adultery was supposed to be ascertained, believed to be ascertained between these parties, that then the relations in their domestic intercourse contradicted the possibility of any such event. Well, now, Sir, that does not depend upon a single isolated and independent declaration which may have been made under influences and sympathies which controlled the expression of the wife upon that particular occasion. But the fact whether or not the intercourse of these parties was inconsistent with the charged adultery is to be traced by the whole course and history of their connection subsequent to that period, incompetent and inadmissible, it is true, Sir, but yet opened by the other side a course of interrogation, pursued on their part, which leads to the one or the other result. Now, Sir, their evidence is substantially in effect a declaration upon the part of Mrs. Tilton, expressions of fondness and affection, if you please, and it is precisely the same as if Mrs. Tilton, being a competent witness, had been placed upon this stand and asked whether, after December, 1870, she had been in the habit, or had, upon that particular occasion, indulged in fondness of expression towards her husband. Suppose she was upon the stand, Sir, making this very declaration contained in this letter, and we had asked her, in pursuit of the real object, what were the truthful relations continuous in your subsequent connection to this event with the plaintiff—what were the continuous relations that existed between you? Have you not at other times been unkind and unsympathetic? Have there not been occurrences between you in your habitual intercourse which were consistent with the alleged adultery with the defendant? Why, most obviously, Sir, that could be shown. It is a cross-examination of the witness whom they produce upon that subject. They produce her by her written declaration; we ask to contradict her by her written declaration made at another time—inconsistent with the exceptional one which they have introduced. Upon what principle would your Honor exclude it, and how else is this letter to be judged except as being a declaration made upon the part of Mrs. Tilton towards the fact which they seek to establish of friendly and affectionate relations between herself and her husband after this event. It is not enough, Sir, to prove that upon a single occasion she made these expressions of affection and manifested continued love for Mr. Tilton, and that they were met upon that particular occasion with responding expressions. The question reaches continuously and further than a single point of observation. We are to view their whole relations subsequent to the charged adultery; we are to see whether in their consistent and habitual intercourse there was no alienation, no cessation of these attentions and these expressions of love and reverence which should have been maintained in the family, the fact of the adultery being absent. But, Sir, if this question, as I said to your Honor, is to be considered as a mere question of discretion, not as a matter of legal right, I submit to you, then, that in the exercise of a proper discretion with a view to the truth and the justice of this inquiry, with reference to the ascertainment of the fact whether the relations between these parties were of a character indicated by this single letter which they introduced, we offer to prove near the same time another letter from this lady containing a declaration of a certain character which will have its proper effect, either sustaining or modifying that contained in the letter which they have introduced. I did not pursue, Sir, perhaps, sufficiently far the quotations from Mr. Phillips:

"So, though character be not in issue, if the party introduce evidence to support his character, held that for that reason the other party might give evidence in reply."

It was incompetent evidence, yet the one party had introduced it, and the Court held that evidence in reply was therefore admissible; and it would be a strange doctrine, Sir, whether it is done by consent or under objection, if one party can give evidence of a particular character tending to establish a prominent and important issue in the case, that the other party might not give evidence of the same kind. Whether it be legal evidence or not is immaterial, Sir. The fact which they seek to establish by this letter is an important and controlling fact in the consideration of this case, one which tends to reflect considerable light I admit, upon the question of the charged adultery, and evidence is given upon it. I say, without endeavoring to anticipate the counsel, they will reason to the jury that this letter of Mrs. Tilton, this act, this expressed conduct upon her part, is utterly inconsistent with the idea that she could have been a criminal or a debased woman. And you allow that, if this evidence is excluded, to stand upon the single proof of a single event without giving to us the privilege of exposing the fallacy of that argument, or producing other declarations from the same lady in regard to the same subject matter, and which may, to a greater or less extent, modify the effect of the proof they have offered.

"Where the plaintiffs offer any evidence of the credibility of one of their witnesses, the defendants were allowed to ask another, if the plaintiff's witness had not been guilty of larceny—"

Not upon precisely the same subject, Sir.

"The testimony," say the Court, "on both sides was illegal, and as the plaintiff resorted to that mode in support of credibility, held, that they could not complain that it was rebutted in the same way."

I could read you some of the numerous examples of the same character, from this authority, and I submit therefore, if your Honor please, that as a matter of right this evidence is admissible, but at least that as a matter of discretion it is a duty of this Court, as affirmed by these repeated authorities, to permit the evidence which is now offered; and I add, Sir, simply that the objection to the exercise of the discretion in that direction made from the inconvenience of allowing extended, prolonged examinations by parole upon irrelevant questions as tending to the disturbance of the order and the interruptions of the business of the Court, cannot apply here. We ask for no parole evidence on the subject. We simply produce a couple of letters written by the same hand, originated in the same mind and heart, expressive of feelings and thoughts upon the same subject. And upon what principle of justice these should be excluded, while the other is permitted to stand in evidence as against this plaintiff, I am at a loss to conceive.

ANSWERING ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—I cannot think, if your Honor please, that every simple question in the law of evidence proposed for your solution demands very long inquiry. Whatever should induce length or variety of proposition concerning it must be to withdraw from the rule of decision, and not to aid your Honor in it. The primary rule of evidence allows us, as it has allowed the plaintiff in the progress of this case, to introduce written acts proceeding from either party as the opposite party had occasion. They also permitted either party to show the reception by the other party of communications through third persons, and thereby to impute, either by affirmative connected evidence or by such conclusions as the law would draw from the reception without response, such consequences as came to the opposite party from thus receiving letters from third persons. The rule about husband and wife's intercourse anterior to the point of suspicion or discovery, is wholly aside from that question. It terminates undoubtedly as by a very well considered opinion, in the Courts of Kings Bench, the full bench, is settled, as upon the common sense of the matter, it would terminate, upon the occasion of interruption, not by a concealed adultery—that had not interrupted but by the suspicion or disclosure as the case may be of an actual or a suspected, though not an actual adultery.

Mr. Beach Well, you give me the reference, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The case of Trelawney vs. Coleman, in the first of Barnwell and Adolphus, by Lord Ellenborough and Justices Abbott, Bayle and Holroyd :

"Held, that since what the husband and wife say to each other and how they conduct themselves toward each other when together, is admissible in the action of crim. con., it follows that letters written to each other during absence are also admissible to show their manner of conducting themselves toward each other, if all suspicions of collusion are removed, and it is sufficient on this point if the letters are proved to have been written at the time they bore date, and before any suspicion was entertained of the wife's misconduct."

Mr. Beach—That case is cited Sir, in Greenleaf in the paragraph which I read in support of my position.

Mr. Evarts—Now, the English case referred to by my learned friend upon this point was a case at Nisi Prius before Justice Coleridge and has not the authority of this that I have cited. And now this letter which we have given in evidence subsequent to this date of suspicion disclosed or excited, is the Catherine Gaunt letter, as it is called. The plaintiff put in evidence a letter dated December 6, 1866, referring to this novel of "Griffith Gaunt" and another letter, I think, having the same reference of December 7, 1866. Perhaps both are not in, the first one is. Now, we undertake to examine in reference to this matter of the Griffith Gaunt letter, first, in connection with a disclosure concerning that letter which was contained in Mrs. Woodhull's publication in her newspaper, it being a part of that line of inquiry followed by me and not yet exhausted, by which the responsibility for these disclosures was sought to be charged upon the plaintiff and Mr. Moulton, and they deprived of the credit of having endeavored to suppress then. In that connection the Catherine Gaunt letter plays this part. [Reading] :

Q. Now, Sir, do you know how Mrs. Woodhull got her reference, in her article, to the Catherine Gaunt letter, as it is called, which your wife wrote you? A. I don't know what reference you allude to.

Q. If there is such a reference do you know where she got it? Then he goes on and finally is asked :

Then, as far as you know, if there is a reference in the Woodhull publication to the Catherine Gaunt letter of your wife, you don't know how she became possessed of the fact that there was such a letter? A. Why, except that she became possessed of it as she got possessed of the other particulars, through circumstances floating to her ear through other persons ; did not get them from me.

Q. And thus floating, they must have originally started from your references to the Catherine Gaunt letter? A. Anything that anybody knew of the Catherine Gaunt letter must have come originally from me, because that letter was written to me; Yes, Sir.

Q. That is exactly what I want to know—my question: then his answer,

But I did not state it to Mrs. Woodhull.

Then this witness, having published the Catherine Gaunt letter, published it not in a complete form. I then introduce it as a part of positive proof in that connection, and with that intent. "Please look at that letter and say if that is the Catherine Gaunt letter, so-called?"—it being a printed page. "What is that?" Mr. Fullerton says, I offered it in connection with his publication of it in an imperfect form, and I put it in evidence to prove that fact of its imperfect condition as compared with his publication of it. And having gone into that inquiry, which your Honor will remember, with what effect or what result in that connection it is not important for me now to consider (that will be reserved for my comments upon the evidence when the evidence is properly completed), then I put in, on the 9th of February, the Catherine Gaunt letter, calling attention in putting it into the differences between it as produced, in its actual condition, and that in which it had been published by the witness. I examined him concerning that, and they put in afterwards, I think, the section of his sworn statement. [Some suggestion to Mr. Evarts by Mr. Abbott.] Oh, yes; they did not take up the Gaunt letter. It was the other letter. They did not put that in: they put in a certain section referring to the 3d of February letters. Now, that letter having been thus introduced, upon the strictest and directest rules of evidence on our part of showing a letter received by him from his wife, and dealt with by him in a certain manner of dealing with a publication or argument or defense of his case, it is claimed that there is opened to them a right to put in evidence letters between the wife and and himself irrespective of any connection with or allusion to the Catherine Gaunt letter, or in connection with it, on the ground that, as one letter has been put in by me, which I had a right, if you please—having a right, if you please, to put in all that I connect with him by his dealing with them—that that gives them a right to put in letters of his received by him from his wife with which the defendant, whom I represent, has no relation of notice or information concerning the letter; and thus the imputation upon this party whom I represent, falling to give any credit to it as evidence against us. Now, if that is not as profound a contempt of the distinction between the laws of evidence that do not permit people to introduce transactions of their own and on their side, although the other side can do so, and although the other side has done so, I cannot understand the propositions that are submitted in the text-books, or in the authorities, or that are argued in a court! Now, the only point by which connected letters come in is thus—Where letters and correspondence between the plaintiff and defendant were offered in evidence by the former, it was held that the latter might read his answer to the plaintiff's last letter, dated the day previous. And where one party produces the letter of another, purporting to be in reply to a previous letter from himself, he is bound to call for and put in the letter to which it was an answer as part of his own evidence.

That is, that, there being brought in one letter, then the letter which it alludes to, as a letter to which it replies and thus makes it a part of itself, may be required then to be put in as a part of the evidence of the party offering the first letter. But, aside from that, there is a right on the part of the opposite party to put in a letter that is a reply to a letter that has been put in. That is, it follows that. Now, if your Honor please, no argument and no restatement could make that plainer as it seems to me, and as I can only follow my own instructions in any views that I present to your Honor, I despair of making that plain if it does not so strike your experienced attention. Now, my friend, departing from any proposition of right, (for I need not say that all sorts of conversations might be given in evidence) confidential communications between these parties might be given in evidence if this can be given in evidence. Now, my friend departs from that and undertakes to appeal to what he considers a discretion of your Honor. Well, if your Honor please, what discretion is there to invade a rule of evidence to a small extent and not to a large one. That is not the proposition. He must then lay it down as a proposition of law that a party has a right to give in evidence correspondence between himself and a third party with which the opposing party to the suit is not connected in any way, either by writing, or receiving, or hearing, or knowing of, if the Judge thinks best in the interests of justice. Now, my learned friend can find no such proposition of law as that. But I apprehend there is the least possible basis for an appeal in the interest of fairness or justice and of right, when it is proposed to your Honor in the trial of a case, where this lady's mouth is closed by the law, and no word of explanation, no word of suggestion of facts, no word of suggestion of the modes and occasion and circumstances in which a letter was written (a privilege so largely availed of by this witness in explanation of his letters) when no, no such word can be heard from this woman, but before her shearers she must be dumb to allow her husband and his counsel to pick out such letters as they like to read and omit the rest.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, do you find the subsequent letter as well as the Griffith Gaunt letter?

Mr. Fullerton—How, Sir?

Judge Neilson—Do you find any letter of later date, besides the Griffith Gaunt letter?

Mr. Fullerton—No later than the Griffith Gaunt, Sir, June 29, 1871; but there are eleven written since.

Judge Neilson—Since the alleged event?

Mr. Fullerton—Since the alleged event.

Mr. Evarts—Not introduced by us?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! Since the event?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! well, we have disposed of that question.

Mr. Morris—No; that question has not been disposed of.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I suppose it is disposed of.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, don't scold about it.

Mr. Evarts—Why not.

Mr. Fullerton—Because there is no necessity for it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, now, let me know what you are saying. Do you find any letter put in by us subsequent to the discovery of the adultery?

Judge Neilson—That is the question I put to counsel.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the question I answered before the gentleman put his question in that extraordinary manner.

Judge Neilson—I know; you answered it according to your general recollection.

Mr. Fullerton—I answered it according to my specific recollection.

Mr. Morris—They put in two subsequent to the discovery.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, March 18, 1871, and there is one June 26, 1871, and the other nine or ten letters are of an anterior date, but subsequent to the discovery of the event, the cause of complaint.

Mr. Evarts—Well, let us see them.

Mr. Fullerton—I have drawn off a list of them.

Mr. Shearman—It is a mere mistake in the book, if your Honor please, a mere misprint in the pamphlet. The original letter is dated March, 1867. The counsel is taking advantage of a misprint in this pamphlet.

Mr. Morris—I have not taken advantage of any misprint in any pamphlet. I have taken it from the Exhibit; that is what I have taken it from.

Judge Neilson—The remark, Mr. Shearman, applies to one letter only.

Mr. Fullerton—I take it it is a misprint, myself, but to say that we took advantage of it is to say a very unkind and uncalled for thing. The Catherine Gaunt letter is June 29, 1871. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. Morris—It is printed here in the Exhibit as March, 1871.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is wrong; it is March, 1868; that is so, and the letter which we offer in evidence only differs three days in the date from the Griffith Gaunt letter, written from the same place.

Judge Neilson—Written from the same place?

Mr. Fullerton—Written from the same place, three days intervening between the two.

Judge Neilson—How about the second letter? That is, the first letter.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir, there is but one. There is a misprint in the book.

Judge Neilson—No, but the letter that you offered?

Mr. Evarts—You offered two.

Mr. Fullerton—We offered two; yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—How remote are those dates?

Mr. Fullerton—The other has no date, Sir, which is a part of the letter. There is a date put upon it in lead pencil. We suppose it was written in December, 1872, and shall be able to prove that it was thus written. The other is July 4, 1871, and the Griffith Gaunt letter is June 29, 1871.

Judge Neilson—A difference of a few days.

Mr. Fullerton—Only a few days.

THE COURT ADMITS THE LETTERS.

Judge Neilson—These letters are not, in my judgment, as important as counsel seem to consider them. They do not go to the actual question before us, but it has to do with the question of damages simply, in this sense, as revealing the condition of the relations between the husband and wife in their peaceful abode, happy abode, or otherwise. Correspondence of this kind is admitted for that purpose. If the plaintiff has a blissful home, the law supposes that he suffers more damages by an event of this kind, if it occurs, than he would suffer if he had a disturbed home, broken up by want of affection and love, independently of the offense charged. As to Mrs. Tilton herself, she has no interest in this matter. It is no hardship that she is not heard to explain the letters, and I never have been able to see the force of any suggestion of that character. The question is between this plaintiff and this defendant. This comes in, if at all, on a collateral branch simply—the condition of the household; and all things considered, I am disposed to receive the letters in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—I think your Honor will allow me to say that we do not introduce the Catherine Gaunt letter on that view, in the least, nor does it bear on that question in the least, but it does bear upon the very material issues in connection with which we introduced it.

Judge Neilson—It performs an office in that relation, however.

Mr. Evarts—And in regard to what I have suggested about the hardships. I understood your Honor to hold very liberally in the right of the witness to explain his letters, and that it would not be right to exclude him.

Judge Neilson—So I should hold with another witness.

Mr. Evarts—I say so, and therefore the reason.

Judge Neilson—The import of that rule does not at all depend upon what some other witness might do if that witness should be called.

Mr. Beach—Are we to open another discussion on that subject, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—No; not by me; not by me, it won't be opened.

Mr. Beach—It seems to me that is what you are endeavoring to do.

Mr. Evarts—Does your Honor admit both of these letters?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Does the ruling cover the entire space of time?

Judge Neilson—What space does it cover, Sir?

Mr. Evarts—This is up to the end of 1872.

Mr. Fullerton—I will reserve that one. I offer the other one.

Judge Neilson—Then the ruling applies to the one letter.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be good enough to note my exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton [reading]:

MRS. TILTON'S LETTER OF CONTRITION.

JULY 4, 1871.

MY DEAR THEODORE: I had expected you all day yesterday and to-day, but now your letter was put into my hand instead. I feel the bitterest disappointment, but we are both in God's hands, and while I now hear him say, by my heart's intense yearnings, "Return to the love of your youth," oh, my dear husband, may you not need the further discipline by being misled by a good woman as I have been by a good man. I rejoice in your happy face and peaceful mind, though I am not in any wise the cause. It will be God's gift alone if ever your face illumines or heart throbs with thoughts of me. As for me, I will wait on the Lord. I thank you for the sufferings of the past year. You have been my deliverer.

Destroy my letters, nor show them to our mutual friend. The fear of this will prevent my writing my inmost self.

I am your dear wife,

ELIZABETH.

[Marked "Exhibit, 106."]

Mr. Fullerton—I now offer the other letter.

Judge Neilson—What is the date of that?

Mr. Fullerton—I shall have to prove it.

Judge Neilson—Very well, prove it.

Mr. Fullerton—Look at the paper now shown you, and which is marked for identification, and tell me when it was written and from where it was written. [Handing witness the letter.]

Judge Neilson—The last letter was written from the same place as the Griffith Gaunt letter?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on.

Mr. Evarts—The inquiry is only of the date, I suppose.

Judge Neilson—The date.

Mr. Fullerton—When was the letter written, and from where was it written? A. It was written, I presume, at my own house, December 28, 1872. At all events it was written on the morning after, or the day after, the publication of the letter to the Complaining Friend in The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. Where were you when you received it? A. I was at my house. It was laid on my desk.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading:] "My dear Theodore——"

Mr. Evarts—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—Now, that letter takes a different relation altogether. It is not a letter intended to reveal the actual condition of the household or the relations existing between the husband and the wife——

Mr. Beach—Oh, well, we will withdraw that; it is of no particular consequence.

Judge Neilson—[Continuing:] But is moved by a single special circumstance, to wit: the letter itself.

Mr. Fullerton—We will withdraw it.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—We are through, Mr. Evarts.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. TILTON.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton, you were to have brought me a letter from Mr. Johnson to you upon your giving him a gold watch? A. Well, Sir; I have forgotten that circumstance. I will be happy to oblige you.

Q. You were also to get for me the date of your Northfield lecture engagement, in Minnesota. A. Well, Sir, I applied to my lecture agent and he informed me that it took place so long ago that it was before his association with me. Therefore I have no means of ascertaining it.

Q. When did his association with you begin? A. I think, Sir, in the season of 1868-'9.

Q. Then it was prior to 1868-'9? A. It must have been, according to that statement; yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON ON THE LAWS OF DIVORCE.

Q. Mr. Tilton, you have given us your views of legal reform in regard to divorce. Were you aware that the State of New-York had provisions of law for a limited divorce, for a variety of causes, for uncomfortable or improper relations between husband and wife? A. Not actual divorce, Sir.

Q. I said limited divorce? A. I don't know of any such thing as limited divorce. There is separation. Articles of separation can be had.

Q. Very well. Were you aware of the regulations of our laws for desertion, cruelty, &c., in separating the parties, except from the obligation of their vow, so that they could not marry again? A. I am quite well aware, Sir, that here parties can be separated for various reasons, but they cannot be divorced, except for one reason.

Q. Well, do you know the difference between a limited and a divorce a vinculo? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now were you aware of the conditions of our laws which limited a divorce a vinculo to a case of adultery, and gave a divorce, separation, limited, protecting the wife in other cases? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, Sir, was the State of Indiana one of those parts of the country where you thought light and liberality on the subject of divorce needed to be promulgated? A. Will you be kind enough to ask that question again, Sir?

Q. It will be read to you.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.]

A. Well, I have not got that yet into my mind, Mr. Evarts.

Q. Well, Sir, we will wait for you to turn it over in your mind.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Mr. Evarts better get it out of his first, properly, because I don't understand what it means.

The Witness—I desire to answer your questions in good faith, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't understand the point of the question. It may be my fault.

The Witness—But I am under oath, and I cannot answer unless I understand the inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think it is very intelligible.

The Witness—It may be my fault, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The question has been read, I think, to the witness. I think it is very intelligible.

The Witness—[To the stenographer.] Will you be kind enough to read the question, Sir.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question.]

The Witness—Well, Sir, I cannot say that I understand your question. I suppose that there is no State in the Union nor is there any part of the world where a public discussion affecting the interests of society is not pertinent and in order.

Q. I thought I understood you to say that it was the differences between the law of New-York and that of the New-England States, and of the West, that constituted your interest and your doctrines on the subject of divorce. A. That was exactly it, Sir.

Q. Did you think, then, that the State of Indiana was one of the places where the presentation of your complaints against the laws of New-York, and preference of the laws of the West, were required as a matter of public reform? A. Well, Sir; I cannot speak for the State of Indiana. I still do not understand your question, Sir.

Q. Very well. That is a difficulty we cannot correct. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you write and deliver a lecture on the subject of divorce and marriage, and promulgate it during a Western tour? A. No, Sir; I made the notes of a discourse on that subject, which I gave in this State, and as it attracted a number of comments, I was requested at various points during my Western tour to express my views. Where I was requested to do, I did it. I did not thrust my lecture upon anybody.

Q. What places in New-York State did you deliver that lecture? A. Cornell University, by the invitation of the authorities.

Q. Anywhere else? A. Well, I should have to look at a list. Yes, I think a number of places.

Q. Well, just tell us where. A. I cannot say.

Q. You cannot remember any place but that? A. Not at this moment. I remember that I opened the lecture course there by invitation of the college students, and as I had been very much traduced for supposed laxity of views, chose that subject.

Q. I didn't ask you that. I only asked you where did you deliver it? nothing else. Now, Sir, did you deliver that at Bloomington in Indiana? A. I did, Sir; that is to say, I delivered a discourse there.

Q. Before a seminary there—university? A. Before the university; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you in that lecture announce this proposition: "If any two among them promised each other enduring love, they were in fact as much man and wife in the eye of Heaven as if the sanction of the law and the benediction of the priest had pronounced them so?" A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you in your lecture tell your hearers—it is at Bloomington, I am now speaking of—"to follow nature, and obey her instincts?" A. There is no such phrase in my lecture, Sir.

Q. No sentiment of that kind? A. Nothing of the kind, Sir; no Sir.

Q. Did you in that lecture denounce the interference of either Church or State with marriage? A. I did not, Sir. I criticised certain relations on the part of Church and State to divorce, not to marriage.

Q. Did you in that lecture say, and in this connection of the subject of your lecture, divorce and marriage, that if you had your way you would crush the Church and crush the State? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you, as a part of this lecture, say that in this free and unrestrained commerce between the sexes, there might be a good many babies born into the world that would have to be taken care of by the State? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. And that it would be the duty of the State to regulate prostitution? A. No, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S DOCTRINES OF MORALITY AND THEOLOGY.

Q. Now, you have stated, Mr. Tilton, in reference to some expressions of your correspondence, classified in the questions put to you, that your early religious education produced a resonance and echo in your mind that would account for these expressions of self-depreciation or of gloom. You remember that inquiry? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, have you not also, as a part of this early education, been taught a strict morality? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As well as these severe doctrines of theology? A. I had, Sir.

Q. You gave as one instance that you would rather have cut off your hand than have written a letter on Sunday, something of that kind? A. In the early days; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, before the dates of these letters you had very thoroughly got over that feeling regarding the sanctity of the Sabbath, had you not? A. Yes, Sir; no, not the sanctity of the Sabbath; the severe rigidity of moral duty.

Q. Well, those feelings regarding the sanctity of the Sabbath that you referred to, was my question? A. Well, I joined Plymouth Church in 1853, and an entirely new system of religious thought was there taught to me.

Q. Now, I only asked you a single question, whether you had got over these notions that you then referred to, and gave an instance of—if you had got over those views at the time you wrote the letter that you were inquired of. A. Mr. Evarts, I have not entirely got over those views yet, and when I spoke the other day of some words which you have appeared just now to have quoted, namely, the resonance and reverberation of the old views in my mind, they are the signs and tokens that they still linger with me. I have never been able to throw them off entirely.

Q. Now, Sir, what effect upon your feelings and their expression in the phrases of degradation and reproach which you use in these letters, would be produced by a reverberation of your early teachings, if your conduct had not changed on those subjects? A. I don't know that my conduct has changed on those subjects; it was the spontaneous impulse of a man brought up, as I was brought up in the early years, to confess myself before God abjectly and wretchedly a sinner, though I departed afterwards, under the teachings of Plymouth Church, from that view of human nature, as under the rod and discipline of the Divine; still, in all hours of weakness and weariness, the early views came back, and the dreadful standard came down, and I am beaten with a rod, and crushed again into the earth.

Q. You think, then, that on the other occasions to which these letters that are in evidence here refer to, that these expressions connect themselves only with these early doctrines of original sin, and the five points of Calvinism, do you, and not your own conduct, referred to in these letters? A. No, Mr. Evarts, every one of these letters refer to my own conduct as falling short of the standard of conduct which God reveals to a man, and which all men should follow, namely unselfishness, kindness, diligence to the wants of others, tender-heartedness, freedom from malice; whenever I compared myself with this standard, and remembered my early education, and the scourge which old Dr. Alexander used to put upon us to do our best, I was always ashamed of myself; I think every honest man is.

Q. Then you think that the recurrence of this religious education, operating upon your mind, was applied by you in your letters to your actual conduct, as it was presented to your recollection? A. Yes, Sir. For instance, Mr. Evarts, if you will allow me to give you an illustration.

MR. BOWEN'S PAYMENT TO MR. TILTON.

Mr. Evarts—No matter about an instance; I don't want any illustration. You have stated, in answer to a direct question, that the payment of the $7,000 had nothing to do with the tripartite agreement? A. Nothing at all.

Q. And that was paid you, I think you said, before you signed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What day did you sign? A. I don't remember the day, but it was two or three days afterwards—two or three days after the payment. The $7,000 was paid to me in the form of a check by Mr. Bowen on the very night of the arbitration.

Q. The 2d of April? A. If it was the 2d of April—I don't know the date of that arbitration other than as it has been generally accepted to be such; yet, I have no means of identifying that day. It has been said in Court to be April, 1872; whether it is so or not, I cannot say.

Q. [Handling check to witness.] Now, Sir, will you look at that and see whether it is the check you received? A. That is the check, Sir.

Q. What is the date of it? A. April 4th. I carried it to Franklin Woodruff, and he scolded me for not being earlier. He said I never would be a rich man because I allowed the pennies to go to waste. He said I had lost a day's interest on a large check.

Q. If it was deposited on the 5th you didn't lose much time, if it was dated on the evening of the 4th? A. I did not say it was dated on the evening of the 4th—dated on the evening of the 2d.

Q. The check speaks for itself as to its date? A. It was deposited with Woodruff & Robinson on the 4th of April, as you see by the account.

Mr. Evarts—That I understand.

The Witness—Mr. Woodruff made a remark to me about my losing a day's interest—about my being careless.

[Check marked "Exhibit D, 108."]

Mr. Evarts—Now, I read the check. [Reading]:

New-York, April 4th, 1872.

Pay to the order of Theodore Tilton seven thousand dollars. ($7,000).

HENRY C. BOWEN.

(Indorsed:) Pay to the order of Woodruff and Robinson. THEODORE TILTON. WOODRUFF AND ROBINSON.

Q. Now, you say you entertained no doubt that Mr. Bowen owed you $7,000? A. I have said that over and over again. Mr. Bowen owed me the $7,000, and paid me because he owed me, and for no other reason.

Mr. Evarts—I ask to have all the answer struck out that is not responsive to my question.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Q. Now, Sir, did you think that you were entitled to these damages if Mr. Bowen had a justifiable cause for dismissing you from his employment? A. Mr. Bowen had no justifiable cause.

Q. Just answer my question. A. What is your question?

Mr. Evarts—I ask to strike out that answer. [To the witness.] My question is a very simple one. Did you think that Mr. Bowen owed you these damages if he had a justifiable cause for dismissing you from his employment?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. That calls for what he thought at that time.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—The witness said he had no justifiable cause.

Mr. Evarts—That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Beach—Yes, it has, because he could not think it if he had not.

Judge Neilson—He might have thought he was mistaken. I think he may answer the question.

Mr. Beach—Then he is asked for his judgment.

Mr. Evarts—I have asked for his judgment, whether Mr. Bowen owed him the money.

Judge Neilson—I think he can answer it.

Q. Did you think that Mr. Bowen owed you these damages, if he had a justifiable cause for dismissing you from his employment? A. No such thought ever arose in my mind, there being no basis to found it on. I never heard such an idea suggested until just now by your own lips.

Q. You never heard, then, from Mr. Bowen a discussion concerning the stories that he had heard to your prejudice anterior to the breaking up of the contracts? A. I never had a word with Mr. Bowen on the subject except in the interview of December 26, 1870. I never saw Mr. Bowen after that time until April 2d or 3d, whatever may be the date, of 1872.

Mr. Evarts—That I understand.

The Witness—And I have never seen him since, except in the most casual way on the ferry-boat.

Q. You did see him on the 26th? A. Four years ago; yes, Sir.

Q. And that interview has been detailed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, have you not stated that the subject of stories against you was present and discussed between you and Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir; I have stated that most distinctly.

Q. Very well, that is enough of that. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that you held that interview upon the suggestion of your friend Johnson, that it would be useful to you to do so?

A. No, Sir. I stated that I held it at my own impulse. I heard Mr. Bowen had received some stories from some one; Mr. Johnson brought me that information, and I said I would see Mr. Bowen at once.

THE COMMUNE AGAIN.

Q. Now, Sir, when did the Commune of France come to an end? A. That is a point of history which I would not like to pluck out of my memory and hand it over to you. I should have to refer to the contemporaneous history of the times. It went down in blood.

Q. It was sometime antecedent to this procession of yours in which you took part? A. Why, it went down a long while ago. The Commune, considered as a mere political organization, a mere shell, lasted only a little while.

Q. It had come to an end before this procession in which you took a part? A. Why, I think it was a long while before; yes, Sir.

Q. It didn't last very long any way, did it? A. No, Sir, the mere exterior organization. The principles which animated it, and the theory, they will live as long as Thomas Jefferson's system of American Republicanism will live.

Mr. Evarts—Very likely; and the principles you announced here to-day had an origin before Thomas Jefferson.

The Witness—I think they had.

MR. TILTON'S COMPANION AT WINSTED.

Mr. Evarts—And will last a great while, I dare say. [To the witness.] Now, Sir, you have been asked in regard to this young person that went to Winsted. Do you know how old that young lady was? A. No, Sir; I stated this morning that she was a school girl, at that time I should say 16 or 17 years old.

Q. You spoke of her in your letter that was read as a mere child? A. Well, that was years ago—that was 1868.

Q. I have nothing to say about it, and only call your attention to it. A. I don't know how old she was. She was a friend and companion of my daughter Florence. I don't know whether they were of equal age, or not. I think she was older, perhaps several years older.

Q. Don't you know, or can you not say, upon consideration that she was as much as 19 years old? A. I don't know, Sir, at all.

Q. Was she not a large person? A. Not very large.

Q. She was not diminutive? A. No, Sir.

Q. She was a fair-sized girl, neither large nor small.

MRS. WOODHULL'S HUSBAND.

Q. You have said on your visits to Mrs. Woodhull's her husband was present. Do you mean by that a gentleman called Col. Blood in the evidence? A. Yes, Sir.

MRS. TILTON'S PHOTOGRAPHS.

Q. Now, Mr. Tilton, you have spoken about the closet you found in your house with a variety of things in it. Do you know how many portraits there were of other persons what were in that closet? A. There was no portrait of anybody else.

Q. In the way of photographs? A. No portraits of anybody else at all.

Q. Do you know how many there were in the bureau drawer of that room of other persons? A. There were not any.

Q. Did you send away from your house a quantity of portraits in photographs of other persons? A. No, Sir.

Q. Afterwards? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you send them to your wife? A. I did not.

Q. Well, were they sent from that house, do you know? A. Not that I know of. I never heard of any such thing.

Q. Don't you know there were altogether some seventy or eighty photographs of persons—I don't say of so many different persons, but of persons other than Mr. Beecher—that were in your wife's possession there? A. No, Sir; I never heard of any such thing. I have got a little recollection of my own of photographic cards of distinguished people, perhaps a hundred and fifty. They didn't belong to her; they belonged to me; but so far as I know they are still in the house.

Q. Didn't Mrs. Tilton have seven or eight photographs of the Rev. Dr. Taylor, in New-York? A. I never saw them if she had.

Q. Hadn't she several of Mr. Greeley? A. I never saw them.

Q. Had she not quite a number of Rev. Dr. Storrs? A. I never saw them.

Q. Now, Sir, did you give her any of these photographs of Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; never one.

Q. Did you never give her a photograph of Mr. Beecher? A. No, not that I remember.

Q. Are you quite sure that you never did? A. I don't remember that I ever had one. Mr. Beecher once gave me a large photograph of himself that hung on the wall, eight or ten years ago. I don't remember any other photograph.

Q. And in the whole course of your friendship with Mr. Beecher you never had a photograph of his own except this one you now refer to? A. I don't remember about the early years; I think quite likely I may have had photographs in those days.

Q. Do you remember whether during those years of friendship you gave any photograph of Mr. Beecher to your wife? A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. You may have done so? A. Oh! I gave her everything I got. If I had it, quite likely I gave it to her.

Q. Did you have any considerable number of Mr. Beecher's photographs yourself? A. No, Sir.

Q. From which you gave to other persons? A. No, Sir; not that I remember.

Q. Not that you remember. Then I want to know whether you will say that you never had them? A. I think I never had.

Q. And never gave photographs of Mr. Beecher to other friends of yours? A. Well, Sir, I don't remember; I may have done so years and years ago.

Q. Nothing more is within your memory? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, there is a little picture here that is made an Exhibit. Do you know to whom that belonged? A. I never saw it until it was passed over to the jury. I didn't know that it was in the box; I didn't myself detect it in the box. I have not yet seen it.

Q. Do you know of its belonging to one of your younger children, having been picked up in the street? A. I know nothing about it other than that I found it in the box, or that it was found in the box which I brought here. I think it was found by Mr. Fullerton since he came into Court.

THE CLOSET WITH THE BEECHER GIFTS.

Q. Now, Sir, in this closet that you spoke of, do you know when the things that you found there were put there? A. I know nothing about it, Sir. I only know that I examined them, that is all.

Q. That is all you know? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was there anything in the way of gifts to Mrs. Tilton, that you found in that closet, which you were not aware of before? A. I was not aware of any of those that I found.

Q. You were not aware of any presents of books to Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir, other than this; I remember once that he gave her a copy of "Life Thoughts," and I think he gave her a copy of "Norwood," and he gave me one; but I was not aware of this great collection of books that I found in the closet, which were inscribed by him to her; those I had never seen.

Q. You speak of it as a great collection? A. Yes, Sir, it would fill a shelf about that length. [Illustrating with his hands.]

Q. What were these books? A. They were his writings—his various publications.

Q. Many copies of the same book? A. No, Sir; no copies of the same book.

Q. Separate books? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of his own works? A. Mainly his own works.

Q. And his gifts to your wife, as appeared by the title page and from his inscriptions, or something? A. Yes, Sir; the only way that I knew that they were gifts by him to Mrs. Tilton was from the fact that the books, on being opened, contained on the white leaf: "Presented to Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, by her Friend Henry Ward Beecher," or something of that kind—inscriptions in various ways.

Q. What size books were they? A. What sized books?

Q. Yes, Sir; what sized books? A. Octavo books generally, if you know that size.

Q. Yes, I know it; I know all sizes. [Laughter.]

Q. They were octavo size? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Consisting in the main of a series of his publications, which had been made from time to time? A. They were not so big as law books.

Q. "Octavos" is near enough for my purpose. Now, did you happen to be aware, among your acquaintances in Brooklyn, that Mr. Beecher had made presents of his books to others of his parishioners? A. No, Sir; I have been told on the contrary, that Mr. Beecher very seldom shows any courtesy to any of his parishioners—very seldom visits them, or makes them presents, or attends their funerals, or anything of that kind. [Laughter in Court.]

Mr. EVARTS—Now, I ask to strike all that out.

Mr. BEACH—Why did you not stop it?

Mr. Everts—How could I? My question did not call for it.

Judge Neilson [To the audience]: I must again speak to the gentlemen in the room to keep order. I have had to appeal to them before, and I stated that I would not sit here and administer justice in the midst of such interruptions. Now, Mr. Everts, you may repeat your question, and that answer will be stricken out. The short answer you are entitled to.

Mr. Everts—That will answer. The rest is stricken out.

Q. Now, Sir, had you sufficient acquaintance with the interior of this house, and the objects, pictures and books, etc., to know that all these gifts of Mr. Beecher were openly about in different rooms of the house, until your wife had occasion to take boarders, and in making arrangements for their accommodation, they had been packed into this closet? A. I knew nothing about it, Sir. I never saw these gifts until I saw them after her desertion. They were never scattered around the house that I know of.

Q. When was this period at which your wife resorted to keep boarders?

Mr. Beach—That is new matter.

Judge Neilson—It may be new matter, but I will take it.

Mr. Everts—It bears upon this subject. It is not new matter in this sense.

The Witness—I don't know how long ago, but she came to me one day—

Q. No, matter; you don't know how long ago? A. No, Sir. I don't know the date. I think after the publication of the Woodhull scandal she wanted to live alone.

Q. And she began to take boarders after the publication of the Woodhull scandal? A. I think she did, but still I will not be positive as to the time.

Q. These presents you have no recollection of seeing about the house up to that time, and of their being displaced in reference to the arrangement for boarders? A. No, Sir; I never saw them; there was a gift of a picture—one or two pictures made years ago, which I knew about. I never knew anything about these books.

Q. Do you remember receiving the key of this closet from your wife?

A. No, Sir; I have not seen my wife since she left my house in July, except at a distance in the court room.

Q. That I understand; but it might be sent to you and received by you at your house? A. I know nothing of that.

Q. The key never was received at your house? A. I don't know that the key was ever taken away. When I made a search through the house I asked my housekeeper for the keys, and she gave me the keys of the various closets, and this one among them. I don't know how she got it.

Q. That is your recollection of how you came by it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you opened the closet with the key? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you know nothing of the key being sent by your wife? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, at the time of your wife's last confinement, you were about the house, were you not? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S PRESENTS OF FLOWERS.

Q. Did you know of these presents of flowers made to your wife in her illness? A. We always had flowers in the house. Sometimes I ordered them and sometimes she did. I knew that occasionally Mr. Beecher had sent her flowers.

Q. Did you know of any flowers being brought from Mr. Beecher's house to your house a few days after the child was born? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Do you know of Captain Duncan bringing them there? A. No, Sir; that is the first I ever heard of that.

Q. Do you remember being at the house when Mr. Beecher called upon your wife during her confinement, and there seeing him sitting? A. No, Sir; I have no recollection of that.

Q. Do you remember other gentlemen friends calling upon your wife during her confinement, and your seeing them there? A. I don't recall it, Sir; it is fully five years ago.

Q. Do you know of Mr. Bates being there and in her room. In the same room that the witness has testified about seeing Mr. Beecher in? A. I don't know any such thing; I never heard of it.

Q. Do you know Mrs. Mitchell, the monthly nurse, was there during all this time? A. I know that she was the nurse.

Q. Do you know that she was in the room with your wife while Mr. Beecher was there in the room? A. I didn't know anything about Mr. Beecher being in the room until I heard it from this stand yesterday from the person of that nurse.

Q. Do you remember that you were in the house at the time that Mr. Beecher called, the September visit which the nurse has testified about? A. No, Sir; I never heard of it until I heard it yesterday.

Q. You mean to say that you never heard of this occurrence before you heard of it yesterday? A. No, Sir.

Q. But do you remember being there on the day when the Equal Rights Committee met there and Mr. Beecher called upon that day? A. The Equal Rights Committee, under Mrs. Tilton's invitation, met at my house, I suppose, every week or so. I don't remember any special occasion when they were there.

Q. Do you remember that on this day in September there was a meeting of the Committee there and you were in the house. I don't say that you were a member of the Committee, because I presume they were all ladies, though I don't know; but do you remember of the meeting? A. Of that meeting.

Q. Of this Equal Rights Committee meeting on that day in September when Mr. Beecher called. A. I cannot single out any particular meeting of this Equal Rights Committee at my house. They met there once a week or once a fortnight. I was not always present. Mrs. Tilton conducted the exercises. I say "exercises." I mean the arrangements.

Q. Do you remember Mr. Bates calling there immediately after your wife's confinement, and seeing her in her room in the end of June more than once? A. I have no recollection of it at all, Sir.

Q. Have you a recollection of his being there on Sunday, the 27th of June? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you and he going off to Coney Island together? A. No, Sir.

Q. No recollection of that? A. No, Sir; I cannot fix the date for any such event so long ago; Mr. Bates was my near neighbor, living around the corner.

Q. An intimate friend? A. A very near friend; he ran in occasionally.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will remember that Article Six of what is called the sworn statement was allowed to be put in evidence on the part of the plaintiff. I want to inquire as to it.

Q. Now, was this Article Six, as put in evidence, written by you? A. Was it written by me, Sir?

Q. Yes, Sir; composed by you? A. The entire statement was composed by me.

Q. That I am not asking about; I am not asking about anything but this. Was this written by you? A. It certainly was.

Q. From beginning to end? A. Except so far as the quotation in it from Mrs. Tilton's letter.

Q. That was written by your pen also? A. No, Sir.

Q. That quotation was made a part of the article by you as composer? A. Yes, Sir.

MORE OF MRS. TILTON'S LETTERS.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I will now read two letters from Mrs. Tilton to her husband, dated Aug. 16th, 1869, and Sept. 4th.

Mr. Beach—Let us see them.

[Mr. Shearman handed the letters to Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton.]

Mr. Beach—This raises the question, whether your Honor's decision excluding the letters of 1872 that we offered, does not apply to these written in August and September, 1869.

Mr. Evarts—Why, there is no trouble about that, I take it; there is no rule upon the subject; it is quite anterior to the suspicion, whatever it was.

Judge Neilson—What is the date?

Mr. Evarts—1869.

Mr. Beach—But not anterior to the event, however.

Mr. Evarts—They are brought in in consequence of the evidence given yesterday, and my friends have introduced two letters. [To Mr. Beach.] You have introduced other letters in connection with this.

Mr. Beach—What letters?

Mr. Evarts—Unimportant letters, not discussed.

Mr. Beach—We didn't introduce them; we showed them to the witness to refresh his recollection.

Judge Neilson—Are they isolated letters or parts of the same correspondence?

Mr. Evarts—They are two letters. We asked for a third one of the 4th of September. Ah! we have got that; that is here.

Judge Neilson—In the same year?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Then read them.

Mr. Evarts—They are from Monticello; there are several letters in evidence.

[Mr. Shearman read the following letter, which was marked "Exhibit D, 109":]

MONTICELLO, Aug. 15, 1869, }
Sunday. }

MY DEAR HUSBAND: These days are full of memories of the sickness and sufferings of little Paul a year ago! Our other darling is full of promise in the future—but the present—while he grows finely, all waking hours as well as sleeping, restless and crying with colic! I feel sure that he will be healthy; his lungs are strong enough for a public speaker already.

When I settled my board bill I had a long talk with the Dr. of my discontent and disappointment, and as I had said to Sally that I would use my fascinations and Christian charity to work a change for our mutual good, and so it proved; I drew out his best and there appeared the gentle man! Since when we have good roast beef; been urged to take another piece, and a bountiful supply generally. In this you will rejoice with me. No reply yet from my Cornwall letter. Of course I shall now remain here. The scales say I have gained four lbs. notwithstanding poor food, and care of baby and children. I think with longing of our seventy-five easy-chairs, when my poor back rises half upright. Then I look up to the hills from whence cometh my rest. I rejoice that at last you feel "The pleasantest place I know of is this house." So may it ever be! I missed my newspapers this week. Mr. Beecher wrote me a very summary characteristic letter, which I would inclose, save for the fear you would lose it.

I very much desire you would bring from Mr. Paige the plaster cast of little Paul and lay it in the bureau drawer among my treasures.

Did you have a visit from Sallie Lovejoy, and did she enjoy our pretty house? Tell me about it. To-day is our first—

Mr. Shearman—The letter breaks off here. I now read the other letter, marked, "Monticello, December 4th, Monday Evening." This has no date, but it is, no doubt, also 1869. It is so marked.

[Mr. Shearman read the letter, which was marked "Exhibit D, 110."]

MONTICELLO, Sept. 4th, }
Monday Evening. }

MY DEAR HUSBAND: Bella is sitting with me, the children asleep, and I have just finished reading your letter describing Mrs. T—'s funeral exercises. I feel very deeply for that young widow. Poor woman! I cannot bear to think of her dreadful loss. It unnerved me. Oh, my darling, may we not once more have a home of our own, where we may live our short lives together? You speak of coming up for next Sunday meeting; if so do prepare to spend the remaining two weeks with me, that we may return together. You can write your editorials here, and the rest you need after this last week's excitement.

Mr. Davison wished me to ask you if you could procure for him the large color'd picture used for illustrations in the Infant Class of Plymouth S. S., also any other apparatus that you think would be useful for that department. Mr. Huntington would help you, darling, in selecting them.

Bella leaves by to-morrow's coach. I was very glad to see her. We had a ride this afternoon and yesterday we strolled in the fields, but I could not say, as the Sabbath before I did, I was perfectly happy or as happy as any one could be in this world, for you were absent on so melancholy a mission.

Darling, do not forget to bring plenty of money that we may get through with our visit here safely.

I have felt my first home-sickness this week—that is, a desire to be back among the dear old places. I have gained only 1 lb. the last week—we sat for our pictures to-day, but I fear with poor success. The children are well and happy. Excuse this wretchedly hurried letter, as I want to send it by the early mail. We look for Emma to-morrow—Tuesday. Clarence is well, and has been well.

Love to dear mother and Joe.

Yours always,

WATSON.

Q. Can you say who Bella is? A. Miss Isabella Oakly, formerly a teacher of our children.

Q. Do you know how soon after this letter of September 4th, in Monticello, Mrs. Tilton returned to New-York—to Brooklyn? A. I cannot say, Sir, out of my memory; I have nothing to identify it.

Mr. Beach—She speaks in the letter of remaining two weeks, and of Mr. Tilton coming there.

Mr. Evarts—That may be, and still it may not have been done.

Mr. Fullerton—Very often ladies write things which are not accomplished.

Mr. Evarts—You do not recall, Mr. Tilton, whether you went up there and spent two weeks? A. I do not recall that particular occasion. I have been at Monticello and made an address there.

Q. Can you tell how soon after the 4th of September she returned, or whether she returned any sooner than she expected? A. No, Sir, there is nothing in my memory that I would like to fix the date by.

END OF MR. TILTON'S EXAMINATION.

Mr. Evarts here inquired for another paper, and Mr. Morris produced the paper.

Mr. Evarts—We have called for a memorandum—something that is called in the evidence "Heads of difficulties;" it is a matter between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher and I have not in my mind at all the evidence concerning it; but it seems the paper could not be found or produced at the time; it is now produced. It arose on my cross-examination, and I think was marked "Exhibit D 107." [Referring to Mr. Sherman]: Oh! I remember, it was not found until my friends had commenced their re-direct. I now offer that paper in evidence.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Mr. Evarts—For what reason.

Mr. Beach—As entirely immaterial, as a matter between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Bowen. We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. Fullerton—You might as well put in the multiplication table.

Mr. Beach—There is no evidence which lays any foundation for it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will have it marked for identification and look further at it in the morning. It is not anything that requires the witness's presence.

Judge Neilson—Are you through with the witness?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You close your re-direct examination?

Mr. Evarts—Our re-cross-examination, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Yes; have you anything to ask on the other side?

Mr. Fullerton—This letter may call for a little examination. If they do not put it in evidence we may offer it ourselves.

Mr. Beach [Showing letter to witness]: Is this a letter that you wrote to your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And at the time of its date. A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach [To the stenographer]: Just mark that for identification.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer marked the letter "Exhibit 107" for identification.]

Mr. Evarts—Do you put it in?

Mr. Beach—I do not know yet.

Mr. Evarts—If you do not determine whether you put it in we will not determine finally as to whether we may ask anything about it

A JUROR FAINTS.

At this point Mr. Davis, one of the jurors, was observed to be ill, and there was some confusion in court.

Judge Neilson—[To the audience.] Wait a moment, gentlemen. Officer, open a window. I wish that the audience would remain quiet and let the jurors retire.

The juror partially revived and attempted to leave the Court, but fell back in a faint.

Judge Neilson—[To the audience.] It is better that the audience should re-ire now, and leave the jurors at liberty to retire afterwards.

Judge Neilson then asked the officers to take charge of the juror and see him safely to his home.

Mr. Morris—If your Honor please, the air has been quite impure. It helps the air very much to have the gas lit in the center of the building, but that was not done to-day.

The court then adjourned until Thursday at 11 o'clock.

TWENTY-NINTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MRS. TILTON'S BROTHER AND THREE OTHER WITNESSES.

MR. TILTON RECALLED FOR A FEW MOMENTS—

GEORGE A. BELL GIVES EVIDENCE REGARDING THE INTERVIEW BETWEEN HIMSELF, MR. HALLIDAY, AND MR. TILTON—REMARKABLE TESTIMONY OF MRS. TILTON'S BROTHER—MR. BEECHER'S FRIENDSHIP FOR MR. MOULTON LAST JULY—WHAT A NEIGHBOR OF THE PLAINTIFF SAW.

THURSDAY, Feb. 18, 1875.

At 11:05 o'clock to-day Mr. Fullerton arose from his chair, glanced over the audience, and called out the name of George A. Bell, the next witness. It was observed at this moment that Mr. Evarts had not arrived, and Mr. Shearman asked first to be allowed to put a few questions to Mr. Tilton. By instruction of Judge Neilson, Mr. Tilton arose and remained standing in front of his chair, surrounded by his counsel, and did not resume the witness stand. Mr. Shearman then produced ten photographs of the Rev. Dr. Storrs, seven of the Rev. Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, two or three of the Rev. Mr. Talmage, and single ones of other prominent men. These pictures, which Mr. Shearman suggested were among the articles sent by Mr. Tilton to his wife after she left him last year, were intended as an offset to the production by the plaintiff of eight photographs of Mr. Beecher found in a closet in the house of the witness. Mr. Tilton said that he never saw the photographs. Examination by Mr. Fullerton called out the fact that the photographs of Dr. Storrs were alike, as were also those of Dr. Taylor, and the examiner closed his questioning by saying inquiringly to the witness, "You don't know but that they might have been bought in Fulton-st. yesterday?" Mr. Tilton replied that he did not. Mr. Evarts, who had been delayed in crossing the river from New-York, arrived at this time, and Mr. Bell, being again called, pushed his way through the crowd and ascended to the witness chair.

Mr. Bell has been a member of Plymouth Church since 1847, and is a prominent friend and benefactor of the Sunday-schools of Brooklyn. He reared up the Bethel Mission of Plymouth Church from a small school to one of the most flourishing institutions of the kind in the city. He also organized the Mayflower Mission, and is now Superintendent of the Bethel Mission. He is a fine-looking gentleman, of mild manners, and extremely polite and dignified. His testimony, which was intelligently given, was almost entirely in regard to the interview between himself, the Rev. Mr. Halliday, and Mr. Tilton, but it was not admitted without protest from Mr. Evarts. The witness corroborated in the main the statements already made regarding that meeting, but stated differently Mr. Tilton's figure of speech about flags on the tree in front of Mr. Halliday's house. He said that when urged to deny the scandal, Mr. Tilton said: "It would be as though I were to go over to New-York and say, 'Before Mr. Halliday's house there is a tree covered with a thousand flags of all nations.' That would be a false statement, and yet there is a tree." Mr. Shearman conducted the cross-examination which did not distinctly tend to offset the testimony already given.

A very important line of the defense not before called up since the beginning of the trial—though it is familiar to those who have read Mr. Beecher's Statement—was broached to-day, Mr. Evarts making an eloquent appeal for the admittance of testimony showing that Mr. Beecher had been called to advise in the troubles between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, and that the witness had an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Beecher in relation to that subject. But Judge Neilson would not allow the witness to testify to an interview which the plaintiff had not introduced in the direct examination. This question was asked in various forms, and ruled out in each case, exceptions being taken by Mr. Evarts every time. After recess, Mr. Bell resumed the witness chair, saying, as he did so, that he had recollected something that he had not stated about the interview at Mr. Halliday's house. He remembered that Mr. Tilton said that Mr. Beecher had committed an offense against his family, and protested that Mrs. Tilton was a pure woman.

The calling of the next witness, Joseph H. Richards, caused a stir in the audience, for it was generally known that that gentleman was Mrs. Tilton's brother. Mr. Richards is apparently about 40 years old. He wears closely-trimmed black whiskers, and his eyes resemble those of Mrs. Tilton. He seemed to give his testimony unwillingly, and at one time turned to the Judge and asked a just appreciation of his painful position. He said that during the past ten years he had been a resident of Montclair, N. J., his business being that of an advertising agent in Broadway. He knew little about the scandal, but what he did have to say caused a profound sensation among the auditors. Mr. Richards stated that, on one occasion, while at Mr. Tilton's house, he unexpectedly opened the parlor door, which was closed, and saw Mr. Beecher seated in the front room, and Mrs. Tilton, with a highly flushed face, making a hasty movement away from the position which Mr. Beecher occupied. It was, the witness said, such a sight as left an indelible impression on his mind in relation with other matters. Mr. Evarts, in his cross-examination, brought out that Mr. Richards had not related this occurrence to the plaintiff or his lawyers until last Tuesday, though he had received a subpoena several weeks ago.

Jeremiah P. Robinson of the firm of Woodruff & Robinson testified concerning the meeting between himself, Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Moulton on July 4, 1874, when the defendant said, placing his hand upon Mr. Moulton's shoulder, "Moulton is as good a friend as God ever raised up for man. If it was not for him I do not know that I should be alive now." Through the cross-examination it was discovered that Mr. Moulton's partnership with the firm of Woodruff & Robinson is to end on March 1.

William M. Marston Brasher was the next witness. He is a large dealer in oilcloths in this city, and is part owner of the yacht Undine of the Brooklyn Yacht Club. He lives near Mr. Tilton, and testified that he had seen Mr. Beecher going into or coming out of Mr. Tilton's house five or six times, and that he had seen the Plymouth pastor in the vicinity of the house perhaps fifty times, between 1866 and 1870. He once saw Mr. Beecher standing on Mr. Tilton's stoop about breakfast time, between 6 and 7 o'clock, he thought.

Mr. Beach now threw down the gauntlet in regard to the reserve question as to whether the remainder of the interview between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton regarding the appearance of the latter before the Plymouth Investigating Committee was to be admitted, or that part of the interview already given stricken out. An exceedingly warm debate followed, Mr. Evarts objecting in pronounced terms, and Mr. Beach clinging to his claim with tenacity. Mr. Beach was finally defeated in his effort, and it being after 4 o'clock, the court adjourned.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MRS. TILTON'S STORY TO THE COMMITTEE.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Fullerton—George A. Bell.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, there was a question reserved, which perhaps you thought was not worth looking at, or may have overlooked, in reference to an instance in which Mr. Tilton answered a question at some length, at any rate at the length that his wife said she had been before the Committee and denied everything. At that point the objection came in.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And it was then claimed that the rest of that conversation must be given, because it had been permitted up to that point. Mr. Beach spoke about looking at some authorities. The question was, whether the rest of that conversation should be given, or whether what had been given should be stricken out.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Are you satisfied with it stand as it is?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir, we desire bringing the same question up at some future time, on giving some other evidence in regard to it.

Judge Neilson—Very well.

MR. TILTON AGAIN UNDER EXAMINATION.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, if we are going on before Mr. Evarts comes—

Judge Neilson—I thought he was here.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Evarts is not here.

Judge Neilson—Then we will wait.

Mr. Shearman—We don't desire to have the witness called until he comes.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor will permit Mr. Tilton to take the stand a moment that we may supplement one question which was asked Judge Neilson—Well. [To Mr. Tilton.] You might stand up there and answer it.

[Mr. Tilton stood up by the chair in which he had been sitting.]

Mr. Shearman—Do you know Katie McDonald? A. Yes, Sir; I have known her for twenty years.

Q. Who is she? A. An old servant of my father's house, and from time to time an inmate of my own, and my house-keeper last Summer.

Q. Did you direct her to send to Mrs. Tilton her things, some things, from your house? A. I told Katie whenever Mrs. Tilton sent for anything, to give her everything she asked for.

Q. Do you not know, Mr. Tilton, that Katie McDonald, by your directions, sent to Mrs. Tilton a trunk full of things? A. Yes; two or three trunks, I think.

A SMALL PICTURE GALLERY PUT IN EVIDENCE.

Q. Please look at these photographs and say whether these photographs were not among the things belonging to Mrs. Tilton. I hand you ten photographs of the Rev. Dr. Storrs. [Handing witness photographs.] A. I don't know anything about these, Sir.

Q. There are ten, are there not? A. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, &c. One of Dr. Leavitt.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Judge Neilson—Well, the witness says he don't know anything about them.

Q. Please state what those are that I now hand to you? [Handing witness photographs.] A. Photographs of somebody; I don't recognize the face.

Q. Are they not photographs of Rev. William M. Taylor, D.D., of New-York? A. I have never seen Dr. Taylor except in the pulpit; they may perhaps be, though.

Q. You have seen him in the pulpit? A. I have heard him preach once or twice; once, I think.

Q. Do you believe that those are photographs of Dr. Taylor? A. Well, I couldn't swear that they are.

Q. How many of them are there, seven are there not? A. I will count. One, two, three, four—there are seven here.

Q. Please look at the photograph that I now hand you and state whether those are photographs of the Rev. Dr. Talmage? [Handing witness photographs.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Two of those, are there not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please look at that picture and say who that is a picture of? [Handing witness a photograph.] A. That is Mr. James H. Bates.

Q. A personal friend of yours, is he not? A. Yes, Sir, for many years.

Q. A gentleman who was bail on a bond for you, is he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you aware that Mrs. Tilton had that photograph in her possession? A. I never saw it before, Sir, to my knowledge.

Q. Please look at that picture and state what that is? [Handing witness a photograph.] A. That is Horace Greeley.

Q. Were you aware that Mrs. Tilton had that in her possession? A. No.

Q. Don't you know that you gave her that yourself, Mr. Tilton? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. Will you swear that you never did? A. No.

Q. Please look at that picture and say what that is? [Handing witness a photograph.] A. Henry Ward Beecher.

Q. Did you not give that photograph to Mrs. Tilton yourself? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. You will not swear that you did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is a photograph of whom? [Handing witness a photograph.] A. A photograph of my old associate in The Independent, Mr. Joshua Leavitt, now dead.

Q. He was a clergyman, was he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A very intimate friend of the family? A. Whose family?

Q. Your family? A. No, Sir; I don't know that he ever was at my house; I think not. Yes, Sir, I think he was on the occasion of the funeral.

Q. You can only remember of his being there once? A. That is the only occasion which I now recall.

Q. Were you not aware that he was in the habit of frequently calling at your house? A. I am aware that he was in no such habit at all.

Q. That is, you are not aware of it? A. I am aware that he was not in the habit of frequently calling at my house.

Q. Then if he called frequently it must have been in your absence? A. Yes, Sir; when I didn't know it, like Mr. Beecher's visits.

Q. Dr. Leavitt was an old clergyman, and you didn't know of his visits, if he did visit? A. No, Sir; not frequently.

Q. Did you never see any of Dr. Storrs's pictures in your house, Mr. Tilton? A. I don't think I ever possessed a picture of Dr. Storrs.

Q. I didn't ask you that; I asked you whether you ever saw pictures of Dr. Storrs in your house? A. Not that I remember, Sir.

Q. Then all these pictures, these photographs, which are now shown to you, are photographs which you never saw, and were not aware of their existence? A. I don't know anything about them.

Judge Neilson—He has answered that in detail.

Mr. Shearman—There are a few more, your Honor. [To the witness.] You do not remember ever seeing any of these pictures? A. [Referring to another photograph.] That is Frederick Douglass. I have got one or two little photographs of Frederick Douglass. I don't think I ever saw that one. That is Judge Morse. [Referring to another photograph.]

Q. Did you ever see those? A. I have seen very many photographs of Judge Morse. He is a relation of ours. I could not say that I have ever seen them.

Q. Judge Morse is your wife's stepfather, is he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Bates was a frequent visitor at your house, was he not, in 1893? A. I could not answer as to that, Sir. Mr. Bates has been for many years a friend of our family, and a very near neighbor. I think he has always been in the habit of calling more or less frequently. I could not answer for any particular time.

Judge Neilson—That is all.

Mr. Shearman—We offer these photographs.

[Photographs marked "Ex's D 11," for identification.]

RE-RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. TILTON.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] This portrait of Mr. Beecher that was handed to you—this photograph—does it represent him as a young man? A. Yes, a much younger man than he now is. I should think 15 or 20 years younger.

Mr. Fullerton—These photographs of Dr. Storrs you never saw before, I understand you, that you know of? A. Not to my knowledge.

THE PRINTS OF EACH SET OF PHOTOGRAPHS IDENTICAL.

Q. Those are four of Dr. Storrs, are they not? [Showing witness four photographs, cabinet size.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Taken from the same plate, apparently, are they not? A. Yes, Sir; copies of the same.

Q. Apparently fresh? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. New? A. Yes, Sir; they look so.

Q. Unsold? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You don't know but what they were bought yesterday in Fulton-st., do you? A. I should not like to swear that they were. I don't know anything about them.

Q. You did not find them in the closet, any way, did you? A. No, Sir; I never saw them to my knowledge.

Q. Now, take those and tell me whether they are not struck from the same plate. [Handing witness six smaller photographs of Dr. Storrs.] A. Yes, Sir; they are all the same.

Q. The same pictures? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Fresh? A. They look pretty fresh.

Q. Clean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They were not in the closet, that you know of? A. No, Sir; they were not in that closet.

MRS. TILTON FREE TO TAKE WHAT SHE PLEASED FROM THE HOUSE.

Q. You instructed this servant, I understand, to send to Mrs. Tilton whatever she sent for? A. I told Katie McDonald, the old housekeeper, that whenever Mrs. Tilton wanted anything to let her have it, to send her everything that she asked for—any articles in the house, any article of furniture—and I remember adding that "if she wants the carpets take them out and send them to her."

Q. Who packed the trunks which were sent? A. Katie McDonald packed them.

Q. Had you anything to do with it? A. Nothing at all, Sir.

ANOTHER CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Mr. Shearman—Did you examine your wife's bureau drawers yourself? A. I went through the house after she deserted it, and went through the closets and through the bureau myself.

Q. And you mean to say that you went through all the bureau drawers and did not see these pictures? A. I mean to say exactly that, here, that never to my knowledge have I seen them until this morning.

Q. We understand that, but did you make a careful search all through the house? A. Yes, Sir, careful as I could.

Q. Did you open all your wife's desks? A. All my wife's desks?

Q. Yes? A. She didn't have but one.

Q. Did you open that one? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Did you unlock it? A. It was not locked.

Q. How about this closet door; you say you have no recollection of the key coming to you? A. I have a recollection of asking Katie McDonald for the key and she handed me the key.

Q. Do you remember getting a cast of your child's face out of that closet? A. No, Sir; I remember Mrs. Tilton sent, through Katie McDonald, to me for the little box of souvenirs of the dead child, some rosebuds, some letters and a little plaster cast of the dead face. They were all in a little box; I sent all these enclosures to her address.

Q. Where was that box? A. That box was in this closet.

Q. Did you open that box? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. What did you find in that box? A. I found in that box the little plaster cast; I simply opened the box to make sure the cast was there; I did not examine into the things at all. She wanted, particularly, the plaster cast of the dead child, and I sent not only that but all the other little souvenirs which were attached to it.

Q. Can you recollect what day that was? A. No, Sir.

WHERE THE PUBLISHED CORRESPONDENCE WAS FOUND.

Q. Wasn't it the same day on which The Brooklyn Eagle republished from The Chicago Tribune these copies, or copies of letters between yourself and your wife? A. I don't remember that, Sir; don't associate the two events together.

Q. Well, had you not, a considerable time before, opened that closet and taken out these letters and had them published—and sent them on for publication? A. The letters which were published in The Chicago Tribune, from my wife, were not in that closet.

Q. I simply desire to identify the dates that they were not in the closet. Now, where were these letters? A. These letters were in a closet on another floor of the house up-stairs. The little closet where Mr. Beecher's presents were kept was on the second floor. The closet in which my wife's correspondence and mine was found was on the third floor.

Q. How many rooms did your wife have for her own use, at the time that she left the house? A. She hadn't any—left them all behind her.

Q. I mean at the time just before she left the house? A. Well, Sir—

Q. One minute before Mrs. Tilton left the house, how many rooms did she have for her own use, one or more? A. Why, she had two or three.

Q. For her own personal use? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were not one or two rooms or more, taken up by boarders? A. Yes, Sir; these little things were locked in a closet to which no member of the family had had access, I think, for a year or more.

Q. How do you know that? A. Because they were in a room, which room was occupied by one of the boarders; I know I had not been in it for a year.

Q. They were put away in a closet because the room was occupied by the boarders? A. No, Sir; I think they were put away in the closet to be concealed from me.

Q. That is your opinion about it?

Mr. Fullerton—That is what you asked.

Mr. Shearman—I understand that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; am I to understand you have got it, too?

The Witness—They were locked in the closet of a room to which I had no access, and had not had for a year.

Q. How was it that you had no access to it? A. Simply because it was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, and I never intruded upon it.

Q. And was not that a pretty good reason for keeping that closet locked?

Mr. Beach—Oh, well; we don't want any reasons of that kind here.

Mr. Shearman—I am satisfied with that, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I am glad you are.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, proceed; Mr. Evarts is here.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I was not delayed only by some ordinary interruptions in the ferry boats, by passing tows and difficulties of getting teams aboard; no especial interruption of ice.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE A. BELL.

George A. Bell was then called on behalf of the plaintiff, and sworn.

Mr. Fullerton—Where do you reside? A. On Columbia Heights—178.

Q. In this city? A. In this city.

Q. How long have you been a resident of Brooklyn? A. For twenty-eight years, nearly.

Q. And what connection, if any, have you had with Plymouth Church during that time, or any part of that time? A. I have been a member of Plymouth Church since the beginning of November, 1847.

Q. I take it for granted that you know Mr. Henry Ward Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And do you also know the Rev. Mr. Halliday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The assistant minister of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

THE TILTON-HALLIDAY INTERVIEW DESCRIBED.

Q. Do you recollect of being at Mr. Halliday's house at any time when Mr. Tilton came there? A. I remember being at Mr. Halliday's house when Mr. Tilton was there.

Q. I take it, then, that he was there when you arrived? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State whether, at that time, a paper was exhibited by Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was there any other person present than yourself, Mr.

Halliday and Mr. Tilton at this meeting? A. No, Sir; no one else.

Q. Can you tell us when it was? A. It was either on the day or the day before the fire at Woodruff & Robinson's stores; it was on a Monday morning; if the fire was on Monday night, then it was on the day of the fire; if the fire was on Tuesday night, I cannot remember how that was; I know it was on Monday morning.

Q. You can fix it by that event? A. I can fix it by that event.

Q. Only in that way. Was this so-called scandal the subject of conversation on that occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who participated in that conversation? A. Mr. Tilton did the greater part of the talking; Mr. Halliday did to some extent; and I did, somewhat more than Mr. Halliday.

Q. In that conversation did Mr. Tilton endeavor to illustrate the innocence of Mrs. Tilton by any figure of speech that he used referring to flags?

THE TESTIMONY OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Evarts—Don't answer, Mr. Bell. I don't understand it is competent for the plaintiff to give this conversation in evidence.

Judge Neilson—The same interview has been inquired into.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt, under our examination from Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—But if your Honor please, it was competent for us, Mr. Tilton being a party, to contradict his statements that are material and pertinent as part of the issue and others if we choose. It is also competent for us to examine him concerning matters that are pertinent, and then competent for us to contradict him. When we do so, then will arise, if at all, the question whether they can confirm his statements by other witnesses. But they cannot anticipate our contradiction by calling witnesses to prove an interview, which is what they are now, I suppose, doing.

Judge Neilson—Well, at most that presents a question as to the order of proof. We will take this evidence.

Mr. Evarts—Supposing we rest with Mr. Tilton's statement, and bring in no contradiction, then what rules of evidence are there that allow them to prove a conversation between Mr. Tilton and third persons, to which Mr. Beecher is not a party?

THE COURT ADMITS THE TESTIMONY.

Judge Neilson—If you rested there they could not. I think we will take this evidence now, and you take an exception. Go on.

Mr. Evarts—Will your Honor be so good as to note my exception?

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will also remember that we offer this evidence because Mr. Tilton was asked in reference to this conversation, and he is a party to the action. They may not undertake to contradict him, but to hold him responsible for what was then and there said as a party; that fact the counsel ignores in the presentation of this question.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—My question was whether Mr. Tilton at that interview illustrated the attitude of his wife with reference to this scandal by any figure of speech referring to flags or a tree; I want to identify the time of the conversation? A. I think the figure of the tree was used in a slightly different connection to what appears by your question.

Q. Well, Sir, I only wanted to identify the conversation to which Mr. Tilton referred, or to which his attention was called; he did use the figure of a tree? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, state what occurred at that time? A. Do you mean at the interview or—

Q. At the interview; at that interview; at that interview at Mr. Halliday's, when you were present and Mr. Tilton was present.

Mr. Evarts—That I object to.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—I inquired as to certain statements of the witness, who was then on the stand.

Judge Neilson—We allow this question Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Please to note my exception.

The Witness—The interview continued for over four hours, so that if I were to give you what took place in the interview it would take a very long time; I could not do it besides.

Q. Well, condense it as well as you can, Mr. Bell, and give us the substance of it; the material parts are all that we wish.

Mr. Beach—Don't be deterred by the time it will take; let us have it substantially.

THE CONVERSATION DETAILED.

A. The interview began, so far as I was concerned, by Mr. Tilton urging me to continue in the parlor into which I had been introduced by the servant girl, she, I suppose, not knowing that Mr. Halliday had been engaged; Mr. Halliday joined in the request of Mr. Tilton that I should remain; I demurred, but as they both—Mr. Tilton appeared to be anxious and Mr. Halliday was willing I should remain—I did remain. Mr. Tilton commenced then, after we were seated, by stating his reasons for calling on Mr. Halliday. Shall I give them?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. He said he had called there at the request of Mr. Moulton, who had told him that Mr. Beecher had been to see him the previous night, after service, informing him that there was to be action taken by the deacons of the church or by the Examining Committee; that Mr. Beecher had suggested to Mr. Moulton that he should see Mr. Tilton, and tell him to come down and see Mr. Halliday, and make some explanation to him which would make it unnecessary for the deacons to have their meeting. He then went into a long history of the scandal prior to the Woodhull and Claflin publication, which had then taken place but about a fortnight, or three weeks, or four weeks, commencing with the affairs of the publisher of The Independent, and what the publisher had stated to him; he said to us that these matters he gave to us in the strictest confidence, not to be mentioned by us to any one; after he had done that I think he paused, and I said to him: "Mr. Tilton, if that is all there is of this matter, your duty to your wife, to Mr. Beecher, who is your pastor, to the church, and your duty to yourself, all demand that you should come out and make a denial of this scandal." He said in answer to that that he could not do it; I said very pointedly and emphatically, "That is absurd." Of course I am not repeating the exact words; I am merely giving my memory of a very long conversation. I said to him, "That is absurd. Who is suffering by this thing? Mr. Beecher, your own wife, yourself, all your friends, and the church—they are all suffering, and there is no reason whatever that should prevent your coming out and denying this thing." Then I made some remarks about the gentleman who had told him these stories against Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—The publisher of The Independent?

The Witness—Yes, Sir. I then insisted further that he should make a denial. He said, "Mr. Bell, I cannot make that denial." I said, "Why not?" "Because," he said, "there is something in this thing which prevents me." I said, "What is it?" At this point of the interview I think I remember that I took almost the control of the conversation. He then narrated circumstances or impression, opinions of his in regard to Mr. Beecher's conduct towards Mrs. Tilton, and when he was through with that I said: "Why, even then—even now I cannot see why you should not come out and contradict this matter." He said: "I cannot do so; it would be—there is an underlying truth in this story told by these women, which would make it worse for Mr. Beecher, if I were to come out and contradict it, than if it were let alone; it would be as though I were to go over to New-York and say, 'before Mr. Halliday's house there is a tree, covered with a thousand flags of all nations.' That would be a false statement; and yet there is a tree—there is a grain of truth—there is an underlying truth in this matter which prevents my coming out and contradicting it." It was in that connection that the figure of the tree was used. Then I think I remember saying to him: "What proof is there? We have this thing merely upon your word. You cannot expect us to believe such a story as this without proof." He said: "The proof exists in writing above the signature of Mr. Beecher." "Well," I said, "let us see the writing," bringing down my hand emphatically. I think he said: "I cannot do so; it is not in my possession; I have no objection that you should see it." Then he informed us that Mr. Moulton possessed the writing, and that if we would go—No, I then said: "Will Mr. Moulton let us see the writing?" because I felt if we could see that, it would either explode the whole story, or put us in a position to take intelligent action about it. He said, "I have no idea—" Oh! he said, "I have no objection to your going in your official capacity to Mr. Moulton, and that he should show you the paper." "Well," I said, "I am not an officer of the church; I cannot go in my official capacity; but I am a member of the church, and as such I demand that I shall see the paper." He said: "I will object to Mr. Moulton showing you the paper unless you are an officer of the Church and go to him in your official capacity." Said he: "Mr. Halliday can go; he is assistant minister." I said: "I will object to Mr. Halliday going in his official capacity to see the paper; Mr. Halliday can go as a member of the church as we would go together as members of the church to see it; but I would object to Mr. Halliday going as assistant pastor, because in that way it would be as it were—it would commit the church as it were to his action.

Mr. Evarts—You are now giving us what you said.

Mr. Beach—The substance of it.

The Witness—What Mr. Tilton said to me and what I replied—the substance of it; of course I cannot repeat the words, because it is two and a half years ago.

Mr. Fullerton—Please go on with the narration. A. I was hesitating, thinking.

Q. Take your time. A. Well, Sir; I think I have given you the gist of the long conversation; it was very long, and we went over and over the same matter quite frequently. The latter part—I think for the last two hours of the interview—it consisted in my driving Mr. Tilton to let us see the papers in some way or other.

Q. Well, Sir; if you recollect anything else that occurred there, you may state the substance of it. A. Mr. Tilton went at length into his conduct towards Mrs. Woodhull, in regard to the time previous to the publication of the statement.

Q. Well, what did he say on the subject? A. I think the bulk of it was trying to show that his whole effort through that time—shorter or longer—the time he knew her—was in regard to repressing her in regard to the publication of the scandal.

Q. As she had threatened to do? A. I cannot remember that.

Q. Well, do you remember, on reflection, anything else that occurred at that interview which you have not stated; or have you given us the substance of the whole thing? A. I think I have given you the substance of the whole conversation; I may have omitted something.

Q. Were you ever present at any time when the church, in its official capacity, took action with reference to this scandal? A. I cannot remember distinctly that I was; I have an indistinct remembrance, but not sufficient to be sure.

MR. BEECHER ANXIOUS TO PUT OFF THE DEACONS' MEETING.

Q. Do you remember being present at any time when Mr. Beecher was present, when the subject of the scandal was up for discussion? A. Do you mean by "discussion" discussion with other people, or in meeting?

Q. Well, in meeting, or among yourselves? Was anything ever said in your presence with reference to church action as to this scandal when Mr. Beecher was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State when it was first. A. I think the only time that is distinctly in my memory is on the very morning of this interview at Mr. Halliday's house.

Q. Where did it take place. A. In Mr. Beecher's house.

Q. In Mr. Beecher's house? Who were present? A. Mr. Beecher and myself.

Q. At what time in the day was it—or the morning? A. I think it was before 8 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Inquire whether it was before or after the interview at Halliday's.

Q. Was it before or after the interview at Mr. Halliday's? A. It was before that interview, Sir.

Q. What occurred at the interview between yourself and Mr.

Beecher? A. Mr. Beecher said he had sent for me, because he understood—he had heard, I think, the day before—that there was to be a meeting of the deacons, in regard to this matter; that he was very anxious that no meeting should take place, and he wished me to go and see Mr. Halliday, and arrange with him that the meeting should not take place.

Q. Give us the conversation in detail as near as you can recollect, Mr. Bell? A. It is impossible for me ever to give the words of a conversation.

Q. That is certainly so, Sir; but give us the substance of the interview? A. Mr. Beecher said he had sent for me; I think I have given you about the substance; Mr. Beecher said he had sent for me because he had heard, the day before, that there was to be a meeting of the deacons that night—on that Monday night; that he was very anxious that the meeting should not take place; that he was going away to Boston, and he could not do anything about it, but wanted I should go round to Mr. Halliday's house and arrange with Mr. Halliday that the meeting should be put off, or not take place, I think.

Q. Did you go from there to Mr. Halliday's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was it then you met Mr. Tilton there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton suggest to you any mode of reasoning with the deacons, by which you should prevent the meeting? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he give any other reason for it than you have stated? A. No, Sir.

THE ALARM A FALSE ONE.

Q. Who were the deacons of the church at that time? A. I cannot remember the names; the Manual will give the names.

Q. How many were there? A. It would be the Examining Committee; we sometimes use the word "deacons" when we are really meaning the Examining Committee; at that time the deacons were members ex officio of the Examining Committee.

Q. Well, how many deacons were there? A. I think there were nine deacons and six members of the Examining Committee.

Mr. Evarts—Six besides?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Q. Can you name any of the deacons at that time? A. The only one I know positively—well, I think I am positive about that—was Mr. Hawkins; I know Mr. Hawkins; I think he was Chairman of the Board of Deacons.

Q. Was Mr. Halliday, ex officio, a member of the Examining Committee? A. I think he is a member of the Board of Deacons.

Q. Of the Examining Committee? A. He was a member ex officio—the same as the pastor of the church—of the Board of Deacons; not a deacon, but a member of the Board of Deacons.

Q. Before you left Mr. Beecher, did you say anything in opposition to his suggestion, and if so, what? A. I did not say anything.

Q. You did not. Did you go to see the deacons as you were requested? A. No, Sir.

Q. You went to see Mr. Halliday, however, in pursuance of that request? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything to Mr. Halliday on that subject? A. I told him why I had gone there—after Mr. Tilton had left.

Q. You stated then the request Mr. Beecher had made of you to Mr. Halliday that morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did the deacons meet? A. No, Sir; it was a mistake on the part of Mr. Beecher; I understood from Mr. Halliday that there was to be no meeting of the Board of Deacons.

Q. It was an error? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And they did not meet? A. I don't know that; I was not a deacon and so I could not know anything about that.

Q. Did you have any other or further conversation with Mr. Beecher upon that subject? A. Not at that time, Sir.

Q. At any other time? A. I had another conversation with Mr. Beecher, but I can scarcely say that it was upon that subject; I had not got into the subject.

Q. Was the subject alluded to? A. The subject of his troubles was alluded to; that was all.

Q. When was that interview? A. That was about a fortnight before I went to England; I went to England on the 10th of May, 1878; this was about a fortnight before.

Q. Then it was subsequent to the interview at Mr. Halliday's? A. Oh! yes; about six months.

Q. About six months? A. Five or six months after; one was in November, the other in the last of April or the beginning of May.

Q. Do you still retain your membership in Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you ever an officer of that church? A. Yes, Sir; frequently.

Q. How long a service have you rendered as an officer in that body? A. I never counted up the number of years, Sir; I have been a member of the Examining Committee of Deacons frequently.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts.] You can ask, gentlemen.

MOTION TO STRIKE OUT PART OF MR. BELL'S TESTIMONY.

Mr. Evarts—I now move, if your Honor please, to strike out all the evidence given by this gentleman other than that of his interview with Mr. Beecher. All the rest of his testimony which is of any importance is, of course, his interview with Mr. Tilton, which he has testified concerning. I had not in Court any authority that occurred to me would be useful, but I ask your Honor's attention to the case of Dudley vs. Bolles, in our old Supreme Court, in the 24th of Wendell, p. 471. The Court says [Reading]:

The reception of Bartle's statements in confirmation of his testimony was erroneous. We have recently, in Robb vs. Hackley, 23 Wendell, 80, et seq., reconsidered the dictum to the contrary in The People vs. Vane, 12 Wendell, 78, and agreed that consistent statements cannot in general be received in reply to the contradictions of a witness; a fortiori, are they inadmissible in answer to direct and positive contradiction by other witnesses.

Judge Neilson—Your motion is denied, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—In the case of Robb vs. Hackley, the same Court say [Reading] :

As a general and almost universal rule, evidence of what the witness has said out of Court cannot be received to fortify his testimony. It violates a first principle in person or his property, by the declarations of a witness made without oath. And, besides, it can be no confirmation of what the witness has said on oath, to show that he has made similar declarations when under no such solemn obligation to speak the truth. It is no answer to say that such evidence will not be likely to gain credit, and consequently will do no harm. Evidence should never be given to a jury which they are not at liberty to believe.

Judge Neilson—I think there is a distinction between those cases and the case before us, and your motion is therefore denied.

Mr. Evarts—In this particular, no doubt, the distinction arises that such evidence is not offered in anticipation of contradiction. This objection that I now read from the authorities would apply, if, even after the contradiction of Mr. Tilton, peremptory statements of his were produced.

Mr. Fullerton—We have given the balance of the conversation that has been introduced; that is all, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts.] The motion is denied.

Mr. Fullerton—This question will come up in another form.

Mr. Evarts—Oh! your Honor understands me as excepting; I except to your refusal to strike out.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Evarts]: Do you cross-examine, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. BELL.

The witness was then cross-examined by Mr. Shearman.

Q. At the time of this Deacons' meeting, or meeting of the Examining Committee, was supposed to be about to take place, do you know whether or not any one in the Church had any idea of making an attack upon Mr. Beecher? A. So far as I know, Sir, it was the very opposite.

Q. So far as was within your knowledge there was not the remotest idea on the part of any deacon or member of the Examining Committee of making an attack upon Mr. Beecher, was there? A. So far as I know, no, Sir.

Q. You were very familiar with those gentlemen, were you not? A. Yes, Sir; very.

Q. You were very familiar with the sentiment of the Church, at that time, were you not, Mr. Bell? A. I was.

Q. I think no man more so. We will excuse your modesty, but is it not the fact? A. I was very well acquainted with the sentiment of the gentleman.

Q. Now, Sir, was it not the universal feeling in that church before one word had been said by Mr. Beecher, in church or out of church, on that point, that no action should be taken upon the subject of the Woodhull scandal, but that it should be treated with silent contempt?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

SENTIMENT IN PLYMOUTH CHURCH ABOUT THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

Mr. Shearman—I am talking now about the early part of November, 1872? A. Yes, Sir. My answer to that probably would be given in the fact that the rumor of the Deacons' meeting, which had come to Mr. Beecher's ears, probably arose from a conversation that was held in the lecture room on the Friday night previous, the persons conversing then being Mr. Hawkins, the Chairman of the Board of Deacons, I think, Mr. Shearman and myself. Mr. Shearman and myself both urged upon Mr. Hawkins that, as a fortnight or three weeks had gone by without Mr. Tilton coming out and denying the scandal, it was the duty of Mr. Beecher and the Church to do so.

Q. One moment; I ask you about the early part of November, 1872; now was this not the first sentence of that conversation in the early part of November, 1872? A. If the interview at Mr. Halliday's was on the 18th that would be on the 15th of November; did you ask previous?

Q. That is the middle of the month. I was coming down to that, Mr. Bell. Now, the first point I want to get at is, whether in the early part of November—the first week of November, 1872—it was not the universal sentiment that no notice should be taken in the Church of that publication? A. Immediately on the publication that was the sentiment of the gentlemen who were in the Church.

Q. Since you have referred to a conversation with Mr. Shearman, you perhaps remember that you saw Mr. Shearman at the meeting on the Friday night following that publication, do you not? A. I don't remember; very likely I did; Mr. Shearman was always there when I was.

Q. Don't you remember coming to Mr. Shearman, in the presence of quite a number of the officers and members of the Church on that Friday night, and saying that it was universally agreed that not one word of allusion should be made to that subject in the Church meeting? A. I cannot remember that, Sir.

Q. Can you not remember something like that? A. I cannot remember anything like it. That is, I cannot remember coming to Mr. Shearman then with any statement at all; but that I met Mr. Shearman several times in the first fortnight after the publication of the Woodhull and Claflin scandal I have not the slightest doubt, and that at this meeting that was the course of the conversation.

Q. And that was the general understanding among the gentlemen? A. During the first fortnight it was almost universal.

Q. Then, after that period, and before the other conversation to which you have alluded, it began to be understood, did it not, that Mr. Tilton, or to be rumored that Mr. Tilton was in some way responsible for this publication? Was there not such a rumor? A. It never came to my ears, Sir.

Q. Was there not a rumor that he was responsible for the scandal itself in some way, or for the story or publication? A. Many of us thought very likely he was, but I don't think that we had anything more to base it upon than that.

Q. It was a subject of talk, was it not? A. He was.

Q. The fact—that supposed circumstance was a subject of conversation, was it not? A. No, Sir.

Q. How did you know that many of us thought so, then? A. I think I was present at nearly every meeting of the members of the church and congregation, and there were several took place after the publication of the Woodhull and Claflin scandal, and the concurrent sentiment of the gentlemen of the church at the first was, that the thing must be a lie, that Mr. or Mrs. Tilton would come out and contradict it, and that it was our duty to wait until they did so. After a fortnight or three weeks had passed, and they did not come out and contradict it, then I think it was the sentiment of many in the church, concurred in by yourself, certainly by me, that it was the duty then of the church and of Mr. Beecher to take hold of the matter.

Q. Are you quite sure about Mr. Beecher's name being brought in in conversation with me, Mr. Bell—about Mr. Beecher doing anything? A. Not about Mr. Beecher doing anything, excepting as through the church.

Q. Was it confined to the church? A. I could not say it was; I think not.

WHAT MR. SHEARMAN THOUGHT SHOULD BE DONE.

Q. Now, Mr. Bell, just pause a moment, and think whether in every conversation (since you bring me in every conversation) which I had with you, I did not universally take the ground that Mr. Beecher ought, under no circumstances, to do anything, although I thought that the church ought to do something, and was not that sentiment concurred in by those who talked with you and me? A. Undoubtedly it was, during the first two or three weeks.

Q. No, Sir; and later than that? A. I am not arguing with you, Mr. Shearman. I will answer your questions to the best of my ability.

Q. I ask you to pause, and I will take your recollection? A. I am clearly of the opinion—I am clear in my recollection that the sentiment in the church changed after the first fortnight or three weeks—

Mr. Shearman—Undoubtedly.

Mr. Beach—Wait, wait. Let him express himself. Let him finish his answer.

Mr. Shearman—I don't know about that.

The Witness—Against silence to action, and I cannot clearly remember in regard to your position; but I remember distinctly in regard to myself, that I could not see how any action could be taken by the church, except with the concurrence of Mr. Beecher.

Q. Now, Mr. Bell, you had (I regret to be obliged to make this at all personal to myself)—but you had frequent conversations with me running down to the time of your departure for Europe, had you not, on this subject—had occasional conversations down to May, 1873? A. I cannot recall any; probably I had. I talked with so many members of the church I cannot recall any conversation.

Q. Can you not recall one that I had in the house of Mr. Fitzgerald with you a couple of nights, or one night before you went to Europe? A. If you say I had I have no doubt but it was so,

Sir; I cannot now remember it. If you will give me some point to hang my recollection upon, perhaps it will bring it to me.

Q. You say it was on Saturday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And we had prayer meeting on the Friday night before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which you attended? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you went around to the house of Mr. Fitzgerald? A. I was staying there, being taken in by kind friends.

Q. You stayed there after giving up your house? A. I stayed there after renting my house.

Q. Don't you recollect my calling on you that evening, and talking with you in the front parlor? A. I suppose I had fifty or sixty friends call on me that evening. I should like to say I did remember your calling, but I really do not. No doubt you did, if you say you did.

Q. The point of it is this: I want to know whether there was ever a conversation between you and me, from first to last, in which I took any other ground than this, that Mr. Beecher ought not to do anything about this case himself; that he ought not to have anything to do with it, although I did change my ground after a while, and say that the church or its officers ought to do something with reference to Mr. Tilton? That is the point. A. It is possible you did, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir—

The Witness—If you will allow me to make a little explanation. The conversation with Mr. Hawkins was with this object: to get the Board of Deacons, of which he was Chairman, to take action.

Q. Yes? A. We thought—I thought, and I think that in that conversation you agreed with me, that the deacons did not understand the sentiment of the church in regard to the matter, that by their then delay and fear they were really doing damage to Mr. Beecher and to the church, and I wished to give him courage to bring the matter into the Board of Deacons, so that the deacons would take action and free the church from the stain that was on it.

Q. That is, to give Mr. Hawkins courage? A. To give Mr. Hawkins the courage to inspire the Board of Deacons with the courage to take up the matter and free the church from the stain—that they didn't understand the sentiment of the church.

MR. TILTON TO BE CALLED TO ACCOUNT, NOT MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Sir, was not the idea that was entertained and expressed at that time simply the idea of bringing Mr. Tilton to account, or Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen? A. None of us had the shadow of a thought in our mind that Mr. Beecher was guilty at that time. We could not bring anybody else to account, except somebody else beside him.

Q. This is what I want to come at. Was not this idea that there was to be a Deacons' meeting to be held, necessarily accompanied with the belief that it was intended to be an attack on Mr. Tilton, and not on Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; I think that the idea in our minds as to the necessity of having a Deacons' meeting was in regard to the whole scandal, and freeing the church from the stain.

Q. What was the stain? Was it not the presence of Mr. Tilton in the church that was talked of as the stain? A. No, Sir; it was the charges made in the Woodhull and Claflin paper.

Q. Was it not the thought that a member was supposed to be in the church—that a person was supposed to be a member of the church who was responsible for the stories that was regarded as the stain? A. No, Sir; that we had felt for a year before—or 12 months—18 months before, that Mr. Tilton ought not to be a member of the church, and we felt aggrieved about that; but the special feeling that we had at the time of that conversation on Friday night was consequent upon the publication in the Woodhull and Claflin paper.

Q. Was it not on account of the failure of Mr. Tilton to deny that publication? A. Certainly, because we had been looking for Mr. and Mrs. Tilton to deny it, and they did not.

Q. Was there any one in that church that cared what was said in the Woodhull and Claflin paper independent of Mr. Tilton? A. Certainly, there were a great many—hundreds.

Q. You and I were not among that number, were we? A. Yes, Sir, we were, both of us.

Q. Do you mean to say that any of us attached any importance to what was in that paper, except on account of the failure of Mr. Tilton to deny it? A. I attached importance to that, as I would to any slander, no matter how false it might be, published in a paper of wide circulation, as it goes to a great many people who will not take the pains to investigate it, who will never hear the denial of what their opinions were formed by, and never will uniform them again. I attach importance to every slander that is—

Q. At the time that you and I and the other gentleman agreed that no notice should be taken of this paper, was it not generally understood and talked of between us that over fifty thousand copies of that paper had been sold? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And yet, notwithstanding that, did not we all agree that it was to be treated with contempt? A. Because we understood certainly—at least we expected certainly—that Mr. and Mrs. Tilton would come out and deny it.

Q. And if Mr. and Mrs. Tilton had denied it no one in the church would have attached any importance to it?

Mr. Fullerton—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—That is a mere opinion.

Mr. Fullerton—It is less than an opinion.

Mr. Shearman—This is all matter of opinion.

Judge Neilson—I thought it proper the examination should be very free, but, as it is objected to, I think this question calls for a general estimate, which is not in keeping with the ordinary rules of evidence. I don't think the question is proper.

Mr. Beach—I do not understand upon what principle the sentiment of the Church or the declarations of members of the Church, at a particular period of progress of this scandal, becomes admissible in evidence as against us.

Mr. Shearman—You introduced them.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, we did not introduce them. We introduced the official action of the Church, but the lay understanding and the understanding of the congregation have not been at all referred to on our examination. Still, the subject has been opened by your Honor, and I have submitted to the ruling; but to call from this gentleman for an opinion or judgment in reference to a particular stated case, to a simple supposition of fact—hypothesis—it seems to me is entirely inadmissible, although, from his intelligence upon the stand, I don't know that we make any objection; we are perfectly willing to take it.

Judge Neilson—I thought it was well to learn the general sentiment as far as we have gone, but I don't think that any witness can say upon a certain day the members and the Church would have a certain frame of mind in regard to it. I don't think he can answer that.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is only in the nature of an examination, that proposition we are seeking to prove by him, which may be true or untrue.

Judge Neilson—How can any gentleman say what impression people would have in a certain event?

Mr. Shearman—We can change the form of the question, and see whether the objection will be made to it then. It is not material, in regard to the other matter I am going to suggest, whether objection be made. [To the witness:] I ask you then, Mr. Bell, in place of that question, do I not understand you to say that importance was attached to this paper by the members of the Church only because of the failure of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton to come out and deny it.

Mr. Beach—He answered that question several times.

Judge Neilson—Let him answer it.

The Witness—Importance was attached to the paper at the first on its publication. We had waited from day to day for the expected denials from Mr. and Mrs. Tilton. After a sufficient length of time, in our opinion, had gone by for these denials, then that feeling began to change. The importance of the paper still was not taken away.

Q. Mr. Bell, were you not present at a meeting of prominent members and officers of the Church on the Tuesday evening before this Woodhull scandal became public, when the subject was brought up to notice, and some consideration was had as to what action should be taken? A. Before it was published?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. What do you mean by "before." I didn't know it was going to be published.

Q. Before the paper was actually placed on sale? A. The first I knew of it was—I don't know whether it was on Tuesday, the day on which a gentleman called at my house and asked me to meet others at the Church that evening in regard to this publication. I attended that meeting, if that is the meeting you alluded to. I thought it was Thursday night, but if it was Tuesday—

Q. Mr. Beecher was not present at that meeting, was he? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it not uniformly agreed at that meeting that the true policy of the Church, in meeting and out of it, was not to allude to this scandal at all, and that it would be considered a degradation on our part to do so? A. I don't know about the degradation. I can speak about the policy. It was considered the policy of the Church to take no notice whatever of it.

Q. Was it not put upon the ground that the source from which it came was such as to make it unworthy of attention?

A. That was a part of the ground. There was another reason, however.

Q. The only method that ever was seriously proposed, so far as you know, in the Church, of meeting this scandal when it was proposed to be met, was by some mode of calling Mr. Tilton to account, was it not, or Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen? A. I cannot speak in regard to official action, because I was not a member of the Examining Committee.

Q. But in these talks which were held between officers and members of the Church, such as between Mr. Hawkins, yourself and myself? A. Well, Sir, very soon after that I seemed to fall out of the channels of communication.

Q. I am asking what happened when you were in the channels? A. Well, but I got out of it very soon after that time, so soon that I really cannot tell you in regard to what took place after the first of January.

Q. I was not talking about that; I was talking in reference to this particular time when you say I was not present; that is in November. I am talking specially with reference to this supposed deacon's meeting in November, 1872, which did not take place, and was not going to take place, but was supposed to be about to take place. Now, at that time, my question is, was not all the proposition for action that ever was on foot a proposition adverse to Mr. Tilton? A. I know of no proposition for action whatever at that time.

Q. Then we didn't make any. You know of no proposition or action—that we could not have made any on our part? A. We called upon the Board of Deacons to bring the matter into the Board so that action should be taken upon it.

Q. That would be action? A. You speak of after that time.

Q. No; I speak of this very time. A. I understood you to mean after that time.

Q. I mean at this time? A. I say that after that time I seemed to slide out.

Q. I don't care about after that time, Mr. Bell, whether you slid out; I don't know about that? A. I would not call that a proposition for action, Mr. Shearman. It was telling the Chairman of the Board of Deacons the feeling in the Church—the demand that there was in the Church for action, and trying to give him backbone to bring it into the Board of Deacons, and to give them backbone to carry it through.

Q. None of us had any idea that anything would be done otherwise than by making an attack upon Mr. Tilton, had we? A. I cannot say in regard to that; it was not clear in my own mind how it could be done.

Q. Now, did you not understand Mr. Beecher, in dissuading the holding of this Deacons' meeting, simply to oppose a measure of attack on Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I don't think he indicated that in the conversation, and I didn't understand it from any other source.

Q. The point is whether there was anything on foot in the church at that time which Mr. Beecher could have dissuaded you or others from doing, except something that would have been hostile to Mr. Tilton? A. I suppose any action whatever would have been considered hostile to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Precisely? A. Any action.

Q. Precisely? A. Even against Mr. Beecher personally.

Q. Well, you put in those words "against Mr. Beecher personally," and it obliges me to ask you once again whether it is not a fact that at that time no one of the church, so far as you knew, dreamed of any action against Mr. Beecher personally? A. I do not think they did, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S COUNSELS BEFORE ADVISING SEPARATION.

Q. Now, Mr. Bell, I want to ask you whether you had an interview with Mr. Beecher in November or December, 1870? A. I had frequent interviews with Mr. Beecher, Mr. Shearman.

Q. Did you have an interview in which the subject of Mr. Tilton's family was brought up?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Is it one that has been inquired into?

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no, Sir.

ARGUMENT OF MR. SHEARMAN.

Mr. Shearman—May it please your Honor, I offer this evidence in this point of view. A great deal of evidence has been put in on the other side to show that Mr. Beecher had—well, I was going to say a great deal of evidence had been put in to show that Mr. Beecher had a kind of clandestine relation with Mrs. Tilton, but in reality I can only say truthfully that so little evidence has been put in that there is barely enough to justify me in offering to rebut it; but still something of that kind has been put in. We have also had the question raised—two witnesses have been asked, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton—whether they knew anything about Mr. Beecher's advising a separation, or whether Mr. Beecher ever acknowledged that he had advised a separation between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton. Now, I propose by this witness to show, if I can, that in December, 1870, at the very time when, according to the theory of this prosecution, Mr. Beecher had been maintaining guilty relations with this lady six months, according to the testimony of Mr. Moulton, after he had prayed for help to discontinue those relations, at the very time that Mrs. Tilton was absenting herself from her husband's home—we propose to show that Mr. Beecher was called in to advise upon that question of separation between the husband and wife. Now, one of the very first things that Mr. Beecher did when he was called in to advise—her supposed paramour—as to whether she should separate from her husband, was to call for the advice of his own wife and one of the foremost officers and most respected members of his church. He called upon them to advise upon that question; he called upon them, the very persons who, of all persons on the earth, would have been the last that a guilty man would have asked to advise upon that question. Have I not a right to prove that this witness—as I believe I can prove both of these facts—to prove that Mrs. Beecher was called in to advise upon that question with Mr. Bell, then the Superintendent of the Bethel Sunday-school, then a deacon, then one of the most trusted and honored members of the church, one of the most incorruptible men, who would have struck down Mr. Beecher in a moment if he had known him to be guilty—that he was called in to ad rise upon this very question, as to what part Mr. Beecher should take in a quarrel between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? Why, may it please your Honor, is not that a thousand times stronger indirect proof than any proof that has been offered here short of the alleged confessions? Is not that the testimony of a man's acts. Is not the fact that he goes to one of the foremost members of his church, to a man whose firmness and whose courage and whose independence and truthfulness are known to us all, and known to the whole of Brooklyn—that he went to him for advice on such a question, and took his own wife into counsel with this gentleman upon that question—is not that material to be proved? I submit that it is, and I submit that it goes a long way towards breaking down the foundation of the case which the plaintiff has put forward. They have introduced this question of Mr. Beecher's advice about a separation of husband and wife. They have undertaken to prove that he gave no such advice. They have undertaken to prove by his admissions, either express or tacit, that he never did anything of the sort. Now, I want to show that he did, and this is one of the links in the chain to show that; and what is more, it shows emphatically the persons whom he took into that counsel, and shows the absurdity of supposing that if he had been a guilty man he would have selected those two persons of all there were on the face of the earth.

Judge Neilson—The embarrassment is that you inquire as to interviews and conversation.

Mr. Evarts—I will limit the conversation.

Judge Neilson—A conversation that has not been inquired into by the other side, and of course I am subject to control by the rule. You cannot introduce conversations, except such as have been inquired into by the other side.

Mr. Shearman—Why, may it please your Honor, this is an act of Mr. Beecher's; it is an act, and his words are only to be called in so far as they explain. I concede we cannot call for the whole conversation with Mr. Beecher. I propose to prove simply this, that Mr. Beecher called in this gentleman to consult with his wife and himself, that is, with Mrs. Beecher and himself, with regard to the trouble that there was in Mr. Tilton's family, and to show that the question that was then under consideration was Mrs. Tilton's supposed desire, or half desire, or rather her application for advice concerning the question of separation from her husband.

Judge Neilson—I think I am controlled by the rule that you cannot inquire into an interview or conversation, in respect to which they have not asked any question in their absence. I do not see how I can get over that rule. If it was not for that rule, I should be very happy to hear you, of course.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, you have allowed on other occasions—you have allowed them to prove conversations with Mr. Tilton in the absence of Mr. Beecher, so far as was necessary to show the meaning of an act, to give color to the act. There is a great deal of testimony already in with which Mr. Beecher is in no way connected—a great deal—and it has been admitted in order to give color and form to a specific act.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, after you proved the act.

Mr. Shearman—No, not at all.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; in all cases.

Mr. Shearman—It was all proved on the other side. I am talking of the direct examination.

Judge Neilson—Unless the counsel withdraw the objection, as I recommend them to do, I think I am controlled by the rule that prevents you going into an independent conversation in respect to which they have given no evidence.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, this is the general rule of evidence—and we have insisted upon it ourselves in this trial—that though the opposite party may show conversations of his opposing party, yet, that the party himself cannot introduce his own acts or conversations. That is the general proposition; but when the other side has introduced a situation and a course of action bearing upon, pertinent to, this question, which is the main question, of course, the intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, which is under inquiry here, and when you have that particular state of facts, that it is alleged that in July there came to the knowledge of this husband, plaintiff, an occurrence of infidelity on the part of his wife to her marriage vows, and that Mr. Beecher was her paramour, and that the first notice that we find him bringing of this matter to Mr. Beecher was on this 30th of December, and in the connections there disclosed of his pecuniary and business troubles, following after his demand on Mr. Beecher, on the 26th of December, to retire from the pulpit and from Brooklyn, that comes in as taking place early in that month of December, a separation of this alleged guilty wife from this husband, and a determination to keep separate from him, and a resort to this alleged paramour of hers, her pastor, her friend, the guilty betrayer of her husband's honor, and debaucher of her person; and yet she is the actor in leaving a husband who had such a fact against her, and she resorts to this guilty pastor for advice concerning a question very suitable to present to a pastor, but very unsuitable to present to a paramour; that then that pastor takes it up, and deals with it as a responsible and solicitous matter of advice concerning the relations between a husband and wife in his parish, and makes it, as a pastor should, having a wife, a matter rather to be submitted to her judgment, her solicitude and her affection, towards a woman of the church, and an important, upright, intelligent, clear-headed leader in the church, to meet this unhappy situation, in which a woman needed this delicate and responsible advice. Now, that it is competent for us to show, in the course of Mr. Beecher's relations with this woman, which he will be permitted to disclose from beginning to end, this little occurrence early in December, before the business and pecuniary troubles of Mr. Tilton had raised movement on his part, of a hostile movement of the wife to separate herself from such a husband, and of the counsels that then were resorted to to determine that matter; as Mr. Beecher can testify to that, so any witness that can testify to his action in the face of, and as a part of that situation, can give evidence, as we submit, concerning it.

GENERAL DISCUSSION.

Judge Neilson—You can prove Mr. Beecher's acts in that regard, no doubt.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will try to limit it to that.

Judge Neilson—But it don't relieve me from the embarrassment arising from the rule. You propose to inquire into a conversation in respect to which the other side have made no inquiry.

Mr. Beach—We are embarrassed by the suggestion, Sir, which your Honor makes to us, of the propriety on our part of withdrawing this objection. I do not exactly understand the feeling, Sir, or motive which prompts that advice. I do not know any reason why we should waive a legal and substantial objection to evidence of declarations upon the part of Mr. Beecher, of which we had no knowledge, and in regard to which we can give no proof; and acting, Sir, on behalf of the interests of our client, and judging of the propriety of this evidence as well as we can, with the utmost respect for your Honor's intimation, we do not feel at liberty to withdraw this objection.

Judge Neilson—Well, Mr. Shearman, the question is disallowed.

Mr. Evarts—We will prove the acts, then, of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not within the ruling of the Court, by any means.

Mr. Shearman—Were you called in by Mr. Beecher in the last of 1870, to a consultation with his wife in reference to the affairs of the Tilton family?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take that, Sir, the mere fact that he was called in.

Mr. Beach—What, Sir, upon the subject—upon a certain subject?

Mr. Shearman—Certainly, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Certainly, Sir! I trust your Honor will permit no evasion of the rule.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not pretended, it cannot be pretended that we have instituted any inquiry upon our part as to anything that took place in December, 1870, prior to the 26th day of that month. They are not calling out, therefore, from this witness anything in connection with the testimony that we have given, at all. It is a new subject entirely. It points to another and a different occasion, prior in time to any that we have examined about. Now, even if they had a right to give that interview in evidence, which took place early in December, 1870, to which the witness on the stand was a party, they could only do it in giving their defense to this action, after our case is closed. That rule is familiar with your Honor, and ought to be enforced in this case. But your Honor will perceive that the question in this case is a leading one, as has been suggested by my associate.

Judge Neilson—And embodies the subject matter of the interview.

Mr. Fullerton—It embodies the subject matter of the interview, in the question.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; they get the whole effect of the interview, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I don't ask what was said.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no; you only characterize the interview.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; they ask what Mr. Beecher said about calling him into the conference, and they can get that in no other way, except by getting the declarations of Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—I will overrule the question. I see nothing else to do except that. Go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Evarts—Do you overrule the question?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I understood your Honor to say—

Judge Neilson—I was inclined to, but on the objection being persisted in, I think I am bound to sustain the objection.

Mr. Evarts—I understood your Honor to hold that while the rules of evidence may not entitle us in the present stage of the matter to conversations that occurred, we may prove Mr. Beecher's acts in reference to this matter of the wife's resort for advice on the subject of separation.

Judge Neilson—When that subject comes up, you will be at liberty to recall this witness if you wish to.

Mr. Evarts—The subject has come up, if your Honor please, and in their direct examination.

Mr. Fullerton—There the counsel is mistaken.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the interruption might have been spared if you had heard me. It formed a part of the conversations between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton that were given in evidence by the plaintiffs, to wit, the advice, intervention, that Mr. Beecher had made in these matters of the wife's concern. That was the situation on which Mr. Beecher was approached in the end of December, in relation to Mr. Bowen's affairs with Mr. Tilton, and his relations to this controversy between Mr. Tilton's wife and her husband that had resulted in the separation and the resort for advice; and I think one of the letters in evidence, and put in evidence by the other side, speaks of a conspiracy between Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse to procure a separation between Mrs. Tilton and her husband—two letters produced by them, letters of Mrs. Tilton, I think, brought by her husband as a part, not narrative letters, but letters that were parts of the acts of this drama that was going on, the conspiracy of Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse to get a separation; and it had been made the topic of conversation as to what Mr. Beecher had done, Mr. Beecher's regrets, his fears, his troubles, was all his intervention. It is in evidence, somewhere, that Mr. Beecher said, in one of these conversations with Moulton which they gave evidence of, and with Tilton, which Tilton gives evidence of, that he had done mischief in that regard, if you please, in the view that he then had of the matter, but not so much as some others, meaning Mrs. Beecher. Now, all that being in evidence, we are not to be permitted to prove what the action was in this situation, produced by this wife's separation from her husband and resort to her pastor, and his dealing through a leader of the church, and his own wife, in that question.

Judge Neilson—Or rather, you are not permitted to give an independent conversation had with this witness.

Mr. Evarts—I have not asked the conversation.

Judge Neilson [Continuing]—In respect to which no inquiry has been made.

Mr. Evarts—We have, at last, under your Honor's direction, limited it to the action that was taken by Mr. Beecher, in calling this gentleman into the counsels sought for by this wife.

Judge Neilson—You could not call him in except by word of mouth, or by letter.

Mr. Morris—Will your Honor allow me to inquire what question is before the Court?

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor has abundantly in the course of this trial allowed the question on the precise ground that you could not show how the man was called in, except by showing the word of mouth.

Judge Neilson—This question is overruled, Mr. Evarts.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will note our exception. [To the witness.] Did you become aware, in the early part of December, 1870, of a difficulty between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, in respect to which Mr. Beecher had been in any way consulted?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Beach—We object to that question.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

Mr. Beach—Sir?

Judge Neilson—General knowledge. I think we will take it.

Mr. Beach—General knowledge?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Knowledge derived from hearsay?

Judge Neilson—Yes, it may be. I think we will take that.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor please consider upon what rule you permit a witness to give hearsay?

Judge Neilson—He has been giving it ever since he has been on the stand.

Mr. Beach—Sir?

Judge Neilson—He has been giving it ever since he has been on the stand.

Mr. Beach—Yes, but he has been giving it because the action of the church was so directly connected with very much of the examination that we gave. We went into the proceedings of the church, and in some degree into the history of the actions and intentions of the church authorities, and of the congregation, in regard to that matter. But this presents altogether a different question, may it please your Honor. It asks this gentleman whether he became aware by hearsay and the gossip of this neighborhood, or by the declaration of Mr. Beecher, or Mrs. Beecher, or Mrs. Morse, that there were difficulties existing in the family of Mr. Tilton. Now, your Honor, that is an important question in this case whether or not those difficulties did exist. It is a question of fact to be settled by the ordinary evidence applicable to all issues in a court of justice. Mr. Tilton is not to be condemned for brutality and unkindness in his family; for neglecting the interest of his household circle upon the gossip of the street or the hearsay of Mr. Bell or any other gentleman, however respectable and intelligent. It is a fact, I submit to your Honor, to be established in the ordinary way, and this question in its general form allows this witness to answer as to the basis of his knowledge of a particular circumstance connected with Mr. Tilton which may have been derived from Mr. Beecher or any other person in the highways.

Judge Neilson—And without any personal knowledge.

Mr. Beach—And without the slightest personal knowledge.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, let me hear you in support of your question.

Mr. Evarts—Why, if your Honor please, it does not prove the truth of there having been a difficulty. How often have we had this distinction brought out? In order to get the proof that you are entitled to, you need to show a situation in the mind of a party, not proving that that was a true circumstance but as the precedent inducement to reach the allowable evidence that can be given. I do not say that rumor there was trouble between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton shows there was any trouble; I have never been guilty of such folly as that in this Court or in any other Court. But when I have a right to the actual transaction that occurred, and when as an inducement of that it is that a witness knew there was a story or a rumor that there was a difficulty, and then we lead to the proof; that is the first step, and if it has been done once it has been done a hundred times in this case before your Honor, and on the same rule that your Honor suggested that this was allowable.

Judge Neilson—This witness took no action in the matter, I suppose.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that.

Judge Neilson—It is not suggested that he did.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—I don't know anything that counsel has said that is at all pertinent to the question before your Honor. How did this question arise? "Why," they say, "you proved by Moulton and by Tilton that they never heard from Mr. Beecher of any advice given to him by Mrs. Beecher on the subject of difficulties or separation from her husband, and because you have given that evidence," they say, "we are entitled to prove the action of Mr. Beecher in that direction, showing that he did give such advice; that he called in his wife and this gentleman in consultation as to the character of the advice he should give to Mrs. Tilton. Well, Sir, that was an act which could only have been pertinent, if the evidence was competent, for the purpose of proving the fact of the intervention of this defendant between this plaintiff and his wife, as an explanation of the letters, the apologies and the contrition which Mr. Beecher manifested toward Mr. Tilton. It was to give an occasion and a plea and foundation for those letters, which, we say, impute a certain offense, and which they attempt to modify by showing a relation between them and this intervention of Mr. Beecher. Now, the gentleman is driven from his position. He says: "I don't offer this evidence for the purpose of proving the fact; I don't offer it to establish before this Court and jury that there were these fundamental difficulties between those parties which led their pastor to interfere with advice to the wife hostile to the husband." Now, I don't pretend that they prove that fact. What is the materiality then, Sir? Of what importance to us is it upon this issue whether or not this gentleman understood publicly, by rumor or otherwise, the fact of the existence of these difficulties if the evidence is not to establish the fact itself? In receding from his position the gentleman falls upon the other difficulty of utter immateriality in this case. Now, the gentleman says that this sort of evidence has been given in a hundred instances. Never in one, Sir, in this case. Never has your Honor received this hearsay evidence; never has your Honor permitted proof of unfounded rumor in this case for the purpose of establishing any important and material issue like this, upon this trial. It is of some consequence to us, Sir, whether we are to be scandalized by these rumors which were floating in this community originating from sources of which we know nothing, and whether the rights of this plaintiff in this case are to be sacrificed by the gossip of this community. We asked to be tried here, Sir, upon legitimate evidence admitted by your Honor under the acknowledged principles of law, and we ask your Honor to hold the proof upon both sides in this case to the rigor of those regulations.

Mr. Evarts—My learned friend says—

Mr. Beach—I believe I have the close of the argument.

Judge Neilson—He has a right to make a correction if he desires.

Mr. Evarts—Yes; he says I have receded from something. I have receded from nothing.

Mr. Beach—Well, you are about succeeding to something. Now, the gentleman enforced upon me the rule, Sir, that he had the right to close.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, and you shall have the right after me.

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't ask anything from the concession or indulgence of the counsel in that respect.

Mr. Evarts—Very well; you will take it from your right.

Mr. Beach—What?

Mr. Evarts—You will take it from your right. I am not giving a concession.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Beach.] You have a right to close. Mr. Evarts has a right to make an explanation.

Mr. Beach—Well, it will take him considerable time to make those corrections.

Mr. Evarts—Your right to close don't mean a right to close my mouth.

Mr. Beach—No; that would be an undertaking I would hardly venture upon.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will go on. I say the present question does not undertake to prove the truth of the fact. I do not say that I do not undertake to prove the truth of the fact; I do not undertake to prove it by this question. And when I say a hundred times I mean exactly what I say—not but that it might be a hundred and one, possibly. I mean exactly what I said: that your Honor knows and enforces the rule to be that it is not an objection, that it is hearsay evidence that you are proving a fact by; that you introduce a hearing to a witness of something that had happened, which is proving the fact that he heard it, and then, that fact having been introduced, of its having got into his ears, is the inducement to what follows.

Mr. Beach—Now, your Honor, you have ruled in this case that this interview between Mr. Beecher and this gentleman is not admissible evidence. You have ruled that the declarations of Mr. Beecher made upon an occasion at which we were not present and to which we have not alluded in our evidence are not admissible proof. And yet, you are asked to permit a question which shall allow this witness to found an answer upon the hearsay conversation in the streets between third persons. While you shut out the declarations of Mr. Beecher, all interviews and conversations with Mr. Beecher upon this subject, to which we have made no allusion in our evidence, yet you allow this witness in his testimony to rove with the whole public, and from whatever source he may have received information in regard to a given fact, to detail it in this Court as evidence.

Judge Neilson—Or state the substance or conclusion.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir. Now, I trust your Honor will be consistent in the application of principles. They are founded, Sir, upon reason.

Judge Neilson—That may be difficult.

Mr. Beach—I don't think it is difficult.

THE OBJECTION SUSTAINED.

Judge Neilson—But I must not allow this question, I think on the whole. I would like to see the evidence taken without much technical objection, but this is substantial. I think I cannot allow it. Proceed, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Evarts—Note an exception, if your Honor please.

Mr. Shearman—I ask this question. Mr. Bell, were you called in by Mr. Beecher in the early part of December, 1870, to a consultation between him and Mrs. Beecher, concerning a meditated separation between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Fullerton—Objection, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That is the same question.

Mr. Fullerton—Same thing as has been ruled out.

Judge Neilson—The question is disallowed.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will note us our exception. I ask this question. [To the witness.] Did you not, in the early part of December, 1870, take any part in a consultation with Mr. and Mrs. Beecher, either with or without Mrs. Tilton, concerning a meditated separation of Mrs. Tilton from her husband?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—Note exception.

Mr. Fullerton—Our objection is two-fold, your Honor will remember.

INDEPENDENT CONVERSATIONS MAKE MORE TROUBLE.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Bell, did you have an interview with Mr. Beecher in the last week of the year 1870 or thereabouts, in which Mr. Beecher told you that Mr. Bowen was going to dismiss Mr. Tilton from The Independent and Union on account of certain stories concerning Mr. Tilton unfavorable to his moral character, the substance of which Mr. Beecher then stated to you?

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—Well, independent conversations which have not been inquired into, mere conversations, cannot be received.

Mr. Shearman—One moment, if your Honor please; we offer this for this purpose—the plaintiff has put in evidence certain letters of Mr. Beecher; he has put in evidence a paper to which Mr. Beecher's name appears, though it is not signed by him, and which the plaintiff calls a letter of contrition sometimes—sometimes an apology. Now, that paper and the other similar papers are put in for the purpose of showing that Mr. Beecher was deeply penitent for something. Have we not a right to shew for what Mr. Beecher was penitent?

Judge Neilson—Oh, you will before you get through.

Mr. Shearman—For what he did apologize?

Judge Neilson—Of course.

Mr. Shearman—Have we not a right to show, on cross examination, by their witnesses?

Judge Neilson—No one doubts that you can show that and give it its full weight; but, equally, no one can doubt that you cannot inquire into an independent conversation of this witness on that subject, or any other subject.

Mr. Shearman—How are we to do it?

Mr. Beach—You have got Mr. Beecher to do it with.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beecher gives, of course, on his consciousness and knowledge. But for the frame and situation, concerning which he spoke, that is one thing. Whatever may be proved may be proved by two witnesses, if it may be proved at all, if there are two who can prove it. Now, the substantive fact that Mr. Beecher had in this early part of the last week in December said these things injurious to Mr. Tilton, and prejudicial to his interests, is a fact—it is a fact and act of Mr. Beecher's. It don't prove that Mr. Tilton was guilty of this, that, or the other, but it proves that Mr. Beecher had said to this responsible and important person in the circles in which they both moved, these things, and we are not obliged to depend entirely upon Mr. Beecher's testimony for the proof of these facts. Whether anything will come of the fact is dependent upon subsequent testimony, and we cannot prove everything at once, nor everything by the same witness. Let it be, that nothing comes of this isolated act of Mr.

Beecher. It is an act of his in saying these things to the injury of Mr. Tilton, whether they were true or false, to the prejudice of him to this witness; and that fact stands proved, then, if we are allowed to prove it; and then the rest of our course of proof takes hold of that fact. And it becomes a subject of regret, when Mr. Moulton has removed an impression from Mr. Beecher's mind, that there was any truth in these stories, that he should have done these rash, inconsiderate and injurious acts in respect to his disciple, Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—If the conversation proposed is an act or a fact, then every conversation may be inquired into as an act or a fact, and we overlook a rule which restrains the Court and controls, and cannot be changed except by legislative act, to wit: that you cannot give in evidence a conversation had by your client with a witness in the absence of your adversary, unless they have inquired into that interview.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, if a man's general letter of remorse is to convict him of a crime of arson, shall he not be at liberty to prove that he had committed a crime of burglary, and that was what he was talking about.

Judge Neilson—That is a very different matter.

Mr. Evarts—That is the very thing.

Mr. Beach—It is not as to proving the fact: it is the mode of proving it.

Mr. Evarts—The fault was, saying these injurious things; and it was concerning that that he was speaking—if that is an element in the matter. I am not now arguing the case. It is not to be attributed to me that I say that that is all there was in it. I am to prove my case in the parts of which it consists. Now, that presents it precisely; there is not any difference that one crime is burglary, when they are trying to convict him of setting fire to the dwelling house by general feelings of remorse. This is a fault that a person of a sensitive conscience and a kind heart, no doubt would feel. Your Honor would feel it; every gentleman would feel it, if he, under the provocation of such a missile hurled at him as that message of the 26th of December, under Mr. Tilton's name—had then given body and force to rumors and reproaches against Mr. Tilton, and had advised that they should be executed in stripping him of his employments and then, afterwards, somebody had come and said to him that all those stories were false, and that he should not have given any such advice, and trusted to them. He may have this or that degree of feeling on the subject. It is not for your Honor or for me to measure the course of feeling that a man is led into by finding his course open to self-reproach and contrition. The question is whether I can prove the fact that I wish to interpose as the basis of part of our case. Now, if he had not committed the crime of burglary then it would be impossible to impute generalities of confession to another crime and not to one that he was not guilty of. And here if there had been no such act and fact as this decisive and oppressive forcing against Mr. Tilton of conclusions, or rumors, if you please, then there would not be the opportunity of applying generality of anguish to this or that form of inquiry and not another. And, in order that that may not be imputed as the defect or fault of our case in that regard, and its argument, we propose the existing fact of his having dealt with this witness in this way.

Judge Neilson—Counsel, I think, may appreciate the restraint I feel under in reference to what I understand to be a settled rule of evidence, and in respect to which I have no power or authority, regarding, as I must, this interview with the witness as involving a conversation that has not been inquired into; and the question is therefore overruled.

[To the Jury]: Gentlemen of the Jury, I wish to say that we have been thoughtful enough to send down to Parker's and have the room where you dine warmed, to be comfortable. Persons who ordinarily desire to stay in this room will find it uncomfortable during the recess, because the windows will be all opened; and it will be as near remaining out of doors as possible to stay here.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note my exception. [Laughter.]

The Court then took a recess until a quarter past two o'clock.

THE WITNESS MAKES AN EXPLANATION.

The Court met at 2:15 p. m. pursuant to adjournment.

The Witness, George A. Bell, on taking the stand addressed the Court: If your Honor please, I have remembered other parts of the interview on which I was examined.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to answer.

The Witness—At what point, Sir?

Judge Neilson—At any time.

Mr. Shearman—We are through on the cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—The witness recollects some parts of the interview which he wants to add.

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, Sir.

Judge Neilson—In your own way, Mr. Bell.

Mr. Evarts—It does not come out on our cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—No. It comes out in the way of explanation by the witness.

The Witness—There are one or two points that have come to me during the recess, and they are these.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will understand us as objecting to this on the same ground that we have before stated.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton said, in the interview when I drove him up, in regard to the publication which I insisted he ought to make—he said that Mr. Beecher had committed an offense against his family. These words come to me very distinctly—that Mr. Beecher had committed an offense against his family which he declined to specify or characterize, or some such words as that. He stated also that Mrs. Tilton was pure—using some very strong language in regard to that. I am merely now giving you the things which I remember that I had omitted. He said besides, alluding to the anticipated meeting of the deacons, "If the deacons, or if the Church, want to investigate this thing I am ready, but you had better go to Mr. Beecher, and if he says he is willing that the Church should go on, then go on." That is about the substance of what he said.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. BELL.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Bell, you spoke on your cross-examination of having fallen out of the channels of communication after a certain period. What did you mean by that expression? A. Did I not say channels of information, Sir?

Q. Perhaps so. A. That is just what I meant.

Q. Well, perhaps so. Was that in consequence of your absence from the city? A. No, Sir; because I did not go away from the city until May following.

Q. You were not consulted in regard to it? A. I was not consulted.

Q. What position did you take in regard to the matter prior to the time of your having fallen out of the channels of information?

Mr. Evarts—That we object to—the question of the position that this gentleman had taken. It is of no consequence what attitude he took in the fight, if there was one.

Mr. Fullerton—They have proved public sentiment in Plymouth Church in regard to this matter. They have enjoyed the widest liberty of examination in that respect. Now, if this gentleman fell out of the channels of information after that, I propose to show why it was.

Judge Neilson—Suppose that he had expressed an opinion upon the subject; that would not be material.

Mr. Fullerton—It would, if your Honor please, in my estimation, in regard to this fight in the Church.

Judge Neilson—No; I think not.

Mr. Fullerton—If he advised a certain course should be taken, and others in the Church advised that another course should be taken, that would show the reason why he was not consulted afterwards in regard to the affairs.

Judge Neilson—That may be so as to the reason; but it is not important.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I do not regard it as very important. [To the witness]: You were going on to state, Mr. Bell, that there was another reason for the meeting at Mr. Halliday's house, other than the one disclosed. Am I right in that? A. Another reason for meeting at Mr. Halliday's house?

Q. Yes. I understood you to say upon cross-examination that there was another reason for meeting at Mr. Halliday's house other than the one stated by you?

Mr. Beach—No, I understand him to say. Mr. Fullerton, that there was another reason for the lethargy of the Church, or the refusal of the Church to move during the first two weeks.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, perhaps I was mistaken. Then I have nothing more to ask, because that has been already explained.

Judge Neilson—Is that all from this witness?

Mr. Fullerton—That is all we have to ask.

Mr. Evarts—That is all, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH H. RICHARDS.

Mr. Fullerton then called Joseph H. Richards, who was duly sworn, and was examined as follows:

Mr. Fullerton—Where do you reside, Mr. Richards? A. At Montclair, New-Jersey.

Q. Did you ever reside in this city? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. During what period of time? A. About ten years ago.

Q. How are you, if at all, connected with the family of Mr. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton is my sister.

Q. Have you spent more or less of your time in Brooklyn, since you moved to Montclair? A. Rather less than more, Sir; I have been here seldom.

Q. Were you in the habit of visiting Mr. Tilton's house when you were here in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently? A. Possibly, during the whole time, not to average more than once a month.

Q. During what period? A. The ten years.

THE TILTON HOME A MODEL ONE.

Q. Whilst you were there, Mr. Richards, did you notice, and if you did you will please state to us, what degree of affection existed between the husband and the wife in that family? A. Well, Sir, I always considered that the home of Mr. Tilton was a model home in that respect as in other respects.

Q. Did you ever see anything to the contrary during your visits there? A. Not certainly until the last two or three years.

Mr. Evarts—I understand the rule, if your Honor please, is that it must be limited to the period antecedent to the alleged cause of the estrangement

Mr. Fullerton—Prior to July, 1870—

Mr. Beach—Put it December, 1870.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, prior to December, 1870.

Mr. Evarts—July, 1870, it was alleged.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it was not made known until December, 1870.

Mr. Evarts—It was alleged to be known to the husband in July, 1870.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, prior to July, 1870. [To the witness]: Prior to July, 1870, was that the condition of things in the family according to your observation?

The Witness—Well, Sir, as to my recollection of dates, the precise time I cannot say; but I should think that would be about the time.

Q. Now, as to the treatment of his family by Mr. Tilton, as to providing for them, what can you say as to that, from your observation? A. I should say it was generous. Sir.

Q. And in his daily intercourse in the family, state whether it was kind, affectionate and agreeable? A. So I should state—loving, kind.

Q. How was he for cheerfulness in the family? A. Well, for the most part, I should say he was rather too cheerful, Sir, if anything—fond of joking and punning, sometimes at the expense of others—my own expense sometimes.

Q. All in good nature? A. Yes, Sir.

THE WITNESS'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. How long have you known Henry Ward Beecher? A. I should think about eighteen years, Sir.

Q. Did you see him frequently during your residence in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; but more often in New-York City on business matters.

Q. What business matters in New-York city brought you in connection with him, if any? A. I was publisher of The Independent for eight years, and there I saw him frequently.

Q. During what eight years? A. You puzzle me, Sir, about dates.

Q. As near as you can get at it—I am not particular? A. I should think probably fifteen years ago my connection with The Independent ceased, and prior to that time I saw him, probably, during the eight years prior to that date.

Q. And since you moved to Montclair have you seen him frequently? A. Not frequently. No, Sir.

Q. Where have you been in the habit of seeing him during your residence in New-Jersey? A. I have met him in the street often, and seen him occasionally at my sister's house.

Q. Mrs. Tilton's? A. Mrs. Tilton's; I should think that would confuse them all, Sir.

Q. How often did you see him at your sister's house? A. I cannot say, Sir.

Q. Give us an estimate, as near as you can, of the number of times? A. Well, it would be difficult to state; I should think probably five or six times in the course of those years.

Q. And when did that occur—during what years? A. Well, I probably met him first when the family lived in Oxford-st. If you can give me that date, Sir, it will recall the time when I met him in Brooklyn at their house.

Mr. Fullerton—That is already in evidence.

Mr. Beach—1862, or about 1862, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—And when again? A. More often in Livingston-st., probably.

Q. Where they resided up to the time that she left her husband's house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you there when you saw him visiting your sister or calling upon her? A. Was I calling upon her?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What times in the day have you seen Mr. Beecher there? A. I recollect of seeing him there in the forenoon of the day; I don't know how often at that time.

Q. How early in the forenoon? A. Probably as early as eleven o'clock.

Q. And how often as early as eleven o'clock have you seen him there? A. I do not recall but one time, Sir, I think.

Q. And when you saw him there at other times, what time of the day was it, if you remember? A. In the afternoon, probably.

Q. And where did you see him—in what part of the house? A. In the parlor of the house, I think, Sir.

Q. In every instance? A. I don't recall any other locality; possibly it might have been.

Q. State whether Mr. Beecher was in the house when you went there, or whether he arrived after you arrived? A. I cannot state so in every instance; I can state I went there on one occasion and found him there; as to the others I cannot remember.

Q. What was the condition of Mrs. Tilton's health at the time of these respective calls of Mr. Beecher? A. I don't remember any other condition but that of good health.

Q. Was any other person in the parlor with them when you saw Mr. Beecher, and, if so, whom?

Mr. Evarts—When?

Mr. Beach—On any occasion.

Mr. Evarts—On all the occasions.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, I embrace the whole.

The Witness—I don't remember; possibly there might have been other persons present.

Q. But you do not remember? A. I do not remember; no, Sir.

THE WITNESS DEPLORES HIS POSITION.

Q. Now, at any time when you saw Mr. Beecher at the house of Mr. Tilton in company with Mrs. Tilton, did you see anything exceptional in their conduct or intercourse, and, if so, state what it was?

The Witness [turning to the Court]—Will you allow me to say, your Honor, that in some way, by the exigencies of this case, I am brought to appear in a cruel position. I did not seek this position. I am here from dire necessity, and very reluctantly testifying. This lady is my only sister, and I esteem her as we all esteem our sisters.

Judge Neilson—I recognize that, Sir; the position may be hard; but still you must yield to the requirements of the case, and state what you know.

The Witness—What is the question, Sir?

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer repeated the question.]

The Witness—In answering this question I don't think I can answer it in justice to myself, unless I should put what I saw in connection with other things, with other things that I had heard about Mr. Beecher in my long knowledge of him. What I saw might not be of any special moment, aside from these other things, and it may not be of any moment at all, in any view.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—The counsel will instruct him.

Mr. Evarts—Here is a witness asked what he saw, and he proceeds to give instructions as to what he saw not being of much importance, unless he is allowed to connect it with other thing he had heard.

Judge Neilson—The counsel does not ask for that.

Mr. Evarts—No; but I certainly never have heard anything like that from a witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Probably you never saw a witness placed in such a position before.

The Witness—Precisely so; but if you will place yourself in my position—

Mr. Evarts—Oh, I will be able to show what your position is by and bye.

SUSPICIOUS POSITION OF MR. BEECHER AND MRS. TILTON.

Mr. Fullerton—I will give you that chance very soon. [To the Witness.] Now, Mr. Richards, please to state what you saw there in the house of Mr. Tilton, that was exceptional in the character or conduct of Mr. Beecher and your sister? A. Well, Sir, on this occasion I spoke of seeing them in the morning—this one occasion. I called at the house, and was in the upper story—the second story, I think. I descended to the parlor floor and opened the door of the parlor, which was closed, and I saw Mr. Beecher seated in the front room, and Mrs. Tilton making a very hasty motion, and with highly flushed face, away from the position that Mr. Beecher occupied. It was such a situation as left an indelible impression on my mind—that is all, Sir—in relation to other matters.

Q. What season of the year was that in? A. I cannot recall the season, Sir.

Q. Have you no way of letting us know whether it was in the Winter or Summer season? A. I do not see how I can be able to—no, Sir.

Q. Can you tell the year when you saw this? A. No, Sir.

Q. With reference to the ages of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, would you be able to fix approximately the time when you saw this? A. No, Sir; I cannot recall the ages of my own children except from a memorandum I carry in my pocket.

Q. Was it as early as 1868? A. I don't think you can aid me, Sir, in that matter, in the recollection of dates.

Q. Well, was it a number of years ago? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could you tell me whether it was between 1868 and 1870? A. It probably was prior to 1870.

Q. And where did Mr. Tilton live at the time—where was his residence? A. In Livingston-st. ; I think 174 is the number.

Q. Will you state whether it was an unusual thing, so far as you observed, that the parlor doors should be shut as they were shut on that occasion? A. I cannot state, Sir; I do not know what the habits of the house were in that regard.

Q. How long had you been in the upper part of the house before you came down and witnessed this? A. I don't remember these side facts about it. I simply called there in the morning, as I had to, living out of the city ; I usually called in the day-time.

Q. Can you tell us whether Mr. Beecher came to the house before or after you did? A. I cannot say, as I was up-stairs.

Q. You don't remember of having seen him on your way up-stairs? A. No, Sir.

Q. In what part of the parlor was Mr. Beecher sitting when you first opened the door? A. About opposite the entrance—the front room ; about opposite the front entrance.

Q. And how far was Mrs. Tilton from Mr. Beecher when your eye rested upon them? A. Well, she was not far, Sir ; in the act of moving ; as I opened the door there was a moving away from the position.

Q. Moving away from Mr. Beecher? A. From Mr. Beecher—yes, Sir.

Q. And in what direction was she moving? A. Towards the front window.

Q. Did you remain in the parlor any time? A. Not long, Sir. Mr. Fullerton—I believe that is all, Sir.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. RICHARDS.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Richards, were you subpoenaed here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when? A. [Looking at subpoena]. This is dated the 18th day of February.

Q. My question was, when you were subpoenaed—when it was served upon you? A. On that day, I presume, Sir.

Q. What is your business now? A. I am an advertising agent.

Q. Where do you carry on your business? A. No. 245 Broadway.

Q. When did you speak of this occurrence, and to whom? A. I think I spoke of it first to my wife.

Q. And when did you speak of it to any of the parties to this case? A. I think the day before yesterday.

Q. Now, Sir, what did you say to Mr. Beecher, or Mrs. Tilton when you went into the room? A. I greeted them, Sir, as was my custom; I shook hands with Mr. Beecher, I think, who remained seated.

Q. Had you seen your sister before that morning? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you come into the house in the usual way, without being announced or introduced to the family at all? A. I used to have free range of the house, Sir, as far as that is concerned.

Q. I asked you exactly that question—whether you came in that morning in the usual way? A. That is exactly as I replied, Sir; I came in in that way.

Q. The usual way? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you went up-stairs to your own room, was it? A. I had no room there, Sir.

Q. Well, what room? A. Probably the second story front room.

Q. With what object? A. To see any one who was to be seen.

Q. Was that the usual and ordinary place that you would expect to find your sister? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it this room that had folding doors between it and the bedroom that you went to, expecting to find her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was the ordinary place? A. The sitting room.

Q. The sitting room where you would expect to find your sister, or any family visitor would expect to find your sister? A. I presume so.

Q. Have you said what time of day this was? A. I think about 11 o'clock.

Q. And had you any particular business there, or only a call? A. Simply a call.

Q. Simply a call. And immediately on finding your sister was not up-stairs, did you come down to the parlor? A. It may not have been so; I may have found some of the children there, and talked to them a little; I do not remember as to that.

Q. And did Mr. Beecher leave before you left the parlor? A. No, Sir; I left before he did.

Q. And did your sister leave with you, or did she remain? A. My impression is she remained; I think I did not leave the house at once; I went up-stairs again.

Q. When you left the parlor? A. The parlor; Yes, Sir.

Q. Leaving your sister there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then you went up-stairs? A. I am not sure as to that; probably I did; I do not remember.

Q. I don't know anything about "probably;" did you or not? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Did you immediately leave the house, or go somewhere in the house where you had some detention or occupation of some kind? A. I have replied that I do not remember.

Q. You do not know, but you immediately left the house when you left the parlor? A. Yes, Sir; I may have done so.

Q. But your impression is to the contrary? A. No; I have no distinct impression; it is vague; I may or may not.

Q. Do you remember seeing your sister again on that day? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then, as I understand you, so far as you have any knowledge, you retired from that room leaving your sister and Mr. Beecher there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And left the house? A. I don't know as to that.

Mr. Evarts—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Wait a moment; I want to ask one or two questions—one moment.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. RICHARDS.

Mr. Fullerton—Have you been subpoenaed more than once in this case, Mr. Richards? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently have subpoenas been served upon you? A. Four times, I think.

Q. When was the first? A. I think the first must have been three or four weeks ago.

Q. And, since that time, up to the 18th—if that is the date of your present subpoena—? A. [Interrupting]. Yes; I think this was the last one.

Mr. Fullerton [resuming]—Subpoenas were served upon you from time to time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have been asked when you first spoke of this occurrence which you have related. Did you speak to any one in consequence of what you saw there, without relating the occurrence?

Mr. Evarts—I object. I have not introduced that; I have not introduced any new inquiry. My question was, when he first spoke of this occurrence, and to whom; as I have said to his wife.

Mr. Fullerton—I have a right to show whether he spoke to any one else.

Mr. Beach—The counsel put a question, when he first spoke to any one of this occurrence.

Mr. Evarts—I asked him when he first spoke of it, and to whom; and he said to his wife; and I then asked him when he spoke to any parties in this case, and he said the day before yesterday. Now, there is nothing in that to permit of this inquiry on the re-direct.

Judge Nelson—It is only on the idea that there may be some correction.

Mr. Fullerton—We want it to appear when he first spoke to any one in regard to this matter which he has stated.

Mr. Evarts—That is proper; but the question is not that; the question is whether he spoke to any one in consequence of that occurrence. That is not called out by my inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—Does the gentleman mean to say that I am concluded by what he drew out on the cross-examination, as to the first person to whom he spoke of this occurrence? I take it not.

Mr. Evarts—Unless he spoke to Mr. Beecher it is no part of their right of direct examination.

Judge Neilson—Yes, that is so. Now, then, there is no right on your part, unless it is by way of correcting something that has been brought out on a wrong interpretation.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is just that.

Judge Neilson—Well, then, ask the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I have asked the question.

Mr. Evarts—No, you asked if it was not in consequence of this occurrence that he spoke to somebody.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, and did you speak to that somebody before you spoke to—whoever it was, day before yesterday? A. I am a little mixed, Sir, as to the question.

Mr. Evarts—Why, the witness has stated that he spoke to his wife.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—When did you speak to your wife about it? A. The day it occurred, I think, Sir.

Q. Where was she on that day? A. She was at my home in Montclair.

Q. You went home that day, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you tell her what you had seen? A. I think I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you speak to any one else in regard to it after that?

Mr. Evarts—That we object to, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take that.

A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Q. To whom? A. To my brother-in-law.

Q. Who was he? A. A Mr. Baker.

Q. When did you speak to him about it? A. During the progress of this trial.

Q. How long ago? A. Probably a month ago.

Q. Well, did you say anything to Mr. Tilton in regard to it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you say anything in consequence of what you had seen, even if you did not tell what you had seen? A. I don't remember, Sir, having any such.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Mr. Richards.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Robinson, will you take the stand, please?

TESTIMONY OF JEREMIAH P. ROBINSON.

Jeremiah P. Robinson sworn on behalf of the plaintiff.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Robinson, do you reside in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A member of the firm of Woodruff & Robinson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And a partner of Francis D. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. Henry Ward Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been acquainted with him; how long have you known him? A. I do not think I have been acquainted with him, to speak with him—speaking acquaintance—more than a couple of years.

Q. How long? A. Two years, probably.

Q. Well, that would carry it back to 1873. Do you recollect whether it was in that year that your speaking acquaintance commenced? A. I think it was about that time, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S INTERCOURSE WITH MR. MOULTON DESCRIBED.

Q. Under what circumstances did you become acquainted with him? A. I think that I met him at Mr. Moulton's house first.

Q. Do you recollect the season of the year? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. Who else was there when you met him there? A. I do not remember that, Sir.

Q. Did you meet him there more than once? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently? A. Well, I saw him—I have seen him there before I was acquainted with him. I have seen him come in and go out.

Q. How frequently? A. Well, I cannot say. A number of times when I happened to be at Mr. Moulton's.

Q. What was the condition of Mr. Moulton at the time that you met Mr. Beecher there—as to health I mean? A. I saw Mr. Beecher there once when Mr. Moulton was sick.

Q. Now, do you refer to his sickness in the early part of the year 1871? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was in January, 1871.

Q. How frequently did you see Mr. Beecher there during that sickness? A. I do not remember, Sir, but I do not think I saw him many times.

Q. Had you seen him there prior to that sickness? A. I do not think I had, Sir. I do not remember. I did not know Mr. Beecher then very well; I only saw him. I knew him by sight.

Q. Mr. Moulton went, in the early part of 1871, South, did he not—or some time? A. After that sickness, I think he went South.

Q. And after his return from the South, did you meet him there. A. Mr. Beecher?

Q. Mr. Beecher. A. I saw him there afterwards, but I do not know how soon. I have seen him there since then, though.

Q. How frequently, after the sickness, did you see Mr. Beecher there? A. In July, 1871, I left the country, and was absent a year and a half. I do not remember whether I saw Mr. Beecher there many times, or hardly at all after Mr. Moulton's sickness. I do not remember that.

Q. And before you left? A. No, Sir. I did see him there during that sickness.

Q. In Mr. Moulton's sick room? A. I think I saw him once there in the sick room, as I passed in or out.

Q. Did you ever meet Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher in the street, at any time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. I think it was the last 4th of July, Sir; on Sunday, at any rate.

Q. In 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where in the street did you meet them? A. I met them on Montague-terrace, where I live.

Q. Walking together, or standing together? A. They were walking together. They stopped when I met them.

Q. You met them; they were going in one direction, and yourself in another? A. I started to go from my house to visit a friend. As I went from my steps—the stoop of the house—they came around the corner of Remsen-st. to Montague terrace, together.

Q. When you met, they stopped, you say? A. They crossed over to meet me, as I supposed—they did, at any rate, near the sidewalk of the next house to mine.

Q. Now, Mr. Robinson, relate what occurred after you met, and before you separated? A. I exchanged salutations—

MR. BEECHER'S REGARD FOR MR. MOULTON.

Q. A little louder, please. A. I exchanged salutations with Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton, and as near as I can remember, Mr. Moulton said to me that he had not seen me for some time. I had returned from the country the day before, and I think that he had been away before that, but that I do not remember definitely. At any rate, he said that he had not seen me for some time. I said, "No, but I have been visible; you could have seen me if you had wanted to." It was in a joke; and said he: "Do you think I didn't want to see you." Said I, "You said that, I didn't." Mr. Beecher says: "Don't be too hard on my friend Moulton."

Q. A little louder. A. Mr. Beecher replied, "Don't be too hard on my friend Moulton." Says I, "No, Moulton is a good fellow." Said he, "Moulton is as good a friend as God ever raised up for a man," I think that was the expression; and that "If it were not for him, I don't know that I would be a live man." That is all, except a good-bye, and I went along, and they went along. They went their way, and I went another.

Q. That was on the 4th of July, 1874? A. That was on the 4th of last July, I think—on Sunday. The 4th of July was on Sunday, wasn't it?

Q. And at what time of the day? A. It was, I should think, between one and three o'clock. It was after I had my dinner, and was going out to visit a friend.

Q. What was the attitude of Mr. Beecher when he made use of the expression which you have given to us? A. I think he laid his hand upon Mr. Moulton's shoulder.

Q. Now, at what particular moment did he lay his hand upon his shoulder, with reference to what he said? A. The expression in regard to his being his friend.

Q. When he made use of that expression? A. Yes, Sir; he put up his hand on Mr. Moulton's shoulder.

Q. Was it only upon his shoulder? A. I think that is all Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. ROBINSON.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Robinson, how many days have you attended as a witness in this Court? A. How many days have I been here?

Q. Now, Sir, as a witness. A. I was here yesterday afternoon, day before yesterday morning, and about an hour and a half the day before that.

Q. Yes; and last week and the week before? A. I have not been here before, Sir.

Q. Oh!

Mr. Fullerton—Well, do you deny that, Mr. Evarts?

