave and go down stairs then? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who besides Mr. Beecher ever called there at the house at any time, and you went down stairs and left them? A. I do not remember as anybody did.

Q. I understood you to say a short time before the recess, that you were in the habit of going down stairs when company called in the day time.

Mr. Beach—What she said was that when anyone called there she always left and went down stairs.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I want you to name any person who so called, when you went down stairs, other than Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—At any time?

Mr. Fullerton—I mean at any time, and I say at any time.

The Witness—I do not remember of any one calling.

Q. Can you name another instance in which anybody called at that house when you went down stairs and left them alone? A. No, Sir; I do not know that I can; I do not know that anyone called.

Q. Then why did you say that you were in the habit of going down stairs when anyone did call, if nobody called except Mr. Beecher? A. Because you puzzled me so that I could not remember.

Q. But I do not puzzle you now, do I? A. Not now, you don't.

Q. Then answer my question. A. I did answer it.

Q. Then you were not in the habit of going down stairs when anyone called? A. No, Sir.

Q. This was an exception, then, to the general practice? A. Yes, Sir, it was.

Q. Can you state now why you went down stairs? A. No, Sir, I can not; I went of my own accord.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir, I am.

Q. No one requested you to go? A. No one requested me to go.

Q. Did you suggest to Mr. Beecher what the doctor had told you about visitors talking to her? A. No, Sir; I did not think of it.

Q. Can you state how you happened to walk out just at that time? A. No, Sir.

Q. When you went up-stairs, after Mr. Beecher's departure, in what condition did you find Mrs. Tilton? A. I do not remember.

Q. Was she not calm? A. I cannot remember.

Q. Have you no recollection of her condition when you returned? A. No, Sir.

Q. How is it that you cannot remember what her condition was when you returned? You were gone about an hour as I understood you? A. As near as I can recollect, I said I was.

Q. And you thought that conversation was injurious to her, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the doctor had forbidden it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you not some anxiety about her during this long absence? A. I could not say it was an hour.

Q. But you have said it was an hour? A. No, I did not, I said it was about an hour; I did not say any particular time, for I had no means of knowing.

Q. Had you not some anxiety during this absence of about an hour? A. I suppose I must have had.

Q. Don't you remember whether you had or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not that anxiety, which you think you must have had, prompt you to observe pretty closely, when you went back into the room, the condition of Mrs. Tilton, to see what effect this conversation of about an hour had had upon her? A. I do not remember.

Q. You do not now recollect what her condition was? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you do not recollect what the result of your observation was, do you? A. No, sir,

Q. That is all a blank in your memory, is it? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You do not remember that she was crying when you went back? A. No, sir; I do not.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. MITCHELL.

Mr. Evarts—At other times than this week—this last week of your attendance on Mrs. Tilton, when you were there as her nurse, or in the three months visit, (a part of which you were a nurse) do you remember, while she was in her sick room, and you were her nurse, persons called upon her and saw her in her sick room? A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did persons call, or not, upon Mrs. Tilton, and see her in her sick room, when you attended her in either of her confinements?

A. Sometimes. That depended upon the length of time that she was sick.

Q. Do you remember, at either of those confinements, the names of persons, either gentlemen or ladies, who saw her in her sick room? A. I remember Miss Cary's calling there.

Q. Who is she? A. Alice Cary, I think it was; I do not know whether it was Alice or Phoebe Cary.

Q. Do you remember other ladies seeing Mrs. Tilton during that confinement, while she was in her sick room? Do you remember other ladies calling to see Mrs. Tilton in her sick room during either of her confinements? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What ladies do you remember? A. I remember Mrs. Bradshaw calling once, and an aunt of hers; I cannot think of the name.

Q. An aunt of Mrs. Tilton's, whose name you do not remember? A. Yes, Sir, I think she called.

Q. Do you remember any other ladies? A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. Do you remember whether any gentlemen called during Mrs. Tilton's confinement, who were admitted to her sick room, except the instance you have given, when Mr. Beecher called upon her? A. I do not remember.

Q. When you say that it was your habit, when callers came to the sick room, to leave the room, did you speak of that as a habit at Mrs. Tilton's house, or as your habit in your profession and business as a nurse? A. That I did not mean; I was mistaken then: Mr. Fullerton puzzled me so that I hardly knew what I was going to say.

Mr. Fullerton—I am very sorry for it: I did not mean to.

Mr. Evarts—That is a very natural result.

Mr. Fullerton—I apologize for that.

Mr. Evarts—Do you remember, Mrs. Mitchell, that during this week in December, in the sickness of Mrs. Tilton (you have been asked about her sitting up in her chair) do you remember what arrangements were made whenever she left her bed, and how that was managed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was that? A. I used to put her in a rocking chair, and tip the chair back and then draw her into the front room, and place her on the lounge.

Q. And that was all that she did during that week, in the way of leaving her bed? A. Yes, Sir, that is all.

Q. The couch was in the room that communicated through the folding doors? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During that week in December did you see any other gentleman in the sick room, or in the communicating room, except Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher—on that call on Friday night? A. No, Sir.

Q. When Mr. Beecher called, you knew him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you knew that he was the clergyman of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that Mrs. Tilton was a member of that Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when you returned after leaving the room, on Mr. Beecher's call, was there anything in Mrs. Tilton's appearance that attracted your notice? A. No, Sir.

Q. I understand you, Mrs. Mitchell—I understood you have said on your direct examination—on your first examination by me, that this call, this return to his house by Mr. Tilton in the middle of the day, was about the middle of the week? A. As near as I can recollect, it was.

Q. Yes; well, how many days do you include in the middle days of the week? A. Well, Wednesday or Thursday, I think.

Q. Now, you know that it was not Saturday, don't you? A. I don't think it was, but I could not say.

Q. Now, you have spoken of visits to this house other than your professional visits there. Through that period of years was you in the habit of being at the house as a visitor, a caller, or a visitor, staying at any time? A. Well, through all the years.

Q. Since you have known them? A. Yes, Sir; the last two or three years I have not been there very often.

Q. That is from 1867 until within two years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how frequently—what length of time would there be between any of those visits of yours? A. Well, sometimes—I don't remember—sometimes six months, perhaps, sometimes a year.

Q. Now, did you stay at the house over night, or over more than one night occasionally or not? A. Yes, Sir; I think I have.

Q. In that way you observed Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, both of them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember once going to Greenwood with them? A. I do.

Q. What was that visit? A. At the time they removed the remains of a child.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a new topic I don't think counsel ought to be permitted to go into.

Mr. Evarts—No, I did not introduce anything but calls of the precise interviews that were important in this case, and you have gone into other relations. [To the witness.] When was that, and on what occasion, and how did that come about? A. Well, I could not remember; I was there staying, I remember.

Q. Staying at their house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For how long a time? A. I don't recollect; a day or two.

Q. A few days? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, what was the occasion that you accompanied them to Greenwood? A. To remove the remains of their two children.

Q. From one lot to another, or from the tomb to the lot? A. From the tomb to the lot.

Q. By their invitation did you go? A. I went by the invitation of Mrs. Tilton.

Q. You went in a carriage together? A. Yes, Sir.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. LUCY W. MITCHELL.

Mr. Fullerton—I understand you to say, Mrs. Mitchell, that on your return to the room, after Mr. Beecher left, that there was nothing in Mrs. Tilton's condition that attracted attention? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember now what her condition was? A. I remember it was weak.

Q. Do you remember anything else about it? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is all that you remember, that she was weak? A. Yes, Sir; she was weak.

Q. Well, I understand you to say you could not recall to your mind now what her condition was when you returned? A. Well, that I know that she was weak, because she was weak through the day.

Q. You know that because— A. She was weak through the day.

Q. What? A. Weak through the day.

Q. Oh! yes, that of course—she was weak; but I understand you, you cannot recall any other feature of her condition, except the weakness? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you observe anything as to the effect which this long conversation had upon her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Made no observation in that regard at all, did you? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mrs. Mitchell.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, there is a gentleman now visiting the city from Indiana, whom I will call as a witness; it won't be a long inquiry, and it may make a considerable difference to him; my friends assent; as Mr. Halliday is a resident here, we can call him at any time.

Judge Neilson—It seems to be proper, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Rev. Mr. Gay.

Mr. Beach—How long will this evidence take?

Mr. Evarts—Oh! I don't think—

Judge Neilson—Do you think you will close it this afternoon, Sir?

Mr. Morris—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on and see.

Mr. Morris—It will not be closed this afternoon, I don't think.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! I think so—

Mr. Morris—I assure you I don't think it will be closed.

Mr. Beach—I hope, then, there won't be a long witness interposed.

Mr. Morris—I know about the witness, I will say from what knowledge I have of the witness, it will be a very long examination.

Mr. Evarts—Well, ours will be brief.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Halliday is here and can be brought any day. [To Mr. Gay.] Take the stand and be sworn.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN L. GAY.

John L. Gay, then affirmed on behalf of the defendant, and testified as follows:

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Gay where is your residence? A. In the town of Bloomfield, Indiana.

Q. How long have you been a resident there? A. Something more than three years.

Q. And where had you resided before that time? A. In Vincennes, in the same State, and in Fort Wayne, in the same State.

Q. For how many years have you been a resident of Indiana? A. Some six years or seven.

Q. What State are you a native of? A. I am a native of North Carolina.

Q. Have you been a resident of this State? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For how many years? A. For four years.

Q. Where was that? A. In the village or town of Manlius, in the County of Onondaga, and also for a short time in Genesee County.

Q. What is your profession? A. I am a clergyman.

Q. Of what denomination? A. Of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Q. And how long have you been a clergyman? A. Thirty years.

Q. In 1872 were you connected with a University that has its seat in Bloomington, Indiana? A. I was, Sir.

Q. What is that University? A. It is a State University—State University, known as the State University—The Indiana State University; that is the corporate name.

Q. And at the time that I speak of in the year 1872—was the University open in its studies to the youth of both sexes? A. It was and is.

Q. Still? A. Still.

Q. How long had it been before that, so far as you know in general—some time? A. Some seven or eight years.

RADICAL VIEWS OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Q. Do you know of Mr. Tilton's lecturing there? A. I do.

Q. When was that? A. It was on the evening of the 9th day of February, 1872.

Q. Where was that lecture delivered, and before what audience? A. It was in the College Chapel; a large room twice as large as this, and before the Faculty, students and citizens generally.

Q. And did the audience include ladies and gentlemen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The female students of the college? A. Yes.

Q. And ladies and gentlemen of the town? A. Of the vicinity—of the town and neighborhood.

Q. Was the house full? A. The house was full.

Q. Do you know by whose invitation Mr. Tilton was there as a lecturer? A. I don't know of my own knowledge. I know generally that he was there in obedience—

Mr. Beach—Well, wait a moment.

Mr. Evarts—As far as you know?

Mr. Beach—It is totally unimportant.

Mr. Evarts—Very well. Did you hear the whole of the lecture? A. I heard the whole of it.

Q. How long was it? A. I should say it was an hour—from an hour and a half to an hour and three-quarters; perhaps fully an hour and three-quarters long.

Q. Was it an able and eloquent lecture? A. It was, speaking in a certain sense, a very—

Mr. Beach—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will take it.

The Witness—A very able lecture; that is, delivered with great rhetorical effect.

Q. Now, at that lecture, what was the subject of that lecture?

A. "Marriage and Divorce." The title of it, however, was "Home, Sweet Home."

Q. Now, at that lecture, did you hear from Mr. Tilton a statement of the marriage relation as he laid it down? A. I did.

Q. What did he state on that subject?

Mr. Beach—We submit to your Honor that this is a collateral question in regard to what Mr. Tilton's lecture was in Indiana.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, I supposed you would.

Mr. Everts—State Mr. —

A. He stated, or told them rather, to follow nature—follow nature in the formation of marital relations; I am clear, however, he told them to follow nature—not the laws of nature, but follow nature.

Q. Well, what did he say about Church and State? A. Well he was in very ill terms with the Church and State.

Mr. Morris—No, no.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I withdraw it then.

Mr. Beach—It is not necessary you should take it back. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—The officers will keep order.

Mr. Everts—State what he said.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Tilton was not interrogated as to that.

Judge Neilson—I don't think he need be a party, you know.

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Church and State?

Mr. Everts—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—He was protesting against—

Mr. Morris—No, no.

Judge Neilson—No, no; you must state what he said.

The Witness—Well, he said to the audience—

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, I think you will have to be a little more sober.

The Witness—That he would not permit the State or the Church to interfere or regulate—I am not sure which word was used—interfere with this relation—with the formation of this relation between the sexes; and if he could have his way, he would crush the Church, and he would crush the State, too, having in his hand a couple of crisp bits of paper, which he crumpled up; made a noise all over the house. It was accompanied with that gesture.

Q. The gesture accompanied the statement? A. Yes.

Q. Did he say in his lecture this, or to this effect: "If any two among them promise each other enduring love they were in effect as much man and wife in the eye of heaven as if the sanction of the law and the benediction of the priest had pronounced them so." Or what did he say in that—on that subject, if at all? A. He said something like that. I don't remember about the "enduring love;" my remembrance is, if—he said this—"if any two of you love each other and promise to be faithful to each other—vow to be faithful to each other, that vow makes you man and wife without the intervention of the priest or the State."

Mr. Beach—That is pretty good law.

Q. Now, as a part of the discourse, was anything said about the children, and any care of them, and by whom? A. Yes, Sir; he said that as they came together without formality, without the intervention of the Church or the State, on their mere desire, so they could separate in the same way, with the same informality; that their relations lasted, was intended to last as long as affection lasted, and no longer—he said "to be sure, there may be a difficulty as to providing for the children that may be born during parties living together in that way, but it would be the duty of the State to take care of the children in that event."

Q. How many female students were there in the University at that time, Mr. Gay? A. Somewhere between 43 and 44. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, that is a number; you know the number accurately? A. Yes, there were 42 on the catalogue at that time, and there were some irregulars, who were not on the catalogue, attending.

Q. What ages were these females? A. Well—

Q. Their average? A. Of all ages, from 15, 16 to '20 and 21 and 22—between 15 and 21 and 22 I should say.

Q. Now, after the delivery of this lecture of Mr. Tilton's, what was the number of female students at that University?

Mr. Beach—We object to that.

Judge Neilson—We will not take that, Sir.

Mr. Everts—It is a fact, Sir—I have not introduced the objectionable word "effect"—

Judge Neilson—No, we got past that—

Mr. Everts—In fact.

Judge Neilson—I don't think we will take that.

Mr. Everts—Very well, we offer to show what the number was after that. I won't except to your Honor's decision.

Judge Neilson—I am much obliged to you.

Q. Oh! Mr. Gay, how long have you been in the State of New-York at present? A. I have been here two weeks to-day.

Q. What business brought you here? A. I came on private business, or properly speaking, on some church business—sent here by my bishop.

Q. And that business brought you in connection with the clergy and laity of your church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you come here in any connection with this suit? A. By no means.

Q. After your coming here, did you have any communication with any of the counsel of the plaintiff, and how—of the defendant, and how? A. Not until I received a telegram from home requesting me to come—

Mr. Beach—What is that?

Mr. Everts—We wish to show how he came here.

Mr. Beach—Well, I object to it.

Mr. Morris—How is that material how he came here?

Mr. Everts—Well, I thought you would want to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—Well, I will find it out.

Mr. Everts—I thought I could get it shorter

Mr. Morris—Oh! no, I will find that out.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF REV. JOHN L. GAY.

Mr. Morris—Well, Mr. Gay, as counsel upon the other side seem anxious to excuse your presence here to-day, I will ask you if, before coming here, you had any correspondence with either counsel upon the other side? A. I had.

Q. When was that? A. Oh, some time ago.

Q. About when? A. I was written to by Mr. Shearman about two months ago, I guess.

Q. And with reference to this case? A. Yes, I think it was in reference to this case, but I don't—

Q. Have you any doubt upon that subject? A. I don't know whether the suit was commenced or not.

Q. About two months ago, you say? A. Two or three months ago; I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember whether any proceedings had been initiated at that time, or not? A. I know they were talked of, but what you were doing here—

Q. Well, have you any doubt as to the fact that you were written to concerning this case? A. I have no doubt in the world that I was written to—no doubt in the world.

Q. Did you reply? A. I replied as one gentleman replies to another.

Q. Yes. Well, did you receive more than one letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Yes. From whom did you receive the second letter? A. Mr. Shearman.

Q. And was that concerning this case also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when was it that you received that letter? A. Shortly after the first.

Q. You replied to that also? A. Yes, Sir; a few words.

Q. Received any other letter? A. I believe not.

Q. Well, were you requested to come on here and be present at the trial? A. No; I was not.

Q. Not requested to come here? A. Mr. Shearman said he did not think my presence would be necessary; he stated that in his second letter to me.

Q. Did you state to him in your reply to him what you have stated upon the stand here to-day? Did you inform him of the facts—communicate the facts to him that you have stated here to-day upon the stand? A. I gave him some points; he asked for some points.

Q. Did you state the facts to Mr. Shearman in reply to his letter as you have stated them here to-day upon the stand? A. I don't remember all that I wrote to him; I gave him the facts.

Q. Oh, no; did you state the facts or the substance of the facts that you have given here to-day to Mr. Shearman in reply to his letter? A. Not in the detail that I have now.

Q. Well, did you refer to the lecture? A. I did.

Q. Did you tell him what Mr. Tilton said at the lecture? A. Yes, in part.

Q. Did you tell him all that you could recollect? A. No, from my—

Q. Why didn't you? A. Because—

Q. Didn't he request from you all the information you had in reference to that matter?

Mr. Evans—"Because," he says.

Mr. Morris—Well, because what? A. Because I had filled my sheet and thought I had said enough. [Laughter.]

Q. Oh, you had filled your sheet and that was the only reason—is that the only reason that you did not communicate to him the balance of the facts, because you had filled the sheet? A. I did communicate to him all that was relevant as I supposed; all that I had to say.

Q. Did you communicate to him all that you have testified to here to-day in regard to Mr. Tilton's lecture there? A. Substantially that.

Q. Substantially that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then he informed you that it would not be necessary for you to attend here? A. He thought not.

Q. Yes? A. And my coming, had no reference to the trial at all.

Q. Oh! well, you need not repeat that—any expenses been paid you? A. Not a dollar; I came on my own expense.

Q. Well, how did they find out that you were here in the city of New-York? A. Because Mr. Shearman's telegram reaching me, I felt it incumbent upon me to go and answer it in person.

Q. When did you receive that telegram? A. The day before yesterday.

Q. Whereabouts was it—were you then in the city of New-York? A. I was in the city of New-York.

Q. He telegraphed for you? A. Telegraphed for me.

Q. To come here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As a witness?

Mr. Evans—Mr. Morris, he telegraphed him out there.

Q. Did you receive a telegram in New-York? A. No, Sir; the telegram was sent to my home.

Q. Out West? A. Out West.

Q. And then you felt it your duty to come here? A. The telegram was sent to me by my wife.

Q. What was it that telegram stated? A. "Come on to Brooklyn."

Q. Oh, then you were sent for to come on to Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir, I was sent for in that way.

Q. In that way—Mr. Shearman informed you in a letter that he didn't want you, and then sent a telegram for you to come on; is that it? A. He sent a telegram for me to come on the other day.

Q. Mr. Shearman informed you in a letter that you were not wanted and then sent a telegram for you to come on, is that it—is that correct? A. I don't know that I need put the two things together, or that you need to.

Q. Well, I do put them together. A. Suppose I don't choose to.

Q. Now, I want you to answer; is that correct that you received first a letter that you were not wanted here, and then a telegram from Mr. Shearman to come on? A. I received a telegram to come on.

Q. And that was after the letter that you were not wanted? A. Why, yes; two months afterwards; I had forgotten almost all about it.

Q. And then, when you received the telegram, you thought it incumbent upon you to come on, do I understand you correctly? A. No, Sir; the telegram went to my home and was sent to me here by my wife.

Q. Transmitted? A. In a letter.

Q. Yes, Sir, then you came over here? A. No.

Q. Were you subpoenaed? A. No.

Q. Well, you did come over here, then didn't you? A. Yes, I am here now.

Q. Well, who gave you notice to come here? A. Mr. Everts.

Q. Oh! Mr. Everts gave you notice—when? A. Night before last.

Q. Night before last. Did you send word to them or notify them in any way that you were in New-York? A. No, Sir; I went and reported to Mr. Everts.

Q. Then you notified them? A. Went in person and told Mr. Everts.

Q. Exactly. A. I consulted a friend as to my duty in the premises.

Q. Never mind that; but then when you arrived in New-York you went and notified the other side—went and saw Mr. Everts? A. Why, to be sure I did; I went and spoke to Mr. Everts.

Q. And then you were requested to come over here? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON COMPLIMENTED BY THE FACULTY AND STUDENTS.

Q. Well, now, let us go back to Indiana for a moment. You were present at this lecture? A. I was.

Q. You made some remarks after Mr. Tilton got through, I believe? A. Yes; I got up and protested against—

Q. Well, that answers my question. And Mr. Tilton replied to you, didn't he? A. Yee—some sort of reply.

Q. Well, yes, we will take it in that way. Who presided at that lecture? A. Our President—

Q. President of the institution? A. (continuing)—was sitting in the chair, sitting there—

Q. Well, who presided at that lecture? A. The President, I presume.

Q. The President of the University? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Mr. Tilton lectured there the next day, didn't he? A. Yes.

Q. And before whom did he lecture the next day? A. I did not attend the lecture the next day.

Q. I didn't ask you whether you attended the lecture or not; before whom did he lecture?

Mr. Everts—How does he know?

The Witness—Pretty much the same sort of crowd as the night before, I presume; I was not there.

Q. Well, who constituted the crowd? You designate them as a crowd; now, who constituted the crowd? A. The President, Faculty, students, and citizens.

Q. And you characterize them as the crowd? A. As making up the assembly, yes; I was not there.

Q. Well, now, he lectured then before the same audience the next morning at eleven o'clock, did not he? A. I say, I presume; I was not there.

Q. Well, you understood so, didn't you? You understood that he lectured the next day, didn't you? A. I did understand he lectured the next day.

Q. And where was that lecture the next day delivered? A. In the College chapel.

Q. In the College chapel; and don't you know that that was delivered the next day by Mr. Tilton in the College chapel at the request of the students and Faculty? A. I heard so.

Q. You heard so—yes? A. I can't say that I know it.

Q. That answers it; you heard so; it was so understood, and that the President of the University presided at that lecture, didn't he? A. I don't know who presided.

Q. You so understood, didn't you? A. I never heard who presided.

Q. Didn't you understand that the President presided at the lecture next morning? A. No; not necessarily, because I never heard; I never inquired.

Q. But he did lecture at the request of the students and Faculty next day in the College chapel? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Morris—Very well.

Mr. Everts—Does that go down on the record?

Mr. Morris—Yes, that goes down, it is down now, already. [To the witness:] Now, do you recollect, Mr. Gay, that the next day the students passed such a resolution as this;

"Resolved, That we the students of the Indiana State University return our most sincere thanks to Theodore Tilton for his able and eloquent address on the evening of February 9th, 1872."

A. I have heard so.

Q. You heard so? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was the lecture at which you took some exception? A. It was a lecture against which I protested and denounced.

Q. Well, you were connected at that time—there is another one here too I believe—oh! yes, I beg your pardon—I will read this; see if you recollect this being passed [reading]:

"Resolved, that we disapprove the course taken by Professor Gay; that Mr. Tilton has the sympathy of the students."

Q. Do you remember that also? A. I recollect there was such an indecent resolution as that passed. (Laughter.)

Mr. Morris—I beg your pardon for overlooking it.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. And you heard also that the President, didn't you, at the adoption of these resolutions, presided, and complimented Mr. Tilton; you understood that, didn't you? A. No, I did not.

Q. Didn't understand that part of it? A. I did not attend the second lecture; I told you I did not attend the second lecture; I was so disgusted with the first I would not go to the second.

Q. Yes, very well. You understood, also, that a number of the professors the next day invited Mr. Tilton to dine with them, did you not, and you were not invited to that dinner? A. I never heard about that.

Q. Didn't hear about that? A. I never heard about it at all.

MR. GAY DENOUNCED FOR HIS INTERFERENCE.

Q. Well, you were a member of the institution at that time? A. I was a member of the Faculty, Sir.

Q. And how long did you continue a member after that? A.

For six or seven months—ended my connection the end of July.

Q. Now, Mr. Gay, were not you discharged from that institution in consequence of the course that you took that night? A. I resigned in consequence or—

Q. Yes; go on. A. Of an excitement and opposition, and persecution that was gotten up in consequence of it.

Q. Yes; then your leaving of the institution was in consequence of the course that you took that night at Mr. Tilton's lecture? A. I am willing you should say so, and I say so.

Q. Well, I am not on the stand now; what do you say to it? A. Well, I am not ashamed to own it.

Q. It is the fact? A. It is the fact.

Q. Well, you were requested to resign, weren't you, Mr. Gay? A. I was requested to resign.

Q. You were requested to resign in order to save expulsion for the course that you took that night, and you resigned? A. No; I don't admit that.

Q. Well, you were requested to resign? A. No; an opposition was gotten up by the students—

Mr. Morris—That will do.

The Witness—In consequence of that—

Mr. Morris—That is enough on that point.

Mr. Everts—Didn't you ask him something about that?

Mr. Morris—Oh, not now; I have got through with that question; got all through with it.

Mr. Everts—All but the answer.

Q. Did you hear Professor Warwick shortly after that, next week or a few days? A. No, Sir; I don't remember at all.

Q. Professor Warwick? A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you recollect his being present at Mr. Tilton's lecture? A. I don't know him.

Q. Don't know him? A. There might have been some person of that name.

Q. Never heard of him? A. No, Sir; I don't know him; there might have been some person there; there is always some person about of that sort.

Mr. Beach—What is that? What is this name—some person about of that sort, do you say?

Mr. Morris—The elocutionist.

Mr. Beach—Well, I want to understand what this gentleman is talking about.

The Witness—When I say, "of that sort," I mean some elocutionist; there was always a number of them around.

Q. Do you mean to say that you don't know Professor Warwick; don't you know Professor Warwick? A. I do not.

Q. Do you know of such a man? A. I have an indistinct recollection of hearing of his name.

Q. Only an indistinct recollection? A. That is all.

Q. That is all. A. That is all.

Q. And what is his business? A. I remember a gentleman—I did not attend his lecture; consequently it made no impression upon my mind.

Q. What is his business; do you know? A. I think I heard he was reading—elocutionary reading—Shakespeare, or something; I don't know what.

Q. Where? A. About the college; I don't know where.

Q. About the college? A. Yes.

Q. What do you mean by "about the college"? A. In and about it.

Q. In and about it? A. In and about it.

Q. What do you mean by about it; I want you to explain that. You say, "in and about the college;" now, what do you mean by that answer? A. If I was in and about the Court-house—

Q. What do you mean by about it? A. You would understand very well; somewhere in the neighborhood, and around the Court-house.

Q. Well, do you understand then that he did not lecture inside, in the College? A. I don't know whether he did or not; I did not hear him.

Q. You don't know? A. I did not hear him.

Q. Now, you say, at that lecture Mr. Tilton said that in the formation of matrimonial alliances parties should follow nature? A. He said so.

Q. Well, what do you think they ought to follow?

Mr. Everts—Is that material?

Mr. Morris—Yes.

The Witness—I think they ought to follow nature in obedience to the Great Law that we have given us in the Ten Commandments.

Q. Well, in the formation of matrimonial alliances, you think they ought to follow nature, don't you? A. Certainly.

Q. Well, then, you agree with Mr. Tilton upon that point, don't you? A. Why, to some extent, of course.

Q. Very well. A. I would not go against nature—should not go without nature; but, nevertheless, it should be nature held in subordination to laws.

Q. Now, as you say, this lecture was upon the subject of marriage and divorce; do you understand that in order to make a valid marriage it is necessary that there should be any ceremony either of Church or State? A. Well, as I am not a lawyer, I don't know that I—

Q. I am asking for your understanding; do you so understand it?

Mr. Beach—Does he so believe and hold?

Mr. Morris—Or do you so believe and hold; is that your idea of marriage? A. Well, I should not think that I was married by simple vow and resolution with a woman; I should not feel that it was a marriage.

Q. You think that for two parties to agree to be man and wife and live faithfully in that relation, and that relation is inspired by mutual affection for one another, that that don't constitute them man and wife? A. Well, no, I don't believe it.

Q. You don't think it does? A. I think there is something more necessary.

Q. What is your idea upon the subject of divorce?

Mr. Beach—Before you go to that, I would like to know from this gentleman whether he holds that there should be some ceremonial sanction, either by the Church or the State? A. I do.

Mr. Morris—Yes; do you hold that doctrine suggested by my— A. Yes; I hold that there should be some Divine sanction—some religious sanction.

Mr. Beach—Some religious sanction? A. Well, yes; some sanction by Church or State, one or both: we believe in both.

Q. Now, then, what do you believe should be ground of divorce? A. I hold that there is—I hold that there is no valid cause for divorce except that given in the New Testament, other—for the cause of adultery.

Q. For the cause of adultery? A. For the cause of adultery.

Q. So that if you believe that if a man abandons his wife, refuses to support his wife and family, and utterly repudiates the relation, that still they should continue to be man and wife.

Mr. Everts—What do you mean by repudiating the relation?

Mr. Morris—By his action and by his conduct.

Mr. Everts—Not by adultery.

Mr. Morris—No; that is a cause of divorce, he says. [To the witness.] Now, you believe they should continue to be man and wife.

The Witness—I have already answered that I didn't believe that man and wife should ever be divorced—

Q. Answer my question; you believe that they should continue to be man and wife under the circumstances that I have suggested? A. Till death them part.

Q. Till death them part? And if a man becomes a drunken brute, beats his wife every day, maltreats her in every form, refuses to provide food for her, or proper clothing, or shelter that she should be his wife until death parted them. Do you believe that? A. That may be cause for separation, but I hold—

Q. Don't think it is cause for divorce? A. Not from the bond of marriage, no.

SLANG USED AND DEFINED.

Q. Now, didn't Mr. Tilton advocate the harmonizing of the laws of the different States upon the subject of divorce, in that lecture, so that they should be uniform, and that there should be more causes for divorce than in some of the States, for instance the State of New-York, that is but one? A. I believe that he blathered a long time about that.

Q. Oh, you think he blathered a long time about that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now then—

Mr. Beach—Look here, wait one moment. Please ask this gentleman what he means by the term "blathered."

Mr. Morris—That is just what I was going to ask; now explain what you mean. Explain to this Court and jury what you mean by the term "blathering."

Mr. Beach—"Blathered."

Q. Explain just what you mean? A. It is a plain, well understood word. When a man speaks emptily, vainly, for no purpose, without sufficient reason and—that is what I understood by the term "blathering."

Q. Now, you said a moment ago that it was a very able speech? A. It was delivered with rhetorical effect.

Q. Now, state to me—

Mr. Beach—Wait, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Everts—That is what he said before.

The Witness—That is what I said.

Q. Did you say "read"—he read the lecture? A. Oh! no, it was not read, it was delivered, because—

Mr. Beach—I understood you to say "read," did you? A. Oh! no, not "read" at all.

Mr. Beach—Well, I ask that the last answer be read.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer [reading]: "It was delivered with rhetorical effect."

The Witness—That is what I mean to say—delivered, not read; it was not read.

THE SUBSTANCE OF THE LECTURE.

Mr. Morris—Then state what he said, as near as you can recollect, upon the subject of divorce? A. Well, he had a long—

Q. Oh! never mind about that; state what it was. A. Well, I can't state without I get at it.

Q. I know you can't. A. He had a great deal to say about the different laws of divorce.

Q. Well, what did he say? A. Different causes of divorce in different States; some States allowed no divorce; South Carolina he mentioned, I think, for instance, and others allowed a great many; I don't remember; it is a long time ago.

Q. Oh, go ahead. Is that all you recollect that he said upon the subject of divorce? A. Oh, no,

Q. Go on, and state now what he said upon that subject?

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Morris.] Didn't he eulogize the laws of New-England?

The Witness—I think he ran over the various States rapidly in an oratorical way?

Q. State what he said, as near as you can? A. He did say something about harmonizing, I remember that; he did say something about harmonizing the various laws of the various States on the subject of divorce.

Q. Didn't he eulogize the laws of New-England upon the subject of divorce? A. I don't remember.

Q. And of the Western States? A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you know anything about the law of divorce in Indiana—or causes of divorce? A. I don't know the number of causes. I know that they were restricted some two years ago. The State passed laws, or the last Legislature, two years ago passed a law restricting divorces, and from an impulse, or inspiration given to the public.

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, now, please stop.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't get on the subject of inspiration, I beg of you.

The Witness—Go on.

Mr. Morris—What were the causes of divorce in Indiana at that time—at the time of the lecture? A. I don't know; I don't think he told us; I don't think he knew.

Q. Was abandonment one?

Mr. Beach—What did you say? You didn't think he knew?

Mr. Morris—Didn't think that Mr. Tilton knew? A. I am sure I didn't know; I don't know.

Q. Do you mean to say that he didn't know? Did you say that he didn't know? A. I think it possible.

Q. Do you mean to say that he didn't know? A. No; I don't mean to say that.

Q. Well, what did you say it for? What did you mean by saying that he didn't know? A. I didn't know the various grounds of divorce—

Q. Why did you say that he didn't know? A. Well, being a stranger, I should suppose that he would not know all our laws.

Q. Oh, that is it? A. That is what I mean to say. Possibly he did; I don't know.

Q. How long had you lived in Indiana? A. Some six or seven years. I have never had occasion—

Q. And you don't know what the causes of divorce in that State were at that time yourself? A. My attention has never been called to it, I have not been—

Q. You never protested against the Indiana laws upon the subject of divorce in your capacity as teacher—moral teacher? A. No; I protested against Mr. Tilton; I didn't protest—

Q. No, no; did you ever protest against the Indiana laws concerning divorce; as a moral teacher did you ever? A. No, Sir; I never felt called upon to do that.

Q. Never felt called upon? A. Certainly not.

Q. Do you know that abandonment was one cause of divorce in Indiana? A. Possibly; I don't know it officially.

Q. Well, if that was a cause, you don't believe it was right, do you? A. I have already stated that I believe there is only one valid cause for divorce.

Q. Well, if it was not right, why didn't you protest against it, as a moral teacher, holding the convictions that you did?

Mr. Evarts—I submit, your Honor, that there is some limit to the right of counsel to reason with the witness. This is not testimony at all.

Mr. Morris—Well, was cruel treatment another cause of divorce in Indiana? A. I don't know; I told you.

Q. You don't think a person ought to be divorced for cruel treatment, do you? A. I have already answered.

Q. If it is carried to any extent? A. It may be cause for separation, but cause for divorce is another thing.

Q. And habitual drunkenness; you don't think that that should be a cause for divorce? A. I have already answered.

Q. Failure of the husband to make reasonable provision for his family; is that a cause also? A. I don't know.

Q. If a man is sent to State's prison for life you still think his wife ought to be a wife legally to him, until she dies, do you? A. I have already answered.

Q. Well, you believe that? A. I believe that there is no scriptural—

Q. Answer my question, do you believe that? A. I believe there is no ground—

A. No, no, no, no! Answer my question. I will have a direct answer to that question? A. Put your question then categorically.

Q. If a man is sent to State's Prison for life for crime, do you believe that his wife must be tied to him legally until he dies, or she dies; is that your doctrine? A. Scripturally, I do, and legally.

Q. Is that your doctrine?

Mr. Beach—Yes, scripturally and legally.

Mr. Morris—Very well; that is so much the worse for him.

The Witness—I am not on trial. I beg pardon; I am not on trial.

Q. That will do now, Mr. Guy. Do you think that a marriage celebrated before a magistrate—a Justice of the Peace—is a valid, legal marriage? A. I do, but it has not the sanctions of religion; it has not the sanctions of the Church, but it is a valid, legal marriage, nevertheless.

Q. Well, Mr. Guy— A. Gay.

Q. Mr. Gay, as we have succeeded in excusing your coming here, we will excuse you now from further attendance.

RE-DIRECT-EXAMINATION OF MR. GAY.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Gay, what did you say in answer to Mr. Tilton's lecture? A. After his lecture was over, sitting down in the audience—supposing this was the platform [indicating], not quite—about half as high as this—sitting down there, I rose in my place and said—turning to the audience, I begged them to wait a moment, and I said that I could not go to my bed, nor indeed to my grave, in peace, without protesting and denouncing that lecture, that a more dangerous lecture I had never heard, a lecture more unsuited to the audience I had never heard, and with that sat down.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton do then? A. The first gesture was to run his fingers through his long hair, blushed, got up, and said he did not feel like measuring swords with the gentleman at that time and place, excused himself for delivering that lecture, on the ground that it was called for by a committee; upon which I replied that if it had been called for by a committee of the students they could not have known what was in it, and I did not still feel that he was excusable for delivering such a lecture there.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton rejoin anything to that? A. Well, by this time there was considerable confusion—considerable confusion and noise.

Q. Well, I asked if he said anything in reply? A. He said something, but exactly what it was I do not remember; I do not know that I heard distinctly.

Q. You were in the audience? A. I was in the audience down there [indicating]; he was up here on the platform.]

Q. You were a Professor in the college? A. I was a Professor—Professor of English Literature.

Q. And for that protest you lost your professorship? A. For that protest an opposition was started which threatened a rebellion and a stampede.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—Why?

The Witness—A threatened rebellion and stampede—

Mr. Beach—Will you wait a moment?

The Witness—Certainly.

Judge Nelson—I think we can take his statement; it is virtually what he gave before. It may be due to the gentleman to take it.

Mr. Beach—Well, upon that ground I withdraw any objection, of course.

The Witness—An organized opposition, violent opposition was started up right away as indicated in those—

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Evarts—Those resolutions.

The Witness—Those resolutions that Mr. Morris has brought out. I think the effect of it should be brought out too.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Sir; and what?

The Witness—Well, this opposition and this feeling of hostility on the part of the students, stirred up that night and the next morning, kept on increasing, until some six weeks afterwards I felt constrained to offer my resignation—

Mr. Everts—Resignation.

The Witness—I was not expelled; I was not threatened with expulsion; nothing of the sort.

Judge Neilson—You thought it proper to resign? A. I thought proper to resign.

Mr. Everts—And that was accepted at the next meeting of the trustees, was it? A. It was accepted.

Q. In the Summer? A. It was accepted with the understanding that if I had a quiet term, next term, I would probably be re-elected.

Q. Well, since that you have pursued your duty as a minister of the gospel, have you not? A. As a clergyman of the Church—the Protestant Episcopal Church—as a missionary.

Q. In the same place? A. In the same place, and in neighboring places. That is my calling.

Q. What was your salary as professor?

Mr. Beach—Oh, I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, we will see.

Mr. Beach—Well, we will see; I object to it.

Judge Neilson—I think we better take it. It is curious to see what compensation professors get.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, does your Honor sit here for the purpose of indulging that sort of curiosity?

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I object to this evidence.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, it is immaterial; ruled out. I suppose you intend to show that he got less as professor than he gets now; is that it?

Mr. Everts—No, not a bit of it. I propose to show that this gentleman lost a salary of $1,800 and has lived on $450 ever since. That I propose to show.

Mr. Fullerton—What of that?

Judge Neilson—I think we will not take it.

Mr. Everts—That is what I propose to show.

Judge Neilson—That is one of the misfortunes of life,

Mr. Fullerton—Suppose it was to show that he was ever paid?

Mr. Everts—I don't propose to show that. The jury will judge about it.

Mr. Beach—The jury will judge about what?

Mr. Everts—About the evidence that he has given.

The Witness—Am I through?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Wait a moment.

Mr. Everts—Look at this, Mr. Gay, and say if that is the letter you sent to Mr. Shearman? A. Yes, Sir, that is the letter I wrote to Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Everts—We offer that in evidence, your Honor.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Mr. Everts—Why?

The Witness—It is dated November 2d. I see there are two sheets, I supposed there was but one.

Mr. Morris—There are four sheets.

Mr. Everts—One full sheet of letter paper.

Judge Neilson—I think we cannot take it. We have the substance, I think.

Mr. Everts—We have had a right—I beg your Honor's pardon for speaking so decidedly—but I suppose we have a right to offer it in evidence. They have called for the correspondence.

Judge Neilson—They have not called for anything that would qualify their cross-examination.

THE LETTERS ABOUT MR. GAY'S TESTIMONY RULED OUT.

Mr. Everts.—They have given the contents of the paper.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, your Honor has the evidence fresh in your recollection. They explored, for their purposes, the correspondence, to make what they could out of it. That gives us a right to show the correspondence and produce it in evidence, that the correspondence may speak for itself. Otherwise witnesses have no protection whatever.

[Mr. Beach here rose as if to speak.]

Mr. Everts—I am not through.

Mr. Beach—Well, I am not troubling you, Go on. I was picking up a pen. (Laughter.)

Mr. Everts—Not picking up a quarrel? [Laughter.] Now, this whole affair is pleasant and hilarious, no doubt; but, seriously, when counsel inquire into correspondence between the witness and the opposite counsel in reference to the position of the witness in the cause, I know no safer rule than that the correspondence itself should be rightfully presented by the other side.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Morris inquired if he wrote substantially what he had stated here.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You consider that looking at the contents of the paper?

Mr. Everts—I do.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir, you mark it, with that view.

Mr. Beach—What, Sir?

Judge Neilson—We will receive it.

Mr. Beach—Receive the letter, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Suppose it has something else in it?

Mr. Everts—You can read it.

Mr. Morris—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Morris interrogated him whether he had written to Mr. Shearman substantially what he had testified to here, and as much as he had stated here.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; substantially what he has stated here. How does that give them a right to introduce the declaration of this man in the form of a letter? The point of the inquiry, if your Honor remembers, was, the gentleman having disclosed that Mr. Shearman wrote to him that he was not needed, or need not come, the point of the inquiry was to show that this gentleman had communicated to Mr. Shearman, before that notice was given, all that he had revealed upon his examination.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—Does that authorize them to go into a statement of what he revealed to Mr. Shearman? Suppose he revealed to Mr. Shearman more than he stated here, would it make it evidence?

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It makes the whole letter evidence.

Mr. Beach—No, it does not make the whole letter evidence.

Judge Neilson—The letter does not prove anything that it contains.

Mr. Evarts—That we understand.

Judge Neilson—It does not prove any fact that is in it, but it may be due to the witness that it should be put in.

Mr. Beach—In what respect? He says that he communicated to Mr. Shearman substantially what he had testified to here. Where is there any necessity for any explanation on the part of the witness?

Judge Neilson—Is that not in effect inquiring into the contents of the letter?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; it is inquiring as to the simple fact. "You have sworn to this upon this stand. Did you communicate this to Mr. Shearman?" "Yes." Now, does that authorize them to give the conversation between the witness and Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Beach—Most certainly not.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Beach—Most certainly not. This is precisely the same thing, Sir. What may be in this letter I don't know. It may state a great many other facts which certainly would not be competent evidence; and we simply proving the fact that certain ascertained, declared evidence had been communicated to Mr. Shearman, does not allow, as I understand your Honor to rule, evidence of the details of that communication. It may have been a great deal more than the evidence as testified to upon the stand, and it is not in the sense which the law recognizes of giving a part of the conversation or declaration. Now, with your Honor's permission, I will look at this.

Mr. Morris—Supposing I had asked him if he had told Mr. Shearman verbally all that he had testified to here, would that authorize their giving the conversation?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Morris—Why, it is the same thing.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, there is a question or two I want to put to the witness.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir; I ask your Honor to look at this and see whether under any rule of law the declarations in that letter can be received. [Handing the letter to the Court.]

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts:] Well, will you proceed?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; it is only a moment. [To the witness:] Mr. Gay, how long had you been in New-York, now— A. I have been here about—

Q. Wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—He can't wait.

Mr. Evarts,—How long had you been in New-York now before you received, through your wife's letter from home, the telegram that had been sent out there? A. I arrived here two weeks ago to-day. I told you that I received my wife's letter and Mr. Shearman's telegram day before yesterday.

Q. Your wife's letter enclosing the telegram reached you day before yesterday? A. Day before yesterday—nearly two weeks.

Q. Have you that telegram with you? A. I think not; I don't think I have. [Taking papers from his pocket.] I can give it almost word for word. It was to come on to Brooklyn.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is accepted as a fact, no doubt.

The Witness—I have stated that before.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I suppose so. I thought the gentleman had it, and it would show the date.

The Witness—No; I have it at my quarters, the St. Denis Hotel.

Q. That you received; and before that had you had any communication with any of the gentlemen connected with this cause? A. None whatever.

Q. I mean during your visit here? A. None whatever; I did not expect to come into this cause.

Q. When you left home it was on Mr. Shearman's letter that you need not expect to be called? A. I did not expect to be called in at all.

Q. Now, after receiving this telegram night before last— A. The morning before last.

Q. Day before yesterday? A. Day before yesterday, in the morning.

Q. What did you then do in reference to coming into connection with anybody in this cause? A. I went and consulted a friend as to my duty in the premises. Shall I say whom I consulted?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—There is no objection to that.

Mr. Beach—There is.

Mr. Evarts—Objection is made.

Mr. Beach—Nobody disputes the propriety of the manner in which he appears here.

Mr. Evarts—Why, we had a very animated conversation about it.

The Witness—I can say I did not wish to come into the cause; I did not wish to appear.

Q. What did you then, after consulting with your friend? A. I went to see you.

Q. At my house? A. At your house.

Q. When was that? A. Night before last.

Q. That was the first you had ever had any connection with me? A. The first time that I had ever had any connection with you.

Q. And thereupon you told me what you knew about the matter, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And I brought you over here to testify? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have testified? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Morris—That is all, Mr. Gay.

Mr. Evarts—Wait until this question of the witness' correspondence is disposed of.

Judge Neilson—I think we understand Mr. Gay without the use of this letter. He has testified the circumstance, the fact that he wrote to Mr. Shearman substantially what he has testified to here. This letter contains other matter and other suggestions. It would not be relevant, perhaps.

The Witness—I would rather keep it.

Mr. Everts—I have not read it at all.

Judge Neilson—I have no doubt he states correctly in his statement that he wrote the substance.

Mr. Everts—But, if your Honor please, my learned friend started off in the cross-examination of the witness with a view of showing that he has corresponded with the counsel, and that in that correspondence he has not told the matter as he told it here, and they thereby expose themselves to the production of the correspondence to sustain the witness and maintain exactly what he has told the counsel. Now, I suppose there is nothing in this letter that does not relate to this subject in some form, for it is correspondence between this gentleman with Mr. Shearman, and they have no relations other than that.

Mr. Fullerton—It may have been about his missionary work.

Judge Neilson—It refers to proceedings which took place the next morning. I think we do not need the letter, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, Sir, your Honor will be so good as to note our exception. The principle may be worth preserving, even if the letter is not, and we suppose it is a material right of the witness that we may have to insist upon again.

Judge Neilson—The witness will allow you to keep the letter. Identify it.

Mr. Everts—We will have it marked for identification. It is our letter—this witness' letter to Mr. Shearman.

The Witness—It is Mr. Shearman's. It is out of my power.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, is that with a view to the reconsideration of this question at all?

Judge Neilson—Oh, no.

Mr. Beach—Because I shall want this witness here.

Mr. Morris—We shall want him here.

Mr. Everts—He is here.

Mr. Morris—Well, if at a subsequent stage you introduce the letter.

Judge Neilson—I think upon consideration it will not occur to the counsel that it is important to take this correspondence.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor throws out an intimation of that kind the other side will want it in evidence. [Laughter.]

Mr. Morris—No; we have read it.

A NEW MISSIONARY FIELD SUGGESTED TO THE WITNESS.

Mr. Fullerton—He may have been laboring as a missionary on the other side, Sir, for all I know, and we don't want that in evidence.

The Witness—No, Sir, it is not my missionary work.

Mr. Morris—I intended no imputation at all upon the witness, as they state. It was my idea to show that he had communicated, and I believe that he had communicated all that he testified to here, and we have regarded it as utterly immaterial as it is.

The Witness—If I am here as a missionary I am entitled to protection, without sneers of that sort.

Judge Neilson—That is so, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What, Sir? There is no sneer upon our side, as I understand.

The Witness—It is from your neighbor.

Mr. Everts—It certainly was not from ours.

Mr. Beach—It certainly is no reflection upon the witness. I think he would certainly find an excellent missionary field among the counsel on the other side.

[The letter above referred to is marked "For identification, Exhibit D, 118."]

Mr. Everts—Now, Mr. Gay, about this change of law in Indiana; when did that take place? A. Two years ago; at the session of the Legislature, two years ago.

Q. Immediately following this lecture of Mr. Tilton? A. The first Legislature following.

Q. The first Legislature after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They made the laws more stringent?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; I object to that, Sir.

Mr. Everts—He said so under your examination, that they had more stringent laws about divorce in Indiana passed two years ago.

Mr. Morris—More stringent laws in the manner of administering them.

Mr. Everts—More stringent laws. All I prove is that it was the first chance that the Legislature had after Mr. Tilton's lecture. [Laughter.]

Mr. Pryor—That is good.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, it seems hardly worth while to resume with any other witness to-day. Will you get ready to retire? Will the audience keep their seats a moment? At 11 o'clock to-morrow, gentlemen.

The Court then adjourned to 11 o'clock Thursday morning.

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE PLYMOUTH CHURCH RECORDS.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES FORRESTER AND JAMES GAYLOR OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT REGARDING THE INTERCEPTION OF THE GOLDEN AGE IN ITS TRANSMISSION THROUGH THE MAILS—THE REV. MR. HALLIDAY REPEATS MOULTON'S ASSERTIONS TO HIM THAT MR. BEECHER WAS INNOCENT—A GOOD-HUMORED SQUABBLE OVER THE POSSESSION OF THE PLYMOUTH CHURCH RECORDS.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1875.

Mr. Beecher's counsel began the day by introducing a new line of evidence, apparently unexpected by their opponents. They called Mr. Charles Forrester of the Post-Office Department. He testified that in 1873 the Post-Office officials in this city stopped the transmission of The Golden Age through the mail, because copies of the Steinway Hall speech of Mrs. Woodhull were inclosed with the copies of that paper. The plaintiff's counsel appeared relieved, however, when the witness explained on cross-examination that the copies were stopped for a short time on the ground that the speech inclosed with The Golden Age was transient matter, and the postage should have been paid in stamps.

James Gaylor, who was a special agent of the Post-Office Department, testified that Mr. Tilton came to him at that time and claimed that the copies of the speech were supplements to The Golden Age, but offered in case they were held to be otherwise to pay the postage on them.

Mr. Halliday then resumed the stand, and gave some further conversations between himself and Francis D. Moulton, in which that gentleman had repeatedly asserted Mr. Beecher's innocence; saying, among other things: "Mr. Halliday, I know all about this that any one knows, and I know that Mr. Beecher is innocent;" and on another occasion: "Do you suppose if Mr. Beecher were a bad man I would allow him to sit here at my table with my wife, as a guest, as he frequently does?" Mr. Halliday also gave a conversation with Mr. Tilton, in 1873, in which Mr. Tilton had said: "My case against Mr. Beecher is wholly irrespective of my wife."

The counsel for the defense then sought to introduce evidence of the actions of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church outside of the records of their meeting. This was ruled out. The record-book was produced, and the witness questioned as to the meetings. At this point, however, arose another great discussion, the volume becoming a sort of bone of contention between the plaintiff's and defendant's counsel, and fully an hour was taken up in the efforts of each side to retain possession of it. Mr. Shearman left it on the plaintiff's desk for a moment, and Mr. Tilton picked it up and began to turn over its pages. Mr. Abbott glanced nervously at the plaintiff, and whispered to Mr. Shearman the fact. Mr. Shearman continued his argument; Mr. Tilton went on with the record-book. Then Mr. Shearman went to the plaintiff and took the book from him. But the trouble began again immediately after the recess. Mr. Fullerton was cross-examining Mr. Halliday. Gen. Pryor and Mr. Tilton were having a quiet investigation of the book, which they had got possession of by some means. Mr. Shearman said he objected to the plaintiff's looking at the records of Plymouth Church. Mr. Fullerton replied by offering the book in evidence. Mr. Shearman protested again against the plaintiff's reading them. Mr. Fullerton handed the book to the witness with a question. Mr. Shearman objected to this use of the volume, and advanced to take possession of it. Mr. Fullerton's shoulder stopped him, and the large frame of the cross-examiner blocked the way of his opponent to the witness chair. Then the quarrel over the book ceased for a few minutes, during which Mr. Shearman declared that Mr. Fullerton had insulted the clergymen and ladies called by the defense as witnesses. This Mr. Fullerton denied, and called attention to the appearance of Mr. Halliday, who was smiling most amiably, as a refutation of the charge. Then the dispute over the records broke out in a new form. Mr. Shearman was willing the plaintiff's side should use them, but insisted that his opponents should admit that they had no right to them, but were allowed to use them by his courtesy. The Judge wearily asked Mr. Shearman to yield in courtesy to him. "If it is a courtesy to the Court, I will," replied Mr. Shearman. "Then we are tenants of the records by the courtesy," retorted Mr. Fullerton, while the laugh went round. But the dispute was not ended, and Judge Porter finally had to take part in the proceedings, for the first time in several weeks, in order to restore peace.

The cross-questioning then continued. It appeared that Mr. Halliday had advised the Examining Committee not to prosecute the West charges as first made against Mr. Tilton. The witness had recommended that Mr. Tilton's name be dropped from the roll of the church members. Capt. Duncan, Dr. White, and Mr. Manchester had desired that Mr. Tilton should be prosecuted on the charges. The witness was asked what advice he had given regarding the matter. Mr. Halliday frequently declared that he could not answer categorically or without explaining. Mr. Shearman raised objection to almost every question; Mr. Beach was always ready in support of his associate, and the last hour of the day was given up to "sparring" between the counsel. Mr. Beach declared that Mr. Shearman made a farce of the proceedings. "The farce is on the side that is always trying to entrap the witness," replied Mr. Shearman. "The farce will become a tragedy if brother Shearman doesn't cool his nerves down," was Mr. Fullerton's retort. After some further discussion Mr. Fullerton vehemently declared that he was determined to get at the advice which Mr. Halliday had given in regard to the perfected charges against Mr. Tilton after the plaintiff had waived his non-membership of the church. This speech was received with applause by the audience, which had been rather disorderly during the afternoon. Mr. Halliday arose from the witness chair, saying, "I would like to ask the Court whether it has any impression that I have been unwilling to give my testimony?" "Not at all," answered Judge Neilson, and cut short the discussion between the counsel by adjourning the court.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES FORRESTER.

Charles Forrester was called and sworn for defendant.

By Mr. Hill—Mr. Forrester, where do you reside? A. No. 280 Henry-st., New-York.

Q. What is your present employment? A. Assistant Superintendent in the city newspaper-room of the New-York Post-Office.

Q. How long have you been so employed? A. I have been employed in the New-York Post-Office for the last 50 years.

Q. For the last—how long? A. Fifty years.

Q. Were you employed in the Post-Office, in the newspaper department, in November or December, 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect of any occasion when there was a trouble with the passage of The Golden Age newspaper through the mails, in consequence of something which was circulated with it or sent to the office with it?

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Mr. Shearman—What is the ground of the objection?

Mr. Morris—It is immaterial and improper.

Judge Neilson—What do you propose to prove, Mr. Hill?

Mr. Hill—Our purpose is this: to show by this witness that the Steinway Hall speech of Mrs. Woodhull had been printed and was about to be circulated, was sent to the office along with The Golden Age newspaper from Mr. Tilton's office, and that subsequently the authorities declined to pass it as a supplement to the paper, and that Mr. Tilton himself undertook to bear any expense and did bear the necessary expense of circulating the speech.

Mr. Morris—What of it?

Judge Neilson—Prove anything that Mr. Tilton did. Omit the—

Mr. Shearman—We propose to connect Mr. Tilton with all this.

Mr. Hill—It is merely a preliminary question.

Judge Neilson—One moment. It is quite obvious to every lawyer that you could not prove in this way what the authorities did in respect to the Post-Office. You may prove any action of Mr. Tilton himself, what he did or said.

Mr. Hill—I propose, with your Honor's permission, first to call his attention to the circumstance.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is what is objected to, and what is ruled out.

Mr. Hill—I do not so understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it is.

Mr. Hill—My question is, if he recollects the occasion.

Mr. Morris—Well, we object to the whole matter.

Mr. Hill—And I understand his Honor to have permitted me to prove that.

Mr. Morris—In that form? Not in that form, I don't understand.

Mr. Beach—I understand it is competent for them to prove there was difficulty in carrying The Golden Age without stating the cause of it, and that Mr. Tilton afterward called.

Mr. Morris—We object to the characterization of it.

Judge Neilson—Do you remember any difficulty in that Post-Office in respect to The Golden Age?

Mr. Hill—What is your answer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please state what that difficulty was?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Morris—That we object to.

Mr. Hill—Why, I want to show that it was connected with this speech subject.

Judge Neilson—You can show what Mr. Tilton did or said.

Mr. Shearman—We can hardly make what Mr. Tilton, did or said intelligible until we have first shown there was a reason for Mr. Tilton's coming. There is Mr. Tilton's paper; we have shown that he was the publisher and editor of that paper. We simply want to show that there was a difficulty which called Mr. Tilton up there, and without which his conversation is not intelligible.

Judge Neilson—If Mr. Tilton came there and acted or said anything, that will sufficiently disclose the difficulty besides he says there was.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, do you recollect whether the Steinway Hall speech was wrapped with The Golden Age as it was sent from Mr. Tilton's office, to be circulated with it?

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Mr. Shearman—That is clearly an act of the publisher of The Golden Age.

Judge Neilson—One moment; we will take that, it is a mere incident.

Mr. Hill—That is all I want.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. Now what did you do—

Judge Neilson—No; what did Mr. Tilton do?

Mr. Hill—I simply desire to show that this gentleman reported it to the authorities.

Judge Neilson—Well, you ought not to offer it.

Mr. Hill—That he did not forward the speech but retained it and reported it to the authorities.

Judge Neilson—You ought not to compel me to rule against you on such things; ought not to compel me to exclude the action of third persons which may be right and which may be wrong. Go at once to Mr. Tilton and let us see what he said or did.

Mr. Hill—My difficulty is, your Honor, I want to prove this transaction by two witnesses. The occasion of Mr. Tilton's call is proved by one; the action of Mr. Tilton with respect to the matter is to be proved by the other.

Judge Neilson—Prove all this witness knows and then bring the other.

Mr. Hill—No, Sir; I fancy that I may show the occasion which brought Mr. Tilton into communication with the other witness; that is my sole object—I do not propose to go any further. Do I understand your Honor to exclude that?

Judge Neilson—I think you have gone as far as you can go to indicate the action of the authorities.

Mr. Hill—Well, may I be permitted to show by this witness that the issue of The Golden Age was stopped in consequence of this speech being sent with it?

Judge Neilson—I have said no, because that is the action of certain authorities which may be right or may be wrong.

Mr. Morris—We will have to go into that question and try that issue.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor and the counsel may, perhaps, be under an impression that some imputation is thrown against The Golden Age, or Mr. Tilton, in consequence of this stoppage; it is merely a postal regulation, and is offered to show and make intelligible the subsequent conduct of Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think we will understand the conversation when it comes.

Q. Did you have any interview yourself with Mr. Tilton in respect to the matter? A. No, Sir; I didn't see Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, Mr. Forrester, were the newspapers, The Golden Age newspapers which were sent to the office, forwarded at that time when they first came? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long were they detained? A. In the course of the day word came down from the—

Mr. Morris—No; we object.

Mr. Hill—That his honor excludes?

Judge Neilson—One moment. How long were they detained—a day or two, or how long? A. I think about soon they were forwarded.

Mr. Hill—Of the same day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About when was this? Fix the date as nearly as you can. A. It was the Fall of 1871 or 1872; I am not certain which.

Q. You cannot remember the date? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you remember whether this stoppage affected the general edition of The Golden Age or only the exchanges?

Mr. Morris—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—Oh, well, it was stopped; I think that is very general and affects it all.

Mr. Hill—I am satisfied, your Honor.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Hill—Permit us to except to the other ruling which your Honor made. That is all, Mr. Forrester.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF CHARLES FORRESTER.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. What do you say was sent with The Golden Age—of your own knowledge now? A. A lecture of Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Did you see it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Read it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know where the lecture was delivered—purported to be delivered? A. I think it was at Steinway Hall.

Q. Sure? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was not this difficulty in September, 1872? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. When do you think it was? A. I think it was in the Fall of 1871 or 1872; I am not positive which.

Q. September is in the Fall of 1872, is it not? A. Well.

Mr. Fullerton—Eh! Well, wasn't it September, 1871? A. It might have been; I am not positive which.

Q. You don't know? A. I don't, Sir, positively, that it was either 1871 or 1872; it was one of the years.

Q. You did not read the lecture? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know what its import was? A. No, Sir.

Q. What was the heading to it; do you recollect? A. I recollect of Robert Hay bringing me—

Q. No, no; what was the heading of it? Did you read the heading? A. No, Sir; I did not read the heading, but I found there were two pieces.

Q. One moment—you did not read the heading? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Did he read the lecture.

Mr. Fullerton—How? A. I think I did read the heading; it was the lecture of Mrs. Woodhull at Steinway Hall.

Q. You think now you did read the heading? A. Yes, Sir, I do.

Q. What was that lecture in; what was it printed in? A. It was printed—it was in The Golden Age.

Q. Published in The Golden Age? A. No, Sir, published detached from it as a supplement.

Q. As a supplement to The Golden Age? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now you are sure of that? A. I think I am, Sir.

Q. You read it, did you, so as to know what it was? A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Q. You read the heading, then, and know of your own knowledge that it was the supplement to The Golden Age? A. Well, I cannot say whether it was the supplement, or whether it was the lecture folded in The Golden Age.

Q. Without any heading indicating that it was a supplement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you are sure now that you read it, so as to know of your own knowledge that it was a lecture at Steinway Hall by Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that it was in the Fall of 1871 or 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But the month you don't know? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was the objection to your sending this; was it because there were two pieces in one? A. The objection was that it was transient matter, and should be paid by stamps.

Q. Yes, that was the only objection? A. That was the objection; there was no objection—other objection to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JAMES GAYLER.

Mr. Hill—What is your business? A. I am General Superintendent of the City Delivery, at the New-York City Post-Office.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that employment? A. Since April, 1872.

Q. What was your business or employment about that time? A. Special Agent of the Post-Office Department.

Q. For how long? A. For about—since 1864; I was appointed in 1864.

Q. Is that a duty under the General Post-Office Department or under the New-York Post-Office? A. Under the General Post-Office Department.

Q. And you were assigned to the New-York Post-Office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you hear Mr. Forrester just now? A. I did.

Q. Do you recollect the occasion spoken of by him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please explain what, if any, connection Mr. Tilton had with that transaction, and what was done between you and him with reference to the Steinway Hall speech and The Golden Age newspaper sent to the office, as described by Mr. Forrester?

Mr. Beach—I understand it is proposed to prove, Sir, that Mr. Tilton assumed the payment of the additional postal charge which he has thought fit to make upon that paper. I am not able to conceive, Sir, the materiality of that inquiry; and I object to it. Here was a public lecture delivered by a public lecturer, printed by the paper of which Mr. Tilton had control and proprietorship, and circulated in the ordinary way, he paying the postal duty upon it. What has that to do, Sir, with this issue? The lecture is not in evidence; its character is not under inquiry here, but it is the simple circumstance that the editor of a public newspaper publishes a public lecture and pays the postal duty upon it. Now, I submit to your Honor that it has not the remotest relevancy to any issue in this case, and is not proper as a circumstance bearing upon any legitimate question to be discussed in this case; and that it is such irrelevant matter as ought not to be introduced for the purposes of debate by counsel. It has no relation, Sir, to the merits of this action; it has no connection with the relations which may be imputed as between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull; it is but the ordinary duty of a public printer or a publisher in the circulation of a public document about which it may be supposed the public feel some interest; and no legitimate inference or consequence, in any relation, either of persons or of subject matter, can be properly derived from such a circumstance. And I submit to your Honor that it ought not to be permitted to go in evidence.

Judge Neilson—This will, no doubt, be very brief; I think he may be permitted to answer it.

Mr. Beach—Is it to be settled, your Honor, that we are to take irrelevant and immaterial evidence, simply because it is brief?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Beach—Or because the witnesses are here?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Beach—Now, if your Honor cannot see a material connection between this evidence and the duty your Honor and the jury have to perform in this case, I submit that we should have a strict application of the rules of evidence. We have got immaterial and irrelevant matter, and side issues enough to be discussed in this action without unnecessarily accumulating them.

Mr. Fullerton—Besides that, Sir, I am instructed that this difficulty did not grow out of an attempt to transmit the Steinway Hall speech through the mails; it was not that lecture at all. And it involves the necessity of our going into proof upon that subject, upon that side issue consuming more time than is necessary to consume in the trial of this case. I trust your Honor won't admit it because it is brief.

Judge Neilson—No, not wholly with that view; that is not in issue. I think I will take the answer.

The Court requested THE TRIBUNE Stenographer to read the last question.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—[Reading:] "Please explain what, if any, connection Mr. Tilton had with that transaction, and what was done between you and him with respect to that Steinway Hall speech and The Golden Age newspaper, as sent to the office, as described by Mr. Forrester."

The Witness—Mr. Tilton came into my office, and we had a conversation in regard to the stoppage of the exchanges of The Golden Age with this so-called supplement in the same package with it, and I contended that it was not a supplement, not a bona fide supplement, and that, if sent through the mails, it should, under the laws and regulations, be paid at transient rates of postage. He disputed my view of the matter, but said that it would cause great inconvenience to The Golden Age if those exchanges did not go out on that day; that he wanted them sent out at once, particularly, and said that if I would submit the case to the Post-Office Department in a letter, that in case the decision was adverse to him he pledged his word to pay the postage which would have been payable at the transient rates. He asked me if that would be satisfactory. I told him yes, although it was not strictly regular, as such postage should be prepaid by stamps; yet, under the circumstances, I would recommend the Postmaster to let them go forward, and would submit the case to the Department, and Mr. Tilton left me with that understanding; that is all the personal interview I had with Mr. Tilton about the matter.

Q. Now, the exchanges with this so-called supplement, were they forwarded? A. I recommended it to the Postmaster. I don't know of my own knowledge that they were forwarded.

Q. Now, please state what, if any, action was had between the New-York Post-Office and Mr. Tilton, or his office, with respect to the matter, after the decision was made—just the words?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Did you see Mr. Tilton in respect to it? A. No, Sir, I didn't see him again.

Judge Neilson—Very well.

Mr. Hill—I propose to show the decision was forwarded to Mr. Tilton, and that subsequently the sum of $100 for that extra postage was sent through the Post-Office Department from Mr. Tilton's office, not through any personal interview with this gentleman, but to his knowledge as a business man. That is all.

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can show anything without bringing Mr. Tilton in connection with it.

Mr. Hill—I suppose I may show this gentleman sent a message to Mr. Tilton stating the amount, and what the decision was.

Judge Neilson—Not what the decision was. [To the witness.] Did you send a message to him? A. I took a message there. I took the letter of the Department to the office.

Q. Did he pay the additional postage? A. He was not there.

Mr. Hill—You left the message in his office? A. Yes, Sir, the next day, but it was, I think, after this interview.

Q. Please state if the money was sent to the Post-Office. A. It was; it came to my hands in a check.

Q. How much was it? A. One hundred dollars.

Judge Neilson—Very well.

Q. Now, be kind enough to state, if you recollect, what this so-called supplement was? A. It was a pamphlet—an octavo pamphlet, I think, as I remember it.

Q. Can you recollect whether it was this speech that has been referred to, or not? A. I cannot recollect that directly. That has been my recollection about it all the time. At that time I had an impression it was the Steinway Hall speech. That was previous to my interview with Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, a single question more. Can you fix the time when this occurred? A. No, Sir, I cannot fix that with any sort of certainty at all. As to the date, I am perfectly uncertain on that point.

Q. Can you say what it was? A. I can, perhaps, scarcely say that now, because after I took my present position I was sometimes called in by Gen. Jones, who was then Postmaster, to speak about matters of this sort; but I think it must have been previous to April, 1872, because I would not have gone to the Post-Office as a special agent after I had resigned that position.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. JAMES GAYLER.

Mr. Fullerton—You didn't read this octavo pamphlet? A. No, Sir.

Q. Therefore you cannot speak from any recollection of what it was? A. No, Sir; only the external appearance of it. I remember seeing such a pamphlet.

Mr. Beach—Have you no recollection of the title page—any present recollection, so as to speak from memory? A. No, Sir, I have not.

Mr. Fullerton—Had it a title page? A. It was without a cover, as I remember it, with a title page.

Q. Without a cover? A. Yes, Sir, without a cover.

Mr. Beach—You are sure this was before April, 1872? A. Yes, Sir; I am sure from that circumstance that I just mentioned.

Mr. Fullerton—Was it not a Golden Age tract? A. No, Sir. It was claimed as a supplement to The Golden Age.

Q. Was it not called a Golden Age tract? A. That I don't remember as any part of the title.

Mr. Beach—About what was the size of that pamphlet? A. If I could have something to compare it with I could tell you.

Q. About that size? [Showing a book to witness.] A. No, Sir, it was larger than that; that is, it was not so thick, but it was longer.

Q. Larger than that? [Showing another book.] A. Yes, Sir, about that size; that is about the size.

Mr. Hill—Of the page you mean? A. Of the paper.

Mr. Shearman—[Handing book to witness.] That is what is called regular octavo size? A. That is what I take to be octavo.

Q. [Showing witness two books.] This is a small octavo, and this is a large octavo—this is full octavo, and that is small octavo. Say whether it was small octavo, or full octavo, or medium? A. I think it was about that [indicating] size, but I won't be certain.

Q. That is, small octavo? A. It had no cover on it; it was white.

Mr. Fullerton—[Answering a whisper from Mr. Shearman.] When you do, it won't be the Steinway Hall lecture.

MR. SAMUEL B. HALLIDAY RECALLED.

The Rev. Samuel B. Halliday, assistant pastor of Plymouth Church, again took the stand in response to a call from Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, do you recollect any interview between yourself and Mr. Moulton in the Fall of 1872? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Will you state whether you called on Mr. Moulton; if so, when? A. My first call at Mr. Moulton's house, or upon him at to see him, was on the evening of the interview with—on the evening of the morning of the interview that I had with Mr. Tilton. I think it was on Monday—it was on Monday, as I recollect, the 18th of November. I called at Mr. Moulton's residence, and he was not at home.

Q. Did you call again; and if so, when? A. I called the next morning about half-past eight o'clock.

Q. Did you see Mr. Moulton then? A. He was, I think, not yet up. He came down-stairs after I had been there a few minutes, and he said to me: "I know what—"

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—What is the objection.

Mr. Fullerton—The objection is that he has answered the question, and is going on to say something he has not been inquired of.

Mr. Shearman—Then I ask what Mr. Moulton said to him.

Mr. Fullerton—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Shearman.] If it is anything Mr. Moulton was interrogated about, you can ask him.

Mr. Shearman—It happens to be something about which plaintiff's counsel interrogated Mr. Moulton quite freely.

Judge Neilson—Let us see. You can ask him in reference to the same matter they inquired into.

Mr. Shearman—That is precisely the same matter; he is going to give substantially the same words.

Judge Neilson—That I don't know. Put your question with a view to—

Mr. Shearman—It is the same occasion.

Mr. Morris—What is the point of your examination?

Mr. Shearman—If plaintiff's counsel will tell me for what purpose they introduced the conversation between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Halliday, I will tell them why I desire to follow them.

Mr. Morris—I say it is not proper to contradict unless they lay the foundation for doing so.

Judge Neilson—There is no difficulty about that. They examined Mr. Moulton about a certain matter, detailing interviews between himself and Mr. Halliday. You [Mr. Shearman] have the right to call Mr. Halliday's attention to what Mr. Moulton said, and take his answers on these points.

Mr. Shearman—I take it, if your Honor please, that I have a right to do a little more than that. If it was on cross-examination we brought this out, then we would submit, of course, to the rule that was laid down, and we would ask these precise questions; but as the plaintiff's counsel brought out the interview between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Halliday—as they brought out Mr. Moulton's version of it, we have a right to bring out Mr. Halliday's version of the whole matter, as we submit, they having what Mr. Moulton admits he said on the direct examination. This witness stands upon an entirely different footing from that of the other witnesses.

Judge Neilson—I understand that, and I said more than once you are at liberty to correct and contradict anything Mr. Moulton said on their direct examination.

Mr. Shearman—I am satisfied. Q. To the Witness.] Now, Mr. Halliday, will you state what was the conversation between you and Mr. Moulton on that occasion?

Mr. Fullerton—That embraces a variety of subjects; perhaps something more than that was alluded to by Mr. Moulton.

The Witness—Not on that occasion.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Halliday, you had no right to say that.

Mr. Shearman—It is only in regard to the conversation now in controversy.

Judge Neilson—Go on and we will see what it is.

The Witness—There was no conversation at all, except Mr. Moulton saying: "I know what you want, but I cannot talk with you this morning. I have been up all night, and I must go to New-York as soon as I get my breakfast," and he escorted me to the door.

Q. Did he say anything at the door? A. He asked me to call again in the evening at half-past seven, or seven, I have forgotten which.

Q. Did you call again? A. I did.

Q. When? A. At the hour that he appointed on Tuesday evening.

Q. Did you see him then? A. I did not.

Q. Did you call again? A. I did the following morning.

Q. Did you see him then? A. I did not.

Q. When did you next see him, and where—when did you next see him, and where? A. Mrs. Moulton brought to me on Saturday evening—the following Saturday evening being November 23, I think; I fixed the dates from points—

Mr. Shearman—That is right, November 23.

The Witness—November 23d, about seven o'clock, I think it was; it was after dark, at all events, or in the dusk. Mrs. Moulton came to my door with a note from Mr. Moulton, saying that he would be in during that evening; that he had not had an hour during the week at his command. It was very brief. I think, in substance, that was the note, and I supposed it was an invitation for me to call down that evening.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind that.

Mr. Shearman—Never mind that. Let us make it as short as we can.

Q. Did you see Mr. Moulton in pursuance of that note? A. I did.

MR. MOULTON SCORNS THE CHARGES OF THE WOODHULL.

Q. Did you see him? A. I did.

Q. Where? A. In the parlor, first.

Q. Where did you have any conversation with him about that? A. Mr. Moulton said, to prevent interruption, we would go to the library, which was on the fourth floor of the house; I think the fourth floor; it was the top floor, at all events.

Q. Now, did you there have any conversation upon this general subject with Mr. Moulton? A. I said to Mr. Moulton—

Q. Never mind. I ask you if you had it? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Now, will you state the substance of that conversation? A. I said at first to Mr. Moulton: "I am not here out of curiosity. I do not want to know anything. I do not want to see anything that you do not want me to know or to see. I was surprised by a call at my house last Monday morning from Mr. Tilton, with whom I conversed in the presence of Mr.

George A. Bell. He said he called at my house at your request, and that after denying the Woodhull scandal entirely, he then said, 'I want you now to observe confidentially everything that I say to you,' insisting upon it that it was in the most absolute confidence that he had to say what he now should say, and though he made no specifications, he made various insinuations against Mr. Beecher"—

Mr. Morris—One moment. I object to this.

Mr. Shearman—The gentleman does not understand.

Judge Neilson—This is what Mr. Halliday said to Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Shearman—That is it.

Judge Neilson—In reciting to him what had occurred between him and Mr. Tilton.

The Witness—"But while he would make no specific charges, he referred me to you for the confirmation of the insinuations which he made, saying that you had written documents in regard to it, urging me to come. I then said that Mr. Bell wanted to come with me, but he objected.

Q. Who—who do you mean by "he"? A. Mr. Tilton objected. Mr. Moulton said immediately—I think it was the first thing he said—"Did Mr. Bell hear all that was said?" I said, "Yes, he did; he came in a few moments before Mr. Tilton, but subsequently when Mr. Moulton—when Mr. Bell came in—Mr. Tilton, at least, came in before Mr. Bell, and subsequently when Mr. Bell came in, only a few minutes after, he repeated to him what he had said to me." Mr. Moulton then alluded—I cannot use very much of the language in which he denied the truth of the scandal, but among the phrases he used were such as "baseless"—that the story was utterly baseless, without foundation, and that it was a perfect shame that anybody should believe such a story from such a source, as against the life of Mr. Beecher for five and twenty years in Brooklyn, manifesting—

Mr. Beach—No, no!

Mr. Fullerton—No, no!

The Witness—Using the strongest language in condemnation of that.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment!

Mr. Shearman—I think that is proper. The witness cannot always give the precise language, nor attempt to put it into words.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I will tell you what he need not do—comment on his own testimony.

Mr. Shearman—He is not commenting upon his own testimony; he is simply saying that Mr. Halliday used the strongest language.

Judge Neilson—The witness should either give the language or the substance of it, without characterizing it.

Mr. Shearman—Give the substance of the language? A. I would characterize it in a single sentence.

Mr. Fullerton—You need not do that.

Judge Neilson—You are to give the words or the substance.

Mr. Fullerton—The substance. You cannot characterize the language.

Judge Neilson—You are to state what he said in words or substance, according to your remembrance? A. It was only a most absolute denial.

Mr. Beach—One moment. You have been cautioned, Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Fullerton—That was absolutely wrong.

Mr. Shearman—I don't think it was.

The Witness—I am sorry if I misunderstood you. I understood you to say "in substance," and that was in substance the fact.

Q. Now, did he? A. I spoke next myself.

Q. Well, what did you say, in substance? A. I said: "You have disposed of the Woodhull scandal, Mr. Moulton, but Dr. Morrill told me that Demas Barnes had told him twice, in his parlor, that fifty men had been to see you, and that you had said invariably to them, what was equivalent to a shrug of the shoulders, that this was a dirty matter, 'you better let it alone; the more you stir it the worse it will smell.'"

Q. What did he say? A. Mr. Moulton immediately replied: "Mr. Halliday, it is false, it is no such thing; very few people come to see me; they go to my partners, and talk to them; why don't they come and see me? They are a set of damned cowards. I have seen Mr. Baxter"—No. "Very few come to me; all that do come to me I speak to precisely as I have done to you. I have seen Mr. Baxter, a member of Dr. Storrs' church, a gentleman whom I respect very much, and I have given him such an account of this affair as I have no doubt was satisfactory to him, and that his knowledge of the story, as I represented it to him, will do a great deal of good in Dr. Storrs' congregation." When he said this, I then said: "You have disposed of both the Woodhull scandal and of the Barnes story. Now, what about these insinuations of Mr."—

MR. TILTON MR. BEECHER'S FRIEND.

Q. Tilton? A. "Tilton?" Mr. Moulton was sitting by a table in the center of the room, nearly, on the west—on the east side of the table. I sat very much—the table was very much in that relation to my seat. [Pointing to a table.] It was a table not dissimilar, but larger—if I remember, a third, perhaps a half, wider than that. Mr. Moulton was sitting with his head resting upon his right hand in this manner [illustrating], hesitating perhaps a second, it was very brief, the hesitancy was after my question, when he raised himself gradually and said, with his hand in this position [illustrating]: "Mr. Halliday, I know all about this affair that any one does, and I know that Mr. Beecher is guiltless." Bringing down his hand with tremendous emphasis upon the table, said he: "Why, Mr. Halliday, Mr. Tilton is Mr. Beecher's friend; when he came back from his New-Hampshire campaign, on the morning of the election, he was sitting precisely where you are, on the sofa; when Mr. Beecher came in that door, Theodore rose and went to Mr. Beecher, took one of Mr. Beecher's hands in both of his, and shook it heartily, and said: 'I am intensely sorry for all this. I was as much surprised as anybody, and pained at the appearance of that; I knew nothing of it until I saw it, and now I am willing to do anything that I can to counteract the effect of that publication.' And he sat down and wrote—I think Mr.—I won't repeat his words—pretend that they are his words exactly, but it was in substance, that two or three different cards was written denying the story, and that by advice of counsel, their publication was withheld." "Now," says he, "Mr. Halliday, what more can be done? I have denied this; Mr. Tilton has denied it; Mrs. H. B. Stanton has denied it," and I think he mentioned some other name, but I cannot recall it. "All have denied it except Paulina Davis, and she is in Europe and could not deny it." I think the last words that he said to me were: "Would you like to see Mr. Tilton in my presence?" I said: "I would like to see him in your presence." That was the whole of the story that occurs to me at this moment.

MR. MOULTON REFERS TO HIS WIFE'S MEMBERSHIP IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Do you remember anything being said about his wife being a member of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. It was in connection with—immediately following his declaration of the guiltlessness of Mr. Beecher. He said: "Mr. Halliday, I am not a member of your church; my wife is. Do you suppose, if Mr. Beecher were a bad man, I would allow him to come and sit here at the table with my wife, as a guest, as he frequently does?"

Q. Do you remember an interview between yourself and Mrs. Tilton after the subject of charges was under consideration at The Golden Age office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you recollect about what time that was? A. Not definitely, Sir, only relatively.

Q. Can you tell in what year it was? A. It was in 1872, and my impression is that it was toward the latter part of September.

Q. In what year—you said 1872? A. Of 1873, rather; of 1873; it was the year—I could tell by a memorandum.

Q. You know that the Woodhull scandal was published in November, 1872? A. It was the following year—

Q. September, 1873, or about that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you state whether, on that occasion, you said anything to Mr. Tilton on this subject of—or rather on the subject of his having charges against Mr. Beecher, and if so, what, and what Mr. Tilton said to you in reply? A. I first said to Mr. Tilton—Must I reply immediately to that or—

Q. Well, if the previous conversation is short you can give it.

Judge Nelson—Whatever the conversation was between you and Mr. Tilton? A. I simply said to Mr. Tilton: "Are you willing to say to the Committee of the Church what you have said to individuals in reference to your membership of Plymouth Church?" Hesitating for a moment he said—I can't use the language exactly.

Mr. Shearman—The substance? A. It was to know why we didn't try Mr. Beecher. That was the substance of it, why we didn't go at Mr. Beecher instead of him.

Q. What did you say? A. I said: "Mr. Tilton"—as he would not say anything definite—I said: "Mr. Tilton, you owe it to yourself, to your family, to Mr. Beecher and to Plymouth Church to do one of two things; if you have any charges against him, prefer them, or hold your tongue." He then said to me—Ah! I am anticipating perhaps.

THE CASE AGAINST MR. BEECHER IRRESPECTIVE OF MRS. TILTON.

Q. You can give his answer. A. Said he: "What would you say if Mr. Beecher had been guilty of adultery?"

Q. What was your answer? A. I rose partially from my seat and said: "Mr. Tilton, you told me, in the presence of George A. Bell, that your wife was as pure as the light." "Oh!" said he, "my case against Mr. Beecher is wholly irrespective of my wife." I don't remember anything else that was said on that occasion.

MR. TILTON'S FIRST TROUBLE WITH PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Do you remember the period in November or December—November and December, 1871, when the question of dropping Mr. Tilton arose for the first time in the Examining Committee? A. I remember very distinctly when—

Q. Just state—A. —when the question arose as to what course should be pursued in regard to Mr. Tilton, and in consequence of his non-attendance at the church, etc.

Q. Do you remember the first meeting at which that question was raised? Was it in November, 1871? A. I cannot fix the date; I can the place and the circumstances.

Q. Well, can you tell who brought forward that question on that occasion?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—This is in reply to the testimony brought forward by the plaintiff through Mr. West, or rather to explain it. Mr. West undoubtedly meant to tell his story correctly.

Mr. Beach—I don't understand it to be in reply to any testimony given by Mr. West.

Mr. Shearman—What did you say? Excuse me.

Mr. Beach—I say I don't understand what portion of Mr. West's testimony this is in reply to.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. West's testimony, as introduced by the plaintiff's counsel, was to the effect that Mr. Beecher was present on certain occasions when the policy or disposition of Mr. Tilton was considered, and he said, with a great deal of positiveness, that he was present at a certain occasion in December. I propose to show that Mr. Beecher was present only on the first occasion in November.

Judge Nelson—You can do that.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness.] Do you remember that first occasion?

Mr. Beach—On that first occasion we gave no evidence that Mr. Beecher was present. It was the meeting in December that West's testimony referred to.

Mr. Shearman—Then I omit that. I pass over that entirely. I withdraw that question. [To the witness.] Do you remember one or more meetings which took place in December, 1871 on that subject? A. I cannot fix the dates, Sir.

Q. 1871? A. I know that there were several meetings at which

I was present, but to fix the date as to a month, I cannot do it; I could only do it by referring—unless I referred to the records, I could not tell anything about dates.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Well, this inquiry has some relation to the West charges. You remember that occasion, I suppose.

The Witness—[To Judge Neilson.] The West charges were a year afterwards.

Judge Neilson—Oh!

Mr. Shearman—I will read a few words from Mr. West's testimony.

Mr. Beach—Why—what for?

Mr. Shearman—Well, there seems to be an objection.

Mr. Beach—No.

Mr. Shearman—You make no objection?

Mr. Beach—I ask to see what his testimony is. [Mr. Beach takes and examines the book.] That refers to a meeting when the Examining Committee appointed Mr. Beecher a Committee of On .

Mr. Shearman—No.

Mr. Beach—Yes; it was.

Mr. Shearman—Well, there seems to be a little dispute. I will read a part of Mr. West's testimony.

Mr. Fullerton—What page?

Mr. Shearman—At page 330 [reading]:

"Mr. Fullerton—State what occurred in Mr. Beecher's presence in that regard?" "A. The action which occurred in Mr. Beecher's presence was at a subsequent meeting when Mr. Beecher made his report. Mr. Beecher reported to the Committee"—Then there is a little controversy follows. The witness continues. "Mr. Beecher reported to the Committee that he had seen Mr. Tilton, and that he was in a very critical position, and that he thought it would be better to leave Mr. Tilton to the influence of his friends, and for the church to take no action."

On his cross-examination, Mr. West described with particularity where Mr. Beecher sat, and how he looked, when he made that verbal report.

Judge Neilson—Now, if you will get the witness's attention fixed to that occasion, you can show whether Mr. Beecher was present.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, on page 337 Mr. West corrected that testimony so far as the date is concerned after looking at the record.

Judge Neilson—Well, leaving it, however, an occasion when Mr. Beecher was present.

Mr. Shearman—Exactly. As I said, Mr. West undoubtedly intended to state the truth, but he got in some confusion on that subject, and I want to have it clearly before the jury.

Judge Neilson—Well, to correctly understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading:]

"I think it was at the meeting of November 3d that the pastor made the statement with regard to Mr. Tilton in regard to his being in difficulty, and said that he had better see him."

Mr. Shearman—That is on the cross-examination, but you observe, your Honor, that Mr. West thinks so, but he is not sure whether he refers to the first or last one, and on his direct examination he referred very distinctly to the conversation in the presence of Mr. Beecher, between the Committee and Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Now, see if the witness recollects that occasion.

Mr. Shearman—Now, Mr. Halliday, do you recollect the occasion referred to in Mr. West's testimony, in which some final action was taken with reference to Mr. Tilton, in the Fall of 1871? Do you remember the meeting at which the last action was taken concerning Mr. Tilton in 1871? A. I think I remember very distinctly the last action taken on Mr. Tilton's case but I don't recollect any such circumstances as Mr. West testified to.

Q. Never mind; I ask you if you recollect the occasion on which the last action was taken on Mr. Tilton's case in 1871? A. I think I do very distinctly.

Judge Neilson—In 1871.

Mr. Shearman—In 1871.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Beecher present on that occasion? A. I didn't, see him.

Q. Well, you saw everybody that was there, did you not? A. I think I did.

Q. Now, did Mr. Beecher at any time in the year 1871 report to that Examining Committee that he had seen Mr. Tilton? A. He did, through me.

Q. Well, was he present? A. He was not.

Mr. Shearman—We know he had seen him. There is no question about his seeing him several times.

Mr. Morris—Never mind the comments.

Q. On that occasion, then, you made the report, and not Mr. Beecher—is that so or not? A. It is so; I was appointed.

Q. Never mind any explanation, Mr. Halliday. Excuse me, because the point is, that you made the report and not Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—He made a report, and the report that he made Mr. Beecher did not make. That is all there is of it.

The Witness—If it please the Court, I do not want to seem to be brought unnecessarily into collision with the testimony of Mr. West, and a single word, which would not affect either side in regard to this matter, would make an explanation that I think would be a relief.

Judge Neilson—And be more agreeable to your feelings?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, make it.

The Witness—It is this: When this case was brought up, some of the brethren said I ought to be a committee to see—

Mr. Beach—Never mind. I object to that.

The Witness—The committee—

Mr. Shearman—Don't go on, Mr. Halliday, the counsel on the other side object, and we must not go on after the counsel object.

Judge Neilson—Well, interrogate your witness. I don't know how it is.

Mr. Shearman—I pass to another question which was raised previously with regard to the action of the Examining Committee, which was left undecided. [To the witness.] Was it the usage of the Board of Deacons, or of the Examining Committee, to record in their minutes propositions which were raised, but upon which no action was taken by any final vote? Do you say it was not? A. I think the habit—the custom invariably was not to do it, and especially in all preliminary steps of discipline never to record them, never to notice them in any way.

Q. You were Clerk of the Board of Deacons for some period, were you not? A. The Board of Deacons never took any action in regard to cases of discipline.

Q. Never mind, I ask the simple question, were you Clerk of the Board of Deacons? A. I was for several years.

Q. As such Clerk was it your habit, and was it expected of you by the Board, that you should record propositions which were discussed, but upon which no final vote was taken? A. I think in the Board of Deacons there may have been some exceptions.

Q. But what was the usage? A. The usage was not to do it.

Q. You were also Clerk of the Examining Committee for some time, were you not? A. I was.

Q. What was the usage there as to recording— A. Clerk pro tem.

Q. Yes. A. Not permanently.

Q. You perhaps were not Clerk at the time that I refer in November and December, 1862? A. I do not think I was; I don't think I was.

THE RECORDS OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH PRODUCED.

Mr. Shearman—Now, if your Honor please, under the suggestion that we should produce the records to show what was done at this meeting, I have searched the records, and I will not burden the Court to look at them; but I will say—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. That won't do.

Judge Neilson—Well, you produce the record.

Mr. Shearman—I do not propose to offer the records.

Mr. Fullerton—You must not state what is or is not in them.

Mr. Shearman—Very good; it makes very little difference.

Judge Neilson—The purpose that you have in view is what?

Mr. Shearman—I offer now oral evidence of a discussion in this regular meeting of the Board of Deacons, upon the question of what should be done by the church, if anything, with reference to this scandal, and I offer to show by oral evidence that it was unanimously agreed, without any formal vote upon the subject, that no notice should be taken of it, and that this action was taken in the absence of Mr. Beecher, and without any recommendation from him.

Mr. Beach—What is the date of that?

Mr. Shearman—November, 1872.

Judge Neilson—Soon after the publication.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—November, 1872?

Mr. Shearman—The last Wednesday of November, 1872.

The Witness—October.

Mr. Beach—I said to you Honor all that I cared to say upon that subject the other day—in regard to the admission of the action of these gentlemen. Upon the principal topic of discussion your Honor ruled that they might introduce the records of the church, but not the casual discussions that took place at a meeting of this Board, but there was a preliminary question, Sir, transpired from the testimony of Mr. Halliday, that this meeting, as it is called, was not convened upon any regular call—upon a notice to the different members composing that body—regularly composing that body that it was rather accidental and casual, informal, and I submit to your Honor that it was a mere conversation between certain gentlemen—brethren of the church, who might, in case of a regular call of a meeting, have formed constituents of that body, but who were not gathered in the character of a regular Board. Your Honor undoubtedly recollects the testimony of Mr. Halliday upon that subject, and if that can be the loose manner in which the officers of that church conduct the discipline of the church, why you perceive it would be perfectly easy for three deacons to meet at any time and at any place casually, and adopt the most effectual measures for the enforcement of the discipline of that society. These gentlemen, gathered upon that occasion, might have deposed the minister or have excommunicated a member, and I think it can not be possible, Sir, under the rules of that society, that any such power could have been vested in three deacons, meeting casually without any formal notice to other parties who were entitled to participate in the discussions of the meeting.

Mr. Shearman—To save time in arguing, the proceedings which I now propose to show are of a regular stated meeting. I waive entirely the proposition to show the proceedings of the other.

Mr. Beach—I did not understand that.

Judge Neilson—I understood Mr. Halliday to say that was a business meeting.

Mr. Beach—That has not been shown yet. The question arose upon a very irregular and accidental assembly of three gentlemen, who had qualifications to be members of such a gathering.

Judge Neilson—I thought the argument was very clear on both sides, presenting both sides of the question, and I have in my mind very clearly that there was but one kind of evidence which could be introduced as against the plaintiff.

Mr. Shearman—I trust your Honor will hear me a moment.

Judge Neilson—That was the recorded evidence of the regular proceedings of a corporation entered in their books, standing then with being subject to accident or change, and that evidence I thought admissible, as distinguished from mere conversation. That is the way the question was left when we adjourned night before last. I would now suggest to Mr. Shearman to put into Mr. Halliday's hands the record of that meeting, and see who were present. The names are there, I suppose, are they not?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir. We have a record of the meeting. [To the witness.] Look at that record, Mr. Halliday, and state whether on October 30th, 1872, there was a regular meeting of the Board of Deacons.

Mr. Fullerton—October 30th?

Mr. Shearman—October 30th. [To the Witness.] Have you found the place?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Who were present, Mr. Halliday?

The Witness—Mr. Hawkins, Mr. White, Mr. Moody, Mr. Ropes, Mr. West, Mr. Morton, Mr. Halliday, of the brethren; and of the deaconesses, Mrs. Morrill, Mrs. Pratt and Mrs. Halliday. I can only tell from the record.

Mr. Fullerton—He reads that from the record. That is putting the record in evidence, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. Shearman—I have no objection to putting the record in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Let that page be marked.

Mr. Shearman—The whole record?

Judge Neilson—[To the Witness.] It appears that certain resolutions were adopted at that meeting?

Mr. Shearman—[To the Witness.] His Honor asks you a question.

Judge Neilson—It appears that certain resolutions were adopted at that meeting?

The Witness—I don't think they were made a matter of record.

Judge Neilson—Some resolutions?

Mr. Shearman—Some resolutions were adopted.

The Witness—The record is there. I would not like to state.

Mr. Shearman—There are some votes.

The Witness—I didn't look at anything except the names. The minutes are in my own handwriting.

Mr. Shearman—Now, if your Honor will permit me, before asking the question, I will just read a very brief statement.

Judge Neilson—No. I think I understand it. What is the rule that was referred to the other day? A rule requiring three deacons and three—

Mr. Shearman—A rule requiring three members of the Board of Deacons, no matter whether they are deacons or deaconesses.

Judge Neilson—That is the point. Just read the rule and let us see. Doesn't it require three of one body and three of the other?

Mr. Shearman—It does not, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Although each may be ex-officio members of the other.

Mr. Shearman—Rule 85:

"Three members of the Board of Deacons, Examining Committee, or Music Committee, respectively, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business."

Judge Neilson—Put your question.

Mr. Shearman—I will ask you, Mr. Halliday, whether that is not one of the rules of Plymouth Church as in force in October, 1872? A. Yes, Sir; but—

Q. Well, is it? A. There must be a notification of all the members of the Board.

Q. At a special meeting you mean? A. They must be specially notified.

Q. At a special meeting?

Mr. Morris—Certainly. That is what he says.

Mr. Shearman—We are not talking about a special meeting. This was a regular meeting, was it not, Mr. Halliday?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, all the members were notified, and if only three came, they constituted a quorum.

Mr. Shearman—It would make no difference whether they were notified or not if it was a regular meeting.

The Witness—That was the rule of the Board of Deacons that all should be notified.

Q. You mean that was the usage. You notified them? A. Yes, Sir. Oh, I don't think it is in the rule. My impression is—

Q. I know it is not in the rule. There is no such rule. A. No, I don't think there is. A stated meeting of the Board, and I always notified every member of the Board, when I was clerk, of the meeting, never an exception.

Mr. Shearman—Now, I suppose, your Honor, the only question is whether we can give oral evidence as to matters which happened at this meeting, and which are not recorded. Now, Mr. Greenleaf states the rule briefly to be that in any case, except with three exceptions, oral evidence can be given. The first is that it cannot be substituted for any instrument that the law requires to be in writing. In the second place, it cannot be substituted for any contract which the parties have put in writing; and third, that it cannot be substituted for any writing, the existence of which is disputed, and which is material to the issue between the parties, or to the credit of witnesses, and not merely a memorandum of some other fact. Now, here we propose to show that a question was raised in the meeting of the officers of a corporate body, and that there was a unanimous sentiment one way, the result of which was there was nobody present who could or would propose a resolution to the contrary and that unanimous sentiment. There could, in the nature of the things, neither by a mover or a seconder, and therefore there could be nothing which could be properly entered upon the minutes of the body. If I know anything about the rules which govern the minutes of the meetings, nothing is to be entered upon the records of the meetings except final resolutions. Jefferson lays it down in his Manual that even if a resolution is moved, yet, if it is not seconded, no notice is to be taken in the record kept by the clerk. That is the rule of Parliament, the rule of Congress, and the rule of the Legislature, and the rule of the Common Council. Now, could we not prove as a fact that a member of the Legislature offered a resolution, and that in consequence of its not being seconded it failed to appear on the record?

Judge Neilson—You could.

Mr. Shearman—Then, your Honor, I think this case is parallel with that. We propose to show that the question was raised as to whether anything should be done on this subject, but that no one was willing to offer a resolution, because there was not a single person there who was in favor of taking any action, but that the question was raised and discussed at length. Now, in the case of Partridge v. Badger (35 Barb., 146) it was held that it was "competent for a plaintiff to prove by witnesses who were present at an election of directors, who were elected at such election. The books of the company, although they are proper evidence if they contain a record of the election, are not the sole evidence of the fact." In Trustees of St. Mary's v.

Caggar (8 Barb., 576) the Court held that it might be shown "that certain resolves were adopted by the trustees of the corporation at one of their meetings, notwithstanding the adoption did not appear from their minutes." I think your Honor will see that those are cases stronger in my favor than the case which I now present. We propose to show that the subject was discussed, but that no action was taken which in its nature could possibly be entered upon the records. For the purpose of raising this discussion, I will ask this question:— [To the witness]: Was the subject—

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—I have looked quite cursorily, Sir, at this manual of the Church, for the purpose of finding, if I can, what the Board of Deacons had to do with this subject. I suppose their action upon this matter is not legitimate proof here unless they had some jurisdiction to act in the matter; that if it was a mere discussion among these members composing the Board of Deacons, upon a subject which could not come officially before them or was not officially before them, in the manner required by the rules of the church, that what they may have said or done was a mere private discussion, with which we have nothing to do. I see by the manual, Sir, that the Board of Deacons, under the title of "The Duties of Deacons," in Rule 26, are charged with the duty of distributing the charities of the Church to the poor; second, of a general oversight of the collections for benevolent objects; third, in the absence of, or at the request of the pastor, to provide a supply for the pulpit and lecture-room; fourth, to make all needful provision for the meetings of the Church, and to superintend all its affairs not actually in charge of other officers of the Church. Well, this I understand to have been a discussion in regard to the propriety of taking Church notice of this Woodhull scandal. That could only be done, Sir, by the presentation of a charge against some member of the church, in the enforcement of discipline of the Church; and the subject could not have been properly brought before any body of the Church, except through the form of charges made against some member. Now, any discussion, not originating in that mode, by the members of this body, although convened in a regular meeting, upon the subject of this scandal, was not official in its character in any sense, and was not obligatory upon the action of the Church in any sense. Under the head of "Discipline," at Rule 4, it is provided that "members cannot be censured by the Church except by the process herein stated. A complaint may be made, either to the Examining Committee or to the whole Church. In the former case, the clerk of the Committee, and in the latter case the clerk of the Church, must reduce the complaint to writing if it is entertained, and may use due diligence and present a copy to the accused, and give him a personal notice of the time and place of appearing; and the accused must have full opportunity, &c., to be heard in his defense." Of course, I may be instructed on this subject; because, my examination of this book, and my general knowledge of the course of action in these bodies are very imperfect; but I do not understand, from the examination that I have made, that this subject in any form was regularly before the Board of Directors. The whole subject, as to the manner in which this scandal might have been investigated, was under the control of the Examining Committee, or in the collective body of the Church. Now there were no charges presented against anybody. If there had been, they would not properly have been preferred to this Board of Deacons, but to the Examining Committee. These gentlemen had no supervision of this subject in their official, collective character; and, whatever sentiments they may have expressed as individuals, and however proper they may have considered it to discuss the general affairs of the congregation or of the Church, or this particular matter, as affecting the interests of the Church, it was not as an official body, and can have no recognition from your Honor. And I therefore submit, in that view, that those proceedings are totally inadmissible.

Judge Neilson—Mr.—

ARGUMENT OF MR. FULLERTON.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor will allow me to add one other consideration to what has been said by my associate. Your Honor will bear in mind that, when Mr. Halliday was on the stand before, his attention was called to this meeting of the Board of Deacons; and some evidence was given to show the character of that meeting, and the proceedings before it. Now, I understood Mr. Halliday to say that what was done in respect of the Woodhull scandal was informal in its character; that it was after the adjournment of the Board of Deacons.

Judge Neilson—After the other business was through.

Mr. Fullerton—Yea, Sir, and this discussion was not by the Board of Deacons, but by the members of the Board. In turning to the book of minutes which has been produced, we find that there is a record of what was done on that occasion by the Board of Deacons as such; a full and complete—of, at least, what purports to be a full and complete record of their doings in their official capacity. Now, it seems from the testimony, so far as it has been developed, that this was a promiscuous discussion among the members of this Board; and it is proposed to show what conclusion was arrived at there—not as a Board, as I understand it, taking the form of a resolution so that that could embody the sense of the Deacons—but to show the individual opinions and conclusions of the different members of that Board. Now, certainly, that is not allowable. The only way to get at the opinion of a Board consisting of as many persons as were assembled here, is to put it into the form of a resolution, and to show how it was passed, to show that it was passed, evidencing the will of the majority, and the unanimous opinion, if it were unanimous. But there is nothing of that kind here. Are we to go into evidence to show what Mr. Moulton said, what Mr. A., B. and C. said, upon that occasion, and to get at, as best we can, what was the sense of this meeting as a whole, without being informed in the regular orderly way of conducting business before such a body, by a resolution. Now, I ask your Honor's attention for a moment to the testimony of Mr. Halliday, hitherto given upon this subject, for the purpose of showing that this was a discussion, not of the Board of Deacons, but by the members of the Board—after the adjournment of the regular meeting, just exactly as they would discuss the weather, or any other topic that might attract their attention. The question was put [reading] :

"Mr. Halliday, at such meetings is there a record kept of the proceedings—entry made? A. Yes, Sir.

"Judge Neilson—You propose to bring that in the morning, I suppose?

"Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir; to bring in what?

"Judge Neilson—The record. He says there is a record kept.

"Mr. Shearman—Oh! well, we can bring the record in, but that will not show. The record, of course, as in every properly kept record, only shows resolutions that were passed.

"Mr. Morris—Is that all the record shows? I was not aware of it.

"Mr. Shearman—Why, certainly."

Now, Mr. Halliday takes part in this discussion, because he wanted your Honor to understand as a reason why the record would not show what was done in regard to this Woodhull scandal was, that it was informal; that it was before the members of the Board of Deacons, and not as a Board that the discussion was had. [Reading]:

"May I say to the Court that at this meeting of the Board of Deacons, the regular business of the Board of Deacons was transacted and ended.

"Judge Neilson—And that much of it would be on record.

"The Witness—The regular meeting, the ordinary business of the Board of Deacons is recorded, and after this"—

Then he was interrupted by Mr. Beach saying, "Please not state what occurred after."

"Mr. Shearman—Now, Mr. Halliday, suppose we confine ourselves strictly to business, as I am afraid the gentlemen will object to something you say."

Now I think it is very clear, Sir, that the Board of Deacons transacted the business that was before them, the business over which they had jurisdiction, the business which as a body they intended to discuss and dispose of, and then they entered into general conversation in regard to the Woodhull scandal, and it is that general conversation which they now propose to give in evidence. And the record shows, as I am reminded by my associate, that after this business was transacted the Board adjourned. It is so recorded.

SOME GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Fullerton, at that meeting, before the Board adjourned, some resolution might have been proposed upon this subject, might there not?

Mr. Beach—That we don't object to, Sir; that we don't object to, if there was any action of the Board, except in the light in which I have suggested to your Honor, that the Board had no sort of jurisdiction over this subject; and it is very certain that no resolution was passed upon this subject; that all they propose to show is a general discussion among the members upon a topic which I say did not fall within the legitimate business of the Board of Deacons.

Judge Neilson—Well, you think, constituted as they were, and convened as they were, that a resolution might have been presented on this subject.

Mr. Beach—I don't think, Sir, it could have been properly presented to the Board, because I think I have shown your Honor from the Manual, that the Board had no jurisdiction of the subject; but I quite agree, Sir, that although the proceedings of any official body may require to be reduced to writing in the form of a record, yet if there should be any inadvertence or irregular omission of the recording of a resolution of an action by the Board, that it may be proved by parol. But will your Honor consider, there being no resolution or sentiment of that body, not being condensed into a form expressive of the unanimous or majority opinion of the Board, but consisting merely of discussion, conversational or otherwise, among the members of the Board, in which they may have expressed individual opinions, how is it possible that that evidence can be given? The gentleman has presented an authority where a resolution being offered and not seconded is not entered upon the minutes, because there is determinate action of the Board, of the body, according to this rule. The resolution cannot be entertained and acted upon unless seconded, and not being seconded it does not become a part of their action, properly going upon the record; but I understand the offer to be simply to show the discussions which were had among the different members of the Board at that meeting. I submit that it is irregular and incompetent for that reason, that it did not assume a determinate and official shape, and for the further reason that the subject was not within the cognizance of that body.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, you stated a moment ago the precise thing that you propose to prove, to wit, that the subject was brought up—called up, and the conclusion not to take any action in respect to it. Is that it?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Without going into the conversation or discussion. I ruled the other day that we could not take the conversation.

Mr. Shearman—We don't care about the conversation.

Judge Neilson—Very well. Now, you can prove just that, if you will confine yourself to that.

Mr. Beach—May I ask your Honor—

Mr. Shearman—I see Mr. Beach thinks that one of his objections is not met. If he will just allow me to state, the Deacons are practically the governing body of Plymouth Church, subject to the church itself. They have, by Rule 28, power to superintend all its affairs not actually in charge of other officers of the church. They are given that general authority. I suppose I am meeting what Brother Beach was going to say. The Examining Committee is empowered to investigate accusations, but it is not even empowered, by express terms, to institute accusations. There can be no doubt that the Board of Deacons would have power to pass a resolution instituting an accusation.

Judge Neilson—Or recommending it.

Mr. Shearman—Or recommending one, although when made it would have to be tried by the Examining Committee, and the power of the Deacons would end.

Judge Neilson—They might have taken some initiatory step.

Mr. Shearman—That is it.

Judge Neilson—And if you will confine yourself now to that precise proposition.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please consider for one single moment in what attitude this question would be placed by such a ruling. I understand your Honor to intimate that they may prove that the subject was suggested before this Board, and may prove the conclusion.

Judge Neilson—Prove that no action was taken.

Mr. Beach—What?

Judge Neilson—That no action was taken.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is very well, Sir, to prove that no action was taken; that is quite another thing; but they cannot prove a conclusion without necessarily involving the conversation of the different members of the Board, it being admitted that no resolution was passed; that there was no formal discussion of the opinion or conclusion of the body, as a body your Honor rules that they cannot give the conversation, the declaration of the different members, and the gentleman (witness) cannot give the conclusion unless he finds that upon those very declarations, and your Honor would then be, I think, running against the rule of law which would prohibit the witness from giving a conclusion derived from the conversation instead of the conversation itself, and I submit that that would be objectionable in a double form, Sir. If they can give that proceeding at all, it must be through the medium of the conversation, the declaration of the different members.

Judge Neilson—We have all this virtually, as far as we have had any light on the subject whatever. It reasonably well appears now that until Mr. West brought this subject up by charges, the church took no notice of it.

Mr. Shearman—And that, your Honor, has been brought forward as an argument upon the other side.

Judge Neilson—Oh! I don't know.

Mr. Shearman—And as an act, or non-action, under the influence of Mr. Beecher. Now, what we undertake to show is, that this very question of action was considered when Mr. Beecher was not present, and they were entirely free from his influence.

Judge Neilson—Well, now, you are to put three questions, if you will allow me to assist you—

Mr. Beach—We have no objection, if your Honor pleases, to their proving that this subject was suggested at that meeting of the Board, and that no action of the Board was taken.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will get at it directly, then.

Mr. Beach—But that is very far from the question whether that was influenced at all by Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beecher's influence proceeds far wider than his immediate presence.

Judge Neilson—I had not that in mind at all, of course. Mr. Shearman, if you will allow me to assist you; first ask if Mr. Beecher was present that evening.

Mr. Shearman—Was Mr. Beecher there on that evening of Nov. 30, 1872? A. He was not.

Judge Neilson—After the resolutions which have been adopted, which appear in the record, was this subject of the Woodhull scandal brought up?

Mr. Shearman—Answer that question.

The Witness—It was.

Mr. Shearman—Has your Honor any further suggestion? If not, I will go on.

Judge Neilson—Was any action taken in respect to it; yes or no, Mr. Halliday?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, there was; if you will—if the Court will—

Judge Neilson—Well, now, he says yes.

The Witness—If the Court will inform me—if you will inform me what you mean by action— What am I to understand by action?

Judge Neilson—Anything done.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—As distinguished from what was said.

The Witness—My memory don't serve me positively; I cannot swear that there was or was not.

Judge Neilson—Well, you see the limit at which you must keep your questions. I ruled the other out—that conversations could not be given.

Mr. Shearman—Now, I ask what was the point considered at that time.

Mr. Beach—That I object to, Sir; it can only be got at by the declarations of the parties.

Judge Neilson—It was the Woodhull scandal collectively—that subject.

Mr. Everts—It is for the witness to say that.

Judge Neilson—He has said it.

Mr. Everts—Yes, he said the subject. Now, what was the point considered by the Board there?

Mr. Beach—Well, that can only be got at, Sir, by proving the declarations that were made there.

Judge Neilson—Well, those are not to be taken.

Mr. Everts—The whole matter comes to be relevant in this case, on one side or the other, solely upon the question whether Mr. Beecher originated the counsels and actions of expression, and with a view of charging him with that responsibility, evidence has been deduced on the part of the plaintiff, and there has been heretofore, as now, a suggestion that Mr. Beecher presumptively (I suppose presumptively by law) had an influence over anything and everything, and anybody and everybody; therefore, that what they did or what they did not do was to be charged to him presumptively. Now, we come to the question of a meeting held immediately after by the responsible adjudicatory or managing body of this congregation, at which, spontaneously, apparently, so far as Mr. Beecher was concerned, that body takes up the subject of this scandal against their pastor, and considers, and disposes of the question, upon their judgment, upon their responsibility, upon their conscience, as to whether it calls for action by the body that would originate action if action were to be taken. to wit, the body of deacons who should institute the charge or recommend the charge, whether it took the form of inquisition upon Mr. Tilton for a share in the scandal, or of Mr. Beecher, the pastor, as the cause—a guilty cause, or suspected cause—of the scandal. And now, when a long course of inquiry has been pursued by the plaintiff, confessedly in support of this innuendo, or this argument, or this impression, to the prejudice of Mr. Beecher, from the non-action of the church, we are told that it is not possible for us to show that in the spontaneous originating consideration of this body (that was the responsible body to determine whether the church should act or not) they decided, on full discussion, that no action and no notice should be taken or had of the matter.

Judge Neilson—Counsel will allow me—

Mr. Evarts—Now, one word more, if your Honor please. And a fortiori that, if that was their deliberate conclusion there should not be inserted in their minutes a reference to a subject concerning which their conclusion was, that the source from which it came did not require the action of anybody.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Pardon me a single word, if your Honor please. The gentleman has not touched the point in discussion before your Honor. In the first place, he is wrong in the assertion that we maintain that Mr. Beecher is presumptively responsible for the action of the official bodies conducting the disciplinary matters of his church. On the contrary, we have proven, by witnesses, direct communication with Mr. Beecher upon the subject, and positive declarations and instructions in regard to the subject of repression. We do not charge him as presumptively responsible for the action either of the members of his church, except so far as we show him personally to have participated in that action. The question is not, either, Sir, as the gentleman presents it, whether, we having given this evidence connecting Mr. Beecher with that policy, it is competent for them to repel that evidence by proving that the church took independent and uninfluenced action upon that subject. Our objection is, Sir, to the mode of proof, not to the fact to be proved. Our objection is that Mr. Beecher cannot free himself from the accusation arising from the evidence of his direct and personal interference which we have introduced, by showing the declarations of the members of his church in our absence, or of the official bodies of his church in our absence, upon this particular subject. That is what we object to. We have conceded the propriety of proving, under your Honor's ruling, respectfully submitting to that ruling, although we differ from its conclusion—of proving that this subject was presented to this Board of Deacons, and that they took no action in regard to the matter. Now, they propose to prove, and that is the question which raises this discussion, what was the point of view in which that subject of the Woodhull scandal was presented.

Mr. Evarts—I did not say "point of view."

Judge Neilson—That was Mr. Shearman's question.

Mr. Evarts—The point disposed of, the point considered.

Mr. Beach—Well, now, they ask to show what was the point considered—yes, Sir, the point considered at the meeting, in connection with this Woodhull scandal. Now, it is sufficient, Sir, to prove the point considered, to show that the subject was presented to the meeting and that they took no action upon it. That was as far as their jurisdiction extended, assuming that the counsel is right in regard to their power of recommending charges or the initiation of disciplinary matters. All that they could do would be to recommend proceeding against some member of the church—some action of the church; and it is sufficient to prove that they took no such action. When they attempt to show what was the particular point upon which they acted, they necessarily draw in question the discussions and conversations had between the different members of that body. If they had taken action by a resolution, the resolution would prove it. They could not give in evidence the intermediate discussions, the speeches made by the different members, the views expressed, the line of policy recommended; that would not be evidence, Sir, because it would be a mere expression of the individual views of the members of the body. But no action was taken, and they can prove that, that no action was taken. But the preceding and preliminary discussion, the expression of sentiments by the different members, is not a subject which is admissible as against us; would not be admissible, Sir, under any circumstances in which the action of that body would be competent evidence. I therefore submit to your Honor that, whenever they attempt to prove any subject which must be proven by the declaration of the members composing that body, it is inadmissible, it is incompetent evidence.

A WRANGLE FOR THE LAST WORD.

Mr. Evarts—This matter may be brought to a head by a very—

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't see as it will be brought to a head, Sir, if the gentleman continues discussing it, when I have the right to close the discussion.

Mr. Evarts—You can follow me.

Mr. Beach—I know I have to follow you; and I will have to follow you pretty close, and a good ways.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; we won't talk about one another very much; we will attend to our case.

Mr. Beach—Very, well, Sir; I attend to my case by suggesting to your Honor that, as this question has been largely discussed, and as we being the objecting party, have a right to close the discussion, that it is not proper for the gentleman upon every occasion—upon every occasion where a discussion arises—to insist upon pursuing the discussion beyond the regular limits.

Mr. Evarts—I shall agree with him in that proposition; in that general proposition, I should agree with him.

Judge Neilson—Then you have something to say.

Mr. Beach—Well, the objection is not to be answered, Sir, by a flippant remark of that kind upon the part of the counsel. I say it is the uniform habit of the counsel, after the regular order of discussion has been pursued, and we being the objecting party have closed it, to re-open the discussion; and I suggest to your Honor that there should be some limit to the privilege which you extend to counsel on that subject.

Judge Neilson—The rule ought to be observed, of course.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach.] Do you remember how many times you have spoken on your side on this very question?

Mr. Beach—What? I have spoken in reply always, Sir, and in exercise of the right of closing this discussion and answer ing the suggestions which are made on the other side, and I have acted in strict pursuance of my legal and professional right, and not intruding constantly upon the courtesy and indulgence of the Court.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I will repeat my remark; we won't talk about one another.

Judge Neilson—Well, would it not be well to observe the rule?

Mr. Evarts—I intended to observe the rule; but I don't admit the accusation that has been made against me.

Judge Neilson—I wish to say nothing about that. You wish to make some suggestion?

Mr. Evarts—I desire—I propose to do so, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I don't need any more argument.

Mr. Evarts—I don't rise to make an argument. I rise to say that the point for judicial determination in this case can be very briefly settled by a statement of the offer which will be made, for it will raise the precise point. We propose to prove that at this regular meeting, while the members were present and in session, the subject of the Woodhull scandal was brought up and considered upon the single point whether the church should take any notice of it; and it was decided unanimously that the church should not. Now, that is what we offer to prove.

JUDGE NEILSON'S DECISION.

Judge Neilson—In the first place, when this subject was up before, the argument was very full and very clear on both sides; and then, according to my judgment of the question, I decided that those church records could be brought in as the record of the proceedings of any corporation might be brought in, and might be shown, because it was matter of record, although the plaintiff is not a party to it, but that mere conversations (using the observation, "conversations to be uttered one day and forgotten the next,") could not be given in evidence because of the rule that the party to be affected should be present when the conversation took place to be proved. I overruled Mr. Beach's objection to that point of bringing in the records. This morning, on hearing Mr. Shearman further, and understanding something more of the rules and character of the official proceedings of this church, I have thought it proper to allow Mr. Shearman to prove that at this meeting, and after the regular business had been transacted, the question of the Woodhull scandal was brought up and considered. That has been proved; need not be embraced in this offer. It has been proved, and that no action was taken, and the only difference now really involved in this discussion is whether it should stand upon the statement that no action was taken, or whether it should stand upon the statement that the conclusion was that no action should be taken. As to the point considered, we understand that it related to the Woodhull scandal, and that need not be resolved into particles or elements, but taken as a whole. Read, Mr. Stenographer, what the evidence last given was.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—Your Honor, there has been no evidence given here since I came in; the stenographer who took it has gone.

Judge Neilson—What did Mr. Halliday last say?

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—It was taken before I came.

Judge Neilson—It was taken before you came in?

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Have you got it, Mr. Stein? Go back to the point where Mr. Shearman put his last question—read the last part of it, Sir.

Mr. McEwen (an unofficial stenographer)—I have the last part of it.

Judge Neilson—Read the last few questions and answers.

Mr. McEwen—"Mr. Tilton objected. Mr. Moulton said immediately—I think it was the first thing he said—"

Mr. Morris—No, oh, away down.

Mr. McEwen—It is further along than that.

Mr. Morris—Yes; away down.

Mr. McEwen—I have not got it then; this is the last thing I have.

Mr. Beach—The last thing, I think that Mr. Halliday said that there was no action taken except by ourselves. Mr. Halliday probably will have a clearer recollection.

Mr. Ackerman (another unofficial stenographer) read as follows: "Judge Neilson suggested to Mr. Shearman to ask this question: 'Was Mr. Beecher present on that evening, October 30th?' Mr. Halliday replied: 'He was not.' The Court suggested the following question: 'After the resolution was taken, was this scandal—was this Woodhull scandal brought up?' Mr. Shearman said to Mr. Halliday: 'Answer that question.' Mr. Halliday replied: 'It was.' Judge Neilson says: 'Was action taken in respect to it?'"

Mr. Beach—Mr. Halliday answered that, and he answered that there was.

The Stenographer—"He answered 'There was.'"

Mr. Beach—Well, then, just go on a little further.

The Stenographer—"Then Mr. Halliday, addressing himself to the Court"—

Mr. Beach—Yes, go on.

The Stenographer—"If your Honor will permit me, I will give you a word or two that will set the matter right." Then the discussion began.

Mr. Beach—No. There is some point where Mr. Halliday said there was no action taken except by language, something of that kind.

The Stenographer—I haven't got it. That must be further on.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Do you remember that? A. I think I do; something of that kind.

Mr. Munson (another stenographer) said he presumed that he had what was wished, and read as follows:

"Q. Was anything done following that? A. Yes.

"Q. As distinguished from anything said? A. My memory don't serve me; I can't swear whether there was or was not."

Mr. Beach—Oh, yes, Sir; that is it.

Judge Neilson—Well, we have the matter clear enough, gentlemen; you have it. We cannot take what was said; that you agree to. We have that sufficiently.

Mr. Evarts—The point, your Honor sees, is whether we prove no action taken is sufficient; but it does not answer our purpose, as we think; nor our rights, as we think. We propose to show that the action of the Board was that the case called for no action; and that that was their action.

The Witness—Precisely.

Mr. Evarts—Just as much their action and decision. If you take a matter up and consider it, it is not passing it sub silentio that you do not do something; but that you decide not to do something, is taking a course either for an individual or a body. That is our whole point.

Mr. Shearman—Will your Honor permit me to put this question? [To the witness.] Was the question raised as to whether any notice should be taken by the church, of this scandal?

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Answer that.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—It was.

Mr. Fullerton—Well; wait, Mr. Halliday.

The Witness—I heard the Court say, "take that question;" and I thought I was—

Mr. Fullerton—I want to know whether it was raised by resolution; whether the ordinary forms were adopted to get at the mind of a numerous body.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, I will ask him that. [To the witness.] Was that by resolution, Mr. Halliday? A. I don't think there was any written resolution offered, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now, go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, that does not satisfy the inquiry at all. I did not suppose there was any written resolution; but, was there a resolution offered?

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]: Was there a resolution of any kind offered, Sir?

The Witness—My impression is very distinct that the proceedings took this form—

Mr. Beach—Oh, that won't do, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That won't do. Now, will you answer the question?

Mr. Shearman—It is rather difficult to say whether there was or was not a resolution.

Mr. Fullerton—It is rather difficult—for Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Shearman—No; it is not a resolution until it is passed.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it is.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]: Was there any resolution proposed to be passed in any form?

The Witness—Essentially, there was.

Judge Neilson—What form? A. In the form that it was not expedient to notice the scandal at all.

Judge Neilson—Very well, now; take that answer; and let it stop there.

Mr. Morris—That opens the door for all that was said there.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Shearman—Was anything said—

Judge Neilson—Well, don't push this thing any further.

Mr. Shearman—I will just put this one question—

Mr. Evarts—The question, whether it was acceded to.

Mr. Shearman—Was there any dissent from that proposition?

A. My best recollection is that the feeling—

Judge Neilson—Say yes or no.

Mr. Shearman—Was there any dissent from that? A. That there was none, that there was a perfect unanimity of view.

Judge Neilson—Now, will you please pass this troublesome subject.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Very well, now; proceed, gentlemen. Will the audience keep quiet?

Mr. Shearman—Only one more question.

Mr. Evarts—Not in that direction, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—I understand; some other subject.

Mr. Shearman—Did Mr. Beecher have anything to do with this suggestion or conclusion?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Shearman—So far as you know?

Mr. Beach—Oh, that is another thing.

Judge Neilson—Answer that; as far as you know, had Mr. Beecher anything to do with this? A. Not in this or any other—

Judge Neilson—That won't do.

The Witness—Not at all.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Strike out that last; that won't do, Mr. Halliday; you are a very intelligent gentleman, and you can answer a question.

Mr. Shearman—That is all; you can cross-examine.

Mr. Beach—Is it worth while, your Honor, to commence a cross-examination now, we are so near the hour of recess?

The Court here took a recess until 2 o'clock.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. HALLIDAY.

The Court met at 2 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment, and the cross-examination of Mr. Halliday was begun.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday, recurring to that meeting of October 28th, in regard to which you have been interrogated, can you name the persons who were present when the Woodhull scandal was the subject of consideration? A. I am confident that all the persons named in that record were present, Sir, and I think that there were others present, also; I cannot recall the name of any individual at present but that of Mr. Fitzgerald, one of the members of the Church, who had been—ah! I should not tell you anything about how he came to be there unless you ask it. There may have been others. He is the only one I can remember at present.

Q. Do you remember the fact that there were others, and that you are not able to recall their names? A. My impression is that there were others, but whether two or three, or five, I cannot say.

Q. Well, that is enough. Was Mr. Bell there? A. I don't think he was there. May I ask, Mr. Fullerton, if it was on the 28th? There were two meetings, at one of which Mr. Bell was present. but at the meeting of the Deacons, I don't think he was present.

Mr. Shearman—Let us have a fair understanding.

The Witness—Very well.

Q. My question was distinctly as to the meeting of the 28th of October, in regard to which you had been interrogated.

Mr. Shearman—You are mistaken; he has not been interrogated as to the meeting of the 28th of October.

Mr. Fullerton—The 23d of October.

Mr. Shearman—The 30th of October.

Mr. Fullerton—Whatever the date is, I thought it was the 28th.

The Witness—There were two meetings.

Q. The 30th of October? A. That is the meeting of the Deacons, and I think Mr. Bell was not present. My best recollection is, that he was not present at that meeting.

Q. These persons, or this person, Mr. Fitzgerald, I think it was, whom you named as having been present at the meeting; was this the meeting you referred to, namely, the 30th of October? A. Yes, sir, that is when Mr. Fitzgerald was present. He was present at a part of the meeting; he came in late.

Q. Was he present at the time the Woodhull scandal was the subject of consideration? A. He was.

Q. Was there a motion made or a resolution offered for adoption at that meeting in regard to the Woodhull scandal? A. I don't—If I were to answer I should say yes and no; from my stand point I mean.

Q. Well, which would be true? A. Substantially there was. In fact I cannot swear that there was.

Q. Well, What I mean, Mr. Halliday, is, did any one make the formal motion or offer for a formal resolution that it was not expedient to take any steps in regard to the Woodhull scandal, or anything embracing the subject in any way? A. I could get at it if you would let me say two or three words, Judge.

Q. I don't think you can get at anything by saying two or three words, so just answer my question that I put? A. I don't know how to give you a better answer than I have, Judge. Substantially there was a resolution, or, formally, I would say not, looking at the matter as I do.

At this point there was a private conference between Mr. Shearman and Mr. Morris in regard to the book containing a portion of the records of Plymouth Church.

Mr. Beach—What is it?

Mr. Shearman—I object to their looking at the record unless they put it in evidence.

Mr. Beach—We, perhaps, are going to produce it in evidence, and we propose to look at the whole book.

Mr. Shearman—We want to have it put in evidence,

Mr. Beach—Very well.

The Witness—[To Mr. Fullerton]: I am speaking now from my best recollection, Judge.

Mr. Fullerton—Of course, Mr. Halliday, you won't speak from your worst recollection; that is taken for granted. Did you participate in that discussion? A. I am very certain I did, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect saying anything on that occasion of this import, that Mr. Beecher did not desire the Church to take any steps in regard to it? A. I never said anything of the kind there.

Q. Did you make use of any form of expression conveying the idea that Mr. Beecher was averse to any official action on the part of the Church, or anything representing it? A. I did not.

Q. Are you entirely positive upon that subject? A. I am.

Q. Did you express such a sentiment without saying, in effect, that Mr. Beecher requested you to? Did you say it of your own motion? A. Will you please repeat the question?

MR. HALLIDAY'S INFLUENCE ON THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Did you say, in substance, to that body, or to any member of that body that evening, that the Church ought not to take any action upon the subject, because you thought it would be displeasing to Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Or in substance that? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you say anything like that in substance? A. I said what possibly might be construed so. I would be very willing to say just what I did say, if I might.

Q. Well, you may say it. A. I simply stated to the meeting that Mr. Beecher, on the afternoon before the Tuesday when he came to say to me that such and such a pamphlet was to appear, after going through the whole of it and stating, "I have—

Q. Is this what you stated? A. This is exactly what I stated there.

Q. To the meeting? A. To the meeting. After Mr. Beecher got through giving me the representation of the paper that was to appear, he said, "I have made up my mind distinctly as to what course I shall pursue; I shall not notice it; I shall treat it with silent contempt."

Q. Didn't you say in effect that to the meeting? A. I repeated Mr. Beecher's remarks to me.

Q. Didn't you say it for the purpose of influencing the body whom you were addressing?

A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. Mr. Beecher—

Q. One moment.

The Witness—I want to tell you a thing in connection with it, if you will allow me.

Mr. Fullerton—I have no doubt what you want to do. That is not a subject of dispute. What I want you to do is simply to answer my question.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. I understand you now to say you did not say that with a purpose of influencing the body whom you were addressing? A. Not in the least.

Q. You had some object in view in conveying to that body?—A. I had.

Q. You have not got the question yet. You had some idea in conveying to that body the information that Mr. Beecher was not going to take any steps in regard to the Woodhull scandal, had you? A. Yes, and no.

Q. Yes, and no. Well, which is true—yes, or no? A. Both.

Q. Both are true. Well, we will leave it there; I won't disturb the harmony of these answers. Now, did you have any conversation with any member of that body there that night, or with any person present during the discussion of this subject, the Woodhull scandal, which was not addressed to the body in general? A. I did not, according to the best of my recollection, ever open my lips except at the meeting the previous evening, when some of these gentlemen were present, and then not to them personally, if I understand your question, as individuals at least.

Q. Was Captain Duncan then present? A. My impression is that he was, though I cannot tell. He was a Deacon, I think, at that time.

Q. Was Mr. West present? A. I think the records say that he was present.

Q. Do you remember that he was present? A. I do, from the record only.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL OFFER THE MINUTES OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Mr. Beach—In this connection just prove what occurred.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, you are speaking of records. [Handing book to witness.] Look at that, and see if that is the record, or one of the records of the church; and, if so, what? A. Do you mean the whole book or this particular record?

Q. I mean the book. A. The book is the record of the—in other words, it is the minute book of the deacons of Plymouth Church.

Q. Embodying a record of their action from time to time, as they held meetings? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Does it record all of the proceedings of that Committee or of that body? A. No, Sir.

Q. Does it record all according to the rules and regulations of the church? A. I think it does.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I offer it in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Let it be marked.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I would like to know for what purpose.

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps his Honor don't know as well as I do.

Mr. Shearman—I think the counsel ought to state fully the purpose for which they offer it.

Mr. Beach—We offer it for the purpose of proving the proceedings of the Board of Deacons on that subject.

Mr. Shearman—To prove all the proceedings for all time?

Mr. Beach—All the proceedings during that time.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Judge Neilson—I think it may be marked.

Mr. Shearman—The only real objection I have to putting everything of the kind in evidence is that it opens all of the private affairs of the poor of the church.

Judge Neilson—That they should not do. It is marked, what they are examining.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't propose to read anything from that book in evidence which does not bear on the matter in hand.

Mr. Shearman—This book relates more to the affairs of the poor of the church than in reference to this church.

Mr. Beach—That we would not examine or consider. We only want to see what is there in regard to this matter.

Mr. Fullerton—At the meeting of which we have been speaking, did you state, in substance, this, that you had called together this body at Mr. Beecher's request? A. No, Sir.

Q. In addition to that, did you state, in substance— A. Will you please let me say, Judge Fullerton, that I stated it in such a way that anybody might fairly infer that from it. I would be happy if I might say exactly what I did say.

Q. I asked you if you said that, in substance? A. I don't think I did; I am certain I did not.

Q. Well, I will put another question to you. Did you say anything from which you desired it to be inferred that you were calling them together at Mr. Beecher's request?

A FIGHT FOR THE MINUTE-BOOK OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Mr. Shearman—One moment.

Mr. Fullerton—What is the objection?

Mr. Shearman—I am not objecting to your question, but to an act. I object to the plaintiff in this case looking over the entire record of this Board of Deacons.

Judge Neilson—It is not necessary.

Mr. Shearman—He is doing it.

Mr. Beach—The book of record is here in evidence, and we propose to examine it to see if—

Mr. Shearman—I object to any general examination of this book. [To Mr. Morris.] Let me have the book. [Each having a hand on the book.]

Mr. Morris—You won't take it from me in that way.

Mr. Shearman—I was not taking it from you. You were taking it from me.

Mr. Morris—No, I was not.

Judge Neilson—There is no occasion for this, gentlemen.

Mr. Shearman—I object to this course being pursued.

Judge Neilson—I think you [Mr. Shearman] are correct. I think there may be private matters in that book which counsel ought not to refer to. It is here for a special purpose, in respect to the meeting. If there are other matters there, they will have a right to—

Mr. Beach—Can we not look at the book for the purpose of ascertaining the meeting?

Mr. Fullerton—I will tell you how I can do it. I can put the book in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—I object to it. The gentleman has got it by our courtesy.

Mr. Beach—We have not got it by courtesy.

Mr. Shearman—The witness has not produced it, and we have not put it in evidence.

Mr. Morris—We have.

Mr. Shearman—You have not got it, except by courtesy.

Judge Neilson—You had better proceed with this examination, gentlemen.

Mr. Beach—We suppose we have a right to examine this book, the record of the deacons' meetings of that church.

Judge Neilson—You are examining the witness. You cannot do two things at the same time.

Mr. Beach—Counsel may do it.

Mr. Morris—There is only one party examining the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—I think a very brief statement will set this thing all right. There are certain portions of this book that I desire to give in evidence, and which I shall offer in evidence. It will be very convenient to us, and, I think, most agreeable to the other side, if some one in connection with the plaintiff's case can examine it to eliminate from this great mass of matter what we desire to put in evidence. I don't know now where it is, but I don't wish to read the whole book through, nor do I care to see any secret connected with the administration of that church—I don't mean "secret" in any offensive sense at all, if there be such in the book. I don't care to read it, or to make myself acquainted with it in any respect whatever. What I desire, and what I mean to do, so far as I shall get it under your Honor's ruling, is to offer this book as far as it has any bearing on the issue in this case.

Mr. Shearman—As to that they may interrogate the witness. I beg most respectfully to insist on my right of having the book.

Mr. Morris—Well, one moment.

Mr. Shearman—I ask as my right the possession of that book.

Mr. Morris—Not in that manner.

THE COUNSEL REBUKED BY THE JUDGE.

Judge Neilson—Is this quite in a spirit that becomes counsel? I don't think it is. [To plaintiff's counsel.] I think for the present, until we get through with examining the witness, you had better return the book to Mr. Shearman, and when you want it call for it.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I call for it now.

Mr. Shearman—Whom do you call it from?

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] Be kind enough, Mr. Halliday, to turn to the next meeting of that church after October 30, 1871.

Mr. Shearman—Until this question of right is settled, Mr. Halliday, you will please do nothing of the sort.

Judge Neilson—The witness must answer the question.

Mr. Shearman—He is not in possession of the book; the book is not in the custody of the witness, and I object to his opening it. When the question of right is settled, I am willing to go as far as any one in courtesy; and I am willing, if I am allowed, to select one gentleman on the other side who may look over the whole book; but I do that as a matter of courtesy, and not of right. I will select one of the counsel on the other side to examine the book.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not disposed to accept as courtesy what I am entitled to as matter of law. I appreciate the gentleman's courtesy, and will reciprocate it on all proper occasions, and in a proper spirit, but that book was placed in the hands of the witness, and he read a portion of it in this case, and I called your Honor's attention to it at the time, saying that was read in evidence. There is no doubt of that. The book cannot go in and out like a shuttlecock to suit the views of the counsel on the other side.

Mr. Shearman—It was not read in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—I say it was read in evidence to the witness on the stand, and it is so recorded.

Judge Neilson—I understand he got from it the date of the meeting, &c.

Mr. Shearman—I was refreshing his memory, and the book was not marked or put in evidence.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman said at the time of handing the book to the reporter that it could be marked if he chose.

Mr. Shearman—I said to the reporter to mark the book for identification, and he did not mark it for identification, and the record was not read, except to refresh the witness's memory.

Mr. Fullerton—It was read.

Mr. Shearman—It was no more read than Paxton's pamphlet was read when it was handed to Mr. Moulton to refresh his memory.

Mr. Fullerton—It was read by the witness, and it was so recorded in the minutes.

Mr. Shearman—I produced it for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness as to who were there.

Judge Neilson—The book can be brought here under a subpoena. It is now in the hands of the witness.

Mr. Beach—It has been given in evidence on our side.

Mr. Morris—It cannot be enforced by a subpoena. It is a corporation.

Judge Neilson—Counsel had better go on with the examination.

AN UNSATISFACTORY END TO THE FIGHT.

Mr. Fullerton—My question is: Turn to the minutes of the Deacons' meeting next after October 30th, 1871.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]: Turn to it, witness.

Mr. Fullerton—1873.

Mr. Shearman—It is understood that book is in the hands of the witness as a matter of courtesy, and not as any matter of right.

Mr. Fullerton—And when we get through with it, as matter of courtesy we will hand it back to you.

Mr. Shearman—No, it is not in your hands except as matter of courtesy. I request your Honor that the witness be instructed to keep the book, or deliver it to me.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]: Do you find the meeting there?

The Witness—I believe I have it, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I offer it in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—We object. What has that got to do with this case, unless something is stated about what that meeting relates to? Are we to have all the proceedings of the Board of Deacons put in evidence in this case?

Mr. Fullerton—It is as much an object to us to show what it does not relate to as what it does relate to.

Mr. Shearman—That is what your Honor excluded, and would not let us do.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Shearman]: I allowed you to show every thing you desired in regard to it. I have not suppressed anything bearing upon this case, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Tracy—If Mr. Beecher was present—

Judge Neilson—We have all the proceedings in his absence.

Mr. Fullerton—For the purpose of showing his absence.

Mr. Shearman—I don't object to the statement of anything that is in that book relating to this matter ; I don't object to a statement of that. I do object to it if it is to be used by putting it in evidence including other matters which have no bearing on this case, and I have stated frankly why I do it. It is because of the names of the poor of the Church.

Judge Neilson—They will not be admitted here.

Mr. Shearman—Are the names of other persons to be brought in here ?

Judge Neilson—They will be respected.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall respect the names of the poor whether in that book or out of it.

Mr. Beech—No, unless the poor should include some member of Mr. Tilton's family.

Mr. Shearman—I have not the slightest objection to their getting that in if that is the object of it.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

ANOTHER BIT OF TESTIMONY.

The Witness [to Mr. Fullerton]: Judge Fullerton, I think there must have been one in November.

Q. November 30th, I think you will find it? A. [Referring to book.] There it is, November 27th.

Q. Now, turn to the next one after November 27th. Is this not it? A. [Referring to book.] Yes, Sir, that is it.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Sir, without reading the proceedings of November 23, if the other side are willing to take the statement that there is nothing in there in the proceedings of that day with reference to the Beecher scandal, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. Shearman—That is an end of the matter.

Mr. Fullerton—That is an end of it as far as that is concerned.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—[To Mr. Fullerton]: Do you mean the Beecher scandal or the Woodhull scandal?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, the Woodhull scandal.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer—You said the Beecher scandal.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is a synonym.

Q. Now, will you turn to the next Deacons' meeting, please? I desire the like entry to be made in regard to that meeting. A. That is it, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—The next meeting is what date?

The Witness—I have not looked to see whether any other meeting intervenes. [After examining:] No, that is it.

Mr. Fullerton—December 23, 1872. No action there in regard to the scandal. The next meeting is January 30, 1873.

Q. Now, will you be kind enough to turn to the next meeting? A. The last was the 30th of December, 1872.

Q. The last one was this? A. [Referring to book]: January 30. Now, you want to know what?

Q. The next one? A. I suppose that was the next one, but I ceased to be clerk then. Where the difference in the writing occurs, then I ceased to be clerk.

Q. Is that the next meeting, February 27th? A. I suppose it is; it would be called a special meeting unless it was.

Q. Is March 27th the next? A. I presume so. There were only monthly meetings unless some special meeting was called, and if there was, there would be some memorandum of it in the book.

Q. April 24 is the next? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you state anything to the Board of Deacons, or to the body there assembled, on the occasion when the Woodhull scandal was the subject of consideration, by which you intended to convey the idea that you had called them together at Mr. Beecher's request? A. If the Court will instruct me how to answer that question; I don't want to seem not to state what is exactly the truth, and I cannot, I fear, give a categorical answer—give a yes or no to it—without making myself uncomfortable lest I may have conveyed a wrong impression.

Judge Neilson—The only instruction I can give you is to answer according to your present conception and understanding of the question if you did or did not, or indirectly did or did not, or in substance did or did not.

The Witness—I can tell you what I did say exactly, and then—

Judge Neilson—Counsel does not ask you that.

The Witness—I could tell the Court, I thought, and he might instruct me how to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I think you cannot get instructions from the Court how to answer a question when it involves the subject and intent which you had in making use of certain language.

The Witness—I had no such intent, Judge Fullerton, at all.

Mr. Fullerton—That is a perfect answer to the question.

The Witness—I didn't understand you as to my intent. I could have answered that very readily. Excuse me that I was so dull.

Q. Did you say in substance this, that you had called them together at Mr. Beecher's request to say that he, Mr. Beecher, thought it best that neither the Examining Committee nor the church should take any notice of Mrs. Woodhull's story? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you say that to the body, or to any individual member or individual members—A. Never.

Q.—of that body there on that occasion? A. No, Sir. Excuse me for saying, "never." You asked simply that question. I did not, Sir; I confine my answer to that.

Q. Did you say that in substance in reference to the meeting of the Board of Deacons? A. I did not.

Q. Did you say in substance that you thought, and that Mr. Beecher thought, that: "We had better try to live it down"? A. Not at that meeting.

Q. Well, I am talking about that meeting? A. No, Sir; I don't know that I did. I am sure at that meeting I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. Fullerton—There cannot be any misunderstanding about the meeting I am inquiring of.

Mr. Shearman—Oct. 30th.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir. [To the witness.] After saying that in substance—A. I didn't say that in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday, you are a little bit too fast; I have a right to employ that language in my question.

The Witness—Pardon me.

Q. After saying that, in substance, was it not also said, in substance, by members present, that they thought the policy thus suggested was a mistaken one.

Mr. Shearman—One moment. I object to that question, because it contains two questions together in one.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you move a division of the question?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir. Suppose Mr. Halliday was obliged to answer this last branch of the question affirmatively—I don't know whether he is or not—he could not truthfully answer it affirmatively without also implying he said the other thing in substance, although he said he didn't say it in substance. If he answers no, the counsel will by and by put the last part of the question separately, and try and involve Mr. Halliday in confusion on the ground that he could have answered yes. It is a double question.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday is evidently on the alert.

Judge Neilson—There is something in the suggestion, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir; Mr. Halliday can answer according to the truth; he is not at all averse to telling what he knows about the subject.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] After saying that, did you say something else, or, if you said that, did you also say so and so?

MORE DISCUSSION.

Mr. Fullerton—It does not answer my question that he said that. I asked him if he said that in substance.

Mr. Shearman—He didn't say that in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well. He may so repeat it, but I shall predicate my question on the belief that he did so state.

Judge Neilson—The question seems to me objectionable, and I think the counsel is correct.

Mr. Beach—We ask him if he said a portion of that question, and he denies it. We ask him didn't you say that, and didn't you say in answer thus and so? Didn't you make that remark, and didn't A. and B. make this reply?

Judge Neilson—That is a different thing.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, it is precisely the same thing.

Judge Neilson—You ask him if, after saying that, he didn't say something that some one else said.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not asking him what some one else said; I am paving the way for what was said in opposition to his policy as made known to that body, and I must incorporate the policy in the question in order to get the answer which I hope to get from the witness, so that we can understand and appreciate it.

Judge Neilson—You had better modify your question.

Mr. Fullerton—I cannot modify it, as your Honor will perceive. I am now calling his attention to what was said in reply to his suggestion about some third person. I ask him that question: Didn't you make such a statement, and was there not a reply made to it of that character?

Judge Neilson—If you ask him was not such a reply made to some statement of his, that would answer the question.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; the reply, if I prove it, amounts to nothing unless he made it to the particular statement to which I call his attention.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Mr. Halliday, you perceive the character of the question and you can answer it.

Mr. Shearman—Does your Honor allow the question?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Then I except.

Judge Neilson—The counsel seems not to be able to modify it.

Mr. Shearman—The witness is not bound to answer yes or no.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday understands what he is bound to do, and when he is at a loss he turns to the Court and gets instructions from the Court as often as the counsel does.

Judge Neilson—[To THE TRIBUNE Stenographer.] Read the question. THE TRIBUNE Stenographer then read the question as follows:

"After saying that, in substance, was it not also said, in substance, by members present, that they thought the policy thus suggested was a mistaken one?"

Mr. Shearman—I move that the first part of that question be stricken out.

Mr. Beach—Move that a part of the question be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—I said the question would be allowed, and Mr. Shearman can have an exception.

Mr. Fullerton—The question has been repeated by the stenographer, and I think Mr. Halliday understands it.

The Witness—I cannot answer that question, yes or no; I cannot look at it in any other light than that of a double question, pledging me or committing me to have made an answer that I have not made, or, if I did, that I did not intend to make. If I did make such an answer I wish to have it amended.

MR. SHERMAN EXCEPTS TO MR. FULLERTON'S WAY OF CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Mr. Fullerton—That is an improvement on Brother Shearman's argument, so we will pass on.

Q. On that occasion did you state that you had called them together at Mr. Beecher's request to say that he thought it best that neither the Examining Committee nor the church should take any notice of Mrs. Woodhull's story, that they had better try to live it down, and did some person or persons present suggest that they thought the policy thus suggested was a mistaken one?

The Witness—There seems to me to be two or three questions there.

Mr. Shearman—There seems to be three questions there.

Mr. Fullerton—You must not interrupt Mr. Halliday in his argument.

Mr. Shearman—I am very sorry, please your Honor, but the counsel on the other side have selected two classes of witnesses for their insolence—clergymen and ladies—and I propose to remonstrate in the most energetic manner against the continuing of that conduct, and to ask of this Court, as it has protected, and properly protected, witnesses of full age, who were neither clergymen nor ladies, and properly protected them against any imputations of counsel, that the Court will also protect clergymen, now that we have a clergyman on the stand, and this is the fifth time that opprobrious remarks have been made with reference to him. The same course was pursued yesterday with reference to Prof. Gay, and I trust your Honor will see that it comes to an end. Counsel has no right to say Mr. Halliday was making an argument. Mr. Halliday was making a fair answer, and I think this course should be stopped.

Judge Neilson—I think you are correct, substantially, in your suggestion. I don't think Mr. Halliday intended to argue. Now, proceed Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, some gentlemen argue without intending it, Sir. He did reply that he thought the question contained three or four questions.

The Witness—Two, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Two; very well.

Judge Neilson—Well, regarding it in that light, proceed to give your answer.

Mr. Fullerton—It was an improper observation for the gentleman to make. I am not going to insult Mr. Halliday. I have insulted no lady at all. The gentleman from the other side is a little off his balance in this case, and does not have a proper appreciation of what takes place.

Mr. Shearman—I have a very different opinion, and I cannot help it if I have not the fortune to agree with the gentleman. I say that such observations are offensive, and I say that such observations were repeatedly directed to ladies in delicate health, as the gentleman knew at the time.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think I knew it, or the ladies knew it; I never heard of it, and Mr. Halliday never looked in better spirits in his life. So that Mr. Shearman perceives insults that were never intended, never given, and never received.

Judge Neilson [To the witness]—Now, regarding the question as being double in its character, please answer each branch of it as you understand it.

The Witness—If the stenographer will read the question.

Mr. Shearman—He will make the best answer he can.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, that is a good suggestion, Mr. Shearman. The stenographer will read it.

Mr. Shearman—I propose to have things go on properly.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, whilst he permits things to go on properly, I wish Mr. Shearman would go on properly himself.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer, reading :

After saying, that in substance, was't it also said in substance by a number present, that they thought the policy thus suggested was a mistaken one?

Mr. Fullerton—It is the next one after that, Mr. Reporter.

The question was read, as follows:

On that occasion did you state that you had called them together at Mr. Beecher's request to say that he thought it best that neither the Examining Committee nor the church should take any notice of Mrs. Woodhull's story; that they had better try to live it down.

And did some person or persons present say that they thought the policy thus suggested was a mistaken one?

The Witness—I — to the best of my recollection I never said what is indicated in the first part of that question, if it is but one, nor have I the least recollection of anything like what is inferred occurring in the second question, or the second part of the same question.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no difficulty in answering the question, you see. Was it also said by any person or persons that, as Theodore Tilton had been named by Mrs. Woodhull as her authority for many of her statements, and as he had made no denial of her assertion, it was the duty of the Examining Committee to question Mr. Tilton with regard to the matter, or anything substantially like that? A. I have no recollection of anything of the kind.

OTHER ACTIONS OF THE DEACONS.

Q. Now, do you recollect the next meeting of the Committee after the one to which your attention has now been called?

The Witness—The Committee or the Board of Deacons?

Mr. Fullerton—The Board.

The Witness—Oh! I do not, Sir; I cannot —

Q. Were you a member of the Examining Committee? A. I think I was, Sir, at that — O! I am sure I was.

Q. The meetings of the Examining Committee and of the Board of Deacons were separate, weren't they? A. Entirely.

Q. Disconnected? A. Yes, Sir. That is, the deacons always met as members of the Board that —

Q. Undoubtedly? A. But the meetings were distinct.

Q. Now, I want the proceedings of the Examining Committee of November 5. Do you recollect the next meeting of the Examining Committee? A. After this meeting of the Board of Deacons?

Q. Yes, after this meeting of the Board of Deacons? A. I don't recollect it, Sir; could not unless I could have something to recall.

Q. Do you recollect that a committee was appointed by the Examining Committee in reference to the Woodhull scandal? A. There was a call—not in reference to the Woodhull scandal.

Q. Well, with reference to some branch of it or some feature? A. There was a committee appointed, I think, to wait on Mr. Tilton and on another party at the same time.

Q. When was that committee appointed? A. I cannot tell you, Sir, without referring to the records.

Q. How soon after? A. I could not give you the least idea, Sir; I might give three months or four months.

Q. Just take the record, please; point it out, will you? A. I will, if it is on the records.

Q. How?

Mr. Shearman—It is not on the records.

The Witness—If it is upon the records I will; I have not the record.

Mr. Fullerton—Hand him the book and let him see.

The Witness—My impression is, Judge Fullerton, that what was said or done was informal, was merely preliminary.

Q. Well, that is your impression? A. Yes, there may be—

Q. Well; there may be an impression on the minute-book that is better than yours; that is what I want to get at. A. Yes, I simply say that to—

Mr. Shearman—I have found in such a meeting as you asked a subsequent meeting—

Mr. Fullerton—I called for that meeting when that Committee was appointed. [Book shown to witness.]

TIME LOST OVER A NICE POINT OF COURTESY.

Mr. Shearman—You can refresh your memory by that. I want it distinctly understood, when the gentleman says he calls, that this is not produced under any notice to produce, or call, or anything of that kind.

Mr. Morris—It is here.

Mr. Shearman—Well, it is not here in any sense except this; as a matter of courtesy I hand it to refresh the witness's memory.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't call for it as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. Shearman—Then I will take it away.

Judge Neilson—Never mind, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—I am perfectly willing if the gentlemen will accept courtesy, but if they won't accept courtesy—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, one moment; the book has been placed in the hands of the witness, and is in the custody of the law.

Mr. Shearman—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, I regard it as a matter of courtesy to the Court.

Mr. Shearman—If it is a matter of courtesy to the Court, I submit.

Mr. Fullerton—Then we are not indebted for the courtesy. [To the witness.] Do you find the next meeting of the Examining Committee? A. I have it, and I am reading it to refresh my memory.

Mr. Shearman—It is not the next one, if you will look to refresh your memory.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is the next one he is looking at.

Mr. Shearman—No, it is the next one after that.

The Witness—I am looking at "Brooklyn, Dec. 10;" what do you want of me, Judge Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—I want you to point out the meeting of the Examining Committee when that Committee was appointed? A. I said I was reading to find it.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Shearman interrupted you.

Mr. Shearman—No, the gentleman said it was the next meeting. I say that it is not the next meeting.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will call this the first meeting, then.

Mr. Shearman—You may call it the last if you please.

Mr. Fullerton—No, but when I get at the meeting, I don't care whether it is first or last, or next.

The Witness—Here. [Pointing to the book.]

Mr. Fullerton—I offer it in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—What is this?

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Shearman, will you be kind enough to read it for me in evidence?

Mr. Shearman—Well, read it; I have no objection; but I do not propose to put the book in.

Mr. Fullerton—No? Then, I will read it in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—You may read it, but I will not put this in as an exhibit.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I didn't ask you.

Mr. Shearman—Well, you don't get it as an exhibit unless you take it as courtesy.

Judge Neilson—Well, do accept it that way, Mr. Fullerton, and let us get along.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir, I will not accept it as courtesy. With all respect to your Honor, these objections are frivolous.

Judge Neilson—Then read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor rule that we have not a right to give that record in evidence?

Mr. Shearman—They hav'n't got it yet.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to understand whether we have a right to give that in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—You have not subpoenaed it, or given notice to produce it.

Mr. Morris—The book is here, and it has been in the hands of the witness, and I ask your Honor if we have not a right to introduce it.

Judge Neilson—You have.

Mr. Shearman—Then I except to this ruling. One moment; I want to understand, your Honor, when I, on a courteous request of these gentlemen, produce a book as a matter of courtesy, and allow them to look at it every time that book is to be placed in evidence, and then they say that they get it as a matter of right, and give me no credit for courtesy. If that is their course, I will not produce another book, and I demand this back.

Mr. Fullerton—I give the gentleman credit for producing as a matter of courtesy what we are entitled to as a matter of right.

Mr. Shearman—No, they have not subpoenaed this book; they have given no notice to produce it.

Judge Neilson—All this is unprofitable.

Mr. Shearman—It is, but the counsel are uncourteous.

MR. PORTER ACTS AS PEACEMAKER.

Mr. Porter—I think there is a misunderstanding between my learned friends. There can be no practical difficulty about the matter. I concur with Mr. Fullerton in the entire propriety of this being read in evidence, and I am quite sure that my friend will not insist that the book should be marked, if not belonging to either of the parties, and being a part of the records, but I concede the entire propriety of this being read. My friend, Mr. Shearman, makes the objection, which is a very appropriate one, that this book being produced by courtesy, should be considered as remaining in his possession, and not placed in the custody of the law, and whatever the book contains, which my learned friends think should be introduced in evidence, can be read without being marked.

Mr. Shearman—That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that having been all that I ever proposed to do, I am satisfied also. [Reading from the book]:

"BROOKLYN, December 10th, 1872.

"Meeting of the Executive Committee, held in the Trustees' Room.

"Brother White was called to the chair; also present, Brothers Halliday, Tallmadge, Roper, Manchester, Moody, West, and White, and Sisters Marrell and Pratt. The Clerk of the Church was called to make the Annual Report."

Then follows something that I don't care to read. I'll read, however, the following:

"Whereas, It is currently reported that Theodore Tilton has been guilty of conduct unbecoming a Brother of this Church:

"Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed to investigate as to the truth of such reports, and to recommend such future action in the matter as they may deem advisable to be taken by the Executive Committee"—or "Examining Committee"—"Ex;" that is Examining Committee?

The Witness—That is the Examining Committee; yes, Sir.

"It was seconded by Brother Manchester. Mr. Beecher, Brother West and Brother Davenport was appointed as such, Brother West being appointed Chairman of the Committee—chairman of the same—Brother White mentioned the taking up of the—" that is another subject, however.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you present, now, when that resolution was offered? A. I think I was.

Q. Do you recollect whether or not you opposed it? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect that you did oppose it, saying in substance that it was Mr. Beecher's desire that no such action should be had? A. I don't remember of saying anything of the kind.

Q. Do you remember you didn't say anything of the kind? A. My best recollection is that I did not.

Q. Now, that is December 10th. Will you be kind enough to turn to the next meeting of that committee? [Mr. Fullerton hands book to witness.] A. This appears to be it, on the next page, Sir—December 17th.

[Mr. Fullerton and the witness looking over the book together.]

Q. Then there is one December 27th, is there? A. Where is that?

Q. That is December 27th? A. Oh, yes.

Q. When was this? A. 17th.

Q. Oh, yes; ten days after? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, then, which is the next? A. The 17th—that seems to be the 29th, Sir.

Q. That is another one— A. No; that is the same.

Q. 29th—and January 31st another one? A. Seems to be, Sir, there was a month intervening there, it seems, does it not.

Q. This is not—this is a mere— A. That is a mere blotch, from which, I suppose, I had—

Q. Now, I recall your attention, Mr. Halliday, to the meeting of October 30th, 1872. How long prior to the meeting of the Deacons on that day did you see Mr. Bell? A. The meeting on October 30th, that is the meeting of the Board of Deacons?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't remember to have seen him at all; do you ask what time that day, Sir, or at any time?

Q. How long before that meeting—whether it was days or weeks that you had seen Mr. Bell? A. I don't think I had seen Mr. Bell since the meeting of the evening before, on Tuesday evening. The 30th was on Wednesday, and I had seen Mr. Bell the previous evening at a meeting to which I had alluded in the church parlor.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Bell in regard to the preceding meeting of the Deacons? A. Not a word that I remember now—I don't remember of having any personal conversation with Mr. Bell at all.

Q. Did Mr. Bell come to see you with reference to the proposed meeting of Deacons? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he ask you whether there was not a meeting of Deacons appointed to be held there soon? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he tell you in substance that he came directly from Mr. Beecher to inform you that he did not want a meeting of the Deacons? A. I don't remember that he told me any such thing.

Q. Can you swear that he did not tell you that in substance? A. I can swear that I feel very positive that he said nothing of the kind to me.

Q. You have no such recollection? A. Mr. Tilton was present and heard the conversation and all that—

Q. Well, that does not convey the information to me. A. That is all, Sir; excuse me.

Q. That is not the conversation? A. To the best of my recollection, he didn't say one word to me about it.

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday, did you refer to a meeting between you and Mr. Bell, when Mr. Tilton was present? I am referring to a meeting between yourself and Mr. Bell, of which Mr. Bell has testified, if you were here when he testified? A. Well, that was the meeting at my house when Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bell were there. Mr. Bell came in while Mr. Tilton was there and it is that that Mr. Bell testifies to.

Q. Well, did Mr. Bell at that, or any other meeting, convey to you what purported to be a wish of Mr. Beecher in regard to the meeting of Deacons? A. I don't think he ever said one word to me about it.

Q. You think you would remember it if he had? A. I do, Sir, decidedly.

Q. At the meeting on the 28th of October, was Mr. R. D. Benedict present—the 30th of October? A. I cannot tell, Sir, the record would show.

Mr. Shearman—Do you mean the 30th?

Mr. Fullerton—I mean the 30th. Yes, sir.

The Witness—The Deacons' meeting the record would show. I am not able to say; Mr. Benedict was there pretty generally, and from that I should infer that he was, but I don't remember.

Q. Do you recollect that Mr. Hawkins was present at that time? A. I do, simply because I saw it on the record.

Q. Do you recollect that Mr. Ropes was present? A. I think I read his name in the record, I could not tell otherwise. The Deacons consisted of so many, that it is very difficult for me to recollect, who, from time to time, were present.

Q. This was an informal meeting, was it not? A. It was a regular monthly meeting, I think.

Q. A regular monthly meeting? A. I think it was, Sir, a stated monthly meeting; the Board of Deacons had stated monthly meetings on every last Wednesday evening in each month.

Q. Did you call them together at the regular meetings by letters? A. I think I did.

Q. You didn't adjourn it to a particular day when you adjourned? A. We adjourned sine die, unless we had a meeting intervening, unless there was a special meeting.

THE INTERVIEW WITH MRS. MOULTON.

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday, you have told us that you had some meetings with Mrs. Moulton at her house—will you state when that first one was, A. I think it was in the early Spring of 1872. I cannot tell with any definiteness at all. I think it was at that period, because I feel quite confident, that the windows were open; that the weather was very beautiful.

Q. Might it not have been—you say the Spring of 1872? A. I think it was, Sir.

Q. Might it not have been the Autumn previous? A. I said so in my testimony—it seemed to me that it was longer than that, but I infer that it was in the Spring because of the character of the weather,

Q. Was that a pastoral call? A. It was, Sir.

Q. How long did you remain? A. I may have been in the house twenty minutes to half an hour, Sir—fifteen minutes to half an hour.

Q. And when was the next call? A. I never called at Mr. Moulton's again until the day on which this Deacons' meeting that you have referred to, Wednesday, the 30th of October, I think.

Q. It was on that same day that you called again? A. I think it was, Sir; about half-past nine o'clock in the morning.

Q. And it was at that time that you had a conversation with Mrs. Moulton? A. In regard to this matter; yes, Sir.

Q. Will you be kind enough now to repeat that conversation as near as you recollect it, Mr. Halliday? A. I had the impression that Mrs. Moulton's name was mixed up in the matter in some way or other from two sentences which I heard read of the story.

Q. One moment. Is that a part of the conversation with Mrs. Moulton? A. No, Sir, but it showed what sent me there.

Q. Oh! I didn't ask you what sent you there, Mr. Halliday.

A. Well, Sir, I beg your pardon for volunteering.

Q. Well, please don't tell me what you went there for. A. The first thing that I said—Mrs. Moulton I think met me at the door herself. Her appearance was as if she—

Q. Now, one moment. I didn't ask you as to the appearance of Mrs. Moulton. A. Mrs. Moulton received me and asked me into the parlor, and I went. May I go on, Sir?

A. And tell what conversation there was, without telling the appearance of the lady? A. I said to Mrs. Moulton. "How is it that you are mixed up in this Woodhull and Claflin scandal?" She replied to me: "I don't know what right Mrs. Woodhull has to use my name, I have nothing to do with it; have had nothing to do with it;" just what I said in very few words next, I can't remember, but Mrs. Moulton, as if interrupting, impatient, she said: "Mr. Halliday, Mr. Beecher is my pastor, and has been from my childhood, and I believe in him, and there is nothing that they can say that will affect my confidence in him, and my affection for him, one particle."

Q. Now, have you repeated the very words that she said? A. I think I have, the very words she uttered.

Q. Have you repeated the same words that you repeated yesterday, as being the same words? A. I think I have; I think my words were very much what I have said now; I meant that they should have been exactly, for those words are, to the best of my recollection, the words she used.

Q. Do you remember the exact words? A. I think, I do, Sir.

Q. Did you make a memorandum of them? A. I did not, Sir. I repeated them immediately to others.

Q. Well, I did not ask you that.

Mr. Shearman—Well, that is very well.

Q. You made no memorandum of your conversation? A. Not of that conversation; I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you undertake to remember the words exactly. A. I did.

Q. Fasten them in your mind? A. I did.

Q. Well, then, do you remember them exactly? A. I think I do, Sir.

Q. Very well—did she say this: "I believe in him, and they can say nothing that will lessen my confidence in him, or my affection one particle"? A. That is my recollection of the language she used,

Q. Yes; are you aware that that is not the exact language that you used a moment ago in giving the words that she made use of? A. No, I am not.

Q. Yes—well, now, will you be kind enough then, to repeat the words that she used, so that you will get at the exact language as it exists in your own mind? A. "Mr. Halliday, Mr. Beecher is my pastor, and has been from my childhood, and I believe in him; there is not anything that they can say to me that will affect my confidence in him, or my affection for him one particle."

Q. And those are the exact words? A. I think they are, Sir, and what I meant to utter before if I did not.

Q. Who called your attention to the portrait of Mr. Beecher?
A. Nobody at that time, Sir.

Q. Why do you answer in that way? A. Because it—that is the fact.

Q. Were you aware that I did not limit my question to that time? A. We were talking about that interview, and I supposed—

Q. No, we were not. We had got through with it, and stopped. A. Excuse me, Sir; shall I answer your question?

Q. Well, I hope so. A. Mrs. Moulton directed my attention to it.

Q. What did she say in regard to it? A. Well, I cannot remember, Sir.

Q. What did you say in regard to it? A. That I do not remember.

Q. Well, do you remember the date of the visit when you were called—your attention was thus called to that portrait? A. No more than I stated a little while ago, that I think it was in the Spring of 1872, my first visit to Mrs. Moulton.

Q. Your first visit to Mrs. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; I never knew her before, till I called that morning.

Q. Where was the portrait when your attention was called to it? A. I think it was hanging about in this direction from me; of course I suppose the space not so great, on the side wall, on the east wall of their residence.

Q. Were you in Court when Mrs. Moulton was examined? A. I was.

Q. Did you hear her narrate in her evidence what she told you? A. I did.

Q. On the occasion when you were there in October, 1872? A. I did, I think, Sir.

Q. In what regard did your memory vary or differ from hers? A. Well, I don't remember now, Sir, what her testimony was.

Mr. Porter—That is objectionable.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose, Sir, that is a proper question.

Mr. Porter—It is asking him to state wherein his memory differs from hers—he is not a reporter of what she testified to; he is not called to speak upon that subject—he is to state what his memory of the transaction is, not how it compares with the memory of another, or with the version of another.

Judge Neilson—Leaving us to make the comparison. I think that is so.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, it is for the witness to state in what respect his memory differs from hers as to what took place on that occasion.

Judge Neilson—Well, he does that in giving what he thinks took place.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, I am aware of that; but at the same time it is proper for me now to ask him in what respect his memory differs from her narration; I think so, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Counsel has her testimony before him, and can refer to any point on which he wishes to compare.

Judge Neilson—It is a simple question.

Mr. Porter—It is a simple question as to the fact, I mean, she represented.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you heard her testimony? A. Yes,

Sir, and if you will let me read it, Judge, I will answer your question.

Q. Well, I will. It is there [pointing to the place in printed book]. If you can point out any difference between her recollection and yours, on reading it, you are at liberty to do so.

Mr. Porter—What page are you asking him?

Mr. Fullerton—Page 731.

The Witness—In the first place, she did not say to me that she was sixteen years old.

Q. Well, now, Mr. Halliday? A. That is what she says she said, and I say she did not say so.

Q. No; you have got your finger on the wrong spot? A. I got it on that spot.

Q. Well, that is the spot where you should not have put it. A. I am sorry; I didn't know where to put it.

Q. Well, we will mark it, so you won't make another mistake—you knew quite well, I think— A. Oh, now, excuse me, Judge, I did not; I thought you referred me to the whole of her testimony. Judge, excuse me; if I—

Q. I am calling your attention to what she said in regard to the interview between yourself and her, which you have given in evidence here now.

Mr. Shearman—Just what he supposed.

Mr. Fullerton—He is not referring to it at all.

Mr. Shearman—I beg pardon, I have got the book before me.

Mr. Fullerton—You beg pardon very often, and very often are forgiven; but you offend right away, the same.

The Witness—The difference is in this, Judge, that she says: "I don't remember, in the first place;" and, I do. The first part she says, "I remember;" so that, in that, we agree—I did not forget part of it.

Q. Does she state that she did not state what you do? A. She says simply, "I don't remember the last part of that, Sir; the first part I remember;" now the part that she has forgotten, I remember.

Q. Is not this the same language that you used, incorporated in the question to her, precisely, word for word? A. Well, she says she don't remember the first part of it.

Q. I did not ask you what she remembered; I ask you, if the language incorporated in the question to her which she answered there, is not the same language that you gave in your answer to-day, as having proceeded from her? A. I think that is the answer, exactly as I gave it, Sir. Now, what is the question?

Q. Well, having answered it, I have no occasion to put it again—

Mr. Shearman—Now, if your Honor please, as there were comments made by the counsel on the witness's statement, it is only fair that I should make a comment, and say that the witness was exactly correct.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Shearman—Well, if the gentleman will make comments as he goes along, I have a right to make a comment, and ask your Honor's attention and the Jury's attention, to the fact that what the witness said is exactly correct.

Judge Neilson—It is correct, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—He called his attention to what he had said, and his attention was directed accidentally to some other portion. I didn't want to know what the lady said about her age, nor anything about it.

Q. Was anything else said in that conversation between you and Mrs. Moulton that you have not related? A. It was very brief, and I don't remember anything further that was said; I don't think that I was there with Mrs. Moulton more than ten minutes; I shortened my stay because I thought Mrs. Moulton was engaged.

THE EXAMINING COMMITTEE AND THE WOODHULL CHARGES.

Q. Now, was there any discussion before any meeting of the Examining Committee, or the Board of Deacons in regard to the Woodhull scandal, that you have not named?

A. At the meeting?—when you say before, do you mean, at the meeting?

Q. At the meeting, yes,—before the meeting,—before the body? A. Oh, I think there were repeatedly, Sir.

Q. Did this Committee make a report—which were appointed when Mr. West was the chairman? A. I cannot recollect positively in regard to it—I remember of Mr. Beecher—Mr. Beecher was once appointed a Committee and he made a report; but I cannot tell distinctly in regard to the report of which Mr. West was a—

Q. Well, now, why drag in that other report? I am asking you about the report of the Committee of which Mr. West was chairman? A. I will simply answer, then, that I cannot remember, Sir.

Q. Anything about it; did you keep the minutes at that time? A. I don't think I ever kept them, excepting a—no; I don't at that time; I was going to say something further in answer.

Q. Did you see the West charges? A. I did, Sir; they were made to the Committee when I—

Q. Well, one moment. A. I was in the Committee when they were presented, when these were reported; when they were presented I was a clerk for the time being.

Q. Well, when were they presented? A. Could not tell you, Sir, without refreshing my mind from the minutes.

Q. Please look at the minutes? A. I haven't them, Sir.

Q. Well, they are here? A. No, Sir; they are not in, in them; the minutes that I made.

Q. Can you tell what year those charges were presented? A. It was some time in the Spring, I think; some time in June, 1873.

Q. Where was the Committee? A. If my memory serves me, it was in the church parlor.

Q. Who were present at that meeting? A. That I could not say that I remember—that Captain Duncan was present; I am pretty certain that Mr. Ropes was present. I cannot remember with any definiteness any other persons, without looking at the records.

Q. Who presented the West charges? A. My impression is that Mr. West presented them himself.

Q. What action was taken by the Committee when they were presented? A. I think the action that was taken was to receive or to accept, that is to permit, Mr.—there are two phrases used, and I cannot be confident—I mean the rules of the church; and I cannot be confident now, as to which of those two; this attaches; at all events, the action of the Committee was at first, I think, equivalent to an acceptance, or allowing him to make the charges—after reading the charges over, they were regarded as incomplete and referred back, if I remember, to Mr. West, to complete.

Q. After that, was the third specification added? A. Whether it was at that time, or subsequent, I don't know, Sir.

Q. Well, I mean subsequently, was the third specification added? A. There was an addition made, but when, I cannot tell, Sir.

Q. Well, now, I didn't ask you when; I asked you if after they were referred back? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. The third specification was added? A. My impression is, that that specification was not presented, was not added at the—when Mr. West handed them back, as he said, amended, but that at some subsequent period, perhaps a month afterwards, and I don't know but a longer period than that, I think he desired to make an addition to them.

Q. And the addition was made, was it? A. That is my impression.

Q. Which is the addition of the third specification there? A. I think it was made—accepted, allowed to be made by the Board.

Q. Well, at what meeting of the Board did he present these charges as thus amended finally? A. I think it was some evening the following week; however, I am not able to say.

Q. What month was that, Mr. Halliday? A. I think it was in June.

Q. In June? A. I think it was.

Q. Who was present when that took place? A. Oh, I could not tell at all, Sir. I could not mention a single one that was present, unless—I could not say positively, and there is nothing now that recalls to my mind any individual that was present.

Q. You recollect the fact—you were there? A. I think I was.

Q. And Mr. West was there? A. I think he was.

Q. Was not Captain Duncan there? A. I think he was.

Q. Now, can't you fix some one else that was there? A. Well, I presume that the majority of the Board, but I cannot tell who.

Q. What action was taken then? A. I cannot remember.

Q. Have you no recollection? A. No, Sir; I could refresh myself from the minutes, if you desire.

Q. Well, the minutes are not here? A. No, Sir; they are not here.

Q. Well, that was an important matter in the church, was it not? A. What way?

Q. The presentation of these charges? A. They were.

Q. And you don't remember what action was taken? A. I do not, definitely.

Q. Well, have you any recollection at all upon that subject? A. No, Sir; I have not positively, as to what took place. I would rather, if you would allow me, to look at the minutes; I will bring the minutes and tell you exactly what was done.

Q. Will you bring them to-morrow morning? A. I will try to.

Q. Then I will defer it? A. I say the minutes. I mean the mere blotter from which the minutes were transcribed.

Q. Very well; was any action taken as to prosecuting those charges? A. Yes, and no—that is, there were, I think, at first a resolution adopted to prosecute them, and then it was found that they were—that there were irregularities and they were recalled, and several comings and goings, I don't know exactly what to call it, before any final and specific action was adopted by the Examining Committee.

IRREGULARITIES IN THE WEST CHARGES.

Q. What was the final and specific action adopted by that Committee with reference to the West charges as finally amended? A. Well, Sir, I am afraid that I should—it would be so much better for me to tell from the minutes after seeing them.

Q. Then you will bring those to-morrow morning? A. I will, Sir.

Q. Well, did you ever converse with Mr. West about his charges after they were presented as finally amended? A. Oh! I think I did have several conversations with him, Sir.

Q. Did you try to dissuade him from further prosecuting them? A. I did.

Q. How frequently? A. Will you let me qualify—I did, because I regarded him—wholly incomplete.

Q. No; one moment. A. Well, I don't want to be misunderstood; I don't want it supposed, and I am not stating that to the jury, that I was opposed to the prosecution of these parties.

Q. Well? A. I wanted that whatever was done should be properly done, and I did not think Mr. West had done it properly, and so stated to him, as I did to the Committee.

Q. Yes; did you point out to him— A. I did.

Q. What? A. In the first place—

Q. Well, you didn't hear my suggestion? A. Excuse me, Sir.

Q. Did you point out to him what you considered as irregularities? A. I did.

Q. And, therefore, you advised him not to prosecute the charges? A. I did, until his charges were properly presented.

Q. Well, look at the charges as they were finally amended, Exhibit No. 29, and point out, if you please, to the jury, in what respect they were imperfect [handing paper to witness].

A. It was not so much—

Q. No, no; answer my question, please, now.

Mr. Shearman—That was what he was going to do. He was going to say his attention was called—

Mr. Beach—Oh, now, Mr. Shearman, that is altogether irregular.

Mr. Shearman—It is not; that is what I supposed he was going to say.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, don't interrupt Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Shearman—You are interrupting him.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I am not; I ask him to point out the irregularities in the charges and specifications of Mr. West, as finally submitted to the Committee.

Mr. Shearman—That is what I supposed he was going to answer.

The Witness—May I state what I said to Mr. West?

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday, will you be kind enough to point out what you regarded at the time as irregularities in the specifications, or imperfections in the specifications of Mr. West, as finally amended? A. Why, Sir, there is not one-half of the matter here that Mr. West presented to the Committee in his charges.

Q. Then? A. There was a long—a long page of printed matter, longer than that book connected with the specifications and the charges, and it is not here. If you will let me bring the charges as I have them, then I will explain them; I have got them at home.

Q. That is taken from your book, I believe, Mr. Halliday? A. Well, but it is not all here, I say.

Q. Then, it is no more imperfect than as if it were all there, I take it, and you will not be embarrassed in pointing out the imperfections? A. I cannot tell what I cannot see here.

Q. Well, point out the imperfections in that instrument that is before you, and tell the jury in what respect it was imperfect? A. I don't know that I am able at the moment to point out any errors or any imperfections in this.

Q. Well, you did point out some to Mr. West, I understand you? A. I did, in regard to the whole affair, which I see is not here.

Q. The imperfections, then, were in the part that is not there? A. I presume so, as I am not able to see any here, and it may be that those were not as they were when I criticised his paper.

Q. What became of the charges as finally amended which he presented to the Committee? A. I prefer to refer to the documents.

Q. Oh! but what became of them; you cannot tell by looking at them what was done with them? A. I don't know what you mean, Sir—where are they now? Where is the paper itself?

Q. No, I shall ask that question when I wish to know. A. Well, Sir, I misunderstood you.

Q. What became of the papers after they were presented to the Committee? A. Do you mean what action was taken upon them?

Q. No. A. Well, I don't understand your question.

ACRIMONY BETWEEN COUNSEL.

Mr. Shearman—I understand you to say—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am not asking you, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we have a right to an intelligible question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I have a right to an intelligent witness, too.

The Witness—Excuse me for—

Mr. Shearman—Now, that statement is very uncalled for and very indecorous, and the gentleman shall not, though he is my superior in age and experience and talent—he shall not insult witnesses on the stand without my remonstrating. Brother Halliday is a very intelligible witness, and is a very intelligent witness, if he is asked a proper question.

Mr. Beach—You do not understand his remark. You were proffering yourself as a witness, and he said he wanted an intelligible witness, and therefore he turned to the witness on the stand. [Laughter.]

Mr. Shearman—That is very ingenious, only unfortunately it is not intelligible.

Mr. Fullerton—I hope your Honor will forgive Brother Shearman; he is a little nervous, and he cannot help it.

Mr. Shearman—No; I have seen this thing practiced on two clergymen, and quite as long as I intend to see it practiced at all.

Mr. Morris—Judge Fullerton, won't you apologise to him, and let us go on?

Judge Neilson—I think I should have hesitated over the question as the witness did.

FINAL DISPOSITION OF THE WEST CHARGES.

Judge Neilson—What became of that paper you mean? Where did the paper go to, or what was done with it?

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly; it might mean that, and that is just what it does mean.

Mr. Shearman—That is just what Mr. Fullerton instructed the witness he did not mean, and it left the question utterly unintelligible.

Judge Neilson—The words "What became of this, then?" are understood to mean "What was done with them, and where are and where were they put and kept?"

The Witness—I cannot state positively, but I am rather inclined to think that they are in a bundle of documents at my house, though I won't be certain if I transferred them to the gentleman who was elected clerk when I ceased to act. There was no clerk, and I was made clerk pro tem, and when another gentleman was elected, I either handed the papers to him, I think, or else they are in my possession at home.

Q. Well, now, look at the paper which I now show you, and say what it is? A. This is, in part, at least, Sir, a copy of Mr. West's charges, I think; I am sure they are not the original; they may be an exact copy, and I suppose they are.

Q. Look at the letter accompanying them, and say what that is? A. It seems to be a notice of the clerk—of the gentleman who was then clerk of the Committee to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Serving a copy of the charges upon him; isn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And do you say that those are not the charges? A. I did not—I said it was not the original paper. I said it was a copy of them. I suppose it is an exact copy.

Q. Of the original charges? A. Yes; the charges on the original paper.

Q. Well, the original paper—

Mr. Shearman—These are not the original; that is an explanation.

The Witness—That is not, I think, the original—I think it is the clerk, Mr. Tallmadge's writing; don't think it is Mr. West's; that answers—

Q. Now, is not that in the handwriting of the clerk of Plymouth Church? A. I think it is, Sir, as I said.

Mr. Shearman—Not the clerk? A. Not the clerk of the church; the clerk of the Examining Committee; I beg your pardon, Sir.

Q. All right, the Examining Committee; and you say it is a copy of the charges as originally presented, do you? A. No, Sir; I don't, Sir. I said it was a copy of the original paper, I supposed.

Q. Well, of the original paper? A. The paper as Mr. West presented it.

Q. Very well; now we have got to the point where you can point out the imperfections in it, then? A. No, Sir; I cannot, because the paper, as Mr. West presented it, is not here; the printed matter is not here.

Q. But you tell me that that is a copy of the original paper which Mr. West presented? A. I will read it, Sir; but I think that the printed matter would take more than the space of that whole piece put in, and so it cannot be here.

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday, it is either a copy or not a copy of the original paper as presented by Mr. West. Say which it is? A. I cannot tell from reading it, Sir, whether it is or not; I can only tell by looking at the original paper whether it is a copy of it.

Mr. Shearman—If you will allow me to say one word; you are spending a great deal of time, and the witness is answering directly the question, and Judge Fullerton—if he will permit me—did not precisely see the distinction. This is not a copy of the original paper presented by Mr. West, but is of course a copy of an original paper—that is, of the original of this copy—but these are not the original charges of Mr. West, nor a copy of the original charges of Mr. West, and therefore my friend Judge Fullerton and the witness are answering at cross purposes; that is all the difficulty.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no difficulty about it at all. Your Honor will recollect that Mr. West presented charges which were thought to be insufficient, and they were referred back for emendation. He afterwards did serve or hand to the Committee, and the Committee received them, charges amended, to which was added the third specification. Those charges were served upon Mr. Tilton for the purpose of subjecting him to the jurisdiction of that tribunal, and they are presented here, put in evidence, and are an exhibit in the case.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, they are the charges finally agreed upon, or as finally made out by Mr. West and accepted by that Committee, and served upon Mr. Tilton. Now, I do not care anything about any charges that were preferred to the Committee before that.

Mr. Shearman—Then make the witness understand that. I certainly did not understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—I have labored to make him understand it, and it is not my fault if he does not. [To the witness.] I ask you the question now, whether that is not a copy of the charges as finally made by Mr. West with the third specification added? A. I have only to answer again, Judge Fullerton, that I cannot remember, and cannot state, unless I am permitted to compare with the document as it is on the record, or in the original paper which I hold, I think.

Q. Was not the clerk of your Committee instructed to serve a copy on Mr. Tilton? A. I think he was.

Q. Don't you know it? A. I am certain he was, and he is the only gentleman in my judgment who can swear that is an exact copy.

Q. Very well; I ask you this question now, without referring to any other paper that went before the Committee. Will you point out there what you regard as imperfections in those charges and specifications, and give to the jury a reason why he should not be tried upon that paper as it is?

Mr. Shearman—Allow me to state, that is assuming that the witness has said that there were defects in those specifications, a fact that he has never said. He said to Mr. West that there were defects in his proceedings.

Mr. Beach—Oh!

Mr. Fullerton—That is not ingenious, even.

Mr. Beach—Now, we have had quite enough instruction from Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—I don't propose to allow a trap to be laid for the witness, assuming that he has made an answer that he never made. It is a very ingenious mode of cross-examination, but it is not law.

Mr. Beach—It is not half as ingenious, Sir, as it is to instruct the witness on the stand.

Mr. Shearman—I accept the tribute of my learned friend.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, you deserve it. [Laughter.]

The Witness—I ought to state to the Court that I have not—I am not certain that I have conveyed in the answers that I have given the impressions, or at least the facts that I meant to state. In proceedings of this kind, there must not only be specifications, but the witnesses to each specification must be given at the same time and in connection with the same paper; that is, whatever is evidence; and then it must be certified, if there be printed matter, that it has been properly identified, that the witnesses have been seen, and that they will appear to testify in regard to the points referred to there. I meant to say that I did object to Mr. West's proceedings, because he had not done anything of that kind. He had not seen the witnesses, he had proof from printed newspaper, and he never had verified the testimony in any way. He never had gone to see the individuals, against which is one of the rules of the church; he never had gone personally to see either of the gentlemen against whom he preferred charges; and it was on these grounds that I demurred.

Mr. Fullerton—Didn't you, a moment ago, say that your objections were founded upon the fact that the charges were imperfect? A. Well, Sir, I meant the whole paper.

Q. Oh, you meant the whole paper? A. Yes, Sir, I did; certainly.

Judge Neilson—A charge would be imperfect if it did not have appended to it the name of the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Look, if you please, to the third specification and see if the name of the witness is not there. Will you be kind enough to turn? A. Will Judge Fullerton let me say that the paper as it came before the Committee had charges against two persons in it, and that original paper—

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday—

Judge Neilson—I think that is proper as an explanation.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, what explanation is it in regard to this paper? This eternal reference to the original paper before the Committee has nothing to do with this case. It was thrown back upon Mr. West's hands, and he amended it and put it before the Committee, and there it is as perfected. Now, he tells us that he advised Mr. West time and again not to prosecute those charges, because he thought that they were imperfect. Now, I ask him to point out the imperfections there. Well, one imperfection is, as he said, that the name of the witness was not stated. I ask him to turn to the third specification of that paper, no other paper, and tell me whether the name of the witness is not stated there?

Mr. Shearman—Now, if your Honor please, the witness has never been asked yet, whether after the presentation of those charges in this final form, he made these charges to Mr. West. He has been asked only the general question whether after Mr. West once presented charges, he opposed their prosecution, and upon what ground. He states that he did oppose, and that he told Mr. West that it was because he had proceeded irregularly, and because his charges were not in proper form.

Judge Neilson—That they were in printed matter, and he had not been to see the witnesses.

Mr. Shearman—Exactly; and that was before they were perfected; and the attempt is made to make the jury believe that it was after the charges were perfected, and when the objections had been taken so far as the form was concerned—that they had been put in proper form. Now, it is sought, by asking that general question, having no reference to that, to make the jury believe that the charges were in proper form, and that he objected to Mr. West, that they were not in proper form. I submit that won't do.

Mr. Fullerton—The question I put to Mr. Halliday was this: After these charges were finally amended, and the third specification was added, did you advise not to prosecute those charges?

Mr. Shearman—That is a fair question.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the question I did put, and it is the question that the witness has not answered.

Mr. Shearman—No.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Halliday, that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Halliday.

The Witness—Excuse me, you were addressing the Judge, and not me, and I didn't understand.

Judge Neilson—Repeat the question, please.

Mr. Fullerton—After the charges of Mr. West were finally amended as they appear now in your hands, did you advise Mr. West not to prosecute them? A. In reference to Mr. Tilton I think I never did anything but urge that Mr. Tilton's name should be dropped from the roll of the church, from the beginning to the end.

Q. Now, Mr. Halliday, please answer my question. Answer my question, please. A. That is the only thing that I remember ever doing in regard to the charges, so far as they pertain to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Then after these charges were made as they now appear in the paper that you hold in your hand, you did not advise Mr. West not to prosecute them against Mr. Tilton? A. I never pursued any other course than that.

Q. You did not advise Mr. West not to prosecute them, did you? A. I don't think I advised him personally at all, Sir.

Q. Did you advise him not to prosecute them? A. I don't think I did.

Q. Well, do you know whether you did? A. I am not positive. I urged the Board—the Examining Committee—

Q. Never mind the Board. I am not talking about the Board.

Mr. Shearman—You asked him what he said to Mr. West.

MR. HALLIDAY'S ACTION WITH REFERENCE TO THE CHARGES.

Mr. Fullerton—I beg of you—[To the witness.] After the charges were preferred by Mr. West, and the 3d specification added, did you or did you not advise Mr. West not to prosecute them? A. I don't think I ever gave him any advice in regard to it at all.

Q. Then you did not advise him not to prosecute them? A. I don't think I did.

Q. Are you sure upon that subject? A. I feel very confident.

Q. Will you swear positively? A. To the best of my recollection I did not give him any such advice.

Q. Will you swear positively? A. No, Sir, I won't.

Q. Very well. A. That is as positive as I will swear. The best of my recollection is that I gave him no such advice.

Q. Did you advise the Examining Committee that it was not best to prosecute them? A. I did.

Q. More than once? A. I did, all the way through, from the beginning to the end.

Q. Not to prosecute the West charges as finally amended? A. Not to prosecute Mr. Tilton. I advised invariably his being dropped from the roll of the church, according to its rules.

Q. One moment; did you advise after the perfection of these charges, and the adding of the 3d specification— A. I did all the way through, from the beginning to the end.

Q. Yes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well, that is an answer. Did you give that advice because of any imperfection in the charges? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was not that? A. No, Sir.

Q. The charges you thought were sufficient, if a trial was to be had at all? A. I didn't think anything about it, so far as that was concerned. Mr. Tilton declared he was not a member of the church, and for years, I think ten years, I never saw him but once in the church, and for that reason I thought he ought to be dropped from the roll of the church, according to the provisions which the church has for such an occasion. I thought it was a mean thing to prosecute him—a mean thing.

Q. When did you commence your connection with the church, Sir? A. What did you say, Sir?

Q. When did you commence your connection with the church? A. I think it is some 10 or 11 years, Sir, and in all the 10 years I was there I never saw Mr. Tilton in church but once.

Q. Well, you had not been there 10 years, then, I take it? A. I had, Sir, about.

Q. About. What year was it? A. Oh! I attended church there, Sir, before I united with the church.

Q. Now, did you have any controversy with any member of the Examining Committee about the prosecution of the West charges? A. With two or three exceptions, I differed from the whole of them in regard to the treatment of Mr. Tilton.

Q. Did you have any controversy with them? A. No controversy with any individuals; my controversy was with the course which they proposed to adopt.

Q. Some of them wanted to prosecute the charges, didn't they? A. They did, Sir.

Q. Now, who wanted to prosecute the charges? A. I can't tell you.

Q. Can't you tell one? A. Most of them were in favor of it first, but finally they did just what I wanted them to do in the beginning—drop his name from the roll of the church.

Q. Name them, please? A. I think Capt. Duncan, for one, was decidedly—

Q. Very well, now, let me ask you this question. A. Did you not in that controversy or discussion growing out of that charge, at some time or other say to Capt. Duncan in substance, in order to prevail upon him not to advocate the prosecution of the charges, that it was Mr. Beecher's request that they should not be prosecuted? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you say that to him in substance? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, name another, if you please? A. What, Sir?

Q. Another person. A. Dr. White.

Q. Did you say that in substance to Dr. White? A. What?

Q. That it was Mr. Beecher's request that the charges should not be prosecuted. A. I never said it to any one.

Q. Well, just confine it to him. A. I never said it to Dr. White, if that is the answer you want.

Q. Now, will you name another member of that Committee? A. I think Mr. Manchester; I think he had the same view.

Q. Did you say it in substance to him? A. Never.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor to any other member of the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. When was the last time that this subject was up for controversy before the Committee? A. I can't tell you.

Q. About what time? A. I can't tell you.

Q. How? A. I can't tell you. If you will ask me that question to-morrow when I have the minutes here, I can tell you by reference to them, as I kept very full minutes.

Q. Can't you give me some idea? A. I can not Sir.

Q. How late was it in the year? A. How late was what, Sir?

Q. The controversy upon the prosecution of the charges? A. The final conclusion of this whole affair of the scandal, I think, was early in October.

Q. Of what year? A. Of the same year; 1873.

Q. Did you ever ask Mr. West to withdraw his charges? A. I have no recollection of any such thing at all, Sir. I tried to get Mr. West to perfect—to do what he did do properly—and he never did it.

Q. He never did it? A. No, Sir; he never did it.

Q. What did you try to get him to do? A. I tried to get him, in the first place, to go and see the gentlemen against whom he made complaint, as a Christian man ought to do, and as is the rule in our church, but he never did it.

Q. Do you know he did not do it? A. I do know he did not, from his own confession. I do know that he never went to see the witnesses, to see if they would come, or else he told a story. He never went to see the witnesses, to see if they would come to testify.

Q. Did he tell you that he did not see— A. He did.

Q. That he did not see Mrs. Bradshaw? A. No, Sir.

Q. Why did you say a moment ago that he never went to see the witnesses? A. There were some that he did not go to see.

Q. Some that he did not; what one didn't he see? A. He never went to see— You remember that my talk is in regard to the other part of his paper, not in regard to the paper as to Mr. Tilton, for I would not argue with him in regard to that.

Q. Why not? A. Because of the course that I wanted adopted. I had that one course that I thought was a right one, and that was to drop Mr. Tilton; and I would have no controversy about any other means with our members.

Q. But he did mention the name of Mrs. Bradshaw in connection with the charges against Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; but I am not sure now whether these witnesses, any of them that he failed to see, were the witnesses against Mr. Tilton.

Q. Did he tell you that he had not seen Mrs. Bradshaw? A. He did not.

Q. You don't know, then, but what he did? A. I can tell you what witnesses he said he did not.

Q. No, that is not the question. You don't know but what he saw Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I think it is very probable he did.

Q. Then, so far as the charge against Mrs. Tilton was concerned, to be proved by Mrs. Bradshaw, he had done all he could do, had he not? A. I don't remember definitely now.

Q. If he had seen Mrs. Bradshaw then he had done all that he could do, or all that you could require him? A. I don't know—

Q. One moment—all that you could require of him to do in respect to that charge and that witness, hadn't he? A. I suppose he had.

Q. Was there any difficulty in going on then and trying Mr. Tilton so far as that charge and that witness was concerned? A. Well, he had never taken the first step.

Q. No, if you please Mr. — A. Well, that is—

Q. Was there any difficulty in going on and prosecuting the charge against Mr. Tilton, so far as the witness, Mrs. Bradshaw, was concerned?

ANOTHER DEFENSE OF THE WITNESS.

Mr. Shearman—Now, one moment. Counsel interrupted the witness when he was going to make an answer and the learned gentleman is going deep into ecclesiastical law; at the same time he does not understand the law of Congregational bodies.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, I don't want to.

Mr. Shearman—Now, the witness has a right to answer, and undoubtedly was going to make a proper answer. There is a great deal more to be done than to see a witness, before, under an ecclesiastical law, a charge can be prosecuted.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, I object.

Mr. Shearman—I am not going to say what it is. I am not going to say what the witness was going to say, for I don't know how he was going to answer.

Mr. Beach—But you are going to tell him what he ought to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. Shearman—No, I am not going to tell him. The gentleman is a prophet, but this time he is a false prophet. I was not going to tell him.

Judge Neilson—Let us hear your objection.

Mr. Shearman—My objection is this, that the witness was going to answer a proper question in a proper way, and immediately the gentleman, as is very much his habit, interrupts him and does not want an answer to his own question, because the witness was not going to answer it, as he thought, in a way that he wanted him to. Now, I can see that the idea in Judge Fullerton's mind is that there is only one ground of proceeding—

Mr. Beach—I object to this. It is not admissible for the counsel, when the witness is under cross-examination, to enter upon an argument of that kind and instruct the witness.

Mr. Shearman—The witness knows more about it than I do.

Mr. Beach—Not in your opinion.

Judge Neilson—The substance of it is that he thinks the witness answered the question.

Mr. Fullerton—He did not answer, and did not commence to answer it.

Judge Neilson—Well, you repeat it then. He thinks you ought to have taken the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—I am quite aware that Mr. Shearman thinks that, but if your Honor will recollect what the witness said, it was not in response to my question at all.

Judge Neilson—You had a right to stop him if it was not in response.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—How can the gentleman tell when he does not hear his answer. The witness says: "I," and—

Mr. Beach—How can the gentleman tell what the witness was going to say if he had not heard him?

Mr. Shearman—I say it is a presumption that a witness on the stand, who is attending to his business and his duty, is trying to make a proper answer.

Judge Neilson—Yes, there is no doubt about that; no one denies that.

THE TESTIMONY RESUMED.

Mr. Fullerton—Was there any difficulty in the prosecution of the charge against Mr. Tilton, so far as Mrs. Bradshaw was the witness to sustain it? A. I cannot swear from my own knowledge that there was.

Q. Did you know of any at the time? A. I don't know that I can give you any better answer than I have.

Q. I am satisfied with it. Did you state any to Mr. West? A. I don't remember what I did state to him.

Q. Now, do you know that he had not talked to Andrew Bradshaw, so far as the second specification is concerned? A. No, Sir; I don't know that he had not.

Q. Do you know that he had not talked to the Rev. E. L. L. Taylor, D. D., as to the charge in the first specification? A. I do not.

Q. Then, these being the names of all the witnesses to all the specifications, how was it that you were enabled to say that he had not seen the witness upon the subject, as he had been directed, or as it was his duty to do? A. I think I said that in regard to the specifications against Mr. Tilton, that I could not remember that I had ever given him any advice, or that I had ever—I meant to say that I had ever urged him not to prosecute them on the ground of their imperfection, or anything of the kind. In talking with him about Mr. Tilton, I took but the one point, and was always urging that, that instead of being prosecuted, he should be dropped from the roll of the church, as he desired himself, as I understood it, and as he had declared, and as I had seen in writing—his own handwriting, that he did not regard himself as a member of the church; that he had—in language—I cannot give his very words, but that he had cut himself off from the church.

Q. And that is the only reason that you advised them— A. So far as Mr. Tilton was concerned.

Q. That this persecution should not go on? A. So far as Mr. Tilton was concerned.

Q. I am talking about Mr. Tilton, and nobody else. There is nobody named but Mr. Tilton in these charges. A. In that paper, and any paper that I have—

Q. I am talking about this paper? A. I was talking about another, as well as this.

A DAY OF BATTLE ENDS IN SKIRMISHING.

Mr. Shearman—One moment. I object to this mode of examination, because Judge Fullerton is again assuming and putting a question which requires Mr. Halliday to answer out of his conscience concerning all his conversations with Mr. West. He is again assuming that he had conversations with him after these specifications were finally presented and about them. Now, that Mr. Halliday has expressly stated he did not have.

Mr. Beach—Oh! you are mistaken.

Mr. Shearman—I say he did say that.

Mr. Beach—Oh! you are in error,

Mr. Fullerton—I think my brother Shearman is not in his right mind [laughter], because there is no such thing before the Court at all. My question to this witness is this, whether he advised Mr. West not to prosecute these charges which I hold in my hand, and which I put in the hands of the witness, after the charges were perfected.

Mr. Shearman—Now, the gentleman is going on to a series of questions, assuming that he did advise him about it. The witness has said that after those perfected charges were put in he did not give Mr. West any advice that he recollects.

Judge Neilson—And that he did not advise not to prosecute.

Mr. Shearman—Not after these perfected charges.

Mr. Beach—Why, certainly.

Mr. Shearman—No.

Mr. Morris—He says, the reason that he gave was that Mr. West had not done his duty in seeing the witnesses in reference to these very charges. That is what he said, that he had not seen the witnesses, and had not performed the duty enjoined upon him in the Scriptures, as he said.

Mr. Shearman—The gentleman says that is going into a farce. The farce is that the counsel is endeavoring to entrap the witness, by assuming over and over again that he has said that he has done that which he distinctly swears he never did, and who, after he has testified that he once gave advice to Mr. West, which advice, as he now distinctly says, dated prior to the perfection of these charges, is asked a question concerning the advice which he gave—and he cannot deny that he gave some—and then he is required to say—to explain that he advised with reference to these perfected charges, concerning which he has stated that he never did advise. Now, the fact is that Mr. Halliday has stated that he gave some advice with reference to the charges which preceded these.

Judge Neilson—I understand the witness perfectly.

Mr. Shearman—I see your Honor does.

Judge Neilson—The preceding charges, when first seen by him, were in print, but he had not then conformed to what the witness thought to be the Scriptural injunction, and had not seen the party to admonish him, confer with him, and had not seen the witnesses.

Mr. Shearman—And all that relates to other charges than these.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, your Honor will bear me witness that I repeatedly and distinctly intimated and informed this witness that my questions were directed toward the charges as perfected.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I have labored to produce that effect, and I have no doubt that I have succeeded.

Judge Neilson—Then I understand the witness further to say that as to these charges he gave Mr. West no advice about it.

Mr. Shearman—That is it.

Judge Neilson—But that his advice at large, from the commencement to the end, was that the charges should not be prosecuted, but his name dropped.

Mr. Shearman—Exactly.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I have proved by him that he did advise the Committee not to prosecute these charges as perfected, and I asked him the reason why he gave such advice, if it was in consequence of any imperfection in the charges.

Mr. Shearman—And he said no.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, if you please. Why this will be a tragedy if Brother Shearman don't cool his nerves. [Laughter.] He ought to know by this time that two men cannot talk at the same time, and be understood intelligibly by your Honor. I propose, Sir, to continue this line of examination, and I am going to know before I get through, unless your Honor restrains me, and I shall be restrained, if your Honor desires it—I am going to know what advice this gentleman gave the Examining Committee and to Mr. West in regard to the perfected charges, and Mr. Halliday can fly back with the aid of Mr. Shearman as often as he pleases to the original charges. I care nothing about them, but I am going to have a distinct and satisfactory answer, exactly what course was taken with regard to these charges where the witnesses were named, and the specifications properly drawn up and submitted, subjecting this man to trial any moment they saw fit to try him, and when he was clamoring for trial, and waiving the fact that he had not been in attendance upon that church, so as to give him the right. [Applause.]

Mr. Shearman—That clamoring—

Judge Nelson—One moment. Now, I have no doubt that it is the right of counsel to interrogate the witness; and I have no doubt that Mr. Halliday, on reflection, to-morrow can give you such an answer as will be satisfactory, especially when he brings his papers with him.

The Witness—I would like to ask the Court if the Court has any impression that I have been unwilling to state anything here this afternoon. [Laughter.]

Judge Nelson—No, not at all. To-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, gentlemen.

The Court then adjourned till 11 o'clock on Friday.

FORTY-EIGHTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

BESSIE TURNER A WITNESS.

CONCLUSION OF THE REV. MR. HALLIDAY'S TESTIMONY—A STRONG EFFORT TO PROVE MRS. BRADSHAW'S REMARKS ABOUT THE WEST CHARGES—MR. TILTON'S UNKINDNESS TO HIS WIFE TESTIFIED TO BY MISS TURNER—THE ALLEGED ECKENTRICITIES OF THE PLAINTIFF VIGOROUSLY DEPICTED—THE ATTEMPTS UPON MISS TURNER'S VIRTUE NARRATED.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1875.

The cross-examination of Mr. Halliday was resumed at the opening of the court. The plaintiff's counsel began with a strong effort to bring out what Mrs. Bradshaw had said to the witness in reference to the prosecution of the West charges. The defense objected to this as evidence of conversations between persons not parties to the case. Mr. Beach replied that they had a right to bring out the motives under which the witness had acted, to contradict some part of his testimony. Judge Nelson ruled that they could only show as much of the conversation as was reported to the Examining Committee. Under this ruling Mr. Halliday testified that Mrs. Bradshaw stated to him that Mrs. Tilton asked her not to be a witness against her husband, saying, "Mattie, how can you appear against me?" Mr. Halliday was then called upon for his past life and history, and gave a full account of the various societies with which he had been connected. In answer to the question, "Have you ever had any connection with the Juvenile Guardian Society?" the witness answered, "No, I hope not; it is one of the greatest humbugs that ever existed," and the witness gave his views in very decided language about the Society and its officers. This terminated his examination, the hour being 12:30 p. m.

After a few moments' pause Mr. Shearman arose and called Elizabeth A. Turner, better known as "Bessie" Turner. The silence of the court-room was broken by a murmur of expectancy on the part of the spectators, who strained forward to get a view of the witness, as she arose from her seat beside Mrs. Tilton, and made her way slowly to the witness chair. Judge Nelson rebuked the spectators, and offered the suggestion that "during this lady's testimony I think the reporters would better keep their eyes on their paper." He addressed no suggestions, however, to the occupants of the gallery, among whom there was a general resumption of the eye-glasses and spectacles laid aside during Mr. Halliday's examination. Miss Turner, on taking the witness chair, appeared at ease and free from all embarrassment. She was examined by Judge Porter, whose pleasant manner of questioning seemed well calculated to relieve her from all constraint. Her testimony began with an account of what she had seen of Mr. Tilton's treatment of his wife and of Mrs. Tilton's bearing toward her husband. This covered the period between 1864, when she first went to live with the Tilton family, and 1874, when she ceased to live with them. Mr. Tilton's "moods," as the witness termed them, were very fully described. He was often sullen and disagreeable, and at such times spoke unkindly to his wife. On one occasion, at the table, when one of the children had refused to eat meat, he had said it was "all her mother's d-d orthodoxy," and at a woman's-rights meeting held at Mr. Tilton's house Miss Turner heard him say to his wife, "Elizabeth, stand aside. Don't keep near me. I do not wish comparisons to be made." The witness also described at length Mr. Tilton's peculiarities. Among others he was in the habit of going about the house at night dressed in his night clothes. In this garb he used to take pleasure in hanging and re-hanging the pictures on the walls. He used also to go from one bedroom to another, trying the different beds to find the softest, and on one of these occasions he appeared at her room, accompanied by Mrs. Tilton bearing a pillow, and took possession of her bed, the witness going to another room.

Thus far the examination had proceeded very smoothly, with scarcely an interruption by the objections of Mr. Tilton's counsel, though punctuated occasionally by the irrepressible laughter of the audience, the plaintiff seeming quite as much amused at the recital of his alleged eccentricities as were the other spectators. But objections were now raised to several of Mr. Porter's questions, which the plaintiff's side declared could not be answered without the witness giving her opinion. Mr. Porter was very ready in his replies, and cited authorities for many of his points. Miss Turner was finally permitted to answer, and testified that she had heard Mr. Tilton swear at his wife, and had known him to lock himself up in a room with her, and scold and swear for several hours at a time. Regarding Mr. Beecher's visits to the house, she said that he called to see the family occasionally, and was treated by Mrs. Tilton in the same manner in which she treated her other friends. Miss Turner never saw any impropriety between Mrs. Tilton and her pastor.

Miss Turner then related Mr. Tilton's alleged attempts upon her own virtue. She testified that in 1867 Mr. Tilton came into her bedroom, saying that he came to bid her good night, and then attempted some familiarities, which she resented. He at the time justified his treatment by saying that such actions were common in the best society. Mr. Tilton then lay down beside her, and inquired whether she would not like to be married, to which question she replied that she "would never marry a literary man any way." He also asked her if she knew anything about affinities, and after some further conversation on like subjects left her. Miss Turner also testified that on another occasion in 1868 she awoke suddenly one night and found herself in Mr. Tilton's room instead of her own. She was very much bewildered, and asked him what he was doing. He replied that he felt lonely and wanted some one to love him. She left the room at once. Miss Turner then told of the dinner at Mr. Tilton's, when Miss Ellen Dennis was present, and Mrs. Tilton cried and was obliged to leave the table. Mr. Tilton said: "Bessie, don't you think my wife is crazy; don't you think Elisabeth is demented?" The witness replied, "No, I do not; but I think it is a wonder you have not driven her into an asylum long ago." Mr. Tilton then went after his wife and the witness followed him and heard him say, shaking his fist over her, "You have brought that girl to this house to use against me, and, d—n it, she shall leave!" The witness declared that she would stand by Mrs. Tilton, and thereupon Mr. Tilton struck her and knocked her across the room, and then said, innocently, "Why, Bessie, how could you trip so." Miss Turner's emphasis, and the spirited way in which she gave the conversational part of this scene, called forth repeated applause from the spectators. Judge Neilson declared that he would have order, and rebuked the court officers for not preserving it. Miss Turner next told of the charges of adultery which Mr. Tilton had made to her against his wife. She also depicted Mrs. Morse in the following conversation, which she heard: "Good morning, grandma," said Mr. Tilton on one occasion to that lady. "I'll grandma you, you miserable wretch, you infernal scoundrel. I will publish you from Dan to Beersheba," was the reply of that lady, accompanied by other remarks of a similar import.

At about 3:30 o'clock, Miss Turner complained of illness, but hearing from Mr. Porter that her examination was nearly ended, continued her testimony, telling what she heard and saw at the time of Mrs. Tilton's alleged confession and retraction. She was obliged to stop, however, before 4 o'clock, and the Court adjourned until Monday, when her direct examination will end and the cross-examination begin.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. HALLIDAY'S CROSS-EXAMINATION RESUMED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Shearman—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Are you ready for Mr. Halliday?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, will you take the stand.

Samuel B. Halliday recalled and cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday, I place in your hands again the West charges as perfected, with the addition of specification 24, and I ask you now whether, after those charges were in the shape in which you now find them, you gave any advice to the Examining Committee in reference to their prosecution? A. I never saw them in this shape, Sir.

Q. That is not the question which I ask you, and I beg you to answer the question which I put to you?

JUDGE NELSON TIRED OF THE BICKERING OF COUNSEL.

Mr. Shearman—I object again.

Judge Nelson—Well, we will proceed without this objecting.

Mr. Shearman—But it is very unfair—

Judge Nelson—Perhaps it is. Sit down, Mr. Shearman. I am inclined to think that is a fair answer, at any rate it is an answer that any layman might well make. Now, we will proceed. I don't propose to have any talks or interruptions. Modify your questions a little, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—I beg your Honor's pardon; how can I modify it? I didn't ask whether he saw the charges.

Judge Nelson—I understand.

Mr. Fullerton—It is no answer to my question.

Judge Nelson—Exactly, but he might well answer as he did, I think.

THE COMMITTEE AND THE WEST CHARGES.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I ask you again, whether, after those charges were perfected and in the shape in which you now find them, you gave any advice to the Examining Committee in reference to their prosecution?

Mr. Shearman—I object to the question. It has been once answered.

Judge Nelson—It is allowed. I will have no discussion about these little things. [To the witness.] Answer the best way you can.

The Witness—I regard it as a double question, and I cannot answer it otherwise.

Judge Nelson—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, give us a double answer then.

The Witness—In the first place, I do not regard this at all as thus perfected—as perfected. I never saw it in this shape.

Judge Nelson—Well!

The Witness—But I am confident—with regard to the other part of it, what I did, whether I gave—

Judge Nelson—Whether you gave any advice.

The Witness—No, I never gave any advice about anything that I knew nothing about.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you give any advice to the Examining Committee after October 16, which appears to be the date of the letter of the Clerk serving a copy of the specifications? A. I cannot remember what I did, unless you will allow me to refer to the minutes.

Q. Certainly; any minutes you have you can refer to. A. I haven't them here to refer to of that date. I have got the minutes that I said I would bring yesterday.

Q. Were you not directed to serve a copy of these charges yourself, as now perfected? A. No, Sir.

Q. You are quite sure of that? A. I am.

Q. Did you go on to New-Haven upon any business? A. I did.

Q. With reference to these charges? A. I did.

Q. Before going to New-Haven didn't you receive instructions from the Committee to serve a copy of the charges that were then in existence? A. I did.

Q. Did you serve a copy? A. I did not before I went.

Q. Did you at all? A. I did not.

Judge Nelson—That is, you did not serve them? A. I did not.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you cause them to be served? A. I was directed not to serve them.

Q. By whom? A. By the Committee.

Q. What member of the Committee gave you those instructions? A. The Committee itself.

Q. Was it after you came back from New-Haven? A. It was.

Q. At what meeting of the Committee were those instructions given? A. I cannot answer unless you let me refer to the minutes.

Q. You may refer to any minutes. A. [Referring to the minutes.] Excuse me for not being able to turn to them immediately, for I have not had time to—it was at a meeting held, Sir, July 14th, 1873.

Q. Yes, Sir. Can you state who were present at that meeting? A. Belcher, Ropes, Brush, Duncan, White, Moody, Day, Morton, Tilney, Manchester, Hawkins, Garbut, Halliday; Deaconesses Pratt and Halliday.

Q. Did you state to any person at that meeting, or to the body assembled, that it was the wish of Mr. Beecher that the charges should not be prosecuted? A. I did not.

Q. Did you state anything in substance like that? A. I did not.

Q. Did you know that Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw were relied upon as witnesses to prove one of the charges against Mr. Tilton? A. I cannot speak from my recollection; my impression is that I did, decidedly.

Q. Well, did you ever have a talk with Mrs. Bradshaw upon the subject of her testimony, or going before the Committee as a witness? A. I did not; she did with me.

Q. You did not talk with her, then? A. I did not.

Q. You said nothing to her upon the subject, as I understand you? A. No, Sir, I simply listened to her, and made no reply to what she said.

Q. Where did that conversation take place? A. In my parlor.

Q. Did she say anything about appearing before the Committee? A. She did.

Q. What did she tell you upon that subject? A. I don't think I can give you her language, exactly.

THE CONVERSATION WITH MRS. BRADSHAW OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Shearman—One moment.

Mr. Evans—The conversation between this gentleman and Mrs. Bradshaw, at which Mr. Beecher was not present, is not evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to follow it up by showing, if I can, what he communicated to the Committee, after it assembled, immediately succeeding that conversation.

Judge Neilson—If you have the fact that it was understood that Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw were to be witnesses, does not that cover the ground?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; it does not.

Judge Neilson—I don't see how you are helped by anything that Mrs. Bradshaw might have said, on that occasion, beyond that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, whatever Mrs. Bradshaw said to the witness, if he communicated it to the Committee, would become evidence in this case.

Judge Neilson—Do you expect to connect the Committee with it?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Well, but, your Honor, haven't we had a uniform ruling, that as the principal rule of evidence has excluded conversations between third parties, that a connection should be first shown; and it is not to show, whenever they have a witness that will show it—whatever was said to the Committee, provided it comes in as a part of the transaction of the Committee that is properly in evidence, will then appear; and as the whole significance is in what was said by Mrs. Bradshaw to this gentleman, and what was said by him or any one else to the Committee, that is the subject of evidence, and not the conversation between Mrs. Bradshaw and him. And we have repeatedly had occasion to consider that point, and your Honor has ruled, certainly, in answer to our offers of any similar evidence, that it should not be given. Take Mr. Schultz's case. Your Honor remembers all that—that he was not allowed to give what passed between him and Mr. Carpenter, although he was going to connect it with what he said to Mr. Tilton. The answer was, "Very well; say what you said to Mr. Tilton; that is all there is of Carpenter's that rightly comes in."

Judge Neilson—Stating what I have ruled, I think it would be naturally in your mind that I applied that rule at your instance very frequently in the early stages of the case.

Mr. Evarts—I did not intend to be understood otherwise, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—You stated it as if it was a late instance. I think I won't take Mrs. Bradshaw's conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—Will your Honor hear me one moment, and see what connection it has with this case?

Judge Neilson—Well.

ARGUMENT OF MR. FULLERTON.

Mr. Fullerton—This witness is put upon the stand for the purpose of showing that the action of Plymouth Church, through its organized committees, was entirely independent of the pastor; that he had no connection with that action. Now, I propose to show that after those charges were made by Mr. West—perfected as they are now, as they appear before the Court here, in evidence—that Mr. Halliday, the witness on the stand, stated in substance to the Committee, as a reason why the prosecution should not be enforced, that Mrs. Bradshaw would not appear before the Committee; and that that was in reply to a statement of an assertion between members of the Committee that there were two good witnesses to prove the truth of the charges contained in the specifications against Mr. Tilton, naming Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw; and that the Committee were deterred, as I have observed, from prosecuting those charges from information given to them by Mr. Halliday that Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw, or Mrs. Bradshaw, would not appear before the Committee; and I propose to show that what Mr. Halliday said and did in reference to the prosecution of those charges, was at the suggestion and instigation of Mr. Beecher himself; that he was his mouthpiece.

Judge Neilson—As to that part of it there has been no objection.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; there has been no objection; but I stated that fact to show what my object is in introducing this evidence. I want to show that this witness had a conversation with a witness to be produced for the purpose of proving the charges against Mr. Tilton, and knew what that evidence was that he produced, and yet the charges were not prosecuted.

Judge Neilson—I don't think the conversation of Mrs. Bradshaw is necessary for that purpose. We cannot take her conversation.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you say to the Committee, at any time, that Mrs. Bradshaw had told you that she would not appear before the Committee?

Mr. Shearman—One moment. To that, your Honor, we object. Mr. Beecher is not yet connected with this in any way, and this relates to meetings concerning which no inquiry has been made certainly on our side. Now, the only meeting that we did make an inquiry into, was the meeting that was referred to on the other side, and with which it was attempted to connect Mr. Beecher. All that we have done has been to disconnect Mr. Beecher; and we have gone no further; and that was the meeting of October 30th, 1872. Now, these are inquiries, without relating to meetings taking place in 1873, Mr. Beecher is in no mode connected with them.

Judge Neilson—My impression is that, having let you show what occurred at a meeting, although Mr. Beecher was not there, and, what was very important, Mr. Tilton was not there, yet I allowed it as a part of the official action, determining not to proceed in the matter, he has a right to refer to any subsequent meeting of the same body, and to anything that occurs there in respect to the same matter. The objection is overruled. Go on, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, will you answer the question?

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, this witness, I understand, has testified—

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Oh, I thought you had decided against us.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I misunderstood your Honor's ruling, Sir.

TWISTING TO GET THE CONVERSATION.

Mr. Fullerton—Will you answer the question ?

A. Was the question asked as to whether I stated to the Committee at any time that Mrs. Bradshaw said that she would not appear as a witness?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I repeated Mrs. Bradshaw's own words to them; if I may state what they were?

Q. Well, won't you state in reply to my question, whether you said that? A. I don't remember that I did anything, except simply to repeat what Mrs. Bradshaw said to me.

Q. Well, I am not at liberty to show what Mrs. Bradshaw said to you by the ruling of the Court. Now, I ask you what you told the Committee. Did you tell the Committee in substance that Mrs. Bradshaw told you she would not appear? A. I did, I think I did; I am not positive; I stated it to individual members, and I am quite confident that I did to the Committee.

Q. Did you state to the Committee that Mrs. Tilton had been to see Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I did not, that I remember; I don't remember stating anything of the kind.

Q. Did you know at the time that Mrs. Tilton had been to see Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I don't recollect now that at the time I knew anything about it. According to my best recollection I did not know that Mrs. Tilton had been to see Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. Didn't you know that Mrs. Tilton had been to see Mrs. Bradshaw, and said to her in substance, "How can you go before the Committee and give evidence?"

Mr. Everts—The witness has answered that he did not know that Mrs. Tilton had seen Mrs. Bradshaw. I don't think it is competent for him to introduce in the form of a question on apparent conversation between Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Bradshaw.

Judge Neilson—Except to remind him.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask him if he did not know the fact.

Judge Neilson—By way, possibly, of reminding the witness of what he might not possibly remember.

The Witness—It is Judge Fullerton alluding to that has refreshed my memory on one point, and it is that Mrs. Bradshaw making a call on Mrs. Moulton—Mrs. Bradshaw making a call on Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Shearman—One moment; I object, unless the witness was there—this question which the counsel asks is, did he know.

The Witness—Only by what Mrs. Bradshaw told me.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, answer my question, whether you knew at the time that Mrs. Tilton—whether you knew or had heard at the time that Mrs. Tilton had seen Mrs. Bradshaw and said to her, in substance: "How can you go before that Committee?"

Mr. Shearman—Wait a moment.

Mr. Everts—We object to that question; he has asked him if he knew, and he has stated, that to the best of his recollection, he did not know. Now, anything that repeats or calls the witness' recollection may be properly put, provided it does not transgress any rules of evidence which are that conversations with other parties are not to be introduced. These are not to be introduced in the form of a question to obtain an answer that accepts them, any more than in any other form. The getting the evidence is inadmissible, in any form, of what passed between Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Bradshaw, or between Mrs. Bradshaw and this witness. It is hearsay evidence, and has nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to follow it up by showing that he communicated the fact to the Committee.

Mr. Everts—Well, then, we come upon the same rule that your Honor has so often enforced.

Judge Neilson—Ask him if he communicated—

Mr. Beach—I was about suggesting to your Honor a while ago that I understand this witness to have testified that one of the reasons why he advised the non-prosecution of the West charges was, that the witnesses had not been seen, that no inquiry had been made as to what they would testify to; that the charges were not in a proper shape under the rules and custom of the proceedings before the Committee to be prosecuted; and now we propose to show that this gentleman had personal knowledge that these charges could be followed up by the presentation of the witnesses whose names were attached to the specifications.

Judge Neilson—I think the statement of the witness related to those charges at an early stage of the proceedings; and when he thought the brother in default had not been dealt with as the Scripture required, and when he thought the witnesses had not been named, and had not been seen as required—that was at an early stage of the proceedings; that matter was perfected afterwards.

Mr. Beach—Well, we propose to correct him in that particular.

Mr. Shearman—But it was in relation, if your Honor please, also to certain other charges which were joined with charges against Mr. Tilton, against some person not named, and it was in reference to those.

Judge Neilson—Yes, a particular person finally omitted in perfecting the charges.

The Witness—No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—It was in regard to some other person not named Mr. Halliday, distinguished between charges against Mr. Tilton and charges against some other person not named, but which were all brought together in one by Mr. West originally, and that was the ground of his objection at the time. He has said that—he has always stated a different reason in regard to the charges so far as they related to Mr. Tilton, and has said that he uniformly opposed the prosecution of those charges before the Committee, but upon a different ground.

Judge Neilson—I recollect—on the ground that Mr. Tilton's name ought to be dropped in this business, and nothing more said about it.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, and that Mr. Halliday's action related to other charges, and not in regard to Mr. Tilton at all, although they were mixed up with them originally.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Fullerton; repeat your last question.

THE TRIBUNE Stenographer read the last question as follows: "Did not you know that Mrs. Tilton had been to see Mrs. Bradshaw and said to her, in substance, 'How can you go before the Committee and give evidence?'" Is that the question?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; it is the same question.

Judge Neilson—Another one after that.

Mr. Everts—That is the question that we objected to.

Mr. Fullerton—Before you told the Committee that Mrs. Bradshaw would not appear as a witness, had you heard that Mrs. Tilton had seen Mrs. Bradshaw and asked her, in substance, how she could go before the Committee and give evidence?

Mr. Everts—That is the question we objected to.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; I rule it out.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you state to the Committee in substance that Mrs. Tilton had seen Mrs. Bradshaw and asked her how she could go before the Committee and give evidence?

Judge Neilson—Answer that.

The Witness—I think I stated decidedly that Mrs. Bradshaw told me she had seen Mrs. Tilton and that—she didn't tell me anything about what she told Mrs. Tilton, but she told me that she could not appear before the Committee—that she would not.

Q. Well, you answered my question.

Judge Neilson—That is what you communicated to the Committee?

The Witness—Yes, Sir; what I communicated to the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—Did she not at the same time say to you, that Mrs. Tilton had asked her: "How can you go—appear before the Committee?"

Mr. Everts—That we object to; that is conversation between Mrs. Bradshaw and the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—A part of which he has just given.

Mr. Everts—No, he did not give any conversation; he was allowed to state only what he told the Committee. Now, anything he told the Committee is within your Honor's permission.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Reporter, will you go back and read the last answer of the witness. [To Mr. Everts.] You will see you are mistaken.

Mr. Everts—Yes, my friend's point is now, that the witness having stated to the Committee what Mrs. Bradshaw told him, that he may ask what further Mrs. Bradshaw said. That is objected to as an unfair inquiry. Your Honor excluded in terms conversations between Mrs. Bradshaw and Mrs. Tilton—conversations between Mrs. Bradshaw and this witness. Your Honor admits statements of what this witness said to the Committee. Now, what the witness said to the Committee is now invoked as evidence admitted of a part of a conversation between Mrs. Bradshaw and the witness, so as to get a right to get the rest of the conversation. How it could carry that consequence when it is their own line of examination (it is not an inquiry that we put) my learned friend can point out better than I. But the foundation falls, for a conversation between this witness and Mrs. Bradshaw is not admissible at all; it may never have occurred; it is only what he said to the Committee that has been introduced, and if he followed that by further statements, which included further conversations between Mrs. Bradshaw and himself, very well.

Judge Neilson—So I understand.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor allow me to say a single word upon the subject, Sir; I will not protract the discussion. But this witness has testified that the only reason why he opposed the proceeding of the Committee against Mr. Tilton was, that he thought his name should be dropped from the roll of membership. Can we not show that, instead of being operated upon by that motive, with knowledge that Mrs. Tilton had been to Mrs. Bradshaw, the principal witness, and implored her not to appear, and that Mrs. Bradshaw, for that reason, refused to appear, that this witness went before the Committee and made a partial and suppressed statement in regard to that matter?

Judge Neilson—Under my ruling, you can show anything this witness communicated to the Committee.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir; but when he pretends that all his motive for prosecuting Mr. Tilton was his opinion that he should be dropped from the roll of membership, can we not contradict him by showing that he had other knowledge, and was influenced by a different motive.

Judge Neilson—I understand Mr. Halliday's judgment to have been in any event, that the true course and policy was to drop Mr. Tilton's name.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir; and you understand Mr. Halliday to say that that was the reason that he opposed the prosecution of Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Yes; that was his reason.

Mr. Beach—Certainly. Now, we propose to prove a different reason, Sir, to show that he had different motives, to show that he had further information, and that the reason why he did not urge the prosecution before the Committee was the knowledge which had been communicated to him through Mrs. Bradshaw, that Mrs. Tilton did not desire Mrs. Bradshaw to appear before the Committee, and that he spoke and acted before the Committee with that knowledge, and under the influence springing from that information. It goes to the credibility of the witness, Sir. It does not prove the fact that Mrs. Tilton made any such communication to Mrs. Bradshaw; it does not prove any of the facts which were in the communication made by Mrs. Bradshaw to this witness. But it does assail his motive, Sir, and his credibility as a witness. We contradict him, Sir, if we prove this—I submit we contradict him in a most important point of his evidence, as to the very point to which he was called by the defense; and it would be singular, Sir, if we cannot show a different motive influencing the action of this witness from the one which he has already given upon the stand.

Judge Neilson—I think all that can be shown, without calling in that conversation, if such be the fact, and that the counsel ought to confine himself to what was communicated by Mr. Halliday to the Committee, and, in that connection, he is at liberty to interrogate him as to his knowledge of any fact bearing on the case.

Mr. Beach—I am sure your Honor does not apprehend the course of my argument. It is not what the witness communicated to the Committee; it is what he knew and what he suppressed. The question is as to what motive influenced him in his action before the Committee in opposition to this inquiry. He gives one motive; we now propose to show that he had information, authentic, from the witness, attached to the specifications in the charges against Mr. Tilton, showing altogether a different motive. It is not for the purpose of proving the fact, or any fact disclosed by that conversation; but by proving the motive, the real motive, under which this witness acted.

Judge Neilson—He has already stated that he stated to the Committee that Mrs. Bradshaw would not appear—could not appear.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; but that is not the important point. Suppose Mr. Beecher had made a communication to Mrs. Bradshaw, which was communicated by her to this witness, under the influence of which he acted, why it would be competent to show that, Sir, not as proof of the fact that Mr. Beecher did make that statement to Mrs. Bradshaw, but as conveying the information, which was communicated to this witness, which led him to take the action he did take before the Examining Committee upon this subject. And it is, Sir, I repeat, it is directed entirely to the credibility of this witness upon his cross-examination, we disclaiming that the communication made to him by Mrs. Bradshaw was of the slightest evidence to prove the facts which were contained in that communication.

Judge Neilson—I think the counsel in his inquiry must confine himself to the communications made to the Committee by this witness. He may interrogate him in that connection whether he didn't know this, or that, or the other thing, which would be—

Mr. Beach—Very well.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—We lose sight of the fact that he has already given in evidence a part of the conversation between himself and Mrs. Bradshaw.

Judge Neilson—No, he has given in evidence what he communicated to the Committee, and you may pursue that.

Mr. Fullerton—I beg your Honor's pardon. I think, by reference to the minutes, you will see I am correct in my assertion.

Judge Neilson—He repeated his conversation with Mrs. Bradshaw in what he told the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—He went on to state the conversation between himself and Mrs. Bradshaw, in part, and says: "That I communicated to the Committee."

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—No, because he stated it to the Committee, as I understand. Now, if your Honor will allow me to call your Honor's attention to a ruling which seems to have preserved precisely the discrimination which your Honor now does, and that I think will be apparent to my learned friends, as it is upon their objection and a decision to which we did not except. [Reading:]

Plaintiff having testified that Johnson was engaged on The Christian Union by Beecher in consequence of a conversation between plaintiff and Beecher; held, competent to prove the result of interviews between Wilkeson and Beecher leading to the engagement of Johnson, but not competent to prove the conversations.

Well, now, that is precisely the attitude, as I understand it here. If this witness can say, upon further exploration or probing by my learned friend, that the advice he gave, the course he took, was in part in consequence of conversations or interviews that he had with Mrs. Bradshaw, why that is very well. That is correcting him. That is contradicting, if you please, the influence on his mind as coming from one source and not from another, just as we did about the employment of Mr. Johnson. But under cover of that, the general rule of law which excludes conversations between third persons, is not allowed to be invaded.

Mr. Beach—That ruling of your Honor, Sir, was when we were attempting to prove declarations and statements made by Mr. Beecher. Now we are not attempting to prove any such fact. We are attempting to assail the credibility of this witness by a cross-examination as to information which he had received superinducing the motives under which he acted before the Committee, and for the purpose of contradicting his allegation that he was moved by but one purpose or consideration, or conviction, that Mr. Tilton ought to be dropped from the roll of members.

THE CONVERSATION EXCLUDED.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Fullerton; confine yourself to what occurred between him and the Committee.

The Witness—May I—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! wait, Mr. Halliday; wait till next Sunday. [Laughter.]

The Witness—No, Sir; the counsel is all the time assuming that I had a conversation with Mrs. Bradshaw. I stated distinctly that I had no conversation with her. She came to my parlor and made a statement to which I made no response, nor asked any question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is got along with now.

Q. How did it happen that you stated to the Committee that Mrs. Bradshaw would not appear before them? A. Because she said so to me.

Q. Well, what occasion had you to tell the Committee of it? A. Because the subject was under discussion.

Q. What subject? A. The subject of the discipline of Mr. Tilton and the appearance of Mrs. Bradshaw as a witness, or other witnesses; it was as to the difficulty of prosecuting the charges if it was attempted.

Q. Did any member of the Committee say in substance, that there were two witnesses, Mr. and Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I don't remember; they may have said it.

Q. [Continuing.] Who would prove the charges against Mr. Tilton? A. [Continuing.] But not that I remember at all.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, wait till Mr. Fullerton has finished the question.

The Witness—Excuse me, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Your object in giving that information was to let them know what difficulties there were in the way of prosecuting the charges? A. That was one object.

Q. Was not that the principal object? A. I cannot remember what was in my mind at the time.

Q. Yes. Did you say in substance, to the Committee, that Mrs. Bradshaw informed you that she had said to Mrs. Tilton in substance, as follows: "I will not add one pang to the agony that poor Elizabeth has already endured"? A. I did, I think I said that in substance, for that was in substance what Mrs. Bradshaw said to me; I can tell you exactly what I did say to the Committee.

Mr. Shearman—One moment, Mr. Halliday. Now, your Honor, in order that the counsel may not have an opportunity to say that this conversation has been brought in, I move to strike out that part of the witness' answer which says, that that was in substance what Mrs. Bradshaw said.

Judge Neilson—I think it is properly a part of the statement.

Mr. Everts—We except, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—You did tell the Committee that? A. I did and more, too.

Q. Well, let us have the "more, too." [Laughter.] A. I said to the Committee that Mrs. Bradshaw came to me, I think it was about the 22d of October, to inquire if I would attend the funeral of Mrs. Carl, and that, after she had completed what she had to say in regard to that, she then introduced this matter of appearing as a witness against Mrs. Tilton, and that she should not do it; she could not do it; that Elizabeth had said to her, "Mattie, how can you appear against me? I shall send the Committee a letter stating my reasons for not appearing."

Q. Did you say Mr. or Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton. I made no reply at all, nor asked any questions. I heard her statement and repeated it to the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you understand that Mrs. Bradshaw's objection to appearing before the Committee was that she could not prove the charge?

Mr. Everts—That is not the question, what he understood. He has told you exactly what he told the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—That is my question.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor has directed them to confine themselves to what this witness said to the Committee. He has told you all that he said to the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask the further question now, Sir, if he understood from Mrs. Bradshaw that she could not prove the truth of the charge against Mr. Tilton, so far as she was concerned, if she appeared before the Committee.

Mr. Everts—I object to that. You cannot prove the conversation as between him and her, and how can you prove the result of a conversation between him and her, what he understood from a conversation between him and her.

Judge Neilson—I don't think that will do Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—It seems to me proper, Sir, to show his motive and the knowledge that he had at the time that he made this communication.

Judge Neilson—That appears from his statement. Upon the statement given, the motive of Mrs. Bradshaw is apparent. There is no suggestion of inability on her part to prove if she were called, but an indisposition to come.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, did Mrs. Bradshaw ever communicate to you a willingness to come after that?

Mr. Shearman—One moment. That is objected to.

Mr. Everts—The conversation between Mrs. Bradshaw and the witness cannot be given in evidence.

Judge Neilson—What further did you say to the Committee, then or afterwards, on that subject?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it seems now that he communicated to the Committee the fact that Mrs. Bradshaw was unwilling to come.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—If information was conveyed to him afterwards that she was willing to come, isn't it proper to show that fact?

Judge Neilson—Not material, I think.

Mr. Beach—Or that he did not communicate it to the Committee; that he suppressed it?

Judge Neilson—I don't think it is very material.

Mr. Fullerton—Had you any correspondence with Mrs. Bradshaw upon the subject? A. I had, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—One moment; that is objected to— All right.

AN EXTENDED AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Halliday, you stated on your direct examination that you were a clergyman; how long have you been a clergyman? A. I never was properly inducted into the ministry until about twelve years ago.

Q. Where was that? A. At Lodi, New-Jersey,

Q. Lodi? A. Yes, Sir, in Bergen County.

Q. And what was your occupation in Providence? A. I went from Newark to Providence, R. I., to go into the employment of the "Young Men's Tract Missionary Society," and did so.

Q. Is that the only employment you had whilst you were in Providence? A. No, Sir.

Q. My question covers the whole employment during that period? A. I did not understand you; I thought you wanted me to answer one question at a time. I continued in their employment until my health broke down, and at the advice of some of my friends I went into the coal business, and upon a farm near the city, in the suburbs of the city, now part of the City of Providence.

Q. Coal merchant? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In partnership with any one? A. I did.

Q. With whom? A. Two persons; first, a man by the name of Israel J. Bullock, and afterward with a young man by the name of Baker.

Q. How long did Mr. Bullock remain in partnership with you? A. Some two or three years; I don't recollect positively.

Q. And how long did Mr. Baker remain in partnership with you? A. Several years; I cannot state exactly.

Q. Fall in that business? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Make an assignment? A. I did, of everything that I had, even my household chattels.

Q. Of course, of course, of course! Well? A. No, it was not; I beg your pardon.

Q. One moment; were you engaged in any other business in Providence besides what you have named? A. Not on my own account that I remember.

Q. Well, were you engaged in any business there on account of anybody else? A. I was the agent of an incorporated manufacturing company.

Q. What was that company? A. I think it was styled—it is some twenty years ago; I cannot recollect positively—I think it was styled the Narragansett Manufacturing Co.

Q. Manufacturing of what? A. It was making oil from fish, and using the residuum, preparing it for a fertiliser.

Q. Called fish guano? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were the agent of that company? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Advertised as the agent? A. I think I was; I am confident; I cannot say positively; it is so long ago that I cannot recollect distinctly. I state to you facts, that I was the agent, and I, of course, advertised myself as such, if I did advertise myself at all.

Q. Well, what became of that company? A. It failed after a very brief existence, Sir.

Q. Were you a stockholder in that company? A. I think I was to a very limited amount.

Q. Well, don't you know that you were? A. I cannot swear that I was or that I was not; my best recollection is that I was.

Q. How long before it failed did you discover its falling condition? A. Well, it had misfortunes from the beginning.

Q. Now— A. Building burned down, and that was the beginning of it, very early.

Q. Answer my question, when did you discover its falling condition? A. I am trying to do it, Sir.

Q. When did you first discover its falling condition? A. It was not—I did not suppose but that it would be a success until a comparatively short time previous to its failure.

Q. Well, do you recollect the day of its failure? A. I do not, Sir, nor the year.

Q. How? A. Nor the year.

Q. Nor the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, do you recollect of selling your stock in that company just before the failure? A. No, Sir, I don't recollect anything of the kind.

Q. Do you recollect of trying to sell it? A. I don't.

Q. Do you recollect the night before its failure, that you tried to sell the stock of the company? A. I don't recollect anything of the kind.

Q. Will you say that you did not? A. My best recollection is that I never attempted anything of the kind.

Q. But you will not say that you did not attempt it, as I understand you? A. I cannot say that because I cannot remember, but my best recollection is that I never did anything of the kind at all—

Q. Were you engaged in any other business in Providence? A. I don't remember any other than those that I have stated—

Q. When did you fall in the coal business? A. Some three years before I came away from there, and about ten years after I went into it, as near as I can recollect.

Q. Do you know the amount of your personal debts at the time you failed in the coal business? A. I don't remember at all, Sir. Hon. Benjamin T. Eames can inform you if you desire to know.

Mr. Fullerton—I do know, without asking him.

Q. How long before you failed did you know you were in a falling condition? A. I didn't know it until about the time that an assignment was made.

Q. About how long before the assignment was made did you know it? A. I can't tell whether it was forty-eight hours or less.

days. I made an assignment immediately on knowing there was a necessity for it.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Everts—That is a proper answer.

Q. Did you purchase a bill of goods the night before you made the assignment? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Do you know one William E. Barrett? A. I might know him, but I can't recollect him.

Q. Do you recollect him? A. I can't recall him.

Q. Do you recollect a gentleman of that name who is engaged in the hardware business? A. I can't recollect any such person.

Q. Engaged in the sale of agricultural implements? A. Yes, Sir, I do remember a man engaged in the sale of agricultural implements—a seedsman.

Q. Don't you remember making a purchase of goods of him the night before you failed? A. I do not.

Q. No recollection upon that subject? A. I have not.

Q. Don't you remember that he didn't come in under the assignment, and take his portion? A. I don't remember anything about it.

Q. You went into business after that, didn't you, in Providence? A. The business I have alluded to.

Q. What was that? A. Agent of the Narragansett Manufacturing Company.

Q. Didn't you embark in any other business? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Don't you recollect that this Mr. Barrett, after you re-entered into business made a purchase of goods of you, and then presented the old bill which he had against you, in payment of it, which gave rise to some difficulty? A. I don't remember anything of the kind.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Are you quite sure you have named all the business you were ever engaged in in Providence? A. I think I have; I don't remember any others. If you can help my memory, I will be very glad to answer.

Q. Before you went to Providence, where did you reside? A. I resided in the City of New-York.

Q. Have you ever resided in any place other than those you have named? A. I think not, Sir. Oh! in my childhood I resided in Morristown, New-Jersey. I was brought up on a farm.

Q. Have you named all the places? A. I think I have; I remained there till I was twelve years of age.

Q. I don't care about the early history; did you ever live in the State of Connecticut? A. I don't think I did; I don't remember of ever having lived there.

Q. Were you ever engaged in the milk business? A. Yes, Sir. The time I alluded to, in Providence, Rhode Island, when I lived on the farm; I had a dairy at the same time.

Q. At the same time as what? A. You asked what business I was in; I told you I was in the coal business, and had a farm at the same time, just in the suburbs of the city.

Q. At the same time you carried on the coal business, you carried on the farm, did you? A. I did.

Q. Did you fail in the farm business? A. I made one assignment of all my property at the same time—a farm of about one hundred acres and my other business.

Q. Have you now stated all the business engagements that you ever entered into? A. I think I have, Sir; I meant to do so. As I said, if you can refresh my memory, I will be very glad to answer.

Q. Coming back to the City of New-York, what were you engaged in there, in connection with the Five Points Mission which you have alluded to? A. I didn't come back to do that, Sir.

Q. Well, I am coming back in my examination to it. A. I thought you asked me when I came back to go into it.

Q. Well, you tell me how you were connected with the Five Points Mission? A. In the first place, the first four years of my service there, I was general agent of the house. My duties were principally connected with the financial matters of the house.

Q. Did you ever have any trouble there? A. With the house, do you mean, or with the Trustees?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. No trouble of any kind or character? A. No, Sir, not during my first four years of service there, I never had a word of misunderstanding with either of the Trustees or with any one in connection with that house—

Q. Or with the corporation? A. No, Sir; the Trustees were the corporation.

Q. Were no charges preferred against you? A. Never.

Q. Nor a complaint made? A. Never.

Q. That was during the first four years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When were you connected with the institution again? A. I left for six months—I left to be gone entirely; but before I had been gone six months—

Mr. Fullerton (interrupting)—Now—

The Witness—I am going to tell you exactly what you want, Judge.

Q. You have already told that, it is on record here, that you went away and returned. I ask you when you were connected with it again? A. I am going to tell you that in six months, I was, at the urgent request of the Trustees, induced to return and take care of the house during the sickness of the Superintendent, expecting to be there only six weeks, and remained three months.

Q. Did you have any trouble there then? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not the slightest? A. No, Sir.

Q. No complaint made against you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Of no kind or character? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you connected with that institution at any other time? A. I was.

Q. When was that? A. Three months subsequently, the superintendent died—

Q. Three months after it, you were connected with it again? A. I was.

Q. How long did your connection continue? A. Six years, I think, about.

Q. This ended when? A. Five years ago this month.

Q. Did you have any trouble there during that period? A. No, Sir; I never had any trouble at all; I came away voluntarily from the house. I would be glad to produce every trustee here to show what my standing was.

Mr. Fullerton—We have not time to do that.

The Witness—I should like to have them here very much.

Q. Were no charges preferred against you? A. Never.

Q. Or complaint made against you? A. Never that I know of.

Q. No difficulty whatever of any kind or character? A. Yes, Sir; there was a misunderstanding as to the management of the house.

Q. What charges were made against you in that respect? A. There were no charges made against me.

Q. You got into no kind of difficulty? A. No, Sir.

Q. In connection with it? A. No, Sir.

Q. What was the misunderstanding? A. They had made me control the house in one way, for six years, including the managing of the whole concern, and there came a time when they wanted to transfer the management of the schools during school hours entirely to the Principal of the school. I objected. I said: "Gentlemen, one of two things. You sail the ship, make the rules, or let me do it. I cannot have a mixed government. If you hold me responsible for the government of this house, you must let me sail the ship as I think best. If not, make your arrangements, and I will follow whatever directions you say." The President of the institution preferred that it should not be so. I sent in my resignation three different times. They would not accept it. I finally sent it in, and they refused then; and I said: "I will go whether or not;" and I went.

Q. No trouble with the finances when you were there? A. I would rather the gentleman would let me bring in a witness to testify in regard to that.

Q. Mr. Halliday is a good witness. A. Never a word.

Q. Never a word? A. Never a word.

Q. Not the slightest difficulty. A. Not the slightest.

Q. No complaint? A. No; I challenge proof.

Mr. Fullerton—Challenges are not lawful.

The Witness—They are here. [Applause.]

Q. Had you any connection with the "Juvenile Guardian Society?" A. I had not, Sir. It is one of the biggest humbugs that ever was put afloat. I had a connection to try to put its eyes out, or the eyes of the scoundrel that was conducting it. That is what I had to do with it.

Q. Who was the scoundrel?

Mr. Evarts—That is no matter. He is a third person; he is innocent.

Mr. Fullerton—He is not innocent. Mr. Halliday says he is a scoundrel.

Q. Who was at the head of the institution? A. I cannot remember the name; I can tell you the head.

Mr. Evarts—I object to it. It is beyond the inquiry. It is not in any sense material. It is a different matter from any we inquired about.

Mr. Fullerton—I am asking who was the head of the concern.

Judge Neilson—He says he don't know.

The Witness—He is a man that wore green glasses; that is all I remember about him, except his rascalities.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness]: Don't.

Mr. Fullerton—Let Mr. Halliday be. He is my witness.

Mr. Shearman—I am willing he should tell all.

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps that is what has ruined him. [To the Witness]: Did you know the Rev. David F. Robertson? A. I am rather inclined to think it was a Robertson that I have alluded to, though I am not certain; you ask me if I know him, I don't know him.

Q. You don't know him? A. I don't know him; no, Sir.

Q. Did you ever hear of him before? A. I think I have.

Q. In what connection did you hear of him? A. If it is the man that I refer to—

Mr. Shearman—Now!

The Witness—I cannot tell whether it is that man or not.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you ever meet him and converse with him? A. I don't think I ever did, Sir; I cannot swear, but I don't think I ever did.

Q. This "Juvenile Guardian Society" was a kind of rival of the Five Points Mission? A. Not by any means.

Mr. Evarts—Why is this material? Their inquiry has reference to the impeachment of this witness's conduct.

Judge Neilson—I think we have had enough. He says he was not connected with that institution.

Mr. Fullerton—That question was answered. I didn't see there was any motion before the Court. [To the witness]: Did you ever visit one of the schools of this Juvenile Guardian Society? A. I think I did, Sir, one of them—two or three of them. I know I did one, and I think two.

Q. Did you visit it under an assumed name? A. No, Sir, I don't do such things.

Q. Did you give your name when you were requested to? A. I don't remember whether I did or not.

Q. Don't you know that you refused to give your name when it was asked? A. I don't; I think it is possible, but I don't remember.

Q. When asked what your object was in visiting that school, did you say that you wanted to make a donation to them? A. I never said a thing of the kind.

Q. Don't you remember now that you did refuse to give your name? A. I don't; it is a good while ago, Judge, that I visited it.

Q. Yes. A. But I cannot remember what I did, or what I did not say, except in the points that you relate—specify to.

Q. What was your object in visiting the school?

Mr. Evarts—What has that to do with the impeachment of the witness?

Judge Neilson—I think he has gone far enough; I think the object is apparent. He had doubts about the integrity of the institution, whatever it was, and may have been there to inspect it—to spy out the nakedness of the land.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, the regard was mutual between the two institutions.

Mr. Evarts—That won't do any harm.

Mr. Fullerton—No, that is the reason I mention it.

Mr. Evans—We would have to inquire, then, which was the right one.

Judge Neilson—I think we have gone far enough.

Q. Were you ever connected with any other institution in New-York? A. As I stated on my direct examination, before I went to Providence I was in the employment of the "American Female Guardian Society" that has under their care the Home of the Friendless.

Q. How long were you connected with that? A. I cannot remember definitely; I think some two or three years; that was before I went to Providence.

Q. Who was at the head of that institution? A. It was a society of ladies, with a Board of Councilors. Dr. Tyng, I think, was the President of the Board of Councilors; Acton Smith was another; Albon S. Man, or Albon P. Man, a lawyer who used to be at 64 Wall-st. was another of the Councilors; I cannot recollect.

Q. When did your connection with that institution cease? A. When I went to Providence. Judge Fullerton, I didn't answer your question fully. You asked me what other Society, and how long. At first I was with them, I think, about three years, and came back and was with them three years subsequently at their request.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SAMUEL B. HALLIDAY.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Halliday, in answer to one question on cross-examination, when you were asked how soon the West charges, as finally amended, and as Judge Fullerton showed them to you, were presented to the Committee after the first and imperfect charges were withdrawn, you answered, a week after. I want to call your attention to that, and ask you whether you meant to say that these final amended charges were presented as soon as that after the original charges were withdrawn—the charges, I mean, in the third specification? A. [Referring to a paper.] The—

Mr. Shearman—That paper won't help you. A. The third third specification was not handed in until in September, but the paper was handed back after the first commission, at a meeting of July 2d, 1873.

Q. Well, do I not understand that you did not mean to say that the charges as finally amended were handed in a week after the charges were withdrawn for amendment? A. Well, it depends on how the word "final" is construed. This was regarded final at the time.