Mr. Evarts—Oh! no; Mr. Robinson has been here a good many times.

Mr. Fullerton—Just exactly as many times as he has stated.

Mr. Evarts—I have no doubt he stated it correctly.

Mr. Beach—You seemed to express a doubt.

The Witness—I would not have come at all if I could avoid it.

Mr. Evarts—No; I suppose not. Now, Sir, is Mr. Moulton or Mrs. Moulton any connection or relative of yours? A. Mrs. Moulton is.

Q. What connection? A. She is a niece of mine, Sir.

Q. Has your partnership with Mr. Moulton been lately dissolved? A. It is not dissolved yet, Sir—the partnership of the firm. The warehouse business has been withdrawn from the firm. The leases terminated on the first of January, and I owning the property and Mr. Woodruff owning others, we withdrew—the leases terminated, and we have withdrawn that part of the business from the firm.

Q. Dissolved, then, as of the first of January?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, no!

Mr. Beach—He tells you it was not dissolved.

Mr. Evarts—In respect to that part of the business? A. Yes, Sir; the warehouse business.

Q. Now, Sir, in what business does any connection still continue, and of what durability is any present connection? A. The merchandise business is still continued.

Q. With a term fixed for the termination of that also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When does that terminate? A. The first of March next.

Q. Wasn't it originally fixed to terminate on the first of February? A. The first of this last February?

Q. This present February. A. Originally fixed?

Q. Yes, Sir, originally; when you dissolved as to part wasn't the connection that was retained originally fixed to dissolve on the first of February? A. Not originally. The first dissolution that was fixed upon was fixed upon a year ago last February, to take place, if we could arrange our business so that it could terminate then, on the first of May or June last.

Q. Of last year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, I am not talking about that. That is all right. A. No; but the answer to the original—

Q. Now, you did have a present termination of some part of your connection on the first of January; that you have stated. Now, wasn't it a part of that arrangement which terminated a part of your business relations on the first of January, that the whole of your business relations were to terminate on the first of February—the present February? A. It was to terminate on last February.

Q. This February? A. There had been an arrangement that it should terminate then.

Q. This present February? A. Yes, Sir; but there had been an arrangement at January, too, and last August and September, but that was with reference to arranging our business.

Q. And now the arrangement is, that it is to terminate wholly on the 1st of March? A. The 1st of March, unless there is some reason for postponing it again.

Q. Yes, Sir; unless it is changed? A. Yes, Sir; there is a definite understanding that it shall terminate then.

Q. Now, was it at Mr. Moulton's request that the full termination of your connection was postponed from the 1st of February to the 1st of March?

Mr. Beach—I don't see the importance or propriety of this.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it.

The Witnesses—The question again, Mr. Evarts, if you please.

Q. Was it at Mr. Moulton's request that the full termination of your connection as partners should be postponed from the 1st of February to the 1st of March? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it at his request that the full termination of your connection was not completed on the 1st of January, but in part it was postponed to the 1st of February? A. Yes, Sir; I think it was.

Mr. Evarts—That is all, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all, Mr. Robinson. Mr. William Brasher.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM M. BRASHER.

William Marston Brasher, sworn on behalf of the plaintiff.

Mr. Fullerton—Where do you reside? A. 198 Livingston street.

Q. In this city? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long have you resided there? A. 40 years.

Q. Do you know the parties to this action? A. I do, Sir.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Henry Ward Beecher? A. Ever since he came to Brooklyn, Sir.

Q. Have been on speaking terms with him during that period? A. No, Sir.

Q. But familiar with him? A. I have been introduced to the gentleman.

Q. Met him often? A. No, Sir; but once.

Q. I mean in the street? A. Oh yes, Sir.

Q. So that you recognized him when you saw him, easy? A. Always.

Q. And you were acquainted also with Mr. Tilton, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You knew where his residence was in Livingston street, did you? A. I passed it six times a day.

Q. And you knew where his residence was in Oxford street, before he removed to Livingston street? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. I want to ask you whether you ever saw Mr. Beecher at Mr. Tilton's house in Livingston street? A. I never was in Mr. Tilton's house, Sir.

Q. Very likely. That would prevent you from answering my question, Mr. Brasher? A. I thought you meant whether I met him there, Sir.

Q. No, Sir; if you ever saw him there? A. Yes, Sir, I have seen him on the stoop.

Q. How frequently? A. I have seen him enter and go out several times.

Q. Give us some idea of the number of times, if you please? A. I cannot be definite on that subject.

Q. Be as definite as you can? A. Say, four or five times.

Q. And when did you see him go in and come out? A. At different hours of the day.

Q. How early and how late in the day? A. I never recollect but once that ever made an impression on me, and that was early in the morning.

Q. How early in the morning? Q. Well, it is so long ago, Sir, that I cannot fix the time.

Q. Give it, as near as you can, Mr. Brasher? A. I can only tell you I was going a fishing and it struck me to be an unusual time for a gentleman to be visiting.

Q. Well, give us some idea of the earliness of the hour. A. I cannot recollect the time, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Give it as near as you can.

Mr. Fullerton—As near as you can get at it? A. Well, it was after breakfast, or about breakfast time.

Q. And what season of the year was it? A. It was in the Fall.

Q. Do you think it was after breakfast? A. I cannot be positive about that.

Q. Can you say that it was not before breakfast? A. I cannot.

Q. In which direction were you going? A. Towards Court street.

Q. You were going fishing, you say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With your yacht? A. I was going toward my yacht.

Q. Well, you were going fishing with your yacht? A. I was going aboard of my yacht.

Q. Well, after you got aboard, you were going a fishing with your yacht? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time did you usually start to go fishing? A. I went all times of day and night.

Q. Well, when you started early in the morning, what time did you start? A. Two o'clock in the morning, sometimes.

Q. Now, Mr. Brasher, I want you to tell this jury as near as you can, at what hour in the morning you saw Mr. Beecher there? A. I would do so with pleasure, Sir, if I knew the hour, if I could fix it.

Q. As near as you can, is my question? A. It was about breakfast time, I think, that morning, because the sun was bright and clear, and looking toward me it dazzled him; it fell in his eyes so that he turned away; he turned his head.

Q. And where was he at the time you saw him? A. He was standing on the stoop.

Q. What do you mean by breakfast time? A. I take breakfast at six o'clock, Sir, in the Summer.

Q. What time did you take breakfast at the time that you saw Mr. Beecher? A. I could not state, Sir.

Q. Well, as near as you can recollect? A. I cannot recollect, for many reasons.

Q. You are sure you had your breakfast that morning? A. I am not sure, Sir.

Q. Well, then, it may have been before breakfast? A. I sometimes take my breakfast aboard the yacht.

Mr. Beach—What is his best recollection?

Mr. Fullerton—I am putting that very question, my dear Sir. Give us the best impression now, Mr. Brasher, as to the time when you saw Mr. Beecher there on the stoop? A. Well, I would not like to state a time, for I cannot recollect. I have tried my best to fix that date, and I cannot do it.

Q. I know, Mr. Brasher, you cannot do it; I understand that, because you told me so, and I take it for granted, of course, that it is so. A. I am under oath, Sir.

Q. Certainly, Sir; I have great respect for your candor, but tell me, according to your best impression, what was the hour? A. I should think it was between seven and eight o'clock. That is the best recollection I have.

Q. Very well, that is satisfactory. A. It was early.

Q. And can you give us now your best impression as to the season of the year when it was? A. In the Fall, Sir.

Q. Well, there are three months in the Fall season; can you tell which month it was in, Sir? A. I met Mr. Beecher so frequently in that location that it is beyond any man's memory to place it.

Q. Very well. Now, how frequently did you meet him in that location? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. Give us some idea of it? A. Fifty times.

Q. During what period of time? A. All the time that I lived there.

Q. That was in Livingston-st.? A. Somewhere in that neighborhood; he was either coming or going from there.

Q. And where did he reside during that period? A. I think on the Heights, or somewhere near there.

Q. How far from Livingston-st., where you saw him? A. It is three-quarters of a mile.

Q. Was he in the act of going in the house or coming out of the house? A. He was standing on the stoop, Sir.

Q. And did you pass by leaving him on the stoop? A. Yes, I passed him while he was on the stoop.

Q. How near was he to the door? A. I should think he was about half way between the door and the edge of the stoop.

Q. Looking out toward you? A. He appeared to turn just as I came up to him. The sun was in the East and I was going to the West.

Q. And did he stand there until you passed by? A. I think he did.

Q. Did you speak with him? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you salute each other? A. No, Sir.

Q. You had a speaking acquaintance with him at that time? A. No, Sir; I never spoke to him but once; then I was introduced to him on a Fulton ferry-boat.

Q. Since that time, was it? A. No, Sir; but once.

Q. Well, but was it since that time? A. Oh! my, yes; years afterward.

Q. Did you, before you got out of sight, see where Mr. Beecher went? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you look around after you passed by? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see Mr. Beecher there at any other time in the morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long before or after the occasion which you have testified to? A. Well, I have seen him there at different times through the day. That was the only day that I ever took any notice of it.

Q. That is, you mean special notice, I suppose? A. Special notice; yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you see him at other times—on the stoop or in the house? A. I have seen him talking with Mr. Tilton at the gate.

Q. Where else have you seen him? A. In that neighborhood.

Q. Going in or coming out? A. Yes, I have seen him several times, going in and out, but mostly in the street.

Q. How, Sir? A. Most frequently in the street.

Q. Near the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see him upon the stoop at any other time than that you have named? A. I have said four or five times.

Q. On the stoop? A. Either going in or coming out.

Q. How many times did you see Mr. Tilton with him. A. Only once, Sir.

Q. That was at the gate? A. That was at the gate.

Q. At what hour of the day did you see him going in or coming out? I do not speak now of the occasion when you have fixed the time. A. I cannot recollect, Sir; different times.

Q. When you were going fishing? A. It might have been on some other occasions.

Q. Do you recollect seeing him at any other time in the fore part of the day? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see anything peculiar in his demeanor whilst he was there? A. Not in the least, Sir.

Q. When you saw Mr. Beecher there early in the morning, do you know whether Mr. Tilton was there or not? A. I do not.

Q. And you have no means of ascertaining that fact? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts.] You can ask.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. BRASHER.

Mr. Evarts—How many days have you attended as a witness in this case? A. I have been here three days to-day. I have been very much annoyed in my business. I was detained from going to Washington and kept here.

Q. To give this evidence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Brasher, during how many years is it that the four times have happened in which you saw Mr. Beecher going into or coming out of this house? A. Several years, Sir—four or five years probably.

Q. All the while you lived there in Livingston street? A. Yes Sir.

Q. What was this year he lived in Livingston street? A. From 1864 to the present time.

Q. From 1864 to the present time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in that period of time you have seen Mr. Beecher go in or out of that house four times? A. Four or five times.

Q. And the only noticeable hour of those visits was between seven and eight o'clock in the morning, was it not? A. as near as I can recollect.

Q. As near as you can fix it. Now, Sir, I think you have been unable to define the part of the Fall—the month, or any nearer time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the year, have you been able to give that? It may have been in the years between 1865 and 1871, we will say, may it not? A. I don't think Mr. Tilton lived there when I first went there in 1864.

Q. Ah! 1866 he went there. Any time between 1866 and 1870, it might have been? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you cannot give it any nearer than that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, when were you first introduced to Mr. Beecher? A. I cannot recollect that; it was on board the ferry-boat, and I forget even who introduced me.

Q. Within how many years back? A. It must have been twelve or fifteen years ago.

Q. Then you had not been introduced to him before that? A. No, Sir.

Q. And had no other acquaintance with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, do you know whether Mrs. Tilton was at home that morning? A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether she was in town that morning? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Beecher went to see Mr. Tilton or Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know anything about it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Except that it was between seven and eight o'clock in the morning that you saw him on the stoop? A. I cannot mention the time. I think they asked me.

Q. And it occurred to you it was an early hour for a call? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you know whether Mr. Beecher had come from Washington that morning? A. No, Sir.

Q. And had called to see Mr. Tilton on that errand? A. No, Sir.

Q. You didn't know that? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That is all, Mr. Brasher.

Mr. Beach—Did you state the year in which this occurred? A. No, Sir.

Q. And did you say that you could not? A. I could not do it.

Mr. Evarts—He says it might have been any year between 1836 and 1870.

The Witness.—The time I lived there.

LEGAL HOLIDAYS DISCUSSED.

Judge Neilson—I wish to inquire of the counsel, in view of the health of the juror, whether we are to sit on Monday—what is the rule—Washington's birthday?

Mr. Evarts—I suppose we have no right to.

Mr. Beach—I suppose we have, but if it is at all for the convenience of the jurors, or anybody else, we shall make no objection.

Judge Neilson—I would like to inquire for information.

Mr. Evarts—Is not the 22d of February a legal holiday?

Judge Neilson—Made so as to commercial paper and the like. That is a matter in which we have no interest.

Mr. Fullerton—I think we had better send for the statute.

Mr. Evarts—I had an idea it was a legal holiday.

Judge Neilson—Send for the statute.

Mr. Beach—The statute making it a holiday confines it entirely to commercial paper, as your Honor sees; but I had a recollection that there was a general statute which forbade the holding of court on that day.

Judge Neilson—There is a provision inserted in the statute that the clerk's office must be closed on that day; I would like to learn how that is.

Mr. Evarts—I don't think the counsel have any wish not to sit on that day, or any special wish to sit.

Judge Neilson—Then we can determine to-morrow, from the way the juror feels.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Evarts—And we will look at the statute in the meantime.

Judge Neilson—Well.

A RESERVED QUESTION IN THE EXAMINATION OF MR. TILTON.

Mr. Beach—I now bring up the question which your Honor suggested a while ago—a reserved question in regard to the omission of the balance of the interview which was drawn out by the counsel for the defense from Mr. Tilton, between himself and his wife, in regard to her appearance before the Committee. I submitted to your Honor that either we were entitled to call from Mr. Tilton for the balance of that interview, or that the part which was taken should be struck out.

Judge Neilson—That was the question which was reserved; yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor, upon reflection, has formed any opinion upon the subject, why, we, of course, will be governed by it.

Judge Neilson—I think the part taken should be struck out. Let the stenographer's attention be called to the precise matter.

Mr. Beach—We don't move to strike it out. We move to give the balance, and we rely upon the rule that, they having given a part of the interview, we are entitled to the whole of it.

Judge Neilson—I think it was upon your interrogatory, and the objection that the counsel interposed was that it did not intervene soon enough, but allowed to proceed to a certain year.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That might occur from an inadvertency.

Mr. Beach—That is not averred by the counsel. It would be hardly consistent with the portion of the interview that was given.

Mr. Evarts—It was as short as possible; there were not over a dozen words.

Mr. Beach—Oh! that is a mistake.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I now know for the first time what you are talking about.

Mr. Beach—Your Honor does not strike out the evidence upon your own motion?

Judge Neilson—No; I had it before me in that alternative, either to retain it or strike it out.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; this is an alternative submitted to your Honor's discretion, but I don't understand them to make a motion to strike out. We do not. We insist upon giving the balance of the interview.

Judge Neilson—If you had changed your mind from what it was before I will hear you.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, in the argument I insisted upon two propositions, first, that having permitted us to give a portion of the interview we were entitled to the whole of it.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Beach—And, second, that they must relieve themselves from the dilemma from which their tacit concurrence in the evidence placed them, by a motion to strike out, not that we are called upon to move to strike out, and they sit silent; they don't move to strike out, and, therefore, I submit that we can go on with the witness and finish his examination upon that point.

ANOTHER EFFORT FOR THE HOLIDAY.

Judge Neilson—[To an officer]: Hand the statute to the counsel.

Mr. Beach—The statute is [Reading]:

"The following days, viz., the first day of January, commonly called New Year's, &c.," enumerating the 22d of February with others, "shall for all purposes whatsoever, as regards the presenting for payment or acceptance, and of the protesting and giving notice of the dishonor of bills of exchange, bank checks and promissory notes, made after the passage of this Act, be treated and considered as is the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday; and when either of those days shall occur on Sunday, the following Monday shall be deemed a public holiday, and any bill of exchange, bank check or promissory note made after the passage of this Act, which, but for this Act, would fall due and payable on such Sunday or Monday, shall become due and payable on the day following such Sunday or Monday."

Mr. Evarts—Does that make it a public holiday?

Judge Neilson—This latter statute, I think, does.

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; but that is only the commercial part of it.

Judge Neilson—The statute of 1873 provides that

"The office of Sheriff of the County, clerk, register, and the office of the clerk of the City Court of Brooklyn shall be closed on Saturdays at three o'clock P. M."—well, ours is four—"shall be kept open every other day in the year, from nine in the forenoon to four o'clock in the afternoon except Sundays, the 1st day of January, commonly called New Year's day, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, known as Decoration Day, the 4th day of July, and the 25th day of December, and any other appointed day recommended by the Governor of this State or the President of the United States as a day of fast or thanksgiving, shall be deemed and considered a public holiday for all or any service," —so that the clerk's office is closed on that day.

Mr. Evarts—I should think that makes it a holiday, if your Honor please.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—It strikes me that makes what we call a dies non, though I have no desire it should be so treated.

Mr. Beach—I suppose it is so.

Mr. Evarts—We might as well know it before we adjourn.

THE RESERVED QUESTION ARGUED.

Mr. Beach—Now, Sir, the question before your Honor arises in this way. Speaking of a report—

Mr. Evarts—Do you say there is any motion reserved?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Where is that? Oh, yes, I see; 2d column of page 442.

Mr. Beach—I find that I made a motion to strike out; I made a motion to strike out after your Honor ruled that the balance of the conversation could not be given. [Reading]:

Mr. Fullerton—Why, it is my suggestion that if they deprive us of the benefit of the whole of the conversation, that the part of it already given in evidence should go out with it.

Mr. Evarts—Do you make a motion to strike it out?

Mr. Fullerton—I made that suggestion to the Court.

Mr. Evarts—Until you make the motion I won't discuss it.

Mr. Beach—Well, we do make the motion, Sir. Your Honor ruling that we can go no further with the conversation we now move to strike out that which has been given.

Mr. Evarts—To strike out the whole?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

And then followed some discussion at the close of which your Honor said: "Well, we will proceed, Mr. Fullerton reserving this until I can hear the counsel further on the subject; I would be happy to hear him of course." I think your Honor was right.

Mr. Evarts—The ruling, if he did not go any further, was that the conversation was disposed of, and then my friends made their motion to strike out, and, on that motion to strike out, Mr. Beach says: "I do not wish to detain the Court, Sir; but I will present it to your Honor hereafter." (That is, authority.) "If your Honor will permit me for a moment I think I can refer to authorities upon the subject." Then your Honor says: "Well, we will proceed, Mr. Fullerton, reserving this until I can hear the counsel further on the subject." That is the point in which the matter comes up now.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; your Honor will perceive that in the address to the Court when I use the language which Mr. Evarts has quoted, the whole subject as to the admissibility of the remainder of the interview between Mr. Tilton and his wife, as well as the question of striking out, was opened.

Judge Neilson—That was the branch of it on which you wished to furnish authorities.

Mr. Beach—The first branch was that as to the admissibility of the whole conversation under the circumstances, and that was the argument which your Honor in kindness permitted me to present to you in review of the conclusion at which you had previously arrived, and you reserved that question for consideration at a future day.

Judge Neilson—The mere request to strike out I need not have reserved; that was the same matter. I think the simplest way would be now to dispose of it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I will call attention to what I consider the matter when it comes to my turn.

ARGUMENT OF MR. BEACH.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is your turn now. The last that I said to your Honor was:

The issue between us, Sir, cannot be avoided by the gentleman. I say that he sat still while this witness detailed a very considerable part of a conversation between himself and his wife, and that it was the duty of the gentleman, if he intended to object to any part of that interview, to interpose the objection when the narrative on the part of the witness commenced, and that it is unjust and illegal to permit the half of that conversation to be given until it reaches the point so far satisfactory to the counsel upon the other side, and when they apprehend that the remaining portion of it will be unfavorable to their interest, then to shut the mouth of the witness by an objection.

—and a few additional remarks. Now, your Honor suggested that it was possibly an inadvertence on the part of counsel, and inattention to the progress of examination. But if your Honor will direct attention to the history of the transaction, you will perceive that no such excuse as that could be given, and I submit no such excuse has been suggested by the counsel up to this time. Speaking of two reports which were prepared by Mr. Tilton—proposed reports—for the Committee, the inquiry was by Mr. Fullerton:

Q. I limit my question to the proposed report before the Committee, in evidence. Is that the short one or the long one? A. It is the short one.

Q. It is the short one. I want you to state under what circumstances the short report was prepared? A. The circumstances were these. Mrs. Tilton came home one evening, and informed me that she had been down—I beg pardon for not addressing the jury—Mrs. Tilton came home one evening about 10 o'clock and informed me—this was the 6th or 8th of July—informed me that she had been down to a Committee of Plymouth Church and I asked what Committee. She said a Committee to inquire into my letter to Dr. Bacon, to do away with the scandal, and she said that she had denied everything—blotted it all out.

It seems to me impossible that the gentleman could have been so far inattentive as not to have noticed before Mr. Tilton had arrived at that point that he was detailing an interview between himself and his wife. Then Mr. Evarts says:

If your Honor please, the occasion of his preparing this report may, perhaps, justify an allusion to what passed between him and his wife, as the basis of that, but that occasion does not give the right to detail conversation between himself and his wife.

—and so the discussion went on, Sir, until we reached the point where your Honor reserved the question, and the whole question, in all of its branches for future consideration. Now, I insist, Sir, that we have a right to give the balance of that conversation.

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS

Mr. Evarts—I do not think there can be any doubt that they have not the right to give the conversation in evidence, per se; that they admit, I suppose; that they do not deny. I do not understand them as claiming to give in evidence, the conversation between Mr. Tilton and his wife. But they have a right to ask as an inducement, no doubt, whether something did not happen in the same sense in which I endeavored to show by inducement, this morning, that this witness, Mr. Bell, had heard something. Your Honor ruled against me there, but here I think that was a right ruling, that they could show an inducement. The question is this, "I want you to state under what circumstances the short report was prepared." Now, that was not a question that I could object to.

A. The circumstances were these: Mrs. Tilton came home one evening, and informed me that she had been down; Mrs. Tilton came home one evening about 10 o'clock, and informed me—this was the 6th or 8th of July—informed me that she had been down to a Committee of Plymouth Church; and I asked what committee. She said a Committee to inquire into my letter to Dr. Bacon to do away with the scandal, and she said that she had denied everything—blotted it all out.

Then I said:

If your Honor please, the occasion of his preparing this report may, perhaps, justify an allusion to what passed between him and his wife as the basis of that, but that occasion does not give the right to detail conversations between himself and his wife.

Your Honor said: "So I think, Sir." Then they claimed that the interruption should have come a little earlier, and took the position that, "if any of it is stricken out, what has been taken in regard wholly to that interview should be stricken out." Judge Neilson says: "Well, it fixes the occasion, that is the effect of it," and my learned friends go on discussing. "The report was based upon that fact," Mr. Fullerton says. I say: "That is all in evidence. That I have not objected to. That is an occasion I do not know, of course, what did pass between this gentleman and his wife afterwards, only it is not a matter that, by fixing an occasion by an introduction to the report, gives an opportunity to go on and give a conversation between them." Your Honor says: "I think not, Sir." I say: "I think it should go no further—that is, no further in respect to the conversation." Your Honor says: "I think he can say, after giving the conversation, that, in consequence of what was said, he was led—if that was one of the circumstances that led him—to make the report." And your Honor again says: "I think he can say that, in consequence of what was communicated to him, he was led to the idea of making this report without giving the conversation; then you have it." And your Honor finally says: "Yes, Sir," in reply to Mr. Fullerton, "but we cannot take the conversation between them in my judgment." I say: "The substantive fact that she told him that she had been before the Committee, and denied all the charges, is already in. That is sufficient foundation, it seems to me." Judge Neilson said: "You will agree with the counsel in that, I think," to Mr. Fullerton, at which he expressed his surprise—"Now, Sir?" "Judge Neilson, the counsel says that the substantive fact, that she had been before the Committee and denied the charges, is already in. That covers the fact." Then Mr. Fullerton raises the question: "We either want the whole or none. They cannot wait until a part of it is out, and then object to the balance." Then your Honor decides the point, "You cannot take the conversation, and further, Sir." Then Mr. Fullerton says: "Then I suppose it all goes out." "Oh! no, I think it stands where it is." Your Honor says, "It appears now that she communicated the fact that she had been before the Committee and denied all the charges." Mr. Fullerton says "Yes, but I want what further she said." Then they argued about it, and about the interruption occurring at this point, that it should have occurred either earlier or later. Your Honor says: "It may be hard, Sir, but I think the objection must be sustained at the point where it was made." Then Mr. Fullerton says: "It is not a question of whether the objection should be sustained. The question is whether the whole conversation is to go out, inasmuch as the balance of it— Judge Neilson—There has been no motion to strike out as yet. Mr. Fullerton—Why, it is my suggestion." Then the motion is made.

Judge Neilson—Now, what are the words in the evidence?

GENERAL DEBATE.

Mr. Evarts—Now, your Honor has decided that the further conversation shall not be given, and if any time was to be made to give the further conversation from the witness, it should have been made before the witness left the stand.

Judge Neilson—What are the words after the "Bacon letter," in that answer? Just close it.

Mr. Evarts—I will read it in a moment—so that the only question now is, whether some part of this answer shall be struck out.

Mr. Beach—I prefer to make my motion in my own form, and not let the gentleman make it.

Mr. Evarts—The difficulty is that the motion has been made, has been partly argued, and the further argument reserved by your Honor's permission. That is the difficulty. We have got a record—motion to strike out. The other question was not reserved and was not decided—that they should not give any further communication.

Mr. Beach—I beg your Honor to hear me upon that proposition before you decide it.

Judge Neilson—What are the words in that answer after "The Bacon letter," towards the close of it?

Mr. Evarts [Reading]:

"She informed me she had been down to a Committee of Plymouth Church; and I asked her what Committee; she said a Committee of inquiry into my letter to Dr. Bacon."

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Beach, I think—my impression is—the words after "Dr. Bacon" are to be stricken out.

Mr. Evarts—I will read these words, Sir:

"To do away with the scandal; and she said that she had denied everything—blotted it all out."

Judge Neilson—If that stood, they ought to have more.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor decided that question, that it should stand as it was, and that the objection was rightly made at that point, and then entertained a motion to strike out the whole.

Judge Neilson—I am very clear now that if anything is stricken out, it is simply what occurred after the word "Bacon."

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is not for me, of course, to say how your Honor might conclude on the subject, but the motion is to strike out.

Mr. Beach—I do not make any such motion.

Mr. Evarts—Very well, there is no question reserved. My learned friend says he does not make the motion to strike out, and there certainly is no other question reserved for them. Your Honor's ruling upon the evidence is complete, with that exception, and if the motion is not insisted upon it is wasting the time of the Court to go on with the matter.

Mr. Beach—I may, perhaps, say that I am very gratified to learn that the gentleman is getting a little careful about the time of the Court. You did, at one time, Sir, in the course of that discussion, decide that question. Afterwards you indulged me so far as to permit me to submit a short argument to your Honor, in substance asking you to review that decision.

Mr. Evarts—I do not so understand.

Mr. Beach—Well, let us see.

Judge Neilson—Also gave you permission—it is very clear in my mind also—also gave you permission to bring in authorities upon that particular question, to wit, your right to continue the part of the conversation given.

Mr. Beach—I hope the gentleman does not suppose that your Honor gave me a permission to look up authorities upon a motion to strike out.

Judge Neilson—No, it was not that.

Mr. Beach—No, I think not.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know why he should not. It was the only motion pending and the only thing you were asking.

Mr. Beach—Well, the gentleman can make that assertion as repeatedly as he pleases; the record is there, and the last words that were said to your Honor before you granted me the opportunity of presenting authorities were said by myself, and they express themselves, however awkwardly. I read a portion, Sir; I will read the balance of what I said:

I say it is untimely and inadmissible, but if under the ruling of your Honor the objection is to be sustained that the whole conversation should be given; that it cannot thus be mangled and misrepresented in its true scope and effect to place the party who offers it in a disadvantageous position. If your Honor will permit me, Sir, a moment, I think I can refer to authorities upon the subject.

—that is, upon that subject of interrupting the conversation at that stage of its development.

Judge Neilson—Certainly.

Mr. Evarts—On the motion to strike out?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; it is not on the motion to strike out.

Judge Neilson—The instance is where a Judge, if I understand him right, acts on a first impression—announces that impression and yet is willing to be corrected and hear authorities, if the counsel wish to introduce them.

Mr. Beach—I suppose so, Sir. Perhaps it was impertinent in me to ask your Honor to reconsider the decision which you had made, but your Honor indulged me in doing it, and permitted the question to be reconsidered.

Judge Neilson—I think it is the duty of the counsel to correct me when I fall into an error; that is what they are here for.

Mr. Evarts—The difference between us is as to what the record shows, as to what your Honor did and what was reserved.

Now, I understand the matter to be finally disposed of, unless they move to strike out that. So far as the question of introducing further evidence was concerned it was ended. We drove them to a necessity then of an alternative to get it out if they could. They were arguing that question and proposed to give authorities on the striking of it out.

Judge Neilson—I did not so understand it.

Mr. Everts—And as a part of that argument that it ought to be all in or all out; that I agree.

Judge Neilson—Well, they claim it ought to be all in—the whole conversation.

Mr. Everts—That your Honor had disposed of finally.

Judge Neilson—Well, I was willing to hear it further.

Mr. Everts—And when your Honor said it ought to go out, then your Honor said there was no motion to strike out. Then they made the motion to strike out, and that was reserved.

Mr. Beach—And the counsel insists in chopping in two the course of ruling upon the part of your Honor on this subject just as he does in chopping in two this conversation. He does not consider the last portion of the proceedings upon that topic in which your Honor reserved this primary and first question. And to show your Honor that you had certainly a different view of the question which was pending before you when Mr. Tilton's examination was closed apparently, and he was about leaving the stand, you then suggested that here was a question reserved and to be decided in regard to the evidence of Mr. Tilton. If it was a mere motion to strike out we did not want Mr. Tilton any further on the stand. But the motion was as is apparent from the suggestion which your Honor then made as you understood it—the motion was as to the propriety of our proceeding to give this evidence.

Judge Neilson—So I have understood it. Look at the words in the answer which come after "Bacon."

Mr. Everts—Does your Honor understand there was a reservation of a right to examine Mr. Tilton further?

Mr. Beach—Why, yes, Sir; when your Honor made that suggestion, why, then, we said we would call Mr. Tilton at a subsequent time upon that point.

Mr. Everts—At that time.

Judge Neilson—Look at that after the word "Bacon" and see what you think of those words.

Mr. Beach—There are so many talking in my ears that I cannot hear your Honor.

Judge Neilson—At the close of that answer read the last line or two and see what it is.

Mr. Beach—At the close of Mr. Tilton's answer?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; after the word "Bacon," I think, if the answer stands down to that point and the rest is struck out.

Mr. Beach [reading]: "She said a committee to inquire into my letter to Dr. Bacon."

Judge Neilson—Now, stopping at that point, I think the rest could be stricken out; that qualified it somewhat.

Mr. Beach—Well, but I don't move to strike out; especially I don't move to strike out a part of it; I am not moving to strike out, your Honor; I am asking you to permit me to give the balance of this conversation.

Judge Neilson—I understand that.

Mr. Everts—That question has not been reserved. It was finally postponed, and the witness is off the stand.

Mr. Beach—Well, your Honor has three or four times overruled the gentleman on that point, and said your understanding was otherwise, and that is enough for me.

Judge Neilson—Well, that settles that point. Now, I think that those last words are struck out.

Mr. Beach—Do you strike it out on your own motion?

Judge Neilson—No, I had a motion before me the other day, which I held.

Mr. Beach—But I moved to strike out the whole. I did not move to strike out that part.

Judge Neilson—If you move to strike out the whole, I can strike out a part.

Mr. Beach—I hope your Honor will not do that, because if any part of it stands we may want the whole.

Judge Neilson—Suppose you read it now.

Mr. Beach—It is the short one:

"I want you to state under what circumstances the short report was prepared? A. The circumstances were these: Mrs. Tilton came home one evening, and informed me that she had been down—I beg pardon for not addressing the jury—Mrs. Tilton came home one evening about 10 o'clock, and informed me—this was the 6th or 8th of July—informed me that she had been down to a Committee of Plymouth Church, and I asked what Committee. She said a Committee to inquire into my letter to Dr. Bacon."

Judge Neilson—Now, they are stopped at that point, that being retained. What follows becomes sensible, because inquiry is made whether that is the first time he learned there had been a Committee at all. Strike that out, and it would leave what remains from their interrogatories uncertain, I think, and confused.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; but still the question comes up, whether these gentlemen can interfere in an examination at a point where so much of the conversation had been given by their tacit admission.

Judge Neilson—Yes; my trouble is, that I cannot persuade myself that a conversation with Mrs. Tilton ought to be received; but a part of it has been received.

Mr. Beach—Then the whole of it ought to go out, or the whole of it come in.

Judge Neilson—See how the effect is upon the subsequent evidence. The effect is bad upon the subsequent evidence. It would introduce confusion.

Mr. Beach—No, I think not.

Judge Neilson—If part of that is retained, the rest is unintelligible.

Mr. Beach—There is no subsequent evidence that has a relation to this, because we immediately go on with another subject.

Judge Neilson—Yes; the subject of when he learned there was a Committee; and he says that is the first time he learned it. You go on with your interrogatories as to when he first learned there was a Committee, and he explains that is the time he learned it—that evening.

Mr. Beach—Why, we did not. Your Honor is mistaken in that. That is another breach of the examination, and not connected with this at all. The precise point presented to your Honor is, whether these gentlemen having permitted us to give so much of a conversation, without objection, can interrupt it at the point which they desire and shut out the balance.

THE RESERVED QUESTION RULED OUT.

Judge Neilson—Now, if it were not a conversation between husband and wife I should adopt your rule; but here is this additional restraint, which is very serious, and which in ordinary cases does not follow.

Mr. Beach—Why, Sir, the conversations between Mr. Tilton and his wife have been given over and over again, on their examination.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that is not—

Mr. Beach—Certainly so.

Judge Neilson—At your leisure, strike out the entire answer, or that part of it which follows the words "Dr. Bacon."

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, I hope you will not assume to strike out evidence which we have given, when we do not make a motion to strike it out, and when the other party does not make a motion to strike it out.

Mr. Evarts—There is nothing pending; certainly there is no motion to strike out.

Mr. Beach—Well, I am pending.

Judge Neilson—I don't like those last words. If you think they are not serious let them stand.

Mr. Beach—Well, I would rather let the answer stand as it is than have any portion stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Well, let it stand as it is.

Mr. Beach—Well, does your Honor rule that we are not at liberty to give the balance of this conversation?

Judge Neilson—Yes, I think I am obliged to. I have thought of it a good deal.

The Court then adjourned until 11 o'clock on Friday morning.

THIRTIETH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MRS. MOULTON SWEARS TO CONFESSIONS BY MR. BEECHER.

THE DEFENDANT SAID TO HAVE DETERMINED TO COMMIT SUICIDE—MRS. MOULTON'S EFFORTS TO DISUADE HIM—HER CONFIDENCE IN HIM LOST WHEN HE TURNED AGAINST HER HUSBAND—MRS. TILTON'S ALLEGED ADMISSIONS,

FRIDAY, Feb. 19, 1875.

As was expected the day before, Mrs. Francis D. Moulton was the first witness called to-day, but unexpectedly she was the only witness of the day. The lady gave her name as Emma C. Moulton, and said that she had been connected with Plymouth Church since 1858. She had known Mr. Beecher personally since 1871, and during four years he had called at her house frequently at all hours of the day, and sometimes late at night. Mrs. Moulton's testimony related mainly to interviews between herself and Mr. Beecher, and between herself and Mrs. Tilton. The first one of importance that she recalled was in 1871, when, as the witness described the incidents, Mr. Beecher came into her parlor and took her hand, saying, "Do you know anything of this great sorrow of my life?" She replied that she did, and a very brief conversation followed. The next interview of importance that the witness related took place on June 2, 1873, and was three or four hours in duration. Mrs. Moulton gave her account of the details of this interview without hesitation and without being once assisted or interrupted by the counsel. The substance of it was that Mrs. Moulton informed Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton had threatened to publish the so-called letter of apology, whereupon Mr. Beecher said that if Mr. Tilton did that, it would be useless for him (Mr. Beecher) longer to live the thing down. Mrs. Moulton advised the Plymouth pastor to confess, but he said that he could not; he would die first. Then, according to Mrs. Moulton, Mr. Beecher said: "I have resolved to take my life. I have prepared a powder which I have at home on my library-table, which I shall take and sink quietly out of life."

The witness testified that at another time she said to Mr. Beecher, "I don't see how you can stand in your pulpit and preach to young men against the sin of adultery when you are implicated in it yourself." To this Mr. Beecher replied: "Having suffered what I have, and passed through the experience I have, I feel more fit for it than ever before." Mrs. Moulton's next important interview with Mr. Beecher was on July 13, 1874, after the call for the Plymouth Investigating Committee, when, according to the witness, Mr. Beecher denied having called the Committee. She states that she told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton proposed to take his case into court, whereupon the preacher told her that Mr. Tilton had no case to take into court; he had condoned his wife's offense, and lived five years with her. Mr. Beecher said, according to Mrs. Moulton, "Let them do their worst, they can't convict me."

The witness also related conversations with Mrs. Tilton, at which the latter said that if she were called before the church, she would sacrifice her husband and deny everything. She excused Mr. Beecher, and assumed the blame herself, while Mr. Beecher insisted that it was all his fault.

It was nearly noon when Mr. Evarts began his cross-examination. The main portion of the testimony elicited by him was a repetition of the interviews already given, every detail being entered into with extreme minuteness. Among other things called out were the facts that the counsel for the plaintiff take their meals at the house of Mr. Moulton, and that the witness has known since last July that her testimony would be wanted in this case. Among other questions, Mr. Evarts asked whether Mrs. Moulton ever told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton was treacherous and hated him (Mr. Beecher). She did not recall those words, but thought she might have said that Mr. Tilton hated Mr. Beecher. She admitted that she told Mr. Tilton that if he turned upon her husband he should never enter her house again. Mrs. Woodhull's visits at Mr. Moulton's house were made a topic for examination upon both sides; Mrs. Moulton testifying that she allowed Mrs. Woodhull to come to the house to keep her still, while Mr. Evarts endeavored to show that there was a friendship towards Mrs. Woodhull and sympathy with her views. The cross-examination was not ended at the hour of adjournment, and Mrs. Moulton will take the witness-chair on Tuesday morning.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. EMMA C. MOULTON.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Mrs. Emma C. Moulton was sworn on behalf of the plaintiff.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we have not quite as much room as we need for the convenience of the counsel on our side.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen will endeavor to make more room there.

Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Moulton, where do you reside? A. 49 Remsen-st.

Q. You are the wife of Francis D. Moulton, I believe? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long have you resided at 49 Remsen-st.? A. Since May, 1871.

Judge Neilson—I am requested by a note from the reporters to ask that counsel will consent that the answers be repeated, so that they will get the evidence. See if it is agreeable.

Mr. Beach—I think Mrs. Moulton's voice will be audible, Sir, when she gets a little accustomed to the strangeness of the place.

Mr. Fullerton—The house will be quiet in a moment, Sir. I think she will be able to be heard.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—What connection, if any, have you had with Plymouth Church? A. I have been connected with Plymouth Church since 1858.

Q. As a communicant? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S INTIMACY WITH THE MOULTONS.

Q. How long have you known Mr. Henry Ward Beecher? A. I have only known him personally since 1871.

Q. Under what circumstances did you make his acquaintance? A. He came to the house to see Mr. Moulton.

Q. A little louder. A. He came to the house to see Mr. Moulton in reference to this case.

Q. When was it that he first came to the house in 1871, or the first time that you saw him there? A. I don't remember the first time that I saw him, but it was early in 1871.

Q. Were you absent any part of 1871, the early part of the year? A. I was in Narragansett.

Q. At what time did you go to Narragansett? A. I went down to spend the holidays; before Christmas I left home, and remained until the 2d of January.

Q. And did you return to Brooklyn on the 2d of January, 1871? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how soon after that was it that you saw Mr. Beecher at your house, 49 Remsen-st.? A. During that week, I think.

Q. During the first week? A. During the first week; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, from that time on, Mrs. Moulton, state whether Mr. Beecher visited at your house, and how often, as near as you can recollect? A. Sometimes twice a day, two or three times a week; sometimes every day in the week, when he has been in town.

Q. And at what hours of the day? A. At all hours; before Mr. Moulton was up in the morning; after he had retired at night; before the Friday night prayer meeting; after his Sunday evening service; after his morning service on Sunday, and at all hours of the day. I have known him to come to the house as late as 11 o'clock at night.

Q. With whom did he confer? A. With Mr. Moulton.

Q. Was that so in all cases, or did he sometimes confer with you? A. Sometimes with me.

Q. How early did he talk with you when calling there? A. With reference to this case?

Q. With reference to anything? A. I saw Mr. Beecher when he first came to the house, but the first time that he spoke to me of this case was, I think, in the Spring of 1871.

Q. Were you absent at any time after you returned from Narragansett in the Spring of 1871? A. I don't remember that I was.

Q. I will call your attention to Mr. Moulton's sickness. A. We were South for six weeks.

Q. Do you recollect what time you went and what time you returned from the South? A. I think we went in the latter part of March, some time in March, and returned in April some time. I have forgotten the date.

Q. How soon after you returned from the South did Mr. Beecher call at your house? A. I think the same day or the day following, as nearly as I can remember; very soon after.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Beecher soon after your return from the South? A. I don't remember that I had any very soon after.

Q. Well, when did you have the first conversation with Mr. Beecher in regard to any difficulty that he spoke of? A. I don't remember whether it was before or after I returned from the South, but it was in the Spring of 1871, I think, late in the Spring.

MR. BEECHER DESCRIBED AS AT THE CONFESSIONAL.

Q. Please state, Mrs. Moulton, what he said to you upon the first occasion when his troubles were the subject of conversation?

Mr. Evarts—Well, the conversation we want, as it was given.

Mr. Fullerton—That is what I shall give.

The Witness—He was waiting in the parlor for Mr. Moulton, and I went into the room. He took my hand and said: "Do you know anything of this great sorrow of my life?" and I said: "Yea." He said: "Then Frank has told you the facts, has he?" I said: "Yes." He said: "I am very glad that he has; I am very glad that there is one woman in this world to whom I can go and talk of my troubles without reserve." As nearly as I can remember, that was all of the conversation at that time.

Q. You were in the parlor then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where was Mr. Moulton then? A. He was engaged with some one in the front room, up-stairs.

Q. And where did Mr. Beecher go to after this conversation? A. He went up to see Mr. Moulton.

Q. Did you see him again that day? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Did you see him after that? A. Yes, Sir, frequently.

Q. Where? A. In our house.

Q. Do you recollect of having any further conversation with him? A. Yes, he need often to speak to me about it.

Q. What would he say when he came to the house to see Mr. Moulton, when he addressed you?

Mr. Evarts—Well, your Honor, I object to a general question—"what would he say."

Mr. Fullerton—I have not asked what would he say. What did he say at any time when he came to your house to visit Mr. Moulton?

Mr. Evarts—Well, some particular time.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it will be some particular time when she relates it. A. He would ask me if Mr. Moulton was still hopeful that this story might be kept quiet. He would ask me also the condition of Mr. Tilton's mind towards him—if he was friendly, or if he was angry or annoyed, or—that generally was his questions.

Q. Do you recollect anything that occurred on the first of June, 1871? No, I beg pardon; not that date, but about that date; any conversation that you had with Mr. Beecher? A. Not in 1871.

Q. Well, the next conversation, then, that you can recall with Mr. Beecher. State, if you please, when it was and what was said between you? A. The next conversation that I remember of any length was, I thought, in 1873.

Q. 1873. Very well. Then I will come down to 1873. You may state what occurred at that conversation to which you now allude. Fix the date as near as you can, Mrs. Moulton? A. I think it was on the 2d of June, 1873. Mr. Tilton felt that he must publish—

Mr. Evarts—No matter about Mr. Tilton's feelings.

Mr. Fullerton—What did you say to Mr. Beecher or what did he say to you? A. Mr. Beecher said to me that if Mr. Tilton published his letter of apology he felt that it was useless trying any longer to live this down. He came in Monday morning. Mr. Moulton was still at the house, and after conversing with him for a few moments, he said, "I came to see your wife, not you, this morning."

MR. BEECHER HOPELESS AND DESPERATE.

Q. Whom did he address when he said that? A. He addressed Mr. Moulton; and they conversed for a short time together, and Mr. Moulton left the house and went to the office. Mr. Beecher lay down on the lounge, and I gave him a cover; and he said: "This is probably my last conversation with you. I feel that if Mr. Tilton publishes my letter of apology, it is useless for me try any longer to live this down. I have never felt that I had much to hope for from Theodore; he has been faithless, he is a faithless man; he seems to lose sight of the fact that in striking at me, or in stating the truth concerning me, he sacrifices his wife, and if that letter of apology is published I might as well go out of life; it is useless trying to live it down." And I said: "Mr. Beecher, there is something better for you to do than that. I think that would be a very cowardly thing for you to do. Go down to your church and confess your crime; they will forgive you." He said: "No, I cannot do that; for the sake of the woman who has given me her love, for her children, for my family, for my church, for my influence throughout the whole world, that I can never do. I will die before I will confess it." And I said: "Sooner or later the truth in this case will come out. It is much better that you should take your case in your own hands, and state to your church—give to them a confession such as you could make to them, and I am sure they would forgive you." He said: "No; that I cannot do; I should be—my children would despise me. I could not go back to my home, and my church would not forgive me, they would not deal with me as you have done. There would be nothing left for me to do. My work would be finished. It would be better that I should go out of life than to remain any longer in it." And I said: "You could write for your paper. You could go to your farm and write." He said: "No; if they would not listen to hear me preach, they certainly would not read anything that I should write. Besides, my position in life is that of a spiritual and moral teacher. If I can no longer hold that position, then there is nothing left for me, and I am resolved to take my life. I have a powder at home on my library table which I have prepared, which I shall take, and shall sink quietly off as if going to sleep, without a struggle. I haven't any desire to live; I have nothing to live for; in fact, I pray for death as a happy release from all my trials and trouble; and I feel that if I publish now a card in The Eagle it will only be a temporary relief; that Mr. Tilton is likely to break out again at any other time, and I feel that physically and mentally I am unable any longer to bear this strain, and I probably shall never come to see you again." And I felt very much grieved at it and begged him to go down to the church. I said, "Mr. Moulton will still stand by you; and, no matter what comes to you, I will always be your friend; and I am convinced that the only way out of this trouble, for you, is by telling the truth." He said that he would come to see me on the day following; that he had some gifts that he wished to dispose of—some little mementoes for different people, something which he wanted me to bear to Elizabeth, and something for different friends, with messages which he wanted me to bear for him; and he would come on the day following to see me. It was a long interview; Mr. Beecher was very much excited; he told me, with tears streaming down his face, what he had suffered; that he had suffered the tortures of the damned; that he was obliged to go home and wear a cheerful smile; that when he appeared in his church, he must appear at his best; that the slightest indication of weakness was a confession on his part, so that really I was the only person to whom he could come and act his natural self; to whom he could unburden his whole heart's trouble.

Q. How long did that interview last, Mrs. Moulton? A. I think for three or four hours.

Q. If you can recall anything else that was said during that interview, you will please state it? A. I don't remember of anything that occurred—.

Q. What time in the day did he leave? A. It was near the hour for lunch.

Q. Did you see him soon after that, Mrs. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir; I saw him the day, or day following.

Q. What took place when you next saw him? A. He said that he was very much depressed on that day, but that he felt more hopeful.

Q. Did he say anything about the card in The Eagle? A. I don't remember that he did.

Q. What, if anything, did he say in regard to the publication of the "Letter of Apology," so-called, in either of these interviews; if he said anything that you have not related, you will please state it?

Mr. Evarts—You mean either of these interviews in June?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I don't remember, at that time, that he spoke to me of the "letter of apology."

Q. Well, recurring again to this interview that took place a few days after this long conversation, can you repeat anything else that he said at that time? A. I don't remember just at that time.

Q. Did he ever speak to you in regard to Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State, please, what he said in regard to her?

Mr. Evarts—At either of these interviews?

Mr. Fullerton—At any time.

Mr. Evarts—The time should be fixed.

The Witness—He nearly always spoke—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will get the time, Mr. Evarts.

The Witness—He nearly always spoke to me of Elizabeth, of his great love for her; wanted me to respect her, and to have regard for her; go and see her; try and comfort her and console her; see if there was anything that he could do for her; if she was in need of anything; that I, a woman, knew what women needed and wanted most.

Q. Did you ever carry any messages from him to her? A. Yes, Sir.

MRS. TILTON TAKES ALL THE BLAME ON HERSELF.

Q. And from her to him—if so, state what those messages were? A. I repeated to Mr. Beecher a conversation which I had with Mrs. Tilton. She said that she felt very sorry for me; even more sympathy for me than for herself, because that I had lost faith in Mr. Beecher; because I was unable any longer to attend the Church; she begged me to go back to the Church and believe in Mr. Beecher; and I said, "Elizabeth, how can you ask me to go back to the Church? How can you ask me to take the communion from his hands knowing what I do of his life?" And she said: "I want you to believe in him; he is a good man; it was not his fault; he is not responsible for the crime; I am the one that is to blame; I invited it." And I said: "I think that I might hear Mr. Beecher preach, and perhaps derive some benefit from his sermon; but I can never go back to the Church with the same faith that I had in him years ago."

Q. Did you report this conversation to Mr. Beecher? A. I did.

Q. How soon after the conversation occurred? A. Perhaps a day or two after; I don't exactly remember how soon.

Q. Now, had you any further conversation with Elizabeth that you reported to Mr. Beecher? A. I had.

Q. State, if you please, what it was. A. I think it was at the time that Mr. Beecher was—Mr. Tilton appeared down at the Church—that I called to see Elizabeth and I said: "If you are called before the Church, what are you going to do to save Mr. Beecher?" She said: "I shall sacrifice my husband and deny everything." I said: "Will you allow your husband to go down with the truth?" She said: "I think I should be justified in stating falsely under the circumstances; I think, for the sake of Mr. Beecher, for the sake of the influence on the world, for my own position, for my children, I think it is my duty to deny it."

Q. And did you report this to Mr. Beecher? A. I did.

Q. What reply, if any, did he make? A. He said, "Poor child, she is trying to repair the wrong she has done in confessing it—in confessing her sin. But it is too late."

MRS. TILTON REPROACHED FOR CONFESSING.

Q. Did he say anything to you in respect of the length of time that Elizabeth had permitted him to be in ignorance of the fact that she had confessed? A. He did.

Q. What did he say upon that subject? A. In talking with me one day, he said that it was very cruel that Elizabeth should have confessed at all; it was very unjust to him; he could not understand it; he didn't know why she should have done it. But that she should have allowed him to visit her for six months after she had confessed to her husband, was even a greater mystery to him—subjecting him to unpleasant greetings and meetings with Mr. Tilton; that he could not understand why she allowed him to visit her house without having told him that she had confessed to her husband.

MR. BEECHER BEGS MRS. MOULTON TO RETURN TO PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Did you ever say anything to Mr. Beecher about returning to the Church? A. I did.

Q. What did you say to him upon that subject? A. I told him how much I missed the Church, the influence of his sermons; I had been a member of his Church for a great many years, and I had believed in him, and it was very hard to be deprived of hearing him; but knowing what I did of him I could not go back to the Church with the same feeling. He used to beg me to come to church; he said if I knew what a comfort it was to him to see my face in the congregation, that I would certainly come; that he felt that he had repented of his sin and been forgiven; that he was better fitted now than ever before in his whole life to do great good. I once said to Mr. Beecher: "I don't see how you can stand in your pulpit and preach to young men against the sin of adultery, when you are implicated in it so deeply yourself," and he said: "Having suffered what I have; having passed through the experiences that I have, I feel that I am better fitted than ever before to preach!"

MRS. MOULTON'S MEDIATION.

Q. Did he ever, in any conversation with you, say anything in respect to Elizabeth's tendency to talk about this thing? A. He did.

Q. State what he said upon that subject? A. He said that Elizabeth was continually making mistakes; that she meant well, but that she had not the judgment or the discretion—she allowed everybody to talk to her about it; that if she could only go away, or if some plan could be adopted by which Elizabeth could be kept quiet—that she would not be allowed to talk with anybody about it; he thought that it was better that she should never speak to anybody, and he often said to me, "When you see Elizabeth tell her never to speak with anybody concerning this case; to refuse to talk with anybody about it."

Q. Did he ever send any message to her by you as to her demeanor in her household, and what she should do there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State, if you please, what that message was? A. I once repeated to Mr. Beecher a conversation that I had had with Mrs. Tilton when she felt that she could no longer remain with Mr. Tilton; that he was continually referring to this sin which she had committed; that he would not let it die out; that he would not give her an opportunity—

Mr. Evans—Mrs. Moulton, is this what you said to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—So she states.

Mr. Evans—I ask her that.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I will ask her.

The Witness—And that she felt that she could not live with him any longer; that she was going home to live with her mother. Mr. Beecher said: "Tell Elizabeth for me that for my sake she must continue to live with Theodore, to be to him a good wife, to make his home happy and as attractive as possible. I know it is hard, I know she has much to endure, but she must do it for my sake, for her own, and for the children. I have a family; she has nothing to hope for with me, and the only way in which she can ever see me is by living with Theodore, and being to him a true and good wife."

Q. State, if you please, again, what reasons she gave for wishing to leave her husband? A. Because Mr. Tilton was referring to this sin which she had committed.

Q. And would not permit her to do what? A. He would not permit her to live a better life with him.

LETTERS INTRODUCED.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, look at the paper I show to you and say whether you ever saw it before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From whom did you receive it? A. Mr. Beecher.

Q. When, as near as you recollect? A. I think in June.

Q. Of what year? A. 1873.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to read that in evidence. [Paper handed to defendant's counsel.]

Mr. Fullerton [Reading]:

MY DEAR MRS. MOULTON: Don't wake Frank up to give him the inclosed, but as soon as he is awake and ready, please hand it to him. What a glorious morning! The earth is not far from Heaven to-day. I am tranquil and hopeful, but not of men, but of God.

Truly yours, with great respect and affection,

H. W. BEECHER.

Mr. Beach—The jury don't hear you—that last sentence.

Mr. Fullerton read the letter again, beginning, "What a glorious morning!"

[Letter marked "Exhibit 106."]

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, please look at the paper that I show you, which is Exhibit 23, and say whether the inclosure spoken of in the letter to you was that letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That has already been read in evidence; it is a letter of June 1st, 1873, and is marked Exhibit 22.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, what I wish to ask you is, whether this letter which I have shown you was received before or after the long conversation in the parlor which you have already related? A. The long conversation was held up-stairs.

Q. Well, was it before or after the receipt of this letter? A. It was the Monday after.

Q. Now, if in any conversation with Mr. Beecher respecting this trouble he took blame upon himself in any way, I wish you would relate it? A. When I repeated to him my conversation with Mrs. Tilton, when she said it was not Mr. Beecher's fault, it was hers, he said: "It is not her fault—it is my fault; I am to blame; Elizabeth was not to blame; she is a good woman and I want you always to love her and to respect her."

Q. Whatever he may have said in any conversation with regard to his affection for her, or hers for him, if there is anything on that subject which you have not stated, please to state it now? A. I don't remember any particular conversation; Mr. Beecher always spoke to me of his love for Elizabeth.

MRS. MOULTON AVERSE TO KNOWING MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. Then I call your attention to Mrs. Woodhull. What occurred between you and Mr. Beecher, if anything, in respect to that woman? A. I was very much opposed to have Mrs. Woodhull at my house, but Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton both deemed it best and necessary for the interest of all concerned that she should come, and I one morning spoke to Mr. Beecher, and said: "I am very much annoyed because Mrs. Woodhull is coming to the house, but Frank and Mr. Tilton, both of them, think it necessary and best." I said: "What do you think about it, Mr. Beecher?" He said: "I don't see how it can possibly do you any harm; I think it is a duty you owe to Frank to coöperate with him in trying to keep the story quiet."

Q. How soon after that conversation did she come? A. I do not remember how soon after.

Q. How frequently did she come to your house? A. I cannot tell how many times she has been to the house.

Q. State your object in permitting her to come, and in entertaining her?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to. It does not appear that she had any control of the matter; it was her husband's house and his directions. In the second place, it does not appear that she did permit her. What her object is has nothing to do with the matter in any way.

Mr. Fullerton—I think it is a proper question, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think she may answer the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, you may answer.

The Witness—Please to put your question again.

THE OBJECT IN TOLERATING FAMILIARITY WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

Mr. Fullerton—What was your object in consenting or allowing Mrs. Woodhull to visit your house, and in entertaining her? A. Because she knew all the facts in this case. Mr. Moulton was doing his utmost to keep it quiet. He thought I knew nothing against her—which I certainly did not know anything personally against her; I knew only of her as I had heard from the public—the public opinion with regard to her; and he thought that I ought to allow her to come to the house; that they were treating her in a friendly way in order to hush up the story, if possible.

Q. At that time, had she threatened to publish the story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect the publication in The New-York World, of Mrs. Woodhull, threatening to make the expose? A. Yes, Sir, I have a faint recollection of it.

Q. And this conversation was after that, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you do anything else to exert a kindly influence with Mrs. Woodhull besides receiving her at your house? A. Do you refer to visiting her?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir; I went to Mrs. Woodhull's house, and brought her to my house three or four times.

Mr. Evarts—Went to Mrs. Woodhull's house does she say?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, and brought her to her house three or four times. [To the witness.] Now, Mrs. Moulton, was that with the same object? A. With the same object.

Q. And at whose request did you do it? A. Sometimes—always, I think, at Mr. Moulton's.

Q. Did you take any one with you to her house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whom did you take? A. The first time I visited her I went with Mr. Tilton; Mr. Moulton was sick and unable to go, and he asked me to go; the next time I took Mr. Moulton's mother; the third time I took my son Frank.

Q. And what was the demeanor of Mrs. Woodhull when she visited your house, and when you visited her house? A. So far as I knew, she always behaved in a ladylike manner.

Q. So far as you observed? A. So far as I observed.

Q. And your visits to her house, I understood you, were with the same object—to exercise an influence over her, to prevent this publication that she had threatened? A. Yes, Sir.

THE FIRST COLDNESS BETWEEN MR. BEECHER AND MR. MOULTON.

Q. Do you recollect an occurrence some time early in July, when the statement was talked of, in 1872—1874? A. 1874?

Q. Yes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What occurred then? A. This last July do you refer to?

Q. I refer to the 13th of July, when the contemplated statement was under discussion? A. May I be allowed to state the particulars?

Q. Yes, state the particulars.

Mr. Evarts—Well, what occurred with Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Fullerton—What occurred between yourself and Mr. Beecher upon that subject? A. Mr. Beecher came to our house on the 13th of July, I think; it was soon after the Bacon letter; Mr. Tilton had published a card in The Eagle, saying that before ten days from that time he would make a statement of the case to the public. Mr. Beecher came to the house, and I met him and took him to the study, and I said: "Mr. Beecher, what have you done that has offended Frank? He is very angry with you." He said: "I don't know." I said: "I am very sorry. Is he not angry because you have called the Committee?" He said: "I did not call the Committee; my people called the Committee; I certainly could not object to an investigation." I said: "I don't know what has happened, but Frank is very angry with you, and I am very sorry for it." He said: "I am very sorry, and I have intrusted myself wholly to Frank throughout the case; I have been willing to be led by him, sometimes against my better judgment; but with relation to the Church, I do not consider that he has anything to do with my non-agreement of the Church affairs. Besides, I could not possibly object to have an investigation when my people wanted it." Soon after Frank came into the room, and I went down-stairs. He went up to Frank, who read to Mr. Beecher a letter that he proposed to read to the Committee. When I went up-stairs I asked Mr. Beecher into the front room, and Mr. Moulton said to Mr. Beecher, in my presence: "Then you think my statement for the Committee an honorable one?" Mr. Beecher said: "I do; perfectly so."

MR. BEECHER HOPEFUL AND DESPERATE.

Mr. Moulton left and went down stairs, and I said to Mr. Beecher: "Do you know what Mr. Tilton proposes to do—what he proposes in The Eagle, to-night." He said: "No." I said: "He proposes to give a statement of the facts to the public in ten days; and if so, it will ruin you." He said: "How so?" I said: "He proposes to publish your written confession." He said: "I have never put any confession in writing." I said: "But your letter to Frank." He said: "If that letter is published, it will be a breach of confidence." I said: "I don't know anything about that, but I think if the statement is published, as Mr. Tilton proposes, it certainly will ruin you; and if he fails in this he will take the case into Court." He said: "He cannot take the case into Court; he has forgiven his wife's offense, and has lived with her four years; he cannot convict me." I said: "He will—he can convict you." And I said: "I don't think it is even now too late for you to go down and confess to the church; there is no other way out for you; and if you had done it when I first advised it, it would have been better." He said: "I don't consider it so; I think your advice from first to last has been bad; the public are not prepared for a confession such as I would have to make." I said: "If you had confessed it then, you would have been better off. Now you have the original crime and four years of perjury and lying to an awer for." He said: "I never will confess it; I will die before I confess it."

Q. Do you recollect anything else that occurred at that interview? A. He was very angry; he said that he had always regarded Theodore as a faithless man; that he had never felt he had much to hope from him; but he said: "Now I have made up my mind to let them come on and do their worst; they cannot convict me."

Q. Did he ever speak of his brothers and sisters in any way; and if so, how? A. After a conversation with Mr. Moulton in the front room, and after saying good-bye to us, he came to me and took my hand in his and said: "You are the best friend I have in this world; you are dearer to me than any sister I have, for you, knowing all the truth, knowing that I am guilty, still stand by me, while they believe me innocent."

Q. Do you recollect when that conversation was? A. I cannot recollect the date.

Q. Did he give any reason why he would rather talk to you than to them? A. Because I knew the truth—because I knew all the truth.

Q. Did you ever make an observation to Mr. Beecher to this effect, that you always supposed a woman was just as much to blame as a man, and if so, what reply did he make to that?

Mr. Evarts—I object to a leading question of that kind to his own witness.

Judge Neilson—Perhaps the inquiry should be whether any observation was made on that subject, and if so, give the words.

Q. Was there any conversation had between you and Mr. Beecher as to the relative or comparative guilt attached to persons who had committed this offense of adultery? A. Yes; once Mr. Beecher was at our house and suffering great remorse at what he had done.

Mr. Evarts—Let us have what was said.

Mr. Fullerton—What did Mr. Beecher say as evidence of his remorse? A. That he had brought so much trouble and sorrow to himself and Elizabeth and the household. I said: "I think a woman is as much to blame as a man; she was the mother of five or six children, and it does not seem to me possible that she could have done what she had done without knowing what she was doing, and she is certainly as much to blame as you are." He said: "No, she is not to blame; it is my fault; I take all the responsibility and all the blame on myself."

Q. Do you recollect when that conversation was? A. I don't recollect the date.

MR. GEORGE C. ROBINSON SEEKING FOR THE TRUTH.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. George C. Robinson which you repeated to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the conversation which you thus repeated?

Mr. Evarts—You mean what was said to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—The conversation which she repeated to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—What she repeated to Mr. Beecher in the conversation should be the question, and not what the conversation was with Mr. Robinson.

Mr. Fullerton—I will frame my question in my own way. [To the witness]: What was the conversation with Mr. Robinson which you afterwards repeated to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—I object to that. The question should be, "Did you have a conversation with Mr. Robinson," as an inducement; then, "Did you repeat it to Mr. Beecher, and if you did, state what you told him."

Judge Neilson—It leads to the same result, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—If it leads to the same result exactly, I claim my own way.

Judge Neilson—I think I would accept the suggestion. It is just as well—first the fact that she had a conversation, and then what she stated to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Beach—The witness was going to say what she told Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—She will answer the question properly.

The Witness—I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. George C. Robinson had spoken to me of his frequent visits at the office to see Mr. Moulton, and that he thought it very strange that he should select Mr. Moulton, who was not a church man; that Mr. Beecher, the first man in the city, having a host of friends at his back, it was very strange that he should go to the office to see Mr. Moulton; that he did not understand the reason; that he thought there must be some great trouble, but he did not understand what it was; that he, realized that, his brother, Jeremiah Robinson, knew the facts, and Mr. Moulton and Mr. Woodruff, and he felt that I ought to tell him what the trouble was; that he was a leading man in Plymouth Church, and had been a deacon, and was still attending Mr. Beecher's church, and meeting him constantly, and it was rather embarrassing for him, and he felt that, perhaps, it might be embarrassing for Mr. Beecher, and he would like to know the truth. He said that sometimes he thought that Mr. Beecher had appropriated the Church money or had been guilty of theft or something of that kind; that he realized it was some great crime which he had committed. I said: "No, it is not that; he has been guilty of adultery with Mrs. Tilton." He said: "Well, that I can hardly believe; it does not seem possible. A man that I have believed in for years, under whose preaching I have sat for so many years, who has preached against that one particular sin—I cannot believe that it is possible that he is guilty." I said: "I am very sorry to have to tell you that he is." He said: "How do you know it?" I said: "From confessions from both parties—both Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher told me. I told Mr. Beecher that I had told Mr. Robinson, feeling that Mr. Beecher might be embarrassed, and that it might be easier for him to talk to Mr. Robinson now that Mr. Robinson knew the truth, as he frequently met him in the office and at our house.

Q. What reply did Mr. Beecher make, if any, when you told him that? A. He said he was very glad I had told him; that he was willing to abide by anything I considered best.

WHEN MRS. MOULTON LEFT PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, up to what time did you continue to take the communion at Plymouth Church? A. I have never taken communion at the Church since I knew the truth of this case.

Q. Did you take the communion up to the time of your learning the facts in this case? A. Yes; I was not always there on Communion Sundays, but I never have attended any other Church.

Q. And since that time have you attended Plymouth Church? A. I have.

Q. How frequently? A. I don't know how many times.

Q. Under what circumstances did you go? A. When there have been friends staying at our house who knew that I belonged to Mr. Beecher's Church, and had been always an admirer of Mr. Beecher, and they would express a desire to go, and I went with them, and Mr. Beecher has asked me repeatedly to continue coming to the Church.

Mr. Fullerton—[Turning to Mr. Evarts.] Now you may ask.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. MOULTON.

Mr. Evarts—Mrs. Moulton, how long have you been married? A. I was married in 1860, the 22d of November.

Q. What family have you? A. I have one son

Q. How old is he? A. Thirteen years old.

Q. Has Mr. Moulton at any time been an attendant at your church? A. Not a regular attendant.

Q. Has he at any time been a frequent attendant? J. No, Sir.

Q. Where has he gone to church? A. He has not attended church anywhere.

Q. Not since your marriage? A. Not regularly; no, Sir.

Q. Has he with any frequency attended Church since your marriage? A. No, Sir; I don't know that I could say he has frequently.

THE WITNESS'S ACQUAINTANCE WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. When did you first make the acquaintance of Mrs. Woodhull? A. I cannot tell you the date.

Q. As near as you can? A. It was about the time she proposed to publish this story.

Q. Do you mean about May, 1871? A. If that was the time that she threatened to publish the story, it is; yes, Sir.

Q. Was it before or after her threat? A. It was before.

Q. Before her threat? A. Or about the time.

Q. Which was it, before or after? A. It must have been about the time.

Q. Can you say whether it was before or after her threat? A. I don't remember about the date.

Q. Was it before? A. It might possibly have been.

Q. Don't you know that it was before? A. I don't remember.

Q. On your best recollection, Mrs. Moulton, was it not before? A. I cannot state positively. I know it was with reference to this case that I made her acquaintance.

Q. Well, now, upon your best recollection, was it not before she published her threat? A. I can't say, Sir.

Q. How did you make her acquaintance, and by whose introduction? A. Mr. Moulton's and Mr. Tilton's.

Q. Where? A. Brought her to our house.

Q. And how was she introduced to you by those gentlemen? A. As Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Were you aware of her public repute at that time? A. I knew only in a general way of her reputation.

Q. You did know of her public repute, didn't you? A. I knew something about it; yes, Sir.

Q. You do know as much as other people about her public repute, don't you?

Mr. Fullerton—That is scarcely proper.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know that it is not proper. I would not have asked it if it was not proper.

Mr. Fullerton—It don't follow that you would not have asked it if it was not proper.

Q. What did you know about her public repute? Q. Well, I had heard that she held peculiar views with relation to marriage, &c. I only knew in a general way that she was not considered—I don't know exactly what to say, not that she was an immoral woman, but she was a woman who held loose views in regard to divorce and marriage, was all that I knew and all that I heard. I had heard that that was her reputation

Q. Were you informed beforehand that she was to be brought to your house? A. It was spoken of; yes, Sir.

Q. And did you know of the appointed time before she came? A. They spoke to me about it on Saturday; I knew she was to come on the next day.

Q. But that was the night of her coming there? A. They wanted to see her with reference to this story which she had proposed to publish, or which she knew about.

Q. You considered your house selected as the proper place of conference between these two gentlemen and this lady, did you? A. I considered it Mr. Moulton's house.

Q. I know it is Mr. Moulton's house. That you understood to be the reason, the only reason of her coming to that house, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you given your consent to it? A. I did not give my consent that I know of.

Q. Then when she came you had not given your consent? A. I don't think that I had given my consent by word; no, Sir.

Q. Now, madam, how frequently was this lady at your house? A. I cannot state how many times she was there.

Q. Was she there a dozen times? A. It is possible that she was; I don't know.

MRS. MOULTON'S CALLS ON MRS. WOODHULL.

Q. How frequently were you at her house? A. I have stated three times that I remember.

Q. Were you not there more times than that? A. I don't remember that I was; no, Sir.

Q. Now, when you went with Mr. Tilton to this lady's house, what was the occasion of this visit? A. Mr. Moulton wanted me to go, and Mr. Tilton wanted to see Mrs. Woodhull in reference to something in the case, I don't know what.

Q. What was the need of your going? A. Mr. Tilton wanted Mr. Moulton to go, but he was sick, and Mr. Moulton asked me to go in his stead, and I went. I presume I went because Mr. Moulton asked me to go.

Q. You did not go with any alacrity? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Don't you know that you went because Mr. Moulton required you to go? A. I don't think that Mr. Moulton required me to go; he made the request that I should go.

Q. Had you an aversion to going? A. I don't know that I had.

Q. You know one way or the other, don't you, whether you had an aversion to going or not? A. I don't know that I had any aversion to going.

Q. Didn't you require more urging on the part of your husband before you were willing to go? A. I don't remember that I was urged.

Q. Have you no impression on that subject? A. I don't remember that I was urged to go.

Q. Have you no impression as to whether you were urged or not, or whether you went very unwillingly? A. I don't remember that I went very unwillingly.

Q. Do you remember that you went very willingly? A. I don't remember that, Sir.

Q. When you got to the house of Mrs. Woodhull what occurred as to your introduction or reception by that lady? A. We were shown into the parlor by the servant; Mrs. Woodhull came in; there were other people in the parlor; I don't remember their names. Mr. Tilton held a few moments' conversation with Mrs. Woodhull, and I did the same, on general topics. We then left.

Q. Do you mean you both talked on general terms with her? A. I don't know what Mr. Tilton talked about.

Q. You didn't hear that interview? A. We were all present in the room together, but I don't know what Mr. Tilton talked about.

Q. And then you came away? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton return with you to your own house? A. I think he did.

Q. When was this? A. I cannot remember the day or time.

Q. About when was it? A. I could not tell you; I don't remember it.

Q. What year was it? A. It was the year I first met Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Was it not soon after you first met her? A. I don't remember how soon.

Q. Was this the first visit you made to her house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when was the next one made? A. I don't remember.

Q. Who went with you the next time? A. Mr. Moulton's mother.

Q. How did that visit come about? A. They wanted to see Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Who wanted to see her? A. Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, and they asked me to take a carriage and go over for her. Mrs. Moulton, my mother, was staying at the house, and I asked her to go with me.

Q. And you went over there and fetched Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At your husband's request? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go then unwillingly or willingly? A. I don't remember that I was either willing or unwilling. I simply went because Mr. Moulton asked me.

Q. Because Mr. Moulton desired you. Did you fetch her? A. I did.

Q. And did you take her back? A. I don't remember. I think we sent her back in a carriage, alone, if I remember right.

Q. And you don't remember whether you went or not with her? A. I don't remember, positively, but I don't think I went with her.

Q. Is not that a matter which would fix itself in your mind a little, if it had happened? A. I don't know that it should.

Q. When was this? A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Now the year? A. No, Sir; I think it must have been in the year I first met her.

Q. Now, do you know whether Mr. Tilton and your husband could not go and see her instead of sending for her? A. I don't know why they could not.

Q. There was not any reason that you know of, was there?
A. If there was any reason given I forget what it was.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton at the house when you started on this errand? A. I don't remember, but I think he must have been at the house.

Q. And they were both there, your husband and Mr. Tilton, when you returned with Mrs. Woodhull, were they not? A. I think so.

Q. Was this interview between Mrs. Woodhull, Mr. Tilton and your husband on this visit to which you brought her a private one, or did you take any part in it? A. I took no part in it.

Q. It was private, then, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did it continue? A. That I don't remember.

Q. Several hours? A. It might have been.

Q. And in what room was it held? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Now, you made another visit to this lady? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then you took your son. How old was he then? A. He must have been eleven or twelve years old. I don't remember the year it was that I went for Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. This third visit? A. I think all my visits were made in that same year.

Q. Then, how old would he have been? A. He is thirteen years old now.

Q. That would make him about nine, by my reckoning. Was that about his age? Don't you remember how old the boy was? A. I cannot tell you just how old he was.

Q. Do you remember what sized boy he was when you made this visit to Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir; I remember he was a boy with short jackets.

Q. How came you to make that visit? A. At the request of Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton.

Q. Both of them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were they both at the house? A. I think so.

Q. And how was the subject introduced to you by those gentlemen? A. They wanted to see Mrs. Woodhull with reference to something in the case, and would like me to go there and bring her to the house.

Q. Was there anything to prevent their going to see her that you know of? A. Not that I know of.

Q. Did you go in a carriage then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Your own carriage? A. No, Sir.

Q. What time of day was this? A. I have forgotten the time of day.

Q. Do you remember whether it was the forenoon, or afternoon or evening? A. I don't think it was in the forenoon; I think it was probably in the afternoon or evening.

Q. Don't you remember whether it was afternoon or evening? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then, it might have been evening that you went? A. I don't remember whether it was afternoon or evening.

Q. Was the carriage sent for to take you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whence was it procured? A. From the livery stable; I don't know what stable, now.

Q. From your usual livery stable? A. Yes, Sir; I presume so.

Q. What livery stable was that? A. I don't remember whether it was from Washburn's in Pacific street; I forget the man who then supplied us with carriages.

Q. It was either from Washburn, in Pacific street, or from where else? A. Either from Washburn's or Robertson's in State street; I think there was a stable in State street at that time.

Q. Can you not remember when you got to Mrs. Woodhull's, whether it was afternoon or evening? A. No, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. Did you find her and bring her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long an interview did she have with Mr. Tilton and your husband at that time? A. I don't remember how long.

Q. Was it several hours? A. It might have been.

Q. Did you take her back? A. I think not.

Q. Are you not sure whether you took her back or not? A. I would not like to say positively; I do not remember.

Q. Do you remember either of those visits distinctly, that it was in the day-time? A. No, Sir; I do not remember.

Q. Any one of the three visits? A. No, Sir.

Q. When Mrs. Woodhull came to your house at other times than these visits that you have named, was she there as a guest with other company, or was she there upon an interview of a private nature? A. I remember that she once took supper at our house with Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tilton, and I forget if there were any other strangers at the table.

Q. When was that? A. I think it must have been in the Summer of 1871.

Q. Was it by free invitation on your part that she came there? A. I don't remember that I invited her.

Q. Was it a set invitation, or was it a casual presence of hers? A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember whether Mr. Beecher was invited by you or not? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Or whether his presence there was casual? A. I don't remember.

Q. Don't you remember that your husband brought him in without your having expected him or knowing that he was coming? A. I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember anything about it? A. I remember Mr. Beecher was there, but how he came there, whether by special invitation or casually, I don't remember.

Q. You have no recollection whether, when Mr. Beecher came there, he came brought by your husband without your expecting him or not? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

MRS. WOODHULL'S WAY OF SALUTATION.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, do you remember an occasion when Mrs. Woodhull came to your house and Mr. Moulton was there, and Mr. Tilton was there, and you were there, and in your husband's room, I suppose—do you remember Mrs. Woodhull coming there? A. Remember her coming in the room?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember how she saluted you and your husband and Mr. Tilton on that occasion? A. I do not understand your question.

Q. How she saluted you three persons? A. I know she always saluted me in a ladylike way—in the usual way.

Q. Do you remember that she saluted Mr. Tilton, Mr. Moulton and yourself, with a kiss? A. I remember that she has kissed me.

Q. Do you remember that she saluted each of you, on that occasion, with a kiss? A. I do not remember that.

MRS. MOULTON'S MEMORY OF THE INTERVIEWS WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, how early did you learn that it was desired that you should be a witness in this case?

A. Since Mr. Beecher made his statement.

Q. That was the first, was it? A. I think so.

Q. Do you mean his public published statement of last year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From whom did you learn that you were desired to be a witness? A. I think from Mr. Moulton.

Q. And from that time to this has the subject of your being a witness in this case been a frequent one between your husband and yourself? A. No, Sir, not a very frequent one.

Q. Has it been repeatedly a subject of conversation? A. I have spoken of it to him a number of times.

Q. And he to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you since this time ever been requested to write out in any way what your recollection or your statement would be?

A. Mr. Frank Woodruff thought that I owed it to Mr. Moulton, after Mr. Beecher made his statement, that I should publish a card stating what I knew concerning this case.

Q. I asked you if you had been requested to write it out in any way? A. I said Mr. Woodruff once made that request.

Q. Did Mr. Moulton ever make that request? A. No, Sir.

Q. I do not mean the request of publishing a card, but the request of writing out what you might know or say? A. No, Sir; he never made such a request.

Q. Have you at any time written out what you proposed to say? A. No, Sir.

Q. So that the conversations that you have given here to-day, you have given by your unassisted memory, have you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And these are conversations that occurred something like four years ago, or the nearest, I think, spoken of, two years ago, with the exception of one of last Summer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have given these conversations as conversations of some considerable duration between you and Mr. Beecher. Are you at all confident that you repeat the very words at either of these conversations? A. I know that some of the words are Mr. Beecher's. I have given you the substance of his interview with me, as near as possible.

Q. Are you at all confident that you used, in giving this narrative, the words as used either by Mr. Beecher or yourself? A. I have endeavored to give you Mr. Beecher's words.

Q. Still, my question remains unanswered. Are you at all confident that, in giving these conversations, you have given the words used either by yourself or Mr. Beecher? A. I have, in some instances, given you Mr. Beecher's exact words.

Q. And you have no record, other than your memory, of them? A. No, Sir.

Q. And have never had? A. No, Sir.

Q. And never had any idea of being called upon to repeat them to any person, had you? A. No, Sir.

Q. When they occurred? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you understand that any of these considerations between yourself and Mr. Beecher were given on either hand with the right or the liberty to either of you to repeat them at your will? A. I understood that I was not to repeat them, except in a case of this kind, where I am to state the truth.

Q. Of course there are exceptions. That was your understanding of the conversations, therefore you didn't treasure them in your memory with a view of repeating them ever? A. I didn't seek to treasure them, but I could never forget my interviews with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Do you mean that all your interviews with Mr. Beecher you never shall forget them? A. I don't think I shall ever forget them.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, how frequently did you have interviews with Mr. Beecher at your house without the presence of your husband or Mr. Tilton, either while he had called upon them and was waiting, or before he left, after such calls? A. I don't remember but three or four interviews with Mr. Beecher alone. I would often meet him on the stairs or in the hall.

Q. Casually, as he came, or as he went? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In reference to these interviews with Mr. Moulton. So that the three or four interviews that you have spoken of are, you think, the only interviews of this kind that you had with Mr. Beecher, the only interviews separate from your husband or Mr. Tilton? A. The only interviews of any length; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, the only interviews that are impressed upon your mind?

Mr. Beach—Oh, no.

Mr. Evarts—I am asking.

Mr. Beach—Very well. She has told you.

Mr. Evarts—She has not yet.

The Witness—I remember of meeting Mr. Beecher very frequently, but not, as I said before, of any length; the interviews were not long.

Q. Anything that made any impression on your mind at any other interviews? A. I remember of his coming to the house on Sunday evening before his lecture—before his Friday night meeting, and asking me if Mr. Moulton was at home, and said that he must see the boy if it was only for five minutes, to enable him to face his congregation.

Q. Who did he mean by the boy—your husband? A. My husband.

Mr. Beach—To enable him to do what? A. To enable him to face his congregation once more.

Mr. Evarts—Well, that he said, and did he wait for Mr. Moulton? A. He did on one or two occasions.

Q. Well, I mean on this occasion; or, was Mr. Moulton in? A. Mr. Moulton was not in.

Q. Did he go off or did he wait? A. I think at this particular interview he waited.

Q. When he said he wanted to see the boy for five minutes, he did wait? A. I think he did.

Q. And saw him. Now, do you know when that was? A. No, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. Nor what part of the year it was? A. I don't remember.

Q. Nor what year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you any recollection in reference to what occasion or occurrence it was that he had this desire, thus expressed? A. I don't remember what was the occasion of his depression at that time.

MRS. MOULTON'S SYMPATHY WITH MR. BEECHER'S WOE.

Q. What was your habit, Mrs. Moulton, in these frequent visits of Mr. Moulton—

Mr. Beach—Who?

Mr. Everts—Of Mr. Beecher to your house, when Mr. Moulton was there, and in your husband's presence; what was your habit as to saluting Mr. Beecher? A. I always saluted Mr. Beecher in a friendly way.

Q. Did you usually salute him with a kiss? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you never salute him with a kiss? A. I never remember to have kissed Mr. Beecher but with one exception. On the morning when he told me that he was about to commit suicide, while he was sitting in the chair with the tears streaming down his face, I was standing behind him and leaned over and kissed him on his forehead, the only time that I ever kissed him.

Q. You remember that occasion? A. I do, Sir.

Q. When you did kiss him on the forehead? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Putting your arm around him? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—No; she did not say that.

Mr. Everts—Well?

The Witness—I put my hand on his shoulder.

Mr. Everts—One hand? A. My hand on his shoulder. He was sitting in the chair, and the tears streaming down his face, when he had spoken to me of his great suffering and of my—

Q. Well, the occasion that you have given?

Mr. Fullerton—Well?

Mr. Everts—The occasion she has given.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Everts—Now, I don't ask her to repeat it.

Judge Neilson—There is no occasion to repeat it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I agree to that.

Mr. Everts—Now, do you remember saying to him at the time when you thus kissed him on the forehead, whenever that may have been, that if there ever was a good man you believed he was one? A. I said that I had believed he was a good man; I had believed in him more thoroughly than in any other man, and that having known what I had of him, it destroyed my faith in human nature.

Q. Now, did you or not, at the time you kissed him on the forehead, whenever that was—did you say to him that if there ever was a good man you believed he was one? A. I think I might—I said to him that I had believed that he was a good man, and I at that time thought there was still a great deal of good in Mr. Beecher.

Q. Have you altered your mind on that particular? A. I haven't any faith in Mr. Beecher.

Q. When did you lose it? A. My faith as a moral teacher in Mr. Beecher was destroyed when I knew what I did of his life.

Q. But this remnant that you had at that time—when did you lose that remnant, that there was a good deal of good in him? A. In the way he has—the course he has pursued for the last year.

Q. Toward your husband? A. Yes.

Q. Now, I ask you, madam, again, if, when you put your hand upon him and kissed him upon the forehead, you did not then say to him that if there ever was a good man you believed he was one, then? A. I think I said to Mr. Beecher I believed that there was a good deal of good in him still.

Q. You think that is what you said? A. I think that is what I said.

Q. And do you remember that you did not say, "If there ever was a good man I believe you are one?" A. I don't remember that I said it in that way; I think I do remember of saying that I believed there was a good deal of good in him still.

Q. And you think that was said on the occasion when you thus kissed him on the forehead? A. I think so; yea.

Q. I think you say that you never kissed Mr. Beecher in the presence of your husband, during his visits? A. No, Sir; I was not in the habit of kissing Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well, I want your recollection distinctly, if you have any on that subject. Do you mean—? A. I recollect that I did not kiss him.

Q. Do you mean to say positively, Mrs. Moulton, that during the periods of these visits of Mr. Beecher, when he called to see your husband, and did see your husband, that then in the presence of the two you did not kiss Mr. Beecher? A. I did not.

Q. Never? A. Never.

Q. And you are very distinct in that recollection, are you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember occasions of his visits, and, in the presence of your husband, putting your hands upon his shoulder or his neck and appealing to your husband to take care of this good man? A. Yes, I remember one occasion particularly.

Q. One; you remember that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. It was on Friday night, just before—

Q. What Friday night? A. I remember it as a Friday night, because Mr. Beecher was on his way then to his Plymouth—to his prayer meeting.

Q. Well, you remember it as a Friday night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you give us the year and part of the year? A. No, Sir.

Q. You cannot say at all at what stage of things that occurred? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember in what room it was? A. Yes, Sir; it was in our front room; second story front room.

Q. And was that the usual place of your meeting, that is, of Mr. Beecher meeting your husband? A. There was not any usual place; they met in every room in the house.

Q. Well, that was a common place, as common as any other, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

WHAT MRS. MOULTON SAID TO MR. HALLIDAY.

Q. Do you remember, Mrs. Moulton, seeing Mr. Halliday on some occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And having a conversation with him in relation to this matter of Mr. Beecher's? A. No, Sir; I don't remember any conversation I have had with Mr. Halliday bearing on this case.

Q. Do you remember that, after the Woodhull publication, Mr. Halliday came to see you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On the subject of that publication? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember answering the bell as he rang, and introducing him into the house? A. I think I do; yes, Sir.

Q. You remember that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember his saying to you, "Mrs. Moulton, what does this Woodhull business mean? How is it that your name is connected with it?" A. I remember that he referred to the Woodhull story.

Q. Did you answer to that, "I don't know what right Mrs. Woodhull had to use my name; I had nothing to do with it?" A. I think I might have made that reply.

Q. And in further conversation between him and you on that subject did you say to Mr. Halliday, "Mr. Halliday, Mr. Beecher is my pastor, and has been from my childhood, and I believe in him, and they can say nothing that will lessen my confidence in him or my affection for him one particle?" A. Well, I don't remember that conversation; I don't remember that I said that; I remember distinctly that I did not say to Mr. Halliday that I believed Mrs. Woodhull's charges against Mr. Beecher.

Q. That you did not say you believed them? A. No.

Q. Don't you remember distinctly that you said that you did not believe them, and that there was not a particle of truth in them? A. I don't remember that; no, Sir.

Q. Well, now, do you or not remember that you said to Mr. Halliday the words that I now repeat, or words to this effect: "Mr. Halliday, Mr. Beecher is my pastor, and has been from my childhood, and I believe in him, and they can say nothing that will lessen my confidence in him or my affection for him one particle?" A. I don't remember the last part of that, Sir; the first part I remember.

Q. The first part you remember? A. I remember that I said Mr. Beecher had been my pastor since I was 16 years old. That I had told to every one, because that was the truth.

Q. Didn't Mr. Halliday know that? A. I don't know how he should have known it. It was Mr. Halliday's first visit to the house. As nearly as I can remember it was his first visit.

Q. Not his first connection with the Church, though? A. No, Sir; but he didn't know me personally.

Q. Do you think your conversation with Mr. Halliday on this subject ended with telling him that you had been a parishioner 16 years, or whatever it was—"from my childhood?" A. As nearly as I can remember that was all that was said. I remember distinctly trying to avoid discussing it with Mr. Halliday.

Q. Yes; but I am not asking you what you avoided, but what you said? A. I don't remember anything but the first part of your question.

Q. Do you mean to say that you do distinctly remember the first part? A. I remember distinctly telling Mr. Halliday that Mr. Beecher had been my pastor since I was 16 years old.

Q. And friend, too? A. I don't remember that, because he had not been my personal friend until this case came up.

Q. Well, it is not "friend" here; it is only "pastor." You do remember, then, saying to him that he had been your pastor from your childhood? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what else do you remember saying to him? A. As nearly as I can remember, I said to Mr. Halliday that I did not care to discuss the case.

Q. Do you remember that you did say that? A. As nearly as I can remember that was what I said.

Q. Well, do you remember that you did say anything of that kind? A. I do not remember positively, but I think I said that to Mr. Halliday.

Q. Now, in regard to the last part: "And they can say nothing that will lessen my confidence in him, or my affection for him, one particle"—do you remember distinctly that you did not say anything of that kind? A. I do not think I could possibly have said that, because my faith had been destroyed in him at that time.

Q. That is the reason you have for thinking that you did not say it? A. I don't think I said it; no, Sir. I don't remember to have said it.

Q. Do you remember that you did not say anything of that kind? A. I say that I don't remember having said it.

Q. That is all that you can say, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

MRS. MOULTON'S HABIT AS TO CHURCH-GOING.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, up to what time did you retain your sittings, or pew, if it was an entire pew, in Mr. Beecher's Church? A. I don't remember the year when we last had a pew there. I had sittings with Mr. George Robinson; the last time that we had sittings there was with him.

Q. Do you mean sittings that you hired, or that you occupied only a part of his pew, as a friend or relative? A. We occupied a part of his pew as his friend.

Q. Not as hiring it from the Church? A. No, Sir. I have never hired any portion of Mr. Robinson's pew.

Q. Now, up to what time did you frequent that church and occupy this seat, or any other seat there? A. Do you mean when I last attended the church?

Q. Yes, when you last— A. I think the last time that I was in Mr. Beecher's church was in last June.

Q. Up to that time had you continued to frequent that church? A. I had attended there occasionally. I had not been a regular member of the church—attendant of the church.

Q. Had you attended church anywhere else? A. No, Sir.

Q. So that whenever you went to church, up to June last, you went to Mr. Beecher's church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You say that you did not receive the communion after some date. When did you last receive the communion there? A. I have not taken communion since 1871. Previous to that I don't remember the date.

Q. Did you during the year 1871 take the communion there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Madam, anterior to 1871, when did you last receive the communion there? A. I cannot tell you the date.

Q. Can you give the year? A. Well, I presume—of course I suppose I took communion in the church the year previous.

Q. You suppose so; have you any recollection? A. I have not any recollection as to the time.

Q. Nor the year? A. I think I last took communion in 1870.

Q. Might it not have been in 1869? A. I never allowed a year to pass without going to the communion.

Q. Was it your habit to partake of communion there as often as once a year? A. Yes, Sir, oftener.

Q. About how often? A. I cannot tell you how often.

Q. But not every time it was administered? A. No, Sir.

THE INTERVIEWS REHEARSED.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, I think you say that the first time you knew of Mr. Beecher coming to your house was the 2d of January, 1871? A. I don't remember that I said he was there on that day. I don't remember the day; I think it was probably some time during that week.

Q. Well, you returned from the country on the 2d? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. He had never been in your house before, I think? A. Not in that house, to my knowledge.

Q. Now, when did you move into this house in Remsen-st.? A. May, 1871.

Q. And where was this house to which he came? A. Clinton-st.

Q. Thus early in January, in Clinton-st.? A. It was in Clinton-st.

Q. What number? A. I forget the number; between Livingston and Schermerhorn.

Q. Now, did you ever see him there at that house again. A. What did you say, Sir?

Q. At this house in Clinton-st., did you ever see him again after this call of his the first week in January? A. Oh, yes, Sir; I saw him there.

Q. Before you went South? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many times? A. I cannot remember.

Q. Cannot you give us any memory at all about it? A. He came very frequently, quite frequently, to see Mr. Moulton while he was sick.

Q. While he was sick? A. Yes; sometimes twice a day.

Q. Was your husband very sick? A. Very sick indeed; yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher come by your desire? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or your husband's desire? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not at all; not during that whole period, did you say? A. What do you say, Sir?

Q. Not during that whole period? A. Not on my invitation; no, Sir.

Q. Do you remember during this period of his visit to your husband, saying to Mr. Beecher: "Well, Mr. Beecher, when are you coming to see me?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You treated these visits as visits to your husband, in that inquiry? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you frequently say to him: "Mr. Beecher, when are you coming to see me?" A. I don't remember that I said so frequently. I remember having said that to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Do you remember having said it several times? A. I possibly might have said it several times.

Q. Didn't you regard that as an invitation to call upon you? A. No, a special invitation.

Q. Wasn't it a suggestion that he ought to make calls upon you and not confine them to your husband? A. Yes; it might have been a suggestion.

Q. Very well; didn't you intend it in the way that it was expressed? A. I suppose I did, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Beecher ever make any calls upon you as separate from these calls that he made at the house in reference to Mr. Moulton? A. I remember of only one instance when he said that he came to see me; it was on the Monday which I have stated.

Q. The Monday that you have given a — A. Then he said to Mr. Moulton distinctly that he did not come to see him, but came to see me.

Q. Mr. Moulton was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when was this occasion? A. On the 2d of June, 1873.

Q. And what time of day was this? A. In the morning.

Q. And where was your husband when Mr. Beecher accosted you and him? A. We were in the front room in the second story.

Q. Together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And on entering, did he say this that you have mentioned? A. After having wished us good morning he said it.

Q. How did he express himself in saying that—whom did he address? A. He said: "Well, Frank, I did not come to see you this morning; I came to see your wife."

Q. What did your husband say to that? A. I don't remember his answer.

Q. Did you and Mr. Beecher then leave the room and go to some other room? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did your husband leave and leave you and Mr. Beecher together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And your interview was in this room then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Continued. Now, that was the occasion in which Mr. Beecher was exhibiting and expressing great grief and depression, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have given the details of that. Now, Mrs. Moulton, in reference to what suggestion of any kind made by you to Mr. Beecher during this interview, were any parts of what Mr. Beecher said answered by him? A. I don't understand your question.

Mr. Beach—Nor I either.

Q. You have given a considerable statement of what Mr. Beecher said to you. Were you saying nothing to him during the progress of that statement by him? A. I said a great deal to him.

Q. During the progress of the statement? A. Yes.

Q. Now, won't you be so good as to give us how that statement went on, who spoke first and what was said, and then what by way of answer, and so on? A. Mr. Beecher spoke first. He said that he had had a sleepless night, that he was very much depressed, that he was utterly without hope, and he felt that he must have the sympathy or consolation of some friend, and as I was the only person who knew the truth in this case he came to me.

Q. Very well. What did you say to that—if he stopped there? A. As nearly as I can remember. I expressed my sympathy for him.

Q. How did you express that sympathy, and in what language? A. I said: "Mr. Beecher, I am very sorry for you in this great trouble, and there is only one way out for you, and that is by a confession and telling the truth. You cannot continue in this life of deception and hypocrisy. The truth will come out sooner or later."

MR. BEECHER REFUSES TO CONFESS BEFORE THE CHURCH.

Q. Well, did you stop then? A. Perhaps I did; I don't remember anything else just then that I said.

Q. Now, if you stopped, then what did he say? A. He said he could not confess it because his work would be at an end; that if he could not continue in his position as a moral and spiritual teacher there was nothing left for him to do; for the sake of his children—he would be a disgrace to them if he were to confess this crime; that he would have no home and that his people would not forgive him,

Q. Well, he stopped then; did you say something? A. I said that I thought they would forgive him; that he had done a great deal of good in the world, and that his Church were bound to him like, as one man almost, and I thought they would stand by him. He said: "No; that is a crime that they won't forgive; they won't treat me as generously and as kindly as you have done."

Q. Well, did that conclude that remark, and did you then say something? A. I don't remember that it concluded it; we were talking for a long time, three or four hours; I can't—On his part it was one long account of what he had suffered and how he was unwilling to try to go on and endure it any longer; that he felt on that morning that the truth would come out, and that he could not live to meet it; that he hadn't the strength, either physically or mentally.

Q. Well, do you remember anything further that you said by way of encouragement to him or admonition? A. I remember that I did endeavor to encourage him; I told him I thought it was a very cowardly thing to do.

Q. To do what? To take his life.

Q. Then he had said something about taking his life, had he?

A. Yes, Sir.

THE POISON MR. BEECHER WAS TO TAKE.

Q. Well, what did he say at this stage of the matter? A. He said that he had made up his mind if Mr. Tilton published his letter of apology to take his life; that he had a powder on his library table which he should take, and that he would pass quietly away without a struggle; that he had made up his mind that he would not try any longer to live it down.

Q. Did he further describe the powder? A. No further than that it was a powder which would give no pain, but cause almost—well, not instant death, but a very easy death.

Q. Yes, but he did not give any name to it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he state in what receptacle he had it on his library table? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or what quantity was there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he state whether it was labeled "Poison," or not, on his library table? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he tell you how long he had had it there? A. No, Sir; I don't remember that he did.

Q. Or where he bought it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, how did the interview come to an end? A. He said that it was near his dinner hour, and I invited him to stay to lunch, but he said that mother would expect him home; that he could not stay.

Q. Whom did he mean by "mother?" A. His wife, I presume.

Q. Was that his general mode of referring to his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did he leave in the same gloomy state that he came? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you understand that he was going away to take that powder then? A. No; because he had said that he should come to see me again.

Q. Yes; did he name the time when he was coming to see you again? A. He said he thought he would come on the next day or the day following.

Q. Yes; to see you and not Mr. Moulton? A. To see me.

Q. Well, where is that note? [Note handed to Mr. Evarts.] Take that, if you please, madam. Was it the next time that Mr. Beecher called, after this gloomy interview, that he gave you that note? A. He sent this note on the Sunday previous.

Q. That was the Sunday previous? A. Yes, Sir; it was on Monday that he came to see me.

Q. Oh! that is the day before he sent you that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did he come to see you the next day after this gloomy Monday? A. I don't remember that he came on the next day.

Q. Or the day after—was it very near? A. I don't remember how soon after.

Q. Well, was it a considerable space of time between? A. I don't remember how soon after he came.

Q. How soon after this gloomy Monday interview do you remember to have seen him? A. I don't remember how soon after.

Q. Well, a month? A. Oh! it was not a month.

Q. A week? A. I think I must have seen him during the next week.

Q. In the course of the week? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, do you mean that week, of which Monday was the beginning? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it is the hour of recess. The Court here took a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE INTERCOURSE BETWEEN THE MOULTONS AND THE TILTONS.

The Court met again at 2:20. Mrs. Moulton was recalled, and the cross-examination was continued.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, when did you first make the acquaintance of Mr. Theodore Tilton? A. I forgot the year.

Q. How far back does your memory run in respect to your acquaintance with him? A. I think it is at least six or seven years since I first knew Mr. Tilton.

Q. Didn't you know him in the earlier years of your married life? A. No, Sir; not until I moved to the Clinton-st. house.

Q. When was that? A. I cannot tell you the year.

Q. How many years did you live in Clinton-st.? A. I think four years.

Q. That would make it, then, about 1866? A. It is barely possible that that was the year, but I don't remember.

Q. Did you become intimately acquainted with him? A. He has been a frequent visitor at our house.

Q. Were you an intimate friend of his, and he of yours? A. Yes, Sir; I consider Mr. Tilton a friend of mine.

Q. And you of him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you make the acquaintance of Mrs. Tilton? A. I think in 1868 or 1869.

Q. And in what way? A. I forget how I first met her; I remember her coming to see me in the Clinton-st. house.

Q. Was she brought there by her husband? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Were you intimate and friendly with her? A. I think always friendly, but not intimate.

Q. Had you a regard for her, and affection? A. I don't know that I had any affection for her until after this case came up; then I had a sympathy for her.

Q. Yes, but up to this time, you had no particular feeling of regard or affection for her? A. I had a regard for her, not any affection.

Q. Well, was she in the circle of your family friends and acquaintances that you looked upon with regard or affection? A. She didn't visit me frequently, nor I her; but I regarded her as a friend.

Q. Were you aware of the intimacy between Mr. Tilton and your husband at a period earlier than your own acquaintance with him commenced? A. I knew that they were in school together.

Q. And their continued intimacy as men in Brooklyn? A. That intimacy was not continued from the time they left school. When we were living in Tompkins-place Mr. Moulton never saw Mr. Tilton, that I remember. It was only when we moved to Clinton-st. that I knew of the intimacy between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton ever form a habit of frequently being at your house at meals? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And for days at a time, one after another? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. He was a good deal at our house when he was organizing the paper—when he was about to start his paper, The Golden Age.

Q. When was that? A. I forgot the year.

Q. You mean The Golden Age? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Don't you remember that was the same season of this interview you have been talking about? A. I don't remember; I only remember that he came to our house and arranged for the paper?

Q. Was he then, at that season, in the habit of being in your house at meals a good deal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he frequently spend the night there? A. Not frequently.

Q. Did he sometimes spend the night there? A. I don't remember that he has ever spent more than one or two nights in our house.

Q. But you do remember he spent one or two nights there? A. I am quite sure that he spent one; I don't remember any more.

Q. And he may have spent more? A. He may have spent one or two more, but I don't remember of but one.

Q. Now, through what period of years, beginning in this season of 1871, when The Golden Age was established, in 1870-71—through how long a period did his habit of taking his meals at your house continue? A. Well, Sir, I don't know for how long. During the paper—his arranging the paper, he was at our house quite a good deal, perhaps every day, for two or three weeks.

Q. Was that the only period he was in the habit of taking his meals there days in succession? A. No, Sir; he has taken his meals at our house very frequently for the last four years.

WHERE THE PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL TAKE THEIR LUNCHEON.

Q. Now, during this trial, has your house furnished the hospitalities of the gentlemen that are conducting the cause of the plaintiff? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Every day? A. With one or two exceptions.

Q. That has been their place of meeting and of lunching, has it not? A. They have lunched with us; yes, Sir.

Q. Habitually? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And have you been present on these occasions? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At the table? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With them? A. Yes, Sir.

MRS. MOULTON MAKES REFLECTIONS ON MR. TILTON.

Q. Do you remember an interview that you had with Mr. Tilton at your house during some of these years; in January, 1873, do you remember having an interview with Mr. Tilton at your house, in which you told him that he was a villain, and would betray your husband as he had Mr. Beecher? A. I think I remember an interview with Mr. Tilton something like that.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. Yes, Sir; it was last July.

Q. Last July? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, on his making some remark in answer to this statement of yours, that you threatened to send for a policeman and have him put out of the house? A. No, Sir; I never remember the policeman, nor any reference to any policeman.

Q. What did you further tell him? A. I said if he was unkind to Frank, my husband—if he turned on him in any way, inasmuch as by a look, that he must never come into our house again.

Q. Did you, on the occasion of any interview that you had with Mr. Beecher, say to him this, or words equivalent to it, that "at heart, Theodore Tilton is treacherous, and hates you?" A. I think I might have said to Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton hated him; I think he had good reason to.

Mr. Everts—I didn't ask you that, madam. I ask that that be struck out.

Judge Neilson—Yes; the last clause will be struck out.

Q. Be good enough to confine your answers to my questions. Do you think that you did say to Mr. Beecher: "At heart Theodore Tilton is treacherous and hates you?" A. I remember repeatedly saying to Mr. Beecher that I thought it was impossible for Mr. Tilton to keep this quiet. I might, in that way, have said that I thought he was treacherous.

Q. Treacherous in regard to keeping it quiet? A. Yes, Sir. While he meant to keep it quiet I think he was often forced to an answer which told you the whole truth.

Q. I didn't ask you your opinion—what you told Mr. Beecher? A. That is what I told Mr. Beecher.

Q. What did you tell him? A. I told him that I thought Mr. Tilton was filled with revenge and anger against him, and that often when questions were put to him, he made a reply such as told the whole truth.

Q. You think you put that in, about the questions being put to him? A. I think I did.

Q. Well, now, madam, will you tell me whether you ever told Mr. Beecher, in terms, that Theodore Tilton at heart was treacherous and hated him? A. I don't recollect those exact words, yet I think I might have said so.

Q. Do you remember at what stage or season of this controversy you said that to Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; I cannot remember any particular time; there have been so many times when Mr. Tilton has had reason to feel angry.

Q. That I am not asking you about his reasons? A. I cannot tell you the times. It may have been a number of times.

Q. You think you may have said that a number of times to Mr. Beecher? A. I think I may have said it a number of times to Mr. Beecher.

Q. A number of times? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, did you first make a profession of religion in Mr. Beecher's Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in what year? A. I think in 1858.

Q. That was two years before your marriage, about? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember your habit of less frequent reception of the communion dating from your marriage? A. The first two years after my marriage I lived in New-York.

Q. And didn't attend the church? A. No, Sir.

Q. And then resumed connection with the congregation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In this place of worship? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember that from that time onward your habit of receiving the communion was infrequent? A. I remember so; yes, Sir.

MRS. MOULTON NO SYMPATHIZER WITH WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

Q. Had you become connected with the Woman's Suffrage movement? A. Never; no, Sir.

Q. Or anything of that kind? A. No, Sir: never in any way connected with it.

Q. Your husband, you think, was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that you were aware of? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was your house a place of meeting for the ladies and gentlemen who were active in that movement? A. Quite a number of them visited our house. I don't know that it was a place of meeting.

Q. Frequently? A. Not very frequently; no, Sir.

Q. And during what period—what year? A. I cannot remember the year.

Q. Was Mrs. Woodhull included in their number? A. I don't remember that Mrs. Woodhull was ever there with any of the Woman's Suffrage Party.

Q. You do not remember? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who do you remember as having been there? A. With Mrs. Woodhull?

Q. No; these Woman Suffrage people. A. Mrs. Stanton, Miss Anthony—I don't remember the names of any of the others.

Q. There were quite a number of others, were there not? A. Well, I don't remember at present the names of any of the others.

Q. Did you used to take part in their meetings or their conversations? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you avoid it? A. I had not any particular interest in it; I don't know that I avoided it.

THE INTERVIEW BETWEEN MRS. MOULTON AND MRS. TILTON.

Q. You have said something, Mrs. Moulton, of an interview that you had with Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that, in point of time—what year, and what part of the year? A. I don't remember the year or the time. I remember it was after my interview with Mr. Beecher.

Q. After which interview with Mr. Beecher? A. The first interview, when he confessed to me the truth of the charges made against him.

Q. The first interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was after the first interview? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was near that, was it not? A. I don't remember how near, or that it was very near to it.

Q. What? A. I don't remember that it was very near.

Q. You do not. Well, then, it was after some other interview that you had with him was it not, if it was not very near? A. I don't remember.

Q. You cannot give us any idea of the time that this interview with Mrs. Tilton took place? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know whether it was in 1873 or 1872? A. It must have been early in 1873.

Q. Do you think it was in 1872? A. It might possibly have been in 1871—in the Fall of 1871; but I don't remember positively when it was.

Q. You have no recollection—you cannot fix it at all? A. I cannot; no, Sir.

Q. Does it connect itself with anything that you can give a date to? A. I know it was after my interview with Mr. Beecher, because she asked me from whom I had learned the truth. I said from Mr. Beecher himself.

Q. That is your only mode of fixing the date? A. That is the reason I know it was after my first interview with Mr. Beecher.

Q. And that is the only mode by which you know it was after that? A. That is the best reason I can give you.

Q. But this interview with Mr. Beecher was in the first week of January, 1871, was it not? A. No, Sir; I didn't say that my first interview with him was in the first week of January. I saw him—he was coming to the house frequently before he spoke to me.

Q. Well, when was this first interview? A. I cannot remember whether it was in the Spring of 1871—

Q. Or— A. Or later; I don't remember the time—the season of the year; I only remember it was in 1871.

Q. And it might have been either Spring or Fall, so far as you know? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you have at present in your memory no circumstance that enables you to know whether it was Spring or Fall? A. No, Sir.

Q. Either in the weather, or anything that remains in your mind of what occurred, or anything else? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you have no way of telling me how soon after that you saw Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did not Mr. Beecher at all times—at the times of which you have spoken of talking with him, always show great solicitude that Mrs. Tilton should be properly considered and treated by everybody? A. Yes, Sir; he always expressed the greatest kindness and consideration for Elizabeth.

Q. For her, and always desired, did he not, that you would treat her well? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And visit her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And console her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you went to see her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did you see her? A. I saw her in her house in Livingston-st.

Q. In which room? A. I have seen her in two or three rooms of the house. I don't remember where I first saw her.

Q. This visit that I speak of? A. I don't remember which room.

Q. You don't remember which room? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember how long you saw her? A. No, Sir; I don't remember how long.

Q. Do you remember at any time visiting Mrs. Tilton when you supposed that there might be some public controversy or accusation that might bring this matter into contest? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And asking her if there would be a contest between her husband and Mr. Beecher, what her views would be? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You do? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that either of the occasions to which you have referred in your direct examination? A. I don't remember; I remember the conversation to which you refer, and the occasion of it. I think it was the time Mr. Tilton went down to the Church.

Q. Went down to the Church? A. I don't know when.

Q. Well, we have that date. You think it was after that, was it? A. I think it was at that time.

Q. Was it after that occurrence, or before? A. I don't remember whether it was after, or not.

Q. Now, what led you to make that visit, and what was your object in making it? A. I wanted to know from Elizabeth what course she meant to adopt in case she was called before the Church.

Q. You mean this last year? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't mean this last year's inquiries? A. No, Sir.

Q. You mean when the talk was about investigating Mr. Tilton? A. When he was dropped from the Church; I think that was the time; I cannot say positively. As near as I remember that was the time.

Q. Did you go of your own accord, or were you desired to go? A. I went of my own accord.

Q. You didn't go on your husband's desire, or in any interest, or at his request? A. No, Sir.

Q. And your object was to learn what her view would be if that contest came on? A. Yes, Sir; what position she proposed to take.

MRS. TILTON'S UNFALTERING DEVOTION TO MR. BEECHER AGAIN DESCRIBED.

Q. Do you remember asking her whether she should support her husband in a charge against Mr. Beecher, or whether she should not, and her answer being made to you that if there ever came a controversy she should speak the truth? A. No, Sir; I never remember that.

Q. You don't remember that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, did you urge her in that interview as to what she should do, one way or the other? A. I cannot remember that I urged her; I can tell what I said to her.

Q. Did you speak to her on the question of which side she should take? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you express an opinion as to which side she ought to take? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Were you at that interview very much excited and distressed? A. I think I was; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you show in your manner great distress? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did.

Q. And weep? A. Very likely, Sir.

Q. Now, did you in that interview express to her great distress lest Mr. Beecher should be betrayed by Mr. Tilton and your husband? A. Not that he would be betrayed by them, but that the truth would be known—made public.

Q. And by them? A. Oh! yes, by them.

Q. By them. Now, did you in that interview, in expressing this opinion of what Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton would do, beg her to stand by Mr. Beecher? A. So long as she could without sacrificing herself and the truth.

Q. Did you beg her to stand by Mr. Beecher? A. So long as she could without sacrificing the truth.

Q. You did beg her? A. Very likely, Sir—very likely.

Q. And did she not then tell you that, whenever the inquiry came, she should tell the truth? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did she tell you that she should not tell the truth? A. She told me distinctly that she should sacrifice her husband and deny everything for Mr. Beecher; that she believed under the circumstances that she would be justified in telling a lie. [Applause.]

Judge Neilson—The audience will please keep quiet.

Q. Now, madam, are you quite sure that in addition to saying she would sacrifice her husband and defend Mr. Beecher (is that the phrase?)— A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts (continuing).—That she added that she would tell a lie? A. Yes, Sir, I am; I cannot say as to the words that she used the word "lie," but she said that she would deny everything.

Q. But did she add that she should lie about it? A. If she didn't use the word "lie" she said falsehood.

Q. Did she say that she would tell a falsehood? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. One or the other—did she flatly tell you that she would tell a lie or a falsehood? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go to your house satisfied then that your errand had succeeded? A. I have never felt that any errand of mine has ever been successful.

Q. In this business? A. No, Sir.

[At this period there was some commotion in Court, and loud conversation.]

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, you will please, unless your business requires you to confer, please omit it; and either listen, or if you have anything to do in the way of reporting, attend to that.

THE MOULTONS' PORTRAIT OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. Do you remember about this portrait of Mr. Beecher being brought to your house? A. I remember it was brought there.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. I don't remember the year—whether we had it in Clinton-st. or not; I don't remember.

Q. You have no recollection? A. Not as to the year; no, Sir.

Q. But still you can recollect as to its being in your house a number of years? A. We have lived in our house for three or four years; I think it has been in our house since we have lived in Remsen-st.; I am quite sure of that.

Q. Ever since? A. I think so.

Q. Now, where was it hung? A. In the front parlor.

Q. And at one time was it removed from that place? A. It was removed—yes, Sir.

Q. When? A. This last Autumn.

Q. And another portrait put in the room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where was Mr. Beecher's portrait put? A. Mr. Beecher's portrait still stands on the mantel-piece in our front room on the second story.

Q. I beg pardon, I didn't hear your answer. A. It stands on the mantel-piece in the front room in our second story.

Q. Your own room? A. It is a sitting-room.

Q. Not a bedroom? A. At present it is not used as a bedroom.

Q. Was it a bedroom when the portrait was put there? A. No, Sir; for the reason that we have not occupied that room often.

Q. But it is a sitting-room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is the room up-stairs, where interviews took place? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And there it has remained? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, that was this last year? A. This last Autumn.

Q. And, of course, after Mr. Beecher's published statement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, while Mr. Beecher's portrait was in the parlor, that Mr. Moulton had gas lights arranged specially to display it? A. Not specially to show his picture; we have several of Mr. Paige's pictures.

Q. Yes? A. He had them arranged to show the different pictures in the room.

Q. Including this of Mr. Beecher? A. Including that; yes, Sir.

MRS. MOULTON'S REMARKS ABOUT THE PORTRAIT.

Q. Do you know Mr. Andrew McLean? A. Of The Eagle?

Mr. Fullerton—No.

Mr. Shearman—Yes, of The Eagle.

The Witness—I have met him; yes, Sir.

Q. You know Mr. Andrew McLean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He is a Brooklyn gentleman? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember a conversation with him about Mr. Beecher, when looking at that portrait, showing it? A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Do you remember a conversation with that gentleman, while you were exhibiting to him Mr. Beecher's portrait? A. I never remember exhibiting Mr. Beecher's portrait to him particularly.

Q. Do you remember, in November or December, 1872, in your parlors, expressing to Mr. Andrew McLean (in view of, and in reference to the portrait of Mr. Beecher) your own confidence and admiration for him? A. I think I expressed my admiration for Mr. Beecher; I don't remember now the exact conversation; but, I think I expressed, perhaps, my admiration for Mr. Beecher, but certainly not my confidence in him.

Q. You are quite sure you did not express your confidence in him? A. I am quite sure.

Q. And nothing equivalent? A. I don't know exactly the conversation; I know I have always spoken to every one of my admiration of Mr. Beecher.

Q. Did you say to Mr. McLean that he was a "pure man?"
A. I don't remember saying that?

Q. And, a "good man?" A. I don't remember having said that.

Q. And "entirely innocent of the Woodhull charges?" A. No, Sir. I never said that to anybody.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. No, Sir; never to anybody.

Q. Do you now remember having had a conversation with Mr. McLean? A. I remember Mr. McLean waiting in our parlor for Mr. Moulton, and I remember his calling attention to Mr. Beecher's portrait, and I think it quite likely that I expressed my admiration for Mr. Beecher, which I have never failed to do.

Q. Never what? A. I have always expressed my admiration of him.

Q. Now, are you quite sure that you did not say to Mr. McLean, as a part of your admiration, that he was a "pure man?" A. I certainly have never said that to anybody.

Q. Can you give us the language you did use to Mr. McLean, in expressing your admiration for Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Do you remember the occasion of Miss Emily Faithfull, who, I think, was an English philanthropist, being here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And, your giving her a reception at your house? A. I don't think we gave her a reception; she spent six weeks with us; but, during that time, I don't remember that we ever had any reception particularly.

Q. Did you not have a social reception, a levee, or a meeting of invited guests, on the occasion of Miss Faithfull's being at your house? A. We invited a number of friends to meet her, but never any reception, or levee, or large entertainment.

Q. Not a large entertainment? A. Not that I remember.

Q. Well, did you take part in any public reception elsewhere than at your house for Miss Faithfull? A. I went with Miss Faithfull to Steinway Hall once, when she delivered a lecture there; and I attended a reception given to Miss Faithfull by Mrs. Bullard of Thirty-ninth street.

Q. Mrs. Bullard of Thirty-ninth street in New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember calling on Mr. Beecher and inviting him to preside at that? A. Preside at the reception at Mrs. Bullard's?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir; I don't remember that I invited him.

Q. Or at the Steinway Hall meeting? A. I, perhaps, asked him to go; I don't remember that I asked him to preside.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. Well, I think it must have been in 1863.

Q. 1873, you mean? A. 1873.

Q. Now, don't you remember that you called especially at Mr. Beecher's house to give that invitation, and that you saw him, and gave it? A. I remember distinctly calling at Mr. Beecher's house and seeing him.

Q. [Interrupting]—And seeing Mr. Beecher and inviting him? A. But, I don't remember that I called to see him on that business.

Q. Do you remember now, Mrs. Moulton, at any interview with Mr. Beecher saying, to him this, or to this effect: "I am afraid that my husband and Mr. Tilton have overreached you?"
A. I don't remember using those words.

Q. You don't remember anything of that kind? A. Not these words; nor I don't remember of conveying any such message as that to Mr. Beecher. I remember often expressing great fear that the truth would come out in spite of my husband's endeavor to keep it quiet.

Q. And Mr. Tilton's? A. Yes; and Mr. Tilton's.

Q. You remember that, but you do not remember giving it the form or effect of an expression that your husband and Mr. Tilton had overreached him? A. I do not remember that—no, Sir.

Q. Do you remember asking Mr. Beecher if he was not fearful that your husband and Mr. Tilton had overreached him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. I do not remember that expression at all—no, Sir.

Q. Do you remember, Mrs. Moulton, having said to any person that your husband and Mr. Tilton had overreached the old man, meaning Mr. Beecher? A. I do not remember, at all, that sentence "overreaching Mr. Beecher," or "The old man."

Q. Well, do you put it upon the word "overreaching?" You know what that means. Was it any equivalent word? A. No; I have always had a very great fear that my husband would never be able to keep it quiet, while he has tried very hard to do it; he has tried to serve both Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton faithfully, yet I have always feared that Mr. Tilton, when he has been forced to answer, that he would tell the whole story; that has been my only fear.

Q. You think, so far as you observed, that the getting out of the matter came from Mr. Tilton? A. I think it was the force of circumstances.

Q. Operating upon him—don't you? A. Perhaps so.

THE FREQUENCY OF MR. BEECHER'S CALLS.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, you have spoken of Mr. Beecher coming to your house almost every day, or twice a day, &c. At what period of time, and through how long a period of time do you speak of any such frequency of visits? A. During the last four years, up to last July.

Q. Do you mean the whole four years he came there every day? A. I do not say so—no, Sir.

Q. Through the whole four years there were times when he came every day? A. Yes, Sir; when he had been in Brooklyn.

Q. Now, what periods of time were those at which his visits were thus frequent, and how long did any such frequency continue at any one time? A. I cannot state how long, nor at the particular times in which he came so frequently.

Q. Well, was one of those times in the Winter of 1871, before you went South? A. We went South in the Spring of 1871.

Q. Well, in the Winter of 1871, before you went South, was there a period of those frequent visits or not? A. Yes, he visited our house very frequently at that time, and during Mr. Moulton's illness he was at the house twice a day.

Q. That was the same season? A. That was in 1871.

Q. That was before you went South? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, when again did there come up any frequency of his visits? A. The time of the Woodhull publication.

Q. You mean of the card? A. I mean of the publication in her paper.

Q. The final paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was the end of 1872? A. I do not know, Sir, what year.

Q. You cannot remember any period of frequent visits from him between those two times? A. Yes, I remember he has been at our house very frequently for the last four years; I cannot tell the dates, the time of year, or the circumstances connected with it.

Q. You certainly do not mean to be understood that Mr. Beecher has been at your house every day during the last four years? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or parts of the days during the last four years? A. I do not know how many days in the year; I know that there have been a great many days when he has been there twice a day.

Q. Do you not know that there were certain periods at which he made frequent visits? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And don't you know that the rest of the time he did not make frequent visits? A. I know when he had been in Brooklyn he visited our house frequently.

Q. Well, but every day visits? A. Of course there have been times in the last four years, when he has visited our house more frequently than at others, but I can not remember the date or time.

Q. Do you not know that there were but few occasions in which the frequency of those visits occurred, and that they all had something to do with some question of publicity, or publication, or expected publication connected with this affair? A. No; I know Mr. Beecher has come very often to see Frank, as we said, to get a little hope and strength and courage from him.

Q. That may be. A. Not with reference to any publication.

Q. Did he come through a series of weeks, every day, for that purpose? A. I do not know that he did.

Q. Can't you distinguish in your mind at all that there were occasions of frequent visits, and then there was an interval when only ordinary visits were made? A. I do not remember of any time when the visits were ordinary.

Q. You do not remember any ordinary visits. A. Yes; for the last four years he has been so much at our house that I can hardly describe between the two.

Q. Now, do you remember there being visits there of ordinary calls in which you participated, and in which there was no connection with this business? A. I do not know that I remember hardly an instance when I was present.

Q. You do not remember any. Was Mr. Beecher, during this time, frequently there as a guest, by invitation at a meal, a dinner, or a tea? A. I remember on two or three occasions he was invited. On one occasion Mr. Tilton was to make a political speech in Brooklyn during the Greeley campaign, and Mr. Beecher was invited with others to take supper at our house.

Q. Is that the only occasion that you remember? A. No, Sir—I have a recollection of perhaps one or two other occasions; but I don't remember who were present, or who were invited—

Q. Do you mean to say that during the whole four years you think he was not invited to your house more than once or twice? A. Yes, but I do not remember.

Q. You do not remember? A. I don't remember how many times Mr. Moulton may have invited him.

Q. Well, how many times he came there to meals. A. I remember his taking breakfast with us one morning; I remember his taking tea with us once, or two or three times.

Q. But to your best recollection the occasions were very few and infrequent? A. I don't remember any occasion when he did so.

THE INTERVIEW AGAIN MINUTELY DETAILED.

Q. Now, you have mentioned one occasion in which Mr. Beecher was waiting in the parlor and took you by the hand, &c. Now, when was that occasion? A. It was either late in the Spring of 1871 or in the Fall; I don't remember whether it was Spring or Fall.

Q. That was not the first time, was it, that you saw him? A. No, Sir; it was not the first. I had frequently seen him at our house before.

Q. In reference to having any conversation with him—was this the first conversation you had with him? A. In reference to this case?

Q. This was the first one? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you cannot say whether this was in the Spring or Fall of 1871? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you are quite sure that up to that time you had no conversation with him? A. None whatever; no, Sir.

Q. Now, as I understand you, he did not then come to see you? A. No, Sir; he did not come to see me.

Q. He did not come to see you; and how came you to have any interview with him on that occasion? A. I presume I went into the parlor to speak with him, as I often did, when he was waiting for Mr. Moulton.

Q. And what did he say? A. He had been walking up and down the floor and seemed very much excited, and after a few moments' conversation he took my hand and asked me if I knew anything of this sorrow of his life.

Q. Of this sorrow of his life? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what did you reply? A. I said I did.

Q. What, then, did he say? A. He said: "Then Frank has told you the facts, has he, in the case?" I said: "He has."

Q. And then you parted? A. I don't remember of anything more; I expressed great sorrow at having known what I had concerning Mr. Beecher; I told him I had been a member of his church for so many years and believed in him.

Q. At this interview? A. I expressed great sympathy for him; some feeling of regret at my own condition of mind in having known what I did concerning him.

Q. At this interview? A. Yes, I think so.

Q. Are you certain you said anything more then? A. I know I expressed sympathy for him on that occasion—yes, Sir.

Q. And then you parted? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You say that you had an interview with Mr. Beecher about the first of June, 1871? A. I don't remember that I had.

Q. That has reference to some date; we fix it?

The Witness—Was it 1873?

Mr. Everts—No; that is another matter.

Q. Well, was the interview that you have just now been speaking about that about the first of June, 1871? A. I do not know at what time in 1871.

Q. Well, at all events, between this interview until Mr. Beecher took your hand, etc., whenever that occurred, was the first interview that you remember when anything passed between you and him concerning this business—that of June 2, 1873? A. I don't think I understand your question.

Q. You have given us an interview that took place some time in 1871? A. Yes.

Q. Is the next interview with Mr. Beecher in which anything passed between you and him on the subject, the interview that took place in June, 1873? A. I had a number of interviews between that time with Mr. Beecher with reference to this case.

Q. Well, the next that you have spoken of in your direct examination, was that the one of June 2, 1873, that lasted three or four hours, you say? A. That is the next of any importance.

Q. The next of any importance—on this occasion, which I think was in the morning, was it not? A. 1873?

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher found you and Mr. Moulton together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In this room up-stairs? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that then a bedroom? A. It was.

Q. Used as a bedroom? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And still it was the place where you had—where Mr. Beecher often had these interviews. Now, what passed between you and Mr. Beecher—and between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton, while your husband was there? A. Oh! most ordinary conversation; I forget what it was; nothing of any importance, however.

Q. The ordinary salutations, and anything in his manner which was peculiar, while Mr. Moulton remained there, I mean? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Beecher said that he had not slept any all night; that he was very much depressed; that he was utterly worn out.

Q. He said that while Mr. Moulton was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, was that all that he said while Mr. Moulton was there? A. No; I asked him if he would lie down on the lounge. I gave him a pillow; covered him up with the Afghan or whatever was lying there, blanket; he laid down on the lounge.

Q. Put a blanket on him? A. I covered him with the ordinary blanket of the lounge. Yes, Sir; Afghan.

Q. The Afghan?—yes. Well, you suggested that to him? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. What led you to make that suggestion that he should lie down, and that you should cover him with the Afghan? A. Because he said he was very tired; that he was heart-broken; he was utterly without any hope; that he had not res ed any;

that he came around for some comfort, and consolation, and sympathy, &c.

Q. And that he came to see you, and not Mr. Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, all this was done, then, while Mr. Moulton was there? A. Yes; and he laid down on the lounge while Mr. Moulton was there.

Q. And was covered with the Afghan? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then Mr. Moulton went off? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, as he lay there, he talked to you, didn't he? A. Yes.

Q. And where were you seated? A. I was sitting on the chair opposite to him.

Q. Now, won't you tell us what Mr. Beecher said; the language that he used, as you remember it, and go through the whole interview in that form, of what he said and of what you said, if you know what it is? A. Well, he began by saying that he was depressed and discouraged—

Q. Was this after your husband went away?

Mr. Fullerton—No; she commenced the narrative.

Mr. Everts—I want you to begin after your husband went away.

The Witness—I have so commenced.

Q. Very well; that is all that I have asked you? A. He expressed great sorrow for the misery that he had brought upon himself and Mrs. Tilton, upon every body connected with the case, but said that he felt that he had thoroughly repented, and that he had been forgiven, and that he was better fitted now to preach than ever before. He expressed to me his love for Elizabeth, and his great remorse and sorrow that she should have ever confessed to her husband that it had brought nothing but—it would bring only ruin in the end to all. After lying on the sofa a little while he got up and walked up and down the room in a very excited manner, with the tears streaming down his cheeks, and said that he thought it was very hard, after a life of usefulness, that he should be brought to this fearful end, and I said that I thought it was—it was very hard, and there was only one way out of it for him; there was only one chance for him left, and that was by confessing it. After walking up and down for some time he sat down in the chair. I stood behind him and put my hand on his shoulder, and I said: "Mr. Beecher, if you will only go down to the church, Frank will go with you; he will stand by you through everything; it does not matter what comes to you, he will always be your friend, and, no matter what comes, I will always be your friend if you will only go down to the Church and confess, because that is the only way out for you; I am convinced of that; you can never cover such a crime as this and continue in the pulpit, except through a confession on your own part. You have been guilty of crime and you have got to take the responsibility upon yourself, and suffer the penalty. And he said: "Well, I never gather much comfort from you; you are always to me like a section of the day of judgment." And I said: "Well, I feel great sympathy for you, but I don't see how you can continue in this sort of life; living a lie; going into your pulpit and preaching Sunday after Sunday." I said: "I have never heard you preach since I knew the truth that I haven't felt that I was standing by an open grave; I cannot express to you the anguish and the sorrow that it has caused me to know what I have of your life. I believed in you since I was a girl; believed you were the only good man in this world. Now, it has destroyed my faith in human nature. I don't believe in anybody; I don't go to church—all my interest in the Church and in you is gone, and I am sure I cannot respect you unless you manifest to me that you are sincerely repentant by going down to the Church and confessing your crime. It is very hard for Mr. Tilton to be abused by your friends, and to be charged with treating his family ill—his unkindness to his wife while he feels that you are principally the cause of all his trouble. It is very hard for him; it is very hard for all concerned. If you are only amind to take this case into your own hands you can settle it by confession. Your people will stand by you; they believe in you; they will forgive this one crime that you say you have committed and which you have—which you say you have—sincerely repented for, and you believe you have been forgiven, and you feel that you are better able now than ever before to do great good in this world if you can only be allowed to go on to the end of your life without all the particulars of this case being made known; that is all that you ask, and if the facts are to come out, you want to go out of life; that you cannot live; that you cannot endure it any longer; physically and mentally you are worn out; and it is only with the greatest care that you have been able to preach Sunday after Sunday." His whole conversation was one—

WHAT THE CONFESSION SHOULD BE, NOT SUGGESTED.

Q. Well, that is what you said to him, this last ?
A. Yes.

Q. Is that what you advised him to say to his people ? A. I don't—

Mr. Fullerton—I think she ought to be permitted to finish the narrative.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I will go on with it; I will take care of my own inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will take care of you if you violate any rule.

Mr. Evarts—I do not violate any rule.

Mr. Fullerton—I think the witness ought to go on with the narration until she is through.

Mr. Evarts—I am finding out what she is saying now, before I go any further.

Mr. Beach—Yes, your Honor; but it is necessarily breaking up a continued narrative which the witness is called upon to give, and must necessarily embarrass her in her relation by diverting her.

Mr. Evarts—I don't wish to do so.

Mr. Beach—I don't know what you wish to do, Sir; I know what the effect is, and I know it would embarrass any one when they are asked to give a narrative about a transaction—conversation, which took place and continued for a very long time, to interrupt them with questions that do not look to a continued statement of the conversation.

Judge Nellson—Well, let the witness proceed.

Mr. Evarts—My inquiry, if your Honor please, was whether this last was what she said to Mr. Beecher, and was in the form of what she advised him to say to his people.

The Witness—I don't know that I ever stated to him what the confession should be to the Church. I simply left—I left that to him. He knew what his confession to the Church could be better than I could—how much he was to confess.

Q. I understand your form of expression in this latter part to have been of what you told him he should tell his people. A. This was my conversation with him; I simply said to him that I thought he should make a confession to his people.

Q. Yes—and should tell them these things, did you? A. I don't think I ever said what he should tell them.

Q. Very well; you can go on now. A. Mr. Beecher then spoke to me of coming some time, either the next day—to bring me some mementoes which he wished to give to his friends—something to Mrs. Tilton—asked me always to respect her and care for her, and be kind to her; that she was not a bad woman at heart; that she had sinned through her affections.

Q. Well? A. I only remember that Mr. Beecher was in a very excited condition of mind on that day; that he told me very positively that he should take his life, and I believed him when he said so.

Q. You did believe him? A. I believed him at that time.

Q. Yes, well? A. And I rebuked him and told him of how much I regretted that he had committed this sin, because I had believed in him; how it had destroyed all my faith in human nature; his only reply was that he had repented and he believed that he had been forgiven; still he suffered greatly, fearing it would come to light; that the truth would all be made known; that he suffered first for the sake of the woman who had given her love to him, for the sake of his children; he said that he would—that his children, of course, would despise him; that he could never go back to his house, and then I said: "You could go up to your farm and write"; but he said, "No; if the people won't listen to hear me preach, they certainly won't read anything that I may write; if I cannot continue as a moral and spiritual teacher, why there is nothing left for me to do, and I had better go out of life than remain a burden to my children and my family, and the Church. All my past record will be wiped out." He said he hadn't any fear of death; he rather longed for it as a release from all the trouble, and all the anxiety, and all the anguish of mind, and remorse that he had suffered and was suffering daily; expressed to me his great gratitude for my sympathy; said that our house was the only place where he could act naturally and without reserve; that when he went home he must be cheerful and happy, and wear a smile; that when he went into the pulpit he must be at his best—the least indication of weakness on his part was a confession; that is the only thing of any importance at the interview that I know.

Q. That is all you remember that you have given us? A. Of any importance.

Q. All that is impressed upon your mind? A. That is all that I can remember at present.

Q. Did he come back and see you again? A. On that day?

Q. No, the day he said he was coming and going to bring some mementoes? A. He never brought me any mementoes, and I don't remember positively that he came on the next day.

Q. Well, did he come anywhere near that time and have a further talk with you on the subject? A. He came soon after; referred to his depression on that day, but said that he felt more hopeful; that he thought that his card in The Eagle was only temporary relief; he was living in a fear of—a constant fear and anxiety, not knowing at what time Mr. Tilton might break out with the truth.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, at what time of the day did Mr. Beecher come to your house on the occasion of this long interview? A. To which I have just referred?

Q. Yes. A. He came early in the morning; about—

Q. How early? A. Perhaps nine o'clock; perhaps later.

Q. And at what time did he leave your house? A. About lunch time, I think.

Q. You asked him to stay to lunch, did you not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he said he would be expected at his dinner by—
A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Beecher. Now, was that about one o'clock? A. I think it was about two o'clock; I don't remember exactly.

Q. Was it your usual lunch time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. There was no delay of your lunch in consequence of this, you think? A. Not that I remember; no, Sir.

Q. There was none. Now, Mrs. Moulton, you say that Mr. Beecher sent some messages by you to Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did the interviews at which that occurred take place? A. I cannot state the times.

Q. What? A. I cannot; I don't remember the time—nearly always when he would come in, he would ask me if I had seen Elizabeth.

Q. Yes; he always expressed interest in regard to her condition, did he? Yes, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S MESSAGES TO MRS. TILTON.

Q. And when—you cannot tell us when it was he sent any messages? A. I cannot tell you of any particular time.

Q. That he always sent messages. A. He sent messages a number of times.

Q. Well, when was the first time that you can tell us, that he sent a message? A. I cannot tell the first time.

Q. Was it after this long interview that you talk about, or before? A. Well, it must have been before.

Q. Before that—but you cannot say whether it was in 1871 or 1872? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or the early part of 1873. Now, where did any interview occur in which he sent any messages by you to Mrs. Tilton, and how did it come about? A. He always asked me to bear his love to her.

Q. He what? A. To take his love to her.

Q. Do you say always? A. I think, nearly always sent his love to her.

Q. Well? A. Wanted me to find out if there was anything she was in need of, any luxury, any little comforts she needed; if so to let him know, and after I had repeated to him a conversation I had had with Mrs. Tilton, when she felt that she could not live with Mr. Tilton any longer, and was going to live with her mother, he told me expressly to see her and say to her from him, that for his sake, if not for her own, she must remain with Mr. Tilton; she must be to him a good and true wife; to make his home as happy as she could.

Q. When was this? A. I don't know when it was. It was when I repeated to him a conversation which I had with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Cannot you give us any idea when this was? A. I cannot, no, Sir.

Q. What year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, that is what you mean by the messages that were sent to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And any other messages that you remember, except of this nature or its equivalent? A. Well, he always told me to say to her that she must refuse to talk with everybody of anything bearing on this case. While she was trying very hard to restore the damage she had done by a confession, she was all the time making it worse.

Q. Anything more? A. No. Mr. Beecher's messages to Mrs. Tilton were always kind—kind and affectionate, that is all.

Q. That is all? A. And an interest for—that she should have everything that she needed; she should be comfortable; that she must keep up a good heart and be hopeful and courageous, and good to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Are you unable to give us any clue to this time when Mrs. Tilton, as you say, was thinking about leaving her husband and living with her mother? A. I don't remember the time.

Q. Now, after receiving this note which I have shown you, which is dated June 1st, 1873—isn't it Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—I think it has no date, only that it was delivered at the same time with the note to Mr. Moulton.

Q. Yes, fixed at that time. Have you said that you had a conversation with him the Monday after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What day of the week was this, June 1st? A. The 2d of June, I think it was; on Monday.

Q. You say it was the Monday after that you had a conversation. How are you able to fix the day and the date? A. I remember the letter distinctly. Mr. Moulton read the letter to me on Sunday.

Q. Well, was the 1st of June Sunday—you mean the next day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, the next day—now Mr. Beecher called the next day, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he call to see Mr. Moulton or you? A. He called to see me.

Q. And Mr. Moulton not there? A. Mr. Moulton was in when he called; when he first came to the house.

Q. Yes, and what passed between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton and you, while your husband was—

Mr. Beach—That is the same thing you have just gone over. Mr. Evarts—Is this the one?

Mr. Beach—Why, certainly.

Q. Now, this, I think, is the last conversation then, that you have given, with Mr. Beecher? A. 1873.

Q. Yes? A. No, Sir, it was not the last that I had with him.

Q. Which later one have you given? A. The last conversation that I had with Mr. Beecher was on the 18th of July—last July.

Q. 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Between this 2d of June, 1873, and this 18th of July, 1874, there was no interview between you and Mr. Beecher, of any information, was there? A. On one occasion when he met me in the hall, and told me—thanked me for my sympathy, and said that I was the best friend that he had, that I was dearer to him than any sister that he had.

Q. That you have spoken of in your direct examination, also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This visit on the 18th of July was not made to you, was it, by Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was made to your husband? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you present at the whole of the interview between your husband and Mr. Beecher? A. I left the room when my husband entered. I don't know anything at all about the interview.

Q. Then your conversation was with Mr. Beecher before your husband came? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, where was your conversation with Mr. Beecher on that occasion—held in what room? A. In the study at the top of the house, the upper floor of our house.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton in the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what delayed his coming? A. He was preparing to go before the Committee on that evening.

Q. Then this was in the evening, was it? A. It was towards evening. It was not dark. It was in June—or in July.

Q. Well, did you go up to the study to see Mr. Beecher? A. I asked Mr. Beecher to come up with me in the study.

Q. Was Mr. Moulton there? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long a time passed before Mr. Moulton came up? A. Perhaps ten or fifteen minutes.

Q. And whatever conversation you had with Mr. Beecher, was in that ten or fifteen minutes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On that occasion, I mean? A. I had another conversation with him when he came down stairs, but the conversation lasted fifteen minutes in that room.

Q. Now, how did that conversation come about? A. Mr. Moulton came—

Q. I am talking about what occurred only between you and Mr. Beecher. What occurred there?

Mr. Beach—You asked how the conversation came about.

Mr. Evarts—Well, how did it pass along? A. I think my first word to Mr. Beecher was: "Frank is very angry with you.

What have you done?" He said: "Nothing that I know of. What is he angry about?" I said: "He is angry because you called your Committee." He said: "I didn't call the Committee. My people called the Committee. I could not object to an investigation." I said: "Why did you do it without consulting Frank?" And he said: "I don't consider that Frank has anything whatever to do with my church affairs. I have intrusted myself to Frank wholly and entirely throughout this whole case, and I have oftentimes been governed by him when it was against my better judgment to do so, and while I have trusted implicitly in Frank, in this case I think he has nothing whatever to do."

Q. Did you say anything further? A. Frank, I think, then came into the room, and I went down-stairs.

Q. And that was all that happened before? A. As near as I can remember that was all.

Q. Then, after your husband and Mr. Beecher had an interview, in which you were not present, did anything further pass between you and Mr. Beecher, and where, and how? A. As Mr. Beecher came down the stairs, I called to him in the front room, second story, and said that I would like to speak to him. He came into the room, and Mr. Moulton came in with him, and as they entered the room Mr. Moulton says: "Well, then, Mr. Beecher, you think my statement before the Committee an honorable one." He said: "Perfectly so." After a few words more of conversation, which I don't remember—not any of importance—Mr. Moulton left the room and went down stairs, and was then going down to the Committee at Plymouth Church. After he had left the room I said: "Mr. Beecher, do you know what Mr. Tilton has promised in The Eagle of to-night?" He said: "No, I do not." I said: "He has promised to give to the public a statement of the facts in this case in ten days. If he publishes that statement it will ruin you." He said: "I think not;" but I said: "He will publish your letter of confession." He said: "I have never made any confession in writing." I said: "That letter given to Mr. Moulton in confidence." "Well," he said, "if that letter is published it is a breach of confidence on the part of Frank, if he publishes that letter." I said: "I don't know anything about that. I only know that if that statement is published, you will be ruined." He said: "Very well, let them come on, and do their worst; they cannot convict me." I said: "But, if Mr. Tilton fails in this, he is going to take his case into the courts." Says he: "He hasn't any case to take into the court. He has condoned his wife's offense, and lived with her for four years; he hasn't any case." And I said: "Well, I don't know anything about that; I only know what he proposes to do. He says he can no longer endure what he has been suffering; that he is losing—he has lost—he is suffering, and his paper is suffering, and he cannot endure it any longer, and he is determined to publish the facts, to tell the truth." And then I said: "Now, you see, Mr. Beecher, how much better it would have been for you if you had taken my advice in the beginning, and made a confession to your church, and then you would have only the original sin to answer for, and now you have four years' of lying and perjury to answer for." He said: "I will never confess it. I will die before I will make a confession."

Q. By your original advice did you mean the advice that you had given him on the 2d of June, 1873? A. Yes, Sir; my advice from the first to the last was that he should make a confession, and if not—

Q. Well, I have asked you a question, if you mean the advice you gave him? A. Yes, Sir, I do.

Q. Not as to any additional advice. Now, all this that you stated to Mr. Beecher on that occasion of Mr. Tilton's intentions—how did you come to know anything about them? A. Why, I had read the card in The Eagle.

WHEN THE PRESENT SUIT WAS PROPOSED.

Q. Was there anything in the card in The Eagle about Mr. Tilton bringing a suit at law? A. No, Sir.

Q. How then had you learned all the things that you told Mr. Beecher then? A. Because I had heard Mr. Tilton say that he would take his case into the courts of justice, where he would be fairly dealt with.

Q. You had heard that? A. I had heard him make that remark in general conversation.

Q. At that time? A. It must have been about that time.

Q. It must have been before this, if you said this to Mr. Beecher. A. Well, perhaps it was the day, or a few days before; I don't remember how long before.

Q. Can't you give us any information as to how long before this you had heard from Mr. Tilton that he was going to have a suit at law with Mr. Beecher? A. It was not very long before.

Q. Well, was it six weeks before? A. I think the first that I heard was about the time of the Bacon letter.

Q. Then as early as the Bacon letter you had heard— A. I am not sure it was as early as that.

Q. That is your best impression? A. I don't remember how soon it was, but I remember that Mr. Tilton made that remark.

Q. And you had that opinion, that he intended to have a suit at law? A. I knew that he proposed to state the truth.

Q. Well, I have asked you about the suit at law. You told Mr. Beecher— A. I certainly did.

Q. About the suit at law. Now, you think you heard that from Mr. Tilton as early as the Bacon letter? A. I am not sure that I did.

Q. Isn't it your best recollection that you did? A. I cannot say that it is; I don't know when he first spoke of it.

Q. Why did you refer to the Bacon letter as a period, if you had no recollection connecting it with that period? A. Well, because at the time of the Bacon letter Mr. Tilton was very much wrought up by the criticisms of the newspapers and of Mr. Beecher's friends. I think it was quite likely at that time, still I cannot say positively when it was.

Q. Well, if it was not at that time do you remember any other time that it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, this communication, Mrs. Moulton, that you made to Mr. Beecher on this last occasion concerning which you have spoken—did you do that by the request of any one? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did your husband know that you were going to do it? A. No, Sir.

THE TRACY INTERVIEW AT MR. MOULTON'S.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, can you give us any information as to the days—the Sundays in December, when Mr. Tilton or Mr. Tracy were at your house—December, 1872, when Mr. Tilton or Mr. Tracy were at your house? A. I don't remember meeting Mr. Tracy—of knowing him personally at that time?

Q. In December, 1872? A. I don't remember that I met him.

Q. You don't remember seeing him there then? A. I think he was at the house.

Q. You cannot tell us, then, on what Sunday in December Mr. Tracy was there? A. I don't remember in 1872.

Q. Now, have you any means of telling us on what Sundays in December, 1872, Mr. Tilton was at your house? A. I know he was there so much of the time that I do not remember—

Q. How? A. I do not remember any particular time.

Q. You cannot fix that date. Mrs. Moulton, perhaps you will remember a Sunday when Mr. Tilton, Mr. Tracy, Mr. Woodruff, and your husband were at tea at your house together. Do you remember that occasion? A. As early as 1872?