Q. Then, explain what you meant by saying that the West charges, as amended finally, were presented a week after the others were withdrawn? A. At this meeting of Friday evening, June 27, when those charges were finally preferred, they were, after being examined, handed back to Mr. West as imperfect. Another meeting was held on July 2, at which Mr. West was present, and he was requested to present the charges which had been referred back to him at the previous meeting, and they were handed in by him as amended by him.

Q. And that is what you meant by saying that the charges, as amended, were handed back by him? A. Yes, Sir; the paper is here.

Q. Those amended charges did not include the third specification? A. No, Sir: that was not handed in until the 2d of September, I think.

Q. Now, you have been asked a number of questions with regard to your advice and action upon the West charges. Will you be kind enough to tell me whether the West charges, as originally made, were brought against any other person than Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Mr. Shearman—No name.

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Judge Neilson—We will take that.

Mr. Fullerton—The charges themselves will appear.

Judge Neilson—It is a mere incident.

Mr. Shearman—We want the original charges.

The Witness—Not only the charges—

Mr. Fullerton—Now!

Mr. Shearman—The Judge said he would take that, so you answer, Mr. Halliday.

Mr. Fullerton—Will your Honor permit him to give parallel evidence of the charges?

Judge Neilson—Has he the charges before him?

Mr. Fullerton—Not the charges referred to.

Judge Neilson—He can refer to the minutes. [To Mr. Shearman.] The charges contained in the third specification.

Mr. Shearman—No, Sir; before the third specification.

The Witness—[Referring to a book]: That is the only paper that was ever presented by Mr. West to the Examining Committee with the third specification handed in on September 2d. That is the paper as handed by Mr. West after being amended by him—handed in by him at the meeting on the 2d, I think, of July.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evans—Has that been put in evidence?

Mr. Shearman—No, it has not been put in evidence.

The Witness—Here is the third specification.

Mr. Shearman—That has got nothing to do with it.

The Witness—A joint indictment.

Q. You were asked if you visited in New Haven about these charges, and you answered that you did. To what charges did you refer when you said you visited about these charges? A. That paper.

Q. To the paper which you have just handed me? There is no use in saying "that paper" for things have to be recorded. A. I mean the charges of Mr. West.

Q. Which charges? A. Both.

Q. What particular charges—the original charges, or the finally-amended charges? A. I cannot swear positively as to that.

Q. When did you make that visit—about what period? A. I can tell exactly the date, I think, Sir; [referring to a paper] I can now state that my visit to New Haven was after the charges were presented, amended.

Q. What date was it? A. I think it was between—

Q. What date was it, Mr. Halliday, if you please? A. I cannot tell you the date exactly; I can tell you between what days it was.

Q. Give me the month? A. It was in July, before the 14th of July, and after the 2d.

Q. It was not after the third specification was entered in the West charges, was it? A. Months—nearly two months before.

Q. It was not after the charges as finally amended were put in? A. As finally amended the third specification didn't come in.

Q. Then it was not after the charges, as finally amended, were presented by Mr. West? A. No, Sir.

Q. No? A. Not until two months afterwards.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness]: You confuse again by saying not until two months after.

Judge Neilson—Two months before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Before the presentation of a third specification was contained? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—The visit to New Haven was before that? A. Nearly two months before. One was in the early part of July, and the other was in the early part of September, nearly two months.

Q. I call your attention to an answer which I am not sure I distinctly heard, but the impression I got is—

Mr. Beach—Wait. No matter what your impression was.

Judge Neilson—Go on, Mr. Shearman, and put your question.

Mr. Shearman—This is the same matter.

Mr. Beach—No matter what your impression was.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, it is a good deal of matter, because there is no value to the question unless I state my impression of Mr. Halliday's answer. The impression I derived was that Mr. Halliday said—

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor think it is proper to state in the question the impression of the counsel?

Judge Neilson—The proper question is, did I understand you to say so and so, which, after all, amounts to the same thing.

Mr. Shearman—Did I understand you to say you reported to the Committee that Mrs. Bradshaw had said to you that Mrs. Tilton said she would not appear before the Committee, but would write the Committee a letter? A. I did not; I did not mean to say so.

Mr. Beach—You didn't say so? A. I don't think I did. I saw that in the report, and saw the incorrectness of it in this morning's paper. I didn't say so.

Q. You said, did you—

The Witness—Will you repeat that again?

Q. Was not your statement in that part of your answer, where you said that you reported to the Committee something about Mrs. Tilton's saying she would not appear, but would write the Committee a letter—was not what you intended to say that Mr. Tilton said he would not appear? A. Mrs. Bradshaw would not appear.

Mr. Shearman—Very well; it was Mrs. Bradshaw said she would not appear.

Mr. Evarts—If you will allow me, I think in the same answer to which Mr. Shearman refers, Mr. Halliday did use the words "Mrs. Tilton," when I supposed he meant Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—No; he didn't

Mr. Evarts—But not in this part of it.

Mr. Beach—He didn't mean Mrs. Tilton; he meant Mrs. Bradshaw when he said Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—That charge would not appear against Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—He meant Mr. Tilton instead of Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, sir, I think so. I want that corrected.

Mr. Morris—He meant Mrs. Tilton, and he referred to the fact that she had suffered enough, and he would not cause her any more suffering by going before the Committee, so it was Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Will you allow us to have it right? It is for the witness to say which was right.

Mr. Morris—He explained it in that way.

Mr. Evarts—Can you find that question and answer?

The Witness—I did make an allusion, if the Court please, to Mrs. Tilton in one point; I don't know whether the gentlemen has any reference to that.

Mr. Beach—It was not in connection with Mrs. Bradshaw.

Mr. Evarts—No, but I think it is the same answer in which he spoke about proceeding against Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—He meant Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, I supposed so, of course. I only want to make it straight.

Mr. Morris—I take issue upon that point. It was against Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Bradshaw was giving that as a reason why she would not appear before the Committee. She said Mrs. Tilton had suffered enough already, and Mrs. Tilton asked her the question—the question was put, how she could appear against her—how she could appear before the Committee against her, and Mrs. Bradshaw said that she had suffered enough already, Mrs. Tilton had, and that is the reason she gave why she would not appear before the Committee; so it is Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—It is not in qualification of anything that came out from Mrs. Bradshaw.

Judge Neilson—The question is now, whether the witness will make the correction of the point referred to?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and I say to Mr. Morris it is not in qualification of anything he remembers was repeated by him (Halliday) as coming from Mrs. Bradshaw, but precedes it, when he said—the point was what he said about not proceeding on the charge, and he speaks of it as not proceeding against Mrs. Tilton when he meant to say against Mr. Tilton, I suppose. It was not any part of Mrs. Bradshaw's statement then, for Mr. Morris has substantially stated that, and I don't ask that to be modified.

Mr. Beach—Oh! not at all.

Mr. Evarts—It has not anything to do with her.

Mr. Beach—I think we have got the answer.

Mr. Evarts—We will find the answer when it is printed.

Judge Neilson—The right to make the correction, if needs be, is reserved.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; we will reserve that. The witness has a right, of course, to make the correction.

Judge Neilson—The right to make the correction, if need be, will be reserved.

Mr. Evans—Yes, we will look at the record, and let the witness make the correction if necessary.

Mr. Shearman—That is all, Mr. Halliday.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Halliday.

TESTIMONY OF MISS BESSIE TURNER.

Mr. Shearman—Miss Elizabeth A. Turner. [Sit in the audience.]

Judge Neilson—Will the gentlemen please be quiet? I think if the reporters would look down at their papers just now it will be a good deal better.

Elizabeth A. Turner called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

THE EARLY EXPERIENCES WITH THE TILTONS.

Mr. Porter—Miss Turner, when did you become an inmate of the family of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. In 1864; the Summer of 1864.

Q. 1864? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what was your age at that time? A. I think I was about 18 years, Sir.

Q. How long did you remain an inmate of the family? A. About ten years; a little more, perhaps.

Q. Where were they living at the time you first went there? A. The number then was 48 Livingston-st. They were boarding with Mrs. Morse.

Q. The mother of Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you ever there on the footing of a servant? A. No, Sir.

Q. Receiving wages? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you in the habit of assisting Mrs. Tilton with the care of her children and her household affairs? A. Yes, Sir; I assisted her just as an older daughter would.

Q. Were you sent to school? A. Yes, Sir; I went a short time to the Packer Institute, and then I had private instructions from Miss Oakley, a little while.

Q. The Miss Oakley who has been a witness upon the stand? A. Yes, Sir, Miss Isabella G. Oakley.

Q. Where were you in the habit usually of sleeping, during the earlier years? A. In the room next to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. With the children? A. Yes, Sir, with little Carroll.

Q. Were you treated as one of the family? A. Yes, Sir; always.

Q. Did you eat at the same table with them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where were you usually in the evening? A. Sometimes I remained up stairs, and sometimes I went in the parlor; sometimes I staid in my own room.

Q. And with the family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How did Mr. Tilton treat you during the earlier years of your being a member of his family? A. Very kindly, Sir.

Q. How as compared with the treatment of the children? A. Yes, Sir; he always treated me just as one of his children, during the early years that I lived with him.

Q. Was he in the habit of kissing the children? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And of kissing you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was his ordinary treatment of you during the period of your living there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you give some idea of the manner—of what you mean when you say you were treated as the children were; what did you do? A. Well, Sir, I used to comb his hair, and he would take me on his lap, just as he did his children.

Q. Did he read to you? A. Read to me; yes, Sir.

Q. And conversed with you? A. Yes, Sir; just as he did with the other children—with his children.

MRS. TILTON'S HOME LIFE.

Q. You have, I suppose, of course, the fullest means of knowing the character of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, and their deportment towards each other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you state in general terms what was the character of Mrs. Tilton as exhibited in her home? A. I think Mrs. Tilton was a very lovely woman, in every respect. I never saw any change in her. She was very devoted to her children and to her home; was very domestic in her tastes apparently.

Q. Was she a woman of marked religious feelings? A. Yes, Sir; one of her habits with her children was, every night when they went to bed she would have them kneel down to her and say their prayers, and she would pray with them, or before praying she would read some little story. That was her custom always when she was home.

Q. Was she in the habit of giving them religious instruction? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On week days as well as on the Sabbath? A. Yes, Sir; particularly on the Sabbath, when they did not go to Sabbath-school.

Q. How was she in her habits in reference to being domestic or otherwise? A. What, Sir?

Q. Was she a domestic lady? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Very domestic in her habits, she said.

Mr. Porter—Oh, I didn't hear. [To the witness.] How was she in reference to her disposition and mode of speech to all who were around her? A. Always gentle and kind, always.

Q. How was she in this regard in respect to Mr. Tilton, in particular? A. Very kind and loving, always, in her manner, and in her conversation with him, I never saw any change, never.

MR. TILTON'S SHIFTING MOODS.

Q. Mr. Tilton was somewhat different in his temperament from her, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; he was very different, indeed.

Q. In the earlier years was he generally kind in the family? A. Yes, Sir, I think he was.

Q. Was there a marked change in that respect in the later years of your residence there? A. Yes, Sir; I noticed a change after we moved from Mrs. Morse's to Livingston-st., in their Livingston-st. house—home.

Q. That, I think, was in 1866. From that time did this change increase in his manners and deportment in the family? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—These questions are somewhat leading in their character, Sir.

Mr. Porter—They are introductory. I will avoid that.

Elizabeth A. Turner Digitized by Google

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't think they are introductory in their character.

Mr. Porter—Was Mr. Tilton always alike, or quite variable in his moods? A. No, Sir; he was very variable and moody?

Q. During all these years, were there times when he exhibited the same kindness that he had in former years—times when he did? A. I don't understand your question, Sir.

Q. You spoke of his kindness in the early years; you speak of his moods afterwards becoming variable? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Through that whole period, was he at times kindly as in the earlier years? A. He was at times kindly, and at times very unkindly.

Q. Will you give the jury an idea of the character of this change, and wherein it was that he exhibited what you have remarked? A. Well, he would be very restless, and walk about the house with his hands in his pockets, and look very sullen; and he would seem to make everybody around him feel unhappy.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment, Madam; we object.

Mr. Evarts—I think that is proper.

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Porter—How long would these periods continue, during which these peculiarities were observable; at periods, I mean? A. Sometimes they would continue two or three days at a time.

Q. During the periods of those moods of his, what was his deportment to Mrs. Tilton? A. Unkind.

Q. And what was hers to him? A. Very gentle and loving; always trying to comfort him; and she would read to him, and she would kneel down beside the sofa and stroke his hair, and seemed to do everything she could to draw him out of his moods and make him feel happy.

Q. During those moods of his, was there anything marked in his deportment at the table? A. Yes, Sir; he was very exacting.

Mr. Beach—Now, if your Honor please, I wish to present an objection to this witness giving her conclusions formed upon her observation of the manner and conduct of Mr. Tilton. For instance, I object to her saying that Mr. Tilton was unkind. I insist that the only mode in which that proof can be given is by showing the details of his conduct, what he did and what he said.

Judge Neilson—Well, what he did and what he said. I think the gentleman will accept that suggestion.

Mr. Beach—We are not to take the general expressions in regard to her conclusions.

Judge Neilson—What he did or said, without characterizing it.

The Witness—What he did in these moods, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Counsel will interrogate you.

Mr. Porter—I submit, if your Honor please, that it was precisely that, for which I was interrogating her; and that my question was proper. Will the stenographer read it?

Mr. Beach—My objection was to her answer, not to the question.

[THE TURNER stenographer read the question and answer, as follows: "During those moods of his was there anything marked in his deportment at the table?"]

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Will you state in what particular?

Mr. Morris—That is calling for a conclusion—that question.

MR. TILTON'S UNKINDNESS IN HIS MOODS.

Mr. Porter—That calls for yes or no; and she answers "Yes." I now ask precisely what the counsel insisted I should. [To the witness.] In what particular? A. On one occasion one of his children refused meat; she did not wish for any meat, and he looked very angrily at her, and said it was all her mother's damned orthodoxy. [Laughter.]

Q. Will you please give me any other instance that occurs to you? A. Yes, Sir; another occasion, when he was moody and rebuked Mrs. Tilton at the table in my presence and in the presence of her children, for the horrible grammar that she used. I won't say "horrible;" I don't know that that was the expression, but it was about the grammar that she used; and he hoped that they would never grow up to use the grammar that their mother did.

Q. How in regard to articles of food that were upon the table—food or drink? A. At one time he said to Mrs. Tilton that he didn't wish any more tea or coffee or pastry on the table—and the very next meal he said he wanted to know if he could not have a cup of strong coffee, and that there was not any pie; and Mrs. Tilton said: "Why, darling, you said not to have any; it was not good for your health." Well, he would have one ordered now—he would have a cup of coffee made now.

Q. Without going further into details, will you state whether these were a few out of a great variety of instances that you observed when he was in these moods?

A GENERAL QUESTION OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Beach—I object to that question, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Upon what ground?

Mr. Beach—Upon the ground, in the first place, that it is leading; and in the next place, that it calls upon her to characterize events that she does not relate.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness ought to enumerate what you wish to prove, as instances of observation.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, the relations of husband and wife, when inquiries of this kind—the kind that are pending in this suit—are raised, are always a subject of inquiry, and were made by the plaintiff a subject of inquiry, and are always general evidence of the tenor of intercourse between husband and wife, and the disposition and conduct exhibited by one towards the other are permitted to be given. We do not understand the law to be so remote from the common sense of human affairs as to require specifications or deductions when the observation is a simple observation. A person by looking at people that are in contact with one another, and intercourse, can tell whether they are quarrelsome, or whether they are kindly, and the law does not require the specification of the quarrels or the instances of kindness, unless a cross-examination makes it necessary to prove that inadequate grounds or unsuitable conclusions have been drawn by the witness; and the same rule should be applied to this witness, of course, as to other witnesses who have been called on the one side and the other, and have given the usual demeanor. Now, the witness has given—what might, perhaps, have been left to cross-examination—particular instances, and it does not seem to us suitable or necessary to explore the years of her observation for every case of unseemly conduct; and having giving her statement of the general attitude of these married people towards each other, and then these particular instances that have been exacted from her, is it not competent for her to say that these are instances, of which there were many of the same nature, that she observed? That is the inquiry now.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I deny this proposition of the counsel, entirely. Their object is to prove that there was unkindness and discontent in the family relations of this husband and wife, and the proposition upon the other side is that they can prove by this witness the general conclusion that she formed from the observation of their mutual conduct, and show in general terms that Mr. Tilton was unkind and rude, unloving in his domestic relations, and the result is, if that is permitted to be proved, that the duty of establishing the facts from which that conclusion may be properly or improperly derived is thrown upon the plaintiff in cross-examination. That is, they can ask the judgment of the witness in regard to the character of these relations, and force us into an examination of the details of transactions as between this husband and wife, from which she has formed that conclusion. Now, the same circumstances, if they are presented in detail, in the conduct from which this young lady assumes to decide that Mr. Tilton was rough, or tyrannical, or abusive in his home, might produce upon your Honor's mind, and upon the mind of the jurors, quite a different impression. In those details there may be modifying circumstances; there may be acts of provocation; there may be a thousand things in those details which, to a different mind—a more mature person, one better acquainted with the world, and the disposition of men and women—would produce an altogether different conclusion from that to which she arrives. The objection is, that this young lady, instead of telling what were the actual circumstances and condition of the family, from events which she observed, and which must constitute the foundation of her judgment, is called upon and permitted to give her conclusions, which may be accurate or inaccurate—which may be extravagant and unjust. And I know nothing, Sir, in the character of this examination, which justifies a departure from the ordinary rule of evidence, that the witness must state facts and leave the Court and jury to draw the proper deductions from those facts. It would be, I think, a very great injustice to a party, to permit this lady to pass a judgment upon the domestic character and conduct of Mr. Tilton without giving the circumstances upon which that judgment is founded; and it is imposing upon us, I think, a very onerous duty, to inquire into the principal and primary facts which it is their duty to give as a foundation for that conclusion.

THE QUESTION RULED OUT.

Judge Neilson—There seems to be no real ground of difference, gentlemen. Of course, all either side wants is the knowledge and recollection of this witness bearing upon the question before us, and she is competent to state any facts and circumstances that came under her notice, and those facts and circumstances appearing before the jury, they will be competent to draw conclusions from them. I therefore think the examination should, upon question being raised, take the ordinary course, which, I think, is to state what this witness observed and knew.

Mr. Everts—Let me ask your attention to Mr. Richards's examination by my learned friends. [Reading:] Whilst you were there, Mr. Richards, did you notice, and if you did, please state what degree of affection existed between the husband and the wife in that family?

Judge Neilson—That would be competent with this witness; no doubt about it.

Mr. Everts—[Reading:]

"How was he for cheerfulness in the family? A. Well, for the most part I should say he was rather too cheerful, Sir, if anything fond of joking and punning, sometimes at the expense of others, at my own expense sometimes." Now, the rule of my learned friends would have required Mr. Richards to reproduce every joke and pun of Mr. Tilton, in order that we might know whether he joked and punned.

Mr. Beach—By no means.

Judge Neilson—We have received evidence of that same character from this witness already, and that, of course, is competent. She now, I think, should state those circumstances that came to her observation. She is at liberty to say that a party was kind or unkind in good temper or bad temper, no doubt.

Mr. Porter—Will the stenographer read the last question?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question, as follows: "Without going further into details, will you state whether these were a few out of a great variety of instances that you observed when he was in these moods."

Mr. Porter—That is my question, your Honor.

Mr. Beach—It is objectionable for various reasons.

Judge Neilson—I don't think it is permissible.

Mr. Porter—I except to your Honor's decision.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Did you observe from time to time various instances of this kind? If so, state such of them as occur to you at this moment. A. Yes, Sir; on another instance—it was at a Woman's Rights meeting that was held at Mr. Tilton's, Livingston-st., and I was standing near the folding doors, at the back part of the front parlor. The guests had assembled, and they were walking to and fro, and Mrs. Tilton was following Mr. Tilton. He came over and looked over Mrs. Tilton's shoulder and said, "Elizabeth, stand one side; don't keep near me; I don't wish any comparisons drawn; the contrast is too great." I remember that very distinctly.

Q. Did she leave as he directed? A. What, Sir?

Q. Did she leave his side as he directed? A. Yes, Sir; she stayed one side, did not go near him, I think, again that evening.

Q. When he gave directions from time to time, was she in the habit uniformly of complying with them? A. Yes, Sir.

OTHER IDIOSYNCRASIES OF MR. TILTON.

Q. Will you mention, without further detail, in this regard, some of Mr. Tilton's peculiarities within the domestic circle—within the household, by night or by day? A. Yes, Sir, I think I can state several peculiarities that he had; one in particular was—or two in particular—was hanging pictures in his night clothes; and another was—

Q. One moment. Hanging pictures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you mean pictures that had just been brought to the house? A. No, Sir; pictures that were on the walls, that were hung on the walls, taking them down and hanging them in different places.

Q. Was that a frequent occurrence with him, changing the pictures as they were hung upon the walls? A. Yes, Sir; quite frequent.

Mr. Beach—What! In his night clothes? A. In his night clothes; yes, Sir.

Q. Frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—What else was he in the habit of doing in his night clothes, ever? A. He was in the habit of going around from one bed to the other, trying all the beds in the house before he could make up his mind which one he would sleep on. [Laughter.] I remember distinctly, because on two occasions I had to get up and leave my bed and let him come in and try and see if he did not think it was the softest; and I was then on the second floor, and he came out of Mrs. Tilton's room into mine, saying: "Darling, suppose we try Bessie's bed a little while." Mrs. Tilton following him with a pillow; and I then took Carroll and went up-stairs in the third story, and I had not but just gotten in bed before he came up: "Well, suppose we try this bed a little while;" and I had to get up the second time and go down-stairs. That is the reason I recollect it so distinctly.

Q. Was he in the habit of going about the house in his night clothes when he was restless—

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, Madam.

Mr. Porter—You have not heard the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I heard the question and the answer.

Mr. Porter—You have not heard the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I heard the answer.

Mr. Porter—You interrupted the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I heard the answer, and the question.

Mr. Porter—You interrupted me, the witness answered, and my question is not yet put; it was a partial question.

Judge Nelson—The answer, then, is stricken out. Let us see what the question is.

Mr. Fullerton—I certainly heard a question and an answer.

Mr. Porter—My question is this: Was he in the habit of going about in the manner you have described in his night clothes—

A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—Excuse me.

Mr. Porter—You answer before you hear the whole question.

Mr. Beach—[To the stenographer.] Don't take that answer, Sir; please strike it out.

Mr. Porter—Was he in the habit of doing this when he was not engaged in hanging pictures, or in changing them?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, please; one moment; that is objected to.

Mr. Porter—I have proved two instances; I now want to know if there were any others.

Mr. Beach—The gentleman asks a leading question.

Judge Nelson—There is no objection to it, except it is leading.

Mr. Porter—It is simply to avoid the repetition, Sir, of the last answer. She has stated two classes of cases in which he was in the habit of doing it; I wish to know whether there were any others.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is the question to ask.

Judge Nelson—Well, ask: "What further did you observe in that respect?"

Mr. Beach—Well, I suppose, if your Honor please, we are inquiring now into the relations between this husband and wife to learn whether they were cordial or otherwise.

Judge Nelson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please consider what materiality there is in the truth of these habits of Mr. Tilton, which do not seem to have produced any enmity or disturbance between him and his wife?

Judge Nelson—I think they go to the general question, so that we can come at the facts properly. I think they go to the general question.

Mr. Beach—Well, is it for the purpose of impeaching the chastity of Mr. Tilton, or his credibility?

Judge Nelson—No.

Mr. Beach—Well, they don't tend to shew the relations, Sir, between these two parties.

Judge Nelson—They have to do with the habits of the person in his daily course.

Mr. Beach—They do certainly have to do with his habits, but are we inquiring into the general habits of Mr. Tilton?

Judge Nelson—Yes, Sir; so far as they have relation.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; so far as they tend to shew the relations between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Nelson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—All this evidence, as your Honor knows, is pertinent only upon the question of damages. Your Honor has so said repeatedly during the trial. It is for the purpose of showing that the relations between this husband and wife were of such an uncordial and unhappy character that the act of the defendant in her seduction, if proven against him, has produced no damage to the plaintiff. Now, then, the fact, Sir, that Mr. Tilton was in the habit of hanging pictures in his night clothes in the night, or in the habit of wandering about the house in his night clothes—

Mr. Fullerton—To find a soft bed.

Mr. Beach—To find a soft bed, as is suggested, does not tend in any degree to illustrate the relations which existed between the husband and wife.

Judge Neilson—I think he may prove anything in that regard that touches the daily life and conversation, and manner, but not by leading questions.

Mr. Porter—The hour of adjournment has arrived.

Judge Neilson—Then, gentlemen, will you get ready. The jury will please return at two o'clock.

The Court then took a recess until 2 p. m.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The direct examination of Miss Bessie Turner was resumed at 2 o'clock.

Mr. Porter—I will repeat the question: Was he in the habit of doing this—that is, going around undressed—on other occasions than those in which he was engaged in rehanging the pictures, or in changing his bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it confined to any particular room of the house when he would go about undressed?

Mr. Beach—Not “undressed”!

Mr. Porter—When he went about in his night-clothes?

The Witness—It was confined particularly to the bed rooms.

Q. You spoke of these various moods of his; how frequent were those—sullen moods, I think, you called them; how frequent in later years were those sullen moods of Mr. Tilton's that you say would last for some time? A. Sometimes they would last for two or three days.

Q. How often would he have them? A. Quite frequently.

Q. And, was that so for several years before you left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you hear Mrs. Putnam's testimony? Yes, Sir; I think I heard a part of it.

Q. Were you with Mrs. Tilton on the occasion of the visit to Southport, to which she referred? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton on that occasion in one of those moods described? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON INDIFFERENT TO HIS CHILD'S SICKNESS.

Q. On occasions of sickness in the family, will you state anything which arrested your attention, and especially in the late years of your residence in that family? A. Yes, Sir; I can state one occasion in particular. It was when little Paul was very ill; he was not expected to live; he was very sick with cholera infantum; and Mr. Tilton went out one night and stayed away all night long; Mrs. Tilton was very much troubled—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; we object to that.

Mr. Porter—Did you notice anything in her appearance? A. Yes, Sir; she was very much troubled.

Q. She appeared so? A. Yes, Sir; and said so.

Q. State anything further that followed.

Mr. Beach—We object to what she said.

Mr. Porter—I will ask if she observed anything further in regard to that; and, if so, to state it.

Mr. Beach—I am speaking of the answer which she made, and to which I object.

Judge Neilson—Her statement about what she said is to be stricken out.

Mr. Porter—I have no objection to that being stricken out; I supposed it was on the suggestion of my friend.

Q. Will you state anything that you observed in regard to this? You say she appeared to be in trouble; how did she indicate that, aside from what she said? A. She indicated it by walking up and down the room, and saying—

Mr. Beach—No, no; not saying.

By Mr. Porter—By walking up and down the room? A. Yes, Sir; and going up and down stairs and listening; whenever she would hear a carriage pass, she would go and listen, and she said—

Q. No matter what she said; for whom was she listening? A. For Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Wait, wait; we object.

By Mr. Porter—Did you know for whom she was listening? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I submit that she cannot know, except from what was said, or by stating circumstances; and those circumstances she should state, and not state conclusions.

Mr. Porter—That is what I am calling for; and I wish to avoid asking what was said, but simply the general fact of what she saw—that she was listening for her husband at a late hour of the night.

Judge Neilson—Instruct your witness to state the general fact, and not refer to a conversation.

Mr. Beach—It is impossible that she can know for whom Mrs. Tilton was listening, except from what Mrs. Tilton said, or from some action. She cannot state what was said, but she can detail any action.

Mr. Porter—She can detail any fact which was within her observation. She shows first, that Mrs. Tilton was restless, walking to and fro, going to the door and listening whenever she heard a carriage approach; I want to know, now, if she did know at the time, for whom she was upon the alert?

Judge Neilson—You can ask her that. [To the witness]: Do you know for whom it was she was going to the door? A. I know that it was for Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Porter—Did he come home that night? A. No, Sir; he came home in the middle of the day; the next morning.

Q. When he came home what occurred? I would ask you first, however, whether he was aware what the condition of Paul was? A. Oh! yes.

Q. Were apprehensions expressed as to his recovery? I mean, had there been, before that? A. I think that the doctor had said that he was dangerously ill.

Q. When Mr. Tilton came home what transpired between him and Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton said to him when he came into the room: “Oh, Theodore darling; I am so glad that you have come home; I have been so troubled about you, that every time I would hear a carriage—”

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor think this evidence is competent—what passed between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton?

Judge Neilson—I think that he can call it out if he thinks proper.

Mr. Beach—Have they any more right upon that subject than we?

Judge Neilson—No; but it is in the presence of a third person.

Mr. Porter—[To the witness]: Go on. A. Mrs. Tilton said: "Oh, Theodore, darling, I am so glad you have come home; I feared that something had happened you last night. How could you go away, darling, and stay all night, and not send me word, when you knew that little Paul was so ill?" Mrs. Tilton had sent me around the next morning to Mr. Briggs, to know what had become of Mr. Tilton.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton do when she said this to him? A. He didn't look at all pleasant, and threw himself on the lounge and said: "Oh! well, it was immaterial; it didn't make any difference, one way or the other."

Q. What did she do then? A. Mrs. Tilton knelt down beside him and stroked his hair.

Q. Little Paul died, did he not? A. He died after that.

Q. Was it shortly after? A. I think it was; I am not sure.

HOW HUSBAND AND WIFE TREATED EACH OTHER'S FRIENDS.

Q. Will you state any peculiarity which you may have observed between them, in regard to the pleasure which either took in the associates and admirers of the other? How was it with Mr. Tilton about her friends, and how was it with his friends? A. Do you mean how they admired each other?

Q. I will come to that presently. What I am asking now is whether Mr. Tilton seemed to be pleased with the admiration of others for his wife, and whether she was with the admiration of others for her husband.

Mr. Beach—I object to that question—whether she seemed to be pleased; I think that you should have called for the facts.

Mr. Porter—I would like to ask a question of that kind, if allowed—whether he liked her friends, and she liked his? A. I think Mrs. Tilton always liked to have Mr. Tilton admired.

Mr. Beach—One moment. I object. The witness is not giving facts.

Judge Neilson—The counsel intended to call for facts in his question.

Mr. Porter—Do I understand your Honor to say that we may call for facts and incidents?

Judge Neilson—I understood you to call for facts and circumstances; but this is asking an opinion.

Mr. Porter—I will call for incidents and illustrations of the action in that regard. [To the witness]: How did he treat her friends as compared with his own?

Mr. Beach—I object to that—calling upon the witness to make a comparison of that sort.

Judge Neilson—That is objectionable. Ask—What did she observe with respect to either?

Mr. Beach—I think that she should give examples or illustrations, and not give her own judgment.

Mr. Porter—I think that the rule is that we may not only give a particular instance, or general facts, where there is particular pertinence in them, but that we may also give the result of general observations.

Judge Neilson—In some cases you can. I think that it will be easy to examine this witness as to anything she may have observed.

Mr. Porter—That is the very point I am inquiring upon—whether she observed how he treated her friends.

Judge Neilson—And if so, state what she observed.

Mr. Porter—Yes; that is it. [To the witness]: And if so state what you observed.

The Witness—Do you mean to ask how Mrs. Tilton treated her husband's friends?

Q. How Mr. Tilton treated her friends—those who particularly admired her? A. I know one or two instances where he did not like them, and did not want them there, because they admired Mrs. Tilton so much.

Q. How was it with her in respect to his friends? A. She was always very kind to them, and did all in her power to make the friends he brought to the house comfortable, and to make it pleasant for them in every way.

THE BEGINNING OF THE CHANGE FOR THE WORSE.

Q. You have stated that Mr. Tilton was generally kind, especially during the earlier years, but that there was a change afterwards. I would like you to indicate how that change exhibited itself in any of the affairs of the family that occurred under your observation. Is there anything that you observed in regard to the servants, for instance? A. Yes, Sir. On one occasion when he had been away (I think that he had been away a few days, or for a week, perhaps on a lecturing trip), he came home while Kate Smith, the wet-nurse, was there, and there had been some difficulty about her, and Mr. Tilton was asked his advice about discharging her, and he answered her very abruptly.

Mr. Beach—State what he said.

Mr. Porter—That is just what I wish. A. He said that she must attend to her own affairs; that if she wished to keep Kate Smith, to keep her; and if she wished to discharge her, to discharge her; and that she must not come to him with her household affairs; that it was none of his business, and that he did not wish to have anything to do with it.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton say in reply? A. Mrs. Tilton looked very meek, as she always did when he rebuked her, and said, "Darling, I did not mean to trouble you. I only wanted your advice about it." He said: "Very well; you can do as you please about it; I have nothing to say about the matter."

Q. Was he in the habit of expressing his mind frequently to Mrs. Tilton? A. His mind about what?

Q. On occasions when he was displeased.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Q. Was he in the habit of scolding Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. That is objected to.

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When he was in these moods ?

Mr. Fullerton—You cannot prove a habit in that way.

Mr. Porter—I submit that I can ; and that that is precisely what the law allows us to do.

Judge Neilson—I think that you can show facts which amount to a habit. You can show that.

Mr. Porter—I will refer your Honor to the case of McKee v. Nelson (4 Cowen, 355), in which it is said :

So, also, in an action for breach of promise of marriage, a witness, who has had opportunity of observation, may testify whether or not one of the parties was sincerely attached to the other. The evidence of such attachment is usually composed of minutiae which cannot be detailed to the jury.

I am seeking general results. I submit that the witness has had means of observation. If they require instances they can elicit them on cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—Go, on, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is no authority in this case. There they proved a condition of things without giving the language. They proved what was the degree of affection existing between two people by their conduct, by their demeanor toward each other. No words need be expressed to show that. Affection is not always manifested by words. Now they propose to show whether Mr. Tilton was in the habit of scolding his wife. Well, scolding is not by gestures, it is by words. Therefore they propose to prove what was said upon different occasions, so frequent as to amount to a habit of scolding. Your Honor will perceive that the authority cited does not bear them out in their proposition.

Mr. Porter—Will my friend permit me, then, to add another authority, which may be more satisfactory to himself and to the Court. In a case in 2 Starkey, 191, it was held that, in an action for crimen con., the judgment formed by a witness, during her acquaintance with the wife, of her affection for her husband, from the anxiety which the wife had expressed concerning her husband, and from her mode of speaking of him during his absence from her, was admissible. In the case of Ball v. Ball, (1 S. & T., 565) the action was for divorce: and it was there held that the general statement of the solicitor, that he did not consider it a happy marriage, was admissible evidence. So of the testimony of a servant, that the husband complained of too much company. But we need not multiply instances or authorities upon this subject, my question was put in conformity with them.

Judge Neilson—The witness can answer.

Mr. Fullerton—There is nothing in those authorities bearing upon this question at all.

Mr. Porter—Do you propose to overrule the Court ?

Mr. Fullerton—I proposed to say what I did say.

Mr. Beach—If he proposed to overrule the Court, he was only following your example.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor admits the testimony, I have nothing further to say; only I should not like to have it admitted upon the strength of those authorities, because they do not bear upon it at all.

Judge Neilson—I admit it.

Mr. Beach—We except.

A. Yes, Sir; I have heard him scold her frequently.

Q. Will you state the manner of doing it? not the words, but the manner. Did he do it before others and in private, or only before others? A. He did it before his children and myself.

Q. Was he ever in the habit of doing it elsewhere? A. Yes, Sir; I have heard him.

Q. Will you state his habit in that regard? A. He has had her in a room, with the door locked, several times, talking very angrily and loudly.

Q. Did you ever on those occasions hear any profane expressions used towards her? A. Yes, Sir; I have heard him swear at her.

Q. How long would she remain with him in the room, with the door locked on the inside, while he was expressing his mind? A. Sometimes for three or four hours.

Q. When she came out from one of those lectures what was her condition usually? A. She was very much troubled, and her eyes were always red, as if she had been weeping.

Q. On these occasions did she raise her voice when he raised his? A. No, Sir, I never heard her. She seemed to be—

Mr. Beach—Wait!

Judge Neilson—You have answered the question, Madam.

Mr. Porter—Was this a matter that occurred at different times? Was this locking himself up with her in a room, and lecturing her, a thing that occurred at various times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And through the various years of the latter portion of your residence there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On any of those occasions, was the bell as usual rung for meals when they did not come down? A. Yes, Sir; on two occasions that I remember.

Q. Did you observe any peculiarity in his treatment of her after gentlemen had called upon her, and if so, state it? A. I remember one instance in particular after a gentleman had been there; it was on a Sabbath evening, and they were in a room, and he was talking very angrily to her.

Q. Was that gentleman Mr. Beecher or another person? A. It was not Mr. Beecher at the time I refer to.

Q. After the visits of any of the gentlemen who were in the habit of coming there will you state whether he was accustomed to require from her a statement of what had occurred between them—of the conversations?

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor allow these leading questions?

Judge Neilson—I do not like them to be so leading.

Mr. Porter—I think the question is objectionable in that form, and I will change it. [To the witness.] Will you state whether, after gentlemen had been there, anything was said by him to her as to what had taken place, or as to what the conversation had been? A. No, Sir; not that I heard of.

MR. TILTON'S LECTURES ON ECONOMY.

Q. Were there occasions when the subject of economy in the affairs of the household was a matter of conversation between them? A. Yes, Sir; that was one of the instances when they were locked in the room, and he was talking to her in a very angry tone of voice. That called my attention to it, while I was in the sitting-room, where I could hear; and I heard her say: "Well, darling, I do as well as I know how. I make every dollar go just as far as I possibly can;" and then she began crying. I heard her crying.

Q. Who had the general charge of all the household matters and of the expenditures? A. Mrs. Tilton had the entire charge.

Q. What sort of a table was she required to provide, if any?

Mr. Beach—One moment. I object to that question—as to what sort of a table she was required to provide.

Mr. Porter—"If any," I said. If the objection be that the question is leading, I will modify it. Will you state anything that was peculiar about Mr. Tilton, in regard to his requirements concerning the table, or the food upon the table? A. He was very fastidious about his food and the way in which it was cooked. He would give an order for breakfast at 8 o'clock, and on one or two occasions he came down at about 10, or perhaps later, and was very angry indeed because the beefsteak they had for breakfast that morning, or on those mornings, was dried up—it having been standing so long on the stove after it was cooked that it was dried.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton say by way of explanation or apology if anything? A. Mrs. Tilton said that he had ordered breakfast at eight o'clock, and that she knew the steak was dried up, because it had been standing so long; that he could not think it would be any different after waiting so long, but that it would have been good if he had come down to breakfast at eight o'clock—at the time he ordered breakfast.

Q. Will you state whether she made any distinction between him and the other members of the family as to the food furnished? A. Yes, Sir; she very frequently had a little dish of something extra prepared for him—such as quails, or oysters (in the season when oysters were very dear)—any delicate dish in that way was always placed before him at the table.

Q. Was there any complaint on his part of the disposition which she proposed to make of what he had left among the children? A. Yes, Sir; he would offer it to her sometimes, and she would say: "Let the children have it if there is anything left; I do not care for it; let the children have it if you do not want it;" and on one of those occasions, when one of the children remarked that she was one of the most unselfish women that they had ever seen, he turned around and said: "Your mother is one of the most selfish women that ever lived."

Q. Do you remember, on one of those occasions, when her economy was the subject of conversation, your going to the room while they were locked up together; and, if so, state the conversation? A. That is the time that I have stated—that my attention was called to—when he was talking very loud. That is the time I have stated.

Mr. Beach—She has already given that.

MR. BEECHER'S VISITS IN 1870.

Q. Was Mr. Beecher in the habit of visiting at Mr. and Mrs. Tilton's? A. Yes, Sir; occasionally.

Q. Did he do so occasionally, down to the Fall of 1870 or down to 1870? A. Yes, Sir, I think he did.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton sometimes at home and sometimes absent on those occasions? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When at home how did he treat Mr. Beecher? A. Very pleasantly, very kindly, as he treated most of his friends that came there—very cordially.

Q. How did Mrs. Tilton treat him, whether her husband was there or not; how did she treat Mr. Beecher? A. When I saw him with her, she treated him pleasantly and kindly, as she did all of her friends. I did not notice any difference.

Q. What was the bearing and deportment of Mr. Beecher towards her? A. Very gentlemanly and pleasant.

Q. Was it the same when he visited her, and her husband was there, as when he visited her in the absence of her husband? A. Just the same; I never noticed any difference.

Q. Did you ever observe any impropriety in the conduct of either towards the other? A. Any impropriety? No, Sir; never.

Q. How did she receive him, as compared with other friends who were in the habit of visiting there? A. Very hospitably and kindly, just as she did all her friends. I never noticed any change.

Q. When Mr. Beecher was there, was he in the habit of giving his attention to the children as well as to Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I remember on one occasion when he went up into the sitting-room and was talking and playing with the children.

Q. Were there a number of other gentlemen visitors who were in the habit of calling at the house upon Mr.—Mrs. Tilton? A. A number of ministers, do you say?

Q. Gentlemen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you name some gentlemen who were in the habit of calling there? A. There was Mr. Bates, and Mr. Ovington, Mr. Green, the Rev. Gilbert Haven, and the Rev. Robert Hatfield, and the Rev. Mr.—Dr. Leavitt, connected with The Independent; Mr. Johnson.

Q. Was Mr. Greeley in the habit of calling? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was her treatment of Mr. Beecher similar to the treatment of those gentlemen as they called? A. Yes, Sir, just the same. I never noticed any difference.

Q. Would you recognize these photographs, Miss Turner? A. Yes, Sir; do you want me to name them?

Q. Just look at them.

Mr. Shearman—Speak louder. Yes, Sir, I recognize these I have in my hand. This is Judge Morse's picture; this is Mr. Greeley's; that is Dr. Leavitt's; that is Mr. Beecher's; that is Frederick Douglass's, and that is Mr. Bates's.

Mr. Porter—I believe the photographs have been already marked as exhibits. [To the witness.] Were those photographs that you were familiar with in the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were there photographs of Mr. Beecher about the house? A. Yes, Sir. There were two or three, perhaps three or four different kinds.

Q. Where were they; in what portions of the house? A. I think there was a cabinet card of Mr. Beecher in the sitting-room, second story, mantelpiece, and there was photographs of him lying around the sitting-room, on the table, in a card basket, or something that they kept photographs in.

Q. Were there books which had been presented to Mr. or Mrs. Tilton, about the house? A. Books that had been presented?

Q. Yes, books presented by Mr. Beecher. A. Yes, Sir, I think I can name three. There was "Norwood," and "Notes from Plymouth Pulpit" and "Life Thoughts." I don't remember any others just now.

Q. Where were they? A. They were, I think—

Q. With the other books in the house? A. Yes, Sir; I think "Norwood" was; I saw it sometimes on the table in the parlor; sometimes it was up in the sitting-room.

Q. Do you recollect a book entitled "Bampton's Lectures on the Divinity of Christ"? A. No, Sir; I don't think I do.

Q. You don't recollect it. Do you recollect any book there entitled "Lectures on the Divinity of Christ"? A. No, Sir; I can't say that I do.

MR. TILTON'S OVERTURES TO MISS TURNER.

Q. You don't recollect it, Miss Turner; you have mentioned a habit of Mr. Tilton in regard to his being out of his room at night. Was there any particular occasion on which he visited your room at night where there was a conversation between you? A. Yes, Sir; there was one particular occasion, in 1867, I think it was.

Q. Do you remember what the conversation was on that occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you state generally? A. Yes, Sir; I had gone to bed in the second story bedroom, front room, off of the sitting-room, connected by folding doors, and I had—I had not been in bed very long before Mr. Tilton came in and said he had come to kiss me good night. I was lying on the side of the bed next the door; he went round on the other side and leaned over the bed and kissed me good-night, and he— Shall I give all the conversation?

Q. Yes, if you please. A. He stroked my forehead and my hair, and said what nice soft hair I had, and how nice and soft my flesh was—my forehead, and then he put his hand—was putting his hand in my neck, and I took his hand out; and he says, "Why, Bessie, my dear, you are painfully modest;" he says, "Why, those caresses, those are all right; people in the best society do all those things, and it is perfectly proper. Nobody but people that had impure minds think of such things as that as not being right." And I said I could not help what they did in the best class of society; that I had my own ideas of what was proper and what was modest, and I was going to carry them out; if I didn't think it was proper for him to put his hand in my neck, I was not going to let him do it; it didn't make any difference what people thought or did in the best classes of society. He then laid down, and asked me if I did not—if I would not like to be married. Why, I asked him, what in the world put that in his head? Well, he said, I was a—an affectionate and nice girl, and I ought to be married; I ought to have a good husband. I said that I supposed when the time came—the right man came along—perhaps I would get married. But I didn't think getting married was the chief end and aim in life. It didn't trouble me very much, and that if I was married, there was one thing very sure, I didn't think I would ever have a literary man for a husband; and he then asked me if I didn't think some people had affinities for each other; well, I asked him what he meant by that—what he meant by "affinities;" and he said that when a man saw a woman that he loved she should be his affinity and they live together as man and wife; and that was what was meant by "affinities" for each other. And then he went on to say that if I would allow him to caress me and love me as he wanted to do, that no harm should come to me—and that a physical expression of love were just the same as a kiss or a caress. He then went on to describe again—to tell that he knew ministers that caressed girls and married women—it was all perfectly right and proper and beautiful. And he then told me that I was a very strange child. He says, "Bessie, you have some very singular ideas," and kissed me good night, and left.

Q. Was there any—you mention 1867 as the date of this— A. I think it was 1867; yes, Sir.

Q. How is that? A. I think it was 1867; yes, Sir.

Q. How, on another occasion, a year or two after that, did anything occur during the night which particularly impressed you, and, if so, state the circumstances in regard to it? A. Yes, Sir; it was in the Summer of 1868. Mr. Greeley was there—Mr. Horace Greeley, making him a visit; he was there some three or four weeks, I think; and one night I had gone to bed, and was awakened from my sleep by seeing a man of tall figure standing over me; and I jumped and said, "Who is there?" and Mr. Tilton said, "Hush! it is only Mr. Tilton," and then I think I raised myself up, and I—it seemed as if I was in a strange place, all whirled around, because I had gone to bed in the second story back room—bedroom—and his room was next to mine, and I had gone to bed in one of the rooms—in my room, and found myself in his room, and I says, "What do you—what did you bring me here for; what are you doing?" and he said that he felt lonely, and he wanted somebody to love him; and I said, "You would not have done this if Mrs. Tilton had been home; you should not take liberties when Mrs. Tilton is away that you would not take when she is at home," and I then got up and left the bed, and went to my own room and locked the door.

Q. On the following morning, did you meet him? A. Did I meet him?

Q. Yes, at the breakfast table the following morning; I left a little while after breakfast.

Q. But after that, you met him at the breakfast table? A. At the breakfast table the next morning, before I left.

Q. Did he make any allusion to what had transpired the night before? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he say anything to you? A. No, Sir, nothing more than "Good morning." I never said a word; there was nothing said at the breakfast table at all.

Q. Had there previously been conversation about your going to Southport—Keyport? A. Keyport—yes, Sir; he said about a week before that, that I had better go down and see Kattie, meaning his sister, a little while, and help his mother Tilton, help her about the house.

Q. What did you do that morning after breakfast, when he had left? A. I left the house and went to Keyport in the—think I took the afternoon boat; in fact, I don't think any boat does go in the morning.

Q. Well, how long did you remain at Keyport; some little time? A. Some little time; I think about two weeks, or perhaps longer.

Q. When you returned to town, did you go to Mrs. Tilton's directly? A. No, Sir; I went around to Mrs. Bates's house, where Mrs. Morse was.

Q. Why did you not return to Mr. Tilton's? A. Because I didn't wish to—

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to. One moment.

Mr. Porter—I propose to show your Honor that she did not return there until she could ascertain that Mrs. Tilton had returned, and she did ascertain.

Judge Neilson—Show that.

Mr. Porter—It is only the general fact, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Oh! no; you asked the reason—show that, if you wish.

Mr. Porter—Why did you not return?

Judge Neilson—Oh! no.

Mr. Beach—objected to.

The Witness—Why didn't I return?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—You ask the witness a reason, which I don't think is correct. The purpose to prove that she did not return until Mrs. Tilton came back; that would be correct.

Mr. Porter—Did you ascertain—afterwards ascertain whether Mrs. Tilton was in town? A. Yes, Sir; I ascertained from Mrs. Morse.

Q. Did you then return to Mr. Tilton's? A. I then went right around; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you communicate what had transpired between Mr. Tilton and yourself to Mrs. Tilton? A. Not at that time, Sir.

Q. Did you at any time prior to your visit to Marietta?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

The Witness—No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not objected to then.

The Witness—Not prior to my—

Q. Yes. A. Oh! do you mean before my return?

Q. No, I mean before you went there. A. Before I went to Marietta?

Q. Before you went to Marietta—you did not communicate this to Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you go to Marietta? A. I went to Marietta in the Fall of— I don't know whether it was in the Fall or Spring of 1870, I think it was.

Mr. Beach—1870, did you say? A. 1870, I think.

Mr. Porter—Was it in the Winter or Spring? A. 1870, I think it was.

Q. Do you remember the month that you went? A. I think it was in the Spring, Sir.

Q. In the Spring? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was at all events, as early as that? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. You remained there on a visit to Mrs. Putnam? A. Yes, Sir, I remained there about eight or nine months.

Q. Well, then, we shall be able to ascertain the time better; when did you go home? A. We came home—we left Marietta on the 9th of November, I think, 1870.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton visit Marietta while you were there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did she go there? A. When did Mrs. Tilton go there?

Q. When did Mrs. Tilton go to Marietta—when she—before your return on that visit of hers, before your return? A. We returned the 9th of November; I think she was there perhaps a month or six weeks before we returned.

Q. So that it must have been in the neighborhood of October when she went—September or October—did you return with Mrs. Tilton when she came home? A. From Marietta?

Q. From Marietta. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the occasion of your going with her? A. Why, Mrs. Tilton had been very—had had a great many fainting spells—

Mr. Fullerton—That is unimportant, Sir.

Mr. Porter—No matter about that; I waive that; the Stenographer need not take it. [To the witness.] Was she feeble? A. Yes, Sir; I came with her because I did not think she was able to come alone, and I wanted to be with her.

Mr. Porter—That is the material point I want to elucidate. [To the witness.] On your return, who met you on your arrival at Jersey City? A. Mr. Tilton met me at the cars.

Q. With a carriage? A. What did you say?

Q. He met you with a carriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And took Mrs. Tilton and you home? A. And Carroll; yes, Sir.

Q. And Carroll; that was the child? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what time did you reach home? A. We reached home, I think, between 7 and 8 in the morning, in time for breakfast.

MR. TILTON'S HARD WORDS TO HIS WIFE.

Q. You took breakfast with them that morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who occupied at breakfast the usual seat at table of Mrs. Tilton? A. Miss Ellen Dennis.

Q. Was she there acting as housekeeper? A. What do you say?

Q. Was she there acting as housekeeper? A. Yes, Sir, she seemed to be, in the absence of Mrs. Tilton, housekeeper and mistress both.

Q. Who else was at the table that you remember? A. That morning when we returned?

Q. Yes, anybody else outside of the family? A. Yes, Sir; there was a lady there.

Q. Who was she? A. Miss Susan B. Anthony.

Q. Will you state what occurred at the breakfast table, if you please? A. Nothing of—

Q. Special? A. Special at the breakfast table, no, Sir.

Q. At dinner who took Mrs. Tilton's place at the table? A. Miss Ellen Dennis, Sir.

Q. Was Miss Anthony there then? No, Sir.

Q. Will you state anything that occurred? A. Yes, Sir. Mrs.

Tilton took her seat at the table beside Mr. Tilton, and the moment she sat down she began crying, and Mr. Tilton was very polite, saying, "My dear, won't you have a bit of this?" or, "My dear, won't you have a bit of that?" and she was crying so she could hardly answer him, the tears were running down in her plate, and she excused herself and got up from the table and went into the front parlor and sat down and played some plaintive little air on the piano. After she had left the table Miss Ellen Dennis looked at Mr. Tilton, and said, "What a strange woman Elizabeth is! What is she crying about? Any one that has such a devoted husband, a nice home, and everything heart could wish for—I think she is a very singular woman." Mr. Tilton never made her an answer but he leaned his face on his hand, and said he: "Bessie, my dear, don't you think Elizabeth is demented? Don't you think she acts like a crazy woman?" Said I—I looked him steadily in the eyes—said I: "No, I don't; but I wonder that you haven't driven her in the lunatic asylum years ago." [Applause.]

Q. What did Mr. Tilton do then? A. He immediately rose—he looked very white and very angrily at me—he rose from the table, then went from the dining-room into the back parlor, and from there into the front parlor, the two being connected by folding doors, and he tried to shut to the folding doors, and they would not—they would not shut tight; there was a little crack in them. He seemed to be working with the key; he was working with the key, and he then went in, or I heard the two parlor doors shut or locked.

Q. The other doors? A. Yes, Sir, from the hall into the front parlor; and he then—then [he came back; I saw him at this door, trying to shut the door again, trying to lock it—seemed to be trying to lock it, working with the key, and the door would not shut, it was open on a little crack, and he was—then I heard his voice, talking very angrily—in a very angry tone of voice.

Q. One moment. I want to inquire of you what led you to follow him, if anything?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Porter—On what ground?

Mr. Fullerton—We are not to fathom the depths of a woman's curiosity.

Mr. Porter—It was the fact that she went from curiosity; that is a proper fact.

Judge Neilson—Well, she went; if she was called, or if she went without, that is a fact you can prove, of course.

Q. I ask if there was any fact, anything that led her to follow; and if so, what it was—what that fact was?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, that is just what we object to. If she did follow, that is all the gentleman has a right to prove, and he can prove what she observed after following, but the object or motive which prompted her to follow he cannot prove.

Judge Neilson—Which led her to follow.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Now, will you answer?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor admit it?

Judge Neilson—I don't think she ought to express it in that way.

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose not.

Mr. Porter—I did not hear, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—The question "What led her to go?" does not seem to be proper.

Mr. Porter—That is not my question, your Honor.

Mr. Beach—Oh! yes it was.

Mr. Porter—My question is, was there any fact which led you to follow her, and if so, state what it was.

Judge Neilson—Well, now, "which led you to follow her" is what is objected to.

Mr. Porter—Certainly no one else can know what led her. She does know, and we have a right to have the jury know what she knows on that point.

Mr. Beach—The gentlemen have a right to know any facts that occurred there.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Beach—But how they operated on the mind of the witness, or created motives upon her part, is not material, Sir.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Porter—I suppose, Sir, that if a witness is called upon to know why he went out on a certain occasion at night, he may answer "Because I heard the alarm of fire."

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—I suppose that if a person goes into a room and finds another prostrate on the floor, that he has a right to state what called him to the room, and he may say, "A cry of distress." I understand that if a person is found in a position of menace or violence, or of wrong to another, no right can be more clear than to show that it was preceded by a threat—whether that threat be in one form or another is immaterial. If your Honor objects that my question is not leading, I will put it in a leading form; but if your Honor assumes that I am not inquiring for a fact—

Judge Neilson—I merely suggest to you that with your faculty you could easily illustrate and make a question that was not quite right appear perfectly correct, of course. This is of very small importance. Did anything occur? She can state what occurred. If she went she can state that fact, and then what occurred afterwards; the Jury will see what led her to go.

Mr. Beach—May I say, Sir, that in regard to the illustrations of the gentleman, in the cases which he supposes, it would be perfectly proper for the witness to say: "I heard an alarm of fire, and I went out;" "I heard one man threatening another, with angry language, and I went there;" or, "I heard a fall in the neighboring room, and I went there." But it is not competent for the witness to prove the reason, except by the statement of facts, from which the Court and the Jury may infer the motive or the reason which led to the particular conduct.

Judge Neilson—In this particular instance the reason is quite apparent.

Mr. Porter—I beg to call your Honor's attention to the fact that during the examination of Mr. Moulton and of Mr. Tilton plaintiff's counsel were permitted again and again to inquire, "What led you to do such thing?" The right to it is so clear that we never objected to it. My friend, in reply to me, admits that, in the very case I put, as to what it was that led a person to leave his bed at midnight, he might reply that it was a cry of fire.

Mr. Beach—I did not admit that, Mr. Porter.

Mr. Porter—If he did not admit it, I assert it; and, if your Honor decides otherwise, I must take an exception.

Judge Neilson—The point is of no importance whatever, not of the slightest importance. Go on, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Is my question overruled?

Judge Neilson—I recommend you to modify it.

Mr. Porter—I cannot modify it.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, I don't overrule it.

Mr. Porter—Will your Honor excuse me? Mr. Evans and I have devoted much time to the examination of this case. We think, with our information, we are more competent than your Honor at this stage of the case, to speak of the importance of the evidence which we introduce.

Judge Neilson—I have been acting upon that theory throughout; and I have been admonished—

Mr. Porter—[To the witness]: Proceed.

The Witness—What led me to—

Mr. Porter—What led you to follow them? A. What led me was Mr. Tilton's very angry look; the way he looked at me when he left the table, that I felt intuitively—

Mr. Porter—No matter what you felt.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Mr. Porter—I have just stricken it out myself; I have rejected that part of the evidence?

Judge Neilson—Well; go on.

Mr. Porter—The look, of course that we have; and Mr. Beach's objection was to the latter part of the answer, to which I also objected.

Judge Neilson—Well!

The Witness—Shall I proceed?

MR. TILTON MAKES AN UNMANLY USE OF HIS FISTS.

Mr. Porter—When you went into the adjoining room, what did you do—you went into the back parlor from the dining room? A. I stood at the folding doors; they were open on a crack; and I saw Mr. Tilton right over near Mrs. Tilton with his fist going this way [with a gesture] very emphatically, and talking very angrily; and when I heard him say: "You have brought that girl on to me against me, and, damn it, she shall leave this house," I opened the door and I rushed in. Said I; "Theodore Tilton, this is not the first time I have heard you swearing at your wife; and you shall not damn her for my sake." He said: "Leave the room." Said I: "I won't leave the room." Said he: "Damn you, leave the room." Said I: "I will not leave the room, and I will stand by Mrs. Tilton if I die in the attempt." He then gave me a terrible blow that hurled me the opposite side of the room, and I fell, striking my head violently against the door. He came forward, perfectly bland—you would think nothing in the world had ever happened—so composed and so calm.

"Why," he says, "why, Beessie, my dear, you tripped and fell, didn't you?" [Laughter and applause.] I turned around to him; said I: "Theodore Tilton, are you a fool, or do you take me for one?"

Judge Neilson—[to the audience]: I must ask the gentlemen again to be more quiet; this interrupts the proceedings of the Court.

MR. TILTON ACCUSES HIS WIFE TO HER FACE.

Mr. Porter—What then took place? A. What, Sir?

Q. What took place then? A. He then changed the subject entirely, and he said—he said, "Oh!"—he was sitting down in the chair, and he says: "Oh, Beessie, my dear, it is no wonder my gray hairs are going down with sorrow to the grave," and took out his handkerchief and was wiping his eyes. He says "No, my dear, you are mistaken in the woman you place so much confidence in." Mrs. Tilton then got up off the piano stool and said, "Why shouldn't Beessie place confidence in me? She has no confidence in you; she has no protector in you. You have offered to ruin her." He then stood up and straightened himself very straight, and put his fingers under his coat the way [illustrating]; said he, "Beessie, my dear, did I ever attempt, in any word, shape or form to ruin you or take any improper liberties with you?" Said I, "Yes, you did. You remember that time you was talking about affinities, and the time you lifted me out of my bed and carried me into your bed?" "Oh, my dear," he says, "you are excited; you are laboring under a false—mistake. No," said he, sitting down in the chair—said he, "the fact is this: Elizabeth is so in the habit of having men fondle her bosoms and her legs that she judges me by herself." He then got—he then turned over to this side of the room and said he, "Do you see that red lounge? Time and time again have I seen Elizabeth and Henry Ward Beecher having sexual intercourse on that red lounge," and not only the red lounge but he spoke of the chair. Mrs. Tilton looked very earnestly at him and said, "Oh! Theodore, Theodore, how can you tell that child such base lies?" He then asked me if I knew what sexual intercourse meant, and if I did not, he would tell me. [Applause.]

Judge Neilson—Will the officers please keep order in this audience instead of standing there idle. Send the officers round to see that order is kept.

An Officer—The officers are stationed around the room.

Judge Neilson—I know they are; they stand there. I do not see why they are there.

THE MOST SWEEPING CHARGES OF ALL.

Q. When you left that room what further took place? A. When I left?

Q. Yes, after this conversation. Was there anything further said that you now recall? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what was it? A. The last words he said were that that red lounge had been consecrated to their sexual intercourse. Those were the last words that he said at that time.

Q. Will you now state what took place after that, when he said that red lounge and so on? What did Mrs. Tilton do?

A. Mrs. Tilton went up stairs, and I went up stairs with her.

Q. What was Mrs. Tilton's condition then as she left the room? A. She looked very much distressed and sad, and troubled.

Q. And she went off up stairs? A. She went up stairs; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, go along. A. She went up stairs in the bedroom and shut the door, and I went in the sitting room. Shall I go on and tell what happened?

Q. Go right on. A. Then he came to me and said he wanted to see me, Mr. Tilton did, and he took me in the second story back room, in his room, and related this story over and over again about the lounge and the chair, and added that not only with Mr. Beecher had she done so, but mentioned three gentlemen's names in connection with Mr. Beecher.

Q. What names did he mention? A. Mr. Bates, Dr. Carroll Dunham and Mr. Ovington.

Q. Did he state anything further in that conversation in regard to the paternity of his children? A. Yes, Sir; he said little Paul that was dead was Mr. Beecher's, and that he didn't claim any of his children but Florence, and that Mr. Beecher preached to forty or twenty of his mistresses every Sabbath, naming two ladies in the congregation.

Q. Who was this Mr. Bates of whom you speak? A. Mr. Bates?

Q. Yes, the first-named gentleman? A. Mr. John Bates, I think,

Q. John or James? A. Mr. James Bates.

Q. A gentleman who was in the habit of calling there? A. Yes, Sir; he used to call occasionally.

Q. The one whose photograph I handed to you a short time since? A. Yes, Sir, that is Mr. Bates.

Mr. Porter—"Ex. D. 112, for identification."

Q. When he took you into the room and held this conversation with you, what did you say or do? A. What did I say?

Q. Say or do; yes? A. I said that I didn't believe there was a word of truth in it, that it was all wicked lies.

Q. What did he then do? A. He said I would live to see the day when I was mistaken—find out I was mistaken.

Q. In what way did he speak—was there any reference to his magnanimity? A. Yes, Sir; he said that his mother had laid her hands on his head and blessed him when he had told his mother this, and she had said, "Theodore, what a magnanimous man you have been." He said that he knelt down and she put her hands on his head and blessed him, and said these words.

Q. Had you ever happened to hear the term "sexual intercourse" before the conversation that you speak of in the parlor? A. No, Sir; I never heard it before in my life.

Q. Did he use this term again in this private conversation with you? A. Yes; he repeated just what he had said in the parlor, just that way,

Q. And did he state anything on the subject of the import of that word? A. Yes, Sir,

Q. Did he explain to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did he keep you there? A. It was dark—near dark when I left the room.

Q. When you came out of this room what occurred? A. Mrs. Tilton was coming out of the bedroom, and I had my hand over my eyes, and I said: "Oh, Mrs. Tilton, I feel as if I was all in a whirl; I feel as if I had been stunned."

Q. Well, what occurred after that? Did you tell her what he had been saying to you—did you repeat it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you go after that, and when? A. After I had spoken to Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. I think I went in the front sitting room; I could not say positively.

THE WIFE'S FLIGHT TO HER MOTHER.

Q. Where did you and Mrs. Tilton go some time after that, and when? A. Mrs. Tilton I think went in the sitting room too.

Q. Did you and Mrs. Tilton afterwards leave Mr. Tilton's house and go to Mrs. Morse's? A. Yes, Sir, we left; I don't remember whether we left that night, or the next morning.

Q. You think it was the next morning? A. I think it was the next morning; yes, Sir.

Q. Were the children taken? A. The next morning I think the children went with their mother around to Mrs. Morse's, and myself.

Q. Now, after Mrs. Tilton had gone to Mrs. Morse's did Mr. Tilton come there on any occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And if so, what transpired? When was it, and what transpired? About what time was it, first—how long after this occurrence of your coming home? A. He came that night.

Q. The night after you had left? A. Suppose we went to Mrs. Morse's this morning, and to-night he came around.

Q. What took place then? A. Mrs. Tilton went down to see him.

Q. Where were you? A. Where was I?

Q. Yes? A. I was on the stairs.

Q. He had a conversation with Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, he was talking very earnestly.

Mr. Beach—Talking very what?

The Witness—Talking very earnestly.

Mr. Porter—It attracted your attention at the time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go down the stairs? A. I went more than half way down the stairs; yes, Sir:

Q. Did you get to a point where you had a view of them? A. Yes, Sir, a full view.

Q. Where was Theodore Tilton? A. He was getting up; he seemed to have been on his knees; he was in the act of rising from his knees.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton go out with him? A. Mrs. Tilton came out with him; yes, Sir.

Q. Was any remonstrance made against her going with him?

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment; I object to it.

Judge Nelson—Anything said?

Mr. Porter—I am asking as to a matter of fact.

Judge Nelson—"Was anything said," I think would be the question.

Mr. Porter—Was anything said?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment—said by whom and in whose presence?

Mr. Porter—To her, in the presence of Mr. Tilton, was anything said?

The Witness—Was anything said to Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. By whom, Sir?

Q. By anybody, in the presence of Mr. Tilton, about her going away? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was it? A. Her mother remonstrated with her and wanted to know—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Porter—Give her words.

The Witness—Give Mrs. Morse's words?

Q. Yes; that is, about her going away.

Mr. Beach—In Mr. Tilton's presence.

THE MOTHER-IN-LAW'S ANATHEMA.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Tilton were coming out of the parlor. Mrs. Morse was coming down the stairs, and Mr. Tilton looked up and said, "Good evening, Grandma." Mrs. Morse said, "I will grandma you, you perfidious wretch, you infernal hypocrite, you most miserable scoundrel!" and he said, "Why, Grandma, you seem to be excited;" and she says, "Oh, you infernal scoundrel, I will punish you from Dan to Beersheba!"

Q. She left with Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; she left with him.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't interrupt her until she gets through.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; I am through.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Porter.] I did not interrupt you. Perhaps Mrs. Morse said something else.

THE WIFE'S RETURN.

Mr. Porter—After that what did you do, after you saw him? A. I went around and followed Mrs. Tilton.

Q. How is that? A. I went around to Mrs. Tilton; they were some distance ahead of me.

Q. Well, what did you do when you went around there? A. When I went around there he was sitting in the parlor with her, and telling her that she had better go to bed; she looked wearied and tired, and she had better retire. He seemed to be very anxious that she should retire.

Q. Well, she did retire, did she? A. She went up-stairs; yes, Sir.

Q. What further took place? A. He took me up-stairs in his room and related all this story over again about the lounge, and about the chair, and all about Mr. Beecher and those other gentlemen again; and after he left me I sat in the room for some little time.

Q. After that? A. After he left me—after he had told me these circumstances over again I—

Q. You went where? A. I went into the next room, where Mrs. Tilton was in bed with Alice and Carroll; I told Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Q. Did you communicate to her the conversation. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think she can state she communicated it to her.

THE WIFE SEEKS HER MOTHER AGAIN.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton do? A. Mrs. Tilton never said a word; she rose, dressed herself, put on her waterproof cloak, went down the basement way (it was then one o'clock), and stole very softly out the basement way. She didn't put on her shoes until she got down to the basement. I wanted to go with her, and she would not let me. She went around to her mother's.

Q. Did you put on your shoes? A. No, Sir; she would not let me go with her; I wanted to go with her, and she would not let me. I locked the basement door after her.

Q. What did she tell you to do?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Q. What did you do? A. I went to bed with the children.

Q. Where she had been in the habit of sleeping? A. Yes, Sir; where she had been lying.

Q. The next morning what did you do? A. The next morning we went around to Mrs. Morse's; Carroll, Alice and myself went around to Mrs. Morse's.

Q. Do you remember afterwards, about the 18th of December, 1870, Mr. Tilton sending for the baby? A. The 18th of December?

Q. Or at any time? Do you recollect the occasion on which he sent for the baby? A. I don't remember the date, but I remember the occasion very well.

Q. You remember the occasion, but not the date? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who was it that he sent there? A. He sent Nellie, the nurse girl, with a note to Mrs. Tilton demanding the baby. Mrs. Tilton was not in then; she was at Mr. Hanley's; had gone there to take supper.

Q. Well, that was the time the child was sick? A. Yes, Sir; it had had the croup, or had the croup; I don't know which it was; however, the child was sick.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton do when she came home and found that the child was gone.

Mr. Beach—We have not learned yet that the child was gone.

Mr. Porter—The child was taken away, wasn't it? A. First, Mr. Tilton sent a note demanding the children; Mrs. Morse read the note; Mrs. Tilton was not in when the note came; and then he sent around his sister, Miss Annie Tilton, demanding the children. I opened the door for the girl and for Miss Annie Tilton, when they came with the message from him. Mrs. Morse came down and said that he had just realized that he had children or had a child.

Mr. Porter—No matter about that.

Mr. Beach—Oh! yes.

Mr. Porter—Well, do you want it? She can tell it.

The Witness—And that they should not go.

Mr. Beach—Yes, I would like to know.

Q. Go on. A. Miss Annie Tilton went away without them; and then this Nellie came around, and Mrs. Morse wrapped the baby up and gave it to Nellie—little Ralph—and Nellie took him home.

Q. Took Ralph? A. Yes, Sir; took Ralph.

Mr. Beach—The other children remained at Mrs. Morse's? A. I don't know whether they remained or whether they left. One of them was with Mrs. Tilton—went to Mr. Hanley's with her, or went out with her for the purpose of going there to supper.

Mr. Porter—If I understand it, one child was taken by Ellen Dennis, or by this girl, whoever it was? A. Little Ralph, the one that was sick with the croup.

Q. And Mrs. Tilton afterwards came home? A. And Mrs. Tilton afterwards came home.

Q. And she found Ralph was gone? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she follow with the other children or with the other child? A. Yes, sir; she went around to Mr. Tilton's.

Q. What hour of the night was it? A. I think it was between 7 and 8 o'clock; it may have been a little later.

Q. Then Mrs. Tilton remained, did she? A. What, Sir?

Q. Mrs. Tilton remained there for some time? A. Mrs. Tilton went in the house; yes, Sir.

MRS. TILTON'S TRIP TO NEW-BRUNSWICK.

Q. Now, after this occurrence did Mrs. Tilton go to New-Brunswick, and when, as nearly as you remember? A. After this?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; I remember her going to New-Brunswick.

Q. How is that? A. I remember her going to New-Brunswick.

Q. Do you remember what time that was—what time in December? A. I think it was perhaps the early part of December, as near as I can recollect.

Q. This was after the children had been taken back? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did Mrs. Tilton go—to New-Brunswick, did you say? A. She went to New-Brunswick to bring Flory home; I think that is what she went for.

Q. To bring Florence? Well, where were you when she returned? A. Where was I?

Q. Yes? A. I was in the second story front sitting-room.

Q. Was there anything in her appearance that night that directed your attention; if so, describe it? A. Yes, Sir; she looked very haggard and pale, and sank down on a chair as if she had not any strength at all.

Q. Well, was Mr. Tilton there? A. Mr. Tilton?

Q. Mr. Tilton? A. He was not in the sitting-room when she came in, but he came up afterwards.

Q. Well, what did he do? A. He kissed her, and asked her how she did.

Q. What? A. He kissed her and said he was glad to see her, asked her how she did.

Q. Yes, what then? A. She began crying.

Q. And what then? A. Then we went around, she and I, went around to Mrs. Morse's.

Q. Well, do you remember now how long she was gone on this trip to New-Brunswick? A. I think perhaps three or four days, and may be a week.

Q. You went around after this to Mrs. Morse, did you not, that evening? A. I went round with Mrs. Tilton to Mrs. Morse's that same evening; yes, Sir.

Q. Did a conversation occur between her and Mrs. Morse? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she afterwards return to Mr. Tilton's house? A. She returned that night; yes, Sir.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton do—where did she go?

Mr. Fullerton—She returned that night to the house, she says.

Mr. Porter—What is that?

Mr. Fullerton—She returned to the house.

Q. Returned to the house, and where in the house did she go? A. She went to bed in the front bedroom on the second floor.

MISS TURNER REMONSTRATES WITH MR. TILTON.

Q. After she had gone to bed, did you see Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there a conversation between you and him? A. Yes, Sir; I went and told him that I would like to see him a little while—went and asked him if I could see him a little while.

Q. You asked him if you could see him a little while? A. Yes, Sir, I asked him if I could see him a little while.

Q. Go on and give the narration? A. He came into his room in the second story back room, in his room, and I shut the door and I told him that Mrs. Tilton was very sick, and had sent around when she was around to Mrs. Morse's that she was going to die, and that her mother must not feel troubled that she was going to her home; she had only one home and that was in Heaven; she would see her little children, Paul and Mattie, and that her mother must not sorrow for her, and I asked him to please to be very kind to her, and not scold her any more and make her cry, and I then told him what the doctor in Marietta had said, that these swooning attacks that Mrs. Tilton had had he was afraid—he feared that she would die in one of them, and he didn't think she would possibly survive her confinement, and I felt very badly; I felt as if Mrs. Tilton was going to die, and I plead with him, with tears in my eyes, and I asked him if he would not be kind to her. He said there was nothing the matter with Elizabeth, that she was as well as ever she was, and that the way she was weeping was perfectly natural to her. I said I didn't think it was natural for people to cry all the time unless they had something to cry about. He said Elizabeth was as well as ever she was, and that she was not weeping because she felt so bad—because of her bodily health, but she was weeping for her sin with Mr. Beecher, that that was what made her cry.

Q. Did you mention anything in that conversation about an occurrence connected with a letter of his while you were in Marietta? A. A letter.

Q. A letter that she received from Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, I took one letter up.

Q. No, I am not asking how the fact was, but whether you mentioned it to him? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. What did you tell him on that subject? A. I told him that I had taken a letter of his to Mrs. Tilton—up to Mrs. Tilton in Marietta, and she opened the letter and read it—seemed to have read it through, and she turned perfectly white and fell very heavily to the floor, with the letter grasped in her hand.

Q. Did you tell him what followed then? A. I told him that she fell to the floor and fainted, and I went and called Mrs. Putnam and she came up, and then she called Philip, the colored man, and he lifted Mrs. Tilton in bed.

Mr. Fullerton—the witness says she is quite ill, your Honor, and does not wish to remain any longer to-day. We are quite willing the Court should recognize it, and adjourn.

Mr. Caldwell, the usher of Plymouth Church—She says she will wait.

Mr. Porter—We will suspend her examination.

Mr. Shearman—We have a witness here.

Mr. Beach—She says she wishes to stay.

Mr. Porter—I would not wish her to if she be ill.

Mr. Caldwell—She has complained all day of a headache.

Mr. Porter—Well, I will go on. [To the witness.] You interrupt me any moment if you feel that you cannot continue to be examined.

Q. Do you remember what term you used in speaking to him about that letter? A. I said: "That awful letter" that he wrote.

Q. What did he say to that—about the letter? A. I don't remember what he said.

Q. What was the result of this appeal of yours in behalf of Mrs. Tilton? what did he do in the end? A. I left him in the room and went out.

Q. That is, left him in the room in which the conversation had occurred? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. His own study?

Mr. Beach—She did not say it was in the study.

By Mr. Porter—Wasn't it in the study? A. No, Sir, in his bed-room.

Q. Now, I will ask you, just at this juncture, whether he was in the habit of changing his study from room to room? A. Yes, Sir; on one occasion he changed his study twice during that week.

Q. Moving all the things? A. Having all the books and everything brought down; yes, Sir.

Q. Was the study at different times in different rooms about the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About how often did he make these changes in the study? A. Well, I remember this one instance where he changed the study twice during the week, and then he used—several times he changed his study previous to this, and after.

Q. Do you remember the time when Mrs. Tilton was taken seriously ill in December? A. Yes, Sir; she was taken sick Christmas Eve, the 24th of December.

Q. On Christmas Eve? A. Yes, Sir; Saturday night. Christmas came on Saturday that year.

Q. Was the doctor brought there that night? A. Yes; I think I went after him—went with the girl after him—Dr. Skiles.

Q. And Mrs. Mitchell, the nurse? A. Mrs. Mitchell was there; yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S LOSS OF POSITION.

Q. Do you remember anything occurring on the day after Christmas, Monday? A. On Sunday?

Q. On Monday after Christmas. A. I recollect Mr. Johnson—Mr. Oliver Johnson, calling in the morning, and Mr. Moulton called in the afternoon.

Q. When Mr. Johnson called in the morning, did any one go out with him, and if so, who? A. Mr. Tilton went out with him.

Mr. Beach—Was that Monday, do you say? A. Monday; yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Was Mr. Tilton going in and out frequently? A. On Monday?

Q. Well, the next two or three days? A. I don't recollect his going in and out of Mrs. Tilton's room on Monday, but on Wednesday and Thursday I remember very distinctly his going in and out.

Q. Do you remember on his return on Wednesday of anything occurring of particular interest? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. He came in the room, and said that he was a ruined man, and said something about The Union. I think he said he had been discharged from The Union; but I could not swear to that.

Q. This was Wednesday? A. Yes Sir.

Q. What room was that; in what room was it that this occurred? A. He said it as he was coming in—going from the sitting room into Mrs. Tilton's sick room.

Q. Where was Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton was in bed.

Q. And where were you? A. I was in the sitting room with Mrs. Mitchell.

Q. This was said in the hearing of Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton was in bed; I suppose she heard it. It was in the hearing of Mrs. Mitchell.

Q. Do you remember observing afterward on that day, any papers in his hands? A. Yes, Sir; when he came in on Wednesday, he had newspapers in his hands, and also what seemed to be foolscap paper—writing paper.

Q. On that and the following days—on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday—did you notice anything marked in his appearance and action? A. In his appearance?

Q. Yes. A. He seemed to; he was very much excited in his manner, very much troubled about something.

Q. Was he engaged a good deal with his manuscripts and papers? A. He kept going in and out of the rooms with papers and pen and ink, and newspapers, and writing paper also.

Q. Did he talk a great deal, and if so, where? A. He was talking with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Was she at that time feeble and weak? A. Oh, she was very sick indeed; yes, Sir.

Q. She had had severe hemorrhage, had she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember one occasion when you saw Mrs. Tilton sitting up in the bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether that was Wednesday or Thursday? A. Two days, both Wednesday and Thursday, I saw her sitting up in the bed.

Q. On one of these occasions will you state what occurred. I refer to something in connection with pen and writing material? A. State what occurred? On one occasion, when he came in with papers and writing material, with pen and ink, and took them and put them on the table, or desk, I don't know which it was—put them on some thing in Mrs. Tilton's room, and then he came to shut—was shutting the folding doors, and Mrs. Mitchell remonstrated, or rather said to him, "Mr. Tilton, Mrs. Tilton cannot stand any excitement," and then repeated what the doctor had said that Mrs. Tilton was in a very critical condition, was very ill indeed, and that she could not stand any excitement. He shut to the folding doors and they were locked.

Q. Can you remember anything that occurred on Friday? A. I remember Mr. Beecher calling Friday night.

Q. Where did you see him? A. I saw him—I saw Mr. Beecher in Mrs. Tilton's bedroom, where she was sick.

Q. You did not remain in that room? A. What, Sir?

Q. You did not remain in the room? A. I was not in the room when he called. I just happened to go into the sitting-room and saw him sitting there; the folding doors were open.

Q. About what time should you think it was when Mr. Beecher left? A. About what time, Sir?

Q. Or don't you remember? A. I was not there when he left; I was not in the room; I did not see him go out, so I could not say.

Q. Did you remain in the room on the occasion when you went in there and saw him there—saw Mr. Beecher there? A. No, Sir; I went in for something, I don't know what; I happened to walk through the room, and I walked out again.

Q. Did you know that Mr. Beecher was in the house before you saw him in the room? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. You had not admitted him? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Do you want to wait any longer?

The Witness—Sir?

Mr. Beach—Do you prefer to leave? A. I can wait until four, I guess; I will try to.

Mr. Porter—I didn't hear.

Mr. Morris—She says she will remain until four o'clock. It is twelve minutes of it.

Mr. Porter—Can you remember what was the condition of Mrs. Tilton on these evenings you have spoken of, and on the night especially when Mr. Tilton was there? A. I remember that she was very sick—very sick indeed; she looked just as though she was dead, or dying; she was so sick that Mrs. Mitchell would not let me speak to her at all, said that I might go and look at her, but I could not speak to her, she must be kept so quiet.

Q. Did she allow you to kiss her? A. Yes, Sir, but not to talk to her at all.

Q. Had Mr. Beecher gone away before you went to bed? A. I suppose he had.

Mr. Beach—Oh! you are only supposing now, ma'am. She said before she didn't know.

The Witness—When I went to bed he was not in the room; no, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Mr. Tilton had not returned when you went to bed? A. I had not seen him in the house then.

Q. When you kissed her and went to bed yourself, where was Mrs. Mitchell? A. Mrs. Mitchell was in bed with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And that was before Mr. Tilton's return—before he had come back?

Mr. Beach—She did not say she kissed him that night.

The Witness—I did not see him. He may have returned and been in the house, but I had not seen him.

Mr. Porter—Was it the same night you had before seen Mr. Beecher in the room? A. The night that I saw Mr. Beecher in the room, Sir, was Friday night; that same night, when I went to bid Mrs. Tilton good night, Mrs. Mitchell was in bed with Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Porter—I think we will suspend, if your Honor please.

Mr. Beach—Are you through with the examination?

Mr. Porter—We are very nearly through the examination. We will close it in a few minutes.

Judge Neilson—Cannot you make it convenient to come to-morrow?

Mr. Evarts—I have assigned to-morrow for particular service in this cause, which will require my attention.

Judge Neilson—Will the jury get ready to retire?

Mr. Fullerton—I think that date ought to be given now, for it is an answer to a single question.

Mr. Beach—The juror wants to know what year it was when Mr. Tilton spoke to her about this occurrence on the lounge.

The Witness—What year, Sir?

Mr. Porter—He wants to know what year this was in which the accusation was made.

The Witness—1870.

Q. 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In December? A. In December.

Q. November, or December? A. Or November; I don't know which.

Mr. Evarts—After he returned from Marietta.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, you will return on Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court then adjourned until Monday morning, March 23d, at 11 a. m.

FORTY-NINTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF BESSIE TURNER.
 INCREASING INTEREST IN THE GREAT TRIAL—MR.
 FULLERTON'S BEST EFFORTS PUT FORTH TO CONFUSE THE WITNESS—LETTERS FROM MR.
 TILTON TO MISS TURNER—THE STORY OF THE PLAINTIFF'S ATTEMPTS UPON HER CHASTITY RE-TOLD—AN AMUSING INCIDENT OF THE CROSS-EXAMINATION.

MONDAY, March 23, 1875.

The increasing interest in the great trial was indicated to-day by the large attendance within and without the court-room. No audience of such numbers has found admission since the Judge gave directions that all must be seated, and thereafter no further admission given. Additional camp-stools seem to have been provided within the bar, and in various corners of the room were groups standing in defiance of the Judge's order to the contrary. The evidence of the increasing interest in the proceedings was unmistakable. The momentary attraction was unquestionably the second appearance of Miss Turner. The fact that her cross-examination was to begin early in the day had been widely published in the morning journals; and this had contributed to the desire to see and hear her. It was the general belief that she would break down under the cross-examination, and that an entertaining scene would follow.

A few minutes before the time for beginning the proceedings, Miss Turner came into the court-room with Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Field, with whom she sat until called to take the witness chair and resume her testimony. She first made an important correction in her testimony of Friday, stating that the dates of Mr. Tilton's alleged attempts upon her virtue were 1868 and 1869. A feature of her examination was the reading of two letters from Mr. Tilton to Miss Turner while she was at school. The letters were full of friendly advice and home news. While Mr. Porter read them Miss Turner looked steadily at the floor, only raising her eyes when the reader made a mistake in a word, on which occasion she corrected him with a rapid sign with her lips. Miss Turner then explained her two letters denying that Mr. Tilton had made improper advances to her. One of them, she testified, was written at the dictation of Mr. Tilton; and the other was at the dictation of his wife. She had remonstrated against this last letter, saying that it would make her call herself a liar, as she had already told five persons that Mr. Tilton had attempted to ruin her.

The cross-examination began a short time before recess, and the marked attention of the court and counsel, as well as the earnest expression of both the plaintiff and defendant, showed that all felt that one of the most important struggles of the trial was about to begin. The appearance of carelessness usually so marked in Mr. Fullerton's manner of beginning a cross-examination was entirely gone. He was thoroughly in earnest. The witness was, perhaps, the coolest person in the room. She was calm and smiling. In response to a number of questions as to the various places where she had passed parts of her life, she said "I don't recollect," with apparent indifference. She seemed especially unable to remember the length of time she had spent in places other than Mr. Tilton's house. An instance of this was in her answers regarding her stay at the Elizabeth Street Home. She had been there on three occasions, but could not say whether she had spent one month or three years in that institution at one time. "Well, do you know where you are now?" at length asked her questioner. "Oh, yes; I know I am in a court-room well enough," was the pointed reply. She seemed to resent Mr. Fullerton's rather significant questions as to whether she was ever taken to task in Mr. Dows's family for telling falsehoods, and her reply, "Never, Sir, never," was emphasized by a toss of the head, and a flush of apparent indignation.

At the request of Mr. Fullerton the witness again recounted the particulars of Mr. Tilton's first attempt upon her chastity. She gave her account of the affair in very rapid and clear tones, using almost the exact words in which she told it on Friday. During this recital Mr. Tilton sat with his eyes on his desk and busied himself with a bundle of papers. Mr. Beecher's eyes never left the witness. Mr. Fullerton read extracts from Miss Turner's testimony before the Church Committee, and pointed out among other things that in her evidence there she had testified very differently as to the times when Mr. Tilton was guilty of improprieties, and had stated the second time as the first. The witness was very deliberate in her replies here, and generally answered, "I was mistaken." She was asked by what means she had corrected these mistakes in her testimony before the Committee, and her reply that she "had it and could read it" excited some surprise until she further explained the curious phrase by saying that she "had it in her mind, and could read it there." Miss Turner was also questioned very closely as to all she had previously said on the subjects mentioned in her evidence, and was asked what persons had spoken about her testimony to her.

There was rather a puzzling scene just before the adjournment between the witness and Mr. Fullerton. The latter handed her a yellow-covered pamphlet containing her testimony before the Church Committee, and requested her to follow him in that book while he read from another. After reading a few lines he asked her if she found that in the book before her. She replied that she did not. He pointed out the place, and resumed his reading; but on again asking her if she followed him she made a like answer. This went on for several minutes, the witness seeming very much puzzled as to what book Mr. Fullerton was reading from. Suddenly a light seemed to break on her, and she interrupted him with the exclamation, "Why, I believe you are reading my testimony of last Friday!" "I am reading precisely the same thing that you have in your hand" was the reply, which seemed to throw the witness into perplexity once more.

Miss Turner's cross-examination will be resumed Tuesday. The defendant's counsel appear delighted with the manner in which she has acquitted herself thus far, and declare that her evidence cannot be shaken. The general remark among the spectators at the adjournment yesterday was, "That is the cleverest witness that has testified since Moulton."

One of the most interesting scenes during the trial followed Mr. Fullerton's first attempt to impeach Miss Turner's recollections of dates. She had sworn on the direct examination that one of Mr. Tilton's alleged advances had been made during the Summer of 1868. She corrected it on Monday, and put the year as 1869. Mr. Fullerton by a series of questions endeavored to commit her to a statement that she was at Tarrytown and Keyport during the very time she had spoken of, and suddenly produced a letter from her to Mr. Tilton dated May 23, 1869, from Tarrytown, and asked her if she recognized the handwriting. She instantly flushed to the temples, and for some minutes was greatly confused. She looked at the letter again and again with constantly heightening color, and then answered, in a confused manner, in words which left a doubt on the more observing among the audience whether she had blushed at the contradictory contents, or the penmanship of the letter. She insisted at first that she could not recognize the handwriting as hers—she certainly had improved very much since then—and it was not until permitted to read it that she admitted it to be her own. The interest of the scene was immediately heightened by the manner in which the counsel for the defense simultaneously came to the rescue of the imperiled witness, and insisted that one of Mr. Fullerton's questions was based upon a false assumption as to what she had previously sworn. Mr. Porter, Mr. Tracy, and Mr. Evarts were on their feet at the same moment, and their objections were uttered as by one voice. Mr. Tracy and Mr. Fullerton had a few violent words, and Mr. Shearman and Mr. Porter on the one side, and Mr. Beach and Mr. Morris on the other took part in the verbal warfare. Meantime Mr. Evarts stood in the center of the group, self-possessed and quiet, and at the right moment closed the confused debate with a few words, which at once silenced all the others, and put the point of the objection clearly before the Court. A consultation of the record followed, and it was found that Mr. Fullerton was wrong, and his line of attack on the witness had, accordingly, to be abandoned. Mr. Fullerton was evidently annoyed at this result, but made good his retreat by remarking that the correction of his error had put the witness in a worse fix than before. But in the meantime the witness had recovered the extraordinary self-possession she had displayed throughout the first day's examination, and when her interrogatories were resumed answered as promptly and precisely as before.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MEASURES FOR BETTER ORDER IN THE COURT.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Sergeant Rogers, you will so dispose of your men as to be able to keep the audience quiet. I don't wish to be obliged to speak to them myself, but you will please have the men observe the manner in which the crowd conduct themselves and repress any disorder.

MISS TURNER RECALLED.

Miss Bessie Turner was then recalled and her direct examination resumed.

Mr. Shearman—We propose to put in evidence these photographs which have heretofore been only marked for identification. They are part of those which were shown to Mr. Tilton on a previous day, and which he could not recollect ever seeing in the house, and which my friend, Judge Fullerton, suggested were bought on Fulton-st. the day before.

Mr. Morris—Oh, no, those are not the ones that Mr. Fullerton suggested were bought on Fulton-st.

Mr. Shearman—A part of the same.

Mr. Morris—You had some half a dozen from the same plate. The objection applied to them.

Mr. Shearman—Some of these are from the same plate; three of them are from the same plate.

Mr. Morris—Those are not the same that he made the objection to.

Mr. Beach—Let us understand what they are.

Judge Neilson—They were referred to by some witness, and they were marked for identification.

Mr. Beach—What photographs are they?

Mr. Shearman—These are photographs which were shown to Mr. Tilton, and which he said he had never seen in the house. They were part of a large parcel of photographs presented collectively. They were shown to Miss Turner, and she identified them as photographs that lay about the house; one of Dr. Leavitt, three of Mr. Morse, one of Mr. Beecher, one of Frederick Douglass, one of Mr. James H. Bates, and one of Horace Greeley.

Mr. Beach—I don't suppose they are admissible, Sir, but I don't care anything about them.

Judge Neilson—We will take them.

Mr. Beach—The photographs of Mr. Beecher were put in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—There are other photographs in evidence.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer—These are all marked "Exhibit 112," each one. Shall I mark them the same?

Mr. Shearman—That was an error. They were afterwards marked "111."

THE TRIBUNE stenographer—They are all "111," also; all "111" and all "112." I will mark them the same, "In evidence."

Mr. Shearman—Very well.

[The photographs were each marked, "In evidence."]

MISS TURNER MAKES A CORRECTION.

Mr. Porter—Miss Turner, I understand from my associate that you desire to make a correction of certain dates that you gave Friday? A. Yes, Sir; I said on Friday that Mr. Tilton's first visit was in 1867, and that Mr. Greeley's visit—

Q. First visit to your bed? A. To my room.

Q. To your room? A. Yes, Sir; 1867; and that Mr. Greeley's visit was in 1868, instead of—

Q. The visit on the occasion when Mr. Greeley was there? A. When Mr. Greeley was there; yes, Sir. Instead of that Mr. Tilton's first visit was in 1868 and Mr. Greeley's visit in 1868.

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment. I don't get that. The first visit in 1868?

The Witness—The first in 1868, yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—The occasion of his first visiting your room, that you referred to the other day, was in 1868? A. 1868; Yes, Sir.

Q. With a door communicating between the two? A. Between Mr. Tilton's and mine.

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir; there was no folding doors.

Q. Both those rooms had outer doors? A. Had outer doors yes, Sir. You went into the rooms from the hall.

Q. Are you able to remember how long Mrs. Tilton was absent in New-Brunswick, in December, 1870? A. When she brought Florry home?

Q. Yes. You thought the other day that she was absent several days? A. Yes, Sir; but she was only absent one night—one day and one night.

MR. TILTON'S CHARGES KEPT SECRET BY MISS TURNER.

Q. When was it that you visited Mr. Beecher? A. December 14th, 1870.

Q. Had you before that communicated to him anything about these visits to your room?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. [Consulting.]

Mr. Porter—Had you before that communicated to Mr. Beecher the fact of Mr. Tilton visiting your bed—your bedroom? A. Had I before that time?

Q. Before the 14th of December? A. No, Sir; that was why I visited Mr. Beecher on the 14th of December.

Q. Did you on that occasion communicate to him anything about the charges which he had made against him? A. That he had made against her, you mean?

Q. That Mr. Tilton had made against Mr. Beecher and his wife? A. Did I communicate that to Mr. Beecher?

Q. To Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, not to any one.

Q. Had you, prior to your leaving for Marietta, communicated to any one other than Mrs. Tilton, the charges which Tilton made against her in respect to Mr. Beecher—to Steubenville, I should say? A. Before going?

Q. Had you ever communicated to any one other than Mrs. Tilton, before you went to Steubenville? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The charges which had been made by Mrs. Tilton against Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—Made by Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Porter—Made by Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; I never communicated that to any one.

Q. Had you communicated to other persons the fact that he had visited your bedroom? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What did you say?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

LETTERS FROM MR. TILTON TO MISS TURNER.

Q. Did you receive letters from time to time from Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I received several letters from him.

Mr. Shearman—A little louder, Miss Turner.

The Witness—I received several letters from Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, the reporters have requested both the counsel and the witness to speak a little louder.

Mr. Porter—Is this a letter which you have received from him? [Handing witness a letter.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is the date of it? A. This is December 20th, 1866.

Q. Is this a letter also which you received from him? [Handing witness a letter.] A. Yes, Sir; this is January 8th, 1867.

Q. Is that also a letter which you received from him? [Handing witness a letter.] A. Yes, Sir; this one I received from him while at Mrs. Putnam's, in Marietta.

Mr. Fullerton—How is that, Judge?

Mr. Porter—"This one I received from him while I was at Marietta on a visit to Mrs. Putnam."

Mr. Fullerton—That is the third one.

Mr. Porter—That is the third one.

Mr. Fullerton—The date, Judge?

Mr. Porter—October 14th, 1870.

The Witness—October 4th, Sir.

Mr. Porter.—October 4th?

The Witness—Yes, Sir, 1870.

Mr. Porter—Is this the envelope which inclosed a letter from him? [Handing witness an envelope.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The letter is mislaid? A. The letter mislaid.

Q. Do you know what has become of the letter? A. No, Sir; I think this is an envelope in which—

Mr. Beach—What does she say?

The Witness—In which was a letter that I received from Mr. Tilton at Steubenville, because here is, "Miss Bessie Turner, care of A. M. Reid, Female Seminary, Steubenville, Ohio," and I remember very well, because I had to pay three cents on it; it says: "Due three cents."

Q. That must be then in January, 1873? A. I haven't got the letter that was inside of that envelope. I haven't it here; I have it in my trunk, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—That is January, 1873.

Mr. Porter—This is merely the envelope of the letter.

Mr. Fullerton—January, 1873.

Mr. Porter—January 27th, 1873.

Mr. Beach—Where did she say the letter was?

Mr. Fullerton—In her trunk.

The Witness—I think I have it in my trunk; I am not sure; I don't know whether I saved it or destroyed it. I think I have it.

Mr. Porter—We will have you look for it.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Your Honor, they are looking at the letters.

Mr. Fullerton—We have no objection to that. [Referring to letter dated January 5th, 1867.]

MR. TILTON SOLICITOUS ABOUT HIS WARD'S HEALTH.

Mr. Porter [Reading]:

MR. VERNON, Iowa, Jan. 5th, 1867.

MY DEAR LIBBY: My wife informs me that you have been very ill, so as to need the physician; I regret, but am not surprised to hear this, for I have often noticed with pain that you are very careless and reckless of your health. By and by you will pay the penalty. You will lose your good looks, your round cheeks, and your sprightly ways. Bad health is a great enemy to young girls; it quickly turns them into old women. I should be sorry to see you gray-haired on my return to Brooklyn. Unhappiness, too, causes wrinkles, on young faces. Are you trying to live a happy life? Sometimes I know you try and succeed. At other times you do not try and of course fail. Now, you have already had a doctor for your body; let me be a doctor for your mind. "A cheerful heart," says the proverb, "doeth good like a medicine." I trust that Dr. Barker will conquer ill-health, but it is your own cheerful heart that must conquer your unhappiness. You know I love you very much, and count you as one of my children. But I wish to be the father of a happy family. Steal every day a little of the sunshine, and hide it away in your heart to make you happy.

Yours ever,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 190;" also an envelope marked "D, 119."]

FATHERLY ADVICE FROM MR. TILTON TO HIS WARD.

Mr. Porter, [Reading]:

LINDELL HOTEL, St. Louis, Dec. 30, '66

MY DEAR LIBBY: I have a moment of leisure before breakfast; and I catch a pen to show you that I remember the girl who combs my hair.

I have to employ barbers for that purpose now!

I have been since early yesterday morning at the largest hotel in the United States. The inclosed is a picture of it. You never saw such a great house, except a government building. It is about as large (perhaps larger) than the County Court House in Brooklyn.

Last evening, after I returned from my lecture, the great halls were re-echoing to the sound of music. There was a ball. There is a ball here every Wednesday evening. I went in, to see the ladies and how they dressed. Some of them were in pure white, some in variegated colors. The scene reminded me of the ball at the Saratoga Hotel, which, I think, you saw.

I enjoy my travels much, except for the homesickness. It is a pleasant and useful thing to see the world. America is the noblest of countries. It is so large that one must travel many days and months to see it thoroughly. Take a map of the United States; look for the State of Missouri, and for the City of St. Louis. Then you will know exactly where I am. I have been much farther west—as far as Kansas. When in Kansas, I was nearly 2,000 miles from home; now I am 1,000. But I can't see any difference between these two distances—so far as either affects my loneliness and yearnings for home.

I trust that you are day by day striving to live a nobler life—to be more and more lovely in your disposition; more and more agreeable to your friends; more and more Christian in all your conduct.

I have always loved you very much, and wish to see you grow into a noble woman.

And now good morning, and God bless you.

Ever your friend,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Marked "Exhibit D, 121."]

MR. TILTON RESPECTS HIS WARD'S INTELLIGENCE.

Mr. Porter [reading]:

BROOKLYN, Oct. 4, 1872.

MY DEAR BESSIE: I have long been under the impression that you had so far forgotten me as to write to me no letter from Marietta, but Mrs. Tilton has asserted the contrary, and has produced a letter which you sent as long ago as May 24th; so it is I who am in your debt, not you in mine. I owe you an apology for not answering your long-ago epistle, which, indeed, was so long ago that I had forgotten that you had ever sent it at all.

Mrs. Tilton is to start for Marietta next Monday, to make a visit of a few weeks to her dearly-beloved friend, Mrs. Putnam. I trust that you will not go to Nashville until after you have seen the face once more of your Brooklyn benefactress. And I feel compelled to say that I am sorry you are going to Nashville at all. The letter which you lately forwarded to Mrs. Tilton as coming from your Nashville friend, seemed to me to be considerably beneath the dignity of a true lady to write. I am not easy in mind at the prospect of your going among such vulgar people. This I say in strict confidence, and it is not to be repeated to any other person than Mrs. Putnam—to whom I am willing you should show this letter.

Your residence in Marietta, under Mrs. Putnam's roof, has been a matter of many pleasant thoughts with me ever since you went there. I regret that you are to leave the good influences by which I know you are there surrounded. As to the circumstances which impel you to this course, I know nothing. But I trust you will think twice before you determine to abandon, of your own accord, so kind a family. Of course, if your future movements are dictated by their desire that you should leave Marietta, I have nothing to say on the subject.

While I am writing these lines, grandma is here in the second story front room, watching the baby at his bath, which his mother is giving him to his great satisfaction; Alice and Oad have just gone up-stairs to bed, for it is about eight o'clock at night, and Florence is in the parlor entertaining Master Joe Low.

The house looks about the same as ever.

You have been absent so long that we cease to miss you, but not to remember you.

I hope, my dear Beatie, that your life may belong, prosperous and happy. You have many qualities of character which I greatly respect. Your intellectual improvement, as evinced in your letters to Mrs. Tilton, is very gratifying both to her and to me. God bless and keep you evermore.

Give my warmest regards to Mr. and Mrs. Putnam.

I send you my fatherly love.

Yours ever,

THEODORE TILTON.

[Letter marked "D, 122."]

THE SUGGESTION OF GOING WEST TO SCHOOL.

Mr. Porter—Miss Turner, who suggested to you your going West to school? A. Who suggested?

Q. In 1871? A. Mr. and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. What did he say about it? A. He said one Sabbath, while I was there, when I was there—that—

Q. A little louder, if you please. A. That he would like to see me up in his study, and I went up, and he asked me how I would like to go to boarding school; and I said, why, that was—I thought that was too good to be true; I thought he was joking about it; I didn't think he was in earnest; and he said that he and Elizabeth were going to do something nice for me, they were going to send me to boarding school, and how would I like it? I was delighted with the idea; and then he told all about Dr. Reid, the President of the Seminary, and he said that Dr. Reid he thought would be very kind and very much interested in me, because he had been there—he had lectured in Steubenville and was entertained at the Seminary, and they were very hospitable and very kind and thought a good deal of him, and that as I would be his ward, they would be very kind to me.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton afterwards speak to you about it also? A. Mrs. Tilton spoke to me about it, too; yes, Sir.

Q. Was anything said to you by anybody about your going West in connection with these stories about Mr. Beecher—was that assigned by anybody as the reason of your going West, to your knowledge? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

THE FIRST VISIT TO MISS TURNER'S ROOM.

Q. I understand you desired to correct an impression made by an answer you gave the other day, as to the occasion of Mr. Tilton's visiting your room, where it is stated that he lay down—that is the first occasion of his visit to your room. Will you state precisely what you meant? A. That I stated that he laid down?

Q. That he laid down on the bed, or— A. He leaned.

Mr. Shearman—It is so reported.

Mr. Porter—It seems to be so reported. Will you state exactly how the fact was? A. I thought that I said he leaned over; came around the other side of the bed, leaned over and kissed me "Good night;" and then, he didn't lie right down on the bed, he was half reclining—in a reclining position. I didn't know that I had said he laid down.

Q. You were lying on the other side of the bed when he came in? A. Yes, Sir; nearest the door.

Q. And he went around the bed to the other side? A. Yes, Sir.

THE FIRST LETTER OF DENIAL DICTATED BY MR. TILTON.

Q. [Letter handed to witness.] Is that letter in your hand-writing, Miss Turner? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you state the circumstances under which it was—

Mr. Morris—One moment; let us see the letter?

Mr. Porter—It is the letter of Jan. 10, 1871.

Mr. Fullerton—Marked what?

Mr. Shearman—Marked D, 11.

Mr. Porter—I think it will contribute to make the testimony intelligible to read it, even although it is a repetition. [Reading.] "JAN. 10, 1871—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't know about that, while you are on direct examination; I think not.

Mr. Porter—I wish the Jury to understand what it is she is referring to.

Mr. Fullerton—The Jury can be made to understand what it is hereafter.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is short; I think he may read it.

Mr. Fullerton—I think the witness should not hear the contents of that letter before the cross-examination, unless it is put into her hands to read.

Mr. Porter—Well, it is in evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—I know it is in evidence.

Judge Neilson—I think he can read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Are they at liberty to read that letter in presence of the witness, it having been already read in evidence?

Judge Neilson—I don't see any harm.

Mr. Fullerton—If it may be read it must be read for her information and instruction.

Mr. Porter—It is read solely for the information of the jury. They of course have heard the letter, but there have been so many letters that it would be difficult to keep them all in mind.

Judge Neilson—You see what the purpose of counsel is.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; and can't that purpose be answered just as well after she has testified in regard to it, then to read it?

Mr. Porter—I will suspend the reading a few minutes, and the gentleman will see then that it is entirely proper.

Judge Neilson—If you suspend it until your examination is closed that would answer.

Mr. Porter—No, Sir; I shall want to read it in connection with her testimony.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed.

Mr. Porter—Miss Turner, under what circumstances was this letter of January 10, 1871, written by you? A. Under what circumstances?

Q. The circumstances, yes. A. Mr. Tilton dictated it to me, and I wrote it off.

Mr. Fullerton—Who did? A. Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Porter—Was Mrs. Tilton then in the house? A. That was January 10, I think.

Q. January 10—I don't mean in the room—was she at home? A. I think she was, Sir; yes, Sir; she was in the house, because I saw her afterwards.

Q. Will you state now, the circumstances under which Mr. Tilton dictated this letter to you, where was it and what was the— A. It was in his bedroom where there was a little gas stove, in the back room, the second story bedroom,

Q. Yes; where was he? A. He was sitting down on the sofa bedstead in his room.

Q. Was he well or ill? A. Was he ill?

Q. Was he well at the time? A. Oh! yes, Sir; perfectly well.

Q. Now, will you state how the conversation—what conversation took place between him and you? A. Why, we were talking about Mrs. Morse; he said something about—

Q. A little louder. A. He said—we were talking about Mrs. Morse—and he asked me if Mrs. Morse had ever—had bribed me to go round and tell this story about Mr. Beecher.

Q. About Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir; and I said that Mrs. Morse had said to me, "Bessie, if you will go and tell Mr. Beecher, I will give you something nice," but I did not go and tell Mr. Beecher that; I could not make up my mind to go round and tell Mr. Beecher that, and I did not tell him, and that was the way the conversation began about—

Q. Yes. Now go on with the conversation. What did he say about these stories—what did he say that led to this dictating the letter? Who proposed that you should write a letter to Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, I object to that.

Mr. Porter—That is introductory.

Mr. Beach—It is introductory, yes, and suggestive.

Mr. Porter—Undoubtedly, quite suggestive.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, he has asked her to state that interview; she is quite at liberty to state it as she recollects.

The Witness—Well, I was stating it, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Well, go on? A. He—then after he got through about Mrs. Morse, and I had told him that Mrs. Morse had said she would give me something nice if I would go around and tell Mr. Beecher this story, he asked me if I would copy that off in my handwriting and put my name to it, and I did it.

Q. Who dictated the words as you wrote? A. Mr. Theodore Tilton.

Q. And after it was written, you signed it? A. I put my name to it, yes, Sir; just as it is there.

Q. And to whom did you hand it? A. Mr. Theodore Tilton.

Q. Was it ever in the possession of Mrs. Tilton so far as you are aware? A. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Porter—Now [Reading]:

January 10th, 1871.

My Dear Mrs. Tilton: I want to tell you something. Your mother, Mrs. Morse, has repeatedly attempted to hire me, by offering me dresses and presents, to go to certain persons and tell them stories injurious to the character of your husband. I have been persuaded that the kind attentions shown me by Mr. Tilton for years were dishonorable demonstrations. I never at the time thought that Mr. Tilton's carcases were for such a purpose. I do not want to be made use of by Mrs. Morse or any one else to bring trouble on my two best friends, you and your husband.

Bye by,
BESSIE TURNER.

THE SECOND LETTER OF DENIAL DICTATED BY MRS. TILTON.

Q. [Handing letter to witness.] Is that letter in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—D. 10; the other was D. 11. [Reading]:

MY DEAR MRS. TILTON:

The story that Mr. Tilton once lifted me from my bed and carried me screaming to his room and attempted to violate my person is a wicked lie. Yours truly,
BESSIE.

Q. At whose request was that letter or statement written? A. At Mrs. Tilton's, Sir.

Q. Will you state from what you wrote it? A. Yes, Sir; the circumstances in connection with it?

Q. Yes; state the circumstances? A. I was around in Remsen-st.—with the ladies in Remsen-st.—and I don't know whether it was Florry Tilton or one of the girls that brought the message to me, and I asked the ladies if I might go, that Mrs. Tilton said in the note she wanted to see me particularly, and I put on my shawl and went around there, and Mrs. Tilton was in this same room where Mr. Tilton dictated that first one that you read to me that I signed, and she had a pen and ink there and a sheet of letter paper, and she said: "Bessie"—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment. We object to what Mrs. Tilton said.

Mr. Porter—Who wrote this first? A. The second one?

Q. Or wrote first the words contained there? Is this a copy of another paper? A. I wrote it from Mrs. Tilton's handwriting.

Q. Did you object to doing it at first? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On what ground?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor admit it?

Judge Neilson—Yes; it is part of the act of writing the letter.

The Witness—I objected on the ground that that would be calling myself a liar; that I had told—

Judge Neilson—I think the answer is sufficient.

Mr. Porter—That you had not used what? Finish what you were going to say. A. Because I had told three or four persons this story, but didn't use the words "screaming from my bed;" but, however, I said that would be calling myself a liar, and I remonstrated with Mrs. Tilton about signing it.

Judge Neilson—Well, that answers the question.

Mr. Porter—What did you say finally, by way of consent? A. I signed it by way of consent.

Q. Did you ever tell any one that he carried you screaming from the one room to the other?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—She has already said she told others, except that. I think that answers the question.

Mr. Porter—I won't press it if your Honor thinks it is sufficiently answered.

Judge Neilson—I think it is.

MISS TURNER'S CHARGE AGAINST MR. TILTON.

Mr. Porter—Did you ever tell anybody that he had attempted to violate your person?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; I object to that.

Mr. Porter—On what ground?

Mr. Fullerton—On the ground that she is not here to tell what she told other people.

Judge Neilson—I think she answered it in connection with other people. We have it very clear that the latter would not be true that it would be a contradiction of what she said before. I think she answered it.

Mr. Porter—Perhaps I didn't understand your Honor.

Judge Neilson—It seems to me the fact is in sufficiently already.

Mr. Evans—That may be a matter of opinion, but that does not touch the question of the introduction of the question, whether it is already in. This young lady has written this note, in which she says that a charge, or a statement, that any ascription to her of the story that Mr. Tilton had carried her screaming from her bed to his and attempted to violate her person is a wicked lie. Now she has narrated what did take place, as matter of fact, between Mr. Tilton and herself in her bedroom.

Mr. Fullerton—I withdraw the objection, Sir.

Q. Did you ever tell any one that Mr. Tilton had attempted to violate your person? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you tell that to different people? A. I told it to five persons.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton aware of the fact that you had told it at the time that he got you to write that letter at his dictation? A. I think he must have been aware of the fact; yes, Sir, I can say he was aware of the fact, because—

Judge Neilson—That is sufficient; you say he was aware of it; that answers it.

Mr. Porter—When you told these people about it, did you tell it in the same way you related it here the other day?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is—

The Witness—No, Sir, I did not.

Mr. Morris—That is a matter of comparison.

Mr. Porter—Not as fully? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Porter—I believe that is all, your Honor. I am reminded by my associate that there is another question I should ask the witness. How was it that Mrs. Morse knew about her husband accusing her with Mr. Beecher? A. Accusing Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Mr. Tilton accusing her in connection with Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. [To Mr. Porter.] Will you repeat the question?

Mr. Porter—How was it that Mrs. Morse was aware—

[Mr. Porter and Mr. Evans here had a whispered consultation together.]

Mr. Porter—I supposed I had asked the question, and my associate argues that I did. That is all, Miss Turner.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MISS TURNER.

Mr. Fullerton—You did not state with much particularity, the time when you went to live with Mrs. Tilton, but I wish to ask you the question, if you can remember the date? A. Yes, Sir, I remember very distinctly. In the Summer of 1864. That is what I stated.

Q. Do you recollect the month? A. It was in July or August; I am not sure which.

Q. Of 1864? A. 1864; yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you leave Mr. Tilton's with the intent of staying away? A. Well, I was there off and on for ten years or more, but I left there several times and went away, and then came back again. I didn't stay on there very steadily the whole ten years.

Q. When did you leave the first time with the intent of staying away? A. The first time was, I think, as near as I can recollect, when I left there and went to Springfield, Mass., and stayed some little time.

Q. How long? A. I don't remember just how long, Sir. I went in the Winter, and I think returned the following Spring, as near as I can remember.

Q. With whom did you remain there? A. In Springfield? Shall I mention names?

Q. Well, I ask you, you know, to mention them? A. With Mrs. P. T. Vining; I think that was her name.

Q. When you left there did you return to Mrs. Tilton's? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. You went to Mrs. Vining's to live, did you not? A. I went there to learn how to make wax flowers, or how to preserve natural flowers in wax.

Q. What year did you go there? A. I could not state that.

Q. Did you remain as long as you expected, to when you went? A. Well, I didn't expect anything about it, how long I would stay when I went, for I didn't know. I simply went there to be taught how to preserve flowers.

Q. Had you any difficulty while you were there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Of no kind? A. Of no kind.

Q. No trouble in the family? A. There was not any family except Mrs. Vining and myself.

Q. Well, that is a family. No trouble there at all? A. No, Sir, no trouble.

Q. Mrs. Vining made no complaint against you of no kind? A. No, Sir, not any; on the contrary she seemed to like me very much, and was very kind and pleasant, and we got along nicely.

Q. You returned to Mr. Tilton's. How long did you remain there before you went away again? A. Yes, Sir; I returned to Mr. Tilton's again.

Q. Where did you go when you left Mr. Vining's? A. Mrs. Vining's.

Q. Mrs. Vining's? A. I think that I went back—I don't know whether I returned to Mrs. Tilton's, or went to the Elizabeth-st. Home.

Q. Can you not recollect now where you went when you left Mrs. Vining's? A. I have just said that I am not sure whether I went back to the Home, or returned to Mr. Tilton's.

Q. If you went to the Elizabeth-st. Home when you left Mrs. Vining's, how long did you remain there? A. I remained there until I went somewhere else.

Q. Very likely; but will you tell me how long you remained there? A. Well, I cannot, Sir.

Q. About how long? A. I cannot—

Q. Well, give us the best recollection that you have upon the subject? A. I don't think I have any definite recollection.

Q. Did you remain there several months? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Several weeks? A. I have not any recollection, I said, Sir, how long I remained.

Q. Do you recollect the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it not in 1886? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Can you tell us whether it was one week or twelve months that you remained at that Home? A. When I returned from Mrs. Vining's?

Q. Remained at that Home? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Well, Miss Turner, you will excuse me for pressing the question? A. Yes, Sir; certainly.

Q. Do you remember the year that you left the Home in Elizabeth-st? A. Do I remember?

Q. You hear my question very plainly. A. No, Sir; I do not remember.

Q. You can give no idea of the length of time that you were there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Whether it was a month or a year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, was it two years that you were there? A. I have not any recollection, Sir, how long it was.

Q. Well, you will excuse me, perhaps, if I add another year to the time. You will then recollect, perhaps. A. No, Sir; I don't think I could.

Q. Was it as much as three years? A. I could not tell; I have not any recollection.

Q. You don't know but that you are there yet. A. I know I am in the court room now. [Laughter.]

Q. When did you leave there? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Now, can you tell me when you left the Elizabeth-st. Home, where you went? A. I have stated that I didn't know whether I went to the Elizabeth-st. Home or to Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. That is quite foreign to my question. I ask you when you left the Elizabeth-st. Home, where you went? A. Well, I don't know as I was there to live, because I said I didn't know whether I went to the Elizabeth-st. Home or went to Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. Were you ever at the Elizabeth-st Home? A. Yes, Sir; I was there several times—two or three different times.

Q. Well, we will speak of the first time that you went there after having gone to Mr. Tilton's to live. Now, where did you go when you left the Elizabeth-st. Home, the first time after you went there, leaving Mrs. Tilton's or leaving Mrs. Vining's? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. You don't remember where you went? A. No, Sir.

Q. After leaving? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you go to the Elizabeth-st. Home more than once? A. Yes, Sir; two or three times.

Mr. Fullerton—You didn't hear my question.

The Witness—Didn't you ask me whether I went to the Elizabeth-st Home more than once?

Mr. Fullerton—That was part of the question, as far as I had got when you answered it.

The Witness—Excuse me for interrupting you.

Q. Did you go to the Elizabeth-st. Home more than once during the time that you were living with Mrs. Tilton, or within the ten years that you lived there? A. Yes, Sir; I think I was there two or three times.

Q. Did you go to the Elizabeth-st. Home at any time before you went to live with Mrs. Tilton. A. No, Sir.

Q. Then, your visits to that Home were all within the ten years that you speak of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you tell me how long you were there the second time you went? A. How long I was at the Home?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can. There was one time when I was there that I was there some little time, but whether it was the first time, the second time, or the third time, I could not say.

Q. How long was it that you were there—some little time? A. Well, probably two or three months, as near as I can recollect.

Q. Two or three months? A. As near as I can recollect; I won't swear to it.

Q. Well, after that visit at the Home, the Home that you now speak of, where did you go when you left it? A. I think I went to live with a Mr. William Dows, in Twenty-second-st.

Q. How long did you live with Mr. William Dows? A. I think I went with them just before they went in the country to their Summer residence.

Q. Where was that? A. That was somewhere near Irvington; I have forgotten the name of the place.

Q. Tarrytown, was it not? A. Yes, Tarrytown.

Q. And it was Mr. David Dows, instead of William Dows, was it not? A. Did I say William?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; it was David Dows.

Q. You remained at the Home until you went to Mr. Dows's to live? A. I was at the Home when I went to Mr. Dows's to live—yes.

Q. And you had been there several months, as I understand you? A. At the Home?

Q. Yes? A. As near as I can recollect; I said that I could not remember exactly.

Q. Two or three months, or several. Do you recollect the year when you went to Mr. Dows's? A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. How long did you remain with Mr. Dows? A. I went there, I think, late or early in the Spring, I don't know which it was—it was in the Spring, I think, and left there late in the Summer, or early in the Fall, I think.

Q. And when you left there where did you go? A. From Mr. Dows's?

Q. Yes. A. I think I returned to Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. What time did you return to Mrs. Tilton's after leaving Mr. Dows's? A. I think as soon as I left there, Sir; I can't tell you what time it was, except that I left there, as I have stated, in the latter part of the Summer, or early in the Fall, and then I went right over to Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. You went to Mrs. Tilton's after leaving Mr. Dows's? A. I think so; I won't swear positively.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton at home when you left Mr. Dows's house and went to Mrs. Tilton's? A. Mrs. Tilton was home when I went to see her.

Q. She was at home? A. She was at home. She was at home, and her mother was with her.

Q. Had she been away during the preceding Summer? A. The time of my being at Mr. Dows's?

Q. Yes. A. I don't remember whether she had been away in the Summer or not.

Q. Do you know whether she had been away during that Summer? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Did you visit Mrs. Tilton during the period that you were at the Home in Elizabeth-st., during your stay there, or during your stay at Mr. Dows's, until you returned in the Autumn, as you have stated? A. It seems to me that I came from Tarrytown one day to see Mrs. Tilton, to visit her, but I am not sure—I have a faint recollection of it, but I am not sure.

Q. Then you cannot state, as I understand you, with any degree of certainty—whether during the period you were at the Home, or during the period that you were at Mr. Dows's, you visited Mr. Tilton's family in Brooklyn? A. I have stated, Sir, that I have a slight recollection of leaving Mrs. Dows's in Tarrytown, and coming to visit Mrs. Tilton.

Q. I am aware that you so state that you have a slight recollection? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you if you can state with any certainty that you did make such a visit to Mrs. Tilton, or is it a mere slight recollection? A. I said it was just a slight recollection—that I could not say positively.

Q. Then from the time that you went to the Home, whenever that was, up to the time when you left Mr. Dows's residence in Tarrytown and returned to Mr. Tilton's, you didn't see Mrs. Tilton or Mr. Tilton, did you, except that possibly you may have visited them during the Summer, as you have mentioned? A. Do you mean to say that, after I went to Mr. Dows's, I never saw Mr. or Mrs. Tilton—whether I can't state that positively?

Q. No, listen to my question. A. Yes, Sir, I will.

Q. From the time that you went to the Home, whenever that was, up to the time that you returned to Mrs. Tilton's house in the Autumn after leaving Mr. Dows's, did you see Mr. or Mrs. Tilton? A. I have a faint recollection of seeing Mrs. Tilton; I cannot say positively.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton? A. I don't remember.

Q. Can you not recall the season of the year when you went to the Home just preceding the time when you went to Mr. Dows's? A. No, Sir; I cannot recall it.

Q. Don't you recollect that you were at the Home all the Winter? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Don't you recollect that on New-Year's Day you were then in the home in Elizabeth-st.? A. No, Sir.

Q. Is there nothing by which you can fix the time when you went to the Home? A. No, Sir; I don't think there is.

Q. What time in the Spring was it that you went to Mr. Dows's, can you tell me that? A. I think it was early—I don't know whether it was early or late in the Spring; it was just before they left for their residence in Tarrytown; I cannot state positively.

Q. You were with them some time in 23d-st, I understand you? A. I was with them, I think, about a week, or it may have been longer.

Q. Was it not in 23d-st? A. Let me see—is Booth's Theater in 23d-st?

Q. That is in 23d-st? A. It was in 23d-st; they lived in 23d-st.

Q. On the north side? A. I don't know whether it was the north side or the south side.

THE DATES OF MR. TILTON'S OVERTURES TO MISS TURNER.

Q. I think you corrected your testimony, Miss Turner, as to the year in which Mr. Tilton visited your room, your bed; won't you please repeat what you stated this morning? A. Yes, Sir; I stated this morning that it was in 1868 and in 1869.

Q. Now, please state what season of the year it was in 1868 when he visited your room? A. I think it was in the Spring, or Summer; it was warm—I think it was warm weather.

Q. And what season of the year was it in 1869 when he visited your room? A. That was in the Summer, Sir.

Q. In the Summer? A. Yes.

Q. You stated on Friday, I think, that his first visit to your room was in 1867? A. 1867 and 1868.

Q. And that was an error? A. Yes, Sir; that was a mistake.

Q. You say now it was in 1868 and 1869, instead of 1867 and 1868? A. 1868 and 1869 instead of 1867 and 1868, as I said on Friday.

Q. You have reflected upon that since Friday, I suppose?

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have fixed it in your mind so that you are quite satisfied that those are the two years, are you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was Mrs. Tilton in 1869 when Mr. Tilton visited your room? A. Mrs. Tilton had gone to Monticello, I think, Sir, with Ralph and the wet nurse, Kate Smith.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, permit me to ask you again—

The Witness—I say I think she went to Monticello, but I am not sure, Sir.

Q. I am satisfied with your answer. Permit me now to call your attention to those years again. Are you not mistaken in saying it was in 1868 and 1869 that he visited your room? A. No, Sir; 1868 and 1869.

Q. Are you quite sure that you were not correct on Friday in saying 1867 and 1868? A. I am quite sure I was not correct on Friday, and that is the reason that I made the correction to-day.

Q. And you are quite sure that Mrs. Tilton was at Monticello when Mr. Tilton visited your room? A. Mrs. Tilton was away, and I think she went to Monticello. I bade her good by at the carriage door.

Q. In whose handwriting is the letter which I now show you? [Handing witness a letter.] A. [Looking at the letter] Well—why—I don't—if you will permit me to read it over perhaps I can tell you.

Q. Can't you tell in whose handwriting it is without reading it over? A. I don't think it looks like mine.

Q. Is it not a letter written by you to Mrs. Tilton? A. I wrote a number of letters to Mrs. Tilton while I was at Tarrytown.

Q. Ah! but is not that a letter which you wrote to Mrs. Tilton? A. I will tell you in a moment, Sir. The writing looks so bad, I must have improved very much since if it is mine; I don't seem to recognize it—I don't recognize that as my handwriting.

Q. You don't recognize it as your handwriting? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did write to Mrs. Tilton from Tarrytown, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; I wrote to her several times.

Q. I put the question to you directly: Is not the letter in your hands, to the best of your belief, in your own handwriting? A. No, Sir; it is not, to the best of my belief, because I don't recognize it as my handwriting.

Q. Please read it all over, from beginning to end? A. Out loud?

Q. No; not out loud; for your own satisfaction? [Witness reads the letter.] A. Yes, Sir; that is mine.

Q. Oh! it is yours? A. Yes, Sir; but the writing—I have improved so much since that I did not recognize the writing at first—at least, I must have improved.

At this point a juror retired for a few moments, and on his return the TARRYTOWN stenographer, at the request of Mr. Fullerton, read the last question and answer.

The Witness—I meant to have said that I did not recognize the writing at first.

Q. You meant to have said that you did not recognize the writing at first? A. Well, I can't really say that I recognize the writing at last, either, except from its speaking of the beds, and the flowers, and all those little things, which brought to my mind that I had written to Mrs. Tilton about them, so, of course, it must be my handwriting.

Mr. Fullerton—I offer it in evidence.

[Letter marked "Ex. 116."]

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading:]

TARRYTOWN, May 24th, 1869.

MY DEAREST FRIEND: We arrived here on Saturday; and everything is so beautiful and pleasant that I hardly know what to tell you first. Their residence here is just as pleasant as can be—beautiful walks, all kinds of flowers, and some of the most beautiful birds I ever saw. It has been a charming day here; and myself, with the rest of the family, attended the Episcopal Church, it is a beautiful walk from the house, and so beautifully shaded with trees that you hardly need a sunshade, but I cannot say that I enjoyed the preaching as much as Mr. Beecher's.

I have the prettiest little room imaginable. It overlooks some beautiful beds of flowers, and as I sit here writing you, the air is so fragrant and delightful, that I wish with all my heart you and the children could enjoy it with me. I have thought of you every moment since I left you, and thought how little I appreciated all the long years you bore so patiently with my sullen nature; and now that I am thrown among strangers and dependant upon myself is the time that I have felt the need of such a friend as you were to me, but as you have often told me there is still a dearer friend who would be a father to the fatherless, and if I ever find Him I should be very happy.

Please write and let me know just how you are, for I feel very anxious about you. Give my love to Mr. Tilton and dear Carroll, and tell him Bessie will bring him a little bouquet of flowers when I come. If you have a picture of yourself and Carroll to spare I would like very much to have it, as I have not any of either. You were very kind and thoughtful to send me that bright new $1, and I thank you very much indeed.

I have enclosed two shrubs to make the letter smell sweet.

And with much love to the children and a double share to yourself,

I remain, very truly, yours,

BESSIE.

Please direct care David Dows.

Q. Now, you observe that the date of that letter is May 24th, 1869? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you explain then—

The Witness—I did not observe the date at all, Sir. I will observe it.

Q. Please to observe it then. It becomes quite important. [Witness examines the letter.]

Q. You were, then, at Mr. David Dows's, in Tarrytown, in 1869, during the Summer? A. Yes, Sir; I was.

Q. Mr. Tilton did not go to your bed at David Dows's, did he? A. No, Sir. He came to my bed, however, in 1869, because I left Mr. Dows's, as I have stated, in the Summer.

Q. You forget. You have stated that you left in the Autumn? A. No, Sir; I beg your pardon, Sir.

Q. It was after you left Mr. Dows's and went to Mr. Tilton's, that he came to your bed, was it? A. It was in the Summer of 1869.

Q. Well, it was after you left David Dows's, was it, or was it before you went there? A. It was after I left David Dows's.

Q. Now, reflect just as long as you choose, so as to get it right? A. Yes, Sir; I don't need to reflect.

Q. You don't need to reflect. Very well. Then it was after you left David Dows's and returned to Mr. Tilton's house that he came to your bed, was it? A. It was 1899, in the Summer.

Q. I beg your pardon; that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. Fullerton [in reply to some whispered remarks by Mr. Beecher's counsel]—Now, gentlemen, you need not interfere, because it will do no good; it will only do harm. [To the witness.] Was it after you left David Dows's and returned to Mr. Tilton's house that Mr. Tilton came to your room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are quite positive of that? A. Quite positive.

Q. There cannot be any mistake as to the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you recollect now that it was after you returned from David Dows's? A. When I spoke of Mr. Greeley I did not recollect anything about David Dows.

Q. That was the time that Mr. Greeley was at Mr. Tilton's house, was it? A. When I was at Mr. David Dows's?

Q. Yes. A. Mr. Greeley was at Mr. Tilton's house while I was there in the Summer of 1899. He spent some two or three weeks there, or perhaps longer.

Q. While you were there? A. While I was there—yes, Sir.

Q. Have you any recollection of what time you left David Dows's? A. I stated, Sir; that it was in the Summer.

Q. How did you come from Tarrytown to Brooklyn? A. How did I come?

Q. You hear my questions very distinctly; don't repeat them please. A. I came in the cars from Tarrytown, and took the ferry to Brooklyn and walked up to Mr. Tilton's house.

Q. Who came with you? A. Nobody came with me. The man went to the cars with me at Tarrytown—their man that used to be about the house.

Q. Did Mr. David Dows's family leave Tarrytown that Summer to go anywhere? A. I think they did go away. I think they went to California while I was there.

Q. Do you know what time they went? A. They went when I first went there. I think, perhaps, the latter part of May, but I cannot say positively.

Q. Did you remain at the house after they went to California? A. After they went to California?

Q. Yes. A. I don't remember, Sir; I guess I was there when they returned.

Q. When did they return? A. I don't remember.

Q. How long were they absent? A. I don't recollect.

Q. About how long? A. I cannot say, Sir.

Q. Who of the family went to California? A. Mr. and Mrs. Dows, I think; I don't know what other members of the family.

Q. How? A. I don't know whether any one else went with them or not; I don't recollect.

Q. Now, you say you returned to Mrs. Tilton's in the Summer of 1899? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did you remain there then before you went somewhere else? A. I think I was there two or three weeks, Sir.

Mr. Beach—A little louder, Miss.

The Witness—Two or three weeks, Sir, I think.

MISS TURNER'S VISIT TO KEYPORT.

Mr. Fullerton—Where did you go when you next left Mrs. Tilton's after returning from David Dows's? A. In 1899—I went to Keyport, New-Jersey, to Mr. Tilton's parents.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. I can't remember just how long.

Q. About how long? A. I can't say.

Q. Was any other member of Mr. Tilton's family at Keyport when you went there? A. I think Miss Annie Tilton was there; I am not sure.

Q. Do you recollect any other member of the family who was there?

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Fullerton, which family do you mean?

Mr. Fullerton—The Tilton family.

Mr. Evarts—The father's family, or this Mr. Tilton's family?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't mean the elder Mr. Tilton. Was there any other member of Mr. Theodore Tilton's family at his father's, at Keyport, when you went there that Summer? A. No. I said that I thought Annie was there, but I could not be sure.

Q. What other member of the family? A. There was Kate McDonald; I think they considered her a member of the family; she had lived with them a long time.

Q. Yes; that is right. Was she there when you arrived, or did she go there with you? A. I don't remember about that.

Q. Or did she follow you to Keyport? A. Did she follow me to Keyport?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; she didn't.

Q. Who went with you to Keyport? A. Nobody went with me.

Q. Can you tell whether Kate McDonald was there when you arrived, or whether she arrived immediately after, or soon after? A. I cannot tell anything about that. I remember seeing her while I was there, but when she came I could not say, except that I know she did not go down with me.

Q. Do you know what time you left Keyport and returned to Brooklyn? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember the season of the year? A. Well, I know that when I returned I went around to Mrs. Morse's, to see if Mrs. Tilton had gotten home; she had been away, and she had gotten home, and then I went around there. It seems to me it was in the early part of the Fall; I won't say for certain.

Q. Mrs. Tilton had been to Monticello, hadn't she? A. I said I thought so.

Q. And you did not return from Keyport until after Mrs. Tilton had returned from Monticello, whatever date that was? A. I didn't say Monticello, positively. I said she had been away, and thought it was to Monticello, but I wasn't sure.

Q. I understand what you said. Then, if it was to Monticello that Mrs. Tilton had been, you did not return to Mr. Tilton's house until after Mrs. Tilton had returned from Monticello? A. Until after she had returned from wherever she had been away. I did not return until I found Mrs. Tilton there; because I came from Keyport and went around to Mr. Bates's where Mrs. Morse was, and asked her if Mrs. Tilton had returned, and she told me she had, and so I went around to see Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And you found her at the house when you first returned to the house after your return from Keyport? A. I didn't go to the house but once.

Q. Well, when you first went to Mrs. Tilton's house after your return from Keyport, you found Mrs. Tilton there, whatever date that was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Kate McDonald return with you from Keyport? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did she remain behind? A. She remained behind.

Q. At Keyport? A. At Keyport.

Q. How long after you returned did Kate McDonald return from Keyport? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. You have no recollection upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, be kind enough to tax your recollection and tell me as near as you can, how long you were at Mr. Tilton's house in the Summer of 1869, after you returned from Mr. Dows's and before you went to Keyport? A. I think about two or three weeks, as near as I can recollect.

Q. That is as near as you can get at it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see Mr. Greeley there during that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are quite certain that Mr. Greeley arrived at the house before you left and went to Keyport, are you? A. Before I left and went to Keyport—oh! yes.

Q. You are certain about that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who composed the family when Mr. Greeley was there? A. Mr. Greeley, Mr. Tilton, Katie Burke and myself.

Q. Now, is it not true that you were sent down to Keyport before Mr. Greeley's arrival? A. No, Sir.

Q. One moment. A. No, Sir.

Q. Let that stand then. Now, is it not true that, when you left, Kate McDonald was the only person remaining in the house beside Mr. Tilton? A. When I left, Mr. Greeley and Kate Burke and Mr. Tilton were in the house.

Q. It is not true, then, that Kate McDonald was the only person remaining behind, except Mr. Tilton, when you left and went to Keyport? A. I don't remember seeing Katie McDonald.

Q. How? A. I don't remember seeing Kate McDonald.

Q. Then can you say that she was there when you left and went to Keyport? A. I don't remember anything about Katie McDonald being at Mr. Tilton's when I left and went to Keyport.

Q. Were you not sent down to Keyport in advance of the arrival of Mr. Greeley, and was not Kate McDonald kept behind to fix Mr. Greeley's room for his reception? A. Please repeat your question.

Q. Were you not sent down to Keyport in advance of the arrival of Mr. Greeley, and was not Kate McDonald kept a few days at the house for the purpose of arranging the room for the reception of Mr. Greeley? A. I don't remember anything about Katie McDonald; but I was sent down to Keyport after this occurrence in 1869, when Mr. Greeley was there.

Q. You don't recollect, then, that Kate McDonald remained behind to adjust Mr. Greeley's room? A. I have said, Sir, that I do not recollect seeing Katie McDonald there at all. I saw her down at Mr. Tilton's at Keyport after I had gone there.

Q. How long did I understand you remained at Mr. Tilton's after you returned from Keyport? A. I don't think I stated how long I remained.

Q. Well, how long did you remain? A. I don't recollect.

THE TRIP TO MARIETTA.

Q. Where did you go next after you returned from Keyport, when you left Mr. Tilton's house to remain away? A. Where did I go next? I think I went next to Mrs. Putnam's.

Q. When was that? A. That was in 1870.

Q. What time? A. I will tell you the month in a moment—in February, I think, 1870. I remained there about eight or nine months.

Q. And you left there to return on the 9th of November, did you? A. Left Marietta?

Q. Yes. A. On the 9th of November; yes, Sir.

Q. 1870? A. 1870.

Q. And how many days were occupied in making the journey from there to New-York or Brooklyn? A. Only one day, I think, Sir, and one night. I think we returned November 10.

Q. The 10th? A. Yes, Sir; we left there November 9, and I think we arrived on the 10th.

Q. You did not expect to return from Marietta, I believe, when you went to Marietta, did you—return to Mr. Tilton's when you went to Marietta? A. I could not say what my expectations were; I did not think anything about it, whether I would return or not.

Q. Well, you returned with Mrs. Tilton only because she was in ill health, I understand you? A. I returned with her because I did not think she was fit to travel alone; the doctor did not think she was fit to travel alone, and I wanted to return with her any way; I wanted to come back with her; I wanted to be with her.

Q. Did you expect to return? A. Oh! perhaps I would not have thought of that if she had not been so sick.

Q. Then the cause of your returning to Mrs. Tilton's was the ill health of Mrs. Tilton? A. Because I didn't think she was able to travel alone.

MISS TURNER NOT ACCUSED OF FALSEHOOD AT THE DOWS'S.

Q. Now, we will go back to Mr. Dows's, if you please? Q. Did you have any trouble at Mr. Dows's? A. Any trouble?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you have any trouble in the family? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you not taken to task for misconduct there? A. Well, I don't know whether it would be called taking to task or not. I remember one instance of cutting out a dress while Mrs. Dows was away, and I think her daughter told me that I was cutting out my dress when I ought to have been sewing for Mrs. Dows.

Q. Were you not taken to task while you were there for telling falsehoods? A. No, Sir; never, never.

Q. Never, by Mrs. Dows or Mr. Dows? A. No, Sir.

Q. Left there pleasantly, did you? A. Yes, Sir; quite pleasantly.

Q. Not discharged? A. When it came time for Mrs.—when Mrs. Dows paid me, I think I had been there one month. There may have been something said. It seems to me that I spoke first, and said that I did not think that she was—that I satisfied her exactly; and I think I was the one to speak first.

Q. Quite sure of that? A. I did not say that I was quite sure, Sir; but I think that was the way of it.

Q. Were you not taken to task there for telling falsehoods? A. No, Sir, never.

Q. Nothing of the kind occurred? A. Nothing of the kind occurred—about telling falsehoods.

Q. You were not accused of telling falsehoods? A. No, Sir.

Q. About anything, while you were there? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, did Mrs. Dows say anything about being satisfied, or dissatisfied with you? A. I don't remember exactly what she said.

Q. You say when she paid you for the month? A. I think I had been there for a month. I think—I don't know whether I had been there a month, or whether it was only I had asked permission to go a day to see Mrs. Tilton, and then I wanted some money to go. I think that was the way it was, and I think then I had been there about a month.

Q. Did they give you permission to go and see Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, Mrs. Dows gave me permission.

Q. Did you return to Mrs. Dows's after that? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. How? A. I think I did; I don't remember exactly.

Q. How long did you remain after you returned? A. I said I did not remember whether I had returned or not; I did not know.

Q. Well, can't you tell us whether you returned to Mrs. Dows's after you had obtained permission to visit Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't remember whether I returned or not, Sir.

Q. Now, was not Mrs. Dows in California at the time? A. At what time?

Q. When you returned to see Mrs. Tilton? A. In California?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir. I never went to see Mrs. Tilton while Mrs. Dows was in California, because she gave me the money to go, and she could not have been in California if she handed me the money.

Q. I understand you to say that Mrs. Dows went to California after you had been there about a month, and you stayed until her return?

Mr. Evarts—No.

Mr. Fullerton—Well?

The Witness—No; I don't think I said that; I said Mrs. Dows went to California after I was there, but I don't think I stated how long I was there.

Q. Didn't you say in your cross-examination that after you had been there about a month Mrs. Dows went to California?

A TEN MINUTES' WRANGLE AMONG COUNSEL.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think—

Mr. Fullerton—I ask her if she said that.

Mr. Evarts—But I have the right—

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; you have not the right.

Mr. Evarts—To know what she said.

Mr. Tracy—The record shows what she said.

Mr. Fullerton—You are not the record.

Mr. Tracy—No, Sir; I am not the record.

Mr. Fullerton—You have got another record.

Mr. Tracy—Counsel has no right to ask her what she said in her cross-examination, and I object to it.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] I ask you whether you did not say, on your cross-examination, that Mrs. Dows went to California after you had been there about a month?

Mr. Tracy—If the witness has said that the record shows what she said, and I submit the counsel has no right to ask the question.

The Witness—I don't remember—

Mr. Shearman—Miss Turner, wait until the counsel makes his objection.

Judge Neilson—The right to put such a question—

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—I was about to observe that the right to put such a question depends upon whether the previous statement is clear and well understood. If there is any ambiguity about it you have a right to put it. I don't recollect.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, then, there is an ambiguity there.

Judge Neilson—Oh, no! it don't follow.

Mr. Beach—Does your Honor intimate that under any circumstances, on cross-examination, we have not a right to ask the witness whether she has not previously stated a certain fact in her cross-examination?

Judge Neilson—I understand that—

Mr. Beach—As a test of recollection?

Judge Neilson—I understand that that applies to cases where the answers already given may not be full, or perfectly understood.

Mr. Beach—May it not be, Sir, for the purpose of testing the recollection of the witness in the presence of the Court and jury? I submit, Sir, that it is a right of the cross-examiner to put a question of that character, and that it is the best and surest and most certain test of recollection and strength of memory of the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a right I never heard questioned before, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Nor I, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—And one that I have exercised a thousand times.

Mr. Tracy—I know you have.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you know one thing.

Mr. Tracy—I know a good many things.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I say that I have a right to test the recollection of this witness and to know whether she has not already stated that Mrs. Dows went to California about a month after she got there, and I have this right, Sir, to put the question for the purpose of having her correct her testimony, if she were in error. I shall give her the largest opportunity to make these corrections. I am not here for the purpose of entrapping the witness by getting her to state what she does not desire to state, and if she have stated that Mrs. Dows went to California about a month after she arrived there, and that was wrong, I want to call her attention to it, and have her correct it, if it be within her power to correct it.

Mr. Evarts—I suppose, if your Honor please, the right of the cross-examination is this, undoubtedly: when any point in the witness's testimony has been misunderstood by the examining counsel, or has escaped his attention, he has a right, undoubtedly, to reinform himself accurately on that subject; and that is not complained of; but there is a great difference between that right and the exercise, or assumption of the right of imputation that the witness has said something contrary, and then, when she now states it correctly, present it as if it were a correction, when it is simply a re-statement of what she has said, and by the insertion of such questions as counsel know how to frame, a witness can be brought into that situation. Well, that is not a just exercise of the right of cross-examination, and therefore the courts do not allow this constant repetition of inquiries, and much less an assumption in them that the witness has said something contrary to what she has said.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Evarts, allow me to say—

Mr. Evarts—And every witness is entitled to have an assumption put to her or him correctly, upon what she has already testified.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Evarts, allow me to say that this is not an assumption of anything. We simply put to her the direct question whether she has said this.

Mr. Evarts—You put it in this form: "Have you not already testified?" That carries an imputation that she has testified.

Judge Neilson—It carries the suggestion that some correction may be proper.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; and then when she says it was not so, it is assumed that it is a correction, when it is simply a repetition of what her correct testimony on the record will be found to be; and so the witness is held up in the light of having needed to make a correction, and having made a correction, when the error is in the assumption that is interpolated between her first and second answer by the imperfect memory of the counsel.

Mr. Beach—Then her answer will correct that imperfect memory. We ask to see if she has not so testified. If she says no, why that ends it. If she says yes, she has an opportunity to explain.

Mr. Fullerton—I now insist upon the question.

Mr. Evarts—What she has testified is recorded, and what my learned friend says is a test of the witness's memory as to whether she has said so and so. In the course of a cross-examination, the witness's memory is tested by its general reach, not upon carrying in her mind everything that she has said during her cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to see if she can reach as far one time as she did at another.

Judge Neilson—Repeat your question.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you not stated on your cross-examination that Mrs. Dows went to California about a month after you went to live with her at Tarrytown? A. I think—I know that I stated Mrs. Dows went to California after I—after we went to Tarrytown, but I don't remember whether I said a month or how long.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I propose to turn to the record and see, Sir. I will adopt the counsel's method of determining the question.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer who took the portion of the testimony referred to, had left the room.]

Judge Neilson—[To other reporters.] Have you got it?

Mr. Fullerton—Has any reporter got her testimony as to the time when Mr. and Mrs. Dows went to California?

Judge Neilson—It is back some ways.

Mr. Porter—It will appear in the printed report in the morning.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't propose to adjourn for that purpose; I want it now.

Mr. Evarts—It is not a legitimate inquiry. If there is error in it, if there is confusion about it, it is to be remarked on in its proper place. We do not stop here to convict people as they run along.

Mr. Fullerton—No; or we would not have any witnesses left.

Mr. Beach—The object of this is to present that to the witness and ask her to explain it.

Judge Neilson—It may be due to the witness; I can't say; I don't remember.

Mr. Norcross, of The Eagle, here read the testimony referred to, as follows:

Q. Did David Dows's family leave Tarrytown that Summer to go anywhere? A. I think they did go away; I think they went to California.

Q. Do you know what time they went? A. They went when we first went there; perhaps the latter part of May, but I am not positive.

Q. Did you remain at the house after they went to California? A. I don't remember; I guess I was there when they returned.

Q. When did they return? A. I don't remember.

Q. How long were they absent? A. I don't recollect.

Q. About how long? A. I couldn't say.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is all.

Mr. Norcross—[Still reading]:

Q. Which of the family went to California? A. Mr. and Mrs. Dows, I think—

Mr. Evarts—That is enough, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—No, it is not enough. It may be enough for you.

Mr. Evarts—There was but one question asked her, and that was what she had stated as to the time when Mr. and Mrs. Dows went to California.

Mr. Beach—Well, let us know, Sir, what she has said upon that subject.

Judge Neilson—The question was whether she said they went after she had been there about a month.

Mr. Evarts—That has already been answered.

Mr. Beach—No.

Mr. Norcross—The answer is two questions below. [Reading]:

Q. Which of the family went to California? A. Mr. and Mrs. Dows, I think; I don't know whether any one went with them or not; I don't recollect.

Q. You returned, you say, to Mrs. Tilton's in 1889. How long did you remain there, then, before you left? A. I think I was there about two or three months, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Now, your Honor perceives that this imputation upon the witness was entirely unfounded.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor does not perceive any such thing.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we don't talk two at once.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, the witness does not appear to have said that they went after she had been there about a month.

The Witness—No, Sir; I did not remember.

Mr. Evarts—No, Sir; she stated exactly that they went after she got there, and she thought in the latter part of May, and they put in evidence a letter dated the 17th of May, which speaks of her having come there the day before.

Mr. Fullerton—So that she went to California before she had been there a month, which is all the better.

Mr. Evarts—No matter about "all the better;" that is arguing the case. The question is whether you correctly stated the witness's previous testimony.

Mr. Beach—We said about a month, Sir. She went there about the middle of May, and she says Mrs. Dows left the latter part of May.

Mr. Fullerton—Less than a month.

Mr. Porter—In other words, their statement was incorrect.

Mr. Evarts—And hers was correct.

Mr. Beach—Then it was not as favorable to ourselves as we might have made it; that is the error that we fell into.

THE TESTIMONY RESUMED.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed now.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Miss Turner, how strong is your impression that you were there when they returned from California? A. How strong is it?

Q. Yes. A. It is not strong at all.

Q. I understood you to say that you were under the impression that you were there when they returned. A. Yes, but I am not under a strong impression; I am not sure whether I was there or not.

Q. Well, that was an event that would fasten itself upon your mind, is it not? A. No, I don't know that it is.

Q. The absence of a family to California and their return to the house—would not that impress you so that you would recollect the fact whether you were there or not? A. No, Sir; I cannot say certainly whether I was there or not; I think perhaps I was there, but I cannot say certainly.

Q. A little louder; the jury can't hear you. A. I say I think perhaps I was there, but I can't say certainly whether I was there when they returned or not, but I was there when they left for California.

Q. Now, you stated what members of the family went to California. A. I stated Mr. and Mrs. Dows; I don't recollect whether other member went or not.

Q. You cannot tell me how long they were gone? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who composed the family during their absence? A. Their daughters—two young ladies, and they had three or four children—two oldest daughters.

Q. Married daughters? A. No, Sir; no married daughters, that I know of. Miss Annie Dows was home and Miss Lena Dows, and Miss Mary Dows, and Susie and David Dows, and several servants they kept.

Q. You recollect then who composed the family during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Dows, do you? A. I think I do, Sir, as I was going to state. There was a lady there that was acting as housekeeper, a Miss Rogers, I think, her name was, besides the children.

Q. Then you know that you were there during Mr. and Mrs. Dows's absence? A. Oh, yes, I was there when they went to California.

Q. And remained after they had gone? A. I was there, yes, Sir, after they had gone.

Mr. Beach—She says she "was there; yes, Sir." Let her say—

Mr. Fullerton—Were you there during the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Dows to California? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who paid you your wages when you did leave finally? A. Mrs. Dows.

Q. Mrs. Dows? A. Mrs. Dows.

Q. Then Mrs. Dows had returned from California before you left, had she? A. I suppose she must have returned.

Q. Well, she paid you your wages when you left finally, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir; she did.

Q. That was after her return from California, then, wasn't it? A. Well, you know I stated that I didn't remember—was not sure whether I was there or not after she returned from California.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, if she paid you your wages when you finally left, and you were there during her absence, it must have been after her return, must it not, from California? You didn't receive your wages from Mrs. Dows in California, did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, she must have got back then before she paid you, didn't she? A. She may have paid me before she went.

Q. Well, did she pay you before she went to California? A. Well, all that I can say is, that when I left there and came to see Mrs. Tilton, Mrs. Dows paid me my wages; whether she paid me in full, or gave me some money to come to see Mrs. Tilton with, I am not sure about; but, however, she gave me the money, when I was in Tarriytown, to come to see Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Now, I am not talking of the occasion when you left Tarriytown to come and see Mrs. Tilton; I am talking of the time when you left Mr. Dows's house—his house, finally, not to return. A. Well, I stated before that I did not remember whether I had returned after she had given me that money—returned to Mrs. Dows's, or returned to Mrs. Tilton's, for certain. That I stated before.

Q. Well, if you came to see Mrs. Tilton then, after you had received your wages finally from Mrs. Dows, it must have been after their return from California, was it not?

Mr. Everts—Why should that reasoning be allowed with the witness? The witness has given the extent of her recollection on all the facts. She has said that she had—in the direct examination or in the beginning of the cross, I think it was—that she had an indistinct recollection of having come down to make a visit, carrying the impression of a visit from which she returned, but only an indistinct recollection. Now, all the facts have been explored sufficiently, and the witness's memory and truthfulness and all, on the facts, are completely here. Now, why should the counsel continually reason with the witness as to whether so and so must not be so and so, if so and so was so and so.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I didn't put that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. Everts—Well, I understood it to be in that sense.

Mr. Fullerton—No, my question was not so.

Mr. Beach—We don't use the term "so-so."

Judge Nelson—The purpose of the counsel may be, and it rather seems to me it is, to assist the witness's memory to get the best recollection he can from her. If that is his view it is proper.

Mr. Fullerton—That is my view exactly, and I am quite willing she should take all the time she requires to reflect upon it and to give no answer hastily. [To the witness.] What I wish to know, Miss Turner, is this: If you didn't return to Mrs. Dows's after she paid you your wages as you have stated? Then I ask you whether that money was not received after Mrs. Dows's return from California? A. Yes, Sir; I understand your question; she may have given me some money before she went to California; it may have been afterward.

Q. Is that the only answer you can give? A. That is the only answer I can give, Sir.

Mr. Porter—I submit that that is a perfect answer.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't say that it wasn't. [To the witness.] I will give you until after recess to reflect upon it, Miss Turner, and see if you can give me any further or different answer.

The Court here took a recess until two o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

After recess, Miss Turner was recalled and her cross-examination continued as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—Miss Turner, can you now state upon reflection, whether you remained at Mr. Dows's until the family returned from California? A. Yes, Sir, I can. I—

Q. A little louder. A. My memory has been refreshed by Mrs. Tilton's diary, and I—then I remembered another instance; little Ralph was born in June, 1869, after I had returned from Mrs. Dows's to Mrs. Tilton's, about two or three days after I had returned.

Q. You have conversed with Mrs. Tilton since you left the stand? A. I talked with Mrs. Tilton, yes, Sir, and received my information from her diary, and then I recollect several things that occurred.

Q. I don't ask about the diary; you were there when Ralph was born, were you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you there when Mrs. Tilton left for Monticello? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That you are quite sure of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And remained at the house some time after she left, did you? A. Some time after she left, yes, Sir.

Q. And until you went to Keyport? A. Remained there until I went to Keyport; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, after you left Mr. Dows's, did you go to the "Home" in Elizabeth-st. before you went to Mr. Tilton's? A. No, Sir; I think not; I think I came directly to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Did you not, when you came to Mr. Tilton, say that you could not remain at the "Home" without paying your board? A. Don't remember any such occurrence, Sir.

Q. What was the name of that Home? A. It is called the "Working Women's Home;" it is in Washington Place, I think, on the corner of Washington Place and Elizabeth-st.; I think that is it.

Q. In New-York? A. Yes, Sir, right opposite Washington Park.

'THE FIRST INVASION OF MISS TURNER'S ROOM.

Q. On this occasion, when Mr. Tilton came to your room in '69, as you have related, was that the first or the second time that he came? A. Second time.

Q. The second time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when did he come to your room the first time? A. In 1868, Sir.

Q. What season of the year? A. I think it was in warm weather, in the Spring or Summer.

Q. And where was Mrs. Tilton then? A. I could not say where she was, but I don't think she was in the house.

Q. Well, don't you remember, if she was absent, where she was? A. I don't remember that she was absent certainly, but—I can't say certainly that she was absent.

Q. Well, do you think that she was at home? A. No, Sir; I don't think she was at home.

Q. How? A. I could not say certainly that she was at home.

Q. Then you have no recollection, have you, whether she was at home or absent from home when he visited your room in 1868? A. My impression is that she was absent, but I could not say positively; however, she was not around at that time, when Mr. Tilton came to my room.

Q. Now, what room were you in, in 1868, when he came to your room? A. I was in the front story bed-room—second story front bed-room, that was connected by folding doors, off the sitting-room.

Q. Did any one sleep with you that night? A. No, Sir; I slept alone.

Q. Where did the children sleep? A. I don't recollect anything about the children at that time.

Q. Can't you tell where the children were sleeping that night? A. I don't recollect anything about the children that night, Sir.

Q. Where did Mrs. Tilton sleep that night if she were at home? A. I did not say she was home, Sir.

Q. If she were home, I said? A. If she was home?

Q. Yes. A. I could not say, because I ain't sure whether she was home or whether she was away.

Q. Where did she usually sleep at that time—in what part of the house? A. Well, sometimes she slept in the front part, and sometimes in the back part of the house, but I recollect nothing about Mrs. Tilton's sleeping, or the children sleeping that night; I could not say anything about it, and my recollection is that Mrs. Tilton was not at home, but I could not say positively.

Q. Well, this visit of his to your room made a great impression upon you, didn't it? A. Yes, Sir; I thought a good deal about it.

Q. How? A. I thought a good deal about it.

Q. And you haven't forgotten it at all? A. Oh! no, Sir.

Q. Well, wouldn't you think—don't you think you would be apt to remember where Mrs. Tilton slept, and whether she was at home, and where the children slept that night? A. I don't recollect anything about it, Sir; about the children or Mrs. Tilton in connection with that night, except what I said first, that my impression is that she was not at home.

Q. Well, won't you tell me now what occurred on that first night in 1868 when he came to your room? A. Relate the circumstances?

Q. Yes. A. How he came to my room and what he said?

Q. Won't you relate to me what occurred on that first night when he came to your room whilst he was there? A. Yes Sir; shall I relate the conversation?

Q. You could not relate what occurred unless you did relate the conversation. A. Well, Sir, he—

Mr. Beach—Well, we want our question general without any qualification covering all that occurred.

Mr. Fullerton—I want all that took place from the time he entered until he left that room. A. Yes, Sir; I was lying in the second story front room, that is off the sitting-room, connected by folding doors, and I had not been in bed very long before Mr. Tilton came in, and came the other side of the bed, and said he had come to bid me good night. He stroked my forehead and my hair and said—what nice soft hair I had, and how nice and soft my flesh was; then offered to put his—then put his hand in my neck, and I took it out, and said he "Why, Bessie, my dear, you are painfully modest; those things are all perfectly proper, those caresses; the best people in society do those things." I said I could not help what the best people in society did, I had my own ideas about what was proper and modest, and it did not make any difference to me what people did in the best classes of society. Then he went on to state that ministers took those—such privileges with young ladies, and with married people, and asked me about—if I wouldn't like to be married. I asked him why—what put that in his head; and he said that I was a very nice affectionate young girl, and he thought I ought to have a good husband. I said that I supposed when the right time came along, the right man came along, perhaps I would be married, but I hadn't thought much about it, I didn't think it was the chief end and aim in life—didn't think getting married was the chief end and aim in life. And then he spoke of affinities; wanted to know if I didn't think people had affinities for each other, and I asked him what he meant by that; and he said what was meant by that was when a man saw a woman that he would like to fondle and caress, and loved her, that she ought to be willing to have him fondle and caress her, and that was what was affinity—what was meant by "affinity."

Q. Well, did he then leave. I asked you to tell me all that occurred? A. No, Sir; he did not leave then; and then he asked me if I would not allow him to love me as he wanted to, and that no harm should come to me, and that physical expressions of love were the same as a kiss or a caress. Then I think something was said about—I was a strange little girl, or something, and he then kissed me, I think, and left me.

Q. Well, did he say that you were a strange little girl? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You say you think he did? A. He did.

Q. Well, what did he say upon that subject? A. He said that I had very strange ideas—I was a strange little girl.

Q. Now, have you given the exact language made use of by Mr. Tilton on that night? A. As near as I can remember, Sir.

Q. Well, do you think you remember it pretty accurately? A. I am pretty sure; yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. I think I remember very accurately that those were the words that he used.

Q. The very words? A. That those were the words that he said.

Q. You have used the very words then that he uttered? A. I think I have; yes, Sir.

Q. And you have remembered them since 1868 to the present time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About seven years, or six years and over, isn't it? Mr. Everts—Don't reason about it.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no objection to reasoning, I take it.

Mr. Everts—Yes, there is to reasoning with the witness all the time.

Q. And have you given your exact replies to him? A. I gave my exact replies when he said that—when he wanted to put his hand in my neck and why I objected to it; I had my own ideas about what was proper and modest.

Q. And as to getting married—you have given your very language? A. Yes, Sir; the very language.

Q. The very words? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, Miss Turner, didn't that conversation shock you? A. I thought it was very singular—very strange.

Q. How old were you then? A. Let us see; I went there in '64—'64—perhaps—about seventeen, I guess I was then.

Q. Well, you were old enough to know that that proposition was wrong, weren't you? A. About his putting his hand in my neck?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir, certainly. I felt that it was wrong or I would not have replied the way I did.

Q. You thought that all his conversation was wrong, didn't you, about affinities, and loving people? A. Yes, Sir, I did.

Q. Well, didn't it shock you? A. I thought it was very strange.

Q. Is that all you can say, that you only thought it was strange? A. I cannot say truthfully that I was really shocked; but I studied over it.

Q. Well, were you frightened? A. No, Sir; I don't think I was really frightened at that time.

Q. What? A. I don't think I was really frightened; but I thought over it, and thought it was very singular.

Q. Well, were you displeased? [After a long pause.] A. Yes, Sir; I was.

Q. Angry? A. I was angry with him when he put his hand in my neck.

Q. Well, you were angry, were you? A. Yes, Sir; when he put his hand in my neck.

Q. Well, weren't you angry when he proposed that he should love you, and that it would do you no harm? A. Well, I didn't really, then, know his design, what he really meant; that is what I said; I studied over his language when he proposed that he should have—talked about affinities and proposing to love me; I didn't really understand him.

Q. You didn't understand him? A. No, Sir; what he really meant.

Q. You didn't know what the meaning of his language was? A. No, Sir, I didn't; that is why I say I studied over it; but I was angry when he put his hand in my neck.

Q. Well, being angry then, it made an impression upon your mind, didn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You had been upon friendly terms with Mrs. Tilton up to that time, had you not? A. Up to that time?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were attached to her, were you not? A. Oh! yes, Sir; Mrs. Tilton was a mother to me always.

Q. Very much attached to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you didn't tell Mrs. Tilton about it then? A. I did not tell her then; no, Sir.

Q. Didn't say anything to her about it, did you? A. I think that I told her, one day on the stairs, that I had something to tell her, or thought of telling her something—

Q. Well, you didn't tell her, did you? A. I don't think I told her; not at that time; no, Sir.

Q. Well, have you any doubt whether you told her or not at that time? A. [After a pause.] Yes, Sir; I have a little doubt as to whether I—whether I—it seems to me that I told her what I have said; that I spoke to her the way that I have said; that I said I had something to tell her, but would not tell her for fear it would trouble her; that is my impression.

Q. Well, now, the question I ask you is whether you told Mrs. Tilton at that time, or near that time, what occurred in the room when Mr. Tilton visited it? A. I don't think I told her.

Q. You don't think you did? A. No, Sir.

Q. Are you sure upon that subject? A. No, Sir; I am not sure.

Q. Don't you think if you had told her it would have impressed itself upon your mind so that you would have recollected it? A. I don't think I told her.

Q. But you cannot speak positively? A. No, Sir.

Q. You recollect now perfectly and distinctly, as I understand you, that he said: "Why, Beadie, my dear, you are painfully modest?" A. Yes, Sir; I remember that very well.

Q. And do you remember also that he said to you, "Why, those caresses are all right?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "People in the best society do all these things?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "And it is perfectly proper?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "Nobody but people who had impure minds would think of such things as that not being right?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You recollect he used all that language to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it has been in your mind ever since? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do I understand you as having related all that occurred whilst he was in the room that night, as near as you can recollect it? A. As near as I recollect, I think I have related all that occurred; yes, Sir; except that when he spoke about physical expressions of love and men caressing women, and then bringing up the ministers, I repeated the second time that I had my own ideas about what was right and proper, and whether ministers caressed ladies and young girls and married women, or whether they didn't, I had my own idea about what was right and proper, and I didn't think those things were right.

Q. Did you understand what he meant when he spoke of "physical expressions of love?" A. No, Sir, I did not. That is what I say I studied over—his "affinities" and his "physical expression of love."

Q. How long did you study over that expression before you got at its meaning? A. I didn't get at its meaning; I thought it strange those words he used about "affinities" and those "expressions of love."

MISS TURNER AND THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Q. Where were you in the Summer of 1874? A. In the Summer—that was last—

Q. Last Summer? A. Last Summer?

Q. Yes, this is 1875. A. I was in Beaver.

Q. Pennsylvania? A. That is, I went to Beaver in March and remained there until June, until school closed there.

Q. Where did you go in June? A. I went to—I stayed two or three weeks in Beaver after school closed, and then I went to visit some friends in Pittsburgh.

Q. From Pittsburgh where did you go? A. While I was in Pittsburgh my father came—

Q. Where did you go? A. I was going to tell you.

Q. Yes, but you are telling me about your father. A. I was going to tell you that my father brought me on here from Pittsburgh.

Q. To Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time did you get in Brooklyn? A. I think it was some time in August.

Q. How long did you remain in Brooklyn after you arrived here in August, 1874? A. I remained perhaps two days, as near as I can recollect.

Q. Whilst you were here did you go before the Committee of Plymouth Church investigating the scandal that was prevalent then in regard to Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, that was the occasion of my coming on.

Q. You went before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you give evidence before that Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you relate to that Committee the circumstances attending Mr. Tilton's first visit to your room in 1868? A. I don't think that I went into detail.

Q. Did you relate any of the circumstances attending that visit to your room in 1868, before that Committee? A. I think I related Mr. Greeley's—

Q. How? A. I think I related about Mr. Greeley.

Q. That was in 1869? A. That was in 1869; yes, Sir.

Q. But my question is whether you related the circumstances attending his visit to your room in 1868, to that Committee? A. I spoke of the two occasions, but I don't think I went into detail about the first occasion.

Q. Yes, but you did speak of the first occasion that he came to your room to that Committee, did you? A. I spoke of two occasions, or the question was put to me: "Did Theodore Tilton ever offer to ruin you?" and I said: "Yes, on two occasions." "Did Theodore Tilton ever attempt your ruin?" and I said: "Yes," and then I named two occasions.

Q. You knew then, I suppose, when that question was asked you, what he meant by "physical expressions of love," did you? A. Yes, Sir, I knew because he had expressed to Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—Oh! wait one moment.

The Witness—told me; that is the only way I knew.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out.

Judge Nelson—Yes.

Q. Do you recollect the testimony you gave before that Committee in regard to these two occasions when Mr. Tilton was said to have visited your room, the one in 1868, and the other in 1869? A. As I remember it, as I stated it before, the question was put to me: "Did Theodore Tilton ever attempt your ruin?" and I said: "Yes, on two occasions."

Q. Is that all that you said upon that subject? A. I guess I said more.

Q. Did you, before that Committee, state where Mrs. Tilton was upon any one of these occasions when Mr. Tilton visited your room? A. It seems to me I stated Mrs. Tilton was away when Horace Greeley was there, as I think I stated when—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; answer the question.

Mr. Shearman—She is doing this.

Mr. Beach—No; she is going beyond the question.

Mr. Shearman—He has asked for the other occasions, and she was stating them.

Mr. Beach—She is asked whether she stated a specific thing as to where Mrs. Tilton was.

Mr. Shearman—She says she did as to one occasion, and she thinks she did as to others.

Q. Did you state to that Committee where Mrs. Tilton was on either or both of those occasions when you allege he visited your room? A. I think I stated—

Q. Just answer my question yes or no first? A. I think I did.

Mr. Shearman—We object to that.

Q. On which occasion did you state that Mrs. Tilton was absent, and where did you state that she was? A. I think I stated that she was in Monticello, but I am not sure about that.

Q. Did you not state that she was at Schoharie?

Mr. Beach—If the minutes will refresh her recollection, she can look at them.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I may have stated I thought she was at Schoharie, but I cannot say positively.

Mr. Beach—[Handing minutes.] Look and see.

Mr. Evans—They are not memorandums of her own.

Mr. Beach—It is not necessary that they should be; any memorandum will do.

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing minutes to witness.] Just look at that part of it here and see whether it refreshes your memory as to your evidence before the Committee? A. [Referring to the printed testimony.] By this I must have said Mrs. Tilton was at Schoharie.

Q. Do you recollect that you did say that Mrs. Tilton was at Schoharie? A. I ain't sure about that, Sir. I know I stated Mrs. Tilton was away.

Q. Does this refresh your recollection so as to say whether Mrs. Tilton was really at Monticello or Schoharie at the time when he visited your room in 1868 or 1869? A. Well, the testimony says it was after returning from Schoharie, so I suppose from that I must have said at Schoharie.

Q. I am asking you whether, after reading that, it refreshes your recollection upon the subject as to where she was? A. No, Sir; it don't refresh my recollection sufficiently to say I am sure I said she was at Schoharie.

Q. Does it refresh your recollection so that you are now able to state whether Mrs. Tilton was in fact at Schoharie or Monticello when these visits were made, or either of them? A. It refreshes my memory that Mrs. Tilton was at Monticello.

Q. And not at Schoharie? A. And not at Schoharie.

Q. So, if you stated she was at Schoharie, before the Committee, it was a mistake? A. Yes, Sir; because I know she was at Monticello.

Q. What year was that—1868 or 1869? A. It was in 1869, Sir.

Q. You were asked, before the Committee, whether he had ever attempted your ruin? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Your answer was, was it not, "he did, on two occasions?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you also answer at that time; "The first time I had been sleeping and woke up and found myself in his arms?" A. I think I did, Sir, but I was mistaken?

Q. Oh! but you were mistaken? A. Yes, Sir; because it was not the first time he came to my—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—It was the second time that I woke up.

Q. You did state so, before the Committee, but you were mistaken? A. I was mistaken, because yes, Sir, when I went before the Committee—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't ask for any reason.

Q. Did you go on to say: "I hardly realised where I was. He must have lifted me out of my bed and put me in his?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you also say before the Committee: "When I woke up and found where I was I asked him what he was doing that for, and he said he was lonesome and wanted me to come and be with him?" A. Yes, Sir; wanted some one to love him; that is what he said.

Q. Did you say this before the Committee that I am now reading? Did you say before the Committee that when you woke up and found where you were you asked what he was doing that for, and he said he was lonesome and "wanted me to come and be with him"—did you say that before the Committee? A. I said that before the Committee.

Q. And were you mistaken? A. What he said to me was—

Q. No, were you mistaken in saying that before the Committee?

Mr. Porter—I insist upon her right to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—I insist upon her right to answer, too; I am trying to get it out of her.

Mr. Porter—You interrupted her.

Mr. Fullerton—The only interruption came from your side.

Mr. Evarts—She is not bound to say she was or was not mistaken.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, I was mistaken.

Mr. Evarts—She may state what she said, and we will judge whether she was mistaken.

Mr. Fullerton—We will get what she said, and we will judge whether she was mistaken,

The Witness—Can I not give my reasons for having been mistaken.

Mr. Fullerton—When I get through interrogating you, then you can.

[To the Witness.] Did you also make use of this language before the Committee: "I said that that was not right, and I went back to my own room?" A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Q. Did you also say before the Committee there was nothing said about it at the time? A. Nothing said by who—about what?

Q. Did you make use of this language before the Committee: "There was nothing said about it at the time," in connection with what else was said at the time you were before the Committee? A. I don't think I quite understand your question. Do you mean there was nothing said about his having come to my room to anybody?

Mr. Beach—That is it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes? A. I must have said that before the Committee; yes, Sir.

Q. Were you asked before the Committee with reference to these two visits of Mr. Tilton to your room?

Mr. Beach—Will you wait one moment, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

[Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton held a whispered consultation together.]

Mr. Fullerton—I withdraw that question.

Q. Did you say before that Committee: "I was quite young, and used to be with him a great deal, like one of the children, and I used to comb his hair, and he used to kiss me as he did the other children, frequently?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you also say before that Committee: "I never had any impure thought in regard to the man?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And also this. "When he came to me a second time, and tried to get into bed with me, I got very indignant, and as he would not leave the room, I went into another and locked the door after me?" A. Yes, Sir, and so I did.

Q. Did you also say: "I had never thought of locking the door before?" A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. Now, before the Committee, in speaking of these two occasions when he visited your room, was this question put to you, and did you give this answer, namely: "Were both events near together?" A. Yes, Sir, I think pretty near together." A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were mistaken. were you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you also asked this question before the Committee: "Was it during the absence of Mrs. Tilton?"

Mr. Beach—The same absence.

Mr. Fullerton—The same absence of Mr. Tilton. And did you answer: "Yes, Mrs. Tilton was absent this time, too?" A. As I remember it I said I thought she was.

Q. Did you say that? A. I am not sure I stated positively.

Q. Was this question put to you: "Had she come back from Schoharie?" and did you answer, "No, Sir?" A. Had she come back from Schoharie when?

Q. Did you answer the question put to you before the Committee, namely, "Had she come back from Schoharie?" "A. No, Sir?"

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] That was when she came back from Schoharie, at the time of these two occasions he came to your room? That is what the question is.

Mr. Fullerton—Let me put the question in another way, and perhaps you will understand it better. Was this evidence given by you before the Committee in answer to the questions I shall now read: "Were both events near together? A. Yes, Sir, I think pretty near together. Q. Was it during the same absence of Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, Mrs. Tilton was absent this time too. Q. Had she got back from Schoharie? A. No, Sir." Was that testimony given by you before the Committee? A. I think that was the testimony that I gave the Committee, but I think I said I thought; I don't think I stated positively.

Q. Now, then, do you remember when Mrs. Tilton was at Schoharie? A. When she was at Schoharie?

Q. Yes. A. She was at Schoharie one Summer, I think, while I was in Steubenville, because I think she wrote me from there. That is all I remember about it.

Q. Was she in Schoharie at any time during the time that you were at Mrs. Tilton's, before you went to Steubenville? A. Not that I remember.

Q. Then, when she was in Schoharie you were in Ohio, were you—in Steubenville? A. As I remember.

Q. You were there all that Summer, were you not? A. I stayed a little while after school left, and then I went to Pittsburgh a little while to visit my friends.

Q. Were you in Brooklyn after you left Steubenville, before you came to give your evidence before the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then, from Feb. 1871, up to the Summer of 1874, you were not in Brooklyn at all? A. No, Sir; not until last Summer. I left for Steubenville in 1871, and the first time I returned to Brooklyn was last Summer.

Q. The only way that you knew Mrs. Tilton had been to Schoharie was your correspondence with Mrs. Tilton, was it not? A. That is all, I think, Sir; but I did not state positively that she was in Schoharie, but I thought so.

Q. I understand it. Can you account for the fact that you named this place, Schoharie, in your testimony before the Committee? A. The only way I can account for the fact is, that she used to go to Monticello, and used to go away nearly every Summer; and I just happened to think of Schoharie before the Committee; I had not had any time to think anything about my evidence, and I gave the facts just as they came to me then, as near as I could recollect them.

THE WAY MISS TURNER CAME TO GO BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Q. When did you know you were going before the Committee first? A. I didn't know it until I was there—until I was in Brooklyn here, last Summer.

Q. How long before you actually went before the Committee did you know that you were going before the Committee? A. About ten minutes.

Q. Not longer than that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you not talked with any one in regard to your evidence before the Committee? A. Not until these ten minutes.

Q. With whom did you talk then? A. With Gen. Tracy.

Q. Any one else? A. No, Sir; nobody else.

Q. You were brought here for the purpose of going before the Committee, were you not? A. So I learned after I got here.

Q. Where did you stay after you got here? A. When I arrived in New-York I went to the Courtlandt-st. hotel, a hotel in Courtlandt-st.—I think it is the Continental House, or some such name.

Q. You have not answered my question. A. That is where I went when I came on from Pittsburgh.

Q. How long were you in New-York or Brooklyn before you went before the Committee? A. Suppose I reached New York to-day, to-morrow night I went before the Committee.

Q. And you didn't see any one during the ten minutes before you went before that Committee in regard to your evidence? A. No, Sir.

Q. No one saw you in New-York? A. Not a living soul.

Q. You didn't see Mrs. Tilton in the meantime? A. I thought you were speaking with regard to having talked to somebody about going before the Committee.

Q. Did you see Mrs. Tilton before you went before the Committee? A. I am trying to think. I didn't see anybody to talk to about—

Q. Did you see Mrs. Tilton before you went before the Committee? A. I will tell you in a moment.

Q. Without reference to talking? A. I came over from New-York and went to Mr. Halliday's; my father left me there.

Q. The Assistant Pastor of Plymouth Church? A. The Assistant Pastor of Plymouth Church; my father left me there, and in a little while Mr. Halliday, I think, took me up to Mrs. Ovington's.

Q. At Mrs. Ovington's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And who was at Mrs. Ovington's? A. Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Ovington.

Q. What time in the day did you go to Mrs. Ovington's? A. I think it was in the morning, Sir.

Q. And what time did you go before the Committee? A. It was in the evening, after supper, if I remember right.

Q. And, from the morning when you arrived here until the evening when you went before the Committee, did you remain at Mrs. Ovington's? A. I think I did.

Q. Don't you know? A. I did; I guess I did.

Q. You say you guess. Are you not sure that you remained there during all that period? A. I went up to see Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Speak a little louder, please. A. I remember distinctly going to see Mrs. Tilton with Mr. Halliday; whether I remained with Mrs. Tilton at Mrs. Ovington's or whether I went back to Mr. Halliday's, I cannot say.

Q. Can you not remember whether you went away after arriving at Mrs. Ovington's on that morning before you went before the Committee? A. Whether I went away?

Q. Yes; before you went before the Committee? A. I have said so, but I don't remember whether I remained at Mrs. Ovington's before going before the Committee, or whether I went back with Mr. Halliday, and went before the Committee from Mr. Halliday's.

Q. You cannot remember? A. I cannot remember distinctly.

Q. It was only last Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever converse with Mrs. Tilton at Mrs. Ovington's in regard to the scandal and the Committee? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Not a word? A. Not a word, Sir.

Q. Was nothing said about the object of your visit to New-York or Brooklyn whilst you were at Mrs. Ovington's that afternoon or that day? A. Not until I saw Gen. Tracy.

Q. Not a word? A. Not a word, that I remember.

Q. How long were you in Mrs. Tilton's presence that day? A. I was there some little time, I think.

Q. Well, how long? A. I cannot state just how long.

Q. Hours? A. I cannot state particularly.

Q. Any one else present when you were with Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Ovington.

Q. Any one else? A. Mr. Halliday was there at first a little while, I think, if I remember correctly.

Q. And when did you talk with Mr. Tracy? A. About ten minutes before I went around to Mr. Storrs's.

Q. Before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where did you talk with Mr. Tracy? A. In Mrs. Ovington's parlor.

Q. Mrs. Ovington's parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was any one present when Mr. Tracy talked with you? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Now, do I understand you, therefore, that from the time you went into Mrs. Ovington's house until you saw Gen. Tracy in the parlor just before you went before the Committee, the object of your visit was not spoken of by anyone? A. Was not spoken of by anyone, as I remember; no, Sir.

Q. Nothing was said about it? A. Until Gen. Tracy said it.

Q. I say until Gen. Tracy talked with you about it. I am talking about the time intervening between your arrival and your talk with Gen. Tracy? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can remember one word being said about going before the Committee until I saw Gen. Tracy.

Q. Was anything said about what occurred in your visit in regard to Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir, not that I remember.

Q. You were not asked by anyone what you remembered in regard to Mr. Tilton's treatment of Mrs. Tilton? A. I was not asked anything about it, as I remember, until I saw Gen. Tracy during the ten minutes before going before the Investigating Committee.

Q. Understand I am speaking of the intervening time. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I am not talking about the conversation with Gen. Tracy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Tilton didn't mention it at all to you? A. No, Sir. I think not.

Q. Nor Mrs. Ovington? A. I think not.

Q. Nor Mr. Halliday? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor did you talk with Mr. Halliday whilst you were at his house about it, did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not a word? A. No, Sir.

Q. As silent as the grave, were they, upon that subject until Gen. Tracy came there and talked about it? A. As silent as the grave upon that subject?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir, not a word was said, as I remember, anything about going before the Committee.

Q. Now, what time did the Committee leave that night? A. I think it was between 7 and 8 o'clock, or about 8 o'clock, as near as I can recollect.

Q. And what time did Mr. Tracy call to see you at Mrs. Ovington's? A. He called, perhaps, between 7 and 8 o'clock. However, it was about ten minutes before I went before the Investigating Committee, and when I left I think it was between 7 and 8.

Q. Did you not talk with Mr. Tracy in Mrs. Ovington's parlor nearly two hours before the meeting of that Committee? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Are you sure? A. I am quite sure about that.

Q. And who went with you to the Committee?

Mr. Beach—Mr. Martin.

The Witness—Mr. Martin?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Mr. Martin.

The Witness—I am trying to think who went with me.

Mr. Beach—I mentioned the name to aid you.

The Witness—I don't remember who went with me, whether it was Mr. Halliday, or whether I went with Gen. Tracy I could not say.

Q. Don't you remember going with Gen. Tracy? A. I don't remember whether I went with Gen. Tracy, or Mr. Martin, or Mr. Halliday.

Q. Did you know what you were going over to Mrs. Oving-ton's for when you left Mr. Halliday's? A. I thought I was going over to see Mrs. Tilton.

Q. You had not been told what you were expected to do? A. I was not told anything about it. I think I saw Gen. Tracy ten minutes before going before the Committee.

Q. Mr. Halliday had not informed you anything about what you were wanted there for? A. Mr. Halliday had not said a word.

HOW THE MISTAKES IN DATES OCCURRED.

Q. So that that is the only opportunity that you had to reflect upon that subject before you went before the Committee? A. That ten minutes was all the opportunity I had to reflect, and that is the reason that I got dates wrong, and got those times near together. I told everything before the Committee just as near as I could recollect it then, but upon further reflection I found I was mistaken in several things.

Q. Were your reflections aided by conversation with anybody upon that subject? A. After that do you mean?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; I think that as I talked it over a great many things came into my mind.

Q. With whom did you talk it over? A. I talked it over with myself a good deal.

Q. Talked it over with yourself? A. Yes, Sir, the best part of it I talked over with myself.

Q. Did you talk it over with anybody else beside yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whom did you talk with? A. I talked with Mrs. Mitchell.

Q. The nurse? A. Yes, Sir, the nurse; I talked with Mrs. Mitchell, and I talked with Mrs. Tilton a little.

Q. Yes. A. And I talked with Mr. Hill a little.

Q. Did either of those persons tell you—

Mr. Beach—Let us get the whole of it.

By Mr. Fullerton—Well, with whom else did you talk then? A. Mr. Hill, Mrs. Twitchell, Mr. Shearman, and Judge Porter. That is all, I guess.

Q. Did anybody tell you that you had made a mistake in your evidence before the Committee? A. Did they tell me afterwards that I made a mistake?

Q. After you were before the Committee did any one tell you that you had made a mistake in your evidence given to that Committee? A. No, Sir; my mind told me, when I came to think it over.

Q. Oh! you discovered your errors yourself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Discovered it without the aid of anybody, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you make that discovery? A. I made that discovery since the witnesses have been on the stand—that is, when they were beginning to come on the stand.

Q. During this trial? A. When I was thinking about my own—about myself.

Q. Do you recollect how long ago it was that you discovered it? A. I guess when I first came to Brooklyn.

Q. You were present in the room and heard the testimony? A. Not all of it.

Q. Well, you heard that portion of it which enabled you to determine or ascertain that you had made mistakes in the dates and in your testimony? A. Oh! no, Sir, I didn't; I did not hear any testimony in this court room that enabled me to think that I had made mistakes; it was before I came to the court room at all that I discovered that.

Q. Well, what testimony was it that you saw or heard that enabled you to determine that you had made mistakes? A. It was not any testimony.

Q. You say that after the commencement of this trial, and after the testimony commenced, you made the discovery, do you not? A. I didn't say anything about the testimony, that I recollect; I said after the witnesses began to come, and I began to think of myself.

Q. It was not what the witnesses said, then, that led you to discover that you had made mistakes? A. Oh! no, Sir.

A. Where were you staying when you discovered those mistakes of yours? A. Where was I staying?

Q. Yes. A. In Hicks-st.

Q. With whom? A. Mrs. Purdy.

Q. Who else stayed with Mrs. Purdy when you made that discovery? A. Her family, and a gentleman and lady, and a little child that were boarding there.

Q. I want to know the names. A. Mr. and Mrs. Loomis and their little baby, and Mrs. Purdy's son and her daughter, and Mrs. Morse and Bessie Turner.

Q. Oh! Mrs. Morse was there, was she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She was there when you made this discovery that you had made mistakes? A. Yes, Sir; but she had nothing to do with refreshing my mind about dates.

Q. You have not talked with her, have you? A. I have talked with her.

Q. Did you talk with her at Mrs. Purdy's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About this matter? A. About this scandal?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you talk with her about your testimony? A. No, Sir.

Q. She did not suggest that you had made a mistake? A. No, Sir, she did not.

Q. But it was while you were there that you discovered that you had made a mistake? A. It was while I was thinking over this trial.

Q. What was it that enabled you to discover that you had made mistakes? A. Why, in thinking over my own testimony, I thought of things, and tried to get them straight in my mind.

Q. How did you find out that your testimony before the Committee was not right? A. Why, upon reflection.

Q. You remembered what your testimony was before the Committee? A. I had it; I could read it.

Q. Oh, you had it. In what form did you have it? A. I had it in my mind; I didn't have it in any other form.

HOW THE MISTAKES WERE CORRECTED.

Mr. Beach—You say you had it and could read it? A. I had it in my mind.

Mr. Beach—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer]. What was that last answer, Mr. Stenographer?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the last answer as follows: "I had it in my mind; I could read it."

Mr. Fullerton—Now, in what form did you have it so that you could read it? A. I had it in my mind.

Q. Is that your answer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were reading from your own mind then? A. I was going all over the testimony that I had given before the Committee, in my own mind.

Q. You mean then, by your answer "I had it; I could read it." that you could read it in your own mind? A. Well, at the time I found that I had made mistakes.

Q. Didn't you have a printed book with your testimony in it? A. Not at that time I had not—not at the time I am referring to now.

Q. Well, you were at Mrs. Purdy's? A. I had a book afterwards but not at the time I refer to now.

Q. At what time did you get a book with the printed testimony in it? A. Oh! I guess perhaps about three weeks ago.

Q. After this trial commenced or before? A. After the trial commenced.

Q. Where were you then? A. At Mrs. Purdy's.

Q. Was the book that you had a book like the one that I now show you, entitled "The Great Brooklyn Romance?" A. Yes, Sir; I think it was like this.

Q. Who gave you that book, pray? A. Mr. Shearman.

Q. What did you do with it after you got it? A. I laid it on my trunk.

Q. Is that all that you did with it? A. Yes.

Q. Nothing else? A. No, Sir.

A. Is it there yet? A. I suppose so; it may have been put upon the table or on the shelf.

Q. Do you mean to be understood that you didn't read any part of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You didn't read any part of it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never looked at your testimony? A. Never looked at my testimony out of that book—no, Sir.

Q. Did you look at your testimony in any book? A. Only in my mind. That is all the book I looked at.

Q. You did not examine your testimony before the Committee as it was printed in the book? A. No, Sir; the book was given to me to look into, but I didn't look into it.

Q. You didn't look? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you discovered these errors out of your own reflection, without anybody's suggesting that there were errors committed by you? A. A good many of them I discovered that way. Some of them I discovered in talking—I discovered several in talking with Mrs. Mitchell; she refreshed my mind.

Q. When was that? A. It was one evening some little time ago.

Q. How long ago? A. I don't remember exactly; I guess perhaps three weeks or a month.

Q. Where was Mrs. Mitchell at the time? A. Mrs. Mitchell was at Mr. Hill's.

A. At Mr. Hill's residence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you were around there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With whom did you go? A. I went with nobody but myself.

Q. You went alone? A. I went alone.

Q. In the day-time or in the evening? A. In the evening.

Q. Did you know that Mrs. Mitchell was to be there when you went there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who asked you to go there? A. I received—I think Mrs. Morse brought me the note.

Q. The note from whom? A. I don't know whether it was from Mr. Hill or from Mr. Shearman. However, the note said to go up to Mr. Hill's that evening.

Q. And you went? A. Yes, Sir; it was Saturday evening I think.

Q. Did you make a statement there? A. Make a statement?

Q. Yes; a statement of what you could testify to? A. Well, no, Sir; I didn't make a statement, exactly.

Q. Did you tell what you could testify? A. I told with regard to my being in the room.

Q. Did you tell what you could testify to before this jury, in substance? A. No, Sir; I didn't go all over it. I just told a few things in regard to—

Q. Just a few things? A. Just a few things in regard to—

Q. Who was present when you told that? A. Mr. Hill.

Q. Any one else? A. Dr. Corey.

Q. Who else? Mr. Hill, Dr. Corey, Mrs. Mitchell and myself.

Q. Anybody else? A. No, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Morse was not there? A. Mrs. Morse, no, Sir.

Q. Had you discovered your mistake at that time? A. Discovered my mistake?

Q. Had you at that time discovered the errors that you had committed in your testimony before the Committee? A. No, Sir; I discovered my mistakes before that.

Q. That is what I asked you, if you had before that time discovered your mistakes? A. I discovered them before that—not at that time.

Q. How long before? A. Some little time, but I cannot say just exactly how long.

Q. Was your attention called at that time to the mistakes that you had made? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you speak of them yourself? A. No, Sir; I was not called there to tell about mistakes that I had made.

Q. It makes no difference whether you were called there for that purpose or not. Were your mistakes the subject of conversation there? A. No, Sir.

Q. When was it that Mrs. Mitchell corrected any mistake or error that you had made? A. Mrs. Mitchell did not correct any error or mistake that I had made.

Q. Well, were you enabled to correct any error by reason of your conversation with Mrs. Mitchell, or by reason of any suggestion she made? A. No, Sir; not to correct any error; but in talking with her, several little things came to my mind that I had not recollected before—not regarding any error, though.

Q. Were you reminded, in talking with her, of some things that had not come to your recollection before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you went before the Committee, and relating what had occurred, you didn't state anything, did you, to the effect that Mr. Tilton stroked your forehead and your hair, and said what nice soft hair you had, and how nice and soft your flesh was? A. I don't think I did, Sir.

Q. You did not then state before the Committee that he put his hand, or was putting his hand in your neck, and that you took his hand out, did you? A. Not that I remember.

Q. You did not state that he said, "Why, Beesie, my dear, you are painfully modest?" A. No, Sir; I don't think I went into those details.

Q. Did you say that he said: "Why those caresses, those are all right; people in the best society do all those things, and it is perfectly proper. Nobody but people that had impure minds think of such things as that as not being right,"—you did not state anything of that kind before the Committee, did you? A. Not that I remember, Sir.

Q. And did you state to that Committee anything like this: "and I said I could not help what they did in the best classes of society?" A. No, Sir.

Q.—"that I had my own ideas of what was proper and what was modest, and I was going to carry them out?" A. No, Sir; I don't think I did; I did not go into those details.

Q.—"if I didn't think it was proper for him to put his hand in my neck, I was not going to let him do it; it didn't make any difference what people thought or did in the best classes of society;" did you say that? A. No, Sir; I don't think I did.

Q. Did you state anything like this? "He then laid down and asked me if I did not—if I would not like to be married. Why, I asked him what in the world put that in his head?" Did anything of that kind take place? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Before the Committee? A. I did not state it before the Committee, as I remember now.

Q. And you didn't state before the Committee that he said: "Well, I was a— an affectionate and nice girl, and I ought to be married; I ought to have a good husband;" did you state anything of that kind before the Committee? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. And you did not state before the Committee, did you, that you then said as follows: "I said that I supposed when the time came—the right man came along—perhaps I would get married?" A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Nor this? "But I didn't think getting married was the chief end and aim of life. It didn't trouble me very much, and that if I was married there was one thing very sure: I didn't think I would ever have a literary man for a husband." A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Nor did you state this: "and he then asked me if I didn't think some people had affinities for each other?" A. I think not.

Q. Nor that you answered, asking him "what he meant by 'affinities,' and he said that when a man saw a woman that he loved, she should be his affinity, and they should live together as man and wife; and that was what was meant by 'affinities' for each other?" A. I think not, Sir.

Q. And did you state to the Committee anything like the following: "And then he went on to say that if I would allow him to caress me and love me as he wanted to do, that no harm should come to me—and that a physical expression of love was just the same as a kiss or caress?"

A. No, Sir; I don't think I said any of those things, because, as I have stated, I did not go into details.

Q. Nor did you state before the Committee as follows: "He then went on to describe again—to tell that he knew ministers that caressed girls and married women—it was all perfectly right and proper and beautiful?" A. No, Sir; I didn't state that.

Q. Nor that he then said that you were a strange child, or that he said, "Bessie, you have some very singular ideas," and that he then kissed you good night and left? A. No, Sir; I don't think I told that.

MISS TURNER'S REFLECTION ON THE CONVERSATION.

Q. All that was omitted before the Committee, was it? A. I think it was.

Q. Had you forgotten it? A. It did not come to my mind just then.

Q. Had you forgotten it? A. I had forgotten it at that time; it did not come to my mind just then.

Q. How long had it been out of your mind? A. How long had it been out of my mind?

Q. Yes. It was out of your mind when you were before the Committee—that is, you did not remember it. Now, how long before that had you remembered it? A. When I came to think about my testimony.

Mr. Beach—No; that was afterwards. That is not the question.

Mr. Fullerton—When had you last thought, before going before the Committee, of all this conversation between you and Mr. Tilton in the room that night—when had you last thought of it? A. Why, the ten minutes before I went before the Committee, that was all the time that I had anything to say.

Q. Did you remember all the conversation which you have stated here on this trial, and which, you say, occurred between you and Mr. Tilton, ten minutes before you went before the Committee? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Very well. Now, listen to my question. When had you last thought of it before you went before that Committee some months or years? A. I hadn't thought about it before going before the Committee.

Mr. Beach—At all?

Mr. Fullerton—At all? A. No, Sir; I had not thought anything about that, even ten minutes before going before the Committee.

Q. When did you last think of it before that—how many years ago? When did you last recall this conversation that took place between you and Mr. Tilton? A. When did I last recall that conversation?

Q. Yes; when last before you went before the Committee? A. I did not recall the conversation before I went before the Committee.

Q. I know you didn't; but had you thought of it within a month before going before the Committee? A. I had not thought anything about it, because I did not know I was going before the Committee until ten minutes before I went.

Q. How soon after the occurrences was it that you forgot it?

Mr. Evarts—She has not said that she ever forgot it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am asking her the question.

The Witness—I never forgot it.

Q. It was always in your mind? A. I cannot say it was always in mind, because I had ten thousand other things to think about.

Q. Well, do you remember any one time when you had it in your mind before you went before the Committee at that time?

A. Yes, Sir; I remember when Mrs. Tilton said, out at Mrs. Putnam's—

Q. One moment. I want a date, not what was said. A. Well, I can give you the date of that. It was in 1870, I think.

Q. In 1870? A. In 1870, I think.

Q. Then you thought it all over—this conversation? A. I thought about those two occasions at the time when Mrs. Tilton said that he had confessed to her—

Mr. Beach—No; that is not proper.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you then think over this conversation that you had with Mr. Tilton when he was in your room, this talk about getting married, having affinities, etc. A. Do you want to know when I thought about that?

Q. I want to know just exactly what my question implies. Did you then think it over so as to remember what took place between you and Mr. Tilton when he was in your room on that occasion in 1867? A. I don't understand the time you refer to when you say "then."

Q. You say you recalled it in 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you were in Marietta? A. Yes, Sir. I then recalled the two occasions when he came to my room and described them to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. I don't want that, and I move to strike it out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, strike that out.

Mr. Evarts—It is only the part about describing it to Mrs. Tilton that is to be struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—When you were in Marietta, and recalled the two occasions when Mr. Tilton was in your room, as you have testified before this jury, did you then recall this conversation that you have related here, about getting married and affinities and all that sort of thing? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it all came up to you in detail, just as you have now stated it? A. It came up to me in detail, and I told it to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I can strike it out as often as you put it in, so that it is a waste of time.

The Witness—Excuse me; I won't put it in any more.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well. It then came up to you in detail, did it? A. Yes, Sir; in detail.

Q. And it was fresh in your recollection? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that was in 1870? A. Yes, Sir; 1870.

Q. What time in 1870? A. It was in the Fall.

Q. State as near as you can what time in the Fall? A. I don't know whether it was in October or November; it was in the Fall; I cannot say positively the time; I know it was the very night that Mrs. Tilton came to Mrs. Putnam's; that I am sure of.

Q. This was fresh in your mind in the Fall of 1870. Now, when did you think it over again? A. When did I think it over again?

Q. Yes; this conversation between you and Mr. Tilton? A. When Mr. Tilton knocked me over, that day that we came back from Marietta.

Q. Then it occurred to you? A. Mrs. Tilton had said—

Q. One moment. You promised not to put that in again? A. Oh! excuse me.

Q. What time did you think it over again? A. That time when we had that fuss, when Mr. Tilton knocked me down.

Q. And that was in November, 1870, was it not? A. Yes, Sir; it was in November, because we returned—it was the 10th of November.

Q. Then it all occurred to you, this conversation between you and Mr. Tilton, did it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When next after that did you think of it? A. When I was—let me see—I thought something about it when I went to those persons and told them—told it to three or four persons.

Q. You thought it all over then, this conversation between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't know that I went into all the details, but I thought about it.

Q. Well, it all occurred to you. You remembered it, did you not, and what he said about getting married, and affinities, and making love to you, and physical expressions of love? A. I don't know that I went all over it, but I thought about it—I thought something about it.

Q. It was fresh in your mind then? A. I don't say that all the details were fresh in my mind, but I remembered about it.

Q. You remembered it then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was it that you told those persons? A. It was the 14th of November, I think.

Q. 1870? A. 1870.

Q. When did you next think of this conversation after that? A. Well, then, I suppose the next time must have been when I went before the Investigating Committee, and that I thought of it while I was talking with them there.

Q. Did you think of it then? A. Yes, Sir,—about the two different times that he came to my room, as I have stated.

Q. You thought of it then? A. Not in detail; the details did not come to me then.

Q. The conversation did not come to you? A. No, Sir; I related just about his coming to my room twice, and his taking me on his lap, and—

Mr. Beach—It is not what you related, it is what you remembered that you are asked.

Mr. Fullerton—Is that what you remembered? A. All the details had not come to me then.

Q. Did you relate to the Committee all that you remembered at that time? A. All that I remembered at the time.

Q. What you did not relate had escaped your recollection? A. Yes, Sir, or I should have related it just as I have related it here.

Q. Your intention was to relate to the Committee all that occurred on those two visits? A. My intention was when I went before the Committee to tell the truth, and to tell everything just as I remembered it then, as near as I could.

Q. And the whole of it? A. And the whole of it; yes, Sir.

Q. And the only reason why you did not tell the whole of it, as you have now told it, is that it did not occur to you; you had forgotten it? A. It did not occur to me.

Q. Is there any other reason? A. No, Sir, I can give no reason; if I had thought it all over I should have given it just as I have given it now.

Q. If you had not forgotten it you would have told it? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—She has not said that she had forgotten it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am asking her the question.

The Witness—If I had recollected all the details I should have told it there as I have told it before the Jury and the Judge.

Q. Name the different persons to whom you told this story. A. Yes, Sir. Which story?

Q. About Mr. Tilton's coming to your room? A. I have related it to Judge Morse; shall I mention names?

Q. Yes. A. To Mrs. Bradshaw, to Mr. Joseph Richards, to Miss Isabella G. Oakley, and to Mr. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. State when you made those respective communications to those different individuals? A. On the 14th day of December.

Q. 1870? A. In 1870; yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. You stated a moment ago, that it was the 14th of November, I think, Miss Turner; if you are mistaken you can correct it. A. It was in December, I think, Sir. Did I say November?

Q. I think you did, a short time ago.

Mr. Beach—Yes, you said November.

The Witness—It was in December, I think, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—How long was it, after you returned from Marietta? A. We returned from Marietta the 10th day of November, and I think it was the 14th day of December that I went around and told these different persons.

MISS TURNER'S PURPOSE IN SPEAKING OF HERSELF.

Q. It was more than a month after then—more than a month after you returned from Marietta, before you went around and told this story—these stories? A. A little over a month.

Q. A little over a month; you are quite sure, then, it was not in November? A. I won't state positively, but I think it was in December.

Q. Did any one ask you to go around and make this statement? A. With regard to myself?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you make that statement all on the same day? A. I think I told them all on the same day. I made that a business when I went out that morning.

Q. You made it a business that day to go and tell this story. A. I didn't make it any—I didn't mean to say that I made it business to tell the story in regard to myself, but my business was to tell about Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—No, no.

The Witness—And then I—

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Fullerton—You did tell the story, however? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you went out to tell the story? A. So as to let them see that he was a bad man, and that he was not the one that was suffering; Mrs. Tilton was the one that was suffering; and they did not seem to pay very much attention to what I had said about Mrs. Tilton having a hard time with Mr. Tilton; and then I thought to make it more emphatic, I would tell the story about myself. That was the way.

Q. And that was the purpose you had in going around and telling this story to various individuals? A. The purpose I had in view was Mrs. Tilton's. I thought by relating this story in regard to myself, it would perhaps open their eyes, and let them see that he was not such a good man.

Q. Yes. A. And that Mrs. Tilton was the one that was abused.

Q. Where were you staying when you made this journey around among the neighbors? A. Where was I staying?

Q. Where was your house at that time? A. I think I was at Mrs. Tilton's. We were there that night, when Judge Morse was there, and the next day—yes, I think it was at Mrs. Tilton's. I won't state positively, but I think it was. I think I went from the house to tell these facts that I have related—from Mrs. Tilton's house.

Q. You went from Mrs. Tilton's house? A. I think so.

Q. And returned to Mrs. Tilton's house? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. Did any one suggest that you should go and tell this story? A. No, Sir, no one at all.

Q. Did Mrs. Morse know that you were going to tell the story? A. That I was going to tell this story?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir, Mrs. Morse did not know; Mrs. Morse had suggested before that I should tell the story about what Theodore Tilton told me in Mrs. Tilton's presence about Mr. Beecher—to tell Mr. Beecher and Mr. Morse.

Q. Yes, I understand that; but she did not want you to go and tell these different persons this story?

Mr. Evarts—The question was whether she suggested.

The Witness—No, Sir, Mrs. Morse did not suggest that, what I went around and told different ones.

Q. Did you talk with Mrs. Morse before you went around? A. Not of this story in regard to myself—no, Sir; Mrs. Morse was not there at all when I went around?

Q. Where was she? A. She was around, I think, at Mrs. Bates's.

Q. Well, you saw her frequently, didn't you? A. I had not seen her that morning; no, Sir.

Q. Had you seen her the day before? A. I think I saw her the night before.

Q. Now, didn't you, the night before, tell Mrs. Morse that you were going around to tell that story? A. No, Sir.

Q. You kept that quite secret, did you? A. I kept that to myself.

Q. You didn't want her to know about it? A. I didn't know that I wanted anything about it; I don't know that I thought anything about it at all.

Q. How? A. I didn't think anything about it, whether she would know it, or that I wanted her to know it.

Q. Now, prior to the 14th of December, if that were the date, had you told any person this story? A. I had told Mrs. Putnam the afternoon before Mrs. Tilton went out to Marietta, and I did not tell her voluntarily, though of my own accord.

Q. You did not tell her voluntarily? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you tell any one else before telling these various persons on the 14th of December? A. I never told a single person, that I remember.

Q. Then Mrs. Putnam was the only person to whom you communicated what occurred in the room, between yourself and Mrs. Tilton, until you told these various persons on the 14th of December, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, will you be kind enough to tell us what you told Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I will as near as I can recollect it. I told Mrs.—

Mr. Porter—Won't you speak a little louder?

The Witness—I will, as near as I can recollect, Sir. I told Mrs. Bradshaw, I think, about his having knocked me down, and saying that I tripped and fell, and how he had acted, and that he was very unkind to Mrs. Tilton, that Mrs. Tilton was crying all the time, and then I told him about myself. That is as near as I can recollect.

Q. Tell us what you told her? A. I told her that he had offered to ruin me, and that is all I said about it, as I remember.

Q. Oh! that was all? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You did not tell her the details, then? A. Oh! no, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. Well, you did not tell any one of these persons the details?

Mr. Evarts—She said before, Mr. Fullerton, that she did not.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no harm to repeat it.

The Witness—Did I tell anybody?

Q. Yes. A. Go into details?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you tell any one of these persons, on the 14th of December, if that be the date, the details of what occurred in your room, between Mr. Tilton and yourself, as you have related it here, substantially? A. No, Sir; I think not; I only said that he offered to ruin me; I think that is all I said.

Q. Did you tell Mrs. Putnam the details, as you have told them here, substantially? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Then you told Mrs. Putnam only that he had attempted to ruin you; is that it?

Mr. Porter—I object to the question.

The Witness—I think that is what I told her. She asked me if he had ever taken any liberties with me.

Q. I didn't ask what she asked you? A. And I didn't say anything at all at first; I didn't say a word, and then I went to her afterwards, and told her that I feared I had acted a lie; I had not said anything, but I feared I had acted a lie, and then I told her, I think, that he offered to take liberties with me.

Q. And that is all you told her? A. I think that is all I told her, yes, Sir, as near as I can remember.

TO WHOM MISS TURNER TOLD THE DETAILS.

Q. Now, up to the time when you came upon the stand here as a witness on Friday last, did you tell any one the details of what occurred in your room between Mrs. Tilton and yourself, as you have testified to them here? A. Up to the time that I came on the stand?

Q. Yes? A. Yes, I told them in detail to—before the stenographer and Mr. Shearman.

Q. What stenographer? A. I don't know what his name was.

Q. Where did you tell him? A. At Mrs. Ovington's.

Q. At Mrs. Ovington's; when? A. I think it was last week.

Q. Last week? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was.

Q. It was taken down in shorthand, was it? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose so.

Q. And who were present when you told the story? A. Judge Porter, Mr. Shearman, the stenographer, and myself.

Q. Last week, you think it was? A. I think it was last week.

Q. Now, then, from the time of the occurrence in 1868, up to last week, had you ever told the details to anybody? A. Yes, Sir; I think I told some of the details to Mrs. Ovington.

Q. When? A. I could not say exactly when.

Q. As near as you can tell? A. Since I have been at Mrs. Purdy's.

Q. You say you think you have? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you any doubt in your mind upon the subject? A. I think I can say truthfully that I did.

Q. Did you tell her all the details? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was before you told it in the presence of the stenographer, was it? A. Before I told it in the presence of the stenographer.

Q. Yes. A. I think it was after.

Q. Well, my question was—perhaps you misunderstood it—whether from the time of the occurrence itself in 1868, up to the time when you told it in the presence of the stenographer, whether you had told the details to anybody? A. I don't think that I went into all the details with anybody but the stenographer and Mrs. Tilton, the night that she came out to Marietta.

Q. That is all that you can state now, is it, about that? A. Yes, Sir.

GENERAL CONVERSATIONS ON THE TWO SUBJECTS.

Q. Now, what did you tell Mrs. Bradshaw, if anything, as to the charge which Mr. Tilton had made against Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher? A. I never said a word to Mrs. Bradshaw, or a living soul, about the charge Mr. Tilton had made to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Was the subject alluded to in your conversation with Mrs. Bradshaw? A. No, Sir, I never said a word about it.

Q. Do you confine that answer now to the 14th of December when you visited her, or do you mean to be understood as saying that you never at any time told Mrs. Bradshaw anything whatever in regard to the charge which Mr. Tilton brought against Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton in respect to criminality? A. I mean to say that I never told Mrs. Bradshaw or anybody else about this charge that Mr. Tilton had made about Mrs. Tilton's criminality with Mr. Beecher.

Q. You did not tell Judge Morse that? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. You did not tell Mr. Richards that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor you did not tell Mr. Beecher that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or Miss Oakley? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, whom did you first tell that Tilton had brought such a charge against his wife and Mr. Beecher? A. I never told anybody.

Q. Not up to the present time? A. Not until I was going over my—going over my testimony with the stenographer.

Q. That is the first that you ever disclosed that? A. And—let me see; did I say anything about it before the Committee? Perhaps I stated before the Committee.

Q. Well, do you remember what you said before the Committee upon that subject? A. I don't say that I did say this before the Committee; I don't remember whether I did or not.

Mr. Beach—What is your best recollection?

Mr. Fullerton—What is your recollection upon the subject? A. I guess I told the Committee something about it. I stated something about it to the Committee, I think.

Q. How? A. I think I stated something about it to the Committee.

Q. Well, what do you think you stated to the Committee? A. I think I stated before the Committee that Mr. Tilton had said that Mrs. Tilton had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher.

Q. How? A. I think I stated before the Committee that Mr. Tilton had told me that Mrs. Tilton had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher; I ain't sure.

Q. Did you inform the Committee that Mr. Tilton had told you that?

Mr. Beach—And at what time?

The Witness—I think I told the Committee about all this occurrence that happened the day we came back from Marietta.

Q. No, I didn't ask you about that. Did you tell the Committee in substance that Mr. Tilton had charged his wife with the commission of adultery with Mr. Beecher? A. I think I did, Sir.

Q. And you told the Committee in substance that Mr. Tilton had told you so, did you not? A. I think so.

Q. And when did you tell the Committee that Mr. Tilton had informed you of that? A. When did I tell the Committee?

Q. Yes. A. Why, the evening that I was before the Committee.

Q. No, no; when did you tell the Committee that Mr. Tilton told you that? A. I think I told the Committee that Mr. Tilton told me that the very day after we—the very day after we got back from Marietta.

Q. From Marietta? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. To whom did you tell this story first on the 14th of December, of the persons that you have named? A. Tell which story?

Q. The story which you told to these various persons, on the 14th of December? A. The story in regard to myself.

Q. Yes. A. Who did I tell first?

Q. Which of them did you tell first? A. I think I went first to Mr. Beecher in the morning.

Q. And who next did you tell? A. I think then I went over to the office of The Evening Post, where Mr. Richards was, and told Mr. Richards.

Q. Now, who next did you tell? A. And then I think I told Judge Morse, and then I think I told Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. When you told Mrs. Bradshaw did she say anything about keeping silent in regard to that story to you? A. I don't remember what Mrs. Bradshaw said, Sir.

Q. Didn't you state in substance— A. Except—no, I don't think she said anything. I think that every one that I told it to remained very quiet except Mr. Richards, and what he said to me was: "Whom God hath joined together let no man or woman put asunder."

Q. Did he say that in reply to what you told him? A. What, Sir?

Q. He said that in reply to something you told him? A. He said that in reply to what I had said about Mrs. Tilton's unkindness—Mr. Tilton's unkindness to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Did you talk to him about a divorce—to Mr. Richards? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Why, don't you remember now, that you spoke to him on the subject of a divorce, and that that was his reply? A. I don't remember anything about it.

Q. Did you speak to no one of these various persons about a divorce? A. Not that I recollect, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect of saying that Mrs. Tilton ought to get a divorce? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, what did you tell Mr. Richards? A. What I had told the others, that Mr. Tilton was very unkind, and that she was crying all the time, and then related this—his having offered to ruin me.

Q. Well, why didn't you tell Mr. Richards that Mr. Tilton had charged Mrs. Tilton with adultery? A. Because I couldn't make up my mind to tell anybody those horrible tales that he told me; because I refused—Mrs. Morse wanted me to tell Mr. Beecher; I wouldn't tell that.

Q. Well, you were willing to tell the horrible tale about going to your room and trying to ruin you, were you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, that is reasoning with the witness.

The Witness—I told that because I thought it would have some weight for Mrs. Tilton; I thought that they are all thinking that Mr. Tilton was the wronged one, and I told that story in regard to myself thinking it would help Mrs. Tilton along. That is why I told that.

Q. And you did not think it would help Mrs. Tilton along to tell the other story, did you, of the adultery?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question.

The witness—I didn't think anything about it.

Mr. Porter—Her opinions upon that question are not evidence.

Mr. Morris—We are getting at her motive.

Mr. Porter—Mr. Stenographer, I would like to have that question repeated.

Judge Nelson—I think the counsel will abandon the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, I abandon it because it is answered; I abandon every question as quick as it is answered.

Mr. Everts—We objected to the question.

Judge Nelson—I think her motives for not telling the other story are not to be received.

Mr. Everts—It brings no evidence into the case at all.

Mr. Fullerton—It certainly does bring evidence into the case, and evidence of great value.

Mr. Everts—Well, that is not our view.

Mr. Morris—We don't expect to take your views.

Mr. Fullerton—I was not confining myself to your view; it was according to my own view that I looked at it.

Mr. Everts—It is the judge's views that are paramount.

Mr. Fullerton—You went to The Evening Post office, I understand? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To see Mr. Richards? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you refer to the brother of Mrs. Tilton? A. The brother of Mrs. Tilton, yes, Sir; that is the only Mr. Richards I know.

Q. Mr. Joseph H. Richards? A. Mr. Joseph H. Richards; yes, Sir.

Q. And you told him this story there at The Post office? A. I told him which story?

Q. The story which you did tell him. A. Well, do you mean that I told him in regard to myself?

Q. Yes. A. And Mr. Tilton's unkindness to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Yes. A. I did not tell him right there in the room; he took me up-stairs. I told him I wanted to see him, and he took me up-stairs, and I told him there.

Q. And there you told him the story? A. It was in the building though of The Evening Post.

Q. That was on the 14th of December, 1870, was it? A. I think it was, yes, Sir.

Q. How do you know it was the 14th of December? A. Because I remember that the 18th of December was the night Mr. Morse was sent for.

Q. How do you remember that? A. Because I went for him.

Q. How does that enable you to remember that it was the 18th? A. Well, I remember it.

Q. Can you state how that enables you to remember it; was it connected with any event or circumstance that enables you to remember it? A. Why, it was connected with the event that Mr. Morse was around there, and Miss Dennis, and that they were all in the parlor talking, and I thought they all seemed to be very quiet and acted as if they thought Mr. Tilton was the wronged one, and Mrs. Tilton—

Q. You recollect when you first talked to Mrs. Bradshaw that she made an entry of your conversation in her diary? A. That she made an entry?

Q. Yes, in her diary. A. Not that I know of; she did not have any then.

Q. Did you not in substance say to Mrs. Bradshaw that Mr. Tilton had accused his wife of adultery with Henry Ward Beecher? A. I said—I did not mention the subject to Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. And after you stated that, did not Mrs. Bradshaw — A. I did not state that. Excuse me, I did not state that.

Q. Well, let me suppose you said it for the purpose of a question?

Mr. Everts—Oh! no.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! yes.

Mr. Everts—That we object to.

Mr. Fullerton—I, notwithstanding your objection, shall put that very question.

Mr. Everts—I think that line of inquiry has been passed upon by the Courts, that the counsel must take the witness's answer as it is, and must not suppose that he has answered the other way.

Mr. Fullerton—The counsel upon the other side will see his error when I put the question, because there is no gentleman more experienced than himself. [To the witness]. After you made a statement of that kind, namely, that Mr. Tilton had accused his wife of adultery, did not Mrs. Bradshaw say to you: "You must not tell anybody of that?"

Mr. Everts—Now, don't answer. We object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think the question is improper, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, certainly not, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, suppose you put it in this way: "After you made a statement, whatever it was, to Mrs. Bradshaw, did she say so and so?"

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir, because I want Mrs. Bradshaw's injunction to reach that very declaration.

Judge Neilson—Well, whatever the declaration was.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you not tell Mrs. Bradshaw that Theodore Tilton had charged his wife with adultery, and did not Mrs. Bradshaw then say to you, "you must not tell anybody of it?" A. No, Sir, I don't remember any such thing about it.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will perceive the two things must come together.

Judge Neilson—In that form there is no objection to their coming together.

Mr. Everts—We don't object to that question.

Mr. Beach—We have got it; it is all right.

Mr. Fullerton—It is all right. [To the Witness.] And did you not then observe: "I have already told Mr. Richards, Miss Oakley and Mr. Beecher?" A. I observed— That I told Mrs. Bradshaw, that I told Miss Oakley, and Mr. Beecher, and Judge Morse, and Mr. Richards this story in regard to myself, and Mr. Tilton's unkind treatment of his wife, but I did not observe that I told anything to any one about Mr. Tilton's accusing Mrs. Tilton of adultery with Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Did she not say to Mrs. Bradshaw that she had told these parties the same thing that she told her?

Mr. Fullerton—Did not you tell Mrs. Bradshaw that you told these other persons the same story that you had told her, Mrs. Bradshaw? A. I did not tell Mrs. Bradshaw that I had told that story about Mrs. Tilton's criminality with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Didn't you tell Mrs. Bradshaw this, that you had told Mr. Richards, Mr. Beecher and Miss Oakley, the same story that you had told her? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did.

THE SECOND INVASION OF MISS TURNER'S ROOM

Q. Now, when you were before the Committee, did you forget the details of the other time when Mr. Tilton came to your room? A. I mentioned two occasions, Sir, before the Committee.

Q. Well, you did not mention the details of the second occasion, did you? A. I don't think I did before the Committee; no, Sir.

Q. What did you say in regard to the second occasion before the Committee? A. All that I remember distinctly now is when the question was put to me, "Did Theodore Tilton ever attempt your ruin?" and I said, "Yes, on two occasions."

Q. Yes? A. And then I spoke about combing his hair and sitting in his lap, and—

Q. Well, how did it happen that you did not give the details of the second visit to the Committee? A. It did not happen to come to me.

Q. How? A. I did not happen to think of that.

Q. Didn't happen to think of it? A. As I said before, I told as truthfully, and as well as I could recollect then.

Q. Did you tell the Committee in regard to the second occasion that Mr. Greeley was staying in the house at the time? A. I mentioned before the Committee that Mr. Greeley was there the first occasion when he came to me—that is the first occasion.

Q. That was wrong, wasn't it? A. That was wrong; yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Greeley was the second occasion? A. Second occasion; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you tell the Committee in regard to that occasion that you were awakened one night from your sleep by seeing a man of tall figure standing over you, that you jumped up and said, "Who is there?" and Mr. Tilton said, "Hush! it is only Mr. Tilton?" A. I don't know whether those were the exact words I used or not before the Committee.

Mr. Beach—Well, anything like that?

Mr. Fullerton—Just look and see whether you stated anything of that kind with regard to that occasion. [Book handed to witness.] A. I must have stated, as it is here.

Q. How? A. I must have stated, as it is here.

Q. Well, did you state what is embodied in that question? A. Please repeat the question.

Q. Did you state before that Committee in reference to the occasion when Mr. Greeley was at the house, as follows, or anything like it: "One night I had gone to bed, and I was awakened from my sleep by seeing a man of tall figure standing over me, and I jumped and said 'Who is there?' and Mr. Tilton said 'Hush! it is only Mr. Tilton,' and then I think I raised myself up, and I—it seemed as if I was in a strange place, all whirled around, because I had gone to bed in the second-story back room, bedroom, and his room was next to mine, and I had gone to bed in one of the rooms—in mine—and found myself in his room?" A. I think that is what I stated before the Committee.

Q. Do you find it there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Exactly in that shape, is it? A. Just as you have read it, I think it is here, Sir.

Q. Look at it carefully and see. Is it there? A. This is the way I stated it, I think, to the Committee.

Q. Well, just tell us how you stated it to the Committee?

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Look at the book, if you please; look at the book and see what is there.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; I have looked at it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, now, tell us what you said to the Committee? A. Why, it is here.

Q. Well, can't you? A. Shall I read it?

Mr. Fullerton—Read it. Well, let me read it then. Now, where is it? A. This is it.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, you hold that place; see if I read right [reading.] "When he came to me a second time and tried to get into bed with me, I got very indignant, and, as he would not leave the room, I went into another and locked the door after me."

The Witness—Please excuse me a minute; you have got ahead of me.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, this is the first time I guess.

The Witness—Where are you? In the beginning of this—

Mr. Fullerton—How?

The Witness—In the beginning of this paragraph?

Mr. Fullerton—About the middle of the paragraph, where you come to the second occasion.

The Witness—If you will begin at the beginning then I can tell better.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I don't propose to begin at the beginning, because that is another subject.

The Witness—Very well, then, I will—

Mr. Fullerton—Let me point it out to you. Do you see "second time" there? A. Yes, Sir; "When he came"—I will follow that.

Q. Now, I ask you if this is your testimony before the Committee with regard to the second occasion—[reading:] "When he came to me a second time and tried to get into bed with me I got very indignant, and, as he would not leave the room, I went into another and locked the door after me." A. I think that was the way I stated it to the Committee.

Q. That is the way you stated it to the Committee? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. Now then, you did not state to the Committee, did you, [Reading:]

One night I had gone to bed, and was awakened from my sleep by seeing a man of tall figure standing over me; and I jumped and said, "Who is there?" and Mr. Tilton said, "Hush! it is only Mr. Tilton," and then I think I raised myself up, and I—it seemed as if I was in a strange place, all whirled around, because I had gone to bed in the second story back room—bedroom—and his room was next to mine, and I had gone to bed in one of the rooms—in my room, and found myself in his room, and I says, "What do you—what did you bring me here for; what are you doing?" and he said that he felt lonely, and he wanted somebody to love him; and I said, "You would not have done this if Mrs. Tilton had been home; you should not take liberties when Mrs. Tilton is away that you would not take when she is at home," and I then got up and left the bed, and went to my own room and locked the door.

A. That is what I stated here last Friday, that you have there.

Q. Yes; and now I want to know if you stated anything like that which you stated last Friday before the Committee? A. What I stated before the Committee was this, I think—

Q. Well, did you state anything like that before the Committee?

Mr. Porter—One moment; she has a right to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you state anything like that before the Committee?

Mr. Evarts—The question whether it is like it may depend upon comparing them; she says: "That is what I said before the Committee."

The Witness—I think that is the way I stated it before the Committee, as you read it there.

Q. Will you be kind enough to state what you stated before the Committee?

Mr. Porter—We insist on her right to finish her answer "This is what I said before the Committee—"

Judge Nelson—Now, the counsel asks her to read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; and I want to know what "this" is, so it can appear on the record.

Mr. Porter—Well, let her read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I say read it. [To the stenographer.] What is the last answer?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]: "Q. Now, I want to know if you stated anything like that which you stated last Friday before the Committee? A. What I stated before the Committee was this, I think"—

Mr. Fullerton—By "this," do you mean as follows [reading:] "When he came to me the second time, and tried to get into bed with me, I got very indignant; and as he would not leave the room, I went into another and locked the door after me;"

Mr. Evarts—Are you reading?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; word for word.

Mr. Evarts—Why should not she read, then?

Mr. Fullerton—Because I can read it better.

Mr. Evarts—Ah!

Mr. Fullerton—Well, then, because I choose to.

The Witness—What you are reading there, I think, is what I stated here on Friday; and as it reads here, that is what I think I told the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—What I have just read is not what you stated on Friday at all. I am reading from the same thing you are holding in your hand.

Mr. Porter—I insist upon it that the witness shall be allowed to complete her answer, and state what she did state before the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—That is just what I insist upon exactly, so we agree once.

The Witness—Well, now, I don't know that I understand you exactly.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you in your hands your testimony before the Committee? A. It must be, I suppose.

Q. Then will you tell us now what you stated before the Committee with regard to what took place in the room when Mr. Greeley was at Mr. Tilton's house? A. Why, this is my testimony; I must have stated what is here.

Q. Well, will you read it then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please read it.

The Witness—[Reading]:

At night I hardly realized where I was; he must have lifted me out of my bed and put me in his; when I woke up and found where I was I asked what he was doing that for; he said that he was lonesome, and wanted me to come and be with him; I said that wasn't right, and I went back to my own room; there was nothing said about it at the time; I was quite young, and used to be with him a great deal, just like one of the children, and I used to comb his hair, and he used to kiss me as he did other children frequently; I never had any impure thought—

Q. That is as far as I wish; these are your reflections. That is your testimony before the Committee, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, wasn't that testimony given in reference to the first occasion when he came to your room? A. It was given in reference to both occasions.

Q. Same thing took place on both occasions? A. And when I referred—the—whoever put the questions to me—said: "Did Mr. Tilton ever attempt your ruin?" I said: "Yes; twice—on two occasions."

Q. Then you related the first occasion was when Mr. Greeley was there, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; I related that as the first occasion, but it was not the first; it was the second.

Q. You had forgotten which was first, had you? A. I told it then, as I have said all along, as near and as truthfully as I could recollect it then, what I thought it was then.

Mr. Fullerton [To the Court]—It is suggested, Sir, that I go no further to-day.

Mr. Everts—It is the regular hour for adjournment.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning.

FIFTIETH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MISS TURNER STILL UNDER CROSS-EXAMINATION.

HER EXAMINATION BEFORE THE COMMITTEE AND ON THE TRIAL CONTRASTED—A FEW CONTRADICTIONARY STATEMENTS EXPLAINED—HER MEMORY OF DATES AND LANGUAGE SEVERELY TESTED—UNPLEASANT RELATIONS WITH MR. TILTON'S PARENTS—SHARP CONTESTS BETWEEN COUNSEL—CHARGES OF IMPROPER TUTELAGE AND INTERROGATION.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1875.

Miss Turner's cross-examination was resumed to-day. She had been ill during the previous night, and as she sat near Mrs. Tilton for a few minutes before taking the stand she looked pale and nervous, but the moment she sat down in the elevated chair reserved for witnesses the blood mounted into her cheeks, and as Mr. Fullerton began she bent forward from her previous reclining position, resolutely fortified for the work. The printed reports of Miss Turner's evidence really give a false impression of the young woman's manner. She appears by the mere perusal of question and answer to be quick, impulsive, and voluble to an offensive degree. On the contrary, she is deliberate, and precise, and she is voluble only when some point affecting Mrs. Tilton is brought up. The most singular and noticeable personal characteristic betrayed by her evidence is her strong loyalty Mrs. Tilton.

With a less deliberate witness testifying to so many different circumstances and dates, Mr. Fullerton's line of examination might have been more successful, even though it was not elaborate. The efforts of Mr. Fullerton were directed almost wholly to attempts to disconcert the witness by comparisons of her former testimony (before the Committee) and the evidence on the present trial, and by confounding dates, and even to confuse her as to the number of beds which Mr. Tilton examined to discover which was the softest. But Miss Turner answered the first efforts by declaring that she did not know that her testimony before the Committee had been fully printed, and by saying that she had gone before the Committee at 10 minutes' notice, unprepared, whereas in this suit she had turned all the details over in her mind, knowing that she was to testify. Her recollection of dates was something marvelous, as tested several times, and yet she had the good sense or honesty (as one may choose to consider it) not to insist on too much precision as to exact days. This gave Mr. Fullerton great annoyance and increased his difficulties. Miss Turner would also insist, when Mr. Fullerton put before her documents, on deliberately reading the whole of a letter or piece of testimony before answering. Several times she snapped him up, with the slightest tinge of asperity in her voice and manner, on the misconstruction of sentences. An instance of this occurred after Judge Neilson had required Mr. Fullerton to modify his inquiry as to Mr. Tilton's advice to her on a proposal of marriage, when the cross-examiner asked if he (Mr. Tilton) had advised her relative to her marriage. Quick as thought she answered, "But I never was married." At another stage he asked her what it was she had testified to, as Mr. Tilton's observations to his wife at the Woman's Rights meeting. "I spoke of what I observed," she replied, "and what he remarked." During the suppressed laughter which followed this retort some one near the reporters' desk remarked, "The Tiltons are a family of critics," doubtless alluding to Mr. Tilton's criticism on Mr. Everts's use of the synonyms "sure" and "certain."

Previous to the recess the examination of Miss Turner, conducted in the manner indicated, embraced inquiries as to the circumstances under which she had lived at Mr. Silas Tilton's house at Keyport, and under which she had left there. It appeared not to have been a pleasant experience, as she admitted; but when she was asked if she had not, while angry with Mr. Tilton, threatened to make herself ill by refusing food, she answered negatively, with an accompaniment of genuine laughter which could have been heard outside the court-room, and which was pleasantly reschoed from various parts of the audience. The stories of the nocturnal hanging of pictures and testing of beds were gone over again, and told with some variations which seemed to add to the zest with which the audience received them, to such a degree that Judge Neilson had to reprove the spectators. After recess attention was largely devoted to the interrogation of the witness as to the times when Mr. Tilton is alleged to have locked up his wife in a room to give her scoldings. Mr. Fullerton asked the witness whether it was not Mr. Tilton's habit to read to his wife articles and lectures that he had written and to get her criticism. Miss Turner replied in the affirmative, "But," she added, apprehending his purpose with her usual quickness whenever Mrs. Tilton is involved, "if he was reading her lectures at those times they were scolding lectures, I know." The witness preserved her composure perfectly through the afternoon, and continued to use very expressive language in her descriptions. When she was asked how Mr. Tilton looked on occasions when he had been scolding Mrs. Tilton the witness said, "His face was as red as fire." "As red as fire?" answered her questioner, with an emphasis on the last word. "Well, it was pretty red," returned the witness. "But was it as red as fire?" persisted Mr. Fullerton. "Well it is a common expression to say as red as fire, or as fury." "Yes, but which was it, fire or fury?" continued the lawyer. "Well, in this case," answered the witness, with an air of great candor, "I think his face was as red as fury." Here Mr. Tracy offered some objections, and both he and Mr. Fullerton continued arguing at the same time for several minutes until the latter fairly drowned the voice of his opponent. The witness, after repeated questions, fixed the number of times when Mr. Tilton had locked his wife in a room to scold her at three dozen. In the morning she had said it was over a dozen. Mr. Fullerton questioned her very closely on this point. An argument between the counsel followed, and at its close Mr. Beach made some rather bitter strictures on "the tutelage which the witness had received during the recess." None of the defendant's counsel made any reply to this charge. Miss Turner was asked to repeat what occurred at the time when Mr. Tilton is alleged to have knocked her down. She gave the scene with more than her former energy of description, and her manner of mimicking the plaintiff by placing her hands under the armholes of an imaginary vest and bowing her whole form as she imitated his voice when he said to her gently, after knocking her down, "Why, Bessie, my child, how could you trip and fall so?" seemed to delight the plaintiff quite as much as it amused the jury.

The yellow books containing the witness's testimony before the Plymouth Church Committee were again brought into use just before the conclusion of the afternoon session. Mr. Fullerton was provided with a copy. The witness was handed one and Mr. Porter held one. Mr. Fullerton wanted the witness to refer to a passage. Mr. Porter seemed to think there was some trap in this book for the witness, and the two counsel for a few minutes stood by the witness telling her to read different passages. The witness, however, obeyed neither, but persisted in spite of Mr. Beach's earnest protest in reading half a dozen of her most damaging statements against the plaintiff. She did this with a composure so perfect as to make it impossible for her hearers to determine whether or not she had mistaken the passages asked for. The comparison of the testimony finally resulted in some apparent discrepancies between the witness's evidence before the Committee and that given in court on Friday. This she quietly explained by saying again, "I was mistaken," as she did in three or four similar cases on Monday.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MISS TURNER'S CROSS-EXAMINATION RESUMED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Fullerton—Miss Turner, yesterday, in enumerating the names of persons to whom you communicated this story on the 14th of December, you didn't mention Mrs. Morse; was her name omitted accidentally or purposely? A. Purposely? Mrs. Morse had been told this once in my presence, by Mrs. Tilton she knew them, but not from me.

Q. Not from you? A. Not from me; no, Sir.

Q. You were present when they were told? A. I was present; yes, Sir.

Q. That was the reason that you did not tell her, is it? A. Well, I didn't think it was necessary to tell her the second time, when she had heard it all.

Q. How did you know where Joseph H. Richards resided when you went, on the 14th of December, to tell him this story? A. I did not go to his residence, I went to his place of business.

Q. How did you know where his place of business was? A. I don't know whether I looked in the directory or whether I learned from somebody personally. I am not sure about that.

Q. Didn't you ask Mrs. Morse where Mr. Richards could be found? I don't remember that I did, Sir.

Q. Reflect a moment, and see if you can tell me how you ascertained his residence?

[After a long pause by witness.] Can you tell? A. No, Sir; I don't remember whether I found it in the directory or whether somebody told me, or who it was that told me.

Q. You can't remember, then, anything upon that subject now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where was the office of The Evening Post when you went to it? A. I think it was in Nassau-st., Sir, as I remember.

Q. Do you recollect where? A. It was a good distance down from Fulton-st.

THE STORY TOLD MRS. PUTNAM.

Q. I understood you to say yesterday that you did not tell Mrs. Putnam this story voluntarily? A. No, Sir.

Q. She questioned you about it, did she? A. Yes, Sir, she questioned me with regard to Mr. Tilton; we were speaking of him.

Q. Yes; that is enough. How long had you been at Mrs. Putnam's when she thus questioned you? A. I had been there some seven months—I guess it; some seven months; yes, Sir.

Q. Did she question you before or after Mrs. Tilton's arrival at Marietta? A. The very afternoon before Mrs. Tilton's arrival.

Q. You didn't tell her at first? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did go to her and tell her afterwards, you say? A. I went to her afterwards, because I thought I had acted a lie and I wanted to make it all right, because I felt the way she looked at me she suspected.

Q. Then you went to Mrs. Putnam and told her this after Mrs. Tilton arrived, did you? A. Oh! no, Sir; before Mrs. Tilton arrived; the afternoon before Mrs. Tilton arrived.

Q. Then it was on the same day that you went back to Mrs. Putnam and told her that you knew about it; the same day that she put the question to you, was it? A. The day that Mrs. Putnam put the question to me was the afternoon before Mrs. Tilton came, and that same afternoon I told Mrs. Putnam before Mrs. Tilton came.

Q. You are quite sure it was the same afternoon, but not after Mrs. Tilton arrived? A. It was before Mrs. Tilton came.

WHERE THE WITNESS FIRST HEARD THE CHARGE OF ADULTERY.

Q. When did you first hear that Mr. Tilton had made the charge against Mrs. Tilton of having committed adultery with Mr. Beecher? A. I first heard it from Theodore Tilton's own lips in the parlor the day we arrived from Marietta.

Q. That is the first you ever heard of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or knew such a charge was made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You didn't hear it at Marietta at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. You recollect the day, I suppose, when Mr. Tilton first made that charge? A. Oh! yes, Sir; very well.

Q. You recollect also the second time that Mrs. Tilton went to her mother's after you returned from Marietta, do you not? A. The first time?

Q. The second time; she went twice, did she not, to her mother's? A. She went backwards and forwards several times.

Q. Well, you have related two occasions at least? A. Yes, Sir; when he told the story to me.

Q. When Mrs. Tilton went to her mother's from her own house, have you not? A. Yes, Sir; the first time we went was the morning after Mr. Tilton related this story; told me this story.

Q. And the second time was when? A. Then the second time was the evening that he went around and brought Mrs. Tilton from Mrs. Morse's back again; that was the time that he told me the story again; that was the third time.

Q. How many days was that after your return from Marietta? Mr. Everts—Which one?

Mr. Fullerton—The second visit.

The Witness—The second time she went to her mother's?

Q. Yes. A. The first time was the day after we returned from Marietta, and then I think it was a day or two after that the third time.

Q. Now, had the troubles with Mr. Bowen about the discharge from The Union commenced then? A. The first time that I heard about—

Q. No; had they commenced then? I don't want the first time.

Mr. Shearman—Well, that is not a fair question.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, it is. Had the troubles with Mr. Bowen commenced at the time Mrs. Tilton made the second visit to her mother's after your return from Marietta?

Judge Nelson—Had they commenced to her knowledge, do you mean?

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly.

The Witness—Well, I was going on to explain, to say—

Mr. Fullerton—I am not trying to get anything but her knowledge; counsel know that very well.

The Witness—If you will allow me to explain I will tell you.

Mr. Fullerton—The question is a very simple one.

The Witness—I was going to say, Sir, in answer to your question, that the first time that I—

Q. I don't ask you about the first time, I ask you if at that time you had then heard about the troubles with Mr. Bowen, about the discharge from The Union?

Mr. Porter—One moment.

The Witness—No, Sir; I think not, Sir.

Mr. Morris—[To Mr. Porter]. She has answered the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, let us hear the objection, because I am curious to know what it could be. [To the witness]. You had not heard of the troubles with Mr. Bowen then? A. I think not, Sir; I would not swear positively, but I think not; I think the first time I heard of the troubles with Mr. Bowen was—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't ask you the first time.

The Witness—Excuse me, Sir.

Q. You are not positive upon that subject, then? A. I could not swear to it, Sir, but I think not.

Q. Were you asked anything in that regard before the Committee? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Were you asked this question before the Committee at that time, referring to this second visit of Mrs. Tilton's to her mother's after your return from Marietta—

Mr. Everts—What page is that?

Mr. Fullerton—Page 314, my paging; it is the last but one of the testimony, the top of the left hand page: "At that time was he having difficulty with Mr. Bowen?" Were you asked that question? A. I cannot remember; I suppose my answer is there.

Q. And did you answer: "Yes, Sir, very great difficulties?" A. Well, I don't understand what you mean "at that time"—do you mean when we were around to Mrs. Morse's?

Q. I mean the second time that you went around to Mrs. Morse's after your return from Marietta? A. I don't think I recollect about any difficulties with Mr. Bowen then, Sir.

Q. My question is whether this evidence was given by you before that Committee, as I have read it? A. Well, if I have said "Yes, Sir," there, then I must have given that evidence; if "Yes, Sir," is in that book in answer to the Committee's question, I must have said "Yes, Sir."

Q. Well, did you remember at that time that the troubles had commenced with Mr. Bowen? A. I must have remembered, if I said "Yes."

Q. Would it refresh your recollection by looking at the book? A. No, Sir; I don't think it will. I will look at it and try.

Q. Just look at it and see if it refreshes your recollection.

Mr. Morris—Near the top of the page.

Mr. Fullerton—It is marked.

The Witness—I suppose I must have said it if this is my testimony.

Q. Well, do you now recollect that Mr. Bowen's difficulties, or Mr. Tilton's difficulties with Mr. Bowen, had commenced? A. I don't recollect—

Q. At that time? A. I don't recollect that they had, Sir, at that time that I knew of; there may have been troubles between them, but not that I knew of; that is the best of my recollection now.

THE VISIT TO KEYPORT AN UNHAPPY ONE.

Q. Why did you leave Keyport in the Summer of 1868, when you came to Brooklyn? A. Because Mr. Elias Tilton was very ugly to me and talked very unkind, as they had always been in the habit of doing, because they had hated me very much always, or disliked me very much indeed.

Q. You refer to the father and mother of Mr. Tilton? A. The father particularly—old Mrs. Tilton was generally kind, but still I didn't think she cared very much for me either; but old Mr. Tilton was very unkind and very ugly.

Q. Did he tell you to leave and never to come back into his house again? A. No, Sir, he did not; I left of my own accord; I didn't wait for him to tell me to leave.

Q. You were not, then, discharged from the house? A. No, Sir, I was not.

Q. Were you sick there that Summer? A. I was sick that night; sick the next morning from having cried all night, with the headache.

Q. You didn't get sick there from any other cause? A. Not at that time, Sir.

Q. Quite sure about that? A. Quite sure; yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't you get angry and refuse to speak to any one for two or three days while you were there that Summer? A. What Summer do you refer to?

Q. 1868. A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. How? A. No, Sir; except that I did not speak to old Mr. Tilton after he had talked so unkind to me that morning at the breakfast table.

Q. Did he accuse you of telling falsehoods? A. I never was accused by any one of telling falsehoods but Mr. Theodore Tilton.

Q. Never? A. Never; no, Sir.

Q. Did you threaten to make yourself ill down there when you got angry? A. Threaten to make myself ill? I don't understand you, Sir.

Q. It is a very plain question? A. Threaten to make myself ill?

Q. Yes? A. I never tried to make myself ill.

Q. Did you threaten there, when you got angry there that Summer, to make yourself ill? A. I don't understand what you mean by threatening to make myself ill.

Q. Yes; didn't you refuse food for several days for the purpose of making yourself ill? A. No, Sir; I didn't. [Laughing.]

Q. And didn't, in consequence of that, Mr. Tilton tell you to leave his house and never to return? A. Mr. Tilton never told me to leave his house and never return, Sir. Shall I relate you the circumstance of my having left the house?

Mr. Fullerton—Whenever I ask you to do so.

The Witness—Excuse me, Sir.

Q. And did you not say upon your return from Mr. Tilton's that Summer, that you were ashamed to come to Mr. Tilton's house because you had been sent away from his father's? A. To return to this Mr. Tilton's house?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. On your return to Brooklyn? A. I could not have said that, because I had nothing to be ashamed of.

Q. Well, you didn't say it? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Nothing of that character? A. Nothing of that character.

DEATH OF THE CHILD PAUL.

Q. Do you recollect little Paul's death? A. Yes, Sir, very well.

Q. Were you at the house at the time he died? A. Yes, Sir; I think he died in July, 1868.

Q. How long had he been ill? A. Well, I think he had been ill some little time of cholera infantum.

Q. About how long? A. I could not say, Sir; it may have been a month, or it may have been more, or perhaps not as long.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton leave home that Summer before Paul's death to go anywhere? A. I don't remember, Sir, but I think not, because Paul was very sick, and I don't think she would leave to go anywhere while he was sick.

Q. Did she leave after his death and go anywhere in that Summer? A. In 1868—I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Don't you know that she remained at home during the whole of that Summer after Paul's death? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. How? A. I don't remember whether she went away or whether she remained at home.

Q. Do you recollect whether Mr. Tilton's visit to your room in 1868 was before or after Paul's death? A. That I could not say, Sir, whether it was before or after; I think it was after, but I am not sure about it.

Q. What makes you think it was after Paul's death? A. What makes me think it was after it is because before little Paul died he was very sick, and Miss Cochrane was there, and I think that there were several persons around; and this time that I referred to about his having come to my room, I think the house was more quiet; that is all that makes me think so.

Q. You have no way of getting at the time, then? A. No, Sir.

THE STORMY INTERVIEW BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Q. In your testimony given here before this jury, in relating the interview between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton when they were in the parlor, and just before you entered, as you have described, you said that Mr. Tilton observed to his wife: "You have brought this girl here to use against me;" do you remember that that is the exact language that he used? A. That is just the exact language. I can just see him with his fist near her face, saying: "Damn it, you have brought that girl on here to use against me!" I remember it as well as if it was yesterday.

Q. And you remember the very words? A. Those are the very words he said.

Q. Did you state those very words before the Committee? A. I cannot say whether I stated those words or not.

Q. They have always been in your mind, have they not? A. Oh! they have been in my mind when I have tried to think about it.

Q. Well, did you try to think about it when you were before the Committee? A. I didn't have time to think about it; I gave my evidence just as it came to my mind, according to my best recollection.

Q. Well, you were thinking of it at the time you gave it? A. I suppose I was, but I did not go into details before the Committee.

Q. Did you not profess to tell before that Committee what Theodore Tilton had said to his wife at that interview? A. Yes, Sir; and I told just what I thought it was then, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Now, refer, if you please, to your testimony before the Committee upon that subject, and tell me whether you used that language then? A. If I knew what, Sir?

Q. Tell me whether you used this language before the Committee, in stating what Mr. Tilton said to his wife: "You have brought this girl here to use against me." A. I think I testified before the Committee that he said: "You have brought this girl on to testify against me."

Q. Look and see if you did? A. Yes, Sir. [Witness reading from book.]

Mr. Tilton got up at once, before I finished my breakfast, and went into the front parlor on the same floor; he locked one door, and tried to fasten the glass folding-doors; I could see him through the crack, and could hear him talk very loud to Mrs. Tilton; I was on the alert, and was going to watch him; I went to the door and listened, and I saw him with his fist in her face, and he said to her, "Damn it, this girl shall leave the house;" then I went in and said, "You shan't damn Mrs. Tilton on my account."

Q. Then you omitted before the Committee these words: "You have brought this girl here to use against me." A. I may have omitted it, or perhaps I may have given it and somebody that fixed this all up, left it out; I don't know.

Q. Do you remember whether you did or did not say that before the Committee? A. Oh! I could not tell you what I said, word for word, before the Committee; I could not recollect.

Q. Did you remember it at the time you were before the Committee? A. I remembered it just as I gave it before the Committee. What I gave before the Committee was just as it came into my mind then.

Q. Did you remember when you were before the Committee that the language of Mr. Tilton was, "you have brought this girl here to use against me?" A. No, Sir; if I had remembered it I would have used those words probably.

Q. You would have used those words? A. Yes, Sir—unless I did use them, and it was not put in, as I have said; I don't know which it is.

Q. You thought a moment ago that you said before the Committee that Mr. Tilton said to his wife on that occasion, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did Mr. Tilton say so? A. Mr. Tilton said, "You have brought this girl on to use against me."

Q. Did he say, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, why did you think you stated that before the Committee? A. Because I have been refreshing my mind, and went into all the details of this testimony. That is the way I think it.

Q. By refreshing your mind, did you come to the conclusion that you had testified before the Committee that he said: "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. I did not think anything about what I said before the Investigating Committee. I just went all over it, and got it in my mind, the way it was—the way I was sure it was.

Q. Are you able now to say how your reflections upon that subject induced you to believe here to-day that you said before the Committee that upon that occasion Mr. Tilton said: "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. I am able to say to-day that he said, "You have brought this girl on to use against me."

Q. Why did you use the word "testify" a moment ago instead of the word "use" in that connection? A. Well, because a moment ago I thought that was what I had said before the Committee.

Q. What made you think so? A. Well, it came into my mind. We think a great many things, and I could not always tell you what makes me think so.

Q. You thought a moment ago that you did use the word "testify" before the Committee? A. I did, Sir, but looking in the book, I see they have got it—

Q. Do you think so now? A. No; I know now that he said—

Q. No, no! Do you think now that he said on that occasion, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?"

Mr. Porter—I object to that question.

The Witness—I know he said—

Mr. Porter—Stop; I object to that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Stop her if you can.

Mr. Porter—I object to the fifth repetition of that question. she has answered it every time very promptly and unequivocally.

Mr. Fullerton—This is the first time that it has been put. [To the witness.] Do you think so now.

Mr. Porter—I object to the repetition of the question.

Judge Neilson—The inquiry seems to be to test her recollection.

Mr. Porter—But the inquiry to test her recollection should not be by way of repeating an inquiry that has been exhausted. Your Honor will find that that question has been answered again and again.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Morris—Questions have been repeated ten times on the other side.

Mr. Everts—On our side we have not repeated, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Morris—The record shows quite differently.

Mr. Everts—We will talk about the record at the end of the case.

Mr. Morris—We will talk about it incidentally before it closes.

Mr. Porter—Let us have this settled; let the stenographer read the last four or five questions.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer here read the testimony as follows:

Did you remember when you were before the Committee that the language of Mr. Tilton was, "You have brought this girl here to use against me?" A. No, Sir; if I had remembered it I would have used those words, probably.

Q. You would have used those words? A. Yes, Sir—unless I did use them, and it was not put in, as I have said; I don't know which it is.

Q. You thought a moment ago that you said before the Committee that Mr. Tilton said to his wife on that occasion, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did Mr. Tilton say so? A. Mr. Tilton said, "You have brought this girl on to use against me."

Q. Did he say, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, why did you think that you stated that before the Committee? A. Because I have been refreshing my mind, and went into all the details of the testimony; that is the way I think it.

Q. By refreshing your mind, did you come to the conclusion that you had testified before the Committee that he said, "You have brought this girl here to testify against me?" A. I did not think anything about what I said before the Investigating Committee. I just went all over it, and got it in my mind, the way it was—the way I was sure it was.

Q. Are you able now to say how your reflections upon that subject induced you to believe here to-day that you said before the Committee, that upon that occasion Mr. Tilton said, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. I am able to say to-day that he said, "You have brought this girl on to use against me."

Q. Why did you use the word "testify" a moment ago, instead of the word "use" in that connection? A. Well, because a moment ago I thought that was what I had said before the Committee.

Q. What made you think so? A. Well, it came into my mind. We think a great many things, and I could not always tell you what makes me think so.

Q. You thought a moment ago that you did use the word "testify" before the Committee? A. I did, Sir; but looking in the book I see they have got it—

Q. Do you think so now? A. No, I know now that he said—

Q. No, no. Do you think now that he said on that occasion, "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?"

Mr. Fullerton—Now, please read the last question to the witness.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Do you think now that he said on that occasion, 'You have brought this girl on to testify against me?'" A. No, Sir, I have answered already that I stated that he said: "You have brought this girl here to use against me."