Q. December, 1872. A. I remember that Mr. Tracy, and Mr. Woodruff, and Mr. Moulton were in consultation, but I do not remember of meeting him at tea.

Q. Well, you remember an occasion when they were all there? A. I do not remember about the tea; I don't think I was present.

Q. You do remember the occasion on which they were all there? A. I remember they were there.

Q. Yes, together. Now, can you tell us what Sunday in December that was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Mrs. Moulton, when did you first understand that you were to be a witness in this case? A. I think in July, 1874.

Q. Of last year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And ever since that time have intended to be a witness? A. If I was called—yes, Sir.

Q. If you were called; and you date that period and time of being a witness from the publication of Mr. Beecher's defense, or whatever it is called—his statement? A. I do not know that it dates particularly from that statement of Mr. Beecher's.

Q. I thought you said heretofore that that was so? A. Well, I can only say that since July, I learned that I was to be a witness.

Q. What? A. Since July I learned that I was to be a witness in the case.

Q. Do you mean before the Church? A. No, Sir, I have never been spoken to in regard to the Church.

Q. Before the Church Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, what suit was there in July that you could be a witness in? A. Should the case come to trial, I should be a witness.

Q. Were you expecting to be a witness before the Church

THIRTY-FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL REST THEIR CASE.

MRS. MOULTON EXPLAINS WHY SHE KISSED MR. BEECHER—HER EXAMINATION CONCLUDED—CATHARINE CAREY'S LIFE AS A SERVANT—SHE ADMITS HAVING BEEN INTOXICATED—THE PLAINTIFF TO INTRODUCE A LARGE AMOUNT OF REBUTTAL TESTIMONY.

TUESDAY, Feb. 23, 1875.

Mr. Evarts, to-day, resumed his cross-examination of Mrs. Moulton. After a few scattered queries regarding Mrs. Woodhull's visits to Mrs. Moulton and the interviews described by the witness, the cross-examination ended. The redirect examination was more interesting, Mrs. Moulton being called upon to say why she kissed Mr. Beecher at the memorable interview of June, 1873. She said that Mr. Beecher was crying and she was crying, and she never expected to see him again. Mr. Evarts interrupted here, and objected to hearing anything further regarding this act, and Mr. Fullerton desisted. The exact language of Mrs. Moulton in advising her husband, in 1874, to make a short statement to the Plymouth Investigating Committee, as stated by her, was, "Give the old man another chance;" the irrepressible audience greeted these words with laughter, calling forth a severe reprimand from Judge Neilson. Soon afterward Mrs. Moulton was excused, and stepped from the witness chair.

Mr. Evarts and Mr. Fullerton now both arose to their feet to address the Court, and considerable amusement was caused by the two men, who for a moment stood smiling and bowing each other to proceed. Mr. Fullerton gracefully withdrew at last, and his opponent went on to say that the defense would call the witness, Catharine Carey, for further cross-examination. Mr. Fullerton was upon his feet in an instant in a very different attitude, and in one voice he and Mr. Beach cried, "We rest our case! We rest! She can't be called on our side." The minor issue regarding Mrs. Carey was forgotten in the murmurs of astonishment that followed the words of the plaintiff's lawyers. There was an excited look on the face of every spectator, and the counsel for Mr. Beecher did not disguise their surprise.

Mr. Evarts went on, however, as if there had been no interruption, and the result was that Mrs. Carey again took the witness-chair, paler Committee, or only in a law suit, if there should be one? A. I didn't expect to be a witness before the Committee.

Q. Where were you in July of last year? A. The only time I was absent from the city I spent in Narragansett.

Q. Well, was not that in July? A. I forget the time that I went to the country.

Q. Were not you absent in July at Narragansett? A. I think a portion of July, yes, Sir.

Q. What part of July? A. It must have been after the 13th. I don't know how soon after. I think I went to the country about the 26th of July, I am not sure.

Q. Was it before you went to Narragansett, or after, that you understood that you were to be a witness? A. I presume it was before.

Mr. Evarts—It has reached the usual hour, Sir, and I shall not be able to conclude to-day.

AN ADJOURNMENT TILL TUESDAY.

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, what conclusion did your Honor arrive at, in respect to Monday, whether there is to be a Court or not?

Judge Neilson—I wish to learn of the counsel what the law is on that subject. They are generally advising us about the law.

Mr. Evarts.—The conclusion I have come to, is that the statute makes it a legal holiday, a dies non.

Judge Neilson—My impression is that way, arising mainly from the fact that the statute provides that the sheriff's office shall be closed, and the clerk's office shall be closed. It is difficult to conceive how you can have a court without a clerk's office.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we shall take no exception to your Honor's ruling on that point.

Judge Neilson—Then we adjourn until Tuesday morning at eleven o'clock. Is that the understanding?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir. Mr. Beach, do you agree to that?

Mr. Beach—I agree to that.

Judge Neilson—It may be a benefit to the jurors. I hope I may have the pleasure of seeing them here Tuesday morning, improved by the air and exercise in the meantime. Get ready to retire, gentlemen. Meet us here on Tuesday at 11 o'clock.

The Court then adjourned until Tuesday, February 23, at 11 a. m.

and more emaciated than before, but as self-possessed and clear in her answers as at her former appearance. Her life for years back was examined after she gave her testimony last week, and it was discovered that her real name is Smith. She insisted to-day that on her first examination she gave that name, which belonged to her husband, who deserted her several years ago. It was also ferreted out that the woman had been fond of liquor, but if the counsel expected that she would give a denial of that fact they were disappointed, for when asked if she knew why she was discharged from a certain family in Brooklyn, she quickly answered, "Yes, Sir; intoxicated." Evidently appreciating her inferiority in point of education, the witness apologized to Mr. Evarts on one occasion, after having given a curious jumble of words, saying that she did not know how to pronounce like "high-flown people."

The plaintiff's lawyers had no questions to ask the witness, and she left the stand. An earnest whispered consultation between five of Mr. Beecher's counsel followed, and at its close Mr. Evarts walked up to the bench and privately informed Judge Neilson that he found that Mr. Tracy, who had been selected to open for the defense, was not ready to proceed, but if possible the opening would be made in the afternoon. It being within a few minutes of one o'clock, the court adjourned for recess. Immediately after the interval, Mr. Evarts announced that counsel for the defense had not supposed that the plaintiff's case would rest until night, and that Mr. Tracy was therefore not ready, and could not begin. He asked an adjournment to Feb. 24. Mr. Beach responded that to allow the adjournment under the circumstances was only a proper courtesy, and he therefore concurred in Mr. Evarts's request. The audience was then dismissed.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MRS. MOULTON'S MEMORY ASSAILED.

The Court met at 11 a.m., pursuant to adjournment. Mrs. Emma C. Moulton was recalled and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Evarts—Mrs. Moulton, you said on your direct examination that you went to Mrs. Woodhull's and "brought her to my house three or four times?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you give any particulars of a fourth visit to your house? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

Q. Did you bring her four times to your house? A. I remember distinctly three times; I don't remember any more.

Q. You remember three times that you brought her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I understood you to say that those three visits that you remember were once with Mr. Tilton, once with your mother-in-law, and once with your son? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And I understand you to say that when you went with Mr. Tilton you did not bring her to your house? A. I don't remember that I said that I did not—that I did or did not bring her.

Q. Did you bring her to your house? A. I think not.

Q. You think not? A. I think not.

Q. I understood you so before? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did not bring her.

Q. Now, there are but two visits, then, that you brought her to your house? A. Two that I remember. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you then mistaken in thinking that you had brought her three or four times to your house? A. I remember distinctly twice that I brought her to the house. I remember visiting her once with Mr. Tilton at her house.

Q. And not bringing her to your house on that occasion? A. I think I did not bring her.

Q. Can't you remember whether you did or did not? A. I don't remember positively.

Q. What? A. I don't remember, but I remember twice distinctly that I brought her.

Q. The time that you went with Mr. Tilton, do you or do you not remember whether you brought her to your house? A. I think not.

Q. Is that all you can say; have you no recollection definitely about it? A. I don't remember positively whether I brought her or not.

Q. What time in the evening did you start on that errand with Mr. Tilton? A. I don't remember the time.

Q. Do you remember nothing about the time? A. I don't remember the time; no, Sir.

Q. What? A. I don't remember positively the time.

Q. Can you give us nothing about the hour of the day that you started? A. I don't remember.

Q. Do you remember the hour of the day that you got back? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you no recollection about the hour of the day that you returned? A. No, Sir.

Q. How many hours were you absent from your house? A. I remember that we made only a short call on Mrs. Woodhull. I don't know how long it takes to go to her house and return.

Q. You have been several times; don't you know about how long it takes to go and return? A. No, Sir; I could not tell you the exact time.

Q. All these visits were made in a carriage, were they not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Madam, how happened you to say on your examination, that your boy was eleven or twelve years old when he went with you? A. I did not remember exactly how long it was since I went with him.

Q. Then perhaps it was last year, wasn't it? A. Oh! no, Sir, it was not last year.

Q. He was twelve a year ago, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And eleven two years ago? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did you go last year? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you go the year before? A. I went the year of the publication of her story; I don't know what year that was.

Q. Did you go in the year 1873? A. I can only tell you that I went the year that she published her story in the paper; I don't know what year.

Q. Can you tell me, Madam, whether you went with Mr. —whether you went to that house in the year 1873? A. I cannot answer the question, what year it was.

Q. Do you mean you cannot remember whether you were there in the year 1873? A. I mean that I do not remember the year that I was there.

Q. And do not remember that you were not there in the year 1873? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, now, were you there in the year 1872? A. I don't know the year.

Q. Were all your visits in the same year? A. I think so.

Q. That you don't remember? A. I think they were.

Q. Do you mean by that that they were in the same year by the calendar, or within a space of a year? A. I don't remember positively, but I think they were within a year; I don't remember.

Q. Have you a pretty good memory? A. Yes, Sir, I think so.

Q. Have you given us the best of your recollection about these visits to Mrs. Woodhull? A. I have; yes, Sir.

Q. And you can give us nothing more? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you an impression that you went there a fourth time? A. I don't remember only of the three visits that I have told you.

Q. And you cannot give the hour of the day or evening that you went, or the hour of the day or evening that you returned either visit? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

Q. What? A. I don't remember the hour; no, Sir.

Q. Nor anywhere near the hour? A. No, Sir; I can't tell you.

Q. Would not a trip in a hackney coach in the night time and back impress itself on your mind, if it had taken place? A. I don't know whether it would.

Q. Are you quite sure that both of the other times than that in which Mr. Tilton accompanied you you did bring this lady to your house? A. Yes, Sir; I am quite sure. My little boy remembers coming back with me.

Q. I don't ask you about what your boy remembers? A. Well, I have stated to you what I knew about it.

Q. Well, you are quite sure? A. I am quite sure.

Q. That you brought her both the other times? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, are you sure whether you took her back both of those times? A. I am not sure; I don't remember of taking her back.

Q. You don't remember whether you did or not, do you? A. I don't remember positively; no, Sir.

Q. Whether you took her back or not? A. I think I did not.

Q. And you can give us no idea of the hours of the evening that you started or got back? A. No, Sir.

MRS. MOULTON'S SERVICES AS MESSENGER.

Q. Did you go on any other errands in connection with this business? A. To Mrs. Woodhull?

Q. No; to anybody. A. I don't remember.

Q. What? A. I don't remember of any at present.

Q. Did you go by your husband's or Mr. Tilton's request, or with either of them, anywhere else on any errands connected with this matter? A. I don't remember any.

Q. Are you quite sure that you did not? A. I don't remember any other.

THE STORY TOLD GEORGE C. ROBINSON.

Q. Mr. George C. Robinson, of whom you have spoken as the party to a conversation with you—he is your uncle, is he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. One of the firm of Woodruff & Robinson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not the gentleman who has been examined as a witness here? A. No, Sir; a brother.

Q. His name is Jeremiah P.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. They are brothers, are they not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And they are both your uncles? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Are they the heads of this mercantile house with which your husband has been connected? A. Yes, Sir, Mr. Jeremiah Robinson is the senior partner.

Q. And Mr. George C. is next to him, is he not? A. I really don't know.

Q. The other partners are younger men, are they not, whoever they may be? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that conversation with Mr. George C. Robinson? A. I cannot state the exact date. I cannot give you the date, or perhaps the year, but it was in the beginning of this trouble.

Q. The beginning of the trouble? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then it was in the year 1871, was it not? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Don't you know when this trouble, as you call it, began? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, when did it begin? A. In 1871.

Q. Well, was your conversation with Mr. Robinson in 1871? A. It might have been some time during that year.

Q. It might have been; when was it? A. I cannot state; I cannot give you the date.

Q. Don't you know that it was in the Spring of that year; before the Summer? A. I don't know, Sir, when it was.

Q. Don't you know that it was in the Fall; after Summer? A. I do not; no.

Q. Don't you know whether it was in 1871 or 1872? A. I think it was in 1871; but I cannot say positively.

Q. And not later than the Fall, you think, of 1871? A. I don't know, Sir, what time it was.

THE INTERVIEW WITH MRS. TILTON.

Q. You have described an interview you had with Mrs. Tilton, in which you were a good deal affected and wept; you have stated that you did not have that interview by the request of Mr. Tilton or your husband? A. Yes, Sir; I stated so.

Q. That is so; did you report to them that conversation after you had it? A. I think I reported it to Mr. Moulton.

Q. Have you any assurance in your memory that you did that? A. I do not remember—

Q. Don't remember? A. —at present, positively; but I think I did.

Q. It is not impressed upon your mind, then, what you did upon that point; do I so understand you? A. I think I reported it, but I cannot say positively.

WHAT PROVOKED MRS. MOULTON'S REBUKE TO MR. TILTON.

Q. Can't say positively. Now, Madame, in this conversation with Mr. Tilton in which you called him a villain, and told him if he turned on your husband, even by a look, you would—

Judge Neilson—I don't think she adopted the word "villain."

Mr. Beach—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I so understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it is a mistake.

Mr. Evarts—I think not; I will read the record.

Judge Neilson—She answers something of that kind; I did not understand she adopted that very word.

Mr. Evarts—I do not wish to hold any witness to anything that has not been said.

Judge Neilson—Of course not.

Mr. Evarts—I wish to understand this lady.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[Reading]:

Do you remember an interview that you had with Mr. Tilton, at your house, during some of these years; in January, 1873, do you remember having an interview with Mr. Tilton, at your house, in which you told him that he was a villain and would betray your husband as he had Mr. Beecher? A. I think I remember an interview with Mr. Tilton something like that.

The Witness—In seventy—last Summer.

Q. When? A. I stated last Summer, that I had such an interview.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps it is.

Judge Neilson—That is as I recollect it, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—I will read on, your Honor. [Reading]:

Do you remember when that was? A. Yes, Sir; it was last July.

Q. Do you remember, on his making some remark in answer to this statement of yours, that you threatened to send for a policeman and have him put out of the house? A. No, Sir; I never remember the policeman nor any reference to any policeman.

Q. What did you further tell him? A. I said if he was unkind to Frank, my husband, if he turned on him in any way, even so much as by a look, that he must never come into our house again.

Judge Neilson—Well, it is not material; your question pointed to the interview.

Mr. Evarts—It did, and pointed to the language, and she discarded from it nothing but the policeman.

Mr. Beach—That is a mistake.

Mr. Evarts—I have read the record.

Mr. Beach—Well, you misconstrue it.

Mr. Evarts—It may be, but you do—one or the other.

Mr. Fullerton—And it is not us.

Mr. Beach—Then it is for the Court to settle it.

Mr. Evarts—It is not for the Court to settle. It is for the jury to settle, when we sum up.

Judge Neilson—Put your question, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—You had a conversation with him, a part of which was, that if he turned upon your husband even by a look—what led you to think of his turning upon your husband? A. I remember, it was in August this conversation took place; it was with reference to Mr. Moulton having failed to make his statement before the Committee as he had promised. At my earnest solicitation a short statement was prepared for Mr. Moulton and given to the Committee in place of the long statement, as I said, to give Mr. Beecher another chance to state his case fairly. Mr. Tilton did not know of that; he had been out of town. When he came home in the evening he came into our house with Judge Morris, and said: "Frank, you have broken your faith with the public; your reputation will suffer; you have promised faithfully to give to-day to the Committee your statement; you have failed to do it." I listened to him for some time; I was sitting in the back room, and I did not like the manner or the way in which he reproved Frank for having failed to make his statement, and I went in and spoke to him. My exact language I do not remember; I know that I was very angry, and reproved him very severely for speaking to Mr. Moulton in the way in which he did.

Q. Well, did you call him a villain? A. I may have called him a villain.

MRS. MOULTON'S TRIP TO NARRAGANSETT.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, can you give me more accurately when you went to Narragansett in last July? A. I forget the day of the month, but some time in July; I think it must have been the latter part of July.

Q. Do you remember any part of the month that you were at Narragansett and how long you were there? A. I think, in all, during the entire Summer, I was there about six weeks, for I went the latter part of July.

Q. Didn't you go as early as the 17th of July? A. I do not think that I did; I do not remember the day of the month.

Q. Do you remember whether or no while you were there you were sick? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember what part of the month of July, if in the month of July, that was? A. I was sick nearly all the time.

Q. Well, do you remember your husband coming there, after you had been there some time; that is a week or more, or some period of time, and that that was in July that he came? A. I remember his coming there while I was there; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, do you remember whether that was the 24th day of July that he came? A. I do not remember the day of the month?

Q. Do you remember how long you had been there when he came, whenever that was? A. I cannot tell you; no, Sir.

Q. Don't know? A. I do not know how long I had been there; no, Sir.

MR. BEECHER NEVER PRONOUNCED INNOCENT BY MRS. MOULTON.

Q. Do you remember meeting a Mrs. Dennis at Newport? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the years 1873 and '74; was she an acquaintance of yours? A. Yes, Sir, she is a relative of mine.

Q. Is she a Brooklyn lady? A. No, Sir; she lives in Newport.

Q. Lives in Newport—an acquaintance of yours there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see her in both years—1873 and '74? A. I think I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, do you remember telling her that Mr. Beecher was an innocent and good man? A. No, Sir; I never told her that.

Q. Quite sure of that? A. Sure that I never told her any such thing.

Q. Do you remember to have told other persons that? A. I have never told anybody Mr. Beecher was an innocent man.

Q. You have never told Mrs. Dennis that Mr. Beecher was an innocent and good man? A. I never told her that he was an innocent man.

Q. Well, nothing to that effect, that he was an innocent and good man? A. I never said to anybody that he was an innocent man.

Mr. Evarts [after consultation]—If your Honor please, that is all I have to ask.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. MOULTON.

The re-direct examination was then begun by Mr. Fullerton, as follows:

Q. Can you state more particularly when you made known to Mr. George C. Robinson what you told him? A. I cannot; I do not understand your question, Sir.

Q. You have told us what you communicated to Mr. George C. Robinson? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In respect to Mr. Beecher when he questioned you as to what was the difficulty? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What led Mr. Beecher to visit your husband so often—can you give us more particularly when that conversation took place between yourself and Mr. Robinson?

Mr. Evarts—That is just what I have been asking.

The Witness—It was. I do not remember whether it was in the first year, but I think it must have been. Mr. Robinson was very much exercised about the stories that were—

Mr. Evarts—No matter about Mr. Robinson.

Mr. Fullerton—Was it after your husband received these frequent visits from Mr. Beecher? A. Certainly.

Q. And how long had that been going on, as near as you can remember? A. I cannot tell you how long. I only know that Mr. Beecher had been frequently to the office, and had excited the suspicion of Mr. Robinson.

Q. Then, whenever it was, it was after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was Mr. George C. Robinson a member of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long had he been a member? A. I forget the year, but before I joined the church.

Q. And had he held an office in the church? A. He had been deacon; yes, Sir.

MRS. WOODHULL'S LAST CALL AT THE MOULTONS.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, you have stated in your cross-examination, speaking of your visit to Mrs. Woodhull's house, that Mr. Moulton wanted you to go, and Mr. Tilton wanted you to go and see Mrs. Woodhull in reference to something in the case, I don't know what. A. It was in reference to the publication of the —of her story.

Q. Of her story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, were those visits after this threat of Mrs. Woodhull, which appeared in one of the New York papers, to publish the story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You never had any intercourse with Mrs. Woodhull after that? A. No, Sir; not at all.

Q. And was it after the threat and before the publication of the story itself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see Mrs. Woodhull after the publication of the story? A. The last time that I saw Mrs. Woodhull she came to our house to ask Mr. Moulton if he could assist her in raising some money; she said she had a library or a set of books which she could give as security. Mr. Moulton was sick at the time, and told her that he could not assist her in any way; she left the house very angry—the last time that I saw her.

Q. That is the last time that you saw her? A. That is the last time that I saw her.

Q. When was that? A. I don't remember the time when it was. I only remember it was the last visit.

Q. Was it after the publication of the story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That visit you did not anticipate? A. No, Sir.

Q. And how long was she at your house? A. Only for a short time; perhaps half an hour.

THE BEECHER-TILTON-WOODHULL DINNER AT THE MOULTONS.

A. You have mentioned an occasion when Mr. Beecher was at your house to dinner; can you tell us when that was? A. I think it must have been in the year 1871, for the reason—I have only one way of knowing—when we were dining in our basement, and I think it was in 1871, but I cannot give you the exact date.

Q. You cannot be positive? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, was Mrs. Woodhull there at dinner? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it before or after Mrs. Woodhull had threatened to publish her story? A. It was after.

Q. It was after? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then, if that threat was published in 1872, the dinner was after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect at what hour the dinner was served? A. In the evening; at evening.

Q. Do you recollect who arrived first, Mr. Beecher or Mrs. Woodhull? A. I don't—no, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect where they first met? A. I don't remember.

Q. Or do you recollect how long they arrived at the house before the dinner was served? A. No, Sir; I cannot tell you anything about the particulars.

Q. You were asked how early you learned you were to be a witness in this case. Can you fix the time any more definitely when you did learn that? A. I think it was in July.

Q. Why do you think it was in July?

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] It was not exactly "a witness in this case," but "a witness."

THE COUNSEL'S WIT IN PLAY.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Sir, the language of the counsel upon the other side in framing the question is as follows—

Judge Neilson—I think it was in an anticipated case—some case.

Mr. Evarts—Not the case before the Court.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know that it was an anticipated suit. That is what I am trying to get at.

Judge Neilson—You have an impression it was an individual suit he brought.

Mr. Fullerton—I asked her if she could fix the time, but she could not, and, therefore, I wish to pursue the inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I am trying to inform you

Mr. Evarts—She has been very certain in regard to it.

Mr. Fullerton—She has not been very certain in regard to it.

Mr. Evarts—We won't dispute with one another.

Mr. Fullerton—I won't dispute if you don't.

Mr. Evarts—Then I won't dispute if you do.

Mr. Fullerton—That is very judicious, but I am going to find out, notwithstanding that, when it was that this took place.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

WHO FIRST SUGGESTED THAT MRS. MOULTON SHOULD BE A WITNESS.

Q. Do you know whether it was before or after this suit that we are now trying was actually commenced? A. I don't think the case had commenced.

Q. Was it talked of? A. I heard Mr. Tilton one day, in conversation, say something with reference to the suit being brought into the Court.

Q. Who was it spoke to you first about being a witness? A. I don't remember who; I think Mr. Moulton.

Q. And what did he say? A. He said that with my knowledge of the case, and of the facts from Mr. Beecher himself, I should have to go before the Court, of course—would be called as a witness.

Q. Was that all there was of it? A. Yes, Sir.

HOW MRS. MOULTON CAME TO KISS MR. BEECHER.

Q. You have been asked, Mrs. Moulton, a question in reference to the kissing of Mr. Beecher, and you stated that you leaned over and kissed him on his forehead, and that was the only time you ever kissed him. I want you to state under what circumstances that was done?

Mr. Evarts—She has already stated that before.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will have it restated.

The Witness—As I have told you, Mr. Beecher came to the house suffering greatly, very despondent and gloomy at his knowledge, or at least his fear, that Mr. Tilton was about to publish that letter of apology; if so, he felt the truth would come out and he felt that he could not any longer try to live up—try to bear up under it, and he came to see me to have a long talk with me. He was lying on the sofa—

Q. You need not repeat the whole conversation, Mrs. Moulton. I only want to know what the condition of his mind was at that time, in general terms? A. I can only tell you the evening that Mr. Moulton came home, I said to him—

Mr. Evarts—No matter what you told Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Fullerton—You may state, in the first place, what was the condition of Mr. Beecher in respect to mental anguish and suffering at that time, and your own condition? A. His condition was such that I said to Mr. Moulton I felt as if I had been in the presence of death.

Mr. Evarts—I must object to that.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] It is not evidence what you said to your husband.

Mr. Evarts—That is struck out, I suppose, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—How did you feel in regard to what you told your husband? A. I felt as if I had been in the presence of death, and, as I expressed it to a friend, I felt as if I had been to a funeral.

Mr. Evarts—No matter about that.

Mr. Fullerton—Leave out about your friend. You can tell your own feelings without telling you expressed them. I want to know the circumstances under which you kissed him on the forehead. A. He was crying and I was crying at the time I kissed him on the forehead. I never expected to see Mr. Beecher again, or at least only a few moments, as he told me he would come on the next day. We had a long interview. Mr. Beecher was suffering greatly. I cannot describe to you any more accurately than I have done the interview.

Mr. Evarts—We don't want an argument.

Mr. Fullerton—No, I don't suppose you do want an argument, nevertheless we want the evidence. If that is an argument we cannot help it.

Q. Did you expect at that time that he would take his life? A. I certainly did.

Q. You have been asked whether you did not say to him, at that time, that if there ever was a good man you believed he was one. You did not state what you did say to him at that time. Do you recollect what you did say to him? A. I tried to dissuade him from committing suicide, and I said to him: "You have committed this sin, but you say you have repented, and you believe you have been forgiven. I still think there is much good in you, and I think it is your duty to confess your crime and try and do some good in the world yet."

Q. What was your object that day in what you said and in what you did to Mr. Beecher?

Mr. Evarts—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think that is fair.

Mr. Evarts—We have three times had what she said and did.

If she had another object than that indicated, why, she can state it, perhaps.

Mr. Fullerton—It is apparent, but there is no objection to making it more so and emphasizing it.

Mr. Evarts—We will judge.

Mr. Fullerton—And we will judge by her motives also.

Mr. Evarts—Not in the least.

Mr. Fullerton—We shall. You may do what you like about it. It is proper for this lady to state what her object and motives were on that day, during that long and painful interview with her pastor.

Judge Neilson—I think the object and motives are quite apparent on the face of the testimony given, and although that would be a proper question on the cross-examination, yet this is your witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; but she has been turned over to us for a re-direct examination. They attempted to place this lady in a false attitude, although they have failed very signally in their attempt, I think; yet it is proper for me to follow that object up and show not only the circumstances under which this act was committed, but the object she had in view in committing it.

Judge Neilson—That is quite apparent.

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor hold it is improper?

Judge Neilson—I think we have it sufficiently, but it may not be improper. Nobody could mistake the spirit or the motive of this lady at that time on the statement she has made.

Mr. Fullerton—I am satisfied with that. [To the witness.] You have been asked also, Mrs. Moulton, whether you did not on one occasion, in the presence of your husband, put your hand upon his shoulder and neck and say to him, "Take care of this good man," speaking with reference to Mr. Beecher. Do you recollect having such an interview, and, if so, state what occurred? A. I remember on one Friday evening Mr. Beecher came into our house, and he was very much depressed and suffering greatly, and Frank called me into the room with reference to some matter—I forget what it was—but I remember putting my hand on Mr. Beecher's shoulder and saying to Frank, "Take care of this man," or "this good man."

Q. You believed at that time, did you not, that Mr. Beecher had repented? A. I believed so; yes, Sir.

Q. You thought he truly repented? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That he had what?

Mr. Fullerton—That he had repented.

Q. One other question I omitted, Mrs. Moulton. Did you repeat to your husband the interview you had with Mr. Beecher—the long interview I refer to, of three or four hours? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. And did you state to him that you had kissed Mr. Beecher on the forehead? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you make that statement to your husband? A. It was the evening when he returned—the evening when he came back.

MR. HALLIDAY'S CALL AT THE MOULTONS.

Q. Your attention has been called to an interview with Mr. Halliday. Do you recollect when that took place? A.

I don't remember; I remember the conversation with Mr. Halliday.

Q. Do you recollect what that conversation was? A. I think I said to Mr. Halliday, "I wonder why Mrs. Woodhull should have used my name;" but I said nothing to Mr. Halliday about Mr. Beecher's guilt or innocence.

Q. Was the conversation after the publication of the Woodhull story? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What questions did Mr. Halliday put to you at that time? A. I don't remember what his questions were; I only remember that I avoided having any conversation with Mr. Halliday with reference to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Did you feel at liberty to tell him what you knew in regard to the matter? A. No, Sir; I did not.

MR. TILTON'S REFUGE FROM HIS TROUBLES.

Q. When did Mr. Tilton commence taking his meals at your house? A. He used to visit us frequently in Clinton-st.

Q. When did he take his meals there with any degree of regularity, with reference to December, 1870; was it before or after? A. It was before. It was in 1869, I think.

Q. 1869? A. I think so—1869 and 1870. He has been so much at our house, I don't remember the last time when he began to come.

Q. Did he commence to take his meals there until after the domestic difficulty? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you state whether it was before or after July, 1870? A. It was afterwards.

Q. Now, did he give any reason to you why he took his meals there?

Mr. Evarts—That I object to. I don't see what this conversation has to do with it.

Judge Neilson—I think not.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, Sir, it is a declaration accompanying the act. Is that not a very familiar principle of law?

Judge Neilson—It would be if you had a specific act in hand.

Mr. Fullerton—The act is very specific; it is taking his meals at the house.

Judge Neilson—Taking meals is a very general thing, and over many months.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—If you can single any one occasion, and a declaration forming part of that occasion, doubtless you can give it.

Mr. Fullerton—Your Honor will remember that this habit of his grew up after the domestic difficulty. The date of that was July 3, 1870. They have given that in evidence for a purpose, and they will use it hereafter before this case is closed. Now, it ought to be competent for us to show what Mr. Tilton said at the time as characterizing the act.

Judge Neilson—What he said on any specific occasion I think might be given, but not general occasions.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will remember your ruling against us in regard to Mr. Bell. We offered to show an act of Mr. Beecher in calling Mr. Bell into conversation, and what he said to Mr. Beecher, and what Mr. Beecher said to Mr. Bell, and you excluded it.

Mr. Fullerton—The objection was twofold as to that. First, it was a part of the defense which they had no right to interject into our case.

Mr. Evarts—That was not the ground.

Mr. Fullerton—It was one of the grounds distinctly stated by myself.

Judge Neilson—I think we cannot take this.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you recollect when Mr. Tilton first came to your house to take his meals after this domestic difficulty? Did he give any reason for not taking them there before?

Mr. Evarts—The same objection.

Judge Neilson—The same ruling.

Mr. Fullerton—I thought that was in harmony with your Honor's suggestion. I am willing to accommodate, of course. [To the witness.] In one of the gentleman's questions put to you on Friday last he used the word "treachery," in asking you what you said with reference to Mr. Tilton. Did you ever, in any conversation with your husband, speak of Mr. Tilton as treacherous, or as likely to be treacherous towards your husband? A. No, Sir; I do not remember that I used the word "treacherous" to him.

MRS. TILTON AS A WOMAN'S RIGHTS ZEALOT.

Q. Now, as to these woman's suffrage meetings at your house, to which your attention has been called, do you recollect to what extent, if any, Mrs. Tilton participated in that Woman's Rights movement? A. I remember her inviting me to take some office in the association, to become a member of it. I remember that she has a number of times been invited to our house to meet them, on one or two occasions, when Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony were there; those are all that I remember.

Q. Did she meet the ladies you mention at your house? —Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony? A. I do not remember that she did.

Q. How? A. I think not.

MRS. MOULTON'S TALK WITH MR. McLEAN.

Q. Do you recollect the conversation with Mr. McLean, to which your attention was called? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that conversation? A. I do not remember the time. He was waiting in our parlor for Mr. Moulton.

Q. Were you acquainted with Mr. McLean at the time? A. I think I had been introduced to him; I do not remember positively, but I think Mr. Moulton had introduced me to him on one occasion.

Q. How long had he been there before Mr. Moulton came in? A. Perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes.

Q. Did he not interrogate you in regard to what you knew about the case? A. No, Sir; I do not remember that there was anything said about the case; he spoke of Mr. Beecher's portrait.

Q. Was there anything said about the domestic difficulty? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or about Mr. Beecher, other than the conversation about his portrait? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you make Miss Emily Faithful's acquaintance? A. I think in 1873 she was here; I forget just how long ago.

Q. How long did she spend at your house? A. She was at our house six weeks.

Q. Do you know where she is now? A. She is in London.

Q. Did you converse with her in regard to this case? A. Only in a general way.

MR. MOULTON'S FIRST STATEMENT.

Q. Now, give us the date, if you please, when this short statement of your husband was the subject of conversation between him and Mr. Beecher? A. In 1873.

Q. In July, was it not? A. In 1873.

Q. Yes. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. 1874, I should say. A. 1874? Do you mean last Summer?

Q. The last statement—the first statement that your husband prepared to make. A. It was in July.

Q. Repeat again, if you please, what it was that Mr. Beecher said in reply to the questions put by your husband? A. Mr. Moulton said to Mr. Beecher, "Then, Mr. Beecher, you consider my statement an honorable one to make before the Committee?" He said, "Yes, Frank, I consider it so, perfectly."

Q. Did you see that statement? A. No, Sir; I do not remember that I saw it.

Q. Did they have it with them at the time of the conversation? A. Mr. Moulton had it. He had read it to Mr. Beecher in the study.

MR. TILTON WITHOUT FAITH IN THE COMMITTEE.

Q. You have stated on your cross-examination that Mr. Tilton said he would take his case into Court. What else did he say on that occasion? A. I do not know.

Q. Do you recollect what else he said on that subject? A. He said he would take his case into Court, where he could be vindicated and have justice.

Q. What was he complaining of, if anything, at the time? Mr. Evarts—She has not said he complained of anything.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I ask the question.

The Witness—Of the unfairness of the Committee.

Q. What did he say, if anything, on that subject?

Judge Neilson—In that connection?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—Of the unjustness of the Committee.

Q. Of what Committee? A. Of the Church Committee.

Q. Did he say in what respect they had done him injustice? A. That it was a packed Committee, and that he had not any chance of stating his case at all.

WHY MRS. MOULTON ADVISED A SHORT STATEMENT.

Q. Mrs. Moulton, you say that you advised a short statement on one occasion? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. It was at the time Mr. Moulton had proposed his statement to the church. There were a number of gentlemen invited to meet General Butler at our house—Mr. Kingsley, Frank Woodruff, Mr. Moulton's father, and a number of other gentlemen were present. I was also present in the room, and I asked General Butler if there was to be a statement prepared—

Q. You need not state the conversation; but why did you advise the short statement? A. Because I asked—

Mr. Evarts—I object.

The Witness—him to give Mr. Beecher another chance.

Mr. Evarts—One moment; I object.

Judge Neilson—It appeared on your cross-examination that she advised the short statement.

Mr. Fullerton [To Mr. Evarts]: Yes, that was at the close of your cross-examination that morning. It came out on your examination.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Fullerton]: Your question seeks to account for that—how she came to do that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—If you are certain of the fact that he called it out.

Mr. Fullerton—I made a memorandum of it at the time.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know what she said, nor it didn't impress itself on my mind. I didn't ask for it.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman got it, however.

Mr. Evarts—What did I get? Let it be read.

Mr. Fullerton—I am willing you should do that. I don't know that it was in answer to a question that necessarily called for it, but it was in answer to a question, and whether there is anything in the answer here that contains that, they have a right to it.

Judge Neilson—Let us see what the statement is.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer, who reported the testimony referred to, being absent from Court writing out his notes for publication, an unofficial stenographer read from his long-hand manuscript the part called for.]

Mr. Fullerton—She stated she suggested they should make a short statement.

Judge Neilson—Now put your question.

Q. Why did you make that suggestion, or give that advice?

Mr. Evarts—It is not any inquiry I made. It is only about fixing a time. She had reference, I am told by my associate, to about the time of the statement. If she referred to the month of July that would not give her a right to tell all that happened in the month of June.

Mr. Fullerton—No; I don't claim that at all, but I do claim that inasmuch as whatever language she did use upon that subject was in reply to questions put by counsel upon the other side, that I have a right to follow it up and show what purpose she had in view in making that suggestion.

Mr. Evarts—I think your Honor sees that it is clearly inadmissible, whatever was the statement. I asked the witness the date of something that she had testified to, and she undertakes to fix the date by its being the time when some statement was made by somebody or other, it being one of the facts, I suppose, understood to exist in this case. It did not answer my purpose; my purpose was to ascertain the time.

Judge Neilson—I thought the object was to get at the time.

Mr. Evarts—But the witness saying that it was the time when a certain statement was made does not entitle counsel to show what the conversation was.

Mr. Beach—It is distinctly in evidence now from this lady that she counseled that a short statement should be made for the purpose of giving Mr. Beecher an opportunity to clear or relieve himself. That is now expressly in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Then we have the object.

Mr. Fullerton—But not in full.

Judge Neilson—Then ask her what further she said.

Mr. Evarts—I object to that. This answer of the witness was made in answer to a question of mine, to give us the date of something that she had testified to. Now your Honor is asked to allow the conversation which took place at that time.

Judge Neilson—Let the question and answer be read.

The stenographer read as follows:

Q. You had a conversation with him, a part of which was, that if he turned upon your husband, even by a look—what led you to think of his turning upon your husband? A. I remember that it was in August that this conversation took place. It was in reference to Mr. Moulton having failed to make his statement before the Committee as he had promised. At my earnest solicitation a short statement was prepared for Mr. Moulton to give to the Committee in place of the long statement—as I understood to give to Mr. Beecher another chance to state his case fairly.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, your Honor knows perfectly well that when my learned friend upon the other side puts a question to the witness, and gets an answer that is not responsive, or does not suit him, he moves forthwith to strike it out, and does not rest until it is stricken out. But, on the other hand, if he puts a question to a witness and gets an answer which is not responsive, but which he deems of some advantage to himself, he then fails to make such a motion and lets it stand, perhaps, until some future time in the case when we, by a question, seek to take advantage of the answer, and then the argument is that it is irresponsible, and that we have no right to follow up the answer. Now, when counsel puts a question and gets an answer, and does not move to strike it out, but permits that answer to stand as evidence, then it is evidence, and we have a right to explain it if it needs any explanation. The question we now put is—why she advised or suggested this short statement.

Judge Neilson—She may answer that.

Mr. Evarts—Note my exception to the question. Why she did it is inadmissible.

Mr. Fullerton—The question is, why did you advise or suggest that a short statement be made at that time by your husband? A. In order to give Mr. Beecher another chance to set before his Church and the Committee the truth.

Q. And what did you state at the time that you gave the advice as to the short statement?

Mr. Evarts—She does not state that she stated anything.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I ask the question.

The Witness—I did not want Frank to state the facts wanted Mr. Beecher to do it.

Mr. Evarts—I object to that answer.

Mr. Fullerton—What words did you employ at that in as nearly as you can recollect? A. I said, "Give the another chance." [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—You had better wait until to-morrow, and then you may have something more exciting.

MRS. MOULTON'S CONVERSATION WITH MRS. DENNIS.

Mr. Fullerton—Where did you make the acquaintance of Mrs. Dennis? A. I have known her all my life.

Q. Does she reside in Brooklyn? A. No, Sir; she lives at Newport, Rhode Island.

Q. When was this conversation that you had with her? A. I do not know whether in 1872 or 1873. I have seen her nearly every year. I visit Newport every Summer.

Q. Was this case talked about? A. Yea, Sir; discussed in a general way.

Q. Did you go into any particulars as to what you knew in regard to it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you feel at liberty to communicate to Mrs. Dennis or to any one else the facts that you knew? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. MOULTON.

Mr. Everts—Mrs. Moulton, are you quite sure that you told your husband of this interview with Mr. Beecher on the evening of the day on which it occurred? A. Do you mean when I kissed Mr. Beecher on the forehead?

Mr. Everts—Yes.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. What impressed it on your mind that you told him on the evening of the day that it occurred? A. Because it caused me great sorrow. The interview through which I had passed with Mr. Beecher made a very great impression upon my mind, as I then really thought that he was going to take his life.

Mr. Everts—No matter what you thought.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the very reason. She is perfectly right in her answer.

Mr. Everts—My suggestion is, what makes you sure that you told him that night? A. Because it made such an impression upon my mind.

Q. You cannot be mistaken about that? A. No, Sir.

Q. You remember the evening, and you remember your husband returning that evening, do you? A. Yea, Sir.

KATE CAREY RECALLED BY THE DEFENSE.

Mr. Everts—That is all Mrs. Moulton. If your Honor please, we have brought Mrs. Kate Carey here for further cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—Mrs. Moulton can retire, can she?

Mr. Fullerton—Yea.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Everts, is your witness in attendance?

Mr. Everts—Yea, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Is the control of this case to be taken out of our hands?

Judge Neilson—The counsel has a right to reserve, until you get through, the further cross-examination of the witness.

PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL REST THEIR CASE.

Mr. Beach—Certainly Sir. We rest now.

Mr. Everts—I called this witness for cross-examination, as a part of your case.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; not as a part of our case. We have rested our case.

Mr. Everts—I gave you notice that I was going to cross-examine the woman.

Judge Neilson—Bring the woman here and then we will see what rights you have.

Mr. Beach—There is no necessity for any point of this kind, for we shall take no objection to their further cross-examination of this lady, for the purposes, I suppose, of contradiction, or for any other purpose.

Mr. Everts—That we understand; and we understand that we have a right to do it now.

Mr. Beach—I submit that you have not a right to do it now, still we make no particular point. We have rested our case, but if the gentlemen wish to call the witness they may do it; but the gentleman had no right to interfere with our case, while we were conducting it for the purpose of examining or cross-examining any witness except the witness on the stand, and we had a right to rest when we were through.

Judge Neilson—And I am very glad you did so. Bring the witness.

Mr. Everts—I have a right so to do, and gave notice since this witness was on the stand that I should call her here for further cross-examination.

MRS. CAREY AGAIN CROSS-EXAMINED.

Mrs. Kate Carey then took the witness chair.

Judge Neilson—You remember, madam, that you were sworn the other day?

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You will consider the binding force of that oath as still continuing. They propose to ask you a few more questions.

Mr. Everts—I think you said, madam, that you were married or had been married? A. I am a widow lady, Sir.

Q. What was your husband's name? A. John Smith, Sir.

Q. When did he die? A. That I cannot say, Sir.

Q. When did you last see him? A. About three months before my babe was born.

Q. Where were you married? A. I was married in Manchester, England.

Q. When? A. That I cannot say.

Q. How long before your babe was born were you married? A. I am in this country for some years, and I was married coming to this country.

Q. How many years had you been married to this John Smith? A. I was married nine months before I came to this country.

Q. When did you come to this country? A. I came to this country at the time of the Burdell murder at Mrs. Cunningham's.

Q. When was this baby born—this babe of yours? I understand you to mean the babe with the milk for whom you went to Mrs. Tilton's. A. I cannot say what time it was born. It was born in the Summer, but I cannot tell exactly the day or date.

Q. You mean the birth of the child with the breast of whose milk you went to Mrs. Tilton's, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well; was that your first child? A. It was not, Sir.

Q. How happens it that you do not know when your husband, John Smith, died? A. I do not know. I heard that he had died with yellow fever. He was not a very good help to me. He went away before the babe was born.

Q. When you have lived in these places of which you have spoken have you lived by the name of Kate Carey? A. Kate Carey and Kate Smith—both names. I went always as a widow woman.

Q. By "both names" do you mean the two names at the same time? A. I went for Kate Smith in most of the places, but I told the servant girls that my name was Carey.

Q. You went sometimes by the name of Kate Smith, and sometimes by the name of Kate Carey? A. I always went as Smith.

Q. Always went by the name of Smith? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did you go to Mrs. Tilton by the name of Smith. A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Why did you give your name as Kate Carey in this cause, when you were called as a witness? A. I gave both names.

Mr. Morris—She gave it as Kate Carey Smith.

Mr. Evarts—I did not hear anything about it.

Mr. Morris—That is the way she gave it.

Mr. Evarts—Is it so down?

Mr. Morris—I do not know, but that is the way she gave her name when she was sworn, and the officer so gave the name when the oath was administered.

Mr. Evarts—Did you live with Mr. Robert T. Moore, at 110 Smith-st., in this city? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did you live there? A. I lived there until they broke up housekeeping.

Q. How long was that? A. I do not know whether it was two months or going on to three. I cannot say.

Q. But about that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember the cause for which you were discharged from that place? A. From Mr. Moore's?

Q. Yes. A. They gave up housekeeping and went to boarding.

Q. Then you were not discharged for any cause or conduct of your own? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you not discharged from that place for intemperance? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is your recollection, is it? A. That is my recollection, Sir.

Q. Do you remember telling Mr. Moore, while there, that you never saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. The name never was mentioned at Moore's.

Q. You are quite sure of that? A. I am sure of it, Sir.

Q. You did not say anything of that kind? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. You have spoken of having lived in Clinton-st. with a family by the name of Duryea or Duryee? A. Dera, Sir.

Q. Do you know how the name is spelled? A. I do not, Sir; I do not know the number on the door.

Q. While you lived at this house of Dera, did you know a man by the name of Webster, who lived in the neighborhood? A. I did not.

Q. A painter, or a mechanic of some kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor talk with him? A. I did not, Sir.

Q. Did you live at Mrs. Gilchison's in Brooklyn? A. I did, Sir.

Q. In what street? A. Right across from the doctor's at the corner of Montague-st.

Q. How long did you live there? A. That was a little while after I left Mrs. Tilton.

Q. How long did you live there? A. A month, Sir; about a month.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all in evidence already.

Mr. Evarts—Were you discharged from that place? A. There was sickness in the house. They lost a little girl named Annie; she had a fever and I took sick there and the milk went through my system, and I was not able for all the work.

Q. Were you discharged from that house for intemperance? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor for any cause except your sickness? A. Nothing as I know, Sir.

Q. Did you ever live at Mr. H. L. Rider's—a lawyer in Willow-st., Brooklyn? A. Not as I know it, Sir; I do not remember.

Q. Don't you know whether you lived there or not? A. No, Sir; I do not remember living in Willow-st.

Q. Did you never live in Willow-st.? A. No, Sir; not as I know of.

Q. And never lived with Mr. Rider? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you remember bringing to Mrs. Rider some certificates of character, from somebody on Staten Island? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't remember that? A. No, Sir; I had no certificates from Staten Island.

Q. Did you present any? A. No, Sir.

Q. You do not remember, then, being discharged from Mr. Rider's? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember saying, at this house of Mr. Rider's, that you had nursed Mrs. Tilton—Mrs. Theodore Tilton—and that you spoke of her as a lovely woman, and a perfect lady? A. I do not remember living at such a name in Willow street.

Q. Nor anywhere else? A. No, Sir.

Q. You do not remember saying that at Mrs. Rider's house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you live with a Mrs. Heinrichs or Heinrichs in Clinton street? A. Heinrichs in Clinton street? I do not remember living with anybody but the DeBucks in Clinton street; not De Bucks, but the family you spoke of near Second place.

Q. I asked you if you lived with Mrs. Heinrichs in Clinton street. A. I do not know; I do not remember.

Q. Did you live with a German family? A. Oh, yes; I did. Their business was the fancy business; I believe it was over in Maiden lane, New-York.

Q. Was their name Heinrichs? A. I believe it was. I am not positive.

Q. How long did you live there? A. I think it was a month.

Q. Do you remember why you were discharged from there?

A. Yes, sir; intoxicated. [Laughter.]

Q. Did you live or lodge at a house kept by a Mrs. Keys or Kays, at No. 261 Pacific street? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is a servants' boarding house, is it not, or don't you know? A. I know nothing of the person; I never visited there.

Q. And never boarded there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you remember lodging at the house of Mrs. Keys, or of boarding with Mrs. Keys? A. Oh! yes, Sir; I did—facing Mr. Moore's grocery store.

Q. I don't know what it faces. You did live there? A. Yes, I did; I remember.

Q. You do remember it now? A. Yes, Sir; I do remember.

Q. Where is that? A. That is facing Mr. Moore's grocery store.

Q. Where is Mr. Moore's grocery store? A. At the corner of Pacific and Smith streets.

Q. You do remember that? A. Yes, I do remember.

Q. How long were you at that lodging house? A. I was not there more than a week at a time; the quicker I got to service the better.

Q. Do you remember of being sent away from that lodging house for drunkenness? A. Not at all, Sir; never. She was able to drink as much as I was. [Laughter.]

Q. Perhaps not when you were there? A. Well—she drank her share—if I would pay for it—like all the lodging women.

THE WITNESS'S CHARACTER.

Q. Now, madam, I understand you to have said before that you have not lived out for a year—something of that kind? A. Not steady.

Q. What? A. Not to say steady in a place. I have been poorly about that length of time.

Q. What—boarding? A. Poorly; I haven't been very well.

Q. Well, I understood you to say that you had not lived out as servant for a year; is that so? A. It is about this time twelve months that I left Brooklyn to go over, and I haven't done anything much since.

Q. Now, do you remember living with a Mr. Motley at Harlem? A. I do, Sir.

Q. How many months did you live there? A. Going on my second month, Sir.

Q. How? A. Going on the second month.

Q. And when was that? A. I was about a month and, I think, two weeks or three weeks. I didn't put in the two months.

Q. Well, when? A. In the Summer; last.

Q. Last Summer? A. I think so.

Q. Wasn't it within four months from now that you lived there? A. It was about there, I guess; about that time; it was in warm weather.

Q. Do you think you lived there about four months, do you mean? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Was it four months ago that you left there? A. I could not say, Sir.

Q. Where did you go to from there? A. I went to the office, and I got a place in two miles past Harlem, in a family named Simpson.

Q. After leaving Motley's? A. After leaving Motley's.

Q. How long did you live at Simpson's? A. I lived at Simpson's about a week, when I was taken with a sore throat.

Q. How long ago did you leave Simpson? A. That is the length of time that I left Simpson's to go to Bellevue Hospital, sick.

Q. And you have been there ever since? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, can you give us again, if you gave it before, the date that you went to the hospital? A. Well, all I can say, Sir, is I was there eight weeks before Christmas, and a week before Christmas I went out and got a situation. I lived one month, and got a severe cold and came back to the hospital, and I am there going on three weeks.

Q. Since? A. Since, Sir.

Q. Where was this place that you got after Simpson's? A. In Irving-place; the English Jew family.

Q. That is the one you spoke of before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, about Motley's; do you remember being discharged from Motley's? A. I do, Sir.

Q. What was that for? A. 'Toxicated.

Q. Anything else? A. Nothing else as I know it, Sir.

Q. Wasn't it in regard to lying also that you were sent off from there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. Nothing of the kind.

Q. Nothing but intoxication? A. Nothing but 'toxicated. I told her I wasn't "tight," and I was "tight." [Laughter.]

Q. Oh, well! And you were sent off, any how? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who is your doctor, that treats you at this hospital? A. Drs. Schaefer and Knox.

Q. And they have treated you, have they, from the beginning? A. Yes, Sir; very good, indeed.

Q. Yes; no doubt of that. Now, do you say that these doctors have told you that you have bronchitis? A. Yes, Sir; a severe cold.

Q. And bronchitis? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you think that is the disorder for which you have been treated there, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the doctors have told you so, have they? A. Well, I heard it from other doctors; some years ago I had brownkeetoas.

Q. Oh! I dare say. The question is, what you have got now. Have these doctors at Bellevue Hospital told you that they were treating you for bronchitis or "brownkeetoas," as you call it? A. No, Sir; they didn't say it, but I heard it from other doctors. I asked doctors, and they said it was a severe cold.

Q. Some years ago? A. Some years ago; and I heard it from other doctors that I had brownkeetoas.

Q. But you have not heard it from these doctors at Bellevue? A. I have not, Sir.

Q. Now, have you heard from these doctors at Bellevue what disease you were being treated for? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you don't know, unless it is bronchitis? A. No.

Q. What? A. I do not, Sir; but my throat got sore, and I have often had it so before, but not as bad as it has been this time, and I thought of course it was brownkeatoes, but they have gave me medicine for severe cold.

Q. Now, madam, do you know a person named George Wilson? A. I do not, Sir.

Q. A barkeeper, or something of that kind, in a hotel in New-York? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't know him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you remember meeting him at the Pacify Hotel, or Pacific Hotel in the Bowery? A. I don't recollect any such name, or such a man. I don't visit such places, hotels or restaurants, or any place else.

Q. You don't remember, then, going there with him or being there with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do I understand you that you do not remember being at this hotel in the Bowery with this Mr. George Wilson? A. Never, Sir. I don't know the person, and I never was in a hotel.

Q. I don't mean to live in the hotel. A. I never was in a hotel in my life, Sir; not in the city.

Q. Now, won't you tell us who this charitable lady was that spoke to you at Bellevue Hospital. A. Mrs. Lyons.

Q. Lyons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where does she live? A. That I don't know, Sir. I know nothing about her, only she visits the poor.

Q. Had you known her before? A. I never seen her in my life, Sir, or spoken to her.

Q. Did she profess to be from Brooklyn? A. She didn't say, Sir, where she was from.

Q. Now, what did she say to you about getting a place for you? A. She told me, "Kate, if you were ready I would get you a fine place in Brooklyn." Well, says I, "When I am ready, I think I can get a place myself." She said: "Did you ever live in Brooklyn?" Says I: "Yes." Says she: "Who did you live with?" and I up and told her that I lived with Mr. Theodore Tilton as a wet nurse. She asked me what to make of this trouble, and I told her I didn't know, nor neither I didn't.

Q. To make of what? A. To make of this trouble—this talking; I don't know.

Q. Then did you tell her what you repeated here the other day? A. I believe I did, Sir.

Q. As near as may be in the same way you told it to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then what did she say to you? A. She says: "Well, if any person comes to you, Kate, would you be timid in telling the truth?" Says I: "Of course I will not be."

Q. Would what? A. Would I be timid in telling the truth, and I says: "No, madame, I won't."

Q. Do you see that lady in her visits there now? A. No, Sir.

Q. She does not come now? A. I have not seen her.

Q. Has she been there since she had this talk with you? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. Had she been there before? A. Several times, Sir.

Q. Before? A. Oh! I have not spoken to her before.

Q. You never spoke to her before? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you ever seen her there before making charitable visits? A. I have, Sir.

Q. How did you know they were charitable visits if she didn't speak to you? A. She had parcels under her arm, such as underclothes and stockings, giving to the poor.

Q. Can you give us any information by which we can find this woman? A. I cannot, Sir; I don't know anything about her.

Mr. Fullerton—I will give you her letter in a moment.

Q. She has not been there since? A. Not as I can say.

Q. Do you know John Rooney? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is he in the hospital? A. I believe he is, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. A very short time, Sir.

Q. Did he remove your trunk for you from one place to another? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From where to where? A. He removed it from Mrs. Dwyer's to Mr. Lawler's.

Q. Do you know now whether this Mr. George Wilson was an acquaintance of Mr. Rooney's or not? A. I don't know anything about it, Sir; I don't know the person.

Q. Or John Wilson? A. I don't know such a person.

Q. Neither of them. Now, do you remember saying to a Mr. George Wilson or a Mr. John Wilson while you were in his company, that you never saw anything wrong between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton? A. I don't know the persons. I have never spoke to the person about anything.

Q. But that you could come and say that you saw something, and could secure a good place for yourself? A. I have never pronounced them words, Sir.

Q. Never said anything of that kind? A. I have not, Sir.

Q. To George or John Wilson? A. I have not, Sir.

Q. Or to any man at the Pacify Hotel, or Pacific Hotel? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever go with Mr. Rooney to, or meet Mr. Rooney at No. 15 Bowery? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never been there in his company? A. Never, Sir.

Q. You have spoken of boarding at Mrs. McCaffrey's, haven't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In Fourteenth-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did you board there? A. I have known her about fourteen years, Sir, and I boarded there every once in a while when I would leave a situation, may be a week, two weeks.

Q. Well, do you remember being sent away from that boarding house by this keeper of it, Mrs. McCaffrey? A. No; never, Sir.

Q. You don't remember being sent away? A. Never was sent out of any place where I boarded yet, Sir.

Q. You don't remember being sent away from there for drunkenness? A. I was not, Sir, sent away.

Q. Do you remember that you were not? A. I remember I was not.

Q. What sort of a looking person was this Mrs. Lyons? A. Low sized and white haired, middle aged lady; she was a middle aged lady, low sized.

Q. Do you mean light hair or gray hair? A. Gray hair, Sir.

Q. White from ———? A. From age, I suppose.

Q. Middle sized? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who did she come to visit at that hospital; who did you see her talking with? A. To all the patients in the ward, Sir.

Q. All in your ward? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not to you except this one time? A. She came to me the second time.

Q. The second time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you mean you saw her the first time talking to everybody but you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the second time she talked to you? A. I called her over, Sir.

Q. Yes; very well. Didn't your husband come with you from England? A. He did, Sir.

Q. And lived with you how many years here? A. He lived with me until the last child was born; three months before that he went down South to some place, but where he went I cannot say; I have not seen tale or tidings of him since. I have not seen him since; that is what I mean to say; I have not seen anything of him since. Of course I am—I can't pronounce my words as these high-frown people.

Q. Well, that is about twenty years since you came over, according to the Burdell murder, I believe. How long ago was it that this Mrs. Lyons came to you at the hospital? A. About a week, I think, before I come over here.

Q. Yes; recently; just before you come over? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So I understood you before—do you know a woman named Eliza that lives near Lexington-ave. and has her face marked with small-pox? A. No, Sir.

Q. Is she an acquaintance of yours? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not at all? A. I don't know such a person.

Q. Then you have had no conversation with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. On this matter? A. No, Sir.

Q. Can you give us any information about this English Jew family more than you have? A. No, Sir.

Q. You gave that in Irving-place, between what streets? A. I think it is between 16th and 17th streets—about there.

Q. But you cannot give the number? A. It is either 55 or 53, I am not positive—the name I cannot pronounce.

Q. Do you know anything of a Dr. Fullgraf that lives in that neighborhood? A. No, Sir.

Q. Haven't seen him or his sign, or know of his name or—
A. No, Sir.

Q. Among the doctors who have treated you at the hospital, is Dr. Bryan one of them? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—That is all.

Mr. Fullerton—I have nothing to ask, Sir.

Some consultation here took place between counsel, and between Mr. Evarts and Judge Neilson, after which the Court took a recess until two o'clock.

GEN. TRACY TO MAKE THE OPENING ADDRESS FOR THE DEFENSE.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it was in the arrangement of the conduct of this case that the opening should be made by our learned associate, Gen. Tracy, and the calculation in regard to the termination of our adversaries' case, which we had endeavored to make as reasonable as we could, had led us to anticipate the consumption of time by witnesses up to to-morrow night, as probable. Nevertheless, it was in the calculation of Gen. Tracy, that he might be called upon to-morrow. I have endeavored to ascertain, I have ascertained, whether it would be possible for him suitably to his presentation of the case, and for the proper consideration of the Jury and the Court, to proceed in this fragment of the day, this afternoon; and he informs me that it will be quite out of his calculation, and, he thinks, of his ability properly to do so. As I mentioned to your Honor before the recess, I should endeavor to find it possible that we should go on this afternoon; and, as I expressed to your Honor a doubt whether it would be possible, and I now find myself in that position. My learned friend, Mr. Beach, recognizes the situation of the case, and is not disposed to consider it other than reasonable that we should have until to-morrow morning.

Mr. Beach—I can well conceive that it will be an inconvenience to Mr. Tracy to proceed this afternoon, having been somewhat surprised by the suddenness, to him, of the close of our case, and I think it is but a proper indulgence and courtesy to be granted to him to comply with his request.

Judge Neilson [To the Jury]—Prepare to retire, gentlemen.

Mr. Mallison [The Clerk]—Will the audience please remain silent until the adjournment of the Court?

Judge Neilson—[To the Jury.] Please to attend at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, gentlemen.

Mr. Mallison—The Court stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until Wednesday at 11 o'clock.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

THIRTY-SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE DEFENSE OPENED BY MR. TRACY.

MR. BEECHER EULOGIZED AND MR. TILTON DENOUNCED—A TRIBUTE PAID TO MRS. TILTON—MR. TILTON'S JEALOUSY OF MR. BEECHER ALLEGED AS THE ORIGINAL CAUSE OF THE ACCUSATION OF ADULTERY — MR. BOWEN'S CONNECTION WITH THE CASE—MR. BEECHER'S ADVICE OF SEPARATION EXPLAINED.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 24, 1875.

The Court waited to-day for Mr. Tracy. He began by tracing Mr. Beecher's life and labors from the pastorate in the West to the culmination of his popularity in Brooklyn. Then he took up the career of Theodore Tilton, speaking of him as one who had fallen from an eminence seldom attained by men of his age to the very bottom of an abyss. With stinging emphasis the speaker referred to the plaintiff as one who, "if he could realize the sad truth that he was morally dead, would still rejoice in this post-mortem investigation of his character." "But we propose," added Mr. Tracy, "to dissect him first in the interest of truth, and bury him afterward in the interest of decency."

With this preliminary sketch of the plaintiff and defendant, the speaker proceeded to review what he called the most remarkable conspiracy of modern times. He was soon obliged to use the name of Mrs. Tilton, who, he said, was the true defendant in the case. He drew a touching picture of her affection for her husband, "giving her whole life to him without murmur as to her own self-sacrifice." Mr. Tracy then read the letter of Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher of Nov. 30, 1865.

Then followed the story of Mr. Tilton's connection with The Independent, his alleged acts of hostility to Mr. Beecher, his change of religious views, and final dismissal from the journal. Mr. Tracy also described his views of Mr. Bowen's feelings toward Mr. Beecher, drawing conclusions from the fact that Mr. Beecher joined The Christian Union in 1870, and that The Advance was started in Chicago, with the aid of the Rev. Edward Beecher, in the same year, both papers being formidable rivals of The Independent. Mr. Tracy announced his inability to say how true were the statements about Mr. Bowen's telling scandals regarding Mr. Beecher, but in the opinion of the speaker Mr. Tilton was the author of these scandals.

Mr. Tracy laid great stress upon the alleged garbling of Mrs. Tilton's letter containing the sentence: "To love is praiseworthy; to abuse your gift is sin," saying that it was an example of the malice of the husband. The "Winsted scandal" was also referred to, and Mr. Tracy said that he knew nothing about its truth or falsity, but he knew that the person besides Mr. Tilton, who was referred to in it, was no mere child, as the plaintiff had said (turning as he uttered the words in scornful tones, upon Mr. Tilton, who sat behind him, calmly facing the speaker), but a fully-developed woman twice as large as Mrs. Tilton. The speaker afterward commented upon the plaintiff's views of marriage and divorce, and alleged that while Mr. Tilton was the editor of a religious newspaper he was an advocate of free lust. Mr. Tracy said that he would convict Mr. Tilton of falsifying, and then read portions of the correspondence between Mr. Greeley and Mr. Tilton on the subject of marriage; also the testimony of the plaintiff regarding the same subject, comparing before the jury the statements in each. After ridiculing the idea that Mr. Tilton's views were limited to the mere desire for more liberal laws, Mr. Tracy asked impressively, "Does he think religion, in a free country, should be regulated by law?" "Yes," said Mr. Tilton in a voice distinctly heard by those immediately about him, but not loud enough to reach the ears of either the speaker or the jury.

The next topic discussed was the alleged trouble in Mr. Tilton's family, on account of which Mr. Beecher is said to have advised separation. At 3:45 o'clock, the leaves of Mr. Tracy's address having become disarranged, Mr. Beach, who was sitting nearest him, asked Judge Nelson to excuse the speaker. This was done, and the court was adjourned.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

OPENING ADDRESS OF GEN. TRACY.

Mr. Tracy, of counsel for defendant, selected to open the defense, reached the court-room a few minutes after the jury had been called, and at once began his address.

THE MAGNITUDE OF THE ISSUE.

MR. TRACY—MAY IT PLEASE THE COURT, GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: The time having arrived when the defendant is permitted to be heard in his own behalf, my associates have assigned to me the duty of stating his case to this Honorable Court and to you. I am sure, gentlemen, when you consider for whom and in whose presence I speak, you will believe that it is for me an occasion of great personal embarrassment. When I think of the interests involved in this trial and the effects which may follow it, when I contemplate the deep and painful anxiety which it everywhere excites, I am oppressed by the burden of responsibility which the over-kindness of my associates has laid upon me, and would gladly surrender it to other and abler hands. Nothing indeed prevents me from sinking beneath the task I have undertaken, but a clear conviction of the absolute innocence of my client, and the assurance of my eminent associates that his case is too strong to be injured by my unskillful advocacy. And moreover I am assured by the knowledge that comes to me from every quarter, that in my effort to make his innocence as plain to you and to the world as it has long been to his counsel and his people, I have the universal sympathy of mankind.

The magnitude and importance of the questions here involved cannot be overestimated, for they go down to the very foundations of our social, moral and religious life. If the effect of your decision in this case could be limited to determining whether the plaintiff has suffered a wrong at the hands of the defendant, for which he is entitled to be compensated in money, this trial would not excite the widespread interest which has attached to it from the beginning, and which must follow it to the end. But, gentlemen, I need not remind you how utterly impossible it is to circumscribe the effect of this trial within such narrow limits. Either this defendant is to go forth from this court-room vindicated by your verdict, or you and I and all who take part in this day's work are actors in one of the greatest moral tragedies which has ever occupied the stage of human life. Look at it as we may, it is impossible to separate the defendant from his representative character.

THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION NOWISE INVOLVED.

Not that I would indorse the remarkable statement of the plaintiff's counsel in his opening, "that upon the result of your verdict, to a very large extent, will depend the integrity of the Christian religion." God forbid that the integrity of the Christian religion should depend upon the character or the fortunes of any man, however learned, eloquent or devout. The Christian religion is founded upon the eternal rock of God's nature and God's decree. It is from everlasting to everlasting, and will abide when the remotest records of future history shall have faded from the annals of time, and the heavens "shall have been rolled together as a scroll." My client expects no other support from the Christian religion than such as may be found in its promises. He takes his stand here alone upon his own integrity, sustained only by God and the justice of his cause. And yet, gentlemen, I repeat, you cannot consider him altogether without reference to that sacred faith of which he has been for a long time one of the most honored ministers, which would acquire luster in his vindication, and which could not but be deeply wounded in his fall.

THE DEFENDANT'S PAST.

The son of one of the most eminent clergymen of the last generation, a member of a large family of which all the men are clergymen and all the women authors of repute—a family, let me say, gentlemen, on whose fair fame the shadow of reproach has never rested hitherto—the defendant early devoted himself to the self-denying pursuit of a minister of the Gospel. For it was no bed of roses in a luxurious abode that he spread for himself—he made no use of a dominant family influence to secure the refinement and privileges of a wealthy city parish. He struck boldly out into the wilds and hardships of the far West. He rode the rough circuit of a home missionary life. With his own hands he made the fires, and swept the floors and rang the bell in his forest church; with his own hands, assisted only by the faithful wife who stood by him then, and who—to the honor of womanhood—stands by him to-day, he ministered to the necessities of his forest home. When the thunders of his manly eloquence had reached even this distant coast and the imperative demand of the church had summoned him to a wider sphere of action, he left neither his simplicity nor his independence behind. He has been the same genuine, true-hearted, unaffected man here that he was in the West. In the midst of all the refinements and luxuries of city life, his motto has been that of the great apostle he so much resembles, "I know how to be abased, and I know how to abound." To some who, in the early days when he was less known than now, undertook to control his utterances by threatening loss of place, he made this memorable reply: "You may unseat me, but you cannot control me. I came from the woods, and I can go back to the woods again."

This man so introduced to us has wrought and taught for now thirty years in our midst. He is no longer a stranger, and no longer a new acquaintance. Genial and unassuming in his manners, inspiring in his speech as new wine, accessible to all, from the gravest citizen to the humblest child, the life he has lived before us has been as warm and fruitful as God's Summer—as open and beneficent as His day.

MR. BEECHER'S LIFE AS A PREACHER.

No truth struggling with error has ever failed to find in him a champion; no phase of human sorrow has sought him in vain for sympathy and relief. Nay, even as we have too much reason to know, the very excess of his sensibility has as times become to him an element of weakness, and he is for the moment at the mercy of colder and harder men.

And, if this is a fair picture of his private and domestic life, what shall be said of his life and influence as a preacher of the Gospel? Let the immense assemblies that for nearly thirty years—without abatement, without fluctuation—have thronged his chapel, more numerous and enthusiastic to-day than ever before, bear testimony. To this great congregation, presenting an unusual proportion of able and thoughtful men, he has ministered all these years untiringly. That his ministrations have been marked with a rare spirituality, and a wonderful mastery over the various motives of human character and moods of human experience, is universally acknowledged. He has been emphatically a preacher of the people; living himself in constant communion with the unseen, he has interpreted the mysteries of the soul and given voice to those dim intuitions, those immortal yearnings which spring in every human breast, but which so few can ever utter. A clergyman of the Congregational Church, he has labored for the aggrandizement of no sect, for the building up of no denomination. His creed is as broad as humanity itself, and his deep, warm heart, instinctively responding to the feeling of all, has enabled him to summon the race to a higher, nobler and purer life. Though a Protestant, he has ever been able to discern the common Christian faith in all churches bearing the Christian name. Moral integrity, sincere devotion, and an honest consecration to the common Lord, have always been recognized by him without reference to the question of his own recognition by those to whom his charity has extended. Every honest soul that labored for the salvation and elevation of mankind, whether minister, priest or monk, or only self-sacrificing layman, has been to him a Christian brother, a minister of God. It is then no wonder, that besides the power of his personal teaching, the demand for his printed sermons should be beyond all precedent; their weekly issue is read in every town and hamlet throughout this broad land; they are met with in the cabin of the backwoodsman, in the hut of the miner, in the fore-castle at sea. Not only this, but they have been translated into every European language. In England alone, as I am informed, their circulation is thrice as large as that in all this country.

THE SECRET OF MR. BEECHER'S SUCCESS.

Thus has he—alone—almost fulfilled the divine command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." I estimate the full force of my words when I affirm that no man ever exerted in his own lifetime so widespread and beneficent an influence. The far-reaching and abiding power of this Christian minister has long been a marvel to the people of two continents, and theories both friendly and hostile have been advanced to explain it. Gentlemen, shall I solve the problem for you? The reason of the power of this man's preaching is, that behind his sermons there is a life, and behind the life, a man. It is because they have come from the heart, that they have gone to the heart. It is because his preaching is known by those who know him best to be illustrated by his daily living, that he is, in this supreme emergency of his life, girded by millions of faithful hearts and walled to heaven by the unfaltering love and confidence of his people.

MR. BEECHER'S RIGHT TO THE NATION'S GRATITUDE.

But if there are those who are not interested in the minister of the Gospel, I invite them to contemplate the patriot and philanthropist. Espousing the cause of the oppressed, he labored for the emancipation of a race. When the agitation resulted in a conflict of arms, imperiling the Union of the States, his clarion voice was heard everywhere arousing the nation to the holy strife; when danger threatened from abroad he was prompt to plead the cause of American union on the basis of American liberty in the face of infuriated thousands set on by a foreign aristocracy to revile him and to strike him down. Mr. Beecher's hand to hand fight with the English masses on English soil is a thrilling page in history, known and read of all men. His courage, his devotion, his eloquence in that memorable contest won the admiration of all Europe and can never be forgotten by the American people. In that struggle Henry Ward Beecher won the nation's gratitude and the nation's love. When the fury of the storm had spent its force, when the war was over, and the nation was saved, then the voice which had rung like a trumpet in the strife was the first to plead for forbearance to the vanquished, for a generous condonation of the past, and a permanent peace resting upon universal amnesty. This, gentlemen, is a true and unflattering portrait of the defendant in this case—as a husband, a father, a citizen, a patriot, a philanthropist, a minister, and a man. If it were a statement to be established by testimony, thousands upon thousands of witnesses might crowd this Court to confirm its truth, for the name of Henry Ward Beecher has long been the treasure of the nation, as it has been the special pride and glory of this city, famous throughout the world as the scene of his life and labors.

MR. BEECHER'S LABORS FOR YOUNG MEN.

One of the most striking characteristics of the man I have been describing was a profound and ever-active interest in young men. The first work he ever published, a work which won him an enviable reputation, while he was himself yet a young man, and which is still disseminated by thousands in this and other lands, was his "Lectures to Young Men." When, therefore, in his earlier Brooklyn ministry, he encountered a young man of unusual promise, it was like him to receive the youth into his heart of hearts and to lavish upon him that affection, that expenditure of time, and that wealth of intimate intercourse, which not a few men of the highest culture had desired in vain. For that privileged intimacy, and for that affectionate devotion, this prosecution is the grateful reward. The heart in which that generous sowing brought forth only the deadly nightshade of envy and hate was the heart of the plaintiff in this suit.

MR. TILTON PICTURED IN DEEP COLORS.

It now becomes my unpleasant duty to invite you, gentlemen, to consider for a moment who and what is Theodore Tilton. The plaintiff in this case presents the most impressive instance that has ever come within my observation of the remorseless power and the destructive effect of a single absorbing master passion. An all-dominating, selfish egotism is the basis of his character. As a boy he was bright and ambitious, and his quickness of apprehension and felicity of statement brought him early recognitions and praise. Everybody flattered and encouraged him, regarding his self-conceit as something which mature years and the hard experiences of life would modify into a reasonable self-reliance and an honorable pride. Beginning life as a reporter on the public press, he was brought into contact with great orators and public men, and he early resolved to devote himself to a public career. All his studies were turned upon this point—to make himself a graceful and powerful speaker and writer. The art of appearing well and sounding well was the art he sought—a dangerous pursuit for one already strongly predisposed by constitutional vanity to consider life a drama and himself its hero. He began with unbounded confidence and cool, calculating pertinacity to work his way upward. Possessed of a fine address, a lively imagination, fertile fancy and flowing speech, he lacked the powers of deep and original thought, and more than these, sound sense, discriminating judgment and the unselfish aims which are the prime elements of a noble manhood. Anxious above all things to shine, he seized every opportunity and advocated every cause which would give him prominence. He adopted the ideas of leading men of the country—Sumner, Phillips, Garrison, and, more than any other, of Mr. Beecher, who, as we have seen, was lavish of friendship and aid—and reproduced them in sensational editorials and lectures. The extremists in politics and religion to whom he joined himself were ready to reward the facility with which he yielded himself to their uses by fostering his conceit, representing him as the successful antagonist of Mr. Beecher—the young David who had overthrown the great Goliath in debate, and the brilliant occupant of the editorial chair of The Independent, who had eclipsed the light of his predecessor.

THE BEGINNING OF MR. TILTON'S DECLINE.

He fell in with gay, fascinating people, who considered themselves free from the conventional restraints of society, and little by little he slid into their ways of thinking. His unbalanced vanity was not proof against the wine of dangerous theories when presented by the hand of the flatterer. Surrounded only by those who burned incense to his vanity, he became inflated with success, and fancied himself a monumental genius, a prolific source of wit and wisdom—in a word, the foremost man of his time. Conspicuously destitute alike of logical power and the poise of a nice moral sense, he embraced the wildest views and rushed forward, believing that the world would follow where he led. Some persons of cool heads can speculate on social, political or religious questions without losing their balance, but with Theodore

Tilton, to calculate the depths of an abyss was to plunge headlong into it. A believer in the Christian faith and a member of an orthodox church, he speculated on the origin of matter and the attributes of God until he became a deist, denying the divinity of Christ and rejecting the Scriptures as a Divine revelation of God's will to man. The husband of a gifted, pure, and loving wife—the father of an interesting family, having, as he describes it, an "ideal home," he speculated on social problems, and was led by the malign influence under which he fell, to denounce the marriage relation as a remnant of effete civilization; a clog and hindrance to the development of the race. His remedy for the evils of marriage was easy divorce, leaving parties as free to dissolve the relation as they were to enter into it. He denies that he is a free lover, but Victoria Woodhull, the apostle of free love, asks for no greater social freedom than this. A leader of men must know how to construct and to preserve, but Theodore Tilton knew only how to unsettle and destroy. The moment he assumed a position of such prominence that he could be studied and criticised, the glaring defects of his character discovered themselves to those who had hitherto been his dupes. Opposition sprang up in every quarter, and at last he was forced to realize that the foundation which had been reared for him, and on which he had been placed by others more than by himself, was crumbling beneath his feet. The end was near. Theodore Tilton fell—fell from an eminence seldom attained by men of his age—to the very bottom of the abyss, the depths of which he had attempted to sound.

A MONUMENT OF BASE INGRATITUDE.

From that abyss he beheld afar off the man who had been his early friend and patron, but whom he had long regarded as his inferior and rival, standing firm and erect, his influence widening and deepening, and his hold on public favor becoming more and more permanent and secure. A man fed by inordinate vanity can never awake to a sane, reasonable estimate of himself. Failure and disappointment never lead such a man to self-examination, but excite within him only bitterness, rage and malice. With him it is never his own folly and impotence that have impeded his advance, but some malevolent power has interfered. In the blindness of his rage, Theodore Tilton persuaded himself that the sole and efficient cause of his overthrow was Beecher, that the one man who had prevented him from reaching the topmost summit of fame was Beecher. But one resource was left to him. If he had not power to rebuild, he still had the power to destroy, and Beecher should feel that power. To be eclipsed and neglected was gall and wormwood to his soul. If he could not be famous, he could at least be infamous, and he preferred infamy to oblivion. Mr. Beecher had long been his friend and the intimate friend of his wife. That friendship he could pervert, and make himself the author, and at the same time the central figure, of the most famous scandal of modern times. If he could not supplant Beecher in the affection of the people, he could scandalize him. If he had made it impossible for any honorable pen to write his own biography, then was it worth any cost to have a line devoted to him in the biography of Henry Ward Beecher. His natural bent towards plots and conspiracies now fully revealed itself, and Beecher was the object of his schemes. His grand genius for attitudinizing—for Tilton is nothing if not dramatic—began to be displayed. As in a play, everything was arranged with a view to effect. Facts were nothing to him except as they could be adroitly used to serve the purpose of his pageant. Friends, wife, children, and all that other men hold sacred and dear, must be trampled down and walked over to reach the notice and applause for which he has shown himself willing to barter his immortal soul. Pure women might abhor and shun him, but one pure woman at least should go to her grave bearing witness to his power in a blasted life and a broken heart. Here, gentlemen, here speaks the "master passion" of this perverted man. At this very moment, if he could realize the sad truth that he is morally dead, he would still rejoice in this post-mortem investigation of his character. The decaying corpse would rather be dissected than buried; but we propose, gentlemen, to dissect him first in the interest of truth, and to bury him afterwards in the interest of decency; such, gentlemen, is the plaintiff in this cause. A staunch new vessel, launched upon an honorable voyage, sailing with prosperous winds over unruffled seas, has been transformed into a pirate by the wickedness of her commander, and wrecked by his folly, and now lies a stranded and battered hulk, the object at once of the curiosity and abhorrence of mankind.

MR. BEECHER'S EARLY INTEREST IN MR. TILTON.

And now, gentlemen, with this imperfect preliminary sketch of the two leading characters in what we shall show you is the most remarkable conspiracy of modern times, perhaps you will be better prepared to comprehend the "strange, eventful history" which I proceed to lay before you. In 1847 Mr. Beecher removed from Indianapolis and settled in Brooklyn. His success as a preacher was already established, and he immediately took rank among the foremost orators of America. His church was at once crowded, and soon came to be the largest and among the wealthiest of the two cities. Removing to Brooklyn in 1851 or 1852, the plaintiff—then a boy just from school—took his place among the young men of Plymouth Church. He was speedily taken into favor by some of the leading members and by the pastor. Being employed to report some of Mr. Beecher's sermons, the two men came into frequent contact and formed a warm friendship. The favor in this friendship was all on one side. Mr. Beecher was a man of mature years, and, even then, almost at the height of his fame. He had multitudes of friends, men of wealth, of learning, of high reputation, and could derive nothing from the mere lad, whom he thus took into the circle of his friends, except the pleasure which a great and generous nature feels in imparting knowledge to an opening mind, and in helping forward a struggling aspirant. The pastor was led to take an additional interest in this young man by the fact of his marriage to a young girl whom Mr. Beecher had known and loved from her childhood. In the following year, Tilton, through Mr. Beecher's friendly interest, was taken upon the editorial staff of The Independent, a paper mainly owned by one of Mr. Beecher's congregation, and to which Mr. Beecher was himself a regular and valued contributor. From this time the relations of the two grew more and more intimate. Tilton visited frequently at Mr. Beecher's house and took an active part in the work of the church; and when, in 1861, Mr. Beecher was invited to the editorial chair of The Independent, his affection for Mr. Tilton was so well known that one of the chief inducements held out to him to accept that position was that Mr. Tilton should be associated with him as assistant editor. It is true that there had been some indications of envy and conscious rivalry on the part of young Tilton, even at this early day; and some of Mr. Beecher's oldest friends suspected and criticised the motives of the young man; but Mr. Beecher himself was entirely free from suspicion, and put the most innocent interpretation upon every act of his new friend.

MR. TILTON SOLICITS MR. BEECHER'S COMPANY.

At this time, gentlemen, Mr. Beecher had a Summer residence in the country, to which it was the habit of his family to repair, along the last of May or the first of June, and to return again in October, and sometimes as late as November. But Mr. Beecher spent a portion of the time, while his family were thus residing in the country, and prior to the beginning of his Summer vacation, in the city, working at his own house, but taking his meals at some of the families of his church during the time that he was in the city. This habit of Mr. Beecher's, thus living for portions of his time with the families or members of his church, was well known to Mr. Tilton, and he, early in 1861 or 1862, urged Mr. Beecher to make his house also a place of frequent resort. He spoke often to Mr. Beecher of his wife's great affection for him, and requested him to call and make himself at home in the family. Mr. Beecher had known Mrs. Tilton prior to his acquaintance with Mr. Tilton, but he had known her as a young girl, a member of the church, and the acquaintance had practically ceased after her marriage, until it was renewed at the request of Mr. Tilton, as I have stated—ceased, I mean, so far as his visits at their house; for in the early years of their marriage they were boarding, and when they began to keep house they commenced in Oxford-st., so far from the place of Mr. Beecher's residence that it was quite impracticable for him to visit the house often. Still, at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Tilton, as we have said, he began his visits at the house of Mr. Tilton in Oxford-st.; but, as the plaintiff tells you, his visits were quite infrequent. But visiting that house, he made the acquaintance of Mrs. Tilton as a wife and mother—a relation which was first disclosed to him on these visits, thus made at the earnest solicitation of the plaintiff.

MRS. TILTON'S PAINFUL POSITION.

And now, gentlemen, I ask you to consider for a moment that Mrs. Tilton is the true defendant in this cause—she whose lips are sealed and whose hands are tied while the battle is waging over her body. She can make no outcry and strike no blow in her own defense. She can only weep and pray, as she has done so often already, looking for her deliverance to Almighty God and to the spirit of justice which He inspires in the hearts of men!

THE FINE ATTRIBUTES OF MRS. TILTON'S CHARACTER.

Small in stature, and of a childlike disposition, she is of a nature deeply reverential and filled with an exalted religious enthusiasm. The plaintiff himself declares that, had she lived in former days and belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, she would have been recognized as one of those illustrious women whose names shine with the halo of saintliness. She was devoted to her home, entertained views of the sacredness of motherhood almost romantic (if that were possible), and gave her whole life, under God, absolutely to her husband and children, without a murmur as to her own self-sacrifice. Gifted, sensitive, pure, self-deprecating, idolizing her home, and worshipping with all the intensity of her nature the husband of her early love, her very existence was so blended with his, that their union fulfilled Lord Coke's definition of marriage, "two souls united in one person." From the time Theodore Tilton placed the wedding ring upon the finger of Elizabeth, until that hour when, driven by his persecution, she was compelled to tear herself from her home and from him forever, there had been but one person who in all things dominated that household, and that one was Theodore Tilton. His wish was to her a command; whatever he willed, she did. Relieving him from every household care incident to the rearing of a young and numerous family, she was content to toil and suffer that he might win the distinction he coveted so much.

MRS. TILTON'S UNHAPPY LOT.

In a married life which would have made most women wretched, for ten long years of absolute self-sacrifice, Elizabeth Tilton fancied herself happy. Month by month she watched the gradual unfolding of her husband, under the guidance and companionship of his friend and pastor. She saw him rising step by step to that proud eminence which had been the ruling ambition of his life, and she was happy. But she at last came to realize that every new success brought to him new dangers. She saw with pain the character of the associates with whom, in the recklessness of vanity and the intoxication of first success, he surrounded himself. And with unspeakable anguish she witnessed the change that, day by day, was going on in his religious convictions. Slowly but certainly he was sliding away from the views of marriage and of social duty which he once adopted, and becoming the advocate of theories which seemed to her to have been propounded only by those who were unwilling that the principles they professed should be better than the lives they lived. The spell of the flatterer was upon him. To rescue him from all that she deemed false in religion and pernicious in morals was, as it seemed to her, the one great duty of life. To accomplish this, no sacrifice was too great. She would patiently if not willingly accept humiliation, reproach, accusation, nay, the most sacred feelings of wife and mother might be outraged and trampled upon, still she would hide her suffering and conceal her wounds, if only the object of her solicitude and prayers might be saved.

MRS. TILTON'S REFUGE IN HER SORROW.

There was but one person on earth to whom she could make known her sorrow, and that one was their friend and pastor. Boundless was her faith in God and in the efficacy of prayer, but she was not a mere enthusiast; she believed in a wise and faithful application of appropriate means. How natural then that she should appeal in this emergency to him who had been the friend of his youth, the counselor and guide of his maturer manhood. He sympathized with her suffering and promised help. How faithfully and how tenderly he counseled the plaintiff we have seen by the beautiful letter, as wise as it is beautiful, which the defendant wrote to the plaintiff in 1867. If Tilton could have but heeded that advice how different the scene from what we this day witness. There would have been no bleeding heart, no deserted hearthstone, no wife with a broken heart and a blasted life, no children with a blight resting upon their young and innocent lives, but a home happy and united, a family bound together by the ties of love and respect, a household altar undeseccated, as in those early days of simple piety, of which he is now so much ashamed.

INCONSISTENCY IN THE CHARGE.

But blinded by his egotism and drunk with the intoxication of flattery, he refused to break away from his evil associates. Neither the voice of friendship nor the appeals of affection had power to save him. And now, gentlemen, they ask us to believe that at this time, when all of a wife's faith, a woman's devotion and a mother's love, was being exerted to save Theodore Tilton from the companionship and corrupting influence of those "whose feet take hold on hell"—this pure-minded and saintly woman, in her very effort to save her husband, fell herself! Fell into the very sins against which, for so many anxious years, she had been warning her husband "with strong crying and with tears!" Nay, more, that the very religion—the religion which she had cherished all her life, and which was confessedly so conspicuous in that life, furnished the motives for her fall! Still more, that so infatuated and unintelligent was her hold upon that faith, that having sinned, she solemnly denied this conscientious crime and invented a tissue of lies to support that denial; that, still further moved by an inspiration she believed Divine, she abandoned all the responsibilities and loves of life, and gave to a spiritual guide, himself all leprous and loathsome with adultery and perjury—and, anti-climax of abominations, that she is "a pure and white-souled woman" still! Gentlemen, you are men full grown; you have the wisdom that comes from the experience of life, the observation of human nature, the knowledge of affairs. Is there one among you that can so discredit all that experience and observation as to entertain for a moment a suggestion so unutterably absurd, so absolutely monstrous?

MR. TILTON'S TRIUMPH ON THE INDEPENDENT.

In June, 1863, Mr. Beecher, feeling exhausted by his labors, visited Europe for a few months, leaving Mr. Tilton in charge of The Independent during his absence, and on his return, finding from experience that the burden was too great for him, he privately relinquished the entire charge of the paper to Mr. Tilton, consenting, however, that his own name should remain as ostensible editor for a year longer, at the end of which time Mr. Tilton assumed the open charge of the paper. The prize Tilton had so earnestly struggled for was now won, and at the age of thirty years he found himself the successor of Henry Ward Beecher, the occupant of one of the proudest editorial chairs in America. For this position he was indebted to the friendship of Henry Ward Beecher.

MR. TILTON'S OWN TESTIMONY TO MR. BEECHER'S HELPFULNESS.

The nature of that friendship, which I have thus briefly described, and its value to Mr. Tilton, can be portrayed in no language of mine more effectively than he has done himself in a letter which he wrote under the impulse of conscience the very year that he became editor, and a few days after he had over his wine made direct and wicked insinuations against his loving pastor and best friend. In this letter he tells, under the impulse of a gratitude which was all too brief, something of the obligations which he was under to the man whom he had just begun covertly to slander, and whom he now seeks to destroy:

MIDNIGHT, {
BROOKLYN, NOV. 30, '65. }

Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER :

MY DEAR FRIEND : Returning home late to-night, I cannot go to bed without writing you a letter.

Twice I have been forced to appear as your antagonist before the public—the occasions five years apart. After the first, I am sure our friendship, instead of being maimed, was strengthened. After this last, if I may guess your heart by knowing mine, I am sure the old love waxes instead of wanes. * * * My friend, from my boyhood up, you have been to me what no other man has been—what no other man can be. While I was a student, the influence of your mind on mine was greater than all books and all teachers. The intimacy with which you honored me for twelve years has been (next to my wife and family) the chief affection of my life. By you I was baptized—by you married. You are my minister, teacher, father, brother, friend, companion. The debt I owe you I can never pay. My religious life; my intellectual development; my open door of opportunity for labor; my public reputation; all these, my dear friend, I owe in so great a degree to your own kindness that my gratitude cannot be written in words, but must be expressed only in love.

Then, what hours we have had together! What arm in arm wanderings about the streets! What hunts for pictures and books! What mutual revelations and communings! What interchangings of mirth, of tears, of prayers!

The more I think back upon this friendship, the more am I convinced that, not your public position, not your fame, not your genius, but just your affection has been the secret of the bond between us; for whether you had been high or low, great or common, I believe that my heart, knowing its mate, would have loved you exactly the same!

Now, therefore, I want to say that if, either long ago or lately, any word of mine, whether spoken or printed, whether public or private, has given you pain, I beg you to blot it from your memory, and to write your forgiveness in its place.

Moreover, if I should die, leaving you alive, I ask you to love my children for their father's sake, who has taught them to reverence you, and to regard you as the man of men.

One thing more. My religious experiences have never been more refreshing than during the last year. [This was in 1865.] Never before have I had such fair and winning thoughts of the other life. With these thoughts you stand connected in a strange and beautiful way. I believe human friendship outlasts human life. Our friendship is yet of the earth, earthly, but it shall one day stand uplifted above mortality, safe, without scar or flaw, without a breath to blot or a suspicion to endanger it. Meanwhile, O my friend! may our Father in Heaven bless you on the earth, guide you, strengthen you, illumine you, and at last crown you with the everlasting crown!

And now good night, and sweet be your dreams of Your unworthy but eternal friend,

THEODORE TILTON.

THE INTOXICATION PRODUCED BY RAPID SUCCESSES.

We have seen, gentlemen, that in this year 1865

Mr. Tilton assumed the absolute and open control of The Independent. He was no longer, he could be no longer supposed to be under the influence of Mr. Beecher. Mr. Beecher had retired from the paper, and, although a correspondent of it, and the paper published his sermons weekly, still Mr. Tilton was the sole responsible editor of that paper. The first thing his egotism prompted him to do on assuming control of the paper was to satisfy the world that he had emancipated himself from Mr. Beecher's influence, and was no longer guided by him. He had, in his estimation, become the equal of Henry Ward Beecher, if not his superior, and he must take the first opportunity to satisfy the world of that fact. Early in 1865 he makes a political difference the occasion for denouncing Mr. Beecher in The Independent. And the year following that opposition, the opposition of The Independent became so pronounced against Mr. Beecher, and its attacks so virulent upon him, that he was compelled in self-respect to sever all connection with the paper, and to refuse it permission longer to print his sermons. The pretended occasion of this attack in 1866 was Mr. Beecher's Cleveland letter, which has been introduced in evidence before you and which you have heard read. You will remember, gentlemen, that that was a period just succeeding the close of the war, and the question before the country was what should be the policy of the North towards the conquered States of the South, and that question depended upon what should be the policy of the Administration, because whatever policy the Administration—having a majority in Congress and the control of the executive power—should adopt, must become, of course, the policy of the nation. There was a long and angry controversy, as you may remember, within the ranks of the Republican party, which was at that time the party responsible for the control of the Government as to what should be the policy of the country, many Republicans adhering to what they regarded the policy which Mr. Lincoln had adopted prior to his death, and others seeking to depart from that policy and adopt a new and more aggressive policy against the South. While the policy of the Republican party was being formed and settled, and debate and argument were going on within the ranks of that party, Mr. Beecher was among those who adhered to what he seemed to be the policy which Mr. Lincoln would have inaugurated and carried out had he lived. That policy was expressed in what is known as the Cleveland letter, a letter, gentlemen, which, permit me to say, read at this time nine years after it was written, shows that Mr. Beecher was no less an eminent statesman than he was a minister of the Gospel; but that letter, which was only an argument intending to influence the policy of the Administration and of the Republican party, was made the pretext with Theodore Tilton for a bitter and outrageous attack upon Henry Ward Beecher, and in that contest, as we know, the policy which was advocated by the extreme men of the party came to prevail, and Mr. Tilton, as he tells you upon the witness stand, found himself with the majority of the party. This controversy which sprang from this letter severed the public connection between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton. The latter could no longer be suspected of being influenced or controlled in his public relations by the influence of Mr. Beecher. Other influences came in to replace the great influence which had departed. The character of that influence, gentlemen, you may judge by the subsequent career of Mr. Tilton. The extreme men of every faction, of every view, flocked around Mr. Tilton. They found how easily they could use him. To use him successfully it was only necessary to flatter him. They found he possessed a mind which naturally brought him to accept the most radical view of every question, and they surrounded him; they obtained possession of him and they controlled him, so long as he remained editor of that paper. But at this time, in 1866, the second year after he had assumed control of The Independent, it was observed that his religious views began to undergo a marked change. For the extremists who had surrounded him were not confined to politics or to social theories exclusively, they extended to religious views also, and Mr. Tilton began to show that he was accepting their views on the subject of religion. As early as March, 1866, he writes his wife: "I don't care greatly for sermons, but I am a believer in hymns." February 1, 1867, he writes: * * * "I am conscious of departing more and more from the peculiar religious and theological views which you regard as sacred. Perhaps this statement may give you trouble, but certainly this fact has given me peace." Twelve days afterwards he again writes: * * * "The old religious teachings, the orthodox view, the dread of punishment, the atonement, have less and less power over my mind. Of course you will mourn over this. But I must be an honest man. I don't believe in orthodoxy, and therefore I will not pretend to do so."

MRS. TILTON'S GRIEF AT HER HUSBAND'S LAXITY.

This change in his religious sentiments was a source of great unhappiness to his wife. This is testified to, not only by Mr. Tilton, but by the witness whom the plaintiff has introduced in your presence, Mrs. Bradshaw. She tells you that Mrs. Tilton mourned greatly over the change of religious sentiments that came over her husband in these early years. On his cross-examination before the Committee, Tilton declared that he thoroughly hates and despises religious creeds. Says he: "I do not believe in one of the thirty-nine articles, nor in either of the catechisms, nor in the divine injunction of the Scriptures, or in the divinity of Christ." He further says: "I despise the church and generally despise ministers." He further says: "I thank God I do not belong to the priesthood or the church." Tilton further testifies to the sorrow and anguish which this change in his religious sentiment caused his wife. He says: "She was always in sorrow that I was not a minister, which," says he, "was the only virtue that I possess." On that examination there was put to him the following question: "Well, it was that lack of reverence for the church and its ordinances, and your lack of belief in the divinity of Christ, as she held it, that she missed in you?" To that he answered: "Yes;" and the following question was put to him: Q. "And she grieved over it? A. "Oh! yes, indeed; grieved over it with tears." And to a further question: "Q. Do you know whether the change in your religious convictions was a source of great grief and sorrow to your wife?" To this question he answered: "It was a great source of tears and anguish to her; she said to me once that denying the divinity of Christ, in her view, nullified our marriage almost; and I think next to the sorrow of this scandal it has caused that woman to sorrow more than anything else she has ever suffered, because I cannot look upon the Lord Jesus Christ as the Lord God. I think her breast has been wrenched with it; she is almost an enthusiast on the subject of the divinity of her Savior. Q. You think her a Christian, do you? A. Yes; she is the best Christian I know of, barring her faults; better than any minister. Q. The change of your religious views has been the subject of a great deal of conversation and anguish, and labor on her part, has it not? A. Oh, yes—of letters, and prayers, and tears, and entreaties, many a time and oft."

BEECHER'S ADVICE TO TILTON ABOUT RELIGIOUS MATTERS.

In this hour of her great sorrow, Mrs. Tilton applied to her pastor for advice and sympathy. Mr. Beecher saw Tilton frequently, and talked with him upon matters of religious belief. On June 3, 1867, he wrote Tilton the wise and beautiful letter which has been given in evidence, and from which I now desire to quote.

Mr. Beecher writes Mr. Tilton:

JUNE 3, 1867.

MY DEAR THEODORE: In thinking over our conversation respecting your position on religious matters, it occurs to me that you are liable to do yourself an unnecessary injustice by supposing or affirming that you have wandered from received opinions, whereas it seems to me that you have simply entered that stage of development in which every active mind explores the grounds and reasons of belief for himself. Now, it is impossible for one, unless cautious even to coldness, to pursue such investigations without great oscillations of belief, without seeming at one time averse to one view, and then again seeking it with greater avidity than ever. It is a question so wide, so grave, that one ought not to commit himself upon the hasty result of a year or several years' reading. You seem to me to follow your sympathies largely in investigation. This has its advantages, and is one way of study; but it requires far more time and caution, inasmuch as it will surely lead you to accept things from poetic or emotive reasons, which are but half true, which need and will get by longer experience much modification. The formation of opinions upon religious questions in such a nature as yours is a matter of growth more than of logic. Under such a state of facts, therefore, I would submit whether you can wisely or even truly say you stand on this or on that ground, and whether you do not, in justice to your own final self, require all the privileges accorded to those who are investigating. In part I write from experience. I look back upon periods when, if I had expressed the then results of thought and reading, I should have committed myself to views which I have outgrown or left behind. I find myself, slowly but surely, going toward those views of human nature and of divine government which have underlain for a thousand years the Evangelical churches. It seems to me that I discern, arising from studies in natural science, a surer foothold of these views than they have ever had, in so far as theology is concerned. If I have one purpose or aim, it is to secure for the truths now developing in the spheres of natural science a religious spirit and a harmonization with all the great cardinal truths of religion which have thus far characterized the Christian system. I turn with more and more chill and dread from that bleak and fruitless desert of naturalism which so many are hailing as a second paradise.

[Further on he says:]

Believe me, Theodore, that I have great sympathy in your developments, and affection for you, and should be glad to help and sorry to hinder.

Now comes a paragraph, the significance of which will be more apparent as we get further on in our opening, gentlemen, but which I wish to call your attention to here now, lest I may not recur to it at that time. Mr. Beecher, in order to disarm all ground of hostility, and to prevent his advice which he had given Mr. Tilton on religious subjects being repelled by hostile personal feelings, says to him:

I have given up the idea of starting a newspaper. I am sure that I could not bear the strain and yet carry on my church.

I am truly yours,

H. W. BEECHER.

This, gentlemen, was in 1867. The significance of that reference to a new newspaper in the relations of these two men, as I have said, will become more apparent as we get further on in this matter. But the change in his religious convictions was not the only departure made by Mr. Tilton from opinions theretofore accepted by him.

MR. TILTON'S GROWTH IN RADICALISM.

There followed soon after a very marked change in his social views respecting the relation of the sexes, and particularly that of marriage and divorce. Mr. Tilton espoused with zeal the cause of woman's suffrage. He reports himself in The Golden Age as having said during the war that after the abolition of slavery, the next great question which would agitate the public mind would be that of woman's suffrage. And undoubtedly believing that a great social revolution was impending, he aspired to make himself the leader of the movement. But its members differed widely among themselves in their views of the marriage relation. Many, perhaps a majority, coincided with all Christian people upon this subject, while others held that marriage was a mere matter of civil contract, and that the parties thereunto should be as free to dissolve the relation as they were to enter into it. As was his custom, Tilton accepted the most radical views upon this, as upon other subjects. He soon began to talk with friends visiting at his house upon this matter. He did not hesitate to declare before his wife that he had now come to regard the marriage relation very differently from what he once did. To him it was no longer a sacred institution to be regulated by the Church or State. His most intimate friends of both sexes came to be those who agreed with him upon the subject of marriage. They used to converse much upon the relation of the sexes, the great value of mutual friendships between married men and unmarried women, or between married men and other men's wives; of the extent to which such intimacies could be carried and still be innocent, and finally that there could be nothing criminal in any relation which love had sanctified. This, I say, gentlemen, we shall show you was a frequent subject of conversation between Mr. Tilton and his associates visiting at his house. It was these sentiments, so offensive to this pure and devoted wife and mother, that she was compelled to listen to day after day, and week after week. This change in his sentiment was, if possible, more repugnant to her than his change in religion. The one she strove against with anguish, with entreaty and with tears; the other she resisted and fought against. She despised the doctrine and its adherents; she forbade her home to the women who advocated it; she remonstrated with her husband against the principles he held and the people with whom he associated, and particularly she suspected his numerous friendships with women, which he characterized as "sacred weddings which knew no sex."

MR. TILTON'S ALIEN LOVES.

She rejected his sophistry that they were helps to him in his labors, or pillars against which he could lean for support. She perceived with a woman's instinct the end to which such relations would bring him. Still Tilton persisted in the necessity of such friendships and humiliated his wife by the publicity he gave them. In 1866, during a lecturing tour in the West, he there made the acquaintance of a family and fell desperately in love with one of the daughters. To pave the way for her to visit him at his own house he immediately sent on for his wife, introduced her to this family, and insisted upon her inviting the young lady to their home in Brooklyn. Tilton himself has testified that his wife wept bitter tears of sorrow upon being introduced to this young lady, and on seeing the extreme cordiality and friendship with which he was received by her. Mrs. Tilton yielded, however, to her husband's request and invited her to make the visit. The lady accepted and came. It was this friendship and visit which drove the mother-in-law almost to insanity on account of the attentions paid by Tilton to this lady, then dwelling under his own roof. That he was desperately in love with her there is no doubt; he has left the fact on record in the correspondence which he himself has published, and which is introduced here in evidence before you; but the lady, soon learning the true character of Tilton and the dangers which association with him threatened to her fair name, suddenly put an end to the acquaintance to the great sorrow and disappointment of Mr. Tilton. The freedom with which he used to write to his wife on the subject of his relations with other women—his friendships, as he called it, for women—is illustrated in the correspondence which has been introduced. It is a remarkable correspondence, gentlemen, to pass between a husband and wife. It develops a trait in Mr. Tilton's character that is most unusual and almost unaccountable—that he could presume to humiliate his wife and destroy her peace of mind by disclosing to her in correspondence the friendships which he had for other ladies, and describe them as going to the extreme lengths which he did. On February 12, 1867, he wrote:

MY DARLING: I wrote to you a hurried sheet this morning from the Sherman House, while waiting for [blank] to breakfast with me. He did not come; I ate my breakfast alone. Once again on the cars, and once again confronting a lecture appointment, I feel that I am once again at work, after my two days of pleasant rest.

And I confess that rest is sweet. I do not mean rest for wearied limbs, though that too, is sweet; but rest for one's spirit; rest in the midst of a circle of kind and loving friends; rest to one's own vagrant, untamed and unconquerable homesickness; rest in the tranquillity of spiritual peace.

I have been enjoying two days of such rest. The spell is still on me this morning. I rode five hours to [blank] yesterday afternoon, and five hours back, after midnight, on purpose to spend a long and delicious evening with the [blank] family [which had no father or male head of the house]. This family and its influences have helped to make me a better man. The very roof seems to spread over me a benediction. I am grateful for the Providence that ordered my steps last December to the threshold of this cottage. Tarrying with these dear people has been a new experience in friendship—a new delight of life.

The whole subject of friendship has been much in my mind this Winter.

I am satisfied that whoso makes no intimate or confidential friends, both among men and among women—friends with whom he girdles himself round about as with a halo—friends who are props to keep him lifted perpetually toward his highest life—friends whose friendship is a kind of sacred wedding that knows no sex—such a man neglects one of the greatest of human opportunities for intellectual, moral and spiritual growth.

Again, he says:

The number of people who mate each other—who fit one another exactly—who are (to use your word) "counterparts," is very small.

Again, he says:

And this fact reveals the one prolonged mistake of my past life—my association with your mother. I can now plainly see what I might have been if, for instance, I could have lived under such a roof as sheltered me in [blank], instead of breathing, during all these years, the atmosphere of Livingston-st.

Mr. Beach—Wont you read the next sentence?

Mr. Tracy—I will, Sir, I presume. This is the next sentence: If my mother-in-law had been such a woman as [blank], believe that I might have grown by this time —

Mr. Beach—No; "and the influences of Brooklyn had been like the influences of" [blank]—

Mr. Tracy—Ah, excuse me if I skipped. No.

Mr. Beach—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—I will repeat the sentence that I read.

Mr. Porter—This is as Mr. Tilton published it, not as given in evidence.

Mr. Tracy—I read it as it is here published and given in evidence.

Mr. Beach—Well, I correct you as it is given in evidence.

Mr. Tracy—The parts were given in evidence at different times, and possibly I have not got them together. I have taken it from the official report, and the only chance of confusion is that in bringing the different parts together from the record, I have not given them—

Mr. Everts—Go on, Mr. Tracy. Go on with your statement.

Mr. Tracy—I will repeat the sentence as I read it, gentlemen, and read the next following:

And this fact reveals the one prolonged mistake of my past life—my association with your mother. I can now plainly see what I might have been, if, for instance, I could have lived under such a roof as sheltered me in [blank], instead of breathing during all these years the atmosphere of Livingston-st.

If my mother-in-law had been such a woman as [blank], and the influences of Brooklyn had been like the influences of [blank], I believe that I might have grown by this time as unselfish as a good woman. How much more I would then have been to yourself and the children! How many pangs you might have been saved! How many unknown joys you might have experienced! I have not been a wise man or I would not have consented, eleven years ago, to pitch my tent in a bank of fog.

Again he says:

I have never seen so plainly as I have seen this Winter what Livingston-street midwife I have been carrying on my garments for eleven years. Six months ago I was accustomed to say to myself, in my secret hours, "Theodore Tilton, it is time for you to die; your soul grows not whiter but darker; die soon and save yourself from total destruction." But, I believe that if I shall return to Brooklyn at all, I shall return a different man. God grant it! I know that I have tried to wash myself clean at the fountain of a better life.

Which was this family in the West, presided over by a mother with several daughters, one of which was the young lady I have referred to, who paid a visit at this house about this time in Brooklyn. If you can imagine a cruelty which a husband can inflict upon a wife greater than the writing of such a letter as I have just read to you, gentlemen, followed by such an association as existed between Theodore Tilton and this Western family, then I confess my inability to appreciate cruelty or the intense sorrow which a man may be capable of inflicting upon a woman. But in January, 1868, Mr. Tilton's social relations had reached a point where concealment could no longer be endured, where there must be an explanation with promise of reformation, or else a break. That explanation was had on Sunday, Jan. 26, 1868. The whole subject of his relations with other women, his temptations, his sins, the manner of treatment by his wife on account of them, his concealment and deceit, were brought up in this interview. Elizabeth Tilton was in one of her most exalted moods. She spoke with frankness, earnestness and sorrow to her husband, who, conscious-stricken, fell groveling at her feet. He confessed that his "sacred weddings" were stained with sin, and that he could no longer look his wife and children in the face and listen to their words of confidence and affection without feeling himself "a hypocrite, a deceiver, a whited sepulchre full of dead men's bones."

MRS. TILTON'S CHARITY.

I will not stop to consider too closely whether he confessed adultery of the body, or what he calls adultery of the soul. Certain it is from the remarkable correspondence which followed, continuing through the year 1868, that this evening was made memorable by confessions of some degree of sin on his part concerning his sexual relations, and by an angelic forgiveness, pity and victorious faith in the future on the part of his wife. Not one word of reproach was uttered by this pure and injured woman. She hastened to lift him from the moral prostration into which he had fallen, to comfort him by the assurance of her unshaken hope and confidence in his future life, and broke him down afresh by her beautiful tenderness. She forgave him even before he pledged himself to a new career, but he gave these pledges with the utmost earnestness and solemnity. They bowed their knees together, renewing before God their early vows, forsaking all the world beside to cleave to each other alone. Nor did this content the noble wife. Her wonderful magnanimity and divinely-inspired sympathy could not let her rest till she had taken upon herself the blame of her husband's fall, and found in some supposed harshness and indifference on her own part an excuse for his many sins. For this imaginary fault she lashed herself both then and afterward with fanatical severity. She applied to herself the epithets which his conscience had suggested concerning his own real transgressions. Her language, seen in the correspondence immediately following, is more extravagant than at any previous or subsequent period, in its expression of devotion to and admiration for her husband. In it she strives in every way to restore his self-respect, to replace him on his pedestal of pride, to convince him that she worshiped him more, and not less, than she had done before his humiliating confessions. The effect of this magnificent exhibition of a woman's devotion, of her utterly unselfish, purifying love upon the mind of her husband, cannot be better described than in the language of that husband himself, from which I shall now read to you a few passages. This interview, gentlemen, took place, as I have said, on Sunday night, January 26, 1868. Mr Tilton was to leave home that night for a lecture tour in the West. He left his house that evening to go to the railroad station in New York, and once in the car he wrote his wife this memorable letter:

HUDSON RIVER R. R., 31st-ST. DEPOT, }
Jan. 26, 1868. }

MY DARLING:

[After a few words he says:]

You have never seemed so noble to me as during last evening and this day. You are not only all, but more than all, that any man can need or ever can desire. Life never seemed to me to be more full of objects and ends worth living for, than since our recent long interview and mutual confessions. I am by nature so frank that the attempt to hide my feelings, to cloak my shortcomings, to deny utterance to my inward sorrows, had lately driven me almost to despair.

The secret of all my long-continued moodiness has been—dissatisfaction, not with you, but with myself. I was once well enough content to be esteemed as something better than my merit, but of late all such estimates of me have been horribly repulsive to my mind. They have revealed me to myself in the character of a hypocrite, a deceiver, a whitened sepulchre filled with dead men's bones. Above all things it has been dreadful for me to hear praises of myself from you and Florence. I could not rest content under the idea that either of you felt that my gloom was occasioned by anything lacking in yourselves, but only in my own self.

She answers this letter on the 31st of January, and in it you will see, gentlemen, how, notwithstanding his admissions and confessions of his numerous temptations, she attributed to her own harshness, her uncharitableness, her rebukes of him, thus compelling him to keep secret his affairs somewhat from her—how she attributed his fall or his shortcomings to herself, and took all the sin upon herself.

FRIDAY, Jan. 31st, 1868—11 o'clock p. m.

Oh, Theodore, darling, I am haunted night and day by the remorse of knowing that, because of my harshness and indifference to you, you were driven to despair, perhaps sin, and these last years of unhappiness. I sometimes feel it to be the unpardonable sin. God cannot forgive me. But if you only may be restored to your former loveliness, I shall be content to live my life in penance, yea, in disgrace. I am the chief of sinners! I understand perfectly how you have felt. I carry in my soul this burden, black of sin, yet appear to my children and friends calm and happy. "Woe unto you, whitened sepulchre," I hear perpetually. I will carry these agonies gladly, for I know a life of happiness awaits you.

This you remember, gentlemen of the jury, was on the 31st of January, 1868. The language which I am about to read will show you what was the subject of their conversation, what the danger is which, at the time, threatened him, and from which she was striving with all the devotion and the faith of a woman to save him:

Darling, we must both cultivate our self-respect by being what we seem—then will be fulfilled my ideal marriage—to you and you only a wife—but contact of a body with no other—while then, a pure friendship with many may be enjoyed, ennobling us. Let us have not even a shadow of doubt of each other—tho' all the world are weak yet will we be strong.

God accept and bless us both.

Now are we one.

By bye,

Faithfully yours.

Now, gentlemen, this letter was written long before the breath of suspicion had been breathed against this lady, even by the malice of her husband. It was written when his own relations with women had destroyed his self-respect and broken him down, and he sought to palliate it by the harshness, and the indifference, and the jealousy which his conduct had inspired in his wife. To save him and restore him she made her forgiveness as bountiful as woman can make forgiveness to man. She accepted everything upon herself, and, as you see, refers to her harshness here, and her indifference, as perhaps the cause of his temptations. But to show you further, and to leave no doubt as to the subject of that interview, and what was discussed there, I read you now the letter of February 3, 1868, a letter which has become somewhat famous in this remarkable controversy:

MONDAY, February 3d, 1868, }
9 o'clock (I think it is) a. m. }

What may I bring to my beloved this bright morning? [Then she says:] Most truly do I love, and am resolved nevermore to repress the expression of it. I have lived under the fatal mistake that I would make you selfish, but oh! what it has cost me to learn that a large, generous love cannot, in its very nature, minister but to our best and holy states! The picture of your dear face, most constant with me, is one glowing with love, but always bearing the look of one that has suffered. Can I, who am the cause thereof, ever again be indifferent? Nay, the little life which remaineth is consecrated to restore, if possible, the beautiful image I have marred. There is no sacrifice too great that I would not enthusiastically make to this end. If God will only consider me worthy to work with him. I have been thinking, my darling, that knowing as you do your immense power over an audience to move them at your will, that same power you have with all public men over any woman whom you may love. To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse your gift of influence is a sin.

This is the letter, gentlemen, which was so marvelously garbled by this plaintiff in the early part of this controversy before the church, which he so garbled as to put upon the wife an imputation that she herself was tempted, and was likely to fall, and was resisting her own temptation. He made it read, as you remember, speaking of herself: "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse the gift is sin. Here I am strong. No temptation could induce me," &c. But when you get at this letter and read the whole of it, you see that she is speaking of him, and the abuse of his influence over women, and she is remonstrating with him against that abuse: "To love is praiseworthy, but to abuse your gift of influence is a sin. Therefore I would fain help restore to you that which I broke down—~~SELF-RESPECT~~. Your manhood and its purity and dignity if you feel it is stronger than even love itself. I know this because here I am strong. No demonstrations or fascinations could cause me to yield my womanhood." He had represented to her and made her believe that her chiding him, her jealousy, her harshness had compelled him to be a hypocrite to her, and to conceal from her his relations and his affections with other women. He told her that that course of life which her conduct in this respect had enforced upon him, had broken down his self-respect, and that she alludes to in this passage. She will aid him now to restore that self-respect which she had helped him to break down.

Mr. Everts—Mr. Tracy, the hour of adjournment has arrived. The Court here took a recess until 3 p. m.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2:15 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment, and Mr. Tracy resumed his argument.

MRS. TILTON'S DEVOTION AND PIETY.

GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: At the recess I was reading to you the remarkable correspondence that followed the interview between the husband and the wife on Sunday evening, January 26th, at the time Mr. Tilton was to take his departure for a lecturing tour out West. I had read to you one letter from Mr. Tilton written on the cars that night, and I had read you two from his wife. I now read the second letter from Mr. Tilton, dated February 9th, 1868, and you will see by this letter, gentlemen, the high estimate in which he held his wife at this time:

CRAWFORDSVILLE, IND. }
SUNDAY MORNING, Feb. 9, 1868. }

MY DEAR ANGEL: I dreamed of you last night, and awoke thinking of you this morning. How much I want to see you! How I yearn after you! How my soul blesses you day by day! I can never describe how precious your love of your husband has appeared to him during these few weeks past. Your stangeness, your fervor, your purity, your devotion—they fill my mind and heart with reverence, adoration and humility.

I regard my last evening spent with you at home as the most memorable point in my whole life. You opened for me, that night, the gate of Heaven, which had so long seemed shut.

Ever since, I have had nothing but glory, thanksgiving, and praise. If ever a man was made a new creature, that man was I: no more despondency—no more repining—no more vain regrets—no more loss of self-respect—no more groveling in the dust. On the contrary, I am once again a man among men, and a Christian among Christians. Now, this transformation I owe to yourself, to your irrepressible love and devotion, to your ceaseless prayers, and to your victorious faith.

• • • • •
Your letters, since I have been from home this last time, have been the dearest you have ever penned. They are royal in their tone. Each one fills me with renewed pride and joy in my wife. O, my darling, in comparison with such love as you express, how poor is the friendship of all other friends! I have never seen any one who loves as you do.

[Well may he have said that.] You have the richest of all human hearts. I am pledged to you forever. My vows I shall keep and not break. With God's help and with yours I shall be the faithfulest man in the world. Blessings on your soul this Sabbath day. Ever yours, THOMAS.

During this Western trip he had, previous to February 18, written his wife in regard to a visit he had paid this same Western family to which I have referred. He had stated to her that, in order to make that visit, he had given up one or two of his engagements at lecturing; and yet, this wife having promised him no more chidings, no more harshness, no more jealousy, when she received this letter from him informing her of this fact, answers him in the manner I shall now read. On Thursday afternoon, February 18, 1868, Mrs. Tilton wrote her husband, then in the West, as follows:

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, Feb. 18th, 1868.

MY DARLING HUSBAND: You have made me rich to-day; your letter from Lincoln came this morning, and this night Eliza brought me the full epistle from Chicago. I read every word eagerly; drop instantly whatever I am doing when the postman comes, and give myself up utterly, body and soul, locking the doors to prevent intruders, just as we are wont to do after an absence. I am heartily glad you are with the dear good friends in Chicago. How I wish I could have been with you! I hope you have impressed upon — my profound respect and love for her. How grateful it was to your poor tired head to rest there in the bosom of those dear ones; I am so glad, so thankful, the opportunity was given you, even tho' it cost the Des Moines appointment and two letters of mine awaiting you. I never realized, as now I do, your arduous labors, and the great hinderance and drag I have been to your young, beautiful life.

I yearn to caress and tenderly care for you, read, sing, and gladden those dear eyes once again. I feel, as never before, how dreadful a thing it is to wound or stab any human heart by sharp, stinging words. Perhaps the dear Father has given me another lease of life, that I may learn this lesson. I praise him for his goodness. Then again, darling, I have felt so heart-sick that there are so few great men and women. The idea of a faithful, true marriage will be lost out of the world—certainly out of the literary and refined world—unless we revive it.

• • • • •
Believe in me,

Yours always,

ELIZABETH, WIFE.

At that same journey West, on the 30th of February, he writes her again, referring to this same Western influence, and he, having made vows of faithfulness, assures her that the spell with him is broken. He says: "The picture Madonna had arrived in good condition, and was hanging on the wall"—the wall of the residence of this lady.

It is very neatly framed, and looks pure and royal. — was pleased, but the old fragrance has gone out of the "prairie rose." The flower is still comely, interesting and agreeable, but I marvel at myself for once thinking it so fragrant above all the rest of the garden. It is gone forever! It can never be to me henceforth anything but a common plant. This figure of speech is a mystery which I think you will understand. I intimate no names.

MR. TILTON BREAKS HIS VOWS OF REFORM.

Thus much, gentlemen, for the letters while he was West, and for the assurances of fidelity to his marriage vow which he gave her after that conversation of January 26th. In the Summer, however, he has returned to his home in the City of New-York. Old associates have come around him and new temptations have overtaken him, and he finds that the resolutions of January cannot hold out through the frosts of November. He is stricken again with humility, with a feeling of worthlessness, with inability to resist these temptations, and, moved by a letter which he received from his wife, written in the studio in New-York, at his office, on the 3d day of November, he replies to her in the following manner. I shall not dwell upon this letter, gentlemen—I shall not stop to comment upon it at present. The duty of that will be reserved until the final summing up of this case. I only allude to it now as the closing letter of this remarkable correspondence in the year 1868:

AT THE OFFICE, Nov. 3, 1868.

MY DEAR: Your kind and loving note falls so pleasantly on my spirits that I would immediately go home this afternoon were it not that I have engaged to go out this evening.

There is so much sunshine pouring into my little office at this moment that I think I never knew a brighter day in my life; [The sunshine he there refers to, I suppose, is the sunshine which came from the note of his wife in the morning.] and I hope that some of the light and warmth will steal into and remain within my cold and cruel heart.

It is the greatest regret of my life that I do not seem constituted so as to make you as happy as you deserve to be; but I have the best of intentions—and the worst of success.

The cause of so much trouble at home is my general anxiety about everything. Lately I worry more or less concerning every matter which I touch. I have hardly ten minutes a day of uninterrupted free from care. This may seem an exaggerated statement; but it is the painful truth. I feel as if I were growing old before my time. Lights that used to burn within me have been quenched. Hopes are faded; ambition is killed; life seems a failure.

As I cannot bear to see any expression of pain, or sorrow, or regret, on your face, I cannot bring myself to speak to you familiarly on any subject connected with any of our sorrows—not even Paul, our chief. I am literally tormented at having no grave for his crumbling clay. Every allusion to the subject has been a pang through my heart.

Then, too, all my religious doubts and difficulties have been, and are, and I fear must be, shut within myself, because I cannot open my mouth to you concerning them without giving you a wound. You are the finest fibered soul that ever was put into a body; you jar at my touch, and I am apt to touch you too readily.

As for my own character, I saw, at the time of Paul's death, what it was to be a man, and how far short of it I am myself; and I have ever since been utterly overwhelmed with my own worthlessness, selfishness, degradation, and wickedness. At some time I expect to recover from this slough of despond, but not now; I must remain longer in suffering before I can emerge into peace. I have been overthrown, and, before I rise, I must be made to feel, like Anteus, that strength comes from touching the ground.

But the chief of all my miseries is this: that I impart them to others. Let me say, with the utmost fervor of protestation, that neither you, nor the children, nor the house, nor the servant, nor anything that is within our gates—not one alone—nor all combined—no, none of these persons or things has the slightest originating share in my troubles. Those troubles (such as they are) are of my own making. Would to God they were also of my own enduring! But they have to be inflicted upon others—upon yourself and the children. It is this fact that doubles my affliction.

But your kind and tender words, penciled in the studio this morning, were very precious to me—sweeter than honey in the honeycomb. I write this letter on purpose to thank you for them. God bless you evermore.

Lovingly yours,

THEODORE.

I now read, gentlemen, another letter in this correspondence written by the wife, February 30, 1868, in which she betrays her fears of renewed difficulty and dissatisfaction, on his return home:

THURSDAY EVENING, February 30, 1868.

MY BELOVED: I am so lonesome and heartsick for your companionship to-night that I hesitate to write lest my mood may depress you. Yet I cannot wish you home, for I am persuaded you are happier where you are. While I long to be with you, I am haunted continually with fears that your cheery face will soon be shadowed and the dear head droop. This thought is agony to me, and I have spent many hours since your absence weeping because of it.

I would fain make the path smooth for your feet, or, in other words, direct the children and the household that they minister harmony only, but I know I cannot, and I am afraid!

Again she says to him, on March 8th, 1868:

NURSERY, Sunday eve, March 8, 1868.

MY BELOVED: All alone, save Eliza in the kitchen, and the children all asleep about me, while I have been trying to imagine my state when I shall again live with you and behold your precious form. This, I think, I have decided—no more chidings, scoldings! An inexpressible tenderness has grown up in my soul towards you. I never saw my path as clear as now—that whatever you may do, say or be, it becometh me to be the Christian wife and mother! The full meaning of those words, when developed from a nature impotent as mine, I most thoroughly understand. If I may lead my children now to an intimate love and trust in God, He manifesting Himself to babes, as He has promised, then to this great source of happiness strong bodies be added, I will risk intellectual training and knowledge.

Notwithstanding the promises made January 26, 1868, and the promises of complete reformation which were often repeated in the correspondence following that interview, it is clear from that correspondence, and particularly from the letter of Nov. 3, 1868, that upon his return to New-York, and falling again under the influence of old associates and subjected anew to temptations, he felt himself unable to keep the vows he had made the January previous. This is made evident from the correspondence of the parties during the years 1869 and 1870. Difficulties were thickening around him, rumors of his dissolute life filled the air—it was impossible for Tilton to conceal any longer from the world the life he lived. In December, 1870, the storm which had been so long gathering, burst upon him. It struck him in every quarter. He found his business relations imperiled and his home shattered. As early as 1866 Tilton began to shadow forth in The Indepen- dent his religious and social views. They bred discontent everywhere, particularly in the North-West.

MR. TILTON JEALOUS OF RIVALRY.

In 1867 there was an open revolt among the Congregational ministers of the North-West, which resulted in starting, at Chicago, a new paper, called The Advance, intended to supersede The Independent in that quarter. The correspondence and the negotiations which led to the starting of that paper began soon after Mr. Tilton commenced developing his views in The Independent on religion and social matters. Several meetings were had between Mr. Bowen and the proprietors of that paper, and representative clergymen of the North-West. Mr. Bowen promised reform, promised repeatedly to muzzle Tilton, and to prevent the obnoxious utterances in his paper; but after one or two promises and failures in that direction, the Congregational clergyman of the North-West started a new and independent paper in Chicago. Mr. Edward Beecher, the brother of the defendant, then residing in Illinois, was active in this opposition to his paper and to him. At this point, gentlemen, I desire again to refer you to the remark of the defendant in his letter in 1867, addressed to Mr. Tilton on the subject of religion, where he says: "I have given up the idea of starting a new paper." You will perceive, therefore, gentlemen, that from the time of this political difference between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, resulting out of the Cleveland letter, the subject of a new paper in place of The Independent, and in opposition to Tilton and his views, had been the subject of conversation. It is evident from the remark of Mr. Beecher to Tilton, that Mr. Tilton under these facts suspected Mr. Beecher of encouraging an opposition to him here, and of becoming the editor of an independent paper. He therefore had for some time regarded Mr. Beecher as a rival and was jealous of his fame. He feared his power, as did also Mr. Bowen, the owner of the paper; and this opposition and this jealousy increased on the part of Mr. Tilton against Mr. Beecher. While they were personal friends outwardly, the public reputation of Mr. Beecher was continually being disparaged by Mr. Tilton, and he represented him as having reached the zenith of his power. Henceforward Mr. Beecher was to decline in mind and public position, and there was only one man who could take his place, and that man, in the estimation of Theodore Tilton, was himself.

In 1868 another opposition paper, The Church Union, was started in New-York. In 1869 it was taken possession of by Ford & Co., Mr. Beecher's publishers; its name changed to The Christian Union, and in January, 1870, Mr. Beecher became its editor. Tilton now regarded Beecher as his rival and was jealous of his fame. You see, therefore, gentlemen, that by this time the rivalry between those two men had become sharp and well defined, at least so far as Tilton was concerned. The rapid increase of The Christian Union (for the name of the paper had changed when Mr. Beecher took hold of it) in circulation and its growing popularity alarmed both Tilton and Bowen. Nevertheless Tilton grew bolder and more outspoken in the advocacy of his peculiar views than ever.

THE STORIES THAT REACHED MR. BOWEN.

In 1869 and 1870 rumors affecting Tilton's moral purity began to reach Bowen; also rumors of Tilton's domestic difficulties reached Bowen's ears. You have heard some of those rumors referred to, gentlemen. It is in evidence that Mr. Bowen heard of the Winsted affair. I do not stop to comment upon that transaction at this time, gentlemen. I do not stop to say whether Mr. Tilton was guilty or not—guilty of what was imputed to him by the people of Winsted on that occasion. I only say that his conduct there with a young lady, who was no mere child (as he represents her to be in his letter from Tidioute to a Mr. Hastings in Winsted)—no mere child, but a young lady, fully developed, twice the size of his wife, was the person there referred to. And I only say, without imputing the slightest blame to the young lady, that Mr. Tilton's conduct on that occasion was characterized by that degree of indiscretion that it provoked a horrible scandal concerning himself at Winsted, Connecticut, in 1869; and the rumor of that difficulty had reached Mr. Bowen; and Mr. Tilton tells you himself from the witness stand that in 1870, about the time this storm-cloud burst upon him, an evening paper in New York published the fact that he was about to elope with a woman, whom it named. Now, gentlemen, evening papers in New York, or morning papers in New York, are not apt to allude to scandals by name, particularly when the names of such prominent persons as Theodore Tilton are connected with them, without those scandals have been of long standing, and have become a matter of news to the editorial profession. This scandal filled the air in regard to Mr. Tilton, and they had reached Mr. Bowen. Mr. Bowen saw that Mr. Tilton must be gotten rid of. How to do it was the problem, which he was not prepared at this time to solve. But, fortunately for him, Tilton, with his genius for blundering, gave adequate cause for dismissal, in an editorial which he published in The Independent on the 1st of December, 1870, committing the paper to the doctrine of Free Love. That editorial has been produced in your presence, gentlemen, and has been read to you. It will be the subject of further comment during the course of this trial. I shall refer to it here, and to other publications of Mr. Tilton about this time, for the purpose of showing that, when he was editor of what was understood to be a religious newspaper, he was still, at heart, the advocate of social freedom, or what might be more correctly characterized as Free Love.

MR. TILTON ON FREE LOVE.

But, before reading this article from The Independent, which led to Mr. Tilton's immediate retirement from it as its editor, I beg, gentlemen, to read to you a letter from Theodore Tilton to his wife, written Jan. 9, 1865, upon this same subject. It was written just about the time he assumed control of that paper. It was written at a time when he was still under the influence and guiding force of this great mind, which had led him from boyhood up to his present position. I want to show you, just on the eve of his emancipating himself from that influence, how he regarded the sanctity of the marriage relation, and what views he held upon that subject. January 9, 1866, in a letter written to his wife, he says:

I have lately been much more than ever impressed with the wonderful simplicity of God's plan for binding together human society, namely, by creating in each breast some strong and dominating love for one human being. Were it not for the love of mother to child, or husband to wife, our society, civilization, the peace and order of the world—all would fall asunder in a day. Whatever rends apart two lives which have been bound into one is a cruelty to all mankind, a blow at the unity of civil society. I begin to see as never before that the center of the world to an honorable man, is his own family, his wife's sitting room, children's play-places, his home. I hope hereafter, if God should spare my life, to be more careful how my face is made to cast a shadow upon my home. I have been too often negligent of your requests that I should give more time to your dear self and the children as my heart now feels. I am ready to promise never to seek my old selfish seclusions again, but to spend my home life in your sweetest of all company.

Such were Tilton's views at the time that he emancipated himself from the friendly influence which had so long guided and directed him.

THE CHANGE OF FIVE YEARS WROUGHT IN MR. TILTON.

But I now, gentlemen, invite your attention to the change which five years had wrought in the principles and character of Theodore Tilton. For five years he had been editor of The Independent, one of the leading and most influential of the religious journals of the country. He had denounced Mr. Beecher politically in 1866 and had parted from him on all public and social questions. Personally friendly, he had by this attack cut himself off from that friendly, guiding mind which had hitherto been his stay and support. His position rendered him serviceable to the advocates of new doctrines. To use him it was only necessary to fawn upon and court him. For five years he had been the victim of the flatterer. For five years he had been the associate and boon companion of people of easy virtue, who gild their lives with plausible but corrupting theories. How continually those who surrounded him burned incense to him and how remorselessly they used him, the history of those five years and his disastrous fall at the end, bear sad and painful evidence. On the 1st of December, 1870, the same man who in 1865 saw with such clearness that the marriage relation was ordained of God, the cement of society, had so fallen that he could publish in the paper of which he was the editor, as the leading editorial, the following. After asking what is love and quoting from the poets, he says:

To answer what breaks we must inquire what makes the marriage bond. Marriage without love is a sin against God—a sin which, like other sins, is to be repented of, ceased from, and put away. No matter with what solemn ceremony the twain may have been made one, yet when love departs, then marriage ceases and divorce begins. This is the essence of Christ's idea. To say that he granted divorce only for a gross and fleshly crime, is to forget that he called the eye a paramour and the heart a wanton's bed. This idea (and this idea cannot but be true) carries with it, as its logical sequence (and this, too, cannot be true), the irresistible conclusion that marriage if broken, and whether broken by the body or the soul, is divorce. Infidelity of the body is not so great a sin against marriage as infidelity of the soul.

This was his utterance in December, 1870, as the responsible editor of that great newspaper, The Independent. Of course it roused a flame of indignation throughout this land from one end of it to the other. No Christian community would support a paper that advocated such doctrines, and Mr. Bowen, who can appreciate the standard of value, if he cannot the standard of morals, soon discovered that it was important for him to be rid of this editor. That this was the cautious utterance of one who at the time accepted the doctrine of social freedom as broadly as Victoria Woodhull herself.

DISCREPANCIES IN MR. TILTON'S UTTERANCES.

You have heard the evidence, gentlemen, of Mr. Tilton from the witness stand as to the subject of his views upon this question. After the article which I am about to read to you had been put in evidence, you saw how the learned counsel opposed, sought to break the force of that evidence by introducing Theodore Tilton to swear, on his re-direct examination, that he held the marriage relation in great sacredness; that with him it was only the question of divorce, and he opposed the strict rule adopted and adhered to in this State upon that subject, and desired to liberalize our legislation, and make it compare with that of New England or the Western States. And you heard him testify on the witness stand, gentlemen, in answer to the counsel, and they felt it important to make him say, I have no doubt, that he did not hold, and never held, that the marriage relation was above the law, but it was a matter which should be regulated by the law, and the only fault he found with the divorce laws of this State was, that they were not sufficiently liberal and they ought to be liberalized, but still it was a matter to be regulated by law. That was a material matter, gentlemen, of evidence, and I propose to convict Theodore Tilton right here, from his own writing, of having falsified before you when he gave that evidence. And I propose to show from his own published writings, writings that he has never repudiated, writings that he adheres to to this day, that when he said from the witness stand that he held as other men held, that the laws of this State touching divorce should be more liberal, but still that divorce should be a matter to be regulated by law, and not by the parties themselves, he testified to what is untrue. And I ask, gentlemen, your careful attention now to this correspondence, which is among the most celebrated correspondence that Mr. Theodore Tilton ever had in his life; I ask your careful attention to his utterances upon that subject. He is answering Horace Greeley's objections to free love, and that you may clearly understand the meaning of his language, I shall read to you Mr. Greeley's position, so that you may have before your mind a clear conception of what Mr. Tilton was uttering. Mr. Greeley says:

I. You ask me what I mean by "Free Love." Let me illustrate:

Here are a husband and wife, each fifty years old, who have lived in wedlock a quarter of a century, and had six or eight children, of whom half survive. The pains and cares of maternity have nearly worn out the wife, while the husband is still in the prime of manly vigor and strength. He has filled a wider sphere and enjoyed better opportunities for mental culture than she has, and feels himself her intellectual superior. Among his acquaintances is a younger, fairer, fresher woman, not so richly dowered with worldly wealth, who admires and is admired by him—who, in fact, is willing, if invited, to be his 'affinity,' and he is more than willing that she shall. If they "take up" with each other, ["take up" is quoted; seems to be an understood phrase with the free lovers;] "their arrangement, or whatever you please to call it, is just what I execrate as 'Free Love.' You know that such alliances exist. I feel that they are abhorred of God and a chief cause of human degradation, family disruption and general wretchedness. In short, I hold the man who has sworn to love and cherish his one woman till death not free to love another while that woman lives and strives to fulfill toward him the duties of a loving wife. Hence, I intensely hate 'Free Love,' and I hate all inculcation that a marriage may rightfully be dissolved, except for flagrant, deliberate adultery, while husband and wife both live."

That was Mr. Greeley's denunciation of free love, and that was the free love that he execrated. Now, let us see what Mr. Tilton's reply to that is. I now read the third paragraph of Mr. Tilton's reply, which is as follows:

III. A just inference from your letter is that I advocate Free Love. On the contrary, I stiffly oppose it. The latest bulletin of Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews castigates me because I hold that the heart's ideal is monogamic marriage—the supreme love of one man for one woman through life, and, I hope, beyond death. But this is only my own view; I do not judge for others. Furthermore, I hold that love, and love only, constitutes marriage; that marriage makes the bond, not the bond marriage; and that as the contract is to "love and honor," so when the love and honor end, the contract dissolves, and the marriage ceases. * * * I would no more permit the law of the land to enchain me to a woman whom I did not love, or who did not love me, than I would permit the same law to handcuff me as a slave to a master on a plantation. There are higher laws than civil statutes, and I am a rebel against the State's too impertinent interference between man and wife. Love should be like religion—free from mandate by the civil law.

Does that correspond with Mr. Tilton's oath that he has given you on the witness stand, that he thinks divorce should be regulated by law? Does he think religion, in a free country, should be regulated by law?

Mr. Tilton—Yes.

Mr. Beach—Never mind; don't interrupt.

Mr. Tracy—Does he think that whether you are a member of this church or that church should be a subject regulated by law? Does he think if you desire to withdraw your relations with one church and join another, that the law should prohibit you from doing that; does he think the law should undertake to regulate in a free country a man's relations to the church and to regulate his religion? No, but he places divorce on the same footing as religion, and he says that "love should be like religion, free from the mandate of the civil law." And it is important, gentlemen, that you heed the discrepancy between this publication of Mr. Tilton made in this correspondence with Mr. Greeley, and his statement of his own views upon the witness stand, because, as I shall show you further on in this opening, gentlemen, that if you are satisfied that Mr. Tilton or any other witness who may be introduced in this case has deliberately falsified upon any material matter concerning evidence here, his whole evidence is to be rejected; in other words, you cannot rely upon any part of the evidence of a witness who has deliberately falsified his evidence upon any material point. And, therefore, if you are convinced that the plaintiff in this case feeling the pressure from his own counsel of the necessity of placing a different view upon his convictions touching marriage and divorce than he had placed in his own publications, came in here to state them as he does not believe them, that of itself would justify you in discarding everything that he has testified to from the witness stand; indeed it would be your duty to do so.

THE CALM THAT CAME BEFORE THE STORM.

We have now, gentlemen, traced the rise and progress of Theodore Tilton from the time when, a boy, he was a reporter upon the newspaper press, to one of the proudest editorial chairs in the country, a station for which he was educated and fitted by this defendant and by him elevated to that lofty position of power and influence. But his star has culminated; and henceforward it will be our painful duty to trace the disastrous fall of this man, whose early life was so full of promise. Previous to the publication of the editorial in The Independent, so far as Mr. Beecher knew, and so far as the world knew, no trouble had occurred between Tilton and his wife. They were apparently living in perfect peace. Moulton, the intimate friend of the family, had seen nothing and suspected nothing. Mrs. Bradshaw, the intimate friend of both husband and wife, and who passed much of her time at their house, had discovered no unhappiness between them, and, I may add, did not until after the Woodhull publication, known as the Woodhull Scandal. But in the early days of December, and before Mr. Tilton had published his valedictory as editor of The Independent, there came to this defendant a message from Mrs. Tilton, borne to him by the young girl, Beesie Turner, which message greatly surprised the defendant. He was informed that Mrs. Tilton had left her home and her husband, and desired to consult him on the subject of separation. The nature of the wrongs of which she complained was made known to him by the girl who bore him the message, who, with downcast eyes, informed Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton had twice attempted her virtue, the details of which she then proceeded to give him.

MR. TILTON ASKING MR. BEECHER'S COMPANY TO THE LAST.

Although Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher had long been separated on public and social questions, yet personally they had always been friends, and Tilton encouraged Beecher's visits to his family. In 1867, by a letter which has been given in evidence, Mr. Tilton, then West, answering a letter of his wife which informed him of Mr. Beecher's visits to her during that absence, says:

MY DARLING: * * * I am sorry to hear that Mr. Beecher had a poor house in Brooklyn. In view of his kind attentions to you this Winter, all my old love for him has revived, and my heart would once more greet him as of old. I sometimes quarrel with my friends on the surface, but never at the bottom. With yourself, O friend above all friends! I am in perpetual love.

Yours, THEODORE.

And on Mr. Tilton's examination before the Investigating Committee of the church he testified at length on the subject of Mr. Beecher's relations to his family, how they originated, and how they were continued from time to time. On that investigation there was put to him the following question:

Q. At the beginning of the acquaintance of Mr. Beecher with your family—not with you or your wife, but with your family—did not you invite him frequently to your house? A. Yes, Sir, and I was always very proud when he came.

Q. Did you not say to him that you desired him to visit your house frequently? A. I did, and always scolded him because he did not come oftener. During the first part of our life we were in Oxford-st., so far away that he very rarely came; the frequency of his visits took place after I purchased the house in Livingston-st. [which, gentlemen, you will remember, was in October, 1866, so the frequency of Mr. Beecher's visits to Mr. Tilton's family, according to Mr. Tilton, did not begin until 1866. He visited occasionally at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Tilton, but not as often as Mr. Tilton would desire him to, but when he came to reside nearer his house he acceded to Mr. Tilton's request and visited him at his house more frequently.]

Q. Did you not say that there was a little woman at your house that loved him dearly? A. I did, many a time; I always wanted him to come oftener.

Q. You frequently spoke to him of the high esteem and affection that your wife bore to him, did you not? A. I did; he knew it and I knew it.

Q. You always knew it? A. I cannot say that I always did, because at first, during the early years of my married life, I felt that Mr. Beecher rather slighted my family; he was intimate with me, and I think loved me; but he did not use to come very often to my house, and it did not please me; I wanted him to come oftener.

Q. And it wounded you, did it not? A. I cannot say that I was wounded; I was a mere boy; it was a matter of pride to have him there. Elizabeth at first was modest and frightened. She did not know how to talk with him, or how to entertain him, and it was a slow process by which he obtained her confidence so that she could talk with him. It was the same with Mr. Greeley. He had great reverence for her, and had an exalted opinion of her. I do not think there was a woman that he had a higher regard for than for Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And did she not have a high regard for him also? A. Yes.

Q. And that was known to you too? A. That was known to me, and I was very glad of it.

Q. Did you urge him to come when you were off lecturing? A. I did.

Q. Did not you impress upon Mr. Beecher the necessity and desire that you had that he would call upon your family and see your wife frequently during your absence? A. I did.

MR. TILTON ALONE RESPONSIBLE FOR MR. BEECHER'S VISITS.

So, gentlemen, if there is any person responsible for the visits which Mr. Beecher has paid to the family of Theodore Tilton, that person is Theodore Tilton himself. From the beginning to the end of their acquaintance it was always a matter of solicitation on his part and urgency on his part that Mr. Beecher should make his visits at his house and to his family more frequent than he did, not only when Mr. Tilton was present, but when he was absent also. The breath of suspicion never crossed the mind of Theodore Tilton, either in regard to the purity of his wife or to the integrity of Henry Ward Beecher. He knew the motive that led to those visits on the part of Mr. Beecher, and that the visits were desired on the part of his wife. He knew that it was her reverence for him as a religious teacher, as her pastor, as her comfort and consolation in the hour of her deep affliction and sorrow on account of the change in his own religious sentiments and social views; he knew it, understood it all, and the fact that Mr. Beecher visited at his house was never a subject of comment or thought upon his part, and never excited in his breast anything but pleasure, as he himself tells you from the witness stand, and told the Committee in the examination from which I am now reading. As proof of that, gentlemen, I only need refer to one fact given in evidence by Theodore Tilton as late as 1869, when he tells you that he expended $300 for the portrait of Henry Ward Beecher, that he might hang it in his parlor, as evidence to all who came within his walls of the esteem, love and affection that he bore towards the one who had been to him more than friend or elder brother. Mr. Beecher, therefore, maintaining always this relation of personal friendship with Mr. Tilton and his family, received in the early days of December, 1870, this message from Mrs. Tilton. It shocked him, but he obeyed the summons. He went to the house of her mother and saw her. From her own lips he learned the sorrows of her life, of which she had told him something, although she had concealed the most of her troubles and difficulties from him. He found that she had quit her home, and concurring with her mother, she did not intend to return to that home. Mr. Beecher, as is his custom in such cases, preferred that his wife should see and confer with Mrs. Tilton, because she could learn from her many things which modesty, perhaps, would restrain her from disclosing to a man. He asked permission to bring Mrs. Beecher to visit Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Tilton consenting, Mr. Beecher turned the case of Elizabeth Tilton separated from her home, and threatening to leave her husband, over to his wife. She went there and heard the story of her sorrow and her affliction, and she came back and reported it to her husband. Mrs. Beecher had no hesitation in advising a separation at once. She declared that she never would live with a man an hour who had heaped upon her one-quarter the indignities that Theodore Tilton had heaped upon his wife for years. But Mr. Beecher hesitated, as became the cautious pastor and the sincere friend, to advise so radical a measure as the separation of husband and wife. It was a matter of consultation between him and his wife; and before he would determine it, gentlemen, he called into his counsel, George A. Bell, one of the most prominent men of his church, whom the plaintiff has put upon the witness stand, for advice upon that subject, and a consultation was had, and after much reluctance Mr. Beecher concurred in the opinion of his wife and advised a separation.

FALSE INTERPRETATIONS CORRECTED.