Q. Do you think now that you stated before the Committee that Mr. Tilton said to his wife: "You have brought this girl on to testify against me?" A. I think that is what I testified before the Committee.

Q. Did you remember at that time what he did say particularly? A. I remembered at that time what I thought he said; I thought he said that Mrs. Tilton had brought me on "to testify against me."

MRS. TILTON'S BAD HEALTH.

Q. Yes. What doctor attended Mrs. Tilton in December, 1870, when she was ill? A. Dr. Skiles.

Q. How long did he attend her? A. Well, I think he came twice a day for a week or more.

Q. And after a week or more how often did he come? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Did he come at all? A. I think he did; I am not sure.

Q. Do you recollect when Mrs. Mitchell, the nurse, left? A.

She left about a week or two weeks, I think, after Mrs. Tilton was taken sick.

Q. She was there a week or two weeks? A. I am not sure, Sir.

Q. Did she leave before Mrs. Tilton recovered? A. Yes, Sir; I think she did. Mrs. Tilton did not recover in two weeks; she was very ill indeed; she did not get up in two weeks, I remember.

Q. Didn't she get up in two weeks? How is your recollection upon that subject? A. My recollection is that she did not get up in two weeks.

Q. You may be mistaken upon that subject? A. I may be mistaken; I said I did not think so; I don't think she got up in two weeks.

Q. Do you recollect what her condition was when Mrs. Mitchell went away? A. I know she was out of danger, but I think she was sick.

Q. Sitting up? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Confined to her bed, was she? A. I think she was.

Q. Miss Turner, have you looked in your trunk for the letter which was spoken of yesterday? A. No, Sir, my trunk is over in Bergen Heights, and I didn't have time to go over and get it.

Q. You have not looked for it, then? A. No, Sir; I can get it to-day; I can go over to-day after four o'clock.

Mr. Fullerton—I should like to have it very much.

The Witness—I don't know that I have it, but I think I have it.

Mr. Fullerton—How did the counsel get these two letters that were written by Mr. Tilton that were read yesterday? A. I don't know how they got them yesterday, but I gave them to a gentleman some three or four weeks ago, I think it was.

Q. To whom did you give them? A. To Mr. Rositer Raymond.

Q. Where had you kept them before giving them to him? A. I had kept them in my trunk.

Q. With this other letter that you didn't bring with you? A. With my letters. I don't know whether I have the other letter or not.

Q. Why didn't you give him the other letter? A. Because that was all I could find at the time.

Q. You looked, did you, for the other letter? A. I was just looking among my letters, and came across these three. I don't remember whether I looked for any others or not, but those are all that came to my notice just then, and I brought them.

Q. Did you look carefully for the other letter at the time you gave these two to Mr. Raymond? A. No, Sir; as I said, I was looking over my letters, and came across these three; I don't think I looked any further; I thought that would be sufficient.

MISS TURNER ANGRY AT MR. TILTON'S FREEDOM.

Q. Were you friendly with Mr. Tilton after his entry to your room in 1868? A. Was I friendly with him?

Q. Yes? A. Yes; I think I was.

Q. You stated yesterday that you were angry when he entered your room?

Mr. Evans—She didn't state that.

The Witness—I stated I was angry when he put his hand in my neck.

Mr. Fullerton—She did state that.

The Witness—Not when he entered the room, I didn't state I was angry.

Mr. Fullerton—I had not finished my question.

The Witness—Excuse me.

Q. I ask you whether you were angry when he entered your room and was guilty of that improper conduct? A. You asked me if I were angry when he entered my room. I was not angry when he entered my room, because he had to enter my room frequently and bid me good night.

Q. Were you angry when he entered your room and was guilty of that misconduct? A. I was angry when he put his hand in my neck.

Q. Did you remain angry with him? A. That is, my modesty impelled me to take his hand out.

Q. You told us yesterday you were angry with him. Did you remain angry with him at all any length of time? A. I remained angry for the time being; I don't know whether you would call it real angry or not, but I thought it was immodest.

Q. Did you at that time suspect that he had any improper design from what he said and did at that time? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. You didn't suspect? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you suspect that his design was improper at that time, if you ever suspected it all? A. The very night that Mrs. Tilton came out to Mrs. Putnam's she told me—

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Why don't you stop when you are asked to.

The Witness—Excuse me, I was finishing the sentence.

Mr. Evans—[To Mr. Beach.] You scold.

Mr. Beach—I have a right to scold.

Mr. Evans—I object to scolding the witness. My friend claims the right to scold the witness; they have no such right. Judge Neilson—He meant to stop the witness.

Mr. Evans—Stopping is not scolding.

Judge Neilson—Sometimes, perhaps—

Mr. Fullerton—I am afraid my friend will scold if he keeps on.

Mr. Evans—I never scold.

Mr. Fullerton—You must not practice it or it will become second nature.

Mr. Fullerton—You did not suspect, then, until you were in Marietta in 1870, that he had any improper design in coming to your room in 1868? A. No, Sir.

Q. You sent your love to him in 1869, did you not, in this letter which you wrote from Mr. Down's? A. Yes, Sir; but that was before Mr. Greeley was there. I had not had that last experience with him then.

Q. You had had the first experience in 1868? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When he talked about affinities? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And loving you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And all that sort of thing? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when he attempted to put his hand in your neck? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That had all occurred? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when you wrote to Mrs. Tilton in 1869, you sent your love to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you left, as you informed us, for Steubenville in February, 1870? A. 1871, January, the beginning of the new year.

Q. 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was my mistake. Soon after you went to Steubenville did you write a letter to Mr. Tilton? A. I wrote a letter to him; I don't know whether it was soon after, or some time after.

Q. In that letter did you express your gratitude for all his kindness to you during the time that you had lived with him?

Mr. Shearman—We object to that question, of course, unless the letter is produced.

Judge Neilson—The letter will speak for itself.

Mr. Fullerton—You do remember writing a letter to him, however? A. Yes, Sir, I remember having written to him.

Q. Did he answer it? A. Did he answer it? No, Sir, I don't think he did.

Q. How did you answer my question? A. I don't think he did.

Q. You don't think he answered it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you answer the letter written to you from Brooklyn, October 4, 1870, which was read in evidence yesterday, commencing, "My dear Beadie, I have long been under the impression that you had so far forgotten me as not to write me a letter from Marietta, but Mrs. Tilton has asserted the contrary, and has produced a letter which you sent me as long ago as May 24?" A. That must have been the answer, then; I must have answered it then.

Q. You did write to him, then, as you recollect, in May, 1870? A. I wrote to him before Mrs. Tilton came in the Fall.

Q. Whilst you were at Marietta? A. Yes, Sir; I think I wrote to him while I was at Marietta.

Q. Did you write him any other letter from Marietta? A. I don't recollect writing but one, Sir.

Q. How? A. I don't remember writing but the one.

Q. Didn't you consult him—

[Mr. Pryor here whispered to Mr. Fullerton.]

Mr. Fullerton—Do you recollect of writing him any kind and affectionate letter after you went to Steubenville, Ohio? A. I remember writing him a letter, yes, Sir; I don't know how affectionate it was; I don't remember.

Q. Did you not consult him by letter in reference to an offer of marriage that you had while you were at Steubenville?

A DEMAND FOR THE LETTER.

Mr. Porter—I object to the question. The witness cannot be interrogated in respect to a letter unless it is produced.

Judge Neilson—That may be one way of identifying the letter, so as to produce it.

Mr. Porter—The letter can be identified when produced in evidence and the letter read. My objection is that, as a rule of law, they cannot interrogate the witness as to the contents of a letter not produced until they prove it to be lost.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the rule where the letter is collateral, as this is.

Judge Neilson—I don't understand this inquiry to be into the contents of the letter, rather restrictive of the letter, and I could not expect counsel to inquire into the contents of it.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't propose to put that letter in evidence unless counsel on the other side make it necessary, because it involves a third person, whose name I don't propose to mention, and which it seems inappropriate to mention, in my judgment.

Mr. Evans—It is a simple matter. We don't think this witness, no more than any other witness, should be interrogated concerning a written paper that she has written unless the paper be shown her. That is the aspect. If the aspect is presenting the contents of a letter, to wit, her written conduct toward this party, whether it was affectionate, whether it was a consultation, whether it was that of a daughter towards a father or protector, the letter must show it, or it must not be shown.

Mr. Beach—The question we put was, whether she wrote a letter on a given subject to Mr. Tilton, and it is perfectly proper.

Judge Neilson—As far as that, I think it is proper; but that is the extent to which you can go.

Mr. Beach—It is the extent to which we want to go.

Judge Neilson—I don't understand the counsel to be inquiring into the contents of the letter.

Mr. Porter—I understand the rule, in Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. Reports, page 398, to be expressly the contrary; that they cannot identify anything of which the writing is evidence by examining it without producing the paper, unless they offer the contents. The rule is founded upon this principle, that human memory is not supposed to be as retentive as pen, ink and paper, and that where there is any writing of evidence which will enable witnesses to speak with certainty, they shall not be interrogated at random as to the contents of a written instrument.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Porter—The only importance of the letter is what it contains. They are not compelled to put the letter in evidence, even if they offer it to the witness. It is at their choice to introduce or not introduce in evidence the letter. They say the letter involves the character of a third person. That may be. If they choose to introduce it the character of third persons must necessarily be involved. If they choose not to introduce it they cannot avail themselves of its contents.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Porter, within the rule, still, don't you think it is competent to ask whether a witness has written a letter upon a given subject?

Mr. Porter—No, Sir, not where the statement of the subject implies the contents of the letter. If there is any attempt to prove this young lady has written something upon the subject of an offer of marriage which she has had, the letter itself must be produced, and she be permitted to look at it, not the jury. It depends on them whether the jury shall see it; but she has a right, as a matter of justice to herself, to see that paper in respect to which they seek to interrogate her.

Judge Neilson—She has a right to see the letter before speaking as to its contents.

Mr. Porter—Yes, Sir; either generally or in detail.

Judge Neilson—Still I think you can inquire whether the witness wrote a letter upon a given subject.

Mr. Porter.—If that is intended to sustain the question which the counsel puts, I beg to except to your Honor's decision, Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton]. Repeat your question, Mr. Fullerton, it may be broader than that.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you consult Mr. Tilton after you went to Steubenville, Ohio, to school, by letter, on the subject of a proposition of marriage?

Judge Neilson—I think that looks into the contents of the letter pretty much.

Mr. Fullerton—It is the question I put before. It don't look into it any more now than it did then.

Mr. Evarts—We except to it.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts.] I don't understand that the exception makes it improper after his Honor has ruled it to be proper.

Judge Neilson—I stated what I understood was the general rule, not with reference to the proper form of your question. I think this question is a little too broad.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you ever write to him upon the subject of your marriage? A. I never was married. [Laughter.]

Q. Did you write to him upon the subject of a proposition of marriage?

Mr. Porter—To that question I desire to object.

The Witness—I think—

Mr. Porter—One moment. I must insist upon your not answering the question when I object. [To Judge Neilson.] It is on the subject of a proposition of marriage. What constitutes a proposition of marriage? What is the nature of that proposition?

Judge Neilson—I think that question is objectionable.

Mr. Porter—Either they have or they have not such a letter.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Porter—If they have not, they can prove it. They are then at liberty to prove its contents.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Porter—If they have it, it is a matter of fairness and justice to the witness that she should see it before being interrogated as to its general subject or effect.

Judge Neilson—The counsel has interrogated the witness as to whether a letter was written upon the subject of her marriage. The question might well be put whether a letter was written upon the subject of her becoming married; that describes the letter, and don't give the contents of it.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the question I have put.

Judge Neilson—Not quite.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception to that form of question.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you, by letter, consult Mr. Tilton while you were at Steubenville, Ohio, on the subject of marriage?

Mr. Porter—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—The word "consult" is objectionable.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you write to him upon the subject of marriage while you were at Steubenville.

Judge Neilson—That is permissible.

Mr. Evarts—That we object to, and we except to it.

The Witness—He wrote to me upon the subject of marriage.

Mrs. Putnam—

Q. No, don't bring Mrs. Putnam here; she has been here. Will you answer my question? A. I was beginning to try and answer it, Sir.

Q. Did he write to you whilst you were at Marietta upon the subject—did you write to him, I mean, whilst you were at Steubenville, Ohio, upon the subject of marriage? A. He wrote to me first—

Mr. Fullerton—Now answer my question.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Did you write to him upon that subject? A. I wrote to him about this—he wrote to me first, and then I answered his letter.

Mr. Fullerton—You wrote to him, did you, upon that subject?

STINGING WORDS BETWEEN COUNSEL.

Mr. Porter—One moment. I object to that question. It is perfectly obvious that this is an unfair examination. If there was correspondence upon that subject, and he wrote a letter to her, that letter speaks for itself, if it can be found; if it cannot, they can prove its contents.

The Witness—I think I have it, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Her answer speaks for itself, and should be submitted to her. No excuse is given for withholding it from her, and yet she is to be interrogated at random in reference to the contents of a paper not produced, and which, so far as it appears, she has not seen for years.

Judge Neilson—I don't intend to let the contents of it be stated.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not interrogating her at random. That is a phrase my learned friend should not use. I am aware that the letter will speak for itself, and I am aware that the answer will speak for itself, and I am equally aware that her hesitation will speak for itself, and I have a right—

Mr. Evarts—Now, we have a right to object, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—I have a right to test the recollection of the witness in the form of interrogatories.

Mr. Evarts—No, you have not.

Mr. Fullerton—We have.

Mr. Evarts—Well, one moment.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Judge Neilson—The question is, whether you are aware you are inquiring into the contents of the letter?

Mr. Fullerton—I am not inquiring, if your Honor please, into the contents of the letter; I am putting the question as framed by your Honor.

Judge Neilson—As to the existence of a letter, that she has answered.

Mr. Fullerton—She answered he wrote to her.

Judge Neilson—And that she wrote to him.

Mr. Fullerton—That don't answer my question. She may have written to him on the subject of the prevailing fashions at Steubenville, or about her studies. What I wish to know, and what I intend to know, if your Honor will permit me to inquire, is whether she wrote to him in reference to marriage. That is my question, and it remains unanswered.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, the reason the law does not allow these inquiries of witnesses without showing them papers concerning which the inquiry is made, is that there may be no basis for counsel to make charges of hesitation in answers, when hesitations are imputed to one cause, and the law says the occasion shall not arise for these imputations, for it is unfair and dishonest to ask them without showing the papers. [Applause.]

Judge Neilson—Mr. Rodgers, you must take charge of this audience. I shan't spend my time talking to them. I think gentlemen might be more exemplary here, and not interrupt the order of business; and it is not at all proper that the audience should express an opinion upon this subject. Whether the remark of counsel is pleasing to the audience or not is not very material.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know whether the learned counsel intended, in the use of the term "dishonest," to characterize my mode of examining this witness, but if he did, I am quite willing that he should institute a comparison between my motives and his own, during the progress of this trial.

Judge Neilson—We will assume for the present that he did not

Mr. Fullerton—Well, your Honor may indulge in that assumption, but I will not at present, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Evarts—I am quite ready to say I meant no personal offense. I spoke of the mode of inquiry, and I spoke of it as a matter that the law had foreseen and provided for, as a fair thing to the witness, that this paper should be shown before she is asked about it.

Mr. Fullerton—Then let that pass.

Judge Neilson—The witness has been asked whether she wrote upon a given subject; it does not, in my judgment, call for the contents of the paper.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't propose to give the contents of the paper.

Judge Neilson—The witness answered: "He wrote to me, and I wrote to him." I think you can inquire upon that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—That is just the inquiry that I have put, Sir; and which has given rise to this discussion.

Judge Neilson—That inquiry, if the answer was given, would cover the point.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I am strictly right in putting that inquiry. I am aware that I have a right to test the recollection of the witness. The witness can say, "I do remember," or, "I don't remember." She has her choice. If it is the fact that she wrote the letter, and the contents of the letter are not in her mind, she can easily say so. I will put the question again [To the witness.] Did you reply to his letter upon the subject of marriage? A. I think I did, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, that covers the ground; that is as far as you can go, Mr. Fullerton.

The Witness—But I don't think I ever wrote a letter consulting with him with regard to getting married.

Judge Neilson—That last can stand or not as counsel elects; it was not called for by the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Is that the letter which you wrote him on that subject? [Handing witness a letter.] A. I will have to read it over before I can tell.

Mr. Porter—Yes; read it.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly.

The Witness—[After looking at the letter.] Yes, Sir; this is the one I wrote in answer to his letter. He wrote a letter first, and that is the answer.

Q. That you have stated.

Mr. Tracy—What is the date?

WOMAN'S RIGHTS MEETINGS AT THE TILTONS'.

Mr. Fullerton—The date is Jan. 13, 1872. [To the witness.] Now, Miss Turner, I come to the time after you returned from Marietta—or, in the first place, I will ask you some questions about what occurred anterior to that. You recollect one instance, I understood you to say, when there was a Woman's Rights meeting at Mr. Tilton's, in Livingston-st. ? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. I could not give the date, Sir.

Q. Can you give the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it not in 1869? A. I could not say, Sir. In 1869?

Q. Yes, or 1868? A. I could not give the year; but it was not in 1869; I know that.

Q. Who were present at that meeting? A. Mr. and Mrs. Celia Burleigh, I think, were there; Miss Anthony and Mr. Studwell; and there were a number there; I don't know.

Q. Well, can you recall any other names? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can.

Q. Was Mrs. Stanton there? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. You don't remember whether she was there or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, how many in all were assembled? A. The parlors were quite full.

Q. Do you recollect the proceedings that evening, before that body? A. Recollect the proceedings?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; I don't think I do.

Q. Did they organize and have a chairman? A. I was not in the parlor when they first began their proceedings, if they had any.

Q. Well, did they have a chairman to preside over the body? A. They may have had; I don't remember.

Q. Any papers read? A. There was no papers read in my hearing.

Q. No reports of committees read? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect anything about that—about the proceedings at all.

Q. Well, you recollect of other Woman's Rights meeting, there, do you not, at that house? A. There were a great—there were several Woman's Rights meetings there; yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know any one where Mrs. Tilton presided? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. Don't you know that she was Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Association? A. I knew—I thought she had something to do with it; but I don't know whether she was chairman or not.

Q. Do you recollect that those meetings were held during Mr. Tilton's absence? A. No, Sir, I don't remember about that.

Q. Do you recollect any one of those Woman's Rights meetings when Mrs. Field was there? A. Mrs. Field?

Q. Mrs. Field? A. I think I have seen Mrs. Field there.

Q. At one of those meetings, I ask you? A. I am not sure whether I saw her at the Woman's Rights meetings or other times.

Q. How? A. I am not sure whether it was at the Woman's Rights meetings, or some other time.

Q. Well, I am asking you in reference to the meetings of the Woman's Rights Convention; was she there upon any one of those occasions? A. I cannot say truthfully, Sir; I don't really remember.

Q. Do you remember whether any one of Mr. Beecher's sisters attended any one of those meetings at Mr. Tilton's house? A. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe?

Q. Any one of them? A. I have a faint recollection that she was at one of the meetings, but I am not sure.

Q. But you do not remember, as I understand you, that some of those meetings were held during Mr. Tilton's absence? A. I know they were held, but whether he was home or not I could not tell, except this one occasion; I remember that time very distinctly, that he was home.

MR. TILTON ASHAMED OF HIS WIFE.

Q. You have given an observation made by Mr. Tilton to his wife at one of these meetings, I think? A. Given an observation?

Q. Yes. A. I gave what he said; it was my observation of what he said.

Q. Yes; well, that is an observation. A. I thought you said Mr. Tilton's observation.

Q. Well, wasn't it Mr. Tilton's observation? A. He didn't observe anything; he spoke to his wife.

Q. Well, I used the word "observation" as a synonym of "spoke." A. It was I that was observing; I had the observation.

Q. How close were you to him when he made use of the language that you have given us? A. I was right— Suppose these were the doors right here [illustrating], and there stood Mrs. Tilton, and here was Mr. Tilton, and I was right back of them, standing near the folding doors.

Q. Were they standing still? A. They were when he spoke to her.

Q. Not moving about at all? A. Well, when— I will correct that. When he spoke to her the guests were moving to and fro in the parlor—walking around, promenading—and I think she was just moving slowly behind him.

Q. And were you promenading too? A. No, Sir; I was standing by the folding doors.

Q. How is that? A. I was standing by the folding doors.

Q. Did any one else hear this observation of his except yourself? A. Not that I know of; they may have heard it; I don't know whether they did or not.

Q. Did he speak it in a loud tone of voice? A. No, Sir, he did not; he spoke low.

Q. Spoke low? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You heard it distinctly? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it not said in jest? A. Oh! no, Sir, in dead earnest.

Q. Dead earnest? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you repeat what he said? A. He said, "My dear, don't"—no, he didn't say "My dear;" he says, "Elizabeth, don't stand near me; I don't wish any comparison drawn; the contrast is too great."

Q. Are you giving his exact words? A. His exact words, as I remember them.

Q. Well, do you remember his exact words? A. Yes, Sir, those were his exact words.

Q. Was he standing by the side of Mrs. Tilton when he said this or was he in advance of her or behind her? A. He was a little in advance of her, and she was behind him.

Q. Did he turn around when he said it? A. He turned around; yes, Sir.

Q. And faced her? A. He turned around and leaned over her shoulder, and whispered one side in a—talked softly, one side.

Q. Did he whisper? A. He didn't really whisper; I don't suppose that I could have heard him if he whispered.

Q. Well, you just said that he whispered? A. Well, I spoke hastily.

Q. Ah! he did not whisper then? A. He did not talk real loud, nor he didn't whisper; he said what he had to say in a low tone of voice.

Q. He put his head by her ear, did he? A. He put his head near hers.

Q. Did he stoop for the purpose of saying this to her? A. Yes, Sir; she was so small that he had to stoop if he had his head near hers.

Q. He did stoop? A. He did stoop; yes, Sir.

Q. How close to her head did he put his when he said this? A. Well, not so very close.

Q. Well, did he tell her to go away? A. He told her just what I have stated, Sir.

Q. What is that? A. Said he, "Don't stand near me, Elizabeth; I don't wish any comparison drawn; the contrast is too great," and he laid off his words that way, [waving her hands].

Q. Didn't he say, "Stand one side?" A. "Don't stand near me"; that is what he said.

Q. Didn't he say "Stand one side?" A. No, Sir; "Don't stand near me."

Q. Did you say in your direct-examination that he used this term, "Elizabeth, stand one side?" A. I don't remember whether I did or not; if it is there in my direct-examination, I suppose I must have said it.

Q. But that is not what he did say you say now? A. "Don't stand near me; I don't wish any comparisons drawn; the contrast is too great."

Q. Did he say, "Don't stand near me, or don't keep near me?" A. "Don't stand near me," he said.

Q. Those are his exact words? A. As I remember them; yes, Sir.

Q. He did not say, then, "Don't keep near me?" A. "Don't stand near me."

Q. What did he say about comparisons? A. "The comparison is too great;"—"The contrast is too great; I don't wish any comparison drawn."

Q. You heard it very distinctly? A. Oh, Yes, Sir, I heard it so distinctly that I lay awake all night and thought over it.

Q. Oh! you did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, then, you have never forgotten it since, have you? A. No, Sir, I have not.

Q. Did you state it before the Committee? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Had you forgotten it then? A. Well, I had forgotten a good many things that I have thought of since, when I was before the Committee.

Q. I am not talking about a good many things; I am talking about one thing; had you forgotten that thing? A. If I didn't give it, I don't suppose I had thought about it.

Q. How? A. If I didn't give it—I didn't give it to the Committee, and therefore I don't suppose I thought about it.

Q. When before the Committee you intended to state all the instances of bad conduct, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir; but I could not recollect all I had to say in ten minutes. I told everything that I could think of.

Q. Were you limited to ten minutes in telling your story? A. I am referring to the time that I had to think about it; ten minutes that I saw Gen. Tracy in Mrs. Ovington's parlor.

Q. I am not referring to that. You were not limited in time when you were before the Committee, in telling your story, were you? A. Oh! no Sir; I think not.

Q. And if you didn't think of it there you had forgotten it, had you? A. I suppose I must have.

Q. Did you ever tell any one of that story? A. Did I ever tell any one?

Q. Yes. A. I have told Mr. Porter and Mr. Shearman.

Q. When did you first tell that incident? A. I first told that incident, I think, the other night, in Mrs. Ovington's parlor, with Mr. Shearman, and Mr. Porter, and the stenographer, I think.

Q. That is the first time you ever told of it— A. I am not sure whether Judge Porter was there or not.

Q. That is the first time, at all events, that you told it after it occurred, is it? A. I think that is the first; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did that occur before or after Paul's death? A. Before or after? Paul died in July, 1883. I guess it must have been— I could not say, Sir, whether it was before or after.

Q. Was it before or after you went to Southport with Mrs. Putnam? A. Oh! I could not give any particular time any more than I know that it was at a Woman's Rights meeting there in Mrs. Tilton's parlor, but whether it was before I went to Southport or whether— No, Sir, I don't— When we went to Southport I think we were boarding with Mrs. Morse; they had not gone to housekeeping, if I remember correctly, then.

Q. Can you tell me how soon it was after they commenced housekeeping in Livingston-st.? A. Oh! I guess it was some time after that.

Q. But you can't tell when? A. No, Sir; I cannot tell the exact time.

THE MIDNIGHT PICTURE HANGING.

Q. Now, you have spoken of his hanging pictures in his night-dress? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see that on more than one occasion? A. Yes, Sir; I saw it on two or three occasions; two occasions anyway.

Q. You won't say more than two, then? A. Two or three.

Q. Can you tell when the first occasion was? A. I could not give the date, Sir.

Q. Can you give the year? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can.

Q. In what room of the house was he hanging pictures? A. He went in several rooms and in the hall.

Q. Was it in the night or day-time? A. It was in the night.

Q. You saw him in the lower hall, or in the upper hall? A. The upper hall.

Q. You were in bed? A. I was in bed.

Q. In bed when he commenced hanging the pictures? A. When he commenced hanging the pictures; yes, Sir.

Q. And did you remain there during all the time that he was hanging the pictures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know how old you were at the time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you in bed on the other occasion when he hung pictures in his night-dress? A. Yes, Sir, I think I was.

Q. On both occasions, then, you were in bed? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know how long you had been in bed when he hung the pictures? A. No, Sir; I know I was awake.

Q. You were awake? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Sleeping with the children at that time? A. I was in bed with the children, but I was not asleep at that time.

Q. Where was Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton was in bed. On one occasion I remember she was in bed; I won't be sure about the second.

Q. Where was she the other? A. I said I would not be sure where she was on the second occasion; I suppose she must have been in bed, though; but I remember this one time that I speak of particularly she was in bed.

Q. Then it was after the family had all retired, was it not, when he hung these pictures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how late in the night was it? A. Oh! well, I could not say, any more than I heard Mrs. Tilton call out, "Dory Tilton, why don't you come to bed?" It is after 12 o'clock,

What are you running around in your night clothes for? What are you doing." [Laughter.]

Q. Oh! you remember that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was after the family had retired that he hung pictures in his night clothes? A. I spoke of the first night as the family having retired.

Q. Well, had the family all retired the second time? A. I say I couldn't tell positively whether Mrs. Tilton was in bed the second time or not, but the children were in bed, because they all went to bed at a particular hour.

Q. Did you say anything when he was hanging pictures in his night clothes? A. Did I say anything?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; but I wondered a good deal.

Q. You wanted to? A. I wondered.

Q. Oh! Wondered at what? A. Why, at a man's going-trotting around in his night clothes, hanging pictures. [Laughter.]

Q. After he supposed that you were asleep? A. I don't know what he supposed, Sir; whether he supposed that I was asleep or not. He may not have thought anything about it.

Q. Well, it was after 12 o'clock; one night was? A. What say?

Q. It was after 12 o'clock one night? A. That is the first night that I speak of; yes, Sir.

Q. What time did you go to bed? A. Oh, my! I couldn't say what time it was.

Q. Well, about what time did you go to bed generally? A. I couldn't tell you; sometimes I went to bed at nine, sometimes ten and sometimes eleven.

Q. Well, he didn't know that you were awake, I suppose, did he? A. I don't suppose it would have made any difference if he had known I was awake. He would have done it all the same, if he wanted to.

Q. He would have done it all the same if he wanted to? A. I suppose he would.

Q. You suppose he would? A. I don't suppose his knowing that I was awake would have made any difference if he wanted to hang pictures; still, I don't know that I have any right to say that.

Q. That is just what I was thinking, but I let you say it, if you wanted to? A. Well, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S HUNTS FOR A SOFT BED.

Q. Well, on one occasion I understand you to say that he went around looking for a soft bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What season of the year was that? A. I guess it must—it could not have been in very cold weather.

Q. Well, do you remember when it was? A. No, Sir; I can't give any date.

Q. Was it not in the Summer season? A. I said I thought it must have been warm, but I am not sure—warm weather.

Q. Do you know the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was he in good health at the time, or was he ill? A. Why, he was generally in good health.

Q. Well I— A. He was in good health at that time, as I remember; yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that about the time that he remained out all night? A. I could not tell you, Sir; I cannot give you any date in regard to those occurrences.

Q. How? A. I cannot give you any dates in regard to those occurrences.

Q. Well, Mrs. Tilton accompanied him in this journey of his around the house, did she? A. She did this evening; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did you ever know it to occur at any other time? How is that? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can truthfully say that I remember that occurrence but once.

Q. But once? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Going to find a soft bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or going around to find another— A. Going to find a soft bed; yes, Sir.

Q. Or another bed than his own; you don't remember it but once, do you? A. Only once, I think, Sir.

Q. How? A. I only remember that once, I think.

Q. Well, now let us understand each other distinctly. Do you recollect of his going about to look for any bed other than his own, except upon one occasion? A. No, Sir; I think not, only this one occasion.

Q. You stated, I think, upon your direct-examination, that he was in the habit of going around from one bed to the other, trying all the beds in the house before he could make up his mind which one he would sleep on; did you state that? A. Well, I suppose that—He was in the habit of going around in his night clothes.

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that will hardly do, Miss Turner.

Mr. Porter—Why not? She is answering.

Mr. Fullerton—I know she is answering.

Mr. Beach—She is not answering the question.

Mr. Porter—She is answering the question.

Mr. Fullerton—She is going off onto something else.

Mr. Porter—She is stating his habit about going around—

Mr. Morris—No; she don't say that.

Mr. Porter—Well, let the question and answer be read.

Judge Neilson—The question was as to his going around to search for a bed.

Mr. Porter—Let it be read.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer then read the last question and answer.]

The Witness—Yes, I did state that he was in the habit of going around trying different beds; but this night in particular he was going around to different rooms, and what I meant was that he was in the habit of going around, not sleeping all the time in the same bed.

Q. Well, a little while ago, Miss Turner, I said, "Let us understand one another." A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And I put the question to you directly whether you ever knew of but one instance in which he went around the house to find a bed other than his own, and you told me, as I understood you to say, that you did not recollect of but one such instance; is that so? A. Well, I meant this one instance when he was going around with Mrs. Tilton after him, and making me get out of my bed; but he was in the habit of going around hunting for another bed more than once.

Q. He was in the habit of doing that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, how many occasions, then, do you recollect of that? A. Well, I know some nights he would sleep in the front bedroom in the second story, and some nights he would sleep in the back room, and some nights he would sleep up stairs.

Q. Well, is that what you meant when you stated that he was in the habit of going around from one bed to the other, trying all the beds in the house, before he could make up his mind which one he would sleep on? Is that what you meant when you used that language? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose it was.

Q. Now, did he go around from one bed to the other, trying all the beds in the house? A. Well, I know he tried three beds.

Q. Did he try all the beds in the house? A. I will tell you, Sir, in a moment.

Q. No; tell me that.

Mr. Everts—Well, she answers.

Mr. Fullerton—I know she answers, but not my question.

The Witness—I will have to count and see how many beds there was in the house.

Q. If you please, yes; and then count and see whether he went to them all. A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Nelson—[To the audience.] Gentlemen, this is a small matter to attract your attention.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; this night, I think that he went in every bed in the house, up-stairs, on the two stories.

Q. He went in every bed in the house in the two stories? A. Yes, Sir, in the second story and the third story; because he was— They had gone to bed in the second story back bedroom, and I was sleeping in the room next to theirs, the back bedroom; and the first thing I knew, here he came— There he was saying: "Pettie, let us go in and try Beattie's bed a little while." Mrs. Tilton was behind him with a pillow, and I had to take Carroll and go up-stairs; and I went up-stairs in the third story back bedroom, and took Carroll, and I hadn't been up there five minutes—just long enough to get in bed, before he says: "Pettie, suppose we try this bed a little while; perhaps this is the softest." [Laughter.] That was three beds he had tried; and then he got up—let us see; I must get that straight. Oh! when he came into my room I had got up and took Carroll and went into the third story back room, and I hadn't but just laid down before up he came and thought he would try that bed a little while, and I took Carroll and went down to the bed that I had gotten up from first. That was three beds, and that night they slept in the front bedroom; that was four beds, and that was all the beds there was in the house.

Q. How do you know they slept in that room that you speak of now? A. Because they washed and dressed there next morning—came out of there.

Q. You remember that distinctly? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They came out of it? A. He came out of that room next morning.

Q. How many beds were there in the third story? A. In the third story there was two bedrooms, I think, Sir, with the servants' room, and a little room that the servants slept in.

Q. That was three? A. That was three; yes, Sir.

Q. He came to the third story where you were, and you got up out of your bed and went down-stairs? A. He came to the second story.

Q. I am speaking of the third story? A. He came up, and I got up and went down to the one that I had left first.

Q. Did you remain there all night when you went down to the bed which you first left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You remained there? A. Yes, I remained there all night; yes, Sir.

Q. Where were Mr. and Mrs. Tilton when you went down to that bed from which you went away first? A. They were about getting into the bed that I had left.

Q. Had left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see them again that night? A. No, Sir, I did not see them again that night.

Q. Not that night? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, there was no bedroom up-stairs other than the one which you got out of? A. Which story do you mean?

Q. Third story. A. There was three bedrooms up there; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, there was another one besides the servants' room? A. No, Sir, only— Oh! there was a study, but it was not a bedroom—had a lounge in.

Q. You have just told me there were three beds up there. A. There were three bedrooms, yes, Sir; that is the two bedrooms that I have named, and the servants' bedroom, and then there was a little long room that he used for a study sometimes.

Q. Then there was but one bed other than in the servant's room? A. There were two beds other than the servants' room.

Q. Well, so I thought you said? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you know that he tried that other bed up-stairs? A. I know it because I made up the bed, and I saw him come down out of the room next morning.

Q. I am speaking of the third story? A. What other bed do you refer to?

Q. The one that you refer to? A. I am not referring to the servants' room.

Q. Nor I either? A. Do you mean do I know that he slept in that bed?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir, I do.

Q. He did not sleep then in the one that he drove you out of? A. No, Sir, he did not.

Q. But went into another bedroom in the third story and slept, did he? A. Went into the one that I saw him coming out of.

Q. In the morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how many beds were there on the second story? A. How many bedrooms?

Q. Yes; how many beds? A. There was—

Q. Or rooms with beds in? A. There was only two rooms with beds in, Sir.

Q. Only two? A. Only two or three; the two back ones and the front—front bedroom.

Q. What room did he go to bed in? A. He went to bed—went to bed in the room next to mine.

Q. And what room did you go to bed in? A. I went to bed in the room next to his. [Laughter].

Q. Very well; now, there was a front room, wasn't there? A. There was a front room?

Q. Yes, a front bedroom on that second floor? A. Yes, Sir; there was a front bedroom, but I say he did not try that, though I had not thought of it.

Q. Oh! he didn't try that? A. No, Sir, because the children were sleeping in there, Florry and Alice.

Q. He didn't try all the beds in the house then? A. Well, that is the only one he didn't try, and the servants' room.

Q. You take out only one now? A. He tried all the empty beds, and some that was not empty.

Q. He tried all the empty beds? A. Yes, Sir, and he tried mine, after I got up.

Q. Then when you say he was in the habit of going around from one bed to another, trying all the beds in the house before he could make up his mind which one he would sleep on, you were slightly mistaken, weren't you? A. Well, all I have to say about that is, I had forgotten about the front bedroom.

Q. How? A. All I have to say about that is, that I had forgotten about the front bedroom.

Q. You had forgotten about it? A. Yes, Sir; I said there were two bedrooms, and I had forgotten to say the front bedroom.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, I think you told me a moment ago that he came up-stairs in the third story, and you left your bed for him and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you went down into the second story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And I think you told me that you hadn't more than got into bed in the second story, before Mr. Tilton came down and you left that? A. No, Sir; oh! no, Sir. I said that he came in my room in the second story, and then said: "Let us try Beesle's bed a little while." I got up and left and went up in the third story and I had just got Carroll in bed and covered myself up before he came, there, and said, "Suppose we try this bed a little while, petty; may be it is softer than the other one." So I got up and went down to the second story bed, that I had left first; where he came to me first.

Q. Now, didn't you tell me a moment ago that you saw him come out of the room in the second story, in the morning when you got up? A. I said in the morning when he got up; I didn't say when I got up.

Q. When he got up? A. But I did not say when I got up.

Q. You went up from the second story into the third, didn't you? A. What for?

Q. I don't know. A. Well, I can tell, very accurately, that I saw him coming out of the room; I was up and dressed.

Q. Where was the room that you saw him coming out of? A. The third story.

Q. Didn't you say, a moment ago, that you saw him coming out of the room in the second story? A. No, Sir; Oh! no, Sir. Third story.

Q. Mr. Fullerton—[In an undertone in reply to a remark by Mr. Beach.] Yes, she did say it distinctly.

The Witness—When I said—I did say something about coming out of a second-story room, but I said I looked out of my bed, and there I saw him; he was in the second story then coming with Mrs. Tilton behind him, with a pillow in her hand, and "Let us try this bed"—and then I went up in the third story, and I said next morning I saw him coming out of a third-story room.

Q. Now, was he in the habit of going about the house undressed or in his night clothes on any other occasion than when he was looking for a soft bed or hanging pictures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Upon what occasions? A. He used to go around frequently—generally came to bid me "good night" in his night clothes, after he got his night clothes on.

Q. Do you know when that was? A. It was several times.

Q. How? A. It was several times.

Q. Well, can you give us the year? A. I can give you the years, '88 and '89, when he was in his night clothes; that is all the years—the dates that I can give.

MR. TILTON'S ABSENCE DURING HIS CHILD'S SICKNESS.

Q. Yes. Now, I call your attention to the occasion when he was out all night. Do you recollect what conversation was had the next morning when he returned between himself and his wife? A. Between myself and his wife?

Q. Between himself and his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect of his mentioning the death of William Pitt Fessenden? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he state distinctly that he had been writing an obituary notice of Mr. Fessenden? A. No, Sir.

Q. Made no such observations? A. Made no statements at all.

Q. How? A. He made no statements at all.

Q. And are you able to state when that occurred? A. That occurred when little Paul was sick, Sir; little Paul was very sick, indeed.

Q. Was it that sickness which resulted in his death? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Oh! yes, Sir; he had cholera infantum.

Q. That must have been in 1868, then? A. He died in July; yes, Sir, 1868.

Q. Are you sure it was July? A. June or July.

Q. Wasn't it the 22d of August, 1868? A. I think it was in July, Sir; I am not sure.

Q. Well, now, how long before his death was it that he remained out all night? A. I can't state truthfully as to that; but I think it was not long before his death.

Q. But can't you state how long? A. I cannot state how long; no, Sir.

Q. Nor give any idea? A. It seems to me that Paul died a little while after that.

MR. TILTON AND THE HOUSEHOLD AFFAIRS.

Q. You have spoken of an occasion when it became necessary to discharge a servant, that he was unkind to her? A. That who—that he was unkind to her?

Q. Yes, Mrs. Tilton. A. Oh! that Mr. Tilton was unkind to Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. Oh! I thought you said unkind to the servant.

Q. No. A. Yes, Sir; I remember that.

Q. Do you recollect when that was? A. That Mrs. Tilton was unkind to the servant?

Q. When it was that Mr. Tilton was consulted by Mrs. Tilton in regard to the discharge of a servant, when you think he was unkind to Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I remember the time, but I don't think I can—I remember the occurrence, but I don't think I could give the date when it was.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton do anything more than say that she had the charge of the house, and she must do as she pleased about the discharging of the servant? A. He said that she—he said to her that she must not come to him with her household matters; that it was none of his business; he attended to his business and she must attend to hers, and he didn't wish to be bothered with the servants.

Q. He did not interfere at all in the management of the house, did he? A. He had nothing to do with the management of the house, apparently.

Q. He didn't attempt to control Mrs. Tilton in regard to the management of the house, did he? A. How?

Q. He did not attempt to control Mrs. Tilton in the management of the house, did he?

Mr. Evans—Do you mean on this occasion?

Mr. Fullerton—On this or any other occasion? A. He did not on this occasion.

Q. Did he on any occasion? A. Why, I think he generally had matters his own way with regard to the house.

Q. Did he undertake to control Mrs. Tilton in the management and direction of her own household? A. Well, he didn't control her in that one instance; he simply said that he didn't want to be bothered with her—

Q. Now, Miss Turner, I don't think you can evade answering the question? A. Oh! no, Sir, I don't wish to evade it; I was thinking—I don't want to evade anything at all, Sir; I will answer everything truthfully, just as well as I can.

Q. Go on? A. What was your first question?

Q. My first question, and the question which you are to answer, is this, whether Mr. Tilton at any time undertook to control and direct household affairs? A. Yes, I think he did; I think he had things his own way.

Q. Now, what things did he have his own way? A. Why, we have often—With regard to the servants about cooking meats, and things not pleasing him on the table, he would say: "Can't she cook better than this. If not, let her be discharged."

Q. That is what you mean by having his own way? A. Yes, Sir; I call that having his own way.

Q. He did not discharge a servant on those occasions? A. He used to make Mrs. Tilton to do all those things.

Q. Used to make her do it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, give us an instance? A. Well, I can give one or two instances with regard to myself, when he didn't want me there, and he told Mrs. Tilton; he didn't tell me himself; he would be very pleasant to me himself, and told Mrs. Tilton to send me off.

Mr. Beach—Oh! you know that only from what Mrs. Tilton told you.

The Witness—She is very good authority.

Mr. Beach—Yes, she may be to you, but you will please state your own knowledge. [To Mr. Fullerton.] Now, make her give examples within her own knowledge.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you ever sent away by Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, give us an instance in which Mr. Tilton interfered with the management of the household? A. I don't think I can think of any just now.

Q. Can't think of any just now? A. No, Sir.

MRS. TILTON MADE A PRISONER.

Q. Very well; you have spoken of occasions when Mrs. Tilton was locked in her room by Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you known her to be locked up in a room? A. Three or four hours at a time.

Q. You recollect the first occasion when that occurred when she was locked up during that length of time? A. Well, it has occurred in the years 1897, 1898 and 1899.

Q. You are sure as to the years, are you? A. They went to their house in 1896, and it was about a year after they went into their house that I noticed his unkindness to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Oh! that is no answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, I didn't ask you that; I asked you about locking her up in the room.

Mr. Porter—You asked her about the year, and it was a proper answer.

Mr. Fullerton—It was not a proper answer.

COUNSEL ACCUSED OF INSULTING THE WITNESS.

Mr. Porter—Well, on that point we differ, and I submit to the Court it was. The witness is not bound to submit to a rebuke on that. Will the stenographer read the question and the answer and then we will submit it to the judgment of his Honor.

Mr. Fullerton—I asked her the year—

Mr. Porter—The stenographer can easily read the question—the last question—and the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no necessity for reading it, Sir; it is a waste of time.

Mr. Porter—There is a necessity for it, Sir; for I raise a question about it. I deny that the counsel has a right at this stage of the case to insult and denounce a witness on the stand.

Mr. Fullerton—Has he done so?

Judge Neilson—He should not do so, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—But has he done so?

Mr. Porter—It has been done constantly—a succession of times. I submit now that her answer to this question was at fair one, and that there was no occasion for the insult offered.

Judge Neilson—Now read the question and answer.

Mr. Beach—Now, your Honor, we have submitted about as long as is proper to their imputation, this repeated imputation upon the part of the counsel that we are treating their witnesses unfairly. I say it has not been done in a single instance Sir; that there has been no departure from the allowed and customary and proper cross-examination of a witness; that no insulting question, or insulting or abusive remark has been addressed to this witness. But I am bound to say, Sir, that we have had occasion, again and again, to interrupt this witness. It is just and proper for us to interrupt an answer which is not responsive to the question which we put, and which is forcing evidence upon us, which we are not obliged to take. Now, the question addressed to this witness by my colleague, Sir, after she had stated the years, 1867, 1868 and 1869 was: "Are you sure that those are the years?" She answered, "I went there in 1866, and it was about a year after that that I commenced observing the unkindness of Mr. Tilton towards his wife—his unkindness."

Judge Neilson—That was not responsive.

Mr. Beach—Very well, Sir; we interrupted her, and then the counsel rises with a denunciation of us, that we are insulting and abusing this witness. And it is not the first time, Sir, that that imputation has been made, and most unjustly made.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Stenographer, read that last question and answer as requested by Mr. Porter.

[Last question and answer read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Sir, is that responsive?

Judge Neilson—Now, read the prior question and answer to get the subject a little more fully.

Mr. Porter—The question is whether the witness properly answered that. They interrupted her at that point and prohibited her from going on to complete the answer. They charge her with evasion. Both counsel find it necessary to compete with this young lady; the one is not considered a match for her, but the other is brought in. One after another lectures and rebukes her; one after the other charges her with evasion. She has answered appropriately, and, evidently, with candor, and, according to the best of her ability, every question they have put to her. She was engaged in answering this question. The counsel asks her if she is sure as to the years. She states it was about a year after they went there, which was in 1866. "Stop," says one counsel—

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Porter—The other says to her: "This answer is not responsive." Is that needful?

Judge Neilson—It was responsive so far as—

Mr. Porter—I submit it is responsive, though it may not be a full response.

Judge Neilson—It was responsive thus far; the last clause—

Mr. Porter—But in regard to these comments that have been interlarded in this examination, I desire to call attention to the action of the Court at an early period, so far as we were concerned, and to insist that the same rule shall be applied to them.

Judge Neilson—I shall certainly apply the same rule if I am aware of the decision.

Mr. Porter—In the cross-examination of Mr. Tilton, I had occasion to put to him this question [Reading]:

Q. Down to that time, had he ever wronged you? A. I don't think that he had, except in asking me to lie for him.

Q. Do you think that was a wrong? A. Now, I do; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you then? A. I did not; I thought I was saving a man who was repentant.

Q. Did you lie for him? A. I did.

Mr. Porter—We have your word.

Judge Neilson—One moment; counsel ought not to comment upon what the witness says.

Most certainly this young lady should be equally protected.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Porter—From these harsh comments I observe that your Honor has endeavored to exercise great liberality on both sides, but it is because I claim the benefit of a rule of law that I must insist upon suppressing these comments or protesting against them.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Stenographer, read the last two questions, and then we will understand the subject perfectly—the one prior to the question you did read.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read as follows:

Q. You recollect the first occasion when that occurred, when she was locked up during that length of time? A. Well, it has occurred in the years 1867, '68 and '69.

Mr. Fullerton—Read the next one; I want to make a motion.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read:

Q. You are sure as to the year, are you? A. They went to their house in 1866; and it was about a year after they went into their house that I noticed his unkindness to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I move to strike that out—

Judge Neilson—Now, the word "that," and the words after it, are stricken out.

Mr. Fullerton—Because it is irresponsible.

Judge Neilson—And the other part of the answer is responsive.

Mr. Evarts—If a motion is made to strike out, I would like to be heard a moment, without reproducing any of the acerbities of the matter. The question is this: She has given evidence concerning certain conduct of Mr. Tilton towards Mrs. Tilton, to wit (what included, as a part of it), their being locked up together in a room for some length of time. Now, my learned friend wishes to get the date of those occurrences, and the witness answers, having no other unkindness in her mind, and no other instance of unkindness but the very one concerning which she is inquired about. She then says: "They went to their house in 1866, and it was in the year 1867, as I first noticed the difference," she says, "on that subject"—

Judge Neilson—About a year afterwards.

Mr. Evarts—I don't care to reproduce it, because I might not do it accurately—"that I noticed his unkindness to his wife." Now, the legitimate application in the witness's mind, and in the witness's answer, and in the jury's apprehension of it, and her apprehension of it, is: "You are asking me to fix the dates of this series or style of occurrences that you are inquiring about; and I do fix the date that these were the times that I noticed his unkindness, but not his unkindness in general, not his unkindness in other particulars; but this unkindness concerning which you are talking to me." I submit that is a perfectly natural conclusion of the witness, and it is a legitimate answer. And, then, if the learned counsel does not necessarily include these particular unkindnesses as thus appropriated to these dates, why, that is easily supplied by a further question on his part. It is not right to strike it out, it seems to me.

Judge Neilson—I think that clause was properly stricken out, the counsel not having interrogated the witness in that connection as to any unkindness, and not having referred to the locking of the door as an act of unkindness and as an act of which he wished to ascertain the date. I ought to say in this connection that I accept cheerfully the suggestion made by Judge Porter, that all witnesses are to be treated alike, and that no counsel, even in the earnestness of the examination, ought to use words unpleasant to a witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Have I used one there?

Judge Neilson—I don't say you have. I cannot take upon myself to recall; only, it is a suggestion.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; but it is implied in the observation of your Honor; and I am studiously avoiding any observation to this witness that is in the slightest degree offensive. I challenge the counsel upon the other side to produce one instance in which I have violated any rule of propriety in the examination of this or any other witness. If I asked this witness the question whether she lied and she should say, "Yes;" and I should respond, "We have your word for it," as Judge Porter did to Mr. Moulton when he was upon the stand, then, Sir, I should be the subject of a proper rebuke.

Mr. Porter—Well, Mr. Moulton had stated that he lied.

Mr. Fullerton—That did not warrant the observation.

Mr. Everts—Why, certainly.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Everts—It was not accusing him of lying. He said he lied.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, and he lied for your client.

Mr. Everts—I know; he said so; As said so. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—He lied for your client, and it ill becomes his counsel to rebuke him for it.

Mr. Beach—Hadn't we better get the answer to this question before we adjourn?

Judge Neilson—Perhaps you had.

Mr. Everts—Now, if your Honor please, here is a ruling that your Honor has made [Reading]:

Tilton having said, in answer to a general question, on direct examination, that defendant never denied the criminal intercourse, added, "whenever he spoke of it he always said that the criminality attached to him alone, etc.;" And, that the motion to strike out as not responsive, and as stating general results of conversations, instead of stating what was said and when, should be denied.

Now, the point undoubtedly is that great prejudice may come to testimony and some injury to the witness by striking out evidence that is not, upon a very clear judgment, either volunteer or spurious, when nullifications of the evidence can easily be supplied by subsequent inquiries. And it is for that reason, I suppose, that your Honor has been averse to striking out in the instances that I called your attention to, and I think it is not just to the witness to strike out an answer that, it seems to me, under fair consideration, may well be regarded by your Honor and the jury as, in the mind of the witness, responsive. Where a witness volunteers extraneous matters, why, of course, we understand that the witness exposes herself, or himself, to the rebuke of striking out evidence.

Judge Neilson—I think in the instance cited from the record, where I failed to strike out the motion, there was a connection between the answer as given and the subject matter of the inquiry; here, on the other hand, in contrast with that, is a simple inquiry as to the time when the locking of the door occurred; whether that locking of the door was an unkind act or not the learned counsel did not inquire, and may not want to take the judgment of this witness—simply the time when it occurred. Therefore, I think the last words of this answer were properly stricken out, because it characterizes the closing of the door, or locking of it, as an unkind act, an inquiry which the counsel had not presented at all.

THE CLOSET LECTURES AGAIN DESCRIBED.

Mr. Fullerton—It does not follow that she referred the unkind conduct to the locking of the door. [To the witness.] Are you certain now, Madam, as to the time when you first knew him to lock her up in a room? A. Those three years, Sir; 1867, '8 and '9.

Q. Well, 1867 was the first time—in the year 1867? A. Those three years; I cannot state in particular—

Q. Well, the first time was not in 1868, was it, if he locked her up in 1867?

Mr. Everts—Well, you will learn that from the calendar.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am trying to get the calendar into her head. [To the witness.] It was not the first time in 1868? A. I ain't saying it was the first time; I have said in those three years those occurrences were.

Q. Now, do you recollect the occasion that he locked her up in the room? A. What he locked her up for?

A. Yes, the first time? A. I don't know, unless to scold her.

Q. Well, do you know; do you know what the occasion was? A. I don't know, Sir. How should I know what he had locked her up for? Only I know whenever they were in there, and the door was locked, he was talking very angrily and she was crying.

Q. Now, how many times in all do you remember of her being locked up in the room by him? A. Oh! a number of times.

Q. How many? A. Over a dozen.

Q. Over a dozen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how many over a dozen? A. Over a dozen, that is all the answer I can give to that question.

Q. How? A. Over a dozen times.

Q. Over a dozen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And two or three hours each time? A. I didn't say that.

Q. Well, that is the reason I have asked you. A. I have spoke of one time when it was three or four hours; I didn't say every time.

Q. Well, how long generally was it? A. Generally pretty long.

Q. Well, how long? A. I cannot state definitely, except on one occasion I know it was three or four hours; sometimes it was so long that the supper bell would ring and they would not come down; they had been there then the best part of the afternoon.

Q. Yes. Were you ever with them in the room when they were locked up? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was he always in the room with her when she was locked up? A. Yes, Sir; that is—these occasions when they were together.

Q. I am speaking of the occasions when he locked her up in the room; was he, on those occasions, in the room with her? A. Yes, Sir, because I always heard his angry voice scolding her.

Q. Always? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On every one of those occasions? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A dozen or more? A. A dozen or more; yes, Sir.

The Court here took a recess until 3:10 p. m.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 3:10 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Miss Turner again took the witness stand.

Judge Nelson—Mr. Shearman, shall we wait for Mr. Everts, or shall we go on?

Mr. Shearman—We will go on.

The Witness—Mr. Fullerton, if you will allow me I would like to correct a mistake that I made this morning with regard to little Paul dying. I think I stated that I thought he died in July, 1868, but he died on the 25th day of August, 1868. Then I was not—I seemed to be—I was not very plain about going to Mrs. Dows's when I was at the Home. I went to the Home in the latter part of December, 1868. It was from the Home that I went to Mrs. Dows's, and I returned from Mrs. Dows's in June, 1869, about the 17th of June. Little Ralph was born on the 30th, and I know I was there two or three days before he was born.

Mr. Fullerton—How did you get at those dates? A. From Mrs. Tilton's diary.

Q. Did you look at the diary during the present recess? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton show it to you? A. Mrs. Tilton gave it to me.

Q. In what room was Mrs. Tilton locked up on the first occasion when she was locked up, that you remember? A. The first occasion that I remember was in the second story front bedroom, Sir.

Q. At what time of day was it? A. I think it was in the early part of the afternoon.

Q. Do you recollect the season of the year? A. No, Sir; I don't think I do.

Q. How long was she locked up on that occasion? A. Two or three hours.

Q. Where did you remain during those two or three hours? A. I remained up-stairs; I was in the sitting-room for a little while, and then I went down-stairs and came up again, and went down in the parlor and came up again; I kept going down and coming up.

Q. You kept going down and coming up? A. I kept going down and coming up.

Q. Did you overhear anything that was said during that locking up? A. Not at the time that I am speaking of now, except that he was talking in a very loud, and angry tone of voice.

Q. When was this? A. During those three years.

Mr. Beach—No, no; that won't do.

Mr. Fullerton—Which of those three years? A. It might probably have been the first year.

Q. 1867? A. 1867.

Q. What time of the year was it? A. What time of the year was it?

Q. Yes. A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. Have you no recollection upon that subject? A. No, Sir; I don't think I could give the time of the year.

Q. Was it Winter or Summer?

Mr. Beach—Or Spring?

Mr. Fullerton—Or Spring? A. It may possibly have been in the Winter, I think.

Q. Is that as near as you can get at it? A. That is as near as I can get at it.

Q. Then it was the year 1867, you think? A. 1867, 1868 and 1869 are the years I know she was locked up in.

Q. No, no; I am speaking now of this one occasion; if it were in the Winter, it was in the Winter of 1867-8? A. 1867, I think.

Q. Well, there was only one month of Winter in 1867; the other two were in 1868.

Mr. Beach—She says it was in the Winter.

The Witness—I did not say that I was sure it was in the Winter.

Mr. Fullerton—Was it in the Winter in the early part of 1867, or at the end of 1867? A. I think it was—well, I cannot say positively.

Mr. Beach—Well, make her say it.

Mr. Fullerton—Can't you give us any idea of the year?

Mr. Beach—She says she thinks it was in the Winter.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, I know. [To the witness.] In the Winter of what year was it? A. I don't know that it was in the Winter,

Mr. Beach—You said you thought so?

The Witness—I think so, but I am not positive.

Mr. Fullerton—If it were in the Spring that it occurred, tell me in the Winter of what year it was? A. 1867, 1868 and 1869—in those three years were the times that he had her locked up.

Q. I am not talking about the times when he had her locked up. I am asking about this particular occasion that you now speak of? A. You want to know what time of the year it was?

Q. Yes? A. Well, I cannot say positively, but I think it was in the Winter.

Q. Well, thinking it was in the Winter, tell me what part of the Winter it was in? A. No, Sir; I cannot tell you that.

Mr. Beach—She does not understand. [To the witness.] Was it the Winter at the commencement of 1867, or the Winter at the end of 1867? A. That I cannot tell you, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Was Mr. Tilton a public lecturer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What part of the year was he usually gone upon lecturing tours? A. I don't remember; I think sometimes in the early part of the year, and sometimes later.

MRS. TILTON HER HUSBAND'S ACCEPTED CRITIC.

Q. Don't you know that he was in the habit of reading his lectures to his wife before he went upon his lecturing tours? A. I know that he used to take a great deal of his writing to her to criticise and to read it over to her, but whether it was his lectures that he was reading to her I could not say.

Q. Well, he was in the habit of reading his writings to her? A. I know she used to criticise a great deal of his writings before they went to press.

Q. Whether those writings were lectures or editorials you cannot say? A. I cannot say whether they were lectures or not.

Q. Was he not in the habit of going into this room with writings of some kind to read them over to his wife? A. When they were locked up?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; I don't think it was anything of that kind, it didn't sound like reading over writings, because he was talking in a loud and angry tone.

Q. Well, if he were delivering or reading a lecture to her, it would be in a loud tone? A. It wouldn't begin that tone.

Q. You think not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You could judge whether it was the reading or declamation of a lecture, or a scolding? A. Oh, I am sure it was a scolding lecture; he was lecturing her; but I am pretty sure he was not reading over any lecture.

Q. You did not hear what he said? A. No, Sir.

Q. You only heard a loud voice? A. Talking loud and angry.

Q. You could tell that it was angry? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You know that it was not the reading of a lecture? A. Well, I think I could swear to that.

Q. Well, you do swear to it, don't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When do you recollect any other occasion when they were locked up together? A. Well, there was so many times that I can't give them all.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike out that answer.

Mr. Shearman—That is a very proper answer.

Mr. Beach—Well, I move to strike it out.

Mr. Shearman—Then we object to its being struck out.

Judge Neilson—it is struck out. He did not ask how many such occasions there were but what other occasion the witness recollects.

Mr. Shearman—She is stating the next occasion when Mrs. Tilton was locked up.

Mr. Beach—We did not ask whether she could recollect the next occasion; we asked when the occasion was.

Mr. Shearman—The answer was a very natural one.

Mr. Beach—Natural is not proper.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we object to the answer being struck out.

Mr. Beach—Well, the Court is against you.

Mr. Shearman—If the Court is against me the counsel has no right to make an observation upon it after the ruling of the Court.

Mr. Beach—It was not necessary for you to say that the answer was a proper answer, after the Court had ruled that it was improper.

Mr. Shearman—I merely observed that it was a natural answer to your question.

Mr. Beach—Well, you will find your remarks answered whenever you make them.

Mr. Shearman—So will you.

Mr. Beach—I hope so.

MR. TILTON WANTS BETTER ECONOMY.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Miss Turner, will you answer my question? A. I remember very distinctly another occasion when they were locked up in the room together, and he was talking very angrily to her, and that was the occasion when she said: "Why, darling, I make every dollar go as far as I can;" and she was crying and sobbing. I knew that, because that day I had not acted very nicely, I felt a little cross, and hearing Mrs. Tilton crying, I went to the door and knocked, and Mrs. Tilton unlocked the door, and the tears were running down her cheeks, and Mr. Tilton was standing by the bureau, and he turned around, and his face was just as red as fire, and he turned his back to me.

OTHER INSTANCES OF UNKINDNESS.

Q. When was that? A. That was another occasion; I cannot state just when it was.

Q. State as near as you can. A. It may have been in that same year, or it may have been another year; it may have been the year after that.

Q. You can give us no idea whether it was in 1887, 1888 or 1889? A. It was during those three years; I cannot give any definite time, any more than that these scoldings and lockings up in the room were during those three years.

Q. How? A. No more than that I remember these scoldings taking place in 1887, 1888 and 1889; those three years.

Q. Did he lock her up in the room on any other occasion than those two that you have spoken of, that you can now remember? A. Another occasion? I remember one evening Mr. Bates had been there, when he took her up stairs and they were locked in the room together, and he was talking very loud in a very angry tone of voice.

Q. You could hear the loud talking again, and the angry tone of voice? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could you hear what was said? A. No, Sir; I was not listening attentively enough. I suppose if I had put my ear to the door I might possibly have made out what they were saying.

Q. But you didn't? A. It was his angry tone of voice that caused me to be around.

Q. Yes. A. I heard it.

Q. When you knocked upon the door and it was opened, by whom was it opened? A. It was opened by Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Where was Mr. Tilton standing? A. On this one occasion he was standing by the bureau, with his face turned toward the door, and when I made my appearance he turned around.

Q. You have told me about that. He was standing by the door; now, how far was the bureau from the door? A. Not very far.

Q. How far? A. Well, suppose here was the door and over there was the bureau. [Illustrating.]

Q. Six or eight feet? A. I didn't measure it; I don't know whether it was six or eight feet or not.

Q. Give us your judgment about it? A. I could not tell you.

Q. He did not prevent her from opening the door? A. I could not tell about that; I didn't see her until the door was opened.

Q. You didn't observe that he attempted to prevent her from opening the door? A. I could not observe, Sir, because the door was shut; all that I saw was after the door was opened.

Q. And his face was as red as fire? A. Yes, Sir; very red.

Q. Well, as red as fire, wasn't it? A. Well, it was pretty red. That is a common expression. When a person is very red, you will say they are as red as fire, or as red as fury.

Q. Well, which was it, red as fire or red as fury? A. Well, I guess as red as fury.

Q. You observed that? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. What did you say? A. I asked Mrs. Tilton if she would forgive me for the way I had acted.

Q. You wanted to get pardon, did you, so you knocked at the door to get admission? A. Well, I cannot state truly that that was the way. I was curious to see what the row was about, and I made my having been angry that day an excuse for going in to see, because I heard Mrs. Tilton sobbing and crying.

Q. You heard her sobbing and crying? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Distinctly? A. I heard her, and then I saw her.

Q. You listened to hear the sobbing and crying? A. I was in the front sitting room.

Q. How far from the door entering the room where they were? A. How far was I sitting?

Q. Yes. A. I was not sitting, I was standing over by the window, I think.

Q. How long did you remain there in that attitude? A. Do you mean before I went in and spoke to her?

Q. Yes. A. I was there some little time.

Q. How long? A. I could not state; perhaps fifteen minutes, or twenty minutes.

Q. How long were they locked up in their room at that time? A. They had been there for several hours, three or four hours.

Q. What time of day was it? A. When they went in?

Q. Yes. A. It was in the afternoon, after dinner or after lunch.

Q. What time was lunch? A. They generally had lunch from twelve to one.

Q. And about two o'clock did they go into that room? A. They went directly after lunch, as I remember.

Q. Then it was about two o'clock? A. I think it was earlier than that.

Q. One o'clock? A. No, Sir; they had lunch at one o'clock. It was about half-past one, I guess.

Q. It was half-past one when they went into the room; now, what was done when Mr. Bates was there? A. What was done?

Q. Yes. A. With Mrs. Tilton?

Q. No. A. Why, Mrs. Tilton had been talking with him—she had spoken to him. He was making a friendly call, I think it was a Sabbath evening, and stayed to supper.

Q. And yet after he went away, about one o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Tilton took Mrs. Tilton into the room and locked her up?

COUNSEL CHARGED WITH MAKING AN INCORRECT ASSUMPTION.

Mr. Tracy—No, Sir, there is no such evidence. I object to that question. The counsel assumes what the witness has not said.

Judge Neilson—I think he does.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think I do, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I think you do, and therefore I object.

Judge Neilson—If the question assumes what does not appear in the testimony of course the objection is a good one.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think I did assume what does not appear.

Mr. Tracy—The counsel stated the testimony about one o'clock, which referred to another occasion, and then he took the occasion when Mr. Bates was there and stayed for supper, as the witness thinks, and applied the one o'clock to that. The witness said—

Mr. Fullerton—Wait a moment. You need not state what the witness said. I propose to have it read. That is the better way to do it.

Mr. Tracy—I don't know what right the counsel has to interrupt me when I am addressing the Court.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't know which side you are on just now.

Mr. Tracy—I am never on but one side of a case, and that is more than some other gentlemen can say.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, will your Honor have the record read?

Judge Neilson—Read the record.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Miss Turner, will you answer my question? A. I remember very distinctly another occasion when they were locked up in the room together and he was talking very angrily to her, and that was the occasion when she said, "Why, darling, I make every dollargo as far as I can," and she was crying and sobbing. I knew that because that day I had not acted very nicely—I felt a little cross—and hearing Mrs. Tilton crying, I went to the door and knocked and Mrs. Tilton unlocked the door and the tears were running down her cheeks, and Mr. Tilton was standing by the bureau, and he turned around and his face was just as red as fire and he turned his back to me.

Q. When was that? A. That was another occasion; I cannot state just when it was.

Q. State as near as you can. A. It may have been in that year, or it may have been another year; it may have been the year after that.

Q. You can give us no idea whether it was in 1867, 1868, or 1869? A. It was during those three years; I cannot give any definite time, any more than that these scoldings or lockings up in the room were during those three years.

Q. How? A. No; more than that, I remember these scoldings taking place in 1867, 1868 and 1869, those three years.

Q. Did he lock her up in the room on any other occasion than those two that you have spoken of, that you can now remember? A. Another occasion. I remember one evening—Mr. Bates had been there—when he took her up-stairs and they were locked in the room together, and he was talking very loud in a very angry tone of voice.

Q. You could hear the loud talking again, and the crying tone of voice? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could your hear what was said? A. No, Sir; I was not listening attentively enough. I suppose if I had put my ear to the door I might possibly have made out what they were saying.

Q. But you didn't? A. It was his angry tone of voice that caused me to be around.

Q. Yes. A. I heard it.

Q. When you knocked upon the door, and it was opened; by whom was it opened? A. It was opened by Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Where was Mr. Tilton standing? A. On this one occasion he was standing by the bureau, with his face turned to the door, and when I made my appearance he turned around.

Q. You have told me about that. He was standing by the door; now how far was the bureau from the door? A. Not very far.

Q. How far? A. Well, suppose here was the door, and over there was the bureau. [Illustrating.]

Q. Six or eight feet? A. I didn't measure it; I don't know whether it was six or eight feet or not.

Q. Give us your judgment about it? A. I could not tell you.

Q. He did not prevent her from opening the door? A. I could not tell about that; I didn't see her until the door was opened.

Q. You didn't observe that he attempted to prevent her from opening the door? A. I could not observe, Sir, because the door was shut; all that I saw was after the door was opened.

Q. And his face was red as fire? A. Yes, Sir; very red.

Q. Well, as red as fire, wasn't it? A. Well, it was pretty red. That is a common expression. When a person is very red, you will say they are as red as fire or as red as fury.

Q. Well, which was it, red as fire or red as fury? A. Well, I guess, as red as fury.

Q. You observed that? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. What did you say? A. I asked Mrs. Tilton if she would forgive me for the way I had acted.

Q. You wanted to get pardoned, did you, so you knocked at the door to get admission? A. Well, I cannot state truly that that was the way. I was curious to see what the row was about, and I made my having been angry that day an excuse for going in to see, because I heard Mrs. Tilton sobbing and crying.

Q. You heard her sobbing and crying? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Distinctly? A. I heard her, and then I saw her.

Q. You listened to hear the sobbing and crying? A. I was in the front sitting room.

Q. How far from the door entering the room where they were?

A. How far was I sitting?

Q. Yes. A. I was not sitting, I was standing over by the window. I think.

Q. How long did you remain in that attitude? A. Do you mean before I went in and spoke to her?

Q. Yes? A. I was there some little time.

Q. How long? A. I could not state; perhaps fifteen minutes or twenty minutes.

Q. How long were they locked up in their room at that time? A. They had been there for several hours, three or four hours.

Q. What time of day was it? A. When they went in?

Q. Yes? A. It was in the afternoon, after dinner or after lunch.

Q. What time was lunch? A. They generally had lunch from twelve to one.

Q. And about two o'clock did they go into that room? A. They went directly after lunch, as I remember.

Q. Then it was about two o'clock? A. I think it was earlier than that.

Q. One o'clock? A. No, Sir; they had lunch at one o'clock; it was about half-past one, I guess.

Q. It was half-past one when they went into the room; now, what was done when Mr. Bates was there? A. What was done?

Q. Yes. A. With Mrs. Tilton?

Q. No. A. Why, Mrs. Tilton had been talking with him; she had spoken to him. He was making a friendly call—I think it was a Sabbath evening—and stayed to supper.

Q. And yet after he went away, about one o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Tilton took Mrs. Tilton into the room and locked her up?"

Mr. Tracy—My objection is that after the counsel had quit the scene which transpired after lunch and had gone back to the scene when Mr. Bates was there, and had the witness tell what occurred in Mr. Bates's presence, he then assumed that the witness had stated that Mr. and Mrs. Tilton went into the room at one o'clock in the afternoon on the occasion when Mr. Bates was there, which was a very different thing from what the witness had said.

Judge Neilson—It is very easy for you to modify your question, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! Sir, I am strictly right about it. The witness may have misunderstood my question—she probably did.

Judge Neilson—It appears that the time when Mr. Bates was there was in the evening.

Mr. Fullerton—Undoubtedly it was, but that did not prevent her from saying that they went into the room at half-past one o'clock.

Mr. Tracy—It prevented the counsel from assuming that she had stated it.

THE TROUBLE CAUSED BY MR. BATES'S CALL.

Judge Neilson—Go on, gentlemen, give us another question, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—What time in the day was it that Mr. Bates was there? A. It was not in the day time, I think. It was in the evening.

Q. What time in the evening? A. He came into supper that evening—I think it was Sunday evening.

Q. What time did he leave? A. I don't know whether he left in time for church or whether he stayed until nine o'clock. My impression is that we did not go to church, but I would not be positive.

Q. How long after he went away did they go up into the room? A. Right as soon as he left—a very few minutes.

Q. Were you present when they left the room to go to their room? A. Yes, Sir; and followed them up-stairs.

Q. You followed them up-stairs? A. Went behind them.

Q. Where did you go? A. Into the front sitting-room.

Q. Where did they go? A. They went into the bedroom off the front sitting-room, and the doors were locked.

Q. How long did they remain there? A. Some time.

Q. How long? A. Three or four hours, I think.

Q. Did you stay there till they came out? A. No, Sir, I went in and out; I stayed a little while, and came down-stairs and came back again.

Q. That is the time that you went up-stairs and came downstairs so very much? A. I went up-stairs and down-stairs a great many times.

Q. What time did you retire that night? A. I could not tell you that.

Q. Do you remember? A. No, sir.

Q. Who retired first, you or Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I didn't know whether I retired first, or whether they retired first; however, I saw them coming out of the room.

Q. What time did they come out? A. They had been in there three or four hours.

Q. They went in about nine o'clock, did they? A. I said that I could not remember whether Mr. Bates left before church—in time for church, or whether he stayed there until nine o'clock.

Q. You say you thought he stayed there till nine? A. I said I thought so, but I could not say positively.

Q. If he stayed until nine it must have been about twelve or after when they came out? A. If it was nine, yes, Sir; it must have been, because they stayed there a long time in this room.

Q. You didn't go to bed until they came out? A. No, Sir; I saw them coming out.

Q. Do you remember any other occasion when there was any locking up in the room. A. Yes, Sir; I remember several other occasions.

Q. Name one of them. A. When he had her locked up there and was scolding her—dozens of times he had her locked up.

Q. Dozens of times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I thought you said it was only about a dozen times before recess. A. It was dozens.

Q. Over a dozen times it was? A. Over a dozen.

Q. You think it was dozens? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About how many dozens of times do you think it was? A. Perhaps two or three dozen.

Q. It must have been, then, between twenty-four and thirty-six times, somewhere? A. Yes, Sir; it may have been more than thirty-six times.

Q. It may have been more than thirty-six times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Upon the whole, how many times do you think it was?

A. It was two or three dozen times; I am sure of that.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you sure that it was three dozen times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Three dozen times; sure of more than that, are you? A. Well, no, Sir; I won't go further than that.

Q. You won't go further than three dozen? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did I understand you to limit it to one dozen before recess? A. I did not say one dozen; I said over a dozen.

Q. Did you mean, then, two or three dozen? A. Over a dozen; now that you are pinning me down to it, as to whether it was a dozen or three dozen times, I said over a dozen.

Q. Did you mean by that more than a dozen times? A. I meant that it was more than a dozen times.

Q. Did you mean that it was as many as two or three dozen times when you said it was more than a dozen?

A CONTEST FOR AN ANSWER.

Mr. Porter—I object to that question. She expressed herself with great intelligence when she said over a dozen times. It is not to be presumed she meant more than three dozen. She answers one question at a time. He asks her if it was more than a dozen times, and she says she thinks it was, and he now asks her if, when she gave that answer, she meant something different from what she answered. She said it was over a dozen.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, that is a fact; there is no doubt about that, and I want to know when this witness limited the times of locking up to more than a dozen, whether she meant then that she knew of at least three dozen.

Mr. Porter—I object to the question in its modified form, as an assumption contrary to the fact that she did limit the times to a dozen.

Judge Neilson—She didn't limit it to a dozen—over a dozen.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; and I did not say she did. I quoted her language. My language was that she stated it was more than a dozen times. Let it pass.

Mr. Beach—No, I won't let it pass.

Mr. Shearman—Do two counsel cross-examine?

Mr. Beach—When we do so, it will be time for you to object.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Beach has constantly objected to a third speech on our side when we were not the objecting party. Now, Mr. Beach is going to make a third speech, when he is not the objecting party.

Judge Neilson—I don't know about that, but it has been a constant practice of one counsel or another to interview and take part as well as counsel who has been examining.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will bear me out in saying that I never object to hear Brother Shearman speaking; I am always anxious to have him relieve himself, when inclined. [Laughter.] I rose for the purpose of saying, which I think it is proper to say, that this lady, before the adjournment, upon cross-examination, limited the number of times that she saw Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton locked up together to over a dozen. Now, when she comes into Court, after having had a communication during the recess with persons whom she has named, she now says that it was two or three dozen, but finally testifies positively to three dozen. The question we put to her, is for the purpose of having an explanation from her, Sir, and, understanding precisely what she understood to be the effect of her answer before the recess; we asked her if she had in her mind—if she meant by "over a dozen" the two or three dozen times which she has now mentioned, and it is a question, Sir, which is very proper, contrasting the two answers before the witness and enabling her to make any explanation she chooses in regard to that difference. Now, of course, we submit with becoming modesty and deference to the frequent lectures which we receive from the other side in regard to our treatment of this witness; but if we are right, your Honor—if we are technically right in our examination of this witness, we ask your Honor to sustain us, and, if we are in error, we will submit, Sir, with great deference to any correction which your Honor may administer to us. I submit we have a right, where this witness has made these answers, apparently at variance and contradictory, to ask her for an explanation and whether she meant by the first answer which she gave—indefinite and uncertain in its limitations—whether she meant the number of times which she now gives.

ARGUMENT OF MR. SHEARMAN.

Mr. Shearman—Now, if your Honor please, the counsel has again assumed a state of facts which does not exist. The lady did not—though it is a contradiction in terms to say that she did not limit the number to over a dozen, the statement is absurd upon its face. But, even if it were a sensible statement, the lady did not limit it to over a dozen. The question that was asked her before recess was something like this: "Did this happen often? A. Yes, Sir, very often. Did it happen several times?" says Mr. Fullerton, with that impressiveness of manner which distinguishes him when he thinks he is going to make a great point, and the witness answers, "Yes, over a dozen." Now, that was a fair answer, and it was no limitation, and it was, as far as the lady had any right to go. She had not a right to say then three dozen times, because Judge Fullerton would have objected to any answer that went a quarter of an inch beyond his question. He asked if it was not a dozen times. I wonder he didn't object that she transcended her right in saying it was over a dozen times. I am surprised he didn't say "I didn't ask you that," as he generally does in the exercise of those strict technical rights which his associate insists upon. But that is all the answer she could make; and now she is asked what was meant by that answer, when that simply was in response to a question put to her. They might as well ask what Judge Fullerton meant by his question. I submit it is an unfair question to ask the witness what she meant when she made this simple response to the question put to her.

GENERAL DEBATE.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] I think you had better waive that.

Mr. Fullerton—What, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think you had better waive the question and go on.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't ask her whether it was a dozen times, before the recess. I asked her to fix the number of times, and she said it was over a dozen.

Judge Neilson—Is that the way it came up?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—It was not.

Mr. Beach—Why, clearly, it was.

Judge Neilson—Repeat the last question.

Mr. Fullerton—When before recess you said that it was over a dozen times that he had locked Mrs. Tilton up in his room, did you mean by that that it was three dozen times?

Mr. Porter—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—We will take the answer.

Mr. Porter—I except to your Honor's ruling.

The Witness—Over a dozen means more than a dozen.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—So Mr. Shearman says.

The Witness—I said more than a dozen times.

Mr. Shearman—I thought the counsel did not comment on the answers of the witness. This is about the thirtieth time to-day the counsel has commented on the answers of the witness.

Mr. Beach—He has commented on your remarks.

Mr. Shearman—I don't object to that; I can comment on his. I do object to comments on his part on the answers of the witness, which were never allowed when we had the giant intellects on the stand, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, and I trust it will not be allowed now.

Judge Neilson—I don't know what was allowed then; I intend to be uniform and consistent, and I think I reasonably am. Very likely when witnesses are upon the stand 8, 9, 10 or 11 days, there may be some deviation from the common course.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will remember that was done on the first day of Mrs. Moulton's cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness said over a dozen times; she may have had in her mind a dozen times or not, and I think it is a simple thing for her to say what she has in her mind.

The Witness—I have in my mind three dozen times—more than a dozen times that he had her locked up.

Judge Neilson—When you said it was more than a dozen times, had you it in your mind that it was three dozen times?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question; is a witness to be subjected to that kind of criticism, whether when she said one thing she meant another? Has the witness shown such a lack of intelligence that her answers cannot be understood by the Court or the jury? When a witness states one thing, and is asked whether she has in her mind another, is it not evidently transcending the rules of the legal examinations? Is that inquiring of her of a fact? I admit she cannot fence with the counsel in the use of words, and it is because I think she is at a disadvantage in comparison with him that I insist upon it that the trial shall not be converted into a fencing match.

Mr. Fullerton—Let it be a fencing match, when my two friends on the other side are seconds to come to her aid every moment; she is now alone.

Judge Neilson—I don't know that there is any contradiction. The witness said at first, "over a dozen times." It might be quite consistent to know if, when she answered, she had in her mind three dozen times; I don't know whether she had it or not. I don't regard it as contradictory. I think this witness ought to be cross-examined as entirely as the counsel in his professional judgment feels called upon to examine her, and I think the practice heretofore has been very liberal. Questions have been put like this continually, day by day, to certain witnesses. I don't think there is any particular pressure upon this witness. Counsel may differ as to the extent to which they should test her recollection. I think she may answer this question.

Mr. Porter—We except.

Mr. Fullerton [To the witness]—Now answer.

The Witness—Whether it was one dozen times or three dozen times?

Judge Neilson [To the witness]—This is it. When you answered before recess as to these occasions of looking up that it was over a dozen times, the question simply is whether you then meant, or had in mind, three dozen. Can you tell how it is? A. I could not say whether it was three dozen, or four dozen, or five dozen, but it was over a dozen.

Q. It is not as to the number. You said before recess it was over a dozen times, and now you say three dozen. The question is whether when you said over a dozen you meant it was three dozen? A. Yes, Sir, I think I meant it was over a dozen.

Q. Yes, you said that. Then you had in your mind that it was three dozen? A. I think I had in my mind that it was a good many dozen, but I said it was over a dozen.

Mr. Fullerton—If you had it in your mind a good many dozen why didn't you state that in your answer to the question put to you?

Mr. Porter—I object to the question. No question was put to her calling for that.

Judge Neilson—I think she answered it was over a dozen. That leaves you at liberty to ask.

Mr. Fullerton—When you were asked the question why didn't you fix the larger number in your mind?

Mr. Porter—Objected. It is a repetition of the same question in another form.

Mr. Fullerton—Which has not been answered.

Mr. Porter—I submit it has, and the Court has just said it has been answered.

Judge Neilson—I don't conceive it to be admissible.

Mr. Beach—The question is whether we have a right to cross-examine the witness—

Judge Neilson—I think you have a right to cross-examine the witness. The witness's duty is to attend patiently to it; but I think every question ought not to be objected to; still counsel have a right to object to questions if they feel called upon to do so. The cross-examination was pretty thorough in regard to other witnesses. This is a small matter.

Mr. Fullerton—Shall she answer the question?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Porter—I except.

The Witness—I thought saying over a dozen times would do as well as saying over three or four dozen.

Q. When you made use of the term "over a dozen times," and had in your mind three dozen times, or more, why didn't you mention the larger number of times?

Mr. Tracy—I object to that. The question is whether she had it in her mind that it was three dozen. The witness has not stated she had in her mind three dozen times.

Mr. Morris—She stated that she thought saying over a dozen times would do as well as saying over three or four dozen.

Mr. Tracy—The probability is that when the witness answered it was over a dozen times, she had not in her mind the precise number of times.

Judge Neilson—How easy it would be for the witness to say what she had in her mind.

Mr. Tracy—The witness cannot fence with the counsel.

Judge Neilson—It is not a question of fencing. That observation is improper. Counsel has a right to cross-examine the witness.

Mr. Tracy—Certainly he has, and he has been enjoying it.

Judge Neilson—And not make every small, simple question a subject of argument.

Mr. Tracy—The counsel has no right to say this witness had in her mind three dozen times.

Judge Neilson—No; I asked her if she had that in her mind, and I didn't learn that she had.

Mr. Tracy—That is the ground of my objection to the counsel's question.

Mr. Morris—She certainly did answer that question propounded by the Court.

Mr. Fullerton—I think I recollect the Court putting the question, and she answering it.

Mr. Morris—She did answer the question.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] I think I asked you, when you answered before recess over a dozen times, whether in making that answer you had in mind, or not, the fact that it was three dozen times that you thought of that at the time. Did you, or not?

The Witness—I don't know that I did particularly, that it was three or four dozen, but I meant over a dozen, and saying a dozen—over a dozen times I thought that would be all that was necessary.

Mr. Morris—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Read the answer of the witness to that question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer [reading]: "I thought saying over a dozen times would do as well as saying over three or four dozen."

Mr. Beach—In answering what your Honor asked her, she said she thought saying over a dozen times would do as well as saying over three or four dozen.

Mr. Morris—That is what she stated; I knew she did.

Judge Neilson—Did it then occur to you that it was three dozen times, or didn't you think of that at all, or think of anything more than simply over a dozen? A. I didn't think of anything more than what I said, that it was over a dozen times.

OTHER CASES OF LOOKING UP.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] That answers your question.

Mr. Fullerton—That is an answer to the question. [To the witness.] Can you name, now, any other occasion when they were locked up in the room, as distinguished from the occasions which you have named? A. I think I have named three occasions in particular.

Judge Neilson—Yes. [To the witness.] The last one was when Mr. Bates was present? A. Yes, Sir. Well, there were a great many after that, but I cannot particularize any one.

Mr. Fullerton—Those three are the only ones you can particularize. Is that what you mean to say? A. There were dozens of other occasions, but those are three that I remember very distinctly.

Q. Can you particularize any other occasion than those three? A. Yes, Sir, I can, one other.

Q. Name it, please? A. When a young lady was there.

Q. When was that? A. That was during these three years.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Can she tell which one.

Mr. Fullerton—Can you tell which year it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. What time in the day did he lock her up then? A. I think it was in the afternoon, Sir.

Q. About what time in the afternoon? A. I guess the early part of the afternoon.

Q. How long was she locked up then? A. Three or four hours.

Q. Did you hear anything then? A. I heard him talking very angry to her.

Q. Very angry? A. In a very angry tone of voice.

Q. Very loud? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where were you? A. In the sitting-room.

Q. You stayed there again, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Stayed until they came out? A. I was in there when they came out, but I went in and out during the time they were in there.

Q. Did you go in and out of their room, or in and out of the room you were in? A. I didn't go in and out of their room, for they were in there together with the door shut. I went in and out of the sitting room.

Q. Now, can you particularize any other occasion when they were locked up together? You have now named four. A. Yes, Sir; another occasion was when she was very sick, in December, 1870.

Q. Yes, that one you spoke of on your direct examination. A. When he came in and said he was a ruined man.

Q. Yes. A. She was taken sick the 26th, and this was on Wednesday or Thursday.

Q. Following? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long was he locked up in the room with her then? A. He was there for two hours, or more, I think.

Q. That was when Mrs. Mitchell was there, was it? A. When Mrs. Mitchell was there; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you particularize any other occasion when they were locked up together? A. Yes, Sir; on Thursday.

Q. What Thursday? A. Those two days he had the door locked up, and Mrs. Mitchell remonstrated with him about shutting the door.

Q. That was the Wednesday and Thursday following her sickness? A. Following her sickness; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you particularize any other day when they were locked up together? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can particularize any other day, but there were a great many times.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! of course, there were three dozen.

The Witness—There may have been more than three dozen.

Mr. Fullerton—Now we will go back to the occasion when you rapped at the door and it was opened by Mrs. Tilton. Did you leave them there when you went away from the door? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to go back.

Mr. Tracy—That is a question I desire to have your Honor pass on, whether the counsel has a right to take up one of these occurrences upon this witness's examination and examine fully in regard to it, apparently exhausting it, and then pass to another, and to another, and to another, and then return to the same interview or the same conversation. It is a question of discretion, I concede.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps he did examine exhaustively as to the first occasion, and perhaps not; I don't know. He seems to think he didn't. As to the other, it was more of an attempt to enumerate than to describe the occasion.

Mr. Tracy—I observe the distinction.

Judge Neilson—I think he can do that.

Mr. Tracy—This is a case where he examined exhaustively, where she knocked at the door, and Mrs. Tilton opened it, and she describes Mrs. Tilton's condition, and Mr. Tilton's condition, and what he did. Then he passed to another occasion, to the occasion of Mr. Bates, and then to others which he simply asked her to enumerate. Now, my point, and one which I desire to have settled by your Honor, is whether this counsel shall be permitted to take up one of these occasions, and apparently exhaust it, and then pass to another, and then to return, and then go from one occasion to another, and from one occasion to another, until the witness, worn and wearied out, is confused in the different occasions. I submit that fairness requires that when the counsel has touched upon an occasion, and has apparently exhausted it—touched upon an interview, and gone into the details of that interview, he should be required to exhaust that interview and pass on to another, and should not be permitted to return to it without limit or qualification from time to time during the examination.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not argument; it is simple turbulence.

Mr. Tracy—It may be, your Honor. But when I am addressing the Court, and not the counsel, if I am turbulent the Court—

Judge Neilson—Would find it out, no doubt.

Mr. Tracy—I accept a reprimand from the Court always.

Judge Neilson—I think this question may be asked, because it is cross-examination.

Mr. Tracy—I was about to call your Honor's attention to an occasion where a different rule was applied by your Honor on cross-examination. It is only a question I desire to submit to the discretion of the Court.

Mr. Beach—I should like to hear the different rule.

Judge Neilson—Who was under examination?

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Meulton. I will read it. [Reading from THE TRIBUNE report:]

Mr. Beach—Your Honor will remember that Mr. Porter cross-examined this witness specially as to the interviews of the 26th and 30th of December, and with great minuteness inquiring into interviews as between those two dates, and carried the witness through the details of this very occurrence. Now, Sir, under the embarrassment in which my friends are situated, I do not care to be very particular upon that subject, and I think they are entitled to some degree of indulgence and license in that respect, but that is but a repetition of the examination of Judge Porter, I think, must occur very readily to my learned friends.

Mr. Shearman—[To Mr. Tracy:] Allow me to suggest—

Mr. Fullerton—I think you had better suggest something.

Mr. Shearman—I think I can suggest something to the point.
[Reading:]

Mr. Morris—I object to the question, on the ground that it has been all gone over on the cross-examination minutely, and they have no right to examine the witness to-day upon the same point upon which he was minutely examined yesterday.

Judge Neilson—That is so, if your recollection is right of what took place.

Then followed the dispute.

Mr. Tracy—I only read from the wrong place, your Honor.

Mr. Fullerton—It was from the wrong place.

Mr. Shearman—One moment; let me come to the final ruling, Mr. Tracy showed the facts were not true, and Judge Neilson said, "Well, proceed, and keep within the rule; don't go over the ground—"

Judge Neilson—I understand perfectly; Mr. Porter had cross-examined the witness for a day and a half, and then Mr. Tracy took up the cross-examination on account of his (Mr. Porter's) illness. Was that not so?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And Mr. Tracy took his place, and the difficulty was that Mr. Tracy should not go over the same ground that had been occupied by Mr. Porter for a day and a half, the motion proposed being that Mr. Porter's examination was final so far as it had gone, and my expression was that you ought to take it up where Judge Porter left it.

Mr. Tracy—I object to that.

Mr. Beach—The objection was to your repeating what Mr. Porter had proved the day before,

Mr. Morris—It was not as to asking any additional questions.

Mr. Tracy—My objection is to Mr. Fullerton repeating a subject he has already touched upon, and apparently exhausted, having examined it in detail, and having done that he should not be allowed to recur to it.

Judge Neilson—The proposition is whether Mr. Fullerton can have this witness again go over what she was examined about.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly not.

Judge Neilson—Or to ask something in addition. If it is something in addition, it don't come within your objection, and he can limit his question.

Mr. Tracy—It comes within my objection; I don't know whether it comes within your Honor's ruling. My point is, that when counsel undertook to investigate in regard to a particular branch of this case, to wit, one of these interviews, he is bound to exhaust his examination; he cannot ask her two or three questions on that occasion, and then go to another, and then come back again to the first interview, for the very effect of such a decision is to confuse a witness. No witness in the world could undergo such a cross-examination as that without getting into confusion, and for the protection of the witness, and for the elicitation of the truth, the counsel ought to be required to exhaust each interview as he approaches it.

Judge Neilson—In each instance in the former examination. Mr. Tracy was allowed to refer to a subject which Mr. Porter had touched, upon the ground that Mr. Porter's examination had not been exhausted; he touched it, but had not exhausted it, evidently implying that he intended to return to it again, and I don't think there is any occasion for discussion about it.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not want to ask a question which has been already answered. They know perfectly well I do not intend to violate that rule.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not proposed to ask a question that has already been asked.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on.

Mr. Beach—Well, will—

Mr. Fullerton—They know—

Mr. Beach—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Fullerton—They know perfectly well, Sir, that I do not intend to violate the rule; they do not anticipate anything of that kind. I think Mr. Tracy has misunderstood, if he understood anything. It is very difficult for one man to communicate to another ideas of which he himself is not possessed. That is an old adage, which we all have heard.

Judge Neilson—I never heard of it before, Sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I think it is a very good one, and very applicable to the objection made on the other side.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Beach.

Mr. Fullerton—I have recurred to the subject, not for the purpose of repeating the question, but for the purpose of developing another point. I was getting at the number of occasions when these lockings up took place, and the years through which they all ran, and then I proposed to return individually to those occasions, and elicit whatever truth there may be bearing upon the issue in this case.

Judge Neilson—Well, is your suggestion superseded, Mr. Beach?

Mr. Beach—I wish, Sir, to enter a dissent from the proposition of Mr. Tracy in regard to the mode of cross-examining a witness; it may become important in the course of this trial. His proposition, Sir, is, if I understand, that upon cross-examination when a subject of inquiry is addressed to a witness, that the counsel must conclude and exhaust his whole examination upon that subject. I have always understood, Sir, that it was admissible and that it certainly was proper practice, instead of following a rule of that character, rather to be irregular and unconservative in the examination of witnesses, for the purpose of testing their recollection, and that whenever it should happen that a witness should go upon the stand clearly tutored and educated in regard to the story which she was to tell, taking advantage of every recess in the Court to refresh her recollection by instruction, and when it appeared to the cross-examining counsel that there was such a constant and continual education of the witness practised, during a long examination, it was not only judicious and wise but admissible and proper to be somewhat irregular in the presentation of subjects to the mind of the witness, so that we might get at her real and honest recollections instead of those proceeding from the tutelage which she might have received.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the Witness:] I now recur to the occasion when you rapped at the door, and Mrs. Tilton opened it, and I ask you whether the door was again closed? A. After Mrs. Tilton had opened it?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. And when it was so closed, did Mr. and Mrs. Tilton remain inside? A. Remained in the room, and he began talking—
 Q. Well, now? A. In an angry—
 Q. Well, don't you begin talking until I ask you the question. A. Excuse me, Sir.
 Q. They remained inside, did they? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Who closed the door? A. Mrs. Tilton.
 Q. Did you hear it locked? A. I don't remember, Sir.
 Q. You are quite sure that she closed the door? A. Yes, Sir, she opened it, and closed it, stood there by the door—right by the door that was open.
 Q. Did Mr. Tilton approach her before the door was closed at all, or did he stand by the bureau? A. He stood by the bureau, as I remember.
 Q. Did he say anything at that time? A. To me?
 Q. Whilst the door was open, did he say anything? A. He turned around, he turned his back to me.
 Q. Did he say anything? A. He did not say a word to me.
 Q. Did Mrs. Tilton say anything? A. She kissed me and said she forgave me
 Q. Is that all she said? A. That is all she said; yes, Sir.
 Q. You say that Mr. Tilton did not say a word to you. Did he say a word to anyone while the door was open? A. Not while the door was open; no, Sir; he had his back to both of us.
 Q. Well, that did not prevent his saying anything? A. No, Sir; he did not.
 Q. He did not say anything? A. No, Sir.

HARSH WORDS AT THE BREAKFAST TABLE.

Q. You have referred to an occasion when Mr. Tilton made an observation to this effect, that Mrs. Tilton was one of the most selfish women that ever lived? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. When did that occur? A. It occurred one morning at the breakfast table.
 Q. And what gave rise to it? A. Florence not eating any meat; is that the one you refer to?
 Q. I am referring to the one that you refer to; if there is any other you may name it. A. Won't you ask me the question you first asked me?
 Q. You have referred to an occasion when Mr. Tilton observed that Mrs. Tilton was one of the most selfish women that ever lived; did that occur more than once? A. That is the only time that I recall, at that table.
 Q. Now, what gave rise to that observation? A. Mr. Tilton had had—Mrs. Tilton had a little dish of something on the table; I don't know whether it was quails or broiled oysters, I think it was one of the two, and he helped himself very liberally, and then passed it to Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Tilton said: "Let the children have it if there is any left; let the children have it," and Florence Tilton looked up and said: "Mamma, I think you are one of the most unselfish women that ever lived;" Theodore Tilton looked right straight at his daughter, and he said: "Your mother is one of the most selfish women that ever lived;" that is the way he said it.

Q. That is the way he said it? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. He said it with that air, did he? A. Yes, Sir; just with that air.
 Q. Did he make any gesture at the time he said it? A. He shook his head, that way. [Illustrating.]
 Q. Angry, was he? A. Yes, Sir; very angry.
 Q. Angry? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. His face as red as fire, was it? A. His face was very red.
 Q. Very red. Is that all that he said? A. That is all that he said on that occasion.
 Q. What? A. All that he said on that occasion.
 Q. Was that all that was said by any parties at the table? A. All that was said in regard to that.
 Q. To that subject? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Did he seem to be angry then because Florence said her mother was unselfish? A. Oh, I think that was what provoked him.
 Q. When was it that he made use of the term that that arose out of Mrs. Tilton's orthodoxy? A. That was another time, at the table.
 Q. Do you recollect when it was, what year it was? A. No, Sir; during those three years.
 Q. What occurred then? A. Florence had had some queer notions about not eating any animal food, or anything that crawled, eggs, or anything that had been alive at all, and one morning—I think Mr. Tilton asked Florence to have some meat, and she refused, and he shook his head and said that was all her mother's damned orthodoxy.
 Q. Well, had her mother instructed her that she should not eat anything that had had life—animal life? A. Had instructed her?
 Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; it troubled her because she did not take meat.
 Q. It troubled Mrs. Tilton? A. It troubled her because she did not take meat.
 Q. Mrs. Tilton, then, as you remember, was not responsible for these notions of Florence? A. It troubled Mr. Tilton, too.
 Q. What? A. It troubled him, too, that she did not take meat.
 Q. And he said that her refusal all grew out of her mother's orthodoxy? A. Yes, Sir; and then he swore.
 Q. He swore? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. His face red then? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Red as fire? A. Well, it was pretty red; I won't say it was as red as fire.
 Q. Very angry, was he? A. He seemed to be; yes, Sir.
 Q. Very angry; then he is a very passionate man, is he not? A. Yes, Sir; when he is mad he is mad in earnest. [Laughter.]

MR. BEECHER'S CALLS AT THE TILTONS'.

Q. You have spoken of Mr. Beecher's visits at the house; how often have you known him to visit the family of Mr. Tilton? A. I have seen him there several—on several occasions.
 Q. Well? A. I could not say just how many.

Q. Well, fix the number as well as you can. A. Well, Sir, I don't think I could fix the number.

Q. Well, were they so frequent that you could not remember them? A. No, Sir; he called occasionally just as a great many of their other friends called—as Mr. Johnson called, and Mr. Bates called, and several others.

Q. You know I am not asking you about them. Did he not call oftener than the gentlemen you have named? A. I never noticed that he did; no, Sir; not as often as a good many of them.

Q. Who let him in when he called? A. I let him in on one or two occasions.

Q. Do you recollect of an occasion when he came there and brought some flowers? A. I think I recollect his having brought some flowers. I don't—I cannot say that I saw him coming in with the flowers, but the flowers—I recollect the flowers—their having flowers that Mr. Beecher had brought—a little basket of flowers. I think Mrs. Mitchell was there at the time.

Q. Do you recollect of an occasion when he put the baby to sleep? A. When Mr. Tilton put the baby to sleep?

Q. No, Mr. Beecher. A. Put the baby to sleep? No, Sir; I don't think I do.

Q. No recollection of that? A. No, Sir. He used to play with the children occasionally.

Q. I am not asking you about that. Do you recollect of Mrs. Tilton going out with him anywhere? A. With Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. You recollect of no such occasion as that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect of her ever going riding with him? A. Mr. Beecher? No, Sir.

Q. Nor going out on foot with him anywhere? A. No, Sir; I don't remember any such occasion.

Q. Do you recollect of an occasion when they went to see the bust of Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. That was being cut by somebody in Brooklyn? A. No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Paige?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; he was a painter, I think. Paige's studio; I don't know but it was. [To the witness]: You don't recollect that occasion? A. Do I recollect that occasion?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; I haven't any recollection of seeing Mrs. Tilton on the street with Mr. Beecher, or in a studio, or anything of that kind.

Q. Or leaving the house in company with him? A. No, Sir; I cannot truthfully say that I do.

MISS ELLEN DENNIS THE MISTRESS OF THE TILTON HOUSE.

Q. This Ellen Dennis that you spoke of, is she living or dead? A. Oh! she is dead.

Q. How long has she been dead? A. Well, she died while I was in school; I guess she has been dead a year or more.

Q. She was at the house on your return from Marietta, was she not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As house-keeper? A. Yes, Sir, and mistress.

Q. You add "and mistress"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Why do you add that? A. Because Mrs. Tilton could not go to a closet or go anywhere without her permission, without her standing looking over her shoulder and asking her what she wanted, and the girl could not get any eggs for little Ralph, the baby, to eat without going to Miss Dennis for it. That is why I said she was mistress.

Q. You were not asked whether she was mistress, were you? A. No, Sir.

Q. That was a volunteer expression? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was not Mrs. Tilton ill when she returned from Marietta? A. She was very tired and weary from having traveled.

Q. She was not ill, then? A. She had had fainting spells, and had been ill; she was not really very ill that day.

Q. Was she ill? A. She was not feeling very well; I could not say that she was really ill.

Q. Well, she was in such a condition when she wanted to come from Marietta to Brooklyn that you thought it improper for her to come alone, did you? A. Well, yes, she had these fainting spells, but she didn't have those fainting spells at the time I refer to; she was not ill with one of those fainting spells, but she had had them very frequently, and that is why I feared she might have one on the cars, and I wanted to come with her.

Q. Then she was only tired when she got to Brooklyn? A. She was tired. She never was very strong—very good health, but then she was not really ill.

Q. Mr. Tilton met her at the cars? A. Yes, Sir; he met us at the cars.

Q. With a carriage? A. The carriage was not at the cars. They were outside of the depot, over in Jersey City.

Q. Yes. How did he salute her when they met? A. Very kindly indeed.

Q. Well, how did he do it? A. Kissed her.

Q. And then you all got into the carriage? A. Carroll and Mrs. Tilton, Mr. Tilton and myself got into the carriage; yes, Sir.

Q. And came to Brooklyn? A. Came to Brooklyn; yes, Sir.

Q. When you got there you found Ellen Dennis at the house, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And Florence? A. Florence—I don't remember seeing Florence there, no, Sir; not at that time.

Q. Wasn't she home then? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Was any one else there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who? A. Miss Susan B. Anthony.

Q. She was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did she remain? A. She remained there until after breakfast, and then I think she went away.

Q. Did anything occur at breakfast? A. Nothing of any account; no, Sir.

Q. Nothing of any account? A. Except that Miss Dennis seemed to act very strange, or very cool, to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Well, there was no trouble at the table? A. Not at breakfast; no, Sir.

Q. The trouble took place at dinner? A. At the dinner table; yes, Sir.

Q. Miss Anthony had gone away then, had she? A. I think Miss Anthony was not then at dinner; no, Sir, she was not at the dinner table; no, Sir.

Q. Are you sure that the trouble which you have related on your direct examination did not take place at the breakfast table instead of the dinner table? A. No, Sir; it was the dinner table.

Q. Have you ever said it took place at the breakfast table? A. Yes, Sir; I think I stated before the Committee that it was at the breakfast table.

Q. Well, how did you happen to state that in that way? A. Because I gave it then just as it came to me, as I thought it was.

Q. Have you read your testimony over that you gave before the Committee, since you gave it? A. No, Sir; it was given to me to read but I did not read it.

Q. You have never seen it since? A. I have never seen it since.

Q. When did you recollect that you were in error as to whether the trouble occurred at the breakfast or at the dinner table? A. When I was preparing myself for this witness stand.

Q. And when was that? A. About—let's see, about two weeks ago, I guess.

Q. How long ago? A. About two or three weeks ago.

Q. Where were you staying at the time? A. At Mrs. Purdy's.

Q. And Mrs. Morse was there then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you saw Mrs. Tilton from time to time? A. Yes, Sir; I saw Mrs. Tilton frequently; not at Mrs. Morse's, but Mrs. Ovington's.

Q. And you saw Mrs. Ovington from time to time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you saw Miss Augusta Moore from time to time? A. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how did you remember that you had so testified before the Committee, that the occurrence was at the breakfast and not at the dinner table? A. How do I remember?

Q. Yes; how did it occur to you that you had so stated it? A. I remembered when I was thinking—going into the details, and thinking what I had said.

Q. You remembered then, without having examined the testimony, or having been told to you that you had so stated, that it took place at the breakfast table? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, when did you first remember that you had so stated that fact? A. When I was thinking over my testimony that I was going to give here.

Q. Well, where were you when you were thinking it over? A. Sometimes I was at Mrs. Purdy's; and when I was thinking it over was when I was with Judge Porter, and Mr. Shearman and the stenographer.

Q. Will you state now how you happened to recall the fact that you had stated before the Committee that the difficulty was at the breakfast, and not at the dinner-table? A. Why, by thinking it over in my mind, by putting my mind on the subject.

Q. Well, Mrs. Tilton left the table, I understood you to say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Left the table crying? A. Left the table crying; yes, Sir.

Q. Sobbing pretty hard? A. Well, she was crying; the tears were rolling down her cheeks.

Q. Where did she go? A. She went into the front parlor.

Q. What did she do there? A. Sat down and played a little—some little plaintive air on the piano.

Q. She went and played on the piano, did she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long did she remain there? A. She remained there some little time, until after the occurrence that happened on that occasion.

Q. She did not go there until after the occurrence happened, did she? A. What, Sir?

Q. She did not go there until the occurrence had happened, did she? A. She went there a few minutes after she sat down to the table with Mr. Tilton.

Q. How long did she remain there? A. In the parlor?

Q. Yes. A. We remained there all the morning, pretty near.

Q. All the morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what time did you leave the parlor? A. Oh! I could not state exactly what time.

Q. How? A. It was some time in the—no, it was not in the morning; it was after dinner. No, Sir; I must not get those mixed up.

Q. No. A. I was thinking about the occurrence happening at breakfast; it was at dinner.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. After this all happened?

Q. Yes. A. We remained there some time.

THE STORMY INTERVIEW IN THE PARLOR.

Q. Now, what occurred whilst you were in the parlor, after you left the dinner table, if it were the dinner table? A. Shall I go right along, relating all that occurred?

Q. Yes. A. The first thing that occurred was my rushing in the parlor and telling Mr. Tilton that he should not damn Mrs. Tilton for my sake, and the next thing that occurred, he knocked me down.

Q. Is that all that you have to state? A. Oh! no, Sir, a great deal more.

Q. Why don't you state it? A. And then, the next thing that occurred after he knocked me down, "Why," he says, "Bessie, my dear, you tripped and fell, didn't you." I then turned around and asked him if he was a fool, or if he thought I was. He then sat down in a chair and said, "Oh, Bessie, my dear, my gray hairs are going down in sorrow to the grave. No, my dear, you are mistaken in the woman in whom you have put so much confidence." Mrs. Tilton spoke up and said, "Why should not Bessie have confidence in me? She has no protector in you; you offered to run her"—and then he turned around and put his hands under his arms [illustrating] and said, "Bessie, my dear, did I ever offer to ruin you in word, shape or form, or take any liberties with you?" Said I, "Yes, you did. Do you remember the time Horace Greeley was there, in 1869?" Then I referred to the other time.

Mr. Beach—Tell it all.

Mr. Fallerton—Tell it all. A. I referred—

Q. Tell us what you said? A. In 1838; those two occasions.

Q. What did you say when you referred to it? A. Why, when he came to my bed and asked me about amities, if I wouldn't like to be married.

Q. You went over that, did you? A. I said, "Do you remember that?"—those two occasions that he came to me; that is what I said to him.

Q. Go on and state all that was said. I want you to give the whole account of it? A. Yes, Sir; and then he said—then Mrs. Tilton said, "You know you offered to ruin her, and you said that she was your superior," and he says, "Why Bessie, my dear, I hope that you"—emphasizing the "you" particularly [laughter] "that you don't presume to think that you are my superior." And I said that it was true the Lord had not endowed me with his literary ability, as a writer of poetry and prose, but as far as my moral character was concerned I thought I was very much his superior; and he said that the fact of the business was—the matter was, Elizabeth was so fond of—was so accustomed to having men fondle her legs and bosoms that she judged him by herself, and that the story was a wicked—an infernal lie.

Q. Which story? A. Why, about his having confessed to Mrs. Tilton that he offered to ruin me; it was all Mrs. Tilton's getting up, all her fabrication.

Q. Is that all that was said there then? A. Then he said what I have stated in my direct examination.

Q. Well, I want you to state it again, please. A. And then he called my attention to the red lounge and said; "Do you see that red lounge? Time and time again I have seen Henry Ward Beecher and Elizabeth having sexual intercourse on that red lounge," and then drew my—called my attention to the red chair; "not only on the lounge but in the chair;" and Mrs. Tilton says, "Oh Theodore! Theodore! how can you tell that child such base lies!"

Q. Is that all? A. That was all at that time; then I think Mrs. Tilton and I left the parlor.

Q. Where did you go when you left the parlor? A. We went up stairs. Mrs. Tilton went in the bedroom, and then he came up stairs and asked to see me, and took me in his room.

Q. Now just pause there. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you quite sure that Mr. Tilton said that he had seen sexual intercourse? A. Oh! quite sure; yes, Sir.

Q. There is no doubt about that? A. There is no doubt about that; no, Sir.

Q. Said he had been a witness to it, did he? A. He said he had seen; those are the words he used.

Q. Well, did you say anything in reply to that? A. No, Sir; I did not say a word.

Q. Not a word? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, when he came up and said he wanted to see you, what did you do? A. I sat down in the chair or on the lounge.

Q. Did you go anywhere? A. I went in his room; he said that he wanted to see me. He took me in the room and shut the door, and I think we both sat down.

Q. What room was it? A. In the second-story bed-room; sometime after that he used it for his study, a little while.

Q. Shut the door? A. Shut the door; yes, Sir.

Q. Did he lock it? A. I don't remember, Sir, whether he locked it, or not.

Q. Would not you remember whether he locked the door or not? A. I don't remember, Sir, whether he locked it or not. I remember his shutting it.

Q. How? A. I remember his having shut the door, but whether he locked it or not—

Q. After he got in that door, who spoke first, you or he? A. He spoke.

Q. What did he say? A. He began by saying this—what he had seen—that he had seen Mr. and Mrs. Beecher—Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Use his own language, if you can; you did before. A. The first words he said, "Do you wonder that I am miserable and unhappy?" and then he related this, what I have stated before.

Q. One moment. He said, "Do you wonder that I am miserable and unhappy?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you reply anything? A. I never said a word, because he talked right on so fast he didn't give me a chance, and I don't think I would have said a word, anyway.

Q. It was only for the want of a chance, then. Now, will you be kind enough to tell me what he next said? A. After he got through describing about the lounge?

Q. No, no; after he said, "Do you consider that I am miserable and unhappy," I want you to continue on and use his language as near as you can recollect, and tell us all that he said? A. Well, I have spoken about what he said about the red lounge. He said the same thing over again.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, please don't say that, but tell us what he did say, and use his language as near as you can? A. He said that he had seen Henry Ward Beecher and Elizabeth having sexual intercourse on that lounge, and in that chair, time and time again, and not only with Mr.—, and then he mentioned Mr. Bates' name, and Dr. Carroll Dunham's name, and Mr. Ovington's name in conjunction with Mr. Beecher, that not only had she had sexual intercourse with Mr. Beecher, but with these three gentlemen that I have named. Then—

Q. Now—well you may go on. A. Then he said that Mr. Beecher preached to a dozen or twenty of his mistresses every Sabbath, naming two ladies in the congregation.

Q. Well, you needn't name them. A. No, Sir; I wasn't going to. I said "naming;" he named them.

Q. Well, go on. A. And that little Paul was not his child, and that he did not claim any of his children except Florence.

Q. Now, reflect and take your own time so as to give me all that you can recollect he said in that room before you left it. A. Yes, Sir; and then I think the last that he said was that even Mrs. Tilton's own mother—calling her "grandma"—he had knelt down to her, and she had put her hands on his head and said, "Theodore, what a magnanimous man you have been."

Q. Of whom was he speaking then? A. He was speaking of grandma, as he called her.

Q. And whom did he— A. Mrs. Morse, Mrs. Tilton's mother.

Q. Mrs. Morse, he said, used that language? A. He spoke of his grandma, meaning Mrs. Tilton's mother, meaning Mrs. Morse.

Q. That was the way he usually designated her, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In his familiar intercourse with her he called her "grandma;" didn't he? A. Sometimes he called her "grandma," and sometimes "Mrs. Morse."

Q. Well, you called her "grandma," didn't you? A. I called her grandma?

Q. Did you not? A. No, Sir, I called her Mrs. Morse always.

Q. Now, I want you to be a little particular, and see if you can recollect anything else that he said in this place? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can, just at this moment.

Q. You do recollect, however, that he charged that Mr. Ovington and Mr. Dunham—Dr. Dunham—and Mr. Bates had had sexual intercourse? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you ever stated that he didn't charge them with sexual intercourse? A. That he didn't do so?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, let us refer to your testimony before the Committee again—do you recollect what you said upon that subject before the Committee? A. I think that I—

Mr. Shearman—Wait a moment; wait a moment; of course the gentleman will give the witness the precise words she said to the Committee.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Q. What did you say before the Committee upon that subject?

RECRIMINATIONS BETWEEN COUNSEL.

Mr. Shearman—We object to that, if your Honor please. Wait a moment. The witness's attention must be called to the precise words, the time and place; it is a well-settled rule.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, there never was a rule ever heard of to that effect before to-day. I am very sorry that the gentleman is not familiar with elementary law; I think you must refer to something in Plymouth Church; it is not in our law books, at all events.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps the witness would need to look at the book. Show the witness the book.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly not, Sir; I am on the cross-examination, and I am asking what she said at a certain time, on a certain subject.

Mr. Shearman—Heretofore, if your Honor please, you have ruled against us, and rightly—I beg your Honor not to understand us as complaining, because your Honor was perfectly right in so ruling—

Mr. Fullerton—I am glad your Honor is indorsed.

Mr. Shearman—It has been so ruled twenty times on this trial.

Judge Neilson—I have not ruled on that point.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not contradicting any witness.

Judge Neilson—I understand. Does this witness remember, without the aid of the book, what she said on that point; if so, she can tell?

Mr. Shearman—Well, it is not intended, if your Honor please, for the purpose of contradicting; and, otherwise, it has no relevancy; otherwise it is hearsay.

Judge Neilson—The occasion is fixed, because she was only once before the Committee, and the time equally is understood.

Mr. Shearman—That is right.

Judge Neilson—And, now, what was stated on that occasion—the substance of the words must be stated.

Mr. Fullerton—Not at all.

Mr. Shearman—I say that is the rule.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no such rule.

Mr. Shearman—Oh! well, now; it is perfectly absurd for us to talk about elementary principles. It is just as well settled as anything can be, and we can produce a decision in the Court of Appeals—I am inclined to think Judge Fullerton was on the bench, certainly Judge Porter was on the bench. Although it is elementary, it was referred to even in the Court of Appeals.

Mr. Beach—I think that throws some doubt on the decision.

Mr. Fullerton—If I ever made such a decision I want to beg pardon for it and be forgiven as quickly as possible.

Mr. Shearman—There is place for repentance.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, there is no such decision on the face of the earth, in any book of the law.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think the first question is to ask whether she remembers what she said before the Committee on that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—That is just what I do ask her.

Judge Neilson—No; I don't remember.

Mr. Morris—That is the exact question.

Judge Neilson—You asked her what she said.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; what did you say before the Committee on that subject?

Judge Neilson—Ask her "Do you remember"—if she don't remember saying so. [To the witness]: Do you remember what you said on that subject?

The Witness—The words I used in regard to Mr. and Mrs. Beecher's crime—Mr. Beecher's and Mrs. Tilton's crime was "adultery;" I think I said that he said they committed adultery.

Judge Neilson—He calls your attention more especially to what was said as to those other gentlemen. A. That is what I think I said before the Committee?

Judge Neilson—But, as to those other gentlemen. A. That she had committed adultery with those three gentlemen, and I think that is the way I stated it before the Committee.

Q. Now, I will ask you to look at the book again; look at the top of the page there, and see if that refreshes your recollection as to what you testified before the Committee?

Mr. Porter—To what part do you call her attention?

Mr. Fullerton—The top of the page there; the last page.

Mr. Porter—[Looking at the book in the witness's hands.] She had better look where it is, than where it is not.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if she don't look where it is, it is her own fault, for I have not pointed it out to her.

Mr. Porter—Excuse me.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! I have not pointed the place you wanted me to point out.

Mr. Porter—You have not pointed the place where she did speak on that subject.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is what I propose to do.

Mr. Porter—Well, do so; but not under pretense that it is the witness's statement.

Mr. Fullerton—That word "pretense" is unbecoming you, my learned friend.

Mr. Porter—Not at all; in its application.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask her to point out what she there said before the Committee; there is no pretense about it.

Mr. Porter—At that time?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, at that time; I don't refer to any other time; I am not misleading the witness at all.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness]: Well, then, aided by the paper you have before you, thus assisted, are you able to say what you then told the Committee?

A REFERENCE TO CONFESSIONS AT THE INTERVIEW.

The Witness—This is the correct statement that I made before the Committee; and it says here, "he said she had confessed to him that she had been criminally intimate with Mr. Beecher;" he never said to me that Mrs. Tilton—

Q. Never mind; I am not asking you that.

Mr. Shearman—That is not the passage.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the passage at all. "Did he state any reason for supposing"—just read from there.

The Witness—Well, what is it you are trying to get at—"did he state"—

Mr. Fullerton—Does that recall to your recollection what you stated before the Committee on that subject?

Mr. Porter—If you will let me see, Miss Turner, what he is showing you.

The Witness—This is what he drew my attention to: "Did he state any reason for supposing she had been criminally intimate with other men than those named."

Mr. Fullerton—And what did you answer to that question?

The Witness—Well, if this is my answer, it is "no."

Q. Well, did you so answer to that question? A. Well, he only named these three men and Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, what three men were referred to there? A. Dr. Carroll Dunham, Mr. Bates and Mr. Ovington.

Q. Well, was that question put to you and did you give that answer? A. If this is all right, I suppose it must be so.

Q. Have you no recollection upon the subject? A. I cannot give in just the words that I stated this before the Committee; I could not say; I am not able to recall just the way I related it to the Committee, Sir.

Q. Well, do you think now, that you told the Committee that Mr. Tilton said that those other three gentlemen had committed adultery with Mrs. Tilton? A. I think I did, Sir.

Mr. Porter—You will find it at the bottom of that page; two pages before.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will find it without any assistance. I don't find but one thing at a time, Sir. [To the witness]: Now, will you turn to the other page here—~~there~~—and see if that refreshes your recollection as to what you stated before the Committee.

The Witness [reading]: "By Mr. Winslow—Did it hurt you, when he knocked you down?"

Q. No, no, read on until you come to that subject, referring to these three men? A. Read it out loud?

Q. No. Read it to yourself until you come to it? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect saying this very well, "what a ridiculous thing that —" "Yes, Sir, it hurt me fearfully." "Beane, my dear, you hurt yourself, didn't you?"

Mr. Beach—Oh! it is not about that.

The Witness, [Reading]: "What a ridiculous thing that was, as though I had tripped and banged my own head."

Mr. Fullerton—No, not about your tripping. Read it until you come to these three persons, Mr. Bates, Dr. Dunham and Mr. Ovington.

Mr. Porter—"Mr. X, Mr. Y, and Mr. Z."

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, represented by those letters there.

The Witness—Mr. X, and Mr. Y and Z, meant these three gentlemen; is that what you mean, Sir?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, does that refresh your recollection as to what you said before the Committee with reference to these three gentlemen? Read it and see if it refreshes your recollection?

The Witness—I stated before the Committee these three gentlemen that he had said she had sexual intercourse with, and it is put in the form of X, Y and Z. I gave the names before the Committee.

Q. And then you were asked this question, "Did he state any reason for supposing that she had been criminally intimate with the other men that he named?" and you stated "No," you say? A. I said that was the way it was here.

Q. Yes, and don't you remember of so answering? A. He did; he told me that she had had intercourse with these other men.

Q. Now, do you remember of so answering before the Committee? A. I cannot say just how I answered the Committee, Sir, or remember just the precise words that I used.

Q. Now, when you were in the room with him, and he was relating this circumstance, or these things to you, did he say anything to the effect that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to this adultery with Mr. Beecher? A. He never said to me that she had confessed, but he said to me that he saw them—with Mr. Beecher—he didn't say that he saw her with these three other men.

Q. I am not talking about the three men; now, leave those out. Did he say anything to the effect that Mrs. Tilton had confessed the adultery with Mr. Beecher to him? A. At that time when I was in the room with him?

Q. Yes? A. I have a slight recollection of it, but I am not sure.

Q. Well, just state as near as—Your best recollection upon that subject. What did he say. A. I have stated what he said as near as I could recollect.

Q. No, upon that subject of confessing; you say you have a slight recollection; please state, as well as you can, what he did say? A. I don't think I can state it, Sir.

Q. Well, state the substance of it. A. No, Sir; I don't think I can.

Q. Well, give us your best recollection. A. What he said about them was, as I remember it, that she had been what I repeated before about Mr. Beecher; that is what he said at that time.

Q. That is another subject, now, Miss Turner; we have gone all over that, and I have come to a different subject. I am now asking you as to what he said as to Mrs. Tilton's having theretofore confessed to him having committed adultery with Mr. Beecher? A. You want me to say whether I remember that he said that Mrs. Tilton had confessed adultery to him?

Q. Yes. A. I am not clear about that; I can't say, Sir.

Q. Well, have you no recollection upon the subject? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can say.

Q. Have you no recollection upon the subject?

Mr. Tracy—That is about the sixth time the question has been answered.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; I object. This is an untimely interference.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to an answer.

Mr. Tracy—She has answered.

Mr. Fullerton—She has not answered; I submit that she has not answered, and your Honor ought to repress this interposition of the counsel.

Judge Neilson—I understand what she said.

Mr. Fullerton—They think it is an opportune time to come to her aid.

Mr. Tracy—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—One moment—I understand what she said very well. I think the counsel has a right to interrogate, and to keep on interrogating, until he gets at all the recollection the witness has got on the point, less or more.

Mr. Tracy—The question is when a witness says "I cannot recollect;" when she changes it in answer to another question and says "I can't remember;" and when she changes again and says "I have no recollection"—

Mr. Fullerton—She has not answered that.

Mr. Tracy (continuing)—Whether that is not an answer to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—She has not said that.

Judge Neilson—I think counsel is entitled to further answer, so that it may certainly appear what, if any, recollection the witness has got. She has gone no further than to say that she is not clear in regard to that.

Mr. Tracy—I appeal to the record.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, the record had better not be discussed. Now, will you tell me whether you had any recollection—

Judge Neilson—There was a faint intimation that she has some recollection, and therefore the counsel has a right to pursue it and see what it is, if anything. That is proper, Mr. Tracy.

A FAINT RECOLLECTION THAT CONFESSIONS WERE MENTIONED.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you any recollection upon the subject at all? A. I have, as I stated first, Sir, a faint recollection of something about a confession, but I am not sure about it; that is all that—the only way I can answer you, Sir.