And, right here, gentlemen of the Jury, I ask you to consider for one moment whether this conduct which we shall lay before you, which has already been proved, and on which we shall give further evidence, furnishes you evidence of the guilt or innocence of these parties? Remember, now, that the theory of the plaintiff's case is, that he had had a knowledge of the wrongs which Mr. Beecher had inflicted upon him since the July previous, and here is the wife separating from her husband in the following December, and going to her alleged paramour for advice as to whether she should separate from him or not. More, that alleged paramour advises separation. Do you believe for a moment, gentlemen, that if either of these parties had been conscious of guilt, they would have been betrayed into such an indiscreet action as this? Is it possible that a woman guilty herself, and yet determined to separate from her husband, goes to her paramour for advice upon that subject? Is he the friend she seeks for counsel, and do you believe that the paramour would have advised a separation, if the thought of guilt had been in his mind? Why, would he not have seen in it at once his own destruction? More than that, gentlemen, it is confessed in this case, testified to by the plaintiff, stands undisputed, that at this time, notwithstanding these repeated interviews that occurred between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher at this time, she never communicated to him the fact that she had made any confession to her husband, or revealed to him anything touching their relations? Is it possible, if they had been guilty, that she would not have told Mr. Beecher that she had disclosed their relations to her husband? Do you think that a woman maintaining this life of sin, and confessing it to her husband, would not make haste to lay before her paramour the fact of that confession? Would she not warn him of the danger he was in? Would she not tell him, "I have confessed to my husband, and if he cuts you, or is hostile to you, you will understand the cause of it? Beware, for you are in danger?" And yet, I say, it stands conceded here that Mr. Beecher was entirely ignorant of the fact of any pretended disclosure by the wife to the husband until it was communicated to him by the plaintiff himself in that interview on the 30th of December, at Mr. Moulton's house. But now, gentlemen, don't you think if Mr. Beecher had been conscious of guilt when he was sent for by this lady, and was informed by her that she had separated from her husband, don't you think the first word he would have said to her would have been, "My dear woman, do you know what you are doing? Are you conscious of the danger to which you are exposing me and exposing yourself? If you separate from your husband, covered all over as you know you are with guilt, do you not suppose that in this investigation, this litigation, this difficulty that will arise out of this separation, your guilt will be discovered." Can it be possible that a man of the ability and mature years of Henry Ward Beecher would have gone into this house and given this advice and never made such a suggestion to this woman? And yet he gives the advice that she should separate. I read you, gentlemen, a note that he handed his wife on the last visit that she was to make to Mrs. Tilton on this occasion. It had been, as I have said, a subject of consultation. She was about leaving. There were visitors in the back parlor, so they could not talk, and Mr. Beecher wrote to his wife and gave her this note: "I incline to think that your view is right, that a separation and settlement of support will be wisest, and that in his present desperate state her presence near him is far more likely to produce hatred than her absence." That was the note which he gave to his wife when she left his house to pay the last visit to Mrs. Tilton.

Now, gentlemen, upon the subject of what advice Mr. Beecher would have been likely to give, I want to call your attention to the words which they have put into the mouth of the witness, Mrs. Moulton, when she makes Mr. Beecher send advice to Elizabeth Tilton. After this difficulty had progressed for a year or two, Mrs. Moulton says that Mr. Beecher sent a message of advice from her to Mrs. Tilton. What was it? "Tell Elizabeth that she must live with her husband. I know how much she suffers. I know how hard it is, but for my sake, for her sake, and for the children's sake, she must bear with her husband and be to him as a faithful and true wife." When skillful men are manufacturing evidence they know the strong way to put it, and they understand thoroughly what advice would be natural under certain circumstances, and they knew that if they sent any message by Mrs. Moulton to Mrs. Tilton from Mr. Beecher, it must be the message which urged her to live with her husband and not separate from him. It was that thing that would conceal guilt if guilt existed. It was the advice that every guilty man would have given under the circumstances, beyond a question. Now, gentlemen, you have got the advice that Henry Ward Beecher gave this woman in December, 1870. Do you think that if he had been a guilty man then he would have given such very different advice on that occasion as what the plaintiff and his mutual friend, through the witness, Mrs. Moulton, makes her give the woman in 1872 or 1873? What was the change? Was not the danger of separation as great in 1870 as in 1872? Was not the likelihood of exposure as great then as at the later period? The same circumstances existed. Of course, gentlemen, if Henry Ward Beecher had been guilty he never could have been guilty of the folly of advising a separation of this woman from her husband. No, no.

But events thickened. That was along about the 15th or 16th of December. He had published this offensive article in The Independent on the 1st, and he had been deposed. But to patch up a peace with Bowen he had entered into two contracts with him by which he was to serve as editor of The Brooklyn Union for five years, and as chief editor of The Independent for two years at $5,000 a year for each. Those contracts were signed on the 20th. His valedictory was published on the 23d of December, the contracts to take effect on the 1st of January following. On the 23d of December, gentlemen, the very day that this valedictory was published in The Independent, Theodore Tilton seized his child, in the absence of his wife by force, took it home, sick, suffering, and this compelled the return of his wife to his house. She returns on the 23d, I think it is. On the night of the 24th she suffers a miscarriage, and goes upon her sick bed, from which she does not rise until after Jan. 1, when the most of those eventful scenes have transpired.

THE RUPTURE BETWEEN MR. BOWEN AND MR.
TILTON.

While these scenes were transpiring in the domestic affairs of Tilton, Bowen was not idle. The article of Dec. 1 had satisfied him that he must be rid of Tilton as editor of The Independent. Yet he was afraid of Beecher and The Christian Union. I have said to you, gentlemen, that Mr. Beecher became editor of The Christian Union in April, 1870, and the circulation of that paper sprang up as if by magic, and it was a menace both to Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen. To withdraw Tilton absolutely, who had so long been the ruling spirit of the paper, was a dangerous experiment. If discharged, Tilton, for aught Bowen knew, might be employed by The Christian Union, and Tilton knew too much about Bowen to become an ally of Beecher. At this time Bowen saw no alternative but to depose him from power and yet retain him in his employment. Hence the two contracts executed about Dec. 20, by which he was to be editor of The Union for five years, at $5,000 per year, and chief contributor of The Independent. His valedictory as editor was published Dec. 22d. So soon as people saw that Bowen had broken with Tilton so far as to depose him as editor, the stories affecting Tilton's character came down upon Bowen, as Tilton himself testifies, like an avalanche. Bowen was alarmed—he doubted whether it was possible to retain Tilton in any capacity upon either paper. He talked with Oliver Johnson, their mutual friend, who solicited for Tilton an opportunity for an explanation. This was granted, and this led to the now celebrated meeting at Bowen's house on December 23, 1870, —Oliver Johnson, Tilton and Bowen present. That interview, gentlemen, has been described to you. The object and purpose of that interview were to enable Tilton to explain the stories which had been planted in Bowen's ears against him. The interview began, as we shall show you, gentlemen, rather in high spirit. Tilton mounted his high horse at first and demanded an investigation, and to be confronted with his accusers, but Bowen met him boldly. He told him that he knew his life, and in a very short time he satisfied Tilton that the last thing that he desired was an investigation. Tilton saw that the game of bluff didn't play with Bowen, and he tried a new line of tactics. Knowing Bowen's fear and hatred of Beecher, he suggested the danger The Independent was in from The Christian Union, and the importance of dethroning Beecher, and nothing could have been suggested to Bowen so agreeable as that. Stories affecting the moral characters of his editors was a matter of light consequence to the suggestion of the displacing of Beecher from The Christian Union, and the crippling of that paper as a business rival. Of course, he listened with eager ear to any suggestion that Tilton had upon that subject. Tilton was familiar with Bowen's scandals against Beecher, because they had often been the subject of conversations between them. He referred to them, to the injury that Bowen had suffered at the hands of Beecher in business relations in times gone by, and all that, and finally he suggested that he, too, had a personal grievance against Beecher. That was news to Bowen; he never had heard of it before, no intimation of it, and he eagerly besought Tilton to tell him what it was, and Tilton finally told him that Mr. Beecher had been guilty of unhandsome proposals to his wife. Bowen was quick to discover the situation.

THE BOWEN SCANDALS ATTRIBUTED TO MR.
TILTON.

He had no scandals against Beecher that he dare undertake the responsibility of establishing. I do not know, gentlemen, how far the stories or the reports which attribute authorship of scandals against Mr. Beecher to Mr. Bowen are true. I have my own opinions that they are very much exaggerated. I have my opinion and belief that when this thing is carefully investigated it will be found that Theodore Tilton is the true source of the most of the scandals that have been put in circulation against Henry Ward Beecher. He is the man whose ability at scheming, whose facility at insinuation, whose ability to produce results in a roundabout way, by which he covers his tracks and prevents the ability to trace him, lead me to suspect that he is largely the author of these scandals, and the scandals which Henry C. Bowen has repeated to others. Thus, scandals which perhaps Henry C. Bowen would come to believe after having heard them repeated year after year, have their true origin in the fertile brain of the plaintiff. However that may be, I do not know; it is not necessary for us to inquire in this proceeding. Suffice it to say, gentlemen, that Henry C. Bowen had no scandal against Mr. Beecher, which he ever dare to bring to the test of an investigation; but when Tilton told him that Henry Ward Beecher had been guilty of unhandsome proposals to his wife, that furnished to him the first tangible bit of evidence which had ever come to him that warranted him in the belief that Mr. Beecher could be attacked, and attacked with evidence against him; and he suggested the letter which Mr. Tilton wrote on that occasion directed to Mr. Beecher, in which he says: "For reasons which you explicitly understand, I demand that you quit Plymouth Church and leave Brooklyn as a residence." That letter, Tilton says, was an open letter when he wrote it and left it with Mr. Bowen. He says Henry C. Bowen not only agreed to bear that open letter to Beecher, but to support it with evidence, and to assume the fight and to carry it on. Tilton was perfectly willing to send a firebrand into the camp, if Bowen would take care of the conflict after it. To save his contracts with Bowen, to save his salary of from ten to twelve thousand dollars a year, he was willing to make a union between himself and Bowen to attack Beecher; so he consented to write that letter, and Bowen was to bear it to Beecher, and he did, as has been disclosed by this evidence, and further evidence will be given you on that subject.

THE PURPOSE UNDERLYING MR. BOWEN'S TREACHERY.

I now, gentlemen, propose to make clear to you what has hitherto been one of the great mysteries involved in this controversy. I refer to what Moulton calls the treachery of Henry C. Bowen in not only refusing to sustain the demand made in the letter which he bore to Beecher, but also in promising Beecher his friendship in the threatened contest with Tilton. I have already indicated Bowen's desire to be rid of Tilton, but the prosperity of The Independent was menaced by The Christian Union and by Beecher, and he hesitated to dismiss Tilton absolutely from his service lest he might join Beecher against Bowen and The Independent. Tilton, anxious to save his contracts, was willing to join in a war upon Beecher, and thereby cement himself to Bowen. Such a suggestion kindled the embers long smoldering in Bowen's bosom, into a flame. Tilton, in his zeal to fan the flame; which he himself had started into life, declared that he too had a personal grievance against Beecher, and Beecher, he said, had made unhandsome proposals to his wife.

Mr. Beach—An accident, Sir, has happened to the points from which Mr. Tracy is speaking, and he feels greatly fatigued. It would be a gratification to us, Sir, if you will oblige him with an adjournment at this moment.

The Court then adjourned until Thursday at 11 o'clock.

THIRTY-THIRD DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE PLAINTIFF AND MR. MOULTON ACCUSED OF CONSPIRACY AND PERJURY.

CONTINUATION OF MR. TRACY'S OPENING FOR THE DEFENSE—CATHERINE CAREY SMITH SAID TO BE A WOMAN OF BAD CHARACTER—JOSEPH H. RICHARDS'S TESTIMONY CRITICISED—AUTHORITIES READ ON ORAL CONFESSIONS AND ON CONSPIRACIES—FRANCIS D. MOULTON'S INTEREST IN THE CASE—WHY THE LETTER OF CONFESSION HAS NOT BEEN PRODUCED.

THURSDAY, Feb. 25, 1875.

This morning, Mr. Tracy proceeded with his speech in behalf of the defense. He dashed vigorously into his subject, and for some time kept the complete and interested attention of his auditors. But finally he struck a vein of argument—the citing of law authorities—which was of the utmost importance to the deliberation of the jury, but was exceedingly dry in the opinion of spectators. The first topic considered was the testimony of Mrs. Kate Carey Smith and that of Joseph H. Richards. The story of the former the speaker characterized as coined in the brain of the woman. He thought that the fact of her putting the words "dear father" into the mouth of Mrs. Tilton was proof of the falsity of the statement, as those were the words, he argued, that the witness would use in her devotions before her priest. Mr. Richards was sharply criticised for giving testimony which, it was asserted, he himself thought of no value except when taken into connection with other scandals. Then the non-appearance of Francis B. Carpenter was commented upon by the speaker, who made a promise to show that Mr. Carpenter was not called because Mr. Tilton's lawyers knew that if Mr. Carpenter were placed on the witness stand, a cross-examination would have hurt the plaintiff's case.

Mr. Tracy now asked his colleague, ex-Judge Porter, to read from a number of law authorities on oral confessions, for the purpose of showing the jury that testimony such as that of Mrs. Moulton was dangerous and should be received with great caution. After Mr. Porter finished reading, Judge Neilson suggested a later authority than any cited by the counselor, which, however, concurred with those read. Mr. Beach begged leave to read an authority, and was allowed to do so. The interruptions of Judge Neilson and of Mr. Beach were incidents not usual to openings, and they served to buoy up the interest of the audience. The theory of the defense in regard to the writing and sending of the letter demanding Mr. Beecher's retirement from the pulpit and from Brooklyn was explained, and it was suggested that the letter was a trap set by Mr. Bowen to make a breach between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, so that the latter could not form any alliance with The Christian Union, while at the same time he (Mr. Bowen) could discharge Mr. Tilton without fear of the consequences. The speaker then boldly charged that a conspiracy against Mr. Beecher's reputation had been carried on since December 26, 1870, by Theodore Tilton. Turning upon Mr. Tilton and shaking his forefinger at him, Mr. Tracy declared that it was a matter of business—an affair of dollars and cents. Ex-Judge Porter then, at the request of Mr. Tracy, quoted a number of authorities regarding conspiracies, after which the speaker resumed his line of argument, appealing to the "True Story" to contradict the testimony of Messrs. Tilton and Moulton.

The character of Francis D. Moulton was next pictured by Mr. Tracy, and the coloring given was anything but complimentary. The "mutual friend" was described as a person used by Woodruff & Robinson to do a certain class of business for them in Washington and Albany, the nature of which demanded that he should have some influence with some lever of public opinion, and for that reason he in 1870 sought Theodore Tilton, who was an editor of The Independent and of The Union, and a trusted friend of Mr. Greeley. Mr. Tracy's next effort—a comparison of Mr. Moulton to Judas Iscariot—brought out an attempt to applaud by the audience. Judge Neilson threatened to adjourn the Court, and Mr. Tracy continued. He stated that the acts of Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Beecher, and others, from July, 1870, to the time when charges of adultery were made, were inconsistent with that crime. He would make it as clear as the noonday sun in the heavens, he said, that the charge of adultery was not made at the interview on Dec. 30, 1870, between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton. It had been shown, he declared, that four days before that interview Mr. Tilton told Mr. Bowen that the charges were "unhandsome proposals;" it would be further shown that Mr. Tilton had told five persons that the charges alleged at that interview were also "unhandsome proposals." Mr. Tracy's next branch of argument—and the most important of the day—was concerning the "so-called letter of confession" of Mrs. Tilton, which, he said, might still be in existence for aught he knew, and the non-production of which he characterized as a great breach of faith. "Why don't they produce the letter?" thundered Mr. Tracy, turning about and looking down upon Mr. Beach, who was calmly taking notes, and then glancing at Judge Neilson. He then said that that missing letter would prove that the "confession" was one of "improper advances," and not of adultery. The startling statement next made was that the defense would produce an unimpeachable witness to prove that Mr. Tilton, after the Woodhull publication, read to the witness what he (Mr. Tilton) said was a copy of the alleged confession of Mrs. Tilton, and that that copy did not contain a charge of adultery; also that Mr. Tilton told that person that the original confession was in the hands of Francis D. Moulton; all this, notwithstanding Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton have sworn that the "confession" was destroyed at the time of the signing of the "tripartite agreement," months before.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

CONTINUATION OF GEN. TRACY'S OPENING.

Gen. Tracy returned to his subject at the opening of the session, and explained the laws bearing on the case. In this he was assisted by his associate, ex-Judge Porter, who read citations from commentators and reports.

THE LAWS BEARING ON THE CASE.

MR. TRACY—*Gentlemen of the Jury: We now approach the stage of the case where it is important for us to consider the nature of this action, the rules which judicial experience has found it necessary to establish in the trial of this class of cases that the truth may prevail, and collusion, deceit and falsehood be defeated. First the charge of adultery is to be tried by the rules applicable to crimes. That is the first important rule of law, gentlemen, to which I desire to call your attention. The charge involved here is in the nature of a crime, the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, and they are bound to make out their case beyond a reasonable doubt. It is not for this defendant to prove that he is not guilty of this offense; it is for the prosecution to prove that he is. As you perceive, gentlemen, from the very nature of the case, it is one where affirmative evidence of innocence is impossible except from the testimony of the party implicated. No man, whoever he may be, charged with such an offense as this can introduce affirmative evidence upon the witness stand that he is not guilty of the offense, for it is impossible for any witness save himself to testify that he did not commit it. Wherever such an accusation is made against any man or woman residing in the same city, running over a long period of time, you see how utterly impossible it is that any witness could come upon the witness stand and say: "Of my own knowledge I know that this accusation is untrue." Select the most estimable man within your knowledge, gentlemen, and bring a charge against him; let any character, however worthless, charge him with having visited houses of ill fame, for instance, in the city of New-York during a period of sixteen months. If he has resided in the city of New-York during that time, what can he do in answer to such a charge as that but to say it was untrue, and rely upon the insufficiency of the evidence to establish his guilt. It is utterly impossible for him to call witnesses upon the witness stand who can say that this man did not visit these houses; he cannot do that from the very nature of the case. It is an attempt to prove a negative, which it is very difficult under any circumstances to establish. From the very nature of this case, therefore, all this defendant, when he is accused of this crime committed with a lady who was his acquaintance, whom it is admitted he frequently visited at her house, visited at the solicitation of her husband—when he is accused of that offense, all he can do is to interpose his word of denial and rest upon his established character, which he has made during the last thirty years in your midst, and say to you: "Gentlemen, the evidence which is introduced before you to establish my guilt is unworthy of your belief." And it must be removed from all suspicion; it must be evidence free from doubt; it must be evidence that carries home to you, consciences conviction of the truth of the offense charged, or you are bound by the oaths you have taken to render a verdict here for this defendant.

The charge of adultery is not a new one in our courts of justice. It is a matter of frequent occurrence, and the rules of law which judicial experience has established in order to ascertain the truth in this class of cases are well defined and well understood by the lawyers. This charge may be established first by direct evidence of witnesses who saw the act. I need not say to you, gentlemen, that there is no such evidence pretended in this case. Second, it may be established by circumstantial evidence leading irresistibly to the conclusion that the act has been committed. There is no evidence worthy of the name which falls under that head in the case now on trial. These parties have been acquainted, gentlemen, for twenty years; twenty years now, nearly, this lady has been the wife of Theodore Tilton. During all that time she has been a member of the church of which this defendant is the pastor. During all that time they have been acquaintances and friends; during all that time, up to within the last four years at least, the pastor and the husband were the most intimate personal friends; he visited that house at the solicitation of the husband; became the acquaintance and friend of that family at his solicitation; and, beyond that fact, the fact that he came to the house of the plaintiff at his request, there is not a fact or circumstance worthy of credit here which tends to show in the slightest degree improper familiarity between these parties, much less a criminal act.

THE PLAINTIFF'S EVIDENCE WEIGHED AND DECLARED WANTING.

The plaintiff accuses his wife now, and seeks to blast her character; but during all these years he is unable to lay his hand upon a single well authenticated fact which convicts this white-souled woman of the slightest impropriety of conduct in connection with her pastor. Will it be said that I forget the evidence? Will it be said that I do not remember Kate Carney, the woman brought from the lazar house of New-York city, reeking with prostitution and disease, twice its inmate within three months; discharged everywhere she has been employed for intoxication or some improper conduct, who testifies to the fact that on some occasion she saw this plaintiff's wife sitting upon the knee of the defendant? Gentlemen, I shall not insult your good sense to suppose that twelve honest-minded men would blast a reputation such as Henry Ward Beecher's and that of a woman of the character that this plaintiff gives his wife for twenty years, upon the word of such a woman as Kate Carney—Carey; Carey is the name, I believe, or Smith; which is it?

Mr. Shearman—Smith; Carey alias Smith.

Mr. Beach—She gave her name as Kate Carey Smith on the stand.

Mr. Tracy—She gave her name, I believe, as Kate Carey; on the second time we found the alias.

Mr. Beach—The minutes show it.

Mr. Tracy—Very well; we won't quarrel over so small a circumstance as that Mr. Beach—Then it is not worth while to misstate it.

Mr. Tracy—Then, gentlemen, what does that circumstance amount to if it is true? What were the facts connected with her testimony which shows the improbability of the story that she tells herself? Why, she says to you, gentlemen, that she came down into the dining-room one day for a drink of water, with the doors of the house all open (as you will remember she made them closed or partly closed, but afterwards she said the folding doors between the dining-room and the parlor were standing wide open), and as she walked in she saw the plaintiff's wife sitting upon the knee of the defendant, and she heard him say to her: "Elizabeth, how do you feel?" and she said: "Dear father, so, so." [Laughter.] Well, now, gentlemen, you only needed that last expression to show that this was a matter that was coined from the brain of this simple-minded woman. It was natural for her to have addressed her priest by the name of "Father," and therefore when she comes to make this plaintiff's wife address her minister she uses the same word that she would have used if she had been addressing her own. It is that slight circumstance that is enough to show the improbability of the story which this woman tells, upon her own showing. But I shall not dwell upon that, gentlemen. It is unworthy, I repeat, of the serious consideration of twelve honest men.

There is another circumstance which I am not permitted to forget, not on account of its importance as evidence, gentlemen, in this case, for, as such, it amounts to nothing, but on account of the exhibition which was made by the witness on the witness stand who came to testify to it. I refer to the brother of this plaintiff's wife, who said she was his only sister, and how highly he regarded her, came into Court in company with this plaintiff, knowing and realising and telling you from the stand that he knew nothing of his own knowledge that could affect the reputation of these parties, unless he should be permitted to make a speech to you from the witness stand and connect with what he saw what he had heard from such women as Kate Carey and other people—prostitutes, male and female alike. If he could connect these rumors and these stories that he had heard, then perhaps his evidence would have some significance; but he knew perfectly well, and realized it, that if he was permitted to testify only to what he had seen, it amounted to nothing against his sister. And yet why did he come here? Why? He was under no obligation to come here. If he had told the plaintiff what he told you, that he never had seen anything that could testify against his sister, or rather, permit me to say, that if he had told the senior counsel of the plaintiff, instead of the plaintiff, that what he had seen would amount to nothing, he would have been excused; but if he could come here and be permitted to make a speech against his sister, then he might possibly influence or prejudice your minds against her. Now, what is the story he told? He says that on one occasion—when, he don't know and cannot tell—he went into the parlor of his sister one morning, and on opening the door, saw Mr. Beecher sitting in a chair, and saw his sister moving away from his direction—moving rapidly, he says, with her face apparently flushed, and that is all he saw—everything. They were in the parlors of this house, gentlemen, where a virtuous woman receives an honorable guest. They were in no bedroom, and Mr. Beecher was sitting quietly; no movement on his part, gentlemen, no surprise could this man testify to at all, and he practically testified to none against his sister. How long had his sister been in that room? He don't know. Where did she come from, and what had she been doing before he went in? He don't know—don't pretend to know, and he saw her moving away. How far she was from him he don't know; and is there any evidence of guilt in that, gentlemen? Is that not a thing that is likely to happen to anybody a thousand times? Is that any evidence of guilt?

Why, let me refer you to the evidence of a virtuous woman, given from this witness stand herself, her own confession of the interview that she had with this defendant without provoking the suspicion on the part of her husband of impropriety, or without a thought of impropriety on her part. I refer to Mrs. Moulton. She says that she spent four hours with this defendant in a bedroom, left there by her husband. Aye! more. She testifies to a fact that they have not yet fastened on Elizabeth Tilton. She tells you that while alone in that bedroom with this defendant she kissed him. Now, gentlemen, supposing that they had got a servant who could have testified to such facts as that against Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. Supposing they had found him tucked up on a sofa with an Afghan, having an interview in a bedroom with this plaintiff's wife and she kissing him, testified to by a servant. That the counsel of the plaintiff would argue was evidence of guilt. Yet you see that when that fact is testified to by Mrs. Moulton from the witness stand herself, against herself, it excited in the mind of no honorable man even a suspicion against that woman's virtue. And you see, therefore, what familiarities and what liberties virtuous women can take, and properly take, with virtuous men, without exciting their suspicion. But there is no such fact as this against Elizabeth Tilton. I say, and I repeat to you, that this case stands entirely destitute of either class of evidence usually relied upon in cases of this description to convict this defendant. It is confined entirely to the confessions of the defendant, written and oral, mainly oral, for they have despaired of convicting him upon his letters, and, therefore, they have endeavored to supplant them by oral confessions. The effect of that class of evidence I shall have occasion to consider in a moment. But that class of evidence, gentlemen, you will bear in mind comes from a single family, if I may count Tilton as a member of the family of Moulton, as I think I can safely from the evidence of both himself and Mr. Moulton and Mrs. Moulton. It comes from two conspirators against this defendant; the plaintiff, his mutual friend, and the mutual friend's wife. No other witness appears to testify to oral confessions except her.

REASONS ASSIGNED FOR MR. CARPENTER'S ABSENCE.

And right here in this connection, gentlemen, I desire to call your attention to a remarkable omission in this case, quite as remarkable as anything that has been produced in it. You were notified upon the opening of this case by the plaintiff's counsel, that the confessions of this defendant would not be confined to a single family, nor to a single instance; that they would call a witness who would claim to be outside of this case, this single and disinterested witness, as they said, who would testify to the confessions of Mr. Beecher, and they named their witness Frank Carpenter. But, is he here? Has he been produced upon the witness stand? Before I close, gentlemen, and before this case closes, we will show you why Frank Carpenter was not produced upon the witness stand in this case. In the first place, he could not testify to any confessions of Henry Ward Beecher, and in the second place, we will show that, if they had produced him, we would have blasted their case with this man's evidence, and the evidence that we had brought against him. The reasons why they have omitted him are cogent and powerful, as you will see. He is a link in the conspiracy that they have been drawing around this defendant for five years, and with him we would have established it. Without him they hope that they have broken the chain of circumstantial evidence, but we will show them that they are disappointed in their expectations.

THE LAW ON ORAL CONFESSIONS.

The plaintiff in this case relying, therefore, exclusively on the oral confessions, or mainly on the oral confessions, of this defendant, it becomes important, gentlemen, for you to consider, and for the Court to consider, the legal effect of this class of evidence, and it is to that question that I desire to invite your attention before I proceed with a further history of this case—before I begin to unravel the network that this plaintiff with his fertile brain, stimulated and aided by his mutual friend, has for four years been weaving around the feet of my unfortunate client. We concede, gentlemen, that, in connection with direct evidence or circumstantial evidence, the oral admissions of the accused are pertinent evidence. Wherever circumstantial evidence is relied upon, the circumstances, taken together, must establish the following three facts: First, the criminal disposition of the parties charged. Second, a like disposition on the part of the paramour. Third, an opportunity to commit the act. As to the first and second, gentlemen, I have shown you that there is no proof in this case that either of the parties, either the defendant or the plaintiff's wife, had any disposition to commit the act of adultery. They have not given you any evidence of that at all. All their associations, all their intercourse is apparently innocent, as innocent as any association can possibly be. All of it was carried on under the eye of the plaintiff, with his concurrence and approval. There is nothing in it, from the beginning to the end, to suggest to you the thought of criminality on the part of either. Third, the opportunity to commit the act. These three facts must be reasonably approximate in point of time, and the opportunity must be one characterized by circumstances pointing to guilt. In other words, guilt cannot be inferred from the opportunity to commit adultery, unless there is also evidence that at about the same time there were acts of each party specifically indicating a disposition to commit it. It is this class of evidence, gentlemen, which is usually relied upon in courts of justice to establish the fact of adultery. In fact, this class of circumstantial evidence, that is, the relations of the parties, the frequency with which they have been seen together, the improper places at which they have been seen, the stealthy meetings of the parties—all of this class of acts tending to show a disposition to commit adultery—is the class of evidence usually relied upon, and is seldom or never wanting in any case of adultery charged in good faith. This is almost the only important case on record where there is no proof of the facts and circumstances calculated to excite suspicion and produce a conviction of guilt. This case is made to rest entirely upon the supposed confessions of the defendant, so far as their case depends upon alleged confessions, it is to be observed that there are two classes, the letters of the defendant and the reports given by witnesses of his oral confessions. The letters are in evidence, and will speak for themselves. The alleged oral confessions are an entirely different kind of evidence, as such evidence is always tested by the law with the most careful scrutiny. My associate, Judge Porter, now, gentlemen, will relieve me by reading the rules of law applicable to this class of evidence—oral confessions.

Mr. Porter—Our first citation in this connection, your Honor, is from 4 Burrill's Reports, the case of Morris vs. Miller. The action was crim. con. Lord Mansfield, in delivering the opinion of the Court, says:

"This is a sort of criminal action—"

Mr. Beach—What page do you read from?

Mr. Porter—Page 3,049. [Resuming.]

"This is a sort of criminal action. There is no way of punishing the crime at common law. It should not depend upon the mere reputation of a marriage which arises from the conduct or declarations of the plaintiff himself. In prosecutions for bigamy, a marriage in fact must be proved. No inconvenience can happen by this determination; but inconvenience might arise by a contrary determination, which might render persons liable to actions founded upon evidence made by the persons themselves who should bring the action."

The next citation of Mr. Tracy is from the 1st Vol. of the Notes of Cases in the Ecclesiastical and Maritime Courts, page 448, in the case of Dillon vs. Dillon. This was a suit for divorce. Dr. Lushington, in delivering the opinion, says:

"This, as concerns the wife, is not a civil, but in effect a criminal proceeding. If there is any doubt, she is entitled to the benefit of it. The evidence as to the fact, on the part of the husband, may, perhaps, preponderate; but I cannot say that the proof is free from reasonable doubt."

The next citation is from the 17th New-Jersey Equity Reports, pages 454, 455 and 456. This was a proceeding for divorce on the ground of adultery. Under the laws of New-Jersey the parties charged were admissible as witnesses to deny the charge. The alleged paramour of the wife was sworn, and denied the adultery. The adultery was supported by the direct evidence of a lady who professed to have detected the parties in the act; and this, supported by corroborating evidence of opportunity, circumstance, and suspicion of adulterous disposition. The Court, in delivering the opinion, say:

"The testimony of Mrs. Berckman, the witness for the plaintiff, is seriously affected by two considerations. First, her testimony is in favor of the complainant; and it stands, so far as these scenes are concerned, alone and uncorroborated, while she is seriously and positively contradicted with regard to them by two witnesses, Sarah Berckman and Dr. Titworth. These two witnesses may be untruthful as to what they say, but they cannot be mistaken about it. They certainly do know whether the scenes described were true or not. Mrs. Berckman, the elder, may be untruthful, and she may also be mistaken. If the evidence of the three be entitled to an equal amount of credit and confidence, then the evidence of the defense has entirely overthrown, by its positiveness and preponderance, that of the complainant. It is true that these witnesses on the part of the defense have a strong inducement to swear as they do; but is not this also true with regard to Mrs. Berckman? We have no rule by which to determine what notice or consideration will most certainly induce a person to perjure himself or herself. One might be tempted to do it for a mere money consideration; another, who could not be purchased by money, might do it to save his name and reputation from the charge of dishonor and disgrace. Another, who might care but little for either of these, might do it to gratify a most malignant and insatiable feeling of revenge or of implacable and unrelenting hate; and I do not see but what either of these motives might be as effectual in inducing a witness to depart from the truth as any of the others; and, judging from the developments and manifestations to be found in the evidence in the case, I hardly feel at liberty to say that the defendant and Dr. Titworth had stronger inducements to depart from the truth than Mrs. Berckman herself. And, entirely aside from this controversy, and everything connected with it, I do not know but what their characters for truth and veracity are as good as her's. Nor can I admit that the mere charge of crime is so far to destroy the credit and character of a person as that he is not entitled to credit when speaking under oath. Such a principle might ruin the most exemplary people. Surely, if the charge is not true, it ought not to discredit the party; and, to permit it to do so, is to assume that the charge is true; which we cannot do, for that is the very thing to be proved."

The next of the authorities cited by Gen. Tracy will be found in 3 Sand., S. C. R., and has relation to the force of evidence that is required on the part of a plaintiff before such an accusation can receive the sanction either of a court or of a jury. It is the case of Ferguson vs. Ferguson, 3 Sand., S. C. R., page 300. In delivering the opinion of the Court, Judge Mason cites and gives the sanction of the Court to the proposition laid down by Judge Stowell in the case of Loveden vs. Loveden, 2 Hagg. Constat. R., p. 1. It is in the following words:

"It is a fundamental rule that it is not necessary to prove the direct fact of adultery, because, if it were otherwise, there is not one case in a hundred in which that proof would be obtainable. It is very rarely, indeed, that the parties are surprised in the direct fact of adultery. In every case almost the fact is inferred from the circumstances that lead to it, by fair inference, as a necessary conclusion; and unless this were the case, and unless this was so held, no protection whatever could be given to marital rights. What are the circumstances which lead to such a conclusion cannot be laid down universally, though many of them, of an obvious nature and of more frequent occurrence, are to be found in the ancient books. The only general rule that can be laid down on the subject is that the circumstances must be such as would lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion; for it is not to lead a harsh and intemperate judgment, moving upon appearances that are equally capable of two interpretations; neither is it to be a matter of artificial reasoning, judging upon such things differently from what would strike the careful and sagacious consideration of a discreet mind."

The Court proceeds:

"This rule, so simply and loosely stated, commends itself to the approbation of every mind, and its application to the present case will lead us to a correct decision."

The Judge then examined the evidence, and came to the conclusion that it was equally capable of two interpretations and therefore did not prove the fact which was there in issue.

The next citation is from 17 Abbott, Fr. R., page 58. In that case Judge Hoffman, who delivered the opinion, states the doctrine thus:

"The general rule that applies to the degree and nature of the evidence demanded is too well known to justify a statement in detail. While direct proof of the actual commission of the crime is not required, yet the approximate facts must lead by a fair inference to a necessary conclusion. This is not a necessary conclusion in a strict mathematical or logical sense; the subject and conditions of the evidence do not admit of this; but it must be a conclusion so far inevitable as that the supposition of innocence cannot by any just course of reasoning be reconciled."

On the subject of oral confessions the authorities cited are, first, the case of Law vs. Merrill, a leading case on the subject in the Court of Errors, where Chancellor Walworth, in delivering the opinion of the Court, has occasion to say—

Mr. Beach—Where do you read from?

Mr. Porter—6th Wendell, 377. [Reading]:

"Again, evidence to establish a fact by the confessions of the party should always be scrutinized and received with caution, as it is the most dangerous evidence that can be admitted in a Court of Justice, and the most liable to abuse. Although the witness is perfectly honest, it is impossible in most cases for him to give the exact words in which an admission was made, and sometimes even the transposition of the words of a party may give a meaning entirely different from that which was intended to be conveyed to the witness."

The next citation is from the 24 Com. Law Reports, 698, Earle and Wife vs. Picken:

"In the course of this circuit Mr. Justice Parke several times observes that too great weight ought not to attach to evidence of what a party has been supposed to have said, as it very frequently happens not only that the witness has misunderstood what the party has said, but that, by unintentionally altering a few of the expressions really used, he gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party really did say."

The next citation is from Harden's Reports, at page 549, in the case Meyers vs. Baker et al., where the Court states the rule thus:

"Proof of confessions of a party, in the presence of the witnesses only, are of him, and the adverse party, although certainly competent testimony, ought to be weighed with great caution, because it is impossible for the party to counteract it by other testimony, because the expressions used are easily misunderstood or perverted, either through mistake or design, and because not the whole conversation, but only parts of it, are generally detailed by the witness. It is the most dangerous species of testimony held competent by the law, and unless the story told is probable in its nature, or is corroborated by circumstances, very little weight is due to it."

The 24th volume of Law Library contains the treatise of Joy on the admissibility of confessions, at page 106.

Mr. Beach—What series is that?

Mr. Porter—Littell's Edition, 1843. In Joy on Confessions it is page 106. In this case the learned writer has embodied what perhaps is the best statement to be found in the English law upon this subject, and singularly enough it first appeared in The Edinburgh Review, being from the hand of the most accomplished master of jurisprudence, not even excepting the name of Jeffreys.

"A modern writer remarks on this subject, that 'the imagination need not be taxed for extreme cases, in which silence, equivocation, or even falsehood, the ordinary badges of guilt, would naturally be found in company with innocence. There are many instances in which the truth, properly brought to light, would set free the accused, but his very situation disqualifies him from doing justice to his own statement. Conscious of his rectitude, and proud of his character, he is abashed, humiliated and confounded by the charge. The untoward chances that have loaded him with suspicion, may go on to his utter ruin; the false witness, who have now established a 'prima facie' case, may ultimately convince his judges. That he should ever become an object of accusation would have struck him yesterday as more impossible, than that accusation should now lead to conviction. The last step seems far less violent than the first, and the commencement of his progress is a fatal surgery, which teaches him to despair of its issue.'"

Mr. Beach—Allow me, Sir.

[Mr. Porter hands the volume to Mr. Beach.]

Mr. Porter—The last citation that Gen. Tracy has marked for evidence is, 1st Greenleaf on evidence, Section 200. The language of Chief Justice Redfield in this portion of the text is as follows:

"In a somewhat extended experience of jury trials we have been compelled to the conclusion that the most unreliable of all evidence is that of the oral admissions of the party. And especially where they purport to have been made during the pendency of the action, or after the parties were in a state of controversy. It is not uncommon for different witnesses of the same conversations to give precisely opposite accounts of them, and in some instances it will appear that the witness deposes to the statement of one party as coming from the other. It is not very encouraging to find a witness of the best intention repeating the declarations of the party in his own favor as the fullest admissions of the utter falsity of his claims."

JUDGE NEILSON HELPS IN THE CITATIONS.

Judge Neilson—Judge Porter, when you and I were boys, we found that general principle cited in all the text-books, very much after the form that you have put it.

Mr. Porter—In the form in which the judges have put it. I have not been using my own language.

Judge Neilson—I mean have read it; and perhaps the best statement of that has been found in Starkey on Evidence; and my general recollection of what he says is to the effect that this kind of evidence is dangerous; first, because it may be misapprehended by the person who hears it; in the second place, it may not be well remembered; and third, it may not be correctly stated. And I have a general recollection of a very early case mentioned in a note, where he said that on the trial of a party for forgery, a witness, a doctor, was examined, and the judge had it down on his notes that the witness said: "I am the drawer, the acceptor and indorser of the bill;" under three different names the witness himself stating himself to be guilty of forgery; and while the judge was so stating to the jury from his notes, the counsel interrupted him; but, like the judge in the Pickwick case, he persisted in adhering to his notes, and the witness was recalled, when on inquiry of the judge himself the witness said that his testimony was, "I know the drawer, the acceptor and indorser of the bill."

Mr. Porter—Your Honor's reference is very striking, and reminds me of a passage which has been previously read, and which will be borne in your Honor's recollection, and as very pertinent to another proposition of Gen. Tracy, that, so far as the evidence is to depend upon circumstances, "wherever there is an imputation of a criminal nature, the circumstances must all be such as to exclude the possibility of innocence, for otherwise the law will presume against guilt," and I think that comes in connection with the very observation to which your Honor has referred.

Mr. Beach—Will my friend permit me to read an additional sentence from Joy on Confessions, from which he has quoted. After considering the subject to which my friend, Judge Porter, has drawn the attention of the Court and jury, this author says:

"Whilst such anomalous cases ought to render courts and juries at all times extremely watchful of every fact attendant on confessions of guilt, these cases should never be invoked, or so urged as to invalidate indiscriminately all confessions put to the jury, thus repudiating those salutary distinctions which the Court, in the judicial exercise of its duty, shall be enabled to make. Such a use of these anomalies, which should be regarded as mere exceptions, and which should speak only in the voice of warning, is unprofessional and impolitic, and should be regarded as offensive to the intelligence both of the Court and jury."

Judge Nelson—The rule being that admissions are to be taken with caution and scrutiny.

COMMENTS ON THE LAW; OR, ORAL CONFESSIONS.

authorities which my associate has read in your hearing, gentlemen, the testimony of witnesses as to oral confessions is always notoriously unreliable; but in this case it is particularly so. The testimony of this kind comes exclusively from three witnesses, the plaintiff, the "mutual friend," and the "mutual friend's" wife. Admissions of this character always require corroboration; and the corroboration must be of facts pointing to guilt, which have been adduced by other witnesses. Before a jury can give effect to oral confessions they must be satisfied, first, that the party who is alleged to have confessed was correctly understood by the witness, a rule which his Honor has just given you, one of the most forcible illustrations of showing how easy it is for a man listening attentively and desiring to recall accurately what is said, to be misunderstood. You have yourselves been witnesses to the numerous contests which have arisen during this trial between counsel experienced in remembering what witnesses say and in repeating it accurately, as to what a particular witness has said, or has not said on this trial; so with a witness who assumes to repeat what another party has said, his liability to have misunderstood the party is very great, and you must be careful and cautious in scrutinizing the evidence, to be satisfied that the party has correctly understood. Second, that he is correctly reported. Now, there is such a uniformity in human language, that an intelligent man, desiring to report accurately, is very liable to misreport, for we seldom remember the precise language of a party who is conversing with us; we catch the idea and reproduce it in our own language, and in doing that we are always liable to convey an impression which the party whom we are reporting did not intend to convey. The third rule is, that the language in which the confession was made was unambiguous: because if the language used by the party may as well apply to one set of facts as to another, you cannot tell by the pretended confession what fact the party intended to admit. If there are two views of a case, or two situations, the party speaking having reference to one, and the witness listening having reference to another, the witness is quite liable to impute to the speaker a reference to a transaction, or give to his language an entirely different meaning from what the speaker intended. All of these rules are to be carefully observed.

Again, if the witnesses relied upon to prove oral admissions are justly tainted with interest in the case, if it is established that they have been guilty of misconduct or falsehood in the case in which they testify, for instance, if they have been guilty of the destruction of important documents in the case, a fact to which I shall call your attention further on, gentlemen, as bearing on the witnesses who testify to oral confessions against this defendant; or if the witnesses testifying to oral admissions are members of the same family, or are moved by a common interest in the result of the action, and particularly if they admit that they have been guilty of repeated falsification of the facts, to which they now testify, this, added to the inherent infirmity of the evidence itself, would compel a Jury to disregard evidence of this nature. I shall not stop here, gentlemen; I only desire to recall your attention to it in passing; I shall not stop here to remind you that every witness in this case is tainted by the infirmities which are otherwise pointed out and which you have heard read. They come from the same family. I shall show you they have been guilty of the destruction of the most important documents in this case; I shall show you that they are under the strongest motives possible to fasten guilt upon this defendant; and I shall show you—no, they have themselves testified to you—that they have been guilty of repeated falsification of the facts to which they now testify.

MR. BOWEN'S SHREWD MANAGEMENT DETAILED.

Having considered thus briefly the rules of law which must govern you in your disposition of this case, I now invite your attention to the charge made by the plaintiff against this defendant, and to the circumstances under which this charge was made. I now resume my narrative at the point where Tilton had said to Bowen that Beecher had made an unhandsome proposal to his wife. This was news to Bowen; the announcement of it caused his very soul to thrill with delight. He at once discovered his opportunity; if he could lead Tilton to make a personal attack upon Beecher, this would give him the choice of two alternatives. If Tilton succeeded in his attack this would so damage The Christian Union that the accruing benefit to The Independent would be many times Tilton's salary, and the danger from retaining Tilton would be compensated for by the injury inflicted upon a dangerous rival. Besides, such a contest would make it impossible for Beecher and Tilton ever to unite against Bowen and The Independent. On the other hand, if Tilton failed in his attack on Beecher, this would furnish an excellent reason for getting rid of him. In either event, therefore, Bowen was to win. After a few moments reflection upon the situation as now presented by Tilton, Bowen turned to him and said, with a seriousness of countenance that would have done honor to Aminadab Sleeke, "you and I, Mr. Tilton, owe a duty to society. This man is the editor of The Christian Union. Its circulation has run up in one year from 2,000 to 45,000. Such a man is a dangerous visitor in the families of his congregation. He is a wolf in the fold. We should unite to extirpate him." "Agreed," says Tilton, "save my two contracts, and we will smite him before the world." "Then," said Bowen, "since my hands are tied by the result of a settlement that I have recently made with Beecher, do you write him a letter, demanding that, 'for reasons which he explicitly understands,' he should immediately cease from the ministry of Plymouth Church, that he quit Brooklyn as a residence, and that he cease to write for The Christian Union. I will bear the letter to him and support the demand." Tilton, thinking only of saving his contracts with Bowen, and without seeing the trap, caught at the bait, and forthwith did the act for the doing of which his friend Moulton an hour afterwards called him a fool. This was a master stroke of strategy on the part of Bowen. At one move he had made a union between Tilton and The Christian Union impossible, and left himself free to discharge Tilton without any danger thereby of strengthening a business rival. For Bowen had no objection to joining in an attack upon Beecher, provided he could do so safely to himself and disastrously to Beecher; but, distrustful of Tilton, and feeling that he was a broken reed on which it was unsafe to lean too heavily, he proceeded to move cautiously, to feel his way carefully, always keeping open a safe road by which he could retreat. If Tilton's charges were true, the mere reading of the letter would disclose the consciousness of guilt to the keen and argus-eyed Bowen.

This letter, Tilton says, was an open one, and if this should be presented open by Bowen, Beecher would at once perceive that he had been a party to it. To prevent this the cautious owner of The Independent said, as he went along bearing the letter to Beecher's house, "I think it would be well for me to seal this letter; then I can deny to Beecher all knowledge of its contents. I will hurl this secret missile at him, and, carefully watching the effect, I will await events before determining whether I will make myself a party to the controversy or not."

Nowhere has Bowen's consummate cunning been more conspicuous than his suggestion which led to the introduction of the clause in the letter "for reasons which you explicitly understand." In the light of Tilton's present accusation, few could understand how this clause came to be inserted in the letter at the instance of Bowen. With this clause in, the letter would point so directly to some cause of offense against the writer which would be understood by the reader, that Bowen could bear the letter without provoking the slightest suspicion of having been its instigator. He would have the advantage of watching, of seeing the effect produced upon Mr. Beecher by the reading of the letter, and a personal interview immediately following thereupon, and thus be able to judge of the probability of Mr. Beecher's guilt. He could thus gain time and await developments. But he was not long in doubt. Mr. Beecher's reply to that letter was quick, bold and impassioned: "Bowen, what does this mean? This is insanity; the man is mad!" And he attacked Tilton to Bowen with a violence that struck him dead in five minutes. He told Bowen Tilton's true life, as he had learned it from his wife and his intimate associates within the last two or three years, and he did what was worse; he then turned Bowen over to Mrs. Beecher, who finished Tilton very summarily in Bowen's estimation.

Having discovered the courage of innocence where he had fondly hoped to see disclosed the cowardice of guilt, Bowen, always quick to discern his interests, at once began a masterly retreat. "I don't know," he said, "I am surprised at the contents of the letter! If Mr. Tilton is your enemy, I will be your friend, Mr. Beecher." "Codlin is your friend, not Short." And he who had just before entered Mr. Beecher's house, having pledged his friendship to Tilton, now left it, pledging that friendship to Beecher. But he was the friend of neither—the implacable enemy of both. Having made certain that Tilton and Beecher could not and would not unite against him, he at once determined to discharge Tilton from his employ. This is proved by Tilton himself, who says: "The next morning, after Bowen had instituted this demand for the retirement of Mr. Beecher, and after saying that he would fortify it with facts, he came to The Union office and said to me: 'Sir, if you ever reveal to Mr. Beecher the things I told you and Mr. Johnson I will cashier you, and," adds Tilton, "hardly had his violent words ceased ringing in my ears, when I received his summary notice breaking my contracts with The Independent and The Brooklyn Union." And thus Tilton's first attack upon Mr. Beecher had miscarried.

MR. TILTON AND MR. BOWEN CO-CONSPIRATORS.

Let us now, gentlemen, consider for a moment the position in which the interview of Dec. 26 had placed Tilton and Bowen in the eye of the law. We charge here, gentlemen, that Theodore Tilton is a conspirator against the reputation of Henry Ward Beecher, and has been since the 26th day of December, 1870. We say he has formed that conspiracy with Henry C. Bowen, but Henry C. Bowen backed out, and then the place had to be supplied, and it was supplied by Francis D. Moulton; but that Theodore Tilton has held the position of a conspirator against the reputation of Henry Ward Beecher since the 26th day of December, 1870, I shall leave no doubt in the mind of any honest man, after I recount the evidence of that conspiracy and of the schemes which Bowen and Tilton then formed against Beecher, Tilton himself being the witness. Beyond all question, therefore, I say they had become conspirators against Beecher, and having entered into a plot to bring a charge of crime against him, not for the purpose of securing his legal punishment, but solely with the view to get him out of their own way. It was business, gentlemen. So much fraud, so much conspiracy, so much lying, for so much money return in dollars and cents through The Independent by dwarfing The Christian Union. Bowen had slipped out of this conspiracy, and immediately on learning this, Tilton, who was too deeply committed to withdraw, sought another man to join him, who, taking Bowen's place, necessarily became a conspirator in his stead.

The nature of that conspiracy between Tilton and Bowen, gentlemen, Mr. Tilton has proved from his evidence. He has shown you that in that conversation between Mr. Bowen and himself, charges against Mr. Beecher were made, charges of crime, charges that would disgrace him before the community, if they were true, and that this missile was hurled at him on that day for the purpose of compelling him to resign his position as pastor of Plymouth Church, and to cease writing for The Christian Union. That was a crime, that made them in the eyes of the law, conspirators.

THE LAW ON CONSPIRACY.

I will ask my associate now to furnish us the authorities on the subject of conspiracy, at this point.

Mr. Porter—The first citation, if your Honor please, is from 2d Greenleaf on Evidence, Section 89:

"A conspiracy may be described in general terms as a combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful by criminal or unlawful means. It is not essential that the act intended to be done should be punishable by indictment, for if it be designed to destroy a man's reputation by verbal slander, or to seduce a female to elope from her parents' house for the purpose of prostitution, is a criminal offense, though the act itself be not indictable."

12th Conn., 112. The State vs. Rowley:

"Now, that many acts which, if done by an individual, are not indictable, are punished criminally when done in pursuance of the conspiracy among numbers, is too well settled to admit of controversy. Thus, a conspiracy to slander a man by charging him with a crime, or with being the father of a bastard child, is an indictable offense."

3 Mass., 534. The Commonwealth vs. Tibbetts:

"A conspiracy to charge any person with a crime, and in pursuance of a conspiracy falsely to affirm that he is guilty, is an indictable offense, without procuring any legal process."

8 Penn. State Rep., 280. The case is that of Hood vs. Pollin, your Honor, in which the action was substantially on the civil side of the Court, for damages occasioned by the conspiracy. In imputing to a party whose property had been burned a design to defraud the insurance company, Chief-Justice Gibson, in delivering the opinion of the Court, uses this language:

"To put another in jeopardy or terror, is of itself a damage to him; and it is on this ground that it is actionable to charge maliciously an innocent person with a crime. It is said that the plaintiff in this case was not in jeopardy. Of prosecution by indictment, he certainly was not; but of being ruined in his reputation and business, he certainly was. The libel which jeopardized him would give him an action against a single publisher of it, and why not against a number who publish it in concert? It is not to be maintained that a libel charging what would not be actionable independent of the publication of it, is not actionable without proof of special damages from it; or that it is not an injury from which constructive damage results by implication of law. From every tort the law implies damage; and when substantial damage is not shown, it implies the smallest amount of it; but still an amount sufficient to sustain an action for it. An action of slander could seldom be maintained on any other basis; and, if the libel be actionable when published by one, it is actionable when published by a plurality. But I do not rest the case entirely on the fact that the defendants conspired to publish a libel. A conspiracy to defame by spoken words, not actionable, would be equally a subject of prosecution by indictment; and, if so, then equally a subject of prosecution by action, by reason of the presumption that injury and damage would be produced by the combination of numbers. The overt acts laid in this declaration were scandalous words written, and scandalous words spoken; and backed, as they were, by a confederacy to give them circulation and credit, they raised a legal presumption of damage to a greater or lesser extent. Defamation by the outcry of numbers is as resistless as defamation by the written act of the individual. The mode of publication is different, but the effect of it is the same; and it is for this reason that an action lies at the suit of one who has been the subject of a conspiracy, whenever an indictment would lie for it. But an indictment lies for any conspiracy to vex or annoy another—for instance, to hiss a play or an actor, right or wrong."

The next case cited is from 4th Wendell, the case of The People vs. Mather, at page 261, where the Court, in delivering the opinion, says:

"If parties concur in doing the act, although they were not previously acquainted with each other, it is a conspiracy. Lord Kenyon says, in King vs. Hammond & Webb: If a general conspiracy exists, you may go into general evidence of its nature, and the conduct of its members, so as to implicate men who stand charged with acting upon the terms of it, years after those terms have been established, and who reside at a great distance from the place where the general plan is carried on. These cases show that all who adhere to a conspiracy after its formation and while it is being executed, become conspirators."

Mr. Tracy—That by the rules of the common law, gentlemen, this plaintiff in this case, if he is to be believed in his testimony, was a conspirator with Henry C. Bowen against the character of this defendant, under the rules of law which you have just heard read, there can be no doubt whatever. I want to put in here, gentlemen, again, the qualification which I stated yesterday. I desire to do it always, for I do not desire to impute even against Mr. Bowen the charge of conspiracy resting entirely upon the evidence of Theodore Tilton. I make the charge on the theory that he states the truth, and that what transpired between him and Mr. Bowen on the 26th of December is what he states in his evidence. If Mr. Bowen should come here and say that that is false; if Mr. Bowen should appear upon the witness stand or elsewhere and say that "Theodore Tilton falsifies when he charges me with conspiring with him on the 26th day of December to drive Henry Ward Beecher out of Brooklyn by the charge of a scandal against him, and under fear of provoking a scandal in the community to induce him or to frighten him to abandon the pulpit," I say that if Henry C. Bowen should deny that, and should assert his ignorance of the contents of that letter, I should not be prepared to ask you to believe Theodore Tilton even against himself. But upon his statement of the case, as he stated it, that he was a deliberate conspirator on the 26th day of December, 1870, against Henry Ward Beecher, the object of that conspiracy being to drive him out of Brooklyn by means of a threat, of an outrageous scandal which he and Bowen afterwards, both, you remember, in the tripartite agreement, signed a statement; Bowen on his part acknowledging the falsehood of those stories, and Tilton agreeing in that to give circulation to them again—but by means of those scandals which were there talked between these two parties on the 26th of December, they deliberately formed a plan to drive Mr. Beecher out of Brooklyn, there can be no doubt, if you are to believe Theodore Tilton. But as we have shown, Mr. Bowen backed out early. He did not want to travel long in that direction; he found it unsafe to go on. But the plaintiff had committed himself, so that he was compelled to go on, and he was therefore compelled to seek another friend to aid him.

MR. BEECHER'S CONDUCT CONSISTENT WITH INNOCENCE.

The letter which Mr. Tilton had sent to Mr. Beecher by Bowen was delivered on the evening of the 26th or 27th day of December. I have repeated to you, gentlemen, the indignant manner in which this defendant received it. I have shown you that his conduct there, in the presence of Henry C. Bowen, satisfied Mr. Bowen of his innocence, and he retraced his steps at once. But there is another fact to which now I desire to call your attention in this connection. You will observe that that letter says, "For reasons which you explicitly understand, you are required," etc. Now, gentlemen of the jury, if Mr. Beecher had been conscious of guilt—if he had committed adultery with Mrs. Tilton, and had received, on the 26th day of December, such a letter from Mr. Tilton—don't you think he would have divined the object of it? Would not he have understood what it meant? At least would not it have suggested to him that "Mr. Tilton has discovered my crime?" And wouldn't he have been desirous of understanding how far that crime had been discovered and precisely what Mr. Tilton knew about it? And yet, gentlemen of the jury, this alleged guilty man, who had been carrying on adulterous intercourse for sixteen months, thus having his guilt suddenly disclosed to him, and the knowledge of it possessed by the husband, never moves a step to ascertain what the husband knew or to communicate with this woman to ascertain the situation at all. There he rested on the 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th and 30th days of December, without making the first movement to ascertain what Mr. Tilton knew about it, and how far he had discovered the truth as it existed between himself and Mrs. Tilton. Would a guilty man have done that, gentlemen? Do you think if an injured and outraged husband had gone to a man who was really guilty and written him such a letter as that, he would not have put himself in communication with that wife, to ascertain just what the husband knew and what this letter meant? And yet, he made no effort to communicate with Mrs. Tilton; did not communicate with her, and, as the plaintiff himself tells you, was in profound ignorance that the plaintiff had any accusation to make against him in connection with his wife, until they met on that stormy night at Moulton's house, about eight o'clock in the evening. I submit to you, gentlemen, that that is proof conclusive that this defendant knew nothing about the object of that letter; at least he did not understand that it referred at all to his relations with Mrs. Tilton. And the fact that he did not so understand, proves conclusively that guilt did not exist.

MR. TILTON'S UNWISE DESTRUCTION OF THE BRIDGE BEHIND HIM.

The sending of this letter by Mr. Tilton to Mr. Beecher provoked a contest from which Mr. Tilton could not retire easily, and when he was deserted by Mr. Bowen, he found himself in a very awkward situation. He had sent this challenge to the most prominent clergyman in Brooklyn, and had nothing on which to support it; Bowen had failed him; he had nothing from his wife in writing—nothing whatever on which to support this charge at all. But he had crossed the Rubicon. To advance might be dangerous, to retreat was impossible. If before this his ruin was imminent, with Beecher and Bowen united against him it was not only sure, but to avail ourselves of the fine criticism of the plaintiff upon the witness stand, we may say it was certain. To sever that union and pacify Beecher was with him the necessity of the hour. Unless he could do this, he was not only the fool that Moulton had called him, but he was a ruined man. How this could be done was the subject that occupied his thoughts during the 27th, 28th, 29th and 30th days of December.

THE HOUR WHEN MR. MOULTON STALKED UPON THE SCENE.

And now, gentlemen, we come to the period of time when we say the conspiracy, which had been begun on the 26th of December at Mr. Bowen's house by Mr. Tilton, was continued between himself and Mr. Moulton, against Mr. Beecher, had its inception. We have seen that Mr. Moulton was somehow (by accident as they say, but by pre-arrangement as we think) at Mr. Tilton's house awaiting Mr. Tilton's return from the interview at Mr. Bowen's house, December 26th. He was then informed of the result of that interview and of the writing of that letter to Mr. Beecher. He regarded that as so important an event, that he made a memorandum noting the precise hour and minute at which this communication had been handed to him!

And here, gentlemen, at the very beginning of the association of these two men in relation to this case, you are called upon to discredit the first fact they testify to, or to accept a statement which is not only extremely improbable, but which is contradicted by the written evidence of one of them. They both testify that Moulton was not consulted again until the evening of the 30th. I ask you, gentlemen, to consider the improbability of that statement. On the 26th, as they tell you, Francis D. Moulton found that his most intimate friend had committed what he called the foolish act of sending this letter to Henry Ward Beecher. He was informed that that letter was to be borne to Mr. Beecher by Mr. Bowen, and he predicted the result. Says he: "You have signed the letter alone; supposing Mr. Bowen leaves you to support it alone, where are you?" The result of the interview between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher was known by Mr. Tilton the next morning, for I have just read in your hearing that he says "The next morning Mr. Bowen came into my presence and told me if I dared repeat what he had told me he would cashier me at once." Do you believe, gentlemen of the jury, that the result of that interview between Mr. Bowen and Mr. Beecher was never communicated to Francis D. Moulton until the evening of the 30th of December? Do you believe that, all these days, he was in ignorance of the response that letter had met at the hands of Henry Ward Beecher? This fact, so important to his friend that he marked not only the hour but the precise minute at which he had received it, denouncing his friend as a fool for what he had done? And yet they tell you—although they admit that they had seen each other in the meantime—they tell you that no word had ever passed between them as to the manner in which Mr. Beecher had received that letter. You would not believe it, gentlemen; you would not believe it if it stood uncontradicted, and rested upon the oath of both these witnesses, with no other infirmity except the improbability of the statement itself.

MR. TILTON'S TRUE STORY ARRAYED AGAINST HIM.

But we are not left to that. We are not left to that. Fortunately for us in this respect and in many others, Theodore Tilton reduced the history of these scenes transpiring at that time to writing, in 1873; and while he thought he had destroyed it, and gotten rid of it, providentially for us, he showed it to too many men; and some of them were shrewd enough and cautious enough to preserve a copy of it; and a paper which he supposed was destroyed, and would not confront him during this litigation was resurrected to his great surprise, and confronted him upon the witness stand. Now, I appeal to that "True Story," as written by Theodore Tilton himself, to contradict the evidence of Mr. Tilton and Francis D. Moulton right at the inception of this conspiracy between them. The "True Story," as Mr. Tilton entitled it, says distinctly that Mr. Moulton was consulted at least twice after the 26th and before the 30th of December, thus giving the lie in the plainest terms to the testimony of these two witnesses. After referring to the interview of Dec. 26th, the "True Story" says:

"A day or two afterwards" [which would be the 27th or 28th], "prompted by my wife's wish and Mr. Moulton's advice, I resolved that I would send for Mr. Beecher to meet me at a personal interview, either in their presence or with me alone."

Then, giving the account of the scene in which Bowen threatened to discharge Tilton from The Independent and The Union, and to call the police to cast him into the streets, the "True Story" proceeds:

"I informed my wife and Mr. Moulton, and afterwards Mr. Johnson, of this incident," (i. e., the incident of the quarrel between him and Mr. Bowen), "concerning which Mr. Moulton remarked that it did not surprise him in the least, and then with the joint advice of all"—

I take it, gentlemen, that that word "all" is never applied to any act concerning this conspiracy that does not include Francis D. Moulton from this time forward.—

"I determined to summon Mr. Beecher to the contemplated interview. To this end Mrs. Tilton wrote a brief note, addressed to Mr. Beecher through me."

Thus it is clear that, upon the statement in Mr. Tilton's own handwriting, prepared in December, 1873, and shown by him to numerous friends, as the very truth of the matter, that Mr. Moulton was consulted on two separate days after the 26th and before the 30th, and that it was by Moulton's advice that Mr. Tilton determined to send for Mr. Beecher. Yet they tell you, gentlemen, that the first that Mr. Moulton knew of that was when Mr. Tilton came to him on the 30th of December with this letter from Mrs. Tilton, this advice being given before Mrs. Tilton wrote her brief note, which Mr. Tilton has sworn was written on December 29th.

The Court here took a recess until two o'clock.

THE "TRUE STORY" THE BEST AUTHORITY.

The Court resumed its session at 2:15 o'clock.

Mr. Tracy.—Thus it is clear that upon the statement in Tilton's own handwriting, prepared in December, 1873, and shown by him to numerous friends as the very truth of the matter, that Mr. Moulton was consulted on two separate days after the 26th, and before the 30th, and that it was by Moulton's advice that Tilton determined to send for Beecher, this advice being given before Mrs. Tilton wrote her brief note, which Tilton has sworn was written on December 29th. What motive did Mr. Tilton have for falsifying in this respect when he drew up the "True Story?" He has a motive for falsifying now, because he has been advised by his counsel that these facts made out a clear case of conspiracy against Moulton and himself, and it is by their shrewd suggestion (but I do not intimate that it is by their advice) that both he and the mutual friend now disclaim any consultation prior to the signing by Mrs. Tilton of the abominable charge drawn up by her husband. But Tilton consulted no lawyer when he prepared the "True Story," and only inserted such falsehoods as seemed to him then to be useful. This statement was not one which could have done him any good, and it may therefore be safely assumed to be true.

MR. TILTON FORCED TO MAKE PEACE.

But whether Moulton was consulted or not, the situation was plain—Tilton could get nothing from Bowen upon which to support his threatening letter, and he had nothing from his wife which would confirm the charge which he had made to Bowen against Beecher. He had, therefore, given a rash challenge to one of the foremost men in Brooklyn without the slightest support, save his own word, backed by his own tainted reputation. There was but one thing to be done. He must make peace with Mr. Beecher. But how should he accomplish that? He had written a most insulting letter. Should he say, frankly, "Mr. Beecher, I have been mistaken. I sent you that letter under a misapprehension of facts?" Not to mention that the idea of an apology would be utterly repugnant to Tilton's self-conceit and vanity, Mr. Beecher's natural answer would have been, "How did you dare to send so insulting a letter without making inquiry as to the facts?" Moreover, what misapprehension of facts could he have alleged? If he had said, "Mr. Bowen told me such and such tales," Bowen would have denied it, and Tilton's position would have been worse than ever. If he should say, "My wife has told an evil tale about you," he well knew that his wife would deny it, unless some writing were extracted from her. It was essential that he should have an interview with Mr. Beecher, in which he should instantly satisfy the latter that he had had some reasonable pretext for writing his insolent demand, and yet should at the same moment withdraw that demand in such manner as to convince Mr. Beecher that if he should further resent this withdrawn insult there would be danger of an explosion, in which Mr. Beecher's reputation must inevitably suffer, no matter how innocent he might be. Furthermore, Tilton must so shape his case as to satisfy Mr. Beecher that the stories which the latter had circulated to some extent against Tilton were false and slanderous, and thus at one blow convince Mr. Beecher that Tilton was pure in his own morals and under an honest apprehension as to Mr. Beecher's conduct.

MR. MOULTON THE ARCH-PLOTTER.

The infernal sagacity which devised a scheme meeting all these requirements did not emanate from the excited brain of Tilton, but from the cool and calculating villainy of his friend. Mrs. Tilton was sick, having had a narrow escape from death, and greatly weakened by a severe and protracted hemorrhage. The Mephistopheles at her husband's elbow suggested to him that now was the time to get her signature to any paper which would answer the purpose. He disclosed to his wife so much of his own difficulties as sufficed to convince her of his imminent ruin. He turned out the nurse and companion; he locked the door, and kept himself for hours alone with the poor prostrate woman, and by a mixture of threats and coaxing, procured her consent to sign a letter which he proposed to write, soliciting Mr. Beecher to an interview with her husband, and pleading for peace and reconciliation. For him to substitute for such a letter a few words, and charging her pastor with having made improper solicitations to her, without describing their precise purport, was easy enough: and his poor wife, having once raised herself from the bed to sign the letter which he originally proposed, had no power to refuse to put her name below such a charge, the purport of which she but dimly comprehended, if indeed she understood it at all. All that she really knew was that she was doing something which her husband, to whom she had always rendered a slavish obedience, commanded her to do. Probably she had some indistinct idea that the natural effect of her signature was to do Mr. Beecher a wrong; but she was assured by her husband, as he tells you himself, that its real effect would be to do Mr. Beecher good, and to put an end to the conflict which had begun between her husband and her pastor. Such a letter was obtained on the 29th of December, and carried by Tilton to Moulton, who now certainly becomes one of the most important actors in this unhappy controversy.

THE CHARACTER OF THE MUTUAL FRIEND.

It is hardly necessary, gentlemen, that I should occupy much time in describing the character of Francis D. Moulton, or in explaining the motives which have actuated him throughout this controversy. He has been in your presence for ten days; you have seen and heard him. No man in this Court-room could fail to be satisfied that Moulton was a person well chosen by the plaintiff to play the desperate part required of the mutual friend. Cool, fearless, plausible, of cultured tastes, not destitute of literary ability, gifted with a quick perception of human character, of tremendous energy, and totally destitute of any belief in conscience, in immortality or in God, this man was well qualified, like his great archetype, to deceive the very elect. He has told you, under the solemnity of an oath, that he was a heathen; and by that you know what he means. Not a heathen like Socrates or Plato, not a heathen like those men of old, who walked in darkness, seeking after the light, and to whom the great poet of the Catholic Church has assigned a place in the other world, free from pain, though far from Heaven—but such a heathen as can only be found in the midst of Christian civilization; a man who despises the idea of personal responsibility; who scoffs at the idea of future accountability, who laughs in his sleeve at the credulity of those who read the solemn words of Scripture, or who listen to the instructions of the Church, and whose only idea of a God is, as a convenient name for rounding an oath or enforcing an execration. Yet it was not in this guise that he presented himself to the defendant, and he took great care not to impress you with this conception of himself in Court. Even here, when facing hundreds of men in whose eyes he read that they knew him to be an unscrupulous and hardened villain, he wore a veil of decent respectability. How much more, when he approached the most distinguished clergyman of the age, to whom he was almost a stranger, did he clothe himself as an angel of light, and, while humbly acknowledging his unconverted state, yet strive to show that he was aiming to practice the highest Christian virtues.

What was this man? What was his position in society? Upon what indorsement was he received? He was the junior member of one of the largest and most respected commercial houses in this city. They were not only the largest warehousing firm at this port, but also the principal importers of certain staple articles of commerce. The high favor in which they stood with the officers of the quarantine and of the port was a matter of public notoriety and the maintenance of friendly relations with all these officers, and with the officers of the Custom House, was a matter of the utmost concern to the firm. A slight change in the tariff would, at any time, gain or lose hundreds of thousands of dollars for them. It was, therefore, a matter of vital importance that they should be represented, as occasion arose, at Washington, at Albany, and among the local officers of both the national and State Governments, by some confidential agent, who could undertake the management of such affairs involving the most delicate and weighty considerations. You must be aware, gentlemen, that in every large concern of this kind there is invariably a junior partner, or a highly-paid confidential clerk, who undertakes the management of these interests, and concerning whose transactions no questions are ever asked. To no partnership in either of the two cities was such an agent more valuable than to the firm of which Mr. Moulton is a member. These considerations will explain some things at a glance, which otherwise might seem to you mysterious. But the confidential partner in such cases cannot do all his work with his own hands. He must be able to put his hand on some lever of public opinion. He cannot afford to go down to Washington and urge or oppose legislation without any support from the public press. To him it is a matter of life and death to be able to guide some current of public sentiment. Failing to do this, his power ceases, his usefulness is at an end, and his share in the partnership would quickly come to an end also, as Mr. Moulton's partnership in this concern did quickly come to an end when his usefulness had been destroyed.

Francis D. Moulton and Theodore Tilton had been intimate friends from boyhood; but they had been separated by circumstances for some years. The period at which Mr. Moulton was placed in charge of all these great interests of his firm appears to have been also the period when he renewed, with all or more than all its original warmth, his devoted friendship for Theodore Tilton. From this time there was no interruption and no breach. Mr. Tilton had, meanwhile, become the editor of The Independent, a paper which before his accession, was religious, but which, he has taken pains to assure you, he made secular. It was a powerful political engine. He has told you that it was one of the principal organs of the Republican party, which, during the whole period of this renewed friendship, has had exclusive control of the National Government, and for most of the time has controlled the legislation of this State. When this controversy began, Mr.

Tilton was the editor, not only of The Independent, but of another newspaper of large influence in this city, and the acknowledged local organ of the Republican party. He was also the intimate and trusted friend of Horace Greeley, the chief editorial writer of that party. No man could obtain more readily access to Mr. Greeley's ear, or introduce a friend with greater assurance of welcome, than Theodore Tilton. Through the whole term of this close union between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton, which reminds us of Damon and Pythias in the olden time, Mr. Moulton had, therefore, easy and confidential access to the principal organs of the Republican party.

WHY MR. MOULTON MADE MR. TILTON'S CASE HIS OWN.

This was the situation of the two friends at the beginning of December, 1870. We may well believe that when Mr. Moulton found his friend suddenly dethroned, and no longer a power in the land, he felt that his own fortunes were seriously imperiled. Whether Mr. Moulton was generous enough to be sincerely grateful for past favors from his friend, or whether he was among those who define gratitude as "a lively sense of favors to come," could make but little difference in the earnestness with which he naturally seeks to reinstate so powerful an ally. It is easy to see that he made the case of Mr. Tilton his own. He attacked Mr. Bowen as bitterly and even ferociously as he could have attacked his own worst personal enemy. This he states himself, and describes the scene with dramatic force.

MR. MOULTON'S GOOD FAITH WITH MR. BEECHER.

But we are asked to believe that when he was informed by Mr. Tilton that not Mr. Bowen, but Mr. Beecher, had been his worst enemy—his enemy in business, his enemy in the church, his enemy in the household—Mr. Moulton approached Mr. Beecher in a genuine spirit of friendship, and with a sincere desire to act the fair and honorable part of a strictly mutual friend. He tells us that he learned that Mr. Beecher had been guilty of one of the basest and foulest acts which any man can commit; he tells you, under the solemn oath of a man who believes in neither God nor devil, that his friendship for Mr. Beecher commenced on that stormy night when he learned for the first time, that this new friend had debauched his old friend's wife. This horrible crime, the deliberate and long-planned seduction of a trusting and reverential woman by the pastor who had given her hand to her husband in marriage, and invoked the blessing of God on their union, was the one fact which awoke in the generous breast of Mr. Moulton a new fountain of sympathy with the alleged treacherous seducer. He hastened to pledge to this man, whom he now describes as an abandoned hypocrite and libertine, "the strictest and firmest friendship." He assured him that no one among the thousands of friends who stood around this pastor with devoted affection would ever equal him in fidelity.

HOW THE FRIENDS WORKED TOGETHER.

He did all this with the knowledge and full approval of the man who claims to have been the injured husband, whose happiness had been destroyed by the new friend whom Mr. Moulton thus enthusiastically took to his bosom. And notwithstanding this pretended friendship for Mr. Beecher, which seemed gradually to ripen into an ardent affection; notwithstanding his repeated pledges and offers of support; notwithstanding his earnest assurances that Mr. Beecher should in all events be protected by him; notwithstanding the absolute confidence and high esteem, which, by his plausibility, he gained from his new-found friend, all of which was well known to Tilton as the case progressed, Mr. Tilton himself tells you, from the witness stand, that this conduct never once excited a doubt or suspicion in his mind of Mr. Moulton's unqualified fidelity to his cause, or made him for a moment think otherwise of Mr. Moulton than as his own most chivalrous and devoted ally. There never was an act of Mr. Moulton's to which Mr. Tilton did not give his assent. There never was a paper of the least importance (save one) written by Mr. Moulton which was not either dictated or approved by Tilton; and there never was a secret confided by Beecher to Moulton which he did not instantly betray to Tilton. On this point the testimony is clear and most significant. While Moulton affected to deny that Tilton had seen Mr. Beecher's letters or that he was aware of Tilton's copying them, the evidence of Tilton shows that in every case he took down shorthand notes in Moulton's presence of just so much as he thought desirable, and that in some cases these confidential communications were left in his hands by Moulton for a period long enough to have made printed copies, if Tilton had wished to do so.

And another piece of evidence to which I desire to invite your attention here, gentlemen, which Mr. Moulton had evidently forgotten in this connection, was his own letter signed by him but written by Tilton on August the 5th, you will remember, where he refuses to Mr. Beecher access to these papers, and says that he shall consult Mr. Tilton and obtain his consent to lay these papers before the Committee at his first opportunity, when Mr. Tilton was present and wrote the letter himself. That letter you will remember, gentlemen—a statement in it Mr. Moulton had evidently forgotten, for in that very letter he states that Mr. Tilton took shorthand notes from these letters as he read them to him—and yet he comes upon the stand here and swears to you deliberately that he never permitted Mr. Tilton to have a copy of this confidential correspondence, and never with his assent allowed him to have a copy; never saw him take a copy; tells you under oath that he could not have taken a copy in shorthand without his knowledge, as we all know he could not; and yet, in that very letter of August 5th, sent by Moulton to Beecher, Mr. Moulton himself says that Mr. Tilton took shorthand notes of these letters, as he read them to him. I shall have occasion to call your attention specifically to that letter. Moulton affected to give advice to both parties in the interest of both. He tells you himself that Tilton almost uniformly disregarded any advice in Beecher's interest; Beecher uniformly, even against his own judgment, followed the advice of the mutual friend. Tilton never yielded, except when it was plain to both these conspirators that his refusal would precipitate the crisis and kill the goose that laid the golden egg; and even when he did nominally yield, it was always upon condition that he should dictate the precise terms of compromise, and, if anything was to be written, that he should write it, word by word, in his own language. Then the papers thus written or dictated were carried to Beecher, without an intimation of their real authorship, and submitted to him as the production of a sincere and devoted friend. It is impossible to conceive that a professed friendship thus carried on with the approval and under the direct guidance of Mr. Beecher's most bitter and relentless enemy could have been otherwise, from beginning to end, than utterly hollow and false. It is not necessary to suppose that when this plot was originally hatched the two conspirators laid out their plans upon the gigantic scale which they afterwards assumed. They doubtless supposed, at the beginning, that the restoration of Theodore Tilton would be speedily accomplished; and it was not until his repeated failures, owing to his own amazing follies and wickedness—that extended over a period of nearly four years—that the original scheme gradually developed into the most gigantic and hideous conspiracy of modern times.

It can need no argument to satisfy you that a man who has been for years carrying on so diabolical a conspiracy as this, his movements being known at every step to the man whose cause he was really serving, could not fall himself to be involved in such a network of crime as would make it impossible for him ever to retrace his steps or to abandon his partner in guilt—no matter what might be the cost to himself of pursuing the original scheme. The descent into crime is easy, but the return from such tortuous paths of darkness is well nigh impossible. Neither of these men could for one moment afford to betray the other, even if they had no secrets apart from this case; for either to drive the other to desperation would be an act of suicidal madness.

ANOTHER BOND OF ALLIANCE BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND MR. MOULTON.

But this is not the only tie, nor even the chief tie, which binds together these two men. They have had a most significant alliance in the prosecution of new social theories. They have had most significant relations with women whose very names stain the lips that utter them. They have both held their voices in humiliating bondage, and compelled the women whom they vowed to love and to cherish to become the mere ministers to their lust. It was not Theodore Tilton who sent his wife to bring home in a carriage the most notorious preacher and practitioner of free love that the world has ever seen. This degradation was reserved for the wife of Francis D. Moulton. And it was her lips, and not the lips of Elizabeth Tilton, so far as we have yet learned, that were kissed by Victoria Woodhull. It was this woman, whose published utterances are so foul, that the learned Judge now presiding was unwilling to allow them to be read in your hearing, even as a part of the evidence in this case, who was selected by Francis D. Moulton as the honored guest of his wife, and as a fit person to be brought home in a carriage by his wife and only child. And this alliance was maintained for a year. It was maintained, if you believe Mr. Moulton, for the sake of Mr. Beecher, whom Mr. Tilton hated with all his soul; or else it was maintained, if you believe Mr. Tilton, for the sake of Mrs. Tilton, whom Moulton despised with all his heart!

MR. MOULTON COMPARED WITH JUDAS.

But no mere words can do justice to this man; none but an artist, who should paint the man as he is, can bring out his real character before mankind; and, thank heaven, gentlemen, that portrait has been painted, and by one of the greatest artists the world has ever known. If any of you ever visit the beautiful city of Milan, you will find that, next to its magnificent cathedral on which thousands of saints and angels stand carved in heavenly white, in the attitude of silent prayer, the pride and glory of that city is in the humble refectory of an ancient monastery, upon the wall of which, four hundred years ago, the illustrious Leonardo da Vinci painted his almost inspired picture of the "Last Supper"—a picture, the colors of which are too rapidly fading, but the fame of which will never die. And, gentlemen, in the most striking portrait of that group of disciples, you will recognize the startling likeness between the red matted hair, the sharp and angular face, the cold and remorseless eyes of Judas Iscariot, and the same features in his legitimate successor, the "mutual friend." [Laughter and applause.] There, on that consecrated wall, the portrait of Francis D. Moulton has stood waiting for his birth 400 years—

The noise still continuing, Judge Nelson said: "Mr. Tracy, please stop." [To the audience.] "I will adjourn this court if there is any more demonstration of that kind."

Mr. Tracy [resuming].—And will stand for twice four hundred years after this resurrected Judas shall have sunk into eternal infamy.

It was such a man that Tilton requested to become his friend in this emergency, and it was this man into whose hands he placed the letter of his wife and bade him go and invite Mr. Beecher to an interview on the night of the 30th of December.

THE SHREWD POLICY OF THE PLOTTERS.

Before he returns, gentlemen, let us inquire into the motives which impelled Tilton to seek this interview, and the object which he sought to accomplish by it. This is made clear from Tilton's own statement. On his cross-examination before the Church Committee he declares that the object of this interview was to make peace between himself and Mr. Beecher. He says: "Elizabeth saw that Mr. Bowen and I were in collision; she was afraid that the collision would extend to Mr. Beecher and she wished me, if possible, to make peace with him, therefore, she wrote a womanly, kindly letter to him. I do not," says Tilton "remember the phraseology. I remember only one phrase which was peculiarly hers. She said she loved her husband with 'her maiden flame.' She begged, as the best mode of avoiding trouble that a reconciliation might be had between Mr. Beecher and himself—that Mr. Beecher and her husband might instantly unite to prevent Mr. Bowen from doing the damage which he had threatened in instigating Mr. Beecher's retirement from the church. Mr. Tilton further said that he "resolved to accede to his wife's request, and for her sake would prevent the threatened exposure by Bowen, and for this purpose he sought the interview with Beecher." His object was peace, and peace was to be secured by his withdrawing the letter he had written to Mr. Beecher and inducing the latter to withdraw the charges which he had made against Tilton to Bowen, and through Beecher's silence not only Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Morse but his own wife from circulating the scandalous stories against himself. You will remember, gentlemen, that this wife had separated from her husband and was under the influence of her mother, where Mrs. Beecher visited her. You will remember that her child was taken from her and she thus forced to return to Mr. Tilton's house. You will remember that the next night after that return she was suddenly taken ill by a miscarriage, and was on her sick-bed at this time. The question which agitated Tilton's mind was, "What will this woman do when she recovers?" He had no strong hold upon her, and her future course was uncertain when she was again restored to health. He was bound to work while opportunity was given him, and you will see the position in which he had his wife, and how skillfully, under the advice of this mutual friend, he used it.

A NEW PURPOSE ASCRIBED TO THE PLOTTERS.

Tilton knew Beecher well, and we shall show you, gentlemen, that he has often declared that the surest way of securing Mr. Beecher's aid was to accuse him of having wronged you. Once convince him that he has done you an injury, and there is nothing you can ask that he will not do to repair the wrong.

They determined to approach him in this manner, and to convince him that the stories he had heard, as well as those he had circulated, against Tilton were false and slanderous. They knew that if they could convict him in his own conscience of having slandered Tilton, he would make haste to atone for the injustice. To do this they must destroy his confidence in Mr. Tilton's accuser. That accuser was Tilton's own wife. They knew Mr. Beecher's confidence in her truthfulness and to impair that confidence was a difficult task. There was only one way in which this could be done beyond a possibility of a doubt. To obtain from her a mere retraction of her charges against her husband would not suffice, for Mr. Beecher would easily suspect that she had done this either from affection or from fear. But if she could be by any means brought to make an accusation against Beecher himself, then he and Tilton would stand on the same ground, both accused by the same woman; and Beecher, knowing the accusation against himself to be false, could no longer place the slightest confidence in the charges which she had made against her husband. They knew, moreover, how reluctant he would be to attack, even in his own defense, a woman who had long been in relations of friendship and sympathy with him, and who was now lying upon her sick bed. They knew that he would rather be sacrificed himself than save his own reputation by making war upon her. This suggestion was the suggestion of the Devil; and it was now being carried out with a skill, an audacity and a heartlessness worthy of its author.

We have seen how Mrs. Tilton had been controlled and entrapped into signing an accusation ingeniously framed so as to be especially disastrous to the reputation of her pastor. Thus far the scheme had been successful, and it only remained to carry it through in such a manner as to convince Beecher that Mrs. Tilton had voluntarily made this accusation, and the success of the plan would be complete. Thus, with these ideas seething in his mind, Tilton sat awaiting Beecher's arrival, conscious that unless this desperate plan of himself and his friend succeeded he was a ruined man. Meanwhile Moulton had gone down to Beecher's house, and with an air of politeness but of great earnestness, had requested Mr. Beecher to come to his house to hold an interview with Theodore Tilton. Mr. Beecher naturally guessed that this proposed interview had some bearing upon the letter which he had recently received from Tilton, and the motive of which was an utter mystery to him. Sending for Mr. Bell to take charge of his meeting, he went with Moulton, and on the way inquired what was the object of the interview, to which Moulton replied that he had better let Tilton tell it himself.

MR. MOULTON'S CONDUCT TOWARDS MR. BEECHER.

While they were on the road an incident occurred, according to Moulton's account of the affair, which will justify a short digression from the main subject. He tells you that having learned that very evening for the first time that Beecher, the pastor of his own wife, had most infamously debauched the wife of Moulton's most intimate friend, that circumstance impelled him, for the first time in his life, to proffer to Beecher a lifelong friendship of his own accord. Without a hint from Beecher of his own desire for such services, Moulton said to him, "I am not a Christian, I am a heathen; but, if you wish, I will show you how well a heathen can serve you." And from that moment there sprang up the strictest and firmest friendship (so he says) between himself and the man whom he now describes, and whom he must then have known as a libertine. He assures you that for four years after that time he strove day and night to serve and save the man whom he now denounces with such intense bitterness, and who, according to his own account, has added not one whit to his sins since that time, except that there came a time when he refused any longer to follow Moulton's lead in this matter. That is the only crime which has changed the friend, for whom Moulton would sacrifice so much to save, into the enemy he now hates and would do so much to destroy. Mr. Moulton has been at some pains to explain to the public his motives in offering and maintaining this friendship. It seems that it was the peace of families, the interests of Plymouth Church, the cause of Christianity, which moved this heathen to undertake the task of maintaining in the first pulpit of America the man who, if what Moulton now says of him be true, deserves to have his name a by-word and a hissing among men. To preserve the peace of families Mr. Moulton was willing to introduce a man, whom he now says was a practiced seducer, into his own household, to recommend him to the confidence of his own wife, to place his own child under his teachings, to invite him to his own table, to leave him in a bedroom with his own wife for four hours, listening with complicity to her narrative of the manner in which she had affectionately tucked him up on the sofa, and kissed him on the forehead, the tears of sympathy streaming down her cheeks! To protect the interests of Plymouth Church, an institution which he now hates with a bitter hatred, because it still believes what he originally said of its pastor! He was anxious to deceive that church into accepting the ministrations of a man whom he now characterizes as a wolf in the fold, and rejoiced in seeing this man continue to preach the doctrines of Christianity from that pulpit! To promote the interests of that Christianity in which he did not believe, and to honor that God, whose name he never used except as a by-word, he tells you now, that he told hundreds of lies, that he invented all manner of schemes, that he belied some men, that he coaxed others, that he made his own wife the associate and companion of prostitutes, and divided her lips between his own kiss and the kiss of Victoria Woodhull—all this and more he was willing to do in behalf of these great interests, which, if his story be true, could only have been truly served from the first moment by casting out the alleged criminal from his place of trust and protecting innocent families from the wiles and intrigues of a seducer.

But when the time came that Mr. Moulton's interests were touched, when he thought that his good name, such as it was, was to be injured, a name which he had not hesitated to defile by contact with sinks of infamy, his regard for the peace of families, for the interests of Plymouth Church and for the cause of Christianity suddenly vanished, and he devoted himself with blind fury and with a single aim to the gratification of revenge.

A BITTER SATIRE ON MR. MOULTON'S CONDUCT.

But, gentlemen, you must not allow yourselves, for a moment, to imagine that Mr. Moulton, who told hundreds of lies for the sake of the Christianity in which he did not believe, will now tell a single falsehood for the sake of himself! You must not imagine that the man who would gladly associate with prostitutes, and take pleasure in seeing them kiss his wife, all for the sake of the honor of the Church and the good of society, would dream of associating with prostitutes for his own pleasure. Oh, no! When Francis D. Moulton steps upon this witness stand, and seeing the man for whom he acknowledges a deadly hate sitting before him, takes an oath upon the Gospels which he never reads, and in the name of a God whose existence is to him a jest, he suddenly becomes absolutely truthful, and demands of you with unhesitating confidence that you shall not doubt a single word that he utters!

THE INTERVIEW OF DECEMBER 30.

But to return now to the interview to which Mr. Moulton introduces Mr. Beecher on this stormy Winter's night. I desire to call your attention in this connection, gentlemen, to a fact which Mr. Moulton states in his evidence; and I desire to refer you to the unconscious testimony which the action of both of these parties, according to the evidence of Mr. Tilton, furnishes of the innocence of Mr. Beecher. Mr. Moulton tells you that, on his way to his own house, he told Mr. Beecher of the stories and slanders which Bowen had reported against him in the interview of the 26th of December. You will remember the language that he makes Mr. Beecher use on that occasion. He says: "Did he? I am surprised at that; for Bowen said nothing to me of that kind." It was evidently, according to Mr. Moulton's testimony, the first that Mr. Beecher had heard that Mr. Bowen had been guilty of slandering him at that interview. When he is introduced into the presence of Mr. Tilton, I desire to call your attention to Mr. Tilton's evidence of what occurred. Mr. Tilton says the first thing he said to Mr. Beecher was: "You received a letter from me, I suppose." Mr. Beecher says: "I did. I wish you to consider that letter withdrawn, as if it was never written." "Then," says Mr. Tilton, "I introduced the name of Elizabeth, and began to state to him what I had learned from Elizabeth. At that instant," says Mr. Tilton, "Mr. Beecher interrupted me and said:" "But what about the stories that Mr. Bowen told you concerning me on the 26th?" And Mr. Tilton says: "Since you ask it, I will tell you," and stopped his narrative and went on to repeat to Mr. Beecher the accusations which Mr. Bowen had made against him. Now, gentlemen, I desire you to consider, if Mr. Beecher was conscious up to that moment that he was confronting an injured husband who was about to accuse him of having seduced his wife, do you think he would have interrupted the husband in that accusation by a reference to the mere slanders of Bowen, saying, "Tell me first about what Bowen said about me?" Do you think that if this great clergyman was conscious that he was to be assailed on that evening with such a charge as that, that that would not have been the one thing that would have absorbed all his attention, and that the questions of the mere slanders that Bowen had uttered against him a week before would not have made any impression on his mind? The very fact that he interrupted Mr. Tilton at this stage of the case as soon as he had introduced the name of Elizabeth shows you, gentlemen, that Mr. Beecher was thinking of nothing at that time except the information which he had just, for the first time, received from Mr. Moulton on the way to his house, to wit, that Bowen had been uttering slanders against him in this interview on the 26th. It is an unconscious piece of testimony that in my judgment outweighs the mere assertions of any number of men who are interested here in producing upon your minds a particular impression. It is the act of the parties. It shows how they felt and how they acted on this occasion.

NOTHING CONSISTENT WITH THE CRIME CHARGED.

And right here, gentlemen, in approaching the discussion of the question, permit me to say that this case is peculiar in this respect: all the acts of all these parties, from the time that this charge was first intimated down to the time that Theodore Tilton made his charge of adultery before the Church Committee, have been inconsistent with the crime of adultery. From the beginning to the end of it, strike it where you will, where you find one of these parties performing an act, that act is utterly inconsistent with the existence of adultery. Their whole evidence against Mr. Beecher here consists of words, of language which they say he has uttered from time to time. But the acts of Mr. Tilton on the night of the 30th of December; his whole conduct from July up to that time, the conduct of Mr. Beecher, the conduct of Mr. Moulton, the conduct of all of them combined, the acts of them, wherever you strike an act, are inconsistent with the charge of adultery. This accusation, I repeat, rests entirely upon words and upon nothing else.

THE CHARGE MADE ON DECEMBER 30.

Now, what was the charge which Tilton made against Mr. Beecher on that night? This is the most important question in this inquiry, gentlemen, and to it I now invite your serious attention; because if we satisfy you that on that night Mr. Tilton did not charge Mr. Beecher with the crime of adultery, you will consider this case disposed of. You will not listen to any charge subsequently invented of a graver offense than that which was brought to Mr. Beecher's attention on that night. They are bound by that act; they cannot charge that interview as one of their devices by which they have been induced to lie to conceal this crime. They brought Mr. Beecher into their presence to make the accusation, and by the accusation there made they must stand or fall. You will not permit them to charge it. I intend to hold them there, and I intend to demonstrate to your understandings as clear as the noonday sun in Heaven, that that charge was not adultery.

In the first place, gentlemen, Tilton's conduct from July to December had been utterly inconsistent with the existence of this pretended knowledge. He says, and asks you to believe now, that all he knew on that night he had known for six months, and yet it had not even ruffled the temper of Theodore Tilton. There was not even a domestic jar in the family arising on account of this information. Theodore Tilton was then editor of The Independent and of The Brooklyn Union. He was a prosperous man, doing well, and you never hear Hissed a word from Theodore Tilton in regard to the existence of this charge until December, when, as he himself says, he fell into business troubles with Henry C. Bowen, which, to use the language of his sworn statement, were augmented by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and his wife; wherefore, says Mr. Tilton in his sworn statement: "At the instance of my wife, Elizabeth, who wrote a letter to Mr. Beecher, I sought an interview with him." Until business troubles came upon Mr. Tilton there was no suggestion of offense against him by Henry Ward Beecher. It was only when he found that his wife had left him, that Mrs. Morse, as he says, was insisting she should not return to him, that Mrs. Beecher was engaged in consultation with Mrs. Morse, that Henry Ward Beecher was also engaged in consultation with that wife and giving her advice, when he found also that Mr. Beecher was crediting the stories that were in circulation against him, and when he found himself liable to be dismissed from the employ of Henry C. Bowen, his position of influence and his means of support taken away from him, then it was that he conceived the idea, on the 27th day of December, of entering into this conspiracy with Henry C. Bowen to make a scandalous charge against Henry Ward Beecher, and thus drive him from Brooklyn. I start there with Mr. Tilton. I say that, from his own showing, if he is to be believed, if what he says transpired at the interview between himself and Henry C. Bowen, if they did there concoct these scandalous matters and sent that letter to Henry Ward Beecher for the purpose of intimidating him and driving him out of Brooklyn at the peril of undergoing a grave investigation for scandal, then he is tainted as a conspirator against Beecher, and stands as a conspirator from that day to this. That conspiracy is formed, and the only question there is about it is, when did Mr. Moulton enter that conspiracy. Now, we say that charge was not the charge of adultery. We say it is not possible that if Theodore Tilton is made of the flesh and blood that other men are made of—it is not possible he carried that terrible secret in his breast for six months. If he had known what he professes to have known, there would have been nothing left of Theodore Tilton but his skeleton to have confronted Henry Ward Beecher on that terrible night in December. I do not believe that any man can carry locked within his bosom any such terrible secret as that and remain undisturbed. But it had not disturbed Tilton. On that night he stood six feet two in his stockings, fat, sleek and happy, meeting Mr. Beecher and negotiating with him on a business matter, and bringing before him accusations which Beecher had made affecting the business of Tilton, and winding up with an accusation that his wife had confessed an undue affection for him, and had charged him with having attempted her virtue. That the charge was not adultery, gentlemen, is proved from the fact that on the 26th he had stated his accusation against Beecher to Bowen, and it was not a charge of adultery, but it was a charge of improper advances, or unhandsome advances. He tells you that he had made that same accusation against Beecher to Moulton on the same day.

Now, these are the two first occasions in the history of this case where we find that Tilton is giving public utterance to these accusations, and those utterances consist of a charge of improper proposals and not of adultery. Would he have dared, after having said to Henry C. Bowen that Mr. Beecher was guilty of improper advances on the 26th, and to Moulton at the same time, to turn around and charge Henry Ward Beecher with the crime of adultery on the 30th? Here he had got three witnesses to confront him and prove the falsehood of that charge if he made it—Bowen, Oliver Johnson, who was present, and Francis D. Moulton. In the presence of three men he had said four days before that that charge was a charge of improper advances. Would he have dared to have done that in the face of that evidence—turn suddenly about, and but four days afterwards, I repeat, charge adultery upon Henry Ward Beecher? But we shall not stop there, gentlemen, with this case. We shall show you that Mr. Tilton has stated to not less than five different people of the highest respectability of any persons in this city, men whose reputation stands unquestioned, in narrating that interview which took place between himself and Henry Ward Beecher that night—we shall show you that he said that he charged Henry Ward Beecher with improper proposals, and nothing else. We shall show you that to one of these persons he made that declaration within a week after the interview occurred. It is a man of the highest character, whom most of you will know, when he is presented on the witness stand. It was a man who had been one of the intimate friends of Theodore Tilton, and Theodore Tilton, in relating to him his difficulties between himself and Mr. Beecher, charged Mr. Beecher in that interview with being the cause of his overthrow with Bowen. He said that he had got him turned out there; he and his wife and Mrs. Morse were responsible for the loss of place and position, which he had suffered; and then he told him that Henry Ward Beecher had been guilty of improper proposals to his wife, and that he had sent for him on this evening of the 30th, at Moulton's house, and charged him with it face to face. And we shall show you further, gentlemen, that he told this person that Henry Ward Beecher denied it, and when he denied it he told him: "If you don't believe that Elizabeth has made this charge, go and see her for yourself," and Beecher went.

We shall show you that, I say, by not less than five different persons, to whom Mr. Tilton has given that narration. But we shall show you more, gentlemen; we have shown you more. We have shown you that that is the truth from the written testimony of Theodore Tilton himself.

THE TRUE STORY A GODSEND TO MR. BEECHER.

I refer now again to the "True Story," and here let me say again that the resurrection of this part of that "True Story" is almost a providential occurrence in favor of this defendant. Last August, when he was compelled by this attack to make a public statement before his Committee, when every paper connected with this transaction he had deposited in the hands of this mutual friend, who had refused to allow him access to one of them, and he was compelled to draw simply upon his own memory for this occurrence, without being able to corroborate it by a single written paper, he gave the interview that occurred between himself and Theodore Tilton on that occasion, and he stated it substantially as Theodore Tilton had written it down in this "True Story" in 1872. Mr. Beecher says: "In that interview, as Tilton went on with his accusation, I grew indignant, and was about to interrupt him, and he, seeing that I was about to interrupt him, stopped me and said: 'Wait until I get through;' and when he finished he said to me: 'If you have any doubt that Elizabeth has said this, go and see for yourself.'" "

The precise story that he told these individuals. Now, Mr. Tilton tells you that Mr. Beecher humbly asked his permission to go and see Mrs. Tilton at the conclusion of this accusation, and that he granted him permission under certain injunctions. We shall show you that Mr. Beecher rejected his allegation that Mrs. Tilton ever made such an accusation, and he had not the paper with him, and, gentlemen, he durst not show it if he had. He never showed this paper to Henry Ward Beecher, and he was obliged therefore to send him to Mrs. Tilton—another fact that will strike you as remarkable, gentlemen.

MRS. TILTON'S LETTER OF CHARGES NEVER SEEN BY MR. BEECHER.

The basis of this interview was a letter obtained from Mrs. Tilton, mark you. That was the pretext under which it was obtained from Mrs. Tilton, but it was never used for that purpose. Never forget that fact, gentlemen, in your consideration of this case, that when such a letter was needed to bring about an interview with Henry Ward Beecher, the pretense was made to this sick and almost dying woman that it was to rescue her husband from difficulty, from business troubles and business embarrassments, but that letter was never shown to Henry Ward Beecher; never to this day has he seen it. It was only a pretext by which they imposed upon this feeble woman. But beyond that, gentlemen, what was in that letter?

THE LETTER OF CHARGES THE KEYSTONE OF THE PLAINTIFF'S CASE.

Was that letter a confession of adultery as they now say it was, or was it what she says it was in that letter that they induced her to sign to Dr. Storrs, a charge of improper proposals? That is the vital question in this case. It is the most important question that you have to consider. Upon it very much of this case hinges. Certainly, so far as the plaintiff's case is concerned it turns entirely upon this question. If I can satisfy you, gentlemen, that that letter did not contain a charge of adultery, then, of course, the plaintiff's case ends. Why don't they produce that letter. If they would produce it it would end the question of fact involved in this issue on this point, wouldn't it? There would be no room for discussion, no room for argument. It would settle this question one way or the other, and it would tell you who was falsifying here and who was telling the truth. They only need to produce that letter to determine this whole question. Where is it? Why don't they produce it. They had it. They promised to keep it, secretly, on the evening when Francis D. Moulton obtained that retraction from Henry Ward Beecher. Their failure to produce it now is the most outrageous breach of faith I ever knew to characterize a litigant in a court of justice.

Henry Ward Beecher had gone from this interview at Moulton's house to this sick wife, and he there confronted her with the accusations which he had received from her husband. She hardly knew what she had made. She knew that she had given a letter to her husband, but whether she had a faint, glimmering conception of the charge, or whether she took it for granted that she had charged Mr. Beecher as her husband had told Mr. Beecher she had charged him, we do not know. We only know that now she has no knowledge or conception of what was in that letter, but when confronted with the friend that she had injured, when she found the use that was being made of it, when she found it was being perverted, she gave a retraction of that charge to her friend and pastor that night in the following language:

DECEMBER 30, 1870.

Wearied by importunity and weakened by sickness, I gave a letter inculcating my friend Henry Ward Beecher, under assurances that that would remove all difficulties between me and my husband. That letter I now revoke. I was persuaded to it—almost forced—when I was in a weakened state of mind. I regret it, and recall all its statements.

(Signed)

E. R. TILTON.

I desire to say explicitly, Mr. Beecher has never offered any improper solicitations, but has always treated me in a manner becoming a Christian and a gentleman.

(Signed)

ELIZABETH R. TILTON.

Now, gentlemen, that retraction itself furnishes conclusive evidence of the nature of the charge which Mr. Tilton made to Mr. Beecher. You see that he does not retract a charge of adultery. There is no allusion to the offense of adultery in this retraction at all. It is a retraction of improper solicitations. Do you believe, gentlemen, that if the charge had been one of adultery against Henry Ward Beecher that night, he would have gone down to the sick woman and contented himself with a charge simply of improper solicitations? Don't you think that the retraction would have been as broad as the charge? Would he have been satisfied with anything less? But how happens it, gentlemen, if the charge was adultery, and nothing had been said about improper solicitations—how happens it that you find those words, "improper solicitations" in the language of one of these parties on that very evening? But there is more than that in this retraction which indicates the nature of the charge. You will see that the first letter, written and signed by Mrs. Tilton, makes no reference at all to the nature of the charge. When that is discovered she immediately adds a postscript to it, covering the charge which she understood to be made by her husband. Can you have more conclusive evidence furnished you of the nature of the charge which Theodore Tilton then made than this furnishes? I apprehend not.

OTHER CONTRADICTIONS IN MR. TILTON'S STATEMENTS.

Mr. Beecher takes this retraction, returns to Moulton's house, and does not see him again that night; and here, gentlemen, is a slight contradiction of Mr. Tilton, to which I desire to call your attention, to show you that even he, with all his effort to be accurate, is unable to state this transaction twice alike. It is now conceded that he did not see Mr. Beecher on that night after Beecher left him at Moulton's house. That is agreed by both Tilton and Moulton; and yet, gentlemen, in the statement before the Committee he says: "Beecher returned, expressed remorse and shame, and declared his life and works seemed brought to a sudden end." And he swore to that statement before the Committee. Now he concedes that that is false; that he did not see Beecher at all that night after he left him at Moulton's house to go to his own house to see his wife. How are you to trust Mr. Tilton's evidence in the midst of so many contradictions? And that was not a hasty statement, gentlemen. It is in evidence here before you, that Theodore Tilton took ten days to prepare that statement. He had all that time, therefore, to make himself entirely accurate. He had access to all the papers. He had no difficulty in fortifying his memory and speaking correctly upon these subjects, yet in that statement he deliberately says that Mr. Beecher returned to his house and used language which implied a confession of guilt, and he put it in that statement for that purpose, so that when it was read by the great public as it was published in the newspapers, they would see that Beecher returned to Tilton that night and used language which virtually amounted to a confession of the offense. Yet Tilton is now bound to tell you, and Moulton tells you, that he did not see Tilton at all; and therefore this statement is entirely untrue. Nor did he say anything of the kind to Moulton; that is not pretended. Now, on this trial, as the evidence stands, it is not claimed that any such expression was made by Beecher to either Moulton or Tilton on that night. Now, gentlemen, after Mr. Tilton goes home that night, thinking probably there was something strange that Mr. Beecher had not called on him again, he wants to know what had transpired between himself and wife.

And I come now to another contradiction of Mr. Tilton in his sworn statement. He says in that statement that he found his wife weeping and almost distracted at the situation in which she had involved herself by the charge and by its retraction. We shall show you, gentlemen, that he found his wife sound asleep that night, on his return, enjoying the only moment of happiness that she knew for several long years, when she was wrapped in sleep. She was in bed with her nurse, and Theodore Tilton entered that room, awoke his wife, entered into a conversation with her and that conversation awoke the nurse, she finding Mrs. Tilton sitting up in bed, and terribly agitated. And then Mr. Tilton drove the nurse out of the room, locked the door, and the nurse went into an adjoining room with a blanket wrapped around her shoulders, and sat there for a long time, while she listened to Tilton's loud and angry conversation with his wife. Finally he came out into the room and got pen and ink and paper, and went back, and produced the next day this explanation of his wife of the retraction which she had given to Mr. Beecher. But you see, gentlemen, the situation in which this retraction had involved Mr. Tilton. He had made the charge, in the first instance, supposing that Mr. Bowen was to back it; so he says. Failing in that, he had obtained from his wife in some manner a letter which he said inculpated Mr. Beecher; and, backed by that, he confronted Mr. Beecher and made the accusation; but he sends Mr. Beecher to his wife for the verification, and she retracts. Not only that, gentlemen; she does more: she makes a statement which, in effect, charges her husband with having extorted that paper from her, and Mr. Tilton, therefore, found himself, on his return that night, robbed of his evidence against Mr. Beecher, but he found that Mr. Beecher had in his possession the written statement of his wife which virtually accused him of having extorted that charge from her. What was his situation then? He was in the absolute power of Henry Ward Beecher. All Mr. Beecher had to do to crush him from existence was to publish the fact, first, of the letter of the 30th, and, then, how he extorted from his wife this charge against him on the 30th, and then publish the wife's own handwriting, saying that that charge was false and was extorted from her, when upon a sick bed, by her husband. Mr. Beecher, I repeat, had him absolutely in his power. He had nothing to do but to establish the facts to absolutely crush him. Theodore Tilton and his wise friend saw this situation. We shall show you that Mr. Tilton fully appreciated it on his return to that house that night. They must get that retraction; they must get it out of the hands of Henry Ward Beecher. And how were they to do it? They got the explanation that night, which is a mere explanation, as I shall have reason to show you in a moment. But that was not sufficient. When he came to consult his adviser the next morning he told him that Mr. Beecher probably would not surrender that retraction at his request; that they had got to have the request of Elizabeth Tilton, the one who gave it to Mr. Beecher to induce him to surrender it. And so they go to this sick woman again and get from her another paper, which is addressed to Moulton, the "Mutual Friend," and which I will read in this connection:

MY DEAR FRANK :

[This is "Saturday morning," without other date.]

I want you to do me the greatest possible favor. My letter which you have, and the one I gave Mr. Beecher at his dictation last evening, ought both to be destroyed. Please bring both to me and I will burn them.

Show this to Theodore and Mr. Beecher. They will see the propriety of this request.
E. R. TILTON.

That was the paper which they saw that they must get from Mrs. Tilton to procure this retraction, and they obtained it, and on the next night Moulton goes to Beecher armed with this paper and asks for this retraction. He shows him that letter, and Mr. Beecher objects to surrendering it. He says: "If I shall die, what shall my family have to protect their name and mine after I am gone? Supposing this charge is renewed, if I surrender this paper what is to protect my fame hereafter?" Moulton says: "You give it to me, and I pledge to you my word of honor I will do one of two things; I will either destroy both the accusation and this retraction, here, in your presence, or I will keep both together, so that one never shall appear without the other." He gave Mr. Beecher his choice, and Mr. Beecher says: "I don't want the retraction destroyed; keep them both." That was the promise on which he obtained from Mr. Beecher this retraction.

I repeat now, gentlemen, with more significance, I trust, than I did when I first alluded to the subject, where is that letter? Why has it been destroyed? Why have these parties broken the solemn pledge under which they obtained from the hands of Henry Ward Beecher this evidence of his innocence? If that letter could be produced to-day, we say it would satisfy you that the charge there made was not a charge of adultery, but a charge of improper proposals, just as the retraction says

It was. We say, put the letter and the retraction together and they both fit each other and cover the case.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE DESTRUCTION OF THE PAPER.

Why have they destroyed it? Why is this, the most important paper in the case, missing, when every other paper that sheds a particle of light upon the case has been carefully preserved by this painstaking and laborious "mutual friend?" There is not a scrap of paper or writing from Mr. Beecher, which could throw the slightest light upon this case, but that they have preserved and garnered up with a care that indicates that they consider it worth many times its weight in gold, more precious to them than diamonds. Every one of these letters can be construed by their oral statement into an accusation or confession of guilt. Why is the one paper the one thing that would have settled this case, missing here? Do they pretend that they destroyed it with the knowledge and consent of Henry Ward Beecher? No! Was he consulted about it? No. Did he assent to it? No. They say they destroyed it. They tell you they destroyed it after the "tripartite agreement." Where is the logic, gentlemen, of taking out this one single paper and destroying that, and preserving all the others? If the "tripartite agreement" had been intended to be executed by them in the good faith in which it professed to have been made, and to be a final settlement of all this difficulty, then I concede to you that there would have been logic and reason and propriety in the destruction of all the papers that bore upon this case. But why the destruction of this one single paper? Why the picking out of this scrap from Moulton's archives and consigning this to the flames, when they husbanded all the others. I will tell you why, gentlemen. We will show you that this paper could not have been destroyed, if it has been destroyed at all, until the conspiracy was hatched between Theodore Tilton and Victoria Woodhull to charge Henry Ward Beecher with adultery, and then the destruction of this paper became absolutely necessary to the scheme. They could not live a moment with that paper in existence. It would blast every man and woman that would have connected himself or herself with the scheme. He only had to produce it to convince every man in the community of the conspiracy. No, destruction, therefore, became imperative, an absolute necessity, and it was never destroyed, if it has been destroyed to this day (which we do not believe, and which you have no evidence of but Theodore Tilton's), until after they had perfected that conspiracy.

A QUICK END OF THE CASE PROMISED.

Now, gentlemen, we shall show you by a witness as who has no superior for integrity in the city, a man whose word will stand unquestioned by you, a man who was one of Theodore Tilton's most intimate friends when his course entitled him to the friendship of honorable men; we shall show you that after the publication of the Woodhull scandal Mr. Tilton showed to this man the identical paper that he said he had presented to

Henry Ward Beecher on the night of the 31st of December. They say it was destroyed immediately after the "tripartite agreement." We will show you, I repeat, that he produced it to a man, and read it, and said: "This is the paper that I presented to Henry Ward Beecher on that night;" and when that man, looking at the paper, says: "Is that in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting," he says: "No, it is a copy, but the original is with Frank Moulton." And that was after the Woodhull publication. Now, gentlemen, if we show you that fact, I think that will end this case, and reveal this conspiracy in a light so plain that even "He who runs may read."

A REMARKABLE INSTANCE OF BAD MEMORY.

But to show you, gentlemen, how unworthy of credit are the witnesses on the part of the plaintiff, I need call to your attention but a single instance in the testimony of Francis D. Moulton. It is concerning the letter which they obtained from Mrs. Tilton on Saturday morning, the 31st of December, and on which they sought the return of this retraction from Mr. Beecher. Now, gentlemen, if there is any one fact in this case which must have made its impression upon the minds of these two witnesses, it is that night of the 30th of December and the ensuing day. No event in the life of Theodore Tilton ever compared with it in importance. The bringing of any accusation against a man so eminent as Henry Ward Beecher, possessing the confidence of the public as he did, whose name and fame had encircled the earth—the bringing of any accusation which involved moral turpitude against him—was a most important act. Mr. Tilton must have appreciated the consequences of it, as did his friend Francis D. Moulton from the start, because you see he began to make memoranda at once. Now, they found themselves completely flanked by Mr. Beecher obtaining this letter of retraction from the wife on the night of the 30th of December. Never was disorganization and dismay sent into the camp of an army more perfect and absolute than the dismay and disorganization which struck Francis D. Moulton and Theodore Tilton on the night of obtaining this retraction from Mrs. Tilton. They went to get a letter from Mrs. Tilton; they obtained it; and yet when we ask Mr. Moulton how this letter was obtained, he is utterly unable to tell you. It is the most remarkable instance of want of memory that I have ever seen in my experience in the trial of causes. He says in the first place, as you remember, gentlemen, that he thinks he went to the house and asked Mrs. Tilton for it, and he thinks he went into the sick room and saw her; but he doesn't know. He thinks she wrote it there, but he doesn't know. He doesn't know whether her husband accompanied him to the house or not. He doesn't know whether the husband accompanied him into the sick room or not. Finally, he doesn't know whether he was in the house at all, or in the sick room at all. He has no recollection of seeing her writing the letter at all; and finally, he doesn't know but he got the letter from the hands of Theodore Tilton himself. Now, I will read you the evidence on this subject. Upon his direct examination he says to Mr. Fullerton:

Q. How did you receive that note—from whom? A. I think from Elizabeth Tilton direct.

Mr. Porter—From her? A. From her directly.

Mr. Swarts—Not personally—at her house? A. Yes, Sir. Q. Did you see Mrs. Tilton? A. I think I did; yes, Sir. My recollection is that I went to the house and saw Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Where did you see her? A. In her room, I think, Sir.

Q. In her room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Sick room? A. Yes, Sir; I don't know whether it was a sick room or not, I saw her.

Mr. Shearman here suggested to Mr. Tracy that he was reading from the cross-examination of the witness.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, I thank you for the correction. Gentlemen, I am now reading from the cross-examination. The first question I read was on the direct, but I am now reading from the cross-examination. He had not any difficulty on the direct examination in answering where he got the letter, but on the cross-examination you see how his memory fails him. The last three questions that I read to you were on the cross-examination.

[Reading]: Q. Was she in bed or not? A. I do not remember.

Now, gentlemen, perhaps you will believe that a man who went to a house to see a lady to obtain so important a paper as that, and went into her room and got the letter from her in that room, would not remember whether she was in bed or not when he went in. You may believe that, but I do not think you will.

Q. Was her husband with you? A. I do not remember that he was.

Q. Do you remember that he was not? A. I don't remember that he was not.

Q. Did he go to the house with you? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Do you know how you went to that house? A. If I went to the house I rode.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton ride with you? A. I don't think he did.

Q. Do you remember that he did not? A. To the best—the best of my recollection is that he did not.

Q. Was he in the house when you went there? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Whether he was or not? A. No.

Q. From the time you went in until the time you came away, you don't recollect of seeing Mr. Tilton there? A. I do not.

Q. And don't know that he was there? A. Don't recollect that he was.

Q. Or that he was not? A. Don't recollect that he was there.

Q. Well, do you recollect that he was not? A. I don't recollect that he was there.

Q. Was that letter written in your presence? A. Don't recollect whether it was or not.

Now, gentlemen, we have shown you that Mrs. Tilton was sick that night and that day. This explanation, which I will read to you in a moment, shows that she was sick in bed, and we shall show you she was sick in bed on that occasion. She had been attended by her physician every day, from the 24th until the 30th. And yet this man, who went there to obtain this letter, don't know whether she was in bed or not when he went into her room; and he don't remember the fact of whether that letter was written in his presence. Now, it is not so important, gentlemen, where Mr. Moulton obtained this letter; it is not very important, except as it characterizes his conduct, whether he got it at the house by Theodore Tilton going up into the room and getting the wife to write it and bring it to him, or whether he went into the room and waited for her to write the letter. But it is important for you to know whether this witness is telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; or whether he is equivocating, whether he is saying he don't remember when you know he does remember; and, if you believe that he says he does not remember a fact when he does remember it, that discredits his testimony utterly and thoroughly, and you are not permitted to give any credit to it.

Q. From whose hand did you receive the letter? A. I think I received it from the hand of Elizabeth Tilton.

Now, gentlemen, there is a scrap torn off here from my notes; but the next answer he makes is—he is asked:

Can you say you did not receive it from the hand of Theodore Tilton?

And he says:

I cannot say but I did receive it from the hand of Theodore Tilton.

MR. MOULTON EQUALLY A CONSPIRATOR WITH MR. TILTON.

Now, gentlemen, there is another fact in this connection to which I desire to call your attention, which goes to show the good faith or the honest purpose of Francis D. Moulton. You remember that he told you he is the friend, and has been the intimate friend, of Theodore Tilton from boyhood. He says he learned on this night that his friend's wife had been debauched by Mr. Beecher, and he had consulted him in regard to that matter as a friend. The question we are now considering is whether Moulton is a conspirator with Tilton against Henry Ward Beecher. Having been consulted by his most intimate friend, and having pledged him his friendship in this transaction, he goes down to Henry Ward Beecher and invites Mr. Beecher up to this interview; and he tells you, gentlemen, that before Mr. Beecher reached his house he pledged his friendship and fidelity to Henry Ward Beecher in this same matter. Now, that he was the sincere friend of Mr. Tilton you know, nobody will doubt that. Was he the friend of Henry Ward Beecher, and was he actuated by good faith when he made that promise? That is the only question for you to consider here in order to determine the character in which Mr. Moulton stands in this case. If you believe that assurance to Mr. Beecher was made in bad faith for the purpose of getting his confidence, the better to enable him to perpetrate the scheme and get this paper from him, that makes him a conspirator with Theodore Tilton in this transaction. But, further, gentlemen, he goes back to Henry Ward Beecher on the morning of the 31st, and requests the return to the retraction. Presenting a letter of Mrs. Tilton, he obtains the retraction and goes away. Now, he knew at that time that he obtained this retraction by presenting this letter of Mrs. Tilton. Yet, when the matter is first published by the Woodhulls, it is published by them in this way: Mr. Tilton is represented as saying: "My friend took a pistol, went to Mr. Beecher, and demanded the letter of Mrs. T., under the pain

Has that concealment been made in good faith? or has it been one of the tricks of these parties, like the garbling of Mrs. Tilton's letter, for the purpose of creating public opinion against Henry Ward Beecher. Why did they not publish, when they published anything, the simple fact that they took this letter of Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Beecher, requesting the return of this retraction, and upon that he surrendered it? That would have been the simple truth, would have told the story truthfully; but they would not have accomplished the object they had in view.

Now, another thing, the reason of that was asked Mr. Moulton upon the witness stand. He was asked to explain that, and what does he say? He says he had absolutely forgotten the existence of this paper. Forgotten the existence of such an important paper as this! In the face of the Woodhull scandal, even the existence of this paper had not occurred to him! "But you learned it somewhere, Mr. Moulton?" "Yes, Sir." "You published it in one of your statements, Mr. Moulton?" "Yes, Sir." "Did you there publish it in connection with the surrender of the retraction of the accusation, or the surrender of the retraction?" No; he did not, and he is compelled to say he did not. Now, every publication which he makes in which he puts this letter, carries the idea that this retraction was surrendered to him upon a demand, and he publishes this letter in an entirely different connection. Twenty pages away from the statement he publishes this identical letter, and he publishes it for the purpose of telling a lie—does tell a lie in connection with it. He publishes the letter and says, "I could not comply with Mrs. Tilton's request to return these letters to her that she might destroy them, because I had previously given my word to Henry Ward Beecher that I would carefully preserve them both." Yet, gentlemen, he had this letter in the morning, and he obtained that retraction in the evening, and he obtained it upon the credit of this letter itself and nothing else. He says that he had—[Mr. Shearman here suggested that Mr. Tracy had quoted the last statement incorrectly].

Mr. Tracy—I thought I had repeated it correctly. He says he had previously pledged his word to Henry Ward Beecher that he would preserve both papers together and not destroy them. Previously? Why he had not seen Mr. Beecher concerning this retraction, until he had the letter of Mrs. Tilton in his pocket. The retraction was obtained on the night of the 30th and he did not see Mr. Beecher again until the night of the 31st. He had this letter in his pocket on the morning of the 31st, and took it with him to Mr. Beecher, and read it to him; and yet he conceals this fact; but when he is compelled to publish every paper he had in his possession on the subject, he publishes the paper, and then tells a lie about it, by saying, "I could not comply with Mrs. Tilton's request, because before I had received this letter from her, I had given to Henry Ward Beecher my word of honor that I would preserve both papers."

Mr. Tracy temporarily rested in his argument at this point and the Court was adjourned until 11 o'clock on Friday morning.

THIRTY-FOURTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A GENERAL ATTACK UPON THE PLAINTIFF AND HIS ALLIES.

MR. TRACY'S OPENING ADDRESS CONTINUED—CIRCUMSTANCES UNDER WHICH THE LETTER OF CONTRITION WAS WRITTEN—AN INTERVIEW ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN INVENTED BY MR. MOULTON—THE SETTLEMENT WITH MR. BOWEN AND THE TRIPARTITE AGREEMENT—MR. TRACY EXPLAINS HIS CONNECTION WITH THE SCANDAL.

FRIDAY, Feb. 26, 1875.

A vigorous attack on the so-called "letter of contrition" was made by Mr. Tracy during the first hour of to-day's session. The circumstances connected with its writing, from the beginning of the interview at which it was composed to the penning of the memoranda at the end of the paper, were explained with remarkable minuteness. Not a pen-scratch was disregarded; not a point lost to view which might have weight for the defendant. The original document was placed in the hands of the jurymen, who examined its contents while Mr. Tracy was engaged in its explanation. Mr. Beecher, at the time of its writing, said Mr. Tracy, stood convicted in his morbid imagination as a slanderer of the meanest type, and as a pastor and friend whose heedless folly had introduced discord in the holiest of relations. The speaker insisted that the letter was a hasty report of hasty expressions, made at the conclusion of the interview, and not from dictation as sworn to by Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Moulton said in his testimony that he had four interviews with Mr. Beecher on as many successive days, beginning with Jan. 1, 1871, on which day the letter of contrition was written. Mr. Tracy announced to-day that the interview of Jan. 2

(which day was celebrated as New Year's Day, Jan. 1 falling on Sunday), sworn to by Mr. Moulton, would be proved to be an invention of the witness. Mr. Beecher was receiving calls, said the speaker, at the time that Mr. Moulton says the interview took place. Mr. Tracy then referred to the interview alleged by Mr. Tilton to have taken place in regard to the paternity of the boy Ralph, speaking of the assertion as a monstrous story, and saying that he would prove that the alleged interview was about another subject. After recess Mr. Tracy delved into the Woodhull corruption, letting in the light of the defense upon Mr. Tilton's intimacy with the woman. The speaker asserted that the plaintiff, instead of attempting to prevent the publication of the scandal, stimulated Mrs. Woodhull. A fragment of Mr. Tilton's poem, "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," was read by Mr. Tracy, who contended strongly that the reference in it to a false woman was intended to stir up again the scandal, and he added that it was a significant fact that at that time Mr. Tilton had just overdrawn his account with Woodruff & Robinson. The money transactions between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen were fully entered into, the speaker alleging that in the Spring of 1872 Mr. Tilton returned from the West, and one day called on Samuel Wilkeson with a proof of a letter explaining why his contracts with Mr. Bowen had been broken, and threatened that he would publish it if Mr. Beecher did not do him justice. Mr. Tracy inquired why Mr. Tilton should threaten the publication of a letter affecting Mr. Bowen if Mr. Beecher did not do Mr. Tilton justice, and explained that Mr. Wilkeson promised to do what he could for Mr. Tilton, believing that Mr. Bowen did rightfully owe him $7,000. This was on March 29, and on April 3 Mr. Tilton, according to Mr. Tracy, received the money from Mr. Bowen. The lawyer promised to prove that the tripartite agreement was the first step in the settlement with Bowen, and that the agreement was considered before the arbitrators. Mr. Tilton testified that the two transactions were separate, but Mr. Tracy says he will prove to the contrary by the arbitrators themselves. From the fact that during the Summer and early Autumn of 1872 Mr. Tilton was actively engaged in the great political campaign of that year, Mr. Tracy drew the conclusion that for that reason nothing was heard of the scandal, and insinuated that perhaps Mr. Tilton intentionally absented himself at the time of the publication by Mrs. Woodhull in November.

Mr. Tracy now came to a stage in the proceedings in which he felt himself personally interested. He said that his name had been dragged into the affair in a manner affecting his professional conduct, and he desired to make a personal explanation.

"Are you going to be a witness, Mr. Tracy?" queried Mr. Beach, interrupting the speaker. "I shall, if it be necessary," replied Mr. Tracy.

Mr. Beach arose and expressed to Judge Neilson his protest against Mr. Tracy's entering into any personal explanation of matters which he did not promise to prove. Mr. Evarts addressed a few words to the Court, after which Mr. Porter spoke, saying that his side would not be dictated to as to whom they would prove matters by. Mr. Porter became considerably excited before he finished, and Mr. Beach quietly rebuked his warmth, saying that he had no objection to Mr. Tracy's explaining his conduct if he would say that whatever he alleged would be proved, and not considered a personal explanation merely. Mr. Beach said that Mr. Tracy had already gravely and grossly departed from the office of an opening. Mr. Porter said that all Mr. Tracy alleged was susceptible of proof. Mr. Tracy then continued his speech, occupying the ensuing 45 minutes, and concluding at a quarter after 4 o'clock, with the history of his connection with the case.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

THE OPENING FOR THE DEFENDANT CONTINUED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, and the opening for the defendant was continued, as follows:

MR. BEECHER'S SYMPATHY USED TO A PURPOSE.

MR. TRACY—May it please the Court, gentlemen of the Jury:—When I closed last night I had finished all I had proposed to say to you on the subject of the interviews of the 30th and 31st of December, except that, in another connection, I shall have occasion to refer to what Mr. Moulton says were the confessions of the defendant on the evening of the 31st. That interview, as you remember, gentlemen, closed by Mr. Moulton having obtained from Mr. Beecher the surrender of Mrs. Tilton's retraction of the charge which she had made against him in her letter dated Dec. 29. It had been surrendered on the express promise of Mr. Moulton that that retraction and the accusation should be preserved and kept together. He had taken that retraction to Mr. Tilton, and the difficulty in which they seemed to be involved the day before by Mr. Beecher's holding in his possession such a piece of terrible evidence against Mr.

Tilton, was removed. They had discovered also that the shock which Mr. Beecher had received in consequence of the accusation of Mrs. Tilton, of beholding her on her sick bed, not only shattered in body but as he feared in mind, had produced a profound impression upon Mr. Beecher. The quick and accurate eye of Moulton had not failed to discover that his heart had been disturbed and moved to the very foundations.

THE HARD MEASURES BY WHICH THE LETTER OF CONTRITION WAS OBTAINED.

Having obtained from his hands the evidence which he held against them, on a promise that the accusation and the retraction should never again be used, the next thing that seems to have occurred to these parties was to pursue this interview, and to see if they could not obtain from Mr. Beecher something authenticated by him which would give a pretext to the accusation which Mr. Tilton had made against him. Because Mr. Tilton did not care to rest, if he could help it, under the imputation—although the retraction had been surrendered—he did not care to rest under the imputation which that retraction cast upon him; and he sought, if possible, to get something from the defendant which should justify or palliate the charge which he had made. Therefore Mr. Moulton returns to the interview on Jan. 1. I shall not stop to dwell here, gentlemen, upon the want of memory of Mr. Moulton as to the time when that interview began and when it ended, as to whether the gas was lighted or whether it was not; all that will be distinct in your mind. I come now to the interview, as he relates it, and to what did in fact occur at that interview, and to discover, if we can, how much credit his testimony is entitled to, when he says that the paper which he took away from that interview was a paper dictated by Mr. Beecher, sentence by sentence, and written down by him as thus dictated.

On the evening of January 1, Moulton again visited the house of Mr. Beecher. But he came to make peace, not war. He drew a picture of Tilton's sorrows, of the utter wreck of his fortunes, of the destruction of his family peace; and all in terms so vivid and touching as to excite the feelings of his hearer to the highest pitch. He vindicated his friend from the calumnious stories which had been brought to Mr. Beecher and had been believed by him. He convinced Mr. Beecher that the charges which the latter, believing them to be true, had repeated to Mr. Bowen, were utterly without foundation. Then he dwelt on the alienation which had arisen between this husband and wife, and on the utter misery which had fallen upon the whole family in consequence. All this in terms calculated to wring tears of blood from a compassionate heart, but without a word of direct accusation against Mr. Beecher. And yet, under everything ran the implication that in some way Mr. Beecher was responsible for all this suffering. Responsible for Tilton's business misfortunes, because he and Bowen had united to turn him out of The Independent and The Brooklyn Union. Responsible for the domestic misery, because the alienation of the wife, which Mr. Beecher had previously supposed to have arisen from the misconduct of the husband, was now assumed to have been caused by an undue affection for her pastor and a violent and protracted struggle between her passion and her sense of duty, which had destroyed her health and unsettled her reason.

Now, gentlemen, neither of these statements fairly describes anything which Mr. Beecher had actually done. They are only what he was made by Moulton to believe he had done. It is very easy to imagine the effect of such a process upon a nature proverbially kind and ingenuous. The measure of undeserved misery then predicated of this plaintiff having been piled very high with careful ingenuity, it needed but a slight push of suggestion to roll the whole over upon the defendant. It needed no special argument or persuasion to fix the responsibility; the man for whose shoulders it had been prepared hastened himself to assume it. Henry Ward Beecher stood convicted in his own morbid imagination, as a slanderer of the meanest type, and as a pastor and friend whose heedless folly had introduced discord into the holiest of relations, and had plunged into sorrow one of the happiest families of his flock.

Gentlemen, can you picture to yourself the agony of his self-reproach under this new and astounding revelation? Can you imagine with what fanatical remorse he would pierce himself again and again with the thorn thus furnished to his hand? "What species of slander," he would say, "is so base as to charge a friend falsely with marital unfaithfulness, seeing that the charges must involve not him alone, but also some innocent woman in inevitable obloquy?" It is true he might palliate to himself the fault by pleading the honesty of his intentions and his belief in the truth of those reports. But neither in law nor in morals is the mere belief in a slander any justification for its utterance in the absence of a preliminary inquiry, with care proportioned to the magnitude of the case. Why had he not made more careful inquiry into the sources of his information? Why had he not instituted a more searching investigation into the facts before assuming the responsibility of action so injurious? Why so prompt to receive with credit calumnious reports against a friend? Such were the questions which the aroused conscience of the defendant, under the skillful manipulation of the plaintiff's serviceable friend, pushed home with stinging force and agonizing effect.

WHY MR. BEECHER WAS READY TO APOLOGIZE.

But if on this first charge Mr. Beecher, following the delicate instincts of an honorable man, felt himself to be absolutely without excuse, how must his self-reproach have been intensified by the additional thought now presented to him, that he had been the means of beguiling Mrs. Tilton into an undue affection for himself, and thus alienating her from her husband and destroying the home where that husband might otherwise have found refuge with his ruined fortunes? If this were so, and the evidence of what he had himself seen led him in his then excited state to accept Moulton's statement as true, there was absolutely but one excuse or palliation which he could offer to his own accusing conscience for the offense, namely: That he had not intentionally done wrong, that though he might have been culpably careless, he had not been consciously guilty of any conduct tending to encourage the alleged affection. But such a defense involved the implication that the lady had conceived this passion entirely without suggestion from him, or any encouragement on his part, and he was debarred from any such plea by all the instincts of a gentleman as well as by his genuine respect and affection for the lady herself. Nor would this plea, even if he could have induced himself to make it, have been a full defense. It is the solemn duty of a clergyman to prevent such a disaster from arising out of his associations with his flock. He is gravely in fault if he fails to see and to repress the first symptoms of a dangerous affection for him on the part of a married woman. This, gentlemen, is the simple and obvious meaning of that language in Mr. Beecher's statement which has been so maliciously and so dishonestly perverted for the ends of this great conspiracy. "The case, as it then appeared in my eyes," says Mr. Beecher, speaking of this interview, "was strongly against me. My old fellow-worker had been dispossessed of his eminent place and influence, and I had counseled it. His family had been well nigh broken up, and I had advised it; his wife had become sick and broken in body and mind, and I, as I fully believed, had been the cause of all this wreck by continuing, with blind heedlessness, that friendship which had beguiled her heart, and roused her husband into a fury of jealousy, although not caused by any intentional act of mine. And should I coldly defend myself? Should I hold her up to contempt as having thrust her affections upon me unsought? Should I tread upon this man and his household in their great adversity?" All this, for purposes sufficiently obvious, has been industriously misrepresented as a contemptible resort on the part of Mr. Beecher, to the very line of defense which in this language he expressly repudiates. Though this was his only possible defense, yet he forebore to use it. It was either this or silence, or what was but one degree better than silence, an acceptance of all the blame, together with an earnest disclaimer of any intentional wrong. He says: "I disclaimed with the greatest earnestness all intent to harm Theodore in his home or business." Think for a moment of his situation, gentlemen. A charge, the most terrible that could possibly confront a man in his position, (for it would be easy to show that, under the circumstances, a charge of impure proposals would seem to be more difficult to meet than one of actual adultery,) such a charge has been suddenly sprung upon him like a thunder clap from a clear sky, not from the gasconading harlequin who orders him out of Brooklyn at the muzzle of a sheet of "commercial note," but in a paper signed by a lady, his friend, his child almost, one whom he knows to be, when in her normal condition, pure and good and truthful. How stunning the surprise! how horrible the complication! Is it possible that she can have consented to such an accusation? If so, what diabolical machination has led to it? And what must be the final result? He has received from her, indeed, a frank retraction, with tearful expressions of regret, and a touching account of the means by which she was driven to such an act; but hardly are these consoling accounts cold before he is informed of a re-retraction! Then is she indeed broken in health and distracted in mind; and all these troubles have been brought upon a family for many years, and still so dear to him; and he a minister of the gospel, who has been to these people as a father, the man by whose agency all this ruin had been brought about! When we consider the swift succession of images presented to the man who, in addition to his remorse for the past, had reason to apprehend a plunge into public conflict with a jealous husband, and with no other defense than his own simple word of honor, can we wonder that Mr. Beecher was a deeply-agitated and excited man!

But this is not all. The pastor of Plymouth Church, surrounded by troops of friends, might have risked even this terrible conflict, if he were absolutely free from blameworthiness. And it has been freely asked, how could he apologize to a husband who brought a false charge against him? But this contingency had been foreseen. The emissary of Tilton entirely dropped the charge of improper advances, and neither then nor ever afterwards alluded to it. But using the language and manner of a gentleman, and pledging his word of honor to the truth of what he said, he found no difficulty in convincing Mr. Beecher that the unhappy little woman, who, as he well knew, and as her husband knew, had always loved Mr. Beecher with a reverential affection, had been misled by his flattering attentions and sympathetic interest into an actual passion for him, which had destroyed her domestic peace, and the struggle between which and her sense of duty had shattered her mind. That this was the fact, we have already shown that Mr. Beecher was made fully to believe. And did not this afford a more satisfactory explanation of her mysterious charge than his previous supposition that it was extorted from her by her cruel husband? Nothing was more natural than that a woman, whose mind was shaken by this cause, should imagine that the object of her love had solicited her affection. Nothing more natural than that in an hour of remorse and of mental prostration, she should confess her own passion and assert that she not only loved but had been loved. For where is the woman living who will freely confess that she has loved without encouragement and without solicitation? This supposed state of facts cleared up the whole mystery, explained the whole disaster to the family, and relieved the husband from all suspicion of a conspiracy against his pastor.

But where did it leave the pastor himself? It made his defense impossible, so long as the accusation brought against him was not coarse and vulgar in its terms. He was not free from fault. His own conscience condemned him. Although he well knew that he had never said an impure word, nor offered an impure caress, yet he could not deny the charge of having beguiled the woman's affections, without imputing to her the indelicacy of "thrusting her affection upon him unsought." This is what he said he would die before he would do. This is what he said in his statement last August that he had always found it impossible to do. Nay, more, with such instinctive horror did he shrink from such a defense, that he would not use it to justify himself before his own conscience, but assumed at once that in some way he must have been to blame, he must have enticed the affections of this wife from her husband. And to this charge, which was the only one intimated by Moulton, he pleaded guilty before his own conscience and before his God. I refer now, gentlemen, to the interview of January 1st, when I say, "as intimated by Moulton —"

MRS. TILTON NEVER UNFAITHFUL IN DEED OR THOUGHT.

Here, gentlemen, I must break the thread of my narrative to prevent a fresh injustice to my client. It must be distinctly understood that he does not now believe, and that he did not when making his statement last August, believe one word of this story concerning Mrs. Tilton's passion for him, to which he was induced to give evidence in January, 1871. He believes that Mrs. Tilton has never been unfaithful to her husband in word, look or thought. He believes that she has lavished upon her unworthy husband all the treasures of her royal nature, and that all the fountains of her love—a love to whose depth and tenderness no justice can be done by language of mine—have been wasted exclusively upon that barren sand which the plaintiff has himself described as the "cold and cruel heart of Theodore Tilton."

MR. MOULTON ACCOMPLISHES THE COMMISSION.

But, Mr. Beecher had no such relief on the night of January 1, 1871. Full of the conviction that he was responsible for the shattered mental condition and the domestic misery of the woman whom he loved with as pure an affection as any of you, gentlemen, have for your own daughters, for upwards of an hour Henry Ward Beecher walked that floor giving utterance to emotions so intense, in language so extravagant, that the self-possessed, keen-eyed gentleman watching him there, almost forgot the delight of triumph in the pleasure of surprise. He had come to this interview, commissioned to obtain at all hazards, something from Beecher, something to supply the place of deserting auxiliaries and lost ammunition. Bowen had slipped from under and could no longer be relied on for the promised reinforcements. The charge of improper proposals had failed or had been neutralized by the retraction; the locker is absolutely empty, and the whole campaign must be begun anew. To get in Mr. Beecher's hand or with his signature something in the nature of a confession of improper advances to fit the vague accusation which had already been propounded with such imperfect success—this was the problem. A tolerably difficult game to play, one would be apt to think, with the wily and accomplished villain whom you had already heard so vigorously described by the senior counsel for the plaintiff. But lo, this man, represented to you as a shrewd and gifted scoundrel, a consummate villain, an unparalleled dissembler, who had practiced wholesale lewdness for more than thirty years under the concentrated gaze of the whole world, and up to this time succeeded in covering his tracks—now advances voluntarily to this friend of a day, opens at once every joint in his harness, and invites him to insert his javelin at his own sweet will. Why, gentlemen, never did a three-year old baby, quivering with contrition for its first conscious fault, more swiftly run to bury its bowed and tearful face in its tender mother's lap, than did this suffering man advance to cast himself on the breast of that guileless and gushing creature, Francis D. Moulton.

MR. BEECHER'S PROFOUND SORROW AND APOLOGY.

With the volubility of one half crazed, he pours out the most poignant self-reproaches without limit. For, gentlemen, you know that men express themselves about their sins generally in inverse ratio to their desert of blame. Their estimate of sin is according to their standard of holiness. There was once before, in good old Scripture days, a man who was given over for a time to the manipulations of the devil. I refer to Job, the patriarch of Uz, who is spoken of as a man "perfect and upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil." And yet in the days of his affliction this good man could say: "I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes." It was because he had been permitted to see in a vision the divine standard of holiness. The greatest of prophets cried: "Woe is me, for I am unclean, for mine eyes have seen the Lord." And from those times down pure and spiritual-minded men—men conspicuous in the world for personal holiness—have been wont to puzzle and astonish worldly natures by the unmeasured terms in which they have denounced their own faults and imperfections. So this defendant on this occasion, excited almost to frenzy by pity and remorse, gave way to his mighty sorrow in a vocabulary whose somber richness and fullness we may well imagine. How embarrassed by the very copiousness of the resources thus gushing forth before him, must have been this "cool hand" who there with hard, cold eyes, sat watching this curious development. "Something to commit Beecher" had been his quest, and here was Mr. Beecher himself furnishing terms in torrents, intense enough, comprehensive enough to cover all sins forbidden in the decalogue! Oh, to get a thousandth part of this rich material on paper, for here it is running all to waste, and every sentence is gold and "there's millions in it." But the copious talker is in no mood for writing, and our shrewd operator in vivisection, watching then his opportunity, sees the supreme moment arrived for dropping the scalpel and taking up the pen.

THE REAL WAY THE LETTER OF CONTRITION WAS WRITTEN.

And now, gentlemen, having brought you up to the situation as it exists in our conception, let us leave it thus for a moment. Mr. Beecher, pouring forth an unceasing torrent of morbid self-accusation and sorrow, and Moulton, with unpracticed pen in the gathering darkness at his wit's ends to make rapid selection and arrangement from the multitude of significant expressions such as should best answer the end in view, namely, to get Mr. Beecher on paper in the attitude of a penitent criminal—let us, I say, turn from this interesting situation, and institute a somewhat careful inquiry into the genesis and nature of the remarkable paper which was the product of that rapid incubation. There is no doubt, gentlemen, that the paper originally called the "Letter of Apology," but more recently the "Letter of Contrition," was written by the mutual friend at this interview of January 1, 1871; but in regard to every other fact concerning its preparation the defendant and Mr. Moulton will be in conflict.

The interview of January 1 is described by Moulton as follows. On his direct examination he says [reading from THE TRIBUNE'S report]:

Q. State, if you please, what that interview was? A. I told Mr. Beecher that I had taken the retraction to Mr. Tilton, and that I had told Mr. Tilton that it would have been very foolish for him to have carried his threat of the morning into execution. I told him that Mr. Tilton was pleased with my having procured the retraction, and that I told Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton seemed to me to be—

[Then he was interrupted. Then he proceeds again]:

I told him that I thought that—I told him that Tilton told me that he had made up his mind that, no matter what came to himself, he would undertake to protect the reputation of his wife at all hazards. Then Mr. Beecher said to me that he was in misery on account of the crime that he had committed against Theodore Tilton and his wife and family; he said that he would be willing to make any reparation that was within his power; he said that Mr. Tilton, he thought, would have been a better man under the circumstances in which he had been placed than he had been; that he felt that he had done a great wrong, because he was Theodore Tilton's friend, he was his pastor, he was his wife's friend and pastor, and he wept bitterly; and I said to him, "Mr. Beecher, why don't you say that to Mr. Tilton?" [Observe, gentlemen, that the suggestion of writing comes from Moulton in this interview.] I said to him, "Mr. Beecher, why don't you say that to Mr. Tilton, why don't you express to him the grief you feel, and the contrition for it. You can do no more than that, and I think I know Theodore Tilton well enough to know that he would be satisfied with that, for I know he loves his wife." Mr. Beecher told me to take pen and paper and to write at his dictation, and I did write at his dictation the letter of January 1, 1871.

Q. What was done after you wrote that letter? A. I read the letter to him, and he read it, and then he signed—

Q. Never mind; we will show that in a moment. You say you read it to him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you read it as it was? A. Yes, Sir, and as it is.

Q. Did he take it and read it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you mean to be understood that you read it to him, and that he read it afterward for himself? A. Yes, certainly.

So remarkable a fact, you observe, gentlemen, had attracted the attention of the counsel, and he wanted to make sure if the witness meant to be understood that after he had read this letter aloud carefully to Mr. Beecher, Mr. Beecher then took it and read it over for himself. "A very remarkable fact, if it be true," as the newspapers say.

On cross-examination he was asked:

Q. Well, what subjects did you and Mr. Beecher converse about on that day; just name the topics of conversation, so far as you can remember? A. The effect of the recantation upon Theodore Tilton; Mr. Beecher's expression of contrition for the crime that he had committed against Elizabeth Tilton and Theodore Tilton, and his expression of regret that he had mentioned Mrs. Bullard's name to Mr. Bowen; those are the three distinct subjects that I now recollect.

Q. And the only three that you recollect? A. Those are the three, Sir.

You will remember, gentlemen, that he described that interview as lasting from one to two hours, and yet he names but three subjects that were conversed about at that interview, and all he relates of the interview would not have occupied more than ten minutes. Indeed, he states but little of importance occurring on that day, except the fact of the writing of this letter. He admits that the preparation of the paper was suggested by a remark that Mr. Beecher made during that conversation. But in another part of his testimony he says that the paper was prepared at the beginning of the conversation. He says it was dictated by Mr. Beecher deliberately, sentence by sentence, and that he wrote it down as dictated, and that the paper is not only in Mr. Beecher's words, but the very sentences are of his construction, while Mr. Beecher will tell you, gentlemen, that this paper was prepared toward the close of a long and excited conversation, embracing many more topics than those referred to by Moulton; that it was suggested by Moulton, who remarked that Tilton was under the impression that Beecher was inimical to him and desirous of his overthrow, and that if Tilton could but know how kindly Mr. Beecher had expressed himself toward him in this conversation, it would remove all harshness from his mind. Mr. Beecher declined to write, but said: "You can tell him what I say." To which Moulton replied: "It would have more effect if it came from you in some authentic form." "Well," said Beecher, "you can make a memorandum of what I say." And thereupon Moulton took a pen and began to write what Beecher had said during the conversation. Substantially, gentlemen, the only dictation which Mr. Beecher did in the matter, was on two or three occasions, when Moulton asked him: "What word or phrase did you use at this point?" And Mr. Beecher supplied the word or phrase as the case might be. The preparation of the paper was the last thing done at the interview. It was completed after Mr. Beecher's tea-bell had rung, which on Sundays always rings at five o'clock. The sun had set. The room was growing dark, and the gas was not lit. It was written in great haste, it was not read over by Moulton, nor was it read by Beecher. It would hardly have been possible for either to read it. When asked by Moulton to sign it, Mr. Beecher refused, on the ground that it was not his paper; but, being pressed, he finally took a pen and wrote on the extreme lower edge of the last page: "I have trusted this to Moulton in confidence. Henry Ward Beecher."

THE LETTER OF CONTRITION ANALYZED.

The question at issue between Moulton and this defendant is this—Was the paper prepared at the beginning of the conversation, deliberately dictated sentence by sentence, written down exactly as delivered and present with the parties during the remainder of the interview, or, on the other hand, was it hastily prepared, at the end of the conversation, by one who endeavored to gather up and record the more salient points of what had been previously uttered? To settle this question of veracity, gentlemen, I appeal to the paper itself. Is it credible that Henry Ward Beecher ever dictated and deliberately signed such sentences as are here recorded? We say that the paper bears on its face conclusive evidence of desperate haste, leading to inaccuracies of composition, which neither Mr. Beecher nor Moulton could ever have committed, had they written deliberately and at their leisure. In the first place, it lacks all the indications which would distinguish a letter either written or dictated by a man of culture habituated to the production of thoughtful methodical papers. The slightest glance must convince any intelligent man that no man of letters could ever have literally dictated this incoherent production, no matter what his mental condition, if it were short of absolute insanity. Even if he had been insane, it is doubtful whether the habits of a literary man would not have led him to prepare a letter having at least the external symbols of logic, sense, and order. But the paper now under consideration, as the most uneducated man may see, is absolutely without logical sequence, and violates the most familiar rules of composition. If Mr. Beecher had really dictated a letter to Mr. Moulton, sentence by sentence, his literary instincts would inevitably have prompted a production having such a natural beginning, middle, and end as is common to all letters written by educated men.

This paper has none of these things. It opens with an abrupt, extravagant, expression which, if literally construed, is profane, and which shows upon its face that it is a distortion of a proper, though excited expression. But note, also, the entire disconnection of the latter part of the sentence from the first. I desire, gentlemen, during my comments on this letter to hand it to you. You will have to take it, half of you at a time, and then pass it to the others. First, if you please, hand it to Mr. Halsey on the back seat. [The original paper was handed to Mr. Halsey.] The first sentence of this letter, gentlemen, is as follows:

MY DEAR FRIEND MOULTON: I ask through you Theodore Tilton's forgiveness, and I humble myself before him as I do before my God, he would have been a better man, in my circumstances than I have been—

Now, I ask you to note that the last clause of that sentence has no sort of relation to the first; and, yet, Mr. Moulton coolly swore in your presence, that Mr. Beecher deliberately dictated as one single connected sentence, without any intervening stop, these extraordinary words: "I ask through you Theodore Tilton's forgiveness, and I humble myself before him as I do before my God, he would have been a better man in my circumstances than I have been." No one but a maniac could have deliberately uttered such a sentence; and neither Mr. Moulton nor Mr. Tilton has ever ventured to print that sentence in type as it was originally written. But all the sentences are disjointed; they do not follow each other in any natural order. Their confusion is perfectly comprehensible if we believe that they are hasty reports of hasty expressions, spread over a long conversation, at intervals, and eagerly grasped at by a man who was anxious to record the worst language which he could possibly select from the excited utterances of a man under deep feeling; but utterly incomprehensible, if we accept Mr. Moulton's oath that the paper was deliberately dictated and deliberately written.

But it is necessary that I should call your attention to still stronger evidence of the desperate haste with which this paper was prepared by other internal evidence of a still more unmistakable nature. In the first place, if you observe the paper, you will see that the first four or five lines are more distinctly written than the subsequent portion. Down to the word "God" every letter is complete in itself, but after this word a comma is inserted where there should be a period, and the next word begins with a small, instead of a capital "H" in the first sentence, after the word "God." You can hardly read that sentence, gentlemen, without making a period at the word "God," and commencing the new sentence of course with a capital; and yet you will observe that it is commenced with a small "H" and separated only by a comma. Now, Henry Ward Beecher would never have dictated such a sentence as that; it is not possible, nor is it possible that Francis D. Moulton would have ever written such a sentence as that, except in the greatest haste, and I am now referring you to the internal evidence from the paper itself, that Mr. Beecher's version of the conversation must be true, and Mr. Moulton's must be untrue. It will be further observed that the writer inserts a comma after the word "man," where there should be none, and a dash after the word "been," where should be a period. He next writes, "I can't ask nothing"—clearly showing that he did not write this from dictation. For he would not have written "can't," where Mr. Beecher had just dictated "can." But starting to frame the sentence "I can't ask," he discovered as the remainder was formed in his mind, that he must change "can't" to "can," and so canceled the "t," as you see in the manuscript—a clear evidence, as we submit to you, gentlemen, that that word was not written from dictation, but it bears internal evidence that it was written by a man who was starting to frame a sentence in his own mind, writes three words of the sentence, and then sees as the balance of it is formed in his mind, that he must change the word, and so he changes "can't" to "can." And so the word "other" is imperfectly written, the necessary letters being undiscoverable, as is seen by an inspection of the paper, showing further evidence of the haste with which the writer went on with the composition. You see as he began, he began leisurely, writing the first few lines—every word perfect; but as he goes on in his composition, his haste increasing, darkness perhaps coming on in the room, there are letters left out of the words and characters that cannot be said to represent any letters. The word "would" is very imperfect; no one could say that the last character was intended for a "D." After the word "ache" he makes a dash, instead of a period as there should be. The first period occurring in the paper is found after the word "myself," away down in the composition. The words "for myself" were interlined, which would not have been the case, had he written them down from Mr. Beecher's dictation. The second period occurs after the word "suffer." The next period occurs after the word "inculcated." The sentence succeeding begins with a small "A" after the period he has marked.

THE ORIGINAL PUNCTUATION OF THIS LETTER.

You observe he has marked a period there; and then, in haste, has begun the sentence with a small letter instead of a capital; and I want to impress upon you the fact, gentlemen, here, that although this letter was published by Mr. Moulton, it has never been published as written; that is, he changes the whole form and style of the letter by the form of its punctuation—the manner in which he punctuates it and publishes it. The punctuation I now give is in accordance with the manner the letter was punctuated when written by Moulton himself; I am reading you his own punctuation of it. The word "towards" is imperfectly written, there being nothing to indicate the letters "d s" except a single dash of the pen resembling "d s" in no wise either singly or together. There is no comma after the word "friends" as there should be. The next "toward" is printed "towards" in the statement. You will see that, gentlemen, in the sentence "lying there and praying, with her folded hands." After the word "hands" there is a semi-colon instead of a period, but the next word begins with a capital, "She is guiltless"—the word "she" beginning with a capital. The "s" in "sinned against" has been altered evidently from an "I." He started to write "I," then he changed it to "s" and wrote the word "sinned." There is no period mark after the word "another," although the next word begins with a capital, as it should do—the sentence beginning "Her forgiveness I have." You see the "I" looks as if originally written an "s" changed to an "i;" on the contrary, all the way through, gentlemen, this letter bears internal evidence on its face, that it was hastily prepared, prepared in great haste; confirming precisely in itself the statement which Mr. Beecher will give you of this interview, and of the manner in which this paper was prepared. Now, he asks you to believe, gentlemen, that he not only read this letter himself, but that Henry Ward Beecher took the letter afterwards and deliberately read it himself, without discovering or correcting these errors of punctuation. Now, is it possible to believe that Henry Ward Beecher would ever sign and send out over his own signature such a composition as that?

THE WRITING EVIDENTLY DISJOINTED.

But now, gentlemen, we come to the conclusive evidence that the writing of this letter was suddenly terminated by an abrupt interruption. You will observe that the paper begins in the form of a letter, addressed to "My Dear Friend Moulton." Had the writer recognized the fact that he had concluded his letter with the sentence, "I humbly pray to God that he may put it into the heart of her husband to forgive me," it is impossible to understand why he did not prepare it for Mr. Beecher's signature by adding some usual concluding clause, as "Yours Truly," or the like. You, observe, gentlemen, that letter begins, "My Dear Friend Moulton." Now, I say, that if Mr. Moulton had supposed that letter was to stop when he wrote the last word of the letter, that that word was the conclusion, he would have prepared it for Mr. Beecher's signature by adding, "Yours truly," or "Yours faithfully," for Mr. Beecher to sign. But there is no such clause in the letter. On the contrary, you observe that after the last word of that letter there is a dash instead of a period, showing that the writer intended to continue writing at the time he wrote the last word of the letter—that he had not finished the letter; he expected to keep on gathering up these gems that were falling with such abundance from the lips of this excited man. But at the time he had written his last word and made his dash, expecting to continue, Mr. Beecher's tea-bell rang and interrupted the writing and stopped it. Then came the question of signing. Mr. Beecher said: "I cannot sign that, because it is not my composition." Then he asked him to authenticate it in some form, so that he could show Mr. Tilton that he had something from Mr. Beecher. It was a trick, gentlemen; a plan deliberately devised to commit this man, in his excited condition, to some note or memorandum that could afterwards be used against him as a power to convince him that he was under their control—that they had him committed. That was the purpose and the object of that letter, and that is the way it was that Moulton pressed so hard for Mr. Beecher's signature in some form to the letter itself. Now, gentlemen, Mr. Moulton tells you another fact—that he put at the end of that letter the clause, "In trust with Francis D. Moulton." He says Mr. Beecher did not dictate that. He says it, I think, for the purpose of explaining the absurdity of Mr. Beecher's dictating that clause at the head of the letter, and then adding it at the foot of the letter, having it twice upon the letter. Mr. Beecher would not have been likely to have done that. If he had dictated at the head of the letter "In trust with Francis D. Moulton," he would not have added the same thing at the foot. Nor would he have added that, if it had been written as a letter to Francis D. Moulton. But Moulton said: "Trust this to me; I will preserve it; I will see that no harm comes to you by your giving me this document, that I may show Tilton in writing how kindly you feel towards him. Leave that to me; trust it to me;" and by these forms of expression, repeated by Moulton when inducing Beecher to authenticate this paper in some form, he got from Mr. Beecher the phrase: "I have trusted this to Moulton in confidence." That is the phrase. "H. W. Beecher."

Again, gentlemen, if Mr. Beecher had commenced this letter dictating "To my Friend Moulton," and that letter had been written by Mr. Moulton in the course of five or ten minutes, what must he have thought of Mr. Beecher, or Mr. Beecher have thought of himself when he refused to sign the letter which he had commenced by dictating? Is not that a remarkable statement—that Mr. Beecher should begin the dictation of a letter, "My Dear Friend Moulton,"—a letter that only contains about one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty words, and at the close of it should say, "I won't sign it?" You see it begins in the form of a letter. Now, if Mr. Beecher had deliberately commenced that in the form of a letter why would he not have finished it? What operated in his mind in these five or ten or perhaps twenty minutes during which this letter was preparing?—what operated upon his mind to make him change and refuse to sign the letter which he had begun by addressing it "My Dear Friend Moulton?" Why, the proposition, it seems to me, gentlemen, carries the evidence of absurdity upon its face; and it shows that Mr. Beecher did not dictate that phrase, "My Dear Friend Moulton." It is evidenced by another fact: in all these four years' correspondence, the number of letters which Mr. Beecher has written to Mr. Moulton since then, no letter of his has ever been addressed in that form, "My Dear Friend Moulton." There is no such letter from the beginning to the end of this correspondence. Therefore we submit to you, gentlemen, that this paper itself so corroborates the statement that Mr. Beecher will make to you upon the stand, and so contradicts the evidence that Mr. Moulton gives you, that when you come to hear Mr. Beecher's statement you will believe that he states the truth, and that Mr. Moulton does not.

MR. BEECHER'S ALLEGED ORAL CONFESSIONS.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, I come to another branch of this case; and that is the branch which is now mainly relied upon, to wit, the pretended oral confessions which this defendant is alleged to have made to Francis D. Moulton and to his wife, and to the plaintiff, Theodore Tilton. In the beginning, gentlemen, we shall show you that these parties relied expressly upon the writing that they had, and upon nothing else. As late as July 10, 1874, after the appointment of the Church Committee, and on Mr. Tilton's first appearing before the Committee, we shall show you, I apprehend, by evidence which you will not doubt, that Mr. Tilton there said that his case against Henry Ward Beecher was in writing. He said that he knew that his reputation was impaired in this community, and that the guilt or innocence of Henry Ward Beecher did not at all depend upon his word—he had it in writing. I think that the evidence will show you that after Mr. Tilton had repeated that once or twice over, he was interrupted by one who thought, at least at that time, that he had seen the written case against Henry Ward Beecher, who said to him: "Mr. Tilton, if your case against Henry Ward Beecher is in writing, then it is wholly a question of what these writings prove; that is a fact that other people can judge of as well as you can; it is the construction of the papers;" and he was told then and there, I think, by one who supposed he had seen these papers and studied them carefully, that they did not warrant the insinuations which Theodore Tilton was then making, and they would not prove the case that he was then insinuating. I think it will transpire before you, gentlemen, that up to that time neither Tilton nor Moulton had ever talked about oral confessions of Henry Ward Beecher. I think it will transpire that this part of their case has arisen since that date. At least I have no doubt that it will appear to you that on that occasion Mr. Tilton did not pretend that he had any oral confessions from Mr. Beecher tending to establish his case, but that he said distinctly that his case against Mr. Beecher was in writing, and was locked in his safe, or in Moulton's safe.

In Moulton's statement, published August 2, some time after this, and after this controversy had gone on, Mr. Moulton alleges then, in general language, that Mr. Beecher had confessed orally to him, but his language was entirely general; he gave no specific words; he made no statement which was legal evidence of that fact. His paper was challenged on that account, and it was said: "If Mr. Henry Ward Beecher ever confessed to you, why haven't you stated the confession, so other people can see whether his language amounted to a confession of guilt or not?" But it was not until after he had been thus challenged and made his second statement that he descends at all, or undertakes to give the words in which Mr. Beecher confessed. But on the trial here, gentlemen, he clothes Mr. Beecher's confessions in entirely different language from what he did in his second statement; but you will not forget the remarkable language which he so continuously puts in the mouth of Henry Ward Beecher; "sexual relations," "sexual intercourse," "sexual expression," "adultery," not once—not once, gentlemen, I beg you to observe, but continuously, at every interview, and he never has Mr. Beecher refer to "their relations," but always precedes it with the word "sexual." Do you believe that, gentlemen of the jury? Upon the basis and the theory that Henry Ward Beecher did intend to convey to Francis D. Moulton the idea that he had had criminal relations with the wife of the plaintiff, do you believe at every interview that occurred between them afterwards Mr. Beecher expressly referred to the confession, and used the precise language that he did on the first occasion? Having used it once, would not a mere reference to it afterwards have been sufficient? Was it necessary for him to repeat always the words "sexual relations" to have Mr. Moulton understand what he meant? Why, it is most improbable, I submit. If Mr. Beecher had been confessing he never could have been guilty of such weakness, and displayed such love of nasty expressions as to be continually rolling these from his lips, as Moulton says he did. It is impossible to believe it; it is incredible. They are words that are manufactured and put into the mouth of Henry Ward Beecher on occasion after occasion. He never made any such expression; he never made any such confession. And you will remember, gentlemen, if you have read his statement—

Mr. Beach—Whose statement?

Mr. Tracy—Moulton's—or if you recall his expression upon the witness stand, when he has attempted to repeat this phraseology, the remarkable slip he made, not once, but twice, when he undertook to say, "Mr. Beecher said his relations—his sexual relations." Not once, but twice, he did that in repeating it, and that is the precise manner he repeats it in his statement. In his statement he says: "Mr. Beecher said his relations with this woman," without adding the word "sexual" relations; and when he comes to repeat it from the witness stand he says: "Mr. Beecher said his relations—his sexual relations;" and when he told it again on his cross-examination he made the same slip, and, recalling himself, added the word "sexual."

SOME OF THE DESCRIBED INTERVIEWS FICTITIOUS.

But, gentlemen, I shall not dwell longer upon those interviews. They are remarkable, if they ever occurred, most remarkable. It is a most remarkable fact that Henry Ward Beecher, if he had been guilty, could have been guilty of the indiscretion of throwing open his heart to a friend of a day; for you will bear in mind that Francis D. Moulton was a stranger to Henry Ward Beecher on the night of the 30th of December. He tells you that he was a stranger to him; that is, he knew him as everybody knew Mr. Beecher; he had a speaking acquaintance with him; he had been introduced to him before, but there were no relations between them of friends or acquaintances; and yet he goes to him on the 30th of December in a hostile attitude, as a friend of the man who was accusing him, and he comes to him again on the 31st of December, the next night, and he says, without word of caution or preliminary suggestion, Mr. Beecher opened to him and confessed his adultery with this woman. The absurdity of the statement itself is sufficient to challenge the closest scrutiny on the part of the jury, and to excite the gravest doubts, even if it fell from the lips of an unquestioned witness, whether it could be possible that any man in his senses could be guilty of such an indiscretion as that. But farther, gentlemen, you will remember the great struggle we had when Mr. Moulton was on the witness stand, to get him to testify that the subject of these stories which Bowen had circulated against Tilton to Beecher, and Beecher had circulated against Tilton to Bowen, were the subjects of conversation between Mr. Beecher and Moulton on the night of the 31st of December, or on the night of the 1st of January. But we could not get him to do it; we could not get him to say that Mr. Beecher agreed to apologize to Bowen, and to write a letter to Bowen taking back what he said in regard to Tilton and Mrs. Bullard. He would not acknowledge that it was done on either the 31st of December or the 1st of January; and it was very important for him, and he understood the importance of it, because that would give a clew, you see, to the contrition and the sorrow and the regret which Mr. Beecher was expressing on the night of the 1st of January. If the subject of his reports concerning Laura Curtis Bullard had been the subject of conversation, and he had agreed to take it back, and had agreed to write a letter upon that subject, if these stories that he had circulated in regard to Tilton to Bowen had been the subject of conversation, and he had been expressing his regrets concerning them, why, that would have furnished an explanation of what his excitement was, what caused it. But they keep that all out of view. They ask you to believe, gentlemen, that there was nothing talked of on either of these nights except his relation to Mrs. Tilton, substantially, and that that was what he was expressing his sorrow and regret for; and so they say that this letter to Bowen was not the subject of conversation, but it was written so soon after, you see, gentlemen, that they could not postpone it very long. It must be the subject of conversation right away. If it was not on the night of the 31st of December, or the 1st of January, it must be immediately following. They saw that necessity, and they must make it. Now, how did they do it? Moulton does it by inventing an interview between himself and Mr. Beecher on the 2d of January, where he makes these stories the subject of conversation, and this letter to Bowen their matter of talk and agreement. I say he invents it, and I shall leave you no doubt upon that subject, gentlemen. The 1st of January that year came on Sunday. This letter called the "Apology" was written Sunday afternoon, in Beecher's house. Moulton tells you that he called the next day in the afternoon, towards evening, somewhere from 3 to 5 o'clock, I think, that evening, and had another long interview with Mr. Beecher, on the 2d of January, and he tells you in great detail what occurred. He tells you expressly, in answer to a question put to him on cross-examination, that he had four separate interviews with Mr. Beecher on four successive days. That is the question put to him and that is the question he answered. Now, gentlemen, we shall show you that Francis D. Moulton had no interview with Henry Ward Beecher on the 2d of January. The 2d of January was the day celebrated as New Year's, and Mr. Beecher, as was his custom, received New Year's calls that day, and was engaged all day long in receiving New Year's calls. He had over 400 callers at his house on the 2d of January, 1871.

Mr. Shearman—Twice that.

Mr. Tracy—Nearly 800, I am informed; busy all day, from 9 o'clock in the morning until late in the evening, no opportunity for such an interview, and no such interview ever occurred. I say it has been invented, and invented for a purpose, in order to enable this witness to carry an interview, on very important and vital questions, one day beyond the writing of this letter of contrition. He tells you further that Mr. Beecher consulted him on that day as to whether the pew renting should go off that year. Why, gentlemen, if that interview was on the 2d day of January, the pew renting was to take place the next day, and had been advertised everywhere, and everybody knew it was to go on. The talk of stopping it from going on would have been worse than a printed confession. There was no such talk, no such thought. The renting of the pews, I say, had been advertised, and it took place the next day, and there never was such a suggestion as to whether it should go off or not, or be postponed.

THE FIRST OBJECT IN THE PLOTTING.

The object of the efforts of Moulton and Tilton in the early days of January, 1871, was to restore Mr. Tilton, if possible, to The Independent and The Union. You see, gentlemen, that this dismissal was disastrous to Mr. Tilton. He has stated to you from the witness stand why it was disastrous. It was peculiarly disastrous for this reason. He had just made a new arrangement with The Independent by which he ceased to be editor and became chief contributor, and was to be editor of The Union; and that arrangement had been announced in The Independent on the 22d, and yet, eight days afterwards, he is displaced from both papers; and everybody said, "Why this remarkable change?" It was disastrous to Mr. Tilton; it was something more than a mere business change that could be explained on its face without discredit to other parties, and hence their great desire to restore Mr. Tilton in some way to The Union and Independent, or to get some explanation of that dismissal which would not be ruinous to him. Now, their plan was to get everybody who had told stories concerning Mr. Tilton to retract. Mr. Beecher was to retract, Mrs. Tilton was to retract, and you see they did get a letter from Mrs. Tilton which denied that she had ever desired a separation from her husband, and attributed it to the action of her poor mother; they even force this weak and sick woman in her weakened state to attribute her action, in the letter which she gave them, to her mother. They got Bessie Turner to retract the stories which she had told to Mr. Beecher concerning Mr. Tilton.

BESSIE TURNER'S RETRACTIONS.

And now, gentlemen, there is more significance to the retraction of Bessie Turner than to most of the retractions in this case, because there is another fact connected with it, Bessie Turner had circulated the story, had told to Mr. Beecher, and had told to other people that Mr. Tilton had twice attempted her virtue, once by taking her from her own bed and carrying her to his, and on another occasion, I believe, in coming to her bedroom and attempting to lie in bed with her. These stories were told, and the evidence of Moulton and Tilton shows you that they knew that she had circulated these stories, and, taken with the flood-tide that was coming in against Mr. Tilton, they were extremely damaging—very damaging. And they say that she was a girl that was given to talk, and she was somewhat under the influence of the mother-in-law, and, if we are to believe Mr. Tilton, the mother-in-law was sometimes given to talk, and it was important not only, therefore, to get Bessie Turner to retract these statements, but to get her out of the way—get her out of Brooklyn where she would not talk—get her into a distant country, where no Brooklyn people could hear her, where she would not be tempted to retail these scandals concerning Mr. Tilton.

Now, gentlemen, they tell you that Bessie Turner was sent West because she had overheard a quarrel between Mr. Tilton and his wife, in which Mr. Beecher's name had been mentioned, and that was the reason she was sent away, and not because of these stories. And the question is, which is true? They attempt now to put the responsibility of her absence upon Mr. Beecher and upon the rumors concerning Beecher and Mrs. Tilton. But they were careful to get from Bessie Turner her written retractions of these stories against Mr. Tilton, and they treasured them up. What for? For the very use that they are putting them to now; for the very use that they are making of them now. They bring them into Court to confront this young girl, and to say that here are statements that your stories concerning Mr. Tilton are false. They got them for that purpose, and they went into these general archives of Moulton, of all papers relating to this scandal, and have been carefully preserved ever since. Was that to protect Mr. Beecher? Did they get these retractions from Bessie Turner that Theodore Tilton had never tempted her virtue, or never had carried her, screaming, from her bed to his own, in order to protect Henry Ward Beecher? I think, gentlemen, you will agree with me, that the same reason that induced parties to get the retraction, influenced them in sending her away. They are connected; there is a vital connection between the obtaining of this retraction, and the sending Bessie Turner out of Brooklyn. Now, here are her letters; January 12th is the first one. [Reading]:

The story that Mr. Tilton once lifted me from my bed, and carried me, screaming, into his own, and attempted to violate my person, is a wicked lie.

Yours truly,

BEECHER.

The other letter was dated January 10th, 1871. [Reading]:

MY DEAR MRS. TILTON: I want to tell you something. Your mother, Mrs. Morse, has repeatedly attempted to hire me, by offering me dresses and presents, to go to certain persons and tell them stories injurious to the character of your husband. I have been persuaded that the kind attentions shown me by Mr. Tilton for years were dishonorable demonstrations. I never at the time thought that Mr. Tilton's caresses were for such a purpose. I do not want to be made use of by Mrs. Morse, or by any one else, to bring trouble on my two best friends, you and your husband. By-by.

BEECHER.

Now, that is a remarkable letter, gentlemen, to be obtained by Mr. Tilton and placed in the hands of his most intimate friend to be kept and preserved. It is a very remarkable letter.

Mr. Beach—Do you say it was obtained by Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Tracy—I say it was obtained by Mr. Tilton. I say it was obtained at his suggestion and influence by his wife, and with his knowledge taken by her, and placed in the hands of his most intimate friend, Francis D. Moulton, and by him preserved until this hour, ready to be produced against this girl if she should ever appear in Court and give a different version of this transaction. "I have been persuaded that the kind attentions shown me by Mr. Tilton for years were dishonorable demonstrations. I never at the time thought that Mr. Tilton's caresses were for such a purpose." Caresses—a very remarkable phrase, gentlemen, if there never was anything between Tilton and Bessie Turner. Then, that was not sufficient, so two days afterwards they get another letter from her. "The story that Mr. Tilton once lifted me from my bed and carried me screaming to his own and attempted to violate my person is a wicked lie." Well, now, gentlemen, Bessie Turner never said he did. If there was any such story it was a lie. Particularly it was a lie if the intent to be carried by it was that she was carried screaming to his bed and that he attempted to violate her person. I am not aware that Bessie Turner ever charged any such thing against Mr. Tilton. I understand that her story simply was that she was taken from her bed in his arms and carried to his bed, and he attempted to persuade her to remain there. I have never understood that the charge was one of attempted violence. So that letter of Bessie Turner is no retraction of what she has really told against Theodore Tilton, and what she had told against Theodore Tilton, as I understand it. So it does not convict her of falsehood; if any such stories had got in circulation, why she could properly deny them. And now, gentlemen, isn't it remarkable that the man who, they say, sent her away, had no inducement to get any retraction from her? She had never circulated any stories about Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; she never had anything to retract concerning them, and nobody ever suspected her of a disposition to talk concerning them. That is a pretense. But we have the fact that she talked about Theodore Tilton. We have the fact that it was well known to Moulton and Tilton that she was talking about him at this very time. Moulton tells you so. We have the fact that those two retractions were obtained and she was sent away; and we shall show you, gentlemen, that she was sent away as an inducement to her giving these retractions.

THE REAL OBJECT OF SENDING BESSIE TURNER WEST.

But more, we have it from the unconscious language of Francis D. Moulton himself, when he says that he told Mr. Beecher—mind you, Francis D. Moulton is the man that suggested the sending away of Miss Turner, not Henry Ward Beecher. Francis D. Moulton is the man who makes the suggestion, and he tells Mr. Beecher that Mr. Tilton cannot afford to pay the expenses. Ah, indeed! If it was Mr. Beecher's business to send her away, why would Tilton have ever thought of saying whether he was able or not able to pay Mr. Beecher's bills? Do you say that you are not able to pay your neighbor's hack bill? Does that question ever occur to you? Do you ever use any such language about paying your neighbor's hack bill? If this was Mr. Beecher's affair—if she was to go away for his protection, and not Mr. Tilton's—why did Mr. Moulton use the remarkable language that “she ought to be got out of town, but Mr. Tilton cannot afford to pay the expenses?”

You cannot have a more explicit acknowledgment, gentlemen, that it was understood by all the parties, that it was an affair which Mr. Tilton was to pay, but an expense which he could not afford to incur, because of his reduced condition in consequence of his dismissal. And therefore, in the interest of peace, when they are getting everybody to retract and are seeking to repair Mr. Tilton's character—everybody is to retract that has ever said anything against him—they say it is indispensable to his salvation from this girl that she be got out of Brooklyn, but he could not afford to pay the expenses. Then Mr. Beecher says: “If it will be doing a favor to Mr. Tilton, I will pay the expenses of sending her to school; I will meet these expenses; Mr. Tilton is in reduced circumstances; Mr. Tilton's income has been cut off; if it is really necessary to his restoration that this girl should be got away where she cannot talk, why send her to school and I will pay the expenses.” And now these men come in, gentlemen, and attempt by their oath to turn upon Mr. Beecher a transaction that was instituted and carried forward, as the written documents which we have already introduced, as the evidence which we shall further introduce will show you, for Tilton's benefit. Yet, that has been made a badge of crime against Mr. Beecher. But, gentlemen, they soon found that reinstatement was impossible; Bowen could not or would not take Mr. Tilton back. Therefore, the scheme of The Golden Age was started. That history, gentlemen, you know; I shall not dwell upon it. Sufficient to say that it was started under auspices that were favorable and that Mr. Tilton believed he was going to have a great success in that paper, and he probably would have had a success in it but for a misfortune which he was led to commit in the Summer following, in writing Mrs. Woodhull's life—if we can call a man's follies misfortunes, then we will call that Mr. Tilton's misfortune.

INCONSISTENT UTTERANCES COMMENTED ON.

There is another fact, gentlemen, that transpired at the interview on January 3d or 4th, to which I desire to call your attention. It is the interview where Mr. Beecher meets Mr. Tilton, at Mr. Moulton's house, early in January, when Mr. Tilton cut him, you will remember; did not receive him cordially. I call your attention to it briefly in support of the theory that we are now attempting to bring before you, that the action of all of these parties has been inconsistent with adultery. Mr. Moulton says that Mr. Tilton did not recognize Mr. Beecher cordially at their first meeting, after January, and he upbraided him for it. He says: “Why, Mr. Beecher has done all he could; he has apologized. You ought to accept it; you ought to recognize him, and I don't like to have you treat a guest in my house in this way.”

Well, now, gentlemen, are you prepared to believe that Francis D. Moulton used such language as that to an injured husband who was meeting the seducer of his wife? And he talked to Mr. Tilton so severely that Mr. Tilton did recognize Mr. Beecher. I do not dwell on it; I only call it to your mind for the purpose of showing simply that their actions are entirely inconsistent with the theory which they now seek to advance. It is impossible that a man can upbraid another for not shaking hands with one who has done him such a great wrong as that, the first time meeting him after such a disclosure. It would be an insult and an outrage which I do not think even Moulton could be guilty of perpetrating upon his most admired friend.

Then comes the correspondence of February 7, where three letters, gentlemen, were written on the same day, written, as Mr. Tilton tells you, at Mr. Moulton's suggestion. All these writings are done at their suggestion. Mr. Beecher is told, “You had better write; there is some object that you can accomplish by a letter; now write.” And the three letters are written, two by Mr. Beecher—one to Mrs. Tilton and the other to Mr. Moulton—and a letter by Tilton to Moulton. Now, the object of those letters, gentlemen, is very obvious: it is to make more complete the reconciliation which these parties had attempted to inaugurate. The men were reconciled after this interview at Mr. Moulton's house to which I have just alluded, but the woman was sulky; the woman was resentful at her treatment; she was not entirely reconciled. She was recovering in health; they were not entirely sure that when she got out from under that roof again she would not go to talking. She did not admire the manner in which she had been treated by her husband, and they wanted to make doubly sure of that fact; so they got Mr. Beecher to write this woman a letter, using all the influence that he had upon her, urging her to live with her husband, to submit to the wrongs that she was called upon to endure, and to build up and restore the peace and unity of her family. That was on the 7th of February. But there is a remark in the letter which Mr. Beecher writes Moulton to which I desire to call your attention, gentlemen. It is in the line of the thought which I am now advancing, that the conduct of these parties shows conclusively that they were not dealing in regard to an admitted adultery, for in that letter of Mr. Beecher to Mr. Moulton, speaking of Mr. Tilton, he says: “My earnest longing is to see her in the full sympathy of her nature at rest in him, and to see him once more trusting her and loving her with even a better than the old love.” Is not that a remarkable sentence for a man to write to the most intimate friend of a husband who has been outraged by his wife being debauched by her pastor, for that pastor to say to his friend: “I hope to see that husband loving the wife with more even than the old love”—love her better than he ever did because of this act and after it? Is it possible that if this was an admitted adultery, and this man had forgiven his wife, that Henry Ward Beecher could be urging upon this mutual friend, this dearest friend of this husband, that this husband should love the wife better than he ever did before? Wouldn't a man be quite contented if he could see the husband love her as well as he ever did before? Gentlemen, that Henry Ward Beecher was writing of his supposed affection which this woman had for him, and had assured Mr. Tilton that he had never intended any wrong to him, that if his wife's affections had become alienated it had been by his unconscious act, and he was suggesting undoubtedly that if Mr. Tilton would be more attentive at home, show his wife more attention, he could win back her affections, and he trusted to see that family which had thus been alienated and shattered restored and built up, and the affection existing between husband and wife greater than it had ever been before—that is consistent; that is honorable; that is reasonable. But the suggestion that the husband should love a wife who had been debauched better than he ever loved her before, is a suggestion, I am sure, that never could have emanated from the pen of Henry Ward Beecher.

MR. BEECHER NOT VISITED BY MRS. TILTON.

Then there are other correspondence passing along from that 7th of February during that Winter, to which I shall not call your attention, except one, gentlemen. They have introduced a letter here from Mr. Beecher, which they say was an invitation to Mrs. Tilton to visit him at his house during the absence of his wife, and while his sister kept house for him. Now, we shall end all that, gentlemen, by showing that if that was such an invitation, or was understood to be such an invitation, that Mrs. Tilton never, as matter of fact, did visit Henry Ward Beecher at his house. I shall not stop to discuss, and it is not my purpose to discuss, the effect of the construction to be put upon that letter, but I simply announce to you the fact that no such visit ever did take place. She did not call upon Henry Ward Beecher at his house during that Winter. The sister was keeping house, and the sister will be introduced on the stand and will so tell you. So will all the other letters, upon which I cannot dwell at present—I mean the later letters that passed in that Winter.

THE INQUEST AS TO THE PATERNITY OF MR. TILTON'S SON, A FABRICATION.

Nor will I stop to consider the monstrous story which this plaintiff has told you concerning a remarkable interview which he says occurred between him and Mr. Beecher when they held an inquest over the paternity of the last child of Mr. Tilton. The monstrosity of such a story is sufficient to shock the moral sense of any man who is compelled to listen to it. You will not believe, gentlemen, that any such interview ever occurred. We shall show you what did occur there by the witness who was present and who took part in it. That was a friendly interview, and it was one in which Mr. Tilton expressed a wish that the past be buried, and that the old relations of Mr. Beecher to that family be restored, and he resume his visits—a fact which is quite inconsistent with adultery. But, for reasons which are obvious to you, while Mr. Beecher had the deepest sympathy for this woman, and while he had the highest regard for her, he, of course, under the circumstances, would not renew his visits to that family, and never did.

The next important fact in this history to which I wish to call your attention now, gentlemen, is the acquaintance of this plaintiff and his relations with Mrs. Woodhull. [To Judge Neillson.] I see, your Honor, it is five minutes to one o'clock. Perhaps, before I enter upon that subject, as it will take some time, we had better take our recess.

Judge Neillson [To the Jury]—Please return punctually at 3 o'clock, gentlemen.

The Court then took a recess until two o'clock.

MR. TILTON'S RELATIONS WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Tracy—Gentlemen, we have now approached the period of time in this case when the plaintiff says he first made the acquaintance of Victoria Woodhull. Something of the history of that acquaintance, gentlemen, has already been detailed to you from the witness stand. You know something of the character and public position of Mrs. Woodhull, of her principles and the manner in which she advocated them, and the fact of this acquaintance of Theodore Tilton with her has also been brought to your attention. It is conceded that in September, 1871, he wrote and published a biography of Mrs. Woodhull. That has not been introduced in evidence to you, the whole of it, at least, but enough has been introduced to show you something of the character of the work, and the fact that he published it is admitted. He tells you, gentlemen, that that acquaintance of his with Mrs. Woodhull was a misfortune to him, and he has stated in various ways that it was a great misfortune, a great calamity to him. That that was the secret of Mr. Tilton's failure in his newspaper enterprise, The Golden Age, I have no doubt, at least that that was sufficient to prevent success, if success had otherwise been possible. But the most remarkable feature of his evidence in this connection, and the one which I desire briefly to call your attention, is that he attempts to charge the existence of that acquaintance, and his association with Mrs. Woodhull to the defendant in this suit; even the writing of that Life, even his falling in love and becoming infatuated with this woman, is all on account of the defendant, and for his sake, and on account of his wife's sake. The period which he assigns for the beginning of this acquaintance, is a very remarkable one. He fixes it about May 23, 1871, and he tells you that before that time he had not known Mrs. Woodhull. He represents to you, gentlemen, as he is bound to do on his theory of his case, that his acquaintance with her being for the purpose of preventing her from publishing this scandal, was entirely pure on his part, that he never saw Victoria Woodhull guilty of any impropriety, and his relations with her have been always entirely proper. Because, you perceive, as he perceives, that if he was compelled to admit that improper relations existed between himself and Mrs. Woodhull, even he could hardly have the presumption to say that that was for the sake of Henry Ward Beecher, or for the sake of his wife. Therefore he makes his acquaintance with her merely casual, having been brought into relations with her on account of her knowledge of this scandal, and never pursuing that acquaintance beyond what was necessary, or what he deemed to be necessary to induce her to suppress it, and not to publish it. Now, if it should transpire, gentlemen, that this is a misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Tilton, you will at once perceive how fatal it is to his case. If he has presumed, under the solemnity of an oath, to account to you and to this community for the remarkable relation which existed between himself and Victoria Woodhull—to account for it on account of this scandal and its existence, and his apprehension that she might give publicity to it, when that statement is untrue—why, of course I need not say to you that no man would give credence to anything he has said here from the witness stand.

THE PUBLICATION OF THE WOODHULL SCANDAL SOUGHT BY MR. TILTON.

If we satisfy you, gentlemen, that his acquaintance with that woman, whether it originated at the time he says it did or before, whether it was as chaste and exceptionable as he pretends it was or not—if we succeed in satisfying you that that acquaintance did not originate and was not continued by him for the purpose of inducing her to suppress this scandal, then we contradict him on a vital point of this case. I shall not detain you, gentlemen, by a detailed statement of what we shall show in this particular; but if it should happen to transpire that Mr. Tilton's acquaintance with this woman did not begin when he says it did; if it went to a degree that he says it did not; if it was carried on for the purpose of inducing this publication instead of suppressing it, then his attempted explanation of his acquaintance with Mrs. Woodhull will prove to him the most fatal part of this case.

That he went down to Coney Island with her in a carriage is admitted by him. He denies that he went bathing with her. We shall satisfy you, gentlemen, that he is mistaken in that particular; at least, we shall prove to you by evidence that will satisfy you, that when they arrived at Coney Island on that occasion, they deposited their watches in the custody of the coachman, and they went to the sea shore, as if to bathe, all, of course, for the sake of Mr. Beecher, and to preserve him from this scandalous publication! And we shall show you that when they returned the golden locks of Mr. Tilton were damp, with the mists of the ocean, at least, or, perhaps, he will say that they were dampened by the perspiration that he suffered on account of the agony that he was enduring for the sake of Henry Ward Beecher, in his associations with Mrs. Woodhull down on the sea coast at that time. We shall show you that they returned to the carriage with all the evidences that they had been bathing together. We shall show you, gentlemen, what is not in fact disputed here, that when he drove them back to this city, they stopped at the house, I think, of Moulton, and late in the evening they ordered a covered carriage and he went home with Mrs. Woodhull. We shall show you that he discharged the carriage at that house, and the coachman left him there, where, we suppose, he remained all night, all for the sake of Mrs. Tilton, and to save her from the apprehended scandal that Mrs. Woodhull was threatening to publish! We probably shall leave little doubt on your minds, gentlemen, before this evidence closes, that Mr. Tilton used that acquaintance with Victoria Woodhull to stimulate this woman to the publication of this scandal rather than to its suppression. Unless I am very much mistaken, we shall show these two parties colluding together upon this subject. Unless I am misinformed, or misapprehend the force of our evidence, we shall show these parties in consultation together. We probably shall show you that the slip, substantially as published afterwards, was in circulation in the newspaper offices long before that publication, and I think we shall leave no doubt in your minds that Theodore Tilton knew it and understood it. If we do this, and we bring you to the conclusion that Theodore Tilton was using the acquaintance of this woman to induce her to make this publication instead of suppressing it, what becomes of his oath upon this point, and his credibility as a witness upon any other point in the case?

I need not dwell, gentlemen, to you, on the fact that Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton induced Mrs. Moulton to go over for this woman and bring her to the house of Moulton in this city, not once, but twice, thrice, I think even more than that, as I remember her evidence. I need not dwell upon the fact that this biography of his was published September 14, in The New-York Sun, as we shall show you. It has already transpired about what time it was published. It was published about the same time that he published the free-love article in The Golden Age. The two publications were almost simultaneous, and his publication of his principles of free love in The Golden Age is published, as we shall show you, almost in the precise language in which Mrs. Woodhull announced her views upon the same question about the same time. This publication, gentlemen, was fatal, as I have said, to Mr. Tilton's prospects as a journalist. The indignation which that publication brought upon him from one end of the country to the other was evidence to him that his fate was sealed as the editor of a great newspaper in this country, unless he could devise some plan for relieving himself from that burden. But not only did he publish that Life, but we have shown you that he presided at the Steinway Hall meeting, and introduced her there. We have had the evidence of Mr. Moulton as to his speech. We shall present probably a more authentic report of it than has yet been presented, and show you that he introduced her as the advocate of social freedom; and what that meant in his mind, and in hers, there will be no room for doubt.

MR. TILTON'S PURPOSE IN TRYING TO MAKE MR. BEECHER AND MRS. WOODHULL INTIMATES.

But Theodore Tilton was not content with associating with Mrs. Woodhull himself, but he attempted to involve Mr. Beecher in that association; and what was the motive, gentlemen? Having involved himself in difficulty by this indiscreet publication, his effort was to compel Mr. Beecher to relieve him, or to come to his relief; in other words, having found that he had taken upon his shoulders a load greater than he could bear, he undertook to "unload," in the language of "the street," on Mr. Beecher, and he wanted Mr. Beecher to come forward before the public to indorse this woman in some way, so that to everybody who assailed him for publishing her life he could point to the pastor of Plymouth Church and say: "Truly, I published her biography, but Henry Ward Beecher indorsed the woman and her sentiments at Steinway Hall. If you have got any quarrel with me you have the same quarrel with Henry Ward Beecher. This woman is a good woman. This woman is a pure woman. An enthusiast she may be, but the fact that Henry Ward Beecher has indorsed her is evidence of her purity, and does not enable any man to condemn me for having published her biography." That was his effort. It was the scheme of himself and Moulton, and it is the explanation of their efforts to induce Mr. Beecher to preside at that Steinway Hall meeting. I have no doubt if we could penetrate the inner recesses of the thoughts of these three persons, it would transpire that the Steinway Hall meeting was devised for no other purpose than to induce Mr. Beecher to preside at it, and thus indorse this woman, and thus to that extent relieve Theodore Tilton from the scandal and the obloquy that he had brought upon himself by publishing that Life. That Life, as I say, was published in September.

MRS. WOODHULL THE CAUSE OF MR. TILTON'S RUIN.

On the 1st of November he published the poem that has been given in evidence here, known as "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," and the object of that, although it is denied by Mr. Tilton, is perfectly obvious. There had been comparative peace from the 7th of February, in this matter, until November 1st. There had been no outbreak; there had been no scandal; there had been nothing but such a circulation as was given to it by the whisperings of Tilton and one or two others who were quietly circulating stories injurious to Mr. Beecher. What their nature or what their character was we do not know, but there had been to a certain extent circulations injurious to his character in this connection; but there had been no outbreak, and no outbreak had been threatened. None would have been made, gentlemen, if Theodore Tilton had remained prosperous. If he had not made this blunder of writing the Life of this woman, if he had not become so infatuated with her as to have lost his head and made a fool of himself, if he had gone on prosperously in The Golden Age, having a fair future before him, I have no idea that any publication would ever have been made, or any allusion made to his troubles. The history of this case shows to you, gentlemen, that whenever Theodore Tilton was prosperous, or whenever he had a future before him, he was as silent as the grave concerning this scandal. It was only when in adversity, only when he was down and was requiring help to be lifted, only when he was involved in difficulty and was demanding that Mr. Beecher should put his hand beneath him and raise him up, that he ever bruited this scandal at all. Then in September, I say, at the time of this publication, all was prosperous, but he had involved himself in difficulty; Mr. Beecher did not come forward to indorse Mrs. Woodhull, or to relieve him from that difficulty. It is well known, and will be shown to you, that Mr. Beecher always repudiated that relation of Tilton with Mrs. Woodhull. From the beginning to the end he told him it was disastrous to him. From the beginning to the end he always told him: "There is no power on earth can lift you into the respect of the people of this country without you repudiate absolutely your relations with this woman." That was the position that Henry Ward Beecher always held to Mr. Tilton. It is the language he always used from beginning to end. "You must repudiate your relation there; you must cast her off; you must say to the people that in some way or other you have made a mistake, and you repent of it; henceforward your conduct will be entirely free from just cause of complaint in this particular."

THE SIR MARMADUKE POEM A MENACE TO MR. BEECHER.

But Mr. Beecher not moving, Mr. Tilton must give him a menace, he must give him a threat, he must do something to alarm him, something to stir him up, to make him go forward to aid him out of the difficulty into which he had fallen with the Woodhulls. So on the 1st of November he published what is known as "Sir Marmaduke's Musings." The first verse of it is:

"I won a noble fame,
But, with a sudden frown,
The people snatched my crown,
And in the mire trod down
My lofty name."

What had happened to have the people with a sudden frown snatch the crown of Theodore Tilton on the first of November, 1873? What but his relations with Victoria Woodhull and his doctrine of Free Love, which he had before published in The Independent and The Golden Age. There was nothing known to the public that could have justified that first verse in this poem except his known relations with that woman. It was that and that only to which he alluded. But the poem was an excuse merely to publish the following verse:

"I clasped a woman's breast,
As if her heart I knew,
Or fancied would be true,
But proved—alas, she too,
False like the rest."

And yet he tells you, gentlemen, that although the story of the scandal had been circulated among a large number of people, although it was known to the Woodhulls, as he says, the May previous, who had threatened to make it public, and who had published a card which called attention to the fact that some prominent minister in Brooklyn was living a life of adultery with the wife of another prominent teacher in Brooklyn, although it had circulated among his handful of friends, and how far it had gone he did not know, yet he tells you that when he published that verse he had no idea that anybody would think that he referred to his own wife. Do you believe it?

According to his own showing the story had been in circulation for nearly a year. How extensive it was he could not know, but he did know that rumor of a domestic infidelity in his own family had been given a considerable circulation in this community. Could he be so dull as not to understand that the publication of that poem over his own signature would be a confession, to every person who had heard it, of that rumor, that the rumor was true, in whatever form they may have heard it? Whether it was of adultery, or of improper proposals, or an undue affection; no matter, I repeat, in what form they had heard the rumor, every person who heard the rumor of a domestic difficulty in the family of Theodore Tilton would have taken that poem as a confirmation of its truth. Didn't he know it would be so received? Can it be possible he did not know it? And yet, he tells you from the witness stand that if he supposed any person could have imagined that that had reference to his own domestic troubles, he would have suffered his right hand to be cut off before he would have published it. I say that that was a menace; it was to send alarm to Mr. Beecher; it was to say to him: "Sir, you must come up to my rescue and my relief, or you will be scandalized by this report." And, immediately following that publication, on the 1st of November, was started the Steinway Hall meeting, where they attempted to induce—not only induce, but by threats, to compel Mr. Beecher to preside. And it is a remarkable fact in this scandal, gentlemen—it has been once stated and proved, and probably will be again, that in his relations with the Woodhull women, he was much more solicitous on account of his wife and Mr. Beecher than they were for themselves. For it is true that Mrs. Tilton, notwithstanding the threats and arguments by which he attempted to persuade her to acquiesce in his relations with this woman, always scouted her and always defied her. She never feared the slanders of Mrs. Woodhull, and she never accepted the arguments of her husband that it was necessary to placate this woman and prevent her circulating stories derogatory to her character. She would not have the Woodhull women in her house; and you see when Mr. Beecher was attempted to be induced to preside at this meeting and to indorse this woman, he faced everything rather than consent to it. He said: "Let her do her worst; you, Theodore Tilton, do your worst; no power on God's earth shall induce me to indorse the principles that this woman advocates."

NOTHING BUT HOSTILITY AFTER THE STEINWAY HALL MEETING.

In confirmation of the fact which I have just stated, that Mr. Tilton's pecuniary wants were always the standard by which you could determine what his course was to be about these slanders, I am just reminded by my learned advocate that, at the very time of the publication of this "Sir Marmaduke's Musings," and this effort to compel Mr. Beecher to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting, Mr. Tilton had just overdrawn his account at Woodruff & Robinson's—had no money—out of money. The importance of that will be made apparent as we go along to another point of this case. But I refer to another fact, gentlemen, in evidence, in support of my view that the Steinway Hall meeting was designed for the purpose of compelling Mr. Beecher to relieve Mr. Tilton from the load of obloquy which rested upon him; and that his refusal to do so was regarded as an act of hostility by Mr. Tilton, and was so treated by Mr. Moulton; and that, from that time forward, they have never been anything but pretended friends, certainly; that whatever they may have pretended to Mr. Beecher, their course has been one of secret hostility, which has never ceased for a single moment. And, in support of that, I refer you to a letter of February 5, 1872. That is the long letter, written to Moulton on the 5th of February, 1872, which is known on this trial as the "Ragged Edge Letter." It is one in which Mr. Beecher, you remember, refers to his having upon his hands his church, his book, and his newspaper, and his being so absorbed in these labors and his course of lecturing abroad; he was necessarily taken away from the society of Moulton; saw but little of him, while he had Tilton constantly under his presence; and, therefore, was continuously impressed with Tilton's needs and necessities, which he could not necessarily be with the situation of Mr. Beecher. You will remember the letter. I only desire to call your attention to a single phase of this letter in this connection for the purpose of illustrating the point that I am now making. Mr. Beecher says:

For all this Fall and Winter I have felt that you did not feel satisfied with me, and that I seemed both to you and Tilton as contenting myself with a cautious or sluggish policy, willing to save myself but not to risk anything for Tilton.

"All this Fall and Winter;" that is going back to his refusal to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting, which was the preceding November. That is the beginning of the coldness of Moulton towards Beecher; or, in other words, it is the commencement of a feeling on his part that he could not induce Beecher to come forward and indorse this woman for the purpose of saving Theodore Tilton. That was on the 5th of February, 1872. About that time, you remember, gentlemen, that Tilton went West on a lecturing tour. He had had his compensation with Bowen, or rather his controversy with Bowen, for his compensation had been pending under the charge of Moulton from January 1st, 1871. It was now February, 1872, and he had not been paid. No money had been received on account of it. He goes West in 1872, and returns discouraged. He finds the public hostility against him so great that he cannot withstand it. They did not understand how it was that his relations with The Independent and The Union were so suddenly and mysteriously severed. Bowen still held out and refused to pay. The Golden Age was failing, and was not paying expenses, and Tilton's money was again exhausted. Something must be done to replenish his treasury, and that claim against Bowen must be pushed to a successful issue, and that amount received, or The Golden Age and all its prospects must collapse.

DOUBLE PURPOSE OF THE BOWEN LETTER.

And you remember, gentlemen, the letter which he wrote to Bowen on the 2d of January, 1871, immediately after his dismissal by that gentleman, in which he recounts, item by item, the different slanders which he said Bowen repeated against Henry Ward Beecher at the interview on the 30th of December. He wrote that letter. What was his motive? We say it was twofold: First, to show Beecher that if he did not sever the union between himself and Bowen, and make peace with Tilton, he would have to subject himself to the publication of this letter, and to this open scandal which would arise from its publication, because Tilton would publish to the world the accusations which Bowen had made against Beecher—the fact that he had instigated Tilton to write that letter, and that that had led to his dismissal. He pretends to say that he deemed the publication of that letter necessary to a proper explanation of his dismissal. At all events, its preparation and its threatened use showed Beecher that if he persisted in the hostility to Tilton, and continued his relations with Bowen, and so took Bowen's side of the fight, that letter would be published, and he would have to confront the public scandal which would arise from it. It was used as a menace to Bowen by saying, "Sir, I publish this letter to the world; I inform the world over my own signature that in that interview you repeated those horrible scandals against Henry Ward Beecher. You instigated me to write that letter. You promised to support it. You promised to bear it to Mr. Beecher yourself. You have borne it to him as my friend, and you basely deserted me and joined him, and that is the explanation of my dismissal."

MR. BOWEN A VICTIM OF A BLACKMAILING SCHEME.

It was a missile, therefore, that was prepared to be hurled against both of these men; but it had another object. He knew that Henry C. Bowen would never dare to face those accusations against Henry Ward Beecher. He knew that Bowen would compromise or adjust those difficulties in some manner, because he would never take the responsibility of fathering such a scandal as that. He hoped, probably, in its first preparation, to induce Bowen to compromise and patch up a peace by which he would be taken back; but, when that failed, he knew it could be used for extorting the money. Moulton himself tells you, gentlemen—and it is a most significant sentence, one which I hope was so impressed upon your minds when it fell from the lips of that witness that it has not left your minds, and will not leave them until this case is finally decided—he told you that that letter was prepared to be used to negotiate with Bowen. Ah! it was a business letter. Tilton had an eye to business in everything that he did in this transaction. It was business from beginning to end. Whether his wife's virtue, or his own character was involved, it was all brought to the standard of business—business; and this letter reciting those horrible stories and accusations was prepared that it might be used to negotiate with Bowen, says Moulton, and it was used, as I will show you, gentlemen, as few documents have ever been used in a Christian community, for the purpose of extorting money from a man who denied his liability. A suit had been instituted, but that didn't bring Bowen to terms. Bowen is not frightened at law suits. But accusations against prominent clergymen are quite a different matter with him. The law suit had not compelled him to pay. An intimation that that paper might possibly be used had not induced him to pay. But when Tilton returned from the West, what does he do? He makes what he calls, or heads, "A Personal Statement," and he goes and sets it up in type in The Golden Age, as if he was to publish it—an explanation of the reasons why he was dismissed from The Union and Independent by Bowen, in which article you remember he incorporates that letter of Jan. 1st, 1871. He takes proof slips of that article—press copies, as they are technically known—and what does he do with them?

Now, gentlemen of the jury, Tilton tells you that he felt impelled to make a publication of the reasons which had led to his dismissal in order to satisfy the public. He took press copies, and he took pains to have it shown to Bowen, as if he was going to publish it, and he takes one of these press copies himself to Samuel Wilkeson, as we shall show you, an owner in The Christian Union, largely interested in the publishing house of Ford & Co., who were Mr. Beecher's publishers, and he told him that he should publish that article unless Henry Ward Beecher did him justice. Not unless Henry C. Bowen did him justice. That would have produced no effect at all upon Samuel Wilkeson, but he took it to Wilkeson, a friend of Beecher, a man deeply interested in the reputation and prosperity of Mr. Beecher as a writer and a newspaper editor; a man who was to suffer a large pecuniary loss if anything happened to Mr. Beecher which should injure his usefulness in this respect. His house had invested a large sum of money in the book which Mr. Beecher was then preparing—"The Life of Christ." It was then uncompleted. Wilkeson saw at a glance that if that article was published it would produce a public scandal, which he told Tilton, then and there, would shake Christendom, and he says: "Tilton, you must not think of making this publication. What has Mr. Beecher done to you?" Says Tilton: "He did nothing to save me when Bowen dismissed me. He could by the lifting of his little finger have saved me, but when I lay upon the sidewalks in Brooklyn, deprived of my position, deprived of my opportunity for pecuniary profit and fame; when he saw me lying helpless upon the sidewalk he passed by on the other side; he did nothing; he refused to aid me, and now he must do me justice." Bear in mind, gentlemen, that Henry Ward Beecher owed Theodore Tilton nothing. Theodore Tilton apparently was not seeking to extort money from Henry Ward Beecher, but he was seeking to obtain what he claimed was due him from Bowen. If he was prosecuting an honest claim, why did he go to the friend of Henry Ward Beecher about it at all? Why didn't he go to Mr. Bowen? We shall show you he did cause the letter to be communicated to Bowen by another hand—a threatened publication. Did he ever intend to publish, gentlemen? Was that letter prepared by Theodore Tilton with an honest intention to publish it, for the purpose of making this explanation to the public, which he pretends to have thought necessary; or, was it prepared for the sole and single purpose of being exhibited to the friends of Mr. Beecher and the friends of Bowen, to compel Bowen to settle this account, and to compel Beecher's friends to insist to Bowen that he should settle that account? On this important point, I will cite no other witness against Theodore Tilton but Theodore Tilton himself. If I satisfy you, gentlemen, that his pretense that he prepared that article with a view to publication was untrue, but that his whole object was to extort the payment of his claim, which he said Bowen owed him, and to induce Mr. Beecher and his friends to insist to Bowen that he should pay him—I say if I satisfy you that was his only object, then I show Theodore Tilton engaged in a transaction that can be truly called by no other name than that of blackmail, for no man is at liberty to resort to threatening a publication, or creating a scandal against a man in order to compel the settlement of a disputed claim.

You see, gentlemen, that if the allegation upon which Henry C. Bowen discharged Tilton, to wit, his immoralities, which rendered it unsafe and improper for him to continue his relations upon the paper, had been true, he could have successfully defended any action that Theodore Tilton might bring against him. He had brought his action, and Bowen had not paid. That this article was prepared for the purpose of extorting this money, as I have said, I cite no other witness against Tilton than Tilton himself. Now, what does he tell you? He says that this article was prepared and set up, and two or three copies of it struck off; that the type was then "locked up," the proof corrected, in which Oliver Johnson assisted him, and one or two copies struck off—not over two he says—and he accounts for every copy, you remember, or attempts to, and then, says he, the type was immediately distributed. I want to know how he could publish it in The Golden Age. If he set up this article, and struck off only three or four copies to be used for private circulation, to be exhibited to Bowen and to Beecher and their friends, and then immediately distributed the type, how could he have made the publication? The fact that that type was distributed immediately upon the striking off of these one or two extra copies, gentlemen, is conclusive evidence that he never intended to make the publication, never expected to make the publication. He got his copies so that he could show the people that he was about to make the publication; so that he could say to them he would make the publication, but he never intended to make it. He intended to use it simply for the purpose of compelling the payment of this money, and when he got his press copies he said he immediately caused the type to be distributed.

MR. WILKESON'S DISINTERESTED MEDIATION.

But, having got his press copies, then he proceeds to use them, and, as I say, he called upon Mr. Wilkeson, Mr. Beecher's friend, and Mr. Wilkeson was horrified at the suggestion of such a publication as that. He saw at once the fire that it would kindle. He knew the scandal that it would create. He knew the shock it would produce to this entire community, and he said: "It will never do to make this publication, Mr. Tilton. If Mr. Bowen owes you money he must pay it, and I will see Mr. Beecher, and Mr. Beecher has friends in Brooklyn that can induce Henry C. Bowen to pay that money if he owes it to you; and I will undertake to see that you get your money from Mr. Bowen; at least I will aid you;" and Mr. Tilton said: "What a fortunate thing it was that I called on you this afternoon. I was walking along Fifth-ave., thinking how disastrous had been all my undertakings, how failure after failure had met me, and as I came along past this building, it occurred to me that my old friend Samuel Wilkeson was here, and I thought I would step in and see him. What a fortunate thing it was that I did. Some kind angel must have directed my steps hither." That was on the 29th day of March, 1872, and on the 3d day of April Theodore Tilton had a check in his pocket from Henry C. Bowen for $7,000.

Mr. Evarts—The 4th of April.

Mr. Tracy—I think the fact will turn out that the check was actually delivered on the evening of the 3d, Mr. Evarts, but dated the following day. The check that bears date on the 4th of April, I think it will transpire in the evidence, was actually given and written on the evening of the 3d. However, the time I don't know, but it was either on the evening of the 3d or on the 4th day of April, after this remarkable conversation between Tilton and Wilkeson on Fifth-ave. After the good angel had directed Tilton's steps to the residence of his old acquaintance, he had his $7,000 in his pocket.

THE BREACH OF FAITH MADE UNDER THE TRIPARTITE AGREEMENT.

I don't say that Henry C. Bowen was blackmailed, gentlemen. Oh! no. I don't say but what he owed Theodore Tilton honestly that money under his contracts. I presume he did. It is very clear that Tilton satisfied Wilkeson that he did; and the probability is that Bowen did owe him and ought to have paid him. I don't say how that is; I don't know how it is; I don't care how it is; I only know that the claim had been in existence for 15 months, and a suit had been brought and Mr. Bowen had not paid, and I know that when Theodore Tilton came home from the West and made his personal statement, and took three or four press copies of it, and had distributed the type, and then went to circulating the copies around among the friends of Beecher and Henry C. Bowen—I know the money came. It came as the result of an arbitration, which produced what is known to you as the "Tripartite Agreement," where all these difficulties were settled and adjusted, and where I shall show you, gentlemen, comes in another one of those marvelous breaches of faith that have characterized this plaintiff and his "mutual friend" from the beginning of this unhappy controversy to the present time. I shall show you now a fact which will leave no doubt, I take it, in your minds, if it be true—and we shall make it clear by evidence that even the plaintiff, I think, will hardly dare dispute—that it was distinctly understood and agreed, not only that all the difficulties between Henry C. Bowen and Henry Ward Beecher, but all the difficulties between Theodore Tilton and Henry C. Bowen and all the difficulties between Theodore Tilton and Henry Ward Beecher were all to be compromised and adjusted in that arbitration and settlement. And further, gentlemen, that when that arbitration was concluded and the tripartite agreement settled upon, it was distinctly understood and agreed that every one of the papers connected with this scandal should be destroyed. That was a part of the arbitration; it was a part of the agreement; that peace was to be final, and no party to that contract was to be at liberty, or to have the means hereafter of reviving any of the scandals settled or adjusted there. This was in 1872, you will remember, and the paper then known as the apology, which had been obtained from Mr. Beecher on the first of January, the retraction, and the accusation then existed in this scandal, and were in the hands of Francis D. Moulton, Mr. Tilton had from Mr. Bowen, what Mr.

Bowen very much desired to recover, a letter known as the Woodstock letter. That was to be surrendered, and all the other papers were to be destroyed.

Now, we shall prove that, gentlemen. But how did this gentleman and his "Mutual Friend" carry out the agreement? I say the same breach of good faith which has characterized every act of theirs was found in this. They agreed to destroy, but they never did destroy. The only paper connected with this scandal that has disappeared from the archives of Mr. Moulton is that most important paper of all, that I alluded to before you, the paper on which Theodore Tilton accused Henry Ward Beecher on the night of the 30th of December. That paper has disappeared. That paper, they say, was destroyed after the tripartite agreement, and in consequence of the tripartite agreement. Don't forget that, gentlemen. They tell you their excuse, and their only excuse for destroying that paper, for picking it out from among the mass of papers held by Moulton, and destroying it, was that the destruction of that followed in consequence of the "tripartite agreement." They do not admit, of course, that it was a part of the "tripartite agreement" that it should be destroyed; but they destroyed it afterwards, and in consequence of it. Why didn't they destroy all the papers then? They had agreed to. Why did they select this one paper, which, if it existed to-day, this case could not stir one single step? Why did they pick that out from among the mass and get rid of that paper, and yet hold Mr. Beecher's papers in their possession, which afterwards, by means of oral confessions and oral testimony, they could make to mean whatever they chose to make them mean? And the question I am putting to you, gentlemen, all through this case is, whether these parties have been acting in good faith—have been fulfilling their agreements and their arrangements which they have entered into from time to time. I say they have not. I say they have been conspirators all this time against Henry Ward Beecher; and if I show you that, in any important point of this case, they have been guilty of breach of faith, that they have violated their contracts, and have obtained advantages by fraud which they have afterwards retained and used against him, that is evidence sufficient to show that they are conspirators, and have been manipulating this defendant from the beginning to the end, with the view of holding this man in their power so long as they could use him, and when they could do that no longer to destroy him if they could.

THE AWARD CONSEQUENT ON THE COVENANT.

One word more upon the "tripartite agreement." Tilton tells you on his cross-examination, gentlemen, that the signing of the "tripartite agreement" had nothing whatever to do with the award of the money that was awarded; that the money had been paid, and it had been actually received by him some time before there was anything at all said about this "tripartite agreement;" that it was a subsequent suggestion, brought up and signed by mutual consent, in no manner resting upon this arbitration. There, gentlemen, we shall show you he is not truthful. On the contrary, we shall show you that the very first step in this arbitration was the "tripartite agreement," and the award followed the agreement to sign, and not the agreement to sign followed the award. We shall show you that, two days before this check was prepared and before this award was made, that the tripartite agreement was drafted, and was presented to this plaintiff, and he objected to a clause of it, and all his objections were fixed and arranged, and that the paper as agreed to by him finally to be signed, and as it was finally signed by him, was presented on the night of the arbitration, and was assented to in the presence of the arbitrators before they made any award at all, or considered the question of award; and that after this "tripartite agreement" had been fixed upon, and all its terms settled satisfactory to Tilton, then the arbitrators withdrew into another room, heard his statement and Moulton's statement and Bowen's statement, and then made the award. Then the "tripartite agreement" was taken by Mr. Wilkeson and engrossed—it having been in detached pieces and erased and interlined—engrossed by Mr. Wilkeson, just as it was agreed upon by the parties that night, and then it was signed; but the agreement to sign it and the terms of the agreement were all fixed before the arbitration commenced at all, and was a matter that preceded the arbitration. Now, we shall show you that, unless I am misinformed by all the arbitrators who took part in the controversy. Well, gentlemen, Mr. Tilton got his $7,000 from Bowen, and was then in a prosperous condition. It is a remarkable fact, however, that just as he got the $7,000, his dear friend, Mr. Woodruff, took advantage of that $7,000 to get relieved from his subscription to The Golden Age, and all the parties got relieved from their subscriptions. If it should be necessary to go into that question further (it is not very important and we may not do so), but if it is necessary, we shall have no difficulty in showing you that Mr. Woodruff urged the other parties to accept these terms, on the distinct ground that the paper was to fail; that he had no confidence in it himself, and said it never could succeed, owing to Mr. Tilton's fatal connection with the Woodhull woman—that he himself was entirely disgusted with the whole crowd, and wanted to get out of it, and that he urged the other subscribers to get out of it in the same way, and it was upon his argument and his suggestion that they did it. This was on the 4th or 5th of April.

MR. TILTON'S PART IN THE CAMPAIGN OF 1873.

You will remember that the Cincinnati Convention followed soon after, in the beginning of May. Mr. Tilton went to the Cincinnati Convention. He claims, in an article subsequently published in The Golden Age, that he suggested the nomination of Horace Greeley to that Convention. Whether he got it patented or not I do not know. But at all events he took a very prominent part in that campaign. He looked to the success of Horace Greeley as the opening of a new avenue to his own success; and it is fair to say that in the beginning of that campaign the prospect did not look unreasonable. He went into the campaign heartily, and all through the Summer of 1873 you observe there is no outbreak in regard to the scandal. The money had been got from Bowen; he had a future hope of success to be won in the election of Greeley; and he had every ambition to have no scandal that would injure him or his family, or injure any one; no inducement to promulgate the scandal; and he says he separated from the Woodhulls about that time. If he did, it is clear he separated from them on account of political reasons, and in the hope of having political promotion, because you have seen, gentlemen, by the correspondence we have introduced between himself and Horace Greeley, early in the previous year, how little sympathy Mr. Greeley had with the Woodhull woman or her doctrines; and it was very clear to the apprehension of Mr. Tilton, I think, that he could have no hope of success with Mr. Greeley if he continued his relations with Victoria C. Woodhull. He, once in his life, therefore, sacrificed his love to his political ambition. He entered into the campaign, as I say, with high hopes of success, and nothing occurred until the North Carolina election, which was calculated to quench those hopes. But soon after the Maine and Pennsylvania elections settled the fate of the Presidential campaign.

MR. TILTON AWARE THAT THE WOODHULL STORY WAS COMING.

He still, however, adhered to the fortunes of his leader, and was engaged in New-Hampshire, just before the election, at the time of this Woodhull publication. We may or we may not show, gentlemen, whether he was absent by accident or design at that time; but that he knew that this publication was to be made, and had known it for some time, I have no reasonable doubt. But the publication was made; and Mr. Greeley was defeated, and died soon after. Mr. Tilton's hopes of political success were gone in that direction.

That avenue to prosperity had been closed. He must now seek other and different avenues. For all remember, gentlemen, the sensation which that publication created, and the general expectation that some of the parties at least mentioned in that publication—not as principals, but as persons who had been the sources of information—would deny that they had thus given the information to Mrs. Woodhull. There were various parties named as the sources of information. Mrs. H. B. Stanton was one, who denied promptly, as you will remember. Mrs. Pauline Wright Davis was another, who at the time of its publication was in Europe, but who denied instantly, on its reaching her, that she had been the source of information to the extent imputed to her, or to any extent whatever. Francis D. Moulton was another person named in the publication as one of the sources of information; Theodore Tilton was another, and the publication rested entirely upon what was represented to be the information of these parties to the woman Woodhull. As I have said, Mrs. Stanton and Pauline Wright Davis denied it. It only remained for Moulton and Tilton to deny, and the Woodhull scandal would have been dead—dead absolutely, beyond the hope of a resurrection, without either of the principals, Henry Ward Beecher or Mrs. Tilton, touching it at all. But we have shown you that Tilton refused to deny, and there was a long delay. Nothing was heard from either Moulton or Tilton on the subject.

GEN. TRACY OFFERS A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Now, gentlemen, we have reached a stage of this case where, for reasons obvious, I suppose to you, and entirely so to me, my name has been dragged into this investigation, and it has been introduced in a way, by the plaintiff and his counsel, and his main witness, that leads me to make to you a personal statement of my relations to this investigation and to this scandal, from the beginning to the end of it, so far as they have connected me with it. I shall not follow necessarily the order of time, but I shall begin at the most recent date and go back—

GEN. TRACY'S EXPLANATION OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Tracy, do you propose to be a witness to what you are about to state?

Mr. Tracy—If necessary I do, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I submit to your Honor, that the gentleman has no right to make a long written personal statement in his opening to the jury, which he does not propose to verify as a witness. It is not the office of an opening.

Judge Neilson—I presume that the counsel proposes to be a witness to what he states in his opening.

Mr. Beach—I don't think, your Honor, that that is a reasonable presumption, when he states that he is making a personal explanation. I do not understand that there is any proposition that he is to be a witness to it.

Judge Neilson—No; we understand, however, that when counsel makes a statement he does so with the expectation of proving it in some way.

Mr. Beach—It would be so, ordinarily, Sir, if the counsel had not prefaced what he now professes to be a personal explanation, by his assurance that it was such, and thus withdrawing it from the ordinary statement that is made by counsel before a jury. Now, I, of course, Sir, speak with some little hesitation on this subject, because I am unwilling to deny to any professional gentlemen, whose conduct has been arraigned in the course of the trial, full opportunity to make a proper explanation to the Court; and if this was addressed to the Court in some other form than an opening to the jury, I should take no possible exception to it. But I do not perceive, Sir, that it falls within the scope and province of an opening, the rules of which have been very greatly exceeded already by the counsel to tender personal explanations to the jury.

Judge Neilson—It is proper only on the assumption that he proposes to prove, in some form, what he is about to state.

Mr. Beach—And, therefore, I asked the counsel whether he intended to become a witness to the explanation he now offers to the jury, and whether the statements in explanation were to be verified by him as a witness, or whether it was a mere personal exculpation of himself, not intended to be proved by witnesses.

Judge Neilson—In the latter event it would not be proper.

Mr. Beach—In that view, I addressed the inquiry to counsel, and I did not understand the learned counsel to avow that he was to be a witness.

Mr. Evans—If your Honor please, General Tracy's statement concerning the matters he now approaches shall be governed, and will be governed, by the same rules that guide counsel in opening matters in which they are not parties and are not witnesses; and in answer to the question put by my learned friend, General Tracy promptly answered that, if it was necessary, he should be a witness himself to prove it.

Judge Neilson—At the same time he would be at liberty to prove it otherwise.

Mr. Beach—That does not answer the point, if your Honor please. If the counsel had not prefaced his approach to this portion of his address to the jury, by saying that he was about making a personal explanation, I should have made no suggestion whatever, either to the counsel or to the Court. If he had merely announced as facts whatever might be contained in the statement of personal explanation, without prefacing or characterizing it in the manner he did, I should not have troubled him or your Honor. My protest is against this counsel, because his name, in other stages of this case, has been brought in question, in his opening to this jury, of what should be the mere facts he intended to prove upon the defense, making a personal explanation to the jury; and I protest against it, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The personal explanation does not seem to be called for. Any statement that the learned counsel thinks forms properly a part of the defense which he expects to prove, it is our duty to hear, of course.

Mr. Porter—We claim, Sir, in behalf of the counsel for the defense who has been personally arraigned, with a view of weakening his influence in speaking on the defendant's behalf, the right to announce the facts we propose to offer in order to meet that arraignment. It is a right.

Mr. Beach—Nobody objects to that.

Mr. Porter—We propose to prove it, Sir, as we choose, and by what evidence we will. The counsel cannot call upon us to specify the particular witness by which we propose to prove it; nor can he interrogate the counsel who is engaged in the opening of this case as to whether he is the party by whom the proof is to be made. That will depend upon subsequent developments in the case.

Mr. Beach—My point, Sir, cannot be evaded or changed. I have made no objection to the counsel stating any fact which they propose to prove in this case, whether that fact, when proved, will go to his exculpation from the grave imputation which has been cast upon him in the course of this trial, or not; if it is announced as a fact that he expects to prove upon the trial, I have no more to say. But, when the counsel enters upon a separate and distinct portion of his opening, and announces that it is a personal explanation that he seeks to make to the jury, thus withdrawing it from the ordinary statement of facts, I protest against that.

Judge Neilson—I think Judge Porter will agree with you in that statement.

Mr. Porter—I do not know that I understand the learned gentleman. If he meant to be understood that when counsel, opening a case, referring to testimony he means to introduce, uses the word explain, that that limits his right to speak, I must take issue upon that.

Judge Neilson—He does not do that.

Mr. Porter—General Tracy has made no avowal that he is commenting upon facts which we do not propose to introduce in evidence, or which have not been introduced on the other side. He was arraigned first by the opening counsel, afterwards by the plaintiff and his witnesses—an arraignment we propose to meet. We do not propose to permit the plaintiff to elect, by what counsel Henry Ward Beecher shall defend himself, nor to permit counsel of his election, by foul aspersion, to be driven to the position to which he has been assigned. But, Sir, in the exercise of his right as a counselor of this court, can there be a question that he may comment upon the arraignment of any witness, or that he may state how that arraignment is to be met, in order that the jury may justly judge between the party accusing and the party accused? That is a right we claim. It cannot be restricted by counsel, and I submit, Sir, that it cannot be restricted by your Honor.

Mr. Beach—All that, if your Honor please, we have not disputed, and this excited appeal made by my friend Mr. Porter to this Court is altogether unjustified by the attitude I have assumed. I have stated, and I restate it, Sir, for the purpose of perspicuity, that I do not object to Mr. Tracy stating any fact which he professes to prove in the course of this trial. I have not attempted to dictate to Henry Ward Beecher what counsel he shall employ, nor have I attempted to exclude any gentleman who chooses to appear from the conduct of this defense, but I still insist, Sir, whatever counsel may act upon the part of this defendant shall be governed by those ordinary rules which govern counsel in the conduct of cases before a court of justice. I say that this gentleman has gravely and grossly exceeded the limits allowed to counsel in the opening of a case, but I have not chosen to object. I will not now say, in answer to the appeal which has been made by my learned friend, what my idea is of the manner or the subject of that counsel in opening this case to the jury; time for that will come in the course of this case. What I do say is, Sir, that when this gentleman, thus situated in this case, departs from the ordinary course of an opening and commences a part of his address with a preface that he will now make a personal explanation to this jury, that is not in any sense or in any purpose a statement of facts which he expects to prove, it is the assumption of a right separate from the character of counsel to make a personal explanation and appeal to the jury, which, I submit to your Honor, is improper. That is all I object to, Sir; and if this counsel, or any other counsel, will avow that Mr. Tracy or this defendant intends to prove the facts or the circumstances which he now proposes to state, of course my voice is silenced, Sir; I have no objection to make, and we will see hereafter how closely and honorably the pledge will be redeemed.

THE EXPLANATION ADMITTED.

Judge Neilson—The learned counsel on both sides will agree, of course, that it is the office of an opening, and the duty of counsel in stating an opening, whether for the plaintiff or the defendant, to limit himself to facts and circumstances which are expected and intended to be proved, and if that be the purpose of counsel in the case, it is proper. If it is a personal explanation, not to be followed up by proof—perhaps not in its nature susceptible of proof—then it should be omitted. I think the rule is very clear.

Mr. Porter—The suggestion of your Honor we accept as correct, with a qualification which I know is in your Honor's mind, and therefore I will mention, that in stating the facts which we propose to prove, we are at liberty to present them in connection with the facts to which they are applicable in evidence. I did not understand, until my learned friend made his last observation, the precise point of difference between us. I understood him to challenge the right of my friend, Gen. Tracy, to open on this subject, unless he would stipulate to be a witness.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no!

THE PERSONAL EXPLANATION TO BE PROVED.

Mr. Porter—I evidently misunderstood my friend from his last explanation. I unhesitatingly avow that the facts which Gen. Tracy proposes to present are facts which we do propose to prove, and on a future occasion we will be perfectly prepared to meet any arraignment the counsel may make.

Mr. Beach—And I commend the gentleman to his best resources when that time comes. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen will please to keep order. Mr. Tracy, proceed.

GEN. TRACY'S PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. Tracy—I shall endeavor, gentlemen, to state no fact in what I am about to say which will not be made plain to you by evidence which we shall introduce, or which, with the comments that I make upon the facts already proved, will not be sufficiently plain to you without further evidence. If some of the facts to which I am about to refer are material to this case, then, of course, we shall prove them by witnesses; but if the plaintiff in this case has dragged in matters that are not material, for the purpose of connecting my name with this investigation, I take it that I have a right to make a personal explanation of those facts, although when we offer the evidence in the case, he might probably object to it on the ground that it is not material. We may differ on that question.

MRS. TILTON NOT INFLUENCED AS TO HER TESTIMONY.

I certainly confess myself surprised to learn that what transpired, or is said to have transpired, between myself and the plaintiff's wife at a time prior to her appearance before the Investigating Committee, is a matter at all material to the issue in this case, and yet that has been introduced by the plaintiff for the purpose of casting an imputation upon me and connecting my name with this investigation as controlling the plaintiff's wife in her action before the Investigating Committee. If I heard correctly the evidence of the plaintiff touching that matter, he says that I told him that I prepared every question and answer before she appeared before that Committee. Now, gentlemen, we shall show you, in answer to that allegation, that I saw the plaintiff's wife for the first time in my life to speak with her or to hear her speak—possibly I had seen her in the street before—but I saw her for the first time in my life about thirty or forty minutes before she was in the presence of that Committee, making her statement. I was introduced to her by her stepfather, Judge Morse, one of the most reputable men in this city, about thirty or forty minutes before she was before the Committee. I had no conversation with that woman, except in his presence and the presence of two or three other witnesses. There never was a word passed between us as to what she should say before that Committee or what she should not say. There was no question suggested and no answer suggested at all, and I never so told the plaintiff, the fact being, gentlemen, that on the sixth, I think it was, of July, knowledge came to me, quite late in the evening, that Mrs. Tilton was at the house of a mutual friend of herself and her husband, in Henry-st., desiring to communicate with some of the Church authorities of Plymouth Church, and I was requested to see her and have an interview with her to see whether she desired to go before the Committee. I called at that house, and I was informed that she had gone to consult her stepfather as to her duty. I did not see her then, but it was thought she would be back in an hour, or half an hour, or something like that, and I called again at the time that I supposed she was to come; and she came in with her stepfather, Judge Morse, and he introduced Mrs. Tilton to myself in the presence of two other parties.

It was then, I think, so dark that I could not see her face in the room where we were. We talked a few moments as to whether she wanted to go before the Committee or not, and before determining the question she went and had a private consultation with her stepfather, and returned and said to me she desired to see the Committee, or said to this person—her stepfather left immediately, and I left to see the Committee to see if they would come to where she was to hear her statement. I went to the Committee, and was gone perhaps ten or fifteen minutes, and the Committee returned. Mrs. Tilton had stepped down to the dining room for a cup of tea, and I stepped down then to inform her that the Committee were ready in the parlor above to hear her. The lady of the house was present.

NO REHEARSAL AND NO SET FORM OF QUESTION AND ANSWER FOLLOWED.

The only words that passed between Mrs. Tilton and myself on that occasion were substantially as follows. In the presence of this lady, I said: "Mrs. Tilton, if any questions are asked you this evening which under other circumstances you might consider indelicate or improper, I beg you to believe that they are not so intended. The Committee will undoubtedly question you, and they may inquire into something that under ordinary circumstances you might consider indelicate." And she made an answer that she should not be offended by any questions they saw fit to ask her, and she went immediately into the presence of the Committee and proceeded to make her statement. I was not gone two minutes from the parlor until Mrs. Tilton was seated in the presence of that Committee making her statement before them, and she proceeded at once without questions, and there were but very few questions asked Mrs. Tilton by the Committee or myself that evening. Her statement generally was a narrative of her relations with her husband and family affairs. Now, I never told the plaintiff that I prepared every question and answer for this lady, for the very obvious reason that I never had any opportunity to do it, if I had been so disposed. It was an unnecessary reflection, it seems to me, for him to have cast upon his wife. No such thing ever occurred.

GEN. TRACY'S PURPOSE IN HAVING THE INTERVIEW AT MOULTON'S.

And another effort has been made, gentlemen, to show you that I have been guilty of unprofessional conduct in some way in connection with this case in my relations to this plaintiff, and it is necessary for me to refer to the evidence already given upon this subject and then to state to you the facts as I understand them.

It is true that sometime after the Woodhull publication, how long I don't know, but I should fix the time either the last of November or the first of December, Mr. Woodruff inquired of me if I would consent to hear a statement of the facts concerning that publication, to see what answer could be made to it. He said many people were saying that Mr. Moulton, his partner, ought to make some statement. I say here that at this time it was well known to Mr. Woodruff, and to everybody who knew my sentiments on that subject, that I was the friend of Mr. Beecher in this affair, not his counsel, for he had employed none, and I held no relations to Mr. Beecher at that time which would have led him to have selected me. Although a member of his congregation attending church there for a few years previous, I had never taken any prominent part at all in the affairs of the society and was not a member of the Church nor was any member of my family, and I knew but very few people in the Church, and knew Mr. Beecher only as hundreds and thousands of others of his congregation know him, I think never having spoken with him over three or four times in my life prior to the publication of the Woodhull scandal. But I had been very outspoken in regard to this publication after it was made and particularly in regard to Mr. Moulton's position in it to Mr. Woodruff. Mr. Moulton was a stranger to me; Mr. Woodruff was well known to me. The understanding was distinctly and so stated that the employment was not professional but a friendly consultation as a friend of Mr. Beecher, and as a friend of their firm, if I would consent to be consulted and look into the facts to see what answer, if any, could be made to that publication. It was distinctly understood that there was to be no compensation for that service. I said, certainly I would if I could be of service to Mr. Beecher, or to them, in the matter, I should willingly give my time to do so. The next morning, or a few mornings after that, possibly the next morning, he came around with Mr. Moulton and introduced Mr. Moulton to me; it was the first time I had ever seen him. Of course, gentlemen, it was in the hurry of business, in the morning hours of the day, and the conversation that occurred there was entirely general. The Woodhull publication was not there. I had learned from Mr. Woodruff before, or I had heard in the street—it was well understood any way that Mr. Moulton had certain papers in his possession that it would be necessary to see and consult before any one could determine what answer could be made to the Woodhull publication. The conversation I state was entirely general at that interview. There was no descending into particulars for the obvious reason that the Woodhull publication itself was not present and none of these papers were present and therefore it would be idle to spend the time to consider the question of what could or could not be done. Well, my recollection is not specific as to that conversation in the morning, as it would not be to any conversation occurring in the ordinary way in the morning hours at my office. I knew generally that the object and purpose of that interview was to introduce Mr. Moulton to myself, and to appoint an interview where the papers should be present, and the whole question could be considered.

THE TRACY-MOULTON-TILTON INTERVIEWS.

Such an interview was appointed, and it took place at Mr. Moulton's study. There were present, as I recollect it, Mr. Moulton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Woodruff and myself. Two conversations have been alluded to by the plaintiff in his evidence. I remember but one. As I recollect the conversation, I went down to the house of Mr. Moulton on Sunday, right after my Sunday dinner, which brought me there not far from three o'clock. I do not remember Mr. Tilton's being present when we entered the house, or went into the study; I know he didn't go into the study with us on that occasion. We went into Mr. Moulton's study, and the papers were produced. The first paper presented to me was the important paper in the case, and that is what was then known as the apology, which is now called the letter of contrition.

Mr. Shearman—Of January 1st, 1871.

Mr. Tracy—Yes; I mean the paper of January 1st, 1871. The Woodhull's publication was present, and of course I had a general knowledge of the main features of that publication. That letter was examined by myself. I remember reading it and I remember what I said about it. Then the retraction was produced, or the explanation of the retraction was produced. Those were the only three papers which Moulton exhibited to me on that occasion that have been introduced in evidence here. Another paper which was of very little importance, but connected with the case, was shown me at a later period of the conversation. Well, now, gentlemen, there occurred at that interview just what men familiar with business would expect to have occurred in this respect. The object of the interview being to see what answer he made to the Woodhull scandal, the Woodhull scandal was taken up with reference to these papers and gone over paragraph by paragraph.

The first thing that I asked Moulton about, of course, was the pistol scene as described in the Woodhull publication. That has been read to you once or twice. It represents Mr. Moulton as going with a pistol and obtaining this retraction from Henry Ward Beecher under the threat of death. I asked him if that was true and he told me no, as he has told you here it was not true. Then the only other place in which his name was connected with it was where he is represented as going into the presence of Henry Ward Beecher and with Mrs. Woodhull and Mrs. Tilton urged Mr. Beecher to preside at the Steinway Hall meeting, and where Mr. Tilton is represented as having made a particular speech to Mr. Beecher on that occasion, setting forth reasons why he should preside at that meeting. I asked Mr. Moulton if that was true, and he said it was not; no such thing ever occurred, as he has sworn to you that no such thing ever occurred. He said that he had not given Mrs. Woodhull the information, or any part of the information there published; he denied having communicated to her the facts; he denied having been an actor in the scenes where he was represented as being an actor. Now, my recollection is that after the paper had been looked over, a question was asked as to what Mr. Tilton had to say about this, and what the foundation of the story was, if there was any, and my recollection of it is that Moulton said he preferred that I should hear that from Mr. Tilton. At all events, I remember that Mr. Tilton was not in the room at the time. I know he came into the room soon after. Whether he was in the house when I went there and was waiting to be summoned to the study I do not remember. He may have been sent for after I went there, or he may have been notified that there was to be a meeting and came around late, and Mr. Moulton, expecting him had gone down, and found him in the lower rooms and brought him up. I remember he came into the room after the papers had been shown to me, and after Moulton and I had had a considerable talk on the subject of the Woodhull scandal. I didn't know when the interview was appointed that Mr. Tilton was to be present. His presence there was a surprise to me. Of course, when I was asked if I had any objection to seeing him or hearing a statement from him, I had none at all, and I said I hadn't. He was brought up into the room, and I remember that he brought with him a manuscript, a considerable of a manuscript, rolled, as I remember, in black leather. He sat down, and before he began to read that manuscript, or said anything, he turned to me and said in substance, "Mr. Tracy, I don't know what the etiquette of your profession permits; if I give you a statement of my case against Henry Ward Beecher, and he and I should afterwards come into collision, in that case would the etiquette of your profession permit you to be counsel for Henry Ward Beecher?" I did say to Mr. Tilton, as I remember it, without discussing what the etiquette of my profession would or would not permit, that if I consented to receive a statement from a man who had a controversy with another and they should come into collision on that case afterward, I should not feel at liberty to become counsel for the other party.

THE CHARGE MADE BEFORE GEN. TRACY.

And thereupon he proceeded to read to me a statement or manuscript which, as I remember it, was substantially the "True Story," so far as it has been produced here. It was not a clean copy, as he says, of the "True Story," for I well remember, as he read it to me, it was interlined and erased and supplemented in various ways. It looked like a draft upon which he had been bestowing much labor. The only fact, the only paper which was communicated to me, as I remember it, which I had not before heard and received from Mr. Moulton, was a letter or paper purporting to be from his wife, similar in language and statement to that now introduced here as her letter to Dr. Storrs, although that paper did not purport to be a letter to Dr. Storrs. It contained the charge against Henry Ward Beecher of improper proposals. That is the only fact that was communicated to me, touching his relations with Henry Ward Beecher, that I had not known before, and learned from Moulton, as I remember it. That document then proceeded after this statement to quote what is now called "the letter of contrition," but until recently called the "apology," the paper of January 1st, in that same paper as proof of the truth of the allegation which Mrs. Tilton made against Mr. Beecher. Now, it is quite true, gentlemen, undoubtedly, as Mr. Tilton says, that after he had made his statement to me, or talked with me, I did take this "apology," or "letter of contrition," and examined it. I undoubtedly did that, because I had looked at in the first instance with reference to the Woodhull scandal, which charged a life of adultery between these parties as of ten years duration; that was the charge of the Woodhull scandal, and I had examined it with reference to that charge. But when Mr. Tilton presented the case of improper proposals and not of adultery. I did, I have no doubt, take up that paper, and look at it again very carefully to see how it compared and supported or contradicted the charge which he made of improper proposals. Therefore it is quite likely true what Mr. Tilton states, that I did have in my hands and did go over this letter of apology after he came into the room, and that may account for Mr. Woodruff's remembering that we had that letter there after Mr. Tilton came into the room. We undoubtedly did.

THE DISCUSSION AT THE INTERVIEW.

The statement of improper proposals, or the statement of the "True Story," or so much of it as Mr. Tilton read to me, having been read, the discussion between us commenced. Now, Mr. Tilton states to you that he read me that "True Story" as finally, completed, as I understand him to say, late in December, or the 1st of January. Now, gentlemen, I am very confident that that paper, as presented here as a final paper, was never shown to me in the world; that is to say, I never saw or heard of the letter of Mrs. Tilton, dated December 29, denying this charge, and the letter of Mr. Beecher, dated December 29, denying this charge.

Mr. Evans—1872.

Mr. Tracy—1872, I mean. I never saw either of these papers in the Winter of 1872 and 1873; I never saw Mr. Beecher's when the investigation was going on, and he turned over to me some of his papers, and among them was this one, as I remember it; that is the first I ever saw of that letter. I never saw Mrs. Tilton's letter until I read it in the publication of Mr. Moulton or Mr. Tilton himself. I think it was Mr. Moulton. So I know that the "True Story" as a completed paper was never shown to me at all.

ONE INSTEAD OF FOUR CONSULTATIONS AT THE MOULTONS.

I have ransacked the chambers of my memory since this thing has been up, and I can recall no two conversations at Moulton's house where the subject of this scandal was conversed about between Tilton, Moulton and myself, three of us together, and another where Woodruff was present, making four. Of course, I cannot affirm that no such conversation took place, but I do affirm—do say that, to the best of my recollection, there was but one conversation. I am certain that the first time I ever saw Mr. Tilton on this subject, what I have repeated in regard to his questioning me and my answer, and his proceeding to state the charge against Mr. Beecher as I have detailed it now, took place at the first interview.

THE WOODHULL CHARGES AS THERE DISCUSSED.

Well, then the question came up as to what denial could be made of the Woodhull charge. We went over it item by item, and Mr. Tilton denied, substantially, the truth of the Woodhull publication in every important particular; that is to say, taking up one view, one scene after another—"Mr. Tilton, did you give this information to Mrs. Woodhull?" "No." In substance he denied having been the author of that information or any of that information to Mrs. Woodhull as he denies it here. So he denied scene after scene. "Did such a scene occur, or such a scene occur?" "No." "Then," I said, "I don't see why you cannot deny this, and I don't see why you and Mr. Moulton cannot deny it. Mr. Moulton admitted that he could deny it so far as the Woodhull publication represented him as an actor in the scene. There was no doubt but what he could deny it. He has sworn to you on the stand that he could deny it. Why could not Tilton deny it? He could not as he argued then, as he subsequently signed in his letter to a "Complaining Friend," which has been introduced here—he could not deny the Woodhull scandal, because while that story itself was false, there was a true story that it did not tell, and he insisted that he could not deny the Woodhull scandal as such without at the same time telling the true story. In other words, if he denied the false story he could only do it by telling the true one, and he went into that sort of reasoning which he sets out in the letter to the "Complaining Friend;" and referred to The Police Gazette as an illustration, just as he does in that letter to show that where there is any truth lying at the bottom of the story, a man could not deny the story without telling the other story that was true. I argued against that; I said: "The story, as you now tell it, of improper proposals, is not alluded to at all in this Woodhull publication. The story that they tell, you say, is false, and inasmuch as they don't allude to the story that you now tell, you are at liberty, it seems to me, to deny the Woodhull publication without saying anything about the "True Story." Now, if there was anything said about lying at that interview, it was on the question whether it would be a lie—the discussion of the question whether it would be a lie for a man to say that a story which is told as a single story, which is substantially untrue—whether for him to say that that story was a lie, would be asserting the truth, provided there was another transaction not alluded to in it, but connected with it, as between the same parties, that was true. He said, "No, I cannot contradict the false story, unless I at the same time tell the true one;" and the discussion was a long one, and even became warm at times; and it continued until late in the evening—ten or eleven o'clock in the evening—but that was the result.

WHY GEN. TRACY ADVISED SILENCE.

Now, they say that I said silence was the one thing to do. Well, now, gentlemen, it must be manifest to you from their own statements that I did not say that silence was the only thing to do in this matter, except upon the theory that Tilton put forward, that he could not deny the Woodhull scandal without publishing what he called the "True Story," or the truth, in which he proceeded, while exonerating his wife, to put Mr. Beecher in the position of having solicited the act. Now, after arguing and failing to convince Tilton that he could not do that thing—failing to convince him that he could deny truthfully the Woodhull story without telling the other, and he making it a condition that he would make no answer to the Woodhull story except the one that exonerated his wife and charged Mr. Beecher with soliciting it, I undoubtedly did say, as a choice between that and silence, that silence was the only thing to be done. Because I regarded, as every man must regard, the charge against a minister of soliciting a woman, as great a crime as the actual accomplishment of the act. And I did not suppose that it would mitigate Mr. Beecher's offense at all to deny the fact of adultery, and to, at the same time, publish the fact that he had attempted to consummate it. Now, so far as that was concerned, I undoubtedly did say that, as between the two things, silence was the only thing to do. But in no other event than that, because both of these parties conceded the statement of facts which, I argued, enabled them both truthfully to deny the Woodhull publication as such. They could deny it without lying in fact. I argued, as far as Moulton was concerned, I remember, that to omit to deny it was to lie, because a man who sat silent under a falsehood, and did not deny it when it was his duty to deny it, was morally guilty of a falsehood.

WHEN GEN. TRACY STEPPED OUT OF THE CASE.

Now, we failed to agree; and it was very evident, I think, to all of the parties there, that Tilton and Moulton and I could not get on together with this scandal business; we differed so widely, that my recollection is that we never met again. Certainly we never met except incidentally, or pos sibly to talk over some question connected with it; but if we ever did I do not remember it. My recollection is that that is the first and last meeting that ever occurred between us. I know our differences were very radical; and I had no expectation when I left that house that I should ever be consulted again by those parties on that subject, and I never was, to my recollection. I stepped down and out of the case after December, 1872.

I saw Mr. Beecher at Mr. Moulton's request once after that meeting, and but once, I think; and I—the only way I can fix the date definitely is that I know I saw him at his house once on the subject, and had an incidental conversation with him on the letting of the pew at his church on January, 1873. We talked five minutes, perhaps, in which we alluded to this subject incidentally, and it is the last time that I ever alluded to this matter with Mr. Beecher until a long time after; and never after, in fact, except incidentally, when we met on other matters and other affairs.

WHEN GEN. TRACY RE-ENTERED THE CASE.

I considered myself out of the case, and was out of it from that time, December, 1872, until after the publication of the Bacon letter. On the night of that publication I was sent for by Mr. Moulton to come to his house, and I went to his house, and I found Mr. Tilton and Frank Carpenter in the dining-room when I went there. Mr. Moulton took me to an upper room, and then introduced to me the subject of this Bacon letter, and said to me—after reading it to me—that he wanted me again to come into the case. I was very much excited and outraged at that publication. It took me altogether by surprise, for I had been so entirely out of it that I had not even known or read of Dr. Bacon's letters in The Independent, or his letters to young men, at New-Haven, and I did not know, or had not heard, that any such publication was contemplated. I remember that the conversation between Mr. Moulton and myself regarding Mr. Tilton's conduct was pretty excited that night; but he insisted that that letter did not foreclose the possibility of a settlement and adjustment, and he had a written abstract of the letter already prepared, which he proceeded to read to me, but I was in no condition to be convinced that night. and went away, he requesting to see me again. Mr. Moulton said to me that if anything was to be done about it he was determined that Mr. Shearman should be kept out of the case; that he thought that Mr. Beecher would do anything in a settlement that he and I concurred in advising, and he had sent for me for that purpose. I had been since 1872—although not connected with this case, gentlemen—I had been much with Mr. Moulton the year previous, because I had been the counsel of that firm in their difficulty with the Government, and it had brought me in connection with Mr. Moulton very much; I had seen much of him. I assume that he inferred that he could talk with me more confidentially than he cared to talk with Mr. Shearman, because their relations were unpleasant, and he said he must have some one with whom he could converse confidentially, and, therefore, he wanted me to come into the case. My introduction into the case, therefore, was as the friend of Henry Ward Beecher, in June, 1874, at the instance of Mr. Moulton, on the theory that I could aid him as the friend of Mr. Beecher, and one whom Mr. Beecher would trust in bringing about an adjustment of this difficulty, which he said he desired very much to accomplish.

I saw him afterwards, when he talked to me about this card that it was proposed that Mr. Beecher should sign, the one stating that he had committed an offense against Mr. Tilton, but no crime; and, I suppose I am the counsel alluded to in the opening as the one who said it would not do for Mr. Beecher to sign that card, or I would not approve of it. I certainly did tell Mr. Moulton when we got into consultation that I could not recommend Mr. Beecher to sign that card, and should not; but he thought I was mistaken and attempted to convince me that I was; but he and I always differed on that subject, and we parted company on that card.

Now, that is the history of my connection, in short, gentlemen, with this scandal and with these parties. Now, after the publication of the Bacon letter, and after my interview with Mr. Moulton, I published an interview in The Brooklyn Union, given as my understanding of this case, in which I stated the case as I had received it from Mr. Tilton in '72, as a charge of improper proposals. Mr. Tilton called to see me the next day after that publication, and we had a long conversation on the subject of my publication in The Union, and the way I stated the case, the details of which, perhaps, it is not necessary to go into here.

It went on until this Committee was appointed. When the time was approaching that I saw, or thought I saw, a tendency in Mr. Tilton to change his ground against Mr. Beecher, and instead of charging an improper proposal, to make a charge of adultery—as soon as I saw that I sought Mr. Tilton and said to him, "Mr. Tilton, when you presented me your case with Mr. Beecher at Mr. Moulton's house in 1872, you asked me a certain question, and I made the answer that I should not be Mr. Beecher's counsel if you came in collision with him in the case—in that case that you stated to me. Now," I said, "as long as you adhere to the case, Mr. Tilton, as there presented, I shall adhere to my promise; but if you ever change your cause of action against Mr. Beecher, and say to me that the story you told me on that occasion is not true, and that your cause of action against Mr. Beecher is an entirely different one from what you then presented, I give you notice that I shall consider myself at liberty—I shall not consider myself bound by the promise I then made you." Now, on that question, gentlemen, which involves my professional standing—and it is the only one I care anything about in this case, and it is strange to me that it is here, but it is here—the only question that I care anything about, I say, is one that imputes to me an impropriety professionally in this case; but so far as that is concerned there is no dispute of facts between Mr. Tilton and myself. The only question is a question of judgment and discretion on that question of whether he, having stated to me one case against Henry Ward Beecher, and obtained from me a promise not to be his counsel, binds me not to be the counsel of Henry Ward Beecher when he brings a different case against him—one of an entirely different nature. Now, on that question, I say, there is no dispute of facts.

Mr. Beach—Do I understand you to say that Mr. Tilton agrees to this statement?

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; I do.

Mr. Beach—I tell you that he does not agree to it.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I shall prove it.

Mr. Beach—Very well, prove it. If you say that you will prove it, that is very well.

Mr. Tracy—I was about to say, I do not undertake to say what Theodore Tilton will say about it now.

Mr. Beach—Oh. I misunderstood you.

Mr. Tracy—But I undertake to say that what he did say about it in the Summer of 1874, when the question was up between us, because in the presence of a half dozen men he brought this allegation against me, as he does now, and said "You agreed at a certain time that if I ever came into collision with Henry Ward Beecher you would not be his counsel," my reply to him was precisely what I have made to you to-day, and his reply to me was, "That does not release you from your promise." I said, "Mr. Tilton, that is a question of judgment. I hold that it does. You are at liberty to think that it does not, but I gave you notice beforehand that I should consider myself absolved, and I do consider myself absolved from all obligation from that promise." Now, gentlemen, on that question, as I say, I have taken careful pains to be right. I have submitted this question to some half-dozen of the most eminent lawyers in this city and New-York, before I consented to appear in the case at all, and they agreed with me on the state of the facts that there was not any doubt about it. As I infer, the counsel would agree, on my statement of the facts, that there is not any doubt about it. And before I appeared in this case I caused the same question to be submitted to my eminent associates, Mr. Everts and Judge Porter, and they agreed that there was no doubt about the question, as I understand, of my right to appear here without any question as to professional propriety.

Now, I say that Mr. Tilton stated that and admitted the fact last Summer. There is no doubt about it; but the position he took was, that "conceding that, it don't absolve you from your promise." I said it did. Now, that is the question, and the issue, as I understand it, between Mr. Tilton and myself.

ADULTERY NOT THE CHARGE MADE IN MR. TRACY'S PRESENCE.

Now, gentlemen, I undertake to say that I never understood from Theodore Tilton, anywhere, to cast any imputation against his wife as having been guilty of adultery at any time, prior to the institution of the Investigating Committee in 1874. I wrote my interview in The Union and published it in the Summer of 1874, immediately after the publication of the Bacon letter, giving my understanding of this case precisely as I had derived it from Mr. Tilton. I had an interview with Mr. Tilton the day after its publication, and he did not question the accuracy of that interview, or the statement of it. The only criticism he made on it was, he said this: "You make me merely a martinet of jealousy. You say that the charge was improper proposals, and then you say that Mr. Beecher and my wife both concur in denying that there is any truth in that. That don't leave me any case at all against Mr. Beecher," and he said: "You array my wife against me, thereby saying that she denies the truth of that allegation." And he criticised my taste and judgment in publishing that interview without seeing and conferring with him, and arraying his wife against him by saying that she denied the truth of the charge of improper proposals. Now, gentlemen, that is the history, in brief, of my connection with this scandal, as I understand it. I think that professionally I shall be entirely justified by every lawyer, certainly, who agrees with me on the facts, and as to that, I have Mr. Tilton's admission, distinctly made; or, in other words, when I stated the case to him he made the admission by saying—not denying my statement, but by saying, "That does not release you from the promise which you made," and I said to him what I have repeated, that that was a question of judgment.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, please keep quiet. [To Mr. Tracy.] Does this close your opening?

Mr. Tracy—Oh! no, your Honor.

Mr. Everts—No, Sir; we will proceed on Monday.

SYMPATHY WITH THE TRIALS OF THE JURY.

Judge Neilson—If the gentlemen of the jury will call at the office of the County Treasurer below on Monday morning, before coming in here, they can receive their pay, the formal pay, as jurors, up to that point of time, being all that we have the power now to do. The suggestion that the jury may eventually suffer great sacrifice, and ought to have additional compensation, is one that cannot be presented until we have seen the extent of your labors, and then it may be presented to the Board of Supervisors, who alone have power to act in the matter, and that I will endeavor to see is done properly. You will prepare now to retire, and return Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court then adjourned until Monday, at 11 a. m.

THIRTY-FIFTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

GENERAL TRACY'S ADDRESS ENDED.

THE POLICY OF SILENCE PLACED UPON MR. TILTON'S SHOULDERS—COINCIDENCES BETWEEN THE PRINTING OF CERTAIN ARTICLES AND LETTERS AND THE CONDITION OF MR. TILTON'S FINANCES—MR. TILTON CHARGED WITH BLACKMAILING—WHY MR. BEECHER THOUGHT OF RESIGNING—ALLEGED INCONSISTENCIES IN MRS. MOULTON'S TESTIMONY.

MONDAY, March 1, 1875.

Mr. Tracy's argument began by an attempt to lift the responsibility of the policy of silence from the shoulders of Mr. Beecher, Mr. Tracy saying that this policy was pushed to involve Mr.

Beecher and extricate Mr. Tilton. It is still fresh in the minds of those who have read Mr. Tilton's testimony that he was closely questioned regarding a scheme to start a new daily paper in New-York with himself at its head, and that he denied all knowledge of such an enterprise. Mr. Tracy now says that in December, 1873, Mr. Tilton's friends proposed to the friends of Mr. Beecher that The Evening Express should be purchased and turned into a morning paper, Mr. Beecher leaving the pulpit and becoming its editor-in-chief. According to this plan, Mr. Tilton was to go abroad for three or four years as the chief of the foreign bureau of the new paper, and was finally to return and become an editor in the establishment. But, according to Mr. Tracy, notwithstanding the friends of Mr. Tilton threatened to shake all Christendom and ruin Mr. Beecher unless something was done for Mr. Tilton, the friends of Mr. Beecher denounced the scheme as a blackmailing one, and refused to give any money. Prefacing his assertion with the remark that Mr. Tilton was more remarkable than Sam Weller for coincidences, Mr. Tracy referred to the "Letter to a Complaining Friend," and called attention to the fact that on the very day that it was written, Mr. Tilton's account with Woodruff & Robinson had been closed; and further that The Golden Age letter was published the day after Mr. Tilton's next deposit with that firm had been exhausted.

Mr. Tracy, in referring to this Golden Age letter, insisted that Mr. Tilton tried to secure its publication in The Eagle through a certain Brooklyn reporter, but did not succeed, as Mr. Tilton declined to take the responsibility of its contents. Mr. Tracy boldly dashed into a ringing denunciation of Mr. Tilton as a blackmailer. He affirmed that the $5,000 got from Mr. Beecher by Mr. Moulton was obtained with the knowledge of Mr. Tilton, and then he scornfully read the note written by the plaintiff to Mr. Beecher on the Sunday after the payment of the money: "Grace, mercy and peace." Mr. Tracy further insisted that $10,000, and afterward $5,000, were demanded to prevent the publication of the Bacon letter, and he made a general charge that whenever Mr. Tilton was out of money there was there an outbreak from him which continued until his bank account was replenished.

Mr. Tracy expressed the opinion that Mr. Moulton had the most remarkable memory of any witness of whom he had ever heard. By actual count Mr.

Moulton had said "I don't recollect" in answer to questions material to the case, 305 times.

One of the notable phases of the defense is the explanation offered by Mr. Tracy of Mr. Beecher's once expressed intention of resignation. Mr. Tracy says that when, in 1873, Mr. Tilton threatened to publish the scandal, Mr. Beecher—determined to stand—defied both Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton; but announced his intention of resigning from Plymouth Church, and not dragging its members into the contest. Said Mr. Beecher, according to Mr. Tracy, "You publish, I resign! I welcome the contest. Come on! But I take not Plymouth Church into the contest."

During the afternoon the subject overshadowing all others was the treatment of Mrs. Moulton's testimony by the counsel for the defense. Mr. Tracy said that he felt deeply her horrible position, and admired while he condemned her devotion to her husband. In illustration he called attention to Adelaide Proctor's poem, "Millie's Expiation," the story of a poor, high-minded girl, who, to save her husband from condemnation for murder, committed perjury. Mr. Tracy pointed out several alleged inaccuracies in Mrs. Moulton's testimony, and reached the climax when he affirmed that the defense would show conclusively and beyond the shadow of a doubt that on the day that Mrs. Moulton says that Mr. Beecher was at her house four hours, and lay upon the sofa there—Monday, June 2, 1873—he was traveling in the cars with Mrs. Beecher on the way to Peekskill. Mr. Tracy said also that Mr. Beecher returned the next day to marry a young couple on Tuesday, and left the city on the following day, and was absent two weeks in New-England.

Mr. Tracy concluded his opening for the defense with a long and affecting tribute to the Plymouth pastor, and a promise to the jury of evidence that would prove his client guiltless.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

GEN. TRACY'S ADDRESS CONTINUED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Mr. Tracy resumed his opening.

THE PROPOSER OF THE POLICY OF SILENCE.

MR. TRACY—May it please the Court, Gentlemen of the Jury: When we closed on Friday night last, gentlemen, we had reached what is now known in this case as the period of the publication of the Woodhull Scandal. We have shown you that after that publication, Mr. Beecher following the advice and judgment—the honest judgment, as he then supposed—of the "Mutual Friend," Francis D. Moulton, accepted the policy of silence, and that policy was accepted by all, on the supposition and belief, on the part of my client, that it was to be executed by all in good faith.

The defendant has been widely criticised for the policy of silence which was adopted and long pursued in reference to this scandal. The fact that the defendant assented to this policy and adhered to it for several years, has been and now is the very corner-stone of this prosecution. The most of your time has been occupied with evidence tending to prove this fact—a fact never denied, but always admitted. But this policy did not originate with Mr. Beecher. If we are to believe the plaintiff, the policy of silence and suppression had been adopted by himself long before Moulton bore to Mr. Beecher the message which brought about the memorable interview on the night of December 30. Tilton now asserts that he then knew, and had known since the preceding July, everything he now knows. Yet he had maintained a silence and effected a suppression so complete that the knowledge which he professes to have had of the facts had never come to the ears of Mr. Beecher. For it is conceded by all the parties that, down to the evening of that interview, Mr. Beecher did not know that he was in any wise involved in Tilton's domestic difficulties, except that he had concurred with his wife in advising Mrs. Tilton to separate from her husband, and had repeated to Mr. Bowen stories affecting Mr. Tilton's character in respect to marital fidelity. The object of that interview was to inform Mr. Beecher of a fact which Tilton says had hitherto been kept from him. Not only from Mr. Beecher had the knowledge of that fact been kept, but also from the friends of the family. Moulton, who visited the house frequently, had never observed the slightest alienation; Mrs. Bradshaw, the most intimate friend of both husband and wife, had seen nothing. So, if this fact, which Tilton now pretends, ever existed, he had suppressed it most absolutely. Surely thus far the policy had been a success.

WHEN THE POLICY OF SILENCE WAS FIRST LEFT.

But in December, 1870, as we have seen, business difficulties arose between Tilton and Bowen, which, to again repeat Mr. Tilton's own words, "were augmented by Mr. and Mrs. Beecher." At the interview in Bowen's house on Dec. 26th, Tilton for the first time departed from his policy of silence and charged Beecher with having made a dishonorable proposal to his wife, but did it under "a special pledge mutually given, that nothing should ever be said concerning Mr. Beecher's demonstration towards Mrs. Tilton." Here the charge was made, but on the express condition that it should be suppressed, and should not enter into the conflict which he and Bowen were about to inaugurate. Gentlemen, that fact is susceptible to the clearest proof by the plaintiff's own testimony.

MR. BOWEN'S TREACHERY TO MR. TILTON.

Set on by Bowen, Tilton wrote and sent that insolent demand that Mr. Beecher should quit the pulpit and leave Brooklyn. Tilton says Bowen assigned as a reason why he could not sign the letter with him, that he had just settled all his difficulties with Mr. Beecher—but promised, if Tilton would make the attack, he would assume and carry on the fight. He bore the letter to Mr. Beecher; and then in the twinkling of an eye Bowen slipped through Tilton's fingers like an eel. Two days after signing the letter Tilton found him an enemy instead of a friend. I repeat again, gentlemen, that what I say concerning the intercourse between these two men I base exclusively on the statement of the plaintiff in this court as a witness. I repeat again that I unwillingly condemn any man on the statement of this plaintiff concerning any fact; but this is a fact that has been published for years, and I believe has never yet been denied by Mr. Bowen. Thus deserted by Bowen, liable himself to be assailed by Mr. Beecher, and threatened with dismissal from both his papers, Tilton's ruin seemed inevitable unless he could suppress the publication of his letter and repress the indignation of Beecher which that letter had aroused.

THE MEASURE FOR COUNTERACTING MR. BOWEN'S TREACHERY.

For this purpose we have seen how like a coward he attempted to interpose the body of a sick and suffering wife between himself and the man he had so grossly outraged, and how this attempt only plunged him into new disasters, rendering further efforts at suppression imperative, since it ended in Mr. Beecher's obtaining from Mrs. Tilton her written declaration that the charges made against him by her husband not only were false, but had been coerced from her while on a bed of sickness. How anxious Mr. Tilton and his friend Mr. Moulton were to suppress the wife's retraction we have already seen. If Mr. Beecher would only consent to its suppression they would destroy both the retraction and the accusation, or they would keep both together, so that one should never appear without the other.

Thus far the policy of silence and suppression had been the policy of the plaintiff. The retraction was surrendered upon the distinct assurance of both Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, that the whole matter from which it had arisen should be suppressed, and suppressed forever.

THE POLICY OF SILENCE NOT MADE, BUT ACCEPTED, BY MR. BEECHER.

Mr. Beecher did not make, but he accepted, the proposition. When the accuser offered to suppress the charges, the accused had no alternative but either to consent, or else to publish, himself, the fact that he had been falsely accused by a woman and her husband. Such an act is expected of no man; such an act Mr. Beecher could not commit without destroying her who had been his friend, and who, on a bed of sickness, with uplifted hands had called on God to witness that she was not morally responsible for the contents of that paper. Here the policy of silence and suppression was united in by all the parties; but it was assented to on the part of the defendant, and not suggested by him.

The next day Moulton comes again as a messenger of peace and reconciliation, and carries away with him the paper which they now call the letter of contrition; this he took from the defendant to the plaintiff not as a weapon of war, but as an emblem of peace and fraternal feeling. And on February 7th, Moulton finding that Mrs. Tilton was not so completely reconciled as he desired she should be, he, and not the defendant, suggested the correspondence bearing date on that day in order to establish a more perfect peace, and to make the suppression of this difficulty doubly sure. The only criticism to which the defendant is liable in this respect is, that having assented to the policy of silence at the instance of the plaintiff, he accepted it in good faith and honestly endeavored to carry it out.

This policy was thus inaugurated on the night of December 31st to save the plaintiff from a ruin which the defendant could have certainly effected had he been disposed to press the advantage he then possessed.

MR. TILTON'S DOUBLE MOTIVE IN URGING SILENCE.

But the difficulty between him and Mr. Beecher was not the only one that Tilton and his friend Moulton desired to bury at this time. Tilton was covered all over with foul scandals, which demanded suppression. There were the stories which had reached Bowen's ears, which Tilton needed to have stifled, and to stifle which had been the object of the meeting at Bowen's house on the 26th of December. That meeting, at first apparently successful, had afterwards resulted in signal failure. Then there were the ugly scandals, which had come to Mr. Beecher, which he, giving credit to them, had repeated to Bowen on December 27th, when the latter bore to him Tilton's audacious demand. There was the hideous story which Bessie Turner had communicated to Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Morse and others, of the manner in which Tilton had lifted her from her bed at night and carried her to his own, and how, upon another occasion, he had again attempted the virtue of this poor child, who had been adopted and cared for by his large-hearted and benevolent wife. And more than all, there was need to keep from public knowledge the fact that his wife had separated from him and had threatened to leave him forever because of his infidelities and the many cruelties that she had suffered at his hands. If Theodore Tilton was to be resurrected from the sepulcher of infamy and again set upon his feet, all these scandals must be suppressed and kept from the knowledge of the world.

MR. MOULTON'S QUALIFICATIONS FOR HIS TASK.

You will see, gentlemen, that this was a task requiring for its performance a man possessing every characteristic which Tilton tells us guided him in the selection of his friend. To accomplish the part, it was necessary to possess "loyalty to his employer, a genius of administration and great courage of thought and action." I quote Tilton's description of Moulton's, given from the witness stand. All these, Tilton says, Moulton possessed in an eminent degree. Undismayed by the extent and variety of the evil stories that had gathered over Tilton, the administrative genius commenced at once with wonderful subtlety and patience the work of suppressing them.

First, Mrs. Tilton was persuaded, not only to deny the story that she had desired to separate from her husband, but to pronounce it a falsehood, coined by the brain of her poor mother. So this story was for the time being suppressed, and so thoroughly congenial to the new master-operator was the business of suppression, that even this denial was withheld from the knowledge of Mr. Beecher. Then Mr. Beecher was assured by the "Mutual Friend" that a story he had repeated to Bowen concerning Tilton's relations with a lady not his wife was unfounded; and he was induced to retract it. So that this story was silenced. Then Bessie Turner was made to sign a retraction of her story, and this was delivered into Moulton's hands as a means of suppression, after which the girl was sent away to prevent her prattling—and so she was for the time being suppressed.

THE HARD WORK OF BRINGING MR. BOWEN TO TERMS.

The last and hardest task remained to get a retraction from Bowen. From him they sought to obtain not only an indorsement of Tilton's character, but also the payment of money—a hard thing to get from Bowen. Success was achieved only by fifteen months of persistent and laborious endeavor. A law suit was begun; but a law suit could not frighten Bowen. It induced him neither to pay nor to retract. When every legitimate effort had failed, another method was resorted to. Tilton prepared a personal statement, giving what purported to be the history of his dismissal by Bowen, and containing the letter written by himself to Bowen, and dated January 1, 1871, in which he repeated the slanders which he says Bowen uttered against Mr. Beecher. This statement was put in type at The Golden Age office as if intended for publication, and printed slips of it were shown to Bowen and to Wilkeson, Mr. Beecher's friend.

They say, gentlemen, that Bowen was not blackmailed. I make no comment. You have seen that a law suit did not bring the money, but the threat to publish this article brought both the money and a certificate of character to Tilton published in The Independent.

MR. MOULTON'S SHREWDNESS IN HANDLING MR. TILTON'S ENEMIES.

The skill of Moulton was strikingly shown in his choice of means to obtain indorsements of character for his friend from the two men whom he had the most reason to fear. Mr. Beecher he controlled by gaining his confidence, and by convincing him that the stories against Tilton were false. Mr. Bowen he controlled by arguments of a different character. But Mrs. Tilton's complaint of the treatment to which she was subjected must also be suppressed. To this end she was made to feel that she was the only obstacle in the way of that reconstruction of her household life for which she longed. In the letter of February 7, every argument that could move her was brought to bear upon her, and at last Mr. Moulton succeeded in obtaining from her a pledge that she would never remember herself to Theodore's harm—a pledge she too faithfully kept, gentlemen, until by his open and shameless attack upon Mr.

Beecher, the plaintiff drove her forth, a despairing, frightened fugitive, flying as for her life from the jaws of hell. Once before her brethren of the church she has had liberty to speak, but prior to that time she was forbidden; and now, in the crisis of this horrible struggle, while the conflict wages over her good name, she is again silenced. Yes, gentlemen, when the plaintiff found that the lips of his innocent wife were unsealed before the tribunal which he had accepted, and that she was resolved on throwing off the incubus of her life, to speak freely the whole truth, he made haste to choose a tribunal where the law would keep her dumb. And so she is suppressed. Thus the administrative genius of the "Mutual Friend," inventing and executing a policy of suppression, had accomplished what Tilton would never have been able to do. Tilton's way would have been to talk and make "statements," each of which would have added to his difficulties. Moulton's way was to suppress talk and get other people to make statements which he could store away in his repository of material. If he had only been able to maintain over Tilton's malice and folly the same command which he acquired over Beecher's generosity and Bowen's self-interest, the first and primary object of this conspiracy, namely, the reinstatement of Theodore Tilton in business and society, might perhaps have been accomplished, and Moulton might have had two powerful and ready allies in the men he had reconciled.

But Tilton whispered to as many as he chose his malignant slanders against Mr. Beecher—the creations of his own obscene imagination. So long as Mr. Beecher kept the secret, Tilton had an excellent chance to retell his own versions as to what the secret was. These versions varied according to his moods; they agreed in one thing only, hatred of Mr. Beecher. While he was in immediate danger, Moulton was able to keep him comparatively quiet; but when he had procured his money from Bowen, and suppressed, as he thought, the stories assailing his own character, he did not see why the policy of suppression should be rigidly adhered to merely on his wife's account.

Particularly after the Woodhull publication, and the substantial failure of The Golden Age, Tilton took a new course towards Mr. Beecher. What he had hitherto circulated in the dark, he now began to use as a direct menace. With Mr. Beecher silence had been a sacred duty under the circumstances, as he understood them. To Tilton and his "Mutual Friend" it was not a duty, but a policy, and they pursued it just as long and just as far as their objects required. Tilton's passion and folly, left to themselves, would soon have overthrown the whole of their plan; but, under Moulton's skillful management, the scandal was merely kept alive, so as to torment Mr. Beecher without provoking an open rupture, or arousing his suspicions that the conspirators were playing him false. Mrs. Morse, a lady whose energetic tongue they were powerless to suppress, was perpetually and falsely put forward as the malicious source of the vile rumors which thickened around their unconscious victim.

This, gentlemen, is the history of the policy of suppression in this case, a policy devised and inaugurated by the plaintiff and his devoted friend, and pursued by them with treachery for wicked ends, while it was accepted by the defendant in pursuance of a chivalric impulse, and maintained by him with loyalty and fidelity through every trial and danger to the end.

HOW THE POLICY OF SILENCE WAS VIOLATED.

Having shown you, gentlemen, how the defendant was induced to enter into this policy of silence, and how he has pursued it for years, in good faith, I now come to show you how this plaintiff and this "Mutual Friend" treacherously and continuously violated it. We have seen how the failure of the political campaign of 1872, and the immediate death of Mr. Greeley following upon the substantial failure of The Golden Age, blasted the future hopes of Tilton in that direction, and compelled him to look for new avenues of success. Up to this time, gentlemen, the policy which I have no doubt moved Moulton and Tilton was mainly the restoration of Tilton on this new newspaper enterprise which he had entered into in the attempted establishment of The Golden Age, but this had failed. The money which he had received from Bowen in 1873 was nearly expended; indeed, I believe in December, all the money had been drawn from Woodruff & Robinson.

Mr. Shearman—The last dollar was drawn on December 27th.

Mr. Tracy—December 27th, I am informed by the accounts, the last money of Tilton had been drawn from Woodruff & Robinson. The $7,000 was exhausted, and he had no means of future supply.

NEW FACTS ABOUT THE NEWSPAPER VENTURE PROPOSED IN 1872.

It was necessary, therefore, that they should look around to find some new avenue for the benefit of Tilton, and, gentlemen, the counsel for the plaintiff in opening this case called your attention to a newspaper scheme that was started and talked of in December, 1872. He represents it that it was the suggestion of some one to Mr. Beecher that now was the great time for a newspaper enterprise in New-York, and he was the man to head it. Three out of five editors controlling the great daily morning press of New-York had recently died. Raymond, the youngest, and the man perhaps having the best conception of the true sphere of journalism of any man who has ever been on the American press, was the first to depart; Bennett, the ablest newspaper publisher and editor that we have ever seen in this country, had also gone, and now came Greeley, by far the strongest writer that ever wrote upon the American morning press. He, too, had died in the early days of December. There remained, then, only Dana, of the Star, and Marble, of the World, left among the men of established reputations upon the morning press of New-York City. This scheming gentlemen, looking out to provide an avenue for Tilton, suggested that this was an occasion for the starting of a new newspaper in the City of New-York; that now there was no great and overshadowing name upon the morning press in the City of New-York; there was a vacancy, and Mr. Beecher was the man to fill that vacancy, and it would be wise and judicious, under the circumstances, for him and Tilton to unite in that enterprise.

I thank the counsel for the plaintiff for calling your attention to this scheme, gentlemen, so I will not be charged with having forced it to your attention here. We shall show you that the friends of Theodore Tilton approached the friends of Henry Ward Beecher, in December, 1872, with this proposition: "Let us buy The New-York Express," which was for sale; "let us turn it into a morning journal; let Henry Ward Beecher assume the editorship of it, and retire from Plymouth Church, and let Theodore Tilton go abroad for three or four years and be the head of the foreign bureau of that paper, and by that time the Woodhull scandal will have died away and will have been forgotten, and he can come back and take a position upon the editorial staff of that newspaper." We shall show you, gentlemen, that meetings were held between the friends of Theodore Tilton and the friends of Henry Ward Beecher to consummate this scheme. We shall show you that the men who represented Theodore Tilton said to the friends of Henry Ward Beecher, "Unless that newspaper scheme is started, or unless something is done for Theodore Tilton, there will be an explosion here which will shake Christendom." There were several meetings. Not only were Mr. Beecher's friends approached in the City of Brooklyn by the friends of Theodore Tilton, but they were also approached in the City of New-York. There was not one meeting at the Union League Club, but there were two, where this scheme was fully canvassed.

THE NEWSPAPER SCHEME A BLACKMAILING PLOT.

But Mr. Beecher's friends, gentlemen, did not bite at the bait. Although every inducement was brought to bear, and although they were threatened with exposure and menaced by a scandal, they refused to enter into the scheme. More than that, gentlemen, they denounced the scheme in 1872 as blackmailing; they so denounced it to Theodore Tilton to his face, in the City of New-York, at the Union League Club. They told him, then and there, that this newspaper scheme which he was proposing was no more nor less than an effort to blackmail Henry Ward Beecher and his friends by threatening the world and Christendom with a scandal, unless it was accepted. We shall show you, gentlemen, by witnesses whom you will not doubt—we shall show it by a man almost as well known in this country as the defendant himself, standing a prince among New-York merchants, whose word has never yet been questioned, who told Theodore Tilton to his face: "You ask me to subscribe to a fund to buy that paper as the condition of Henry Ward Beecher retiring from the pulpit and the suppression of this scandal, you to be interested in it; I tell you it is blackmailing." And it did not succeed.

Another thing, gentlemen, now, I desire to call your attention to in this connection. These interviews were held the last days of December. Horace B. Claflin, of the City of Brooklyn, was one of the men that was approached on this subject by the friends of Mr. Tilton, and he did not assent to the scheme. He held back; he refused. The man in New-York held back. This was early in December. Remember that Mr. Tilton and all these parties had just entered upon a policy of silence, that this scandal was to remain a secret and to be kept a secret. But the friends of Henry Ward Beecher did not come up; they did not move to the establishment of this newspaper.

THE DEFENSE'S THEORY OF THE COMPLAINING FRIEND LETTER.

And, now, I want to call your attention to this "Letter to a Complaining Friend," and ask you why it was that this policy of silence was broken within a very few days after it was made. Here is a letter to a "Complaining Friend," which is confessedly a fiction. Theodore Tilton tells you from the witness stand that he never received a letter from a "Complaining Friend;" he tells you that he never wrote a letter to a "Complaining Friend;" he tells you it was a fiction invented by him, to be published by him, concerning this scandal. Now, why was it? I will read the letter, gentlemen. [Reading]:

MY COMPLAINING FRIEND: Thanks for your good letter of bad advice. You say, "How easy it is to give the lie to the wicked story, and thus end it forever!"

I have read enough to call your attention to the letter, gentlemen. Now I go to the foot of the letter and show you the threat that is in it. [Reading]:

Moreover, after all, the chief victim of the public displeasure is myself alone, and, so long as this is happily the case, I shall try with patience to keep my answer within my own breast, lest it shoot forth like a thunderbolt through other hearts.

He has told you in the letter before you, remember, that this Woodhull scandal cannot be answered except by publishing the "True Story," thereby intimating that he has got a true story to publish—to tell the world; he has got a true story to publish referring to the scandal, in December, and not denying it, and closing the letter with a threat that if he should speak it would send a thunderbolt through other hearts. I ask you why was this lie, this confessed lie, this lie of a letter to a "Complaining Friend," when he never had received any such letter, and never answered any such letter? Why was it invented and published at this moment except as a menace to the friends of Mr. Beecher? For, I want to tell you, in this connection, gentlemen, that we shall show you that at the Union League Club, when this friend of Mr. Tilton approached the friends of Mr. Beecher on this newspaper enterprise, and said that that was the only means of suppressing the scandal, a friend of Mr. Beecher said to him: "If Mr. Beecher cannot stay in his pulpit in the face of this scandal, why it will be still worse for him as a journalist. He will expose himself to attack from every quarter; and how is it going to benefit Mr. Beecher by getting out of the pulpit and getting into a newspaper?" Says the friend: "We can take care of that. We have got possession of the documents." And, of course, if Henry Ward Beecher headed a great business enterprise, in which the friends of Theodore Tilton and Theodore Tilton himself were interested, they would not kill it by publishing the documents against Mr. Beecher, and thus creating a scandal. And the very suggestion that they had the documents which they would not publish, was a suggestion that if the scheme did not go on they might publish. And I desire to impress upon you, gentlemen, right here, that those are the identical documents which this friend of Mr. Tilton was talking about in the City of New-York in December, 1873, which Moulton and Tilton had solemnly agreed as the condition of the tripartite agreement, in April, 1873, to burn and destroy. They had not burned them; they had preserved them, in violation of their covenant, treacherously, and now they were using them, and boasting of their possession, as a means of menace and of intimidation to Henry Ward Beecher.

I am desired by my associate to call your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that the very day on which this letter to the "Complaining Friend" is dated is the very day that Mr. Tilton had drawn out his last dollar at Woodruff & Robinson's; a strange coincidence. This case, as I progress in it, you will see is full of the most remarkable coincidences of any case that has ever been brought before a court of justice. But that game did not succeed, and Mr. Beecher did not go into a newspaper enterprise, but he stayed in the pulpit.

THE TRICKERY USED WITH THE GOLDEN AGE ARTICLE.

The Winter went on; Theodore Tilton had no employment. I now come, gentlemen, to another fact which, unless I mistake myself, will throw a greater flood of light into the hidden secrets of this case, and respecting the character of this defendant, and the manner in which this scandal has been worked up from month to month and from year to year, than any other fact that has yet been commented upon during this opening. You remember the history of what is known here as "The Golden Age article" that Tilton put in type after his return from his discouraging efforts to lecture in the West, in the Winter of 1871 and 1872, the paper with which he menaced Bowen and Beecher, and which brought the $7,000. Now, gentlemen, that paper was preserved by Theodore Tilton until the following Fall, and until the publication of the Woodhull scandal. And right at this time, during the excitement of the Woodhull scandal, and when Mr. Moulton was recommending silence to Beecher, when these parties were agreeing upon silence and suppression, I will show you that Theodore Tilton artfully, cunningly, as has marked every step in his course in this transaction, made an effort to get that article secretly published without assuming the responsibility of it himself—wanted to have it mysteriously published. And so he had a conversation with a man that he denominates from the witness stand, "That man over there," whom we have since seen, Mr. McKelway of The Brooklyn Eagle.

And it transpires, gentlemen, that on the 18th day of November, 1872, Mr. McKelway of The Brooklyn Eagle, in pursuance of his profession as a journalist, of course, having read this Woodhull scandal, was sent by his principal, Mr. Kinsella, to have an interview with Mr. Tilton, an appointment having been brought about and made by their mutual friend—I will not use that term in regard to John W. Harman—their friend, Mr. Harman, had appointed an interview between Mr. Tilton and Mr. McKelway at Tilton's house, and that interview occurred on the 18th of November, I think—18th or 19th. We shall show you at that interview, gentlemen, not only that Tilton gave the history of this scandal, and of his difficulty, to McKelway on that occasion; we shall show you that he not only stated to McKelway that the charge he made against Mr. Beecher on that night of the 30th of December was not adultery, but improper proposals; we shall show you that he told Mr. McKelway that his wife resisted the proposals of Mr. Beecher; and we shall show you that when McKelway applied to him for that article—"The Golden Age article"—for publication, he said that he had agreed himself not to publish; therefore he could not make any publication for which he could be held responsible to the public; that would be in violation of his word. But he had no objection to the publication, if it could be arranged, you know! Well, how could it be arranged? So they canvassed various schemes by which this article could be got before the public without Theodore Tilton's being held personally responsible for the publication; and McKelway suggested that he might give it to somebody else, and that somebody else should show it to him, or that he might have a hypothetical interview with a man; suppose a case, and thus get the fact. And they canvassed various schemes, and finally Tilton says, "I will tell you: we will go up to my and our dear friend John W. Harman; I will take this article along, and I will give it over to him, and then, if he has a mind to give it to you, why that is all right. I do not care what Mr. Harman does."

And so they went up to John W. Harman's, and John W. Harman was not at home. They walked into the parlor. There a new difficulty met them. But Mr. Tilton is equal to any emergency—any suggestions. And so he said to Mr. McKelway, "See here, I will write a note to Mr. Harman, and I will leave this paper in a big envelope right here, on Harman's table and then you and I will go away, and, of course, if you get this paper, why it is none of my business." And so he put the article in the envelope and he wrote the note to Harman, and they went away, and, of course, Mr. McKelway turned right around and went back into the parlor and took the paper and had it in his possession, as Mr. Tilton of course knew he would. But so strong a desire had Tilton manifested to have this letter got before the public that when Mr. McKelway came to communicate the facts to his principal they dared not publish it. They suspected a trick and dared not publish it, and so they dictated it to a shorthand writer, and then returned the copy to Mr. Harman and kept the shorthand notes in their possession, and it was not until the following April that another enterprising newspaper got hold of those notes and published them in The Sunday Press.

Now, gentlemen, that is the history of the publication of that Golden Age article. It would have been published on the 19th day of November, 1872, following the publication of this Woodhull scandal, by the act of Theodore Tilton as I have stated it to you, but for the fact that his zeal and anxiety to have it published, and yet to avoid the personal responsibility of its publication, was so marked that it frightened the newspaper men, and they durst not do it. But in April, 1873, this newspaper article came before the public in a surreptitious way, proceeding from the identical copy that Mr. Tilton got into the hands of Mr. McKelway in the manner which I have stated. Of course, it created a great commotion. It was one of the emergencies of the case. It was published, I think, on Sunday, the 30th day of April.

THE ALLEGED BLACKMAILING OF MR. BEECHER IN ANOTHER WAY.

Now I come to another remarkable coincidence. (Samuel Weller is nothing to Tilton in producing remarkable coincidences)—I come to another remarkable coincidence. At the time of this publication, on the 19th of April, the day before Tilton's account had been written up at Woodruff & Robinson's, I said in the December previous he had drawn his last dollar; he had drawn his account, but there was an interest account which had not been cast up, and between December, 1873, and April, 1874, he had deposited about $100 more, I believe. But on the 19th of April this account was written up, or was ready to be written up. This paper was published on the 30th, and on the 21st of April Mr. Tilton drew his last dollar from the firm of Woodruff & Robinson—his last cent; down to a cent; the books were closed. Now, gentlemen, this brings us within a few days of a very important event in the history of this matter.

I have shown you that in the beginning they sought the restoration of Mr. Tilton; I have shown you that in the middle of this controversy they wanted what afforded bread and butter to him, a position also on the newspaper enterprise of 1873. But as he had gone on, and one disappointment after another had come upon him, no success had attended his efforts; it degenerated, as such things always do degenerate, into a mere question of money. You have heard from Mr. Moulton how, on an occasion, he took pains to display to this defendant the liberal offer of another person to contribute to the support of The Golden Age, with the remarkable statement, gentlemen, which I want to impress upon you, accompanying that exhibition, that they did not intend to use that money. Now, if they did not, pray why did Moulton exhibit it to Mr. Beecher at all? If this was money which had been rejected and was to be returned, why was Mr. Beecher's attention called to it? Do not suspect, gentlemen, that Francis D. Moulton or Theodore Tilton are bungling operators here. No more skillful men ever undertook the conducting of such a transaction as this. Mr. Moulton did not go to Henry Ward Beecher and say, "Your money or your life." He did not go to him and say: "Mr. Tilton is bankrupt; he is on the verge of starvation; give me $5,000 or I cannot keep him quiet." That is the way the bungler would have done. That is the way the unskillful operator would have performed. But do not suspect Francis D. Moulton of such indiscretion as that. He exhibits these papers and says: "My God, isn't that friendship! isn't that friendship!" Well, Mr. Beecher was dull; he did not actually take until he got away from Moulton, and, as he went away reflecting upon what he had seen, he said to himself, "What does this mean?" And, all at once, it occurred to him what it meant, and in a day or two afterwards he saw Moulton, and when he suggested his theory about it, why, he found that he was exactly right; that money was what Moulton wanted. Mr. Beecher had taken the hint, and Mr. Beecher says: "Why, I am willing to contribute; I will contribute;" and Mr. Moulton says: "It will be the best investment you ever made." But, says Mr. Beecher, "I shall have to raise the money on a mortgage."

Now, gentlemen, I think I do not mistake Mr. Moulton's evidence. Although he intended, attempted, to cast an aspersion upon Mr. Beecher's character in this respect in his public statement, when he comes upon the witness stand, if I did not mistake his evidence, he says that Mr. Beecher told him he would have to raise it on a mortgage, and as soon as he could get the money on a mortgage he would contribute. So Moulton knew that he was not taking the loose money of Henry Ward Beecher. He knew that he was requiring him to mortgage his property to raise it. And yet he would have you believe that this was a mere incident, a matter that attracted no attention, no thought. And Mr. Beecher went home and mortgaged the roof that sheltered him and his aged wife and children, to satisfy the demand of these two conspirators, and he went to the bank and drew the money and took it and placed it in the hands of Moulton. And then there came a message from Tilton—"Grace, mercy and peace!" That money was put into the hands of Francis D. Moulton, gentlemen, and the day he received it he knew that Tilton was wanting money. That is evident from the fact that a friend had offered to contribute which had been returned. He knew that Mr. Tilton was wanting money, and he lost no time to send him money. But he sent it with a note saying: "I send you a thousand dollars and a memorandum note. Please sign and return." And what was Tilton's answer? "I cannot borrow money, for I see no way to returning it,"—and he sent back the note and the check. And then Moulton sent him the check without the note, and Tilton kept the money. And then he went on from time to time drawing from Moulton every time he said he was short, for one whole year, gentlemen; for one entire year we have shown you that Theodore Tilton had no other income except the $5,000 that Mr. Beecher had deposited for him with Moulton, and he lived on it and consumed it, and but for the unfortunate publication of the tripartite agreement in May—in the last of the same month—there would have been peace all that year in regard to that scandal. Remember, gentlemen, that Moulton had never been in the habit of loaning Tilton money. He tells you that he never loaned him at any time exceeding $500, and that Tilton only owed him at this time about $1,000. And yet he went on advancing him for a year until he had advanced him the $5,000. But in the Spring of 1874 the fund was running low. This man who knew nothing about it, this man who was in blissful ignorance of the source of the revenue that was feeding and supporting him, somehow or other had an intuitive knowledge of the fact that the pile was becoming exhausted. Because, we shall show you, gentlemen, that in May, 1874, when this money was running out, this same serviceable friend of Tilton's who had attempted to organize for his benefit this newspaper scheme of 1873, this same friend goes again to the friend of Mr. Beecher and demands $5,000 more for Theodore Tilton, in the Spring of 1874. I am reminded of what I should have remembered, that the first demand was for $10,000. Failing in that, they offered to compromise for $5,000. Of course, gentlemen, it was not demanded for Theodore Tilton in the express language of blackmail. Oh, no. This is a case of indirection from the beginning to the end of it; indirection has marked every step of it, and so you meet it here again; but the veil is so thin that the mind of no intelligent man will fail to penetrate it. The Golden Age was still on Tilton's hands. It was worthless, it was bankrupt. Tilton was seeking to give it away, absolutely begging for some one to take it; and this friend went to the friends of Beecher and said—

[At this point the foreman notified to the Court that one of the jurors wished to retire.]

On resuming his argument Mr. Tracy said:

Before proceeding, gentlemen, to the point that I was on before the interruption I desire here to say that I ought to call your attention to the treachery of this publication, or attempted publication, by Tilton of that letter of his directed to Mr. Bowen, dated January 1, 1871; I ought to call your attention to the treachery of that attempted publication against Henry C. Bowen himself. You will remember, gentlemen, that Mr. Tilton had got the money from Mr. Bowen on the promise never to repeat these scandals, and never, therefore, to publish that letter, and he had obtained it on the distinct understanding that all the papers, which included the one addressed to him by Tilton on January 1st, should have been destroyed; and yet you see, in violation of that agreement, in violation of the agreement by which he had obtained from Mr. Bowen $7,000, in 1873, six months after he had so obtained that money, he was colluding with a journalist to get that letter published, without being compelled to take the personal responsibility of publishing it. And it was this tripartite agreement to which he had reference when he said to Mr. McKelway: "Why, I have agreed not to publish this paper, therefore I cannot publish it on my own responsibility, but if it can get before the public without my being responsible for it, all right."

THE SECOND APPLICATION FOR $5,000 UNSUCCESSFUL.

I was saying, gentlemen, that in 1874 there came to the friends of Mr. Beecher a suggestion from this same friend of Mr. Tilton, who had attempted to negotiate this newspaper enterprise of 1873, suggesting a scheme by which Tilton should go to Europe, and be gone some time; but the difficulty was to raise the money; he had no means to go to Europe, and it was finally said, "Why, Mr. Beecher's friends can put into Mr. Tilton's hands $5,000 of money, under the pretense of a transfer of The Golden Age. We can buy The Golden Age of Tilton, and pay him $5,000, and then give it to somebody, whoever will take it, and make the transfer of The Golden Age the cover of putting into Mr. Tilton's hands $5,000 in money. Now, as I say to you, gentlemen, this Golden Age, as has already appeared in the evidence satisfactorily, and will be made further to appear in evidence, this Golden Age was perfectly bankrupt. Mr. Tilton had long been seeking to get rid of it, to give it away; and it was stated distinctly between this friend of Tilton and this friend of Beecher, that it was only used as a cover to transfer this money from the hands of Mr. Beecher's friends to the hands of Theodore Tilton. Now, in all these cases that I am talking about newspapers, gentlemen, I want you to bear in mind, that Theodore Tilton was informed of the enterprise, and knew what had transpired between his friend and the friends of Mr. Beecher. For instance, he was informed in 1873 who this friend was, what he had said, and what he had done, fully; and two years afterwards we find this same friend—not another, but the same man—coming again to the friends of Beecher with a new suggestion for $5,000 more—made $10,000 in the start, and finally reduced to $5,000.

Now we will show you, gentlemen, that Mr. Tilton was seen and talked with on the subject, and knew of the negotiation that was going on. We shall show you that this was about the time of the preparation of the Bacon letter, which caused this explosion. We shall show you, unless I am mistaken, that the Bacon letter was in preparation at the very time this negotiation for $5,000 was going on. It was well understood by the friends of Mr. Beecher and the friend of Mr. Tilton that it was in preparation. If it is permitted, gentlemen, we shall show you that this scheme, when mentioned to one or two others of Mr. Beecher's friends—this second scheme—was denounced as a blackmailing operation, and they refused to submit to it, or to have anything to do with it. Their answer was, "If we begin now, we don't know where we shall stop. Pay not one cent." And this friend of Mr. Tilton was informed that this money could not be raised, and the negotiation need not longer be presented, or the proposition need not longer be presented. And we shall show you, gentlemen, that that friend then said: "Well, the letter to Bacon, or the Bacon letter, will be published, and Mr. Beecher will be ruined." The $5,000 was not paid. True to the prediction of that friend, the Bacon letter was published, and I think nobody will dispute that it has been followed by a persistent and malignant effort to ruin Henry Ward Beecher, and thus make the prophecy of that friend to come true. But the money was not raised. Theodore Tilton did not get his $5,000. The Golden Age passed into other hands about this time, and this controversy began.