Q. Can you not state something that he said upon the subject of a confession? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. Did he state in substance that Mrs. Tilton had made a confession to him, although you cannot recall the words that he used? A. I have a faint idea—a faint recollection—that there was something about a confession.

Q. A confession of Mrs. Tilton? A. Confessions; I won't say whether it was Mrs. Tilton's or whose confessions, but that word is kind of in my mind with regard to the subject, and that is all I can say.

Q. Well, you had nothing to do but to pay attention to what he was saying then, had you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You recall very distinctly the story of the lounge and Mr. Beecher and the other three gentlemen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have been able to tell us what you suppose were the exact words used by Mr. Tilton upon that occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How does it happen that what he said upon the subject of confession is so faint in your recollection? Can you tell? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Is there any reason why you should not recall that with the same particularity that you did the other things? A. I assure you I am not purposely avoiding recollection. I would tell you if I recollected it, just as readily as I answered—as I told you about the other.

Q. Look at the part that I will mark here [showing book to witness] look at that which I have marked now, and see whether you gave such evidence. A. If this is the way that I stated it before the Committee it was a mistake, because he never said to me that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to him her criminality with Mr. Beecher, but had said to me that he saw them.

Q. Yes; that is a mistake, is it? A. If this is the way it is given it is a mistake; he never said to me that Mrs. Tilton confessed to him, but he told me that he saw them—saw Mr. Beecher; he did not say he had seen these other men.

Q. Was this question put to you before the Committee: "Did he, at any time on this day, say that she had made any confession to him in regard to Mr. Beecher," and did you answer as follows: "He said she had confessed to him that she had been criminally intimate with Mr. Beecher"? A. I can't remember just what questions were put to me before the Committee, or just how I answered them; but if I answered them that way it was a mistake, because he never said to me that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to him, but told me before her, in her presence, that he had seen Mr. Tilton—Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, you need not repeat it—was this question put to you: "When was that?" and did you answer, "This all occurred on that one day that we went back; in the Fall of 1870?"

Mr. Porter—I assume Mr. Fullerton intends to ask whether she did not say also that Mrs. Tilton was present when he said that, and she said: "Oh! Theodore, Theodore, how can you tell that child such base lies——"

Mr. Fullerton—I don't expect to pass over anything.

Mr. Beach—Well, put the whole question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will put the whole question although it will burden the record. [To the witness.] Was this question put to you: "Did he at any time on this day say she had made any confession to him in regard to Mr. Beecher?" and did you answer, "He said she had confessed to him that she had been criminally intimate with Mr. Beecher; she was present when he said that, and she said, 'Oh, Theodore, how can you tell that child such base lies!' and then she burst out crying?" A. She said, "Oh, Theodore"——

Q. No; was that question put to you, and did you give that answer? A. I said, Sir, that I could not remember just what question was put to me before the Committee, or just how I answered it; but if I answered it as it is there I was mistaken.

Mr. Fullerton—Mark this "to be continued," Sir, "in our next."

The Court then adjourned till eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning.

FIFTY-FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

BESSIE TURNER'S CROSS-EXAMINATION ENDED.

THE MORNING SPENT IN CROSS-QUESTIONING—
TESTIMONY OF GEORGE L. PERKINS IN REFERENCE TO MR. AND MRS. BEECHER'S ABSENCE FROM TOWN ON AN IMPORTANT OCCASION—GEORGE S. SEDGWICK AND CECIL CAMPBELL SWEAR TO HAVING SEEN MR. TILTON WALK WITH MRS. WOODHULL DURING THE ROSSEL PARADE—JOHN C. SOUTHWICK TESTIFIES THAT TILTON DENIED THE STORY OF MR. BEECHER'S ADULTERY WITH MRS. TILTON.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1875.

The manner of Miss Turner on the stand differed in no sense from her demeanor on preceding days, already fully described in THE TRIBUNE. She appeared to less advantage in the early part of today's cross-examination in consequence of misapprehension of the questions put to her. She was compelled to admit two or three discrepancies between her statements before the Committee and on the present trial; but explained, as she had done before, that she had gone before the Committee unexpectedly, without preparation, and had testified at random as to matters she had seen and heard and had been told, chiefly by Mrs. Tilton. Now, she had testified after preparation and thought, and had been restricted to what she knew of her own knowledge. Once or twice during the proceedings the witness was afforded opportunity again to imitate Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Morse, and she did so in the same language and with the same gestures as on former occasions, and with equal effect on the audience.

Toward the close of the cross-examination Mr. Fullerton made a faint attack upon the witness's character, evidently with the design of showing that some of her associations had been bad, and that she lied in the fabrication of documents which had been produced in evidence. The first of these inquiries brought out a noteworthy fact still further illustrating the singular domestic affairs of Mr. Tilton's household; and the second finally led to the introduction on the cross-examination of evidence which for weeks past the defense have vainly tried to get into the case. The first incident alluded to was the introduction of the fact that Miss Turner had been employed several years ago at a place called the Dollar Store, which did not at that time bear a very enviable reputation, and that she had been discharged from that employment. Mr. Tilton during this part of the examination was handing written questions to Mr. Fullerton, and the witness, probably supposing that he was suggesting these unpleasant questions, took her little revenge by telling promptly that she was employed at the Dollar Store and was discharged, and then adding immediately that at the time she was a boarder in Mr. Tilton's house. The second incident occurred at the close of Miss Turner's testimony, and was its fitting climax. Her two letters to Mrs. Tilton exculpating Mr. Tilton—denying in guarded and equivocal terms the stories of insults and outrages he had offered the witness—were shown to her; and she was finally asked if the letters thus signed stated truth or falsehood. The purpose, of course, was to commit her to an unequivocal admission that they were falsehoods and that she had deliberately signed falsehoods. She gave a qualified answer, but the plaintiff's counsel insisted on striking out the qualification and letting the positive "Yes" stand as her answer. Mr. Porter and Mr. Tracy sprang to the rescue, and nearly half an hour was spent in an earnest and at times acrimonious debate, in which Judge Neilson finally took part, and suggested another form of question, which acted like oil upon the troubled waters. It was adopted and put by Mr. Fullerton. It was in effect an inquiry "Why, if her letter was not true, she had signed it?" The witness instantly and unhesitatingly cried out, "Because I loved Mrs. Tilton and I wanted to do it, because she said if I would put my name to that paper I would get Mr. Tilton out of all his difficulties with Henry C. Bowen; that that story had got to Mr. Bowen's ears, and that all that was needed was my signature, and my retraction of that." The counsel for the plaintiff made no attempt to stop her, and thus she injected into the case the very evidence as to the purpose with which the letters were manufactured, which the defense have been using their best arts to develop. The counsel for the plaintiff made no attempt to stop her, and adjourned without moving to strike out the improper answer.

The cross-examination of Miss Turner was not resumed after recess. Mr. Hill stated that he was obliged to call his next witness out of order as the gentleman was compelled to leave the city. George L. Perkins of Norwich, Conn., then testified that in the first part of June, 1873, he saw Mr. and Mrs. Beecher leave an eastward bound Boston and Albany train at Worcester, Mass. He had fixed the date by means of a memorandum, and believed it to have been the 4th day of June, 1873.

Two witnesses were examined to refute the statement of Mr. Tilton that while in the Communitist parade in honor of Rosell he had walked arm in arm with John Swinton, instead of being with Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin. George S. Sedgwick testified that he saw Mr. Tilton marching in the procession on Dec. 17, 1871, and that Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin were walking on either side of him. Cecil Campbell gave like testimony, except that at the time when he saw the procession Mrs. Woodhull, Miss Claflin and Mr. Tilton were riding in a carriage. The testimony of these witnesses was very brief and their cross-examinations lasted only a few moments. Mr. John C. Southwick, a partner of Jackson S. Schultz, was the next witness. His testimony carried the jury back once more to The Golden Age times and to Mr. Tilton's declarations concerning Mrs. Woodhull, and his statements about the scandal published in her paper. The witness related the history of the establishment of The Golden Age, and told of the changes in the paper and its supporters, said to have been caused by the publication of Mr. Tilton's life of Mrs. Woodhull. When the witness reproached him for his course in this respect, Mr. Tilton had replied: "I took an oath before Almighty God when I was oppressed by Henry C. Bowen that I would help the first oppressed creature that came to me, and the first one I met was Victoria Woodhull. And I believe she is a natural born lady and as pure as an angel." Mr. Southwick added that soon after the publication of the Woodhull scandal Mr. Tilton said to him, "I cannot deny it." On being asked whether the story was true the plaintiff said: "Mr. Beecher has not committed adultery with my wife, but I cannot deny the story, for there is a wheel within a wheel." Gen. Tracy then tried to have admitted the statements made to the witness by Mr. Franklin Woodruff in reference to the status of The Golden Age. A long argument ensued, Mr. Beach protesting most earnestly against the evidence. Mr. Evarts sought to have it admitted on the ground that Mr. Woodruff was acting as Mr. Tilton's agent in the matter. Judge Neilson finally admitted it, and reserved his decision on Mr. Beach's motions to have it struck out, after the witness had given it. By way of cross-examination, Mr. Beach read a highly complimentary note to Mr. Tilton, signed by the witness and by several other gentlemen, congratulating Mr. Tilton on the success of his paper. The witness acknowledged that he had signed the note, and the cross-examination ended at the hour of adjournment.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MISS TURNER'S CROSS-EXAMINATION CONTINUED.

The Court opened, pursuant to adjournment, at 11 a. m. yesterday.

Miss Beebe Turner was recalled on cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—Is Judge Porter in yet?

Mr. Shearman—Judge Porter is here.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, shall we proceed?

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir; Mr. Evarts will not be here.

THE INTERVIEW IN MR. TILTON'S STUDY.

Mr. Fullerton—At the close of the examination yesterday, Miss Turner, we were speaking of what occurred in the room where Mr. Tilton took you and had a conversation about Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you state how long you were with Mr. Tilton in that room? A. I was with him until dark; we went up after we had had that scene in the parlor after dinner; and I was with him until dark, I think—some little time; we were some little time in the parlor.

Q. Well, that does not answer my question. How long do you think it was that you were in the room up-stairs holding this conversation? A. Well, I will have to see. I will have to think how long we were in the parlor first. We went in there directly after dinner, but I guess we were there—we were there some little time, and then we went up-stairs; and he kept me there until dark, nearly dark.

Q. Well, now, please tell me about how long you were up there? A. Well, I could not tell just exactly how long; we were there from the time we left the parlor until nearly dark.

Q. Well, how long was it? I don't ask you to tell exactly; but give us your best judgment. A. It may have been two or three hours.

Q. Do you think it was as long as that? A. I am not sure.

Q. Well, what is your best judgment as to the time? A. It was some time.

Q. I am aware of that. A. I could not say whether it was three hours or four hours.

Q. Well, was it as much as three hours? A. It may have been.

Q. Do you think it was as much as three? A. I won't say just how many hours it was.

Q. Now, Miss Turner, you are aware that I don't ask you to say just how many hours; I ask your best judgment as to how long a time you were up there with him? A. Well, it was a long time.

Q. Yes; how long? A. Well, that, I say, I cannot tell you exactly.

Q. About how long? A. Well, it may have been two hours; it may have been three hours.

Q. Do you think it was two hours? A. I said I could not say just whether it was two hours or three hours.

Q. What is your best judgment upon the subject, as near as you can recollect it now? A. I won't say just how long I was there; I know it was some time.

Q. I don't ask you to say just how long? A. Why, I thought that was what you were trying to get at—just how long I was there.

Q. No, I ask your best judgment about the length of time you were up there; I don't want you to be exact, but give us the best of your recollection; that is all? A. Well, we were there some time; I can't say just how long.

Q. Well, do you think it was about two hours, or three hours? A. It may have been two hours; it may have been three hours; it may have been longer.

Mr. Beach—[In an undertone to Mr. Fullerton.] Make her answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Will you come nearer than that? A. No, Sir.

Q. No nearer than to say it may have been so long a time? A. It may have been two hours; it may have been three hours.

Q. Well, may it have been less than two hours? A. It might have been less than two hours; it might have been more.

Q. Might it have been less than one hour? A. Well it was more than one hour.

Q. Now, then, that is your best judgment, is it—that it was more than one hour? A. My best judgment is that I won't say how long it was, but I think it was more than an hour.

Q. You think it was more than an hour; very well; let it stand at that. Now, can you give us any more of the conversation that was had during that hour (if that were the length of time) that you have already given? A. Oh! I didn't say an hour was the length of time.

Q. Well, you say it was more than an hour? A. It was more than an hour.

Q. Very well. A. You are fixing it at an hour.

Q. Well, I will alter the question and ask you whether you can give more of the conversation which took place during that period which was more than hour? A. Yes, Sir, I can; but I would rather not tell the rest of what was said, if you will excuse me; I would rather not repeat it.

Q. Well, I have asked you to tell the whole of it? A. He told me what sexual intercourse meant.

Q. In the presence of Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton was not there in that room; no, Sir; we had left Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Left Mrs. Tilton. Well, what else did he say? A. No, Sir; you will have to excuse me; I could not tell you.

Q. You would not tell me? A. I can't tell you, Sir; no, Sir. I could tell you, but I would rather not.

Q. Very well. You learned at that time, then, what sexual intercourse was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And from him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what else did he say about Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher during that period, which was more than an hour? A. I can't remember that he said anything more than I told you yesterday.

Q. Well, what was this period of more than an hour devoted to? A. Devoted to what I told you yesterday.

Q. Well, it didn't take an hour to tell that, did it? A. I could not tell you just how long it did take, Sir.

Q. Can't you tell me something that Mr. Tilton said during that period of time? A. Nothing more than I told you yesterday, and in regard to what he described to me about what I have named; that took a long time.

Q. Did he say anything in that conversation to the effect that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to him, or pretended that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to him? A. No, Sir, he did not.

Q. Not a word upon the subject of confession? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Was there nothing said down-stairs in the parlor before you went up-stairs about confession? A. Mrs. Tilton's confession?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir.

Q. He did not accuse Mrs. Tilton then—? A. No, Sir; he said that he had seen her—

Q. I understand; but nothing said about confession upon her part? A. No, Sir; not anything.

Q. Well, do you now, after reflection, recollect that you said anything to the effect that Mr. Tilton said, in the conversation in the parlor or up-stairs, that Mrs. Tilton had confessed to him her adultery with Henry Ward Beecher? A. Have I a recollection after the—

Q. No; of having said that before the Committee. A. No, Sir; no, Sir; the only way that I can account for having had that recollection for a moment yesterday, although I have thought of it since I got out of this room, that if I got—had any recollection or idea about Mrs. Tilton's confessions, it was from the papers; I had seen so much about Mrs. Tilton's con-feeling to one and another, and that is the way that I must have gotten my idea; that is, if I said that before the Committee— if the report is true as I gave it; if that report that is in the book is correct, that is the only way that I can account for having said it.

Q. Have you talked with any one since the adjournment—? A. No, Sir, I have not.

Q. Oh! you haven't heard my question. A. But I knew what it was going to be.

Q. You did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You had better wait until you hear it, for you might be mistaken. A. Excuse me.

Q. Have you talked with any one since the adjournment about your evidence in this case? A. About my evidence?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Have you talked with any one since the adjournment last night about the case at all? A. [Hesitating.] No, Sir; I have said—

Mr. Beach—No matter what you said.

Mr. Fullerton—What is your answer?

Mr. Porter—She said yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I think not. She said, "No, Sir."

Mr. Shearman—She said, yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, repeat your answer and I will understand it? A. I was going on to explain—

Q. I don't ask you to explain; I only want you to answer yes or no, whether you have talked about this case with any one last night? A. I have talked about the case, but not in regard to anything that I was going to say, or anything that I had in my mind about the Committee, or anything of that kind.

Q. Did anybody suggest to you how you must have—? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you think you had better wait until you hear the question? A. Yes, Sir; I will try and wait next time.

Q. Did anybody suggest to you how it happened that you made the mistake if you said that Mr. Tilton accused his wife of adultery—of confessing the adultery before the Committee; did anybody suggest that to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, whom have you talked with since the adjournment last night? A. Whom have I talked with?

Q. Yes, about the case? A. I think Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Shearman, and Mr. Shearman.

Q. Any one else? A. No one else that I can think of now, Sir.

Q. Where did you spend the night? A. At Mrs. Ovington's.

Q. Talk with Mrs. Ovington alone upon the subject? A. Oh, no, Sir.

Q. Who were present when you talked with Mrs. Ovington? A. Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Shearman—Mr. Shearman—

Q. Did you walk out with Mrs. Ovington? A. No, Sir; Mrs. Ovington does not walk out, Sir.

Q. Did you ride out with her? A. With Mrs. Ovington?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you say that if you did testify before the Committee that Mr. Tilton alleged that Mrs. Tilton had confessed her adultery, that you must have fallen into the error by having read statements or newspaper articles upon that subject? A. I said that was where I must have gotten those ideas about that, or that recollection.

Q. Now, do you recollect where you got the ideas from—what source? A. About these confessions?

Q. Yes. A. Why, I saw these confessions in THE TRIBUNE and several other papers that were in the library.

Q. What were they in? A. In Dr. Taylor's institution.

Q. Where was that? A. Down in Beaver, Sir.

Q. How? A. In Beaver. Sir.

Q. In Beaver? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In THE TRIBUNE, were they? A. I don't know whether it was THE TRIBUNE; I looked over several papers there, but I think THE TRIBUNE was among them; THE TRIBUNE and The Herald, and there were several papers there.

Q. Do you recollect from which paper you derived the information? A. No, Sir, I could not say whether it was from THE TRIBUNE or The Herald, or the other papers; they took a great many papers there; the table was full.

Q. Well, do you now recollect that you did testify before the Committee as to those confessions, or alleged confessions, of Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't remember, Sir, just what I testified before the Committee; all that I have to say about it is that if the report is correct—

Q. Well, you have said that once you know; that is on the record. Well, you have thought over all these facts, after you gave your evidence before the Committee, you say? A. Thought over all these facts that I have given here?

Q. Yes. A. Why, no, Sir; I only had ten minutes—

Q. After you were before the Committee, I say you thought over the facts that were within the range of your memory, didn't you? A. No, Sir; not just then—

Q. Just then; I say after—after you were before the Committee? A. No, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Well, you told me yesterday that you were preparing yourself for that— A. Well, but not at that time.

Q. I don't speak before—after. A. About three weeks ago I said when I was preparing.

Q. That is, after your examination before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir; but not just after that.

Q. I don't say just after; I mean to embrace the whole time between your examination before the Committee and the present moment; you have thought it all over, didn't you? A. I have thought it all over since; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, didn't you recall what you testified before the Committee? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; I did not look at what I testified before the Committee.

Q. Didn't you recall it in your own mind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't? A. No, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S MEETING WITH HIS WIFE AT MR. BATES'S.

Q. You have spoken of the visit of Mrs. Tilton to her mother when you discovered Mr. Tilton in the act of rising from his knees? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect the occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where were Mr. and Mrs. Tilton at the time? A. Mr.

and Mrs. Tilton were sitting in Mr. Bates's parlor—front parlor—and Mr. Tilton was just in the act of rising from his knees—sitting down on the chair.

Q. Where were you? A. I was on the stairs.

Q. You could see them distinctly, could you? A. Yes, Sir; I could see them or else I would not have known that he was rising from his knees.

Q. You say he was in the act of rising from his knees? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could you tell distinctly and satisfactorily that he had been upon his knees? A. I should judge so from the position in which he was when I saw him.

Q. Then he was not actually on his knees when you saw him, but in the act of rising from his knees? A. Well, I wish I could show you, then I could tell you better. There was one knee downward the other up—just as you would rise from your knees.

Q. He was in a rising posture, one foot up and the other on the floor? A. If I was a man I could show you.

Q. I think it is lucky you are not; you are better off as you are. Did you hear anything said at that time? A. Well, I had been on the stairs all the time, and he was talking very earnestly to Mrs. Tilton, but I could not say that I heard what he said—I didn't hear what he said, only that he was talking very earnestly.

Q. Couldn't you hear anything that he said? A. No, Sir; I was not standing, all the time that I heard them talking, at the place where I was when I saw him rising from his knees. I was farther up on the stairs, and I kept coming down one step further all the time.

Q. How? A. I kept coming one step further down all the time.

Q. Wherever you were at that time, I want to know if you didn't overhear something that was said? A. No, Sir; I have said that I could not hear, except that he was talking low and in a very earnest tone.

Q. You could not distinguish any words at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Could you see Mrs. Tilton when you stood there. A. Yes.

Q. Could you see Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How far do you think you were from them? A. I was on the stairs and they were in the parlor.

Q. You could have heard if anything was said by Mr. Tilton? A. I might have heard if he had talked louder, but as it was I didn't hear; no, Sir.

Q. Did you testify before the Committee with reference to that interview as follows: "I went with her, and that same night, or the night after, he came around and got on his knees and vowed how much he loved her, and asked her if she would come back to his bosom again, and all that sort of nonsense." A. I remember speaking to the Committee of that occasion—at least I think I do—I don't know exactly; I can't tell just exactly what I told before the Committee.

Q. Read it where it is marked in red there and see if that refreshes your recollection that you did overhear what was said and did state that to the Committee? A. [After looking at the book.] If this is a correct statement I must have said it.

Mr. Beach—Well—

Mr. Fullerton—That is not what I asked you, Miss Turner. After reading that, do you now recollect having said it before the Committee? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect just the words that I used before the Committee.

Q. Now, that is not the question I ask you. A. No, Sir; I don't recollect just what I said.

Q. I didn't ask you that. I don't ask you if you could recollect just what you said. I ask you whether, after reading that, it refreshes your recollection, so that you could say that you did say that before the Committee?

Mr. Beach—Or the substance of it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, that, or in substance that. A. Well, I talked so fast before the Committee that I may have gotten in a great many things and gotten them mixed up, because I know that once or twice the man that was taking notes had to stop me, he could not keep track, the way I was talking.

Q. Do you think you talked so fast as to say you heard something that you didn't hear? A. [After a pause.] Well, I was perfectly truthful, as near as I could be, before the Committee. I didn't try to make up anything or say anything that I did not hear, but I may have got different things mixed together by talking so fast and not having thought over what I was going to say, or knowing anything about going before the Committee some time beforehand.

Q. Well, did you think that that condition of things which you have now intimated led you to say before the Committee that you heard things which you did not hear?

Mr. Shearman—One moment. I object to that question. There has been no foundation laid, there has not been anything shown to the witness which shows that she said she heard it. It is only intimated that she said that Mr. Tilton had said this—not that she had heard it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is a suggestion that I don't think any of us can profit by it.

Judge Neilson—You want to get at the recollection of the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And you frame your question with that view.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; with that view.

Judge Neilson—You ask the witness whether reading that so refreshes her recollection as to enable her to say whether she said that before the Committee, in form or in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; and her reply is that she talked so fast before the Committee that she may have gotten things mixed; and now I ask her if she talked so fast before the Committee as to be led to say that she had heard things that she had not heard.

Judge Neilson—Recurring to your question, which was correct in form, and to which the witness ought to attend, the witness will state to the jury whether, on reading that, it so refreshes her recollection that she can or cannot say whether, before the Committee, she said that, in form or in substance.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, answer that question. A. This refreshes my recollection, so that I can say, by looking at this, that I cannot remember just what I said before the Committee; but, whatever I did say at that time, I was trying to tell the truth, and did, from the best of my recollection at that time.

Q. Well, if you did say that you heard Mr. Tilton say—

Mr. Porter—Have you put your question?

Mr. Fullerton—Not yet.

Mr. Porter—I shall object to that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you may object to that part of it if you like. [To the witness.] Now, if you did say before the Committee that you heard Mr. Tilton ask Mrs. Tilton "to come back to his bosom again, and all that sort of nonsense," was it true?

Mr. Porter—One moment.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to put that question.

A. I think very likely, Sir, it was.

Q. Is that as near as you can come to it? A. I only think so. That is as near as I can come to it. I think very likely that that was the state of facts, that he had asked her to come back to his bosom, yet I could not swear to it.

Q. What makes you think it very likely, if you heard nothing upon the subject? A. Mrs. Tilton may have told me something about it; I don't know.

Q. Is that all that you can say now upon the subject? A. That is all, Sir.

Q. Well, I think you told us something that Mrs. Morse said on that occasion; where was Mrs. Morse when Mr. Tilton was in the act of rising from his knees? A. She was on the stairs two or three steps ahead of me.

Q. Nearer to them, or further from them? A. Further from them.

Q. What occurred after he rose from his knees? A. He got up and was going out— Suppose this was the stairs going up this way [illustrating], and here were Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton coming out, and Mrs. Tilton had hold of his arm, and he looked up—he had his large hat in his hand, and he looked up and said: "Good evening, Grandma." "Oh, Grandma," said she, "you infernal scoundrel! you perfidious wretch! you infernal hypocrite! you infernal scoundrel! I'll 'Grandma' you!"

Q. What did Mr. Tilton reply? A. "Why," he says, "Grandma you seem to be excited." "I'll excite you," said she, "I'll publish you from Dan to Beersheba," and she talked to him all the way going down the steps.

Q. Tell all that she said? A. Well, he went down the steps pretty fast, and she was saying, "I'll publish you from Dan to Beersheba."

Q. That did not prevent her from talking—his speed in going down the steps? A. It might not have prevented her from talking, but it prevented him from hearing,

Q. But it does not prevent you from telling what she said, if you heard it? A. I have told you what she said.

Q. But you say she continued to talk to him all the way going down the steps? A. She kept saying: "I'll publish you from Dan to Beersheba."

Q. Was that the last she said to him? A. That was the last she said.

Q. Have you given us all the reply that Mr. Tilton made to that remark of hers? A. He said: "You seem excited, Grandma."

Q. Was that all? A. That is all that he said there; I don't know what he said afterwards to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Was that all that you heard? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Morse was not in an amiable frame of mind, was she? A. I don't see how she could be.

Q. I do not ask you that; I ask for the fact? A. Well, I don't think she was.

Q. And she spoke angrily? A. I think she did.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton make any reply to Mrs. Morse on that occasion? A. No, Sir; she held her head down and took hold of his arm.

Q. But she had hold of his arm when they came out? A. Well, she kept hold of his arm.

Q. Did Mrs. Morse say anything to Mrs. Tilton about going away? A. Yes, Sir; after Mrs. Tilton had gone down in the parlor, Mrs. Morse said, "Why, Elizabeth,——"

Q. No, no;—— A. I thought you asked me.

Q. I am speaking of the occasion when Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton were going out of the door, and when Mrs. Morse was saying these amiable things to him. A. I don't remember her saying anything to Mrs. Tilton then; her attention was taken up with him.

Q. Did she say anything to Mrs. Tilton at that time about going away? A. Not at that time; but she did before.

Q. Before Mr. Tilton came? A. No, Sir; after he came and was down in the parlor. We saw him come in, and Mrs. Tilton went down to see him, and she came up to get her water-proof cloak, and Mrs. Morse plead with her about going back with him.

Q. She did not wish Mrs. Tilton to go back? A. No, Sir; she did not want her to go back.

Q. Did Mrs. Morse say anything then about Mrs. Tilton getting a divorce? A. At that time?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Not a word upon that subject? A. Not a word, that I remember.

Q. After they arrived at home I understood you to say that Mr. Tilton told Mrs. Tilton that she looked tired and had better go to bed? A. Yes, Sir; he seemed to be pressing her to go to bed.

THE TALK WITH MISS TURNER AFTER THE WIFE'S RETURN.

Q. And after she went to bed he had another talk with you, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was that conversation? A. In the room next to the room that Mrs. Tilton had gone into. They were the two back bedrooms of the second story.

Q. How long did that conversation occupy? A. Well, I think it was between eight and nine o'clock when he came around, and they were talking a long time in the parlor—some little time in the parlor; and then he was talking a long time to me in his room; and after he left me I went into Mrs. Tilton's room where she had gone to bed with her two children; I think it was Alice and Carroll, and I told——

Q. No; don't state that; how long did the talk with you in that room occupy? That is my question. A. I guess he talked over an hour.

Q. With the door closed? A. His door was closed, and so was Mrs. Tilton's door.

Q. The doors of the room in which you were were closed? A. Yes, Sir; they were closed.

Q. Who closed them? A. Mr. Tilton; there was only one door to close.

Q. Well, that door was closed, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During that hour that you were in there were you sitting or standing? A. I think I was sitting.

Q. Was he sitting or standing? A. He was sitting—now, excuse me; it seems to me that he was walking up and down. I think that was the way, but I won't be positive.

Q. Very well. What was said first after you got into that room? State, as near as you can recollect, the substance of what was said first? A. I cannot tell you just how he began to talk, but he told me all about these—

Q. Don't repeat that language, because I want the particulars of that conversation now, as near as you can get at them? A. Well, the particulars were just as I have given them.

Q. Oh! you have not given the particulars of that conversation, Miss Turner? A. Well, it was the same conversation that he had told me before.

Q. Then you can repeat it? A. I was going to do it.

Q. Well, please repeat, as well as you can, the conversation that occurred in that room that night? A. He told me these—

Mr. Beach—Oh! that won't do.

The Witness—I thought you wanted me to tell.

Mr. Tracy—That is right. That is the way she introduces the conversation, and she is going on to repeat it.

Mr. Fullerton—What did he say? A. He said that Paul was not his child, that he did not own any of the children except Florence; and about Mr. Beecher and these three gentlemen.

Q. What about Mr. Beecher? A. Well, that he had seen them.

Q. Go on and tell it, please. A. Must I describe that again?

Q. I want you to tell what the conversation was; all he said. A. Why, he told me that he had seen them having sexual intercourse on the red lounge, time and again, and in the large red chair, and then he spoke of these three gentlemen.

Q. What did he say? A. He said she had sexual intercourse with those three gentlemen.

Q. He stated that distinctly? A. Yes, Sir; very distinctly.

Q. And he used that term with reference to those three gentlemen also? A. Yes, Sir; he did not say that he had seen it, but that she had it.

Q. But as to Mr. Beecher, he said he had seen it himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Time and time again? A. Time and time again.

Q. Did he say where he was when he saw it? A. All he said was, "I have seen them." He did not say where he was; he must have been in the parlor or he could not have seen them.

Q. What else did he say during that hour? A. I cannot recall anything more than I have stated with regard to those three times that he took me in the room.

Q. I am not talking about the three times. Please confine yourself to this one occasion. After he had advised Mrs. Tilton to go to bed, and when he took you into that room, and remained one hour, I want you to tell all that was said on that occasion, as near as you can, during that hour? A. I think I have, Sir.

Q. Well, it didn't take an hour to tell what you have now told, did it? A. [Hesitating.] I think it did. We were there a long time it seemed to me,

Q. Did he say anything about Mrs. Tilton's return from the country in the July previous? A. No, Sir, I don't think—her return in July?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir, I don't think he did.

Q. Do you know where Mrs. Tilton had been the July previous to that conversation before she went to Marietta? A. Well, that was in 1870 he told me this, and in 1869 Mrs. Tilton went to Monticello with Ralph.

Q. Oh! no, I didn't ask you that. I was talking about the July previous to this conversation, which would be July, 1870. Do you know where Mrs. Tilton was in July, 1870? A. Do I know where she was in July, 1870?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir, I don't remember that I do, because I was at Mrs. Putnam's in July, 1870, and come on with Mrs. Tilton in the Fall, so I could not say where Mrs. Tilton was.

Q. Didn't you hear that she was in Cornwall? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Didn't Mr. Tilton tell you in that conversation that Mrs. Tilton had been to Cornwall during the Summer? A. I don't remember anything about that.

Q. Didn't he tell you, upon her return from Cornwall in July of that year, that she said something to him about her relations with Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, I don't remember any such conversation.

Mr. Beach—I am requested by the reporters to ask this witness to speak louder; they say they cannot hear her.

The Witness—It seems to me that I am speaking very loud, but I will try to speak louder.

Mr. Fullerton—In that conversation—this hour's conversation—didn't Mr. Tilton tell you that Mrs. Tilton returned from the country the July previous, and had confessed to him her criminality with Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir, he never told me in his life about Mrs. Tilton confessing anything about criminality with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Nothing upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where did you go after you left that room? A. I went right in Mrs. Tilton's room, or where Mrs. Tilton was sleeping.

THE PLACE WHERE THE LOCKINGS-UP OCCURRED.

Q. Now, will you state, so that we won't fall into any error about it, what room it was that Mr. and Mrs. Tilton were locked up in in 1867, 1868, and 1869, of which you spoke yesterday? A. The times when I particularized?

Q. Yes. A. Each time was in the front bedroom which was connected with the other room by folding door.

Q. By what name is it known in the house? A. By what name? I never knew there was any particular name for it, except it was the front bedroom.

Q. How was it designated in speaking of the room—in the family how was it designated? A. I don't remember that it had any particular designation. It was up in the front room.

Q. When you spoke of it down-stairs—if Mrs. Tilton sent you up to it what would she tell you, or how would she call it? A. If she sent me up to her room, she would say up in her room.

Q. Then it was her room, was it? A. It was both his room and her room.

Q. His room and her room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it so during all 1897, 1898 and 1899? A. That I could not say, Sir, whether they occupied it steadily all these three years, because they changed around.

Q. It was one room always that they were locked up in? A. These three times that I referred to; yes, Sir, it was in that room, but I could not swear that they slept in there all of those three years, because they sometimes slept in both of those rooms, not at the same time, though.

Q. Was it known as the front bedroom? A. The front room. I think that was the way it was spoken of.

Q. The front room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it a bedroom? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is there more than one front room? A. Yes, Sir; there are two front rooms. There is only one front bedroom. There was always a bed in there the year round.

Q. Do you recollect that the room was ever locked whilst you were in the house? A. That that room was ever locked?

Q. Yes? A. Why, yes, Sir; it was locked on these three occasions of which I have spoken.

Q. Don't you know you could not lock it? A. No, Sir; but I know I could lock it?

Q. You have locked it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Frequently? A. That I would not say, Sir, frequently. I have slept in there once or twice.

Q. Don't you know that during all that period those folding doors could not be brought together so as to lock them? A. No, Sir.

Q. And don't you know that when that room was fastened by any person on the inside, it was tied with a string or handkerchief around the knob? A. I never remember seeing a string or handkerchief around the knob.

Q. You are positive, then? A. I am positive it could be locked, because on these three occasions Mrs. Tilton unlocked it when I knocked at the door. I never saw a string or handkerchief around it at all.

Q. Now, when was it, in reference to this last conversation, that Mrs. Tilton went to New-Brunswick? A. Mrs. Tilton went to New-Brunswick, I think, in November. I think it was before this—this time I am speaking of was in December, if I remember correctly.

Q. Well, what is your answer? A. I think Mrs. Tilton went to New-Brunswick in November.

Q. Before this last conversation, or after, which was it? A. I think it was before; I won't be certain, Sir.

MR. TILTON SPEAKS LIGHTLY OF HIS WIFE'S HEALTH.

Q. When was it you had a conversation with Mr. Tilton in regard to Mrs. Tilton's health, when you made a — A. That was after Mrs. Tilton had come from New-Brunswick, that very night.

Q. That very night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whom did she bring with her from New-Brunswick? A. I think she brought Miss Florry Tilton.

Q. Florence? A. I think she brought Florence home.

Q. Don't you remember that she brought Florence home? A. I think she did; I won't be positive, but I think she did.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton reply to this suggestion of yours on that occasion? A. What suggestion, Sir?

Q. That he should treat Mrs. Tilton kindly, that she was ill, &c. A. Oh! he rubbed his face, rubbed his hands through his hair, and said, "Oh, Elizabeth is as well as ever she was," that was her custom, to be crying all the time, and she was crying for her sin with Mr. Beecher. I said it was not natural for people to be crying all the time without they had something to cry about, and he said that she was crying for her sin with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Did you ask him any questions then? A. No, Sir, I was feeling very badly that night; I thought Mrs. Tilton was going to die.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind.

The Witness—I didn't feel like asking him any questions then.

Q. Don't let us feel badly now about it. Did Mr. Tilton say what Mrs. Tilton's sin was? A. No, Sir, that was the remark he made that I have already told you.

Q. Was that the only remark that he made upon the subject? A. He also made a remark that Elizabeth was as well as ever she was.

Q. He did not state when the sin was committed, did he? A. No, Sir, he didn't state anything but what I have told you, Sir.

Q. Nor he didn't state how he described the sin that he spoke of? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he speak of Mrs. Tilton's confession then? A. No, Sir; he never spoke to me about Mrs. Tilton's confession—any confession.

Q. And how long was that conversation? A. I could not say just how long, Sir.

Q. As near as you can recollect? A. I don't recollect, Sir, just how long it was.

MR. BEECHER'S CALL ON DECEMBER 30TH.

Q. I understood you to say that Mr. Beecher called at Mr. Tilton's house on Friday night after Mrs. Tilton's illness? A. He called on the 30th of December, on Friday; yes, Sir.

Q. How do you recollect the day of the month and the week? A. Because Mrs. Tilton was taken very ill on the 25th—the 26th of December, that was Saturday, and Christmas came on Sunday, and Monday, Oliver Johnson called, and Mr. Tilton went with him on Monday morning. On Monday afternoon Mr. Moulton called—

Mr. Fullerton—That is not telling me how you remember it was on Friday.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it is.

The Witness—I was going on to explain how I came to remember it so well, because she was taken sick on Christmas Eve. Sunday was the 25th, Monday was the 26th, Tuesday was the 27th, Wednesday the 28th, and Thursday was the 29th, and Friday was the 30th.

Q. Did you look at any diary in regard to those dates? A. No diary.

Q. You have not consulted any one's diary? A. No, Sir, because it is strongly impressed on my mind, because she was taken sick on Christmas Eve.

Q. Yes. Did you see Mr. Beecher enter the house that night? A. No, Sir, I didn't see him come in.

Q. Where did you first see him? A. I first saw him in Mrs. Tilton's sick room sitting beside the bed.

Q. What occasion had you to go in? A. I don't remember whether I went to get something, or whether I walked into the room.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. I just walked in and walked out again, I think.

Q. What were they doing while you were there? A. I think Mrs. Tilton was talking to him.

Q. Did you see any writing materials there at that time. A. I don't remember about that, Sir; I don't remember seeing any.

Q. Could you hear anything that Mrs. Tilton said? A. No, Sir; I was not listening; I just went in and saw Mrs. Tilton was a kind of half reclining on pillows; she looked very sick.

Mr. Fullerton—No, don't tell us how she looked—I don't ask that. You saw no writing materials, and you heard nothing that was said? A. I don't remember of seeing any writing materials.

Q. How long did you remain there? A. I think I went in—walked in and walked out again; I may have remained, but I don't think that I did.

Q. Did you speak whilst you were in the room? A. Did I speak? no, Sir.

Q. Did you get anything whilst you were in the room? A. Not that I remember, Sir.

Q. Did you do anything whilst you were in the room? A. I don't remember that I did. I said my impression was that I walked in and walked out again; that I may have gone in for something, but I don't remember that I did.

THE PLANS FOR SENDING MISS TURNER TO SCHOOL.

Q. You have spoken of something that was said to you about being sent to school? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. That was in January, I think, Sir, or February; the latter part of January, or the 1st of February.

Q. Who first spoke to you upon that subject? A. Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Mrs. Tilton spoke to you first? A. Let me think a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—[Pausing.] Yes, Sir; I remember after the retraction—after signing that paper Mrs. Tilton spoke to me about it.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] "Retraction" she says. She says "after signing that retraction."

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—After making that retraction.

Mr. Fullerton—What day of the month do you recollect that was? A. The day of the month?—it seems to me it was the 10th or the 11th of January; it was in January some time.

Q. Did any one else speak to you upon the subject of going to school other than Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tilton did.

Q. But Mrs. Tilton spoke to you first about it, did she? A. Yes, Sir, I think she did.

Q. When Mr. Tilton spoke to you upon the subject, what did he say? A. He said that he and Elizabeth were going to do something nice for me; they were going to send me to boarding school; how would I like to go to boarding school? I was very much surprised, and delighted, too. I said I thought that was too good to be true, and he said that he thought of sending me to Steubenville, as he knew the principal of the seminary there; he had been entertained very kindly and hospitably by the Rev. Dr. Reid and his wife, and he thought they would take particular interest in me as I was a ward of his; having known him they would take particular interest in me.

Q. I didn't understand you when you told me what Mr. Tilton first said to you? A. Mr. Tilton first said to me that he and Elizabeth were going to do something nice for me, they were going to send me to boarding school.

Q. Did he say that he and Elizabeth were going to do it? A. Yes, or Elizabeth and he; I don't know which it was.

Q. Didn't he say Elizabeth was going to do something nice for you? A. He said he and Elizabeth.

Q. You recollect that distinctly? A. Yes, Sir, because after he spoke of my being a ward of his.

Q. Didn't he say that she, Mrs. Tilton, had always intended to send you to school? A. No, Sir, he said that "they;" he put the two together.

Q. Be kind enough to look at your evidence upon the subject there [handing paper to witness], and see if it refreshes your recollection upon the subject? A. I don't think it will, because I cannot recollect just what I stated before the Committee.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, there is no harm in trying. A. Ye Sir, I will try, with regard to my—shall I state?

Mr. Fullerton—Please.

The Witness—With regard to my having forgiven him, when I said—

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the subject, Madam.

The Witness—I was going on to explain.

Mr. Fullerton—I know you were, Madam, and that is the reason I stopped you. I want you to testify in regard to what you said before the Committee as to who it was had suggested that you should go to school.

The Witness—I have not read it all yet.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, please read that part of it.

The Witness—This refreshes my memory, inasmuch as I remember about stating to the Committee about their going to send me to school.

Mr. Porter—Please speak a little louder.

The Witness—This refreshes my memory, inasmuch as I remember having said something to the Committee about Mr. and Mrs. Tilton sending me to school—going to boarding school—but just what I said I could not state.

Mr. Fullerton—I will ask you this question—did you testify before the Committee as follows, or in substance as follows: "On one Sunday, I was up in his study, I think, and he told me that Mrs. Tilton was going to do something nice for me. Previous to this time she had said to me: 'Beside how would you like to go to a boarding school?' I said I would like it very much, but that the news seemed too good to be true. She said I might go anywhere I wanted to. I thought that was very nice. At the same time I wondered that night how they got money so quick, because Mr. Tilton had been turned out of The Independent, and he had no money, he said. I did not inquire into that, but I thought of this to myself. After Mrs. Tilton had talked to me this way, Mr. Tilton, one Sunday, up in the study, said that Elizabeth was going to do something nice for me; that she had always intended to send me to school, and that the time had come when she would do it." A. Well, I said, Sir, that Mrs. Tilton spoke to me first about it.

Q. Do you recollect so testifying? A. I cannot recollect just what I said before the Committee.

Q. Did you say this, in substance, before the Committee: "After Mrs. Tilton had talked to me in this way, Mr. Tilton, one Sunday, up in the study, said that Elizabeth was going to do something nice for me; that she had always intended to send me to school; and that the time had come when she would do it." A. I remember, Sir, stating before the Committee about sending me to school, but just the words I don't recollect.

Q. You don't remember of stating what I have just read? A. I don't remember just the words I used, but I remember stating to the Committee about their going to send me to school.

Q. Do you remember stating the words I have just read, in substance? A. I cannot state whether I gave those words or not.

MISS TURNER'S PRAISE OF THE TILTONS.

Q. Did you know a young lady at school by the name of Miss Vance? A. Miss Lou Vance?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know what her first name was. The Witness—Oh! yes, Sir; we were great friends.

Mr. Fullerton—Did she visit Brooklyn while you were at Steubenville? A. Visit Brooklyn? No, Sir, not that I know of. I heard that she—

Q. Was she a schoolmate of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did she say to you whilst you were at school together that she was going to visit Brooklyn? A. I don't remember—it seems to me she said something about coming East. She spoke two Summers about coming East, I think, but whether she said she was coming to Brooklyn, or not, I don't remember distinctly but— No, Sir, I don't think I remember about—

Mr. Fullerton—A little louder.

The Witness—I don't recollect her saying she was coming to Brooklyn particularly, but I recollect her speaking of coming East in the Summer.

Q. Don't you recollect of saying to her, that if she came to Brooklyn she must call upon Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I may have said so, Sir; I don't recall it clearly now.

Q. Didn't you say to her in substance that they were very nice people indeed, and that you were very much attached to them? A. I have often spoken of—

Q. How? A. I have spoken—I spoke very kindly of Mrs. Tilton in the West always, because the last year when I left for school Mrs. Tilton—

Q. No, I don't want that; I want to know if you didn't say that to Miss Vance? A. That Mr. and Mrs. Tilton were nice people?

Q. Very nice people? A. I very likely said so, because I spoke of them very kindly to everybody.

Q. Didn't you say she would be delighted with Mr. Tilton—that he was such a perfect gentleman? A. I may have said so; I don't recollect about it.

Q. Just tax your recollection for a moment, and see whether you did not say so? A. I may have said so; I could not state positively.

Q. Did you not state that you had been brought up by the family, and that Mr. Tilton had always treated you like one of his own children, with the greatest affection? A. To Miss Vance?

Q. Yes. A. I may have said so; I told a great many that.

Q. Then you think you told her amongst others? A. I don't know; I may have done so, but I cannot state positively.

Q. Do you know a Mrs. Jones residing in New York?

Mr. Beach—No, she did live at New York.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—Mrs. Abraham Jones?

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose so.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, she was a lady I boarded with on Staten Island when I first came from the South.

Mr. Fullerton—When was that? A. Oh! that was a long, long time ago.

Q. Well, how long? A. Well, I think when I left the South, as I remember going to her, I must have been between four and five years old, as near as I can remember.

Mr. Beach—How old? A. Between four and five, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—What was the family composed of? A. Mrs. Jones's?

Q. Yes. A. There was her daughter, Emma, and she had a son, Willie; a son and daughter; there were only two children, and Mr. and Mrs. Jones and myself.

Mr. Beach—Was Emma a widow?

Mr. Fullerton—Was the daughter a widow? A. Oh, no, Sir, she was quite young.

Q. Had she a widowed daughter living home with her? A. Mrs. Jones?

Q. Yes. A. She never had but the one daughter, I think, Sir, as I remember.

Q. Did you ever live with Mr. Libby? A. William Libby?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. Let me see. [Pausing]: I left Mrs. Haggerty's—

Mr. Porter—Speak a little louder.

The Witness—Oh! it was some time ago, Sir; I could not say just when.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, about what time was it? A. When I left the South I suppose I was about between four and five, I think I said; and then I boarded for some little time with Mrs. Jones; and then from Mrs. Jones I went to Mrs. Haggerty's on Staten Island; and I ran away from Mrs. Haggerty's with a lady that came to the house and advised me to run away from her because she was very cruel to me, and this lady took me.

Mr. Beach—Who was she?

Mr. Fullerton—Who was the lady? A. The lady; shall I give the name?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—Mrs. Ward; she took me, as I remember, over to Jersey City to a friend of hers, and from Jersey City I went to—there Mr. Libby got me.

Q. How long did you live with Mr. Libby? A. I don't remember, Sir; I don't think I was there long.

Q. As near as you can recollect? A. I could not state; it may have been three or four months, and it may have been longer.

Q. How? A. I could not state positively; it may have been three or four months, and it may have been longer.

Q. Under what circumstances did you leave Mr. Libby? A. I don't remember, Sir, except that I was—I think I was lonesome and lonely out there. They lived in New Jersey, and I think I was dissatisfied; I don't know any other reason.

Q. Did you run away? A. Oh! no, Sir; Mr. Libby took me back to the lady's where he had gotten me first—took me back to Jersey City, if I remember right.

Q. Were you ever anywhere else other than the places you have spoken of? A. You are coming to the time after I left Mr. Libby?

Q. Yes. A. Well, after I left Mr. Libby, this lady that I was staying with, I—

Q. Mrs. Ward? A. No, Sir; this lady that I was staying with was a friend of Mrs. Ward's, where Mrs. Ward had got me.

Q. What was her name? A. Mrs. Sinclair I think her name was.

Q. Where did she live? A. She lived in Jersey City, and Mrs. Sinclair had a sister living here in Brooklyn by the name of Mrs. Jack; she was the wife of Col. Jack, the lawyer; he is dead now; he is not living.

Mr. Beach—When did you come there? A. Then I went to Mrs. Jack's.

Mr. Fullerton—How long did you stay there? A. Well, I guess I lived with them some little time; I don't remember just how long.

HOW MISS TURNER CAME TO LIVE WITH THE TILTONS.

Q. Can you name any other place where you lived at any time before going to Mr. Tilton's? A. Yes, Sir; after I left—would you like to know the way I came to leave Mrs. Jack?

Q. Oh! no. A. Well, after I left Mrs. Jack—or while I was with Mrs. Jack—I met a lady on the street one day that knew me when I was a little girl on Staten Island—Miss Ansell her name was; there are two sisters of them. They are school teachers, and teach music, and teach French, and had a school on Staten Island; and I recognized them one day in the street, and they came to see me two or three times. I told them where I was, at Mrs. Jack's, and they did not like the looks of things there, and they advised me—at least one of them—Miss Ansell advised me to leave Mrs. Jack's and come and stay with her, and she would see about getting me a home, and it was through Miss Ansell that I went to Mr. Tilton's. They put an advertisement in the paper for me.

Q. Now, during this period, were you in a store in New-York? A. During this period?

Q. During any time before you went to Mr. Tilton's? A. I think— Yes, Sir, I was in the Dollar Store.

Q. In Broadway? A. On Broadway; yes, Sir; the Winter Garden Palace, it used to be.

Q. How long were you there? A. Well, some little time; I don't remember just how long.

Q. Well, about how long? A. Perhaps two or three months; it may have been longer, it may have been shorter; I cannot say just how long.

Q. Who were the proprietors of that store? A. It was kept by the Elias Brothers, I think their names were.

Q. Did you have any trouble there? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. I never had any trouble; no, Sir.

Q. Leave pleasantly? A. Yes, Sir. Well, I thought very strange when I left. Did you want to know how I left?

Q. Were you accused of anything? A. I was not accused of anything; no, Sir.

Q. Nothing at all? A. No.

Q. No difficulty between you and the proprietor? A. Never had a word; no, Sir.

Q. What was the occasion of your leaving? A. I was discharged, Sir.

Q. By whom? A. By the gentleman that paid the young ladies at the desk.

Q. He did not give you any reason for it? A. He did not give me any reason; no, Sir. The way we were paid—we were paid every Saturday night, and the money was put inside of a yellow envelope and sealed up, and we had a percentage on everything we sold, and we always tore open the envelopes as soon as we got them to see how much we had, and I tore open my envelope, and in it was a little note saying:

"Miss TURNER: Will require your services no longer," and then I went up to the gentleman and inquired about it; but I afterwards learned from one of the young ladies that I was—

Mr. Beach—No, no.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! no.

Mr. Beach—How came she to go there?

Mr. Fullerton—How came you to go to the Dollar Store? A. I don't remember how I got the position.

Q. Do you remember through whom you got it? A. No, Sir, I do not. I don't remember how I came to go there.

Q. Have you no recollection as to the way in which you got that position? A. No, Sir, I don't think I have.

Q. Do you recollect any of the circumstances attending your going to that place? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect any.

Q. What was your age at that time? A. I don't remember, Sir, how old I was.

Q. How many years ago was it that you were there? A. If I could tell you what year it was I might be able to tell.

Q. Well, how many years was it before you went to Mr. Tilton's? A. Oh! I had been at Mr. Tilton's; it was during the ten years I was there; I had been living at Mr. Tilton's.

Q. Well, do you still think that you were at Mr. Tilton's ten years? A. Off and on for ten years. I left there two or three times.

Q. Well, you went there in 1864, didn't you? A. 1864; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you left in 1870, didn't you? A. 1870; yes, Sir.

Q. Did not return after January, 1870, did you? A. What say?

Q. You did not return after January, 1870?

Mr. Beach—1871.

Mr. Fullerton—1871, I should say.

The Witness—I returned with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. After January, 1871, when you went to Steubenville, I mean? A. I went to Steubenville in 1871; yes, Sir.

Q. You did not return after that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, that is a good deal short of ten years. A. 64 and 10 are 74.

Q. Yes, but you have got by 1870. That is immaterial, however. A. Well, I am thinking. Well, this is 1871.

Q. Is it? A. This is 1875; 1875.

Q. Yes. A. Yes; well, I was away at school. I went there in 1864 and I was away at school about three years and a half. This is 1875. Yes, Sir, I was there about ten years.

Q. About ten years? A. Yes, Sir; that is, off and on. I would go there and then—I was there—

Q. Well, you left permanently in January, 1871? A. In January, 1871; yes, Sir.

Q. Very well; then between 1864 and January, 1871, it is not ten years. Now, how long was it after you left Mr. Tilton's that you went to the Dollar Store, or in what year was it? A. Well, I left Mr. Tilton's two or three times.

Q. Well, in what years was it that you went to the Dollar Store? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. Was it during 1867, 1868 or 1869? A. No, Sir; 1867, 1868 and 1869. I think I was there permanently those three years.

Q. Well, was it in 1866 that you were in the Dollar Store, then? A. I cannot give you the date, Sir.

Q. Can you form no idea as to the time when you were there? A. Not the slightest idea.

Q. How many years was it before you went to Marietta? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Was it before or after you went to Southport? A. Oh! it was after I went to Southport, I think.

Q. Well, you were in Southport in 1868, I believe? A. I don't remember what date it was.

Q. Was it before or after you lived with Mr. David Dows? A. Before or after I lived with Mr. Dows?

Q. Yes? A. Let's see: I lived with Mr. Dows in 1868. It must have been before that.

Q. Before that? A. Some little time, I think, before that.

Q. Well, were you ever in a store in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; I was.

Q. When was that? A. I was in Mr. Ovington's store.

Q. When was it? A. This Winter, during the holidays.

Q. Well, were you not there before that? A. Before the holidays?

Q. Before this present Winter? A. At Mr. Ovington's?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. Wasn't you in a Brooklyn store years ago? A. I was in another store, not in Mr. Ovington's, and I was only in Mr. Ovington's once, and then I was in another store besides Mr. Ovington's.

Q. What other store? A. Mr. Jones's.

Q. And when were you at Mr. Jones's? A. I don't remember. There are so many things I have to think of I cannot give all the dates.

Q. Well, as near as you can? A. No, Sir, I don't think I can.

Q. Was it after you came to Mr. Tilton's? A. I was at Mr. Tilton's; I was boarding at Mr. Tilton's when I was in the Dollar Store.

Q. Yes. A. And I think— Oh! yes, Sir, I was with Mr. Tilton when I was in Mr. Jones's, I think.

Q. Were you ever in Mr. Loesser's store? A. Mr. Loesser's?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember that name? A. Oh, yes, I remember the name very well.

Q. But you were never there? A. Oh! no, Sir, only those two stores, Mr. Jones's and Mr. Ovington's.

MISS TURNER'S RETRACTIONS.

Q. You have mentioned, Miss Turner, that just before you left for Steubenville you wrote some letters, which were produced, I believe, and handed to you? A. Just before I left I wrote some letters?

Q. Yes. A. I wrote those—well one was a very short—it could not be called a letter, just a few lines, on a piece of paper—a retraction, and then one for Mr. Tilton.

Q. Which of those letters did you write first, for Mrs. Tilton or for Mr. Tilton? A. I wrote the one for Mr. Tilton, I think, first.

Q. Where were you when you wrote that letter? A. I was sitting in the— When I wrote that letter I was in the second story back room—in his room, where there was a little gas stove.

Q. What occurred at the time of the writing of that letter?

A. We were talking about Mrs. Morse.

Q. I want you to tell what was said? A. Why, I think, that I told Mr. Tilton—I don't know how the subject began, but I think that I told Mr. Tilton that Mrs. Tilton had told Mrs. Morse all these—in my presence all these scenes—those terrible things that he had told me, those awful things about Mr. Beecher and other men.

Q. Mrs. Tilton had told Mrs. Morse in your presence? A. In my presence, yes, Sir; and that Mrs. Morse wanted me to go around and tell Mr. Beecher.

Q. Now, are you telling what Mrs. Tilton told Mrs. Morse in your presence? A. Oh I did you wish me to tell that? No, Sir, I am not; I am telling what I said to Mrs. Tilton at the time that I was—that he was fixing up that that he wrote about—that I wrote for him.

Q. Let me see now if you are not in error? A. No, Sir; I am not.

Q. Do you say that you were telling Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I was telling Mr. Tilton.

Q. You said Mrs. Tilton; it is a misstatement. A. Well, I meant Mr. Tilton.

Q. Very well; all right. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, commence again so that we won't misunderstand, and state what conversation was had between you and Mr. Tilton when you wrote the letter to which you refer? A. I was telling you, Sir.

Q. Well? A. It was about Mrs. Morse, and that Mrs. Morse—that—I said that I thought I told him that Mrs. Tilton had told Mrs. Morse all these horrible scenes that he had described to me in the parlor, and that Mrs. Morse wanted me to go around and tell Mr. Beecher all that had happened, and I would not go around and tell Mr. Beecher. And then he spoke about Mrs. Morse—when I said that Mrs. Morse wanted me to go around and tell Mr. Beecher: "Well, then, that was bribing," he says, "that was bribing you;" and I said: "No, Sir, she did not bribe me, but she said would I—if I would go around and tell this to Mr. Beecher that she would give me something nice." And then he asked me if I would write that down on paper and put my name to it.

Q. Well? A. And I did so.

Q. Well, what did you say when he asked you that? A. I said that I would.

Q. You said that you would put it down on the paper? A. Yes, Sir; and sign my name.

Q. Well, did you put it down on paper? A. Yes, Sir; on that paper that you have.

Q. Yes. A. I wrote it. That was in January.

Q. That was in January? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you get the paper? A. I think he gave it to me, Sir. I think he brought me the paper, and a pen and ink.

Q. Yes; and then you wrote it? A. And then I wrote it; yes, Sir; from his dictation—he dictated it to me and I wrote it.

Q. He dictated it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what do you mean by his dictating it? A. What I mean by dictating, he told me what to say and I put it down as he told me.

Q. He would repeat a few words, and then you would write it down? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then he would pause whilst you were writing it down? A. Yes, Sir; until he made up his mind what would go next.

Q. And then he would repeat something else? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you would write it down? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And so you kept on until you finished it? A. Kept on until I finished it? Yes, Sir; it was not very long.

Q. Now, is your recollection quite distinct about that? A. Yes, Sir, very distinct.

Q. You cannot be mistaken? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he write it out at first, and didn't you copy it? A. No, Sir; he dictated it to me; I am pretty sure of that.

Q. Well, now, just see how sure you are of it. A. Yes, Sir; I think that he dictated it to me; I don't remember copying it from his writing.

Q. In the direct examination did you state as follows: "He asked me if I would copy that off in my handwriting and put my name to it, and I did it"—in speaking of this very letter? A. It must have been that letter, because that was the only one that he asked me to copy.

Q. Well, do you remember of so stating in your direct examination? A. I remember stating about this—these few lines that I wrote—but I cannot remember just the language that I used, or just the words that I used, before the Committee.

Q. I am not speaking of the Committee, Miss Turner; I am speaking of what occurred here last week, when you were under a direct examination by Judge Porter. I ask you whether at that time, in speaking of this letter which is now the subject of inquiry, you did not say as follows:

Mr. Beach—Just read the whole of it.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading:]

And then, after he got through about Mrs. Morse, and I had told him that Mrs. Morse had said she would give me something nice if I would go around and tell Mr. Beecher this story, he asked me if I would copy that off in my handwriting and put my name to it, and I did it.

A. Yes, Sir; copy off what I had been telling him about Mrs. Morse.

Q. He did not furnish you, then, with a copy, written out? A. No, Sir; I think not; the copy was from his mind; that is what I meant by copy.

Q. Well, did he state it correctly? A. What, Sir?

Q. Did he state it correctly as you copied it? A. He stated exactly as I copied it, Sir.

Q. Did he state it correctly? A. I don't understand what you mean by "correctly."

Q. He stated some events, did he not, for you to put upon paper? A. He stated just those events that I have been relating with regard to Mrs. Morse; yes, Sir.

Q. And did he state the truth as it had taken place? A. He stated just as it is written there.

Q. No, I am not talking about what is written. Did he state § correctly as you had told him in that interview? A. No, Sir; I don't know that he did state it correctly, because he—I think that it reads that Mrs. Morse bribed me. Well, Mrs. Morse did not exactly bribe me, for I did not tell the story; I did not go around and tell it.

Q. In every other respect was it correct, what he stated?

A BRISK DEBATE OVER THE TESTIMONY.

Judge Porter—I object to this; not as to the facts, as to whether any fact stated was true, but it is not a question for her— They cannot put the question in a general form, as to the contents of that letter, and whether the letter was correct, without placing the letter in her hands so that she can look at it.

Mr. Fullerton—I am speaking of his statement, Sir, irrespective of the letter.

Mr. Beach—We are not asking anything about the letter.

Mr. Porter—"Did he state it correctly in the letter that you wrote?"

Mr. Fullerton—No, I have not asked that; you cannot invent that.

Mr. Porter—I object to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir! [To the witness.] You had made certain statements to Mr. Tilton in regard to Mrs. Morse, had you, in that conversation? A. I had spoken to him about Mrs. Morse, yes, Sir, and told him that Mrs. Tilton had described all this that he had told me about her daughter.

Q. And Mr. Tilton wanted you to put that upon paper and sign it, did he—what you had told him? A. Well, he picked it out to suit himself, what he wanted me to put on paper.

Q. No, no; I am not asking you that. He wanted you to put that, whatever it was that you had said to him, upon paper, and sign it, did he not? A. He wanted me to put what he dictated; it was something like that; I don't know whether it was exactly, or whether he fixed—

Q. After you had made the statement to him, didn't he say, "Will you put that upon paper and sign it?" Is not that what he said? A. He wanted me to put what he dictated on paper; it was in regard to the conversation that I had had with him.

Q. Did he ask you to put what he dictated on paper? Is that what he asked you? A. He asked me if I would put that on paper; I think that was the way he expressed it, and sign my name.

Q. And by "that" he referred to what you had just told him about Mrs. Morse, didn't he? A. Well, but he didn't fix it exactly—

Q. Well, we will see about that. I will not go to that yet. A. Well, Sir.

Q. Now, when he came to dictate, as you term it, what you should write, did he repeat correctly what you had told him about Mrs. Morse? A. Oh! I don't know whether he repeated just the exact words that I used.

Q. Well, in substance, was it correct?

Mr. Porter—That I object to. Where what was dictated was written. I submit that the writing speaks as to what it was and that she is entitled to have the writing before her, and if they wish to ascertain, clause by clause, whether it was correct or not, she should be examined with reference to it.

Mr. Morris—How would the writing show what she had stated to Mrs. Morse, whether that was correct or not?

Mr. Porter—What she had stated to Mrs. Morse?

Mr. Morris—The question asked was whether it was correct.

Mr. Porter—That is not what he is inquiring. I do not understand the gentleman to be inquiring at all about what she stated to Mrs. Morse.

Mr. Morris—Concerning Mrs. Morse—about Mrs. Morse.

Mr. Porter—Concerning Mrs. Morse is what appears in the letter.

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Porter—One moment.

Mr. Fullerton—Not by any means.

Mr. Porter—If he is inquiring for a conversation between her and Mrs. Morse, I have no objection. If he is inquiring for what Mr. Tilton then dictated, and she wrote, then I submit that what she wrote under his dictation should be before her.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; that is so.

Mr. Morris—That is not the inquiry.

Judge Neilson—If, on the other hand, without its being confined to the letter, he is inquiring if Mr. Tilton asked her to write down what Mrs. Morse had said, I think he may do that without showing the letter.

Mr. Porter—Undoubtedly, but she states instead of that he dictated clause by clause.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; still—

Mr. Fullerton—My inquiry relates to the period of time before it was put to paper.

Judge Neilson—Well, if that be so, interrogate her.

Mr. Porter—Well, I suppose the rule to be well settled that you cannot inquire as to what transpired during the period of time before an instrument—before words were committed to paper, when they were committed to paper and the paper itself is in evidence.

Mr. Morris—The question is whether it was committed to paper.

Mr. Fullerton—The objection is as foreign to this question as possible.

Judge Neilson—The object of the inquiry seems to be to ascertain whether the conversation of Mrs. Morse was adopted as the subject matter of the letter, in a general way—in a general sense.

Mr. Porter—The document shows for itself, as to two points.

Mr. Fullerton—We are not talking about the letter.

Mr. Porter—One is as to the truth of the letter, and the other is as to whether or not, in dictating it, he dictated it as she had previously told it to him. The witness should be treated fairly and should see what the words of the letter are; and your Honor sees very clearly, in view of her testimony, that Mrs. Morse's offer related to the stories against Mr. Beecher, whereas the jury will see that the letter relates to stories about Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not in order, and I object to it.

Judge Neilson—Now, there is one inquiry which Mr. Fullerton has made which has not been answered. She says:

"He asked me to write that." Now, he wants to learn whether the "that" used referred to what had passed between the witness and Mrs. Morse, and prior to writing the letter, it seems to me that might be given.

Mr. Porter—That I have no objection to.

Judge Neilson—Well, I don't think that has been answered fully.

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—I don't think that inquiry has been answered fully.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; it has not been answered. [To the witness.] Now, Miss Turner, will you be kind enough to tell me whether, in the dictation of Mr. Tilton, he stated correctly what you had told him in regard to Mrs. Morse?

Mr. Porter—Now, I object, your Honor; the question is put boldly and baldly.

Judge Neilson—Let her see the letter.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not talking about the letter, Sir.

The Witness—If you would let me see it, I might—

Mr. Porter—One moment; I object to the question.

Judge Neilson—No objection to showing her the letter, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—I have objections to showing it to her now, Sir. What have we got to do with the letter yet?

Judge Neilson—She had a conversation with Mrs. Morse.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Judge Neilson—Now, she related that conversation to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Judge Neilson—I think you can show whether or not that was what he asked her to write, and if you go a step beyond that, you ought to show her the letter.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not : a step beyond that; I have not taken that step, and don't propose to quite yet.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on.

Mr. Fullerton—Nor will the counsel compel me to take that step, because when I take that step, I shall put my foot into it; and I don't mean to do anything of the kind.

Judge Neilson—I think she may answer that.

[Last question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Porter—I object to that question as assuming what does not appear, that she knows what it was that he did dictate to her without the production of the writing in which it is recorded; and that she shall be examined generally as to her recollection of the contents of that which was dictated and written, without having the writing before her.

Judge Neilson—I think she can answer.

Mr. Fullerton—The writing has nothing to do with the dictation; I am going to ask her this: Whether she wrote it down as it was dictated.

Judge Neilson—It is an attempt at getting at the recollection of the witness about it, and is to be allowed. Now, repeat the question again and let the witness answer the exact question.

[Question again read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

The Witness—Well, I put down just as he stated it.

Judge Neilson—That is not the point, Madam.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the point, Madam.

Judge Neilson—Just recollect the question. In dictating to you, did he correctly repeat what you had told him about Mrs. Morse, or what Mrs. Morse had said? A. Well, Sir; I cannot recollect just whether he repeated it correctly or incorrectly; but, however, I put it down just as he repeated it.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind "putting down," we are coming to that.

Mr. Porter—I submit that the answer is proper.

Mr. Fullerton—No; it is not.

Judge Neilson—I shall permit the answer to stand, just as she made it, Sir.

Q. Can't you recollect whether, in repeating what you had told him he repeated it correctly—substantially correctly?

Mr. Porter—I object to that as a repetition of a question immediately before the answer.

Judge Neilson—I think he has a right to put it to test her recollection further.

Mr. Porter—I except to your Honor's decision allowing him to repeat it again.

Judge Neilson—Now, repeat the question, please.

Mr. Fullerton—Can't you recollect whether, in repeating what you had told him he repeated it correctly? A. No, Sir; I don't think I can, whether he repeated correctly or incorrectly.

Q. In listening to his dictation did you discover that he had made any mistake in doing it? A. I don't remember, Sir, because he seemed very much excited—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind.

The Witness—[Continuing]—just then, and I put it down.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! well, never mind.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] By "mistake" he means departure from the statement about Mrs. Morse.

Mr. Fullerton—You paid attention to what he dictated, didn't you? A. I think I did, at the time; yes, Sir, but I don't recollect now whether—

Q. Now, one moment. Did you, at the time of his dictation, discover any error that he had fallen into in repeating the language, or the substance of what you had just told him?

Mr. Porter—I object to the second repetition in substance of that question. I submit there has been nothing in the bearing of the witness that calls for a repetition of a question once clearly and intelligently answered.

Judge Neilson—That is no reflection—

Mr. Fullerton—It is a wonder my friend don't claim she is insulted.

Judge Neilson—This is no reflection upon the witness, but merely goes to test her recollection.

Mr. Porter—I except to your Honor's decision that they may repeat the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not repeated the question; I ask now whether when he dictated, and she was paying attention to it, she discovered any error or departure from the words or the substance of the words which you had just told him? A. I may have discovered—I don't remember whether I did or not.

Judge Neilson—Well, do you recollect whether you did, or not? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if you had discovered any error that he had fallen into, would you not have corrected it?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question; that is reasoning with the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—No, it is not.

Mr. Porter—It is a purely psychological—a purely metaphysical inquiry—hypothetical. She is not bound to give her opinion as an expert as to the probabilities upon such a subject, or of the laws of memory. She is not here to speculate but to state what she remembers, and all that she remembers.

Judge Neilson—I think she may answer that question.

Mr. Porter—I except to the decision.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, will you please answer.

The Witness—Please repeat the question, Sir.

THE FIRST RETRACTION ANALYZED.

Q. If you had discovered, when he was dictating to you what to write, any error that he had fallen into in repeating your language or the substance of what you told him, would you have put it down as he dictated it, or would you have corrected the error?

Judge Neilson—Or called his attention to it?

The Witness—Well, he told it so fast—and yet I think if he was dictating a falsehood that, it seems to me now, my attention would have been called to it, but I don't recollect about that very well.

Q. But don't you think if your attention had been— A. But all I know is—

Q. One moment, excuse me.

Mr. Porter—I submit that she is entitled to answer. If the witness is called on for a reason she can state it.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you think if you had observed a falsehood that you would have written it down as dictated, or would you have called his attention to it? A. I don't— It seems to me I don't think I would have written down a falsehood, but he told it so quick and seemed to be so excited about it that I don't think I stopped to think anything about it.

Q. He did not tell it any quicker than you would write it, did he?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question.

The Witness—Well, I don't know, Sir, sometimes I can write fast.

Mr. Porter—One moment. When I object I desire you not to answer.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think we have that sufficiently.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, we have not had it at all. [To the witness.] Did he dictate faster than you could write?

Mr. Porter—She has already been examined on that question, and has said that he stepped for her to write; that she wrote it at once; that she wrote it under excitement.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—Did he dictate to you faster than you could write it?

Mr. Porter—I except to the decision permitting him to repeat the question.

The Witness—Shall I answer?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

The Witness—Did he dictate faster than I could write?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; it seems to me he did. It seems to me I had to—that he had to stop once or twice, if I remember correctly.

Q. Yes; and what occasioned him to stop? A. Why, he was going on too fast, I think.

Q. Well, how did he find that out? A. Why, I found it out.

Q. You found it out; and what did you say to him? A. I don't recollect just what I said.

Q. In substance? A. Unless it was that he was speaking too fast; I can't swear positively to that; I could not swear, but that is the way I think it was.

Q. That is the way that you think it was; did you write all that he dictated? A. Yes, Sir; I wrote all, and just as he dictated it.

Q. Well, now, I will read and ask you some questions; I find the following sentence in the letter of Jan. 10, 1871. [Reading:] "Your mother, Mrs. Morse, has repeatedly attempted to hire me by offering me dresses and presents to go to certain persons and tell them stories."

Mr. Shearman—That is not all the sentence.

Mr. Fullerton—Isn't it?

Mr. Shearman—No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I am glad you discovered it.

Mr. Shearman—[Reading:] "Injurious to the character of your husband."

Mr. Fullerton—I am glad you discovered it, because I cannot read the balance of it.

Mr. Porter—It has been printed.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, there is where you have the advantage of me, because I am reading her handwriting.

Mr. Porter—And I, too.

Mr. Fullerton—Printed in the letter—what is the word there?

Mr. Shearman—It is printed in your mind, but it is written on the letter.

Judge Neilson—The counsel asks what the word is as printed.

Mr. Shearman—"Injurious to the character."

Mr. Fullerton—"Injurious?" I will call it "injurious"—"to tell them stories injurious to the character of your husband." Was that true? A. That was not true then, if that is the way it was written, because Mrs. Morse had not repeatedly—Mrs. Morse had only on this occasion, when this horrible affair was related by Mrs. Tilton in my presence.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't want all that.

Mr. Porter—One moment. I submit that there is no occasion for interrupting her.

Judge Neilson—Her answer is that it is not true, because Mrs. Morse had only on one occasion made such request. That answers the question fully, it seems to me.

Mr. Fullerton—I read further [reading]: "I have been persuaded that the kind attentions shown me by Mr. Tilton for years, were dishonorable demonstrations"; was that true? A. That Mrs. Morse had said that?

Q. I read exactly as it is written. [Reading:] "I have been persuaded that the kind attentions shown me by Mr. Tilton for years, were dishonorable demonstrations." A. I supposed they were dishonorable demonstrations after Mrs. Tilton had told me that he had confessed to her—

Q. No; I don't ask you that. Is that true that you had been so persuaded that these kind attentions shown you by Mr. Tilton for years, were dishonorable demonstrations? A. There was no persuading about it; nobody persuaded me; I believed them when Mrs. Tilton told me that he had confessed to her.

Q. Then the statement in the letter is not true, is it?

Mr. Porter—She has not said that. She has said that was not true.

Mr. Fullerton—Is that statement in the letter true? A. That I had been persuaded?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir, because nobody had persuaded me.

Q. Yes, that is not true. I read another sentence [reading]: "I never at the time thought that Mr. Tilton's caresses were for such a purpose." A. For a bad purpose?

Q. "For such a purpose;" was that true? A. No, Sir; I did not think so at the time.

Q. How? A. I had not any such thought with regard to him at the time; I did though, after he confessed it to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, never mind.

Judge Neilson—Never mind; the question is whether that particular statement is true.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you not think at the time that he proposed to put his hand in your neck that it was a dishonorable demonstration? A. I thought it was immodest; that was the term I applied to it.

Q. And you did not think it was dishonorable?

Mr. Porter—A dishonorable demonstration.

Mr. Fullerton—Dishonorable demonstration then?

The Witness—I thought it was improper demonstrations.

Q. Didn't you think it was a dishonorable demonstration? A. Dishonorable? That word didn't come into my head at that time that I know of; I thought it was immodest, and something that he ought not to do, and I told him so.

Q. I read again [reading]: "I do not want to be made use of by Mrs. Morse or any one else to bring trouble on my two best friends, you and your husband." Is that true? A. I did not want to bring trouble on Mr. and Mrs. Tilton; no, Sir.

Q. You didn't want to be used by Mrs. Morse for that purpose, did you, or any one else? A. I stated to him that I did not want to go and tell these stories.

Q. No; that is not what I am talking about. A. But it was n't put in that language.

Q. I am talking about the language in that letter. A. What is it you want me to answer, Sir?

Q. I ask you if this is true: "I don't want to be made use of by Mrs. Morse, or any one else, to bring trouble to my two best friends, you and your husband?" A. I don't think I stated that to Mr. Tilton, that "I didn't want to be made use of;" that was his own fabrication; the way he put it for himself; the way he dictated it.

Q. The way he dictated it? A. I suppose if that is my writing—I would like to see—

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. [Handing letter to witness.]

Judge Neilson—Now, the inquiry is, whether that was the fact, Miss Turner, whether that was true.

The Witness—Whether what was true?

Judge Neilson—That clause: "I don't want to be made use of."

Mr. Porter—She has just answered that she did not want to be made use of to injure him.

The Witness—No, Sir; I did not want to be made use of; I did not want to injure him; that is—

Mr. Fullerton—That was on the 10th of January, 1871, wasn't it? A. This was on— Yes, Sir; 1871.

Q. When was the conversation with you in reference to going to school, before or after the writing of that letter? A. It was after, Sir.

Q. How long after? A. Well, I think I left in 1871 for Steubenville—the 13th day of February.

Q. About how long before you left was it that the conversation was about your going to school? A. How long before that?

Q. Yes. A. It was on Sunday, and I left for school, I think, two or three days afterwards.

Q. During the succeeding week, or the same week? A. The conversation was Sunday, and I think Thursday, or Wednesday, or Friday—I don't know which it was—I left.

Q. At the time of signing that letter did you regard the statement contained in it all correct?

Mr. Porter—I did not hear the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you at the time of signing that letter regard the statement contained in it as all correct?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question. You have questioned her in regard to this statement in detail, and she has proved that some of them were incorrect, and to ask her if she regarded them as correct, is going over the same ground, and putting the question in a form tending to mislead the witness, and, as I claim, to abuse the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, the gentleman's claims are entirely unfounded. Nobody knows better than he does, that they are unfounded.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness may answer the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Of course she may.

Mr. Porter—I except to your Honor's decision.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Stenographer, please read the question, THE TURNER Stenographer read the question as follows:

"Did you at the time of signing that letter regard the statements contained in it as all correct?" A. I don't know that I thought anything about the statements in that letter. I had been talking with Mr. Tilton—

Q. That is an answer, Miss Turner, that is an answer to the question. Now, you observe an erasure in that letter; can you tell me what was written there before that erasure was made? A. No, Sir; it is so badly scratched out I cannot say what it is.

Q. You mean it is so well scratched out? A. Well, Sir, so well scratched out.

Q. Do you recollect the fact that you did erase something that you had written? A. No, Sir, I do not. It has been erased. I don't recollect anything about it.

MISS TURNER'S SECOND RETRACTION.

Q. Well, I understand that you wrote another letter? A. I wrote a few lines; I don't suppose it would be called a letter.

Q. Who asked you to write that letter? A. The retraction; that short one?

Mr. Porter—The other letter.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, the other letter. I refer to Exhibit D 10, the small letter? A. Who asked me to write the other one?

Q. Yes? A. Mrs. Tilton, Sir.

Q. Where was she when she asked you to write it? A. When she asked me to write it, she was in this same room where Mr. Tilton had dictated this other writing.

Q. Were you and she there alone? A. Yes, Sir, we were alone in the room. Mr. Tilton was pacing up and down in the hall.

Q. Well, did you write that without any assistance? A. I copied that from Mrs. Tilton's handwriting.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton prepare the copy before she asked you to write it? A. No, Sir; Mr. Tilton prepared the copy.

Q. Mr. Tilton prepared the copy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When? A. That day, I think.

Q. Did you see him? A. No, Sir; I have Mrs. Tilton's word for it.

Mr. Fullerton—Ah! I move to strike that out.

Mr. Porter—I object to this being struck out. It was responsive to the question.

Judge Neilson—I think we will let it stand.

Mr. Fullerton—What, Sir! what she heard from Mrs. Tilton to stand here as evidence!

Judge Neilson—You are now busy with Mrs. Tilton about that letter, and she says that Mrs. Tilton said to her that Mr. Tilton prepared it.

The Witness—She didn't say it at that time.

Judge Neilson—Well, if she did not say it at that time, we will strike it out.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well, Sir; that is the reason that I moved to strike it out.

Q. Did she hand you the paper for you to copy? A. The letter paper, or her copy?

Q. Her copy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you sat down and copied it as she handed it to you, did you? A. I think I read it over first.

Q. In whose handwriting was it? A. Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. Was she in the room when you copied it? A. Oh! yes, Sir; standing by the chair in which I was sitting.

Q. Did that paper embody a truth or a falsehood?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question. He has no right to assume that it embodied a falsehood, and no right to interrogate the witness upon the assumption that it did. He can inquire whether a certain thing was true, but that inquiry must be with the paper before the witness, so that she may see it.

Judge Neilson—I think your inquiry should be in reference to the letter.

Mr. Porter—It should be handed to her.

Judge Neilson—Yes, or read to her.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, I think that is the better course.

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing letter to witness.] Is that letter in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir; that is what I wrote.

Mr. Fullerton—I will read it. [Reading:]

January 19th.

MY DEAR MRS. TILTON: The story that Mr. Tilton once lifted me from my bed and carried me screaming to his own, and attempted to violate my person, is a wicked lie.

Yours truly,

BESSIE T.

[To the Witness.] Now, had you heard of such a story as that before writing this letter? A. Why, it was on the paper before me; I read it, Sir.

Q. Is that the first that you had heard of such a story? A. Heard of such a story?

Q. Yes.

Judge Neilson—Such a story—such a statement?

The Witness—Why, I knew that he had carried me from my bed.

Mr. Beach—Oh! no; that is not what you are asked.

Mr. Fullerton—Was that the first that you had heard of the story that Mrs. Tilton had once lifted you from your bed? A. Mrs. Tilton?

Q. No, Mr. Tilton. Was that the first that you had heard of the story that Mr. Tilton had once lifted you from your bed, and carried you screaming to his own, and attempted to violate your person? A. Why, he had carried me from my bed; but he never carried me screaming.

Q. Was that the first that you ever heard of that story, in that form?

Mr. Beach—Being circulated?

Mr. Fullerton—Being circulated? A. Why, I never had seen it circulated, except on this little paper that Mrs. Tilton handed me to copy.

Q. Please answer the question.

Judge Neilson—That in part answers the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, in part; but that does not satisfy me, Sir; I want the whole.

Judge Neilson—Go on, then.

Q. When you copied the paper that Mrs. Tilton handed to you, was that the first that you had ever heard of the story that Mr. Tilton once lifted you from your bed, and carried you screaming to his own, and attempted to violate your person? A. Well, I had told those persons about it myself; but not that he had carried me screaming.

Q. Now, that is not an answer to the question. I am not asking you what you told persons; I am asking you whether, when you copied that letter which Mrs. Tilton handed to you, that was the first time that you ever heard of the story in that form; and, by "that form," I mean that he carried you screaming? A. I don't think I ever heard anything about it until I saw it in this copy before me.

Q. Well, did you make any attempt to correct it? A. I read it over, and I turned around and said, "Why, I will be calling myself a liar," because it impressed me then that he had carried me from my bed, because he had confessed it to Mrs. Tilton; and I thought that my writing that would be calling myself a liar.

Q. Had he ever carried you from your bed screaming? A. Screaming? No, Sir.

Q. Had he ever attempted to violate your person? A. Well, he had never used any harshness—no, Sir—except when he knocked me down.

Q. Had he ever attempted to violate your person? A. Yes, Sir, he had.

Q. When? A. Because he confessed it to Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Ah! We move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—We move to strike it out, Sir. It is constantly interjected, against all remonstrances.

Judge Neilson—The question is a very simple one, Miss Turner; please pay attention.

Mr. Fullerton—When did he attempt to violate your person?

A. Why, he wanted to harm me that first night that he came in, because he confessed it to Mrs. Tilton.

AN ARGUMENT OVER AN ANSWER.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out—"he confessed it."

Judge Neilson—Yes; the question, Miss Turner, is as to your own knowledge when, if ever, did he attempt to violate your person.

Mr. Porter—The word "attempt" in the question is evidently ambiguous in the sense—

Judge Neilson—"Attempt" means undertake.

Mr. Porter—But, your Honor, it implies Mr. Tilton's intention and act. Of course she cannot tell his intention—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! yes, she can.

Mr. Porter—When she says that he had the intent, she judges from other circumstances.

Mr. Morris—Let the witness state what she judges from, and not the counsel.

Judge Neilson—The inquiry is put as to an attempt which means an undertaking; which is a plain and simple word and is, of course understood by the witness.

Mr. Porter—But she must answer according to the fact—

Mr. Beach—She has answered that question; she has answered that he did attempt it.

Mr. Porter—Then why ask it further?

Mr. Beach—We have not asked it further, Sir. The question was put to her whether Mr. Tilton did attempt to violate her person, and she said yes, and this argument is gotten up to divert the attention of the jury, and to interrupt our cross-examination.

Mr. Porter—She has answered "Yes," with the qualification, "because he confessed that purpose to Mrs. Tilton;" but she does not know it herself.

Mr. Beach—That is not her language.

Mr. Porter—They propose to—

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman mistakes the testimony entirely for the purpose of making a foundation for an argument. The witness did not state what he says she said, at all.

Judge Neilson—There is no intention to misstate it, I think.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Stenographer, please to refer to the question so that we may see what the witness did say, and it will appear that the representation of the gentleman is entirely unfounded.

Mr. Porter—My representation is correct, and every juror heard it. The counsel strikes out the latter part of the answer, leaving the first part to stand alone.

Judge Neilson—The word "yes" answers the question.

Mr. Porter—The word "yes" answers the question falsely, without the qualification. That is precisely it, and he cannot split the answer and make a "yes" qualified a "yes" absolute. Violation of the person may mean rape; violation of the person may mean seduction. She is at liberty to answer according to her understanding of the facts.

Judge Neilson—She can answer yes or no.

Mr. Porter—She can state the facts, but your Honor certainly cannot insist, when she gives the answer, "Yes; for Mrs. Tilton told me that he intended it,"—to split the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not the evidence, Sir. There is nothing of that kind in the case.

Judge Neilson—This is very plain to me, gentlemen.

Mr. Morris—It is very plain to the counsel too.

Judge Neilson—It is very plain to me that whenever a question like this is put on cross-examination, the witness can answer yes or no. When the counsel interrogates her as to any conversation with Mr. Tilton she will have a right to give it, but not till then. The counsel has not asked anything about what Mrs. Tilton told her.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor permit the Stenographer to read beyond the question and answer that was put, to see whether we have misrepresented the state of this question at all?

Judge Neilson—But even suppose the recollection of the learned counsel is correct?

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I want to show your Honor that it is incorrect—that it is totally mistaken.

Judge Neilson—I do not mean to say anything as to that. I merely mean to say that when a question of this kind is put on cross-examination, the witness can answer yes or no, and would not have a right to bring in what Mrs. Tilton said to her, and what is not pertinent to the inquiry.

Mr. Porter—Granted, your Honor. What I contend for is that they shall not insist upon retaining the "yes" alone, and striking out the qualification. I submit that if the answer is rejected at all it should be rejected entire.

Judge Neilson—So much of the answer stands as is responsive to the question.

Mr. Porter—No, Sir; not if it is falsified by striking out the qualification.

Mr. Beach—There is no qualification at all.

Mr. Porter—If, for instance, I am asked whether a person struck another on such an occasion, and I answer "yes; I was so informed immediately afterwards," would your Honor strike out the latter words, "I was so informed," and leave me in the false attitude of having affirmed, as of my own knowledge, what I had affirmed only on information and belief? Now, what I insist upon is, that if that part of the answer is to be struck out, then the question ought to be put anew, and as an independent question, so that the witness shall not be held to the answer "yes," when the answer would be "no," if she understood the question.

Mr. Beach—Now, I say to your Honor that the assumption of the gentleman is a total mis-statement—unconscious, undoubtedly, of the manner in which that portion of the answer was stricken out. When she was asked whether Mr. Tilton ever did attempt to violate her person she answered, "yes," without any qualification, and no part of her answer to that question was stricken out; and if your Honor will hear the record read, you will perceive how erroneous the gentleman's assumptions are. It is for the purpose of placing us in an unfriendly and improper attitude in the course of our cross-examination of this witness, that this point is raised, and the effort has been made repeatedly, and the counsel now appeals to your Honor and the jury, to remember things which do not appear upon the Stenographer's record. Therefore, I hope your Honor will hear the questions and answers read, so that the true attitude of this question may appear.

Judge Neilson—If you make the request, of course I shall comply with it. The Stenographer will read the question.

THE TILTON Stenographer here read the question and answer, as follows: "Q. Had he ever attempted to violate your person? A. Yes, Sir, he had. Q. When? A. Because he confessed it to Mrs. Tilton."

Mr. Porter—That is the precise fact which I claim.

Judge Neilson—The inquiry is for a date.

Mr. Porter—I know that, but it was an inquiry immediately following the preceding question, which she had answered "Yes," and the next answer shows that she answered upon what was evidence to her, but is not evidence to your Honor—shows that her affirmative answer rested upon the confession made to Mrs. Tilton. Now, you will bear in mind the allegation is violation of the person. In the ordinary acceptance of the term that might mean violence. This witness swore, in answer to the question whether there was an attempted violation of her person, that he never used harshness to her except on the occasion when he threw her against the door in the parlor conversation; so there is no violence. She has answered that he did on one occasion attempt to violate her person. "When?" "By his confession to Mrs. Tilton."

Mr. Morris—No, no; that is not the record.

Mr. Porter—Oh! but it has been just read.

Judge Neilson—Don't interrupt, gentlemen. Let us have this understood. I will hear you, whatever further you have to say, Sir.

Mr. Porter—Now, Sir, if your Honor thinks that in a case of this kind, where it is apparent by the examination of the witness that she answered "yes," founding her answer as to his intent and attempt upon that confession—if your Honor assumes that it is fair to the witness to say that she has sworn that he attempted to violate her person, and that that is to be the basis of further examination, then we have nothing to do except to submit to your Honor's decision, and except.

Judge Neilson—I shall not be wanting in the disposition to attend to any suggestion that Mr. Porter may make, because I have, of course, a proper degree of respect for counsel of his ability and eminence. My own view, however, is that this is a very simple question. My own view also, generally, is that this witness has not been cross-examined with undue severity, and I am not willing to suppose that counsel intend to entrap the witness at all. The question is very simple, did he attempt to violate your person? and the witness answers "yes." Now, on re-direct, if not on cross-examination, you can draw out how it was. The next question after that answer was "When?" calling for a date which she could give, and she alone could give, and which she could give without reference to Mrs. Tilton. It was an act, if there was such an act at all, to which she was a party, and in respect to which she and she alone can give the date, or near the date. Therefore I think the inquiry as to the time when it occurred, if ever, did not call for any repetition by the witness of what Mrs. Tilton had said.

Mr. Tracy—Pardon me one word your Honor. I think we have fallen into this error by the manner in which the stenographer has recorded what transpired. As I recollect the question and answer it was precisely this. She was asked whether he had ever attempted to violate her person, and she said "yes," and then hesitated a moment, and there the counsel interjected the question "when?" and she then continued the original answer,—“for Mrs. Tilton told me so,” and then they stopped her. That explains the stenographer's notes and that is the situation and the true situation of this case. She was continuing her answer and the counsel interjected another question, and it is recorded between the first part of her answer and the second part.

Mr. Fullerton—The question we are discussing arose after all that.

Mr. Tracy—Oh no, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Let the stenographer read, and you will see.

Judge Neilson—One moment. Mr. Tracy, is it not quite obvious to you that a statement by Mrs. Tilton to this witness could not be received until the counsel asked for it?

Mr. Tracy—Undoubtedly, your Honor; but my point is this: The first answer of the witness, if it had been listened to and received before any other question was put, might have been properly stricken out, the answer being, "Yes; for Mrs. Tilton told me this;" but they ask now to have the first part of that answer struck out, leaving the latter part of it to stand alone as the answer. Now, that cannot be properly stricken out, because it is a qualification of the first part of the answer, illustrating the point that has been made by Mr. Porter. It seems to me that it must be clear to every person in this court room that the witness never intended to say "yes, he attempted to violate my person," without adding, "for he confessed it to Mrs. Tilton." That is the basis of her answer, and that is the only basis of it; because your Honor will see that she has testified that "he never used any harshness to me," which forbids the idea that she intended to say that he attempted to forcibly violate her person.

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps she is better qualified to answer the question now than before. I will put it again.

Judge Neilson—My notion is, and I want to ask if it is not yours, Mr. Tracy, that upon the cross-examination of a witness of importance and intelligence, if a question be asked and be answered yes or no, and the witness proceeds to give a conversation with some third person, a conversation not called for, it is competent to allow the answer to stand so far as it is responsive, and to strike it out so far as it is not responsive.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, if it be true that the answer would be the same without the qualification as with it, but if she answers, "yes, because I was told so," when if she were required to answer from her own knowledge she would say "no," then it is not proper to strike out the qualification and let the first part of the answer stand.

Judge Neilson—Is it not the office of the re-direct examination to correct such things? And, is not the only reason why we have a re-direct examination at all, simply that and nothing else? You have not a re-direct examination for new matter, but simply to correct and illustrate what has already come on.

MISS TURNER'S INTERPRETATION OF MR. TILTON'S OVERTURES.

Mr. Porter—We will take our exception, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Very well.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Miss Turner, I put this question to you. Did Mr. Tilton ever attempt to violate your person? I want you to answer it without reference to what anybody ever said to you upon this subject. A. Well, I don't think I could answer that just that way, unless you allow me to explain.

Q. I ask you: In your own view of what he did, can you say that he ever attempted to violate your person? A. In my own views?

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir; I don't think I could say truthfully, in my own view, because—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; there is no "because" about it.

The Witness—Well, I could not—

Mr. Beach—Wait, Madam, when you are asked to.

Mr. Fullerton—You cannot say, then, in your own view of what he did, that he ever did attempt to violate your person?

Mr. Porter—She is stating.

Mr. Fullerton—Then, from your own view of the case, you cannot say that he attempted to violate your person; is that the answer? A. From my own view at the time of the occurrence, Sir?

Q. Well, from the view which you took of it, unaided by anything that anybody told you at the time you signed this letter, did you think that he had attempted to violate your person? A. At the time I signed the letter, I think I did think that he had.

Q. That is, from your own idea? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is, from your own idea?

Mr. Beach—And your own construction of his conduct?

The Witness—From my own ideas?

Q. Yes; from your own idea and construction of his conduct.

A. Not from my own idea. I did not suspect his design at the time.

Q. But, when you signed this letter, did you, from your own idea and uninfluenced by anything that was said to you, believe that he had attempted to violate your person? [A pause, but no answer.] Or, was this the statement of Mrs. Tilton? A. I cannot answer it in any other way than I have done already; that, at the time of the occurrence, I had not any idea of his wanting to harm me; the thought never came into my head. That is the only way that I can answer that, Sir.

Q. Well, was it true that he had lifted you from your bed and carried you screaming to his room? A. It was true that—

Mr. Tracy—One moment.

Mr. Fullerton—Was that true?

Mr. Tracy—She is proceeding to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—And you are proceeding to interrupt her.

The Witness—It was true that he carried me from my bed to his own bed; but I didn't scream.

Q. Then he didn't carry you screaming. A. Well, carrying—

Q. Then that statement in the letter is not true? A. It is not true.

Q. Were you awake at the time that he carried you from your bed to his? A. No, Sir, I was not.

Q. You were unconscious of the fact, then, that you were being carried? A. Perfectly unconscious.

Q. And when you did become conscious, you were in his bed? A. I was in his bed, and he was standing over me.

Q. Now, why did you sign that statement if it were untrue, namely, that he once lifted you from your bed and carried you screaming to his own?

TROUBLE IN FRAMING A QUESTION.

Mr. Porter—I object to that question; because it assumes that the statement was true, when counsel have just shown that it was untrue.

Judge Neilson—She says the statement was untrue.

Mr. Shearman—She said that he never did lift her and carry her screaming.

Mr. Fullerton—And I now ask her why she signed such a statement. Mr. Shearman understands that perfectly.

Mr. Shearman—The counsel modifies his question.

Mr. Fullerton—I do not modify it, at all, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Why did you sign a statement that he carried you from your bed screaming to his own bed, if it was untrue? That is the question.

Mr. Porter—But she has not signed a statement of that kind that he carried her screaming.

Mr. Tracy—It was a denial.

Judge Neilson—The question is: "Why did she sign a statement which contains those words?"

Mr. Porter—But, your Honor, that is only part of the words. The counsel ignores her denial, which is contained in that very paper.

Mr. Beach—Those are the words.

Mr. Fullerton—I will change the question—

The Witness—I did not use those words.

Mr. Porter [to witness]—One moment. Wait till you hear the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't speak cross to the witness. That is something that I never do. [To the witness]: Why did you sign this paper, if it were untrue that he once lifted you from your bed, and carried you screaming to his own?

Mr. Porter—I object to that question. It is another palpable attempt to mislead the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman is profuse in his charges of attempts to mislead the witness.

Mr. Porter—I shall repeat the charge as often as occasion arises, and call the attention of the Court and the jury and the public to the repetition.

Mr. Morris—It is harmless.

Mr. Fullerton—I supposed you were speaking for the public—I supposed that was the case. The suggestion that I am attempting to mislead the witness has no foundation in fact at all, I am attempting no such thing, and the counsel upon the other side will not in his calmer moments, accuse me of any such attempt. If he were not excited in making his speech for the public he would not have done it now.

Judge Neilson—The matter is simply this. According to her statement he did not carry her screaming; that appears very plainly. Now, then, the simple inquiry is how she came to sign a paper that contains that statement.

Mr. Porter—But it does not contain that statement. How came she to do what she swears she did not do?—that is the question that he puts.

Judge Neilson—But there is her signature on the paper.

Mr. Porter—It is not on the paper containing that statement.

Mr. Tracy—That is the point.

Mr. Porter—She does not assert that statement in that paper; she denies it.

Judge Neilson—Undoubtedly she denies it.

Mr. Porter—Then why does the counsel assume that she asserted it?

Judge Neilson—He does not. Let the stenographer read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Why did you sign this paper, if it were untrue, that he once lifted you from your bed and carried you screaming to his own?"

THE REAL PURPOSE OF MISS TURNER'S RETRACTIONS.

Judge Neilson—Now, can you tell why you signed it—why you signed that paper which contained that statement, if it was not true?

Mr. Porter—The paper does not contain that statement.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, is the statement that you put in your question in that paper before you?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; every word.

Judge Neilson—Please read it.

Mr. Porter—Read the letter.

Mr. Fullerton read the letter as follows:

Jan. 19th.

MY DEAR MRS. TILTON: The story that Mr. Tilton once lifted me from my bed and carried me screaming to his own, and attempted to viol to my person, is a wicked lie."

Yours truly,

EMERIE T.

Mr. Tracy—A lie—not the truth.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly. [To the witness.] Now, why did that paper if there was no such story?

Judge Neilson [To witness]—That being untrue, how came you to sign that paper containing the statement?

Mr. Porter—The question is, why she signed a paper stating that a thing was untrue, which was untrue in fact?

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Can you answer that question?

The Witness—Because I loved Mrs. Tilton, I wanted to do it because she said if I would put my name to that paper, it would get Mr. Tilton out of all difficulties with Henry C. Bowen, that that story had gotten to Mr. Bowen's ears, and that all was needed was my signature and my retraction of that. That is why I signed it. [Applause.]

Mr. Fullerton—That is the result of that speech to the public a while ago. [Laughter.]

Q. You signed it, then, to please Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; although I said I would be calling myself a liar. I did not refer to any particular words contained in the statement; I said to myself that he did carry me from my bed, but I did not think about the screaming.

Q. Did you regard that as calling yourself a liar when you signed it? A. I regarded as saying that he did not carry me, when he did, and I remonstrated with Mrs. Tilton, and then I signed it because she said, "Do it for me, darling; it will help Theodore." That is the reason I signed it.

Q. Haven't you stated that you regarded the signing of that paper as calling yourself a liar? A. Yes.

Q. And you were willing to do that to please Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Porter—I object to that question. She has answered it frankly.

Mr. Fullerton—She has answered it already. I guess we will adjourn on that.

The Court here took a recess until 2:30 p. m.

MISS TURNER'S LAST MOMENTS AS A WITNESS.

The Court met at 2:30 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Miss Beale Turner resumed the stand.

Mr. Fullerton [To Judge Neilson]: I have no further question to ask the witness, Sir.

Mr. Porter—A single question, Miss Turner. What were you engaged at at Beaver? A. I was teaching the rudiments of music, Sir.

Q. In what department? A. In the musical department—the rudiments of music I was teaching at the Seminary in Beaver.

Mr. Porter—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you discharged? A. What, Sir.

Q. Were you discharged from there? A. No, Sir; I expected to have resumed my position there last Fall, but when I went back, Dr. Taylor told me that he could not employ me; he thought just the same of me as he had always done, but that he could not employ me on account of the notoriety this scandal had given me; he feared the young ladies would be writing home to their parents that the notorious Beale Turner was there, and that would not do for the school, but he felt he had the same opinion of me. That is the reason I didn't go back.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Porter—That is all, Miss Turner.

Mr. Hill—If the Court please, we ask its indulgence to examine a witness out of order somewhat, who happens to be in the city and has to leave very soon.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE L. PERKINS.

George L. Perkins called and affirmed on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—What is your residence? A. Norwich, Conn.

Q. How long have you lived there? A. Eighty-seven years.

Q. What is your business at present? A. I am treasurer of the Norwich & Worcester R. R. Co., and have been for about forty years, and director.

Q. Mr. Perkins, how long have you known Mr. Beecher, the defendant, in this case, so as to recognize him when you saw him? A. I don't understand your question.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Henry Ward Beecher so as to be able to recognize him when you see him? A. For many years. I have seen him in his desk here, and at other places.

Q. Have you any personal acquaintance with him? A. I have not. I knew his father about seventy years ago.

Q. Mr. Perkins, did you see Henry Ward Beecher about the 1st of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir. Shall I state the circumstances?

Q. Please state where you saw him, and what the circumstances were, and when? A. In reading Gen. Tracy's opening for the defence of Mr. Beecher, I observed that he stated—

Mr. Beach—What was it.

Mr. Hill—Wait a moment. [To Mr. Beach]: In reading Gen. Tracy's opening—he was going on to make a preliminary statement, I suppose.

The Witness—I observed—

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Mr. Hill—The preliminaries are objected to by counsel. You will simply state where and when you saw him, and under what circumstances? A. I was sure, on reading that statement, that I saw Mr. Beecher on the Boston and Albany railroad train; that I entered a car where Mr. Beecher and a lady were seated, and the train that he was on left New York—the New York and Boston Express train left New York at eight o'clock, and arrived in Boston by the way of New Haven, Hartford, Springfield and Worcester about five o'clock in the afternoon. The regular time for arriving at the Worcester station was about three and a half o'clock. When we arrived there Mr. Beecher left with a lady that I supposed to be Mrs. Beecher—not personally acquainted with her.

Q. You have seen her here in court to-day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recognize the lady? A. The impression I received was, that she was a lady of the size, height, and very little or no color—pale. That was my impression at that time. I see to-day that I had a correct impression.

Q. You recognize Mrs. Beecher as the person who was with him? A. I thought there was no question about it.

Q. Now, please state the day when you saw him there. A. My impression was that I rode on the cars with Mr. Beecher about a year and a half previous, in the year 1873. I read the statement a second time, and that brought me to thinking, and I determined the next day to examine the books in my office, expecting to find a record there of the expense.

Q. Of your trip? A. Of going to Boston on official business, I did not find any record, but I found entries in my handwriting on the 4th and 5th—on the 3d and 6th. On the 4th and 5th there were entries in the handwriting of my clerk both days. That is and was presumptive evidence that I was absent. I then supposed that I must have gone to Boston on my own private business, and I went to my family record for 1873, and under the date of the 6th of July—of June, and I found this entry: "Expense to Boston, June 4, $5.83."

Q. Now, do you say that it was the 4th of June that you saw Mr. Beecher on the cars? A. Well, Sir, to be sure I might be mistaken about the 4th, but I am quite sure it was so. I wrote to the proprietor of the United States Hotel, where I stopped—

Mr. Fullerton—No, that is objected to.

Mr. Hill—That won't be received if it is objected to, and it seems to be.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I suppose the gentleman will allow me to tell the whole truth.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! certainly.

Mr. Hill—State to his Honor and the jury if you are sure it was the 4th? A. I have no doubt about it. I wish to strengthen that assurance doubly, Sir; that is my only object.

Q. And you have assured yourself in those various ways? A. I had a letter from the proprietor of the United States Hotel—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

The Witness—that I arrived at tea, and occupied room 51.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—I think I will let it stand.

The Witness—I didn't hear you. I am not very conversant with Court proceedings; very seldom I am in court. Excuse me.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF GEORGE L. PERKINS.

Q. Mr. Fullerton—Where were you when you saw Mr. Beecher? A. Allow me to trace myself to that point—

Mr. Fullerton—Please name the spot first. A. I saw him at the Junction, on the Boston and Albany Railroad, at Worcester.

Q. At Worcester? A. At Worcester—the Junction.

Q. That is the first that you saw him, was it? A. That is the first.

Q. What time in the day was that? A. I suppose about—as it is the usual time for the train—this New York train to arrive, about twenty minutes past three.

Q. In the afternoon? A. In the afternoon.

Q. What time did the train leave New-York? A. Eight o'clock in the morning.

Q. Of the same day? A. Of the same day, due at Boston at five o'clock.

Q. Did you get on to the same train? A. On to the same train.

Q. And went to Boston? A. And went to Boston that night.

Q. Did you see Mr. Beecher after you got on the train? A. There is where I saw him; met him in the cars.

Q. After the train left Worcester did you see him? A. No, Sir; he got off the train at Worcester with a lady who was with him, who was, as I stated, about sixty years of age, of good size, and not much color.

Q. There is no mistake about the day? A. No, Sir.

Q. It is the same day you went to Boston? A. My record shows that.

Q. It is the same day you went to Boston? A. The same day I went to Boston, on the 4th of June, 1873.

Q. And your attention was not called to it until you read the opening in this case? A. No, Sir; of course I thought no more of it than meeting any other gentleman.

Q. Did I understand you that Mr. Beecher left the train as you got on it? A. No, Sir; I got on the train at the Junction, and we ran down about two miles, and he got off at the passenger station, in Worcester, of the Boston and Albany train. There he left with the lady who was with him, who I supposed was Mrs. Beecher. I knew Mrs. Beecher had a widowed sister residing there, the widow of Judge Martin.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF GEORGE L. PERKINS.

Mr. Hill—How long from Worcester Junction to Worcester City? A. How long from the Junction to the station where Mr. Beecher got off?

Q. Yes. A. It is perhaps ten minutes, more or less.

Q. You reside at Norwich? A. Norwich, Connecticut.

Q. And came up to the Junction that you have spoken of on your way to Boston? A. Yes, Sir; left at a quarter before twelve, and arrived there about three.

Mr. Hill—That is all, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. Hill—Is Mr. Sedgwick in court?

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE S. SEDGWICK.

George S. Sedgwick, called and sworn on behalf of defendant.

Mr. Evarts—You are a member of our profession? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Practicing law in the City of New York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where is your office? A. No. 11 Pine street.

Q. How long since you were admitted to the practice of the law? A. April, 1870.

Q. And have you pursued your profession ever since in the City of New-York? A. Ever since, Sir.

Q. Were you at any time, and, if so, for how long, an assistant in the office of the United States Attorney of that city—of that district? A. I was clerk there from July, 1869, until, I think, July, 1870, and when Judge Noah Davis came in I became an assistant, so-called.

Q. And continued until when? A. January, 1873.

Q. Were you in the United States Attorney's office at the time of the prosecution against Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin? A. I knew them by sight long before that, Sir.

Q. How long had you known them before that? A. Well, I certainly had known them in the Summer of 1871.

Q. So that you knew their appearance? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. And could identify them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember seeing the procession in honor of the Commune, or in honor of Roscel, whichever it is called, in the City of New-York? A. I do, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. That was on the 17th of December, 1871.

Q. How long have you been acquainted with the person, or appearance of Mr. Tilton? A. It is impossible for me to say, Sir.

Q. Get it as reasonably correct as you can? A. I knew Mr. Tilton by sight at that time.

Q. Now, Sir, did you see Mr. Tilton and Miss Claflin and Mrs. Woodhull in that procession? A. I did, Sir.

Q. How were they situated as towards each other when you saw them? A. To the best of my recollection Mr. Tilton was marching in the procession between Messames Woodhull and Claflin.

Q. And was there any banner of any kind carried, or supported, by the three, or any one of them? A. I have a decided impression on my mind that Mr. Tilton carried a banner.

Q. And how about the ladies? A. They marched on each side.

Q. Did you observe whether they carried the tassels, or not? A. That is my impression, but I won't be very positive.

Q. Now, where were you when you saw this, Mr. Sedgwick? A. I was on the corner of Waverly-place and University-place.

Q. And which way was the procession heading? A. It was heading—it was turning the corner, as I remember, of Waverly-place and University-place, on its way to Fifth avenue, to the best of my belief.

Q. How long did you stand and observe the procession? A. I should say for fifteen or twenty minutes, until it went by; I don't remember.

Mr. Evarts—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. SEDGWICK.

Mr. Fullerton—You cannot be mistaken about the identity of these women? A. No, Sir.

Q. You knew them that day? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And you saw them? A. I did, Sir.

Q. In the procession? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You cannot be mistaken about the identity of Theodore Tilton. A. No, Sir.

Q. You knew him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you saw him in the procession that day? A. I did.

Q. And do you now say positively that you saw him walking between these two women in that procession? A. To the best of my recollection.

Q. You are a lawyer, Mr. Sedgwick? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And understand the import of my question? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you now say positively that you saw Theodore Tilton walking between Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin in the procession that day? A. I say positively that, as I now remember it, I saw Theodore Tilton walking between Mrs. Woodhull and Tennie C. Claflin in that procession, as I remember it to-day.

Q. You do not say positively, then, that that was so, as I understand you? A. I can answer only in that way, Sir.

Q. You will not say positively, then, that you saw him there that day in that relative position. A. Yes, Sir, I will say positively—my memory is the best test I have—to the best of my recollection.

Q. You will say positively, to the best of your recollection. Will you swear it, without that qualification? A. No, Sir, I will not.

Q. Knowing these persons perfectly well, and seeing them that day, you are not enabled to say positively that you saw him in the attitude that you have named, are you? A. I am able to state and swear positively that, as I now remember, Theodore Tilton walked between Tennie C. Claflin and Mrs. Woodhull. I won't swear positively as to the fact, because my—

Mr. Fullerton—Very well.

The Witness—Because my memory is liable to—

Mr. Fullerton—That is all I want to ask you.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. SEDGWICK.

Mr. Evarts—You made no memorandum of this? A. Not at all, Sir.

Q. And you have only your memory to rely upon? A. I have reason to doubt.

Mr. Beach—That is not an answer.

The Witness—That is all I have.

Mr. Evarts—Upon your memory have you any doubt that you saw those three persons together? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not a re-direct examination.

Judge Neilson—I think the answer may stand.

Mr. Beach [To Mr. Fullerton]: Won't you put this question to him, whether his memory is so accurate upon this subject that he will swear positively he saw him walking between those two women that day in that procession.

RE-CROSS EXAMINATION OF MR. SEDGWICK.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I will put the question again. Is your memory so accurate upon this subject that you will swear positively you saw him marching between these two women that day in that procession? A. Yes, Sir, it is.

Q. Now, will you swear positively?

An Eagle stenographer—[To the witness.] What did you say?

The Witness—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Shall I tell the reporter?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—[To The Eagle stenographer.] The Judge asked me if my memory was so positive—

Mr. Fullerton—No, so accurate that you could swear positively you saw him marching between these two women in that procession on that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you mean to swear to it positively, without qualification? A. Not without the qualification I gave before.

Q. Then your memory is not so accurate as to enable you to swear to it positively? A. Possibly not.

Q. Do you know Mr. John Swinton? A. I do not.

Q. Did you see Theodore Tilton marching in that procession with anybody else that day? A. Not to my recollection.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—In what part of the procession were they? A. Immediately behind the catafalque.

Q. Immediately behind it? A. I think so, yes, Sir; I remember seeing a colored man with them; I think they followed immediately behind, but I won't swear positively to that; to the best of my recollection.

Q. And to the best of your recollection he was carrying the flag? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you positive about that? A. Qualified in the same way that I qualified my other answer, to the best of my recollection.

Q. And you think the ladies carried the tassels of that flag? A. That is my impression.

Q. And you qualify that in the same way? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you state anything on that subject that you don't qualify? A. I can swear positively I saw Theodore Tilton marching in the procession with Woodhull and Claflin.

Q. Now, it is positive, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Without any qualification? A. Without any qualification. The only point I qualified was the banner part and the tassel part.

Q. You don't qualify the other parts, do you? A. No, Sir, I didn't intend to.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I think, Mr. Sedgwick, you may be excused.

Mr. Evarts—That is all.

Mr. Morris—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—[Sotto voce.] That is a pretty exhibition.

TESTIMONY OF CECIL C. HIGGINS.

Q. Cecil Campbell Higgins was here called and sworn in behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Evarts—You are a member of our profession? A. I am, Sir.

Q. And practicing in the City of New-York? A. I am, Sir.

Q. How long have you been admitted to the bar? A. Nearly two years.

Q. And where do you pursue your practice? A. No. 11 Pine street.

Q. Did you see the procession for the Commune or Roscel in December, 1871? A. I did, Sir.

Q. In the City of New-York? A. I did, Sir.

Q. You were then residing in the city? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Are you an old resident of the city? A. No, Sir; I have lived there nearly four years.

Q. Now, Sir, did you know the persons of Mr. Tilton, and of Miss Claflin, and of Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you see those three persons, or any, or either of them, in that procession? A. I saw all of them, Sir.

Q. And how were they situated toward each other at the time you saw them? A. They were riding in a carriage.

Q. Together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How were they in respect to a banner? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Now, where did you see these persons? A. At the corner of Fourteenth-st. and University place.

Q. Fourteenth-st. and University place? A. Yes, Sir, Union Square.

Q. Yes; at the corner of Union Square? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where the Lincoln Monument is? A. Yes, Sir, just there.

Q. How long did you observe that procession? A. I suppose I stood at the corner ten or fifteen minutes, I should say; I don't know precisely, but there was quite a crowd there, and I could not get through, and I had to stand some time there.

Q. You saw these persons together? A. Yes, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. HIGGINS.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Higgins, are you positive that you saw these three persons in a carriage? A. I am as positive as I can be about anything.

Q. You have not any doubt at all in your mind? A. No, Sir; none whatever.

Q. And you swear positively to that fact, do you? A. As positive as I can swear to anything in my own recollection.

Q. I don't know how positive that is? A. That is the best I can do.

Q. I don't want you to compare it with anything else in your recollection. Will you swear positively you saw Mrs. Woodhull, Miss Claflin, and Mr. Tilton in a carriage that day? A. Just as sure as I am that you are standing there.

Q. I don't know how sure you are of that. A. Well, my eyesight—

Q. I don't want you to compare it with anything? A. Well, I am positive.

Q. And you swear to it without qualification? A. I do.

Q. You saw these three persons in a carriage that day, riding in the procession? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. Are you positive? A. Yes, Sir, I swear to it positively.

Q. How long had you known Mr. Tilton? A. I didn't know him at all; I never have known him.

Q. You know what I mean. A. I have seen him on the street, and had him pointed out to me.

Q. How often had he been pointed out to you before that? A. Four or five times, I should say; perhaps more, not less.

Q. During what period of time have you had him pointed out to you before that? A. I should say, Sir, within a year, or eighteen months perhaps, at different times; I don't remember the times, but passing in the street—in Wall-st. and Broadway,

Q. In New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How often had you seen Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin? A. I had seen them several times in the street, and had them pointed out in the same way.

Q. And that is the way that you knew these people? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was any one else in the carriage? A. My impression is there was a fourth person; I cannot swear to that, for I don't know who he was, of my own knowledge; I cannot swear positively to that.

Q. Now, their relative positions in the carriage—what were they? A. My impression is that Mr. Tilton and a fourth person, if there was any, were sitting on the front seat; it was a barouche, if I remember right, an open carriage, and the two ladies were in the back seat; I think so; I won't be positive about that.

Q. You say if you remember right. Please remember right, and tell me if it was an open carriage? A. As far as I can remember anything, those were the relative positions.

Q. Do you say it was an open carriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was not a clarence? A. No, Sir, it was an open carriage; I am quite sure about that; at least I think so; I cannot swear positively, but I think so.

Q. The two ladies—where were they sitting? A. On the back seat.

Q. How is it that you can be positive that you saw them sitting on the back seat, if you are not positive it was an open carriage? A. Well, Sir, you can see anybody through the door of a carriage.

Q. Did you see them through the door of the carriage? A. I think not; my recollection and belief is that they were sitting in an open carriage.

Q. Can you not speak positively on the subject? A. No, Sir; I would not like to swear positively to it.

Q. You don't remember distinctly whether it was an open carriage or a close carriage? A. I think it was an open carriage.

Q. You don't remember positively? A. I would not want to swear positively; no, Sir; I would not.

Q. Was there any banner? A. I don't remember any such thing; I don't remember anything about that.

Q. You have no recollection of it? A. None at all, Sir.

Q. You remember there were four persons in the carriage? A. I won't swear there were four; I think there were four.

Q. There were not more than four? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. You were familiar with the city? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How far was that from the corner of Washington place; and University place? A. Waverley place is Sixth-st., I believe this was the corner of Fourteenth-st.

Q. How? A. Waverley place is supposed to be Sixth-st.

Q. Yes? A. It ought to be, in the relative position as to the rows of streets in the city, and, I think, was, the corner of Fourteenth-st.

Q. Yes; then it was eight streets from where Mr. Sedgwick saw them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To the spot where you saw them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you saw them they were in a carriage? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, which way was the procession going? A. My impression is that they were disbanding then, Sir, but I cannot swear positively to that; my impression is they came—they were coming from Fifth-ave. along Fourteenth-st.; but that is merely an impression.

Q. What time in the day was it? A. Sometime— It was after dinner. Sir: the dinner hour being one o'clock, I remember, at that time, my dinner hour on Sundays, and I think it was about between two and three.

Q. Two and three o'clock? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Had you been in company with Mr. Sedgwick? A. I had not, Sir; I didn't know him at that time.
 Q. Were you in company with any one that day? A. No, Sir; I was going up town.
 Q. How? I was then going up town walking.
 Q. Where had you been? A. Been to dinner, Sir.
 Q. Where did you dine? A. Corner of Waverley and University place; No. 1, I think it is.
 Q. How? A. No. 1, I think it is, corner of Waverly, on Washington Square—Waverley and University place.
 Q. Did Mr. Sedgwick dine there that day? A. No, Sir; I didn't then know him.
 Mr. Fullerton—I believe that is all.
 Mr. Tracy—Mr. Southwick.
 Mr. Shearman—Wait a moment, Mr. Higgins.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. HIGGINS.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Higgins at the time that you saw them, or while you stood there, was the procession broken up, or breaking up, or coming to an end? A. That is my impression, Sir; that is my impression.
 Q. That was the end of the procession? A. I think so, Sir.
 Q. The time you saw them was as they came to that point, and then disbanded? A. Yes, Sir.
 Mr. Tracy—Mr. Southwick.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN C. SOUTHWICK.

John C. Southwick called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.
 Mr. Tracy—Mr. Southwick, where do you reside? A. In New-York, No. 16 West 50th.
 Q. Are you engaged in business in the City of New-York? A. I am, Sir.
 Q. With whom? A. Jackson S. Schultz.
 Q. You are a partner of Mr. Schultz? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. How long have you been engaged in business with Mr. Schultz? A. Twenty-three years, as clerk and partner; 18 years as partner, and 5 years as clerk.
 Q. Did you formerly reside in Brooklyn? A. I did, Sir.
 Q. For how many years did you reside in Brooklyn? A. Twenty-two years; 21 years, I think.
 Q. When did you remove to New-York? A. I removed to New-York a year ago June—last June, I think.
 Q. Do you know Franklin Woodruff? A. I do, Sir, very well.
 Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him, I should say, 15 or 16 years; perhaps longer.
 Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I do, Sir.
 Q. How long have you known him? A. About 7 or 8 years to speak with, and I should say 15 to 20 years by sight.
 Q. Did the plaintiff at any time apply to you to aid him in the establishment of The Golden Age? A. He did, Sir.
 Q. When was it? A. In the early part of 1871.
 Q. Where did he make that application to you? A. At my house.
 Q. Did any one come with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who? A. Franklin Woodruff.
 Q. State what transpired between yourself, Tilton and Woodruff on that occasion? A. Mr. Woodruff came in one evening. I should say about half-past 7 or 8 o'clock, after tea, and said: "Mr. Southwick, I wish to have you"—
 Mr. Beach—Who?
 The Witness—Mr. Woodruff said to me—
 Mr. Beach—Wait one moment; who was by?
 The Witness—Mr. Tilton and Mr. Woodruff.
 Mr. Beach—Well, you said Mr. Woodruff came in? A. I said Mr. Woodruff came in, not come in.
 Judge Neilson—Was Mr. Tilton with him when he came in? A. Yes, Sir; he was.
 Mr. Beach—What was that? What was that criticism you indulged on me?
 Mr. Tracy—Go on. You can ask that on cross-examination.
 Mr. Beach—No, Sir; I want to know what he said.
 The Witness—I thought you reflected on me. You said Mr. Woodruff "come" in; I said "came" in.
 Judge Neilson—The reason why counsel interfered and called your attention was that it appeared from your statement that Mr. Woodruff came in alone.
 The Witness—I said Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Tilton.
 Judge Neilson—No.
 The Witness—Didn't I? I beg your pardon.
 Mr. Tracy—The record will show.
 Judge Neilson—It is immaterial what the record will show. I recollect perfectly, and it is proper that the counsel should ask.
 The Witness—Yes, that is all right.
 Judge Neilson—There is no reflection about it.
 Mr. Tracy—The witness had preceded the statement—in the first part of his statement he said that Tilton and Woodruff came to the house together.
 Judge Neilson—I remember what he said. At that moment it looked as if Mr. Woodruff came in alone.

THE WORK OF STARTING THE GOLDEN AGE.

Mr. Tracy—Now, go on and state what occurred.
 A. I said Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Tilton came to my house that night, and Mr. Woodruff said, "John, I wish to have you engage"—or "be"—"to help Mr. Tilton and myself and a few others. We will all start a paper for him!" Well, I said, "Mr. Woodruff"—in the presence of Mr. Tilton—"I am rather surprised to have you come and ask me to help Mr. Tilton." I felt well enough disposed towards him, but I did not know him well enough—I rather wondered at Mr. Woodruff coming to me. Mr. Woodruff says: "I wish you to loan me, or to loan Mr. Tilton, $1,500, and I wish to have Mr. Schultz enlisted also." I said, after talking, as we did for half an hour, or three-quarters of an hour—I finally said to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Woodruff that I would loan the money—that I would see Mr. Schultz, and if Mr. Schultz would loan me the money, that I would do the same.
 Q. Well, what further was said? A. Well that is about all that I recollect, the first night. Of course there was other talk; for instance—

Q. Was there anything said that night, and if so, what, on the subject of his having—the plaintiff having suffered from the treatment of Mr. Bowen? A. No, Sir. I would like one minute. Mr. Tilton, that night, laid out the plan; he said that he could edit a paper, that he could carry it on cheaper than almost anybody that he knew of, and spoke of it in that way, that he was very competent, and Mr. Woodruff said so. It was at the second interview that you asked—about Mr. Bowen.

Q. Well? A. At the second interview they had seen Mr. Schultz, and Mr. Schultz says: "If John wishes—if he will join, I will join," and I agreed; but before I agreed—To go back—before I agreed, I hesitated, and Mr. Woodruff said: "If you knew, John, what Mr. Tilton has suffered at the hands of Henry O. Bowen, you would loan him double that amount. I know you well enough to know that you would do that."

Q. That was at the second conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you and Schultz finally agreed to loan $3,000? A. $1,500 each; yes, Sir.

Q. After that conversation did Mr. Tilton apply to you again on the subject of Mr. Claflin—H. B. Claflin—loaning him money? A. He did, Sir.

Q. Is Mr. Claflin a relative of yours? A. He is.

Q. What relation? A. My uncle.

Q. He is your uncle? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say to you, if anything, about desiring the aid of Mr. Claflin? A. He said to me, "I would like to have the aid of your uncle, Horace B. Claflin." I told him that I did not think Mr. Claflin could be induced to go into the enterprise, and gave him my reason, that while Mr. Claflin hadn't anything perhaps against him, I didn't believe that he would; he had other enterprises, &c. Mr. Tilton made the special point: "I wish, Mr. Southwick, that you would ask Mr. Claflin to ask Henry Ward Beecher whether he, Mr. Beecher, will advise Mr. Claflin to take stock in The Golden Age, and he will do it." I went to Mr. Claflin. I then stated to Mr. Tilton in substance—

Q. Did you go to Claflin? A. Yes, Sir; I did go to Claflin.

Q. What did you say to Claflin? A. I told Mr. Claflin of the request which Mr. Tilton had made of me, and Mr. Claflin says: "I will ask Mr. Beecher." One Sunday after church, Mr. Claflin asked Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—Well, I was telling what I told Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—Go right on. I will get at it in a moment. Did you afterwards see Mr. Claflin after he had seen Mr. Beecher? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Claflin report to you that he had seen Mr. Beecher and spoken with him on the subject? A. He did, Sir.

Q. Did he tell you what Mr. Beecher had said? A. He did, Sir.

Q. Did you afterwards see Mr. Tilton? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you report to Mr. Tilton Mr. Claflin's reply? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What did you say to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Beecher had said on the subject of Mr. Claflin's subscribing? A. I merely said to Mr. Tilton that Mr. Beecher had said to Mr. Claflin that he could not advise him to take any stock in the paper, that he treated it in an indifferent manner, and told him that he must treat it the same as he would any other enterprise.

Q. Now, Mr. Southwick, will you repeat more in detail, if you can, what Mr. Tilton said about Mr. Claflin's consulting Henry Ward Beecher on the subject of his subscribing for The Golden Age. I want Mr. Tilton's precise language, if you can repeat it. A. I have repeated it as near as I can recollect it, and I think that is correct; that he repeated—He said, "I wish to have your uncle join in this enterprise." I told him that I did not think that he could be induced to enter it—to go into it.

Q. Did he say—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Tracy—Did he give any reason why he desired Mr. Claflin's name? A. He did. He said: "I know he is a very strong friend of Mr. Beecher; I know he is—I wish to have him for his name and his influence."

Q. Why did he want him for his name and his influence? A. Well, he even expressed to me—

Q. Did he say? A. No; he said he wished to have him for his name and his influence; that is all.

Q. Did he say anything, and if so what, about Mr. Claflin being a friend of Henry Ward Beecher? A. He did, Sir; he said he was a very strong friend of Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Now, what did he say, if anything, about Mr. Claflin's consulting Mr. Beecher on the subject of his subscribing, and what did he say Mr. Beecher would advise on that subject if consulted? A. I told it once. He said that Mr. Claflin—says he, "You tell Mr. Claflin to ask Henry Ward Beecher whether or not he, Mr. Beecher, will advise Mr. Claflin to join this enterprise, and I tell you"—he said in an emphatic manner—"he will advise him."

Q. That Henry Ward Beecher would advise him? A. That Henry Ward Beecher would advise Mr. Claflin.

Q. Well, when you reported to Mr. Tilton that Henry Ward Beecher did not advise Mr. Claflin to take stock in The Golden Age, what did Mr. Tilton say? A. Mr. Tilton said he was surprised and sorry. I did not tell Mr. Tilton exactly all that Mr. Claflin said; I told that to Franklin Woodruff; but I told him in substance that, that he refused, that he treated the matter in an indifferent manner.

MR. TILTON PROUD OF THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Q. Now, when was this conversation between yourself and Tilton about Claflin's subscribing for the stock of The Golden Age? A. I hadn't any date. I didn't take any date or memoranda; I only know that it was shortly after—after Mr. Schultz and myself had been induced to go into The Golden Age.

Q. Well, was it before The Golden Age started? A. Yes, Sir, I should say it was.

Q. Before the issuing of the first number? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember when the first number of The Golden Age was issued? A. Well, I think it was issued in 1871, somewhere about March.

Q. About March, 1871? A. I have got a bill of it. I could tell by looking at the date, but I think it was about March.

Q. March 4th, 1874, was the first number. Well, you say that you and Mr. Schultz subscribed $3,000 to the stock of The Golden Age? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, from that time on did you see Mr. Tilton from time to time? A. Yes, Sir; I used to meet him.

Q. Do you remember the publication of what is known as the Life of Victoria Woodhull? A. I do, Sir; very well.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton soon after the appearance of that life—that publication? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Where? A. I met him on the Wall-st. ferry-boat as I was going home.

Q. Did you have a conversation with him on the subject of his publishing that Life? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What was said? A. I met Mr. Tilton on the boat, spoke with him, and said, "Mr. Tilton, are you out of your mind?" He turned to me and said, "John Southwick, I know very well what you mean; you refer to my writing the life of Mrs. Woodhull." I said, "That is just what I did mean." He then said, putting his hand on my shoulder, and speaking in so loud a tone that I said to him, "Mr. Tilton, be a little quiet, because people may hear us," and he said in an emphatic manner, putting his hand on my shoulder, "John Southwick, I took an oath before Almighty God, when I was oppressed—on my bended knees, when I was oppressed by Henry C. Bowen, that the first poor creature who demanded assistance or aid from me I would give it to her, and that poor creature came in the person of Mrs. Woodhull, whom I know to be a natural born lady, and as pure as an angel."

Q. Well, did you have further conversation at that time in regard to Mrs. Woodhull? A. I did, Sir.

Q. How long did that conversation continue? A. It continued going from the boat up to Mr. Moulton's, where I left Mr. Theodore Tilton.

Q. At the house of Francis D. Moulton? A. Francis D. Moulton; yes, Sir.

Q. Was he during that walk engaged in talking about Mrs. Woodhull? A. He was, Sir.

Q. What was his manner of speech when speaking of Mrs. Woodhull? A. It was very earnest, very sincere I thought, and he continued the conversation going up the hill.

Q. What did he say further, if anything, in regard to his esteem and affection for her? A. He said in answer to a question of mine—I said, "Mr. Tilton, how is it that Mr. Woodruff, who certainly is a friend of yours, has shown himself to be such, because Mr. Moulton has been sick during the time that you have been trying to raise this money, and he has raised that money, a portion of the time at least, and he is the man—perhaps the most prominent one of all to help you; how is it that Mr. Jackson S. Schultz, who has always admired you very much, and how is it that Isaac H. Bailey, who is probably as intimate a friend as you have in New-York City, to say nothing of myself, in agreeing to loan the money—how is it that every one are all against you?" Mr. Tilton said to me: "What does Mr. Schultz know about Woodhull, or what does Bailey, or what does Woodruff, or yourself? you know nothing about her. I know the lady. I am acquainted with her. I have written her life, and I glory in it.

Q. Did he assign to you, at that time, any reason, except what you have stated, for his writing or publishing the Life of Woodhull? A. No, Sir; I don't think he did, any reason at all; I know he did not; he never did.

Q. Now, was there anything said in that conversation, and if so what, about the effect that that publication would have upon the newspaper? A. Well, I cannot say on that occasion that there was; no, Sir.

MR. TILTON DENIES THE WOODHULL CHARGE OF ADULTERY.

Q. Do you remember the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal? A. I do, Sir, very well.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton soon after that publication? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Where did you see him? A. I met him opposite St. Ann's Church, on my way home, in Clinton-st.

Q. Did you speak to him on the subject of the scandal? A. I did, Sir; he spoke first to me about it, though.

Q. Well, what was said? A. He said—I think he said this: I won't swear—that I was the first man, but at any rate that I was among the first—

Q. Well, when was it? A. That was a few nights before the election. My impression is it was only two or three nights, because he coupled it with this remark. He said to me: "John Southwick, you are about the first friend that I have met to talk on this subject." I said to him, says I: "Of course you will deny it"—about these horrible statements, something of that kind. I said: "Of course you can deny it." "No," he says, "I cannot deny it." I said to him: "Has Henry Ward Beecher been guilty of adultery with your wife?" "No, he has not." "Why can't you deny it?" "I cannot deny it. There is a wheel within a wheel." I then asked him if it were true that Francis D. Moulton had taken a pistol to Henry Ward Beecher's head—had gone to his house." He says: "I can't answer that." I said then: "Mr. Tilton, if Mr. Francis D. Moulton took a pistol to Henry Ward Beecher's head, I think he is an informal coward, and as small a man as I am I would like to have him take a pistol to my head." Mr. Tilton then said emphatically: "John, there isn't one word of truth in that part of the statement, but I am all in a whirl, and I am going around to see Franklin Woodruff, who has a very level head." That is the exact language he used.

Q. That you say was before election? A. Yes, Sir; I am sure it was before election, and I think the very night—As I see, the election was on the 5th or 6th—the first Tuesday. I think it was Saturday night; it was at any rate within two or three nights.

Q. Did he say anything more, further than that there was a wheel within a wheel; did he amplify that at all? A. He said that his head was all in a whirl, and he was going around to see Franklin Woodruff. We talked half an hour.

Q. You say he said that he could not deny it, because there was a wheel within a wheel. Now, did he amplify that part of his statement any further than that? A. I don't recollect that he did. Those are the main strong points that struck me.

Q. What was his manner when you asked him—when he replied to you when you asked him: "At least you can tell me whether Henry Ward Beecher is guilty of adultery with your wife," what was his manner when he said that? A. He said: "No, Sir, he is not." He said it in a decided, positive way.

MR. SCHULTZ'S CHARGE OF BLACK-MAIL.

Q. Now, did you see Mr. Tilton again—did you see Mr. Tilton on New Year's Day, the first of January, 1873, at Moulton's house? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you have any talk with him that day about your partner, Mr. Schultz, having called him a black-mailer? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Well, tell us what was said then and there on that subject? A. I was calling on Mrs. Moulton, and another lady was there in the room, and Mr. Tilton came in and said: "I wish you a happy New Year. What is that you say about Beecher?" I had been speaking to Mrs. Moulton about Mr. Beecher's speech made on December 28d, the celebration of New-England, which came that year on Monday, and was on the 22d—what a remarkable, what a fine speech it was, and that it was all written on the bill of fare, the notes of which I had, I think, then in my pocket; and I said: "Mr. Beecher"—I was talking with Mrs. Moulton, and Mr. Tilton said, as he came in, "What is that you say about Beecher?" and I repeated to him what I had said to Mrs. Moulton. Mr. Tilton says: "Your partner has been pleased to call me, I understand, within a few days, a blackmailer." I said: "Mr. Tilton, if he has, I think he has had good cause for it." Says he: "He has not had good cause for it." I said: "Mr. Tilton, I know Schultz well enough to know that he is not a malicious man, he is as kind-hearted a man as ever lived, and I know what he has thought of you until lately, and if he has called you a blackmailer I think he has had good cause for it." Says he: "He has not, and Henry Ward Beecher has written," or "will write"; I am not sure whether he said, "has written," or "will write," one of the two—"has written," or "will write him a letter to-day, and he will retract that to-morrow." I said, "Mr. Tilton"—

Q. Whom did he mean by "he"? A. Jackson S. Schultz—that Mr. Beecher had written to Jackson S. Schultz.

Q. And that Jackson S. Schultz would retract the charge of blackmailing to-morrow? A. Yes, sir; I said to Mr. Tilton, if Mr. Beecher had been foolish enough to write Mr. Schultz, or should be induced to write Mr. Schultz, that he would get just as good as he sent, because I knew that Mr. Schultz would not make a charge without he had some ground; Mr. Tilton then again said: "He will retract it to-morrow." I then turned to Mr. Tilton and said: "Mr. Tilton, whether Mr. Schultz has made the charge or not, I don't think New Year's is the day, or the place in the presence of two ladies, for you to arraign my partner and bring your private griefs here," and I bade them all good morning; and that is the whole of it.

Q. Did you afterward see Mr. Tilton at your office? A. I did, Sir; yes, Sir; some time after.

THE TERMS OF THE SUBSCRIPTION.

Q. How many days after that did he come there and have an interview with Mr. Schultz? A. Well, I should judge it was two or three days after.

Q. Was that the occasion when Mr. Bailey was with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You heard Mr. Schultz's evidence on the stand, describing the interview between himself and Mr. Tilton at that office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was this the same interview? A. That was the same interview; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, you have stated that you and your partner subscribed to The Golden Age. Will you state the terms of that subscription? A. We were to loan—

Mr. Beach—I suppose that is in writing, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—No, there is no proof that it is in writing, yet. It was a verbal subscription, for aught that appears up to this time, and for which notes were subsequently given, as your Honor will remember, on the 16th day of September, 1871, the subscription having been made in the Spring or Winter previous, that is, the agreement to subscribe, and notes were given for half of it, $750, on the 16th of September, 1871, I think. Those notes were taken up by subsequent—

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, it is not of any consequence, Sir. Go on.

Mr. Tracy—What were the terms of that subscription? A. We were to loan Mr. Tilton, each of us, $1,500, for which we were to receive seven per cent. per annum. I drew the form of the notes, I think, and perhaps drew some of the notes; at any rate Mr. Woodruff sent up the form of a note, and I objected to it. It gave us permission to examine the books of The Golden Age, and the accounts, &c., as I recollect it, and I sent back to Mr. Woodruff that whatever money I loaned to Mr. Tilton I would rather loan to him right out, and I drew a form of note something like this: "To value received, I promise to pay John C. Southwick $700, with interest at seven per cent., contingent upon the success of The Golden Age, of which I am the sole editor and proprietor." That form was adopted, and Mr. Woodruff said that I was right.

Q. When did you pay any amount on your subscription that you had made to The Golden Age; when did you pay it? A. I think Sept. 15th; I have looked at my books—

Q. Sept. 15th, 1871? A. I think that is the date of my check.

Q. And what did you receive for that check from Mr. Tilton? A. I don't recollect; I received afterwards—I received afterwards this note, signed in the—

Q. In the way you have stated? A. The form I have stated; yes, Sir.

Q. What proportion of that subscription did you pay at that time? A. $750.

Q. One-half? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And, as I understand, all the subscribers did the same? A. Well, half of what they agreed.

Q. Now, afterwards, was there any change made in your agreement about The Golden Age; and if so, when was it? A. The change was made in 1872; I think somewhere in the Summer. Shall I—can I state what Mr. Woodruff—how it was brought about?

Q. Go right on? A. Mr. Woodruff came to my house and said—

Mr. Beach—You need not state that.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! yes; Mr. Woodruff was the agent of the plaintiff, who consummated that arrangement, as already appears in evidence.

Mr. Beach—We object to it. There is no such evidence in the case.

Mr. Tracy—You must forget the evidence of Mr. Woodruff, I take it.

Mr. Beach—No; I don't forget it.

Judge Neilson—Well, a change was made.

The Witness—A change was made; yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Can you say, without giving the conversation—can you say whether that was on the intervention of Mr. Woodruff? It was, entirely, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Now, go on.

Mr. Tracy—On the intervention of Mr. Woodruff? A. Yes Sir.

Q. What was the reason assigned for that change?

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can take the conversation.

Mr. Tracy—I don't ask for the conversation now. [To Mr. Shearman.] Can you turn to the testimony of Mr. Woodruff on that subject? I ask now for the reason that led to that change. I will take another question, preliminary, before we get to that. [To the witness:] Did you have a talk with Mr. Tilton about he change? A. I don't recollect that I did.

Q. Did you before or after it was made? A. I don't recollect that I did.

Q. Well, what was the change that was made then? A. Well, the change was made that we were to give up the notes which we held to Mr. Tilton; and then to be released from further payment of further moneys—any further amount.

Q. You were to give up the security that you had received for the one-half paid in? A. To make him a present in consideration of being released from any further payment.

Q. Yes; any further payment? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, with whom was that arrangement made? A. With Franklin Woodruff.

Q. For whom did he claim to act in that arrangement?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir; wait a minute.

THE CONVERSATION BETWEEN MR. SOUTHWICK AND MR. WOODRUFF OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Tracy—Now, I propose to show that Mr. Woodruff claimed to act as the agent of Mr. Tilton; that the arrangement was consummated with Mr. Woodruff, and affirmed by Mr. Tilton, and the note returned, and the release given for the balance of the subscription.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Tracy requests that I should read a little of the evidence of Mr. Woodruff. I read from page 349 of the printed book. [Reading:] Mr Tilton told me about his being thrown out of The Union and Independent, and Mr. Moulton had talked with me about the case of Mr. Tilton's position, and Mr. Tilton was out of employment, and he expressed a wish that if he could only have a paper, and I, without thinking of it, asked him what it would cost to start a paper.

Then he proceeds to relate Mr. Tilton's conversation with him on that subject; then he goes on to tell how he went around and made the arrangement; and then he tells in relation to this very matter what was done between him and Mr. Tilton. [Reading:]

In June, 1872, Mr. Tilton says, one day, that The Golden Age is about paying its way, and that he only owed two or three hundred dollars, * * * and I said to Mr. Tilton, "Now, instead of calling in for the rest of this money, wouldn't it be better for these people that have—for the contributions—for the notes—for the amount that has been paid in, that they should surrender them as a part of the loss that had been incurred in starting The Golden Age, and instead of calling in the other $6,000, and you have $12,000 in debt, not call it in, relinquish it, and be free of debt."

I beg your Honor's pardon, but this is not very intelligible.

Well, that was discussed, and he said he did not think they would do it. I said, "I think they would do it;" and he said it would be a very generous thing if they did. I told him I would try it; so I saw them, and that was the way it was disposed of.

Judge Neilson—I think this will go on, on that supposition.

Mr. Beach—That what?

Judge Neilson—I think he can proceed, on that, to state what the arrangement was, what Mr. Woodruff did.

Mr. Beach—Why, there was no constitution of an agent, Sir, there. Mr. Woodruff made the proposition, or suggestion, to Mr. Tilton that such an arrangement would be advisable in the then condition of the paper. Mr. Tilton accepted it as a very generous and beneficent offer, but said that he did not think that the subscribers would unite in it. Mr. Woodruff says: "I think they will, and I will try it."

Judge Neilson—Then Mr. Tilton assents to his making the experiment.

Mr. Beach—No assent to that; he did not assent or dissent.

Judge Neilson—Well, silence was an assent that he should try it.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, does that make him the agent of Mr. Tilton—that declaration?

Judge Neilson—Not for any extraneous conversation; but, for that particular thing, I think it does.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I except to the ruling, if your Honor so rules.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a thing that Mr. Woodruff could do without the assent of Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! no.

Mr. Beach—What is the reason he could not?

Mr. Fullerton—He did not require Mr. Tilton's assent to do it; he simply stated the fact to Mr. Tilton that he was going to try to accomplish that end. Your Honor will perceive there is no agency established by anything that took place there at all.

Mr. Tracy—Shall I proceed, your Honor?

Judge Neilson—Yes, [To the witness.] Did Mr. Woodruff apply to you—

Mr. Tracy—Yes; did Mr. Woodruff apply to you to surrender the notes you held against Mr. Tilton in consideration of being released? A. He did, Sir.

Q. What did he say?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Tracy—[To the witness.] On that subject, of course?

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, that is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Well now, Mr. Tracy, suppose Mr. Woodruff proceeded to say various things that Mr. Tilton could not have anticipated he would say; use arguments that he could not have anticipated?

Mr. Tracy—Then it will have to be rejected after it is told.

Mr. Evans—Separate the wheat from the chaff.

Judge Neilson—He could do anything that was necessary to bring about that end.

Mr. Fullerton—If you go into it, suppose there is no grain of wheat there; then what?

Mr. Evans—Then do as with other testimony.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will remember the evidence. Mr. Woodruff expresses to Mr. Tilton a belief that that arrangement can be consummated. Mr. Tilton expresses a doubt; says it would be very advantageous to him if it could be, but he doubts whether it can be. Mr. Woodruff says, "I think it can, and I will undertake it," and thereupon Mr. Tilton assents. Now, he goes and undertakes it; he consummates it, and the notes are returned to Mr. Tilton and the subscription released. It seems to me that that makes Mr. Woodruff an agent, and that we are entitled to know what he said to Mr. Southwick on that subject to induce him to surrender that note.

Mr. Beach—Well, your Honor, it is a most extraordinary proposition that the declarations, the arguments, and the reasons which may have been presented to the mind of Mr. Southwick by Mr. Woodruff to induce him to comply with this arrangement are obligatory upon Mr. Tilton. Mr. Tilton is indebted to these parties; one of the creditors comes to him and says, "I think this indebtedness may be canceled if you will release the obligation of the subscription for the balance." Why, Mr. Tilton is ready to do that. "That will be generous on the part of my creditors who hold my notes; I will do that cheerfully, but I don't think they will do it." Mr. Woodruff answers, "I think they will; I am one; I will do it, and I will try and accomplish it with the others." Now, does your Honor rule, under just those circumstances, that Mr. Woodruff may make any declaration he pleases to Mr. Southwick, or any one of these creditors, and bind Mr. Tilton by the reasons which he then gives? Can your Honor find in this evidence anything like the creation of an agency? It is a voluntary undertaking on the part of Mr. Woodruff; he suggests it; he is the author of the idea, and he is the principal who, he says, will carry it out. Mr. Tilton is willing to accept the obligation, the generous gift on the part of his patrons, and that is all he says or does. Mr. Woodruff says, "I will undertake it." Of course Mr. Tilton accedes to his undertaking it, but he confers upon him no authority to make representations, to make conditions, to make statements which shall bind him, and no authority is given to him except to follow out his own first suggested plan, if your Honor rules that to be an agency.

Judge Neilson—There was an agency as far as this, that Mr. Woodruff, it was understood (tacitly understood), was to proceed to try this experiment.

Mr. Beach—Undoubtedly.

Judge Neilson—And procure this arrangement if he could, and if he had proceeded and had, as it now appears, procured the arrangement to be consummated, his authority was sufficient to prevent Mr. Tilton from receding from it.

Mr. Beach—Undoubtedly, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It bound him so far.

Mr. Beach—Well, grant that.

Judge Neilson—Therefore, it savors of an agency; but I admit that independent declarations and conversations, not really necessary to that business, would not be admissible.

Mr. Beach—The thing to be done, Sir, was simple and plain. It was the surrender of the obligations of Mr. Tilton upon the equivalent surrender of the balance of the subscription. Now, no representations were to be made; it was a simple, naked proposition of the discharge and release of mutual obligations between the parties. Mr. Tilton owing his notes, these parties owing their subscription, the proposition is presented to Mr. Tilton, by Mr. Woodruff, that they can be canceled, mutually canceled. Mr. Tilton says: "I accept that as a generous proposition upon the part of these gentlemen; I am willing to accede to that." Now, does that willingness, Sir, to accept that gratuity upon the part of the gentlemen who had aided him, expressed to one of the parties, authorize that person to make statements or representations or agreements, beyond the simple fact of the surrender?

Judge Neilson—No; but it enabled him to do all that would be necessary to consummate that act.

Mr. Beach—It did not enable him, Sir, to make any representations to Mr. Southwick which could operate upon his mind to induce him to do that act. Mr. Tilton gave no authority to Mr. Woodruff to make any such representations, or to present any arguments. Your Honor will remember that Mr. Woodruff came as the principal actor and the proposer of this arrangement. It was not suggested by Mr. Tilton, it did not originate with him. Mr. Tilton is a passive recipient of this proposition upon the part of one of his creditors to cancel their obligations. And, of course, he says: "I will accept it with cheerfulness." But he confers no agency upon Mr. Woodruff; he accedes, acquiesces in the proposition of Mr. Woodruff to undertake to accomplish it, but he gives no countenance or no authority as to the means which are to be used by Mr. Woodruff to accomplish it, and I submit to your Honor that there is no such agency, no such relation between the parties as authorized Mr. Woodruff to make any communication as on behalf of Mr. Tilton to this gentleman or any other, except that Mr. Tilton was willing to accept that arrangement.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tracy, what do you purpose to prove by this witness?

Mr. Tracy—I propose to prove what passed between—Judge Neilson—Well, as to what?

Mr. Tracy—Between Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Southwick, which induced him to assent to this arrangement, and surrender Mr. Tilton's note which he held against him for $750 to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—Now, as to what that was—what do you purpose to prove it was?

Mr. Tracy—I propose to show that Mr. Woodruff said to him that now was the time for him, Southwick and others, to get out of The Golden Age; that it was a bankrupt concern; that the publication of the life of Woodhull and Mr. Tilton's connection with the Woodhulls had killed it, and that he could consummate that arrangement with Mr. Tilton, and Mr. Tilton had authorized him to make that arrangement, by which he would release the balance of the subscription, if they would surrender the notes which they held, and thereupon he did it.

Mr. Beach—Now, you see, Sir, now you see Mr. Woodruff had been told by Tilton that there was only two or three hundred dollars of debt, and that The Golden Age had got to be a paying concern, and yet the counsel proposes upon what passed between Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Tilton to create an agency which authorized Mr. Woodruff to go to this gentleman and make statements which never occurred to the mind of Mr. Tilton, and which were untrue and directly antagonistic to the information that had been given by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Woodruff.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it will be remembered that Mr. Woodruff was the original agent of Mr. Tilton in making the arrangement whereby this aid was obtained from these munificent gentlemen in the establishment of The Golden Age. At a certain stage of the condition of that newspaper, Mr. Woodruff says to Mr. Tilton: "I think that it would be a judicious thing for you to have the obligations of these gentlemen to pay the further sums that their original subscription obliges them to, relieved by you, and they give up your notes for the past." Your Honor will remember that Mr. Tilton's obligation for the money that was acquired for his enterprise was an imperfect obligation, not an absolute obligation.

Judge Neilson—Contingent.

Mr. Evarts—Contingent entirely upon prosperity and means. In other words, it was a generous aid to be met in the same spirit by him if prosperity came, and if not he was not to be held as a debtor. Now, at that stage of the matter, to be relieved from the future prosperity's obliging him to return the money and to be relieved from, and to proceed free from, that obligation, Mr. Woodruff makes this suggestion to him, and Mr. Tilton accepts it as a valuable proposition, so far as he is concerned, but doubts whether it can be accomplished, and Mr. Woodruff says to him, "I think I can bring it about," or "I think I can accomplish it," proposing to him, therefore, that it was a transaction that would need some management, and some argument, and some influence, and that management, that argument, and that influence were to be at his service to gain a desired result for him. Mr. Tilton as much as says, "Well, if you can accomplish it, it will be a great thing for me," and leaves him to undertake it, and accepts the results and keeps them. Now, if that does not commission Mr. Franklin Woodruff to conduct that negotiation as the representative of Mr. Tilton and his interests and his side of the negotiation, it would be difficult to find any such authority if it were written out with a power of attorney under seal, prima facie you have, therefore, a right to show what this agent thus empowered did toward the result desired for his principal; it should be produced by the witness, and is my learned friend upon his suggestion, upon your Honor's inquiry as to what the scope of those influences and those arguments will be—is the extent of them such as to preclude them? Why, certainly not. He went to this man and used with him, for the accomplishment of an object in Mr. Tilton's favor, the statements of the facts as Mr. Woodruff understood them. Now, it is not for my learned friends to say that Mr. Franklin Woodruff was a false and deceitful agent. He undertook to deal for this principal of his, in the interest of that principal, by a shrewder business management than the principal himself could furnish, and the principal accepted him rather than himself to undertake it. And what he did with any one subscriber is, on the face of this matter, done by Mr. Tilton's authority. Now, unquestionably, when any agent undertakes to do business for a principal, the agent may do things that are outside of his authority, and for which his principal should not be held. But we are not in any such nice dispute as that. My learned associate has informed your Honor as to the scope of the representations which were all within the argument and tending to the result which was accomplished, and of which Mr. Tilton reaped the benefit.

Judge Neilson—Of what value to us, Mr. Evarts, is Mr. Woodruff's opinion about the effect of the Woodhull publication upon The Golden Age? That is the only point evidently that Mr. Tracy has in view, as if it would be beneficial. Of what value would that be?

Mr. Everts—Well, the question—it is not for me to weigh testimony, and say how much and how important it is; your Honor understands that.

Judge Neilson—If his testimony is the expression of Mr. Woodruff's opinion upon that subject.

Mr. Everts—Supposing Mr. Tilton had personally said it. The question is, whether or no it is within the purview of the authority, and is covered by the original mandate, or the subsequent ratification. Now, on the face of it, if it is an argument that is used in good faith toward Mr. Tilton to accomplish the object or tends to the result—

Judge Neilson—There could be no subsequent ratification unless Mr. Tilton knew that Mr. Woodruff had made such a statement.

Mr. Everts—Well, they are to relieve themselves of it by showing that they did not know. You must have some principle by which, when errands are intrusted to messengers, the messenger speaks concerning his errand and binds his principal who sends with him. If he is sent only to put a letter in the post-office, that is the end of it. If it is to use influence and argument to induce creditors to surrender claims, and relieve the party for whom the negotiations are instituted, why, then the action of the party that makes the negotiation, keeping within the purview of the negotiation, tending toward the object desired, is the action of the principal himself.

Mr. Beach—I do not perceive, Sir, that the gentleman's argument has added any very valuable suggestion to this discussion. He assumes the fact of an agency, and with that premise admitted, it is not very difficult to reason to the conclusion that the declarations of the agent within the line and scope of his agency are admissible against the principal. But the primary question before your Honor upon this objection is, whether Mr. Woodruff was constituted the agent of Mr. Tilton to use arguments, to make suggestions, to enter into undertakings with Mr. Southwick beyond the simple question of the surrender of these notes out of this subscription or these subscriptions. What was the relation of these parties? They stood, Sir, in an antagonistic attitude so far as written obligation was concerned. If the proposition which they attempt to prove through this gentleman is true, why, then, Mr. Woodruff came to Mr. Tilton for the purpose of relieving himself and his co-subscribers to this paper from an unfortunate enterprise. His object was not to bestow a benefaction upon Mr. Tilton, not to be generous and liberal to Mr. Tilton, but to get himself and his co-subscribers relief from an onerous obligation under the assumption that this paper was in desperate and falling circumstances. Now, they stood, Sir, in directly opposing positions upon the ground of the question of interest. Mr. Woodruff, from whatever motive you may choose to assume, makes the proposition to Mr. Tilton to surrender the notes they hold against him upon the discharge of their subscriptions to this paper. Mr. Tilton says, "I accept that proposition cheerfully, Mr. Woodruff. It is generous and liberal, so much so that I do not believe your associates will assent to the proposition." Mr. Woodruff says, "I think they will; I think I can accomplish it." Now, according to the record, Mr. Tilton says nothing to that. But if you assume that by his silence he accepts the proposition that Mr. Woodruff shall make that effort, I then contend to your Honor that there is no such relation as that existing between principal and agent between these parties upon that subject. If there was, Sir, to what does it extend? Why to the simple proposition of surrendering one piece of paper upon the release of another. But to pretend that on the acceptance of that proposition by Mr. Tilton, and the suggestion of Mr. Woodruff that he will attempt to accomplish it, Mr. Woodruff shall be permitted to make declarations hostile to Mr. Tilton, not necessary to the accomplishment of the principal object, suggestions no way presented to the mind of Mr. Tilton and no way suggested by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Woodruff, that it gives Mr. Woodruff unlimited agency to make these declarations injurious and detrimental to Mr. Tilton will be, Sir, one of the most extraordinary propositions that was ever sustained in a court of justice. Recur, Sir, to the circumstances. As between Mr. Woodruff and Mr. Tilton the understanding is, "this paper is prosperous; it owes but $200 or $300. It is now upon a successful footing, and if you can get relief from your obligations to these subscribers to the amount of half their subscriptions upon condition of relieving the balance of the subscriptions, you will be free and and you can pursue your career of prosperity." Now, they pretend to prove that Mr. Woodruff goes to Mr. Southwick and represents to him that the prospects of this paper have been blighted by the publication of the Woodhull Life or Biography, that it is in desperate and falling circumstances, and to conclude, upon the general issues of this case—to conclude Mr. Tilton by a declaration of that character. Now, if there were any agency, Sir, is that within the line of the agency? If your Honor authorizes me to apply to a creditor of yours—pardon the assumption, Sir—

Judge Neilson—Well, it is not an unreasonable one, Sir, at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. Beach—Well, I hope it is, Sir. But if a gentleman applies to me, Sir, to make an arrangement with my creditor by which I shall be released from an obligation upon a certain consideration, and I authorize him to accomplish that project, does it constitute him an agent with the powers of an agent unlimited and discretionary within the particular object to be accomplished? May he go to my creditor and make just such representations and statements as he please and bind me with them and by them as if I had communicated to him authority to make such statements? Why, the thing to be accomplished, Sir, is plain; it is not to be done by negotiation; it is the simple proposition of a naked fact, there is no complication about it, no arguments to be used; a proposition is to be submitted by Mr. Woodruff from Mr. Tilton to those subscribers—"I will surrender the balance of your subscriptions if you will surrender my notes." And that is the simple thing to be done by the agent, no persuasions to be added, no inducements to be offered, no other consideration to be presented, no arguments or reasons to be adduced, but the agency is to present to those gentlemen, if there be any agency at all, that simple, naked proposition of the mutual surrender of those papers, and that is all there is about it, Sir. He was authorized to do that, and authorized to do no more; it is simply to present that alternative or proposition to these gentlemen. Now, I submit to your Honor that it would be most dangerous and unjust to permit the declarations of Mr. Woodruff, the reasons which he may have presented to Mr. Southwick, or to any other gentleman, to be given in evidence before this jury upon the general issues of this case, those declarations not bearing upon this particular proposition, but having an undue and improper influence upon other questions which are to be agitated and discussed and decided in the case. I object to it, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Would your Honor allow me to make a simple suggestion?

THE CONVERSATION RECEIVED.

Judge Neilson—One moment. I think this closes the argument. I think I will take this testimony.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Southwick, please proceed and state what Mr. Woodruff said to you on that occasion? A. Mr. Woodruff came—

Mr. Beach—That I object to, Sir, and reserve an exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; proceed, Sir.

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff came to my house one evening and said, after talking about some other matters, "John we must get out of this Golden Age business."

Mr. Tracy—Louder.

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff said, "John, we must get out of this Golden Age business." I said to him, "I don't see how we can get out of it; we have agreed to give the money—$750 more; I will give mine to-morrow, and Mr. Schultz will give his, and that is the end of the business." Mr. Woodruff said, "We must get out of it because"—I said, "How can we?" He says, "Theodore Tilton has not conducted the paper as he ought to have done; he wrote the Woodhull Life." He then went very strongly—

Mr. Beach—Now, I object to these two last, Sir, specifically and move to strike them out.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will take the whole and then see on reflection whether that will be stricken out.

The Witness—He wrote the Woodhull Life and then he said, "he used his paper very strongly in the interest of Mr. Greeley." I said to Mr. Woodruff, "What have we to do with the Woodhull Life or with Mr. Greeley?" It was for that very reason that we drew up the notes so the notes would not be marketable; we put our money there so that would be the end of it, so that he could have no claim on us, and if he had wrote the lives of 50 women, and gone for Greeley ten times stronger, we had nothing to do with it. Mr. Woodruff then went on and made a severe charge against Mr. Tilton.

Q. What did he say?

Mr. Beach—I object to it Sir—"He went and made a severe charge against Mr. Tilton"—I object to it.

Mr. Morris—The agent making a charge against his principal, his principal bound by that?

Mr. Tracy—Oh! we are not protecting the agency of Mr. Woodruff.

Mr. Beach—Well, we are, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I know; we don't object to your saying that he misrepresented or made charges; we don't care anything about that; we are only showing what induced us to surrender that note; that is all.

Mr. Beach—Is that within the line of the agency, Sir, if you assume the agency? Is it within the line of the agency?

Judge Neilson—The agent to make a severe charge against Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—No, it is a novel way of presenting the action of an agent, of course. I think we will take this conversation and see what it amounts to, and strike out parts of it if on reflection it seems to deserve it.

Mr. Beach—If this is only an experiment, why, then, well and good.

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff said that ever since Theodore Tilton had slandered Mr. —, the name I would rather not call—a gentleman in Brooklyn of as high social standing and commercial standing in New-York as there is in Brooklyn—"ever since he made that statement I have lost faith in him, and I dare not trust him. If he will slander this gentleman he will slander somebody else." That was the cause and the whole cause to my mind, as Mr. Woodruff then put it to me, why we went out of The Golden Age; it was to save, as Mr. Woodruff says, the $750.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, I move to strike out this answer.

Mr. Tracy—Wait a moment.

Mr. Beach—Why, no, we won't.

Mr. Tracy—Oh! I have not got all the conversation; the Judge said he would take it all.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will take it all.

Mr. Tracy—What did he say, if anything, about the release of your subscriptions if you would surrender the notes? A. Well, that was said afterward; afterward, the next time I saw him, Mr. Woodruff said to me—

By Mr. Fullerton—That is after the surrender, isn't it? A. No, no; after this meeting.

Mr. Beach—Now, your Honor perceives that this is a conversation where the question of the release of those notes or of those subscriptions was not suggested at all to Mr. Southwick, where, if there was any agency, he had not entered upon his agency.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will go to the next conversation now and see what that is.

Mr. Morris—Well, hadn't we better dispose of this one now.

Mr. Beach—Never mind.

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff said decidedly and distinctly, "Would you not, John, if you can be released from further payment of moneys, give up, make a present of these notes?" and I said "Certainly; that is business, and I would be very glad to do it."

Q. That was in the first conversation? A. Yes, Sir, in the first conversation.

Q. Then did you have a further conversation with him before the surrender was consummated. A. We had a further conversation; that I won't be sure; it was after that, at any rate, when Mr. Woodruff said to me in a joking, pleasant way: "Well," he says, "Johnny, you did n't come out so bad after all, for if you lost $750 by going in, you made $750 by coming out;" I told him it was a very queer way of making money, but I had no hard feelings against him so it was all pleasant.

Q. When did the surrender take place? A. I could not tell the date.

Q. How soon after this conversation with Mr. Woodruff? A. I should say it was two or three weeks; I could not tell you exactly.

Q. Was it that conversation that led to the surrender? A. It was so far as Mr. Woodruff and myself were concerned; I don't know what Mr. Woodruff said to Mr. Tilton.

Q. It was that conversation that led you to surrender Tilton's notes? A. Yes, Sir; and Mr. Schultz too.

Mr. Beach—I move now to strike out the first conversation; all of it.

Judge Neilson—Well, let the motion be entered; I will have an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. Beach—And I move also to strike out the second conversation.

Judge Neilson—You will save your right.

Mr. Beach—A separate motion.

Mr. Evarts—We shall wish to be heard on that motion Judge Neilson—It is a matter of secondary character quite collateral.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we shall ask to be heard.

Judge Neilson—Is there anything more? Do you want to cross-examine, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. SOUTHWICK.

By Mr. Beach (showing witness a paper)—Is that your signature to that paper? A. Yes, Sir, it is.

Q. Did you understand the paper when you signed it? A. I will read it if you will permit me; I have not read it since I signed it. [After reading the paper.] Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I will read it. [Ex. 62.]

NEW-YORK, June 11, 1873.

Mr. THEODORE TILTON—Dear Sir: We, the undersigned, desiring to contribute to the loss sustained by you in establishing The Golden Age, do cheerfully return herewith the notes canceled which you gave for money loaned. Wishing you continued success and prosperity in the years to come, and congratulating you on having so securely founded the paper, and that you are now free from debt, we are, dear Sir, yours truly.

Mr. Beach—Following are the names of the subscribers, Mr. Southwick, the witness, among them. We have no questions for you, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Southwick.

The Court then adjourned until 11 o'clock on Thursday morning.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

ALLEGED CONSPIRACY TO PUBLISH THE SCANDAL.

TESTIMONY OF THREE COLORED SERVANTS OF MRS.

WOODHULL IN REGARD TO MR. TILTON'S PERSONAL RELATIONS WITH MRS. WOODHULL—EVIDENCE OF MR. TILTON'S HAVING URGED THE PUBLICATION IN WOODHULL & CLAFLIN'S WEEKLY ON THE GROUND THAT PLYMOUTH CHURCH WOULD PAY $100,000 TO SUPPRESS FURTHER DISCLOSURES—MRS. WOODHULL'S THREATS TO MAKE MR. BEECHER PRESIDE AT THE STEINWAY HALL MEETING—THE HUMORS OF CROSS-EXAMINATION.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1873.

The testimony in the Tilton-Beecher suit to-day was devoted exclusively to an examination into the personal relations between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull, in support of Mr. Tracy's declaration in the opening address that the defense would show conspiracy between them to publish the scandal. Three colored servants of Mrs. Woodhull at the time of the publication were called to the stand with this view.

The first and most important of these witnesses was James B. Woodley, formerly a slave in Virginia, who came North in 1869 to invest his savings where he had heard people were paying ten per cent interest. This remark and a similar one later in the examination indicated the man to be of an economical and secretive character. Mr. Fullerton pressed him to tell how much money he had saved while in the South, but he refused to tell, and said by way of emphasis "that he wouldn't tell that to his wife, if he had one." His testimony, told in considerable detail, was to the general effect that Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were intimate to an affectionate degree; that he had seen them "sitting together with their arms around each other," which, the witness added—when a little laugh was raised—he "thought was perfectly natural;" and, finally, that Mr. Tilton had almost habitually lunched with Mrs. Woodhull and her sister for months prior to the publication of the scandal. His most important testimony, however, was in the direction of establishing the alleged conspiracy. He swore that he had heard Mr. Tilton urge Mrs. Woodhull to publish the scandal, which at the time was in proof slips, on the ground that she could get $100,000 from Plymouth Church to suppress the further details. This he had urged against the remonstrances of Mrs. Woodhull's husband, who said the result of such a publication would be that all would be sent to jail. This astounding piece of evidence the witness stuck to on the cross-examination. Both sides evidently laid great stress upon the testimony of Woodley, for Mr. Evarts in person conducted the direct examination, and Mr. Fullerton made long and continued efforts to break the force of what the witness said.

The examination was attended with several amusing incidents. On the resumption of the cross-examination after recess the witness appeared to have got over his timidity, and showed a tendency to speak his mind on various matters not connected with his evidence. Mr. Fullerton attempted to get at the witness's ideas as to what a proof sheet was. The witness, without saying whether he thought a proof was written or printed, hinted that he had told all he could on the subject. Mr. Fullerton pressed for an answer. "Well, I think we have taken up enough time on that matter," smilingly suggested the cross-examined. "Well, if you will answer the question we will not waste any more time on it," persisted his interrogator. "Yes, but," objected the witness, "I do answer it you will have a thousand more just like it." "I shall have to ask your Honor's assistance," said Mr. Fullerton. "Well, the witness is the first one that has yet come to help me in this matter of wasting time," said the Judge, evidently well pleased with the witness's ideas on the value of time. The witness also showed a great aversion to repeating his account of scenes already described. "I thought we had got all through with that, and now we are going back to it," was his constant protest, and, "You have got three matters all mixed up together now, Sir," was his desponding comment on the result of the repetition.

The re-direct examination was devoted to an investigation of what the witness termed "the usual greeting" of Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull. "Well, what was their usual greeting?" asked Mr. Evarts. "Why, they used to bow and kiss, just as any two ladies do when they meet, you know," answered the witness, who made all haste to get away from the stand amid the laughter which followed.

Richard A. Gray, the second witness of the day, had also been a servant of Mrs. Woodhull, and testified to some conversations which he had heard between that lady and Mr. Tilton. In reference to the Steinway Hall meeting, he testified that he heard her say—alluding to Mr. Beecher—"He had better preside at that meeting, or I will make it hotter on earth than it will be in hell." And to this Mr. Tilton answered: "Oh! he will preside." The witness also described the affectionate manner in which Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull conducted themselves toward each other. There was no cross-examination of this witness.

Mrs. Lucy Ann Giles, also colored, had been a cook at Mrs. Woodhull's house. Her testimony related entirely to what she had seen of Mr. Tilton's visits to the house. She stated positively that he often remained there during the night, and that on one occasion she saw him and Mrs. Woodhull in the latter's room in the evening. He was partly undressed, and Mrs. Woodhull was in her night-clothes at the time. There was no cross-examination.

The clock of the court-room now pointed to a quarter before 4 o'clock. Judge Neilson was desirous that another witness should be called, and suggested that there was time for a "short" one. Mr. Shearman said to the Judge that they had no "short" witness to call. The Judge then consented with apparent reluctance to an adjournment before the usual time, and announced that there would be no session of the Court March 26, so that those of the jury who desired to observe Good Friday might have an opportunity to do so.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MRS. WOODHULL TALKS WITH HER SERVANT
ABOUT FREE LOVE.

Q. Who were present? A. Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin.

Q. And where was that? A. That was in their office.

Q. Which office? A. Woodhull & Claflin's.

Q. Yes; but which room? A. In the middle room.

Q. The middle room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And on this same — A. Yes; on this same sofa.

Q. They were seated on the same sofa? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was that conversation? A. Mrs. Woodhull asked me was I a free-lover. [Laughter.] I told her I didn't know what free love was.

Q. Well? A. Then she said, then I didn't know what free love was? I told her no. Says she: "Did you know Henry Ward Beecher was a free-lover?" "Don't know; I don't know anything about it." So she asked me had I ever heard him preach, and I told her I had not; I had heard talk of him, but I never heard him preach. Well, I ought to hear him—said he was a free-lover, and one of the greatest men that ever lived.

Q. Yes; what, if anything, passed between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull while this conversation was going on? A. Yes, Mr. Tilton, he said something to Mrs. Woodhull, and then Mrs. Woodhull asked me about free love again, something concerning free love, and so I told her that I didn't know anything about it. So she said, then she would tell me, she would explain free love to me.

Q. Well, what did she say? A. She said that free love was, when man had a wife, or a woman—had a wife, and saw another one that they liked best, he thought it was their duty and place to leave and go to that one; that was free love.

Q. Yes. A. I told her I didn't believe in that; that doctrine I didn't believe in; that I thought it was always quoted by the Scripture says, "Whatever God put together let no man put asunder."

Q. Well, now you say that Mr. Tilton would speak to this lady? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tilton would speak.

Q. Did he speak so that you heard what he said? A. No, Sir; I could not understand what he said.

Q. He spoke to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In a tone that you could not hear? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And after that speaking, these questions were put to you, were they? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was anything further said, James, by you or Mrs. Woodhull, after she told you this about what free love was, about your hearing or wanting to hear Mr. Beecher? A. Well, I don't recollect anything particular; there might have been something said, but then I don't recollect it now; I never took to recollecting anything at the time; I heard so much about it all the time that I didn't take any notice of it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, never mind.

The Witness—All right, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Did you at any time after that hear Mr. Beecher preach? A. I did, Sir.

Q. How many times do you think you have heard him preach? A. Twice; I thought I would be convinced, any how.

Mr. Beach—Well, wait a minute.

MR. TILTON'S INTIMACY WITH THE WOODHULLS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, how frequently during the Summer, from the Spring on through the Summer of 1871, did you see Mr. Tilton at the office of Woodhull & Claflin? A. Well, sometimes two or three times a day; sometimes he would be there the best part of the day.

Q. Well, how frequently as respects the days, how many days in a week or— A. Well, sometimes every day in the week when—he was out of town pretty much—you could tell pretty much when he was away.

Q. By his not being there? A. Yes; by his absence from the office.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts.] Yes; you helped him out well.

Mr. Evarts—Now, about lunching; what was his habit? A. Well, sometimes he used to be down there and lunch with them.

Q. Was the lunch always ordered for each day there? A. Yes, Sir; very apt to be ordered. Sometimes Mr. Tilton and Miss Claflin would go to Delmonico's or Curtis's, or somewhere there to lunch.

Q. Well, but usually lunch was there, was it? A. Yes, Sir; usually the lunch was at the office.

Q. And just state, now, whether Mr. Tilton was or was not in the habit of being at, or was frequently at, the lunch during that Summer? A. Yes, Sir; but he was a great part of the time; I think he was away some part along about midsummer, some time—a long time.

Q. How long did that habit of his of being at the office continue through that year? A. Well, all through that year, entirely through that year—very frequently.

Q. How frequently during that period—I am now speaking of the season of 1871 from Spring—how frequently during that period were you in the habit of being up at the 38th-st. house? A. Well, I was up there sometimes two or three times a week and stayed all night, and sometimes every night through the week.

Q. After you went to service at the office— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This is my question: After you went to service at the office, did you continue to live at the 38th-st. house? A. No, Sir; I came over to Brooklyn then.

Q. With whom did you live here? A. I lived up here in Claason-ave.

Q. Boarding? A. Yes.

Q. But during this time you went up frequently to the 38th-st. house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was it about Mr. Tilton at the 38th-st. house—how often did you see him there that Summer, or that season? A. Well, I saw him quite a number of times of an evening.

Q. How late at night? A. Well, as late as between 12 and 1 o'clock.

Q. In what rooms, on what story of the house? A. Sometimes he would be in Mrs. Woodhull's room writing, or else in one or the other of the parlors, or sometimes in Miss Claflin's room.

Q. On what floor were those rooms that you speak of as Mrs. Woodhull's room or Miss Claflin's room? A. Miss Claflin's was the front room on the second floor.

Q. Up one flight of stairs? A. Yes, Sir; up one flight of stairs.

Q. Where was Mrs. Woodhull's? A. Mrs. Woodhull's was at the back.

Q. On the same floor? A. On the same floor.

Q. Who else did you see in those rooms at the same time with Mr. Tilton, at any time? A. Well, sometimes Mrs. Woodhull, Miss Claflin, and Colonel Blood, or sometimes some other visitors probably might be there.

Q. Did you observe anything, or have anything to do with attending upon them, or carrying refreshments or anything of that kind? A. I did Sir; yes, Sir.

Q. State how that would happen in those rooms? A. Well, sometimes evenings after it would get quite late Miss Claflin or Mrs. Woodhull would want me to go out and get some oysters, or some cider, or something of that kind, and I would go out and get it and fetch it back again and serve it.

Q. Into what rooms would you carry these refreshments that you thus served? A. Up in Miss Claflin's room sometimes, and sometimes in Mrs. Woodhull's.

Q. How about the parlor—had they suppers or refreshments in the parlors? A. Hardly ever in the parlor.

Q. Generally on this floor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. After they left the 38th-st. house where did they go? A. To 23d-st.

Q. Did they keep house there? A. Yes, Sir; Mrs. Myers was in charge.

Q. Was she a sister of Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she kept house there? A. Yes.

Q. You did not live there? A. Sometimes I was there two or three times a week, and sometimes every night through the week.

Q. But that was not your permanent home—your living place? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton at that house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was he then in regard to the company, or the rooms of the house that you saw him in? A. Well, he was the same unusual—he was up there, and generally always with the ladies.

Q. After that where did they go? A. They moved from there to Irving-place.

Q. These did they keep house? A. Mrs. Myers—

Q. She kept house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And were they there at the time of the arrest or break-up? A. They were there at the time of the arrest, I think.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton at that house also? A. I did, Sir.

Q. And was your habit the same of being up at that house that you have spoken of in regard to the other houses? A. Tying there—yes, Sir.

Q. Your habit — A. I went up there once in a while. The last evening that I was there, before I was taken sick, he was there that evening, I remember.

Q. Very well, we will go on. You did not live at that house? A. No, Sir.

Q. You speak of your having been arrested at the time of this break up? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you been before that, sick, and away from business? A. I had been sick for a week or two, or probably more.

Q. Were you then out for the first time? A. That was the first time. I came over on Friday afternoon for the first time.

Q. And when were you arrested? A. Saturday morning.

Q. And about how long had you been sick at that time? A. I don't remember exactly how long, but I think two or three weeks, probably more than that.

Q. And after this arrest, were you sick for some time? A. Yes, Sir; after the arrest they throwed me in Ludlow-st. Jail, in damp cells, where they had been repairing of the —

Q. Well, it was a damp cell? A. Yes.

Q. And were you seriously sick after that? A. Yes, Sir; seriously. I was taken with rheumatism, and so I am affected now by it very much.

Q. Whom did he say that to? A. He said it to Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin.

Q. Well, what did Col. Blood say—did he say anything about it? A. Well, Colonel Blood said that he would not do it—he opposed the article all the time.

Q. Did you know at any time, at the 88th-st. house, when you saw Mr. Tilton there, whether he passed the night there or not? A. He was there next morning.

Q. Yes? A. At breakfast.

Mr. Evarts—At what hour? A. He was there to breakfast, between 7 and 8 o'clock.

Q. The morning following the night you had seen him there late, you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How often do you think you observed that at that house in 88th-st.? A. Quite a number of times.

Q. Now, you say that the next morning after this, at the office, Col. Blood was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And who else? A. There was not any one there. The rest had not come down; they had not got up when I left Irving-place.

Q. At first, I mean? A. No, Sir.

Q. But afterwards was there any further interview or talk between Mr. Tilton and Miss Claflin and Mrs. Woodhull and Colonel Blood, or any of them, the next morning—anything in which Mr. Tilton took part? A. Any interview between Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin, you mean?

Q. And Mr. Tilton? A. And Mr. Tilton, there was.

Q. And Colonel Blood, or any of them, in which Mr. Tilton took part? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The next day? A. The next day.

Q. What was said at that time, if you remember, if anything, about this matter of the publication? A. Yes, Sir; they had an interview there about the same publication, and Mrs. Woodhull, she got provoked with Colonel Blood.

Mr. Evarts—I don't wish anything now unless Mr. Tilton was there.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, Mr. Tilton was present.

Mr. Evarts—Was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what passed? A. She asked him what was the matter with him, she asked Col. Blood what was the matter with him, she didn't know what had got into him; and Col. Blood said if they would publish that article that he would have nothing to do with it; they might do it, but he would not have anything to do with it, so he went off that day—he locked up the safe that night and went off.

Q. One of the jurors asks the question how long you were in jail? A. Fifteen days.

Q. Were you there? A. As a witness—United States witness.

Q. House of Detention? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Or a place of detention for witnesses. Where was it—in Ludlow-st. Jail? A. In Ludlow-st. Jail.

Q. Lodged there as a witness? A. Yes, Sir.

PROOF-SLIPS PRESENT AT THE CONVERSATION.

Q. At the time of this talk in the forenoon before the lunch—the talk about the publication that you have spoken of— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were there any printed slips or proof—

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I object to that.

Mr. Everts—Why?

Mr. Fullerton—Because it is leading.

Mr. Everts—I don't think it is leading; do you?

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is.

Judge Neilson—It is leading, I think.

Mr. Everts—How could I suggest that I wanted to talk about that subject otherwise than in that way? It don't certainly suggest to the witness which way to answer, yes or no. It is simply a question to him whether there were any—

Judge Neilson—Any printed slips; which can be answered yes or no.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; and then he started the witness off on printed slips.

Mr. Everts—But it does not indicate whether the answer should be yes or no. I might ask whether you had a horse—

Mr. Fullerton—It is not necessary there should be an indication whether the answer should be yes or no, to make it a leading question.

Mr. Everts—I agree to that.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman wants to start off in this manner in his examination by proving there were printed slips there, and if he gets an affirmative answer he is well embarked in the line of examination to whatever else may be proved.

Mr. Everts—Of course.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, the evil of putting a leading question is already accomplished. It won't make much difference whether you overrule it or not.

Judge Neilson—I think the question is leading.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Well, if your Honor please, I supposed the distinction between what is called a leading question and an indicating question, which points at the subject, is one that we all understood, and I intend, of course, to adhere to the latter proposition.

Mr. Fullerton—My friend intends to point to slips.

Mr. Everts—I intend to point the question to whether there were any there or not.

Mr. Everts—Now, James, at the time of this conversation was there present any paper of any kind with these parties? A. Oh! yes, there were; the proofs were all ready there to go to the press for their publication.

Q. Who had them in hand there? A. Miss Claffin, Mrs. Woodhull, and Mr. Tilton. Colonel Blood had gone off.

Q. Now, were you, or not, before that time, familiar with proofs and printed slips—I don't mean on this subject—this or any other subject; was that any part of your employment? A. Oh! yes, Sir; I was usually taking them up to the printing office.

Q. Was that part of your business to go back and forth to the printing office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, at that time, did you have in your hands, or see in any way these printed slips? A. There were some printed slips around there, but I could not say—

Mr. Everts—I am not speaking of those very ones.

Mr. Fullerton—Let him answer the question.

Mr. Everts—I asked him about his habit of carrying printed slips? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I am now speaking of the particular time when the conversation took place, and you said there were some slips there. Did you have those very ones in your hands in any way? A. I did have printed slips in my hands; but I don't know what they were or what they contained at all.

Q. And did you have those that you have spoken of as having been in their hands— A. Yes, Sir.

Q. —at the time of this particular conversation? That is my inquiry. A. I had all the proofs that were around there, and those printed slips, too.

Q. Now, after the publication of the scandal, as it is called, in their paper, did you know of that fact—did you see it in the paper? A. Did I see that publication?

Q. The publication; yes, in the paper after it was made? A. Well, the same talk was—it was not published at that time at all.

Q. I understand that; I am now talking of the time when it was really published, and when you were arrested? A. I didn't look at it at all—at the scandal. I heard them talking about it—of the Beecher scandal, and Luther—

Mr. Beach—Wait.

The Witness—Luther C. Chaffin.

Mr. Everts—And the Chaffin article? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when you saw Mr. Tilton and these ladies—Mrs. Woodhull—together at the office, or the house, did you see anything in their manner towards each other in respect to familiarity? A. Yes, Sir; I seen them sitting together talking, with their arms around each other.

Q. Both at the office and at the house? A. Yes, Sir; that was all very natural, I thought, at that time; I never thought anything about it. [Laughter.]

Q. And how frequently did you observe anything of that kind? A. Well, that was very often; near as often as he was there.

Mr. Everts—That is all.

Judge Neilson—Officer Rogers, you will have to take some special charge of this audience. Gentlemen and ladies think proper to laugh and giggle at the most trivial word that is uttered.

Mr. Everts—How long before the actual publication of what we call the Beecher scandal in their paper, when you were arrested—about how long before that was it that you heard this talk at the lunch time about a publication? A. I cannot remember, Sir.

Q. Well, about what time, as near as you can tell? A. I could not say; three, or four, or five weeks; I could not tell anything about it. Of course, I never took any remembrance of it—

Mr. Everts—That is all.

The Witness—For it didn't concern me.

The Witness—[To Judge Neilson.] Your Honor, can I speak to you a moment, Sir? I hope you will not let them keep me too long; I have the rheumatism, and would not like to sit very long.

Judge Neilson—We never keep witnesses long; you will be discharged soon.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. JAMES B. WOODLEY.

Mr. Fullerton—When did you come North, James?

Q. What time in 1865? A. I don't recollect, Sir, at all.

Mr. Beach—In the Spring, he said.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you at the funeral? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you tell me it was in the Spring of 1865? A. It was in the Spring; I was not at the funeral, though.

Q. It was in the Spring of 1865? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You had, then, worked with him about a year, as near as you can tell? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Since the close of the war? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How do you recollect that it was in the Spring that he died? A. I know I was going down to North Carolina on some business.

Q. How long had you been gone on some business. A. I had been gone about a week.

Q. Did he die during your absence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long? A. I don't know, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. About how long? A. I could not remember at all; I would not like to say without I had some recollection of it.

Q. Can't you give us some idea of the length of time you had been out of your uncle's employ when you went down to North Carolina? A. No, Sir; he had been sick for some time.

Q. Give us some idea of the length of time you had been out of his employ? A. I think it was along the latter part of the Winter. I was working with him.

Q. Have you no other recollection than that? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long had your uncle been sick when you left to go to North Carolina? A. He had been sick some—probably three weeks.

Q. Had he not been sick longer than that? A. I don't know, Sir; I don't know whether he had or not; he might.

Q. Did you remain with him until he got sick? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did you quit his employ before he became sick? A. No, Sir; he was lingering some time before he got down.

Q. How long had your uncle been lingering, as you say, before he was taken down sick? A. I don't know, Sir; I have no recollection of the time, Sir, at all.

Q. Can't you give us some idea? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. Whether it was a year or six months? A. No, Sir, I could not at all.

Q. You could not tell? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, did he work while he was lingering? A. Yes, Sir; he worked some time before he was down.

Q. Did he work whilst he was lingering? A. Oh! yes, Sir; he worked while he was in poor health.

Q. All the time? A. Until he got down.

Q. Did he work until he got down sick? A. Yes, Sir, until he got down and had to have a doctor.

Q. Then, whilst he was lingering he was at work? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you were at work with him? A. I was at work with him.

Q. All the while? A. All the while.

Q. Up to the time he was taken down? A. Up to the time.

Mr. Fullerton—Ahem!

The Witness—I think up to just about the time, I guess.

Q. Just about the time? A. I think about that time, Sir.

Q. Can't you tell me exactly? A. No, Sir; I cannot, because I never took any note of it.

Q. What was the last work you did before he was taken down sick? A. The last work we did we were building a house, and we finished that house that time.

Q. What house? A. We were building a house in the city.

Q. What house? A. In Petersburg. I don't remember the house at all, now.

Q. You don't recollect what house it was? A. No, Sir, I don't.

Q. Can you tell us what street it was in? A. I don't believe I can. The streets are changed; they have changed the names of the streets.

Q. What street was it on? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. You don't know the street? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor you don't know the name of the person who owned the house? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Can you tell what kind of a house it was, whether it was wood, or brick, or stone? A. It was a wood house.

Q. You say they changed the names of the streets since that? A. Yes, Sir, of some of them.

Q. Will you mention one street the name of which has been changed? A. I don't think, Sir—

Mr. Fullerton—Speak a little louder.

The Witness—I don't think it would be any use for me to go over and tell the change of the streets.

Q. Why not? A. Because I don't—because I don't remember.

Q. Well, then, it would not be any use. [Laughter.] Can you name any street in Petersburg the name of which has been changed since you were there? A. No, Sir; I cannot name any.

Q. Did you do the marketing? A. I did, Sir.

Q. When did you first see Theodore Tilton at the house in 38th-st.? A. The first time I saw him there—I don't know whether it was three or four weeks after I was there—I don't know whether it was a lecture, or what it was, but one Sunday afternoon there was a congregation of people met there, and they had some kind of a lecture in the house, and I don't know what it was, because I didn't take notice; I never had any thought about it.

Q. Did you attend the lecture? A. No, Sir; I was at the door.

Q. You don't know how long you had been there, then? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long do you think you had been there then? A. I know I had not been there very long, but I don't recollect how long I had been there.

Q. Well, what season of the year was it? A. It was late in the Fall, I think, Sir.

Q. Late in the Fall? A. I think it was.

Q. Of what year? A. Of 18 and 70.

Q. Was it before or after the holidays? A. What, after Thanksgiving?

Q. Well, Christmas and New Year's. A. Oh! I know—I went down to the office at that time.

Q. How? A. I was down at the office at that time.

Q. You were at the office then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were not at the house? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you leave the house and go to the office? A.

That was that Winter, when Mrs. — it was after Mrs. Woodhull went to Washington and come back.

Q. When did she go to Washington and come back? A. She come back, I think, a few days before the holidays, to the best of my recollection.

Q. How? A. She come back a few days before the holidays, I think.

Q. And how long after she came back before you went down to the office? A. I suppose it might have been a week or two, probably.

Q. How? A. It might have been a week or so, probably; I don't know.

Q. Well, then you got down to the office before the holidays, I understand you? A. Yes; about that time, I think.

Q. About that time? A. I think somewhere along there.

Q. And you think a little before? A. I don't recollect just about the time. I don't like to state without I am certain about it.

Q. Then how long had you been at Mrs. Woodhull's before you went down to the office? A. I went there in the Fall, Sir; I don't know how long, Sir.

Q. About how long had you been with her. A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. As near as you can recollect? A. I haven't the least—not the slightest idea.

Q. Not the slightest recollection? A. No, Sir; as to how long it was.

Q. Had you been there some months? A. Oh! I had been there some months; I know I had been there over two months.

Q. How? A. I had been there over two months.

Q. Over two months? A. Oh! yes; I had been there over two months.

Q. When you left and went down to the office, had you seen Mr. Tilton there? A. More than once at that time.

Q. Yes. A. I had seen the gentleman come in, I think, sometimes of an evening.

Q. You think? A. I think.

Q. You are not positive? A. No, Sir; I am not positive about it.

Q. How long before you left was it that he was there at what you call the lecture? A. Before I left?

Q. Yes, Sir? A. They had the lecture before Mrs. Woodhull went to Washington.

Q. To Washington? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And are you sure you saw him there then? A. I saw him there then, on Sunday.

Q. Positive? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On Sunday? A. Yes, Sir; because I admired the gentleman.

Q. You did, eh? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it before or after Thanksgiving? A. After Thanksgiving.

Q. Yes? A. I don't remember, Sir, at all.

Q. But you are not sure that you saw him there but once before you left and went down to the office? A. No, Sir; I am not sure.

Q. Now, have you any way of getting at the date when you went to the office, James? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect how the weather was when you went to the office? A. It was cold weather; I know that.

Q. Where did you board after you went to the office? A. Up to the house, and sometimes I boarded over here in Brooklyn.

Q. Sometimes at the house and sometimes you boarded in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; I had taken my washing always over here, and so I thought I would stay over this side, where I could go to church.

Q. Where did you board here? A. In Clason-ave.

Q. What number? A. 604 Clason-ave.

Q. 604 Clason-ave? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With whom? A. My mother.

Q. She lives there, does she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, didn't you board there regularly after you went to the office in New-York, with Woodhull & Claflin? A. No, Sir; I did not board there regularly at all.

Q. Well, did you quit boarding with your mother? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, then, how do you mean? A. Well, I would be sometimes up to the house, and then over here. If I was ketch'd up at the house I would stay there; if I had any errands to do up that way I would stay up there.

Q. Then you were there irregularly, were you? A. At the house?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; I was not there all the time; sometimes two or three times a week, sometimes more; sometimes probably a whole week I would be up at the house.

Q. And would not come to Brooklyn at all? A. Not until about Saturday evening.

Q. Now, when did you next see Mr. Tilton there after this lecture? A. To the house or the office?

Q. To the house. A. Well, I saw him there after that—Mrs. Woodhull introduced him to me; I saw him there; I don't know whether it was along—I think it was some time along in the Spring, some time.

Q. In the Spring? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the following Spring? A. In the following Spring.

Q. What year was that? A. That was 18 and 71.

Q. '71? A. '71.

Q. Then from the time that you saw him there at the lecture, up to the Spring of 1871 you are not sure that you saw him there? A. I am not very positive about seeing him there any time only the lecture. I am sure of that.

Q. And then again in the Spring of 1871? A. In the Spring; I am not so very sure.

Q. Now, do you know what time it was in the Spring of 1871 when you saw him there next? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. When were you introduced to him? A. Down at the office.

Q. When? A. I think it might have been the latter part of February, or perhaps March; it was cold weather; I remember that very well. I had been out with my papers and had come in, making my return to Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin.

Q. That is the first that you saw him at the office, was it? A.

That was my first acquaintance with him at the office, to my recollection.

Q. Had you seen him at the office before? A. I might have seen him there.

Q. But you don't recollect, though? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect it.

Q. How long after you were thus introduced to him was it that you saw him next at the house? A. I think it was some time along—it might have been the last of the Spring probably, and the first of June, some time that time. I could not tell what time it was.

Q. It was warm weather, was it not, James? A. It was quite warm.

Q. Wasn't it as late as July or August? A. I don't think that it was quite as late as that, Sir.

Q. Well, you are not sure, are you? A. I am not sure it was quite as late as that. I saw him there often before that.

Q. Where? A. Before as late as that, I should say.

Q. Where? A. Why, at the office, and up at the house too.

Q. Did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, I was speaking of the time when you saw him at the house next after you saw him at the lecture? A. It was along late in the Spring, I think.

Q. How? If my memory serves me right, I think it was the latter part of the Spring.

Q. But you added a moment ago, I think, James, that it might have been as late as the first of June? A. Well, that is what I say, the latter part of May; that would be—that would end in June, wouldn't it?

Q. Yes, and I understood you to say that from the time you saw him at the lecture, up to the time when you saw him the latter part of May or June, whatever time it was, you were not sure that you had seen him at the house? A. I am not very sure, not very sure.

Q. Well, a moment ago, didn't you tell me that you had seen him at the house very often before that, or did you misspeak?

Mr. Evarts—He did not say before that, did he?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, he did.

Mr. Tracy—The question, your Honor, of the counsel was July or August, when the witness said: "I had seen him a good many times before that at the house."

Mr. Fullerton—Now, when you say you saw him there the next time as late, probably, as May or June, I asked you if it might not have been as late as August when you first saw him there? A. Yes, Sir; you asked me that question, but I told you it was not so late as that.

Q. Are you sure it was not so late as that. A. It was not so late as that, Sir, when I first saw him there, Sir; it was not so late as that.

Q. And when do you mean to be understood now that you saw him frequently there—before May or June? A. It was about May, along some time in May; perhaps in June some time. I think it was about the latter part of May, along at that time, when he was more accustomed—

Q. When he was what? A. When I became more acquainted with him about the house.

Q. About the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, James, let me put this question to you: When did you first see him at the house after the delivery of the lecture which you speak of? A. I might have—I am not positive that I saw the gentleman there particularly before the Spring; I am not so positive about it as to say truly, but I saw him after the lecture, I think I saw him after that, probably a number of times after that, but I am positive I saw him there in the Spring.

Q. As late as May or June? A. Somewhere along about the latter part.

Q. Now, when you saw him there in May or June, of which you are certain, do you recollect what took place? A. Well, he was accustomed always when—

Q. Well, go on. A. When he met the ladies they would greet him and he would greet them as usual.

Q. How often had you seen him greet them and him greet them before that visit in May or June, 1871? A. How often?

Q. Yes. A. Where at? If you please state where at, because you know I saw him at the office too, and at the house.

Q. And at the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Before that? A. I hope you will make it plain to me, what you mean.

Q. Oh! yes, as plain as I can. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I understood you to say that in May or June, whatever the month was, when you saw him at the house—the first time that you are sure that you saw him at the house, that he greeted them and they greeted him as usual? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you the question, and I will make it as plain as I can, where you had seen them greet him and him greet them, before that visit at the house? A. At the office.

Q. At the office? A. Oh, yes, Sir; frequently at the office.

Q. Frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you seen them greet him and him greet them at the house before that visit in May or June? A. I don't know that I remember anything about it before.

Q. How? A. I don't remember anything about it before that.

Q. How frequently had you seen him at the office? A. Well, I had seen him there quite a number—number of times, at that time. He seemed to be very intimate with them at that time.

Q. In that Winter? A. Along through the Winter and Spring season.

Q. 1870 and 1871? A. That was—you are speaking now of 1871, I suppose?

Q. I am speaking of the same time that you are speaking of. A. Well, 1871.

Q. Very well. Had you seen him lunching there before May or June, 1871? A. Oh! yes, Sir, I had seen him lunching there.

Mr. Evarts—You mean by that, at the office?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—At the office.

THE LUNCHESES AT DELMONICO'S.

Mr. Fullerton—At the office. Sometimes you say they went to Delmonico's to lunch? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What Delmonico's; where? A. In Broad-st.

Q. At their eating house there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many times have you seen them there? A. Well, I can't mention, Sir, how many times; I don't remember.

Q. Well, about how many? A. Oh, I couldn't remember; I know I saw him a number of times.

Q. Well, a half a dozen? A. Oh, more than that!

Q. Well, a dozen—a dozen times? A. Oh, yes, Sir; more too.

Q. Well, two dozen times? A. It might.

Q. How? A. It might; I know I saw him quite a number of times, but I couldn't tell.

Q. Where was he lunching in Delmonico's, in the upper or lower room? A. They went up in the upper room.

Q. In the upper room? A. Yes, Sir, in the upper room, I think, Sir.

Q. Well, you think it was as much as two dozen times? A. I guess perhaps it was; I don't know; I couldn't say.

Q. Well, as near as you can say, James? A. Well, I told you just about as near as I can say.

Q. Well, please repeat it. A. I told you I supposed it was more than a dozen times.

Q. More than a dozen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that is as far as you can go? A. Yes, Sir; that is about as far as I can go.

Q. Where were you when you saw them go up in the upper room? A. Probably I— Sometimes I would want something from Mrs. Woodhull, or something of that kind, and Col. Blood would send me. He would generally stay at the office; he would be busy at the office, and would not go sometimes.

Q. You say "probably." A. Sometimes, I say, he didn't go with them to lunch; he would stay there; he would be busy writing, or some of his business, so he would not go; he would not go until they came back, and I might have to go after something.

Q. You say you might have to go after something? A. Well, I did.

Q. One moment. Do you recollect that you actually did go after something? A. I do.

Q. Where did you find Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. —? A. Sitting at the table.

Q. In Delmonico's? A. In Delmonico's.

Q. How? A. I went up with the waiter.

Q. You went up with the waiter? A. One of the waiters.

Q. One of the waiters? A. In the place.

Q. In the place. How frequently did you go up stairs, and find them in Delmonico's? A. I could not tell how many times Sir; I have stated to you about as far as I can.

Q. Did it occur more than once that you went up stairs? A. Oh! yes, Sir; it occurred more than once, Sir.

Q. More than twice? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. More than half a dozen times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And as many as a dozen times? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. More than that? A. I have been—I went up stairs quite a number of times, and I didn't go up there any time without it was I went up there for something concerning them, because I could get what I wanted down on the first floor.

Q. No, I am speaking of your going up stairs to find them. A. That is why I went; to find them.

Q. And you did find them up there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This was in Broad-st., was it not? A. Yes, Sir, in Broad-st.

Q. There are two floors, are there not, there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The upper floor consists of little tables in the room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At a table occupied by them alone? A. By them alone.

Q. Now, that occurred, I understand you, in the Winter of 1870 and '71? A. No, Sir, don't put '70 there, Sir, if you please.

Q. Well, the Winter commences in December? A. I know it do, but then your question—of course you can't put '70 in with '71 at all, because I told you fully that my remembrance of seeing Mr. Tilton and being acquainted with Mr. Tilton first was in 1871. I saw him up at the house when he lectured there; he lectured or probably read a lecture or something.

Q. Or something? A. Or something of that kind.

Q. That was in 1871? A. That was in 1871.

Q. Now, when was it that you saw him lunching up-stairs in Delmonico's? A. That was '71 and '72.

Q. At Delmonico's? A. No, Sir, at Woodhull & Claflin's office.

Q. I am talking about lunching at Delmonico's, James. Did he lunch at Delmonico's right along after you first saw him there, from time to time? A. Oh! no, Sir; because they ordered it a great many times; they ordered it and had it come in; I went out very often to order it.

Q. Where did you go for it? A. Sometimes I went to Delmonico's, and sometimes to Curtis's.

Q. Did you ever see him and Mrs. Woodhull at Curtis's lunching together? A. I don't hardly remember whether I did or not.

Q. Well, how near do you come to remembering; do you think you did or did not? A. Well, I won't—I can't say—I won't say particularly, because I may not be right.

Q. Well, when you went up stairs and saw him lunching at Delmonico's, did you see any one else there whom you knew? A. No, Sir; Miss Claflin; they all three was together, Mr. Tilton and Miss Claflin and Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. And when he came in he joined them? A. He joined them; they didn't say anything about it at all, not till he came.

Q. And then they commenced talking about it? A. They commenced talking about the publication.

Q. He stood up with them on the floor? A. Yes, Sir, they were all standing together.

Q. What was said? A. They spoke—

Q. Don't say "they;" tell me who spoke? A. Mr. What and Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin.

through

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say? A. He spoke about publishing "the Beecher article;" I didn't know what it was, though.

Q. The "article," or "the Beecher article?" A. The Beecher article.

Q. Did he call it the Beecher article? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He made use of that term? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you sure? A. I am sure, Sir.

Q. Did he speak first about it? A. He spoke first, to my recollection.

Q. Now, what did he say? A. I don't remember just the words—what was said.

Q. Well, the substance, James, the substance of the words? A. I don't know how it was introduced at all, more than that I heard him say—speak about publishing the article, and—he said, "I would do it"—said, "I could not do it—I would do it directly," but if I did it I would be crushed; they would crush me; I am a man; you are a woman; you can do it."

Q. What else was said then? A. Well, they talked about the same article and they said—

Q. Was that the first that you heard said? A. The first.

Q. Yes, you have given the first conversation that you heard, that you remember, have you? A. [After a pause.] I heard them talking about the conversation several times.

Q. Before that? A. Several times before that, and then at that interview they were speaking about the publication particularly; that was the one that I took particular notice of, because Colonel Blood was opposed to it.

Q. You have related the first conversation that you heard upon that subject that you remember, haven't you? A. I heard them talking about a conversation—

Q. Before that? A. Several times before that; but then at that interview, if you are speaking about the publication part, the one that I had taken so particular notice of, because Colonel Blood was opposed to it.

Q. Yes; but I say you have told us all that you remember that took place at that conversation, have you?—if not, tell the rest that you remember.

Mr. Evarts—You have not asked for all.

Q. Can you remember anything else that took place at that time? A. Oh! yes; I can remember things that took place.

Q. Well, please state it. A. I want to be sure and correct.

Q. Please state it.

The Witness hesitated, drummed with his fingers on the arm of the chair, and sat looking around—

Mr. Fullerton—Can you state it?

The Witness [looking at Mr. Fullerton]—I can state it, but then I want to be sure, just exactly.

Q. Well, I want you to be sure, too, James; I am not interfering with your being sure. A. To state just the words that was used.

Q. Well, can you now give them—just the words that were used? A. Well, they used the words that this—as I before told you that they told—Mr. Tilton said that, "Vickey, if you publish this thing, you will be a made woman on it; you will be a made woman if you publish it;" so then, she called first of all Blood—Colonel Blood was behind the counter
t the same time when I was opening the exchanges; and so they then went and had an interview together; she spoke to Colonel Blood about it; and so they went on about it—

Mr. Fullerton—A little louder.

The Witness—She talked with Colonel Blood about the matter; and then Mr. Tilton, taking Colonel Blood off and talked with him about it privately.

Q. Where did he take him? A. Took him onside, just took him onside; they both stood onside, and was talking about it.

Q. Well he didn't go so far but what you could hear, did he? A. Oh! I could not exactly understand everything was said.

Q. Oh! you could not exactly understand everything; but, could you understand some things? A. Well, I heard him say—he says, "Colonel, you publish it—you publish;" and Colonel Blood said, "No, I won't have anything at all to do with it."

Q. That is when they were standing by themselves? A. That is when they were standing by themselves.

Q. Now, you heard that; what else did you hear them say, when they were standing by themselves? A. Well, I heard him say that—what's the reason that he could not do it?

Q. Colonel Blood said this? A. No; that was Mr. Tilton.

Q. Mr. Tilton said to Colonel Blood? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "What's the reason he could not do it?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, then, what did Colonel Blood reply? A. He said that he would not have anything to do with it.

Q. Then what did Mr. Tilton say? A. Mr. Tilton—they were there together—and they talked on—I don't recollect—

Q. No; what did Mr. Tilton say next, as near as you can recollect? A. I don't exactly recollect now, Sir.

Q. Well, give us the best recollection you have got upon the subject. A. Well, I don't want to give you the best recollection without I give it to you correct.

Q. Well, give us the best recollection you have got correctly, as near as you can recollect what it was. What else did Colonel Blood and Mr. Tilton say? A. Well, after they had an interview there, Mrs. Woodhull and all of them went back in the back office, and they talked there about it.

Q. Well, before they went back into the back office; can you state anything else that you heard Mr. Tilton and Colonel Blood say when they were standing by themselves? A. Well, I—

Q. How? A. Well, I could; I could state some things, but I want to be sure and correct whether—just in a straight line or not—

Q. Well, state those things, James, that you are sure of; what else did you hear them say, if anything? A. Yes, I did hear them say more.

Q. Well, now, please state what else you heard when Colonel Blood and Mr. Tilton were standing there by themselves? A. Well, they were talking about Mr. Beecher.

Q. They were talking about Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

COL. BLOOD WASHES HIS HANDS OF THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

Q. Now, what did they say about Mr. Beecher?

A. They were talking about Plymouth Church; Mr. Beecher's church was a rich congregation, and they could make $100,000 by publishing—publishing that Beecher article; said they would pay any amount, they would pay any amount to have it stopped.

Q. To have it stopped? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what did Col. Blood reply to Mr. Tilton? A. He said no, that he would not have nothing to do with it; it would ruin them.

Q. Now, how far were the girls, the ladies, standing from them when Mr. Tilton and— A. They were standing talking; I don't remember how far they were standing at all.

Q. How far were they from Mr. Tilton and Col. Blood? A. I don't know, Sir; they might not have been standing further apart than you are from me probably.

Q. But this was a private conversation between Mr. Tilton and Col. Blood? A. That was a private conversation, yes, Sir, at that time.

Q. Well, did they talk in a lower voice than they did before? A. Yes, Sir; they were talking in a lower voice.

Q. Did you listen to hear what they said? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. You were engaged in opening the exchanges? A. I was engaged in opening the exchanges.

Q. Well, how long were you engaged in opening those exchanges? A. Oh, well, it probably took me—there was quite a number of them—it took me quite a while, because I would have to stop to go first one errand and then another.

Q. Well, Sir, did you stand there and open the exchanges until they got through with this conversation? A. But when I opened the exchanges, then I would look over and mark the certain articles that was in the papers.

Q. Yes; for what purpose did you mark them? A. Well, I knew that Col. Blood wanted to clip them a great many times.

Q. Yes; you made the selections? A. What I thought he would want to clip out.

Q. When you stood there either opening the exchanges or marking the papers? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Until they got through with that conversation? A. They went in the office before they got through; they went in all of them, went in the back office,

Q. Went in the back office? A. Yes, Sir; had an interview there.

Q. Well, did you stand and open exchanges— A. I did, Sir.

Q. One moment. Did you stand and open exchanges, and mark the papers, until they went into the back office? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What was between you and them? A. What was between? There was a little door, a little small door, I suppose about as high as this cane, I guess, there, where we went back in the counting-room, behind the desk.

Q. And you stood— A. I was in between, standing at the desk—a high desk.

Q. And the desk was between you and them, wasn't it? A. Oh! no; not the desk wasn't between me and them.

Q. Were you standing with your back or face towards them? A. I was standing right just as I am sitting now, near the counter.

Q. Were the papers on the counters? A. The papers were on the counter.

Q. Then the counter was between you and them, wasn't it? A. No, Sir, the counter was not between me and them; there was a little door, as I was telling you, where you open and go in behind the counter.

Q. The door was connected with the counter, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir, the door was connected with the sides of the—

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir, the door was connected not with the counter, but there was a little railing that went around.

Q. Well, how did you stand; facing them? A. No, Sir, I was standing sideways to them.

Q. Sideways? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The table was here [illustrating], wasn't it, that you had your papers on it? A. That was not a table; it was a desk, a writing desk.

Q. Now, suppose you stood here, and the papers were before you on this desk, where were they? A. I was standing just pretty much as I am sitting now, and they were standing right off to my left.

Q. On your left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the papers were in front of you? A. The papers were in front of me.

Q. Now, in looking over those papers, then, you marked what you thought Colonel Blood would want to cut or clip out? A. Yes, Sir; made selections to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Making selections? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you of course read what you marked before you marked it? A. Oh! I would always look at the heading to see what it was.

Q. And so marked it for him to clip out? A. Yes, Sir; what I thought he would like.

Q. Yes, cut out for publication in The Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly? A. Yes, Sir; from the exchanges.

Q. Now, where did you go when you left that desk, and got through with marking and opening exchanges? A. Before I got through—I done several things before I got through; I couldn't say; I was in the back office and out, and went in and out—

Q. How long had they been in the back office before you quit opening the exchanges? A. How long?

Q. Yes. A. Not very long before Mrs. Woodhull called me to go out; I know one errand I recollect—

Q. No, don't mix up errands; whenever you got through with opening the exchanges and marking them, what did you next do after they went in the back office? A. When I got through? I don't know as I was through. I don't know what time I got through; I don't remember what time I got through at all.

Q. Well, when you left that position first after they went into the back office, where did you go? A. I went into the back office; they called me.

Q. They called you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did they call you for? A. To do something; I don't remember what.

Q. Did they tell you? A. Oh! yes, Sir, they told me.

Q. And did you go and do it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Right away? A. I had to wait some time for an answer.

Q. Yes; and who were in there when you went in there? A. Col. Blood and Mrs. Woodhull, and Miss Claflin and Mr. Tilton.

Q. Anybody else? A. Nobody else.

Q. And did you hear anything that was said in there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, they had talked this matter all over in the middle room, hadn't they? A. They was still talking.

Q. Still talking? A. Yes, Sir; talking on the same subject, as far as I could learn.

Q. Well, did you hear what was said when you were in there? A. Oh! I heard some—some talking about this same article.

Q. No, no; did you hear what was said? A. Did I hear what was said?

Q. Now, what did you hear in the back room? A. I heard them talking about publishing this same Beecher article.

Q. Now, tell me who spoke, and what was said? A. Why, all of them was talking.

Q. Well, tell us what all of them said, then? A. It is impossible for me to tell you what all of them said.

Q. Can you now distinguish and tell us any one thing that was said in the back room? A. I knew they were talking about publishing.

Mr. Beach—I would not allow that; I would have it stricken out. It has been repeated so often, I would not permit it.

Mr. Fullerton—Can you tell me any one thing that was said in the back room, after you went in there? A. I heard them talking Colonel Blood to publish—Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin first; they were the first ones I heard speaking of the publishing of this Beecher article. "Why," she said, "why it will be the making of us." Colonel Blood said, "I won't do it; you can do it; I won't have nothing at all to do with it."

Q. That is about what you heard in the middle room? A. I heard that, and then they went—Mr. Tilton and Colonel Blood went and stood up there by the desk—they had a desk sitting in there, a large desk sitting there, and they stood about where the gas is, I think—the gas fixture is. They stood there near the window, and they conversed on the subject. Colonel Blood told him, "No, I won't have nothing to do with it."

Q. And then Colonel Blood and Mr. Tilton went by themselves twice, did they? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the middle office and in the back office, did they? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And talked over the same thing, did they? A. Talked over—they was talking on the same thing.

Q. Using the same words? A. Using pretty much the same words, Sir; about the same publication.

Q. Now, which of them did you hear mention the word "Beecher scandal"? A. Which of them?

Q. Yes. A. I heard Mr. Tilton use the word; I heard Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin use the word.

Mr. Evans—The "Beecher matter."

The Witness—The "Beecher matter," they didn't say anything about the "Beecher scandal."

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, the "Beecher matter," was it? A. Yes, Sir, the "Beecher article," they called it.

Q. The "Beecher article"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, which was it, James? A. I heard all—Mrs. Woodhull, Mr. Tilton, and Miss Claflin and Col. Blood.

Q. They all used that phrase, did they? A. They all used it.

Q. What phrase? A. The "Beecher article."

Q. The "Beecher article"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you spoke of their using—talking about a Chellis article too, didn't you? A. I said they—I never heard anything about the Chellis article, not until I heard it was in the paper; I didn't see that at all; I never heard anything about the Chellis.

Q. They were not talking about the Chellis article at any time? A. I never heard anything about the Chellis article.

Q. How? A. I never heard anything about the Chellis article; not until it was published.

Q. Now, can you state any one thing that you did that day when you heard them thus talking? A. I know I went and ordered the dinner; I know when they were standing up there—Mr. Tilton and Col. Blood was standing there talking together—I was then waiting for an order to go and order lunch.

Q. That is what you were waiting for? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you get the order to get the lunch? A. I got the order; Col. Blood filled all—or wrote the order and gave it to me to go to get the lunch.

Q. And where did you get it from? A. I don't remember whether I got it at Curtis's or Delmonico's that day.

Q. Now, James, could you tell us when that was? A. That was 1873.

Q. What month? A. Don't remember.

Q. What? A. It was before I was taken sick.

Q. Before you were taken sick? A. Yes, Sir; it was before I was taken sick.

Q. About how long before you were taken sick? A. I don't remember at all.

Q. Can't you give us any idea? A. No, Sir; I wish I could.

Q. Where were you boarding then? A. In Brooklyn.

Q. With your mother? A. With my mother.

Q. What? A. With my mother.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; it is time for recess, Sir, I believe.

The Court here took a recess until two p. m.

OTHER CONVERSATIONS ABOUT THE BEECHER MATTER.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and the cross-examination of James B. Woodley was continued as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—How long, James, was it before this conversation which you have last testified to, when the Woodhull story, or the Beecher story, or the Beecher article, was the subject of conversation, that you had seen Mr. Tilton at the office? A. How long had it been?

Q. Yes? A. Before the publication?

Q. No; before the conversation? A. I don't know, Sir, what you mean.

Q. You have spoken of a conversation in the office of Woodhull & Claflin? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between the ladies and Mr. Blood and Mr. Tilton; first in the middle room, and next in the back room. Do you recollect that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how long before that conversation was it that you had last seen Mr. Tilton? A. How long had it been?

Q. Yes. A. Before I seen him, or—

Q. Up to that time? A. I don't understand.

Q. Had you seen him just previous to that conversation? A. Had I seen him? I think he had been away.

Q. Well, was that the first time you had seen him after his return? A. I think it was about the first time that I had seen him after his return; I think he had been away somewhere out of the city.

Q. Where do you think he had been? A. I don't know, Sir. I suppose he must have been off on this campaign tour, so far as I would know.

Q. How long, prior to that time, had you seen him lunching at Delmonico's with Mrs. Woodhull? A. How long had it been after that?

Q. Before that. Before that. A. Before—I saw him several times. It had been some time, though, since I had seen him lunching there.

Q. How long had it been? A. I could not give you any date nor time, nor anything about it, Sir.

Q. Could you give us no idea of the time at all? A. No, Sir, I could not.

Q. I understood you to say before recess that you had heard these parties talking about this same matter before that day? A. Yes, Sir, I did say that.

Q. Where were they when they were talking about that matter? A. They were at their office—Woodhull & Claflin's office.

Q. Do you remember the day? A. No, Sir, I don't remember the day.

Q. Where were they when they were talking about it? A. They were in their office.

Q. Which office? A. The office in Broad-st.

Q. Which of the offices in Broad-st? A. Well, I heard the interview several times; I don't remember how many times—

Q. No, I am talking about the interview next before the one which you have related the particulars of? A. Well, it had been some time before that.

Q. How long before that? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Months? A. Yes, Sir, months.

Q. Months before? A. Probably it might have been, may be two months, it might have been three; I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. They were in which of the offices when they were talking? A. Well, they was in the back office, and the front office, too.

Q. But not at the same time? A. No, Sir, not at the same time.

Q. What were you doing when that conversation took place? A. I had to be backwards and forwards, doing whatever I was told to.

Q. Did you hear the conversation? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Now, relate, please, what you heard? A. I think I related it to you, before recess, that—

Q. No; I am not talking about the interview which you have already described; I am talking about another interview, before the one that you have now spoken of. Don't make a mistake. A. I heard them speaking about Mr. Beecher and Plymouth Church, and different things.

Q. What time do you now allude to? A. When they were speaking about free love and so on, at different times.

Q. How long was that before the conversation that you have detailed already? A. Well, I heard that conversation several times before that.

Q. I am speaking now of the particular conversation, when they talked about Mr. Beecher and free love? A. There was so many times, that I could not relate to you at all.

Q. Was that two or three months before the conversation you have already related? A. It was mostly along in the Spring; along about that time.

Q. The Spring of what year? A. 1872.

Q. How early in the Spring? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Well, Spring or Winter? A. In the Spring—generally—

Q. How? A. Along in the Spring, when it came to be common talk.

Q. You are sure it was not Winter? A. I am sure it was along in the Spring; when she wanted to get some way to get her paper up and going—

Q. Who were present when that conversation was held? A. There was several sometimes present.

Q. Oh! "sometimes present." I mean at that conversation who were present? A. Why, there was several conversations, so I don't know which one you mean.

Q. I mean the one where they were talking about getting their paper up? A. I heard it so often, Sir, I could not tell you—that she wanted—

Q. You heard that very often? A. Very often.

Q. But did you hear very often about the Beecher article? A. I never heard very much about the Beecher article; not until just before it was published.

Q. You did hear something about it in the Spring before that, did you not? A. I heard them talking about Mr. Beecher in the Spring, yes, Sir, in regard to free love and such things as that.

Q. But nothing about the article? A. Nothing about the article at all.

Q. Then you never heard them talk about the article but once, I understand you? A. If you understand me, I told you that they were talking about the article. The first time that I heard it, I think it was on Monday, and they had an interview about it the first time on Monday, and the next day was Tuesday; I think we were making up, then, the proofs to go to the press.

Q. Yes? A. Yes, those two days. I particularly noticed it by Col. Blood—the action of Col. Blood made me take particular notice.

Q. Did I understand you that you heard the Beecher article talked about only on those two days, Monday and Tuesday? A. Monday and Tuesday—

Q. Answer me, please? A. Monday and Tuesday, those are the two days that I heard them talking about the Beecher article.

Q. Are those the only two days? A. The only two days, particular.

Q. Very well, let us go a little further. You never heard the Beecher article spoken of until the Monday that you have now mentioned? A. Till that Monday. I never heard it spoken of before then.

Q. And you heard it talked of again on the Tuesday following that Monday? A. The next day.

Q. Which was Tuesday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And after that you never heard it talked about? A. No, Sir; I was taken sick then, and I never saw him any more after Tuesday. I was taken sick some time after that; I didn't see him no more—I don't know when I saw him any more after that.

Q. How? A. I don't know when I saw him after that; I don't know as I saw him after that in some time.

Q. Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see him after that at all? A. Yes, Sir; I saw him several times since then; but—

Q. Not in regard to the Beecher article? A. No, Sir.

Q. You related before recess a conversation which you heard between these parties; was that conversation you heard on Monday or on Tuesday? A. On Monday and Tuesday.

Q. No, no, you don't understand me. You related before recess a conversation which you heard in the middle office, and which was afterward continued in the back office; did that conversation take place on the Monday or the Tuesday of which you have spoken? A. Well, on Tuesday was the last interview.

Q. I should suppose it was if— A. Well, I told you there was two interviews Monday and Tuesday.

Q. Understand my question, James, please. Before the recess you spoke of an interview between Mrs. Woodhull, Miss Claflin, Mr. Blood and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which you overheard? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And which commenced in the middle office and ended in the back office? A. In the back office.

Q. Now, did that interview take place on the Monday or on the Tuesday? A. That last interview was Tuesday.

Q. It certainly was, if the first one was on Monday. The interview which you described before recess, was that on Monday or on Tuesday? A. Was that on Monday or Tuesday?

Q. Yes. A. The last interview was on Tuesday.

Q. I have not any doubt about that, James. Do you understand my question? A. Well, I may not, Sir.

Q. Was it Monday or Tuesday that you stood at the desk, opening the exchanges and marking the articles? A. Both days, Sir, I was opening the exchanges, but Tuesday was the last day, as I mentioned, Sir.

Q. Certainly it was. We won't dispute that any longer; but I want you to tell me whether it was on Monday or Tuesday that you overheard the conversation which you detailed to us before recess? A. That was Tuesday.

Q. It was Tuesday? A. Tuesday, Sir, was the last interview. [Laughter.]

Q. I want you to tell me whether that conversation was on Monday, or Tuesday? A. The two days, Monday and Tuesday—the same conversation—the Beecher article was discussed between them.

Q. Was it the same conversation on both days? A. The same conversation on both days. I tried to make you understand that. [Laughter.]

Q. It is my dullness, that I did not understand it before? A. No, I don't believe it is your dullness at all, Sir. [Laughter.]

Q. I understand it now. Were the same parties present on both days? A. The same parties, Sir.

Q. Did the conversation commence in the middle room on both days? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And ended in the back room? A. In the back room.

Q. And both days you stood opening the exchanges and counting the articles? A. Both days I was opening the exchanges.

Q. And all of them standing up, as you described before? A. No, Sir; the first day, on Monday, they were sitting down on the sofa.

Q. In which room? A. In the middle office.

Q. And did they say the same things on both days? A. The same things—talking about this Beecher article.

Q. And used the same language? A. The same language, so far as I could see.

Q. A little louder. A. The same, so far as I could learn.

Q. Well, you heard it? A. Yes; I heard it. I would not have noticed it, though, if Colonel Blood hadn't—Colonel Blood was dissatisfied.

Q. Yes, I know that he was dissatisfied. You have not told us what occurred on the first day, have you, as distinguished from what occurred on the second day? A. I have not told you—certainly I have.

Q. Now, will you describe what took place on the day when you say you saw them sitting on the sofa? A. Didn't I tell you once or twice?

Q. Well, my memory is not very good, James, you will have to tell me again. That was Monday, was it? A. The first interview was Monday.

Q. Then they were sitting on the sofa? A. Sitting on the sofa.

Q. What took place? A. They were talking about this Beecher article.

Q. Who were talking? A. Mr. Tilton, Mrs. Woodhull, and Miss Claflin.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say? A. Well, he told her that he had something for her to publish, and he wanted her to publish it.

Q. That he had what? A. He had an article that he wanted her to publish.

THE PAPERS READ TO MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. What did she say? A. Well, they read it over there, and they talked about it, and then she went and took Colonel Blood—

Q. I suppose she didn't know what it was when he spoke of it? A. She might have known, so far as I know.

Q. Well, so far as appearances were concerned, did she appear to know what it was? A. I guess she knew what it was.

Q. Well, he took it out and read it, did he? A. Yes, Sir; he read it.

Q. How long did it take him to read it? A. Oh! not very long.

Q. About how long? A. Oh! I could not describe at all.

Q. You could not describe it? A. No, Sir, I could not tell you how long it was.

Q. Was it written on foolscap paper? A. It was written on paper. I didn't take particular notice.

Q. Was it about this size? [Holding up a sheet of legal cap.] A. I didn't notice.

Q. Was it writing paper? A. It must have been writing paper.

Q. Did he read it out loud? A. He read it so that they could understand him; I could not understand what he read.

Q. You could not? A. No, Sir.

A. Couldn't you hear what he read? A. No, Sir; I could hear him reading, but I could not understand what he read.

Q. Where were you when he read it? A. I was backwards and forwards in each of the offices, attending to my work.

Q. You sometimes stood, still did you not? A. I was standing still sometimes.

Q. When you stood still could you hear what he read? A. I was not paying any attention.

Q. Could you hear what he read? A. No, Sir, I could not.

Q. Not a word? A. Well, probably I might have got one or two words, but that wouldn't do much good.

Q. Well, give us those one or two words. A. No, I could not do that, because I don't know the commencement or the endings.

Q. Well, you could give us the commencement and the endings of what you heard? A. No, Sir, I could not. There would be no sentence to that.

Q. Well, you could hear what they said where you stood? A. I could not hear some things.

Q. You heard them talking about the Beecher article? A. Yes, Sir; the Beecher article.

Q. You heard Mr. Tilton say that he had an article that he wanted her to publish? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then he commenced reading? A. Yes, Sir; they talked about it, and then he read it there.

Q. Didn't he read it as loud as he talked? A. No, Sir; I don't think he did.

Q. Then it was read in a low tone of voice? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that you could not hear? A. I don't know as it was read that way particularly about my hearing.

Q. How long did you stand at any one place where he was reading? A. Oh! I was backwards and forwards, I don't know how long I stayed in one place; I was backwards and forwards.

Q. You cannot tell us a word that you heard? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you tell us how many sheets of paper it covered? A. No, Sir. Sometimes he would write for their paper you know, but—

Q. I don't care anything about his writing for their paper. I am talking about that day when he was reading that article to them. How many sheets of paper did he appear to read from? A. I didn't notice at all.

Q. Well, he read something about "the Beecher scandal" or "the Beecher article?" A. He was reading, but I never heard him read it at all; and what it was I could not tell.

Q. Didn't you know what it was about? A. I didn't know what proofs they were at all.

Q. Well, they were proofs, were they? A. Surely they were proofs.

Q. Oh, then, he was reading from proofs? A. They were proofs that they were reading.

Q. Proofs that they were reading? A. Certainly they were proofs.

Q. Then it was not on foolscap paper? A. I do not know, Sir; I could not tell.

Q. Was it writing or print? A. They had printed proofs there, and written ones, too.

Q. What did he read from, printing or manuscript—writing? A. I don't know, Sir; I could not tell.

Q. You could not tell? A. No, Sir; I didn't take particular notice, because they had a whole lot of papers there by them; they had proofs for their weekly paper.

Q. Proofs for that weekly paper? A. Yes, Sir, they were making up their weekly paper.

Q. All the proofs for the weekly paper? A. They were getting up what they had, any way.

Q. How? A. They were getting up what they had.

Q. Who brought this paper there, that he read? A. He might have brought it himself.

Q. Don't you know who brought it? A. No, Sir, I don't know who fetched it.

Q. Was Colonel Blood there at that reading? A. He was not there with them when it was first read. Then, afterwards, Mrs. Woodhull got him, and he went there and sat down, and—

Q. Did he hear it read? A. Yes, Sir; I have no doubt but what he heard it read.

Q. Do you know? A. I don't know as he was taking particular notice. I don't remember whether he was sitting there present, when it was read, or not; I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton, when he read, read from the proofs? A. I know that he was reading proofs that he had.

Q. Was he reading from the proofs when he did read? A. When he did read?

Q. Yes. A. He was reading the proofs that they had there?

Q. He was reading proofs that they had there? A. I don't know who fetched them, or anything at all about them?

Q. My question, James, is this: was he reading proofs?

whether he brought them there or not? A. [Emphatically]. He was reading proofs, Sir.

Q. Very well, we understand that. Now, what do you mean by proofs? A. Why, proofs for a newspaper..

Q. In what shape are they? A. Why, a large paper, like any editor would have.

THE WITNESS DEPLORES A WASTE OF TIME.

Q. I want you to explain to the jury. Do you mean the proofs are in writing or in print? A. They had printing proofs there and they had writing.

Q. Now, James, if you please, I don't care anything about the writing, if the proofs were in print. Were they in print—the proofs that he read? A. I don't know, Sir, whether they were in print or writing.

Q. Then there are written proofs, are there? A. I don't know, Sir; I told you I didn't know whether he was reading writing proofs or whether it was print.

Q. I am not talking about what he was reading. Do you understand that proofs may be either in print or in writing? A. That is what I am trying to explain to you now, Sir. [Laughter.]

Q. Try again. Do you understand that proofs may be either in writing or in print? A. I have told you that I didn't know what he was reading, whether it was print or writing.

Q. James, I am not asking you what he was reading; I am asking about proofs, what you understand by proofs. Do you understand that proofs are in writing or in print? A. Well, Sir, I have answered your question as far as I—

Q. I want your understanding about it? A. I have told you just as well as I can tell you.

Q. Excuse me, you have not told me. A. You are excusable, Sir; I hope you will excuse me. [Laughter.]

Q. I will if you will answer. A. Well; but I don't know what your meaning is; and you ask me so many times.

Q. You speak of proofs; you have seen proofs, haven't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you think you know what proofs are, don't you? A. I suppose I know what proofs are.

Q. Now, tell me what you suppose they are—whether they are in print or writing? A. Well, Sir, I think I have answered your question, probably as far as I think it need be— [Laughter.]

Q. Well, I want you to go a little further. A. No, Sir; I think it is taking up so much time I won't go any further. [Laughter.]

Q. James, it won't take you long to answer that question. A. But then you will have probably a thousand such other questions. [Laughter.]

Q. Then you will have to answer a thousand other questions. A. No, Sir; I have got a kind of sore throat, and I don't care to answer so many questions.

Q. Well, I will promise you not to ask you another question about proofs if you will tell me whether you understand proofs to be in writing or in print. A. Well, Sir, I think I am just about through with that matter.

Mr. Fullerton—I think I shall have to ask a little of your Honor's help. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Well, the witness has come to my assistance in protesting against the waste of time. [Laughter.]

Mr. Fullerton—By wasting it.

Judge Neilson—No; he is the first gentleman that has helped me. [To the witness.] Now, the counsel wants to know whether the proofs which you speak of were printed paper or written paper, or both?

The Witness—I told him, that I didn't know whether it was print or writing paper they were reading.

Judge Neilson—You told him that you did not know whether the paper that they were reading was written or printed. That is not what he asked you. You spoke of proofs. Now, do you understand proof to be something that is printed or may it be something that is written? A. Well, proofs, I suppose we would say, was printed.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is what the counsel wanted you to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—That is what you understand by proofs, is it? A. That is what you call—

Q. How? A. Yes, Sir, so far as I know about it.

Q. That is as far as you know about it; is that your answer? A. That is my answer.

Q. Speak up, James. A. I says that, according, I suppose, to the rule of printing, the proofs are manuscripts struck out, I think.

Judge Neilson—Struck off in print—in type.

Mr. Beach—No; he does not say that. "Struck out," he says.

Mr. Fullerton—Struck out how?

Judge Neilson—In print.

The Witness—I don't know whether he was reading something that was printed or that was written.

Q. I am not asking about that. You saw what he held in his hand, did you? A. No, Sir; I saw him have a paper in his hand.

Q. You do not know whether that paper was in print or in writing? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you cannot tell us one word he uttered whilst he was reading it? A. No, Sir; I cannot, Sir.

Q. A little louder? A. I cannot, Sir.

Q. Before he commenced reading it, what did he say? A. Well, he was talking—he was there talking to the ladies.

Q. What did he say—what did he say? A. He said, "Vicky, I have got something here for you that will—that is one of the best things that you ever done," if my memory serves me right.

Q. Go on. A. I think I told you that, too.

Q. What did she say then? A. They had a talk together.

Q. No; what did she say; did she make any reply? A. Oh! yes, Sir; she made a reply.

Q. What did she say? A. She said a good many things.

Q. What did she say? A. So many things I could not explain, Sir. It is no use in me to go on and explain it.

Q. Can't you remember what she said? A. Oh, she talks very fast, you know, and she said a good many things.

Q. Do you remember anything she said in reply? A. Oh, yes, I remember.

Q. What did she say in reply, that you remember? A. I think she says, as near as I can recollect—she says: "Let's see it."

Q. Now, what did Theodore Tilton say? A. They all stood there a while talking, and then they went and sat down on the sofa.

Q. Well, was nothing more said before they sat down? A. Oh, yes, they stood there with a close interview together, talking.

Q. Now, after Mrs. Woodhull said, "Let's see it," who next spoke? A. Miss Claflin came up and spoke.

Q. And what did she say? A. Then they all went and sat down.

Q. Didn't she say something? A. Oh, yes.

Q. What did she say? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Can you remember anything else that was said before they sat down on the sofa? A. There was some little interview, but I could not exactly say what.

Q. What day was this, Monday or Tuesday? A. That was Monday, the first interview.

Q. The first interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did they remain on the sofa? A. Oh! for quite a while, quite a good while.

Q. Half an hour, or an hour? A. Well, half an hour, may be more; may be three-quarters of an hour, before they went in the back room.

Q. Did you hear them talking while they were on the sofa? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did they say to him? A. They were talking about

Q. What did they say? Don't tell me what they were talking about. A. Well, as I told you before, they were talking about

Q. No, no; tell what they said; who spoke, and what did he say, or she say? A. Well, he told her— Mr. Tilton said, "Vic., I want you to publish this."

Q. What did she say? A. That was the introductory conversation, as far as I could learn. He told her that he could not do it. Says he, "I wouldn't dare do it. I am a man, and you are a woman; you can do it; they won't do anything with you, but they will crush me." Those were the words that were used.

Q. After they sat down on the sofa? A. Yes, Sir, after they sat down on the sofa.

Q. What did Mrs. Woodhull reply? A. They was talking; I don't know hardly what she said.

Q. What did Col. Blood say? A. She went and got Col. Blood, and he was talking with Col. Blood. I don't know particularly just what their interview was at that moment. Then he came and sat down there—took a chair and sat down, and they all talked, and I saw Col. Blood put his hand through his hair, and says he, "Well, I won't have anything to do with it. You can all do like you mind to; I won't touch it; I know you will all get in trouble." And Mrs. Woodhull said at that time, "Oh! no. Theodore knows; he knows all about it; he knows just exactly what it is, and how to do. Now you just go right ahead," she says, "and do it as I tell you to do it." So the conversation prevailed there.

Q. Is that all that you remember? A. Sir?

Q. Is that all you remember? A. They went into the back office after that.

Q. Shut the door, did they? A. Went in and shut the door.

Q. And did you go in there? A. I went in there.

Q. How long after they went in? A. I could not remember, Sir; I don't remember at all, how long.

Q. Pretty soon after? A. I might—it might have been an hour.

Mr. Shearman—Will the witness speak a little louder?

The Witness—I said it might have been an hour.

Mr. Fullerton—When you went in there, what were they doing? A. They were then talking about the same Beecher article.

Q. What did you hear after they went in? A. I heard him saying—talking to Col. Blood about it, prevailing on Col. Blood to take it in hand and publish it.

Q. What did he say to him? A. Col. Blood said no.

Q. What did they say to Col. Blood? A. They told him to do it and that would be the making of him. She says, "Beecher's congregation will pay you $100,000"—Mrs. Woodhull said.

Q. For what? A. For publishing it.

Q. For publishing it? A. No, not for publishing, but if they published it they would pay $100,000 to have it taken out, or anything. She said, "It is a rich congregation, and they wouldn't have that come out—nohow in the world."

Q. Who said that? A. That was Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Who replied to that? A. Tennie.

Q. What did Tennie say? A. She told him "Yes," and Col. Blood says, "No, I won't have nothing to do with it."

Q. Who else spoke? A. Then Mr. Tilton he took Col. Blood up to the side of the window, as I told you before, right near the gas, and they talked there at the window.

Q. Yes; did you hear anything that was said then? A. I did.

Q. What did you hear said there? A. I heard him telling Col. Blood about publishing that—

Q. What did he say, what did he say? A. Mr. Tilton told Col. Blood if he would just take that thing—; says he: "If you publish that thing it will be the making of you." Col. Blood shook his head, "No, I don't see it."

Q. Then what took place? A. Then after that interview I went on then about my errand, and done what I had to do.

Q. That was on Monday? A. That was on Monday.

Q. And the interview that you gave me before dinner was on Tuesday? A. Gave you before dinner?

Q. Before lunch; yes, before recess.

Mr. Shearman—Before we went out.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, never mind. Before recess. You know we have taken a little recess. A. Yes, Sir; we have taken a little recess.

Q. Before you went out you told me what took place on Tuesday, the last interview, did you not? A. Yes, sir; I told you. You have done with that now, haint you, Sir?

Q. How? A. You have done with that now, haint you, Sir?

[Laughter.]

Q. Very near; I want to see how near they were alike. Both days then they said about the same thing, did they? A. About the same thing, Sir, the next day.

Q. Went into the back room the same way? A. In the same way the next day.

Q. And Tilton called Blood out to the gas light? A. There was no gas light.

Q. Well, the gas fixtures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And told him the same thing there that he had told him on Monday, did he? A. Yes, Sir; they were talking there together on the same subject.

Q. How? A. They were talking there together on the same subject.

THE TIME OF THE INTERVIEW.

Q. Did they ever have a conversation of the same character on any other day? A. I never saw Mr. Tilton after Tuesday to my memory—after Tuesday night. I have never seen him since—after Tuesday.

Mr. Beach—What does he say?

Mr. Fullerton—After that Tuesday evening.

The Witness—Not in some time; I don't know as I saw him in a whole year; probably I might have seen him in a whole year after that; I don't know.

Q. You didn't see Tilton after that conversation which was on Tuesday, for a long time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not again that same year, you don't think? A. I don't know as I seen him again that same year.

Q. Well, can you now tell how long that conversation was before the publication of the scandal? A. Well, I could not tell to save my life, Sir. I have no date, nor no time of it, and I have not committed it to memory at all, and so I could not tell you anything about it.

Q. Well, you recollect that it was before the scandal was published, wasn't it? A. Oh, it was some time before the scandal was published.

Q. Can't you tell now? You recollect the publication of the scandal, don't you? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect the publication of the scandal, and that scandal was out before I got—I came out at all.

Q. How? A. The scandal was out; I had been sick two or three weeks, probably more than that.

Q. Yes. A. And the paper was published—came out Thursday.

Q. Before you got out? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was out Thursday; it was out, I know, before I came out Friday.

Q. Well, do you know how long you had been sick at that time? A. No, Sir.

Q. About how long? A. It might have been three weeks or more; I don't know.

Q. Well, how long before you were taken sick was it that this conversation was had in the office, that you have related? A. I could not tell, Sir.

Q. Was it just before you were taken sick? A. I don't remember whether it was just before or not, Sir.

Q. Was it a month before? A. I hardly think; it might have been; I wouldn't say; I wouldn't dare to say.

Q. You couldn't give us any idea of it, could you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, did you hear anything about the Beecher article prior to those two conversations? A. Nothing about it, Sir.

Q. Never heard anything from anybody on the subject? A. No; no one on the subject.

Q. How? A. No one on the subject at all, only those two days, Monday and Tuesday, as I named.

Q. When did Mrs. Woodhall leave 28th-st? A. She left 28th-st., I think, Sir, if my memory serves me right, in '72—1872.

Q. What time of the year? A. I don't know what time of the year, but I think it was before May—I think.

Q. Before May of 1872? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was now; I won't be certain.

Q. And where did she move to? A. Moved in 23rd-st.

Q. How long did she live in 23rd-st? A. She was there—they moved from there—I don't know how long they lived there, but they moved from there down to Irving-pl.

Q. Can't you tell me what time they moved to Irving-pl? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did they remain in 23rd-st. more or less than a year? A. No, Sir; they did not.

Q. More or less than a year? A. It was less than a year, Sir.

Q. Less than a year? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know what season of the year she moved from 23d-st. to Irving-pl.? A. No, Sir; I don't remember at all, Sir.

Q. Were you boarding with them at the time? A. I would go sometimes of a night and stay all night. My home was over in Brooklyn here.

Q. Yes, and you saw Theodore Tilton in 23d-st., did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what year did they move from 23d-st? A. In '72.

Q. You saw Theodore Tilton in 23d-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very frequently? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you ever see him there more than once? A. Oh! yes, I saw him there more than once.

Q. That you swear to positively? A. It might be perhaps half a dozen times; I don't know.

Q. Well, you will swear positively that you saw him there more than once? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. There cannot be any doubt about that in your mind? A. No doubt at all, Sir.

Q. And then you saw him in Irving-pl. also. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you saw him there frequently, did you? A. About once; I don't think I saw him more than once.

Q. Not more than once in Irving-pl.? A. Not to my memory at all; I don't think more than once.

Q. What time did they leave Irving-pl.? A. I don't know what time. You know they didn't leave—I think they left Irving-pl. at the time of their arrest—at the time they were arrested, I think; I don't know.

Q. Very well? A. I didn't go there any more, I know.

Q. Well, you went to Irving-pl., did you not? A. Not after I was arrested.

Q. No, but up to the time of the arrest you went back and forth as usual, did you not? A. Oh! it had been some time; I was sick; I hadn't been there in some time.

Q. Well, up to the time you were taken sick you went to Irving-place? A. I went up there in the day, and came away.

Q. How? A. I went up there, but I was back to the office, and didn't go up there more than once, I don't think. I didn't see him there. I don't recollect of staying there—

Q. You are not answering what I asked you. Were you in the habit, up to the time that you were taken sick, of going up to Irving place as you had been in the habit of going to 23d-st.? A. Not so much as I did to 23d-st.

Q. But you did go up? A. Oh! I went up, but not to stay all night.

Q. I understood so. Did you go up there frequently? A. I don't know how many times I was up there. I don't remember.

Q. You never stayed all night there, you say? A. What, in Irving place?

Q. Yes. A. Certainly; I thought you understood me to say that I stayed all night there.

Q. Well, then you stayed all night there; how frequently? A. I don't think I stayed there—I don't think a half a dozen times, if I did that, in Irving place.

Q. Where did you see Theodore Tilton in Irving place? A. I saw him there at that house.

Q. What part of the house? A. Up-stairs.

Q. Up-stairs? A. Yes, Sir; up-stairs.

Q. What room? A. I don't remember; I don't know the rooms well enough to remember them.

Q. Was it a front or back room? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Did you let him in? A. No, Sir; I did not let him in at all.

Q. How? A. I did not let him in at all; I didn't know he was there, not until they called me to go out to get—I think it was cider or something I went out after, between twelve and eleven o'clock, or eleven and twelve o'clock.

Q. What time did you see him there in the year? A. I don't remember, Sir, what time it was.

Q. How long was it before the publication of the scandal? A. Well, it might have been some time before that. I know that was the same time—the same time I saw him there, that was the Monday evening that they were talking over this matter.

Q. It was the same Monday evening? A. It was the same Monday evening. Why I had to go up was because Col. Blood went off that day—ran off that day, and didn't come back, and I had to go up to the house with the proofs; I had to call at the printing office and get the proofs.

Q. Did you get the proofs? A. I got what there were ready.

Q. Where did you take them? A. Taken up some from the office, and what they had ready from the printing office—took them up to Irving-place, to the house.

Q. And that was on Monday? A. That was Monday evening.

Q. And that Monday evening you saw Tilton there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So that you are enabled to fix the time, are you, now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, it was on that Monday? A. Yes, Sir, it was on that Monday.

Q. Are you sure it was on that Monday? A. I am sure it was Monday night, Sir.

Q. Who were with him when you saw him at Irving-place? A. Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Cladin.

Q. Who else? A. I don't know as there was any one else present.

Q. Were they in a room together. A. They were in a room together.

Q. Were they talking? A. Talking and reading.

Q. Reading what? A. Why they were reading their manuscripts, and proofs from the printing office, and whatever they had.

Q. When you got there? A. When I got there; when I went up-stairs.

Q. When you went up-stairs in the room they were reading the proofs and manuscripts, were they? A. Yes, Sir, they had a lot of them there on the desk, I think, or table, or something.

Q. Did you hear anything that was read? A. No, Sir; I didn't hear anything that was read.

Q. Did you hear anything that was said? A. No, Sir; not particularly.

Q. Can you remember one word that was said while you were there? A. They were more serious that evening than usual.

Q. More serious than usual? A. Yes, Sir. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, that is the reason why you cannot remember what they said? A. I wasn't thinking about it; all I was thinking about was about going to sleep.

THE STEINWAY HALL LECTURE.

Q. You were introduced to Mr. Tilton at one time? A. I was, Sir.

Q. And what was it that Mrs. Woodhull said to you when she introduced you? A. She said that was Mr. Theodore Tilton. I don't remember whether she said that he was then the present editor of The Brooklyn Union or had been, but she said he was the editor of The Brooklyn Union, and from that I looked more particularly at him, more than I did any one else.

Q. Yes; you had great respect for editors, I suppose? A. Well, for some of them I did; I did for Mr. Tilton.

Q. You remember the Steinway Hall lecture, do you? A. I remember a little something about it. I remember I fetched a note over inviting Mr. Beecher, just before their lecture was.

Q. Where did you deliver it? A. To Mr. Beecher's house, so far as I can recollect, Sir.

Q. Do you remember the year? A. I haven't taken any notice particularly, but I think it was 1871, I think, as nigh—

Q. A little louder. A. I don't remember just the year it was in.

Q. Don't you remember the year? A. I don't remember the year at all.

[Mr. Fullerton here consulted with his associates and then repeated the question.]

Q. Do you remember the year now? A. Sir?

Q. Do you remember the year, when it was? A. I don't remember the year, Sir.

Q. What season of the year was it? A. It was in the Fall.

Q. In the Fall? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was in the Fall.

Q. Was it the same Fall when you heard this conversation in Woodhull & Claflin's office about the Beecher article? A. No, Sir; I don't think it was; I think it was in 1871, if my memory serves me right.

Q. Well, was it before or after this conversation in the office of Woodhull & Claflin? A. Oh! that lecture was before her conversation was.

Q. The lecture was before the conversation? A. I think so, if my memory serves me right.

Q. Speak a little louder. A. Well, I say I think it was.

Q. The year before? A. I think it might have been the year before. If I had been like you I should have taken a note of it, and then I would have known, but I have never taken any notes about the time of it; I never thought enough of it to think about it.

Q. And is it for that reason that you cannot tell me the year when the lecture was delivered? A. Yes, Sir; that is just the reason. I never thought of it; I never paid no thought to it, whatever.

Q. Could the lecture have been as late as 1878? A. No, Sir; it could not have been as late as that, Sir, I am sure.

Q. Was it as late as 1873? A. I don't remember, Sir, when it was; what year it was in.

Q. When was it that you saw these women sitting upon the sofa with Mr. Tilton in between them? A. In between them? Why, several times. There wouldn't be no use for you to ask me that, for it was so many times.

Q. So many times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was a very common thing, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir; I thought it was rather natural for a person to be between two ladies.

Q. Who were in the office at the time when you saw them? A. Well, there were several persons sometimes, and sometimes, may be, there wouldn't be no one but them, and Col. Blood sometimes.

Q. Col. Blood was sometimes in there when that was done? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Well, the office was a public office, wasn't it? A. The office was a public office.

Q. A great many people coming in and going out? A. A great many people coming in; that is the reason I don't have no recollection about it.

Q. Well, when people were going in and going out, did they sit on the sofa in the attitude in which you have described them? A. Oh! yes; a great many of them, very particular friends.

Q. No, no; I am talking about the two women and Mr. Tilton? A. Oh! yes.

Q. He would sit there with his arm about them when they were coming in and going out? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Right before the public? A. Yes, Sir; that is why I paid no more attention to it.

Q. Which room was the sofa in? A. There was a long sofa in the middle room.

Q. Is that the sofa that they sat upon, that you speak of?

A. That was the sofa, where they sat in sometimes; sometimes in the back office.

Q. How? A. There was a sofa in the back office too.

Q. Which was the one they were sitting on, as you have described? A. Which time do you mean, Sir?

Q. When they sat down and finished their conversation? A. Well, they had so many conversations I could not tell you which time you mean.

Q. The conversation which you described? A. Well, Sir, I thought you was through with the other interview, Sir. [Laughter.]

Q. Yes, well we have got back to it again. A. I don't think you have got back to it now, Sir; you have got two or three things all mixed up together. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, we will try to unmix them. You have described the two women and Tilton sitting on the sofa during the conversation in which they spoke of the Woodhull article? A. Well, Sir, I thought you was through with that, Sir.

Q. Now, where was the sofa; was that in the front room or in the back room? A. I will tell you again; the sofa was in the middle office. You understand that, Sir.

Q. Yes, but you say there was one in the back office too? A. I say there was one in the back office.

Q. But my question is— A. But that sofa was in the middle office where I told you the interview was.

Q. When they sat upon it? A. When they were sitting upon it.

MRS. WOODHULL'S TRIAL IN THE U. S. COURT.

Q. That was in the middle office. Very well. Were you a witness in the United States Court? A. I was, Sir.

Q. Gave evidence there, did you? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Woodhull was on trial there, I believe, for sending improper matter through the mails, was she not? A. Yes, Sir, that is what they say.

Q. You were examined at length, were you not? A. Sir?

Q. You were examined as a witness at length, were you not? A. No, Sir; no Sir; it was the first time I was ever in any court in my life. Twenty-seven years old before I was ever in a court.