THE PUBLICATION OF THE TRIPARTITE COVENANT.

Now, gentlemen, I go back to the publication of the tripartite agreement and to the scenes that followed about the first of June, 1873. That tripartite agreement, as you have heard, was published without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Beecher, by one of his friends, who had preserved a copy of it—the only copy, I believe, gentlemen, so far as I am informed, that Mr. Beecher or any of his friends ever had of any paper connected with this controversy; for I recall at this time no other paper of the multitude that was ever left in their hands or kept by Mr. Beecher or any of his friends. But this friend publishes a copy of the tripartite agreement, and that caused an explosion. That was published on Friday, May 30th. Mr. Tilton then threatened that he would make a publication unless Mr. Beecher in some way vindicated him from the imputation which he said that tripartite agreement cast upon him by this publication. Well, now, gentlemen, you have heard from the witness stand how much pains Theodore Tilton took in changing his clause of that tripartite agreement before signing it. He has told you, Moulton has told you, and other witnesses will tell you all about it. He took it home with him, and he rewrote it himself every word of it, as I believe, and he made that clause of the tripartite agreement just to suit him; it was just what he wanted it, and he refused to sign anything else, he said, except just such a statement of his case as he desired. Then one would have thought, having drawn his own paper, that the publication of that paper would not have been a very great offense to Theodore Tilton. We could understand how Mr. Bowen might have complained of the publication and justly complained of it; but it is difficult to understand how Theodore Tilton could complain of it. But he did, and he insisted that that publication put him in the position of one having been forgiven by Mr. Beecher, and therefore he said that Mr. Beecher should do something to right that wrong.

Well, now, Mr. Beecher was not responsible for that publication. But that is no matter. That is a peculiarity of this case, gentlemen, which has marked it from the beginning to the end, that Mr. Beecher has been held responsible by Mr. Tilton for everything that everybody did in connection with this scandal. If a member of Plymouth Church uttered a word concerning Theodore Tilton, Beecher was responsible. If my friend Shearman said anything that was offensive to Tilton or Moulton, the man who was to be held responsible was Beecher, not Shearman. If the Clerk or Assistant Pastor or anybody else down at Plymouth Church did what Tilton did not want them to do, or refused to do what he did want them to do, the man who was to blame for it was Beecher, and Beecher should be held responsible. So this publication of this tripartite agreement, which was an accident which none of the parties to it directly were responsible for, was to be charged home upon Mr. Beecher, and he must redress the wrong; nay, more, he must do something which would be equivalent to relieving Mr. Tilton from the imputation that he said his own article put upon him. Well, now, what was that imputation? It is difficult for us to say, gentlemen.

MR. BEECHER MADE DESPERATE.

Mr. Beecher sought to convince this man that the publication of the tripartite agreement did him no wrong; but he insisted that it did, and so he threatened to publish, and on Saturday morning, May 31, Mr. Beecher was sent for to come to that celebrated study in Remsen-st., where he had an interview with Moulton and Tilton, and Mr. Tilton threatened to make a publication, and Mr. Beecher went home that morning to consider and determine his course. He had thought of it through the day, and he had fixed upon the policy that he should pursue.

He had entered into this policy of silence which they had instituted for their own protection, which they had instituted for the purpose of suppressing the scandals which were floating in the community against Tilton—he had followed that policy with the same good faith that characterizes every act of Henry Ward Beecher's life. He had stood their persecution, their annoyance, their torments, their threats, their indignities, for four long years; but now at last, by the indiscreet act of a friend, Mr. Tilton claimed to be so offended that this policy of silence should no longer be adhered to. "Well," said Mr. Beecher, "let it come. I am prepared to meet it. I face your publication, and I defy you! But there is Plymouth Church, dearer to me than the apple of my eye; there are these thousand trusting souls, young men and women, who have been reared up by me, and under my instruction; there is an organization which has within it three thousand children in its Sunday-School; there is a power that is doing good in the land, foremost in every good work, carrying on every enterprise of charity, benevolence, with a power and an effective force that characterizes no other church in this city or this State. That church is mine. Under God, I have been permitted to raise it, to build it up and to hold it together. Now, shall I shatter it? Shall any personal controversy of mine be made the thunderbolt that shall shiver Plymouth Church to atoms? Shall I divide it? No; that society shall be united; I will fight my own fight against Theodore Tilton, but I will not drag it into the church. I will step outside of it; then I will welcome the conflict, if the conflict must come." And so, on Saturday night he went down again, this brave-hearted, true man, to meet the men who had been persecuting him for years; and there he said: "You publish; I resign; I welcome the conflict; come on. But I take not Plymouth Church into this conflict; at least, I will give these noble men and women who have stood by me the opportunity to say whether they accept my resignation before this contest is inaugurated." And he met them, and how did they receive it? When he showed to Moulton this resignation, why, he said: "Good God!" It took his breath away; he read it, and he ran down quicker than lightning to convey to Tilton the news of this man's design: "The time has come when persecution will be no longer submitted to; the hour has now come when it is liberty or it is conflict, and this is liberty." "You publish; I fight." And they were amazed at the temerity of this man; they were astounded to find that the man that they thought they had sure hold on and would lead forever under their yoke, at last had come to the point of saying: "Gentlemen, thus far but no farther." He went home, and on the next morning he indited the letter of June 1st, expecting that that was to be the last Sabbath that he would spend as minister of Plymouth Church. He supposed, in the language of that letter, that he was "preaching his last sermon;" he supposed that he went from that pulpit forth, on that Sunday night, to conflict and to battle with these two men who had been hounding him for the last four years. But, when he sent that letter—he tells Moulton in the letter: "I, too, shall make a statement; you publish; I publish too; and I will make a statement that will stand the test of the Judgment Day"—and he sends that letter down to Moulton. He receives back this answer:

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your letter makes this first Sabbath of Summer dark and cold like a vault.

Ah, gentlemen, you will remember the history of this letter. Mr. Moulton first starts to write, and he writes the following:

MY DEAR FRIEND: You know I have never been in sympathy with the mood out of which you have often spoken as you have written this morning. I know you can stand if the whole case was published to-morrow; and, in my opinion, it shows a selfish faith in God, who—

And there he stops; erases what he has written; and commences his letter anew; but he says to Mr. Beecher there:

I know that you can stand if the whole case was published to-morrow.

And so did Mr. Beecher know it; it conveyed no information to Mr. Beecher; but it is a confession passing between these two men, at this time, showing that they both knew that when the truth of this case came out Mr. Beecher could stand; and stand successfully. Having written that, he goes back and writes again:

MY DEAR FRIEND: Your letter makes this first Sabbath of Summer dark and cold like a vault. You have never inspired me with courage or hope; and if I had listened to you alone my hands would have been dropped helpless long ago. You don't begin to be in the danger to-day that has faced you many times before. If you now look it square in the eyes, it will cower and slink away again.

And so it did cower and slink away!

You know that I have never been in sympathy with, but that I absolutely abhor, the unmanly mood out of which your letter of this morning came. This mood is a reservoir of mill-dew. You can stand if the whole case were published to-morrow. In my opinion it shows only a selfish faith in God to go whining into heaven, if you could, with a truth that you are not courageous enough, with God's help and faith in God, to try to live on earth. You know that I love you; and because I do, I shall try and try and try, as in the past.

You are mistaken when you say that Theodore Tilton charges you with making him appear as one graciously pardoned by you. He said the form in which it was published in some of the papers made it so appear; and it was from this that he asked relief. I don't think it impossible to frame a letter which will cover the case. May God bless you; I know He will protect you.

A prophet was Francis D. Moulton, as well as a "Mutual Friend."

MR. MOULTON'S OWN TESTIMONY TO THE STRENGTH OF MR. BEECHER'S CASE.

But what sort of a God is Moulton's if he thinks, when he asserts, "I know that God will protect you, Mr. Beecher," if Mr. Beecher was then the man that he now pretends to say he is? "God will protect you." Will God protect the guilty? Does Moulton think that his God protects the guilty? Does he think that He covers him with His protection who has been a cold-blooded and heartless seducer of innocence for years? I affirm, gentlemen, that both of those expressions in that letter show that Francis D. Moulton knew that when this whole scandal was out there was nothing affecting the honor of Henry Ward Beecher as a Christian minister. Indiscretions it might prove; complications arising out of family difficulties, that are hard of explanation and difficult to be explained to outsiders, it might establish; but he tells him and he tells you, "There is no guilt there which, the world knowing of you could not still stand as the pastor of Plymouth Church." I had hoped, gentlemen, to have in court an authority on the subject bearing upon this letter. I will refer to it, and state the law. It is this, as established by the Supreme Court of this State, that when a jury is called upon to consider the credibility of a witness and his writing, which he made at the time of a transaction, is in conflict with his testimony that he gives on the trial, and that testimony is also in conflict with the other party to the case, the jury are bound to take the writing and not the oath of the witness as delivered from the stand. I read, if your Honor please, from the 30th of Howard's Supreme Court Reports, Boyd vs. Colt:

Where, on a question of fact, the plaintiff swears one way—

Judge Neilson—What page do you read from?

Mr. Tracy—384, if your Honor please. The 30th of Howard's Practice Reports, 384.

Where, on a question of fact, the plaintiff swears one way, and the defendant directly adverse, and the defendant introduces a letter of the plaintiff in evidence, written before the commencement of the action, flatly contradicting his oath, the jury are bound to disregard his oath.

This is a decision at the New-York General Term, Sutherland, Judge, delivering the opinion:

The question in this case was whether the services performed by the plaintiff for the defendant in London were performed under a special agreement to be paid for at the rate of $1,000 per year, or whether they were performed without any special agreement as to the rate of compensation, and with a view of the plaintiff receiving therefor what they were really worth. On this question of fact the plaintiff swore one way and Sargeant, the agent of the defendant, another. The jury had a right to credit the plaintiff and not Sargeant. We ought not to grant a new trial, because they did so.

But I do not see how the jury could disregard the plaintiff's letter produced and read in evidence by the defendant on the trial. In that letter the plaintiff expressly admits that he had been in the defendant's employ for two years at $1,000, meaning evidently at the rate of, or salary of $1,000 per year, and these two years must include the period of his services in London up to the date of his letter on or about the 1st of January, 1854.

It appears to me that this letter, unexplained, was conclusive against the plaintiff, and that the jury were bound to disregard his oath when flatly contradicted by his own letter, written long before the action was commenced.

I think the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

Now, gentlemen, we have shown you the letter of Francis D. Moulton written in June, 1873, to Henry Ward Beecher, who knew certainly quite as well as Mr. Moulton knew what were the real facts of this case, and in that letter we see Francis D. Moulton saying to Mr. Beecher: "You can stand if the whole case was published to-morrow." But now he comes into Court and under the solemnity of an oath proceeds to tell you that this man for two years before, for three years nearly, had been confessing his adultery with the plaintiff's wife. He tells you a story, which, in fact, makes him one of the worst seducers and libertines the country has ever seen, and yet he pretends to us that such a man could stand in the foremost pulpit of America and be received and sustained by its people, although he should confess his crime and confess the falsehoods and lies that he had told to cover it up! Gentlemen of the jury, you will not believe in the face of this letter, in the face of the numerous contradictions of Mr. Moulton, in the face of the fact that the witness has been himself lying about this case, as he would now have you believe, for four years—when you have heard the evidence of Henry Ward Beecher on this subject, I say you will not believe the testimony of Francis D. Moulton, but will accept his letter written on that Sunday morning of June 1st, 1873, as stating the truth and the whole truth in this unfortunate controversy.

HOW MANY TIMES MR. MOULTON SAID, "I DON'T REMEMBER."

While I am on this subject, gentlemen, I desire to call your attention briefly to one or two of the marked features that characterize Mr. Moulton's testimony as a witness. I have had occasion, once or twice, as I have passed along, to call your attention to special facts where he forgets or don't remember. His cross-examination, in that respect, was one of the most remarkable that I have ever seen in a court of justice. I doubt whether it is not the most remarkable that has ever been exhibited before any judicial tribunal. I have taken pains, gentlemen, to have counted the number of times in which Mr. Moulton, in answer to questions on cross-examination touching material points in this case, has said, "I don't remember," or "I don't recollect," the number of matters which have been called to his attention, important and material in this case, where he has refused to give an answer, and cloaked himself under the pretense that he don't remember or cannot recollect, and that number, gentlemen, is 305 times. And this is a specimen. Speaking of Mrs. Woodhull after her Free Love speech at Steinway Hall, where he heard her, and was present with Mr. Tilton where he presided, I asked him if he had Mrs. Woodhull at his house after that. [Reading]:

Q. Did you have her at your house after that speech? A. I don't recollect.

Q. You don't recollect? A. No.

Q. When Mrs. Woodhull was at your house talking about her Steinway Hall speech, did Mr. Tilton come with her? A. I don't remember whether he was with her, or not, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether he went away with her? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Speaking of this gift that was proposed to be given to The Golden Age at the time he exhibited the papers to Mr. Beecher, saying that was evidence of friendship, I asked him:

Do you remember whether the amount offered was as high as $5,000? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether it was as high as $3,000? A. I don't recollect.

Then speaking of the Woodhull speech again:

What was the subject of that speech? A. I don't recollect, Sir, what the subject was.

Q. Well, you heard it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it on the marriage relation? A. I really don't recollect, Sir, whether that was the title or not.

Q. I did not ask you about the title? A. You asked me what the speech was on, whether it was on the marriage relation.

Q. Yes; I asked you whether the subject was not the marriage relation? A. That, I say, I cannot tell you.

Q. You cannot tell that? A. No, Sir.

Present at the speech—a speech that had created great excitement—had a serious interruption—and he could not tell what the subject of the speech was about; and you will remember, gentlemen, that after he got out of our hands, on cross-examination, and was taken by the plaintiff, he was able to repeat, almost word for word, Theodore Tilton's speech introducing Victoria Woodhull on that occasion, made in 1871, and swore that he had never read it since that time. He repeated it, I say, almost word for word, a fact in human memory that I have never before seen equaled, if it was true. He repeated it, only leaving out of it, gentlemen, the remarkable feature of it, and that was that Theodore Tilton introduced Victoria Woodhull on that occasion as the advocate of social freedom. With that exception it was word for word. With that single exception, gentlemen, which occurs at the last end of the speech, his repetition of that speech was word for word with the shorthand report published in the newspaper the next morning, and yet he tells you he had never read it since, and yet when I had him on cross-examination he could not tell us what the subject even of Victoria Woodhull's speech was.

Gentlemen of the jury, would you give credit to the testimony of such a witness? Will you hang the most important issues that were ever submitted to the judgment of twelve men for eighteen centuries, on the testimony of such a witness as that? I'll read no further. I say to you that I have had them counted, and the report is 305 such answers as that from Francis D. Moulton on cross-examination.

It is one o'clock now, your Honor.

The Court here took a recess until 3 p. m.

MR. BEECHER'S CARD IN THE EAGLE.

The Court convened at 2:15 p. m., and Mr. Tracy continued his argument.

Mr. Tracy—We had finished at recess, gentlemen of the jury, June 1st, 1873, which you will remember occurred on Sunday. The emergency which the publication of the tripartite agreement had created was after Mr. Beecher's threat of resignation, a threat to face these men, and himself to meet statement with statement, satisfied, as you will see, by a very slight affair. Moulton proved a prophet, and this new danger did slink away and hide itself when Mr. Beecher threatened to meet it firmly and to bid them do their worst, and Mr. Tilton was contented with this little card, which he says he wrote, and which was published in The Brooklyn Eagle, June 2:

To the Editor of The Brooklyn Eagle.

JUNE 2, 1873.

DEAR SIR: I have maintained silence respecting the slanders which have for some time past followed me. I should not speak now but for the sake of relieving another of unjust imputation. The document that was recently published, and bearing my name with others, was published without consultation either with me or with Mr. Tilton, nor with any authorization from us. If that document should lead the public to regard Theodore Tilton as the author of the calumnies to which it alludes, it would do him great injustice. I am unwilling that he should even seem to be responsible for the injurious statements, whose force was derived wholly from others.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Now, you will see, gentlemen, that that card contented Mr. Tilton, but the document which was published, the tripartite agreement, did not assert or profess to assert that Theodore Tilton was the author of the scandals which it recited, and the publication of it created no such imputation, and yet you see that this great emergency was satisfied when Mr. Beecher threatened to meet their threats by publication of that mild and harmless card. But there is another fact, gentlemen of the jury, connected with this 2d day of June, 1872, to which it now becomes my duty to call your attention.

COMMENTS ON MRS. MOULTON'S TESTIMONY.

We now, gentlemen, approach one of the most delicate subjects which my duty calls upon me to discuss. I refer to the connection of Mrs. Emma Moulton with this case. Apart from her relations to this matter, I shall not speak of this lady otherwise than in terms of respect. I feel most deeply her extraordinary position—the terrible emergency which she had to meet, and the overwhelming power of the temptation before which she has fallen. The truth of this case makes it impossible for me to abstain from speaking with apparent severity of this lady's testimony; but I do so with sorrow for her, reserving all my indignation for those who have forced her upon the witness stand to confirm the accusations which they have invented. The experience of ages has shown, gentlemen, that among the best, the purest and the loveliest of women, the instinct of devotion to their husbands and their children is so strong, and rises to such a sublime height of unselfishness, that not only will they, in the majority of cases, sacrifice all their own temporal interests, but that in many instances they will consciously imperil their immortal souls, for the sake of saving the unworthy men to whom they are bound by sacred ties. This truth has always been recognized by our law, which until eight years ago would not permit wives to be called upon to testify for or against their husbands, and by that other principle of the law, still in force, which absolves a woman from responsibility for any crime, less than murder, committed by her in the immediate presence of her husband. This truth is perfectly familiar to every one frequenting our courts, for not a week passes in which some poor, broken-hearted, cruelly-abused woman, in the lower walks of life, does not appear in some court and swear that the injuries which she had received from her brutal husband were not really inflicted by him, but proceeded from some other cause. It is recognized by society at large, which expects, as a matter of course, that women, otherwise excellent and truthful, are, just in proportion to the loveliness and magnanimity of their natures, likely to deceive their friends in their accounts of their husbands' conduct. And this feminine weakness, which it is impossible not to admire, even while we must strongly condemn, has been immortalized by more than one poet as a fit subject for pathetic verse. One of the most touching poems of Adelaide Proctor is illustrative of this very point. It is called "Milly's Expiation," and is the story of a poor, high-minded girl, who, in order to save her lover from conviction for murder, committed deliberate perjury, and having saved him, devotes the rest of her life to one long expiation for her sin.

MRS. MOULTON'S UNHAPPY POSITION AS A WITNESS.

What is the relation of Mrs. Moulton to this case?

This lady is the wife of the only man who has anything to lose by a verdict for the defendant. Animated by his thirst for revenge, Francis D. Moulton has periled all on the issue of this suit. The plaintiff himself might find some persons to excuse him, on the supposition of an insane jealousy, but no such excuse can be made for his friend. He will be held to a strict and stern responsibility, and the plaintiff's failure in this suit, as every man can see, involves Mr. Moulton in utter and hopeless ruin. Yet his guilt and his ruin will not release his unhappy wife from her allegiance, nor make him any the less the father of her only child. What a terrible alternative for her! If she so testifies as to save Mr. Beecher, she necessarily ruins her own husband, destroys her home, and leaves her only child to a blight. If, on the other hand, she can give such testimony as will convict Mr. Beecher, she saves her husband's fame, at least so far as to prevent the exposure of his perjury. And a woman's confidence may lead her to hope that she can thus reinstate him in social position, and maintain him in the business world.

There is much to be said in palliation of Mrs. Moulton's course. Her husband has doubtless assured her with the utmost solemnity that he knows Mr. Beecher to be guilty; and this she may have been well made to believe, since it is hard indeed for a wife to disbelieve the earnest assurances of her husband. The struggle then presents itself to her mind as one between her husband, asserting the substantial truth, and her husband's enemies asserting substantial falsehood. "What matter is it," she may say to herself, "which side presents the truth as to details? The side which has the substantial truth ought to gain the victory; and if that victory can only be gained by misrepresenting some of the minor circumstances, is it not better that the truth should be sacrificed in respect to these details, than that it should be sacrificed upon the main issue? Mr. Beecher" she may say, "has certainly been guilty of adultery. Is it not less wicked that I should say that he has confessed it to me, than that he should sacrifice my husband, by falsely asserting that he has not confessed to him? Since he has confessed to somebody, of course, when talking on the same subject, he must have meant to confess to me. He expressed himself sorrowfully, and for what else could he have felt sorrow? He acknowledged that he had been in fault, and to what fault could he have referred, except the crime of adultery? If, then, I put that very word into his mouth, I shall only be expressing his real meaning, and be serving the cause of substantial truth." Such, gentlemen, it is easy to imagine was the process by which Mrs. Moulton convinced herself that she ought to testify to these explicit confessions; and having quieted her conscience to this extent, it was not hard to go further, and attribute language to herself which no lady could possibly use under such circumstances, and language to Mr. Beecher which none but a fool could utter.

MRS. MOULTON'S MANNER ON THE WITNESS STAND.

The first interview which Mrs. Moulton relates, obviously does not suffice to convict Mr. Beecher, while it plainly shows that her husband had previously given her his version of the case. Mr. Beecher, she says, asked her if Frank had told her the facts about his great sorrow, and she said he had. Nothing else that is pretended to be a confession follows, until June 22d, 1873, when Mrs. Moulton says she advised Mr. Beecher to confess his crime before the Church. This is extraordinary language for a lady to use, when conversing with her pastor in his great sorrow. The word "crime" is offensive and coarse, and no lady of the refinement of Mrs. Moulton could possibly have used it on such an occasion. This, it will be remembered, was the time when Mrs. Moulton says she kissed Mr. Beecher on the forehead in sympathy for his distress. You will remember Mrs. Moulton's singular manner in giving her testimony. Her face was flushed, her eyes were steadily fixed upon the floor, and she could not look even her husband's own counsel in the face. During the whole of the cross-examination in the morning session she never once looked Mr. Evans in the eye. Twice she made the effort to do so, but her eyes instantly wandered and made the circuit of the court-room and the ceiling, without resting upon her questioner. In the afternoon, by a desperate effort, she succeeded in doing better. But these are minor matters. Her manner strongly indicated that she was repeating a lesson. By another of those extraordinary coincidences which mark her husband's testimony, she, too, was obliged to stop and correct her account of Mr. Beecher's language, by changing it from a natural to an unnatural form of expression. In her direct examination she made Mr. Beecher say, "Tilton, in striking at me, sacrifices his wife," and immediately changed the words into this strange form, "Tilton, in stating the truth concerning me, sacrifices his wife;" an awkward and utterly unnatural mode of speech, reminding us of her husband's saying that Mr. Beecher spoke of his relations—and then stopping—and changing it into sexual relations with Mrs. Tilton. It is perfectly clear that these changes were made for the purpose of inserting something unnatural, with a view to the conviction of Mr. Beecher.

ABSURDITIES IN MRS. MOULTON'S STORY INSTANCED.

I will not dwell on other points of the story which show its inherent improbability; the language about the tortures of the damned, which is plainly copied from his letter of February, 1873; the continued advice to go to the church immediately and tell all the truth, given the day after Moulton had so strongly dissuaded him from publishing anything, and two days after Tilton had threatened to shoot Beecher if he did tell the truth; the allusion to the card in The Eagle, as a thing which he was considering, but thought useless, when in fact the card was already in type in The Eagle office, as Moulton himself has shown; the unutterable absurdity of Mr. Beecher's announcement that he should never see her again, and should poison himself forthwith, followed by his conclusion to postpone his death for one day, for the sake of collecting some mementoes to send through her to his friends—these inherent absurdities are enough to condemn this story. But I shall have something even more decisive to say upon the subject of this interview presently.

Before coming to that, however, I desire you to observe that Mrs. Moulton's account of the interview of July 13th, 1874, bears similar internal evidence of its untruth. I will only call attention to one point. Mrs. Moulton accuses herself of having used this unladylike expression: "If you had confessed it then, you would have been better off. Now, you have the original crime and four years of perjury and lying to answer for." Gentlemen, you have seen for yourselves that Mrs. Moulton is naturally a lady; you know and I know that she has the manners of a lady. She could no more have made that coarse and vulgar speech to her pastor, at that time, than she could have cut off her hand. Nor could she have had even the idea of "perjury" in her mind, for Mr. Beecher had never taken an oath, nor said a word in public, except in his brief card of June 30, 1873. That date is not right.

Mr. Shearman—June 13, 1874.

Mr. Tracy—June 13, 1874. That is right. But the climax is reached when she represents Mr. Beecher as responding to that insult, "You are dearer to me than any sister I have." That is the reply she makes Mr. Beecher make to her charge of perjury.

Again, the account which Mr. Moulton gives of her interview with Mrs. Tilton in October, 1873, is preposterous upon its face. In her direct examination she told you that she then called on Mrs. Tilton, to ask if she would allow her husband to go down with the truth. On her cross-examination, she admitted that on this occasion she implored Mrs. Tilton to stand by Mr. Beecher, and urged her with agony and tears, not to allow Mr. Tilton to destroy him. That is the interview which she states occurred between herself and Mrs. Tilton, you will remember gentlemen, in Oct, 1873, at the time Mr. Tilton had gone down to the church, at the church meeting. But feeling the difficulty of her position before you, Mrs. Moulton sought to qualify this statement, by claiming that she only begged Mrs. Tilton to stand by Mr. Beecher, so long as she could without sacrificing the truth. Yet if Mrs. Moulton is to be believed, it was impossible for Mrs. Tilton to stand by Mr. Beecher at all, without sacrificing the truth.

THE INTERVIEW OF JUNE 2, 1873, A FICTION.

But, gentlemen, there remains a graver fact than any to which I have yet referred. You will observe that Mrs. Moulton fixes the principal interview with Mr. Beecher upon Monday, the 2d of June, 1873. She has identified that day with great particularity, and left no room for misapprehension as to date. She has also fixed the length of that interview at four hours, by reference to circumstances which cannot now be explained away. The motive for naming this day is obvious. There were but two days on which, even according to the plaintiff's theory, the idea of suicide could possibly have been talked about, namely: May 31 and June 2, 1873. And Mrs. Moulton was required to confirm her husband's story of Mr. Beecher's contemplated suicide on May 31st, which was Saturday. The testimony of Mr. Moulton has left no room for a four hours' interview between his wife and Mr. Beecher. The next Monday was therefore chosen as the only available day, and it has been specified, I repeat, with the utmost particularity. The subject of this pretended conversation, and the circumstances under which it was had, are such as to make it certain that it either took place on June 2, 1873, or never took place at all.

Gentlemen, in all this the interposition of Divine Providence is most singularly manifest. For upon that very morning of June 2, 1873, Mr. Beecher was detained at his own house in consultation with a gentleman well known to you all; and at the very time at which, according to Mrs. Moulton, she was tucking him up on her sofa, and encouraging him to confess, he was seated by the side of his own wife, and speeding his way to Peekskill! This we shall prove to you so conclusively, gentlemen, that I venture with confidence to predict that you will see Mrs. Moulton again on the witness stand, testifying that by June 2, she meant May 31, that by Monday she meant Saturday, that by four hours she meant half an hour, that there was no sofa and no Afghan, that nine o'clock in the morning was seven o'clock in the evening, and that Mr. Beecher's card in The Eagle was not spoken of or thought of! Perhaps you will believe this story, gentlemen, when thus amended, as amended it will surely be; but if you do, your capacity for belief will exceed that of any other twelve gentlemen in my acquaintance. For Mr. Beecher will give you the most explicit assurance that no such conversation as that which Mrs. Moulton has related ever occurred, either on June 2 or at any other time, that he never spoke of suicide, and she never spoke of crime, and that the only interview between himself and this lady at or about this period took place on the evening of Saturday, May 31, lasting only from fifteen minutes to half an hour, while Mr. Moulton stepped down stairs to repeat Mr. Beecher's proposed resignation to Mr. Tilton. We shall leave no doubt on that subject, gentlemen. The proof which we shall introduce to you will show conclusively that Mr. Beecher spent no time at Mr. Moulton's house on Monday, June 2. We shall show you where he was in the morning when he went away; the time he went to Peekskill; who took him from the depot to his house, and that he returned next day and attended a wedding, marrying a young man, a member of his church, on Tuesday night, and on Wednesday morning, bright and early, went to New-England, where he remained for nearly two weeks, and was not back in Brooklyn until about two weeks from that time. We shall leave no doubt, I say, on that question. The evidence which we shall introduce to you will be perfectly satisfactory on that subject. It was necessary for Mr. Beecher to go to his farm in Peekskill on this Monday because of his contemplated visit to New-England, where he was going to be gone about two weeks, and as this was seed-time it was necessary for him to go up and confer with his farmer and mark out the work of the next two weeks, and, as I repeat, he went there on Monday, returned here on Tuesday late, attended that wedding Tuesday evening, and early the next morning went with his wife to New-England, spending his time with Ex-Governor Claflin of Massachusetts.

Mr. Shearman—And Mrs. Moulton swore Mr. Beecher returned again that week to that house.

Mr. Tracy—I am reminded by my associate that Mrs. Moulton swore Mr. Beecher returned to that house again that week, but we shall show you how utterly mistaken this lady is.

Gentlemen, this portion of my task has been a peculiarly unwelcome one to me. I have personally known and esteemed Mrs. Moulton. I had hoped that at the last she might be saved from the terrible calamity which has befallen her. I beseech you to judge charitably of this hapless lady, dragged down to ruin by two men who have slaughtered their own wives and children, in their desperate attempt at an impossible revenge. She will yet repent of her grievous error. She will realise that by truth, and truth only, can she serve to any purpose those whom she loves; and she will live to ask and to receive the forgiveness of the man whom she has vainly tried to destroy. I shall not stop, gentlemen of the jury, to dwell on the scenes that have transpired in this scandal from June, 1873, on to the present time. Its history is not so important as many other parts of this case, and I have already too long occupied your time in this opening address.

MR. BEECHER'S REFUSAL TO ACKNOWLEDGE AN OFFENSE AGAINST MR. TILTON.

I go now briefly, for a moment, to the publication of the Bacon letter, and to the effort that was made to induce Mr. Beecher to sign a card acknowledging that he had committed an offense against Theodore Tilton, but no crime, which offense he had apologized for, and that apology had been accepted and the difficulty settled, and he should not be a party to the opening of that controversy. That card was proposed, as you remember gentlemen, by Moulton, who thought, or pretended to think, that the Bacon letter still left open a way of compromise and settlement by which this public scandal, this great public calamity, which has been inflicted upon the world, could be avoided. His plan was that Mr. Tilton, having charged Mr. Beecher with an offense in the Bacon letter, and not having characterized that offense, Mr. Moulton's plan was that Mr. Beecher should acknowledge that he had committed an offense, but had apologized for it, that that apology had been accepted and the case settled.

It was in regard to this card, gentlemen, as I stated to you on Friday evening, that I was called into this case as the adviser of Mr. Moulton and Mr. Beecher on that subject. I differed with Mr. Moulton, as I there stated. I could not see how any friend of Mr. Beecher could advise him to sign this card. I sought to convince Moulton that he could not sign it, but Moulton persisted, and, after I had declined, still urged this upon Mr. Beecher. You will remember, in the evidence given, it has been stated to you by Mr. Moulton himself, that he told Beecher that if he would sign this card, acknowledging an offense without stating what the offense was, Mr. Theodore Tilton would accept it as satisfactory, and if Mr. Beecher would sign it, he, Moulton, would burn every paper connected with this case, and would stand by Beecher if Tilton sought to wage a conflict with him after that. Now, gentlemen of the jury, if Mr. Beecher had known what they say he knew; if he had been conscious of guilt with this woman for sixteen months; if he had confessed it over and over again to all these parties; if it be true that his writing referred to adultery, and not to a complicated domestic family difficulty—if that be true, I say, how can you explain the fact that Mr. Beecher refused the offer of Mr. Moulton? He had not distrusted Mr. Moulton at this time. Moulton still had his confidence. He still believed Moulton his friend, and he relied upon Moulton fulfilling the promise if he had made it.

Now, gentlemen of the jury, do you believe that if Henry Ward Beecher had been conscious of his guilt, if he had known that his guilt could be proved by this cloud of witnesses, that he would have refused the offer to sign a card which simply acknowledged an offense, without naming the offense, and thus had the paper destroyed and made an ally of Moulton, which Tilton could not have detached. They would have disarmed themselves with the destruction of that paper. They would have had nothing to go into court with a case against Mr. Beecher. How is it possible, I say, to account for this refusal upon any known motive which actuates or controls human nature? Why, if Mr. Beecher had not been conscious of his own innocence—if he had not felt confident of the power, however thick the storm might beat upon him—ultimately to vindicate himself from this charge, he would have made haste to sign that card, attach Moulton to him, and had him destroy the papers and the evidence against him. But he refused, steadfastly refused, to do any such thing. He said: "I will sign no card, and for this reason." Mr. Tilton had charged, it is true, in the Bacon letter, simply an offense, but he had charged it in such a way that most people, reading the Bacon letter, thought that it intended to charge a marital offense and if Mr. Beecher had signed this card acknowledging an offense, persons who wanted to believe him guilty would say that that meant adultery, and he would not sign unless the card should specify what the offense was. That was the point, and the point of dispute in that adjustment.

MR. TILTON'S PROPOSED REPORT FOR THE COMMITTEE.

And that brings me to consider for a single moment the card which has been given in evidence, which Tilton tells you he prepared after consultation with his wife, after his wife had been before the Committee. It is possible that if the card had specified what Mr. Beecher said the offense was, he would have signed a card admitting an offense, and specifying what it was so clearly that nobody could mistake it, but if there was to be left that ambiguity about it which would leave it open to misconstruction, he refused absolutely to sign it. Now, gentlemen, this card has been introduced, and Mr. Tilton tells you that he prepared it in consultation with his wife. It is a proposed report for the Committee to make. I will read but a single clause of it:

The Committee further find that Mr. Tilton, in his relations with the pastor, had a just cause of offense and had received a voluntary apology. Mr. Tilton declined to characterize the offense for the following reasons:

First, because the necessary evidence which should accompany any statement would include the names of persons who had happily escaped thus far the tongue of public gossip.

Next, that the apology was designed to cover a complicated transaction, including details difficult of exact or just statement.

MR. TILTON'S PROPOSED REPORT TRUTHFUL.

Now, gentlemen, that is precisely what Henry Ward Beecher has always said this controversy between himself and Theodore Tilton was. He has always said that that is what his correspondence pointed to, and to nothing else. He has always said that that is what the letter of contrition referred to and nothing else, and his letters. It was an offense, in the language of this report, "designed to cover a complicated transaction, including details difficult of exact and just statement." Now, you have Mr. Tilton going home, and in consultation with his wife, after she has been before the Committee, agreeing with her that a certain report shall be made by this Committee, and they will go before the Committee and make a statement which shall justify that report; and he there writes in his own handwriting the exact statement that Mr. Beecher has always given to this affair.

THE AMBIGUITIES AND BROAD GENERALITIES IN THE CASE.

I have now, gentlemen, I believe, gone over all the facts of this case so far as I design to call them to your attention in this address. You will observe, gentlemen, that I have spent no time in commenting upon or explaining the letters of the defendant. I have confined myself to stating a case, which we shall prove, which explains the letters, and I prefer that the case should explain the letters than to explain them by mere word of mouth. When we have presented to you our case, when we have proven the facts which I have laid before you, you will see that the case explains the letters. The letters explain themselves. They are entirely consistent with the case as we shall make it. Everything here turns upon a single question. When these people were talking about generalities, when Mr. Beecher was using general language which might cover one thing or cover another thing, the question is to what were the parties referring, what did they have in their minds. Did they have this complicated transaction, the details of which were difficult of exact statement, involving this business trouble, involving the stories which Mr. Beecher had told and circulated against Mr. Tilton, involving the angry remarks which he had made to Bowen when that letter had been presented to him, involving the domestic difficulty between Tilton and his wife, in which Mr. and Mrs. Beecher had both taken part; was it this complicated affair which had ended in Tilton's dismissal and injury, and for which Mr. Beecher had been convinced that he had been in the wrong, and had done Tilton injustice—was it this, or was it a case of adultery? That is the only question here for you. And, as I say, the case that we have made, the facts that already stand proved in this case, when they are put alongside of other facts which we shall prove, will show you beyond all question what it was these parties were talking about, and what it is that this general language in this correspondence refers to. You will see, gentlemen, how utterly unsafe it is to ascribe to any particular offense as being covered by general language that designates nothing. In all this correspondence you will observe that but very few facts are stated at all. This correspondence consists entirely in general expressions of sorrow, and regret and anguish; but wherever there is a fact stated in one of these letters, when you come to consider it, as you will when the case comes to be summed up—wherever there is a fact stated in one of these letters, you will see that that fact is against adultery; it tends to establish innocence and prove innocence, and not guilt. But to show you how utterly unsafe it is, I say, to say that general language points to any particular sin or crime, I desire to read to you briefly now a letter from Mrs. Tilton dated the 31st of January, 1868. It is conceded on all hands that at this time this lady was perfectly pure. This language had no relation to adultery, as the plaintiff and we both concede. It is nine months before the pretended allegation, and two years and a half before even a suspicion had been excited. All agree that at this time this lady had no suspicion or thought that she had been accused of crime, and certainly that she had never committed it. She is referring to the ordinary sins, the ordinary difficulties between husband and wife, and now I want you to see how she described it:

My Dear Husband: I have just returned from Mattie's. Have the bust. Love it, &c. Oh, Theodore, darling! I am haunted night and day by the remorse of knowing that because of my harshness and indifference to you, you were driven to despair, and perhaps sin, and these last years of unhappiness.

There is the word "remorse," used in connection with harshness, merely, harsh words, harsh language, and yet they say that the word "remorse," in Mr. Beecher's letter, means adultery, cannot mean anything else than adultery, for what could a man have remorse for except for the crime of adultery?

I sometimes feel it to be the unpardonable sin.

Suppose this letter had been written by Mrs. Tilton after the alleged act—crime—how the changes would be rung on that phrase. How my eloquent friend would expatiate on that sentence, and he would ask you what is the unpardonable sin of the wife, What is it but adultery; what can it be but adultery. And yet the sin of which she is here speaking is the sin of harshness to her husband, uncharitableness, and ill temper.

And God cannot forgive me, but you only may be restored to your former loveliness. I shall be content to live my life in penance, yea, in disgrace. I am the chief of sinners. I understand perfectly how you have felt. I carry in my soul this burden black of sin.

Is there any such language in Mr. Beecher's letters, notwithstanding his sorrow, notwithstanding the woe and wretchedness that these men inflicted on him for four years, notwithstanding the fact that he did walk on the rough and ragged edge of life for four long years, is there any such general language in his letters as this woman has used to describe the mere, most menial offenses in household life. And I could turn you, gentlemen, and my associates will, to letters of Theodore Tilton himself written during this very period, that fall but very little below the exaggerated language which I have read from his wife. He, too, uses the word "remorse." With him life has been a failure and blight, I am quoting the language of his letters, long before any charge of this description is mooted, in 1867 and '8. His language, I repeat, is as strong as Mr. Beecher's, as strong as the plaintiff's wife, nearly, and you see, gentlemen, the necessity that they felt, the pressure that they were under of attempting to explain their own letters.

THE RESPONSIBLE CAUSES OF MR. TILTON'S SINS.

Theodore Tilton was put upon the witness stand to explain away his own letters, and attributed them all to John Calvin. [Laughter.] Calvin was responsible for his letters, his sins and omissions prior to 1870, and Beecher has been responsible for all that have been committed since that time. [Laughter.] So, between Calvin and Beecher, Tilton walks out as white a souled man in his estimation as he describes his wife to be a woman.

In weighing, therefore, the testimony in the case, we say you are to consider, gentlemen, the relative probabilities and improbabilities involved, of innocence and guilt respectively. It is impossible, if the letters of the defendant are confessions of guilt, that the guilty man should write such letters, most of them voluntarily, and covering a long period of time. We say, gentlemen of the jury, that if Henry Ward Beecher had been conscious of guilt, if he had supposed at the time of writing these letters that they could be construed into confessions of adultery, it is not possible that any man should have ever written them.

THE GENERAL LANGUAGE PROOF OF AN INNOCENT MIND.

Instead of these letters being evidence of guilt, the fact that he has used this general language is evidence that at the time of writing the thought that it could be perverted to cover such a charge never occurred to him. It is improbable that a guilty man should volunteer to surrender to the plaintiff or his friend the alleged clandestine letters of the existence of which they had no knowledge and no means of knowledge.

Now, gentlemen, they have introduced before you some evidence of the secret correspondence, as they choose to call it, between Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. It was very secret indeed. Where are the letters produced from; where are they brought from into this Court to testify against Henry Ward Beecher? Why, from the archives of Francis D. Moulton. And how did they come there? Why, Henry Ward Beecher delivered them to him. Do you think, gentlemen, that if he had thought this a guilty correspondence, and they did not know of it, would not he have kept those letters to himself, or silently destroyed them and placed them beyond existence? Would he have gone and deposited them with them, where they could be produced against him? The very fact that he did it, I submit, is evidence conclusive that the thought of guilt was not in his mind. It is impossible that a guilty man should communicate his guilt to a woman, to ask her how to conceal it, and that he should express his gratification at her having communicated his guilt to other persons.

There is another remarkable feature of this case. Here was Mr. Beecher, they say, possessed of a secret which was crushing him, a secret which he knew if it was ever exposed would be his ruin, a secret which they say he was continually moving Heaven and earth to conceal, and yet, it is a remarkable fact, gentlemen, that whenever one of these parties has told another of that secret and that fact has been communicated to Mr. Beecher he has always expressed the highest pleasure and gratification because it has been thus communicated. He had told Moulton the secret, they say, and in 1871 Moulton told his wife, and when she spoke to him and said, "Frank has told me about it," why, Beecher was glad Frank had told her about it. He had been struggling for a year and over to keep his secret and to keep it safe, and when he found that a woman had got it how glad he was. [Laughter.] It would certainly be kept now. If men could not keep it, she could; and so he was gratified to learn that at least one woman knew his secret. They say he was glad of it, because he wanted so much to have some woman to whom he could converse on the subject, and yet, learning it in 1871, the first conversation she refers to between him and her on the subject was in 1873, two years afterward. But to help Beecher keep his secret she went and told the Robinson family of it, a pretty numerous family in this city, and when she communicated the fact to Beecher that she had told the Robinson family of it, why, Beecher was so glad that Robinson knew it. [Laughter.] It would enable him to meet Robinson so much better—so much better understanding. He had been going down to Robinson's office day after day, and having long interviews with Moulton and Robinson didn't know what it meant, and Beecher knew he didn't know what it meant, and therefore, he felt sort of guilty going and having an interview with a man's partner when all the firm didn't know what he was talking about, and he was so glad when he learned, that the next time that he went down to Robinson's office the whole firm would know that he had come there to talk about his adultery with Mrs. Tilton.

You may believe all these improbabilities, gentlemen, but I don't believe you will.

My associate suggests to me another fact that is one of the remarkable facts of this case. After Mr. Beecher knew that Mrs. Moulton knew his secret and knew that he had been guilty of adultery he was so anxious for Mrs. Moulton to come to church. It would be such a gratification for him to see in his congregation at least one woman who knew when he was preaching he was a libertine and seducer. You may believe, gentlemen, that Henry Ward Beecher, knowing that a woman knew that he was guilty of adultery, invited her to come to his church that she might hear him preach, but I think you will believe that if any such thing was true, Henry Ward Beecher would go a thousand miles to get around preaching, looking such a woman as that in the face.

Then also, they introduce letters, showing that Beecher was anxious to see Mrs. Tilton at church, too; it would be such a satisfaction for him to see his poor victim, whom he had ruined, and whose family he had shattered, in his presence on Sunday, when he was invoking the blessings of God upon himself and his congregation. There is another fact in regard to Mrs. Moulton to which I desire also to call your attention, one of the improbabilities in this case, and that is, she says she urged upon him to go down to his church and confess, and his church would forgive him and stand by him, and Frank would stand by him and she would be his friend also, and yet, in the same breath she tells you that she used to say to Henry Ward Beecher: "How can I receive communion at your hands, knowing of your guilt? I can't; but you go down and tell those 3,000 men and women at Plymouth Church that you are covered all over with the leprosy of adultery and falsehood, and they will forgive you, and they will stand by you, and they will receive communion at your hands, and I and Frank will be your friends."

OTHER INCONSISTENCIES MENTIONED.

Again, gentlemen, I have shown you that in the correspondence of the 7th of February, 1871, Mr. Beecher commended to Mr. Tilton his wife, and expressed the hope that Tilton would love her with even more than the old love. Is it probable, I repeat to you, that a man who had seduced another man's wife would write a letter to the dearest friend of that man and express such a monstrous wish as that the fact that he had debauched a woman should be a reason why the husband should love her better than ever before.

All this shows you, gentlemen, that these parties were not talking about adultery, but were talking about these complicated family transactions—this supposed alienation of Mrs. Tilton's affections, this leaving her husband; the threatening to separate from him, and this business difficulty, which had become so complicated that it could hardly be unraveled. Again, we say that it is improbable that a guilty man should demand investigation, when it was resisted by his accusers. And yet we have the word of Mrs. Moulton, given in evidence here, that her husband was outraged and offended at Mr. Beecher because he had demanded an investigation; and you see how boldly even this woman makes this man meet this charge. He tells her: "They cannot convict me."

He tells her: "They may do their worst; I am going to be free." Is it probable, if he had been guilty, he would have been the man insisting upon an investigation while his accusers were struggling to prevent it?

It is improbable that the husband, having reason, in good faith, to believe his wife guilty, should continue, without interruption, to cohabit with her? Yet it is conceded he did—not for six months, gentlemen, but for two years. It is improbable that the wife should put in writing, or that the husband should consent to her doing so, a confession and charge against the paramour, and that the husband should use it for the purpose of aiding in his extrication from another difficulty. And yet it is conceded that this statement of what they claim was her confession, or her statement, or her accusation, whatever it is called, was obtained from the husband and used touching a business difficulty.

I am reminded that I said that he lived with his wife two years, gentlemen, when I should have said four years.

It is improbable that the husband should communicate his wife's guilt to third persons, for the purpose of securing its concealment? It is improbable that the husband should forgive the paramour and meet with him socially at dinner tables and receptions, and receive affectionate salutations from him. It is said somewhere, gentlemen, that I, in some conversation, told Mr. Tilton that the world would never forgive him for having taken back his wife. All that I have to say about that is, Mr. Tilton is mistaken. What I said to Mr. Tilton in the Summer of 1874, and not in '73 or '73, but in the Summer of '74, when he was about to bring a charge of adultery against Mr. Beecher, I said, "Mr. Tilton, the world will never forgive you for having been the friend of the man you claim to be the seducer of your wife. It was for taking back to friendship the man and not the woman." It is improbable that the husband should destroy the original charge. And yet they come here saying, gentlemen, confessing that they have destroyed the original charge on which they accused Henry Ward Beecher on the night of the 30th of December. They do not produce it; they pretend it is destroyed. We say that it is improbable that the most important document of all these should have been destroyed, if it ever existed, and if it would do anything but damn their present case if presented. It is improbable that the husband should make successive threats of disclosure, and constantly advise the paramour to remain silent. It is improbable that the husband, if he believed his wife's guilt, should declare her to be pure. It is improbable that he should delay to sue for over four years upon what he now alleges as the true and original charge, while he has been confessedly in the interim manipulating a false or garbled charge against the defendant.

WEAKER POINTS IN THE PLAINTIFF'S EVIDENCE.

Now as to the infirmities of the plaintiff's evidence. The defendant's own writings adduced against him, none of them expressly indicate guilt, and, as read in the light of the circumstances which will be proved by the defendant, they point to innocence. All the other evidence adduced by the plaintiff is infected by every infirmity known to the law. The testimony is of oral admissions, which are of themselves notoriously unreliable. Such alleged admissions require corroboration, and the corroboration must be of facts pointing to guilt. No such facts have been thus far adduced. The willful destruction of documents impairs the credibility of the story. The witnesses have given contradictory accounts. They admit that, gentlemen. Moulton and Tilton both tell you upon the witness stand that they have been lying about this case for four years, three years—four years, and you will remember the reply of my associate to Moulton. "We have your word for that when you say you have been lying." Certain it is that they have been asserting the innocence of Mr. Beecher for four years. Now they assert his guilt. The reason they give for it—that Moulton gives for that—is, that at the time he was asserting Mr. Beecher's innocence, he regarded himself as a friend of Beecher. Now that he is the enemy of Beecher, the party more involved in this case, and having more to lose in it than any other but Mr. Beecher, he now asserts Beecher's guilt; and the only question you have got to determine is whether a man who has lied for four years for a friend, by his own confession, will lie one year for himself. The witnesses, Tilton and Moulton, have both repeated their own falsifications. The witnesses, Tilton and Moulton, have shown themselves to have been in constant confederacy throughout their dealings with the defendant. I call your attention to this fact, gentlemen, that it is proved from the witness stand that while Moulton had secured, and gained, and held the confidence of Beecher as no other man ever held the confidence of another, while he was professing to be a friend, acting for him, protecting him in this matter, you have it from his own mouth that, with but a single exception, all the papers and documents that he ever presented to Beecher in this connection for four years, were written by Tilton himself, or prepared in Tilton's presence, save one, and that was the letter I read to you this morning—the letter of June 1st, 1873, gentlemen. That letter Moulton says he wrote in Tilton's absence; Tilton was not present; and you see what sort of a letter he does write when away from Tilton. Do you believe that if Tilton had been present when that letter was prepared any such careless phrase as "I know you can stand if the whole case were published to-morrow"—do you believe that if Tilton had been present dictating the letter, such a clause as that would have crept into it? Oh! no. Mr. Tilton knew the force of words too much to commit such an indiscretion as that. But the letter was written in Tilton's absence, by Moulton, and it is the only important one in this case for four years that Moulton presented to Beecher that Tilton had not himself composed, or been present taking part in the composition of.

The witness, Mrs. Moulton, has shown that she was a party to their design to bring an action at the time when they were still pretending to be the friends of the defendant, and when Moulton was still claiming to hold the defendant's letters in trust for the protection of each party against the other. Do you remember the important evidence, gentlemen, that fell from the lips of Mr. Moulton's wife upon the stand, that on the 18th day of January, while Mr. Moulton says he was professing to be the friend of Henry Ward Beecher, while he was claiming to hold these letters in trust for him, for the benefit of both parties, no break, no breach at that time, she tells you she told Beecher they were going to sue him in a court of law? How came this woman to be possessed of that fact, gentlemen? She tells you that she knew as early as that time that she was to be a witness against Henry Ward Beecher, and she was not to be a witness before the Investigating Committee. How came she in the possession of that information? This "Mutual Friend," this man protecting Beecher from Tilton and yet refusing to give Mr. Beecher his documents, this man who had betrayed every one of Beecher's secrets to his most deadly enemy, the moment they came to his possession for four years—this man's wife knew days and weeks before there was any pretended breach between Moulton and Tilton, when Moulton was still soliciting and still receiving the confidence of this defendant—his wife knew that he was to be sued at law and she was to be a witness. No conspiracy here, gentlemen! No confederacy between these men! Nothing but sincere and honest friendship from Moulton to Beecher! There has no little piece of evidence accidentally dropped from the witness stand during this long trial that has the significance, to wit, that that accidental and unthought-of remark which that woman let fall in your presence has. It stamps the conduct of these parties, and discloses the malice and the organized plotting which had been going on between them for months, for the final overthrow and ruin of this defendant.

HISTORIC PARALLELS TO THIS CASE.

And yet this charge, gentlemen, the charge of incontinence, which is brought against this defendant, is not a new or unfamiliar charge against clergymen. It is the common method of warfare. There is no accusation to which a clergyman is so much exposed; and if he has an enemy that desires to do him a deadly injury, there is no point from which he can strike with such deadly effect as the charge of infidelity in his marital rights. That charge, whether there is guilt or not, is almost sufficient to blast the usefulness of any clergyman, however respected and however beloved. But Mr. Beecher is not the first eminent clergyman that has been called upon to face such a persecution as this. It was by means of such an accusation that the enemies of St. Athanasius sought to destroy the great champion of the orthodox faith. It was by such means that the name of St. Francis de Sales was kept under a cloud for four years, during which he maintained the same silence for which my client is so sharply criticised. It was upon such a charge that the ruin of the illustrious Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambrai, was attempted. It was under such an imputation that the "judicious Hooker," one of the brightest lights in the English Church, remained "dumb as the dead," though innocent as a babe, for six years of bitter anguish. It was such a charge, spread broadcast over England, that John Wesley, the man who of all Protestants most nearly approached to the spirit and labors of the Apostle Paul, suffered to pass without any public reply for twenty years. And, by a yet more remarkable coincidence, it was by means of an insinuation that he had made improper advances that a persecution was kindled against him in Georgia, which resulted in driving him out of this country under the ban of an indictment. Who envies the memory of the jury which found that indictment? Where is John Causton, the magistrate who inspired the prosecution? He is pilloried forever in a few lines of Wesley's biography, and escapes oblivion only because the unsullied and venerated name of the man whom he thought he had crushed makes it impossible for him to escape from infamy.

THE VALUE OF ESTABLISHED CHARACTER.

On the discharge of my duty, I have laid before you, gentlemen, so much of this case as, to the best of my ability, I could put into words. But the deepest truth that underlies it is beyond adequate expression by feeble words of mine; nor I think could any single tongue set forth the nature and the power of that influence, which radiates throughout the world and time, and beyond the grave, from the glowing center of a good man's life. There are facts which are not spoken from lip to ear, but from heart to heart. There is a treasure at stake, in comparison with which even the good name of one innocent man and one innocent woman, however sacred and precious this may be, is of trivial worth; I mean the principle of the value of established character. What is the use of an honorable life if it is no barrier against false accusation; if, in the face of foul conspiracy, its prayers and labors, generousities and heroisms are to be counted as worse than nothing—merely the disguises of a rotten hypocrisy? Against this most dangerous infidelity of our time, one grand protest has been made. Three thousand men and women of Plymouth Church have presented to this community a spectacle unparalleled of faith in goodness and in God.

These people are your fellow-citizens, gentlemen; virtuous, industrious, practical, sensible as yourselves. They love their wives and daughters; they cherish the purity of their households. Foremost among you in every work of charity; earnest, sincere, good friends, good neighbors, good citizens, they stand and have stood through many months unshaken in their confidence around the pastor whom they love. And this they do because they know him—because for thirty years they have looked through his clear eyes into his transparent soul—because his influence upon them and their children has been pure and wholesome—because he has taught them from lips that repeated the words of the Master and by a life that reflected the example of the Master to fear God and to abhor evil.

This multitude of witnesses bear testimony to the value of a good man's character, as read in a good man's life. And it is the lesson of the value of character which you, gentlemen, are called upon to impress upon the world. It will be seen, that although this city contained men vile enough to assail with perjured lips the spotless reputation of our noblest citizen, there were also found in it those whose firm faith in him could not be shaken by ingenious lies, and a jury of honest, just and fearless men to stand like a rock against the tide of slander.

THE CLOSING PERORATION.

You will save Brooklyn, already too much disgraced by the existence of such a scandal, from the far greater disgrace of permitting such a man to be destroyed by such instrumentality—

"An eagle towering in his pride of place, Hawked at and killed by mousing owls!"

You will tell the American people that when innocence is assailed by unscrupulous and cunning malice, however successful for a time the assault may seem, it must find its barrier when it reaches an American jury. And you will say to this heartless and ungodly persecution, "Thus far shalt thou come, but no farther—here all the midnight plottings of cruel craft must cease forever."

I ask of you for this defendant nothing but that justice which you would mete out to the humblest citizen; yet you cannot but feel, as I do, an overwhelming sense of the solemn importance of this trial. It will loom larger in history than any which has taken place for eighteen centuries. No man of this defendant's fame has ever been called upon to answer such a charge in a court of justice. What a spectacle has been presented in this city of churches! Every day for eight weeks this aged man, who has been a large and various contributor to the literature of the English tongue, and who never wrote a word that was not inspired by the love of God, of nature, and of his fellow-men, who has swayed with sublimest eloquence greater multitudes than any living orator, and who never spoke save for justice, truth and virtue, who has convinced, rescued, instructed and comforted unnumbered thousands of erring, struggling, suffering souls, counting his own life, fortune and reputation as nothing, if by their risk or sacrifice he could serve the humble and the weak; this man, whose fame encircles the earth, and whose name is honored and beloved wherever Christianity bears sway, has been dragged by malignant conspirators into this Court to answer the vile and odious charge, which all the evidence of a long lifetime outside of these walls, no less than the evidence produced within them, brands indelibly as a lie. Day by day he has passed along our streets with his brave and true wife, to meet the unmerited indignity of this arraignment. Strong men have been touched with mingled pity and wrath at the sight, and women have turned aside to weep. It is an outrage which posterity will avenge. This fair city will yet boast among her proudest monuments the statue of him who conferred upon her such glory, and received within her gates such torture. All who had part in this crowning drama of his life will be remembered with exaltation or praise. Those who falsely accused, those who weakly doubted, those who cowardly forsook him, those who were swift to believe evil on the one side and on the other, those who steadfastly trusted, and those, gentlemen of the jury, who justly adjudged.

Yes, gentlemen, by the judgment which you here pronounce, you will yourselves be judged at the tribunal of after ages. What you do here will never die. When these scenes shall have passed away, when he who presides over this trial shall rest in the silent chambers of the dead; when the seats you occupy shall be filled by your children, or your children's children, strangers from distant climes will come to view the place from which was given back to the world, freed from cloud or passing shadow, the name of Henry Ward Beecher. Even when centuries shall have rolled away, when these marble walls shall have crumbled and decayed, this trial will be remembered with all-absorbing interest. More eloquent than the words of this defendant, more inspiring than his deeds of magnanimity, more powerful among men than the story of all his life of usefulness and virtue, will be the recital of his serene faith and patience under dire affliction and deadly assault. Heroes are admired; it is the martyrs who are beloved. Not the triumphal procession and the loud hosanna, but the cup, the thorn-crown, the cross, the sepulcher conquered the world, and since the hour of the Divine Sufferer no follower of Christ has borne the cross in vain.

Gentlemen, do you believe in God! Then you will recognise to-day what the generations to come will so clearly see; what the Day of Revelation will blaze forth in letters of immortal light, the mark of God's approval upon this, his faithful, upright suffering servant, whom He hath hitherto guided, sustained and blessed—whom in the hour of tribulation He hath not forsaken; and whom by all the truth of his eternal promise and all the resources of His Almighty power, He will surely rescue and reward; for "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished, but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered." [Applause.]

The Court here adjourned until eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning.

EDWARD J. OVINGTON TESTIFIES TO IMPORTANT DECLARATIONS BY THE PLAINTIFF—MR. TILTON TELLS THE WITNESS THAT HIS WIFE WOULD SAY ANYTHING FOR HER HUSBAND—MR. FULLERTON CONFUSES THE WITNESS—HOW MRS. TILTON HAS SPENT HER TIME SINCE SHE LEFT HER HUSBAND—A WITNESS TESTIFIES TO THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE WINSTED AFFAIR—MRS. OVINGTON IN THE WITNESS CHAIR.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1875.

The proceedings to-day were ushered in with a fever of expectancy on the part of the spectators, but this gradually subsided as the day passed. The interest was revived about three-quarters of an hour before the closing by the testimony of a witness to the conduct of Mr. Tilton at Winsted, Conn., some years ago. Mr. Shearman announced that necessity would oblige the defense to produce their witnesses a little out of order. The name of Edward J. Ovington was then called, and that gentleman arose from a seat beside his wife and Mrs. Shearman, and took the witness chair. He is a tall, erect, well-knit man with a very light sandy beard and hair, and is apparently bashful and retiring in disposition. His direct examination ran smoothly. Mr. John L. Hill, who, since last Summer, has done considerable under-surface work for the defense, conducted the questioning. The testimony was chiefly in regard to events which followed the publication of the Bacon letter. Mr. Ovington testified that Mr. Tilton boasted that he (Mr. Tilton) could make his wife tell what he pleased, and that if she saw him commit the Nathan murder she would swear that he did not do it. Mr. Ovington said positively that Mr. Tracy only saw Mrs. Tilton about two minutes before she appeared before the Plymouth Investigating Committee.

The cross-examination by Mr. Fullerton was most remarkable, and showed how completely a witness may become confused and embarrassed in the hands of a skillful lawyer. Not that Mr. Fullerton was harsh or severe, for he was just the opposite—smooth and polite—but he so tangled the story of the witness that the latter lost his self-possession, and beclouded his testimony with mistakes and contradictions. The cross-examination disclosed that Mr. Ovington had received $375 from Augustus Storrs, which had been expended to fit out Mrs. Tilton's children for school, and for the support of Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Tilton has paid the school bills of the children at Washington, Conn. It was also brought out that Messrs. Evarts, Porter and the other lawyers for Mr. Beecher, have visited at Mr. Ovington's house, where Mrs. Tilton has been staying since last July. Also that Mr. Beecher called once soon after Mrs. Tilton appeared before the Investigating Committee, and that Mr. Ovington last Summer declined to tell Florence Tilton where her mother was when Mrs. Tilton was visiting in Fairfield, Conn. Mr. Ovington is going to Europe on Saturday. Mrs. Tilton will remain with his family in Brooklyn.

Another witness who is going away was called to-day out of the regular order—Rufus E. Holmes of Winsted, Conn. When Mr. Tilton lectured in that town he was the Vice-President of the Young Men's Christian Association there. He thought that the lady who was with Mr. Tilton at that time was 27 or 28 years of age; and he testified that he went to Mr. Tilton's room in the hotel at Winsted, and knocked twice. As he was going away a lady opened the door, and Mr. Tilton's voice from within asked Mr. Holmes to wait, and they would go out together. Mr. Holmes declared that Mr. Tilton was on the bed with only pantaloons, shirt, and stockings on. The lady's hair and dress were disheveled. Mr. Fullerton, in cross-questioning the witness, brought out that Mr. Holmes went to Mr. Tilton's room by appointment, that no effort was made to conceal anything after the door was opened, and that Mr. Holmes afterward introduced the plaintiff to his wife, sisters, and others.

That the jurymen are alert was made evident by the question of Mr. Carpenter, the foreman, who, before the witness stepped down, asked him if there was a fire in the room where Mr. Tilton and the lady were found. This was put in view of the plaintiff's statement that there was no fire in her own room, and that she therefore went to his room, where there was one. Mr. Holmes corroborated Mr. Tilton's statement in regard to the presence of a fire in the room where Mr. Tilton was found by the witness.

Mrs. Maria N. Ovington, wife of Edward J. Ovington, was placed in the witness chair about 15 minutes before the closing. The lady is an invalid, and she testified that until to-day she has not been out of the house since last October. Little progress was made in her examination before the hour of adjournment arrived, and nothing of importance was developed. Mr. Hill is conducting Mrs. Ovington's examination.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD J. OVINGTON.

The Court opened as usual at eleven o'clock, and the jurors being promptly in attendance, Judge Neilson requested the counsel for the defendant to proceed.

Mr. Shearman—The first witness will be called a little out of order, if your Honor please.

Edward J. Ovington was then called on behalf of the defendant, sworn and examined by Mr. John L. Hill.

Q. Mr. Ovington, are you acquainted with the parties to this action? A. I am.

Q. How long have you known them? A. Mr. Beecher about twenty-five years.

Q. And Mr. Tilton? A. Twelve years.

Q. Have you been a neighbor of Mr. Tilton's? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When were you living near him, and please state where his residence was, in relation to yours? A. His residence was the block above mine.

Q. What was your number? A. 135.

Q. Livingston-st. ? A. Livingston-st., or 95 at that time—the old number.

Q. And his? A. His is now 174; I don't remember the old number.

Q. But it was within a block, you say? A. Within a block; yes, Sir.

Q. Please state how intimate your acquaintance was with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. Well we were on calling acquaintance.

Q. Frequent, or otherwise? A. Well, rather frequent for a time; for the most part rather infrequent.

Q. Any especial friendship between Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Ovington? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long had that continued, and when did it begin? A. Well, we began in the year 1868, I think, and continued from that time.

Q. Continued from that time on? Are you certain of dates, Sir? A. '67 or '68, I think it was.

MR. TILTON INDIFFERENT ABOUT HIS WIFE'S HEALTH.

Q. I will call your attention to the publication of the Bacon letter in June last; do you recollect having an interview with Mr. Tilton soon after the publication of that letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When, with reference to its publication? A. Three or four days after.

Q. Well, where? A. At his house; I called upon him.

Q. Please state the circumstances and what was said between you—the circumstances of the call? A. I called at his invitation; he mentioned to my wife that he would like to see me, and I called upon him.

Q. Well, go on and state what occurred? A. I told him that I was sorry to find him in this trouble; I told him it was a very serious matter to bring this charge against Mr. Beecher; it would be a very great injury to the cause of religion. Mr. Tilton said that it was not his own bringing, that if Mr. Beecher would do his duty and do justice to him he was willing to do no more, to stop just there.

Q. Well, what else was said? A. Then I had considerable to say about his wife's appearance; remarked that she was looking in very bad condition of health, and he answered: "Oh! I think she is looking about as usual;" some indifferent remark, I don't remember what.

Q. Well, what was his manner upon that occasion? A. Well, he was very hard on Mr. Beecher; said that he was not going to be called a fool and knave while Mr. Beecher knew that he was the magnanimous man.

Q. He, Tilton? A. He, Tilton.

Q. Yes; did he make any statement of what he proposed to do; if so, state it? A. Well, he said it was now his time for action, and he proposed to fight it out from that moment; various expressions of that kind.

Q. Of what kind? A. Figures of battle-axes and swords; and the sword was—he would not sheath his sword until Mr. Beecher was down, &c.

Q. Now, I would like you to state the day of the week when this occurred, if you can? A. It must have been Tuesday; it was Tuesday.

Q. On a Tuesday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you seen him before that after the Bacon letter was published? A. Yes; I saw him a few moments on the previous Sunday.

Q. Yes; at his house or where? A. At his house or in front of his house; I called at his house in a carriage, driving out, and he came out and spoke to me a few words.

Q. Now, that was the very latter part of June or the early part of July; when did you next see him to have an interview with him?

Mr. Fullerton—He has not stated that I think.

Mr. Hill—What?

Mr. Fullerton—He has not stated, I think, that it was in the latter part of June.

Mr. Hill—He said it was two or three days after the publication of the Bacon letter.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, let it stand at that.

MR. TILTON PRAISES HIS WIFE'S APPEARANCE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Mr. Hill—When did you next see him, Mr. Ovington? A. The next interview was at my house, I think.

Q. Can you recollect the time? A. It was about a week after that; I don't recall the day.

Q. Can you recall the day of the week? A. Friday, I think.

Q. What is it? A. Friday, it appears to me, but I cannot recall the day.

Q. You think it was a Friday, but you cannot recall the day. Where was this conversation which you now refer to held? A. In my house, or on the piazza of the house.

Q. Who was present at it? A. My wife, and Mr. Tilton and myself.

Q. Please begin now and give the conversation which there occurred between yourself and your wife and Mr. Tilton, as nearly as you can? A. Well, Mr. Tilton opened the conversa-

Gon, saying: "Elizabeth made a fine impression before the Committee. Elizabeth is a tramp, isn't she? But it was all fiction. I could come before the Committee and weave fiction; speak of Mr. Beecher and Elizabeth; but she only done what any true wife would do." My wife remarked that she didn't look and talk as though she was telling an untruth, and she didn't believe that she did. Mr. Tilton replied: "Oh, Libbie will tell any number of lies for me." Then my wife said something about Mrs. Tilton's appearance, that she was looking in a very bad condition of health, and remarked that I had, when I came home from my interview, said that she looked death struck. Mr. Tilton said: "Oh, not as bad as that." My wife then said that she was pleased to get a very pleasant letter from Mrs. Tilton the day previous, I think it was, and contrasted it with a letter that she had previously received, when she said that—a letter that was opposite in character, a distressful letter.

Q. Yes; well, what then occurred? A. And Mr. Tilton was—

Q. Speak a little louder? A. Mr. Tilton was inquisitive to know the contents of the letter. Mrs. Ovington—

Q. You say he was inquisitive—did he ask? A. Well, he said: "How is that? Elizabeth has been writing you?" My wife said, "Yes." "And what did she say?" My wife told him.

Q. Well, what did your wife say? Can you recall? A. Of the letter?

Q. Yes. A. Well, she repeated the letter in substance.

Q. Did she have the letter present? A. No, Sir, but I had heard it read and she repeated it.

Q. Repeated the contents? A. The contents of the letter; yes, Sir.

Q. To Mr. Tilton? A. To Mr. Tilton.

Q. Of which letter—the first one, or the second one? A. Well, both.

Q. Both of them? A. Yes, Sir; virtually.

Q. Now, can you recall what was said—in stating the contents of that letter, I mean? A. Oh! I could not recall; no, Sir.

Q. Can you give the substance of it? A. Well, no, except the first was a sad letter and the second a cheerful one. I could not give the substance of it.

Q. That is your memory; can you state the contents of the communications if you were to look at the letters, Mr. Ovington? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Rather, can you state what was said on that occasion in respect to the contents?

Mr. Hill—I have asked him; he says he cannot state.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is still the question.

Mr. Hill—Certainly.

Mr. Fullerton—No; the question now is whether he could state the contents if he saw them.

Judge Neilson—Of course he could read the letter, [Papers handed to witness.] See if those papers refresh your recollection so that you can repeat what was said on that occasion.

Mr. Hill—Now, Sir, you can give what your wife said to Mr. Tilton in giving the contents of the first letter.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Please close the letter.

The Witness—Which is the first letter—this?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is what you are to find out.

Mr. Hill—Well, you can look, Mr. Ovington, if you can recall—

Mr. Beach—It is the sad letter.

The Witness—[Looking at the letter.] Yes; that is about what was said.

Q. Well, go on and state what was said.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. I move that that be stricken out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, that is stricken out. Mr. Ovington, after having examined those papers, close them, and then the question is whether you can recollect and state the substance of what was stated to Mr. Tilton at that time in respect to the letters.

Mr. Beach—I submit that the rule is, if your Honor please, that after refreshing his recollection by the memorandum the witness must be able to state from his recollection, independently of the memorandum, what the conversation was.

Mr. Hill—Well, I desire simply to obtain the state of this recollection with reference to that subject.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir.

Mr. Hill—If he can state the contents of the letter without the letter, I suppose that it is proper that he should do it. If he cannot, I suppose that he may refer to the letter, or that the letter and the statement may go in together, if he cannot recollect the contents.

Mr. Beach—Well, we dispute that proposition.

Judge Neilson—There is no occasion, gentlemen, for any argument about it.

Mr. Morris—And how long is the witness to have to commit it to memory?

Judge Neilson—The simple direction to this witness is this, to examine those papers and see if they refresh his recollection; then to close the letters, and then state from his recollection as thus refreshed, so far as he can, what was said to Mr. Tilton on that occasion as to the contents of the letters.

The Witness—Well, I cannot commit these to memory, your Honor, and then repeat them.

Q. Well, give the substance of what your wife said now, in giving the contents of the first letter?

Mr. Beach—I submit that the witness cannot testify with his eyes resting upon the table.

Judge Neilson—No; my suggestion was that he could examine the paper.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Ovington, his Honor has just suggested that you close the letter.

Judge Neilson—After having examined it.

Mr. Hill—After having examined it a sufficient time to refresh your recollection. Now, if you can state the contents of the first letter.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—No; that is not it at all.

Mr. Hill—Or state what your wife said in regard to the contents of the letter.

Judge Neilson—Yes; that is better. A. I cannot recollect it.

Q. You cannot recollect it? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Then I offer the letter, together with his statement, in evidence.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] Oh! please don't be reading those letters.

Judge Neilson—I do not see, at present, how the letter can be received.

Mr. Hill—Very well, I will ask one other question, then. Mr. Ovington, did your wife state to Mr. Tilton the contents of this letter?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir. In the first place, it is leading; and, in the second place, he don't know whether she did or not.

Judge Neilson—He cannot recollect what was said about the contents of the letter, and therefore he cannot answer the question.

Mr. Hill—I am asking him, with the letter before him if his wife stated the contents of this letter to Mr. Tilton?

The Witness—She did.

Judge Neilson—You can ask him what his wife said.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, what did your wife say in regard to the contents of this letter. Did she say anything, and if so, what? A. She repeated the contents of them; I had just heard them read, and I knew that what she was saying was the contents of them.

Q. You cannot recall what she then said? A. What she then said, I cannot recollect.

Mr. Beach—I object to the answer, and move to strike it out.

Mr. Hill—I submit that it is proper.

Judge Neilson—The statement that she has read them and that he remembers the contents is stricken out; I suppose it was not called for by your question.

Mr. Hill—I don't understand what your Honor strikes out.

Judge Neilson—The statement that he had heard the letters read, and that his wife on that occasion repeated them correctly, is stricken out, because it was not called for by your question.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, I asked if the witness stated the contents of these letters to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—That was objected to and ruled out. Then you asked the witness what his wife did state, and he made this irresponsible and improper answer.

Mr. Hill—I understand your Honor's ruling to be the striking out of that part of the answer which he made as not responsive to my question. I now put a question to which it shall be responsive.

Judge Neilson—What is your question?

Mr. Hill—Now, I ask if his wife did state the contents of this letter as he had previously heard it read?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—That involves a comparison between what he heard before and what was stated then. Your inquiry should be, what was stated then.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, I desire to prove by the witness that she stated the contents of the letter. He says that he cannot recollect what the contents were now, even after looking at the letter.

Judge Neilson—He cannot remember what was stated as the contents. That seems to embrace the examination. If the witness cannot remember, why, then, you should pass on to something else.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, I desire to offer the letter in evidence in connection with this testimony.

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Judge Neilson—It cannot be received.

Mr. Hill—[To THE TILTON stenographer.] Mark it for identification.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor will note our exception.

[Letter marked "Exhibit D, 111," for identification.]

Mr. Hill—Can you recall what she said in regard to the contents of the second letter? A. She said something about her being as happy as a bird on that day.

Mr. Hill—[To Judge Neilson.] Inasmuch as this letter is now marked, I will except to your Honor's ruling. [To the witness.] Now go on, Mr. Ovington. A. I cannot recall the phraseology; simply that she was happy, and everything was going on smoothly, and the letter closed by, "Bless the Lord, oh, my soul!" I remember that.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, go on with the conversation which occurred there after the statement about the letters? A. He said: "Mr. Beecher never loved any other woman as he loves Elizabeth. Mrs. Beecher he never loved; Mrs. Beecher made his home a hell, and as long as he loves Elizabeth so why does he not treat her like a man? Why don't he come forward and help her? He is a coward and poltroon. I would not treat a woman so who had given me all a woman can give. Why does he let her let her only cool rooms in the house to boarders."

Q. Anything else, in that connection I mean? A. Nothing further. He continued to call Mr. Beecher a coward.

Q. What else did he say on any other topic? A. He then said: "Mrs. Tilton has only done the duty of a wife in coming forward and lying for me." He then said: "If I had committed the Nathan murder, and Mrs. Tilton was a witness of it, do you suppose she would testify to the truth?" He said, "No, indeed," and appealed to my wife if she would not do the same thing.

Q. If she would not do what? A. If she would not testify—if she would testify to the truth if her husband was up for the Nathan murder, charged with the Nathan murder, and she a witness of it. My wife replied that she would not to convict an innocent man—she would sacrifice her husband rather than an innocent man should suffer—some such reply as that.

Q. Well, go on; anything further? A. I don't know that I can recall anything further.

Q. At that time. Was anything said about the conversation being confidential? A. Yes, Sir; as he left he said: "This conversation is confidential, but you can repeat it all to Elizabeth."

Q. Speaking to your wife? A. Speaking to my wife, yes, Sir.

Q. When did you see Mr. Tilton after that? A. The second day, I think.

GEN. TRACY'S INTERVIEWS AT THE OVINGTONS.

Q. Mr. Ovington, let me call your attention, or ask you if you saw Mr. Tilton within a day or two prior to the conversation which you have now referred to upon the piazza, a conversation when Gen. Tracy was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, please state what occurred then. Who was present at the conversation when Gen. Tracy and Mrs. Tilton were also present, and where did it take place? A. Judge Morse and myself, if that is the interview that you refer to.

Q. When was that, with reference to this last conversation which you have now given? A. The second day previous, I think.

Q. That would be on Wednesday, as near as you can locate it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Do you recollect the day, Mr. Ovington, when Mrs. Tilton appeared before the Committee of Plymouth Church? A. On the 6th of June.

Q. On the 6th of June? A. On the 6th of July.

Q. On the 6th of July. Where were you on that day? A. That evening I was present.

Q. You were present when she was before the Committee, do you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where were you during the afternoon of that day? A. I was in the house.

Q. Did you see Gen. Tracy that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what time did you see him? A. In the evening, about half-past six, I should judge.

Q. Well, who did he see when he came to your house? A. He saw my wife and myself.

Q. Who else? A. No one, I think, when he first came to the house.

Q. Then he went away, you say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he call again? A. He then returned in a half hour, I should think.

Q. Who was present then, and whom did he see? A. Only my wife and myself.

Q. At your house was this? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was he introduced to Mrs. Tilton at any time there, and if so, by whom? A. Not up to that time. Afterwards he was introduced by Judge Morse.

Q. And the interview between Mrs. Tilton and Gen. Tracy occurred in Judge Morse's presence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see the General again that day? A. Well, he remained there through the evening while Mrs. Tilton was giving her evidence before the Committee.

Q. The Committee then came to your house, as I understand it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, had Gen. Tracy any interview with Mrs. Tilton, or conversation with her which was not in the presence of either you or your wife, or the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—How can he speak when he was not present?

Mr. Hill—I don't know.

Mr. Beach—Well, he can say. The question called upon him to speak in reference to matters when he was absent; it so assumes by the question.

Q. Well, I will ask you, Mr. Ovington, were you present all the while that Mr. Tracy was in the house on that occasion, upon each of these interviews? A. Except one, Sir.

Q. Well, where was that, and when was it? A. Gen. Tracy called down stairs, where my wife and Mrs. Tilton were taking supper, to tell her that the Committee had come.

Q. Never mind what he said there. How long were they down there?

Mr. Beach—How long were they down there?

Mr. Hill—Gen. Tracy and Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton, together, I mean. A. Oh! just long enough to go and return.

Q. A very few minutes? A. About two minutes, I should say.

Q. And then the General came up stairs and remained in your presence until he went away?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. Don't tell him the story. Ask him the question.

A. Yes, Sir: the General came up and remained with the Committee, and with us, all through the evening.

Q. Mr. Ovington, please state to his Honor and the jury your business. A. A merchant in Brooklyn.

Q. How long have you been engaged in business here? A. 26 years—29 years.

Q. Where do you carry it on, Sir? A. On Fulton-st., near Clinton.

Q. State the place. A. 260 Fulton, near Clinton-st.

Q. Just state the line of your business in a general way. A. Importer of fancy goods, china and bronzes.

Q. Are you about to go away from the city now? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When do you expect to go? A. On Saturday.

Q. Going where? A. To Europe.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. OVINGTON.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Ovington, where has Mrs. Tilton made her home for the last four months? A. At my house.

Q. When did she go there first to make it her home? A. The early part of July.

Q. Do you recollect the day? A. I do not, the day of the week; it must have been July 8th.

Q. 1874? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What time in the day did she come there? A. Early in the morning.

Q. How early? A. I should think about half-past seven.

WHERE MRS. TILTON HAS LIVED SINCE LEAVING HER HUSBAND.

Q. And she has made it her home there ever since? A. Yes, Sir; except that she has been out of town for a short time visiting with my wife.

Q. Where did she visit? A. At Fairfield, Connecticut.

Q. In whose families, or in what families did she visit? A. I cannot recall the names; I am not acquainted with them—boarding-houses.

Q. Does your wife know the families with whom she visited? A. She did not until she went there; no, Sir.

Q. Did she go to visit strangers? A. She went, as she is in the habit of doing, out of town in the Summer months.

Q. Then she did not go visiting? A. No; not visiting; no, Sir.

Q. She went to spend the Summer, did she? A. To spend a short time; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you visit her while she was there? A. I did not.

Q. Can you not give me the name of the family or the house in which she remained during her absence? A. I cannot recall the name.

Q. How long was she absent during the Summer. A. I should think about four or five weeks altogether.

Q. And where were you during those four or five weeks? A. In the city.

Q. And did not visit her during that time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was she absent from Brooklyn at any other place since the time she went to live at your house up to the present time? A. She spent a short time in Washington, Connecticut.

Q. When was that? A. It must have been the early days of August.

Q. With your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did they spend the time then? A. With Mr. Gunn.

Q. Mr. Gunn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What place in Connecticut? A. Washington.

Q. What is his first name? A. I don't remember.

Q. Was it a boarding-house? A. Yes, Sir; a school, not a boarding-house.

Q. Do you know the name of the school? A. It is called "The Gunnery."

Q. The Gunnery? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who is the proprietor of it—Mr. Gunn? A. Mr. Gunn; yes, Sir.

Q. A large school? A. I think it is.

Q. A ladies' school—girls' school? A. Yes, Sir; men's principally, but there are some young ladies there.

Q. Did you visit her whilst she was there? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long did your wife and Mrs. Tilton remain there? A. I should say about a week; I don't remember the exact time.

Q. Now, was your wife absent at any other time during the Summer at any other place except the two that you have named? A. She stopped a few days at another place.

Q. Where was that? A. I cannot remember where now.

Q. Did you visit her at the Gunnery? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you visit her at this other place that you cannot recollect? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, you have named three places at which your wife was absent during the Summer with Mrs. Tilton. Is there any other place where they spent any portion of the time? A. I think not.

Q. Where did they spend the balance of their time intermediate to the time she came to your house up to the present day? A. At my house.

Q. Altogether? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In all of your wife's absences, then, during the Summer, Mrs. Tilton went with her, if I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And during the remaining period she has been in your family? A. Except occasional visits of a day or two to friends in New-Jersey.

Q. Where had she visited in New-Jersey?

Mr. Hill—If he knows.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't suppose he will tell if he don't know.

You must not distrust your own witness.

The Witness—She visited Montclair.

Q. How long? A. Only a day or two.

Q. Did your wife go with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long was she absent? A. Not more than two days, I think.

Q. Do you know how she went? A. How she went?

Q. Yes, Sir; how did she get to Montclair? A. She went to the ferry and crossed the ferry and crossed the city and took the cars, I presume.

Q. Then she went by rail, did she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you put her on board the cars? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know who did? A. I do not know.

Q. Did your wife go with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did any one go with her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who did? A. I presume Mr. Tubbs went with her.

Q. Mr. who? A. Mr. Tubbs.

Q. Who is Mr. Tubbs? A. He is an old resident here in Brooklyn.

Q. Friend of your family? A. Not until recently.

Q. How recently? A. Two or three months.

Q. Where does Mr. Tubbs reside? A. At Montclair.

Q. He came over after her, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you correspond with Mr. Tubbs? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether any one corresponded with him, in reference to that visit? A. He was in the habit of calling at the house; I think there was no correspondence.

Q. And he went away from your house in company with her, did he? A. I presume so; I don't know that.

Q. Do you know who returned with her? A. Mr. Tubbs.

Q. Mr. Tubbs returned with her—brought her to your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. After two or three days' absence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Has she been absent any other time than those you have named? A. Yes, Sir; she went up to "the Gunnery," if I remember right.

Q. The second time? A. Yes, Sir; the second time.

Q. When was that? A. I should think in January; I won't be sure.

Q. Of the present year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who went with her there? A. I don't know.

Q. Did any one? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. And don't you know who it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't your wife go with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Any member of your family go with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you present when she left the house? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir, I was not.

Q. And you cannot tell us who went with her? A. I don't remember now; no, Sir.

Q. Can you tell whether any one went with her? A. Yes, Sir; I know that some one went with her.

Q. How do you know that fact? A. From the fact of her inquiring who could go with her.

Q. Of whom did she make the inquiry? A. She talked with us in regard to it.

Q. Who do you mean by "us"? A. My wife and myself.

Q. She consulted you then as to who should go with her; did you suggest? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did your wife suggest in your presence? A. She may have done so.

Q. Don't you recollect that she did so? A. Yes, Sir; I do remember that she did suggest; but I don't know who she suggested.

Q. Don't you remember now who she suggested? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was thought to be a matter of importance that some proper person should go with her, was it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And don't you remember that some proper person was suggested? A. I remember that Mrs. Morse was suggested; whether she went or not, I don't know.

Q. Mrs. Morse was suggested. Now, who suggested Mrs. Morse? A. I think likely Mrs. Tilton did.

Q. That is Mrs. Tilton's mother, is it not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was there any other absence than those you have named? A. I think not, Sir; I don't recall any.

MRS. TILTON'S VISITORS.

Q. Will you state, if you please, during the period that Mrs. Tilton has been at your house, whether she has had many or few persons to call upon her? A. Rather few, I should say; or, at least, she has seen few; many have called, and—

Q. Many have called, and few were chosen, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have mentioned a call by Mr. Tracy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that call made? A. On the 6th of July.

Q. How? A. On the 6th of July.

Q. Are you sure of the day? A. Well, presuming that that was the date that she went before the Committee, that was the first call—the first time that he saw her.

Q. That you knew of? A. Yes, Sir; that I knew of.

Q. What time in the day was it that Mr. Tracy called first? A. That he called first at our house?

Q. Yes, Sir; that you know of; on that day—whatever day it was that he did call? A. Towards evening; I should think, six o'clock, or so.

Q. Were you home when he called? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you know, at that time, of the appointment of this Committee of the Church? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were in ignorance of that fact, were you? A. Entirely so; yes, Sir.

Q. From whom did you learn the fact that the Committee was appointed? A. From my wife.

Q. When did you first learn it? A. That same evening; or, perhaps, at that very interview; I don't remember.

Q. Who met Mr. Tracy at the door when he came; do you recollect? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Where did you first see Mr. Tracy in the house after his arrival? A. In the upper room.

Q. What upper room? A. The front bedroom, over the parlor; I was sick—detained home.

Q. How did it happen that you were up there? A. I was detained home by sickness.

Q. And you were in the upper front room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In bed? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who brought Mr. Tracy up there? A. I think he was shown up by the servant.

Q. Do you know, of your own knowledge, how long Mr. Tracy had been in the house before he was ushered into your presence? A. Oh, I know that he came—

Q. Of your own knowledge? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You saw him come in the house, then? A. I heard the bell ring.

Q. Did the bell ring more than once that day? Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you at the door when persons visiting the house were admitted? A. No, Sir.

Q. Could you distinguish, then, being up stairs in your sick room, between the advent of Mr. Tracy and any other person who might have rung the bell? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then I put the question to you again. Do you know, of your own knowledge, when Mr. Tracy arrived at the house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You saw him come in, did you? A. No, Sir; I know he was not down stairs.

Q. How long had you been up-stairs before he was ushered into your room? A. Oh, I think I had been there some time.

Q. How long? A. Two or three hours.

Q. Is it impossible for a person to get into your house without ringing the bell? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is; quite impossible? A. Except with a right key.

Q. They could not be let in by any other person without ringing the bell, could they? Not very well; no, Sir.

Q. It might happen? A. Yes, Sir; they might come in with the servant, perhaps.

Q. Now, will you explain to this jury as an intelligent man, Mr. Ovington, how you are enabled to say that you know when Mr. Tracy came into your house when you acknowledged that you didn't see him come in, but was in an upper room of the house? A. It is a very small house—

Q. Well? A. And when the bell rings, I can hear just what is going on down in the hall, and I generally ascertain who rings at the bell.

Q. Well, if you generally ascertained who rung the bell, did that enable you to tell who rung the bell that day? A. Who entered the house; yes, Sir.

Q. You could tell, then, who entered the house that day, because you generally inquired who rung the bell; is that your answer? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is your answer. Now, Mr. Ovington, do you know how long Gen. Tracy was in that house before he came to your room, of your own knowledge? A. I knew it only in that way.

Q. That you heard a bell ring, and supposed that somebody was admitted? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that that somebody you conjectured was Mr. Tracy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is not that all you know about it? Is that all you know about it? A. I don't understand the question.

Q. Then you should not have answered it? A. Is that all I know about it?

Q. I understand you to conjecture that Gen. Tracy came in the house when you heard a certain bell ring, but you don't know it of your own knowledge? A. Why, yes; I knew that it was he. I do know it of my own knowledge; I did know it.

Q. I want you to tell how you knew when you were up stairs in the room and did not see him enter? A. If any one enters the house I hear their voice from my room; the house is small.

Q. You don't hear the voice unless they speak, do you? A. They generally speak.

Q. Generally speak? A. Always speak.

Q. Always? A. They ask the servant if Mr. Ovington is in. That I hear.

Q. Did you hear that, that day? A. I presume I did.

Q. Did you hear that, that day? A. I cannot recall it.

Q. You cannot recall it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Then how can you state positively that you knew when Gen. Tracy came in, if you didn't hear his voice? A. Well, I have stated as near as I can.

Q. I think you have too? A. Yes.

Q. But I must ask you a little further about it? A. I am sure that he was not in the house a moment, Sir, before he came up to the room.

Q. You are sure of it? A. Absolutely sure.

Q. You swear to it positively? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That he was not in the house a moment before he came up to your room? A. It could not be possible. No.

Q. It could not have been possible. Very well, I am glad to get that. You know it was not I who rung that bell and came in the house? A. Yes.

Q. Positive? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The door of your room shut or open? A. Open in the summer always.

Q. Can you see from your room where you were sitting, down stairs to the front door? A. No, Sir, I could not see to the front door.

Q. How? A. No.

Q. Can't see at all. Did you get up that day to go to the head of the stairs to see who had entered? A. No, Sir; I don't think I did.

Q. Do you remember exactly how long it was after you heard a bell ring before Mr. Tracy came to your room? A. About half a minute.

Q. I ask you if you recollect positively how long it was? A. I remember that he came right up; yes, Sir.

Q. You have a distinct recollection of that, have you? A. Well, no; I can not say that I have a very distinct recollection.

Q. If you have not a distinct recollection, how are you enabled to say that you know that he came right up? A. His calls were very unusual, you know, and I remarked it.

Q. His calls were unusual, and you remarked it; now, pray tell us how many calls he had made before that. A. I think that was the first call.

Q. Then his calls were not unusual, were they? He had made none? A. No.

Q. And do you think that because he had never called before that, therefore he came right up? A. No, Sir; that I should remember it—be more apt to.

Q. How? A. I should be more apt to remember it.

Q. You would be more apt to remember that he came right up stairs after ringing the bell, because he had never called before? A. Being a stranger.

Q. Was he a stranger to you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You had never met him before? A. Yes, Sir; I had met him once or twice.

Q. Where had you met him? A. Met him at the church.

Q. A speaking acquaintance? A. I had spoken with him. I think I had had but one interview with him; one or two.

Q. Then he was not a stranger, was he? A. Comparatively a stranger.

Q. Did you know that Gen. Tracy was coming? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had not you heard that he was coming? A. No, Sir.

Q. Hadn't it been suggested or intimated to you that he was coming? A. I think not.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, just reflect a moment. Before Gen. Tracy visited you that day had it not been intimated to you that he would come, or some one else would come to your house on behalf of Mr. Beecher? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. You are not sure? A. I am almost sure.

Q. Almost, not quite. Why do you hesitate in regard to it if you are not sure? [To Mr. Hill.] You are talking a little too loud for the jury.

Mr. Hill—How?

Mr. Beach—We say that you are talking a little too loud, and your remarks can be heard by the jury.

Mr. Hill—Can you hear us?

Mr. Fullerton—I do.

Mr. Hill—I am speaking to Mr. Everts.

Mr. Fullerton—I cannot help that, Sir.

Mr. Beach—There is no necessity of speaking quite so loud.

The Witness—I am prepared to say that I did not know that Mr. Tracy was coming in.

Q. Well, I am prepared to say that I did not ask you that question. A. I thought you did. I beg pardon.

Q. No, I didn't. I will repeat it. Before Mr. Tracy arrived at your house, had you no intimation that he, or some one else, on behalf of Mr. Beecher, would call?

Mr. Everts—By that question, does Mr. Fullerton assume that Mr. Tracy called on behalf of Mr. Beecher?

Judge Neilson—No. Mr. Tracy or somebody else on behalf of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Everts—Exactly.

Judge Neilson—It don't imply that Mr. Tracy called on behalf of Mr. Beecher; somebody else.

Mr. Beach—Strike out the "else" or "some one on behalf of Mr. Beecher."

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evans—I had heard no evidence that Gen. Tracy had called on behalf of Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Fullerton—Not yet.

Mr. Evans—Well, the past is secure.

Mr. Fullerton—The future is not, for you.

Q. Now, Sir, will you be kind enough to answer the question?

A. Ask it again, please.

Q. I will ask the reporter to read it for fear I might not do it distinctly enough.

[Question repeated by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

A. I had not.

Q. No intimation? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you no intimation that some one would call at your house that day before the call was made? A. No, Sir.

Q. Who was in your room when Mr. Tracy entered? A. My wife.

Q. Any one else? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long did he remain in your room in your company, and in your wife's company? A. I should say five minutes—five or ten minutes, perhaps.

Q. And during that five or ten minutes, where was Mrs. Tilton? A. I think she was up stairs.

Q. Are you sure? A. If she was in the house, she was up stairs; yes, Sir.

Q. Why does that follow? She did not always stay up stairs when she was in the house, did she? A. Because she had requested me to give her a Bible to go up stairs to be alone?

Q. Do you recollect that distinctly? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She wanted a Bible to go up stairs to be alone? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She said all that, did she? A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how long before Gen. Tracy arrived did she say that? A. I should think a half hour or so.

Q. How? A. Half an hour, perhaps; it might have been longer; I cannot recall.

Q. Then how do you know that she remained up stairs during that half hour? A. I do not know; I presume she was up stairs.

Q. Yes: it was a presumption of yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You did not see her go up, did you? A. I saw her leave the room, and heard her go up; yes, Sir. I do swear that she was up there.

Q. When did you next see her after she left your room that day, under those circumstances? A. I think at the interview with Mr. Morse—with her father.

Q. How long after she left your room was it that you saw her in the presence of Judge Morse? A. I should say about an hour.

Q. Where did Gen. Tracy go after he left your room after being there as you have stated? A. He left the house.

Q. Did you see him leave the house? A. He left the room, rather.

Q. Yes. Did your wife leave the room at the same time? A. I think not.

Q. She remained with you? A. I think so.

Q. How long did she remain in your company after Mr. Tracy left? A. I don't remember.

Q. About how long? A. I really could not say, Mr. Fullerton.

Q. Did Mr. Tracy go down stairs after he left your room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know how long he remained in the lower part of the house before leaving, of your own knowledge? A. I knew that he went right out in the street; I heard the door shut.

Q. And therefore you knew that he went out because you heard the door shut? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You swear positively that it was he that went out? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Although you did not see him? A. I do not remember to have seen him; I may have seen him from the window.

Q. Well, did you or did you not see him to enable you to swear positively that it was he who went out? A. I did not see him; no, Sir.

Q. You did not see him? A. Not that I remember.

Q. Well, I put the question to you again, without having seen him go out are you enabled to swear positively that he did go out? A. Yes, Sir; I will swear that he went out.

Q. Yes. Well, that is got along to. Do you know of your own knowledge that he did not remain in the lower part of the house a half an hour before he left? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And do you know of your own knowledge that Mrs. Tilton was not down there with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Positively? A. Positively.

Q. How long after he left the house, as you say he did, before you saw him again? A. I should say 15 or 20 minutes.

Q. Where did you see him then? A. In the parlor, down stairs, I think.

Q. Was he in the parlor when you entered it? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Where were you when he entered the house the second time? A. I think I was in the parlor.

Q. And where was he if you did not see him in the parlor? A. He entered the house from the street.

Q. And came to the parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you were there when he entered? A. I think so.

Q. Or were you up stairs in your room? A. No; I think I was down stairs at that interview.

Q. Who was in the parlor when he entered beside yourself? A. I think only my wife.

Q. No one else. Where was Mrs. Tilton at that time? A. In the mean time she had gone out to get her father, and I think—

Q. What time did she go out? A. Well, I can't remember.

Q. What did she want of her father? A. Wanted to consult with her.

Q. Wanted to consult? A. To consult with him.

Q. How? A. She wished to consult with him.

Q. Do you know about what? A. In regard to the step that she proposed taking to consult with some of the members of the church—some of the brethren of the church—as she termed it.

Q. About what? A. About this scandal matter.

Q. About this scandal matter; what was going on about this scandal matter? A. Well, the Tilton-Bacon letter had been Published, and she had determined to take some step in the matter.

Q. Anything said about the Committee? A. No, Sir; I think she was not aware of the appointment of the Committee.

Q. Now, what brethren of the church was she going to consult? A. She did not designate, did not say.

Q. Did you designate? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where was the consultation to be held? A. That was not mentioned at all.

Q. How long had the Tilton-Bacon letter been published then? A. A week or ten days, I think.

Q. And this was the first that the conclusion was arrived at that something was to be done in regard to it, was it? A. That was the first day?

Q. Yes. A. No, Sir.

Q. The first day that any consultation was proposed? A. Not the first.

Mr. Hill—What persons are you speaking of?

Mr. Fullerton—The very persons that the witness is speaking of.

Mr. Hill—Pardon me, I am asking the question.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know anything more about it than what he has stated. I don't keep my memory up for you. I attend to my own branch of the case as well as I can, and I know no more about it than what he has stated. [To the witness.] Was there any consultation at your house? A. No, Sir; there was not.

Q. Did Judge Morse come back with Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where did they sit—in the parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did they talk in your presence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in the presence of your wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you see Mrs. Tilton leave the house to go after her father, Judge Morse? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Do you recollect when she left? A. No, Sir; that I cannot recall.

Q. Was it before or after Mr. Tracy left? A. Oh, it was before.

Q. Before Mr. Tracy left? A. She said she had to go to prepare supper for her boarders.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, perhaps you will explain one thing then. If Mrs. Tilton left before Gen. Tracy left, how were you enabled to state a moment ago that Mrs. Tilton was up-stairs with her Bible when Mr. Tracy left? A. Yes; I think I was mistaken there.

Q. Yes. Now you have an opportunity of correcting it? A. I think that must have been earlier in the afternoon that she came in and said to me that she would like to be alone, and asked for a Bible.

Q. Earlier in the afternoon? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Earlier than what? A. Earlier than six o'clock.

Q. What has six o'clock got to do with our examination at the present moment? It has not been mentioned before. A. Well, it was earlier in the afternoon; perhaps it was three or four o'clock.

Q. Well, we will commence anew? A. Well, Sir.

Q. Now, when did Mrs. Tilton go up-stairs; was it before or after Mr. Tracy came there? A. It was before.

Q. Now, you say she came down and left the house before Mr. Tracy did? A. Yes, Sir, because I remember her saying that she had to prepare supper for her boarders.

Q. Where was Mr. Tracy when she said that? A. I don't think I heard her say that, though.

Q. Well, you are mistaken again, then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You don't think you heard her say that. Where was she when Mr. Tracy left the house? A. I heard that she did say so through my wife.

Q. No, never mind that. A. Well.

Q. Where was she when Mr. Tracy left the house? A. I suppose she must have been home.

Q. Home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then when she went down-stairs and to leave the house, Mr. Tracy was in your room, was he? A. That I cannot recall.

Q. If Mr. Tracy was in your room after he entered the house and remained there until he left and Mrs. Tilton went down-stairs before Mr. Tracy did, doesn't it follow then that he was in the room when she left? A. I cannot remember as to that really.

Q. How long after she left the house was it before Mr. Tracy left? A. That I don't remember.

Q. About how long was it? A. Because I don't know exactly when she went out of the house; I did not know at the time.

THE WITNESS'S MEMORY BAD.

Q. You say she went out before Mr. Tracy did? A. She might have gone before Mr. Tracy came. I don't remember.

Q. Oh. How could she go before Mr. Tracy came when you said she was up-stairs when Mr. Tracy was in your room? A. Well, I think I must have been mistaken there.

Q. Mistaken again; very well. Now, Mr. Ovington, I will give you the fairest opportunity to set this matter straight if you have any recollection on the subject. A. Well, I should like to do it if I could.

Q. Well, I should like to see you. A. My recollection is, that Mrs. Tilton came in, perhaps, in the middle of the afternoon, and came up to my room—if I remember right, my wife was not at home then—and said to me, "I would like to be alone for a moment, if you will allow me to go up stairs," and asked for a Bible. She left the room, and I supposed she went up stairs.

Q. Well, now go on? A. Then my recollection is, that Mr. Tracy came in towards evening, and after stopping for a few moments went out, as I believed, to Mr. Beecher's, and in a few—

Q. Beecher's? A. And in a few moments again returned.

Q. Yes; well? A. Well, then I think Mrs. Tilton came in with Judge Morse, and had that interview in the back parlor, but the time that elapsed between these interviews I cannot recall.

Q. Well, Mr. Tracy, then, and Mrs. Tilton were absent from your house at the same time? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tracy for a few moments; Mrs. Tilton for an hour or two.

Q. About half an hour you told me Mr. Tracy was absent? A. Yes, Sir; perhaps as long as that.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge that they did not meet outside of your house? A. I was not in the street to see.

Q. Well, you don't know then, do you? A. No.

Q. Now, what makes you think Mr. Tracy left to go to see Mr. Beecher? A. I think he made a remark to that effect.

Q. To whom did he make that observation? A. To my wife and myself.

Q. Any one else present? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, up to the time of Mr. Tracy's return after he left your house, had he seen or met Mrs. Tilton? A. Not that I know of.

Q. On his return the second time to your house, what room did he occupy or sit in? A. The second time I think it was up-stairs; I won't be sure.

Q. And who was with him up-stairs the second time? A. I think only my wife.

Q. Where were you? A. I was present.

Q. Well, then, you were there? A. Yes, Sir; my wife and myself.

Q. And it was not in the parlor that the second call was made? A. I think not; I won't be sure. It might have been down-stairs.

Q. Then you are wrong there again, are you? A. Yes.

Q. You told us a moment ago that it was in the parlor, I think? A. Well, it might have been in the parlor.

Mr. Beach—Stop a moment.

Mr. Beach—What are you hollering to us for?

Mr. Hill—I didn't.

Mr. Beach—You are making a great noise there about something.

The Witness—I gave very little attention to the matter, and it is all indistinct, you know.

Mr. Fullerton—I think my adventures are excusable for being nervous, Sir. I don't complain. [To the witness.] It is all indistinct, is it? A. Rather so; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, do you know anything about it? A. Oh! I know a good deal about it; yes, Sir. Lapses of time and all that—

Q. Then will you tell us now whether you know whether the second interview with Gen. Tracy was in the parlor or in the room up-stairs? A. You refer now to the second interview with Mr. Tracy alone, not when Judge Morse was present.

Q. I refer to just what is embraced in my question?

Mr. Everts—That is what he has asked you—what was embraced in your question.

Mr. Fullerton—That is what he ought to know without asking.

Mr. Everts—Oh, I don't know that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't know that you do.

The Witness—I think the chances are that it was up-stairs.

Q. The chances are it was up-stairs. How long did that interview last? A. I cannot say, really. It might have been ten minutes, and it might have been half an hour, and it might have been five minutes.

Q. Where was Mrs. Tilton during that second interview up-stairs, which might have been half an hour? Do you know whether she had returned to the house or not? A. No, Sir; she had not; she must have been at home, I think.

Q. Where did Mr. Tracy go after he left your room, that second interview being ended up there? A. I cannot be sure whether he left the house—whether he didn't stay until Judge Morse came in the evening.

Q. Then you don't know whether he staid until Judge Morse came or not, do you? A. I cannot be sure.

Q. Did he come back after leaving—after that interview? A. With Judge Morse?

Q. After leaving your house the second time, the interview being closed, did he return? A. I just remarked that I don't remember whether he went away.

Q. Well, if he did not go away, why did he stay? A. He staid with us until Judge Morse came.

Q. Are you sure of that now? A. That is my impression.

Q. You are not sure, however, are you? A. I cannot be sure; no, Sir.

Q. Did Judge Morse come while you and Mr. Tracy were sitting in your upper room during that interview? A. No, Sir; that was in the back parlor.

Q. No; you don't understand my question, Mr. Ovington. During that interview up-stairs—the second interview up-stairs, did Judge Morse come to the house? A. No, Sir; not up-stairs. Judge Morse came to the house when we were in the parlor.

Q. And was Mr. Tracy in the parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then he went from your room up-stairs into the parlor, didn't he? A. I cannot remember, Sir.

Q. How? A. I cannot recall.

Q. Can you recall the length of time that elapsed after your interview up-stairs was ended before you saw Gen. Tracy in the parlor? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. May it have been an hour? A. It might have been, perhaps.

Q. It might have been an hour? A. It might not have been.

Q. Do you know what time Mr. Morse came and Mrs. Tilton; was it before or after your interview up-stairs in the room was ended? A. Oh! it was after.

Q. How long after? A. When Judge Morse came it must have been pretty nearly 8 o'clock.

Q. In the evening? A. I think so.

Q. In the evening, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long after your interview up-stairs—the second interview up-stairs in your room—ended? A. I don't remember.

Q. About how long was it? A. I cannot recall it now.

Q. Two hours? A. I cannot tell.

Q. You cannot tell whether it was two or three hours, can you? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, you say you don't know whether Gen. Tracy went away after the second interview was closed and before Judge

Morse arrived. I understand you to say so? A. I presume he must have gone away, but I cannot recall.

Q. You don't know whether he went away or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, if he did not go away, he was in the house, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you tell me where he was in your house during that two or three hours? A. He was not there two or three hours.

Q. You have told us that you did not know whether it was two or three hours after the interview up-stairs closed before Judge Morse came? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whatever interval it was, whether it was one hour or three, can you tell where Gen. Tracy was in the house, if he were there during that period? A. I cannot.

Q. Then you don't know whether he was with Mrs. Tilton or not, do you? A. Yes, I know he was not with her.

Q. Will you tell the jury then, how you know that? A. Because I know she was not in the house.

Q. Not in the house? She was in the house after she arrived there, wasn't she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Can you state that Gen. Tracy and she were not together after she arrived in your house when you were not present? A. Yes, Sir; I know they were not.

Q. Now, we will see how you know it. Where were you when Judge Morse arrived? A. I was in the parlor.

Q. You told me a moment ago that you did not know whether you were in the parlor up-stairs in your room when he arrived, I think? A. Oh, no; not when Judge Morse arrived.

Q. You are sure you were in the parlor? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did Mrs. Tilton come with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

THE COMMITTEE'S MEETING AT THE OVINGTONS.

Q. Mrs. Tilton did not arrive before Judge Morse did, then? A. I think she went after her father; he came with her.

Q. Now, answer my question. Do you say that Mrs. Tilton did not arrive there that evening with her father—before her father? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. You think; you say so. Is that the answer? A. I think it was so.

Q. Understand my question, Mr. Ovington. A. Yes; I think it was so.

Q. That she arrived before her father? A. I think she did not arrive before her father; I think she came with her father.

Q. You think she came with her father? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was about eight o'clock, you think, in the evening? A. Somewhere along there; yes, Sir.

Q. And you were in the parlor when he arrived? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who else was in the parlor? A. Gen. Tracy and my wife.

Q. Gen. Tracy. What time did he arrive there? A. He must have arrived just a short time previous to Judge Morse coming in, I think.

Q. Were you up-stairs when he arrived that time? A. I cannot remember the fact of him coming in, you know.

Q. Then you were not there when he came in, were you? A. I think I must have been there.

Q. Were you up-stairs in your room when he arrived at the time? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Where do you think you were? A. I think I was in the parlor.

Q. Did you see Gen. Tracy arrive? A. I think I saw him coming in, but I cannot remember now.

Q. How long had you been down in the parlor when he came in? A. That I cannot remember.

Q. Are you sure you saw him come in while you were in the parlor? A. I cannot swear I saw Gen. Tracy passing through the hall and entering the parlor—that I saw him.

Q. Was he in the parlor when you went down stairs? A. I don't remember any such occurrence as that.

Q. How long did they remain in the parlor after they got together? A. I should think about—a short time.

Q. Then what was done? A. During the interview?

Q. No, Sir; what was done after the interview was over—what became of the persons assembled there? A. Mr. Tracy went out, and returned in a few moments with the Committee.

Q. Ah! well, what time did the Committee leave? A. Well, it had got on in the evening pretty well.

Q. About what time? A. Perhaps half-past eight or nine.

Q. How long was he gone before he returned with the Committee? A. A very few minutes.

Q. Did you know the Committee were coming there before they arrived? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did you first learn that fact? A. Just a few moments before they did arrive, or before Gen. Tracy left.

Q. Before Gen. Tracy left it was? A. Yes, Sir; before Gen. Tracy left to get them.

Q. You learned it, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You said something or other about Mrs. Tilton going down-stairs and Gen. Tracy going down-stairs, on your direct examination? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you mean by that? A. The Committee came in, and I showed them into the parlor, and Gen. Tracy said: "Where is Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton?"

Q. I don't ask you what Gen. Tracy said. A. Ah.

Q. I ask you to explain what you meant on your direct examination by saying Mrs. Tilton went down-stairs and Gen. Tracy went down-stairs? A. He asked me the question where they were, and I told him where they were, and he went down-stairs.

Q. Where who were? A. Where Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton were. I said they were down at supper, and he went down-stairs to them.

Q. Where was the supper? A. In the basement parlor.

Q. Where were you when you said it? A. I was in the parlor, I suppose—I think—or in the hall.

Q. Were the Committee there then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The Committee were assembled then? A. Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Will you allow me, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—There is a gentleman who is wanted in the next room as a witness.

The Clerk (Mr. Mallison)—David Corbett, please step into the court-room opposite; you are wanted immediately as a witness.

Mr. Tracy—[To the witness.] Was it tea they were at, or dinner? A. Tea.

Q. Did he take tea that night? A. No, Sir; not that I know of.

Q. How? A. He didn't take tea at our house.

Q. Were they taking tea as late as eight o'clock? A. No, Sir; we took tea much earlier.

Q. How happens it, then, that Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton were down stairs after eight o'clock, as you say, taking tea? A. I understood that Mrs. Tilton wanted a cup of tea, and my wife took her down there.

Q. When did you understand that? A. I don't know when I understood it.

Q. Are you sure you understood it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was how much past eight o'clock? A. It must have been nearly nine o'clock, I should think; some remark was made about the late hour, or something of that kind.

Q. Mr. Tracy was a comparative stranger in your house, as I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He had never been there before that day? A. I believe not.

Q. Had he ever been presented to Mrs. Ovington until that day? A. I think not.

Q. Could not Mr. Tracy wait until Mrs. Tilton drank her cup of tea and came up-stairs? A. He didn't tell me whether he could or not.

Q. How does it happen that this stranger should go down-stairs after Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton in your house, into the basement? A. I don't know.

Q. Why didn't you go down after the ladies, if they were wanted? A. I was entertaining the Committee.

Q. Entertaining the Committee? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Could not Mr. Tracy entertain the Committee as well as you? A. Much better, Sir.

Q. Could you not have gone after your wife and the other lady as well as he? A. I presume I could.

Q. Now, do you know how long Mr. Tracy was down-stairs when he went down after Mrs. Ovington and Mrs. Tilton, as you say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you a distinct recollection of the length of time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A distinct recollection? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. Well, tell us exactly how long it was? A. I remember that he just went down and came up-stairs again, without occupying more than two or three minutes.

Q. Sure of that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Indelibly impressed upon your recollection as to what was the length of time? A. Oh, not indelible, perhaps.

Q. You are very positive as to the length of time, are you? A. That is my recollection.

Q. May it not have been ten minutes? A. No, Sir; I should have remarked it if it had been.

Q. Well, when he came up-stairs, did you see any papers in Mr. Tracy's hands? A. I don't remember, Sir; I don't remember having seen any.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton give her statement there that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, who were present when that statement was given? A. Mr. Sage, Mr. White, and Mr. Olafin; I think the Committee were all present.

Q. I don't limit the question to the Committee; I want every person who was present named. A. Mr. Winalow and General Tracy, I think that was all, and my wife and myself.

Q. Have you now named all the persons who were present? A. I think so, Sir.

Q. How long did the Committee sit? A. I should judge about half an hour.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, how long was this session of the Committee before Mrs. Tilton came to your house to live permanently? A. Mr. Storrs was present; I beg your pardon. I beg your pardon, what was your question?

Q. How long after the meeting of this Committee, which you have now named, was it that Mrs. Tilton came to your house to reside permanently? A. The second day, I think; the second day following, or the third.

Q. Do you know the day of the month when she did come? A. I don't remember.

Q. Can you state whether or not it was the 11th of July? A. I think it was, Sir, the 11th.

Q. On the 11th of July. Then are you enabled by that to state, with some degree of certainty, the day of the meeting of the Committee at your house? A. The day of the month?

Q. The day of the month; yes, Sir? A. I don't remember the date.

Q. Well, whenever it was that Mrs. Tilton came to your house to stay permanently, I want to ask you if you knew before she came that she was coming? A. No, Sir.

Q. In the morning, then, when she arrived early, was it an entire surprise to you? A. It was a surprise to us; yes, Sir; it was a surprise.

Q. You had no intimation of her coming at all? A. Not that she was coming to reside; no, Sir.

Q. Well, had you an intimation that she was coming that morning? A. My wife—no, Sir; not at all, we had not, that she was coming.

Q. How? A. We did not know that she was coming.

Q. You did not know that she was coming at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect when the publication first appeared of the appointment of the Committee? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Do you recollect whether it was not on the day on which Mrs. Tilton arrived at your house? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Do you recollect when you first saw it in print? A. No, Sir.

Q. No recollection on that subject?

Mr. Evans—You mean the arrival to stay.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, certainly. [To the witness.] Have you no means of recollecting when you first saw that publication? A. I don't remember the day.

Mr. Hill—The publication of what?

Mr. Fullerton—The publication of the appointment of the Committee.

The Witness—No, Sir, I don't remember the day.

Q. You cannot state, with reference to the day when you first saw that publication, when it was that Mrs. Tilton came to your house? A. No, Sir.

DEFENDANT'S COUNSEL VISITORS OF MRS. TILTON'S

Q. Now, you have spoken of some visits that were made to Mrs. Tilton whilst at your house. Will you state whether Mr. Tracy has called to see her? A. At my house?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tracy has called to see her.

Q. How frequently? A. I suppose he has made a dozen or fifteen calls there.

Q. And at what time of day generally? A. Usually in the evening, perhaps.

Q. Had interviews alone? A. Yes, Sir, usually alone.

Q. How long did they last? A. Some were very short, and others longer.

Q. Well, state how long some of them would last? A. Half an hour; an hour, perhaps, some of them.

Q. Did any other of the counsel for the defendant call to see Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Name them, please? A. Mr. Shearman.

Q. How frequently has Mr. Shearman called? A. About as frequent as Mr. Tracy.

Q. And how long were his interviews with her? A. About the same, I should think, some of them.

Q. Were those interviews with Mrs. Tilton alone? A. Most of them; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did any other of the counsel call to see her? A. Mr. Hill has called.

Q. How frequently? A. His calls were more upon Mrs. Ovington, I think, though—

Q. I didn't ask you about his calls? A—than upon Mrs. Tilton. Not very frequent.

Q. He had interviews with Mrs. Tilton, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And alone? A. I think very rarely alone.

Q. Well, some of them were alone? A. I don't remember how that is.

Q. You are not at home in the daytime, I take it, Mr. Ovington? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you don't know what calls are made in your absence? A. No, Sir; I would only hear about them.

Q. Did any other of the counsel for the defendant call than those you have named? A. Upon Mrs. Tilton, I think not.

Q. Do you know? A. I think Mr. Everts and Mr. Porter called once; I heard about it; I don't know.

Q. You were not at home? A. No, Sir.

MR. BEECHER'S RECENT CALLS ON MRS. TILTON.

Q. Has Mr. Beecher called since she came to your house? A. He made one call.

Q. When was that? A. I think it was a day or two after her appearing before the Committee.

Q. How many days, as near as you can recollect? A. Perhaps five days.

Q. Were you present? A. No, Sir.

Q. Were you at home when he called? A. No, Sir, I was not.

Q. Have you not been at home at any time when he called since she has been at your house? A. There has been only one call that I ever heard of.

Q. You don't know of any other call? A. No, Sir.

Q. Has he made any calls at your house since Mrs. Tilton was there? A. No, Sir.

Q. None that you know of? A. Except that one that I just referred to.

Q. Do you know on what day of the week that was? A. No, Sir.

Q. What? A. I don't.

Q. Don't you know that he called before Mrs. Tilton went before the Committee? A. I don't know that he did; no, Sir.

Q. Have you no knowledge upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. I never heard that he called, and I certainly should have known it if he had; my recollection is that his call was after Mrs. Tilton's being before the Committee.

Q. I am talking about the call before Mrs. Tilton went before the Committee; don't you know that he called at your house and had an interview with Mrs. Tilton before she went before the Committee? A. Oh! I know that he didn't.

Q. You know that he did? A. I know that he didn't.

Q. Even when you were absent you know it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That is, when you were down at your store during the day, you know that Mr. Beecher did not call at your house? A. I know that my wife would have told me if he had.

Q. Well, in that state of things are you willing to swear positively that he did not call during the day? A. Yes, Sir.

THE WHEREABOUTS OF MRS. TILTON'S CHILDREN.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, where have Mrs. Tilton's children been since she came to your house? A. Two of them—Alice and Carroll—for the most part, at "The Gunnery."

Q. Where? A. At "The Gunnery," at Washington, Connecticut.

Q. They went off to "The Gunnery;" very well, when did they go? A. I should think in September.

Q. September last? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, the other children, where have they been? A. The youngest one, Ralph, has been with us; with his mother—with us.

Q. During the whole time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, that does not embrace the whole of the children? A. Florence, I can't say where she has been.

Q. Well, you can say that she has not been at your house? A. Not been at our house; no, Sir.

Q. How old is she? A. 17, I believe.

Q. Hasn't she been at your house since Mrs. Tilton came there? A. Been to call upon her mother; yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently? A. Average about once a fortnight, I should say.

Q. How? A. Average of about once a fortnight, or once in ten days.

Q. Up to within what time? A. Up to within about three weeks.

Q. Do you recollect of her calling on one occasion and asking for her mother when she was absent from your house? A. I don't remember it; no, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect that you refused to tell her where her mother was when she called? A. No, Sir.

Q. You know nothing of such a circumstance? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, don't you know that the oldest child, Florence, is with her father? A. I have heard so; yes, Sir.

Q. Have you been at Mr. Tilton's house since Mrs. Tilton came to your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Are you quite sure that you did not refuse to tell Florence where her mother was? A. I am, Sir.

Q. Well, do you recollect her coming to your house upon any occasion and inquiring particularly for her mother when her mother was absent? A. I don't recollect it now—might have done so.

Q. And didn't you afterwards apologize for it, for not telling her? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Do you recollect of anything taking place between you and Florence in reference to the whereabouts of her mother at any time? A. Yes; I think that Florence sent a messenger to me, requesting me to say where her mother was. I think I wrote her a letter, which I sent by the messenger, advising her not to go to her mother at present.

Q. Yes. Well, where was her mother then? A. I believe at Fairfield, or at this other place that I cannot recall the name of it.

Q. What reason had you for advising the child not to go to her mother? A. Her mother was anxious that her whereabouts should not be known, that she might be quiet.

Q. You didn't want even her child to see her? A. I had no preference in the matter; I knew her mother's feelings.

Q. Well, you didn't tell Florence where her mother was, did you? A. I sent this note by the messenger, advising her not to go to her mother at present.

Q. Well, you didn't inform her? A. No, Sir; no.

Q. You would recognise that note if you saw it? A. Oh! yes. That is my recollection of it.

THE WITNESS'S CONNECTION WITH PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, what connection have you had, if any, with Plymouth Church? A. I have been a member for ten or eleven years.

Q. Ever held any office in the church? A. Never, until recently, except in the Sabbath-School.

Q. How recently have you filled office? A. Since the first of January.

Q. Of the present year? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And to what office were you elected then? A. A deacon.

Q. Of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is your wife a member of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Both regular attendants and communicants? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long have you been communicants? A. For ten years; ten or eleven years, I think it is.

Q. How? A. Ten or eleven years.

THE INTERVIEWS WITH MR. TILTON.

Q. You have spoken of some interviews which you had with Mr. Tilton; will you state when the first interview was, as near as you can recollect? A. It was on Sunday—the first Sunday after the publication of the Tilton-Bacon letter.

Q. And where was that interview? A. In front of his house.

Q. In the street? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Anyone with you and him? A. No, Sir.

Q. You two were together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long did that interview last? A. I should say ten minutes.

Q. You were passing by? A. No, Sir; I was driving—driving out.

Q. And stopped? A. Stopped; yes, Sir.

Q. Where was Mr. Tilton when you stopped? A. Mr. Tilton came out of his house, and came down to the carriage to speak to me.

Q. After you stopped? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You stopped then and saw him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This was on Sunday? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. This meeting then was purely accidental? A. No, Sir; it was not accidental.

Q. Well, then, you will explain how it happened? A. We were in the habit of driving on pleasant Sundays for my wife's health; and my wife had desired to see Mrs. Tilton, and requested me to stop there. She got out and spoke to her; went in the house; and while she was in, Mr. Tilton came out and spoke to me.

Q. Well, then, was not your meeting with Mr. Tilton accidental? A. Well, yes, it was in that sense; yes, Sir.

Mr. Everts—He has described it.

Mr. Fullerton—He has described it as not accidental, too.

Mr. Everts—Well, he has described it.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, and then characterized it wrong. [To the witness]: How long did you say that interview lasted? A. I should think ten or fifteen minutes.

Q. The Tilton-Bacon letter, then, was the subject of conversation during that interview, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton send for you on that day to come and see him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you so state on your direct examination? A. No Sir, I think not; that was at the subsequent interview of Tuesday.

Q. Well, did Mr. Tilton make any complaints on that day as to the manner in which he had been treated with reference to Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he say he had been badly treated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he say he had been made to appear in a false light?

Mr. Hill—A single moment; which interview are you speaking of?

Mr. Fullerton—On a Sunday, when he was riding out for his wife's health.

The Witness—He said he was badly treated by Mr. Beecher and Plymouth Church; put them together in that way,

Q. Did he say that he was made to appear in a false light? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he say that he had been called a dog and a fool? A. I think he did use that expression.

Q. Did he say that he had been shown up as a knave falsely? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And in what way did he say all this had been done? A. He didn't explain how, I think.

Q. Didn't he say that Mr. Beecher was responsible for it? A. Yes, Sir, I think he did.

Q. Didn't he say that Mr. Beecher could have prevented it if he had tried? A. I don't remember that expression.

Q. Didn't he say that in substance? A. I think he did.

Q. Didn't he say that Mr. Beecher should have controlled his own congregation, his own people, and not permitted them to slander him in that kind of way? A. I believe so; yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that inasmuch as Mr. Beecher didn't protect him as he might have done, that he should protect himself? A. That he should slay Mr. Beecher I think was his expression.

Q. Didn't he say that he would protect himself? A. I do not remember that; very likely he did though.

Q. Didn't he say that he should take care of himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And didn't he say that in doing so he should tell the truth? A. I do not remember that expression.

Q. Didn't he say that in substance? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that he should tell what had occurred—lay the whole thing bare? A. I do not remember that; no, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that, Sir, and then add: "If I do, it will slay Mr. Beecher?" A. Don't remember that.

Q. How? A. I don't remember it; he might have said so.

Q. In what connection did he say that he should slay Mr. Beecher? A. He said if Mr. Beecher didn't do his duty—Plymouth Church didn't stop throwing mud at him, or some such expression, "I will slay him—slay Mr. Beecher."

Q. Now, didn't he add how he was going to do it, by publishing the truth? A. He said if he published the rest of that letter it would be fatal to Mr. Beecher—something of that kind.

Q. The rest of what letter? A. Of the portion of the letter which he copied in the Tilton-Bacon communication.

Q. The letter written through Moulton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. January first, 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. 1871? A. Yes, Sir; that—

Q. Then he was going to slay him, was he, by publishing the whole of Mr. Beecher's letter? A. He said that would have that effect upon him.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; that gives me an appetite, Sir. I propose that we adjourn.

The Court then took a recess until 3 o'clock.

MR. TILTON DEMANDS PEACE OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH.

The Court met at 2 p.m., pursuant to adjournment, and the cross-examination of Mr. Ovington was resumed by Mr. Fullerton.

Q. I will continue to direct your attention to the first interview, Mr. Ovington, between yourself and Mr. Tilton in front of his house. In your direct examination you stated that Mr. Tilton observed to you that Mr. Beecher knew that he was a magnanimous man, instead of being a knave and a dog. In what respect did he say that he was magnanimous? A. I do not remember that he explained that.

Q. Do you recollect anything that he said upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that he hadn't charged Mr. Beecher with the whole truth, or something to that effect? A. I do not remember that.

Q. Well, what did you reply when he made use of that observation? A. I said that he owed it to his wife, and Mr. Beecher, and himself to publish the whole of that letter.

Q. And what did he reply to that? A. He said if he did, Mr. Beecher would have to leave Brooklyn.

Q. Yes, Sir. Had you read the part of the letter which had been published up to that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In the Bacon letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you knew what it was so far as published? A. Yes, Sir.

In your direct examination you state that Mr. Tilton made use of some words implying a threat if Mr. Beecher did not do what was right. What did Mr. Tilton say that Mr. Beecher ought to do that would be right? A. I cannot recall it; I do not know that he explained what he ought to do.

Q. Did he not say in substance that Beecher should protect him from such accusations as Dr. Bacon had made against him, and that Plymouth Church was making against him? A. I do not remember, Sir.

Q. Was there nothing upon that subject said by him? A. I think he simply said that Mr. Beecher and Plymouth Church should do him justice.

Q. He didn't say in what respect? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. He observed that Elizabeth had made a fine impression upon the Committee, I understood you to say? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you state again how long after the Committee met, and Mrs. Tilton was before them, that he made this observation? A. I think it was the second day after Mrs. Tilton made the statement.

Q. Yes. But what did you reply to him when he made the observation? A. I do not remember of replying, but my wife may have said something; I do not recollect.

Q. Well, I ask what you said? A. I said nothing.

Q. Was anything said by Mr. Tilton to this effect, that he was pleased that his wife had vindicated herself? A. I do not remember that.

Q. Well, you say that he spoke of his wife telling untruths? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what respect did he say she had told untruths? A. He simply said that it was a fiction—that it was untrue—that it was a lie.

Q. Well, did you understand in that conversation what Mrs. Tilton had testified to, or had said, before the Committee? A. I understood what she had said before the Committee; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, it was to the effect that Mr. Beecher was innocent, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And it was that that Mr. Tilton characterized as false, was it? A. I presume so; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did not you so understand it? A. Yes, Sir; I think I did.

Q. When was that second interview which you have spoken of; how long after the first? A. About a week, I should think.

Q. And where did that take place? A. That is this interview that you speak of on the piazza.

Q. The second interview that you have spoken of in your direct examination. A. Oh, no, Sir; the second one was at Mr. Tilton's house.

Q. And how long after the first interview. A. Two days.

MR. OVINGTON CALLS ON THE TILTONS FROM CURIOSITY.

Q. And how did it happen that you were at Mr. Tilton's house? A. Oh, I called there to see them—curiosity, perhaps.

Q. Curiosity. Did your wife go with you for curiosity? A. My wife did not go with me.

Q. Did not. What was your curiosity? A. I had a question to ask Mrs. Tilton in regard to a woman—a protégée of hers—that she had placed in a vacant house of mine, and wanted to question her about that somewhat.

Q. You made that as an excuse for going, didn't you? A. Well perhaps, so.

Q. What was your real object? A. I had no real object, further than that I thought I would like to speak with her on that subject; in regard to this woman that was in my house.

Q. Well, was that your real object in going; had you no other object in going? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. None at all? A. Except merely that I wanted to see Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. On a business matter? Well, then, why did you tell me, a moment ago, you went from curiosity? A. Well, that in addition to this business matter.

Q. Well, what was the curiosity in addition to the business matter? A. Just to see Mr. and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. You had seen Mrs. Tilton before, hadn't you? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Never had seen her before? A. Oh, never before; I had just returned from Europe, and hadn't seen her for four or five months at least.

Q. How? A. I had just returned from Europe, and hadn't seen her for some time.

Q. Well, how would seeing her satisfy your curiosity; did you think she had changed since your absence in Europe? A. I thought likely she might have.

Q. And you went to see how much she had changed? A. Yes, perhaps so.

Q. How? A. I went to see her.

Q. Well, was it to see what changes had taken place during your absence? A. I could not tell you; I am not sure.

Q. Mr. Ovington, won't you be kind enough to tell me what you did go there for? A. I cannot tell you more distinctly than I have told you.

Q. Then you went there on business and out of curiosity? A. On business, and out of a desire to see Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And to see Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Wanted to see them both? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When did that desire seize you first; how soon after your return from Europe? A. I had not thought of it until the publication of the letter.

Q. What letter? A. The Tilton-Bacon letter.

Q. Yes; did any one ask you to go? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did any one suggest that you should go? A. No, Sir.

Q. Quite sure? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You went of your own motion? A. Entirely so.

Q. Well, didn't you want to find out something about the Tilton-Bacon letter? A. Oh, I wanted to talk with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Didn't you want to find out something about that letter? A. I wanted to find out how Mrs. Tilton felt in regard to it, perhaps; yes, I had—

Q. How Mrs. Tilton felt in regard to the Bacon letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That's it, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Why didn't you tell me so a moment ago? A. Because that was not the sole object of my going.

Q. But it was a part, wasn't it? A. It was a part; yes, Sir.

Q. That was the curious part, wasn't it? A. Well, perhaps so.

Q. Didn't you interrogate Mrs. Tilton about the Bacon letter? A. No, Sir.

Q. Why? A. She didn't seem to be in a mood to speak at all—very much depressed, evidently.

Q. Her husband was present, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the reason you didn't ask her about it? A. Perhaps so; I don't know.

Q. Well, really, wasn't it so? A. I was talking—he was talking with me.

Q. How? A. He was talking with me in regard to these matters.

Q. Yes, I am aware of that; is that the reason you didn't talk to her? A. Oh, I presume if she had been alone I might have talked with her about it.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, haven't you told us already that you went there on that occasion at the request of Mr. Tilton? A. I may have said that; I have a recollection that my wife told me that Mr. Tilton wanted to see me; but whether it was previous to that, I cannot recall; some message that she brought.

Q. No; but didn't you tell us, on your direct examination, that you went to see Mr. Tilton on the occasion to which I am now calling your attention, because Mr. Tilton sent for you? A. I think I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, is that true; that you went because he sent for you? A. I cannot remember—cannot recall, now.

Q. If you cannot remember it, why did you say so? A. Well, that was the impression on my mind at the time.

Q. Well, is it your impression now? A. I don't remember when this message came from my wife—

Q. Is it your impression now? A. Well, I cannot answer the question in that way.

Q. You don't know now whether it is even your impression or not? A. Yes, Sir; it is my impression.

Q. Well, if it is your impression then you are able to state that that was because of that invitation? A. Partly because of that, if that invitation was given; but I cannot recollect whether it was or not.

Q. Well, then you don't know anything about it, do you? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, tell us. Did you go to see Mr. Tilton on that day because Mr. Tilton sent for you, or because you went out of curiosity, or because you went on business, or was it all three mixed together? A. Well, probably it was all three mixed together.

Q. When Mr. Tilton sent for you then you thought you would go out of curiosity and on business, how is that? A. Well, I don't understand the question.

Q. Well, I don't think I should understand your answer if you gave it, so I will pass it by. A. Well, then, you had better not ask me.

Q. Are you quite sure that you went there at all, Mr. Ovington? A. Yes, I am.

Q. Are you quite sure that you held a conversation with him on that occasion? A. That I held a conversation with him?

Q. With Mr. Tilton or Mrs. Tilton? A. I am.

Q. Now, will you tell us what that conversation was? A. I first asked Mr. Tilton in regard to this woman that was in my house. He said he was ignorant of it, but would speak with Elizabeth, as he said. So he called Mrs. Tilton. Mrs. Tilton came down, and I asked her a few questions in regard to that, and then I made some remark to Mr. Tilton about regretting that he was in this trouble, and the other conversation was—

Mr. Hill—Speak louder, please.

The Witness—He then went on to say that Mr. Beecher—it was Mr. Beecher's own doing, and he was willing to stop right there if Plymouth Church and Mr. Beecher would desist from any further movements in the matter. That was the substance of it; I can't recall the words.

Q. Yes; he wanted to quit then if they would; is that it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He didn't want to stay then unless they went on? A. Well, if they did go on he would stay; that is the idea.

Q. Well, if they went on then he would stay? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was a conditional promise, then; he didn't promise to do anything unless Plymouth Church did something first; wasn't that it? A. Well, that is, I think, in—something like that.

MRS. TILTON'S DESERTION OF HER HUSBAND ANTICIPATED BY THE OVINGTONS.

Q. Very well. Now, Mr. Ovington, let us go back a little to a topic already presented to you. Do you remember whether you took Mrs. Tilton out riding the day before she came to your house to stay permanently? A. I did not.

Q. Didn't you within three days after Mrs. Tilton went before the Committee take Mrs. Tilton out riding? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect what occurred on the 9th of July? A. I cannot recollect.

Q. Don't you know that your wife took Mrs. Tilton out riding on the 9th of July, and on the 10th of July also? A. I don't remember the date. What day of the week was it?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know.

The Witness—Well, I don't know. So we are both ignorant on that point.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; it is not my business to know when your wife went riding. Do you recollect the day before Mrs. Tilton came to your house to stay permanently that your wife took her to Coney Island, or somewhere near that place, riding? A. I think she did. She took her out riding. I don't know where she went to.

Q. Don't you know that she was gone the most of the day? A. That I don't remember.

Q. You were not along, were you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know where they went? A. I don't.

Q. Do you know whom they saw while they were absent? A. No, Sir; I don't.

Q. And do you now say that you didn't know Mrs. Tilton was coming to your house, or have any intimation to that effect before she arrived there on the morning after that ride? A. I didn't know that she was coming to the house to stay.

Q. Did you know she was coming to the house? A. I don't remember whether I knew it or not.

Q. Did you have an intimation that she was coming to the house? A. No, Sir; I know that I was surprised when she came there.

Q. Why did you say a moment ago that you didn't know that she was coming to stay? A. My wife had invited her to come at any time; to come in at any time and to come and stay at any time.

Q. How long? A. To stay how long?

Q. Yes, permanently? A. If it was necessary, yes.

Q. If it was necessary? A. If she wished to.

Q. Yes; did you hear your wife give her that invitation? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Did you join in any such invitation to Mrs. Tilton to come and stay permanently, if it was necessary? A. I may have done so; I agreed with my—

Q. Well, don't you recollect that something of that kind was said by you or your wife in your presence? A. No, I don't think that I said so to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Well, as near as you can recollect, what was it that you said on that subject? A. I don't think I said anything to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. What was it that your wife said to Mrs. Tilton in your presence? A. In my presence?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't know of any conversation.

Q. All you know about Mrs. Tilton's being invited to your house was learned from your wife? A. Yes Sir.

Q. Well, how long did you hear anything upon that subject before Mrs. Tilton did actually come? A. Oh, I think a day or two, perhaps.

Q. Any one present when that information was given to you? A. I believe not, Sir.

Q. Well, you rather suspected that Mrs. Tilton would come to your house to stay before she did actually come, did you not? A. Well, I thought it possible that she might; yes, Sir.

Q. And stay permanently? A. I thought it possible; yes, Sir.

Q. And when did you first make up your mind that that was possible? A. When she told us the morning that she did come.

Q. When she told you the morning that she did come that it was possible she might come to stay permanently? A. That she had come to stay.

Q. Well, that was not a possibility, it was a reality, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir; you are right.

Q. I ask how long before she did come had you thought it was possible that she might come; how long before? A. Oh, two or three days before.

Q. Two or three days before? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what enabled you to come to that conclusion, or to think that that might be possible? A. From what my wife told me.

Q. Yes; any one else tell you anything? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had Mrs. Tilton been to your house frequently just before going before the Committee? A. I think once or twice; I cannot recall now.

Q. Do you recollect whom she came there with? A. With my wife.

Q. She came to your house with your wife? A. Yes, Sir; I think she did not come alone.

Q. Do you know where your wife found her to bring her to your house? A. My wife called upon her to take her and drive.

Mr. Shearman—We object to asking this gentleman what his wife told him.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that objection is ready whenever I put such a question. I haven't asked any such thing as that.

Mr. Everts—The point would be gained by instructions to the witness that he is to speak of what he saw and knows himself, not of other matters.

Judge Neilson—Yes, unless you wish to prove notice of something; that you can do.

[Last question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

A. I don't know, no, Sir. I suppose at her own house.

By Mr. Fullerton—I don't want you to suppose, but do you know of your own knowledge? A. No, Sir, I don't.

Q. How many times had you and your wife, or either of you to your own knowledge, been at Mr. Tilton's prior to the publication of the Bacon letter, within one year prior to that time? A. I think but once myself, but once.

Q. When was that? A. That was the Tuesday, excepting the call in front of the house in the carriage.

Q. That was after the publishing of the Bacon letter, wasn't it? A. Oh, prior to the publication.

Q. Prior—for a year prior? A. Oh, I think I had not been there at all; I was in Europe.

Q. It was an unusual thing then for you to go to Mr. Tilton's house? A. No, Sir; I think I called on New Year's Day prior.

Q. Yes; well, with that exception, it was an unusual thing for you to go to his house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, was your wife in the habit of going there, that you know of? A. Not during that year, I think.

Q. What? A. Not during that year. My wife was an invalid, confined to the house a good deal.

Q. Now, I will ask you this question—whether some person or other, other than your wife, did not speak to you upon the subject of Mrs. Tilton's coming to your house before she did come there to stay permanently? A. No, Sir; no one.

Q. Not a word passed between you and any one upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, are you sure you called there on the New Year's prior to that call? A. No, Sir; I am not sure that it was the New Year's prior; I called upon a New Year's Day.

Q. What year? A. That I cannot say.

Q. Well, was it three or four years before that? A. No, Sir, I should think not.

Q. You recollect the arrival of Mrs. Tilton at your house on the morning that she left home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect that Mr. Tilton followed soon after? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect that he then and there read to you the appointment of the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect that he purchased a newspaper on his way to your house and read to you the appointment of the Plymouth Church Committee to investigate that scandal and said: "Now there will be war."

Mr. Everts—How could he recollect that Mr. Tilton bought a newspaper on the way to him?

Mr. Morris—Well, that he had it there.

The Witness—I don't recollect that, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Don't you recollect that he had a newspaper that he bought on his way, or said that he did? A. No, Sir.

Q. Don't you recollect of learning that the Committee was appointed that morning, and that Mr. Tilton stated it to you, or read it to you from a paper? A. No, Sir.

Q. No recollection upon that subject? A. No, Sir.

Q. Will you swear positively that Mr. Tilton did not read to you the appointment of that Committee from a paper that morning? A. The morning that Mrs. Tilton came to our house?

Q. The morning that he came there after Mrs. Tilton came? A. Yes, Sir, I can swear positively to that, I think.

Q. That he did not do so? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how soon after Mrs. Tilton arrived at your house did you read of the appointment of that Committee? A. I don't remember reading of it at all.

Q. How soon was it made public after her arrival there? A. I think it was prior to that.

Q. That it was made public—why you have told us that you didn't know anything about it until toward night, and the night she went before the Committee?

Mr. Shearman—That was the Monday before.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind.

The Witness—That was not—I learned of the appointment of a Committee for the first time at the first interview of Mr. Tracy; I think I learned it from my wife at the time of the first interview with Mr. Tracy, if I remember right.

Q. And that was the day the Committee met at your house, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mrs. Tilton went before the Committee that night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And a few days after she came to your house to stay permanently, did she not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you when it was that this appointment of the Committee was published in the newspapers with reference to the day of her coming to your house? A. That I don't remember.

Q. It had not been published when Mr. Tracy told you of it, had it? A. That I don't remember either. I presume not; no, Sir. I had not seen the publication of it.

Q. And it was published soon afterwards, was it not, and became a notorious thing? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How soon after? A. That I don't know.

Q. Two or three days? A. I don't know, Sir.

Q. How? A. I could not state.

MRS. TILTON'S WHEREABOUTS KEPT FROM HER FAMILY.

Q. [Handing letter to witness.]—State if that is the letter you wrote to Florence? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, after looking at that, can you state whether Mrs. Tilton's whereabouts was designedly kept from Florence? A. Whether her whereabouts was designedly kept from Florence?

Q. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—[To the Witness.] You had better read it through.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] Your answer is "yes, Sir"? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you state, do you not, that it is by the advice of her friends that her whereabouts is to be kept secret? A. Yes, Sir; I have stated so there.

Q. Will you state who the friends were who gave that advice? A. I was not advised by any friends; it was my own decision in the matter.

Q. Didn't you advise that Mr. Tilton should not see her? A. Mrs. Tilton had so requested me.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, Sir; if you please, I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That being out, now put your answer in its place.

Judge Neilson—Repeat the question.

Q. Didn't you advise that Mr. Tilton should not see Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you not say to some person that you were afraid if Mr. Tilton saw his wife that she would go back home again? A. I may have made that remark.

Q. Don't you remember having made it? A. I think very likely.

Q. Don't you remember it, that you did make it, in substance?

A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you didn't want her to go back, did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. No? A. Not by any means.

NO PREARRANGEMENT OF QUESTIONS FOR MRS. TILTON.

Q. Now, Sir, were you not aware when Mr. Tracy went before that Committee with Mrs. Tilton what questions he was going to put to her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had you not been told? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Of any questions.

Mr. Fullerton—Of any questions that were to be put to her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was she not told in your presence? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you hear nothing upon that subject? A. Not a word.

Q. How is that? A. Not a word.

Q. Well, I understand you to say that it was your advice only, and not the advice of any of Mrs. Tilton's friends, that her whereabouts should be kept secret? A. I think so, yes, Sir; I don't remember any others.

Q. Why didn't you say so in this letter? A. I don't remember of any one advising me; they may have done so.

Q. Why did you write so in the letter if it were not true?

Mr. Hill—Objected to as assuming that it is written.

Mr. Fullerton—It ought to be objected to before it is written.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer.

Q. Why did you so write if it were not true in point of fact that her friends advised that her whereabouts should be kept secret?

Mr. Evans—It must appear that he did so write.

Mr. Morris—He says he did.

Mr. Fullerton—Read and see if it don't so appear.

Mr. Evans—We have not heard of it. If you are going to use it (the letter) you must show it to us.

Mr. Fullerton—He (the witness) is using it now. He will inform himself on the subject.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; I have so written here.

Q. Why did you so write it if it were not true? A. I suppose my wife may have advised me in regard to it. I cannot recall being advised by any one else.

Q. Well, can you recall that, that your wife advised it? A. Yes, Sir; my wife rather recommended it.

Q. Is that what you meant in your letter when you said "her friends"? Did you mean you and your wife? A. I don't remember what my meaning was.

Q. Was it true, as therein expressed, that her Brooklyn friends had advised her whereabouts be kept secret? A. No, Sir; I don't think that was true.

Q. It was not true. Then it was false, was it? A. Except that my wife—

Q. Was it false? A. No, Sir; it was not false either.

Q. But it was not true? A. Well, my wife is my friend.

Q. Eh? A. My wife is a pretty good friend of mine.

Q. Then you did mean by that that it was you and your wife had so advised? A. Perhaps so.

Q. No perhaps about it. What did you mean?

Mr. Beach—He meant by the term "Brooklyn friends" his wife.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you mean so? A. I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember what you meant? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Everts—We are entitled, if your Honor please, to know what was written.

Mr. Beach—Oh! certainly. There is no objection to that.

Mr. Fullerton—Not the slightest objection.

Q. Do you know Teresa Burke? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever hear of her before? A. I have heard her name mentioned.

Q. Do you know where she is? A. I do not know, Sir.

Q. Any knowledge on that subject? A. I have heard of her as being—

Mr. Hill—Is it material where she is, or whether he has any knowledge on that subject?

Mr. Fullerton—It is quite material. [To the witness.] Finish your answer. A. I cannot recall now.

Q. Has it escaped from you since the objection was made? A. Living at some light-house, or something like that; I don't remember where.

Q. Where was the light-house? A. That I don't recall.

Q. Don't you know that she was staying part of the time within the last three months at the Pierrepont House? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see her there? A. No, Sir.

Q. At any time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Never heard she was there at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. At any time? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have no knowledge, then, as to where she is now, excepting what you told me? A. That is all.

Q. Do you know whether she goes by the name of Teresa Burke now? A. That I don't know.

Q. Do you know whether she goes by the name of Teresa Hedges? A. I don't know.

Mr. Beach—By what name did you hear her spoken of? A. Teresa Burke. I heard the name mentioned only.

Mr. Fullerton—Is your family going to Europe with you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You are going alone? A. Yes, Sir.

BY WHOM MRS. TILTON IS SUPPORTED.

Q. Is Mrs. Tilton going to remain with Mrs. Ovington during your absence? A. That is the understanding; we presume so. I don't know anything to the contrary.

Q. You have not made any other or different arrangement in regard to her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Has any provision been made for her support? A. No, Sir, not that I know of.

Q. Have you held any conversation with any person upon that subject? A. Oh! there has been various talks, yes, Sir.

Q. And with whom were those talks? A. With some of the members of the church.

Q. That is too indefinite for me? A. Mr. Halliday.

Q. What did Mr. Halliday say upon that subject?

Mr. Hill—We object.

Mr. Everts—The question is, if your Honor please, what Mr. Halliday said. That is not good evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, it was good evidence until it was objected to. I didn't know that anything that Brother Halliday said would be objected to.

Mr. Everts—That is for your cross-examination, and not for our examination.

Mr. Beach—You ought to have begun a little earlier.

Mr. Everts—Perhaps so. We are very indifferent about the whole matter.

Mr. Beach—You seem to be.

Mr. Fullerton—I have no doubt.

Q. Has any arrangement been made with you about Mrs. Tilton's support? A. No, Sir; and none with Mr. Halliday in regard to her future support.

Mr. Everts—I object.

The Witness—He simply said he would assist.

Mr. Everts—Wait.

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] They object.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the witness.] You must not state anything they object to. Be careful about that. [To defendant's counsel.] I stopped him as quick as I could.

Q. You don't mean to support her, then, without some assistance? A. Oh! no, Sir.

Q. And from whom do you expect that assistance? A. I have no idea.

Q. Have you not any idea from whom you expect it? A. Some of my friends in the Church, probably.

Q. What church? A. Plymouth Church.

Q. Yes; and is that expectation founded upon anything that has been said to you?

Mr. Hill—I object to that.

Mr. Beach—We don't ask for it.

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Q. And was anything to that effect said to you before Mrs. Tilton went to your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. How soon after she came there was it said? A. Three or four months, I should think.

Q. Have you received anything towards her support? A. No, Sir.

Q. Are you sure? A. Not for her support; no, Sir.

Q. For the support of the children? A. Fitting out the children for school.

Q. And from whom did you receive it? A. Mr. Storrs handed me some money.

Q. What Mr. Storrs—Charles? A. Mr. Augustus Storrs.

Q. From any one else? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you receive it in money? A. In a check.

Q. What kind of a check? A. I received one check of—two checks of $400.

Q. Each, or together? A. $300 each.

Q. Did you receive more than two checks? A. And another check of $475.

Q. That is $875? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what other check did you receive? A. That is all.

Q. Any in money? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you received anything beyond the three checks—$875? A. That is all.

Q. Now, were they payable to your order? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what did you do with the checks? A. Deposited them.

Q. To your own credit? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how did you disburse the money? A. In payment of the bills for the fitting out of the children.

Q. Bills for fitting out the children. Anything else? A. Some went towards some private matters of Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. Exactly; and what were the private matters of Mrs. Tilton? A. I do not know.

Q. Didn't you hear? A. No, Sir.

Q. To whom did you give the money? A. To Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And how much of the $875 did you give to Mrs. Tilton? A. I should think one or two hundred dollars.

Q. Any balance on hand? A. I have not kept an account of it in that way. I think there is a little balance on hand.

Q. Now, to whom did you pay the money other than Mrs. Tilton? A. I do not remember to any one except to these store-keepers.

Q. Why not mention them? A. Balch & Price.

Q. Now, name the amount. A. Somewhere about $35 or $30; I cannot remember.

Q. How much? A. $35 or $30, I think.

Q. I want you to name every person to whom you paid a dollar of that money other than Mrs. Tilton. A. Rawson, the photographer.

Q. Well? A. I cannot recall those names.

Q. Have you not got any account of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. May you not produce it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you produce it to-morrow morning? A. I will.

Q. Very well. Then will you be able to tell us what money you have got on hand? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, you did not pay any school bills, did you? A. No, Sir.

THE CHILDREN'S SCHOOL BILLS PAID BY MR. TILTON.

Q. Mr. Tilton paid the school bills, did he not? A. I should say so.

Q. Where was the school? A. At Washington, Connecticut.

Q. All that you have paid out, then, is to Mrs. Tilton, and for the fitting out of the children, in the way of clothes, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir; I think so. Some little moneys have been sent to the children—small amounts have been sent to the children.

Q. Through you? A. Mrs. Tilton has sent them.

A. Mrs. Tilton has sent them? A. Yes Sir.

Q. How much of that money did you place at Mrs. Tilton's disposal at any one time? A. I only served her money as she asked for it.

Q. And did you keep an account of what you handed to her? A. No, Sir.

Q. Would you be able to tell to-morrow how much you had given to her personally? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. Now, have you received money from no other source excepting Mr. Augustus Storrs? A. That is all.

Q. Have you had the promise of any from any other source? A. No, Sir, not a penny.

Q. Have you not asked for money from other persons? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or suggested to some other person or persons, that he or they should give you money on that account? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you not complained that you were left to take charge of this family with no contribution towards it except what Augustus Storrs gave you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Will you permit the clerk to make an announcement, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—Certainly, Sir.

The Clerk (Mr. Mallison)—Is Dr. Kretz in the room? [No response.]

Mr. Fullerton—This Augustus Storrs that you speak of was one of the Plymouth Church Committee of Investigation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, one word with regard to Mrs. Tilton's habit of going out whilst at your house. Did she go out to your knowledge, at times alone?

Mr. Beach—In the city.

Mr. Fullerton—In the City of Brooklyn. A. I think she came around to the store alone; generally with one of the children, or one of the servants, perhaps.

Q. But she has come to your store alone? A. She may have done so, but I cannot recollect.

Q. But you just told me she did do so? A. I think she may have done so; I do not recollect that she did.

Q. What do you say about it now. Did she or not come to your store alone? A. I do not recall any instance.

Q. Did you ever see her in the street alone ever since she came to your house? A. I never saw her in the street alone; no, Sir.

Q. Were you ever home at any time when she left your house alone? A. No, Sir; not that I remember of.

Q. Did you ever take her out riding? A. No, Sir; never.

Q. Not since she has been at your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever call for her at any place and bring her to your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever leave the city with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. And go to any place? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all, Mr. Hill.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. OVINGTON.

Mr. Hill—Do you know, Mr. Ovington, whether the children were sent to the school at Washington with Mr. Tilton's approval? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how was that? Was it with his approval? A. With his approval; yes, Sir.

Q. Can you recollect what day of the week it was when Mrs. Tilton went before the Committee? A. I am exceedingly bad on days and dates; I cannot remember.

Q. I simply desire to have you to fix either the day of the month or the day of the week, if you can? A. The 6th, I think.

Q. The 6th. Now, can you fix the day of the week? A. I cannot; no, Sir.

Q. Was it Monday? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Can you now fix the day when Mrs. Tilton came to your house early in the morning, when she came, as you say, to stay permanently—the day of the week or the day of the month? A. It strikes me it was the 11th.

Q. Saturday? A. Saturday morning.

Q. Saturday morning, the 11th. Now, from that, can you determine the day of the week upon which she came?

Mr. Beach—We can very easily do that.

Mr. Evans—We can all fix that.

Mr. Beach—There is no trouble about that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, may be he could not.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, do you know yourself anything about the invitation to Mrs. Tilton to come to your house to stay permanently or otherwise? A. No, Sir.

Q. From anything that occurred in your presence? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were asked, Mr. Ovington, why it was that you thought it possible that she might come to stay permanently at your house. Why was that, if any other reason remains to be given? A. My wife had told me that she had extended the invitation to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Any reason for extending the invitation? If so, give it.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take it.

Mr. Hill—Well, I don't care particularly at present.

Q. You were asked when you had called to Mrs. Tilton's, prior to the time that you called there, immediately after the publication of the Bacon letter, and I think you stated you had been to Europe. Now, when did you return from Europe, with reference to the publication of the Bacon letter? A. The 2d of June.

Q. How long had you been absent? A. About four months. Left in January, or early in February.

Q. Mr. Ovington, you have been asked with reference to Mrs. Tilton going away during the Summer. Can you recollect when she went away—I mean when she went out of the city to stay any length of time? A. No, Sir, except I imagine it was the latter part of July, or the 1st of August—in August probably.

Q. In August. Now, can you state whether or not there were a great many applications by people to your house for interviews with Mrs. Tilton, or with members of the family, about that time? A. Yes, Sir, there were.

Q. Now, state the reason why Mrs. Tilton went away from the city?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

The Witness—She said she wanted to be quiet.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment. That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take the reason.

Mr. Hill—Very well.

Mr. Evans—The idea seems to have been, if there was any force in the cross-examination, that this lady had been sent away in a private way, and with the purpose of concealment from her husband, or from her daughter or somebody. The point is, that she had gone away to avoid the persecution of publicity that the newspapers had brought on her.

Judge Neilson—The last question indicates that somebody did call. There were a great many calls.

Q. Do you know whether Florence came to see her mother after her return? A. Oh! yes, Sir.

Q. And did Mr. Tilton see her also? A. Did Mr. Tilton see his wife?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. No, Sir.

Q. I mean after her return from the country, or don't you remember about that? A. I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember how that was? A. I think not.

Q. Now, was there ever any effort to prevent Florence from seeing her mother at your house, so far as you know? A. No, Sir.

Q. None at all? Now, Sir, do you know from Mr. Tilton, or otherwise, whether Miss Florence visited her mother at Washington?

Mr. Fullerton—If he knows of his own knowledge, he can state it.

Mr. Hill—I am following your illustrious example.

Mr. Beach—We object to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Mine was a cross-examination.

Q. Do you know from Mr. Tilton or otherwise whether Miss Florence visited her mother at Washington?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it; I object to the words "or otherwise" as a phrase.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Hill.] Amend your question.

Q. Do you know it from Mr. Tilton—did you ever converse with him about it? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That settles it. [To the Witness.] Mr. Ovington, do you know whether or not Miss Florence went with her mother to Fairfield? A. She did not go with her.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Florence about her mother being at Fairfield?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Shearman—That is proper, because all this talk has been about that.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, the objection is, that it is unreasonable. That is the only thing your Honor has to consider.

Judge Neilson—I think he may answer that question.

Mr. Hill—What is it?

Judge Neilson—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer]: Read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows: "Did you have any conversation with Florence about her mother being at Fairfield?"

Mr. Fullerton—I think your Honor didn't mean to admit that question.

Judge Neilson—No; if he gave her notice she was in Fairfield that might qualify it.

Q. Fairfield or Washington I will make it?

Judge Neilson—If it was after writing a letter it is pertinent, I think, to show he changed his mind.

Mr. Evans [To the witness]—If you know, Mr. Ovington, please tell us, and if you don't know please say so, or go on.

Mr. Fullerton—That is good advice, undoubtedly.

The Witness—What is the question?

Mr. Shearman—The question is, did you speak to Miss Florence about her mother being at Fairfield or Washington after this? A. Yes, Sir; I gave Miss Florence her direction in Fairfield, and she started off to join her mother. I gave her the direction where she was, and how to reach her.

Mr. Hill—Now, do you know whether Miss Florence went with her mother to Washington? A. Yes, Sir; she did.

Mr. Hill—She did.

Judge Neilson—Well, is that all?

Mr. Hill—That is all.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. OVINGTON.

Mr. Fullerton—You say there was no effort made to prevent Miss Florence visiting her mother at any time? A. At my house the question was?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. No, Sir, none at all.

Q. Has there been no such effort? A. No, Sir.

Q. Has she not been denied your house within the last six weeks? A. No, Sir.

Q. Has she not been forbidden to come to your house within the last six or eight weeks? A. That I forbade her, or my wife?

Q. I don't ask that. A. I understand that Mrs. Tilton has advised her not to come.

Q. Advised her not to come? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she has not come since that advice was given, has she? A. No, Sir.

Q. When did you give the direction of her mother to Florence? A. While she was at Fairfield.

Q. Don't you know that you gave her the wrong direction? A. I did, but not knowingly. Meantime she had left there and gone to another place.

Q. You gave her a direction which was not a correct one, was it? A. It was the correct one if she had not meantime left there.

Q. If Mrs. Tilton was there it was correct, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And if she was not there it was not correct? A. It was correct, but she had left without my knowledge.

Q. And Florence didn't see her? A. Not at that time; no, Sir.

Q. Who kept you informed as to where Mrs. Tilton was? A. My wife wrote me after she had left that place.

Q. So that Miss Florence took that journey for nothing, did she? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] When was that letter written?

Mr. Fullerton—[Handing letter to witness.] This letter that I have shown you I now hand you again, and ask you when it was written? A. I could not give you the date of it.

Q. Can you give me the month when it was written? A. No, Sir; I presume it was in August, but I could not say positively.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton at Fairfield when that letter was written? A. I think she was; I am not positive.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. RUFUS E. HOLMES,

Rufus E. Holmes sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Holmes, where do you reside? A. Winsted, Connecticut.

Q. What is your business? A. Banker; I am Vice-President of the Hurlbut National Bank.

Q. How long have you resided at Winsted? A. Twenty-four or five years.

Q. How long have you been a banker and a vice-president of a bank? A. I have been connected with the bank—with one or the other of the banks there for twenty years or over.

Q. Were you connected with the Young Men's Christian Association of Winsted during the lecture season of 1869 and '70? A. I was; yes, Sir.

Q. What relation did you sustain to it? A. I was President of it, Sir.

THE WINSTED SCANDAL DETAILED.

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I do, Sir, by sight.

Q. Do you recollect his lecturing there in 1869, in the month of December? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Who met him when he came there? A. Do you mean at the depot?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I did.

Q. Did you escort him to a hotel? A. I did; I went there with a carriage and rode with him to the hotel.

Q. Do you recollect whether or not a lady came with him? A. There did, Sir.

Q. About how old a person, and how large; was she a grown person? A. She was a grown person, Sir; I should judge twenty-seven or eight years old. [Laughter.]

Q. What did you do in entertaining Mr. Tilton while he was there?

Judge Neilson—Will the audience keep quiet?

A. Well, Sir, I had made arrangements at the Beardslee House.

Mr. Beach—I object to what arrangements he had made.

Q. Did you take him to the Beardslee House? A. I did.

Q. Did you see him register? A. No, Sir.

Q. Where were you when he registered? A. I was in the hotel, or at the front door of it.

Q. Well, you was in his company? A. I was in his company; I was at the hotel.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think, Sir, we ought to go into these side issues. This case is going to be long enough without that. This is irrelevant matter which they have inquired about, and they cannot contradict.

Mr. Evans—Let them hear what we are going to prove. There will be time to raise the question, no doubt.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I beg leave to take my own time to do that, because this is just the time. I say it is immaterial.

Judge Neilson—If this relates to anything imputing bad conduct to the plaintiff I should not regard it as collateral to allow the evidence. Anything that has been inquired about as if with a view to contradict would be collateral simply, but I suppose anything affecting the plaintiff in his conduct and moral condition, cannot be deemed as collateral; but it simply goes to the question of damages, nothing else.

Mr. Fullerton—Very well, Sir.

Q. Did you call upon Mr. Tilton that afternoon? A. I did, Sir.

Q. By an arrangement with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please just state what you did when you called upon him; give the transaction just as it occurred? A. Well, Sir; I went to the door of his room and knocked upon it, and there was no reply, and I knocked again and there was no reply; I don't know whether I knocked a third time, I think not, but turned to go away, and after a step or two I heard something inside as if some one was moving, and I stopped, and the door opened a short distance, and a lady appeared there.

Q. Had you seen her before? A. I had; it was the same lady that came with Mr. Tilton.

Q. Proceed. A. I said to her, "Mr. Tilton said he would like to see the church where he was going to speak, and I called for that purpose." She said, "He has lain down to rest." I said, "I will come again." Mr. Tilton spoke from the inside, and said, "Hold on, Mr. Holmes, and I will go with you now." Upon that the lady opened the door wide.

Q. Well, did you go into the room? A. I did not, Sir; I stood at the door.

Q. Could you see into the room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, what was Mr. Tilton's condition as to dress? A. Well, Sir, Mr. Tilton lay on the bed; the clothes were turned down over the foot of the bed, all but the undersheet. He lay upon the back side of the bed.

Q. How was he dressed? A. He had nothing on that was visible but his shirt, pants and stockings.

Q. What was the appearance of the lady as to her dress? A. Her hair had the appearance of being dishevelled, and her dress somewhat so, so much so that I noticed it.

Q. Now, Sir, was there anything said, any explanation made while you were inside of the room—while you were at the door rather? A. About what do you mean?

Q. As to their resting? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. Well, give it. A. Mr. Tilton said that the lady had been reading him to sleep.

Q. Did he state what they had been reading? A. I think "Paradise Lost." [Laughter.]

Q. Well, what happened next? A. Mr. Tilton got up and proceeded to dress himself, and then accompanied me down to the church, which was across—almost across the road from the hotel, and we went into the church and spent a few moments there, and then went out, and I think from there we went to the furniture store of one S. B. Forbes, whom I introduced to Mr. Tilton.

Q. Well, you showed him about the village? A. I don't think further than that. I left him at Mr. Forbes, I think.

Q. Now, I want to ask you, Mr. Holmes, if there was anything of the appearance of a little girl or school girl about this lady that was there? A. Not at all, Sir.

Q. A full grown person? A. A full grown person.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. RUFUS E. HOLMES.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you the President of the Christian Association at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long had you filled that position? A. I don't know exactly; I should think for two years perhaps; a year or two.

Q. And after that how long did you fill that position? A. As long as it was in existence, Sir.

Q. Did it go out of existence? A. So far as having any organization, any continued organisation, by the election of officers every year, it is out of existence; it still maintains a reading room, or one is maintained by those who were members of it.

Q. But not as a body or association? A. It has no regular meeting, Sir, annual or otherwise.

Q. It has no President now? A. No, Sir.

Q. How long did it continue its existence after this affair that you have spoken of? A. I could not tell you positively, but I should think another year.

A. Yes. Well, you went to the room door? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And I understand you knocked? A. I did.

Q. You didn't try the door? A. No, Sir.

Q. You knocked twice, I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And heard no noise? A. I heard no noise until after.

Q. I understand that; how far had you gone from the door before you did hear a noise inside? A. Possibly a step or two; I had just turned away from it.

Q. A step or two? A. Possibly a step.

Q. And what was the nature of the noise that you heard first—a human voice? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, a chair move? A. A rustling, moving.

Q. Moving? A. I could not say that it was a chair, or what.

Q. You don't know what it was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, if it had not been for that noise you would have gone your way? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And been none the wiser? A. Yes, Sir; I presume so.

Q. How? A. I presume so.

Q. And after you heard the noise what did you do? A. I stopped, waited.

Q. And what occurred then? A. The door opened.

Q. Voluntarily? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You did not knock again? A. No, Sir.

Q. And this lady showed herself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At the door? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In full view? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, so that you could see her? A. So that I could see that it was a lady.

Q. And what did she say, or what did you say? A. I said to her that Mr. Tilton had requested him to accompany me to the church, or had said that he wanted to see the church where he was going to lecture that night.

Q. He expected you, then, did he? A. Yes, Sir; he did.

Q. Made an appointment with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To call? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was the hour named that you were to call? A. I said to him when the appointment was made, "I will come in the course of an hour or two."

Q. Did you go in the course of an hour or two? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. At the time appointed? A. Yes, Sir; about that.

Q. When you said this to the lady, did she make any reply? A. Not that I remember.

Q. What season of the year was this? A. Oh! she said that he had lain down to rest; she said that.

Q. You would not have known that unless she had told you, would you? A. No, Sir.

Q. What season of the year was this? A. It was in the Winter, Sir.

Q. What month? A. I think in December.

Q. And then when she said that what next occurred? A. I said "I will come again," and then Mr. Tilton spoke from the inside and said: "Wait a little, Mr. Holmes," or, "Wait a moment, and I will go with you now."

Q. He then prevented you from going away? A. He did.

Q. You would have gone only for that? A. I suppose so.

Q. What did he say about your coming in—anything? A. I don't remember that he said anything; I don't think I went in.

Q. He simply said, "Wait?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was the bed with reference to the door? A. Well, Sir, it was back of it.

Q. Back of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You could not see the bed when she spoke to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor when he spoke to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. You could not see it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you did see it, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And the lady threw the door open so that you could see it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you would not have seen Tilton where he was except that she did throw the door open? A. I should not.

Q. All this then was exposed to your view by Tilton and by the lady? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When she threw the door open so that you could see the bed and see Mr. Tilton, what was said? A. I don't remember anything being said.

Q. Did you say anything? A. Well, he said that he would—please ask the question again, Sir.

Q. After the door was thrown open, and the bed and Tilton were exposed to your view, what was said by any one? A. I don't remember anything being said until he spoke of her reading him to sleep.

Q. And where were you standing then? A. At the door, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir; the clothes were turned over the foot of the bed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was he not in the act of getting up then? A. No, Sir.

Q. He was not in the act of getting up? A. No, Sir.

Q. Lying still? A. Lying still.

Q. Uncovered? A. Uncovered.

Q. There was no effort at concealment, was there? A. No, Sir; not after the door was opened.

Q. Well, was there any effort at concealment before the door was opened? A. Well, that is a matter of impression, Sir. The door was opened very narrowly indeed.

Q. Narrow enough for you to see the lady? A. Well, that was very narrow, Sir.

Q. Did you want to see anything else? [Laughter.] A. I didn't want to see her.

Q. Then what you did see was exposed to your view by her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did you think she was concealing? A. I don't know; I didn't know then.

Q. Do you know now? A. I don't know that she was concealing anything, positively.

Q. Very well; nor I neither. Now Mr. Holmes, Mr. Tilton dressed himself and went with you, did he? A. He did.

Q. She said something about reading to him, or he said something about reading? A. He said something about it.

Q. What did he say? A. As near as I remember, that she had been reading him to sleep.

By Mr. Beach—What position was he in? A. When he said that?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

A. I could not tell whether he was in the act of getting up, and was putting on his gaiters.

Q. You don't recollect which? A. No, Sir; I think it was after he had got up.

Q. And what did he say she had been reading him to sleep with? A. I think "Paradise Lost."

Q. Don't you think that would put a man to sleep about as quick as anything? [Laughter.] A. Well, it is some time since I have read it, Sir.

Q. How long did it take him to dress before he went with the President of the Christian Association down to the Church? A. I should think five or ten minutes. He was pretty slow about it.

Q. Didn't hurry? A. No, Sir.

Q. He was not in a hurry to get out? A. Not particularly; no, Sir.

Q. Didn't you go in the room? A. I don't think I did; no, I have no recollection of it.

Q. Are you sure you did not go in the room? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Stood at the door? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where was the lady all this time? A. I think she was sitting in the room.

Q. Full view? A. I don't remember whether sitting or standing, positively. She was in the room. I have no doubt she was in full view.

Q. You did not take any particular notice of her while she was standing there? A. I don't think I did after—I don't think that I did the latter part of the time.

Q. Well, then you did not? A. I don't think that I did the latter part of the time.

Q. You took particular notice of her when you say there was nothing else to be seen when she opened the door, I suppose? A. Well, right after that.

Q. Well, the Christian Association was lectured to that night by Mr. Tilton? A. It was; yes, Sir.

Q. And you were one of the audience? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you introduced him to Mr. Forbes? A. I introduced him to Mr. Forbes in the afternoon.

Q. Any one else? A. I don't remember that I did until after the lecture.

Q. Then you did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To whom? A. To my wife, and my wife's sister, and my wife's mother.

Q. And who else? A. I don't remember positively.

Q. A number? A. To one or two; I have no positive remembrance of it.

Q. When did you arrive in this city? A. Yesterday.

Q. Been here before? A. Do you mean in Brooklyn? Yes, Sir, I have.

Q. During this trial? A. No, Sir.

Q. When were you informed that you were to be wanted? A. I think it was on Thursday of last week.

Q. That is the first you knew that you were to be a witness? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You came out of the State of Connecticut here voluntarily to be a witness? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And to tell what you have told? A. By request; yes, Sir.

Q. At the request of whom? A. At the request of Mr. Hill, one of the attorneys.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. HOLMES.

Mr. Hill—The counsel have suggested a question, Sir, which I omitted by inadvertency. [To the witness.] Now, please state whether or not that transaction to which you have referred created a scandal at Winsted.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—One moment. That is ruled out, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I take it that anything makes a scandal at Winsted.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will notice that this Winsted scandal constituted one of the elements in the relations between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen which led to his displacement from his employments and which furnishes the justification, so far, against Mr. Bowen's recognising his obligations to pay him his damages. Now, the occurrence and that it was a scandal here, so reported, and affecting the minds of these two men, Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen, already appears, and Mr. Tilton has given his explanation of it in a letter, and we now show the dimensions of the affair itself. Now, it seems to us to be competent to show that this transaction, this occurrence at Winsted, did come to be the subject of scandalous remark there. That is our inquiry.

Judge Neilson—I think not, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Carpenter—[Foreman of the jury.] Was there a fire in that room? A. I think there was, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Holmes, was there a stove there, or how was it? A. There was a stove there; yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I desire to say, if your Honor please, and the jury, that we called this gentleman out of order to accommodate him.

Mr. Fullerton—It was out of order.

Judge Neilson—It was quite proper to call him.

Mr. Evarts—He is going West.

Mr. Fullerton—Go West, young man. [Laughter.]

TESTIMONY OF MARIA N. OVINGTON.

Mrs. Maria N. Ovington sworn on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Hill—Are you the wife of the witness, Edward J. Ovington, who has just been examined? A. I am.

Q. Where do you reside? A. 148 Hicks-st.

Q. How long have you resided there? A. Since May last.

Q. How long have you known the parties to this action? A. My first acquaintance was the tin wedding in 1865.

Mr. Evarts—[To the jury.] Perhaps you cannot hear, gentlemen.

A Juror—No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Madam, you will have to exert yourself a little. You are not in good health, we know, and your voice is perhaps affected also. We must try to either repeat the answers or to—

Judge Neilson—Counsel might repeat the answers.

Mr. Hill—We will try it a little while. If the room can be quiet, I think she can be heard. She has said that she had known them since their tin wedding in 1865. [To the witness.] My question related to the parties, and by that I mean Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton. You have now stated how long you had been acquainted with Mr. Tilton. Please state how long you had been acquainted with Mr. Beecher? A. I think a year or two previous to my uniting with the church.

Q. When was that? A. In 1865.

Q. So that you have known both of them about the same length of time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been acquainted with Mrs. Tilton? A. Since 1865.

Q. You met her upon the same occasion with her husband? A. Yes, Sir, by invitation at the tin wedding.

Q. Please state to his Honor and the jury how intimate you have been with the family? A. I was not intimate until the Fall of 1867, when my husband was very ill indeed, and Mrs. Tilton being a member of the church came to call upon me, to offer her services in any way that she could serve me. From that time I have known her intimately. I have been absent from the city very frequently for a long time together, but whenever I have been in the city I have always been on terms of intimate acquaintance with her.

Q. Where did you live in 1865, with reference to Mr. Tilton's residence?

Mr. Evarts—That answer has not been repeated.

The Witness—I will speak a little louder.

[THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the last answer.]

Q. Please state how frequent her calls were during the affliction of your husband's sickness? A. Almost daily.

Judge Neilson—The stenographer can repeat each answer.

Q. Did she aid you in taking care of your husband?

Mr. Evans—The stenographer will have to speak much louder than the witness, because he is further off.

Mr. Fullerton—You can repeat what the stenographer says. A. She did; also the care of my youngest child, which was ill at the same time.

Q. How long did your husband's sickness continue? A. Until the Summer of 1868.

Q. I asked you before where you were living at that time with reference to—

Mr. Evans—It is important that the jury should hear the answer.

The Witness—I will undertake to speak louder.

Q. Where was your husband at that time—that is, at the time of the sickness, and your acquaintance with Mrs. Tilton's with reference to hers? A. The old number of 95 Livingston-st., the present number 135.

Q. That was your residence? A. Yes, Sir; Mrs. Tilton was then, I think, 130 Livingston-st., since changed to 174 Livingston-st.

MRS. OVINGTON'S FIRST OFFER OF KINDNESS TO MRS. TILTON.

Q. Mrs. Ovington, do you recollect the publication of the Woodhull scandal in Nov., 1872? A. Perfectly well.

Q. Do you recollect, then, whether there was any offer of friendship or kindness between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. I was confined to my bed at that time, but sent word by my nurse to Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Beach—We object to that; I don't care what word you sent; but state whether or not you offered your sympathies and assistance to her? A. I did.

Q. Now, please state whether or not you have, in times of affliction, been accustomed mutually to offer your services one to the other? A. We have.

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, won't you please state what Mrs. Tilton's manner and habit was in her own home, as to religious services; her religious character and her observances?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think it will answer your purpose to have her describe the home in her own way.

Mr. Hill—Very well, describe the home, then.

MRS. TILTON IN HER HOME.

The Witness—A deeply religious woman; a very affectionate mother; and, as I supposed at that time, a very much beloved wife.

Q. Yes? A. And a very loving wife.

Q. Yes; how about her observance of religious duties in her family, herself? A. She was strictly religious; I thought, a very beautiful example of Christianity.

Q. Now, when did you first observe that as the character of Mrs. Tilton and her home? A. In 1867 and '8; '68 more particularly; I think.

Q. You may state, Mrs. Ovington, whether her calls upon you, in affliction, were of a religious character at all; or whether she ministered—endeavored to minister to the spiritual wants of the sick there?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—You might ask, I think, more properly, what was the character of her calls.

Mr. Beach—Well, of what materiality is it, what the character of those visits was between these ladies? It has nothing to do with any issue with which we are concerned.

Judge Neilson—All the counsel wants, or is seeking to get, is the character of the lady and her mode of life, and condition.

Mr. Beach—It is not the character of the lady, Sir; it is the character of the home that is in issue.

Judge Neilson—The character of the lady in respect to her home and daily habits.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, there is a great deal more than the character of the home. It is a polite suggestion from the counsel on the other side, that there is nothing of any importance in this case, except to prove their half of it. We happen to think our half is worth proving.

Judge Neilson—Well, we intend to hear you.

Mr. Shearman—That is more for counsel than your Honor. But the point is this—that we have the right to show the whole nature and character of this lady, with a view to other evidence, which we will gradually introduce, which will show how and why her husband came to think of inventing this charge against her, the pretexts which he had, the difficulties which he found in his own character and in his own relations to his wife; we want to show what was her nature, and what was the incompatibility, as he might afterwards claim, between him and her, and gradually to show how this difficulty arose in the family.

Judge Neilson—We have no question really. The counsel has a right to examine this lady and get at the condition of the household, whether peaceful, kind, in harmony or not; that is the extent of it.

Mr. Hill—I am uncertain if the question which I am now about to ask falls within the ruling; however, I will present it. [To the witness.] Mrs. Ovington, please state whether Mrs. Tilton was engaged at all in benevolent enterprises in the city, and works of charity and mercy.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think she may answer that.

The Witness—I should judge she was.

Mr. Beach—I object to the answer.

Mr. Hill—Do you know?

Mr. Beach—I object to the answer, and move to strike it out.

Judge Neilson—The answer is, she thinks she knows.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir: "I should judge she was." I move to strike it out.

The Witness—I know—I might explain myself—I know that she was interested in the Bethel; whether at that time or not, I don't recall.

Q. You may state to his Honor and the Jury how much of her time within your own knowledge of course, was devoted to charitable employments? A. I think she gave—I think she made it a point of duty to give all the time that she rightfully could, that her family did not demand; it seemed her duty and her pleasure.

Mr. Beach—Well, now, Sir; that is all a very beautiful tribute to a lady's friend, but it is obvious to your Honor that she does not speak from knowledge. The answer shows that it is a mere conclusion, or judgment, or opinion, formed by this lady.

Judge Neilson—It may be an estimate, still I think we will let it stand.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir, I have no particular objection to it; of course it is a very fine saying.

Mr. Hill—Mrs. Ovington, do you recollect a trip you made to Havana, departing in the Fall of 1873? A. November 12th, 1873, I left for Havana.

Q. When did you return? A. September 23d, 1873, to the city; I was absent in the Summer, not in Havana all the time.

Q. Yes, but you were away from the city? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how much were you in the city from your return in September, 1873, down to the publication of the Bacon letter? A. I did not leave the city from 1873 until last August of 1874.

Q. It is suggested that I ask you when you were in Havana was it because of your health? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what has been your state of health from the time of your return in 1873 down to the present time? A. I have not left the house until to-day since last October—the 18th. The previous Winter I think it was four or five months that I was not out of the house but once.

Q. Now, I will call your attention to the time of the beginning with the Bacon letter; do you recollect reading or hearing that paper read? A. I did, on Friday, I think, the 26th of June, that my husband brought it home and read it to me.

Q. Are you certain of the day of the month, or of the week? A. It was Thursday, I think, the 26th; I am not certain the day of the month; it was on Thursday or Friday he brought it; he spoke of it to me on Thursday; on Friday he brought the paper and read it aloud to me.

Q. Now, please state Mrs. Ovington, whether or not you then determined at once to see Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Ask what she did thereupon.

Mr. Hill—Well, what did you do upon hearing of this new trouble of Mrs. Tilton? A. I immediately arose from the lounge where I was lying—said that "I must go to Mrs. Tilton; she is in trouble."

Mr. Beach—You don't need to say what you said then.

Judge Neilson—You rose from your lounge; did you go to Mrs. Tilton? A. Not that day; I was not well enough.

Mr. Hill—You were not well enough to go then? A. I was not well enough to go on Friday.

Q. Well, when did you go? A. On the Sabbath following.

Q. What time? A. In the afternoon.

Q. Now, who took you to the house? how did you go? A. My husband; in the morning, before attending church, I asked him if he would take me to ride. He said he would do so, and I asked him if he would leave me to call upon Mrs. Tilton in the afternoon. He said he would. In the afternoon we started from the house, two or three o'clock, I think, in the afternoon; went to Mrs. Tilton's house then.

Q. And whom did you see, and what occurred? A. Carroll opened the door for me; my husband remained in the phaeton, and there Mr. Tilton saw him in front of the house. I entered the hall, Carroll inviting me into the parlor, but I did not accept then. In a few moments Mrs. Tilton came down the stairs.

FIRST ARGUMENT OVER THE DEFENDANT'S EVIDENCE.

Q. Wait a moment—go on? A. In a few moments Mrs. Tilton came down the stairs looking—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind how she looked.

Mr. Hill—I submit that we may have it.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, I think not, Sir.

The Witness—It will explain perhaps what I said to her afterwards.

Judge Neilson—This lady had not seen Mrs. Tilton in a long time, as it appears now. She might, I think, mention any marked appearance.

Mr. Hill—That is all I want.

Judge Neilson—But as to any minute or general description, or an opinion as to her health, or an opinion as to her trouble, that would not do.

Mr. Hill—Oh, no. I simply want Mrs. Tilton's general appearance as she came in, that is all; if there was anything marked special about it.

Mr. Beach—Suppose there was; what materiality is there here?

Judge Neilson—Suppose she were in tears, she might not have been in tears the day before. I do not think you can do anything with that, Mr. Hill.

Mr. Evans—Your Honor will undoubtedly recognize the proposition that, so far as the general competency of evidence goes, this witness can speak as to what she saw in Mrs. Tilton that day. Now, until it is disclosed what it was that she saw, it may not be apparent whether it is material or not. It is evidence that we have a right to bring, because it is what passed under the eyes of this witness herself.

Mr. Beach—What passed in the actions, conduct, or appearance of Mrs. Tilton under the eye of this witness is not presumptively evidence. On the contrary, it is presumptively immaterial and incompetent, and therefore, if the learned gentleman proposes to make it in any way material, by additional matter, he should state what he expects or proposes to prove. It is utterly immaterial to any issue in this case, I submit to your Honor, whether Mrs. Tilton was then appearing well and cheerful and happy or ill and despondent and depressed. I submit, therefore, that it should be rejected.

Mr. Evans—I think, if your Honor please, that when you ask for what is said, presumptively it is not evidence. But when you ask what the witness saw, it presumptively is evidence.

Judge Neilson—State what you expect or wish to prove.

Mr. Hill—I simply propose to show that the general appearance and her state of health was the subject of conversation very soon afterwards between this witness and Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—What do you purpose to show that this lady observed?

Mr. Hill—I propose to show that she observed a sorrowful condition on the part of Mrs. Tilton, and that her health seemed very greatly impaired—seemed weak.

Judge Neilson—In other words, that she was weak and not in good health, and you ask her that. It seems to me she may answer that.

Mr. Fullerton—That raises another issue, Sir, which we are to follow up. Suppose they prove that she was in ill health. Shall we be permitted to go on and show the cause of that ill health?

Judge Neilson—No. It stands if there may have been a thousand causes.

Mr. Fullerton—Exactly so. Therefore it is not proper evidence.

Judge Neilson—It seems to me a general fact.

Mr. Fullerton—It is a general fact, it is true. It is too general; that is the difficulty with it. What have we to do with the condition of the lady's health? Nothing at all. It proves nothing. If there is any pertinency to the evidence, then we have a right to disprove the fact, or to account for the condition of the lady, and then we will have side issues innumerable.

Judge Neilson—If she states the general fact of bad health, then you won't have occasion to account for it.

Mr. Beach—Why not, Sir. It is not mere bad health, it is bad, appearance; it is despondency and distress they seek to show, and it is pretty evident, Sir, that the object is for the purpose of drawing the conclusion that all this disturbance and depression of Mrs. Tilton arose from the recent publication of the Bacon letter. Now, can we be placed in that attitude, Sir, by this general, and, as we say, improper evidence, without having the opportunity of explaining what was the real cause of the difficulty, which, of course, your Honor will not permit.

Judge Neilson—I think, simply, that he may ask and ascertain whether this lady, on being met by the witness, appeared in good health or not, as a general simple fact. That is admissible in respect to any person.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is not of any very great importance.

Mr. Hill—State, Mrs. Ovington, how that was.

Judge Neilson—Whether she appeared to be in good health or not.

Mr. Everts—Our question, if your Honor please, we think should be: "State what you observed in the appearance of Mrs. Tilton?" It is primarily good evidence.

Judge Neilson—It is too broad. I will allow you to put the question, "What appeared to be the condition of her health." That you have put. Now, what is the answer to that? A. She looked very pale, very white, as I told my husband. Death struck—

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Hill—Never mind what you told him, just go on and give the fact as you observed.

Mr. Beach—Ought not this lady to answer the question, Sir, as to her state of health—apparent state of health?

Judge Neilson—Yes, simply.

Mr. Beach—She is wandering into an answer to the other question—giving a general description.

Judge Neilson—What was her apparent state of health? A. Very feeble.

Judge Neilson—Very well; that answers the question.

Mr. Hill—Now, what occurred between you?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Mr. Hill—Go on; state what occurred there.

Mr. Fullerton—I think not.

Mr. Morris—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Who was present?

Mr. Hill—Very well, I will go back to that. [To the witness.] Now, who was present at this interview between you and Mrs. Tilton? A. No one but Mrs. Tilton and myself.

Q. That is at the hall? A. In the hall.

Q. Now, where was Mr. Tilton? A. He at first was in the parlor; I did not see him; he passed out through the front window to the side of the carriage talking with my husband.

Q. Yes; and then you and Mrs. Tilton went into the parlor? A. I went into the parlor at her invitation.

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, was the subject of conversation which you and Mrs. Tilton had in the parlor a subject of conversation between you and Mr. Tilton afterwards?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; that won't do, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Why not?

Mr. Fullerton—Because it is wrong.

Mr. Everts—Why, it is a simple question of whether the conversation that she had with this lady was afterwards a subject of conversation with Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't object to it because I didn't understand it, so that the gentleman needn't repeat it.

Mr. Everts—She answers yes or no.

Mr. Fullerton—I know she does, and therefore it is a leading question.

Mr. Everts—No; it is not.

Judge Neilson—If this lady had a conversation with Mrs. Tilton, he can pass to that in due time and give it, of course. You cannot state anything that occurred between this lady and Mrs. Tilton in the parlor.

Mr. Everts—Unless it was a subject of conversation with Mrs. Tilton, and then what occurred between her and Mrs. Tilton will be evidence.

Mr. Beach—As your Honor recollects the counsel fought against that mode of proof.

Mr. Everts—I said expressly that what occurred between the witness and Mrs. Tilton would be evidence.

Judge Neilson—Well, when you get to that point you can examine and take the evidence.

Mr. Everts—Well, we do examine. She had a conversation with Mrs. Tilton. Now, we don't ask what the conversation was; our present question is did you speak to Mrs. Tilton concerning it?

Mr. Beach—That is not the question.

Mr. Everts—It is.

Mr. Beach—It is not.

Judge Neilson—You can give the conversation she had with Mr. Tilton, of course.

Mr. Everts—What is the question?

Mr. Beach—You had better find out before you discuss it. [The last question read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

Mr. Everts—That is my question.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out, with the permission to give my conversation that this witness had with Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Everts—That I understand; but this is but a preliminary question, and I say it is precisely the same with what my learned friends do not object to—"You had a conversation with Mrs. Tilton? Yes. Did you speak of that conversation to Mr. Tilton?"

Judge Neilson—Well, I don't know; I have ruled you can do that of course.

The Witness—I did.

Judge Neilson—I think you had better finish with this witness.

Mr. Hill—Why, I can't finish the examination in an hour.

Judge Neilson—Yes, you can. Well, let us go on half an hour then. We lose a great deal of time. We lost a quarter of an hour this morning; we lost another quarter at noon. Now, proceed with this witness. It is too bad to bring this witness again.

Mr. Hill—She certainly will have to come again.

Judge Neilson—Very well; she will come with a lighter burden.

Mr. Beach—How would you prefer, witness?

The Witness—Whichever you decide.

Judge Neilson—Well, the majority is against me, I suppose. Gentlemen, get ready.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock Wednesday morning.

THIRTY-SEVENTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

MRS. OVINGTON'S TESTIMONY.

SHE REVIEWS CONVERSATIONS HAD WITH MR. TILTON

—MRS. TILTON'S DENIAL THAT MR. BEECHER OFFERED HER ANY IMPROPRIETY—INCIDENTS OF MRS. TILTON'S SEPARATION FROM HER HUSBAND —A MRS. PUTNAM OF MARIETTA, OHIO, CALLED TO THE STAND—A JURYMAN BECOMES FAINT AND THE COURT ADJOURNS.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1876.

The defense is now fairly under way, and its machinery is running smoothly. In accordance with the request of Mr. Fullerton, Mr. Ovington was present early this morning with a statement of the money received and disbursed for Mrs. Tilton and her children. In examining the accounts Mr. Ovington had found that he had received $1,945 from Mr. Storrs, instead of $875, as he had testified on the previous day. Mr. Ovington stepped from the stand after five minutes of questioning, and his wife took the witness chair. Mrs. Ovington made an admirable impression upon all who heard her testimony. She is a gentle, refined lady, and whatever she knew she told with apparent candor and impartiality. Much of her story, touching as it did the incidents connected with Mrs. Tilton's departure from her husband, was told with pathetic feeling. The witness related the circumstances of Mrs. Tilton's coming to Mr. Ovington's house on the morning when she left her husband. Mr. Tilton followed, and all breakfasted together. Before sitting down Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Ovington talked together about the matter, the former saying to the lady, "Tell me what to do and I will do it." Mrs. Ovington says that she replied, "Do what you think in the sight of God is right." After breakfast Mr. Ovington said to Mr. Tilton, "Why do you push this matter?" Mr. Tilton replied, "I shall be the Samson who will destroy the temple; I will pull down the pillars of the temple, and although Mr. Beecher and my family are crushed, I shall be crushed with them."

When Mr. Tilton was going away he drew his wife and Mrs. Ovington together, placing his hands upon their shoulders saying, "Take care of Elizabeth. Any kindness done to her is more than done to me." He then went away, and after he had gone Mrs. Tilton told Mrs. Ovington for the first time that she had left her husband forever.

Mrs. Ovington testified that, in order to confirm her belief in Mr. Beecher's innocence, she asked Mrs. Tilton whether Mr. Beecher had ever by word or deed offered any impropriety to her. Mrs. Tilton answered "Never."

The details of Gen. Tracy's visit to Mrs. Ovington, and his interview with Mrs. Tilton before the latter was examined by the Investigation Committee, were the subject of inquiry. When it was decided that Mrs. Tilton should go before the Committee she went with Mrs. Ovington to an upper room to hold prayer before giving her testimony. A day or two after Mrs. Tilton had told her story to the Committee, Mrs. Ovington saw Mr. Tilton on the piazza of his house, where he said to her: "Lib's a tramp. I am told that she made a fine impression before the Committee. But her story was all fiction." Then followed a long conversation, which was concluded by Mr. Tilton telling Mrs. Ovington that she might tell Mrs. Tilton what he had said. A sharp discussion—the only one of importance during the day—followed the proposition of the defense to introduce Mrs. Tilton's reply when Mrs. Ovington told her what her husband had thus said. Mr. Evarts and Mr. Beach took an active part, and Judge Neilson finally decided that the defense could not give the proffered testimony.

A few moments before the recess Mr. Hill announced that he was through with the witness, and Mr. Fullerton immediately began the cross-examination. He had not proceeded far before the luncheon hour arrived. After the interval Mrs. Ovington was questioned in regard to an interview she had with Mr. Beecher before Mrs. Tilton made her statement to the Investigating Committee; Mrs. Ovington told Mr. Beecher that Mrs. Tilton wished to state the truth, and that she had said, "It may end in a separation from my husband; I may lose every child I have; I may lose every friend I have in the world, but, Mrs. Ovington, that will not deter me." Mrs. Ovington exhibited an anxiety to tell all she knew of the affair, and frequently volunteered testimony that legally could not be admitted, but only once did Mr. Fullerton lose his temper. That was when he was trying to make the witness tell how it was that on the morning when Mr. and Mrs. Tilton breakfasted at Mrs. Ovington's house she (Mrs. Ovington) did not make any inquiries whether Mrs. Tilton had left her home.

Mrs. Ovington repeatedly replied that she could not explain without giving that interview with Mrs. Tilton which had been ruled out, and finally Mr. Fullerton protested with severity against her answer. At another time, when the examiner asked Mrs. Ovington if she had not been told that a report prepared for presentation to the Committee, shown to her by Mr. Tilton, was in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting, the witness leaned forward and enthusiastically replied, "No, Sir; I was not told anything of the kind." "Do not waste strength, Mrs. Ovington," said Mr. Fullerton, and the lady replied, laughingly, "Excuse me, Sir; I am very much interested." "So am I—slightly," responded the lawyer with a smile.

A few questions about Bessie Turner and in regard to the number of times that the counsel for the defense had called upon Mrs. Tilton and upon the witness were answered, and then Mrs. Ovington was excused.

After a short pause—it being then half-past three o'clock—Mrs. Sarah C. D. Putnam of Marietta, Ohio, was called. Mrs. Putnam is an elderly lady, who has been in attendance in the court-room for several days past. She was a resident of Brooklyn or New-York nearly all the time from her first marriage in 1839 till 1867, the time of her second marriage. She was well acquainted with the Tilton family, and of Mrs. Tilton she said that she never knew a woman so devoted to her husband, her only fault being a blind idolatry of Mr. Tilton.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

RE-EXAMINATION OF MR. OVINGTON.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Hill—A question was asked Mr. Ovington, yesterday, in regard to receipts of money and disbursements, which he is prepared to explain this morning.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Ovington, come forward, please.

Edward J. Ovington recalled.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Ovington, since your examination yesterday, have you looked at your accounts and memoranda with a view of making up the statement referred to by Judge Fullerton? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Wait one moment; I don't understand this, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You interrogated him as to disbursements of money.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He said in answer to you that he would furnish a statement this morning.

Mr. Fullerton—I will do my own part of the business, although my brother Hill is about to do it.

Mr. Hill—"My brother Hill" proposes to do a little on his own part.

Mr. Fullerton—If my brother Hill will wait until the opportunity comes, when he can do so.

Judge Neilson—[To plaintiff's counsel.] I think the witness is with you on that subject.

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir, but I have a right to recall the witness.

The Witness—I wish to correct a statement that I made yesterday.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to do that.

Mr. Fullerton—I asked Mr. Ovington if he would furnish me this morning with those items. He said he would. Now, you propose to take it out of my hands and have him do it on your examination.

Mr. Hill—I don't suppose it makes very much difference so long as the Court and jury get it.

Mr. Fullerton—Then you had better let me do it.

Mr. Hill—I propose to do a certain part of it.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to object to that.

THE MONEYS RECEIVED FOR MRS. TILTON'S SUPPORT.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Now, the personal explanation.

The Witness—I wish to make a statement to correct a misstatement that I made yesterday in regard to the amounts of money that were handed to me by Mr. Storrs. I wish to say that my mind has been very much occupied the past two or three months—

Mr. Hill—A little louder, Mr. Ovington.

The Witness—My mind has been very much occupied the past two or three months, and particularly in making preparations for a long business trip in Europe—a purchasing trip—and also the fact that I had not, I think, to my recollection, seen those entries that I made in the book at the time of receiving the money, nor had any one questioned me regarding them; and they had escaped my memory; and in referring to them this morning I found I had made a great mistake in the amounts.

Mr. Hill—What is the mistake?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, if you please, Mr. Hill.

The Witness—I wrote a statement and brought it with me.

Mr. Fullerton—Where is the statement, Sir? A. Mr. Hill has it.

Q. Will you furnish it to me? A. I will.

Mr. Hill—Here it is. [Handing a paper to Mr. Fullerton.] It is a statement of the receipts.

Mr. Fullerton—Is that a statement of the funds you have received? [Handing witness the paper.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is more than you stated yesterday? A. Considerable.

Q. You received, then, September 4th, 1874, two checks of $500 each, was it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Two checks making up $500? A. Two checks of $350 each, instead of $500 as I said yesterday.

Q. Then January 4th, 1875, you received $745? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Making an aggregate of $1,345 in all that you received on that account? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Ovington, you were to furnish me with a list of disbursements? A. Yes, Sir; I have done so.

Q. Is that it? [Handing witness a paper.] A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to have this marked as an exhibit. [Referring to the first paper produced.] That is the paper showing the money received.

[Marked "Exhibit 109."]

Mr. Fullerton—The paper showing how the money was disbursed will be marked 110.

[Marked "Exhibit 110."]

Q. Is there any other paper connected with these accounts that you have? A. I have a paper of little memorandums, which Mr. Hill has.

Q. Little memorandums of what? A. Small disbursements.

Q. Will you furnish it? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Here it is. [Handing Mr. Fullerton a paper.] It represents the last item, or next to the last; the details of the last item.

Mr. Fullerton—That paper now shown you represents the details of the item of $297 56 on "Exhibit 110," does it? [Handing witness the paper.] A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That will be marked 111 then.

[Marked "Exhibit 111."]

Q. Do these papers represent all the money that you have received and disbursed, from any source whatever? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Look at "Exhibit No. 110," and say whether the respective charges upon it, with the exception of the $350 for traveling expenses and board, and the $397 56 under the head of "Sundry Disbursements"—

Mr. Hill—Please speak a little louder, Mr. Fullerton; we can't hear.

Q. Look at "Exhibit No. 110," and say whether the items upon it, except the $350 for traveling expenses and board, etc., and the charges of $397 56 under the head of "Sundry Disbursements," were for merchandise for Mrs. Tilton and the children?

A. With the exception of the bill of John Gallagher, carriage hire—that is not merchandise; James Donnelly, also carriage hire; Dr. Mirick, dentist bill; E. Hobart, a board bill when she was absent in the country; another bill of $4, carriage hire; physician's charges. With those exceptions—

Q. The bill is for merchandise for Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; and the children.

MR. OVINGTON AGAIN QUESTIONED BY MR. HILL.

Mr. Hill—The total amount, then, which you received was $1,345? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, the total amount which you have paid out is how much? A. I don't remember. [Looking at the account.] $1,349 98.

Q. Please state if "Exhibit 111" represents the items upon "Exhibit 110" marked as "Sundry Disbursements, $397 56?" A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That we proved by him.

Mr. Hill—I didn't understand you.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, yes.

Mr. Hill—Have you at any time made any charge for Mrs. Tilton's board in your family? A. No, Sir.

Q. None at all? I will ask you, Mr. Ovington, whether the charge of $350 upon "Exhibit 110" includes any of Miss Florence's expenses while she was at the country? A. Yes, Sir; her traveling expenses and board, excepting perhaps her traveling expenses from New-York to the —, while she was there and returning.

Mr. Hill—Now, may it please your Honor, I offer in evidence the statement of receipts.

Mr. Morris—Why, it is in evidence; we have put it in evidence.

Mr. Hill—I didn't understand you to put it in evidence.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is in evidence and marked.

Mr. Hill—I am satisfied.

Mr. Morris—They are marked as exhibits.

Mr. Hill—I am satisfied. I supposed they were marked for identification. That is all, Mr. Ovington.

MRS. OVINGTON RECALLED.

Maria N. Ovington was then recalled, and her direct examination resumed.

Mr. Hill—I will be pardoned for interrupting the line of my examination yesterday for a single moment. [To the witness.] Mrs. Ovington, have you examined any of the items of these two—these three exhibits which are present here? I will call your attention particularly to the two relating to disbursements by your husband. A. I have seen the bills, but the papers that he has brought this morning I have not seen.

Q. The papers themselves? A. No, Sir.

Q. Just look at the papers and see if you recognize any of the items, and if you are familiar with the transactions to which they refer? [Handing witness the papers.]

Judge Neilson—Mr. Hill, I think that we can assume that those moneys were received and disbursed.

Mr. Hill—That is not all of it, Sir. My friends have chosen to go into this subject.

The Witness—I think I know them much better than my husband does, as I have had the money transactions in many instances with Mrs. Tilton myself, to avoid unpleasant feelings in regard to money matters, as it was a delicate subject.

Q. State whether or not Miss Florence was with her mother at all during her absence in the Summer? A. She was at Fairfield. We arrived in Fairfield on Monday, I think; the following Wednesday, I think it was—the day I am not quite certain—Mrs. Tilton received a letter from Florence saying—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind!

Mr. Hill—I don't care what the letter said. Did Florence come? A. It was in regard to the mistake of her direction to Litchfield. She came to Fairfield, remained with us there until we left for "The Guntery," accompanied us to "The Guntery," then to Lake Warramang, where Mr. Gunn was camping; returned to Brooklyn with us; returned to my house, intending to spend the Fall with her mother at my house, until her father forbade her.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment; we ask to strike that out, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think I will leave it for your cross-examination; she may have been present when her father forbade her.

Mr. Beach—Well, if she assumes to state it upon her own knowledge, I don't object.

Mr. Fullerton—When I come to cross-examine in regard to it, though, I don't want them to say that it was not responsive, and therefore not in the case.

Mr. Hill—Now, Mrs. Ovington, did you yourself aid Mrs. Tilton in making any of the purchases represented by these items? A. Many of the purchases I made without Mrs. Tilton being with me; that is, in fitting out the children she was not with me; she made a few herself in New-York one day when I wasn't with her. After that I think that I made most of them myself, with the children; with Alice and Carroll.

Q. Now, will you please state the condition of Mrs. Tilton's wardrobe and that of the children when they came—as to the necessity for these disbursements being made—these purchases being made?

Judge Neilson—Now, I think, we shall certainly assume that they were necessary; I think that is enough. I don't think the learned counsel proposes—he cannot question but what they were necessary; and I don't think it is well to put the details on the record.

Mr. Hill—I don't want to go into details; but I want to show this, if your Honor please—I want to show just this: that these children were almost in a destitute condition when they came there, as was Mrs. Tilton also.

Judge Neilson—Well, these supplies were necessary, of course; that is to be assumed. People are not wont to buy things for others unless there is some occasion for it. I think, Mr. Hill, you might ask her if these supplies were necessary, and get her answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Why, it is not disputed that they were necessary.

Judge Neilson—No, it could not be disputed very well.

Mr. Hill—Nor is it yet proved, either. [To the Witness.] State whether these purchases for Mrs. Tilton and these children were necessary, in your judgment? A. I considered them necessary; she would have done with less.

Judge Neilson—That answers the question; that is all we need.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; let us get along pleasantly. Please answer the question simply.

The Witness—I am not used to the witness stand, Mr. Fullerton; you can correct me when I am out of order.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, well, Madam; I don't wish to do that, only answer, please.

MR. TILTON THANKFUL FOR FAVORS SHOWN HIS WIFE.

Mr. Hill—We left your examination yesterday at Mr. Tilton's residence in Livingston-st., on Sunday afternoon. Please state if you had any conversation with Mr. Tilton at all, before you left that day? A. I spoke a few words to him, after I had gone to the carriage, in the presence of my husband.

Q. What did you say to him? A. I said that I had seen his wife. He said: "Did she come down-stairs?" I replied she did. I think that was the most that I said. I held no lengthy conversation; I remember nothing else.

Q. Did you state what acts had been done between his wife and yourself when she came down-stairs? A. I don't remember that I did.

Q. Was anything said about your taking her to ride? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. I said that she looked miserably, and I would like to take her to drive with me, as I was in the habit of driving out. He said he would be gratified to have me do so; he thought it would benefit her, and spoke kindly of her.

Q. Now, when did you next see Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Tilton? A. A week from that day.

Q. This was Sunday; did you go the next day to drive? A. Oh, the next day, Monday! Excuse me. The next morning, as I had said to Mrs. Tilton that I would call for her if I rode out, I did so; I took her to the Park—drove there. Do you wish me to say anything—

Q. Well, you took her out to drive that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then brought her home again? A. Yes, Sir; after calling upon Mrs. Bradshaw.

Q. Now, when did you see her again? A. A week from that day; the 6th of July.

Q. Under what circumstances? A. I went to take her to ride in the afternoon.

Q. Before going to that, let me ask you if you had any conversation with Mr. Tilton in regard to a call by your husband upon him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. That was while Mrs. Tilton was preparing to drive, when she was putting on her hat, etc.; I was in the parlor.

Q. That was on Monday morning—the first drive? A. Monday morning; yea, Sir.

Q. Now, what did he say? A. He asked me if I would ask my husband to call upon him; that he would like to converse with him upon his affairs.

Q. What affairs? A. His affairs, and then—

Q. Did he specify? A. This matter; I do not know as he made use of any expression then; I do not recollect it; he might have done so.

Q. Well, proceed. A. "Will you ask your husband to call upon me; I will be pleased to see him; he is a just man; I will open my heart to him as to a brother; ask him if he will call here?" I told him I would do so, and did not doubt but that Mr. Ovington would call.

Q. Now, did you tell your husband what Mr. Tilton had said to you? A. I did.

Q. When did you so tell him? A. I probably did on my return from my ride; but I do not remember the exact time.

Q. Now, go to the second drive on the following Monday. State, if you can, the date of that drive?

Mr. Fullerton—The following Monday?

Mr. Hill—The first time she called on Sunday, and then she took her to drive on Monday.

Mr. Fullerton—The following Monday was July 6th, was it?

The Witness—July 6th.

Mr. Hill—Now, on the 6th of July you took Mrs. Tilton to drive? A. Without any previous appointment I called to her house and asked her if she would go to drive with me that afternoon. She replied she would like to—

Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Ovington, there is no use in giving that conversation; you took her to drive, that is enough. Do not give the conversation between you and Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Hill—Proceed with the story, Mrs. Ovington.

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Judge Neilson—What was done, not what was said.

Mr. Hill—Well, the witness has received instructions from the counsel that he don't want the conversation. I simply say proceed; I think she understands it.

Judge Neilson—When you say proceed, you mean in reference to the drive?

Mr. Hill—Yea, certainly.

Mr. Fullerton—If you will go on a drive, I have no objections.

Mr. Hill—Well, go on, Mrs. Ovington.

The Witness—There is one remark that I think would be necessary, to say why I took the drive I did.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Mrs. Ovington, don't give us what you think is necessary.

Mr. Hill—Where did you go, Mrs. Ovington; simply tell us that? A. I went to the Park first; took a short drive there; at Mrs. Tilton's request I returned to the city; she asked me—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Hill—Not what she asked you, not what she said, you know; just what did you do? Where did you go when you returned to the city from the Park? A. From the Park I returned to my house in Hicks-st.; there left Mrs. Tilton, then went to my husband's store. My son drove me to Mr. Beecher's house.

Q. Now you may state whether, or not, Mrs. Tilton was taken to your house by her request? A. She was.

Q. Had you invited her to come there upon that occasion? A. I had not.

Q. Well, you went to Mr. Beecher's house? A. He was not at home; I called at Mr.—

Q. Never mind. What did you do then after you left Mr. Beecher's? A. I called at Mr. Beach's to see if Mr. Beecher was there. He was not; I then went to Mr. J. T. Howard's to see if he was there; he was not. I returned to my home, went upstairs, and Mrs. Tilton then came down in the carriage, and I left her at her residence in Livingston-st.

Q. Now, kindly specify about the hour that you returned to your house from the Park? A. I didn't notice, but I left my home, I should think, about half-past two or three. I should judge so.

Q. Left your home to go where? A. To go to call for Mrs. Tilton; I should judge it might have been four o'clock, but I am not certain as to the moment. It was about that time.

Q. That is when you returned from the Park to your house? A. When I left Mrs. Tilton at her home in Livingston-st. I think it was about four o'clock.

Q. But you did not quite tell me yet when you returned from the Park to your house? A. I came directly from the Park to my house.

Q. Yea; and had been gone on your ride about how long? A. I don't know; only long enough to go to the Park.

Q. And take a short drive and return? A. Yea, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, you have left Mrs. Tilton at her house. What did you do next? A. What did I do, or she? I say—what any one else did, I hardly know how to—

Q. You drove home, did you, from Mrs. Tilton's house? A. I did.

Q. Very well. Now, when did Mrs. Tilton return to your house that day? A. There is something before that, Mr. Hill.

Mr. Hill—I don't care what it was. When did she come back?

Mr. Fullerton—Answer the question.

The Witness—At six o'clock.

Q. She came back about six o'clock? A. At six o'clock.

GEN. TRACY'S CALLS AT THE OVINGTONS.

Now, do you recollect of seeing Gen. Tracy that day? A. Yea, Sir.

Q. Where? A. At my house.

Q. State about the time that he called? A. Between five and six, I should think.

Q. Do you know whether Mrs. Tilton was present on that occasion? A. She was not present. I had left her at her house in Livingston street.

Q. How long was General Tracy's call? A. I should think not over five minutes.

Q. Where was he received? A. In the second story front room.

Q. Who was present? A. My husband.

Q. Besides yourself? A. I was present; Mr. Ovington, Gen. Tracy and myself.

Q. Now, when did you next see General Tracy? A. I think it was between half-past six and seven or six o'clock; I think that was—no, it was later than that; it was seven, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that night? A. That same evening.

Mr. Hill—Was Mrs. Tilton present when he called? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, how long was that call of Gen. Tracy's? A. The second call?

Q. Yes. A. I should think ten minutes perhaps; I don't know exactly.

Q. Can you state whether or not Mrs. Tilton was present at any time during that call? A. She was not.

Q. Where did you receive Gen. Tracy upon the occasion of this second call? A. I think that I was in the parlor; I went to the parlor and saw him there; I think my husband met him there.

Q. You have stated, I think, how long that was? A. I think it was ten or fifteen minutes; I don't know exactly.

Q. Very well; now when did Mrs. Tilton come, with reference to the second call of Gen. Tracy's? A. Upon her— Please say that again, Mr. Hill.

Q. When did Mrs. Tilton call, with reference to the second call of Gen. Tracy's; was it after or before? I mean when she returned to your house. You say you had taken her to her house in the carriage—she came back as I understand it; when was that, with reference to Gen. Tracy's second call? She came back at 6 o'clock, but she knew nothing about Gen. Tracy then.

Q. Very well; was any one with her? A. She came alone at six o'clock.

Q. Now, go on and state the narrative with reference to the calls, and what Mrs. Tilton did, and what Gen. Tracy did that evening? A. Can I state as I went and returned; would that be proper?

Q. No; limit yourself to Gen. Tracy's call and Mrs. Tilton's; give the narrative; just that part of it. A. Gen. Tracy called and saw my husband and myself, I should think five minutes, and left the house; very shortly afterward, Mrs. Tilton came, which was at six o'clock; that hour, I think, I am quite positive about. Mrs. Tilton called at six; she left quite soon after, and returned again about half-past seven with Judge Morse, and remained then until, I suppose, about ten o'clock.

Q. Now, was Gen. Tracy present when she returned with Judge Morse? A. He was.

Q. What occurred when they came in, do you recollect? A. I think that I opened the door myself for Mrs. Tilton and Judge Morse. They entered the parlor, Judge Morse introducing Mrs. Tilton to Gen. Tracy. My husband was present.

Q. Was any one else present at that moment? A. No, Sir.

Q. You may state, Mrs. Ovington, whether there was any consultation there with respect to Mrs. Tilton's appearance before the Committee that evening.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think she ought to be allowed to answer it.

Q. What occurred upon that subject, Mrs. Ovington?

Judge Neilson—Not what was said—whether anything was said.

The Witness—There was.

Mr. Hill—There was what?

A. There was something said in regard to the subject of her meeting the Committee that evening.

Q. Now, by whom was the arrangement made? Tell the story to his Honor and the jury without giving conversation or detail. A. I had been to Mr. Beecher's house between the call of Gen. Tracy and Mrs. Tilton's return with Judge Morse. That is what I spoke of referring to, which will explain some matters.

Q. Yes; but give the story with regard to the arrangement in pursuance of which Mrs. Tilton appeared before the Committee; what was done by each: whether the consultations were private, or in the presence of all. A. Shall I speak of my interview with Mr. Beecher?

Judge Neilson—No, except that you had an interview.

The Witness—I had an interview in regard to this subject.

Mr. Shearman—We have not the right to ask that.

Mr. Hill—I am speaking of the consultation after Mrs. Tilton came with Judge Morse to your house that evening? A. They consulted with regard to seeing the Committee that evening.

Q. Who consulted; was it Gen. Tracy or Judge Morse? A. Mrs. Tilton expressed the desire—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Madam.

Judge Neilson—Omit that.

Mr. Hill—I submit it is proper to show that she expressed a desire to see the Committee.

Mr. Beach—I submit that it is not, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Your principal question seems to remain unanswered, to wit, whether the consultations were private or not?

MRS. TILTON'S APPEARANCE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE VOLUNTARY.

Mr. Hill—I will pursue that a single moment further. [To the witness.] State to his Honor and the jury whether these consultations about Mrs. Tilton appearing before the Committee were private; how were they held, and where? A. In the parlor, in the presence of Mr. Ovington, Judge Morse, Gen. Tracy and myself.

Q. Was there any private consultation between Judge Morse and Mrs. Tilton about it, or any private consultation between them? A. Before—

Judge Neilson—In your presence.

Mr. Shearman—The point is to inquire whether Judge Morse and Mrs. Tilton stepped aside.

The Witness—Mrs. Tilton requested to speak to Judge Morse alone. They went up-stairs and consulted, Mrs. Tilton returning and saying she would like to see the Committee.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—State what she said. Mrs. Tilton returned?

The Witness—Yes, Sir; Mrs. Tilton returned.

Mr. Beach—With Judge Morse? A. With Judge Morse.

Q. Please state whether or not Mrs. Tilton requested to see the Committee? A. She did.

Mr. Beach—Wait; we object to that.

Judge Neilson—We cannot take that; if we take that we must take everything else that occurred in the conversation.

Mr. Hill—I understand we may show that the appearance of Mrs. Tilton before the Committee was voluntary, without solicitation.

Judge Neilson—You will get at the fact that it was voluntary.

Mr. Hill—That is all I care for, your Honor. [To the witness.] Did she appear before the Committee that night? A. She did.

Q. State whether or not that was upon her solicitation or upon the solicitation of some other person?

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Mr. Evarts—Why?

Judge Neilson—Do you know whether it was voluntary or not?

The Witness—It was entirely so.

Mr. Hill—I think that you stated that the Committee was not then present? A. With Judge Morse?

Q. Yes? A. They were not.

Q. Did Gen. Tracy remain until they came, or did he go after them? Go on with the narrative in that particular. A. Gen. Tracy left the house, went out for the Committee, and returned with the Committee.

Q. Where were you when he returned? A. I was in the dining-room, with Mrs. Tilton, giving her her tea.

Q. Well, go on with the story. A. Mr. Ovington came down and said Gen. Tracy would like to speak to Mrs. Tilton a moment before she saw the Committee. He went up and told him to come down in the dining-room. He came; as he entered, said I: "I presume you don't wish me, Gen. Tracy—excuse me." He said: "Mrs. Ovington, I prefer that you should remain." He took a seat beside Mrs. Tilton. Shall I give the conversation?

Q. I have no objection to it.

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—He took a seat beside Mrs. Tilton and had a conversation.

The Witness—I should say of three minutes duration.

Judge Neilson—Well, a conversation of three minutes duration; that will do.

Mr. Hill—Were you present all the time? A. I was. He then left us and went up to the gentlemen in the parlor.

Q. And how soon did you and Mrs. Tilton go? A. When she finished her tea; I should think about five minutes, perhaps. We did not go directly to the Committee, however.

Q. Where did you go, and Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Tilton and myself, Mr. Hill, went in the second story front room for her to hold prayer before she made her appearance before that Committee.

Q. How long, then, before you appeared before the Committee, or how long before Mrs. Tilton appeared before the Committee? A. Directly after that we came to the parlor, Mr.

Ovington introduced—or Gen. Tracy, I don't know which—introduced Mrs. Tilton to the Committee.

Q. And then Mrs. Tilton made her statement before the Committee? A. She did.

Q. And they left about what time? A. I do not know the exact time. I should think about ten o'clock.

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, did Gen. Tracy give any instructions whatever, or make any suggestions whatever, to Mrs. Tilton in regard to her answers, or the form of the answers, before the Committee at all? A. The form of the questions he did.

Q. Did he as to the form of the answer, Mrs. Ovington, at all? A. No, Sir. Shall I say what he said?

Q. State what he said, what he suggested in regard to the question?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think we will have to stop there.

Mr. Shearman—They brought this in.

Mr. Beach—Who brought it in?

Mr. Shearman—The gentlemen on the other side brought this in, representing Gen. Tracy as having certain conversations, and of course that conversation becomes a fact in the case.

Mr. Fullerton—Brought it in how?

Mr. Shearman—On the direct examination of Mr. Tilton, Mr. Tilton stated that Gen. Tracy related to him that he had given instructions to Mrs. Tilton as to the form of the answers that she was to make to the questions put.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you want to prove Gen. Tracy didn't tell the truth?

Mr. Shearman—No; but we want to prove that he never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Fullerton—How does this witness know that fact?

Judge Neilson—We will proceed. That thing might occur in twenty places, as well as in Mr. Ovington's house.

Mr. Shearman—We want to account for the whole time that Gen. Tracy was there at the house, the statement he has made, to wit, that no such thing took place.

Judge Neilson—Go on; we cannot take the conversations.

Q. Mrs. Ovington, will you explain what you mean by saying that Gen. Tracy instructed her as to the form of the questions; was it as to the form of question or the subject matter of the examinations?

Mr. Beach—We are objecting to this, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I think we have had that sufficiently, Mr. Hill.

The Witness—It was more the matter than the questions.

Judge Neilson—Now, you have made a different answer.

Mr. Shearman—They allowed this question to go in without any objection.

Judge Neilson—This last answer covers the ground. She said it was more the subject matter than the form of the question.

Mr. Hill—Very well.

Mr. Hill—When and where was it that Gen. Tracy made the suggestion as to the subject matter of the examination? A. In the dining-room, at the tea table, in the presence of Mrs. Tilton and myself.

Q. What did he state was the subject matter upon which she was to be examined?

Judge Neilson—I think we have had that.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to this, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We cannot go any further with it.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Mr. Hill—You were present at the whole interview between Mrs. Tilton and the Committee? A. I was?

MR. TILTON'S TALK WITH THE OVINGTONS ABOUT HIS TROUBLES.

Q. Now, be kind enough to state when you next saw Mr. Tilton? A. Thursday morning, the 9th of July, he called at my house.

Q. Where did you receive him? A. On the back piazza.

Q. Now, please begin with that conversation and state it just as it occurred, as nearly as you can? A. It was a three hours' conversation; I don't think I could repeat all of it, Mr. Hill.

Q. Give us so much of it as you recollect, stating who was present? A. Mr. Ovington was the only one present besides Mr. Tilton and myself. When he greeted us on the piazza, he spoke of Mrs. Tilton, and said: "Lib is a trump, isn't she? I hear she spoke well before the Committee, that she made a favorable impression upon them, but it is fiction—all fiction. I, too, could come before the Committee and weave fiction."

Q. Well? A. I asked after her health. He said: "She is well; happy as a bird this morning." Says I: "I am glad to hear it. I have received a note, saying that she was in much better spirits than the first note that I received from her." I cannot remember word for word this conversation, Mr. Hill. This is the substance merely, as well as I can recollect it.

Q. Give the substance of it. A. I think then Mr. Tilton said to me: "So you have heard from her?" I said that I had received two letters from her, and expressed my pleasure that she was feeling better than when I received the first letter. He said: "You should see her this morning; she is happy, happy as a bird." I think then it was that I repeated some of the contents of her letters to me; I don't think I repeated all; I cannot remember.

Q. State what you repeated as nearly as you can; take the first one? A. "Upon my return home last evening"—it was written Tuesday morning. I think—"upon my return home Tuesday evening I found Mr. Tilton in bed reading. I told him of the interview I had had. He immediately arose, dressed himself, and left me, saying we were parted forever." He called—no, that I didn't say to Mr. Tilton. "I am indeed alone as never before." I think that was all I repeated of that note to him.

Q. You now refer to the first note? A. That was the first note.

Q. Now, please state when you had received that first note? A. It was Tuesday morning, I think—I think Tuesday morning. It was the morning following her coming before the Committee.

Q. You may state also if you had read it to your husband.

A. I think I handed the note to him or read it to him, I don't remember which. He knew the contents of the note.

Q. State what you said in regard to it or in giving the contents of the second note? A. I spoke of her health, my pleasure at her being better, and the contrast of the two notes. I think that was it. Do you wish me to state—

Q. I want you to state, Mrs. Ovington, what you have already stated, that you told him what the two notes contained, or the substance of them.

Mr. Beach—No, she has not stated that.

Mr. Hill—I beg pardon. [To the witness.] Now, you have given the one, or what you said in giving the contents of the one. Now, I would like you to give what you said in giving the contents of the other? A. It was after Mr. Tilton's return home. "I sang a new song this morning. Theo. returned at 12 o'clock last night: said that he had seen Gen. Tracy; that I carried the Committee, not only with me but for him. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul!' He again has restored confidence in me. I cannot—" Then spoke of riding—that she could not go to ride with me that day, as I had invited her to go to the beach.

Mr. Beach—Is that what you stated to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, as near as I can remember it—"As when her heart was light she wished to be home."

Mr. Hill—Did you state that to him as part of the contents of the letter? A. I think I did. I stated part of the contents of the letter, and I think I stated that I have given it as near as I can.

Q. Was anything said, in stating the contents of the letter, with respect to the opportunity which the Church had? A. I said that was in reference to Gen. Tracy. She wrote that Gen. Tracy had told him that she had carried the Committee, not only with her, but for him; she wished the church might realize how great their opportunity was to throw their arms around her dear husband. And, turning to him, I said, "Your wife loves you, Mr. Tilton."

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, go on with the conversation which occurred between yourself and your husband and Mr. Tilton after stating the contents of the letters? A. In speaking of her health my husband referred to her poor looks the day he called there, and I remarked that he had felt as I did, that she looked death struck. Said he: "No, not so bad as that," but then he again spoke and said: "You should see her to-day." Then he referred to this scandal.

MR. TILTON THINKS MR. BEECHER UNGENEROUS TOWARDS MRS. TILTON.

Q. Well, what did he say about that? A. He spoke of Mr. Beecher.

Q. State what he said? A. He said that Mr. Beecher had forced this thing upon him much against his will; that he had been called a knave and a fool, that he could not rest under that imputation, and that he felt Mr. Beecher could have come forward in regard to the Council that was called in the Spring, but he had not done so. There was so much said that I can hardly give it all.

Q. Well, was there anything further in regard to Mr.

Beecher? A. Yes, Sir, there was a great deal said, but I have forgotten much of it. I may recall it.

Q. Was anything said, Mrs. Ovington. in regard to what Mr. Beecher ought to have done for Mrs. Tilton? A. That was in speaking of Mrs. Tilton's position.

Q. Very well; state what was said upon that subject? A. He said, "Mr. Beecher is a coward." After Elizabeth had given all that a woman can give, or the best, I don't remember the exact expression, "how did he treat her? He should have come forward like a man and helped her, but he allowed her to rent the only two cool rooms in the house to boarders. I could never treat a lady in like manner that had served me as Elizabeth has Mr. Beecher, or has given herself to Mr. Beecher."

Q. Do you recollect where Mr. Tilton was then living, Mrs. Ovington, whether he was living with his wife at that time? A. He was—he had returned to her; he had left her on Tuesday.

Q. If you recollect any more—anything further that he stated upon that subject, please give it now? A. I think there was some little more, but I don't recall it; there was something in the same strain, but I cannot recall it.

Q. Anything said about Mr. Beecher's own home? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was said on that subject? A. I told Mr. Tilton my feelings in regard to Mr. and Mrs. Beecher; that it seemed impossible to me to believe—

Q. Wait a single moment. Go on now. You could scarcely be heard. A. That it seemed impossible to me that this story should be true; that I had known Mrs. Beecher for years intimately; I had known Mr. Beecher well; that I could not believe these things of him, neither could I believe it of his wife; that I felt he was laboring under a mistake; that he was mistaken, and I believed so at the time.

Q. Well, did you mention— A. And in speaking of Mrs. Beecher, he said that she had made her home a hell, that Mr. Beecher had never loved her; he never had loved any woman as he loved Elizabeth. It was in that connection that he spoke of her having given herself to him; it was at that time, in that connection.

MRS. TILTON EXONERATES MR. BEECHER TO MRS. OVINGTON.

Q. Did you say anything to Mr. Tilton upon that occasion with respect to any conversation which you had had with Mrs. Tilton in regard to the matter about her denial of the story? A. I said to him the remark that she made to me in giving the previous Monday.

Q. Now, state what you said in giving that to him? A. I told him that I had asked Mrs. Tilton: "Mrs. Tilton, I wish to ask you a question, not for my own satisfaction, but to give me the power to deny this thing. Has Mr. Beecher ever, by word, action, or conduct, done anything that was the least improper to you—has been the least improper; any impropriety, by either word, action or manner?"

Q. Yes? A. She looked in my face and said, "Never." I said I believed her.

Q. You told Mr. Tilton that? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S REFLECTIONS ON THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Let me ask you, Mrs. Ovington, was there anything said with reference to the character of the Committee men and the object of the investigation? A. Yes, Sir; he spoke quite at length; that was more particularly with my husband.

Q. But in your presence? A. I was present; yes, Sir.

Q. State what was said between them on that subject? A. He asked who the gentlemen of the Committee were, what kind of men, what the object of the Committee was. Mr. Ovington said that they had been called together, as he understood it, to investigate this matter, and had been called since the publishing of the Bacon letter, I think; then I said to Mr. Tilton: "Why did you publish the letter, Mr. Tilton?" Said he, "I did it for my own defense."

Q. Do you recollect anything further upon that subject? A. Yes, Sir; I will in a moment.

Q. Something else was said, do you say? A. Yes, Sir; there was. Oh, he asked as to the character of the gentlemen of the Committee; he asked my husband. Said he: "Do you know what are their views—their religious views? Is Mr. Sage, the Chairman, anything of a moralist?" Then I turned to Mr. Tilton, or when he was speaking the name, said I, "Mr. Tilton, if you suppose these gentlemen have been called together to try and clear Mr. Beecher, whether guilty or innocent, you are mistaken. Could you have sat in the parlor, as I did on Monday evening, looking in the face of each one of the Committee, you could believe that they were searching for the truth, and nothing but the truth, and although I love Mr. Beecher, and I love his wife, I could never, for one moment, stand by him if I considered him guilty."

Q. Well, have you now finished what was said upon that subject? If you recall anything farther, please give it, in this connection? A. Not at present, to me.

Q. You cannot recall anything more of that. Now, was anything said with respect to Mrs. Tilton making efforts to protect or screen her husband before the Committee? A. I said to Mr. Tilton, "She spoke beautifully for you, Mr. Tilton." Said I, "I believe no woman ever loved her husband more devotedly than she loves you."

Q. Well? A. I don't remember—I cannot, at present, recall anything more.

Q. Was anything said with reference to her lying for him? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tilton said—that was in the early part of the conversation.

Q. State what he said upon that subject? A. When he spoke of the fiction, I think it was, he said: "Elizabeth will lie for me. She would tell any number of lies to clear me. She loves me." He said, "Even if I were on trial for the Nathan murder, and she had seen me commit the act, do you think that she, if called upon to testify, do you think that she would tell the truth, and have me convicted?" He said, "No, she would not." Said he "Would you?" Said I, "I can hardly imagine such a case, but, Mr. Tilton, they are not parallel cases. If my husband was guilty of the murder, and an innocent man was on trial for his life, and about to be convicted, and I were called upon to testify, I believe that I should have to tell the truth, even though it convicted my husband, rather than that the innocent should suffer.

Q. What did he say to that? A. Said he, "No, you wouldn't—no, you wouldn't."

Q. Now, I will ask you, Mrs. Ovington, was there anything said about this conversation being confidential? A. As Mr. Tilton was leaving the piazza, said he, "This conversation is confidential, but," turning to me, "you may tell Elizabeth the whole of it."

Q. Now, can you recall anything further that was stated during this conversation; if not, I will pass to the next point? A. Not definitely, I cannot. There was of course three hours' conversation, and I cannot recall all of it.

Q. Now when did you next see Mrs. Tilton? A. The following morning.

Q. Now, state the circumstances; did you call upon her? A. I called for Mrs. Tilton at her house, and took her to Coney Island.

Q. Now, on the way to Coney Island was anything said between you and Mrs. Tilton with respect to the conversation which had occurred between her husband and yourself and Mr. Ovington on the piazza? A. I repeated it as nearly as I could, word for word.

Q. Mrs. Ovington, do you recollect any replies that Mrs. Tilton made as you were giving that conversation? A. She said—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—No. "Do you recollect," that is the question?

By Mr. Hill—Do you recollect whether she did or not? A. She did.

Q. Now, please state them?

Mr. Fullerton—It is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Hill, how do you think that can be received?

Mr. Hill—I suppose if Mr. Tilton refers this lady to his wife, to give a conversation, that it must certainly be implied that what she said in reply is to be received as part of it.

Judge Neilson—No, he gives his consent, as it were; or, if you please, instructions that she will or may repeat this to Mrs. Tilton. That is all. No, Sir, I cannot take it.

Mr. Evarts—The plaintiff, if your Honor please, makes a charge in regard to his wife, implicating this defendant. That is the gist of this action. All this evidence that we are giving here, as well as much that has been given in behalf of the plaintiff, has its bearing as showing the conduct and statements of the parties, as the rules of evidence permit them to be shown, or may permit them to be shown, bearing upon the truthfulness of one or the other view of this case. Now, Mr. Tilton, being a party to this conversation which this lady has given to the Court, says to her: "This is a conversation that is confidential, excepting you can tell Elizabeth all of it." and this lady goes to Elizabeth—goes to Mrs. Tilton, or, in her interview with Mrs. Tilton on the following day, narrates it, she says, as near as she could, it then being a recent conversation, word for word to her. Now, the manner in which Mrs. Tilton received this communication and the statement either of admission or silence or denial is a part of the very action of this witness, under the instruction of this plaintiff and toward his wife, and gives his license and his authority to the consequences of that communication. The communication, in this effect, as a fact and as a truth to influence the mind of this jury, seeking the truth, is incomplete, if the response of the wife to this communication, thus coming from the husband through the witness, is not made.

Judge Neilson—Notwithstanding Mr. Tilton's consent or authority to repeat this conversation to Mrs. Tilton, it is utterly immaterial, in my view, whether she availed herself of that permission and did repeat it to Mrs. Tilton or not. Of course it is immaterial to what Mr. Tilton said. I think I shall not receive it.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Mr. Hill—I will ask you, Mrs. Ovington, what Mrs. Tilton's manner was when you stated to—

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Hill—Let us take an exception then.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—We also offer to show that at this time she said this statement, that it was all fiction.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out also.

MRS. TILTON'S LAST DESERTION OF HER HUSBAND.

Q. When did you next see Mrs. Tilton, Mrs. Ovington, after that day when you took her to ride? A. The following morning at about half-past seven or seven o'clock.

Q. Now, be kind enough to begin with your first interview.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Hill.] Excuse me, I didn't hear the answer.

Mr. Hill—It was about half-past seven the next morning that she had her next interview with Mrs. Tilton. [To the witness.] Just begin with the interview and state all that occurred, giving, as near as you can recollect, the time, circumstance and place? A. Mrs. Tilton arrived at our house, I should say, at seven, perhaps half-past seven o'clock; I had not then finished dressing, and invited her to take a seat in an adjoining room, and spoke to her. She asked me if I had slept any.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Hill—In asking you to give all that occurred, I didn't want you to give all the conversation.

Mr. Shearman—Until Mr. Tilton was present.

Mr. Hill—Until Mr. Tilton arrived; then you may give all that occurred.

The Witness—Very shortly after her arrival, Mr. Tilton came and was shown into the parlor. Mr. Ovington went down and spoke a few words. I followed shortly after. He said that he had come to speak about Elizabeth. I told him that early in the morning I felt unfit for any conversation until I had taken a cup of coffee, and the breakfast bell had rung or was about to ring, and I asked him to breakfast with us. He declined at first, but afterward accepted. We went to the table. On he way to the breakfast table, Mr. Tilton and myself remained in the hall, and I there spoke to him in regard to his position in this matter. I said: "Mr. Tilton, why do you do this thing? Why did you publish this letter?" And, of course, at that time I was somewhat excited. I cannot remember definitely all that I said, but I plead with him to try and stop any trouble that was arising, and he made the remark—and I thought that he was sincere at the time. Says he: "Mrs. Ovington, tell me what to do and I will do it." He said: "Tell me, what shall I do?" Says I: "Mr. Tilton, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of this case to say anything about it. But," says I, "do what you know in the sight of God is right. That is all you need to do." I think he felt very deeply.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind that.

Mr. Hill—Never mind that. What did he do? How did he appear under your suggestion and advice?

The Witness—He appeared to me as though he were deciding the question in his mind.

Q. Well? A. We then went down to the breakfast table, he taking his seat beside his wife; I think directly beside her at the table. We breakfasted—ordinary conversation. My two children were present, and my husband, of course. After breakfast we went up-stairs into the parlor, Mrs. Tilton, Mr. Tilton, Mr. Ovington and myself. He said: "I wish to make some remarks; I wish to speak to you in the presence of Elizabeth. I think there is some misunderstanding or misapprehension in regard to the conversation held here on Thursday. Yesterday, upon her returning from her trip, I supposed that she had had a day of unmitigated pleasure. I thought her trouble—this subject had been scarcely referred to, as she said nothing to me on the subject, or very little. I supposed she had had a day of unmitigated pleasure. Much to my astonishment this morning, she came to my bedside and told me that she should leave me, and, Mrs. Ovington, I think it was something in the conversation you repeated to her yesterday that I think she is under a misapprehension." Said I: "Mr. Tilton, please remember upon your leaving yesterday you told me that I might tell Elizabeth the whole of your conversation; I have done so as nearly as I could, word for word." That seemed to settle the question. I think nothing more was said then.

Q. Do you recollect whether you then told Mr. Tilton what Mrs. Tilton had said in response to the statement which you made to her, when you repeated the conversation of the day before? A. I don't think I did; I don't remember that I did. Mr. Tilton spoke of her coming before the Committee. Said he: "For what Elizabeth has done, Mr. Beecher should kiss the hem of her garment." Upon the mention of Mr. Beecher's name, Mrs. Tilton got up and left the room and went up stairs. Then I think it was that Mr. Tilton spoke of Mrs. Tilton, and Mr. Ovington spoke of his position. Mr. Ovington asked him why he should go forward in this thing and drag in himself and his family, and Mr. Beecher, a man of his position and standing and goodness—how he could do it. Mr. Tilton then said: "I shall be the Samson which will destroy the temple. I will pull down the pillars of the temple, and although Mr. Beecher and my family are crushed, he shall be crushed with it."

Q. Well? A. Then he again remarked: "For what Elizabeth has said to that Committee, Mr. Beecher should kiss her hand." Said I: "Mr. Tilton, I hardly think that would look proper just now." Said he: "Metaphorically speaking." Then he said—he started to leave and called Elizabeth. She was up stairs. She did not come. I asked him if he wished to see her again. He said he did. She came down the stairs, standing at the foot of the stairs beside myself, Mr. Tilton facing us, and saying to me, "Mrs. Ovington, Elizabeth I think, has misunderstood me, but I wish you to understand that any kindness shown to Elizabeth is more than shown me, and come what may, do all you can for Elizabeth; whatever you do for her it is more than done for myself." Said I, "Mr. Tilton, I shall be to your wife as true a friend as I can." He left us, placing first one hand on Elizabeth's shoulder, the other on mine, drawing us together while he was conversing in this manner. He directly, I think, then left the house. Then Mrs. Tilton told us of her having left her husband for the first time.

Q. Did you know that Mrs. Tilton had left her husband for good, until she made that statement to you, after the conversation, after he left? A. I did not.

Q. Mrs. Ovington, I will ask you this question: Did—

The Witness—Shall I qualify that Mr. Hill?

Mr. Hill—State the fact, whatever it was. A. I did not know that she had left him for good; I only knew that she had the offer of coming to me at any time that she chose to.

Q. Yes? A. I had made the offer to her.

MRS. TILTON UNINFLUENCED BY THE OVINGTONS IN THE DESERTION.

Q. Now, I will ask you this, had you at any time or under any circumstances solicited Mrs. Tilton to come to you and leave her husband and her home? A. I never did.

Q. Do you know whether any of your family did, or not? A. Not that I know of.

Q. Do you know whether your husband opposed it? A. Not strictly opposed her coming to me.

Q. Oh, I don't think it necessary to go into that inquiry between Mrs. Ovington and her husband.

Mr. Hill—What occurred on that subject?

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—It sufficiently appears. It does not appear that she was solicited by either of them to do so.

Mr. Everts—All we can do, if your Honor please, is to offer to prove that this family had no action in it.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is enough.

Mr. Everts—And, if we offer the point blank question and it is ruled out, why then—

Judge Neilson—It has been proved sufficiently.

Mr. Beach—Of course we must object to what passed between Mr. and Mrs. Ovington on this subject. It is entirely incompetent evidence.

Judge Neilson—I think we have had sufficient evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—They may offer incompetent evidence until doomsday, but it proves nothing.

Judge Neilson—Well, proceed Mr. Hill.

MRS. OVINGTON'S AND MRS. TILTON'S SUMMER TRIP.

Mr. Hill—Mrs. Ovington, how soon after this interview, which you have just given at your house, was it that you left the city for the Summer? A. I think I left the first Monday in August. I think that was the first or second day, was it not?

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton go with you? A. She did,

Q. Now, just state to his Honor and the jury, about how many newspaper men were to visit you before you went away? A. It would be impossible, I think.

Q. Were they very numerous? A. Very many; I think there was not a half hour in the day but there was some call—persons to see—asking for Mrs. Tilton; sending messengers to her as reporters from different parts of the country, and from Brooklyn, to her very great annoyance.

Q. You then left the city? Where did you go with Mrs. Tilton, or she with you? A. I went to Ridgefield, Connecticut.

Q. And from there where? How long did you stay at Ridgefield by the way? A. I think it was eight days; I am not certain. It was one or two weeks. Mr. Caldwell will know.

Q. That, at all events, was your first stopping place? A. It was.

Q. Where did you go from there? A. To Fairfield.

Q. How long did you stay there? A. I think it was two weeks, or nearly two.

Q. And from there you went where? A. From there to Washington, Connecticut, and finding Mr. Gunn encamped at Lake Waramang, a few miles from his house, we went to the hotel and stayed the remainder of the trip there.

Q. How long was that—about how long—I don't ask for the exact time? A. From Tuesday of one week to the following Monday; I think that is correct.

Q. You mentioned Ridgefield, I think, in your examination this morning before, as the place to which Florence went by mistake? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Whose mistake was that that you referred to? A. It was a misunderstanding. Mr. Ovington supposed that Mrs. Tilton and myself were still—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. I think Mr. Ovington can tell what he supposed better than his wife.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Hill—She went to Ridgefield, by Mr. Ovington's suggestion, and she was then gone to Fairfield.

Mr. Fullerton—That she does not know. How could she know that?

Mr. Hill—She probably knows it as well as you do.

Mr. Fullerton—And no better; that is the difficulty. We don't either of us know it.

Q. She did go to Ridgefield, and from Ridgefield to Fairfield? A. No, Sir; she came from Ridgefield to New-York or Elizabeth, and then receiving the telegram from her mother, on Thursday, I think, to come to Fairfield, she came to Fairfield, and remained with us the rest of the trip.

Q. And who paid her expenses? A. I did; she offered to pay them, Mr. Hill, herself—offered to pay her own and her mother's expenses, but I paid them; I told her I would rather pay them myself; she allowed me to do so.

DEBATE ON A DULL TECHNICAL QUESTION.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, if you will allow me to recall, what we consider a matter of some importance, the recent ruling of your Honor excluding the answer of Mrs. Tilton to the communication made to her by this witness under the authority of the plaintiff. We had given in evidence the showing of the letter to Mr. Tilton, and the counsel undertook—this was in Mr. Moulton's examination—and the counsel undertook to show Mr. Tilton's statements made to the witness when the letter was so shown to him, and the question came up whether what Mr. Tilton said should be allowed. We objected to it. Your Honor said: "On what ground is it evidence?" Mr. Fullerton, said: "It is a part of the res gestæ. They prove that the letter was exhibited to Mrs. Tilton, and they mean to draw an inference from it." "Mr. Beach—They seek to conclude him by the contents of the letter—his seeing it. Now, what answer did he make?" "Mr. Fullerton—They mean to argue that he acquiesced in the sentiments expressed in that letter. Now they cannot foreclose Mr. Tilton in that way." I argued as I best might against that proposition—that rule of evidence, holding that it did not come within the res gestæ. Then Mr. Beach says to me, after one of my arguments: "Counsel will observe that we ask no questions as to the declarations of Mr. Tilton, in regard to the letter which he drafted and sent to Mr. Beecher; the question is as to the letter from Mr. Beecher, which was presented to him." Your Honor then observes: "I understand that. What did he say when he saw that letter? I think he can give that, Sir," speaking to myself. "Mr. Evarts—Doesn't it transcend any rule as yet considered, whereby everything that passed between this witness and third person, including Mr. Tilton, in order to affect Mr. Beecher, has been brought home to him. Now, that has not been done." Your Honor says: "This is a part of the act of receiving the letter. I admit it with that view." "Mr. Fullerton—It was a letter that they put in evidence." I say: "If your Honor please, Mr. Moulton receives a letter from Mr. Beecher, and goes and shows it to Tilton, and the conversation between them is to be given in evidence." Your Honor says: "As a part of the act; yes, Sir." Mr. Beach says: "That is what they prove—showing the letter to Mr. Tilton—for without that they could not introduce it at all, and upon the theories that he approved it when it was brought to his attention. Mr. Evarts—The theory is of proving that he made the answer which we have given in evidence. Judge Neilson—We will receive what was said in immediate connection of receiving the letter. Mr. Evarts—Between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton"—what was said between them. Your Honor says, "Yes." I then closed the matter: "Your Honor will be so kind as to note our exception."

Now, to show how far this went in the actual answer,

Mr. Moulton goes on to state that when this letter of Mr. Beecher to him, Moulton, complaining of his retaining or publishing private letters—the point was what Mr. Tilton said upon having that letter shown, and then Mr. Moulton went on to narrate a considerable statement, and your Honor recognized it as coming within the rule that you had established. The witness says:

He said to me, "Don't you remember in that connection that Mr. Beecher wanted me to go and see Mrs. Hooker, and that I did go to see Mrs. Hooker and that I did for the purpose of quieting her as against the making of the charge of adultery against him, charging her with adultery; and don't you remember upon the same authority, I mean that she proposed to charge Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton with adultery, and I came back and told Mr. Beecher that, and he seemed to be satisfied with it, and was delighted with it; don't you remember that? He said to me, and he recalled it, and I did remember it."

That is the situation which we suppose that Mrs. Tilton is placed in, with this further point; that this communication made through this witness to Mrs. Tilton of the conversation that had occurred between Mr. Tilton and herself, the witness, was made by the permissive authority, or the instruction, as it may be construed, one way or the other, of this plaintiff. Now it becomes, as I imperfectly argued to your Honor when the question first came up, a part of the communication, so as that what your Honor has characterized as a part of the act of receiving the communication, what the party to whom the communication was made said in the act of receiving the communication. Now, that it was in writing instead of a conversation, cannot, as we apprehend, make any difference, and your Honor's ruling seems to us to cover the proposition which we have now occasion to make, as it did against the objection to the situation then produced.

Mr. Beach—The proposition is, Sir, to prove what was said by a third person, not a party to this controversy, upon hearing the narrative of a conversation on the part of Mr. Tilton, which he authorized to be communicated to her. On the first ruling upon this proposition, your Honor was of the opinion that the license given by Mr. Tilton to Mrs. Ovington to repeat what he had said in the interview with Mrs. Ovington to Mrs. Tilton was by no means an authority to receive any declarations which Mrs. Tilton might make upon the repetition of that interview; and that would seem to be very obvious. Mr. Tilton pronounces the conversation confidential, with a single exception, leaving it entirely to the option of Mrs. Ovington whether or not she should make the communication to Mrs. Tilton, conferring upon her no authority, delegating to her no agency, but qualifying the restriction which he placed upon her in regard to a possible communication of that conversation to third parties. Now, the counsel suppose that the ruling which your Honor made upon the proposition that where a statement by the authority of one party to a litigation is made to the other party to the litigation, that the manner in which that communication is received by the party to the litigation to whom it is made is admissible, and for the reason, Sir, that the action and the conduct of the party to whom that communication is made serves to give character and significance to the communication itself. To make the cases entirely parallel, the license of Mr. Tilton should have been to Mrs. Ovington to communicate the interview he had with her to Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Beach, you are mistaken in supposing that there was any such relation as that. The letter then in question was a letter written by Mr. Beecher to Mr. Moulton, and which Mr. Moulton of his own motion had shown to Mr. Tilton. It was no part of Mr. Beecher's letter to Mr. Moulton that it should be shown.

Judge Neilson—Which party proved in that case that the letter was shown to Mr. Tilton, do you remember?

Mr. Beach—They proved it.

Judge Neilson—So I understand. Well, is not that the distinction?

Mr. Beach—That is just the distinction which I am endeavoring to present to your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—But it was not by any authority of Mr. Beecher that Mr. Moulton has shown it to Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—You prove that the letter was shown to Mr. Tilton and then they interrogate as to the manner in which Mr. Tilton received it.

Mr. Beach—Precisely, Sir.

Judge Neilson—That distinguishes the case from the present.

Mr. Beach—And that would have made the illustration which I give perfect; that is, a communication by Mrs. Ovington of this conversation with Tilton to Mr. Beecher with Tilton's consent and approbation, authorizing her to make that repetition. If that had been the state of this case, why, it would have been parallel with the ruling which your Honor made upon the previous question to which the counsel has referred.

Judge Neilson—In the previous instance, if I remember right, one party proves a presentation of a letter to Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The party does that by his own election, and with his own view, and then the other party, as I concede, with a right, did call for what was said in that immediate conversation.

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And in that instance the rule of law was recognized and illustrated. I think you illustrated it by a supposed assault and battery.

Mr. Beach—Yes; that was the precise ruling which your Honor made.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—And you made it because the action and conduct of the party to the litigation to whom the communication was made was material and essential to the issue, but the conduct of Mrs. Tilton at the time Mrs. Ovington made this communication to her is entirely unimportant.

Judge Neilson—Especially as they had their own election showing that the communication was made, and they also wanted to follow it up.

Mr. Evarts—We will look at the record a little further.

Judge Neilson—That distinguishes the case. I still think that the disposition made of it a moment ago was correct. I am satisfied about this, gentlemen. Proceed, Mr. Hill. Mr. Hill, will you proceed with your examination?

Mr. Hill—There is only a single question.

Judge Neilson—I have spent time enough on it.

Mr. Morris—The Court has decided the question.

Mr. Hill—Well, the Court is able to speak for itself, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Fullerton—You don't seem to be able to hear what he says.

Mr. Everts—I told your Honor I would look at the record.

Judge Neilson—I think we have the record.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor is correct, I think, in the view that on the cross-examination we proved that the letter addressed to Mr. Moulton by Mr. Beecher had been shown to Mr. Tilton. Your Honor was right about it.

Judge Neilson—Then the other side claims the right to show—

Mr. Everts—To show this conversation, what he said upon its being shown to him in that regard. Now, the difficulty there was this, that his being a party to this action made a difference in his favor, because then it would be, as it were, making testimony for himself. It was on that general proposition that our objection arose, that what the party said himself could not be given in evidence for himself. Here we have the element which was entirely wanting in that case, and that is, that the communication then up as the occasion for the testimony which was sought to be introduced and objected to—the communication was made, not by authority of the party, the opposite party, not by Mr. Beecher's authority. It was a communication that so far as Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton were concerned began and ended between them. Mr. Moulton then takes the letter, and by means of taking that letter to Mr. Tilton brings into evidence the manner in which Mr. Tilton received the letter. Now, your Honor says that because we show on our side that the letter came to Mr. Tilton's knowledge and notice, that that makes the difference, and gives them the right; but we show in this situation that the communication was made by the authority of Mr. Tilton to his wife, and that the reception is a part of the res gestæ, just as much in this case as it was in that. It does not depend, nor is it varied or affected by any diversity of circumstances; nor, we submit, does the question of whether or no it is justly a part of the res gestæ depending upon the question which party in the litigation introduces this or that branch of the evidence. We have the conversation with Tilton that binds him. We have the communication by his permissive authority to his wife, and under that authority we have proved it, and now the question whether of this res the wife's reception forms a part which leaves the truth incomplete without its statement, is precisely the same question as whether the communication of the letter to Tilton—the communication of the letter to Moulton, made by himself to Tilton—leaves the truth incomplete unless, as a part of its res, its reception is proved.

Judge Neilson—In the former instance the defendant's counsel proved, as they had a right to, that the letter was presented to Mr. Tilton by the witness, Moulton. The defendant's counsel elected to put that evidence in. That, as the Court at that time understood it, gave the plaintiff's counsel the right to interrogate as to the act of presentation and of reception; what constituted part of the act, the act of delivering the letter and the act of receiving it. And that is strikingly distinguished from the present case, where the defendant's counsel elects to show that this conversation was communicated to Mr. Tilton, and wishes to follow it up by showing what transpired in that connection to the extent of giving her declarations. I think this disposition, made a moment ago, of this question is correct.

Mr. Hill—Your Honor will be so good as to note my exception. Permit me, your Honor; counsel have suggested that I present another question, with the view of presenting this exception more pointedly. [To the witness.] When you told Mrs. Tilton, on the way to Coney Island, in repeating the conversation to her which had occurred upon the piazza at your house, between yourself and Mr. Tilton—when you told her that her husband had stated, as his charges against herself and Mr. Beecher, did she say anything in respect to those charges, admitting or denying them?

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to.

Mr. Hill—If so, what did she say in that respect? That presents it.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Hill—That is objected to; overruled; and exception.

Judge Neilson—Are you through with your examination, Mr. Hill?

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To the plaintiff's counsel]—Gentlemen, will you proceed?

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. OVINGTON.

By Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Ovington, you have spoken of several interviews with Mr. Tilton in the Summer of 1874; have you named all of the interviews that you had with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. After Mrs. Tilton came to your house? A. No, Sir.

Q. You had other interviews with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many? A. Two or three, I think.

Q. Where did they take place? A. In the parlor; front parlor, I think.

Q. Of your house? A. Of our house; yes, Sir.

Q. And in whose presence? A. The first one?

OTHER INTERVIEWS BETWEEN MR. TILTON AND THE OVINGTONS.

Q. I refer now to the interviews of which you have not spoken in your direct examination? A. Yes, Sir; I think the first interview I had was when Mr. Charles Storrs was there, when Mr. Tilton arrived, on a Sabbath in July; my husband was also present. The second interview—there may have been another; I think not until September—I don't know whether it was the first of September or July; but there was a second interview a Sabbath afternoon, when I saw him alone, with the exception, I think, of about fifteen minutes before he left. My husband came home and entered the parlor.

Q. Those two interviews, then, and those to which your attention was called on your direct examination, are all that you had with Mr. Tilton, were they? A. It is all that I can recall.

Q. Now? A. Yes, Sir—it is possible—that is all, I think.

Q. Well, if any other occurs to you hereafter, you can name it? A. Thank you.

MISS FLORENCE'S VISITS TO HER MOTHER.

Q. You spoke of Florence's visits to your house until her father forbade her, did you not? A. Of her remaining at our house until her father forbade her.

Q. How long did she remain at your house? A. One night.

Q. And when was that? A. On the night of our return from Washington, Conn.

Q. Were you present when her father forbade her? A. I was not.

Q. Then you don't know that he did forbid her, of your own knowledge? A. I have only her word for it.

Q. You don't know of your own knowledge, that he did forbid her; do you? A. Do you mean that I didn't hear it from Mr. Tilton? Is that what you mean?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, ma'm.

The Witness—I did not.

Mr. Beach—Well, you don't know from him? A. No, Sir; I don't.

Mr. Fullerton—Did she visit your house after that? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Up to what period? A. I should think about three weeks ago; I am not positively certain; I think it is about that time, perhaps—

Q. Was she told not to come again, at that time? A. I understood she was.

Q. Were you present when she was so told? A. No, Sir.

Q. But she has not been there since? A. She has not been there since.

MISS FLORENCE WISHES TO ATTEND HER MOTHER IN COURT.

Q. Were you present at any time when any request was made of Florence to attend her mother on this trial from day to day? A. No, Sir; I was not.

Q. Did you hear anything said to her upon that subject? A. I did not.

Q. Were you not aware of the fact that she was requested to attend with her mother at this trial?

Mr. Hill—We object.

The Witness—No, Sir; I was aware of the fact that she wished to attend her mother on this trial, and plead with her mother, or requested two or three times over that she might accompany her mother here, saying that it would be a favor to her if her mother would allow her to come into the court room with her, if she was to enter the court room.

Mr. Fullerton—When did that take place? A. It was shortly before the trial; I think the Sabbath before.

Q. At your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You heard this request made by Florence? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did not hear it? A. I say she made the request.

Q. I say, did you hear the request made? A. I did not.

Q. Then you don't know that it was made of your own knowledge? A. I don't.

Q. No; it is all hearsay, then? A. Mrs. Tilton's word for it.

Q. I don't ask who told you; it was all hearsay that that was so? A. Yes, Sir; I was not present.

Mr. Shearman—You asked the lady if she was aware of it.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; we did not ask if she was aware of it. You objected to that question when we put it to the other point.

Mr. Shearman—We objected to it and allowed it to pass.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; we asked this lady whether she was aware that Miss Florence had been forbidden to call on her mother at the house. That the counsel objected to. We put another question, Sir, and she goes on and states hearsay.

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, they asked her whether she was aware that Florence had been forbidden, and she answers no, that she was aware that she had desired to attend.

Mr. Fullerton—And was not aware of it at all when she said so, except by hearsay.

Mr. Evarts—Just as much as she was what she was aware of, as what your question called upon her to be aware of what you asked her.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I am not aware of what that means, and cannot answer it.

The Witness—Mr. Fullerton, if you will allow me, I am not accustomed to the witness stand; I wish to answer you directly.

Mr. Fullerton—I have not any doubt about that, Mrs. Ovington, at all, and I did not mean to censure you in the slightest degree by anything that I said.

Judge Neilson—I think the witness was perfectly fair about it.

Mr. Fullerton—I understood you as relating what you knew of your own knowledge, and it turned out that you did not, and that is all there is of it.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton]: Now, move to strike it out.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; I am going to that. Now, Sir, I move to strike out what is said upon that subject.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir. Proceed now.

Mr. Beach—I think Mrs. Ovington should be cautioned, if your Honor please, in answer to our questions, not to give hearsay testimony any further. We cannot tell whether she is speaking from knowledge, or from what she may have heard from others.

Mr. Hill—I submit that when she attempted to say what she was aware of, the gentleman ought not to make that suggestion.

Judge Neilson—The question "Were you aware of a certain thing?" would, in the estimation of a lawyer, or of counsel putting it, call for personal knowledge; in the estimation of a witness not accustomed to those proceedings, it would call for general information.

Mr. Fullerton—But I did not ask her for general information. I did not ask her if she was aware of the fact at all.

Judge Neilson—It is right enough now.

The Witness—I do not understand it.

Mr. Everts—If we were to criticise the question in the lawyer's intelligence of it, we should apprehend that it was framed so that he might possibly draw out information not within her own knowledge that would be favorable to them, or it would not have been objected to.

Judge Neilson—Well, if that had been the case on your motion, I should have stricken it out as being hearsay.

Mr. Everts—That may be, but she answers in the same sense, "I was aware of that state of things."

Mr. Beach—We may as well understand this. Our question put to this lady was: "Were you not aware that Miss Florence was requested to attend her mother?" She answered that question, Sir, and then goes on, irresponsively, to state the contrary fact from hearsay—utterly inadmissible.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think that is understood now.

Mr. Fullerton—Then that is out. [Some suggestion being made that it was about time to adjourn, Mr. Fullerton looked up at the clock.]

Judge Neilson—I will watch the clock, Mr. Fullerton; you go on. [Laughter.]

THE INTERCOURSE BETWEEN THE TILTONS AND OVINGTONS AGAIN DESCRIBED.

Mr. Fullerton—I was afraid your Honor might omit it. [To the witness.] Now, Mrs. Ovington, I want to call your attention to this first interview in your house, when your husband was at the gate. A. What did you say?

Q. Your interview with Mr. Tilton—with Mrs. Tilton—in your house, when your husband was at the gate?

Judge Neilson—That was in Mr. Tilton's house, I think.

Mr. Fullerton—In Mr. Tilton's house, I should have said.

The Witness—I do not understand you.

Mr. Fullerton—You say that Mr. Tilton returned after conversing with your husband, and came into the house? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you not? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—I misunderstood you.

Mr. Beach—No, she didn't say that.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you have any conversation with Mr. Tilton on that day? A. None but the remarks that I made, that I gave; after I had gone into the carriage that day—that afternoon.

Q. And it was the next day, was it, that you came? A. The following morning.

Q. The following morning you came there? A. The following morning, Monday.

Q. And then it was that you had the conversation with Mr. Tilton? A. In Mr. Tilton's parlor.

Q. Have you related all which took place, that you remember, at that time? A. I think I have; there might have been more said; probably was.

Q. Is that the conversation when your husband—when Mr.

Tilton requested you to inform your husband that he wished him to call upon him? A. It was.

Q. And that he would open his heart as a brother? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What else did Mr. Tilton say at that time? A. He said he thought my husband to be a just man, that he would like to see him, to talk over this matter.

Q. Did he say anything about this difficulty at that time, in which he was involved? A. He did not particularize; I think he may have referred to it; I think he did; I do not remember in what words.

Q. Didn't he say in that conversation that his defense, which he had made, and was to make, was forced upon him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he say that he would be destroyed, unless he defended himself, by those imputations that were cast upon him? A. Not at that interview he didn't.

Q. Did he speak of Dr. Bacon's letter, and of his articles in The Independent at that time? A. I do not know whether it was that morning or the morning on the piazza at our house; he spoke of it at one interview.

Q. You are not able to distinguish between the two later views, probably? A. No, Sir, but he did make those remarks.

Q. Well, if you can recollect anything else that he said on the Monday morning that you have spoken of, I wish you now to relate it. A. I do not recollect anything except that he was glad to have Elizabeth go out, that he thought it would benefit her, he was glad that she should divert her mind; some such remark as that is all I remember.

Q. He spoke kindly of her, did he? A. Very kindly: yes, Sir.

Q. Well, the following morning, I understand, you called there—July 6th? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And took her out to drive? A. Yes, Sir; in the morning.

Q. Well, the following day? A. The following day was not July the 6th.

Q. I so noted it; perhaps I am wrong. Then it was July 6th, at all events, that you took her out to ride? A. The second ride; yes, Sir.

Q. And you went to the Park? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go to the Park first? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then you returned to the city, as I understand you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you left Mrs. Tilton at your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At her request? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you go anywhere else that day, except to the Park? A. I did.

Q. Where did you go? A. With Mrs. Tilton, do you mean?

Q. Yes? A. I didn't go anywhere with Mrs. Tilton but to the Park and to my own house.

Q. And after you arrived at your house where did you go—anywhere? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where? A. To Mr. Beecher's house.

Q. What time in the day was that? A. I should judge about four o'clock, as well as I could remember.

Q. How long did you stay at Mr. Beecher's house? A. I did not enter; Mr. Beecher wasn't at home.

Q. How did you learn that fact? A. The servant told me so.
 Q. At the door? A. At the door; I didn't enter.
 Q. Was Mr. Beecher whom you wished to see? A. I wished to see Mr. Beecher.
 Q. And not Mrs. Beecher, or any other member of the family? A. Mr. Beecher.
 Q. Well, did you inquire where Mr. Beecher was? A. I did.
 Q. Did you learn? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Did you make any further effort to find him that day? A. I did.
 Q. What effort did you make? A. I called at Mr. Moses Beach's house, thinking he might be there; I called at Mr. J. T. Howard's house; then, returning, to my own house.
 Q. You didn't find him at either of those places? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Did you leave any message for him at either of those places? A. At his own house I did.
 Q. What message did you leave? A. I asked the servant to please say to Mr. Beecher that Mrs. Ovington had called and wished to see him particularly.
 Q. Is that all the message that you left; as near as you can recollect? A. I asked at what hour he would be at home. She said she thought at six o'clock, for his tea. I said to say to him that if I were able I would try to call around and see him; that I was very anxious to see him.
 Q. Yes: did you know at that time that the Committee was called? A. I did not.
 Q. Didn't know anything about it? A. No, Sir.
 The Court here took a recess until two o'clock.

MRS. OVINGTON'S CALL ON MR. BEECHER.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Maria N. Ovington was recalled, and the cross-examination resumed.

Mr. Fullerton—At the time that you left the message for Mr. Beecher, Mrs. Ovington, did you request that he should call to see you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you appoint a time when you would call again to see him? A. I said if he would be in at six o'clock, if I were able I would call around to see him.

Q. Did you call at that hour? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you go to Mr. Beecher's house again that day? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. At what time? A. A little past six, I think it was; between six and seven o'clock.

Q. That evening? A. That evening.

Q. Did you desire to see him in regard to any matter of your own? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Hill—We object.

Judge Neilson—We will take that, I think. Go on, Sir.

Mr. Hill—What she desired—without expressing it.

Judge Neilson—Did she desire to see him on any matter of hers?

Mr. Fullerton—She would not express the desire if she hadn't any.

Judge Neilson—It is a very harmless thing, and may be preliminary to something else.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason why they object.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—You found Mr. Beecher at home then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have an interview with him? A. I did.

Q. How long in duration? A. I could not say; I should think twenty minutes; perhaps a little longer.

Q. Any third person present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who was present? A. Gen. Tracy.

Q. Did you meet Gen. Tracy there? A. I did.

Q. By appointment? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you know that he was going before you went? A. I knew he was to see Mr. Beecher before I came there.

Q. How did you learn that fact? A. He called at my house.

Q. That afternoon? A. About five o'clock; yes, Sir.

Q. Then, we will return to your house. Was that Gen. Tracy's first call at your house? A. It was.

Q. Were you acquainted with Mr. Tracy up to that time? A. I had never seen him to know him before.

Q. He was a stranger to you, then? A. A stranger; yes, Sir.

Q. Did he come at your request? A. No, Sir; he did not.

Q. Did you know that he was coming before he came? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. It took you by surprise, then, somewhat, that he called, did it? A. Yes, Sir; I did not know he was coming; yes, Sir, it did.

Q. Who presented you to him, or he to you? A. He presented himself.

Q. Introduced himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And stated his business? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that before or after you first went to Mr. Beecher's house? A. After my first call at Mr. Beecher's house.

Q. Was it agreed between you and Mr. Tracy that you should go to Mr. Beecher's house? A. Providing Mr. Beecher would see me I was to go to Mr. Beecher's house.

Q. Did you learn before you did go the second time whether he would see you or not? A. I did.

Q. From whom? A. From Mr. Shearman.

Q. The gentleman upon the other side? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And what time, pray, did you see Mr. Shearman? A. I did not see Mr. Shearman; I received a note from him soon after six o'clock.

Q. Have you that note? A. I have not; I think not; I have not found it.

Q. You think it is destroyed? A. I think it is.

Q. Do you know how Mr. Shearman learned that you wanted to see Mr. Beecher? A. I presume—I don't know.

Q. Did you see Mr. Shearman at Mr. Beecher's house when you first called? A. I did not.

Q. Were you informed that Mr. Shearman would give you information as to whether Mr. Beecher would, or would not see you? A. I was not.

Q. What time did you get Mr. Shearman's note? A. Shortly after six o'clock.

Q. Shortly after six o'clock? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you went then directly to Mr. Beecher's house, did you? A. I did.

Q. Did you expect to see Mr. Tracy there? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Now, Mr. Tracy came to your house after you met him at Mr. Beecher's? A. The second time he did.

Q. And how long after you saw him at Mr. Beecher's did he go to your house the second time? A. I should think half an hour, perhaps; I am not exact.

Q. Did he return with you? A. He did not.

Q. Did he return to your house before or after you did? A. After I did.

Q. After you did? A. Yes, Sir.

THE CONVERSATION AT THE INTERVIEW WITH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, please state what took place between you and Mr. Beecher? A. I told Mr. Beecher I had called in the afternoon with a message from Mrs. Tilton to him, saying that she wished to say to him that she wished to meet some of the brethren of the church, and if he could arrange that she might, or if she could see some of them, it would be a very great privilege.

Q. Well, that is not all, I presume, is it? A. No, Sir; I asked Mr. Beecher what he thought of it. I asked him if he could see Mrs. Tilton. He said he could not, but he would give the message to me, saying that if Mrs. Tilton had anything to say in the cause of truth, he would be very glad, indeed, for her to say it. I then said to him the second time: "It is by her request that she should see some of the brethren of the church; she wishes to speak with them." Mr. Beecher—in the first place when I went in, he read from a paper that he held, this same remark. He said that as I had called in the afternoon, Gen. Tracy he had sent to me to know what I wished of him, and when Gen. Tracy returned to Mr. Beecher he told him that I had a message from Mrs. Tilton. "I," he says, "have written this on the paper, but I will read it to you," and he read it aloud, and that was the substance that he said to me afterward: "If Mrs. Tilton has anything to say in truth—truthfully in regard to this subject, I shall be very glad to have her." I said to him: "Mr. Beecher, could you have seen Elizabeth Tilton as I have this afternoon, you could not doubt her desire to come forward and take her stand, and what she considers to be the right. She says she utterly denies the fact that she has said anything in regard to this matter lately. The Bacon letter was published without her knowledge. When that letter was published, but a very short time afterwards, she went to her brother's office, in New-York—Mr. Joseph Richards—and told him she wished Mr. Oliver Johnson sent for to confer with them. Mr. Johnson came to the office. Mrs. Tilton said that she would like to publish a card, taking, saying, or writing the truth of this matter." That was the amount that she said about Mr. Richards and Mr. Johnson. I may not have worded it correctly. Mr. Richards advised her taking no step in the matter. He thought it best for her not to do so. Mr. Johnson told her he thought it best to consider that; he would think it over, but not to do it immediately.

Said I, "Mr. Beecher, she has also gone to her father, Judge Morse, and he told her he thought the time had not yet come; he thought a way would be opened to her. She told me this afternoon, 'When I woke this morning I felt the way was opened, and I believe the Lord has sent you to me this afternoon to help me in this way.'" I told Mr. Beecher my remark to Mrs. Tilton at that time. Said I, "Anything that I can do to help or aid you I shall very cheerfully do." And again I told Mr. Beecher her position, that had she weighed this matter carefully—said I, "When Mrs. Tilton made these remarks to me, that she wished to see some of the brethren of the church, I said to her, 'Mrs. Tilton, have you weighed this matter well? Do you consider what it will lead to?' She hesitated an instant and then replied: 'Yes, I have well considered and prayed over it. It may end in a separation from my husband.'" Says I, "I asked her, 'Is that all?' Says she, 'I may lose every child I have; I may lose every friend in the world, but, Mrs. Ovington, that will not deter me.' Says I, 'Thank God for that.' I then made up my mind"—

Q. No, no, not your mind. Tell us what you told Mr. Beecher? A. I told Mr. Beecher, I then and there made up my mind—

Q. Ah, well, that will do. A. That anything I could in any way serve Mrs. Beecher—Mrs. Tilton, as a true, firm friend, I intended to do it, and I then said to her when she made this remark, as I said to Mr. Beecher—said I, "I said that I would be her friend so long as I lived, and, Mr. Beecher, I intend to be that." Then I said to him again: "Mr. Beecher, she is anxious to see some of the brethren of the church. How can it be arranged?" He turned to Gen. Tracy, and said he, "Will the gentlemen meet to-night." Then, turning to me, "There is a committee from the church appointed to investigate this matter, and if Mrs. Tilton wishes to see them at any time, I think they can meet her." Says I, "When?" Says he, "When she wishes." Says I, "The sooner the better." "Why?" "Because she has said to me that she has made up her mind to request me to attend to it as soon as possible." Mr. Beecher then said to Gen. Tracy, "Could the gentlemen be got together?" or, "Will they be got together?" I don't remember which phrase he used. Gen. Tracy said he thought they could. Says I, "Mr. Beecher, I cannot answer for Mrs. Tilton. She is waiting at our house for your answer. I will go back and give it to her, and if you will send around, I will give you her answer." I then went home and gave it. Is that all you wish?

Q. Yes, that is all. This paper that Mr. Beecher read from was prepared, as I understand you, before you got there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Please repeat again what it contained. A. He said the paper—I don't think it was headed or signed; I don't remember that. It was but a piece of paper, and as he entered the room he was evidently shaking it, or was shaking it to dry the ink, as I supposed. He held the paper and read from it two or three lines.

Q. Please repeat as near you can recollect what was in that paper? A. I think he referred to my having asked to see him, with a message from Mrs. Tilton; I think so.

The wording I don't remember; I felt—I must not speak my own feelings.

Q. Please not, ma'm? A. I am unused to the stand, you will see."

Q. Was the paper addressed to you? A. I do not think it was. I did not see the paper.

Q. Now, proceed. A. "Anything that Mrs. Tilton can say truthfully in regard to this matter I should be very glad to have her say."

Q. Well, you were requested by Mrs. Tilton to go down and see Mr. Beecher, were you? A. I was.

Q. And say to him that she wished to see some of the brethren? A. I was.

Q. Well, did it occur to you that Mrs. Tilton could see the brethren without asking Mr. Beecher to assist her or help her in any way? A. I proffered my friendship.

Q. No; I understand that. Did that occur to you at the time? A. No, Sir.

Q. That there was no use in seeing the brethren through Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. Your husband was one of the brethren, wasn't he? A. He is a member of the church; yes, Sir.

Q. And these gentlemen he did meet at your house lived in the neighborhood, did they not, some of them? A. I think most of them did.

Q. You were not requested to go and see any of the brethren and ask them to confer with her, were you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did anything else occur at Mr. Beecher's before you left? A. I do not remember anything else.

Q. Are you quite sure that Mr. Beecher asked whether the Committee would meet? A. He asked Gen. Tracy if the Committee were to meet that evening.

Q. When was it?

Mr. Beach—What did Gen. Tracy say?

Mr. Fullerton—What did he reply? A. He expected they would.

Q. Wasn't this a special meeting? A. I do not know, Sir.

Q. Didn't you learn that at the interview at Mr. Beecher's? A. No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you didn't know that a meeting was appointed at your house, did you? A. The meeting was not then appointed at my house.

Q. Did you know at that time that the Committee had met? A. I had not known it until I—until Mr. Beecher told me so at that time.

Q. You didn't know that the Committee had been appointed, did you? A. I did not know it, Sir.

Q. Although it was appointed by Mr. Beecher? A. I did not know it.

Q. When was it that Mrs. Tilton told you that it might lead to a separation from her husband? A. On the drive to the island.

Q. Coney Island? A. No; on the drive to the Park, on the 6th, after I left her house.

Q. That is the same day that you went to Mr. Beecher's house in the evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did she think might separate her from her husband? A. Taking this stand, as she said to me.

Q. Conferring with the brethren? A. She said she wished to speak to some of the brethren of the church in regard to this matter, the publication of the Bacon letter, as Mr. Tilton had published it unawares to her.

Q. Well, what she had to say to the brethren I suppose was said that night to the Committee in your presence? A. It was; I suppose so.

Q. When she said that did you extend any invitation to her to come to your house? A. Said I: "As long as I live I will be your friend." When she said, as she afterwards did, "I may not have a roof to shelter me," said I: "You will; as long as I have one I will be your friend."

Q. What did you say to her about coming to your house? A. Said I, "Come; whenever you wish to come to my house you can come."

Q. And that was on the 6th, on the road to the Park? A. It was on the 6th of July when she said that she might not have a roof to shelter her.

Q. You went to Coney Island, too, did you? A. Not that afternoon.

Q. How soon after was it you went to Coney Island? A. The Friday following.

Q. Before we come to that we will ask a few questions more about the meeting. Gen. Tracy came back the second time to your house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton there then? A. She was in the house, but up-stairs.

Q. How long had she been there when Gen. Tracy arrived? A. From six o'clock. She said that she would return at half-past six; she returned at six.

Q. When did she say she would return at half-past six? A. When I took her home in the afternoon.

Q. There was an appointment, then, that she should be at your house at six o'clock—half-past six? A. Half-past six; yes, Sir.

Q. And were you then to convey to her whatever information you got by your visit to Mr. Beecher? A. I was.

Q. That was the understanding between you? A. That was the understanding; yes, Sir.

Q. And she came at 6? A. She came at 6.

Q. Did you have an interview with her in the presence of Mr. Tracy? A. I did not then.

MRS. TILTON'S MEETING WITH GEN. TRACY AND THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Where was Mr. Tracy—where did she and Mr. Tracy first meet? A. In the back parlor, in the presence of Judge Morse.

Q. The Judge had arrived then? A. She had gone for her father and returned with him. I think I opened the door myself, and ushered them into the back parlor. Judge Morse introduced Gen. Tracy to Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Was Judge Morse a member of Plymouth Church? A. I do not know, Sir.

Q. You don't know that he is not? A. I do not; I know nothing about it.

Q. What time was it when you and Mrs. Tilton went down to tea? A. I think it was half-past—no, it was about 8 o'clock, I think; I am not positive, but it was from half-past 7 to 8, I think; about 8 o'clock.

Q. Mrs. Tilton had been there then an hour and a half or two hours? A. No, Sir.

Q. She came at 8, did she not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, you went down at half-past seven or eight o'clock? A. In the meantime she had left the house to go for her father, Judge Morse.

Q. Then she came to the house at 8 o'clock, you say? A. She did.

Q. She did not bring her father then? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was Gen. Tracy there then? A. He was not; he had left.

Q. When he came back did he inquire for Mrs. Tilton? A. He did not.

Q. Did you convey a message from Tracy to Mrs. Tilton? A. I did not.

Q. Now, where did they stay after their return, Tracy and Mrs. Tilton, until Mrs. Tilton went down to tea? A. Mrs. Tilton left our house to go for Judge Morse. Gen. Tracy soon after that left to take his dinner. He then returned after his dinner to the house. A very few moments afterwards Mrs. Tilton and Judge Morse rang the bell. I opened the door and ushered them into the back parlor, as I said before.

Q. Now, my question is from that time up to the period when you and Mrs. Tilton went down-stairs to tea, where did those people remain? A. Gen. Tracy left the house to call the Committee together. He returned with the Committee, and remained in the back parlor until she was nearly through her tea. Then he came down into the dining-room, and was there, as I say.

Q. When was it that he said he wanted to see Mrs. Tilton before she went before the Committee? A. When he returned with the Committee, he said to my husband he would like to see Mrs. Tilton for a moment before she came up-stairs.

Q. Did he give any reasons? A. He did not.

Q. Where were you then? A. I was in the dining-room.

Q. When he said this? A. No, Sir. I was in the dining-room when he said it. He said it to my husband in the parlor, where the gentlemen of the Committee were. I was down-stairs in the dining-room, with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. And you heard it? A. I did not hear it.

Q. I asked you if you heard it. A. I didn't understand you.

Q. Gen. Tracy came down then into the dining-room? A. He did; yes, Sir.

Q. He had then been presented to Mrs. Tilton? A. He had, by Judge Morse, previously.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton then taking her tea? A. She was.

Q. Did Mr. Tracy give any excuse for coming down there? A. I don't know that it was an excuse. I can tell you what he said, if you wish that.

Q. You have already testified to what he said.

Mr. Beach—No.

The Witness—I have not. Excuse me.

Mr. Fullerton—You have said some things that had taken place down there? A. I think—

Q. No, don't think; I only want to know the facts. How long did Mr. Tracy stay down there with you and Mrs. Tilton? A. I should think three minutes. I didn't notice; I should think that time.

Q. Did he converse with her whilst he was there? A. He did.

Q. In your presence? A. In my presence.

Q. And then? A. Went up stairs to the gentlemen in the parlor.

Q. And how long after he went up stairs before Mrs. Tilton made her statement to the Committee? A. She finished her tea; she was nearly through, I think, when Gen. Tracy came down; she finished it, then, as I said before, she went to the second story for prayer, and returned to the back parlor, and met the gentlemen of the Committee.

Q. How long after she entered the parlor before she made her statement? A. Almost immediately.

Q. Was she sworn? A. No, Sir.

Q. No oath was administered to her? A. No, Sir; not that I heard.

Q. Now, Mrs. Ovington, be kind enough to tell us who were present that night when that statement was made? A. I will, as near as I can remember. Mr. Sage, Mr. Claflin, Mr. Winslow, Mr. Cleveland, Mr. Storrs, Gen. Tracy; I think that was all.

Q. Was there a shorthand writer there? A. Yes, Sir, Mr. Ellinwood.

Q. Mr. Ellinwood was present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He took down her statement, did he not? A. I presume he did.

Q. Well, he appeared to be taking it down? A. He was writing.

Q. Did you ever see it after it was written out? A. I have not.

Q. You didn't know anything about it then, to this day? A. No, Sir.

Q. You have never seen it published, have you? A. I have not read it since it was published; I have the book.

Q. No; have you seen it published? A. I think not.

Q. What time did the Committee break up that night? A. I should judge about 10 o'clock; I am not certain.

Q. You have spoken of an interview with Mr. Tilton on the 9th of July, Thursday morning? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you had an interview of about three hours in duration? A. About that time.

Q. Your husband was present? A. I believe he was.

Q. In that interview did Mr. Tilton say that he had had an account of what Mrs. Tilton stated to that Committee? A. He said he had had an interview with Gen. Tracy, and that he informed him that the Committee were with her, and that she had influenced them in his favor.

Q. What else did he say that Gen. Tracy informed him? A. I don't remember anything else.

Q. Didn't he say that Gen. Tracy had informed him that Elizabeth spoke exceedingly well of him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And of ~~his~~ <sup>his</sup> ~~well~~ <sup>well</sup>? A. I don't remember whether she said that she ~~was~~ <sup>was</sup> exceedingly well of him; he did say, "exceedingly well."

Q. Didn't he particularize in what respect she had spoken well of him? A. I don't remember that he did.

Q. Don't you remember? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

Q. Well, that seemed to please Mr. Tilton, did it not? A. Her interview with the Committee?

Q. What Gen. Tracy had told him? A. I suppose it had.

Q. Well, didn't you judge so from what he said to you on that morning, of the 9th of July? A. I had received her letter previously telling me it had.

Q. I don't care about that; I am not speaking of her letter; I am speaking of what Mr. Tilton told you on the 9th of July during that long interview? A. I think that I had that impression from him.

Q. Did he not say that he was delighted and pleased? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With what his wife had said to the Committee? A. Yes, Sir; since you have said "delighted," he did express that word.

Q. He expressed himself in the warmest terms, did he not? A. In high terms; yes, Sir, of his wife.

Q. And he said Elizabeth was as happy as a bird, did he not? A. Yes, Sir; he said: "You should see Elizabeth this morning. She is as happy as a bird."

Q. You did not discover, then, that her interview with the brethren tended to separate husband and wife, but rather to knit them together; is not that it? A. I had understood that they had separated.

Q. No, I am not asking you that. I am asking you if you did not discover at that interview with Mr. Tilton on the 9th of July, judging from what he said, that Mrs. Tilton's narration to the "brethren," which she quoted so much, had tended to knit husband and wife together rather than to separate them, didn't you? A. Well, I cannot say that it was that alone: the two together, her letter and Mr. Tilton's remarks together, made me suppose so.

Q. Did you learn anything from that letter that Mr. Tilton had not learned from Gen. Tracy, as you understood it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you thought then that the interview with the brethren tended to peace between husband and wife, did you not? A. I supposed from what Gen. Tracy had said to Mr. Tilton that he was pleased with Mrs. Tilton's interview at the Committee; but as Mr. Tilton told me that it was all fiction, I did not think he had much faith in his wife.

Q. But he was pleased with the fiction, was he not? A. He seemed to be.

Q. Exactly; and he said that she did not tell the truth, didn't he? A. He said she had lied throughout.

Q. Exactly; and that Mr. Beecher was guilty? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Notwithstanding she said he was innocent? A. He did say so.

Q. He wanted to cover up and smother the scandal, did he not; didn't he say so? A. No, Sir.

Q. He did not? A. No, Sir, he did not.

THE REPORT PREPARED BY MR. TILTON FOR THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Did he want Mrs. Tilton to tell the truth, did he say, before the Committee? A. He said if Mr. Beecher would lay down his weapons, let the matter rest where it was; if the Committee would bring in a report satisfactory to himself that then he would be quiet. He read the report that he had prepared to give himself before the Committee.

Q. That is just what I was coming to. Now then, that report. [To defendant's counsel.] Let me have it. [To the witness.] Now, Madame, can you tell me in whose handwriting that report was? A. I did not take it in my hands, or see it.

Q. Didn't you see the handwriting? A. No, Sir; I didn't notice it.

Q. Were not you told that night that this report was in the handwriting of Elizabeth? A. No, Sir; I was not told anything of the kind.

Q. Oh, well, don't let us waste our strength. A. I am very much interested, Mr. Fullerton. You must excuse me if I am carried out of myself.

Q. Well, and I am slightly so. [Laughter.] Who read the report to you? A. Mr. Tilton.

Q. Did he read more than one? A. Only one.

Q. Only one report? A. Only one.

Q. Was it a long or a short one? A. Not very long.

Q. What was the sum and substance of the report?

Mr. Beach—Oh, I would read it to her.

Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Ovington has a good memory.

Mr. Beach—I see she is very intelligent.

Mr. Fullerton—We have the original here.

Mr. Morris—Exhibit D 45.

Mr. Fullerton—Exhibit D 45, I believe, Mr. Shearman. Is it possible Mr. Shearman is absent. [Laughter.] [To the witness:] While they are looking for the paper, Mrs. Ovington, I will ask you whether Mr. Tilton stated his object in drawing up such a report? A. It was to present it to the Committee, he said.

Q. Did he state what effect he wanted to produce upon the minds of the Committee? A. He said here was a statement he had written, which, if the Committee would accept, he would lay down his weapons.

Q. That report vindicated Mr. Tilton, did it not, and his family? A. It vindicated Mr. Tilton; not entirely, I should judge, Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Well, it did not impute to her the principal crime, did it? A. I think not.

Q. Well, didn't he regard it as vindictory of Elizabeth and his family and himself? A. I thought he supposed so, but I did not take it so.

Q. Well, you thought he supposed so? A. I thought he supposed so.

Q. Well, wasn't it in harmony to a very great extent with the statement of Mrs. Tilton before the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not to a very great extent? A. Not in the most particular—in which I—in which was the most particular point, it did not agree.

Q. Well, it did not assert adultery, did it—the report? A. No, Sir; I think not.

Q. Did you call his attention to the harmony between that report and Elizabeth's statement to any effect? A. No, Sir; I said to him, "Mr. Tilton, I don't believe the Committee will receive that report." In taking it to read he held the statement in his hand, and says he, "Here is a statement that I have prepared; I have read it to Elizabeth." I think he said to Gen. Tracy, also. Said he: "Please consider that this statement is dated two weeks in advance of the present time. I will read it to you, but please remember that it is fiction, fiction throughout."

Q. Yes; he resorted to fiction, then, to vindicate himself and his family, did he? A. No, Sir; I didn't look upon it in that light entirely.

Q. Didn't he look upon it in that light, or didn't he say so? A. He said that.

Mr. Everts—The opinions of the witness are not to be called for. She has said what she said; whether he resorted to that entirely or not.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask the question.

Mr. Everts—Well, she is not to reply.

Mr. Fullerton—Repeat the last question, Mr. Stenographer.

[The question was repeated by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.]

A. He said it was to quiet the scandal, if it was accepted; if that report was accepted.

Q. And then he said he would lay down his weapons; didn't he? A. If the Committee would receive that report, and Mr. Beecher would keep quiet.

Q. He was particular to emphasize the fact that Mr. Beecher should keep quiet, didn't he? A. I think so.

Q. Didn't he complain that Mr. Beecher hadn't done what lay in his power to defend him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Didn't he complain, too, of Plymouth Church that they had been starting this thing up to his, Tilton's, detriment? A. Yes, Sir; and I replied, "How could it be else, after your publication of the Bacon letter; you should not throw this blame upon Mr. Beecher; it rests with yourself; after that partial letter of contrition, there was nothing else left for Plymouth Church and Mr. Beecher to do."

Q. But, my good woman, didn't he say that Mr. Beecher had failed in his duty, and therefore he had to write the Bacon letter? A. He didn't say "failed in his duty."

Q. Well, whatever he did say, didn't he do; and, therefore, he was compelled to write the Bacon letter? A. I don't remember his saying "he was compelled;" he might have said so; I don't remember it.

Q. Well, didn't he give an excuse, or an apology, or an explanation rather, for his writing the Bacon letter? A. Because at the Congregational Council he was called "a knave and a fool," and he would not rest under that imputation.

Q. Well, didn't he hold Plymouth Church responsible for that, and Mr. Beecher also? A. He spoke of Plymouth Church in connection with Mr. Beecher.

Q. Didn't he say that it was Mr. Beecher, or his friends, that had brought about the necessity for writing the Bacon letter? A. He said it was the action of the Council, as I remember.

Q. Speaking of Dr. Bacon? A. The Congregational Council that was held in the Spring; I don't remember the date; I think it was March.

Q. Mrs. Ovington—

Mr. Hill—Is that the one that is in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting?

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't say this was in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting. I ask her if the one read to her was not in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting; you said, I suppose, pretty close attention to the reading of that report? A. I paid attention to it.

Q. So that you would be able to recognise the language used? A. I could partially; but I could not swear to it.

Q. Well, you can give us your best judgment, without being positive; I will read, and see if you recognise it:

"I the undersigned, constituting the Committee of Plymouth Church, to whom were referred certain recent publications of Dr. Leonard Bacon and Mr. Theodore Tilton, hereby present their unanimous report."

Does that sound like the document you have heard read?

"The Committee sought and obtained a personal interview with each of the three following named persons, to wit: Mr. Tilton, Mrs. Tilton and the pastor, all of whom responded to the searching questions of the Committee with freedom and candor. Documents, letters and papers pertaining to the case were carefully considered. A multiplicity of details, needing to be duly weighed, occasioned a somewhat protracted investigation."

Do you recollect the language? A. I do not recall that part of it. Very likely it was that.

Q. "The Committee hope"—I will read further:

"The Committee hope that the apparent tardiness of their report will be compensated to the parties by rectifying an erroneous public sentiment, under which they have all suffered misrepresentation."

Perhaps you recall that? A. I do not; but it is some time since I heard it, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—I am aware of that; yes.

Q. [Reading:] "The Committee's first interview was with Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, whose testimony was given with a modesty and touching sincerity that deeply moved those who listened to it."

A. That I remember.

Q. You recollect it. "The Committee's first interview," I have read that:

"Her straightforward narrative was an unconscious vindication of her innocence and purity of character, and confirmed by evidence in the documents. She repelled with warm feeling the idea that her husband was the author of calumnious statements against her, or had ever treated her with other than chivalrous consideration and attention. She paid a high tribute to his character, and also to the fortitude with which he had borne prolonged injustice."

A. I think that was so; I cannot recall the wording.

Q. [Reading:] "The Committee further find that Mr. Tilton, in his relations with the pastor, had a just cause of offense, and had received a voluntary apology."

A. I think that was so.

Q. [Reading:] "Mr. Tilton declined to characterize the offense, for the following reasons: first, because the necessary evidence which should accompany any statement would include the names of persons who had happily escaped thus far the tongue of public gossip; and next, that the apology was designed to cover a complicated transaction, its details difficult of exact or just; statement; and last, that no possible good could arise from satisfying the public curiosity on this point."

A. The last clause I remember, the former—

Q. [Reading:] "Mr. Tilton, after concluding his testimony, respectfully called the attention of the Committee to the fact that the Clerk of the Church had spoken calumniously of Mr. Tilton during the late Council—"

Mr. Morris—"Mrs. Tilton."

Mr. Fullerton—"Mr." here; well it's a mistake; a misprint:

—"during the late Council, and had since unqualifiedly contradicted and retracted his statement as untrue and unjust; and he, [Mr. T.] requested the Committee to ratify and confirm that apology, making honorable record of the same in their report, which is hereby cheerfully done. The Committee further find that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's evidence corroborated the statements of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton. He also said the Church action of which Mr. Tilton had complained had not been inspired by the pastor, but had been taken independently by the Church; that the popular impression that Mr. Tilton had been in the habit of speaking against him was unjust to Mr. T. and was owing mainly to the unwelcome introduction into the Church of the charges against Mr. T. by a mere handful of persons, who, in so doing, had received no countenance from the great mass of the congregation, or from the pastor. He said that the apology had been invested by the public press with an undue mystery; that after having been led by his own precipitancy and folly into wrong, he saw no singularity of behavior in a Christian man (particularly a clergyman) in acknowledging his offense. He had always preached this doctrine to others, and would not shrink from applying it to himself. The Committee, after hearing the three witnesses already referred to, felt unanimously that any regrets previously entertained concerning the publication of Mr. Tilton's letter to Dr. Bacon should give way to grateful acknowledgments of the providential opportunity which this publication has unexpectedly afforded to draw forth the testimony which the Committee have thus reported in brief, but in sufficient fullness, as they believe, to explain and put at rest forever a vexatious scandal. The Committee are likewise of opinion, based on the testimony submitted to them, that no unprejudiced Court of Inquiry could have reviewed this case, as thus presented in person by its principal figures, without being strikingly impressed with the moral integrity and elevation of character of the parties; and, accordingly, the Committee cannot forbear to state that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Mr. Theodore Tilton, and Mrs. Tilton (and, in an especial manner, the latter) must and should receive the increased sympathy and respect of Plymouth Church."

A. As I recall it, I think there is a little more in that statement than the one he read to me; still, I cannot remember well enough to swear to it.

Q. But I understood you to say that you do remember that when he read it to you, he said: "Imagine yourself two weeks ahead of this time?" A. "Two weeks in advance of the date of this;" or, "Imagine this to be dated two weeks in advance of the present time."

Q. You did not understand that Mr. Tilton's testimony had been taken at that time; did you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor Mr. Beecher's? A. No, Sir.

Q. And you did understand that the report was anticipating the testimony which they would give? A. Yes, Sir.

THE TRIP TO CONEY ISLAND.

Q. When did you say the ride to Coney Island was? A. The 10th day of July; the Friday following Mrs. Tilton's going before the Committee.

Q. The day after this long interview? A. The day following this interview.

Q. Did you meet any of Mr. Beecher's particular friends on that first ride to Coney Island? A. I did.

Q. Where did you meet them? A. On the piazza of the hotel, unexpectedly.

Q. At Coney Island—who were they, pray? A. Mr. Charles Storrs, Mrs. Charles Storrs; Mrs. Valentine, I think is the name, Mrs. Storrs's daughter; the nurse, child, Miss Proctor.

Q. Did you propose to go to Coney Island, or did Mrs. Tilton propose it? A. I proposed to go to salt water, and I think I mentioned Coney Island, as I was in the habit of going there.

Q. Did you stop between Brooklyn and Coney Island? A. I did not.

Q. Did you take another ride to Coney Island about that date? A. I cannot say how soon after. I went a number of times last Summer with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Didn't you go again on the 10th—on the 11th? A. No, Sir.