Q. When did you first tell any one what you knew about that? A. Well, that was the time, and when I spoke it then I wasn't thinking about it. They asked me about it; and I didn't know as I was arrested either at that time, and they arrested me at the Post-Office, and asked me to go up there and see the District Attorney. I didn't know who they were, and nothing at all about it, and I went up, and they questioned me all about it, and I told them that I thought Mr. Tilton wrote it; that was my opinion, but I wasn't thinking at that time at all.

Q. Didn't you tell them that you knew Mr. Tilton wrote it? A. No, Sir, I didn't tell them that I knew he wrote it, because Mr. Tilton was writing there a great deal, and I didn't know anything about that.

THE WITNESS THINKS MR. TILTON WROTE THE WOODHULL STORY.

Q. Didn't you tell the District Attorney or one of his assistants that Mr. Tilton wrote the Beecher article? A. No, Sir; I did not tell him that he wrote it; I told him that that was my opinion that he wrote it; I didn't think that Col. Blood wrote it at all.

Q. Did you say no more than that you believed that Tilton wrote it? A. No, not to my recollection, Sir.

Q. Didn't you tell them that Tilton wrote it, and you heard him read it? A. No, Sir, I don't believe they questioned me so particularly; they didn't question me so close as that, Sir.

Q. One moment; didn't you tell the District Attorney, or one of his assistants, that you heard Mr. Tilton reading the article in regard to Beecher? A. I told him I heard him reading some article—reading some proofs, or manuscripts, but in regard to that—and I told him that I thought he wrote it; that was my opinion.

Q. Now, James, you just pay particular attention to my question, so that you will be able to answer it. Did you not tell the District Attorney or one of his assistants that Tilton wrote that article, because you heard him read it to Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin? A. No, I didn't say that he did write it, because it was impossible for me to say that he did write it, because I don't know what he wrote, because a person can write and write all the writing they want to, and I cannot tell what they are writing.

Q. Now, James, understand me, that I am not asking you whether he wrote it or not; I am asking you whether you did not tell the District Attorney or one of his assistants that he wrote it because you heard him read it? A. No, Sir; I didn't tell him.

Q. How? A. I did not tell him those words at all.

Q. Did you tell him in substance that? A. No, Sir; I told him that it was my opinion that he did write it.

Q. Didn't you add that you heard him read it? A. I told him I heard him reading, but I didn't say whether that was the article that he was reading or not, because I could not tell.

Q. Didn't you say what you meant to have them understood as implying, or meaning that Tilton wrote the article because you heard him read it? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't they ask you this question, "Did you hear Tilton read this article on Mr. Beecher?"—did they ask you that question? A. I think probably they did; they did, I think.

Q. Didn't you answer them that you were present and heard him read the article? A. I think I told them that I heard him reading something, and saw him reading, but what it was I didn't know.

Q. Did you tell them anything else about that article in connection with Mr. Tilton? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Didn't you tell them that you carried the proofs to Mr. Tilton? A. I said that I carried the proofs from Woodhull and Claflin's, and Mr. Tilton was present, up to the printing office, but whether they was the prints—was the proofs, at that time, I didn't know.

Q. Didn't you tell them that you carried the proofs of this article up, and delivered them to Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir; I think not Sir; I don't remember anything about it Sir.

Mr. Everts—I understand this inquiry not as to statements in Court, but to the District Attorney.

Mr. Fullerton—To the District Attorney, or one of his assistants. [To the witness]: Now, when you came in court to give your evidence, were you asked anything about the Beecher article? A. I think I was, Sir.

Q. And what did you testify there in relation to it? A. Well, Sir, I don't remember; it was the first time I ever was in court, ever was sworn to anything, and I don't recollect anything about it.

Q. Were you asked there who wrote the Beecher article? A. I think probably I was, but I don't remember what was said.

Q. Didn't you answer them that Theodore Tilton did? A. No, Sir, I did not answer them that he did, because it was impossible for me to say that he did it.

Q. How? A. I could not swear. I won't say anything that I can't swear to.

Q. No, I don't want you to, you know, James. Didn't you say to them that you had heard Theodore Tilton read the Woodhull article; in court, now. A. I said that I heard him, and saw him reading—reading some of the manuscripts, or proofs, or something of that kind.

Q. But you did not say it was the Beecher article? A. I did not say it; I don't remember saying it was; I don't know.

Q. Now, when did you first tell any one what you knew about this case, what you have testified to now, other than at that time? A. Probably I might have talked with some one else about it, because I was so disgusted with it. [Laughter.]

Q. Well, I didn't ask you what you probably had done, James. I ask you what you really did do? A. What I really did do?

Q. Yes, in the way of telling people what you knew about the case? A. I don't know particularly that I told them anything.

Q. When did you first learn that you were to be a witness in this case? A. Not until I was subpoenaed.

Q. When was that? A. I don't know, Sir; I forgot what the date was.

Q. About how long ago? A. It was sometime—when I was subpoenaed I didn't know—

Q. Oh! about how long ago? A. Oh! I don't know, Sir, how long it is.

Q. A month ago? A. Oh, yes, it is a month ago.

Q. Where were you when you were subpoenaed? A. I was here in Brooklyn.

Q. Living where? A. The same place.

Q. Living at the same place? A. The same place.

Q. Now, if you will tell me what same place—where it was? A. 604 Nassau-st., Sir.

Q. With whom was you at work at that time? A. I was going to school.

Q. Where? A. To Mr. Dorsey.

Q. Where? A. C. A. Dorsey.

Q. When did you commence going to school to him? A. Last Fall.

Q. What time? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. How? A. I don't recollect, Sir, what time it was.

Q. Who suggested that you should go to school? A. I suggested it myself, Sir.

Q. Nobody spoke to you upon the subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Sir? A. No, Sir.

THE WITNESS'S OCCUPATION SINCE LEAVING THE WOODHULLS.

Q. Did you have any conversation with any gentleman about going to school before you went? A. Never, never. I had been in the fruit and vegetable business, and it was getting very scarce then, and I thought it was best—that the best thing I could do was to go right to school and try and get some education.

Q. And when did you see Mrs. Woodhull last? A. I have not seen Mrs. Woodhull since they were on trial in the United States Circus Court.

Q. When did you see Miss Claflin? A. Both were there the same time.

Q. Did you see Miss Tennie Claflin? A. No, Sir; I have not seen one of them since.

Q. Have you seen Colonel Blood since? A. Not one of them.

Q. Who subpoenaed you? A. Who subpoenaed me? I don't know, Sir, who it was; I don't know who subpoenaed me.

Q. Has any one talked to you about your evidence in this case since you were subpoenaed? A. Some of the lawyers have.

Q. When? A. To-day.

Q. How? A. To-day.

Q. To-day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not before to-day? A. Oh! yes, Sir; some before to-day.

Q. Well, when? A. Yesterday.

Q. Before yesterday? A. There might have been some before yesterday.

Q. Speak louder. A. I might have had a little interview before yesterday.

Q. I don't ask what you might have had. Did any one talk to you about your evidence in this case before yesterday? A. They asked me—I was questioned about what I knew about it.

Q. When? A. This week?

Q. What day? A. Monday, and yesterday, too.

Q. Where? A. Up here.

Q. How? A. At Mr. Hill's office.

Q. In New York? A. No, Sir, here in Brooklyn.

Q. Here in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who asked you to go to Mr. Hill's office? A. Mr. Whitney—Alderman Whitney.

Q. Where did Alderman Whitney see you? A. He came after me, and found me.

Q. Found you at school? A. No, Sir, I was not at school that morning.

Q. At home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you talk to anybody before you talked to Alderman Whitney about this case? A. I didn't talk in particular with him, because he didn't tell me; I didn't know what he wanted.

Q. Did you talk with anyone in regard to the evidence that you were to give in this case, before he came for you? A. No, Sir, because no one knew where I was; I tried to keep out of it; I gave no one my number.

Q. You tried to keep out of it? A. Yes, Sir, for I had enough of it before.

Q. Where did you go with Alderman Whitney? A. I came down to see Mr. Hill.

Q. When was that? A. I don't know.

Q. Eh? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Where did you live after you left Woodhull & Claflin's? A. The same place, Sir.

Q. Whom did you work with? A. Whom did I work with? I worked at my own business—fruit and vegetable business.

Q. Where did you carry it on? A. I carried it on from Norfolk, Virginia, to New York.

Q. Where did you make your sales? A. Different places; sometimes in private families, and so on.

Q. Did you have any stand? A. No, Sir, no stand at all.

Q. No shop? A. No shop whatever. I would ship it and get it all engaged to people to take it, and ship it on here and get paid for it.

Q. What vessels did it come on? A. The Old Dominion Steamship Co.

Q. Where did they land? A. Pier 37.

Q. And have you been engaged in that business ever since you left Woodhull & Claflin? A. Off and on.

Q. Up to the time you went to school? A. Off and on pretty much while it was in season.

Q. Have you not followed your trade at all? A. No, Sir; I could not get anything to do.

Q. Did you work for no one after you left Woodhull & Claflin? A. I do jobs around.

Q. Where did you do jobs? A. Oh, several little places.

Q. Well, where? A. Where any one wanted me to do anything.

Q. Where did any one want you to do anything? A. Several places.

Q. Name those places, James; you are wasting time. A. I could not begin to name the little small jobs I did.

Q. Can you name any person for whom you worked after you left Woodhull & Claflin's employ? A. I worked for myself, on my own hook.

Q. Eh? A. I worked on my own hook; that is my principal business.

Q. Besides yourself whom else did you labor for? A. Oh! different small jobs I have done.

Q. Name the persons? A. I could not begin to name to you the persons. Supposing you were to go do two or three little jobs —

Q. Name one little job, James? A. I could not begin to do that, Sir.

Q. How recently have you done any work for any man? A. How recently? Most any time.

Q. How long since you did one of these jobs? A. I did one this morning.

Q. Can you tell me for whom you did a job this morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who is it? A. Powsland, 344 Carlton-st.

Q. And the name? A. L. A. Powsland.

Q. Before that for whom did you do a job? A. Sir?

Q. Before that for whom did you do a job? A. I could not remember. There is no use of my undertaking to try to tell you, because I could not.

Q. Can you not name one person? A. I have named one. You asked me to name one person, and I did so. [Laughter.]

Q. Can you not name another one? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. You cannot recall the name of any other person? A. I don't believe I could. I thought you wanted to ask me particular questions.

Q. Well, I do. I want to know for whom you have been working? A. But you are entirely out, now.

Q. Did you work more than one day for anybody? A. Yes, Sir, I did, several. If you have got a job for me to do, I will do it.

Mr. Fullerton—The job we have got we have on hand now.

The Witness—Have you not anything else?

Mr. Fullerton—Can you tell me whether you worked more than one day for any man since you left the employ of Woodhall and Claflin? A. I have; I have worked several days.

Q. Several days for one man, have you? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Can you not tell me the name of that man for whom you worked for several days? A. I will tell you one more, and I hope you won't ask me for any more.

Q. Tell me one more, James? A. That is J. B. Smith, the builder. I think you will find—I don't exactly know his number in New York.

Q. J. B. Smith? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The builder? A. Yes, Sir; I think his office is 300 and something, Broadway.

Q. How long did you work for him? A. Oh, I used to work quite a good deal of jobs for him all the time he stayed in Brooklyn pretty much.

Q. Did he live in Brooklyn? A. He used to live in Brooklyn—in Baltic-st.

Q. From whom did you make purchases in Norfolk? A. Different people. When the sloop would come in I would go and buy whatever I wanted to buy. I didn't have any particular person to buy from; whoever I could get it from the cheapest.

Q. Did you go to Norfolk? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How often? A. Once in a while—as often as I could afford it.

Q. To Norfolk? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you made your purchases and came back on the vessel here? A. Came back on the vessel here, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF JAMES B. WOODLEY.

By Mr. Everts—James. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have not seen or heard anything about your evidence that you gave in the U. S. Court, or what you told the District-Attorney or his assistant since that time, have you? A. No, Sir, nothing at all about it; I never thought about it since.

Q. Until you were asked here to-day? A. No, Sir; I never thought about it.

Q. Now, this Mr. Dorsey, to whom you go to school, does he keep a school for grown persons? A. No, Sir.

Q. Is he a colored man? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you been to him before, any Winter? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or only this Winter? A. Only this one, Sir.

Q. Now, you have been asked about any job outside of the fruit and vegetable business that you have been engaged in since you left Woodhall & Claflin's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Since that matter came to an end, do you keep up a set of carpenter's tools? Do you profess to work at the carpenter business? A. No, Sir; I don't keep any; I never got any job, so I didn't keep any.

Q. And any jobs that you have done that have been inquired about, were they in the way of your trade as a carpenter, or in some other way? A. Sometimes it was, and sometimes it was the other way.

Q. This job this morning that you spoke of, what was that? A. I tended a furnace this morning.

Q. Now you have spoken about the habit of lunching—the frequency of Mr. Tilton being at lunch at the office, and you have spoken of lunches also—of their lunching at Delmonico's or at their office?—Delmonico's particularly. You spoke of its being a dozen times, or perhaps two dozen times. Do you mean that that was during the whole time that you were there, from 1870 to 1873? A. That is what I mean, Sir.

Q. From time to time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there any habit of their lunching at Delmonico's day after day, or did they lunch at their offices? A. They lunched at their offices most generally.

Q. What did you do about that?—what was your service there? A. My services, Sir, were opening and attending the door at that time.

Q. Did you sit at the door? A. I sat at the door part of the time.

Q. And were you then a stranger to most of the people that came there? A. I was a stranger, Sir.

Q. Had you ever seen Mr. Tilton before that occasion, do you think? A. If I did, I didn't know it, Sir.

Q. Not to your knowledge? A. No, Sir.

Q. You had not seen him. Do you remember how you found out that the gentleman whom you then saw was Mr. Tilton—was named Mr. Tilton? A. I heard—Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin told me that that was Mr. Tilton.

Q. Was that after the assemblage had broken up? A. That was soon after—shortly afterward; I heard his name mentioned several times, but I had not been acquainted with the gentleman, and I was very anxious to see him.

Mr. Beach—Oh, well!

Q. You have spoken of two occasions of Mr. Tilton addressing Mrs. Woodhull as "Vickey?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that an ordinary thing with him? A. Oh, it was common—very common—usual to call her "Vickey."

Q. And how did she address him? A. Theodore.

Q. You have spoken of their greeting one another as usual? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was their usual mode of greeting one another? A. When they would come in they would bow and kiss, just the same as two ladies would meet. Of course you understand that.

Mr. Evans—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Q. At Willard's Hotel? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach (to Mr. Hill)—Was it in August, 1870, he says?

Mr. Beach—You may as well stop that.

Mr. Hill—He was pointed out to you, then, by some one who you knew, as Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Be kind enough to state how much you saw of Mr. Tilton after that? A. Well, after that I used to see him there sometimes once or twice a week; sometimes every day, until the weather began to get warm; then his visits became more frequent.

Q. Now, do you recollect any circumstance which will enable you to state about when it was that you are certain you first saw Mr. Tilton; if so, mention it? A. I don't know any other circumstance except the one I have already related, when he first came in the office.

Q. To be down to the office early? A. Yes, Sir, went down to the office.

Q. How late at night did you say? A. I observed his being there until 12 o'clock two or three times.

Q. Well, what was he doing? A. Writing.

Q. Always, or in social intercourse? A. Once I remember he was talking to them.

Q. Do you know when that was? A. Sir?

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. Well, it was in warm weather; I don't know what month it was in. It was very warm weather, because they had all the windows up.

Q. Do you remember whether they rode out or walked out together? A. Yes, Sir; I seen them go out once riding.

Q. Do you remember what kind of a vehicle they had? A. They had a phaeton, one of those low carriages, with a white horse.

Q. How late at night was this? A. This was 6 or 7 o'clock; probably 8 o'clock in the evening; somewhere along there.

Q. When they started from the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember when they came back? A. No, Sir.

MRS. WOODHULL THREATENS MR. BEECHER.

Q. You didn't see them. Now, Mr. Gray, do you remember the Steinway Hall speech which Mrs. Woodhull delivered? A. I know she did deliver a speech at Steinway Hall, sometime in November, 1871, I think.

Q. Were you present at it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you recollect of hearing any conversation between Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton in respect to Mr. Beecher, not long before the occurrence of that speech? A. I heard them talking very many times about Mr. Beecher—about his presiding at that Steinway Hall lecture.

Q. Well, Sir? A. I don't know what they said, but they were always talking about him, and I heard Mrs. Woodhull say—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Hill—To him? A. To him, Tilton?

Q. Yes; go on with it then? A. That he had better preside at that meeting.

Q. Who had better? A. Mr. Beecher; that he, Mr. Beecher, had better preside at that meeting, or that she would make it hotter on earth for him than hell was below. [Laughter.]

Q. Do you recollect an occasion when Mr. Tilton separated from her to go away, about that time. Oh, pardon me. Did Mr. Tilton make any reply to that? A. He said, "He has got to preside; he will do it, and I shall go over to Brooklyn to see about it."

Q. You are now giving Mr. Tilton's answer? A. Yes, Sir; and as he went out of the door his arm was half around her waist.

Q. Around Mrs. Woodhull's waist? A. Yes, Sir.

THE WRITING OF THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Q. Well, Mr. Gray, do you recollect the biography of Mrs. Woodhull which is said to have been prepared by Mr. Tilton? A. I heard that he was going to write—

Mr. Morris—No, one moment.

The Witness—He wrote her biography.

By Mr. Hill—Do you recollect the fact that it was published? A. Yes, Sir, or at least I heard it was.

Q. Now, do you know how long they were at work upon that biography? A. Well, I suppose—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. I object to that question.

Mr. Hill—To the question, Mr. Beach?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—What is the ground of objection?

Mr. Beach—The ground of objection is that you call for persons who are not named. "How long they were at work." I don't know who you mean by that question.

Mr. Hill—Do you know whether or not Mr. Tilton was at work upon it, either with Mrs. Woodhull or by himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how was it? Were they at work, or not? A. They were; Mr. Tilton was at work.

Q. Now, how do you know that fact, Richard? A. Because he was up at the house at work at night; he would be sometimes at her house writing, and sometimes at the office writing.

Q. Anything said about it? A. No, Sir, not that I heard.

Q. Then, you don't know from him that he was at work on the Life? A. Not from him.

Q. Now, Mr. Gray, won't you please describe to his Honor and the jury a little about the relative position of these rooms in the Woodhull office? On which side of Broad-st. was it, to start with? A. On the west side.

Q. What sort of room was it into which you entered from the street? What was in that room? A. What was in the room?

Q. Yes, what was it used for? A. It was used as a broker's office, the first room.

Q. What part of the brokerage business was conducted in that room—desks? A. Desks and other things there.

Q. Clerks there? A. Yes, Sir; all the clerks were there, a good many of them.

Q. Where was all your work done—in that front room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how did you get into the back room, the next room behind this room? A. We went through a little door; there is a partition across there, and we went from there into the middle room.

Q. It was not a partition extending up to the ceiling? A. No, Sir.

Q. A low one? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With a little gate? A. Yes, Sir, extending all the way round.

Q. Half door? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that what you call the middle room? A. Yes, Sir; you entered into the middle room there.

Q. Well now, I understand there was another room? A. Yes, Sir, what they called their private office.

Q. Private office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How was that separated from the front office? A. There was a large glass window, which extended all the way from the floor to the ceiling.

Q. And what kind of a door? A. Well, the door was pretty much the same—a glass door like.

Q. Well, how late at night did you stay at this office ordinarily? A. Well, I stayed very late, stayed there until 7 or 8 o'clock, sometimes 9 o'clock; sometimes I stayed there until 10; I had not anything special to do, and I remained right there.

Q. Now, please state whether you observed any, and if so what, acts of familiarity between Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull at the office. A. I remember on one occasion I was there very late at night; the gas in the room that I was in was out; it had not been lighted; the gas in this private office was lighted, and they had been there some time, and when they got up to go they came near this door; I was sitting nearly opposite to the door, and I saw the motioning of arms and the heads moving backward; could see them distinctly; of course I became interested and I watched, and I could see the arms and the two heads moving together in a very lover-like manner.

Mr. Beach—In what?

Mr. Hill—In a very lover-like manner.

The Witness—Very lover-like manner, as though lovers were parting, something like that.

Q. How did you happen to be there so late? A. Well, I always stayed there because I used to lock the office sometimes.

Q. You used to wait to lock up the office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were waiting for them to come out on that occasion? A. Waiting for them to come out; yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Gray, do you recollect whether or not Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton came out from that room that night after you saw these shadows upon the glass? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Let me understand you; the suggestion is made, did you see the forms of the people through the glass, or the shadows upon the glass? A. I saw it through; I could sit and look right through.

Q. Now I understand. A. Of course it reflected right through the glass—the whole action.

Q. Do you say that you saw them come out that night after they— A. Yes, Sir; they came out.

Q. What is it? A. Yes, Sir, they came out of the room.

Q. Do you recollect other occasions at evening or at night when they were in this back room together? A. Yes; Sir, they used to be there quite often.

Q. When the gas was not lighted? A. I remember once or twice when the gas was not lighted, and they remained there, I think, until along about half past 6 or 7 o'clock.

Q. How late in the evening? A. Just about dusk, 6 or 7 o'clock.

Q. Could you hear them conversing? A. Sometimes I could, and sometimes I could not.

Q. Well, could you hear conversation in ordinary tones of voice, that occurred in the back room? A. Not at all times.

Q. But you could hear them conversing at one time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then intervals when you did not hear them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then you would hear them again? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, please state what rooms in the Woodhull mansion you have seen Mr. Tilton in. A. In Thirty-eighth-st.?

Q. Yes. A. In Mrs. Woodhull's room, back room, second floor.

Q. What floor was that—second floor, front or back? A. Back room.

Q. Back room—how many times have you seen him there? A. I have saw him there some two or three times.

Q. Well, was that a bedroom or a library? A. It was a bedroom, Sir; it is where they slept; I supposed it was a bedroom.

Q. Have you seen him in other rooms about the house? A. Yes, Sir, saw him in the parlor.

Q. Name them—well, in the dining-room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Any others, if so, name them? A. Well, I saw him in her bedroom, in the parlor, and in the dining-room.

Q. Now, about how much did you see him at the house? A. Well, I used to see him there quite often; I sometimes would retire and leave him there and would find him there in the morning.

Q. What time in the morning? A. Well, when I left, about half-past seven, probably eight o'clock.

Q. How many times did you see him in the morning? A. Well, some two or three times.

Q. What is it? A. Some two or three times.

Q. What part of the house was he when you saw him in the morning? A. The dining-room.

Q. Was it at meals, at breakfast? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the dining-room? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

Mr. Pryor—[After consultation with Mr. Morris.] That will do, Mr. Gray.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

Mr. Pryor (to the witness)—That will do.

Judge Nelson—Next witness. Find a short witness (it being near the hour of adjournment).

Mr. Tracy—We are trying to find as short a witness as we can, your Honor. We are disappointed in the examination of the last two witnesses.

Mr. Morris—I should think you would be.

Mr. Tracy—We are satisfied.

Mr. Beach—So are we.

Mr. Morris (to Mr. Tracy)—You are easily satisfied.

Mr. Shearman—I don't think we have any but long witnesses, and to go on about seven minutes would do no possible good. It would have to be an exceedingly short witness.

Judge Nelson—Gentlemen of the jury, in view of the fact that to-morrow is Good Friday, and of the further fact that the counsel are engaged on Saturday, we shall now adjourn to Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court was then adjourned.

FIFTY-THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE CONFESSION TO MRS. MOULTON.

TWELVE WITNESSES EXAMINED—TESTIMONY IN REGARD TO A REMARKABLE PROPOSITION FROM MR. TILTON TO A MEMBER OF THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE—EFFORTS TO DULL THE POINT OF THE VERBAL CONFESSION TO MRS. MOULTON—A TELEGRAM DATED THREE WEEKS AFTER ITS RECEPTION.

MONDAY, March 29, 1875.

The morning session of the Tilton-Beecher trial to-day was devoted to three witnesses, each called for a different purpose. Mr. David Dows, the New-York merchant in whose family Miss Turner resided for a month or two, was called to confirm the latter's testimony as to the length of her stay in his family. By reference to data he established that Miss Turner was right in her recollection of the time she was in Tarrytown, and correct in her statement that she had remained until the family of Mr. Dows had returned from their California trip.

John Winslow, ex-District-Attorney of Kings County, and a member of the Committee of Investigation appointed by Mr. Beecher, was called to testify to the fact that Mr. Tilton had proposed to him—as the only member opposed to it—a plan of silencing the scandal by the adoption of a report which Mr. Tilton had drawn up exonerating Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Tilton, and himself. On the cross-examination Mr. Fullerton endeavored to commit the witness to the statement that Mr. Tilton had proposed this plan in order to shield Mr. Beecher, but Mr. Winslow insisted that Mr. Tilton, without naming any person, had urged the acceptance of his plan on the ground that investigation would cause sorrow to a great many persons. Mr. Winslow testified that Mr. Tilton had accused Mr. Tracy of a breach of good faith in appearing against him after he had solemnly promised not to do so. Mr. Tracy had retorted that he had not done so without giving Mr. Tilton notice that he considered himself absolved from that promise when Mr. Tilton advanced his charge against Mr. Beecher from "improper solicitation" to "adultery." The further fact was brought out that in his action as counsel of the Committee Mr. Tracy had worked without pay or prospect of remuneration. On the cross-examination Mr. Fullerton made many inquiries as to the present whereabouts of the evidence taken before the Committee, but obtained no definite answer. He also made inquiries as to alterations made by the Committee in Mr. Beecher's statement before giving it to the press.

Thomas James Turner, Mr. Beecher's farmer at Peekskill, was called to add another link in the chain of evidence which the defense relies upon to contradict the extraordinary statement of Mrs. Moulton relative to Mr. Beecher's verbal confession of his alleged offense with Mrs. Tilton. The minuteness with which Mr. Turner was examined and cross-examined indicates the importance which both sides attach to Mrs. Moulton's story; it is looked upon, indeed, as among the most vital points in the case. The defense do not hesitate to say that it was manufactured, and promise to prove an alibi; the plaintiff's counsel exhibit deep interest when the subject is touched upon by the witnesses.

The evidence of Mr. Turner yesterday shows that Mr. Beecher was absent from New-York from two o'clock on June 2 until nightfall on June 3; and that of Mr. Perkins, a few days ago, places him at Worcester, Mass., on an eastward-bound train. Only the morning of June 2 remains to be accounted for, and this is the important period; for Mrs. Moulton, on her direct examination, stated that the interview lasted for three or four hours; that he left her to go home to lunch, and that she saw him the next day or the day thereafter. On the cross-examination she stated that the interview was in the morning, and that she could not remember that Mr. Beecher had called the next day or the day after that, but she thought he called again during the week. So it now remains to show where Mr. Beecher was on the forenoon of Monday, June 2, 1873, and on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday of the same week.

After recess Mr. Beecher's counsel resumed their line of defense by additional testimony as to Mr. Beecher's whereabouts during June 2, 3, and 4, 1873. Joseph S. Turner, a son of Mr. James Turner, corroborated his father's testimony that Mr. Beecher's arrival at Peekskill was on the evening of June 2. The witness had met Mr. and Mrs. Beecher at the depot, and driven them to their house. He was positive as to the date, and gave his means of fixing it.

James Rochford, a receiver at the Western Union Telegraph office in Brooklyn, identified the original dispatch which was produced by Mr. Hill in Mr. Beecher's handwriting as one of the dispatches received by him June 2, 1873. The production of this paper created some stir among the plaintiff's counsel. Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton examined it closely. The telegram was dated June 2, but the date was written in pencil, and the examination by the plaintiff's counsel disclosed the fact that the 2 had been changed from some other figure. The cross-examination was confined to this, and elicited the fact that the date had been written on the telegram two or three weeks ago by one of the operators at the office, and that he had changed it from June 1 to June 2. E. B. Denzler, a telegraph operator, also identified the dispatch, and swore that he had sent it between 8 and 9 a. m.

Ben. Kittridge, a farmer residing near Mr. Beecher's farm at Peekskill, swore positively that he saw Mr. Beecher at Peekskill on the evening of June 2, 1873. He fixed the date by a number of incidents which happened about that time, the recital of which afforded a very good specimen of the closeness with which the country people watched the movements of the Plymouth pastor when he visited his farm.

Thomas J. Tilney testified that Mr. Beecher married him in Brooklyn on Tuesday, June 3, 1873; and Frederick A. Putnam testified that he had seen Mr. Beecher and his wife taking the cars at the New-Haven depot early on the morning of June 4, 1873. The last witness on this part of the defense was Mr. Henry L. Hughes, manager of the Western Union Telegraph office in Brooklyn, who testified that he had found Mr. Beecher's telegram three weeks ago in the package of dispatches sent June 1, 1873. He had written the date upon it and was sure that it belonged with the dispatches of the day before. There was no cross-examination of these last witnesses.

Stephen V. White, a member of the Investigation Committee appointed by Mr. Beecher, was called to corroborate the testimony given by Mr. Winslow about Mr. Tilton's statements before the Committee. His account was substantially like Mr. Winslow's, but in one respect it differed—at least in the witness's own estimation. Gen. Tracy asked him, "Was anything said by Mr. Tilton about verbal confessions to him by Mr. Beecher?" "Well, I think they were recognized," answered the witness, who afterward explained that he had understood that Mr. Tilton had alluded to verbal confessions when he had declared that Mr. Beecher had asked him (Tilton) to give him an opportunity to leave the country in case the facts were published. Gen. Tracy insisted that this referred to the publication of the documentary evidence alone, but the witness replied that that was a matter of personal opinion. Mr. White also gave an account of the quarrel between Mr. Tilton and Gen. Tracy over the latter's conduct in taking part in the case, and testified that the disputants had finally reached an amicable understanding on the matter.

The twelfth and last witness of the day was H. B. Claffin, who took the stand a short time before the adjournment. He was suffering from a very severe cold, which prevented him from raising his voice above a whisper. Mr. Shearman repeated aloud Mr. Claffin's answers to Gen. Tracy's questions, and the examination proceeded slowly. The witness began with an account of the discussion of the tripartite covenant made at the interview between Messrs. Tilton, Moulton, Wilkeson, and the witness, at Mr. Moulton's house.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DAVID DOWS.

At a few minutes past eleven the jurors were called and the day's work was begun.

David Dows was sworn on behalf of the defendant, and examined as follows:

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Dows, you are a merchant of the City of New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is the name of your firm? A. David Dows & Co.

Q. What is your line of business? A. Produce commission business.

Q. And how long have you been a merchant of the City of New-York? A. Forty years and more.

Q. Are you the Mr. Dows in whose family Miss Bessie Turner lived at one time, as she has stated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long was she in your family? A. I cannot tell you how long she was there.

Q. Well, about how long? A. Probably between two and three months; she came there in the Spring, and left in the Summer some time.

Q. Have you any personal recollection about it, or is that in your wife's affairs? A. I have no personal recollection distinct enough to tell you the time she came, nor the time she left.

Q. All matters between her and the family were between your wife and her, I suppose, or the other ladies, and not yourself? A. I heard nothing about—

Q. I am not talking about that—I mean only about what time; and the payment was with the ladies of the family, the — A. Memorandum as to the time when she came and left?

Q. And the payment, then the time she came and left, and as to — A. Well, I cannot tell you; I am not—

Q. Very well. That I understand. A. Neither have I any memorandum to show exactly the time she came; but she came some time in the Spring, and left in the Summer; I think in April or—

Q. Well, now, did you or some portion of your family go on the Pacific Railroad that spring? A. On the Union Pacific Railroad?

Wm. Sterling

Q. On the Union Pacific? Or on a trip towards California, or what? A. Well, my family with others—party of gentlemen from New-York, went on a trip to Omaha, at the opening of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad.

Q. Yes; and the Pacific Railroad was not opened then, was it to California? A. I think the Pacific Railroad was not opened all the way through; I think it was not, although I am not certain.

Q. Now, do you know what day you left and what day you returned on that trip? A. We left on the 31st day of May, in the morning train, and we returned so that I was in New-York on the 12th of June. We returned, I think very likely, on the 11th, at night at Tarrytown where we lived; and on the 12th, in the morning, I came right through to New-York, and I was in New-York on the morning of the 12th of June.

Q. Have you examined your books and papers to— A. Yes, Sir. I have examined my letter book to refresh my memory.

Q. And the ladies of your family that went with you, they returned with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Nothing, Mr. Dows.

John Winslow was next called for the defense, and having made affirmation, was examined as follows:

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN WINSLOW.

Mr. Tracy—You are a practicing lawyer in this city, Mr. Winslow? A. Yes.

Q. Where do you practice; where is your office? A. New-York.

Q. Reside in Brooklyn. A. Yes.

Q. How long have you been a practicing lawyer? A. Oh! about 25 years.

Q. Formerly District Attorney of Kings County? A. Yes.

Q. Were you a member of the Investigating Committee appointed by Plymouth Church last Summer? A. Yes.

Q. And did you meet with that Committee? A. Yes.

Q. Were you present at the meeting when Mrs. Tilton was before the Committee? A. Yes.

Q. Can you tell us when it was? A. 6th of July, in the evening.

Q. Where was that meeting of the Committee at which she was present? A. At Mr. Ovington's.

Q. How came the meeting to be at Mr. Ovington's? A. The Committee met previously at Mr. Storrs's, and were notified by yourself that they could meet Mrs. Tilton at Mr. Ovington's.

Q. And did the Committee adjourn from Mr. Storrs's to Ovington's for that purpose? A. They did.

Q. You went with the Committee there, did you? A. Yes.

Q. Did Mr. Tracy accompany the Committee to Mr. Ovington's? A. He did.

Q. Will you tell us, Mr. Winslow, whether Mr. Tracy was absent from the presence of the Committee when they arrived at Mr. Ovington's house, on that night, before Mrs. Tilton gave her statement before the Committee; and, if so, how long he was absent from the immediate presence of the Committee? A. Well, I missed him I think two or three minutes, more or less; I could not state very precisely.

Q. How long had the Committee been in the house, should you say, before Mrs. Tilton was in the presence of the Committee giving her statement? A. Well, I should think it might be from five to six minutes.

Q. Without asking you what was said or what questions were put, I ask you whether, as a matter of fact—by whom, as a matter of fact, most of the questions put to Mrs. Tilton that night were put; by whom were they put? A. By members of the Committee.

Q. You were present at the meeting of the Committee, when Mr. Tilton first appeared before the Committee? A. I was.

Q. Can you give us the date of his first appearance? A. That is the 10th of July, in the evening.

Q. Where was that meeting held? A. Mr. Storrs's.

Q. Did you listen to Mr. Tilton's talk with the Committee that night? A. Yes.

Q. Heard what he said, did you? A. Yes.

Q. What, if anything, did he say in regard to the evidence of his case against Henry Ward Beecher? A. Well, the talk was a conversational one.

Q. Well? A. He at first said he didn't think there had better be an investigation; didn't think there was any occasion for one, and doubted whether Mr. Beecher wanted one, or had authorized one. We assured him that he did. He still doubted it, and then one of the members of the Committee, Mr. Cleveland, showed him the letter of authority from Mr. Beecher, requesting this investigation. Mr. Tilton expressed surprise, and said that he was aware that he was a discredited person in this community, but that his case did not depend upon him; it was in writing, in documents and papers.

Q. At that point of the conversation did Mr. Tracy say anything to Mr. Tilton on the subject of what his evidence proved? A. If you will call my attention to the particular point that you refer to—

Q. Did Mr. Tracy say anything to Mr. Tilton that if his case was—

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, I object to his embodying the substance. The Witness—I now remember what was said.

Mr. Tracy—Well.

The Witness—Mr. Tracy said to Mr. Tilton that if his case was in writing, if he would produce the documents, we could judge of them as well as he could.

Q. Well, was anything said by Mr. Tracy on that occasion? A. Oh! there was a good deal said, but I do not now recall—

Q. Well, did Mr. Tracy say that he had seen the documents himself?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Beach—That style and form of examination, Sir, is very objectionable as leading.

Mr. Tracy—On the ground that it is leading?

Mr. Beach—Why, yes, Sir; you know as well as we that it is leading.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I don't suppose this witness is one that is likely to be influenced very much.

Judge Neilson—That is not the point.

Mr. Morris—He don't need leading.

Judge Neilson—It is no reflection on the witness at all; you can ask whether anything was said on a given subject.

Mr. Tracy—Was anything said by Mr. Tracy upon the subject of his having seen the documents? A. I don't recall at this moment what was said about that.

Q. Was there anything said by Mr. Tilton on that occasion in regard to his case resting in any degree upon the verbal confession of Mr. Beecher? A. Not a word.

Q. Did he state anything upon that subject, as to whether Mr. Beecher had ever confessed to him verbally or to anybody else? A. No.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton—state whether or not Mr. Tilton read Mr. Beecher's letter asking for the appointment of the Committee that night? A. Did Mr. Tilton state?

Q. Did Mr. Tilton read it? A. He did.

Q. Had it in his hands? A. Yes.

Q. Read it more than once? A. Looked at it very carefully—took plenty of time.

Q. After that meeting did you have an interview with Mr. Tilton, a few days after that, on the subject of this investigation? A. Yes.

Q. When was that interview, and where was it? A. That was on the 13th, about sunset.

Q. 13th of July? A. Yes, in Montague-st., opposite the Academy of Music.

Q. Can you state whether or not that was on the day that Mr. Tilton published in The Argus his card saying that he should accept Mr. Beecher's challenge, and produce his proofs before the Committee? A. Same day.

Q. Same day? Had you read that card at the time of this conversation? A. Yes, just read it, and had the paper in my hands, and referred to it in our conversation.

MR. TILTON'S OFFER TO PREPARE A REPORT FOR THE COMMITTEE.

Q. What was said between yourself and Mr. Tilton on the subject of that investigation at that conversation? A. I met Mr. Tilton; he was passing toward the west, and I toward Court st., and I said to him, "Theodore, I have just read your letter." I had the paper in my hand and had just finished reading it. He said he would like to talk with me. I said, in a playful way, "Do you think it proper to talk to the court?" He said he wanted to talk to me. I then—we stopped. He said this investigation was all wrong, it ought not to proceed, and that it might be easily closed; he had a way of closing it; he said that he wanted the Committee to adopt a report that he had drawn—he said indeed he had drawn two or three reports, but he had one that he thought would be satisfactory, which provided for the exoneration of the three parties, himself, Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, and they could all go about their work. I told him that that was the first I had heard of any such project as that; that I did not know anything about the case, either on his side or on the other; I had never heard it stated. I told him I did not propose to know anything about it, except what I learned from testimony taken by the Committee; that I considered it my duty to listen to that as if I were a Judge on the bench, and that I thought I could come to a conclusion after hearing it; if I did I should state it, hit where it might. He said he had understood that I would oppose it, and if I would not oppose it all the other members of the Committee would agree to it. I told him I thought he was mistaken, that I did not believe a member of the Committee would listen to it, and that I had not heard it mentioned by any member of the Committee. He said, "Well, do me justice." I said, "Certainly," and we separated.

MR. TILTON CRITICISES GEN. TRACY.

Q. You were also before the Committee the night he presented the sworn statement? A. Yes.

Q. Were you present also at his cross-examination? A. Yes.

Q. When was that—when did that occur? A. Well, the first—it commenced on the 30th and it ended on the 23d.

Q. I call your attention to the 23d, I think it was—at all events, I call your attention to an occasion, if you were present, when Mr. Tilton attacked Mr. Tracy? A. My impression is that that was on the 23d; that is my impression about it.

Q. On the 23d? A. Yes.

Q. Did you hear that attack? A. Yes.

Q. What was said? A. We had—it was in the afternoon; we had an afternoon session that day, not a regular session; it was an informal meeting—

Mr. Beach—I do not understand, Sir, the importance of this evidence, and I object to it.

Judge Neilson—We cannot very well tell what it will be until we hear it; I think we will have to hear it.

Mr. Beach—We gave no evidence whatever of any attack by Mr. Tilton upon Mr. Tracy before the Committee.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is a conversation with the plaintiff, and I think therefore we must take it.

Mr. Beach—It does not follow, Sir, because it is a conversation with the plaintiff upon a subject totally foreign and irrelevant to this issue, that it should be taken.

Mr. Tracy—It is not irrelevant; it is on the same subject.

Mr. Morris—He is calling for a personal difficulty now.

Mr. Everts—Oh, no.

Mr. Tracy—Listen to the evidence and you will see its materiality.

Mr. Beach—Well, go on.

The Witness—There had been no regular session that afternoon, that is to say, no regular testimony taken, and I think the stenographer took no minutes. We were on the point of separating—it was quite late in the afternoon—when Mr. Tilton suddenly burst out, sitting near you and opposite you, to this effect: "Mr. Tracy, you have no right to be here in collision with me; you made me a promise when you first knew this case, that if I and Mr. Beecher came in collision you would not appear against me." You answered: "Yes, but when I saw you changing your ground, changing the case from one of improper advances to the main charge, I notified you that that promise would not bind me, and ought not to." Mr. Tilton answered that that did not make any difference, you had made the promise, and you were bound by it. That idea was repeated there in various forms, and you both got talking pretty loud, and showed some excitement. Then after that stormy conversation, if I may so characterize it, you went into the front parlor to speak to some gentlemen, and I also went there with some others. In a moment Mr. Tilton came in, looking very sweet and pleasant, and said: "Tracy, I forgive you, I like you better than any man in Brooklyn." He put his arm on your shoulder, or partly around your neck, and I think you—I am not quite sure whether you said anything about forgiveness or not—but you looked very good-natured. [Laughter.]

Judge Nelson—The audience will have to keep quiet. Do not signify that it pleases you, or displeases you.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton then said that the difference between you and him was, that he sometimes did wrong and asked forgiveness, and you sometimes did wrong and never did ask forgiveness. I think you then shook hands, and there was a general laugh all around. Mr. Tilton then left, and there was some laugh after he left.

Q. Was there anything said there on that occasion by Mr. Tracy as to what the nature of his charge against Mr. Beecher was at the time he stated it to me and got that promise? A. It was repeatedly referred to as a case of improper advances; that is to say, you put it so, and he did not deny it, but claimed that it made no difference. That was his position, that you were bound.

Q. Did Mr. Tracy also say to him that whether I was bound under the circumstances was a matter of judgment?

Mr. Beech—Well, that is all improper, Sir, putting occasions in that form.

The Witness—Oh, yes.

Q. Well, was there anything said by Mr. Tracy at that time as to whether that was a matter of judgment whether the promise under the circumstances was binding or not? A. Yes, that was said, and I think you said also that you had not acted without considering it, and asking other opinions or other views.

Q. Views of other lawyers on the subject? A. Yes.

Mr. Tracy—You may examine, gentlemen.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. WINSLOW.

Mr. Fullerton—When was the first meeting of that Committee, Mr. Winslow? A. We had an informal gathering on Sunday evening, June 28th.

Q. Any testimony taken that evening? A. No; a mere informal conversation.

Q. When was the first meeting of the Committee when evidence was taken? A. The 6th of July.

SECRETS OF THE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE REVEALED.

Q. What means did the Committee adopt to perpetuate the testimony? A. We used a stenographer.

Q. Whom did you use? A. I think his name is Ellinwood; I am not personally acquainted with him.

Q. Was he present on July 6th? A. I think he was.

Q. And did he reduce to writing the evidence taken that night? A. I think he did; he seemed to be doing that.

Q. Was he present at every subsequent meeting of the Committee? A. So far as I remember.

Q. And did he take the evidence of all the witnesses produced before that Committee? A. I think he did, unless he may have substituted some one some day that he could not be there. I don't recollect.

Q. You don't recollect of any such instance? A. I have no distinct recollection of it. It may have occurred, though; but he was generally there.

Q. How many statements did Mrs. Tilton make before the Committee, either verbal or in writing? A. I think she was before the Committee twice.

Q. That does not answer my question, Mr. Winslow? A. That is all I saw of her and all the Committee saw of her, as a Committee.

Q. My question was, how many statements she made before the Committee, either verbal or in writing; your answer is that she was before the Committee twice.

Mr. Everts—How is that material, if your Honor please?

Judge Nelson—I don't know; it may be. I think we had better take it.

The Witness—She made two.

Q. Verbal or in writing? A. Verbal.

Q. On what night did she make the first one? A. 6th of July.

Q. Was that statement ever published? A. I never saw it.

Q. Do you know what became of the notes after they were written out? A. No.

Q. Have you ever seen them since? A. I never saw them at all.

Q. Do you know whether or not they were written out? A. No.

Q. Well, how many times was Mr. Beecher before the Committee? A. Mr. Beecher was before the Committee twice.

Q. How many statements, either written or verbal, did he make before the Committee? A. Two.

Q. Were they oral or written? A. Both; that is, mixed.

Q. Did he make two written statements before the Committee? A. His first statement, if you call it that, was an informal affair—

Mr. Beech—That we did not ask at all.

The Witness [continuing]: Which he read—

Mr. Fullerton—No; that is not asked.

The Witness—I am going to tell you what shape it was in.

Mr. Fullerton—Not until you are asked, I suppose?

The Witness—You did ask.

Mr. Everts—You asked whether he made a statement.

Mr. Fullerton—I did not ask whether it was formal or informal, or the manner in which he read it; I asked if he made two written statements before the Committee.

The Witness—Yes.

Q. When was the first statement? A. I think it was about the 15th of July.

Q. Where did the Committee meet when that statement was made? A. At Mr. Storrs's.

Q. Who of the Committee were present? A. My recollection is that they were all present, though some one may have been absent.

Q. Was the statement left with the Committee after it was read? A. No.

Q. Who took it away? A. Mr. Beecher; I suppose he took it away; I am supposing now.

Q. Who read it to the Committee? A. Mr. Beecher.

Q. Was that statement ever published? A. The substance of it was, afterwards—yes.

Q. No, no; I did not ask you that. Was that statement, as made, ever published? A. I think not—not so far as I know.

Q. Did the stenographer take notes of it? A. I really cannot say; I don't know whether he did or not.

Q. You were present? A. Yes.

Mr. Beach—Please reflect, Mr. Winslow, and see if you can recollect.

The Witness—I can tell you what I do recollect, and you can judge for yourself. Mr. Beecher read—

Mr. Beach—You were not asked that.

Mr. Fullerton—I am talking about the stenographer now, not about the reading. Did the stenographer take notes of it?

The Witness—I know. I want to give you the facts so that you may judge whether he did, or not. I cannot say whether he did or not.

Q. Have you no recollection on the subject? A. I have not.

Q. Do you recollect that the stenographer was there that night? A. I have no distinct recollection of it, only I know that he was generally there; that is all.

Q. Have you seen that statement since that night? A. No.

Q. Have you seen a copy of it since that night? A. No.

Q. Do you know whether the stenographer ever wrote out any notes that he took of that statement that night? A. I don't know.

Q. You have never seen any? A. No.

Q. Do you know where the minutes of the Committee now are? A. I do not.

Q. Who was the chairman of that Committee? A. Mr. Sage.

Q. Who had charge of them during the sittings of the Committee? A. Well, I think the stenographer took them, uniformly.

Q. Well, after he wrote out the testimony, what was done with it then? A. Well, we turned it all over to the Examining Committee of the Church.

Q. Do you mean to say that you turned over the whole of the evidence taken before the Committee to the Examining Committee? A. Yes; except I don't suppose that that brief statement referred to of Mr. Beecher was included—I don't suppose it was.

Q. Nor was the first statement of Mrs. Tilton included, was it? A. I presume it was; I merely presume that—I don't know.

THE DISPOSITION MADE OF THE EVIDENCE A MYSTERY.

Q. Did you hand over the evidence thus taken at the time the Committee made its report? A. That was the direction given; I didn't personally do it.

Q. Is that your understanding of the matter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, to whom were the directions given to pass over to the Examining Committee the evidence that you had taken? A. Some one member of the Committee, I think, took charge of that, but I cannot say positively who it was.

Q. Have you no recollection upon that subject? A. I could give a guess, that would be very satisfactory to me, but it would be a guess, though.

Q. What is your best recollection upon the subject without guessing? A. I have a best recollection about it, but it is not a distinct recollection; my impression is that Mr. Cleveland took it, and yet I may be mistaken.

Q. Have you seen the minutes of evidence since they were submitted to the Examining Committee? A. No; except as they have been printed.

Q. Printed where? A. Well, in these various pamphlets and newspapers.

Q. Do you know where the minutes of evidence are? A. No; it went out of our jurisdiction when it went to the Committee.

Q. Did you superintend the printing of any of the evidence? A. No.

Q. Or correction of proofs? A. No.

Q. Did you superintend the printing of Mr. Beecher's statement that was printed? A. No.

Q. Did you aid in its preparation for the printers? A. No.

Q. Were you present when it was being prepared for the printers? A. No.

Q. Were you present when any alterations were made in it? A. No.

Q. Do you know who did superintend it? A. No.

Q. Do you know whether it was all printed? A. That would depend, of course, upon my recollection of it.

Q. That is the reason I asked you? A. I should say, from my recollection, it was.

Q. You signed the report of the Committee, did you? A. Yes.

Q. Have you seen that in print? A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether it is correctly printed in the book entitled "The Great Brooklyn Romance?" A. I know it is not correct; it is substantially so, but there are errors in it.

Q. You mean simply verbal errors? A. I think you would be able to detect the meaning through the mistakes; still there are errors in it.

Q. Do you know where the original report is? A. I know in whose hands it was the last time I saw it.

Q. When did you see it last? A. The day that the report was read at Plymouth Church.

Q. In whose hands was it then? A. Mr. Cleveland's.

Q. Do you recollect the examination of Mr. Beecher before the Committee? A. Yes.

Q. Who drew the report of the Investigating Committee? A. That is the work of several minds.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that does not prevent you from answering the question.

The Witness—I made the first draft.

AN ERROR IN THE PRINTED REPORT OF THE TESTIMONY.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes. [Handing report to the witness.] Will you please look at the report, at that part of it commencing, "Mr. Belcher testified that he made," &c., and tell me who drew it, or that part of it? A. I think I did.

Q. You drew it then in conformity with the evidence, did you? A. I think there has a slight error crept in there. I had not Mr. Belcher's evidence at my elbow when I wrote that part of the report; I had other testimony, but not that, and I believe there was an error.

Q. Do you remember that error? A. Yes.

Q. Is it a matter of positive recollection? A. Yes.

Q. Have you got Mr. Belcher's evidence now? A. I have refreshed my memory by looking at it?

Q. When did you look at it? A. I looked at it a day or two after he testified here; I thought he made an error, and I wanted to see who was right.

Q. Where did you find it? A. I think Mr. Hill handed it to me.

Q. In what form was it? A. Manuscript.

Q. Written out by whom? A. I don't know; it was written out.

Q. Do you know it was correct? A. Well, it struck me to be correct—entirely correct.

Q. Was not your recollection as good when you drew that report as on the afternoon of those two or three days ago when you looked at Mr. Belcher's testimony? A. No; when this report was drawn quite a number of days had passed from Mr. Belcher's testimony.

Q. I ask if your recollection of his testimony when you drew the report, which was only a short time after he testified before the Committee, was as good as it was a few days ago, when you looked at some manuscript purporting to be his testimony? A. I don't think my recollection of his testimony was as correct as to verbal matters when I wrote this part of the report as it was after I had refreshed my recollection.

Q. Did you look at the evidence as written out by the stenographer? A. Of course I cannot say of my own knowledge who wrote that out; it was handed to me as stenographic copy; I don't know that it was; I have no doubt it was, however.

Q. I want you to speak independent of what you saw on that paper? A. It would be difficult to do it, for I had refreshed my memory somewhat.

Q. And then you discovered an error had crept into your report, the part of it which you drew; is that it? A. Yes, Sir; a slight error.

Q. Had you any evidence before you besides Mr. Beecher's at the time you discovered this error? A. Do you mean when the report was drawn?

Q. No; when you saw this manuscript in the hands of Mr. Hill? A. No.

Q. Do you know where that evidence came from? A. It came from Mr. Hill to me; that is all I know about it.

Q. You took it for granted that evidence was written out correctly? A. I assumed that to be so; I have no doubt it was so.

Q. Do you say from your recollection that it was so? A. Well, from my recollection refreshed I say yes.

Q. How? A. From my refreshed recollection I say yes.

Q. From your recollection before you wrote it? A. I can only say this, that it occurred to me when I heard Mr. Belcher's testimony read here that he made a mistake, and I was curious to see whether his memory or mine was at fault; and I thought it over somewhat, and came to the conclusion as to my own memory when I read Mr. Belcher's testimony.

Q. Now, irrespective of the testimony you have seen, or took before you, what did Mr. Belcher testify as to having seen the "True Story?" A. I don't think it would be fair for me to undertake to say I could state that irrespective of the testimony, because there came in the refreshing in connection with my general memory.

Q. Have you no recollection on that subject? A. I have a general recollection on it.

Q. Give us the best of your general recollection? A. As to what he testified to?

Q. Upon the subject of the having seen the "True Story?" A. My recollection is that Mr. Belcher referred to the paper that Mr. Tilton read to him, or extracts from it, and that he stated—he called it before the Committee a "document," and he called it a "statement," and in one instance he called it a "story;" but the phrase "True Story" he didn't use.

Q. Your recollection is distinct upon that subject? A. I have no doubt of it, at all; and yet I say to you that I would not be as positive if I had not refreshed my recollection in the manner I have stated.

Q. Well, you thought at one time he used the term "True Story." did you not? A. Yes; and I can easily see how that occurred.

Q. Well, inasmuch as I can see, I won't ask you how it was. Immediately after he gave his testimony before the Committee were you not under the impression that he used the phrase "True Story" in his testimony? A. I cannot testify as to the condition of my memory or my mind at that moment, because I did not refer to the testimony of Mr. Belcher again in my recollection specially until we came to make the draft of the report.

Q. When you drew that report, did you not think that Mr. Belcher had used the term "True Story" in his testimony? A. I must have confounded—

Q. I ask you? A. I must have had that impression, of course.

Q. You must have had that impression? Oh, I think so.

HOW THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE WAS REVISED.

Q. Now, different parts of the report were written by different members of the Committee, I understand you? A. As I said, I made the first draft. Then there was some amendment suggested.

Q. Discussed, was it? A. Well, yes, somewhat.

Q. Read over? A. Yes.

Q. Frequently? A. No.

Q. How frequently was it read over? A. The course pursued was this: The amendments suggested were considered, and either adopted or rejected. Then, after they had been settled, the report was read to the entire Committee, just on the point of their signing it.

Q. Yes. Any discussion then in regard to it? A. Not at that point.

Q. Were all the members of the Committee present? A. They were when it was signed.

Q. When it was read over? A. Yes.

Q. They were all present? A. Yes.

Q. And where was that done? A. The last piece of work was done in my office in New-York.

Q. When was it done? A. It was done two days before, I think, the report was made to the Church.

Q. Were you present at the Academy of Music when it was presented? A. Mr. Beecher's church you mean—Plymouth Church.

Mr. Fullerton—I beg your pardon—Plymouth Church.

The Witness—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—It was there read at length, was it not? A. Yes.

Q. No exception taken to it at that time, was there? A. Yes.

Q. I mean by any member of the Committee? A. No.

Q. Was Mr. Tracy present when it was read over at your office? A. No.

Q. Was he present at any time when it was read over? A. No.

Q. Was he present at any time when it was discussed, or when any part of it was discussed? A. I think not when the Committee were present; I have no recollection that he was.

Q. When any member of the Committee was present and read it over, or discussed it, was he present? A. I think I had a casual conversation with Gen. Tracy in the street or in the office, just as it might happen, wherever I met him.

Q. On the subject of the report? A. Yes; part of the subject. We talked over the thing generally, and no doubt that was referred to.

Q. Did you ever read any part of the report to him in your office, or elsewhere? A. I think not.

Q. You have no such recollection? A. No.

MR. TILTON'S FIRST APPEARANCE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Q. When do I understand you to say you first saw Mr. Tilton in regard to this matter—July 10th, was it? A. He came before the Committee July 10; yes.

Q. Voluntarily, or upon your invitation? A. He had received an invitation from the Chairman of the Committee.

Q. Now, what was it he said when he came there? A. Well, it was quite an extended conversation. I well remember the first remark he made, if you want that, but it is not very material.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—He said he had hastened away from an engagement in New-York, and I understood him to say he had partially shortened that engagement for the purpose of coming over.

Q. I understood you to say he didn't want an investigation? A. I am telling you the first remark he made, which was that he hastened over so as to show no discourtesy to the Committee. That is almost the first remark he made.

Q. Did he say he didn't wish an investigation? A. He said he didn't think it was best to have an investigation.

Q. Did he give any reason for it? A. Well, his reasons were more in the way of insinuation than clear statement.

Q. Well, give us his insinuations, then, as he gave them to you. A. His insinuations were that it would be a very unhappy affair, make a great deal of unhappiness and trouble, and it really had better not proceed. That is about the idea.

Q. I want you to state all he said on that subject? A. Call my attention to anything you have in your mind.

Q. The reasons he gave you for saying it was not best to have an investigation? A. That was the idea, that he thought it would be a very unhappy affair, and cause a great deal of trouble and distress, and all that sort of thing.

Q. Did he say to whom it would cause trouble or distress? A. He thought it would cause trouble to a good many people.

Q. Did he say to whom? A. I don't know that he did specially; it was very obvious to whom.

Q. Did he say it would cause trouble to Mr. Beecher? A. I don't think he specified him; he referred to the general trouble it would make.

Q. Did he not specify Mr. Beecher? A. I think not.

Q. Did he say to whom trouble would come? A. I think not specifically.

Q. Did he say anything upon the subject of guilt? A. Not in any clear statement; it was by way of intimation.

Q. What was his statement upon that subject? A. The intimation was that there would be some very unhappy revelations which we would not like to hear. He didn't believe Mr. Beecher wanted them brought out—didn't believe Mr. Beecher wanted any investigation; and when we assured him he did, and requested it, he would not believe that, and then we showed him the letter.

Q. What did he say when he read the letter? A. He didn't say anything for some little time; he looked over the letter very carefully; he said he would reserve for further consideration the question whether he would make a statement; he said he would consider it, and then he, as you know, appeared afterwards.

Q. Did he then and there express an unwillingness to testify to what he knew upon the subject? A. He did.

Q. Did he not do so repeatedly? A. Yes.

Q. Did he give any reason for it? A. The general reason I have referred to, that it would make so much trouble, pain and sorrow.

Q. Did he say he didn't wish an investigation on account of his wife? A. I don't remember that he alluded to his wife or to Mr. Beecher specifically, though of course we understood the allusion to be to both of them.

Q. Didn't he say, in substance, that he would withhold, or thought he would withhold testifying upon the subject, for the purpose of shielding his wife and family? A. Not as you state it now.

Q. How did he state it? A. As I have stated it.

Q. Won't you state it over again, because I don't recollect how you stated it? A. Because it would produce distress and sorrow among many people, and it had better not proceed; there was no occasion for it—ought not to go on.

Q. Did he say anything upon the subject of shielding his wife and family? A. I would not say he didn't speak of his family, yet I have no particular recollection of it; he may have done so.

Q. I am asking you the question about shielding his family—protecting his family? A. I am answering about that.

Q. Don't you recollect, in substance, that he said something of that kind? A. No, I don't.

Q. This was on the 10th of July? A. Yes.

Q. Was anything stated to Mr. Tilton at that time touching the nature of the statement which Mrs. Tilton made upon the 6th before the Committee? A. I have no recollection of it, yet it may have been referred to; I am very certain that I didn't refer to it; some one else may have done so.

Q. Tax your recollection, please, and tell me whether or not the subject of Mrs. Tilton's statement on the 6th was not communicated to Mr. Tilton on the 10th, when he was before the Committee? A. Not as I recollect, but some one may have made such a remark; I could not say it was not so; I know I didn't say it.

Q. Something was said at that time about documents and papers, I understood you to say? A. Yes.

Q. Who spoke of the documents and papers first? A. I think Mr. Tilton did.

Q. What did he say upon that subject? A. He said: "Gentlemen, I am well aware that I am a discredited person in this community, but my case rests in writing, documents and papers."

Q. And who replied to that? A. The conversation was quite general. Mr. Tracy had something to say, and other members of the Committee.

Q. What reply was made to that? A. We assured him we wanted to see the documents and papers; that we meant an honest and sincere investigation, and we wanted to know all he knew. He told us he didn't think Mr. Beecher did, and we told him Mr. Beecher certainly did, and that he had requested this investigation. He said he didn't believe that; at least he didn't say he didn't believe it, but he said: "I doubt it."

Q. Was anything more said in regard to the documents and papers of which he spoke? A. I don't now recall anything, and yet if you refer to a point I will tell you if I can.

Q. Was there anything said about producing them and letting the Committee judge for themselves? A. I think there was.

Q. What was said upon that subject, and who said it? A. It would be impossible for me to tell who said this or that in that conversation. This was said: "We would like to see your documents and papers; we want you to produce them; we can judge as well as you can. Now, let us see what you have got."

Q. What reply did he make to that? A. He would not say, in reply to that, whether he would give the documents or papers, or whether he would testify; he wanted to consider it; he would reserve that for consideration, and he didn't decide until the 18th whether he would come or not.

Q. Have you any distinct recollection of that conversation? A. I can give you the substance of it, to the best of my recollection.

Q. You don't profess to adopt his very language? A. No; I do in part; yes.

Q. But not wholly? A. No.

Q. Are you prepared, at this date, to say whether Mr. Tilton said, "My case does not depend upon my recollection, but upon documents and papers," or did he say, "It does not alone depend upon my recollection—what I have to say, but upon documents and papers?" A. No; this was what he said: he was referring to documents and papers in connection with his own personal standing.

Q. He didn't say it didn't depend alone upon documents and papers? A. He said it rested in writing, upon documents and papers, and what I have already said was said in that connection.

Q. Did he say it depended alone upon documents and papers? A. He didn't use the word "alone."

Q. Didn't he say it depended principally upon documents and papers? A. No.

Q. Are you prepared to say he didn't use the word "principally?" A. Yes.

Q. Or any synonym of that word? A. Yes.

Q. That conversation was not taken down, was it? A. Well, I didn't watch the stenographer as he was there; I could not even say he was there.

Q. Have you any recollection? A. I have never seen any minutes of it, and I don't suppose it was taken down; I have no idea it was.

Q. Was it your intention to have it taken down? A. Well, I had no personal intention about it, one way or the other.

Q. Any direction given to the stenographer as to what he should record? A. The stenographer may have been there and he may have been taking notes, but I might not have even noticed him; I might have been engaged in conversation. If anybody says he was there I wouldn't deny it.

THE INTERVIEW IN MONTAGUE STREET.

Q. You speak of an interview with Mr. Tilton on the 18th of July, in Montague-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A casual meeting, was it? A. Yea, Sir.

Q. You had just read his letter in The Argus? A. Just read it, and had the paper in my hands.

Mr. Tracy—The reporters request you to speak a little louder, Mr. Winslow.

Mr. Fullerton—What did he say upon the subject of making a report, or writing a report for the Committee? A. He said that he didn't think this investigation ought to go on—it ought to be closed; there was no occasion to have it go on in this way, and that he thought it could be closed by a short report, indeed that he had drawn two or three, and he had one that he thought would do, which substantially exonerated the three principal parties, Mr. Beecher, Elizabeth Tilton, and himself; and then he—there was one other remark that he made that I did not state before, that they could go before the Committee and support that by their statements, and so close it.

Q. Did he give any reason in that conversation for saying that the investigation ought not to go on? A. Well, he may have done so; I have had several conversations with Mr. Tilton in the course of the Summer, and I am in a little danger of confounding what he said on one with this occasion. I have a slight impression—it is only an impression—that he referred to the testimony which Mrs. Tilton had given on the 6th of July, as one of the reasons that made him feel kindly and lenient, and yet I may have confounded that with some other conversation.

Q. Did he, in that conversation in Montague-st., say anything to the effect that he wanted such a report made as would shield his family? A. No, not as you state it.

Q. How did he state it? A. Well, as I have stated it.

Q. Repeat it, please. A. A report that would substantially exonerate Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Tilton and himself, and let them go their way.

Q. Did he give any reason for that? A. He thought it was best.

Q. Did he give any reason why he thought it was best? A. He did not, unless to make the remark that I have just referred to; he may have made that remark on that occasion.

Q. Calling attention to Elizabeth's statement on the night of the 6th? A. Yes, he may have done that.

Q. Well, why did he draw the report; did he tell you? A. No, and I did not—well, I won't say.

Q. Did you see the report that he drew? A. No; he didn't show me any paper.

Q. Did you at any time see any report that he had prepared for the Committee? A. I never did, except as afterwards published.

Q. Well, you understood in that conversation, as I take it, that his desire was to protect the three persons implicated—Beecher, himself and his wife—by drawing a report that would effectuate that purpose, was it not? A. Well, I understand that he wanted done precisely what he said he wanted done—to exonerate, as I have stated.

Q. Didn't he state that after Elizabeth's evidence before the Committee that she could substantiate the report or agree with the report? A. His plan was to have, I think, all three support the report by a statement before the Committee.

Q. Yes. Did he say whether he had seen the other members of the Committee to know whether they would agree to such a report? A. No; he said he had understood what I have stated about that.

THE ALTERCATION BETWEEN MR. TRACY AND MR. TILTON.

Q. I now call your attention to the time when he was before the Committee, and presented his sworn statement, when something occurred between him and Mr. Tracy. A. Well, I don't think it was on that occasion; I think that was two or three days later. His sworn statement was on the 30th.

Q. On the 30th and ended on the 22d? A. Yes. My recollection is that the altercation occurred on the 23d.

Q. Where? A. At the Committee room, at the Storns house.

Q. What was Mr. Tilton doing there on that day? A. My recollection is that he had brought a bundle of letters there, and it was understood that there should be no formal proceedings that day, no testimony taken.

Q. Did he come there by appointment? A. I presume he did.

Q. Do you recollect whether he did not? A. Well, I think he did.

Q. An appointment with whom? A. With the Committee.

Q. Did the Committee all meet that day? A. Well, they were all there unless there might have been some one absent; I guess they were all there.

Q. And did they meet there for the purpose of receiving Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, and particularly to see his letters.

Q. Did he bring some letters there? A. He did; quite a large package.

Q. Exhibited them to you? A. He kept them in his hand and commenced reading some of them, and then the remark was made by some member of the Committee, "Well, what you are reading don't seem to be of very much pertinency here. Supposing that some of us look these letters over and see what are wanted," and that led to a discussion of how to manage that. Mr. Tilton said that he—I remember one proposition he made was to leave them in the hands of Judge Reynolds.

Q. Yes. A. And that we might look them over while in his possession; but the upshot of it was that I should see the letters at some subsequent time, and if any of them were important or pertinent that we should have copies.

Q. Now, what remark, if any, was made by Mr. Tracy which caused Mr. Tilton to attack him, to use your own language? A. Mr. Tracy was as still as he is now. It was an outburst; it surprised us all.

Q. Hadn't Mr. Tracy said anything in that conversation? A. Not that I remember. We were having a very quiet, cosy time.

Q. And are you prepared to state that he did not say something? A. I am prepared to state that I don't believe he did, for I have no recollection.

Q. Well, he was there? A. Tracy?

Q. Yes. A. Oh! yes; sitting right opposite Mr. Tilton.

Q. Come with the Committee? A. Well, he was there; he didn't come with the Committee particularly; he came in.

Q. Do you know who notified him to be there? A. Mr. Tracy?

Q. Yes. A. Oh! he attended all the meetings of the Committee; he was appointed to act for the Committee by the Committee, he and Mr. Hill, by a resolution, on record, of the Committee.

Q. Appointed by the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To act for the Committee? A. Yes.

Q. As counsel? A. Yes.

Q. Was Mr. Hill there that day? A. I can't tell you; I think he was, but take his word about that.

Q. Now, what did Mr. Tilton say first to Mr. Tracy? A. Well, the substance of it was: "Mr. Tracy, you have no right to appear here in collision with me or against me; you promised me, when you first came into this case, that if Mr. Beecher and I ever came in collision you would not appear against me." That was the charge.

Q. What did Mr. Tracy reply to that? A. Mr. Tracy immediately said, "Yes, and I notified you when I saw you changing your case from one of improper advances to the main charge, that that promise would not bind me—ought not to bind me."

Q. What did Mr. Tilton reply to that? A. He said that that didn't make any difference; Mr. Tracy had made the promise, and he was bound by it.

Q. Did not Mr. Tilton say in substance, "You are prevaricating, Mr. Tracy; you know what the original charge was?" A. Oh! I don't think the word "prevaricating" was used.

Q. Did he say that in substance, omitting the word "prevaricating?" A. No, no; his idea was, it didn't make any difference. "You once made the promise, and you are bound by it."

Q. One moment, Mr. Winslow; I want his ideas, judged by his words? A. Well.

Q. Didn't he say in substance, "You know what the original charge was?" A. No.

Q. Nothing to that effect? A. Nothing to that effect; there was no disputation about that.

Q. But Mr. Tilton's reply was that it made no difference, was it? A. No difference; he was bound by the promise; that was the position he took.

Q. Now, what else was said between them before they broke up? A. Well, as I said before, that idea was repeated in various forms, but in substance the same; they did not agree at all about it, as to Mr. Tracy's obligation, and then they went into the front parlor, and this scene occurred which I have described.

Q. Yes; and then did it end? A. Mr. Tilton left.

Q. Was the lie passed between them that day? A. Nothing so vulgar as that.

Q. Well, how much short of it? A. "False" was used.

Q. Who used the word "false?" A. I think Mr. Tracy said with great vehemence, once, "It is false."

Q. What did he allege was false? A. Tilton's assertion that the promise was to be binding no matter what happened, or what was said.

Q. He said that was false? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tracy say he was not appearing against Mr. Tilton then? A. No.

Q. Nothing to that effect? A. No.

Q. Well, did he allege that he was appearing against him? A. That was taken for granted; it was assumed.

Q. Appearing against him by acting as counsel for the Committee? A. Mr. Tilton assumed that to be so, and Mr. Tracy made no point about it.

Q. Not a word upon that subject? A. No.

Q. Was not that point discussed as to whether in point of fact Mr. Tracy was appearing against Mr. Tilton by acting as counsel for the Committee? A. Mr. Tilton said he was appearing against him; that is all there was said about that; that is, in that form. He says, "You have no right to appear here against me."

Q. That was the charge? A. Yes.

THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE'S COUNSEL.

Q. Now, what other counsel appeared before that Committee than Hill and Tracy? A. No other.

Q. No other party to be affected, or who could be affected by the investigation, was represented there by counsel? A. There was no party represented in the strict sense. We passed a resolution at our first meeting, I think, employing Messrs. Tracy and Hill to assist the Committee.

Q. What assistance were they to render the Committee? A. Oh, they were very useful.

Q. Well, I have no doubt about that, but I want to know in what line of business they were useful. A. Well, I judge of their work by what was done. I suppose they attended to the getting of witnesses and all that.

Q. Well, they could get the witnesses without being present before the Committee, I suppose? A. And examining witnesses also.

Q. Did they examine the witnesses? Yes, in conjunction with the Committee.

Q. Were they paid for their services? A. I don't know.

Q. Nothing been done in regard to that? A. No, not that I know of.

Q. Nothing said at the time of their employment about compensation? A. I can tell what our understanding was, but I really have no knowledge.

Q. How? A. I can tell you what our understanding was, but I have no knowledge.

Q. The understanding with the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what was the understanding with the gentlemen? A. That their services would be voluntary.

Q. To be voluntary? Yes, Sir.

Q. They agreed to that, did they? A. No distinct agreement that I know of. I cannot refer to any agreement. It is simply my understanding.

Q. This understanding that you speak of—do you mean that it was based upon anything that was said? A. No; there is simply a resolution upon the minutes to employ them. That is all the Committee did about it.

Q. Employ them without compensation? A. There was not a word said about it.

Q. Was there anything said or done from which you drew the conclusion that they were to work without compensation? A. Well, I think I have heard the remark made through the summer, whether from Mr. Tracy or from Mr. Hill, or somebody that heard them say, I could not distinctly say now—

Q. How? A. I could not distinctly say now whether the remark came directly from them to me or through third parties, that they had made up their minds to make no charge for their services.

Q. Inasmuch as the Committee did not expect to pay them? A. How?

Q. Inasmuch as the Committee did not expect to pay them? A. Well, we had nothing to pay with.

Q. No; and you don't know whether they have had any compensation or not? A. No; I have no knowledge.

THE WITNESSES BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Do you recollect that Bessie Turner was before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. I suppose her testimony was taken down by the stenographer, also, was it not? A. I presume so.

Q. Do you recollect distinctly her testimony before the Committee? A. Well, I have a general recollection of it.

Q. I want to ask you whether this question was put to her: "Did he [referring to Tilton] at any time on this day say that she had made any confession to him in regard to Mr. Beecher?" and did she give this answer in substance: "He said she had confessed to him that she had been criminally intimate with Mr. Beecher. She was present when he said that [that is, Mrs. Tilton was], and said: 'Oh! Theodore, how can you tell that child such base lies?' and then burst out crying." A. I think that was said.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all. Oh! one moment. Do you know anything about the West charges? A. Nothing.

Q. When did you first hear of them? A. I think the first time I ever saw them or knew what they were was a statement of them in one of the statements—Mr. Moulton's or Tilton's—purported to be the charges.

Q. Is that the first that you ever heard of them? A. Yes; the first that I ever heard of them except that I did hear in a general way about Mr. West and Plymouth Church, but I was not active in those matters, and would not be likely to know about that.

Q. Well, was it not discussed before the Committee at any time? A. Never alluded to in any way, that I ever heard.

Q. Do you know what offices the other members of the Committee held in Plymouth Church? A. I think it would trouble me to tell; I am not a member of the church.

Q. Then you don't know of your own knowledge? A. No.

Q. Was Mrs. Bradshaw before the Committee? A. She was not; we sent for her, but she declined to come.

Q. Was Mrs. Moulton before the Committee? A. No; we could not get her husband, and we thought we wouldn't send for her.

Q. You did get her husband, didn't you? A. Not to say anything.

Q. Not to say anything? A. He came and promised to say, but did not say.

Q. Was Mr. Bowen before the Committee? A. No.

Q. You could not get him, could you? A. I don't know.

Q. Did you try? A. I think not.

Q. That is what I think. That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. WINSLOW.

Mr. Tracy—In regard to the compensation of counsel before the Committee, don't you know that they were compensated by a resolution of thanks by Plymouth Church for their gratuitous services before the Committee? A. Whether that compensated or not, I don't know. We gave the thanks.

Q. For their gratuitous services? A. That phrase may have been used; if it was, it escaped my notice.

A. That is the only compensation you know of having been paid them? A. I say I don't know any, not even the thanks; I had forgotten it.

Q. Wasn't you present at the meeting? A. I suppose I was there, but I had forgotten about it.

Q. Now, this question of Bessie Turner, that you say Bessie Turner answered—the answer was made to a question read or asked her; was it at that time? A. That is my recollection.

Q. It was not in her narrative? A. No, it was question and answer, and quite a leading question, I should judge.

Q. And were a good many questions asked her? A. Yes.

Q. By various members of the Committee? A. Yes.

Q. And was there more or less confusion in the questions of one member of the Committee, and then another, and then another, following?

Mr. Beach—One moment, I object to that.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection?

Mr. Fullerton—The objection is, the questions themselves will determine the fact whether there was confusion.

Mr. Tracy—I ask whether they were put by different members of the Committee, first one member putting a question, and then another, and then another? A. That was so.

Judge Neilson—You may state how that was, Sir.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; that was so.

Mr. Tracy—You say Mr. Tilton brought letters there on the 23d, and they were examined? A. Yes.

Q. And it was agreed that you should afterwards— A. They were not examined.

Q. He read some of them? A. He commenced reading some of them—what we might call affectionate letters.

Q. You say that it was agreed that you should have the privilege of examining the letters and selecting any that were relevant to the investigation? A. That was the final agreement; yes, Sir.

Q. Did he ever furnish you those letters? A. No.

Q. Did he refuse afterwards to furnish them? A. He did.

Q. On the evening of his sworn statement did he present any papers, any letters, accompanying that statement? A. No.

Q. At all? A. No.

Q. Even the letter he quoted from in the statement? A. No.

Q. They were not present. Did the Committee ever see what was known as the "Griffith Gaunt letter"? A. It did not. That was what I wanted to see, but failed to see, among other letters. I ought to add, perhaps, as a matter of justice—Mr. Tilton gave a reason finally for not furnishing it, which I thought to be a fair reason.

Q. Well, they can ask that, and I presume they will. Do you remember, on the 23d, his presenting a letter to the Committee which has since been published, dated January 31st, 1837—1838—January 31st, 1838, in which his wife speaks of her sin—as being black with sin, or some phrase of that kind; do you remember a conversation that occurred about that letter? A. Yes, I remember you thought it a very important letter.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton asked for that letter on that day? A. Yes.

Q. Did he give it or refuse to give it? A. He did not give it.

Q. Did he ever give it to the Committee? A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Was he asked what that reference of his wife—to what sin his wife referred in that letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What answer did he make? A. O, I don't think he made any explanation.

Q. Do you remember whether or not his answer was, "I won't tell you?" A. It was something like that; he declined to tell us.

Q. Now, you say, Mr. Winslow, that Mr. Beecher did not refer to the documents that he saw in Mr. Tilton's possession at the time of that interview before the Committee as the "True Story?" A. Yes.

Q. Can you tell or explain how it was that you fell into the error of referring to his testimony as referring to the "True Story?" A. Yes.

Q. Will you? A. The Committee were constantly hearing of the "True Story"—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. We object to that.

Mr. Tracy—We think they have opened the question. They have proved by this witness that an error occurred in that report. Now, I asked him how it occurred.

Judge Neilson—I think you may explain.

The Witness—It occurred in this way; the Committee were constantly hearing about this—

Mr. Beach—I object to what the Committee were constantly hearing.

The Witness—Well, the Committee in my hearing were hearing about this "True Story," and Mr. Harman had testified about the "True Story."

Mr. Tracy—Calling it such? A. Yes, Sir; he called it that, and the newspapers were talking about it more or less.

Judge Neilson—The term had become familiar, I suppose.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; he became familiar, and when that part of the report was written, Mr. Beecher's testimony was not at hand, and therefore not referred to, as to the precise phraseology.

Mr. Tracy—That is the way the error of referring to Mr. Beecher as testifying to the "True Story," occurred? A. I think so.

Q. You have been asked about the details of the documents and the evidence before the Committee; what has become of it? A. I ought to add further that what attracted my attention to Mr. Beecher's testimony further was that I thought he made a mistake.

Mr. Beach—Oh!

Judge Neilson—We have that.

The Witness—No, I think not.

Mr. Tracy—There is another question. Do you remember whether or not before the Committee Mr. Beecher testified to Mr. Tilton's reading him the letter of his wife? A. He did as testify before the Committee.

Q. Before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—It is inadmissible, Sir, but it is of no great consequence.

Mr. Tracy—Testified to it there as he has here?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Oh! no.

Mr. Beach—The question was inadmissible in itself.

MR. BEECHER AND THE COMMITTEE.

Mr. Tracy—Now, in regard to the documents and the evidence before the Committee, I suppose you had nothing to do with that, Mr. Winslow? A. No, Sir.

Q. Your duties, or the part you took in the investigation was confined simply to what transpired in the room? A. That is all.

Q. In the presence of the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the drafting of the report afterwards? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have referred to a statement made by Mr. Beecher before the Committee, what you called on his appearance before the Committee. Did Mr. Beecher read from a paper that night? A. He read from a paper, whether from notes or a continuous paper I don't know.

Q. You never had that paper in your hands? A. No.

Q. And you don't know how much of his statement before the Committee was verbal and how much written? A. Well, I know it was both.

Q. Yes, but you never saw the paper? A. No.

Q. Now, do you know what led to Mr. Beecher's appearance before the Committee on that first occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the subject of his coming there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was it?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—I think it is important for this purpose, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Well, a general occasion to appear there is plain enough.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, but they have shown that Mr. Beecher appeared there and made a statement, which statement has not been published. Now, I propose to show that it never was intended for publication, and was not made for publication but was made for the information of the Committee to guide them in their investigation, simply.

Judge Neilson—Don't that follow from the mere fact that it was not published?

Mr. Tracy—Not necessarily; that is not the insinuation that was sought to be cast.

Judge Neilson—I don't think there was any insinuation. The simple question was whether Mr. Beecher appeared, and if so on two occasions, and whether he made his communication orally or written, and the answer was, both. Now, I don't think you can go beyond that. There is no insinuation in it.

Mr. Tracy—What I ask to show of this witness is this, your Honor, that after Mr. Tilton published his card in The Argus, saying he should give a true statement, or that he should give a statement of the facts, &c., to the Committee. the Committee were investigating without knowing—Mr. Tilton had not made any statement, and been before the Committee and had declined to make any statement, and the Committee were investigating without knowing what the truth was in regard to Mr. Beecher's relation with Mr. Tilton's family, and they sent for Mr. Beecher and he came before them and made a brief statement concerning his relations there, but not intended for publication, but simply to guide the Committee in their investigation. That is the object and purpose for which we desire to offer it.

Judge Neilson—I think that sufficiently appears.

Mr. Tracy—Very well. Now, one word, Mr. Winslow; was it or was it not stated, in the collision between Mr. Tilton and myself on that occasion, that his statement to me at the time of procuring that promise was of—

Mr. Beach—Now, the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him; I submit that it is a leading question and inadmissible to embody a statement in the question which is put to the witness.

Mr. Tracy—Was anything said as to the nature of Mr. Tilton's charge against Mr. Beecher at the time he obtained that promise from me? A. Oh! yes, Sir, that was the point of your argument.

Q. Was it repeated more than once? A. Oh! yes, Sir; several times.

Q. What was stated to be the nature of that charge?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is a mere repetition of the examination on the direct and the cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take the answer.

The Witness—That his original charge against Mr. Beecher was improper advances.

Q. Was it or was it not stated that at that conversation anything more was charged? A. You asserted that nothing more was charged and he did not deny it.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. WINSLOW.

Mr. Fullerton—Was it not about that that Mr. Tilton replied that it was false? A. Well, I am not sure that Mr. Tilton did say anything about anything being false, though he may have used that phrase; I cannot be sure about that.

Q. Well, was it not about that allegation that he made use of the term, if he did use it? A. I do not now remember that Mr. Tilton used the word "false." He may have done so, however.

Q. I understood you so? A. No; I said Mr. Tracy did. Mr. Tilton told Mr. Tracy that that promise was to bind him, no matter what happened. Mr. Tracy said, "That is false," and it was said with considerable force.

Q. Now, when Mr. Belcher was on the stand up to the time that he closed his testimony, was any statement talked of beyond what was termed the "True Story?" A. Up—any statement?

Q. Yes; before the Committee? A. Why, it was referred to in conversation in the Committee frequently.

Q. Referred to as the "True Story?" A. That there was such a thing as a "True Story."

Q. And sometimes it was called "a statement," wasn't it? A. I think the general phrase was "True Story."

Q. Sometimes wasn't it called "a statement?" A. I have no recollection that it was so called.

Mr. Morris—He has said so.

Mr. Fullerton—Was there anything talked of before that Committee as a "statement" or "story," except the "True Story?" A. Mr. Belcher spoke of this document.

Q. Now, I am asking you a question to which I want an answer. A. Well, yes, Mr. Belcher called it "a document" and "a statement" and "a story."

Mr. Beach—No, the point is this—the point is this—whether there was anything designated as "a story" before that Committee, except the "True Story"—as "a story?" A. I think Mr. Belcher called it "the story."

Q. Called what "the story?" A. The paper that Mr. Tilton read extracts from.

Q. Well, but the question is whether anything was designated as "a story" except the "True Story," with the exception of what Mr. Belcher said? A. No, I think not.

Mr. Fullerton—And do you now recollect with distinctness that he did not style it the "True Story?" A. I am sure of it.

Q. Sure of it? A. Yes, Sir, and indeed I might say I am certain of it.

Q. Whatever else you may have forgotten you don't forget that? A. Well, there are reasons why I might remember it very well, but of course when this report was drawn we had Mr. Hanson's testimony about the "True Story," and all that.

Q. Well, now, Mr. Winslow, you say there was some lack of clearness in the questions put to Beattie Turner—I understood you to say? A. I didn't say that.

Q. Well, that is the impression I received? A. Questions were piled pretty fast; that is all I meant to convey.

Q. How? A. The questions came pretty fast.

Q. Well, she got through answering one before another was put, didn't she? A. Yes; in a fashion.

Q. How? A. In a fashion.

Q. In a fashion? A. Her story excited a good deal of interest in the Committee, as it does elsewhere.

Q. Of course? A. And the Committee were asking questions.

Q. Well, was there any confusion in the question put to which she gave the answer which I read to you, and which you recognised? A. Well, I don't know of any particular confusion; no, I don't know that I could call it confusion.

Q. Do you recollect who put that question? A. About the confession?

Q. Yes.

Mr. Beach—Let him see the record and say whether—

The Witness—I was thinking whether I did or not.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, look at the record and see whether you did or not [handing book to witness].

The Witness—Very likely I did.

Mr. Beach—No, it was not you.

The Witness—Where is it?

Mr. Fullerton—At the bottom of the left hand page—no, you have got it there.

The Witness—I see, I commenced over on this page.

Mr. Beach—And then at the bottom of that page Mr. Tracy commenced.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, that seems to have been inspired by Gen. Tracy.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, his questions were clear, were they not, although his services were gratuitous? [Laughter, in which the witness joined.] That is all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS JAMES TURNER.

Thomas James Turner was then called for the defendant, and sworn.

Mr. Shearman—I desire to apologise to the Court and jury for being obliged to break a little in the order of evidence again, to accommodate two or three out-of-town witnesses; I think it will not take long. [To the witness.] Where do you reside? A. In Peekskill.

Q. What is your occupation? A. Well, I am a farmer and a little of everything; I have charge of Mr. Beecher's place.

Q. How long have you been in charge of Mr. Beecher's place? A. Fifteen years.

Q. Do you recollect who were employed on the farm in the Summer of 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State the names of the persons employed? A. Well, I cannot state all of them; I can state most of them.

Q. The persons employed on the farm, not in the house? A. Well, there was my son, was one—

Mr. Fullerton—Give us his name.

The Witness—Joseph S. Turner, Nicholas Sullivan, Timothy Ryan, George Tilford, and John 'Ayes, I believe, is the—

Q. John who? A. John 'Ayes—Hayes.

Mr. Fullerton—Hayes?

The Witness—John Hayes, yes, Sir; that is all I can recollect.

Mr. Shearman—By the courtesy of the opposite counsel I will exchange with Mr. Hill, for I have not talked with this witness.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Hill was engaged in court on the other side of the river, and was expecting to be here.

Mr. Hill—Do you recollect a visit of Mr. Beecher in the early part of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On a Monday? A. On a Monday, Sir, June 3d.

Q. Monday, June 3d? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are you certain of that date? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Hill, the reporters request that your witness speak louder.

The Witness—[Repeating.] Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Have you examined memoranda with a view of refreshing your recollection particularly with reference to that date, Mr. Turner? A. I have, Sir.

Q. So that you are certain of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect when Mr. Beecher arrived? A. In Peekskill?

Q. Yes. A. On June 3d.

Q. Yes, Sir? A. I think it was on the 3:43 train.

Q. 3:43? A. Yes, Sir, arrives in Peekskill at that time.

Q. It arrives in Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time does that train leave New-York? A. Two o'clock, Sir.

Q. From what depot? A. The 43d-st. Hudson River Railroad.

Q. Who came with him upon that occasion? A. Mrs. Beecher.

Q. Do you recollect how long they remained at the farm that day? A. Yes, Sir, they remained—they remained part of that day and part of the next day, June 3d.

Q. How late into the next day, June 3d? A. I am not certain whether they came back on the 3:15 train, or the 4:30, either one or the other.

Q. You are certain that it was one or the other? A. One or the other; yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Come where?

Mr. Hill—Come back to New-York—are you certain whether—are you certain that they were there at dinner on Tuesday, the 3d? A. I am, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether they were there at any meal on the 3d? A. On the 3d, I presume they was there to tea, as I had got orders from Mrs. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. Just one moment.

Mr. Hill—Well, do you remember, or is it only a presumption? A. Well, I cannot say that I see them eating, because I was not in the house, perhaps, when they was eating, but I know they came—

Judge Neilson—They were there at tea time, I suppose?

The Witness—They were there at tea time, yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Do you remember of making provision for their meal? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, do you recollect of sending for Mr. Beecher to the train, which you have mentioned, on the 3d? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Had you been advised in any way that he was to come on that train? A. Yes, Sir; I received a telegram on June 3d.

Q. Do you remember whether you paid the expenses of bringing that telegram from Peekskill Village up to the farm? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You paid it yourself? A. Paid fifty cents, yes, Sir.

Q. I will ask you this—when did Mr. Beecher return to the farm again after he left on the 3d of June? A. On the 16th of June, Sir, on Monday.

Q. Now, were you at the farm all the intervening time between the 3d, the time that he left, and his return on the 16th? A. I was, Sir.

Q. That is, about in charge of your ordinary duties? A. Yes, Sir, I was there all the time.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. TURNER.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you in the habit of visiting New-York frequently at that time? A. No, Sir, I had not been to New-York at all that season, I believe, since—I was there early in the year—I believe I was down with my wife to a doctor here in New-York, early in the year.

Q. How early? A. Well, I could not say; perhaps in January; I don't think it was after that.

Q. In January? A. Yes, Sir, perhaps I might have been; I can't say that I was.

Q. Well, how do you know then what time the trains left New-York on the 2d of June? A. On the 2d of June?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. From the reason of this telegram I received, Sir; I should not have known particularly about the trains only I got a telegram from Mr. Beecher.

Q. Now, where is that telegram? A. The copy of it I believe—the copy of that telegram is, I believe, with Mr. Hill.

Q. Where is the one you received? A. Well, I haven't got it, but I saw a copy of that.

Q. Now, I am asking where the telegram is that you received? A. I haven't got it, Sir; I don't keep them; it is very seldom I keep telegrams, I receive so many.

Q. Well, that is enough; you didn't keep it? A. No, Sir.

Q. You destroyed it, did you? A. It is gone, Sir; I cannot find it.

Q. What time in the day did you receive it? A. I cannot say that, Sir.

Q. You don't know, of your own knowledge, then, what time the trains left New-York on the 2d of June that year? A. No, Sir, only as—

Q. That is enough.

Mr. Evarts—"Only," he says—

Judge Neilson—Is it necessary to the question?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, "only"—I don't care about "only," so long as he don't know of his own knowledge.

Mr. Evarts—Well, whether it is his own knowledge will appear by the answer. If he should say, "I only know the times they got there, and I know how fast they went," that is his own knowledge, just as much as if he knew when they started.

Mr. Fullerton—I take it for granted that he doesn't know how fast they went; he was not there.

Mr. Evarts—You don't know that; he knows a great deal better.

Mr. Fullerton—No; he had not been to New-York since January previous.

The Witness—I can't say that I was not, nor that I was; my wife was sick at the time, and I think I was in January, the last time.

Q. Now, that we have got; so you need not repeat it. Where did you see the copy of the telegram—what you say was the copy? A. I seen it here in New-York—in Brooklyn.

Q. In whose possession? A. In possession of Mr. Hill.

Q. When did you see it? A. About two weeks ago, Sir.

Q. Where were you when you saw it? A. In Mr. Hill's office.

Q. Yes. Did you remember before you saw the copy of the telegram what date it was that Mr. Beecher came to Peekskill? A. No, Sir; I did not at that time, until I began to get my recollections about me.

Q. Well, I am asking you whether, up to that time, you remembered what date it was that Mr. Beecher came to Peekskill? A. No, Sir; I did not particularly notice the time, not until after that, because I was not called upon about it—

Q. Now, that is enough; don't make a speech every time I ask a question; have you seen any other memorandum than the copy of the telegram that you speak of? A. Yes, Sir; I saw a memorandum in my book of 50 cents for a telegraph on June the 7th.

Q. Where is that book? A. That is in Peekskill.

Q. On June the 2d? A. No, on June the 7th; I charge my items always on a Saturday; that is, the end of the week.

Q. June 7th you charged the 50 cents for bringing the telegram from Peekskill up to the farm? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That book is not here? A. No, Sir.

Q. On the 7th, then, you charged it from recollection? A. No, Sir, I kept a memorandum—put it down on a little memorandum, as I generally keep—

Q. Where is that memorandum book? A. I cannot tell where it is now.

Q. When did you see it last? A. Why, in that year, I suppose; I put it down on paper or—

Q. Now, Mr. Turner, don't; give me a chance to talk half the time. When did you see it last? A. I can't say, Sir.

Q. When did you see it last? A. I can't say, Sir.

Q. Did you see it last year? A. Last year was 1874—no, Sir; I don't keep those memorandums that I—

Q. In what year was it that Mr. Beecher came up there on the 2d of June? A. In 1873, Sir.

Q. 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long after that did you see this memorandum book? A. Oh! perhaps it was not a book at all; I can't say it was a book; sometimes a sheet of paper will do for me to enter my little items.

Q. What did you use at that time upon which to enter memoranda? A. I can't say whether it was a memorandum book or sheet of paper.

Q. Can you say that it was either? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. May it not have been the fact that you didn't keep any memorandum at that time? A. I always did, Sir, for I had a good many items to charge at the end of the week.

Q. Well, do you recollect distinctly that on the 17th you made any entry in your book from the memorandum book? A. It must be, Sir.

Q. No, no; do you recollect it now distinctly? A. I cannot from my own recollection say now.

Q. Very well. That is enough, that is enough. Haven't you got the memorandum book either? A. No, Sir.

Q. Upon which you charged the 50 cents? A. Yes; it is a memorandum book—that is on the book that is up at the farm.

Q. That is not here? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is under the date of June 7th? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mr. Beecher in the habit of coming to Peekskill frequently about that time? A. Yes, Sir, he was; he was there several times.

Q. With the exception of your book of which you now speak, have you examined any other memoranda? A. Yes, Sir; I have examined the butcher's account, so as to remind myself that they was there—getting the meat there, you know. When the family would come up I would always get my orders from Mrs. Beecher so as to get—

Q. Never mind that.

Mr. Hill—You called for it.

Mr. Fullerton—I did not call for any such thing.

Q. You have examined the books? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The butcher's books? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Not your own? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you examine the butcher's books? A. I examined them about two weeks ago.

Q. A butcher in Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What is his name? A. Israel Larch; I think he is a Jew; Larch or Laritch.

Q. Do you know how it is spelled? A. I do not.

Q. Does he keep a stall there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what street? A. In South-st.

Q. Have you named now all the memoranda that you have consulted? A. Well, I believe I have.

Q. What day was it that Mr. Beecher came to Peekskill? A. Do you mean in June?

Q. Yes; not the day of the month, but the day of the week?

A. On Monday, Sir.

Q. It was on Monday? A. Yes.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You recollect that, irrespective of your memorandum? A. I do, Sir.

Q. You recollect it was on Monday? A. It was on Monday.

Q. Before that, when was he there last? A. He was there on May 26th, on Monday.

Q. Between May 26th and June 2d had he not been there at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. That you are sure of? A. Yes.

Q. Had you any memorandum of May 26? A. No, Sir; I have no memorandum, but I know it from other circumstances.

Q. You did not resort to any book or any other memorandum to find that out? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; that is from memory.

Q. How are you enabled to tell the time of day that he came there on June 2d?

Mr. Hill—I did not hear the last question.

Mr. Fullerton—[Repeating the question]: How are you enabled to tell the time of day that Mr. Beecher arrived in Peekskill? A. So far as my knowledge serves me it was in the afternoon train leaving New-York at 2 o'clock.

Q. Well, there are trains that leave later than that. A. There is no train that leaves the depot until 4 o'clock. It is a general thing every year that the 2 o'clock train is the last train for Peekskill, excepting the 4 o'clock train.

Q. How long does it take to run from New-York to Peekskill? A. That 2 o'clock train gets into Peekskill in about one hour and thirty-five minutes or one hour forty-five. The express takes about one hour twenty minutes, but that is not an express, is a way train.

Q. What time does it take the 4 o'clock train to run to Peekskill? A. One hour twenty-three minutes.

Q. So that at 5 o'clock 23 minutes it would arrive at Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long does it take to ride up from the Peekskill station to the farm? A. Well, Sir, with a good, fast team, I guess they might go up there in twenty minutes.

Q. Well, with such a team as you had, how long would it take? A. We hadn't a team; we had only one horse.

Q. How did Mr. Beecher get up to the farm? A. With that one horse; he drew him up. [Laughter.]

Q. Of course he did. Now, how long did it take him to draw him up? A. Likely it would take over half an hour.

Q. Then it would be past six o'clock when he got up there? A. Oh, no, Sir; getting to Peekskill at 8:48.

Q. But I am talking about the 4 o'clock train? A. Oh, the 4 o'clock train?

Q. Yes? A. Oh, yes; it would be; half an hour would bring it to a quarter past six.

Q. That was in the month of June? A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect what time the sun sets in June? A. I don't recollect much about it. I don't study the almanac.

Q. I want you to study the almanac as well as the butcher's books. Don't you know that the sun sets very late in June? A. Yes, Sir; we have very long days then.

Q. Plenty of time to come to tea and yet leave New-York in the 4 o'clock train? A. Oh! yes, Sir; plenty of time.

Q. Do you know of any other train that leaves New-York in the afternoon and arrives at Peekskill besides the 2 o'clock train and the 4 o'clock train? A. I think there is one that arrives there about 6 o'clock; starts from New-York about ten minutes past 4—a way train.

Q. Don't you know that it is the Peekskill Special? A. Perhaps it is.

Q. And that it gets to Peekskill about 6? A. Perhaps it does; I cannot say for certain.

Q. Don't you know that there is another Peekskill Special leaving later in the afternoon? A. Yes, Sir; I know.

Q. What time does that arrive at the Peekskill depot? A. I don't know; it may be 7 or 8 o'clock, or after 8 o'clock, for all I know; I am not particularly posted about it.

Q. What time did Mr. Beecher usually go to Peekskill when he came from New-York? A. Well, sometimes in the morning, and sometimes in the evening; it depended greatly upon Mr. Beecher; he has come by all trains according as his business allowed him to come.

Q. Did he more frequently come in the morning than in the afternoon? A. When he came up to see me about his business he generally came in the morning, because he wanted to spend the day there.

Q. Now, as to his leaving on that occasion, when do you say he left? A. He left on June 2d, Tuesday.

Q. Do you know what time? A. It was either by the 2:15 train or the 4:30, or somewhere about that time.

Q. How do you know that he left at that time? A. I know that he left after dinner.

Q. Did you take him down to the depot? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. What have you got to guide you about the time that he left—the day or the hour? A. I know they was there at dinner; I am satisfied of that, because I provided for them.

Mr. Fullerton—I believe that is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. TURNER.

By Mr. Hill—Mr. Turner, you say that you had one horse; do you recollect what horse that was? A. Yes.

Q. What horse was it? A. It was Billy, a bay horse that Mr. Beecher reserved for use for the Summer; he sold the balance of them down here in Brooklyn before he went up.

Q. Do you recollect when that horse was sent up from New-York? A. Yes.

Q. When was it? A. May 29th.

Q. That would be on what day? A. On a Thursday; the day the family moved up.

Q. A Thursday; the day the family moved up? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What family? A. Mrs. Beecher and the two girls.

Q. Servants? A. Servant girls.

Q. Do you recollect their coming up? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect any loss of their baggage which gave you any trouble? A. Well, I recollect there was one of the girls that Mrs. Beecher brought up with her—they had sent the baggage by Westcott's Express, a trunk, and the trunk was not there when Mrs. Beecher left, and she telegraphed to me on the 31st, but the trunk arrived in Peekskill on the 30th; I have got the receipt of it.

Q. Did you pay the freight on that horse that was sent up? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How much was the freight? A. $4.50 for the horse and buggy.

Q. Have you consulted that memorandum as well? A. Yes, Sir; that is on my book.

Q. On what boat was the horse sent up? A. The steamer Christena.

Q. Who went down to the depot to meet Mr. Beecher on the second of June?

Mr. Fullerton—That I object to. That ground has been gone over once already.

Judge Neilson—You asked him if he went.

Mr. Fullerton—How?

Judge Neilson—I do not think it appears who did go down; you asked the witness if he went, and he said that he did not.

Mr. Hill—Who did go down? A. My son.

Q. What is his name? A. Joseph S. Turner.

Q. I think, Mr. Turner, that your wife died about that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Any special directions in reference to them? A. Yes, Sir, he told me—

Mr. Fullerton—No, no; I object to the strawberries.

Q. Now, do you recollect another circumstance to which I will call your attention—when your son Joseph first began to work for wages? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that?

Mr. Fullerton—They are opening up new topics here all the time.

Mr. Hill—My friends have undertaken to throw doubt upon a matter about which Mr. Turner said he was perfectly certain.

Mr. Morris—What is that?

Mr. Hill—The date.

Judge Neilson—The question before us seems to be one of mere dates.

Mr. Hill—I know, Sir, and it is one which will bear considerable examination. My friends on the other side have endeavored to show that there has been other trips, and they are trying to confuse the recollection of the witness.

Judge Neilson—I do not think they have tried to confuse his recollection. I think you may ask this question.

Mr. Hill—Well, if I said that they had tried to confuse his recollection, perhaps that is a misstatement, but I say they are trying to show that there is an opportunity for a confusion of dates. [To the witness.] When did your son Joseph begin to work for wages? A. June 1st, 1873.

Q. That was Sunday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you recollect whether this going down to the depot and the work done that day, was the first work that Joseph did for wages? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Soon following his mother's death and funeral? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were asked about the manner in which you keep memoranda of your expenses? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You stated that you keep a book, and that sometimes you keep them upon loose sheets of paper? A. Yes, Sir, little memorandums through the week.

Q. Then what is done at the end of the week with the sheets of paper on which these memoranda are? A. I enter them into my book.

Q. On what day? A. Always on the Saturday when I pay the men.

Q. So that all the items upon your book are entered under the date of Saturday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is this charge of a telegram entered on a Saturday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that is the 7th of June? A. Yes, Sir, the 7th.

Q. Do you remember whether you received any other telegram that week at all? A. No, Sir, I did not.

Q. Where did he live after he commenced working for wages? A. He lived in Mr. Beecher's house—that is, he boarded.

Q. How are you enabled to tell that he went down to the depot for Mr. Beecher on the 3d of June—that that was the first service that he performed for wages? A. Because it was the first time that that horse was taken out of the stable after he arrived, and Joseph drove him.

Q. That was the first time that the horse was taken out? A. Yes, Sir, the first thing that he did was to go down and meet Mr. and Mrs. Beecher.

Q. And he arrived there when? A. May 29th, on Thursday.

Mr. Fullerton—Had you any memoranda to guide your recollection of these events? A. No, Sir, I had not.

Q. You have none? A. No, Sir, none; I did not keep any.

Q. It is a mere matter of recollection then? A. That is all, Sir.

Q. How are you enabled to say that it was on the 2d of June? A. Well, as it being the first working day that I ever worked under wages, and it was the first time that the bay horse Billy was ever taken out of the stable after he came up, and I drove him down for Mr. and Mrs. Beecher on that day.

Q. How does that assist you in determining the day? A. The first of June was Sunday, and that was not a working day, and I know it by the first time that the horse went out, and I drove him.

Mr. Fullerton—What time did they leave on Tuesday the third? A. It might have been by the 2:15 train, or the 4:30 train.

Q. I don't ask what it might have been. Do you recollect? A. I don't know. It was in the afternoon.

Q. Did you drive Billy on that occasion? A. Yes, Sir, I drove him down.

Q. That is the second time you drove Billy down after he came there; now, why does not the second time you drove him refresh your recollection in regard to the hour of the day, as well as the first time? A. [After a pause.] I did not drive Billy that time; I had Lem.

Q. Then you had two horses there? A. Well, we never drove the gray horse much.

Q. Was that the first time you drove Lem? A. No, Sir, not the first time.

Q. The first time after you were employed for wages? A. No, Sir, not the first time that I drove Lem.

Q. When did you drive him? A. I drove him very often down to the village on errands.

Q. Did you drive him on Monday? A. The 2d of June?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir, I drove Billy.

Q. Then it was the first time you drove that horse after you commenced to work for wages? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then I ask you why that first time, when you drove Lem, does not enable you to fix the time you went down to the depot on the third, if the first time you drove Billy enabled you to fix the time on the second? A. Because Billy was counted as a carriage horse, and Lem was counted as a farm horse; that was the difference.

Q. Is that the only difference? A. That is the only difference I can give.

Q. Because he was a carriage horse? A. Counted as a carriage horse.

Q. Did you take Mr. and Mrs. Beecher down to the depot on the 2d? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You can tell the time of day? A. I cannot tell the time of day; it was in the afternoon, some time.

Mr. Shearman—It was to one of these two trains; either the 2:15 or 4:30 train? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you cannot tell which one? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you meet that train that first day, June 2d? A. Do you mean that train for Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did you wait there for it? A. I suppose may be I waited ten minutes or fifteen minutes, I cannot say.

Mr. Shearman—That is all. Mr. Rochford, will you take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS ROCHFORD.

Thomas Rochford called and sworn in behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—What is your age? A. 25 years.

Q. What is your business? A. Receiver in the Western Union Telegraph Office.

Q. How long have you been such receiver? A. About five years.

Q. Now, state to his Honor and the jury the ordinary course of business with reference to the receipt of a message and the entry of it in a book or in the register. When you receive a message do you immediately enter it in the book? A. Yes, Sir, at once, or in two or three minutes, perhaps.

Q. You keep either that book or one like it lying before you every day when you receive messages? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that the book that was lying before you on the 3d June, 1878? A. Yes, Sir, that is the book.

Q. What is the number of the message? A. Number 8.

Q. Who sent the message? A. E. B. Dengler.

Q. Is he in court now? A. He is.

Q. I observe that the message itself, as written by Mr. Beecher, is not dated? A. No, Sir; he often sent messages up and they would not be dated, but we would date them and put them on the blanks.

Q. Does the book on which the message is entered enable you to fix the date? A. Yes, Sir; certainly.

Q. It is entered in the ordinary course of business, with other messages on that day? A. Yes, Sir; and they are filed away in a package by themselves.

Mr. Hill—I now offer to read the message itself in evidence. Your Honor will see that it is pinned to a blank of the Company. [The message was marked Exhibit 123 D.]

Mr. Hill read as follows:

[8] [8.38] [8.58]

THOMAS J. TURNER,

Peekskill, N. Y.

Send for us to train leaving New-York at two p.m.

(Sig.)

H. W. BEECHER.

10 paid, 45.

Q. See if these words, "10 paid, 45," are in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir, in my handwriting.

Q. Do you know whose memorandum that is upon the book? A. I do, Sir; the operator's.

Q. The one that you have referred to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether that message is in Mr. Beecher's handwriting? A. I could not say, Sir; I did not see it. It was sent up by a messenger.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. ROCHFORD.

Mr. Fullerton—Where is the record for June 1st?

A. We have got two books.

Q. Alternate days? A. Yes, Sir, every other day.

Mr. Beach—What did he say?

Mr. Fullerton—He says they have two books for alternate days.

The Witness—We have the other clerk who makes a daily report, and he has to use the other book while checking up.

Mr. Beach—I see there is no record here for May 31st.

The Witness—No, Sir, I will get you the other book.

Mr. Beach—We want that other book.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Is your office open on Sundays? A. Yes, Sir; open all the time.

Q. In whose handwriting is the memorandum, "June 3d?" A. That is the handwriting of the manager of the office. He took it out of that package, and dated it as he took it out. I did not date it as I put it in the package; I neglected to do so.

Mr. Beach—What is that?

The Witness—He took it out and dated it.

Mr. Fullerton—When did he take it? A. About two or three weeks ago.

Q. It was not dated then? A. No, Sir.

Q. That date was written in there then, was it? A. Yes, Sir, at the time he took it out.

Mr. Beach—Two or three weeks ago? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was first dated June 1st, was it not? A. Yes, Sir, I think it was.

Q. Look at it and see? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then it was altered to June 3d? A. Yes, Sir, he found out his own mistake, I suppose.

Q. Yes, I suppose so. You did not find it out? A. No, Sir.

Q. Which are yours? A. [Referring to book.] "Philadelphia," "New-York"—those are mine.

Q. Which of these of June 3d are in the handwriting? A. "Cleveland," is in my handwriting.

Q. Is "Peekskill," opposite the number 8, in your handwriting? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were not there when that message was received? A. I received the message and I handed it to another clerk to attend to, as I have somebody to help me all the time, being busy all the time.

Q. That is not your entry? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where is the book of June first? A. We shall get you that in the office.

[The witness rose to leave the stand.]

Mr. Hill—Wait a moment.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. ROCHFORD.

Mr. Hill—That message, as received from Mr. Beecher by you, I understand was on the white piece of paper which is attached to the telegraph blank? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that had no date on it at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, are you enabled to swear that that white piece of paper bearing the message itself was received by you on the second day of June? A. Yes, Sir, it was.

Q. It is entered along in the ordinary course of business with other messages received that day? A. Yes, Sir, number 8 in the morning. We commence with number 1 in the morning, and follow it up to 100.

Q. And this message stands eighth in this entry on the 2d of June? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Seven other messages were received that morning before this one? A. Yes, Sir. You will see that 96, or thereabouts, is the whole day's business.

Q. How many in number are there during the day? A. On that day, Sir, we received 106 messages, and the amount paid on that day was—

Q. I don't care about that. Please state whether there is on each message the number of the message entered upon the message itself and upon the book? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that is the fact in this case? A. Yes, Sir. New-York would not receive duplicate numbers from us, and we had to correct them at the same time.

[The entry in the telegraph book produced by witness was put in evidence and marked.]

Mr. Fullerton—In whose handwriting are the figures here, "8?" A. That is the messenger boy that we had at that time. He was pretty smart, and he used to help me once in a great while, perhaps two or three hours in a day.

Q. They are not in yours? A. No, Sir; not in mine.

Q. What is the significance in this memorandum on the back? A. That is the initials of the operators who sent it, and received it.

Q. I want to know whose initials they are. Whose initials are "D. R.?" A. "D. R.," Sir; those are his initials. He did that with his left hand while working the key with his right.

Q. Engaged in the Brooklyn office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was that office then located? A. 327 Washington-st.

Q. Here near the Post Office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Just look at that telegraphic message and say if you sent that message from New-York? [Handing telegraphic message to witness.] A. I did not.

Q. Is this your memorandum? [Handing memorandum to witness.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether it was sent from the office that day? A. It was sent from Brooklyn, and not from New-York.

Q. To the office in New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you send it to the New-York office from Brooklyn? A. I did.

Q. On what day, can you tell? A. No, Sir, I cannot.

Q. You made no memorandum yourself of the date? A. No, Sir.

Q. This is your memorandum on the back? A. It is.

Q. Now, what does that mean: "D. R. 8:58 W?" A. "D. R." are my initials, "8:58" is the time it was sent, and "W" is the operator's signature that received it at the New-York office.

Q. What is the full name of the operator who received it in the New-York office? A. Roagers.

Q. The full name? A. Louisa J. Roagers.

Q. A lady? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I will ask you if you saw this message taken from the files of messages of the Western Union Telegraph Co. recently? A. I did.

Q. By whom? A. By Mr. Hughes.

Q. Mr. Hughes is whom? A. A manager of the Brooklyn office.

Q. How long ago did he take it from the files? A. I should calculate about two weeks ago.

Q. That is the time you sent this message to the New-York office? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you call Peekskill directly from here? A. No, Sir.

Q. So you have your message go over from here to the general office in New-York, and from thence to Peekskill? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. DENSLER.

Mr. Beach—How do you know "8:58" means 8:58 in the morning? A. Judging by the number of the message.

Q. By its being No. 8? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That is all.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

TESTIMONY OF BEN KITTRIDGE.

Ben Kittridge called and sworn on behalf of defendant.

Mr. Mallison—[To the witness.] Benjamin?

The Witness—Well, I think it is Ben; I always write it Ben?

Mr. Hill—Where do you reside? A. Peekskill.

Q. How long have you lived there? A. Ten years ago this month.

Q. What is your age? A. Fifty-four next July.

Q. How far did you live from Mr. Beecher's Peekskill residence? A. About 800 feet, I should think; 850 feet.

Q. State whether or not from the piazza of your house you can look all over the eastern slope in front of Mr. Beecher's house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And see most of his out-buildings? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Over a large portion of his premises? A. When the foliage is very full we only see the out-buildings indistinctly; in fact we only see the house indistinctly when the foliage is very full.

Q. But the ordinary method of going to Mr. Beecher's house, that is directly in front of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And his house on one side of a lane and yours on the other? A. Yes, Sir, we own the avenue together.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Beecher, Mr. Kittidge? A. Ten years personally, and beyond that.

Q. You know that he had a Summer residence, a farm and dwelling near you in 1873 in June? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On the 1st of June? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And has ever since? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Kittidge, can you state to his Honor and the Jury whether or not Mr. Beecher was at his farm on the 2d day of June, 1873? A. He was.

Q. You know that fact? A. Yes, Sir; I saw him.

Q. You are positive of it? A. I saw him.

Q. What is your business? A. Well, at Peekskill I am a farmer.

Q. You have occasion to come to New-York? A. I come to New-York three times a week, some times four.

Q. Had you been to New-York on that occasion, the 2d day of June? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What train did you take to go home? A. Four o'clock.

Q. From New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Arriving at Peekskill about what time? A. I arrived at Peekskill about 4:15.

Q. 4:15 or 5:15? A. I should say 5:15; I am not speaking from recollection as to that, but the time that train arrived there would be about 5:15 or 17, a minute sooner or later.

Q. Now, please state, Mr. Kittidge, on leaving the cars whether you have to pass through a somewhat narrow entrance in order to reach the carriage-way on the outside ordinarily? A. Yes, Sir; moderately narrow; it a pretty good width; I should say it was—

Q. I don't care exactly, but it is comparatively a narrow space you have to go through? A. Yes, Sir, moderately narrow; I should think it was 100 feet wide; we have complained of its being narrow.

Q. You don't quite understand me. I mean the door from which you leave the depot yard to get out into the carriage yard on either side? A. Oh! well, that is a double door; sometimes one is open and sometimes both.

Q. Now, do you know whether Mr. Beecher was home at the time you arrived at home? A. He was. I saw Mr. Beecher with several other persons, I should say from four to six, south of his house at or about the time I turned into the avenue. I should think the point of turning was a little more than twice the distance from my house, and before I turned into my own gateway I could hear Mr. Beecher talking distinctly. We sometimes hear him when we don't hear the rest of the people.

Q. Now, Sir, did Mr. Beecher come up from New-York on that train with you? A. I think he could not possibly have come up unless—he sometimes drives very much faster than I do.

Q. You think he couldn't not have come up on that train with you? A. Because I came home very quick; he could not possibly have come up on that train, I think, and be there when I got there.

Q. Did you see him the next day, June 3d? A. I saw him again the same day.

Q. How near were you to him? A. When I saw him the second time he was half way from his house to mine in his shrubbery, looking at his shrubbery.

Q. About what time in the day was that? A. I should say the time I saw him the second time—well, the first thing when I got home I went in to dinner. That I always do, the first thing when I get from the city. [Laughter.] We talked—

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir; so do I.

The Witness—We talked with reference to the fact. That was the subject of conversation at dinner.

Mr. Hill—That Mr. Beecher was at home? A. That Mr. Beecher was at home was the subject of conversation. After dinner I went out on to my porch or veranda, which looks over the same slope that he looks over to the river.

Q. And out towards his house as well? A. Yes, Sir, and up towards his house as well, and then I went up the bank to my garden, and I saw Mr. Beecher—well, I was tempted to speak to him, but I thought I would not disturb him, and I didn't disturb him.

Q. Any one with him at that time? A. No, Sir, he was alone. He strolled out to the shrubbery on the right side of the road as you go up to his house.

Q. Will you please state any circumstance that enables you to fix this date, the 2d of June? A. Well, I was very anxious to see Mr. Beecher about a little business. We had had some talk about it the 24th of June—

Q. Of May? A. Of May, I mean. The 24th of May I saw Mr. Beecher at his own house, and I then understood, either from him or from others—

Mr. Beach—Never mind; never mind what you understood.

The Witness—That he was going up—

Mr. Beach—I ask you not to state it.

The Witness—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Hill—You are possessed of circumstances which will enable you to fix the date? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As the 2d of June? A. I can fix it otherwise.

Q. Very well? A. I had been to the city; I know that just a week had intervened from the time I saw him there before; I knew that his wife was there a week previous—the intervening week, on Thursday, and I know that in my own mind I associated her being there with its being preparatory to their moving up.

Q. For the Summer? A. For the Summer; and I know that in my own mind when I saw him there I associated it with the fact that I had seen his wife there, and that he was there for the Summer, and afterwards I saw the servants there, which fixed it that he was there for the Summer.

Q. Do you recollect that you were disappointed in the fact that he went back and did not return again for a week or ten days? A. Yes, Sir, I recollect that I went up to his house to see him, and he had gone.

Mr. Hill—[To Mr. Fullerton.] You can cross-examine him.

Mr. Fullerton—No, nothing.

Q. About what hour of the day? A. About 7 in the evening.

Q. Who performed the marriage ceremony? A. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Can you tell anything which you noticed about his appearance when he came to perform the ceremony? A. I noticed that he was in a—it is hard to describe a man's appearance, but he didn't seem to be arrayed as we would expect him to be on an occasion of that kind; I cannot say that his was a travel worn appearance, or anything of that sort, but he seemed to have come unprepared in respect to his dress.

Q. Didn't seem to be dressed for a wedding? A. So it struck me at that time.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Beach—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Morris—That is all.

[Laughter.]

TESTIMONY OF F. A. PUTNAM.

Fred A. Putnam was called on behalf of the defendant, sworn, and examined as follows:—

Q. Did you reside there in 1873? A. I did.

Q. No, the 4th day, or Wednesday of that week? A. Yes, Sir; I recollect the 4th day of June.

Q. By what railroad? A. Harlem Railroad.

Q. Did you at that time know by sight the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher? A. I did.

Q. At what time of the day was that? A. In the morning.

Q. Before 8 o'clock, or after? A. Between 7 and 8 o'clock, I should think.

Q. What train were you going to take to go there?

A. I was going in the first train that went to White Plains; I didn't know exactly when I left my office when I would get there. I spoke to him and asked him if he was going home at once. He said, "No," he had a few minutes, and Mrs. Beecher was in the cars and he called her by her first name. I went in and spoke to her.

Q. You spoke to Mrs. Beecher in the cars? A. Yes.

Q. What train was that? A. They were on the express train of the New-Haven road.

Q. On the New-Haven train for Boston? A. Yes, Sir. When I went in first I did not recognize her, as she was veiled; and I said I didn't see her. He pointed her out through the window, and I went back and spoke to her.

Mr. Shearman—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Nothing to ask?

Judge Neilson—That is all.

Mr. Hill—I want to ask Mr. Turner one more question.

THOMAS J. TURNER RECALLED.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Turner, please look at that paper [handing a paper to witness], and state whether the contents of the telegram which you received were the same as that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That you received on the 2d day of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

Mr. Morris—That is all.

Mr. Hill—[To Judge Neilson]: I have sent for the manager of the telegraph office, but he may be delayed for a few moments.

Judge Neilson—Meantime we can take up some short witness.

Mr. Hill—If your Honor will permit us to interrupt the examination of this witness when the other gentleman arrives, so that he can go back to his duties, I will be obliged to you.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

TESTIMONY OF MR. STEPHEN V. WHITE.

Stephen V. White called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Tracy—Where do you reside? A. Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. About ten years.

Q. Are you a member of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been a member? A. Nine years the first Monday of January past, I think, Sir.

Q. What is your business? A. I am a stock operator—broker sometimes.

Q. And are engaged in that business now? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the City of New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You were a member of the profession formerly, I believe, Mr. White? A. Yes, Sir, I was.

Q. Practicing law? A. I was a member of the legal profession if you refer to that.

Q. Where did you practice? A. I practiced in Missouri and Iowa.

Q. Were you a member of the Investigating Committee of Plymouth Church, appointed last Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you present at the meeting of the Committee, July 6th, at the time Mrs. Tilton first made her appearance before the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you present July 10th, when Mr. Tilton first appeared before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that his first appearance? A. As far as I know it was the first meeting of the Committee, as a Committee, that I attended, and I believe it was his first appearance.

Q. Did you hear the talk between himself and members of the Committee at that time? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Was there anything said by him on that occasion in regard to the nature of the evidence which he had against Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did he say on that subject? A. He said, among other things on that subject, that his case rested upon written evidence. He said that he would not ask the Committee to trust him, or to take his word for it, if he made the charges. He was asserting that he had a case against Mr. Beecher, as he stated it, and one that would convince the Committee, if he should state it to them, and he said that it was a case which he would not ask the Committee to take his word for, as he acknowledged or admitted that he was a discredited man in this community—Brooklyn—and that he rested upon documentary evidence or written evidence, under Mr. Beecher's own signature, or under his own signature.

Q. Was there anything said by any person present on the subject that, if his case against Mr. Beecher was in writing, the writings would speak for themselves? A. Yes, Sir, that reply was made by yourself.

Q. What did Mr. Tracy say on that subject? A. Well, Sir, you said that there might be a question about what the papers would show; that the Committee could judge better of that after they had seen them, and after a remark in reply to that, which I could not give the exact words of, and not even the substance, you made the further statement that if the charge which he should make was one of criminality between Mr. Beecher and his wife, that the paper which you had seen, if you had ever seen the paper which he relied on, you didn't think that it would sustain that charge.

Q. Was there anything said by him on that evening in regard to verbal confessions by Mr. Beecher? A. Well, I don't know that there was directly in those words, but there were statements made which recognized a verbal confession on the part of Mr. Beecher.

Q. That night? A. Yes, Sir; I feel very clear that there was, Sir. I think I can refresh your recollection on it.

Q. What was it? A. It was when Mr. Tilton had said to us: "Gentlemen you think there is no case, but there is;" and we then said: "Give it to us, then," and he said, "Don't ask me to; it is too horrible; it is too terrible to tell you." He said in that connection that Mr. Beecher had asked him, if it ever became necessary to make these declarations, to let him know that he might leave the country or take his life. I feel very clear that that was said on that night.

Q. Was that not in reference to the publication of the written paper which he claimed to have? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not in regard to a verbal confession? A. The construction is whatever you please. I said he didn't make any verbal confessions; he didn't claim any verbal confession in these express words, but that something was said by which there might have been inferred a verbal confession.

Q. Was he not speaking of the publication of the documents which he held against Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Morris—One moment.

Mr. Beach—Mr. White can tell the condition which it was.

Mr. Hill—In that statement, was he not speaking of the threatened publication?

Mr. Fullerton—He can state what was said.

Mr. Morris—I suggest that these leading questions ought not to be put; they are improper. The witness's attention should not be called to particular things.

Judge Neilson—I think he had better state the conversation.

Mr. Morris—Yes, all he recollects first.