Q. On the 10th? A. No, Sir; the 10th I went—Friday.

Q. Well, on the 11th; didn't you go again on the 11th? A. No, Sir; I went to the Park, I think, in the afternoon, to drive with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Do you recollect of meeting some other friend of Mr. Beecher on your ride, or some ride, to Coney Island? A. I think not.

Q. Did you stop at Mr. Snediker's at any time? A. Yes, Sir; several times; was in the habit of going there for our dinner. I did once see Mr. Joseph Howard on the piazza of the hotel, but he didn't speak to us.

Q. Any one else did you see there? A. I have an indistinct idea of friends—bowing acquaintances—but I think those were the only friends that we had any conversation with that I can recall.

MRS. TILTON'S LOVE OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. Yes. Now, in one of these interviews with Mr. Tilton, I understand you to say that you observed that you could not stand by Mr. Beecher if he were guilty? A. That was on the piazza; yes, Sir.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton reply to that observation? A. He said he thought many in Plymouth Church would stand by Mr. Beecher, both from love—some from love to him, some from other motives, whether he were guilty or innocent. Said I, "I think you mistake, Mr. Tilton; the feeling of Plymouth Church towards Mr. Beecher—if he is proved guilty, I don't think they will stand by him, but they believe him to be innocent."

Q. When Mr. Tilton observed in substance that Elizabeth would be for him if it were necessary, did he not also add that he would—that she would do the same thing for Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he not say that in effect? A. No, Sir.

Q. What did he say upon that subject, namely, what Mrs. Tilton would be willing to do to save Mr. Beecher? A. I don't think he said anything.

Q. What Mr. Tilton said that Elizabeth would be willing to do to save Mr. Beecher? A. I don't recall anything.

Q. Don't you recollect anything at all? A. No, Sir, I do not. If you can help me, I will gladly do it.

Q. What did he say about her love for Mr. Beecher? A. He said that Mr. Beecher loved Elizabeth as he had never loved any woman, and that Elizabeth loved Mr. Beecher. Said I, "But she loves you, Mr. Tilton, more than any one else on this earth." Said he, "I believe that Elizabeth loves me." Then he made the remark: "She is the best of the three. Whatever becomes of Mr. Beecher or myself, remember Elizabeth is the best of the three; I shall always say that."

Q. Now, when he said that Elizabeth loved Mr. Beecher better than any woman on earth, did he not also add what she would be willing to do for him? A. He said that Mr. Beecher loved Elizabeth better than any woman on earth.

Q. Well, did he not add in that conversation what Elizabeth—? A. He said Elizabeth loved Mr. Beecher—

Q. Hear my question, please. In that connection, didn't he say to you what he thought Elizabeth would do for Mr. Beecher, if it were necessary? A. I don't think he did; no, Sir.

MR. TILTON READY TO MAKE PEACE ON CONDITIONS.

Q. I call your attention now to the morning when Mrs. Tilton came to your house, on the morning of the 11th of July, I believe it was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You think she came in pursuance of what you said to her the day before, in riding to the Park, do you not, that she was at liberty to come to your house? A. I think that night—

Q. Not the day before, but the week before? A. She told me afterwards that that had influenced her.

Q. I ask you if you do not think she came to your house at that time, on the morning of the 11th, whether you don't think she came there in pursuance or in consequence of what you said to her on the morning when you rode to the Park? A. I think she did.

Q. Did she bring her children with her? A. She did not—Ralph followed the next day.

Q. And when did the other children come, if at all? A. Alice came to see her from the house, I think, twice or three times before she left for Elizabeth; Carroll came to her, I do not remember the day; it was shortly after—on his way to Montclair—Alice, before she went to Montclair, I mean, and Carroll on his way to Montclair, called to speak with his mother.

Q. Now, there was some conversation between you and Mr. Tilton in the hall on your way down to breakfast, was there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Will you say again what you said to Mr. Tilton at that time? A. I spoke to him then—asked him why he wished to bring this trouble upon his wife and family. Mr. Tilton said "What shall I do? Tell me what to do, and I will do it." Said I: "I am not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of the case to advise you, but do what you know to be right in the sight of God."

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say anything else at that time? A. He may; I do not recall it.

Q. Did he not say, "What would you do under the circumstances?" A. I do not remember it.

Q. Did he tell you what the circumstances were? A. No, Sir, I think not; it was but a moment's conversation en our way to the breakfast table.

Q. You did not tell him, then, what he should do in reply to his suggestion? A. I did not—I do not know.

Q. You could not suggest any way out of the difficulty? A. No, Sir; I did not, that I remember; I think I should have remembered it.

Q. I understood you to say that Mr. Tilton told you that if you would suggest what he should do, he would do it? A. Says he, "Tell me what to do, and I will do it."

Q. But you did not tell him what to do? A. Only what he knew to be right in the sight of God.

Q. Yes; well, what was going on then in regard to that matter, as you understood it?

Mr. Beach—What was Mr. Tilton doing? A. I knew—I do not know what you refer to.

Q. Well, you put a question to him, or made an observation to him, what he wanted to stir this thing up for? A. Because he had published the Bacon letter.

Q. Well, that was stirred up, wasn't it; he was not going to do anything then, was he? A. He had said on the piazza that if this Committee did not report favorably, he would take it into a court of justice.

Q. And that is what led to your observation, was it? A. I knew there was trouble from that, I suppose; yes, Sir.

Q. And if the Committee do report favorably he would not take it into a court of justice. A. He would lay down his weapons.

Q. Be satisfied? A. And Beecher keep quiet.

Q. Well, you went down to breakfast, did you? A. I did.

Q. And at what stage of the breakfast was it that Mrs. Tilton left? A. She did not leave the breakfast table until we all left, as I remember it. We left and went together in the parlor.

Q. I understood you to say that at some observation of Mr. Tilton Mrs. Tilton left. A. That was in the back parlor, after breakfast.

Q. After breakfast? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well; then we will go to the back parlor. What was said in the back parlor by Mrs. Tilton or Mr. Tilton in your presence?

Q. Mr. Tilton said he wished to speak a few—wished to speak in the presence of Mr. Orington and myself and Elizabeth; he thought she was laboring under some misapprehension in regard to his conversation on the previous day; that when she returned from her ride she spoke of having enjoyed the day, he supposed she had had a day of unmitigated pleasure, and much to his surprise, at about seven o'clock that morning, she had dressed herself and left him to come to our house.

Q. Did he speak of the conversation which you had had with Elizabeth? A. He said he thought that there had been some misapprehension in regard to the conversation on the previous day.

Q. Did you understand that she had left Mr. Tilton in consequence of the repetition of that conversation by you? A. I did not understand that she had left him permanently then; I did not know it until he left the house.

Q. Well, did you not understand that he was laboring under the impression that the repetition of the conversation between you and Mr. Tilton to Mrs. Tilton had caused her to leave that morning? A. I did.

Q. Well, did he not insist upon it that it was not sufficient cause for her to leave? A. After I repeated the conversation I think he made no reference to it.

Q. Did you repeat the conversation there? A. I mean after I repeated to him what he said to me as he left the piazza—says I, "Please remember, Mr. Tilton, that you told me that I might tell the whole of this to Elizabeth, and I have done so as near as I can remember, word for word."

Q. Now, did not Mr. Tilton add that he thought that that was an insufficient cause for her to leave him? A. I don't remember his saying anything of the kind.

Q. Didn't he say something to that effect? A. I think not Sir.

Q. Well, what reply did Mrs. Tilton make when Mr. Tilton made that observation? A. I don't think she spoke in his presence.

THE FINAL PARTING BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Q. She did not speak, then, of the cause of her leaving, in his presence? A. She said nothing to me of leaving her husband until after Mr. Tilton had left the house.

Q. Well, I ask you this question: Did she or not allege any cause for leaving him that morning, in his presence? A. She did not.

Q. The only cause, then, that was suggested was the repetition of this conversation which had been had between you and Mr. Tilton prior to that day? A. The repetition of the conversation implicating her guilt with Mr. Beecher.

Q. The repetition of the conversation? A. That I had had with Mr. Tilton on the piazza implicating her—

Q. Never mind, don't characterize it; you have told us what the conversation was; whether it implicated or not, we will judge. You understood that morning that that was the only cause for the separation, did you not? A. I understood that that was the cause that she had left him then for.

Q. And she gave no other cause at all in his presence? A. Not in his presence; no, Sir. If I could give you her conversation with me riding you would understand this matter better.

Q. Then the difficulty is that you cannot? A. I see it is, but I mean that you would be better informed.

Q. Yes, I want to be informed in a legal way. [Laughter.] Now, did Mr. Tilton, on that morning, say anything about his wife's returning? A. I do not remember anything being said about it, for I did not know that she had left permanently until after he left the house.

Q. Well, you knew that she was at your house? A. I knew she was there.

Q. I ask if anything was said about her returning to her own house? A. I think not that morning.

Q. What did Mr. Tilton say, if anything, upon that subject? A. I don't think he said anything after I told him.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say what he came there for? A. He said he wished to hold some conversation in the presence of my husband and myself in regard to Elizabeth.

Q. Then he spoke about this conversation? A. He spoke about the conversation.

Q. Which had been repeated by you to her? A. The conversation that I had repeated to her.

Q. And said that there was some misapprehension about it? A. He said he thought Elizabeth labored under some misapprehension.

Q. Now, was there nothing said about her returning home? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Why, you would remember it, wouldn't you? A. I think I should; but I do not think there was, Mr. Fullerton.

Q. And Mr. Tilton went away without saying a word about it, did he? A. I think so.

Q. Did not propose that Elizabeth should go back with him? A. No, Sir; because he left us in the hall, leaving her in my charge.

Q. Yes. Before that had she not refused to go back? A. No, Sir, not that I remember at all; there was nothing of the kind; as I can recall that conversation, there was nothing of the kind said.

Q. Then he appeared to regard it as a separation, didn't he, when he left her in your charge? A. I suppose so.

Q. Didn't you say anything then in regard to that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not a word? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, you thought it was a separation, then, didn't you? A. I didn't know.

Q. Well, what did you think about it? A. I did not know.

Q. He put one hand on your shoulder, and another hand on hers, didn't he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Brought you together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And said, "Take care of Elizabeth?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. "Any kindness you show to her is a kindness shown to me?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, didn't you regard that as indicating a separation? A. I thought it was a temporary separation at any rate; whether it would be permanent, or not, I did not know.

Q. But yet you said nothing about her going back? A. I said nothing about it.

Q. You did not inquire as to whether there was any other cause for separation other than this conversation that you have repeated? A. I did not; no, Sir.

Q. Did you take any interest in it? A. My whole heart was in it.

Q. Well, why didn't you try to find out, when this lady was put in your charge, under those affecting circumstances, what was the cause of all this commotion? A. As I said before, if I give you the conversation in my ride you would understand; I want to know what took place that morning? A. I have given you what took place that morning.

Q. Well, I am trying to get something else? A. I am giving you all I know.

Q. Had you any reason for not inquiring that morning? A. No, Sir.

Q. Why it was that this ceremony of putting her in your charge in that kind of way was gone through with? A. I did not know why it was gone through with; I knew nothing about it.

Q. And you made no inquiry? A. I made no inquiry.

Mr. Evarts—Now, I submit, if your Honor please, that when counsel, in pursuing the proper privilege of cross-examination, undertakes to reason with the witness why it was that she did not then presently press some inquiries, her answer is a proper one: "I remembered the conversation I had had with Mrs. Tilton in my carriage drive; if I tell you that you will understand why I did not."

Mr. Beach—Well, who has objected to that?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, the gentlemen will understand that that does not become proper evidence either under the circumstances.

Judge Neilson—No, Sir; not by any means.

Mr. Evarts—It does become proper evidence if you press the witness as to the reasons operating on her mind why she did not press inquiries then between husband and wife, because she saw the action of the husband and she knew what had passed between her and the wife.

Mr. Fullerton—I am pressing for the reasons, Sir, that had their origin there that morning.

Mr. Evarts—Well, then confine it.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, but the whole answer to this speech of the gentleman is that the lady says that she does not understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—With all the light shed upon it she don't understand it.

Mr. Evarts—She has said three times, "If you will allow me to tell you the conversation between Mrs. Tilton and myself you will understand this business better." Now, he is not obliged to have that conversation, but then he must forbear to press into the witness's mind to find out what governed her and made her conduct explicable or inexplicable.

Mr. Beach—I don't understand what all this speechifying is about.

Mr. Fullerton—Nor my friend upon the other side either; we are all even on that score.

Mr. Evarts—I have made myself understood, I think.

Mr. Beach—Yes, I suppose you have accomplished your object in a speech there when there was no objection made to the question.

Mr. Fullerton—Not the slightest. [To the witness.] Mr. Tilton went away then? A. He went away.

Q. Mrs. Tilton remained with you? A. She did.

Q. When was it that he said he would pull down the pillars of the temple? A. It was after, I think—it was after Mrs.

Tilton had left the room and gone up-stairs, and Mr. Ovington and myself remained in the parlor with him.

Q. In what connection did he say that? A. I think Mr. Ovington said to him, "Mr. Tilton, why continue this? Why do you drag down Mr. Beecher and your family in this ruin? Why follow this up?" Mr. Tilton then spoke of Samson, as I already repeated.

Q. Well, didn't he complain then of the position that he had been put in? A. I think not. But very little was said that morning—very little conversation.

Q. Did he regard the Bacon letter, as you understood him to say, the pulling down of the temple? A. He did not speak of the Bacon letter then, I think. There was very little conversation that morning.

Q. Well, did you understand from him that he contemplated any other step than the publication of the Bacon letter which had been taken then? A. Again I will have to say that my conversation with Mrs. Tilton led me to understand—

Q. Never mind, Mrs. Ovington, you cannot get out your conversation with Mrs. Tilton, and you may as well lock it up in your own mind first as last; I am talking about what took place. A. Then I cannot tell you the motives that led me to interpret Mr. Tilton's language.

Q. I ask you whether he said anything to the effect that the publication of the Bacon letter was the pulling down of the temple? A. No, Sir.

Q. You can tell me that without telling me what Mrs. Tilton said the day before? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I submit—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you don't submit, you are scolding all the while. [To the witness.] Where was that observation made? A. What observation?

Q. About pulling down the temple? A. In the back parlor after Mrs. Tilton left the parlor and went up-stairs.

Q. And it was made to you and your husband? A. To myself and my husband.

Q. And any other or further conversation at that time? A. I remember no more; there might have been, but I don't recall anything more.

Q. Be kind enough to tell us, if you please, what observation it was in regard to Mr. Beecher that led Mr. Tilton to leave the room—Mr. Beecher—that led Mrs. Tilton to leave the room? A. Mr. Tilton said: "For what Elizabeth has done Mr. Beecher should kiss the hem of her garment;" she immediately arose and left the room.

Mr. Beach—Said nothing? A. Said nothing.

Mr. Fullerton—Did Mr. Tilton see her after that except up in the parlor, as you have stated? A. She left the parlor—

Q. I mean did he see her after that before he left the house? A. He saw her in the hall, as I told you.

THE TRIP IN CONNECTICUT MADE UNDER ASSUMED NAMES.

Q. Now, you went up to Richfield or Ridgefield, I believe? A. Ridgefield; yes, Sir.

Q. Connecticut. You remained eight days there. I think?

A. I think it was about that time, I am not quite certain as to days.

Q. Why didn't you remain there longer? A. I was not well there, I thought it best to leave; I also heard that a reporter of a newspaper was there.

Q. Well, they are all over. [Laughter.] A. So I find.

Q. So you left. Were you there under your own name? A. No, Sir, I was not.

Q. Mrs. Tilton under her own name there? A. She was not.

Q. Under fictitious names were you? A. She was.

Q. What name did you pass by there? A. My maiden name of Lewis.

Q. And by what name was Mrs. Tilton known there? A. Her maiden name of Richards.

Q. And from there you went to Fairfield? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Anything pass in the house about your going under assumed names? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Some fault found in regard to it? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing of the kind? A. Nothing of the kind.

Q. Well, did you go under your assumed name again at Fairfield? A. Yes, Sir; but Mr. Wheeler, in introducing me, made a mistake and introduced me as Mrs. Ovington. [Laughter.]

Q. And did you correct that mistake? A. I said nothing at all, but was called Mrs. Lewis until two or three days, I think—two days, perhaps. I went to the lady and explained. At Ridgefield I explained the first night of our arrival to the lady of the house. Mr. Caldwell did to the gentleman of the house.

Q. Well, at Washington you were then about six days there? A. I think from Tuesday to the following Monday.

Q. Well, were you there as Mrs. Lewis or as Mrs. Ovington?

A. As Mrs. Ovington.

Q. Then you took your proper name? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And did Mrs. Tilton also? A. She did; Florence was called Florence Tilton, also.

Q. Who went with you up to Ridgefield? A. Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell.

Q. Well, did they go under their proper names? A. They did, I think; I think they did, yes, Sir.

Q. Well, have you any doubt upon your mind in regard to that? A. I don't know whether Mrs. Caldwell at first proposed changing her name or not. I don't recollect that; she did not go under an assumed name then, I think.

Q. Well, what Mr. Caldwell was it? A. Wallace E. Caldwell.

Q. Residing in Brooklyn? A. Plymouth Church.

Q. A member of Plymouth Church? A. A member of Plymouth Church.

Q. Did he stay with you all the while that you were there? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did he go with you from Ridgefield to Fairfield? A. He did not.

Q. Who was your escort there? A. Mr. Wheeler; Mr. Caldwell came to the city with his wife and myself, leaving Mrs. Tilton in Mr. Seymour's family at Ridgefield; I was absent one or two days, and then returned to Ridgefield.

WHERE BESSIE TURNER HAS BEEN LIVING.

Q. Do you know Bessie Turner? A. I do.

Q. When have you seen her last? A. I think it was last week Tuesday she called to see Ralph.

Q. How many times has she been at your house within the last two months? A. I could not say—frequently.

Q. Well, about how many times? A. I could not say—frequently.

Q. Once a week? A. I should think oftener than that; many times she called when I did not see her, or know that she was there.

Q. Did she spend any part of her time there? A. Not this Fall. She did when she came before the Committee; she remained one or two nights with us.

Q. At your house? A. At our house.

Q. Do you know where she came from when she went before the Committee? A. I think from Pittsburgh.

Q. Do you know where she has been staying since she was before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir; part of the time had been with her mother; I don't remember the date; she returned in the Fall to Brooklyn, and has been at 74 Hicks street, until, I think, one or two months ago, or a few days ago, she went to Mr. Manchester's; I believe it was Mr. Manchester's.

Q. Where did Mr. Manchester reside? A. I don't know.

Q. Do you know the gentleman? A. No, Sir.

Q. No acquaintance with him whatever? A. None whatever.

Q. Did you visit Bessie Turner while she was in Brooklyn? A. I have not been out of the house since October.

MRS. TILTON'S VISITORS.

Q. Very well, now I will ask you some questions in regard to the visitors at your house, Mrs. Ovington, since Mrs. Tilton came there to live. How many interviews, or about how many, as near as you can tell me, have counsel for Mr. Beecher had with Mrs. Tilton at your house? A. It would be impossible for me to tell you.

Q. So numerous? A. Yes, Sir; and not noticed as to time, the number of times.

Q. Where did the interviews generally take place? A. In the parlor.

Q. Any of them in your presence? A. Frequently.

Q. Not all of them? A. No, Sir; many times alone with them.

Q. How many times has Mr. Tracy been there? A. I could not say—a number of times; he has come of his own accord; he has come by invitation of Mrs. Tilton; by my invitation.

Q. Very frequently? A. Sometimes frequently, sometimes not as—

Q. Sometimes in the daytime? A. Yes, Sir; sometimes.

Q. When the Committee were sitting did he visit Mrs. Tilton frequently? A. He was there several times, I think.

Q. Had interviews with her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you were not present? A. I think he did; yes, Sir.

Q. And up to what period did that continue—up to the present time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Beecher, has he ever called? A. Once.

Q. Have an interview with Mrs. Tilton? A. He did.

Q. What time in the day was it? A. Eleven o'clock in the morning.

Q. How long ago? A. In July; I don't know the date; before I left for the country.

Q. Well, what day did you leave, Mrs. Ovington? A. I think it was the second day of August; the first Monday in August.

Q. And how long before you left was it that Mr. Beecher called? A. I don't know; I don't think it was many days.

Q. Probably the last week in July, then? A. I don't remember; it was in July.

Q. In July? A. In July.

Q. How long was that interview? A. It might have been twenty minutes; I should think about that time.

Q. Were you present? A. I was.

Q. Any one else present? A. No, Sir.

Q. Hasn't he been there since that time? A. Never.

Q. Only one call? A. Only one call.

A SEARCH FOR THE OLD SERVANTS OF THE TILTONS.

Q. Do you know anything of the servants that Mr. Tilton used to have in his employ—any of them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know where they are? A. I don't know what you mean.

Q. Where the servants that Mrs. Tilton formerly had in her employ are, or any of them? A. No, Sir; but I could find them for you.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if you will be kind enough to do so I will be obliged to you.

The Witness—I will; yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—We have had a great look for them. You don't know where any of them are now? A. There was one in Hoboken—Kate Burke her maiden name was—I know is in Hoboken; I know of no others I think; I can't recall any others at present. I have had the directions, as two of them that were in her employ came to me in the Fall; I employed them for some time.

Q. Yes, that is what I wanted to inquire about—how long did you have them in your employ? A. The cook came, I think, in September and remained, I think, until November. I don't remember the dates, as I was ill when she left.

Q. Yes; now the other one, when did she come? A. She came the 1st of October, and left after the holidays.

Q. What did you say last? A. She left after the holidays, the second one.

Q. Now, what is the name of the cook? A. Marcella Murray, I think.

Q. Do you know where she went when she left you? A. She went to Mr. Sheldon's in Clark street, I think, where she now is.

Q. And what is the name of the other one? A. Lizzie Lowery.

Q. And how long did she remain with you? A. From the 1st of October until after the holidays, I think in January some date; it may have been a little later, but I think it was in January.

Q. And where did she go when she left? A. I don't know.

Q. Don't know where she is now? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Beach—There was a third one that you did not name.

The Witness—A third one that came to me?

Mr. Fullerton—A third one that was in your employ? A. But she had not lived with Mrs. Tilton; she has lived with me since the 8th of May, Lizzie Winne.

Q. Is Mrs. Tilton in the habit of going out in the carriage frequently? A. In the carriage with me she was.

O. Didn't she go alone in the carriage? A. Never.

Q. Did you ride out with her when she ordered a carriage? A. I don't know that she ever ordered the carriage.

Q. Well, I observe on this bill that your husband presented this morning, there are several charges for carriages; I supposed Mrs. Tilton had them? A. She went in the carriage a number of times—several times I went in the carriage with Alice and Carol, preparing their outfit for school.

Q. Well, did Mrs. Tilton ever ride out in the carriage when you did not go with her? A. I don't remember that she did.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. OVINGTON.

Mr. Hill—You stated, I think, that you were at Ridgefield and Fairfield under your name of Lewis—your maiden name—and Mrs. Tilton under hers, and that your true names were given at Washington? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you among acquaintances and friends at Washington? A. I have never been acquainted with Mr. or Mrs. Gunn. I went there to show the school to Mrs. Tilton for her son. There I met at the camp, on the camp-ground, unexpectedly, Mr. and Mrs. Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio King. I don't know but there were one or two others that I met there.

Q. Plymouth Church people? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And was that the reason why your true names were used there? A. It was; I felt protected there.

Q. You mentioned meeting Mr. Storrs and some other people at Coney Island? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Upon a drive which you took there? A. The 10th of July.

Q. Did you know that Mr. Storrs, or any of the persons whom you found there, were to be there? A. I knew nothing of it at all.

Q. No prearrangement of that meeting at all? A. It was an entirely accidental meeting.

Q. Mr. Charles Storrs is not a member of Plymouth Church, I believe, at all? A. I think not; I am not sure.

Q. Don't you know that he is a member of Dr. Storrs's church? A. I believe he is, yet I could not swear to it.

Q. I think you stated, Mrs. Ovington, that during the—that there was an understanding between you and Mrs. Tilton, while you were taking a ride, that you were to meet at your house. Did you so state to Judge Fullerton? I may have misunderstood you. A. I don't think I understand what you say.

Q. On one of the rides which you took to Coney Island with Mrs. Tilton, either upon July 6th or the following Monday—on one of those two rides you stated that there was an understanding in pursuance of which Mrs. Tilton was to come to your house?

Mr. Beach—Well, that is a mistake.

The Witness—The 6th of July?

Mr. Hill—I am inquiring to see if I am mistaken.

The Witness—The 6th of July.

Q. Now, will you give what occurred between you and Mrs. Tilton on that occasion?

Mr. Beach—I do not understand, Sir, that the witness has given any such testimony, that there was any understanding upon the drive that they should meet at this witness's house when this witness took her right back to her house.

Mr. Hill—She stated she took her back to her house, and there was an understanding they were to meet again.

Mr. Beach—Yes, certainly; come to her house at half-past six.

The Witness—At six she was to come—at half-past six. You are correct. She came at six.

Mr. Hill—[To plaintiff's counsel.] Well, if you don't care to have that conversation given, I don't care to press it. [To the witness.] Now, you stated that on the 11th she came in consequence of what had been said to you—of what you had said to her on the ride of the 10th? A. I did.

Q. Now, what did you say to her or she to you which leads you to suppose that it was in consequence of that conversation that she came?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out.

Mr. Hill—Why, it seems to me, Sir, that if it is competent—

Judge Neilson—Don't discuss it.

Mr. Hill—Doesn't your Honor propose to hear the suggestion which we—

Judge Neilson—No, Sir; it is too simple and plain for there to be any argument about it.

Mr. Hill—Well, I desire to know what this witness said, or what was said from which she drew that inference. I want to show what her conclusion was based upon.

Judge Neilson—In other words, you desire to give the conversation between this witness and Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Hill—Ah! but my learned friend has asked this witness if Mrs. Tilton did not come in consequence of something that was there said.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Now, that is a conclusion, and I want to ascertain upon what that conclusion was based. It seems to me to be proper.

Judge Neilson—Well, I rule the conversation out.

Mr. Hill—Very well; we except.

Q. Mrs. Ovington, I understood you to state, in response to Judge Fullerton, that you were under the impression from what Mr. Tilton said, that Mrs. Tilton had left him on the morning of the 11th because of the repetition of the piazza conversation to her. Now, did he tell you that his wife had told him that she had had a conversation with you in regard to that, in which the piazza conversation was restated? A. He didn't say that the whole of it had been given to him.

Q. Did he say that any part of it had been given to him by his wife? A. He said that she was under a misapprehension in regard to the conversation.

Q. How did he know that fact—did he state? A. I don't remember that he did; I think not.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] That is all, Mrs. Ovington. [To Mr. Shearman.] Now, your next witness, Mr. Shearman.

TESTIMONY OF SARAH C. D. PUTNAM.

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Putnam.

[Sarah C. D. Putnam, sworn on behalf of defendant, and examined.]

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Putnam, where do you reside? A. I reside in Marietta, Ohio.

Q. What is the name of your husband? A. Douglas Putnam.

Q. You have been married twice, I believe? A. I have.

Q. What was the name of your first husband? A. Isaac M. Diamond.

Q. When were you married to your first husband? A. In April, 1839.

Q. When did he die? A. He died in December, 1833.

Q. Was he in poor health for some time previous? A. He was.

Q. When did you marry your second husband? A. January, 1837.

Q. Was he living at Marietta then? A. He was.

Q. Did you remove from Brooklyn to Marietta? A. I did.

Q. How long had you lived in Brooklyn previously to that? A. I had lived in Brooklyn at various times; I lived in New-York and Brooklyn—I had lived in New-York and Brooklyn since my first marriage, with the exception of some years that I lived in Michigan. I came back and forth. I was not in one place all the time. I had called Brooklyn my home for fifteen or sixteen years before I left.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I am.

Q. When did you form their acquaintance? A. I formed their acquaintance about two or three months after their marriage in 1835; the late Fall or the early Winter of the year they were married.

Q. They were married in October, 1835? A. They were married in October, 1835. I had known about Mrs. Tilton ever since she was a little girl; she was the daughter of a friend.

Q. You were acquainted with her mother before that time? A. Yes, Sir; my husband's family had been always acquainted with her since she was very young.

Q. Were you an intimate acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I became quite intimate in the family and was there a great deal, and after a few years very intimate. Mrs. Tilton made a motherly friend of me. I saw a great deal of them.

Q. Did you exchange visits with them—did you visit their house, and did they visit yours? A. Yes, Sir; on my first acquaintance with them I was boarding in South Brooklyn; and the first Winter I knew them, the Winter after their marriage,

I was in very poor health, and anxious to attend Mr. Beecher's church; and the cars did not run then; and I was in the habit for many months of going down to Mrs. Richards's, Mrs. Tilton's mother, then Mrs. Richards, now Mrs. Morse, on Saturday, stopping until Monday, so that I might avail myself of the riding without the expense of hiring a carriage.

Q. You have maintained the acquaintance of Mrs. Tilton down to the present time? A. I have.

Q. How long did you maintain friendship with Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Q. How long have you maintained acquaintance with Mr. Tilton? A. I have maintained acquaintance with Mr. Tilton—I have not spoken to Mr. Tilton for between four and five years. I have written and received one or two letters from him in that time.

Q. That is what I refer to. When did you have the last correspondence with Mr. Tilton? A. The last letter I wrote Mr. Tilton was in 1872, from California; I was journeying there.

MRS. TILTON'S HOME LIFE.

Q. Will you please describe what you saw of Mrs. Tilton with respect to her attachment to her husband and her children during the entire period of your acquaintance with her? A. I never saw any wife or mother so unselfishly and utterly devoted to a family as Mrs. Tilton was to hers. I used to feel that Mrs. Tilton's greatest fault was a blind idolatry of her husband.

Q. Did that continue down to a period later than 1868? A. I never have seen her when she has not manifested the same.

Q. When she manifested it? A. She always manifested it.

Mr. Everts—When she has not manifested the same.

Q. Have you noticed anything with regard to Mrs. Tilton's treatment of Mr. Tilton's parents and his brother? A. She has always been a very devoted, faithful friend, always ministering to them in all ways. I have often been there when she has put me aside for the time being because she felt that she must minister to them, and asked me to excuse her.

Q. Mr. Tilton had a brother who died finally of some infirmities. Do you recollect anything of Mrs. Tilton's treatment of him, and conduct towards him? A. I have often seen her in her ministrations to him, and her care for his comfort, and have been very much impressed by it.

Q. At what time was that? A. I don't remember when he died.

Q. No; but the time at which you observed this conduct of hers toward him? A. Often, when I have been there, when I have been visiting in the city, and spending a day there, I have seen him there. I spent nearly a week there once when the brother was in the house.

Q. About what year was that? A. I think that was since I was married.

Q. Since you went to Marietta? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Since 1867? A. Yes, Sir; and I have frequently seen him as a caller when I dropped in the house.

Q. What was the family habit of Mrs. Tilton's family with respect to receiving friends? What was the manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Tilton received intimate friends? A. They were very cordial, and adopted often the Quaker mode—the Friends mode of saying: "I am glad to see thee;" Mrs. Tilton did in particular, and they used generally not only give the hand, but salute with a kiss; that is their particular friends. It was the custom of the family to kiss their friends when they met them.

Q. It was the custom, therefore, of Mrs. Tilton to kiss the gentlemen friends of the family? A. Yes, Sir, kiss all.

Q. And Mr. Tilton's to kiss the lady friends? A. Yes, Sir.

ANOTHER JUROR FAINTS.

At this point in the examination of the witness one of the jurors, Mr. Jeffreys, became faint, and had to be taken to a window for fresh air.

Judge Neilson—[To one of the officers.] Mr. Spaulding, come here. Ask that juror whether he wishes to adjourn. Tell him I wish to consult his own views about it.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Jeffreys.] Mr. Jeffreys, if you prefer to adjourn now, I think the Court will do so.

Judge Neilson—[To Officer Spaulding.] What does he say now?

Mr. Spaulding—He prefers to adjourn now.

Mr. Everts—As it is so near the hour of adjournment, we might as well adjourn now; of course on the juror's account entirely. A repetition of the injury might be more serious.

Mr. Beach—[To the juror.] I think it is safer for you to get out in the air.

Judge Neilson—Well, we will adjourn now. [To the jurors.] Please be in your seats to-morrow morning, gentlemen, at eleven o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until eleven o'clock. Thursday.

THIRTY-EIGHTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A SICK JUROR AND AN ADJOURNMENT.

A SESSION ONLY FORTY MINUTES LONG—MR. JEFFREYS, THE SEVENTH JUROR, UNABLE TO REMAIN IN COURT—THE TESTIMONY OF MRS. PUTNAM IN REGARD TO MR. TILTON'S HOME LIFE—THE PLAINTIFF'S VIEWS IN REGARD TO THEATERS AND CHURCHES TWELVE YEARS AGO.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1876.

There was a vacant chair in the jury-box this morning, and Mr. Jeffreys, the absentee, was in Judge Neilson's private room in consultation as to whether it would be wise for him to take his place with his fellow-jurors. Mr. Jeffreys finally concluded to make the attempt, and entered the trial-room, looking—as every one present observed—pale and ill. The examination of Mrs. Putnam was immediately resumed. The lady was questioned closely in regard to the home life of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton, but her testimony was interrupted by frequent objections on the part of Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton. Mrs. Putnam testified that the Tiltons were in the habit of greeting their friends by a kiss, Mrs. Tilton kissing the gentlemen; Mr. Tilton, the ladies. The characteristics and virtues of Mrs. Tilton, and the peculiar views, religious and otherwise, of Mr. Tilton, were introduced to some extent, notwithstanding the protest on the part of Mr. Beach that an essay on Mrs. Tilton's disposition and character was not admissible. At this point ex-Judge Porter announced that Mr. Shearman, who was examining the witness, was ill. Judge Porter asked that Mr. Shearman be allowed to sit while conducting the examination. The favor was granted, and Mr. Shearman took a seat exactly between and in close proximity to Mr. Beach and Mr. Fullerton.

Mrs. Putnam testified that she considered Mrs. Tilton truthful in ordinary affairs, but the witness had known of Mrs. Tilton telling what was not true in endeavoring to hide her husband's faults. Mr. Tilton's views with respect to theater-going received a good deal of attention. Mrs. Putnam says that in 1862, (while she was visiting the house of Mrs. Richards, now Mrs. Morse,) Mr. Tilton asked her many times to go to the theater, but, as her husband's death was recent, she declined the invitation. The witness and Mr. Tilton had a long discussion in regard to the matter, during which Mr. Tilton said that he would like his wife to go to the theater soon after he was dead, if it would entertain her. He expressed the opinion that seeing a good play would benefit Mrs. Putnam more than hearing the Rev. Dr. Storrs preach, Mrs. Putnam being then an attendant at Dr. Storrs's church. While the witness was giving the details of a visit of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton at her house at Southport, Conn., Mr. Jeffreys sent word to Judge Neilson that he could not remain in Court any longer. The examination came to a sudden pause, and the Court was adjourned to 2 o'clock. Mr. Case, the second jurymen, went home with the sick juror, and returning at 2 o'clock, brought the news that Mr. Jeffreys was still too ill to take his place. By an agreement of the counsel on both sides, the Court adjourned to the morning of March 8.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. PUTNAM CONTINUED.

The Court met at eleven o'clock, pursuant to adjournment. Sarah C. D. Putnam was recalled, and her direct examination continued as follows:

Mr. Shearman—I was asking you yesterday afternoon, Mrs. Putnam, with regard to the family habit of treating their friends. I will ask a little more on this subject; do you remember a visit—any visit—at Washington which you made in company with Mr. Tilton's family? A. I do; I went to Washington, and they came afterward, and we were together.

Q. Who were there together at that time? A. I went with a party of my own friends, and Mr. and Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Morse and Florence Tilton met us, and came to the same house where we were—private boarding-house.

Q. Was your husband with you? A. I was a widow at the time.

Q. You were a widow at that time—at what time was that? A. That was just before Lincoln's second inauguration; we were present at the inauguration; left the next day.

Q. That was March, 1865? A. I think so; yes, Sir, it was.

MR. TILTON'S SCRIPTURAL ETIQUETTE.

Q. Well, on that occasion, what was the habit of all that circle of friends with regard to greeting in the morning?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to; wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—I think we will take it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What, of all the circle of friends?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—including Mr. Tilton, Mrs. Tilton, and Mrs. Putnam? A. It was—they always were very cordial and warm, and always greeting with a kiss and very—always calling each other by their first names, after the style of the Friends.

Q. Did you ever have any conversation on the subject of this mode of greeting friends with Mrs. Tilton? A. I did once.

Q. Will you state what that conversation was? A. He apologized to me for his habit of kissing people; said that he considered it Scriptural; that the Bible said: "Greet one another with an holy kiss," and he thought he liked the Oriental style of kissing; he liked to see gentlemen kiss, and he should be very sorry to see his wife with the fastidious notions that some ladies had on the subject of kissing. He referred to his brother-in-law, Mr. Richards, and says—

Q. Joseph H. Richards? A. Joseph H. Richards—he says: "Joseph doesn't approve of our free style of—our cordial, free style of intercourse, but he says I think it is the true style; I don't like to just greet my friends with a shake of the hand; I like to give them a kiss, and I like to have my wife do it."

MRS. TILTON'S RELIGIOUS CHARACTER.

Q. Will you state what was Mrs. Tilton's religious character? A. She had a very exalted religious character, a highly spiritualized religious character, and the chief element of her religious character was love. I used often to think that she manifested the most of the love of Christ, the love that could overlook sin and fault and personal wrong to herself, of any person that I ever knew; she lived in a spiritual atmosphere; it was so—

Q. You say that she overlooked faults easily against herself; but, did she overlook faults in herself? A. No, Sir; she was very severe, very rigid, in her judgment of herself; morbidly so, I always thought; and I labored with her many times to convince her that she did herself wrong. If she had committed the slightest offense against a friend, or had neglected a friend in any way, or had dropped an incautious word, that she thought might possibly wound, she gave herself great sorrow over it; has often written me long letters about some little thing that I had utterly forgotten, and was not conscious that she had committed an error, often calling herself very severe names—

Mr. Beach—I don't think you can speak of the letters, Madam, without producing them.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness.] Are those letters in existence? A. Well, I don't know, Sir.

Judge Neilson—You could not use them, Mr. Shearman, if they were.

Mr. Shearman—Well, the counsel objected to giving the contents of letters.

Judge Neilson—Well, you are not giving them; you are giving the general fact.

Mr. Beach—That was sufficient, I think. If the letters were here I might object to them.

MRS. TILTON'S INTELLECTUAL GIFTS.

Mr. Shearman—What was Mrs. Tilton's intellectual character? A. She had a very fine mind, indeed; it was somewhat peculiar; she was a very fine critic; her husband told me once that he valued Elizabeth's criticisms more than those of any other friend.

Mr. Beach—I beg you not to state what others have said.

Mr. Shearman—Excuse me; this is what the plaintiff said, her husband said so.

Mr. Beach—I did not understand it.

Mr. Fullerton—It was not responsive, at any rate.

Mr. Pryor—Nor was it relevant.

Mr. Shearman—Very well; these are very fine criticisms. [To the witness.] What did Mr. Tilton say to you on the subject of his wife's intellectual character? A. He has often told me that Elizabeth was undervalued in her intellectual character, she was so domestic and so quiet; but that she was the finest critic he had ever had; when she pronounced a poem or a composition of his perfect, he said it would do; he felt sure that he had done as well as he could; he always felt satisfied with her criticism, and he said that—he said to me once, in his reading the proof of a poem of his—he spoke of a little criticism Elizabeth had made upon it; and he says: "If Elizabeth was not cumbered with the cares of a family—had her leisure for writing, for intellectual effort, she would make one of the finest writers, most interesting writers.

Mr. Shearman—Do the jury hear?

The Witness—I can speak louder if I try to.

Q. Did you consider Mrs. Tilton a strong or a weak woman? A. I considered her, in most respects, a remarkably strong woman; very strong in her moral character, strong in her powers of loving and in enduring; she had a wonderful endurance; I think I never saw any one that could endure so patiently and so quietly as she could; she had wonderful strength.

METAPHYSICAL CRITICISMS OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Fullerton—I think that is enough, Madam.

Mr. Shearman—Excuse me, I don't think it is; it is but half an answer to my question. I ask whether Mrs. Tilton was a strong or a weak woman.

Mr. Fullerton—She said she was a strong woman.

Mr. Shearman—I will let you know when I am satisfied with the answer.

Mr. Fullerton—And I will let you know when I am not satisfied with it.

Mr. Shearman—Well, let that come on the cross-examination.

Mr. Fullerton—You needn't make it cross now unless you please, but I will object to this wonderful illustration after giving an answer to the question as to her powers of endurance.

Judge Neilson—I think we have sufficient; we have the strength of mind and the power of endurance, and her severe estimate of herself, and her forbearance as to others; I think that gives a pretty full picture of the woman's mind.

Mr. Shearman—With all deference to your Honor's judgment, it does not answer my question, and I, therefore, shall renew the latter half of it. [To the witness.] Was there any point of weakness in Mrs. Tilton's character, Mrs. Putnam; if so, state it?

Mr. Beach—I don't precisely understand, Sir, upon what theory of evidence this lady is called upon to give a judgment or opinion in regard to the mental or moral characteristics of this lady. She might have given incidents illustrating her peculiarities, but I imagine we are not to have an essay from this lady upon the peculiarities of Mrs. Tilton's disposition.

Judge Neilson—This evidence is the extreme of what you could ask from an expert.

Mr. Beach—I suppose so, Sir.

Judge Neilson—And even an expert might be mistaken.

Mr. Beach—To a reasonable extent we make no objections to it, but it seems to me it is getting altogether too refined and particular, and I repeat that I don't know of any principle of evidence that allows evidence of this character. It is admissible to give the state of the family relations and the general characteristics of that family, I suppose, as they are made apparent by their actions in the presence of witnesses. But the highest and most perfect evidence would be the actions themselves.

Mr. Evans—I am afraid, if your Honor please, if we undertake to give—

Judge Neilson—I propose to allow the counsel to put this one question, and that may satisfy him, perhaps. Repeat your last question, please.

Mr. Shearman—I ask if there was any point of weakness in Mrs. Tilton's character, in your observation? A. Yes, Sir; there was one point of weakness.

MRS. TILTON THE SUBMISSIVE CREATURE OF HER HUSBAND'S WILL.

Q. What was that? A. She never seemed to have the power of living out her own life in opposition to her husband's wishes; she was perfectly dominated, apparently, by his will.

Mr. Fullerton—Just one moment. I move, Sir, to strike that out; that is not proper evidence in this case. Under the form of a question as to whether this lady had any weakness, they seek to get in evidence that this woman was dominated by her husband's will.

Mr. Beach—Apparently dominated.

Mr. Fullerton—Apparently dominated by her husband's will.

Mr. Beach—And that is a matter to be proved by facts.

Mr. Fullerton—That is not to be proved by the opinion of any witness, however intimate she may have been with the parties. If that were susceptible of proof at all, which we deny, it would have to be established by instances of some kind, and not permitted to rest on the opinion of any person.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, let me hear you on that subject; I am inclined to think so.

Mr. Everts—The question was allowed and allowable. The answer is responsive to the question; it is this lady's declaration upon an intimate and continued observation of the character and life of this lady in her relations to her family and her husband; that though she had a clear intellect, an intelligent judgment, and strength of will and purpose in other regards, yet in this very relation, which is the subject of all others, concerning which testimony from competent observers may be given, she was unable, in the language, I think, of this witness, to act out her own life when it came in competition with the will and power of her husband. Now, that is good evidence; it is of an important fact; it is in the very marrow of the relation between the husband and wife in respect to this matter in controversy here, and the forms and modes in which it has been produced to public attention, and made the method of this plaintiff's testimony in producing it to the jury, to wit: what his wife had said or done. Now, my learned friends have no power, nor does the law undertake any such absurdity or injustice as to control, or frame, or mold a witness's answer to a proper question. It is the witness's mode of saying as the result of an observation making her competent to say it, that in this regard this lady's character exhibited weakness, to wit: in the submission to the will of her husband to an inordinate and faulty degree. It is then responsive; it produces not instances, but results of observation. And I am afraid, if we were disposed to introduce all the instances of conduct, that we should find a much more decisive objection made by our learned friends, and certainly the disposition of your Honor as I suppose, the inclination of the law is not to take all detailed instances of domestic conduct, but to take from observers the general disposition, attitude, and conduct, and relation of the parties to one another, as exhibited. Such was the course on the testimony for the plaintiff; such we understand to be the proper course.

Judge Neilson—I think I will let the answer stand, gentlemen. Let the answer stand.

Mr. Porter—Will your Honor permit me to suggest that my friend, Mr. Shearman, is quite ill to-day, and I would ask the favor that he be permitted to examine the witness, retaining his seat.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

MRS. TILTON'S TRUTHFULNESS.

Q. Mrs. Putnam, will you state what was Mrs. Tilton's character for truthfulness? A. I never had the slightest hesitation in relying upon Mrs. Tilton's word in anything but one direction.

Q. What direction was that? A. I don't think she was always truthful with reference to her husband's faults.

Judge Neilson—That answers the question.

The Witness—She sometimes made statements that I think were not truthful in reference to her husband's faults, endeavoring to cover up her husband's faults.

Judge Neilson—That will do, Madam; you have answered the question.

Mr. Fullerton—That will do.

Q. And that was the only exception you are aware of? A. I relied on Mrs. Tilton's word implicitly in any of the ordinary affairs of life.

Q. Did you ever know of any case in which she represented her husband to be in fault when he was not?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—I think it has gone far enough, Mr. Shearman.

Q. To what church did you belong when you lived in Brooklyn? A. Rev. Dr. Storrs's—Richard S. Storrs.

MR. TILTON'S EARLY ENTHUSIASM OVER MR. BEECHER.

Q. You mentioned you went in 1856 or 1857 to hear Mr. Beecher; will you tell us by whose invitation you went, or suggestion? A. I had just returned from several years' absence from the city; I had been in Michigan, and renewed my acquaintance with Mrs. Richards, now Mrs. Morse, and her daughter, who had recently been married, was living with her, and in that acquaintance heard Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Richards speak very highly of Mr. Beecher, and was urged by them and invited by them to hear Mr. Beecher.

Q. Can you remember anything which Mr. Tilton said of Mr. Beecher in that early period—1856 or 1857? A. He was very enthusiastic about Mr. Beecher; I don't know that I can give his precise language, but he used to speak of him as one of the great men of the world, and one of the most inspiring men; he used to tell me a great deal about his family and himself.

Q. At that time did Mr. Tilton appear to be a religious man? A. He did.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Mr. Shearman—This is in the direct line of the inquiry upon that subject.

Judge Neilson—She has answered that he did. I think I will let it stand.

Mr. Fullerton—He has stated that upon his cross-examination.

Mr. Shearman—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—I should think, to the entire satisfaction of the other side.

Mr. Shearman—Do you object to Mr. Tilton being proved to be a religious man?

Mr. Fullerton—By you, yes, I would rather take it from himself.

Mr. Shearman—We have got the answer, so we will let it stand. We can have better evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—Not better than we have got.

Q. When did you first notice, if ever, any change in Mr. Tilton's views on the subject of religion and churches? A. I think the first time I was ever impressed with a fear that Mr. Tilton was departing from his old religious faith was on the occasion of a tea-taking at his house in Oxford-st; I think it was in 1862, but I am not confident. It was in Oxford-st.

Mr. Beach—I object to this lady giving her opinion as to the religious views of Mr. Tilton. If those views were expressed by word or act, she can give them.

Judge Neilson—The counsel ought to protect the witness somewhat. You asked: "When?" You observed she was making a general statement, and you ought to have apprised her that all you wanted was the date. If she stated the year that would have been a perfect answer.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we will take the answer—in 1862.

The Witness—I think it was in 1862. It was when they lived in Oxford-st.

Mr. Morris—The question goes beyond the mere time. The objection goes to her stating her impressions.

Judge Neilson—I know.

Q. State what conversation, if any, you then had with Mr. Tilton on the subject of religion and churches about that time? A. He told me he didn't go to church as often as he used to do; that he was throwing off the trammels of church, and that he hoped that his children would never be so trammelled by an education that required them to go to church, and they never would have the religious teaching that he had; he thought it was unwholesome, it was not good for the soul; that our religious views were largely the result of education, and that he had suffered from his education.

Q. You have mentioned that in December, 1862, your husband died. Is that the correct date? A. Mr. Diamond died in 1862.

THE RELATIVE MERITS OF CHURCHES AND THEATERS.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Tilton shortly after that occurrence on the subject of churches and theaters? A. I did.

Q. Will you state what that was, and how it arose? A. Mr. Tilton sent me—

Q. A little louder. A. Mr. Tilton sent me an invitation two or three times to go to the theater with him.

Q. How long after your husband's death? A. A very few weeks after my husband's death. He said he wanted to do something for me to comfort me, and minister to me in some way, and he didn't know of any other way, and I declined. One afternoon his mother-in-law, Mrs. Morse, came around with a special invitation for that evening, saying that if I would—

Mr. Fullerton—No, don't tell us what Mrs. Morse said.

The Witness—She came around with a special invitation from Mr. Tilton. I declined the invitation, saying—

Mr. Shearman—Never mind, if it was not in the presence of Mr. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—You declined the invitation? A. I declined the invitation.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Shearman—Tell what conversation you had with Mr. Tilton on the subject, if any? A. I thought my reply was rather curt, and I went around, as soon as I thought he came from his office, to explain myself to him, and said I thanked him for his kindness, but as I had never been to a theater in my life I didn't like to make my debut in widow's weeds, and he said that was just the time to go, if I was in affliction; that he invited me for the sake of entertaining me; and with that we got into a discussion with regard to the relative merits of theaters and churches. He said that if he should die—I asked him if he would like to think his wife went to a theater to console herself a few weeks after his death, and he said most certainly he should; if she got any entertainment from it, or any relief from sorrow, he would be glad to have her go. He thought those religious narrow notions were exploded, and that they were not worthy of regard. He told me I was narrow, and that it was the result of education, and that I could get more benefit if I would go and see a certain play with him; he felt assured that I would derive more benefit than I would from hearing Dr. Storrs preach—far.

Q. Did you have another conversation with him on that subject in the year 1865, when you were at Washington? A. I did.

Q. Will you state that conversation? A. He asked me if I would go to the theater with him, and repeated the same thoughts he had expressed before, and said that—I told him I never had been to a theater, and he said for that reason I was no judge of a theater, and of the influence of a theater upon me. He said the power of the pulpit over his mind was inferior to the power of the theater; that he derived more inspiration from a certain play he had heard within a short time than he had ever derived from hearing Mr. Beecher, or Dr. Storrs, or any of the great preachers of the day.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton say anything to you with regard to that conversation on the subject of theaters?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Mr. Shearman—We offer this for the purpose of showing that this conversation troubled Mrs. Tilton's mind, and that this was part of the line of—

Judge Neilson—It is ruled out, Sir.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton speak of the subject in the presence of Mr. Tilton? A. She did.

Q. What did she say? A. She commenced—she thanked me for what I had said to him. There was quite a long conversation.

Q. Who was present? A. She began to explain her views, and her husband told her that he was talking to me now, and he didn't want her to interrupt.

Q. Then Mrs. Tilton was present at this conversation? A. She heard the conversation.

Q. What did Mrs. Tilton do when she was told to keep silent? A. She kept silence.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton manifest any feeling in the presence of her husband at that time? A. She did; she manifested a good deal of feeling. She seemed to be very anxious to watch the argument. We had quite an argument, and there was—I don't know that she gave any expression of feeling, only thanking me. She took hold of my hand and said, "I thank you for speaking this way; I wish Theodore had more friends that took this stand with him."

Q. I understand that you opposed Mr. Tilton's views on that subject? A. I did.

MR. TILTON'S MOODINESS.

Q. Now, Mrs. Putnam, did you not spend some time in Southport, Connecticut, in 1866? A. I spent the Summer there.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton and her children spend any time with you there? A. They were with me a good deal that Summer.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton pay some visits there? A. He came up several times and made short visits.

Q. Mrs. Putnam, there has been something said in Mr. Tilton's letters, put in evidence, about his moodiness. Do you recollect anything which occurred at Southport which tends to explain what is meant by his moodiness?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that.

Mr. Shearman—Why?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think Mrs. Putnam can tell what tends to explain Mr. Tilton's letters better than anybody else.

Judge Neilson—You can ask her what she observed at that place.

Q. Will you repeat what occurred at one of Mr. Tilton's visits at Southport, when he showed, if he did show, some moodiness? A. He had been in Washington, I think, and had come up there—

Mr. Fullerton—No, what occurred there; that is the question.

Mr. Shearman—This is a very natural introduction.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't want any introduction.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton told me also he came from Washington.

Mr. Shearman—He was there on a visit? A. He was there on a visit, and he was my guest; he seemed very unhappy and uncomfortable for two or three days, and I, of course, felt very uncomfortable, supposing I was not entertaining him in a way that was agreeable to him, and his moodiness and low spirits increased from day to day, until we were all very uncomfortable.

Q. Well, will you tell how he acted—how did he act at the table? A. Well he didn't seem—he seemed disgusted at everything at the table, and gave us all short answers; he walked up and down the verandah of the house, and threw a general atmosphere of gloom and discomfort over the whole house. I cannot exactly describe his manner.

Judge Neilson—That is sufficiently described, Ma'am.

Q. You say that lasted two or three days? A. I think so. One day it was very much worse than any other day.

Q. What happened on that day? A. Mrs. Tilton declined to come down to her meals. She said—

Mr. Fullerton—No, not what she said.

The Witness—She declined coming down to her meals.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Tilton came down? A. He did.

Q. How long did Mrs. Tilton remain in her room? She remained a good part of the day, perhaps all the day.

Q. Then, did you have any interview with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? Did Mrs. Tilton write Mr. Tilton a letter that day? A. She did.

Q. Did you deliver it? A. I did.

Q. Were you aware of the contents of it? A. I was.

Q. Will you state the contents?

Mr. Fullerton—We object to it.

Mr. Shearman—We call for that letter. [To plaintiff's counsel.] We gave you notice to produce it, a letter written from Mrs. Tilton to her husband in 1866, while at Southport, Connecticut.

Mr. Morris—We cannot find it just now.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton that day? A. I did that evening, just before retiring.

Q. Will you state what that conversation was, as fully as you can? A. Mrs. Tilton came to my room and asked me to come in and hear Theodore apologize for the way he had appeared for the last two or three days. I declined going, as I was ready for bed, but she urged it very much, and I went into their room. He said: "I suppose I have made you very uncomfortable to-day—the past two or three days, and especially to-day, by my moodiness, and my wife and I are both very sorry for it, because you have been so hospitable and courteous to us, but," he says, "I couldn't help it, it was utterly impossible for me to help it."

THE JUROR JEFFREYS STILL INDISPOSED.

Judge Neilson—Gentlemen, the jurymen (Mr. Jeffreys) feels that he cannot remain with us just at present, and I purpose, therefore, sympathizing with him, as we all do, to adjourn until two o'clock, and see whether then he will be better. Will gentlemen keep their seats a few minutes. The jury will retire until two o'clock.

The Court here, at 11:30, took a recess until two o'clock.

AN ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

At the expiration of the recess, Judge Neilson announced the continued illness of Mr. Jeffreys as follows: I regret to state that the jurymen who is ill is not able to attend this afternoon. Mr. Case, one of the jurymen, called upon him, and came directly from him, and advises us that he is not able to come out, and the doctor advised certain remedies, and it was thought, on the whole, the counsel agreeing, that we should adjourn until Monday morning, to give the jurymen some opportunity of recovering or improving. With that view, we now adjourn to Monday morning at eleven o'clock.

THIRTY-NINTH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

TWO WITNESSES FOR THE DEFENSE.

CONCLUSION OF THE TESTIMONY AND CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. PUTNAM—MR. TILTON'S MOODINESS AS EXPLAINED BY HIM—HIS OPINION OF CHURCHES AND OF MR. BEECHER'S POWERS—TESTIMONY OF MISS MOORE—THE PLAINTIFF'S TREATMENT OF HIS WIFE—A WITNESS HARD TO CROSS-QUESTION.

MONDAY, March 8, 1875.

There was no delay in beginning the day's work, as there has been on previous mornings. All the lawyers for both plaintiff and defendant, except Mr. Hill, were in court early; so also were the principals in the suit. All appeared to be the better for the extra day of rest which the sickness of the sixth juror, Mr. Jeffreys, occasioned. Mr. Jeffreys was present, seeming improved in health, and received the congratulations of counsel and his fellow-jurors on his recovery. Promptly at 11 o'clock Judge Neilson asked Mr. Shearman if he would begin. Mr. Shearman replied by calling the name of Mrs. Sarah C. D. Putnam again. The lady was escorted to the witness chair by her husband, a tall gentleman about 65 years old, vigorous for his age. He took a chair at his wife's feet, gazed up approvingly in her face as she uttered her testimony, and occasionally handed to her a glass of water, from which she moistened her throat. The witness said, in reply to Mr. Shearman's questions, that she only knew Mr. Beecher as the world knew him. She had been introduced to him at the house of Mr. Tilton, but had never met him socially elsewhere. Mr. Beecher fondled the Tilton children, and his manner was always that of a familiar pastor. She had seen several photographs of Mr. Beecher, with others of public men, on the card-table in Mr. Tilton's parlor, and had received one of them as a gift from the master of the house. Mr. Tilton had procured for her an autograph volume of one of Mr. Beecher's literary works. Mrs. Putnam represented Mr. Tilton as describing his moodiness at Southport and on other occasions as "one of the moods of genius"—a "penalty of being a poet and a man of genius"—and as illustrating his meaning by mentioning the idiosyncrasies of Burns, Coleridge, and Byron. Mr. Tilton's strictures on the church, and his waning faith in Mr. Beecher's powers, were minutely described by the witness. Mr. Tilton looked amused when the witness repeated a conversation with him in which he called Dr. Storrs "a glittering iceberg."

Mrs. Putnam's direct examination was concluded at half-past twelve o'clock. Judge Neilson remarked to Mr. Fullerton, who was proceeding to cross-examine, that he thought the bearing of the testimony of the witness on the case was such that it would not be worth while to occupy much time with her cross-examination. Mr. Fullerton replied that he would be as brief as possible. His questions in the main were about Mr. Tilton's conduct in his family and Mrs. Tilton's affection for her husband. During the course of the questioning, Mr. Fullerton elicited the fact that Mr. Tilton had kissed the witness in the presence of Mrs. Tilton, and that no exception was taken to the act. The witness said that Mr. Tilton had treated Bessie Turner as he treated his children. Mrs. Putnam stated that Mrs. Tilton had the fault that she would not always speak the truth where her affection for her husband urged her to speak falsely. Mrs. Putnam denied that she had ever expressed herself as angry with Dr. Storrs, but when she was shown a letter in which she had said she was angry with Dr. Storrs's church, she modified her original statement somewhat by saying that she had never felt anger for Dr. Storrs. There was an animated discussion between Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Evarts over this part of Mrs. Putnam's testimony. Mr. Evarts at one time refused to let Mr. Fullerton take a letter which the latter proposed to read in evidence, and Mr. Fullerton retaliated a few moments later when Mr. Evarts wanted to take the letter again to find out to whom it was addressed. The cross-examination of Mrs. Putnam closed a few minutes after the opening of the afternoon session, having lasted about three-quarters of an hour. Her re-direct and re-cross-examinations occupied hardly five minutes and elicited nothing new.

The next witness was Miss Hannah Augusta Moore. She gave her testimony on her affirmation, and was examined by Gen. Tracy. Her evidence was in the main about the domestic affairs of the Tilton family, with whom she once boarded while they were residing in Livingston-st. Miss Moore gave her testimony in a very straight-forward and emphatic manner, and did not appear in the least embarrassed. She told of the changes which had taken place in Mr. Tilton's religious views, and described her efforts and those of Mrs. Tilton to induce him to think as they did on religious matters. She testified that Mr. Tilton was often neglectful of his wife, and that Mrs. Tilton felt that this neglect was because she was not worthy of him. Miss Moore testified, among other things, that on one occasion Mrs. Tilton had said to her, "I wish you had had him," and that she (the witness) had replied, "I am glad that I am spared such a curse." Miss Moore's vigorous manner of giving this bit of testimony created some amusement in the court, which was afterward increased when the witness described a visit of Stephen Pearl Andrews with a lady to the Tilton family. On this occasion Miss Moore said that Mr. Tilton and the lady visitor sat on a sofa together, and the talk was about "spheres" and "affinities." The lady arranged Mr. Tilton's hair and rubbed his face, and peering up into his countenance, said, "What a lovely sphere you have." This testimony, and the gestures of the witness in giving it, caused a laugh in which all in court, including Judge Neilson and the plaintiff and defendant, heartily joined.

The witness was compelled on her cross-examination to modify and correct many of her former statements, but she preserved an entire self-possession during the ordeal. She persisted in answering the questions put, in her own way, and it was noticed that before her cross-examination was concluded the usual suave demeanor of Mr. Fullerton was somewhat ruffled by his efforts to induce the witness to answer directly. Once when Mr. Fullerton chided the witness for not answering directly, she broke out into a hearty, good-natured laugh and said, "You ought to want to find out the spirit of things." Miss Moore's cross-examination and re-direct examination were concluded at a quarter before 4 o'clock. Mr. Fullerton openly confessed that it was utterly impossible to cross-examine the witness.

Mr. Shearman then called the name of Miss Oakley, but Mr. Beach hastily rose and informed the Court that Mr. Jeffreys had not yet recovered from his recent illness and was then feeling unwell. The court was adjourned accordingly until this morning, when Miss Isabella H. Oakley will be the first witness.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. PUTNAM CONTINUED.

At 11 o'clock the list of jurors was called, and all being present Judge Neilson said: "Will you please proceed, Mr. Shearman."

Sarah C. D. Putnam was then recalled by counsel for the defense, and her direct examination continued as follows.

MR. BEECHER DESCRIBED AS THE TILTONS' FAMILIAR PASTOR.

Mr. Shearman—We were so unfortunately interrupted in the examination of Mrs. Putnam that it would be best to begin a little back and not continue precisely where I left off. [To the witness.] You said that you were a member of Dr. Storrs's church? A. I was.

Q. For how long were you a member? A. I don't remember exactly how long I was a member; several years.

Q. You remained such until you moved to the West? A. Until I went to Marietta to live, after I united with his church.

Q. Excuse me. A. I remained so from the time I united with his church until I was married and went to Marietta.

Q. You never were a member of Plymouth Church, were you? A. Never.

Q. You never were a regular attendant, were you? A. No, Sir; excepting that Winter that I spoke of—the Winter of 1855 and 1856, I attended church there most of the Winter, when I was able to attend to it.

Q. After that did you attend Dr. Storrs's with regularity? A. Yes, Sir; when I was in the city—no, Sir; excuse me; I didn't answer correctly. I did not attend Dr. Storrs's church; I was living in South Brooklyn and I attended Rev. Mr. Carpenter's church until I moved down to the Heights; then I attended Dr. Storrs's church.

Q. Rev. Hugh H. Carpenter? A. Hugh H. Carpenter.

Q. Westminster Presbyterian Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How much acquaintance have you had with the defendant in this case, Mr. Beecher? A. I have had very little excepting as all the world know him as a public man; I have no—a very slight personal acquaintance.

Q. Did you ever see Mr. Beecher visit at the house of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I have seen him there perhaps two or three times; almost the only place I ever have met Mr. Beecher socially, there.

Q. Will you describe briefly what occurred on those occasions when Mr. Beecher visited; how he treated the family and Mrs. Tilton, and who was there? Take the first that you remember; who was in the house at the time Mr. Beecher called—the first time? A. Mr. Beecher came in very informally, and Mr. Tilton called upon his wife, and I think she was below, and he said Mr. Beecher was here. She said she could not come up then, and Mr. Beecher went up to the familiar sitting-room and Mr. Tilton went up with him where the children were.

Q. Mr. Tilton? A. Mr. Tilton, and either Mr. or Mrs. Tilton asked me to go up and see Mr. Beecher—knew I would like to be acquainted with him—introduced to him, and I went up, but Mr. Beecher was so absorbed in the children he did not pay much attention to me; he frolicked with the children, and when he got through frolicking with the children he went away; he said very little to any one else.

Q. Well, describe the next visit that you saw? A. Well, I can't remember them in their order; three or four times he happened in there very informally; I remember once he happened in, and Mrs. Tilton and he were going to visit some sick person; I don't know that Mr. Beecher spoke to me, or saw me; I was in the back parlor, and he was in the front; he sat there while Mrs. Tilton put on her things, and she asked me to excuse her, they were going to see some sick person.

Q. Can't you recollect who it was? A. Well, I think it was Mr. Ovington; I am not quite sure, but I think it was Mr. Ovington; and I was there one other time when he came in, and I was just coming out of the hall, and he went up-stairs to the sitting-room; asked where the children were, and I didn't go up—just two or three informal calls of that kind; he seemed to be coming to see the children principally.

Mr. Fullerton—No, not that; I beg your pardon, Madam.

Mr. Shearman—About what years were these visits, Madam? It may help you—were they after Mr. Tilton moved into his present house? A. Yes, Sir; they were after he moved into his present house.

Q. That was in October, 1866? A. Yes, Sir; the time that I most distinctly remember; when Mr. Tilton introduced me to Mr. Beecher was the first visit I made in Brooklyn after I had gone to Marietta, or left Brooklyn—the time that he frolicked so long with the children.

Q. You were married in 1867? A. Yes, Sir; January.

Q. And this was—first visit you made afterward? A. I think it was the next Fall; yes, Sir.

Q. In the Fall of 1867? A. It was the first time I ever was at Mr. Tilton's house visiting after I left Brooklyn to live.

Q. Well, was there anything in the demeanor of Mr. Beecher toward Mrs. Tilton, or Mrs. Tilton toward Mr. Beecher, that attracted your attention—made any especial impression? A. No, Sir, not at all; only that he was their familiar pastor, coming in informally to see them.

Q. Well, were his visits made specially to Mrs. Tilton, or the family?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; that cannot be determined—

Judge Neilson—We have what is described; that is sufficient.

Q. What hour of the day were those visits? A. This visit that I particularly remember was in the morning—he went up-stairs with him, and he received the visit himself.

Q. What is your best recollection of the time of the other visits—daytime or evening? A. They were always in the daytime, the calls that I saw.

Q. Always in the daytime? A. Yes, Sir; my impression is that they were Monday mornings—I know that this was a Monday morning that he made this call.

THE TILTONS' PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. Did you ever see any photographs of Mr. Beecher in Mr. Tilton's house in your visits? A. I have.

Q. Where did you see them? A. I saw them on his—seen them standing on his mantel, and I seen one hanging in his house, a framed one; and I have seen various photographs in the card receiver that stood on the table in his parlor.

Q. Various photographs of whom? A. Of Mr. Beecher and others—of other distinguished men.

Q. Who pointed out—did anybody point out those photographs to you in that card receiver, or show them to you? A. Mr. Tilton once showed me photographs of—a variety of photographs that he thought were particularly fine.

Q. Of Mr. Beecher? A. Of Mr. Beecher and other distinguished men.

Q. And other eminent men? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton ever give you a photograph of Mr. Beecher? A. He did give me one at that time.

Q. From where did he take it? A. He took it from—I do not know whether it was from a little box of—something that stood on his table; took it from a variety of cards that were there.

Q. Did the family have a collection of such photographs? A. They had a large collection of photographs.

Q. And Mr. Beecher's was among those? A. Yes, Sir.

ALL OF MR. BEECHER'S BOOKS IN MR. TILTON'S LIBRARY.

Q. Now, did you see any books written by Mr. Beecher, or presented by Mr. Beecher, lying around the house in any of your visits? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. About what time was it that you saw those—after your marriage, or before, or both? A. I do not think I could remember; I have been in the habit of seeing Mr. Beecher's—I do not remember exactly. I have always been in the habit of seeing those—whatever Mr. Beecher had written—there. I recollect going to the library once—Mr. Tilton gave me permission to take anything from the library that I chose, and I selected one of Mr. Beecher's books in the library.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton ever say anything to you about getting for you a book with Mr. Beecher's autograph, or getting his autograph in any way? A. I told Mr. Tilton once that I had a good many books that had the autographs of the authors in, and that I valued them, and he said—frequently said—he could aid me in adding to the collection if I wished, and gave me one of his own with his autograph in, and asked me if I would not like to have one of Mr. Beecher's, and I said I would, but it would be an impertinence in me to ask Mr. Beecher—he was somewhat of a stranger to me—and he said he could get me one if I wanted.

MR. TILTON'S MOODS ONE OF THE PENALTIES OF GENIUS.

Q. Now, Mrs. Putnam, we will resume that Southport conversation; there has been such a long interruption that you might as well begin. It will be only a few words more; and tell us just how Mr. Tilton acted on that occasion, and what led—

Judge Neilson—We have that down, and I remember it. He was there, and was very moody, three days, and one day Mrs. Tilton did not come down; she wrote a note down. Thereupon Mr. Tilton apologized to her and explained.

Mr. Everts—We have got to the point of explanation.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; begin at that point.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I want to bring in that letter. I have given these gentlemen notice to produce this letter written by Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Tilton, and delivered by Mrs. Putnam to him, on that occasion, and I called for the letter. I didn't suppose it was in existence. [To the witness.] Mrs. Putnam, you read that letter which Mrs. Tilton sent to her husband through you, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; it was rather a note than a letter.

Thos G. Shearman

Q. A little note? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You read it at her request? A. I did.

Q. Now, can you state the substance of that letter, that note?

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Shearman.] Can they produce the letter?

Mr. Shearman—I suppose not; I see Mr. Morris shakes his head.

Mr. Morris—No, we haven't it.

The Witness—It was a protest against his—

Mr. Fullerton—No, don't characterize it.

Judge Neilson—Do you recollect what was in it? A. I could not remember the language, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—The substance of the language.

Mr. Beach—It is the substance of the language, Sir, and not a characterization of the paper.

The Witness—The substance of it was that she could not endure his moods, and she was not coming down until he had changed.

Mr. Shearman—Well, then, you went up-stairs and had a conversation with Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On that subject. Now will you be kind enough to give us that conversation as nearly as you can recollect it?

Mr. Fullerton—What conversation is that?

Mr. Shearman—The conversation in regard to Mr. Tilton's exhibitions of moodiness—and what explanation did he make of it?

A. He said he could not help his moods, that they were irresistible.

Judge Neilson—We had that the other day, and you said he expressed his regret, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Morris—That was all explained the other day.

Mr. Evarts—[To the witness.] Will you endeavor to speak a little louder? We have to make more effort—

The Witness—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—The conversation was broken at the beginning. It is useless to give a conversation in fragments with an interval of three days.

Judge Neilson—We had it the other day.

Mr. Shearman—There are only a few words of it; it is necessary to begin at the beginning.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Shearman—Just go on, Mrs. Putnam, state what he said. A. As near as I can remember he said that his moods—these moods—were beyond his control; that he knew he made his wife and every one unhappy about him when they were upon him, but he could not resist them; he could not help himself. We had some talk about it, and I asked him why he could not help himself; why he could not overcome what he thought was a fault. He said he didn't know, but he could not; he supposed they were the moods of genius; that other men, poets, had the same moods, and spoke of—

Q. Did he mention any poets? A. Spoke of other poets—he said that Burns and Byron and Coleridge, and mentioned some of the English poets, were subject to the same moods, or to similar moods, and they were uncontrollable; it was the penalty that genius had to pay.

Q. He said this was the penalty that genius had to pay? A. One of the penalties of genius; I remember that expression, that he supposed it was the moods of genius; I remember those two expressions; the language of the rest perhaps I have not given exactly, but that was the idea.

Q. Did he say anything about a pall coming over him? A. Yes, Sir; he said that sometimes when he was from home he was—that his heart was heavy with homesickness; he yearned to get home; but as soon as he would get home and get settled down quietly, these moods would come over him; there would be a dark pall settle down upon everything; he said it was no one's fault; it was not because his home was not happy, but it was something he could not resist; those that were connected with him must suffer; he seemed to regret them very much.

HOW MR. TILTON'S MOODINESS WAS CURED.

Q. Did he say anything about the effect of a quiet life? A. Yes, Sir; he said that when he was in such a quiet place where he was then he could not resist it; he had just come from Washington, where there was excitement; he said if he had an audience, something to do, he could rise above it; if he could speak to a thousand Sunday-School children that evening or speak to a large audience next day, he would be all over it; but no amount of reasoning with him would raise him above them.

Q. Well, did he suggest anything practical about an audience? A. I don't know whether he suggested it, or whether I thought of it; but I went—

Mr. Fullerton—Well, one moment; there is quite a difference, and we won't have it unless you can find it out.

The Witness—I could not tell you certainly whether I suggested it, or whether he suggested it.

Q. He did tell you, however, that if he could speak to an audience it would help him out of this mood? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—The reporters don't hear very well; and they have sent me a request; but, of course, you must control the matter according to your own strength and voice. If you bear in mind—

The Witness—Yes, Sir; I am suffering a little from a cold; but I will speak as loud as I can.

Q. Was anything done about an audience? A. There was.

Q. Tell what it was. A. I saw some of the leading men of Southport, and it was near the 4th of July, either the day before or the day but one before, and asked them—

Mr. Fullerton—I think this is unnecessary.

Mr. Shearman—Well, I don't think it is.

Mr. Beach—Well, we object to what she told the leading men.

Judge Neilson—Of course. Go on to what was done.

The Witness—We got up a 4th of July audience in the Southport Congregational Church, where Mr. Tilton spoke with great acceptance.

Q. And after that how did Mr. Tilton act and become? A. He seemed like himself, and in good spirits.

Q. After that did he get entirely out of this mood?

Mr. Fullerton—I suppose you don't propose to show what the speech was in connection with that?

Mr. Shearman—I will if you desire it.

Mr. Fullerton—If you wait until the 4th of July we will have it again.

MR. TILTON'S PRIDE IN HIS POSITION ON THE INDEPENDENT.

Mr. Shearman—Did you have any conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Tilton at about this time with regard to his position on The Independent, and the degree to which he valued it? A. I did.

Q. State what that conversation was? A. He told me that he would rather be the editor of The New-York Independent than to have any other position in the country. He had previously told me that in Washington.

Q. What was said between you on this occasion about that? A. I don't remember what was said on that occasion; I remember better what was said on some other occasion.

Q. I perhaps mingled two or three occasions. State what was said on the other occasions, so as to close this subject of The Independent? A. Shall I tell you what he said at other times?

Q. Yes; give us what he said, and anything that Mrs. Tilton said in his presence, and what you said to him? A. He told me when he was in Washington, where he received a great deal of attention, that he would rather be editor of The New-York Independent than to have any position that any one had at Washington—than the great men who had shown him attentions had, the members of the Cabinet; and he told me once in his house in Livingston-st., when I asked him if he was going to be a political candidate, "No, indeed," he preferred his position as editor of The Independent to anything that the people could give him; there was no office in the gift of the people that he would accept in exchange for his position on The Independent. I told him that I was surprised—I turned to Mrs. Tilton and said, "I am surprised Theodore values the position as much as that." Oh, she said, he did; that it would break Theodore's heart to lose his position on The Independent, and that he thought more of that—

Mr. Fullerton—Was Mrs. Tilton present then? A. She was; yes, Sir.

Q. Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; he was present. We were all talking, and he said at another time that he would rather be editor of The New-York Independent than to fill the most popular pulpit in the country.

BESSIE TURNER TREATED AS A MEMBER OF THE FAMILY.

Q. Did you have some conversation with Mr. Tilton while he was at Southport with regard to Miss Turner—Bessie, as you called her at that time? A. I did, Sir.

Q. State what that was. A. We had several conversations.

Q. Give the substance, briefly. What did he say about her qualities and his intentions in regard to her? A. He said at one time—he asked my advice at one time about sending her to Nyack to school, where my nieces and his sisters were. He said that Bessie was a girl of rare qualities, and if she only had an education she would make a lady, and meant she should have education; he meant she should have as good an education as his sister Annie, whom he was educating at that time. He said often a good deal—we talked a long time about it. He said that he thought Elizabeth kept Bessie confined to the care of the children too much; that Elizabeth had trouble with her disposition sometimes; that he never had any trouble, and he thought Bessie had rare qualities.

Q. Did he say nothing about her musical qualities? A. Yes, Sir; he said her perceptions of musical harmonies were wonderful, they were almost intuitions. He said she was very sensitive, and she was out of her sphere, and was unhappy because she was out of her sphere; she was not educated where she wanted to be.

Q. In what manner did he treat Bessie Turner? Did he treat her as a servant, or as one of the family? A. She always came to the table while they were at our house, and he always greeted her with a kiss, as he did his own children, when he arrived and when he left; he treated her just about as he did his own children; I didn't see any difference, except she was confined at times more to the children's care. She took care of the children herself.

Q. Do you remember his ever reading to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State when that occurred, and what you observed? A. I remember his sitting under an elm tree one day and reading to her from a book, and I afterwards learned it was a book of poems.

Mr. Fullerton—No; one moment.

Mr. Shearman—It is no harm to read from a book of poetry.

Judge Neilson—It is utterly immaterial.

Mr. Fullerton—And it is a waste of time.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] When was this? A. It was the Summer when she was in Southport.

Mr. Shearman—The Summer of 1866.

The Witness—He frequently walked with her up and down under the shade trees, and conversed with her, and seemed interested in her, and treated her as he would a daughter that was of the same age; he always treated her in a perfectly proper and kindly way.

WHEN MR. TILTON OUTGREW MR. BEECHER.

Q. Now, in the Fall of this year, 1866, did you have any further conversation with Mr. Tilton on the subject of his attendance at church? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Did he tell you what his habits were at that time with regard to attendance at church, and how often he had been at church? A. He told me he had nearly given up church-going; he very seldom went; that when he went, he went more to hear good music, or to accompany some friend, and occasionally he went with Elizabeth, but church, as an institution, he had given up, and priestcraft he had given up.

Q. Did he compare the drama with the Gospel in any way?

Judge Nelson—We had that the other day.

Mr. Shearman—This is something different.

The Witness—Yes, Sir. He repeated pretty much what I said before. He said he preferred the platform to the pulpit, and the drama to what I would call preaching the Gospel.

Q. In this conversation did he speak about ministers? A. He did.

Q. What ministers did he mention? A. We had a long conversation. We discussed a good many of the Brooklyn ministers and New York ministers. He said the most about Mr. Beecher and Dr. Storrs.

Q. What I want to know really is, whether he talked of them in conjunction with Mr. Beecher, and made any comparison? A. Yes, Sir, he did.

Q. Just tell us what he said with regard to Mr. Beecher and the other ministers whom he mentioned in connection with Mr. Beecher? A. He said that— Do you wish me to say what he said of Mr. Beecher?

Q. Yes, and of others also? A. I asked him if his leaving church-going was because he didn't like Mr. Beecher, and he said no; he liked Mr. Beecher as a man, but he had outgrown Mr. Beecher. When I asked him if he didn't think Mr. Beecher was still the great preacher of the day, he said yes, Mr. Beecher was the great moral preacher of the day, but he had outgrown him, that people got tired of a man when they had heard him so many years, and he considered that it fettered a man to sit always under one line of thought. He spoke a good deal of Mr. Beecher's moral qualities, and the characteristics of his teachings, and compared them with other ministers.

Q. Can you tell us, in substance, what he said on that subject? A. I cannot give Mr. Tilton's language, but I can give you the substance of it.

MR. TILTON'S ESTIMATE OF MR. BEECHER'S GIFTS.

Q. That is all we require; the substance of the language? A. He said Mr. Beecher's genius was very much overrated; that Mr. Beecher's power over people was through his moral qualities, his magnanimity and his great-heartedness. He said that he was such a believer in his fellow-man, and he said that people were tired of the old Calvinistic doctrines, they were tired of decrees and so forth, characterizing the Calvinistic doctrines, and they went to hear Mr. Beecher because they got something fresh, something new, and something that was varied. He said that Mr. Beecher was the most magnanimous man that he ever saw; he said he often was imposed upon, but if people knew him as well as he did, they could impose upon him a great deal more than they did. He said that magnanimity was Mr. Beecher's quality, was his moral characteristic; and I told him that I thought courage—moral courage was, and he said there was where myself and other people were very much mistaken; Mr. Beecher was a very courageous man before a multitude, but he was almost a coward before an individual sinner who saw him.

Q. Before an individual sinner? A. Before an individual sinner; he could not rebuke one private individual, but could stand up and face a mob.

Q. And this was with reference to Mr. Beecher's power to rebuke sin, do I understand it?

Mr. Fullerton—No, she has stated what was said upon that subject.

Mr. Shearman—This is a very fair question.

Mr. Fullerton—It was not a question at all. You said that you understood it.

Mr. Shearman—I repeat it. In what connection was this reference to courage made? A. It was in connection with my saying that his courage was—his moral courage was his great characteristic, and he said it was not. We were discussing Mr. Beecher and his peculiarities.

Q. You were not talking about physical courage at all? A. No, Sir; talking about moral courage.

MR. BEECHER AND DR. STORRS COMPARED.

Q. Now, was any comparison made between Mr. Beecher and other ministers at that time; if so, state what it was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. State what it was? A. He said Dr. Storrs had more logic, was a better theologian than Mr. Beecher—a theologian in the common acceptance of the term; and he said they were utterly unlike. He spoke of Dr. Storrs as cold and logical, and of Mr. Beecher as warm-hearted and impulsive, never stopped to think what the influence of what he said was—how it would affect him. I don't remember his language; I remember one expression; after we had discussed the matter some time he said: "Dr. Storrs is a man to go to to help you keep out of trouble. Mr. Beecher is a man to go to if you are in trouble, to help you out of it."

Q. Any other expression about Dr. Storrs, that you remember? A. I don't think of any other expression than that.

MR. TILTON ON THE CLEVELAND LETTER.

Q. Now, Mrs. Putnam, after the publication of the Cleveland letter, in 1836, do you remember visiting Mr. Tilton when that matter was made the subject of conversation? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, do you remember seeing a bust or plaster cast of Mr. Beecher at that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Something about it which formed the subject of conversation? A. The first time I went into their house after they had—

Q. Just wait a moment. Now go on and tell what happened on that occasion, and speak a little louder, if you can. A. The first time I visited their home after they were settled in their new house in Livingston-st., Mrs. Tilton showed me a little plaster bust of Mr. Tilton that she had put on a little bracket right at her sitting-room door on the second story. We had some conversation about it, and the next time I went there the face of the bust was turned towards the wall, and Mr. and Mrs. Tilton and myself came up-stairs and were just passing into the sitting room. I was making an informal call. I said: "Why, Mr. Beecher's face is to the wall." Mr. Tilton said: "That is Elizabeth's doing." I said: "How is that, Elizabeth; why have you turned your pastor's face to the wall?" She says: "Theodore says that our pastor has proved himself a traitor to the Republican party."

Q. Mr. Evarts thinks you said this was a bust of Mr. Tilton. If you did say so, you meant Mr. Beecher? A. I meant a bust of Mr. Beecher. It is a little, small, plaster cast.

Q. I didn't catch it. Well, was there any more conversation? A. Yes, Sir; we went into the sitting room and had a long talk.

Q. So far as Mr. Beecher was made the subject of that conversation, please relate the conversation whether his qualities of mind were discussed with reference to his conduct and writing the Cleveland letter? A. I asked Mr. Tilton if writing the Cleveland letter and the editorial that he wrote on the Cleveland letter—

Q. The editorial that Mr. Tilton had written? A. Yes, Sir; if the letter that Mr. Tilton had written in The Independent, and the editorial on it, was the occasion of any alienation between himself and Mr. Beecher, and he said he thought not; he said Mr. Beecher was too magnanimous a man to lay up anything against one who had expressed their honest sentiments. I asked him if he didn't think his editorial had hurt Mr. Beecher, and he said he presumed it had, but that Mr. Beecher would never show it.

Q. Did you say you thought it would hurt him, or hurt his feelings? A. I asked him if he didn't think it would hurt Mr. Beecher's feelings—I meant his feelings. He said he presumed it did hurt his feelings, and upon that we sat down and had a long talk about Mr. Beecher, very much a repetition of our talk in Southport, with a few additional remarks that Mr. Tilton made.

MR. BEECHER'S FORGIVING DISPOSITION.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say anything with regard to Mr. Beecher's inability to understand how any one should punish? A. He analyzed Mr. Beecher's character again; he spoke again of Mr. Beecher's great magnanimity, and his love and forgiveness; he said that Mr. Beecher's power lay there; he said people thought it was his genius, but it was not his genius; Mr. Beecher was overestimated in his genius very much; there were a great many men in the world who had more genius than Mr. Beecher; but he said Mr. Beecher never could lay up anything against any one; it was utterly impossible; he never could be willing to see any one punished for anything they had done.

Q. Did he say anything about the effect upon Mr. Beecher's mind of doing him a wrong? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was it? A. He said Mr. Beecher had a very peculiarly constituted mind, and if one wanted to enlist him in their behalf the best way to do it was to abuse Mr. Beecher.

Q. What did he say Mr. Beecher would do then? A. He said he would exert his best powers to deliver them from any difficulty they had gotten into from him.

Q. What did he say about Mr. Beecher's course in case he (Mr. Beecher) had injured anybody—what he would do if he were made to believe that he had injured anybody? A. I remember the impression he left on my mind; I don't know as I can remember the language.

Q. We only require the substance of the language; of course you cannot remember the exact words? A. He said that Mr. Beecher was—the substance of it was that Mr. Beecher—it was impossible to do anything to Mr. Beecher that he would not forgive and overlook—commit any offense against him; that he was very sensitive himself to anything he had done to others, but it was one of his peculiar characteristics; his mind was peculiarly constructed in that respect; that if he thought he had ever injured a person he would leave no effort—he would put forth every effort he possibly could to comfort them and help them, and to do away with what might have been an injury to them. He said he was a very tender man of people's feelings—exceedingly so—and that his peculiar constitution of mind subjected him to great imposition from those who were designing.

DR. STORRS CALLED A GLITTERING ICEBERG.

Q. Now, do you remember—do you recollect making a visit to Mr. Tilton on a Sunday in 1866, just before he went lecturing—in November, 1866? A. I do, Sir; it was my last visit there.

Q. Well, what did you do yourself that Sunday morning; did you go to church or what? A. I went to church; yes, Sir.

Q. What church? A. Dr. Storrs's.

Q. Did you hear Dr. Storrs preach? A. I did.

Q. After that where did you go? A. I returned to Mr. Tilton's house. I was spending the Sabbath there.

Q. What did you find Mr. Tilton doing? A. I found him hanging pictures.

Q. What conversation passed between you on that? A. I expressed a little surprise that he was hanging pictures on the Sabbath. He had a man assisting him—he said it was his worship.

Q. Then did you have any discussion about the observance of Sunday? A. No, Sir; we had no particular discussion about the observance of the Sabbath. He asked me where I had been to church—where I had been, and I said I had been to church. He asked me where I had been to church, and I said I had been to my own church, to Dr. Storrs's. He said: "I thought you was one of those good women who didn't need to go to church;" and I said I was not; and he says: "Why do you go to hear that—do you go to hear Dr. Storrs always?" and I said, "Yes, when I am in the city;" and he says: "Why, do you go to hear that glittering iceberg?" and I said yes, but I didn't like the way he spoke of my pastor, and turned and left the room. He called out to me—he was on the step-ladder—and he says: "Wait until I finish hanging this picture, and I will talk that over with you."

Q. Did you resume the conversation at dinner? A. I did, when I came down to the dinner-table.

Q. Was Mrs. Tilton present then? A. She was.

Q. Did he make any comparison between you and Mrs. Tilton in regard to this matter? A. Why, he said—I don't know whether he said it then—he said it in the course of the conversation—that Elizabeth and I were very much alike about some things—in our ideas.

Q. In what respect? A. He said that we were narrow and hampered by our old religious notions.

Q. In that conversation did he say anything again in regard to church going, his intentions or habits, if so, what? A. He apologized to me for—I don't know as he exactly apologized, but he says—alluded to his speaking of my pastor as he did, calling him a glittering iceberg; and he says "I didn't mean to be—to speak disrespectfully of Dr. Storrs, or of your pastor. I would speak in the same way of my own pastor," said he, "or rather of Elizabeth's pastor; I have no pastor." I said, "You would not call Mr. Beecher a glittering iceberg, would you?" He said: "No, he would not call Mr. Beecher a glittering iceberg," but he made some other comparison, I don't remember what, that was more appropriate to Mr. Beecher, and then we commenced another long conversation about—a repetition of what we had gone over before, about church-going and the trammels of the church, etc.

HOW MR. TILTON WISHED HIS CHILDREN REARED.

Q. Was anything said about the mode of bringing up his children in regard to church-going? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was that? A. He used the word "priestcraft" two or three times, and said that his children should not—if he had his own way his children should not be brought up to feel as he had felt about the ordinances and church-going, &c. He said he would not have them now; he would take them out of Sabbath-School and forbid them going to church, but Elizabeth—he said Elizabeth would always have her own way about the children; they were not his notions at all. He had thrown off those trammels himself, and he repeated again that he should never go to church again to hear the Gospel; he might go to hear good music; he might go as he would go to hear a lecture; he might go to take a guest that was staying with him to church, but he said: "It may be years before I step inside of a church again, and I shall not go to church ever again, excepting for some such reason as that." He said when his children were old enough to judge for themselves, he should insist that they should throw off these trammels, if they wished to.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton say anything to him on the subject of the children's training at that time? A. He said that Elizabeth always had her own way about those things, and she replied that as long as she took all the care of the children and gave them all their training, she must train them according to her own conscience; and he then said: "Well, when they are old enough to judge for themselves, they shall throw off these trammels if they wish;" and he said: "I hope they will never suffer what I have suffered from the trammels of religious education."

Q. After you were married did not different members of Mr. Tilton's family make you several visits in Marietta? A. Yes, Sir, they did.

Q. Can you mention those visits, some of them? A. Mr. Tilton made me a very short call when he was lecturing, only part of a day; and Mrs. Morse and Alice visited me the first Summer I was there—Mrs. Morse and Alice Tilton.

Q. Did they spend some time with you? A. They spent a month with me, I think.

Q. Did Florence visit you in 1868? A. I do not know what year. Florence came out with some family friends of mine and spent a large part of the Summer.

Q. Was it the same year that little Paul died? A. Yes, Sir; she was there when Paul died.

Q. That was 1868. A. And Mrs. Tilton and Carroll visited me in 1870.

Q. Did Beattie Turner come to you in 1870? A. She did, in February of 1870; the last of January or the first of February.

Q. How long did she stay with you? A. She stayed with me until Mrs. Tilton left in the Fall of 1870.

Q. That was November, 1870? A. Yes, November, 1870.

Q. You say Mrs. Tilton and Carroll visited you in 1870? A. They did.

Q. Was that in the middle of October or thereabouts? A. I think about the 12th or 13th of October; somewhere near that that they arrived.

Q. When did she return to New York? A. She returned to New-York, I should think, about—somewhere from the 8th to the 12th of November. I don't remember the precise day.

SOME SECONDARY EVIDENCE EXCLUDED.

Mr. Shearman—We now call for letters under a former notice to produce—all letters received by Mr. Tilton from his wife during the Fall of 1870, during her absence at Marietta, and letters received from Mr. Tilton by his wife, if any are preserved, during that same period.

Mr. Morris—I shall not be able to furnish you with all that you call for now, with readiness.

Mr. Shearman—I have accepted, I believe, a notice to produce—gave instruction to accept that particular letter—a double letter. I do not call for that; it is the other two letters.

Mr. Fullerton—What do you mean by the double letter?

Mr. Shearman—That I don't want; any other letters during October or November.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Shearman, there are none; I am so informed.

Mr. Shearman—While Mrs. Tilton was at Marietta—

Mr. Everts—The answer is they have no letters such as we call for.

Mr. Morris—Except one.

Mr. Shearman—While Mrs. Tilton was at Marietta did she read to you, or allow you to read any part of the correspondence between herself and her husband? A. She did, some parts of it.

Q. Do you recollect a letter written by Mr. Tilton in that period in which he referred to the possibility of his dismissal from The Brooklyn Union and The Independent?

Mr. Fullerton—Wait one moment. What is that?

Mr. Shearman—I ask if Mrs. Putnam recollects a letter from Mr. Tilton, received by his wife, during that period in which he referred to the possibility of his dismissal from The Brooklyn Union and The New-York Independent.

Mr. Fullerton—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—Where is the letter, Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Everts—We have asked for the letter, and they say they haven't it.

Mr. Beach—We would not have it.

Judge Neilson—How would they have it?

Mr. Everts—They would have it.

Judge Neilson—A letter written by Mr. Tilton to his wife?

Mr. Evarts—Yes; but all the contents of that house was in Mr. Tilton's hands.

Mr. Morris—No, no; not by a long shot.

Judge Neilson—We cannot assume that he has got that letter.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor, let us see for a moment.

Judge Neilson—One moment! I do not wish any argument about it.

Mr. Evarts—No; but if your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—I don't wish any argument.

Mr. Evarts—Does your Honor require me not to state my proposition?

Judge Neilson—You may state your proposition, but I do not wish any argument.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor does not wish me to, I certainly shall not force myself upon you and the jury.

Judge Neilson—That remark is unnecessary; I have generally heard you with pleasure and satisfaction.

Mr. Evarts—Not at this time.

Judge Neilson—Well, at this time. Here is a letter written by another person, seen by this witness.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor will observe, these letters of Mrs. Tilton to himself, and of himself to Mrs. Tilton, have all been produced by this plaintiff as being equally in his possession, and from those same treasures we are to expect any other letters passing either way between those parties.

Judge Neilson—Well, Sir, when you call for a letter, assuming, as perhaps you have a right to do, that they, having produced some, also have this, and you receive from respectable counsel the answer that they haven't got it, that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. Evarts—I agree to that, that they haven't got it; that is the only ground upon which I offer this evidence of the witness.

Mr. Morris—And we further say that there are a great many written that we have not also.

Judge Neilson—There is no foundation laid.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Tilton has given an account as to the manner in which these letters written to his wife were obtained by him.

Judge Neilson—Now, the answer of counsel that he has not got it, and cannot produce it, is satisfactory.

Mr. Evarts—We do not quarrel with that, if your Honor please; we accept that, and have thereby laid the foundation for disclosing the contents by those who know.

Judge Neilson—I do not think so; no, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Well, not certainly upon the ground that they are not supposed to have the letter?

Mr. Fullerton—Upon that ground alone.

Mr. Evarts—If there was such a letter; if there never was such a letter, then it won't be proved; but if there was such a letter, and the witness saw it and read it, then that is good legal proof, provided—

Judge Neilson—If there was such a letter, and the witness saw it and read it, and it appeared to the satisfaction of the Court that that letter has been lost, or estranged, then you can prove it.

Mr. Evarts—And the basis of that satisfaction is our call for the letter, and its non production.

Judge Neilson—And the answer of counsel that he has it not and cannot produce it.

Mr. Evarts—That is the very answer that permits us to give this secondary evidence.

Judge Neilson—Proceed to something else; I rule this out.

Mr. Evarts—It is the only answer upon which we can give the secondary evidence.

Mr. Beach—Our answer is that we haven't it, and never had it.

Mr. Evarts—Ah! that we never heard.

Mr. Beach—Yes, you have.

Mr. Evarts—No.

Mr. Beach—You hear it now.

Mr. Evarts—That you never had the letter?

Mr. Beach—Never had it after it was sent.

Mr. Evarts—Nobody has answered that.

Mr. Beach—It is answered now.

Mr. Evarts—We have given notice to produce it; we have proved that all the contents of that house, including all papers of every kind that were in existence, were left there.

Judge Neilson—But not including this letter.

Mr. Morris—By what witness have you proven that fact; who has ever proved that there was such a letter?

Mr. Evarts—This witness is the person to do it.

Judge Neilson—I understand you perfectly, and understand your theory; I think the proper foundation has not been laid for showing the contents of this letter.

Mr. Evarts—Is it, if your Honor please, upon the ground that Mr. Tilton is not presumably in possession of that letter?

Judge Neilson—The counsel has answered.

Mr. Evarts—I don't mean that he is not now in possession; as I say, I proceed upon the ground that it is not in existence; if it were in existence we should have it.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Evarts—It not being in existence, we are entitled to prove its contents by competent evidence.

Judge Neilson—A letter received by a third person in another State, perhaps brought back and perhaps not.

Mr. Evarts—It is a letter received by the plaintiff's wife.

Judge Neilson—Yes, in another State.

Mr. Evarts—And presumably in her possession in her house; he succeeded to that possession, on his own statement, of everything that was there.

Mr. Beach—That is a mistake.

Mr. Morris—He has not made any such statement.

Judge Neilson—I see no trouble about this.

Mr. Evarts—He said that his wife left, taking nothing but his love and good will. Now, if that don't leave him in possession of everything that she presumably was in possession of, I don't know of language that would convey it.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no such presumption, Sir.

Judge Neilson—It is immaterial whether there is or not. I have ruled on this, and would like to have the ruling accepted.

Mr. Fullerton—There is no evidence that the letter ever left Marietta.

Judge Neilson—I think we ought to proceed. It is very informal and of secondary importance. Go on, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Evarts—That might depend upon what the contents of the letter was. Well, your Honor, we offer to prove the contents of a letter from Mr. Tilton to his wife during the month of October or the early part of November, 1870, and received by her while an inmate in the family of Mrs. Putnam, shown to Mrs. Putnam by Mrs. Tilton and called for by us and not produced.

Mr. Fullerton—Because we haven't got it.

Mr. Evarts—Well, of course I assume you haven't got it; that is the very basis.

Judge Neilson—Well, your offer is overruled.

Mr. Evarts—And we claim that we have laid the foundation for secondary evidence, and this is a competent witness to that secondary evidence.

Judge Neilson—I don't see it in that light, Sir. Mr. Shearman you will proceed.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will be so good as to note our exception.

Q. Do you know what became of that letter? A. I do not.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton prepare a letter to her husband which she showed you about that time? A. She showed me several letters that she wrote her husband while there.

Q. Do you remember one of which she made a copy, and which you and she compared together—the original and the copy? A. I do.

Q. Do you remember Mrs. Tilton's general appearance and manner after sending that letter?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I simply propose to show, if your Honor please, that Mrs. Tilton was cheerful after sending that letter; not to show a word that she said.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will please note our exception. [To the witness.] Do you remember the arrival of the answer to that letter? A. I do.

Q. Did Mrs. Tilton invite you to read that answer? A. She invited me to go up-stairs and read it with her.

Q. Did you go up-stairs? A. I went up after I had sent the letter up to her.

Q. Tell just what happened. A. I sent the letter up to her, and about, perhaps, half an hour—20 minutes or half an hour went up-stairs to see how she felt about it.

Mr. Morris—We object to that, your Honor.

Judge Neilson—She said she went up-stairs; that is right enough. Go on.

Q. Did you find Mrs. Tilton; and, if so, state the result?

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

A. I found her.

Judge Neilson—You found her; that is the answer. "I found Mrs. Tilton there."

Mr. Shearman—We want to know how you found Mrs. Tilton.

Mr. Fullerton—That is what we object to.

Judge Neilson—She can state that she found her when she went up-stairs; she cannot go any further.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we will go as far as we are permitted.

Mr. Fallerton—You have got there now.

Mr. Shearman—Did you find Mrs. Tilton up-stairs? A. I did.

Q. In what condition?

Mr. Fullerton—I object.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—Well, we propose to show a simple fact about it.

Mr. Fullerton—It is so simple that the Court will not let it in.

THE JUDGE REBUKES PLAINTIFF'S COUNSEL.

Mr. Shearman—We except. [To the witness.]

Did you speak to Mrs. Tilton? A. She was not—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. Please answer the question, and not smuggle in evidence in that way.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Beach! If your Honor please—

Judge Neilson—One moment, Mr. Shearman. Mr. Beach, you committed a grave error in using the word "smuggle."

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't think I did, Sir. I of course submit to your Honor's rebuke, but this lady should not be allowed—she was simply asked whether she spoke to Mrs. Tilton. She had understood the previous discussion, and our objections, and your Honor's ruling that she was not at liberty to state the condition in which she found Mrs. Tilton, and in answer to that simple question she undertook to state the condition in which she found Mrs. Tilton, and I say, Sir, it is smuggling in testimony.

Mr. Morris—She didn't answer the question—was not proceeding to.

Judge Neilson—It might be a mere inadvertence.

COUNSEL INTERCHANGE SHARP WORDS.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Beach.] You repeat it?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir; I repeat it.

Mr. Evarts—You repeat the offense in the face of the Court?

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; in explanation to the Court.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, I consider that an outrage, no matter who it comes from.

Judge Neilson—One moment, please.

Mr. Beach—It will probably annihilate me, Sir, that he does consider it an outrage.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman was not called upon to administer any rebuke to Mr. Beach after the remark I made.

Mr. Beach—I submit to it.

Mr. Shearman—He renews the same remark.

Mr. Beach—Under your Honor's view I withdraw the expression.

Judge Neilson—I don't think counsel will use those expressions. It is improper. I have signified my view of it.

Mr. Beach—In obedience, Sir, to your Honor's idea of propriety, I very respectfully withdraw the remark.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—If he withdraws his I will withdraw mine.

Mr. Morris—I think his Honor would survive without your withdrawal.

Mr. Beach—I didn't desire a withdrawal from you.

Mr. Shearman—Let it stand. [To the witness.] Now, Mrs. Putnam, will you please answer my question: Did you speak to Mrs. Tilton when you went up-stairs?

Judge Neilson—You may say yes or no to that question. A. I did not.

Judge Neilson—That will do now.

Q. Why did you not?

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—We except, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Everts—Now, if your Honor please, we offer to prove by this lady—

Judge Neilson—I understand it perfectly; I understand this question, and I rule it out.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor does not understand what we propose to prove.

Judge Neilson—If you offer something additional, of course I will hear you.

Mr. Everts—We propose to show by this lady that when she went into Mrs. Tilton's room she found that that lady—

Mr. Morris—Now, if your Honor please, we object. The question is ruled out, and counsel now is seeking to get in, by a statement to the Court, that which your Honor has ruled out; and I submit that it is improper that the counsel should make his offer. There is nothing before the Court. The counsel now is proceeding to state what they offer to prove by a question that your Honor has ruled out. We submit that it is improper that counsel should go on and state what they propose to prove by the identical question, after it has been ruled out by the Court.

Mr. Everts—You think you know what it is, by the seal which you show.

Mr. Morris—I know what you propose.

Mr. Everts—Yes, I thought you did; I thought you knew what I proposed.

Mr. Morris—I know you propose to get in evidence that has been ruled out.

Mr. Everts—Yes; I thought you knew.

Judge Neilson—One moment! Now, I understand you to make an offer of some kind, which I wish to listen to.

Mr. Everts—I do; I propose to prove by this witness, that when she entered the room she found this lady upon the floor, fainted away, with her husband's letter in her hand.

Judge Neilson—That is ruled out.

Mr. Morris—Now, Sir, is it proper that counsel should make such an offer as that when they had asked the question calling for the precise fact, and it had been ruled out by the Court? Is it proper for counsel to get up then and make such an offer? Isn't that smuggling in testimony?

Judge Neilson—There is something due to the seal of the counsel, of course. I have found that out.

Mr. Everts—There is no zeal on our side.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, will you proceed with your examination.

Mr. Everts—And then we should proceed to show the contents of that letter.

Judge Neilson—It is ruled out.

Mr. Everts—We except to your Honor's decision.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Shearman—Did you find Mr. Tilton's letter in Mrs. Tilton's hand? A. I did.

Q. Did you take it out of her hand?

Mr. Beach—I object to this as immaterial.

Judge Neilson—It is immaterial and ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—We except. [To the witness.] Did you read that letter? A. I did.

Q. Was that letter afterwards destroyed? A. I suppose it was.

Mr. Beach—I object to this.

The Witness—Mrs. Tilton told me it was.

Judge Neilson—You don't know whether it was? A. No.

Mr. Shearman—Very well. This letter comes under our former call; we now ask for the contents of that letter.

Mr. Beach—We object.

Judge Neilson—It is ruled out, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—We except to that; and, if your Honor please, I propose to make an offer of proof.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I offer to prove that this letter contained a statement to the following effect:—

Mr. Pryor—If your Honor please, we object.

Mr. Shearman—[Continuing:] "I shall have just such women visit my house as I please."

Mr. Fullerton—If your Honor please, this is objected to.

Mr. Pryor—If your Honor please, they propose now to give the contents of the letter, pure and simple. Your Honor sees that this is not proof—is not competent evidence without reference to what the contents may be; absolutely incompetent. They then propose to repeat, in the hearing of the jury, the contents of the letter, well aware from your Honor's peremptory ruling that it is not evidence, and that you won't admit it; and we object to it.

Judge Neilson—They are well aware that I will not admit it, but they propose to make an offer to point the exception.

Mr. Pryor—But, the exception goes to the whole letter. Under no circumstances can the contents of the letter be evidence in this case, if your Honor please.

Mr. Shearman—That was precisely the ruling—

Judge Neilson—I hardly think Mr. Shearman would, for the sake of mere form, or for the sake of getting the letter before the jury—

Mr. Beach—Well, I don't imagine for one moment that this jury can be affected by the statements which counsel makes under such circumstances.

Judge Neilson—I hardly think Mr. Shearman would make an offer simply with that view.

Mr. Beach—Well, I think otherwise. It is perfectly obvious that it is made with that view; but I have no apprehensions.

Mr. Morris—It is the contents of the letter that your Honor has ruled out as utterly incompetent for them to prove; very well, then, it is improper for them to make the offer to prove the contents of that ruled-out letter.

Mr. Fullerton—There is another subject, which may as well be stated. They have not laid the foundation for such contents.

Mr. Pryor—That is the ground I take.

Mr. Fullerton—That letter may be in existence, in this city, in this room.

Judge Neilson—I don't think he has laid any foundation.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; and, therefore, they cannot undertake to prove the contents of it for that reason.

Mr. Evarts—We have laid the same foundation that we did in the other case.

Judge Neilson—You laid all the foundation you could, no doubt.

Mr. Evarts—It is the same foundation; that your Honor understands.

Judge Neilson—That is disposed of.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor no doubt disposed of this question in regard to this letter when you did the other.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Shearman, will you proceed with something else?

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception to the refusal of the right to prove the contents of the letter.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Putnam, have you not been for a long time well acquainted with Mrs. Morse? A. I have.

Q. Were you not intimately acquainted with her during all this period from 1855 or 1856, down to the present time? A. I have been.

Q. Was Mrs. Morse in the habit of talking to you freely and fully about her family affairs and the affairs of her daughter?

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—I don't propose to prove what Mrs. Morse said.

Judge Neilson—You can say yes or no to that, Madam, I think. A. She was.

EVIDENCE AS TO MRS. TILTON'S HEALTH EXCLUDED.

Q. What was the condition of Mrs. Tilton's health during her visit at Marietta? A. She was very feeble.

Q. How did her feebleness manifest itself; did she have any attacks?

Mr. Fullerton—I don't think that has anything to do with it, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—That she was very feeble, I think, answers it sufficiently. This lady is not a physician.

Mr. Evarts—What was her malady?

Judge Neilson—The very fact that she was very feeble is sufficient, I think.

Mr. Evarts—We wish to ask this question: What was her malady, and how did it exhibit itself?

Judge Neilson—Ruled out as immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—Perhaps that might depend upon what the malady was.

Mr. Morris—How is it of any importance whether she was sick or well?

Judge Neilson—This lady is not a physician. I don't think we will go any further on that subject.

Mr. Evarts—An observer could tell whether a woman lay in a trance as well as a physician could.

Judge Neilson—We are not in a transition state now; I don't think we will take it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Well, if your Honor please, we regard it as important.

Judge Neilson—I don't think I will take it.

Mr. Evarts—I think your Honor will agree with us that whether it was important will depend upon the character of the malady and the manifestations of it.

Judge Neilson—No; it opens the door to speculation, and it might lead to some error were it of any moment at all.

Mr. Evarts—If it were not significant and determinative, if your Honor please, if it was significant and determinative, it would be proper evidence.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out.

Mr. Shearman—Your Honor will note our exception. May it please your Honor, in order to give point to our exception, we will offer to prove that at this occasion Mrs. Tilton was subject to a malady which caused her frequently to fall into a trance, and to faints of long duration, lasting an hour or more at a time, during which—the events which occurred during which time she remained entirely unconscious of.

Judge Neilson—Ruled out as immaterial.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will note our exception. This extends, if your Honor will notice, through the month of October and half or the early part of November, immediately preceding the December of 1870, in which certain action of this lady is supposed to be important.

Mr. Shearman—It is for the very purpose of characterizing that action and showing how it originated and what importance should be attached to it that we offer this evidence.

Judge Neilson—[To plaintiff's counsel.] Now, you can cross-examine. [To Mr. Shearman.] Have you got through, Mr. Shearman?

Mr. Shearman—We are through, Sir.

Judge Neilson—I would like to say to counsel, before he proceeds with the cross-examination, that while he knows as well as I do the character and effect of this evidence, I think it proper to submit to him whether it is important to go into an extended cross-examination. You must judge for yourself, I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—I shall be as brief as possible, Sir. The other side attach importance to this evidence or they would not put it in.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MRS. PUTNAM.

Mr. Fullerton—When did you first become intimately acquainted with Mrs. Tilton? A. My intimate acquaintance commenced in 1855-56.

Q. Where were you then residing? A. I was residing in South Brooklyn.

Q. How long did that intimate acquaintance continue before it was interrupted? A. It has never been interrupted, Sir, that I know of.

Q. Well, I mean a continuous acquaintance—an intercourse?

A. When we have not been in the same place we have always corresponded.

Q. When did you leave Brooklyn? A. I used frequently to go to Brooklyn and stay a few months at a time and return.

Q. When did you lose your residence in Brooklyn? A. I lost my residence in Brooklyn when I married Mr. Putnam, in 1867.

Q. Did your intimate acquaintance continue up to that time with Mrs. Tilton? A. It did.

Q. In 1867 where did you go to live? A. I went to Marietta, Ohio.

Q. Have you resided out of Brooklyn ever since that time? A. I have resided in Marietta since that time.

Q. How often have you seen Mrs. Tilton since your marriage up to the Fall of 1874? A. I have visited Brooklyn two, three, and once, I think, four times in the course of a year; always saw her when I came to Brooklyn.

Q. Did you stay at her house any time? A. Sometimes; it was not my stopping place.

Q. When did you stop at her house any length of time? A. I don't remember of spending more than a day at a time at her house, excepting once after my marriage I spent a week with her; I think it was about a week.

Q. Where? A. In Livingston-st.

Q. Do you recollect the year of that visit that you spent a week at her house? A. I don't recollect positively. It was either my first or my second visit. My first visit was made in the Fall after I was married.

Q. Name the year, please? A. I went to Marietta in 1867, and I came back and made quite a long visit in the Fall of that year, and the next Spring I made another visit.

Q. In which year was it that you spent the week at her house? A. I could not tell you certainly which it was.

Q. How? A. I could not tell you positively.

Q. When was she married? A. Mrs. Tilton?

Q. Yes. A. In 1855.

MR. TILTON'S ORIENTAL ETIQUETTE.

Q. You have spoken, Mrs. Putnam, of Mr. Tilton's habit in receiving his friends. How frequently have you seen him salute his friends with a kiss? A. It was a very customary thing indeed.

Q. Well, how frequently? A. I could not tell you how frequently, because I don't remember how often I went to the house or saw guests come in and go out.

Q. Was not that occasional, when guests arrived at their house when you were there? A. I don't exactly understand your question, Sir.

Q. Did you on every occasion when you were at his house see guests arrive? A. No, Sir; not on every occasion.

Q. Then the arrival of guests when you were there was occasional only? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you ever see him kiss a gentleman? A. I don't think I ever did.

Q. Ladies—you saw him kiss ladies? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How frequently? A. When his friends called—his familiar friends.

Q. How frequently; on how many occasions do you think you can recall? A. I couldn't tell you, Sir, how many occasions.

Q. You can't tell the number? A. Because I have been scores of times to his house; no, Sir; I could not tell you the number.

Q. Could not designate. Did you have any dispute with Mrs. Tilton about the propriety of that? A. No, Sir; never had any dispute.

Q. Any controversy. A. Yes, Sir. I had a conversation with him once about it.

Q. A controversy? A. No controversy.

Q. No discussion of the propriety of the custom, did you? A. We had a chit-chat on the subject.

Q. Well, a chit-chat may or may not be a discussion. A. No, Sir; I don't think it was a discussion.

Q. You didn't think it was wrong? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Shearman—Mr. Fullerton, excuse me; did you think we offered that evidence for the purpose—

Mr. Fullerton—I can't think what your object is; it is past finding out, as far as I can understand. [To the witness]: Did Mr. Tilton ever salute you with a kiss? A. He has.

Q. Frequently? A. Not very frequently; when we have parted and when I have been away and haven't seen him for some time; occasions when I stepped in—

Q. You were a friend of the family? A. A friend of the family; when I stepped in he kissed the rest of the family and saluted me in that way.

Q. The others that he kissed—were they friends of the family like yourself? A. Friends of the family; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, you have stated that Mr. Tilton observed on one occasion that he wanted his wife to kiss her friends also? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he state whether they were male or female friends whom he wished her to kiss, or was the observation general? A. The observation—I think we were discussing the question of ladies and gentlemen kissing each other, or we were talking.

Q. Well, you think so; were you discussing; are you quite sure upon that point? A. I can tell you how the conversation occurred, if you will allow me.

Q. You have already stated, I think, how the conversation occurred, Mrs. Putnam; I only wanted to know what was the purport of it. A. He said he should be very sorry to have Mrs. Tilton so prudish and fastidious as to attach anything to a kiss more than she would to the shaking of the hand.

Q. That was the observation? A. That was the observation.

Q. And that is all that he said upon the subject, is it? A. Not all, for we had quite a little conversation upon that subject.

Q. What else did he say upon the subject? A. He spoke of other people differing from him; he said that his brother-in-law, Joseph Richards—

Q. That we have got already. Did he say anything else that you have not related upon your direct or upon your cross-examination, that you now think of? A. He said he thought it was an indication of indelicacy rather than purity for a lady to object to salute a familiar friend with a kiss.

Q. Now, have you related all upon that subject that you remember? A. I don't think of anything else. I might be reminded of something else.

Q. Mrs. Tilton was a woman of strong affections, I think you stated? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Her prominent characteristic was love, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She loved her husband, you thought? A. Very much.

Q. Very much indeed—devotedly? A. Devotedly.

Q. And hence she would tell stories, you say, to cover up his faults? A. I used to think she did.

Q. You used to think so? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By stories did you mean falsehoods? A. She would deny accusations that were made against him to me.

Q. That were true? A. I had evidence sufficient to my own mind that they were true.

Mr. Beach—Oh, well!

Mr. Evarts—That is proper enough.

Mr. Beach—No, that is not proper enough; it is not an answer.

Mr. Evarts—If she thought these accusations were true, and Mrs. Tilton denied them, that was enough for this lady to think that Mrs. Tilton covered her husband's fault.

Mr. Beach—The question is whether she knew whether the accusations were true or not.

Mr. Evarts—She might have known all that was necessary.

Mr. Beach—It may be all that is necessary for you; it is not all that is necessary for us.

MRS. TILTON AN ABJECT SLAVE TO HER AFFECTIONS.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, you thought at the time that they were falsehoods, did you not? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. And that she did this at the time on account of her husband? A. Yes, Sir; she seemed to be very anxious to have me think well of him.

Q. And so you think it was on account of her affection? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Her affections, then, controlled her, didn't they? A. Her devotion to her husband.

Q. Her affections—didn't they control her in your judgment? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Her affections then were stronger than her love of truth? A. As far as he was concerned, they were.

Q. How? A. As far as he was concerned they were; that is as far as I could judge.

Q. Well, do you know that they did not control her so far as any one else was concerned whom she might love? A. I don't know.

Q. Don't know? A. No, Sir.

Q. Very well, that is an answer—did you ever chide her for her falsehood? A. I have.

Q. You have? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Often? A. Often.

Q. Well, didn't you think that that was rather a blemish upon her character? A. I did.

Q. When you speak, then, of her lofty spiritual nature, you don't mean to be understood that she was without fault? A. No, Sir.

Q. And her fault was untruthfulness? A. Not general untruthfulness.

Q. Untruthfulness; I don't speak of general or special.

Mr. Evarts—Well, she has a right to answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; she has a right to answer my question.

Mr. Evarts—Well, her answer is, "Not general untruthfulness."

Mr. Fullerton—But particular untruthfulness? A. As far as her husband was concerned—his faults.

Q. You have also remarked that you think she was dominated by her husband's will? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. An incident of that kind occurred, I believe, at Southport, when you were there, when she wanted to participate in the discussion between yourself and Mr. Tilton, when he told her that he was speaking and did not wish to be interrupted? A. That was at Washington, not Southport.

Q. At Washington; I beg pardon, at Washington—that was an instance of it, was it? A. That was a slight instance; it was very slight.

Q. Well, an instance, however slight? A. Well, I hardly thought of it in that light.

Q. Well, how do you think of it now; she remained silent, didn't she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And her husband wished her to do so? A. He wanted to convince me.

A. I didn't ask that. A. Of something—yes, Sir, perhaps it was a slight instance, though I didn't think of it particularly in that light.

Q. Well, she did subject herself to his wishes? A. Yes, Sir, she did.

Q. By not talking at the same time that he did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long did that discussion last. A. At Washington.

Q. Yes. A. Well, it lasted all through our dinner hour and some time after; I don't remember.

Q. Pretty warm discussion? A. No, Sir, very pleasant discussion.

Q. Well, I didn't mean to say it was unpleasant because I thought it was warm; it was an animated discussion, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir; quite an animated discussion.

Q. And you replied to his arguments, and then he to yours? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And when you were not speaking he was speaking, I suppose? A. Well, there was quite a circle of us; some others joined in the conversation.

Q. But you two were the principal disputants? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have spoken of invitations upon his part to you to go to the theater; did you think at the time that he did that in a kindly spirit? A. Certainly I did.

Q. For the purpose of doing you a favor? A. Of entertaining me.

Q. From the best of motives? A. Kindly motive to me.

Q. You did not go, I think? A. I did not.

Q. Well, the apology that he made at Southport, was it made in a kind and gentlemanly spirit? A. It was.

Q. He said he could not help what had occurred? A. He could not help making his—he could not help being unhappy, and making others unhappy.

Q. And was that done immediately after receiving his wife's note? A. No, Sir; this was in the evening, just as I was retiring.

Q. Well, didn't she write him a note that very day? A. She had written him a good many notes that day.

Q. Now, if you please, Mrs. Putnam, you have spoken of his wife's writing him a note. A. She wrote that in the morning.

Q. In the morning of the same day when he apologized? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he apologized in the evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And wanted you to be present and hear it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Everything went on pleasantly after that, didn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Any more moodiness after that at Southport at that time? A. He did not entirely recover his spirits until after he had spoken on the 4th of July.

Q. And then he did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was pleasant after that? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S TREATMENT OF BESSIE TURNER.

Q. Now, what was the age of Bessie Turner at the time when you say that he read to her under a tree and saluted her with a kiss the same as he did his children? A. I don't know, Sir; I have never known her age.

Q. Well, what would you judge was her age from her appearance? A. Well, I am not very good at judging, but I should think she was seventeen—somewhere from fifteen to eighteen years old; it is a mere guess of mine.

Q. Didn't you know her age? A. I did not—she don't know it herself.

Q. Was she a child in her habits and mode of conversation at that time? A. Yes, Sir; she was simple and childlike.

Q. You didn't think it was amiable whatever he did in his salutation of her? A. Oh, no, Sir; he saluted her just as he did his children.

Q. In the presence of Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And no exceptions taken to it? A. No exception at all—he seemed to regard her as he did his children almost.

Q. Well, how long did Bessie Turner stay with you at Marietta? A. She came to me—I think we arrived there the first of February—first day of February, 1870, and she returned with Mrs. Tilton in November, in the Fall.

Q. Was she with you any time when Mrs. Tilton was not there? A. All the time until October—from February until Mrs. Tilton arrived in October.

Q. Mrs. Tilton came in October? A. In October.

Q. And during the Summer and part of the Autumn she was with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And where did she go when she left—did she return to Brooklyn with Mrs. Tilton? A. She came to help Mrs. Tilton home.

Q. And did you see her after that? A. Yes, Sir; I saw her after that.

Q. Where did you see her next after that? A. She visited me again.

Q. Where? A. At Marietta.

Q. And how long did she remain at that time? A. I think she remained about eight weeks—seven or eight weeks.

Q. And from there where did she go? A. She returned to school at Steubenville, where she was attending school.

Q. At Steubenville, Ohio? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know how long she remained there? A. I do not.

THE WITNESS'S INTIMACY WITH THE FRIENDS OF THE DEFENDANT.

Q. Mrs. Putnam, where are you staying now? A. I am staying at 815 Greene-ave.

Q. Have you seen Mrs. Morse since you came here this time? A. I have.

Q. And when did you arrive in Brooklyn? A. I arrived—it will be eight weeks on Wednesday since I arrived—seven or eight.

Q. Did you come on for the purpose of being a witness in this case? A. I did.

Q. At whose request? A. At the request of—I think it was Mr. Shearman's request; Mr. Shearman telegraphed me or sent me the request.

Q. Have you seen Bessie Turner since you came here? A. I have.

Q. Staying in the same house with you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have they, either of them, stayed in the same house with you since you came here? A. No, Sir.

Q. How often have you seen them? A. Possibly I have seen Bessie Turner half a dozen times for a few moments; I don't know as I have seen her—

Q. Where did you see her? A. I saw her when I called on Mrs. Morse.

Q. Where did you see Mrs. Morse? A. At her boarding-house in Hicks-st.; I don't remember the number; I think it is 74.

Q. She was there, was she? A. I think she was, when I first came here.

Q. Have some conversation with Bessie? A. Yes, Sir; I had some conversation with her.

Q. Any one present during those conversations? A. Mrs. Morse has been present.

Q. On all occasions? A. I don't remember; my sister has been present on one or two occasions.

Q. Did you ever converse with her alone upon the subject of this trial? A. I cannot remember, Sir, whether I have or not.

Q. Did you converse with her upon the subject of this trial? A. I have.

Q. And as to the evidence that she should give? A. I don't quite understand you.

Q. Did you converse with her as to any evidence that she might be called upon to give at this trial? A. I asked her—

Q. No; I beg your pardon.

Mr. Evarts—Well, say yes or no; it is all right.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, your interference is out of order, I think.

The Witness—No, Sir; I have not conversed with her about any evidence she should give.

Q. Did you tell her what you were going to swear to? A. No, Sir; I didn't tell her what I was going to swear to; I asked her some questions.

Q. I don't want you to tell me what you asked her. Did you converse with Mrs. Morse about this trial? A. I have.

Q. Often? A. No, Sir.

Q. At any great length? A. No, Sir.

Q. Any one present when you conversed with Mrs. Morse? A. My sister was present once.

Q. Conversed with Mrs. Morse how many times? A. Well, very few times about this.

Q. About how many times? A. Well, perhaps—possibly—three or four times; perhaps not as often.

Q. How often have you seen Mrs. Tilton since you arrived in Brooklyn? A. I have seen her frequently.

Q. About how frequently? A. Sometimes I have seen her every day, for a few moments; sometimes I have not seen her for a week.

Q. Did you call upon her? A. I have.

Q. And she upon you? A. No, Sir.

Q. She has not called upon you? A. Never has called upon me.

Q. Well, have you seen Mr. Beecher since you were here with us, except in this room? A. I have seen him in his lecture room.

Q. Anywhere else? A. I think he passed through the room, once I called upon Mrs. Beecher; I think Mr. Beecher passed through the room and simply greeted me good morning.

Q. You called upon Mrs. Beecher? A. I called upon Mrs. Beecher.

Q. When was that? A. I called two or three days ago.

Q. Did you ever call upon Mrs. Beecher before? A. Yes, called on her once before.

Q. When? A. Soon after I came to town.

Q. This time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You have called on Mrs. Beecher twice, then? A. I have called on Mrs. Beecher twice.

Q. Now, did you ever call on her before at any time? A. I have been to the house two or three times on benevolent errands.

Q. Now, Mrs. Putnam, please, did you ever call on Mrs. Beecher before your present visit in Brooklyn? A. No, Sir; not to make a formal call on her.

Q. Well, that is an answer. You have spoken to Mr. Beecher when he passed through the room, I suppose? A. I think he said good morning.

Q. You have spoken of a letter which you compared at Marietta, which Mrs. Tilton wrote; please look at the paper I show you and say whether that is the letter which you compared, commencing there—. A. Do you mean whether I compared it with a duplicate?

Q. Yes, Ma'am. [Paper handed to the witness.] A. Do you wish me to read the letter through?

Q. Yes, Madam, so as to be able to determine whether it is the one that you compared. A. I could not tell you certainly, Sir, whether that is the letter or not.

Q. What is your best judgment? A. My judgment is that the letter that I saw at—

Q. What is your best judgment as to the identity of the paper I now show you with the letter which you compared in Marietta, Ohio? A. I don't know how to answer you exactly, Sir, because—there are some things in it that were in the letter that I saw.

Q. Well, upon those "some things" you probably may base a judgment about it, whatever those things are, without naming them? A. But there are some things in here that were not in that letter.

Q. Well, you have not read the whole of it, have you? A. I have read it in print; I know what it is.

Q. Have you read the whole of the letter which I hand you? A. No, Sir, I have not.

Q. Well, how can you speak of some things in that letter? A. Well, Sir, I can read it; I supposed it was the letter I had seen—you must excuse me, Sir, I am so unaccustomed to the witness stand, if I violate the courtesies of the—

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, not at all; you haven't violated any of the—I don't mean to find any fault.

Q. Are you now enabled to answer the question? A. I cannot answer you positively.

Q. What is your best judgment about it? A. I know Mrs.—

Q. Please, Mrs. Putnam, what is your best judgment about it?

Mr. Evarts—Let her express it in her own way; that is the better way, I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—No; it does not follow that she may express it in her own way.

Mr. Evarts—I don't know how you are to put words in the witness's mouth.

Mr. Fullerton—I don't know how you shall get them out when they are not proper.

Mr. Evarts—I don't propose to get them out.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I ask the witness whether, according to her best judgment, that letter is identical with the one she compared in Marietta, Ohio, and she can answer yes or no to that question.

Mr. Evarts—Your question was, "What is your best judgment?" She was beginning to tell you what her best judgment was when you stopped her.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, my best judgment is, that you don't know what she was beginning to tell. I know she was not answering my question.

Judge Nelson—[To the witness.] Do you think whether that is the letter, or not? A. Well, I am at a great loss to say.

Mr. Fullerton—Therefore I ask you for your best judgment on the subject? A. I don't know that I have any best judgment about it.

Q. What your judgment is as to whether that is the letter? A. There are some things in it that make me think it is, and there are some things lacking that make me think it is not the letter.

Q. What is your judgment on the whole? A. I could not answer.

Q. [Handing paper to witness] Is the paper I show you in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting? A. It is.

Q. Tell me whether you ever saw it before, or not? A. Yes, Sir; I have seen that letter before.

Q. This manuscript? A. I have seen this manuscript before.

Q. Where did you see it? A. I saw it in Marietta.

Q. Saw that? A. Yes, Sir; I saw a good many others.

Q. I didn't ask you that. Please confine yourself to the subject I am inquiring about. A. I have seen that letter before.

Q. You saw that in Marietta? A. I did.

Q. In whose hands? A. In Mrs. Tilton's.

Q. Did she read it to you? A. She did, or handed it to me to read; I forget which.

Q. One or the other? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, we will have that marked for identification.

[Letter marked Exhibit No. 112 for identification.]

Q. Now, Mrs. Putnam, do you know that this letter which I have just shown you, which is now marked Exhibit No. 112, was sent by mail? A. I do not.

Mr. Evarts—What is that?

Mr. Fullerton—She does not.

The Witness—I do not, Mr. Fullerton, unless it is that duplicate letter, and I cannot tell you whether it is that or not.

WHEN THE WITNESS FIRST HEARD OF THE SCANDAL.

Q. When did you first hear of what is termed this scandal? A. Do you mean when I first heard the public rumors?

Q. Yes, ma'am. A. I heard it the time the Victoria Woodhull scandal was published.

Mr. Evarts—I cannot hear your question, Mr. Fullerton, over here.

Mr. Fullerton—When did she first hear of this scandal, was the question, and her answer was she heard it first at the time of the Woodhull scandal.

The Witness—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Do you mean is that the first time I ever heard anything about it?

Q. When did you first hear of it publicly? A. I heard it after the Victoria Woodhull scandal was published.

Q. Privately had you heard it before that? A. I heard rumors of it.

Q. How long before that? A. I had heard rumors of—not exactly that scandal, but I had heard rumors of difficulty; I had heard it, I could not—

Q. When did you first hear rumors of difficulty? A. I first heard of the difficulty when Mrs. Tilton visited me in 1870, in October.

Q. In October, 1870, then, was it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, Madam, had you much feeling upon the subject?

Mr. Evarts—You ask her if she had much feeling on the subject?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—What was your question?

Q. Did you have much feeling on the subject? A. I felt it was a great outrage.

THE WITNESS ANGRY AT DR. STORRS'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE SCANDAL.

Q. Dr. Storrs was your pastor, you say, when you were here? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Have you called upon him since you have been here this time? A. I have not.

Q. Been here eight weeks? A. I have.

Q. Did you ever find any fault with Dr. Storrs for anything he did in connection with this matter? A. I don't know exactly what you mean by finding fault.

Q. Well, Madam, you are an intelligent, educated lady, and understand the use of the term, I presume, as well as I do? A. I have conversed with my family and friends.

Q. I don't want you to give your conversations with your family and friends. Have you felt angry with Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir; I have not felt angry with Dr. Storrs.

Q. Never felt angry with him? A. I never felt angry with Dr. Storrs.

Q. Didn't you express anger at the time this Council was called? A. No Sir; I never expressed anger.

Q. You had considerable feeling, did you, about it? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Against Dr. Storrs? A. No, Sir; I had no feeling against Dr. Storrs, but I had a good deal of feeling about the matter.

Q. I am not asking you about that. Didn't you think Dr. Storrs was wrong in participating in whatever resulted in calling the Council? A. I thought Dr. Storrs was mistaken and unwise.

Q. No, I am not talking about his unwisdom; I am talking about your anger? A. I never was angry with Dr. Storrs in my life.

Q. Never expressed anger with Dr. Storrs? A. Never expressed anger with Dr. Storrs.

[Handing letter to witness.] Perhaps that letter will refresh your recollection, Mrs. Putnam? A. I see that I say here I was angry with the two churches.

Mr. Evarts—No matter, unless he asks you what you see.

The Witness—But I don't remember.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you say you were angry with the two churches? A. I suppose it was an extravagant woman's expression. I was never conscious of any error.

Q. However extravagant it may be, I ask you if you say in that letter you were angry with the two churches? A. It seems I said so, but I—

Q. Did you say that? A. I should not think I said it if I didn't see it here.

COUNSEL, AGAIN GIVING AND TAKING.

Mr. Evarts—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—Well.

Mr. Evarts—We have a right to look at the paper concerning which you are asking the witness, and to read it.

Mr. Fullerton—And you may have time to read it after I put it into the case.

Mr. Evarts—You can put it into the case after I get through with it.

Mr. Fullerton—You have the physical power to keep it.

Mr. Evarts—I have a right to read it first.

Mr. Fullerton—No, you have not. It is a violation of etiquette and propriety, and I don't hesitate to say so.

Mr. Evarts—You can now proceed.

Mr. Fullerton—And I proceed not because your permission is given. [To the witness.] Look at that letter again and see whether you express anger at the two churches.

Mr. Evarts—Wait a moment. Do you wish to offer the letter in evidence?

Mr. Fullerton—When I do I will make it known without being interrogated, but I wish an answer to the question.

Mr. Evarts—The contents of the letter you cannot give without reading the letter.

Mr. Beach—The question is whether she expressed anger.

Mr. Evarts—We have a right, after showing her this letter, now to ask her what her recollection is as to her having felt or expressed anger towards Dr. Storrs, which was your question before. You never asked her whether she was angry at the two churches.

Mr. Fullerton—No, because I know she never expressed anger at the two churches. I asked her if she expressed anger at Dr. Storrs, and her reply was, "I expressed anger at the two churches," and I ask her to look at the letter to see whether she is mistaken or not.

Mr. Evarts—The counsel has a right, after exhibiting the letter or memorandum, to ask the witness, thus refreshed, what her present statement now is as to having expressed so and so.

Mr. Fullerton—Is that letter in your handwriting? A. Yes, Sir, it is.

Mr. Fullerton—Then I will read the letter; I propose it shall speak for itself.

Mr. Evarts—Now, how is the letter evidence?

Mr. Fullerton—After having read it you ought to know as well as I do.

Mr. Evarts—I was in a hurry.

Mr. Fullerton—No, you took your time, and handed it back to me whenever it pleased you.

Mr. Evarts—I wish to understand what the evidence is on which it is offered.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Fullerton.] How is the letter material?

Mr. Fullerton—In contradiction of her, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I don't see that it is necessarily contradictory; it is not a contradiction that I know of. Who was the letter to?

Mr. Fullerton—[To Judge Neilson.] What does your Honor decide as to the admissibility of the letter?

Judge Neilson—The learned counsel has asked you whom it is addressed to.

Mr. Fullerton—He has read the letter, and ought to know as well as I.

Mr. Evarts—No, I ought not.

Judge Neilson—If you use it to contradict the witness, I think you can use it for that purpose.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir, I think so.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, it depends upon what the witness has now stated. A memorandum may be handed to a witness, whether in the form of a letter or anything else, in his or her handwriting, and after that the witness may be asked whether or not she has expressed the sentiments concerning which she had previously been inquired of, and about which she had made a certain answer.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

THE WITNESS ANGRY WITH TWO CHURCHES.

Mr. Evarts—Now, that is all. I have not understood this witness, after this statement, after the exhibition of this memorandum, to have made any answer that this memorandum will contradict.

Judge Neilson—I don't know what the memorandum will do.

Mr. Fullerton—If it don't contradict, it don't do any harm.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I object to the reading of letters to third persons. It is not evidence in itself, and there is no basis for it as evidence-in-chief, and if it is admitted, it must be admitted under our exception.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading]:

HARMON, OHIO, April 7, 1874.

MY DEAR ELIZABETH: Many thanks for The Golden Age paper. I do not know whether I am to thank you or Theodore for it. Inclosed find $10, with which pay for the papers, and spend the rest for the children in some way for me, or use all that way if the paper is not to be paid for. How are you? How the children? How your mother? I wrote the latter a long letter in February, to which I have never had a reply. I am strong this Spring. I have, as usual, a large family. I have received all the papers, both secular and religious, in this county—

Mr. Fullerton—Is it "county," Mrs. Putnam? It is a word I don't make out very well.

The Witness—"Council"—on this council.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading:]

On this council I have been much excited, and my sympathies have been warmly enlisted for Mr. Beecher. How his great heart must ache. I wish I knew what makes Theodore take the ground he does. Is he B.'s enemy? Does he feel that Mr. B. has not been slandered in the accusations made against him? Oh! how I do wish this thing could slip. It makes me sick, and I have felt really angry with those two churches—Dr. S. and Dr. B.—for stirring it up. I do wish Dory would either come out and say he thinks B. a bad man, or else say he never said what he is accused of saying, or else not keep saying he never slandered B.

Mr. Beach—Is "slandered" underscored?

Mr. Fullerton—"Slandered" is underscored.

How is your poor little heart now-a-days? I love you, and think of you much. April 7, 1874. —

Mr. Fullerton—Unless you can help me, Mrs. Putnam, I cannot make that out. The closing line there; I would like to read the whole of it. It is at the bottom of the page.

The Witness—[Reading:] "We all read with great interest the story."

Mr. Fullerton—It is almost as bad as my handwriting.

The Witness—[Reading:] "But it is not a bit like Theodore."

Mr. Fullerton—"We all read with great interest the story, but it is not a bit like Theodore, or what I thought it was to be." [To the witness.] Is this referring to his book—"Tempest Tossed?" A. Referring to "Tempest Tossed," that was coming out in the paper.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I don't care about that. [To Judge Neilson.] I suppose it is time to adjourn, your Honor. It is after one o'clock.

Judge Neilson—Madam, that letter seems to be written under the conception that the proceedings of the two churches were directed against Mr. Beecher; was that your feeling at the time? A. Yes, Sir, that was my feeling at the time. I cannot remember what expressions I had used in the warmth of the controversy, but I can truly say, under oath, that I never felt angry at Dr. Storrs in my life.

Judge Neilson—Well, I never understood the proceedings of the two churches to be directed against Mr. Beecher at all.

Mr. Fullerton—But the language was explicit, because the two churches were stirring it up.

Mr. Evarts—That is hardly a debatable matter, your Honor.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not debatable, because it is here in black and white.

Mr. Evarts—I mean the Judge's opinion.

Judge Neilson—[To the jurors.] Gentlemen, be here at ten minutes after two o'clock, please.

The Court then took a recess until ten minutes past two o'clock.

The Court resumed its session at 2:10, p. m., pursuant to adjournment, and Mrs. Putnam was recalled.

Mr. Fullerton—Look at the letter which I show you, and say whether it is in your handwriting, Mrs. Putnam? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all with the witness.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MRS. PUTNAM.

Mr. Shearman—You asked her something about a letter.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; I asked her if that letter was in her handwriting.

Mr. Shearman—Will you now be kind enough to give us the letter which you did put in evidence, a part, as we propose to read the whole?

Mr. Fullerton—The whole of it has been read. It is mislaid for the moment, Mr. Shearman; we can find it in a second.

[Letter produced.]

Mr. Shearman—Mrs. Putnam, perhaps you would read the rest of this letter yourself; it would be easier. Will you read it as distinctly as may be, beginning from that part after the slander.

The Witness—[Reading:]

I love you and think of you much. We all read with great interest the story, but it is not a bit like Theo., or what I thought it would be. I thought he was going to make the Tempest Tossed his own religious life; but, oh, how I do wish that man would let me love him as I used to; my heart yearns after him, with his great undeveloped powers for blessing the world.

Shall I read it all?

Q. Yes. A. [Reading again:]

Ever so much love to the children. Do write me when you can; I will always destroy your letters when you wish it, and let no one see them.

Q. Did you receive an answer to that letter? A. I did.

Q. Mr. Shearman—We have the original of this letter; and I ask the indulgence of counsel to let us put it in, in the morning. That is not assuming the letter is to be received—I will just identify the copy at present. [To the witness:] Will you see if that is a copy of the letter which you received?

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we object to that.

Mr. Shearman—You received a letter May 1st, 1874—did you receive a letter dated "174 Livingston-st., May 1st, 1874," as an answer to the letter which you received? I wish to offer this letter in evidence as a reply to the letter to Mrs. Putnam.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I shall object, on two grounds: first, it has not been identified as an answer.

Mr. Shearman—Well, do you put the—I offer the letter in evidence, and propose to read from it at present.

Mr. Evarts—This is a copy in case the original should be lost.

Mr. Shearman—[To the witness:] You have read this? A. I have.

Q. And this is a correct copy of your letter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of the letter which you received? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—Let it be marked for identification.

Mr. Fullerton—This is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Let it be marked for identification.

Letter marked for identification "D, 112."

Mr. Shearman—Well, we offered to read this letter. We should like to know on what ground the objection is made.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, let me see the letter. [Mr. Shearman showed the letter to Mr. Fullerton.]

Mr. Fullerton—No; that is not the letter—

Mr. Shearman—The ground is that the original is not produced.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to see the original.

Mr. Beach—The substitute may do just as well.

Mr. Fullerton—I want to examine the witness about the identity.

Judge Neilson—Well, I understand Mr. Shearman cannot produce the letter till morning.

Mr. Evarts—He supposed it was in the books—we have looked for it, and find it is not.

Mr. Beach—Well, we can use the copy just as well, Sir.

[Looking over the copy with Mr. Fullerton.] We don't think, Sir, that this letter is admissible, but we make no objection to it.

Mr. Shearman—[Reading] :

No. 174 LIVINGSTON-STREET, }
May 1st, 1874. }

My own dear Friend: I am most unwilling to confess the receipt of your two letters thus tardily; the last, of inquiry concerning the first, came to-day. That I failed to acknowledge your exceeding kindness and delicate present, was because I waited for time to write fully my love, my state, my appreciation of your sweet self—all of which I daily and hourly long to do; but the opportunity has not yet come, for I am my own up-stairs maid and mistress, and amanuensis for Theodore, etc., etc.; for I am still without help, and my little miserable body is so tired, so tired, dear, that I cannot even love. You will understand this. Oh, how much you are to me, and have been, these years of severe trial. I am not sick, as you fear; but so tired. My heart is strong in the Lord; never stronger or nearer to him than in these latter days. I thank you and bless you.

My regards to your husband and children. Do forgive, and believe, as ever, in your dear

ELIZABETH.

How beautiful your growing love for Theodore. God bless you, sweet woman.

E—.

Mother is well.

Mr. Evans—That is all of this witness, if your Honor please; except that we may need to recall her, if we succeed in showing the destruction of the letters concerning which we offered in parole evidence.

Mr. Fullerton—Mrs. Putnam, you are quite sure, are you, that the copy letter just read is in reply to your letter, read before the recess, of April 7th, 1874? A. I think it is, Sir, from acknowledging the present.

Q. And the letter of Mrs. Tilton to you, just read, is the only letter received at that time, was it? A. That I remember of, Sir.

Q. Yes; she made at that time no other or further reply to the inquiries in your letter with regard to this slander, did she? A. No, Sir; not at that time.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all with this witness.

TESTIMONY OF HANNAH AUGUSTA MOORE.

Hannah Augusta Moore was then called on behalf of the defendant, affirmed, and was examined by Gen. Tracy.

Clerk Mallison administered the following oath :

"You solemnly affirm and declare that the evidence that you shall give in this issue joined between Theodore Tilton, plaintiff, and Henry Ward Beecher, defendant, shall be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

Gen. Tracy—Where do you reside, Miss Moore? A. Brooklyn I call my home.

Q. Do you know Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I do.

Q. How long have you known them? A. About sixteen years, I think.

Mr. Tracy—You will have to speak a little louder, so that the jury can hear you.

The Witness—[Resuming]: I have known them since Florence was a year old.

Q. Where were they living at the time you knew them? A. 48 Livingston-st.

Q. 48 Livingston-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were they keeping house or boarding? A. They were boarding with Mrs. Richards.

Q. Mrs. Tilton's mother? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know the—did you reside with them at any time in the family of Mrs. Richards? A. I boarded that Winter with Mrs. Richards in the family.

Q. Mrs. Richards? So you were members of the same family? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you tell us the year that was? A. I think it was 1860.

Q. You saw much of them, I suppose, that Winter? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What were their relations as husband and wife at that time, happy or unhappy? A. They appeared happy when together, evidently, must have—

Q. When did they move to Oxford-st., do you know? A. They moved from 48 Livingston-st. to 102 State-st.

Q. Before moving to Oxford-st.? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know when in State-st. they went to reside? A. It was in 1862, I think; 1862 or 1863; I am not good at dates; that is my recollection.

Q. Do you know how long they resided there? A. They resided there three or four years.

Q. In State-st.? A. Oh, in Oxford-st.—In State-st. they only resided a part of one year.

Q. Well, do I understand you that they went to State-st. to reside in 1862? A. They—if it was 1860, when I first went with them—

Q. In 1860, you mean? A. In 1860; I was two Winters with them in that house, 48 Livingston-st.; they then went from there to 102 State-st.

Q. That would make it 1860 or 1861? A. That was 1860 or 1861.

Q. Now, how long did they reside in State-st.? A. I cannot tell exactly; but they returned from State-st. to their mother's house, at 48 Livingston-st., and resided for some months.

Q. Well, were you with them in State-st.? A. I was with them in State-st.

Q. Where did they go after returning to Oxford-st. and remaining a few months. A. Returned to Livingston-st.

Q. Returning to Livingston-st., where did they next reside after that? A. Then they went to Oxford-st., and took a lease.

Q. Whereabouts in Oxford-st.? A. 27 Oxford, I think it was.

Q. North Oxford-st.? A. North Oxford-st.

Q. Did they keep house there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that the first of their keeping house? A. No, Sir; they kept house the second Winter in 48 Livingston-st.; I boarded with them.

Q. Ah! A. The second Winter.

Q. What was the practice in these early days of having family worship in Mr. Tilton's family, do you know? A. They would have it sometimes a few days at a time, but it was never continuous.

Q. Well, were you with them in Oxford-st. also? A. I was there one Summer; part of one Summer, and all one Winter.

Q. How long did you reside in Oxford-st., do you know? A. I cannot swear; they took a house for three years; I think they stayed their lease out.

MR. TILTON'S DECLINE FROM THE ORTHODOX FAITH.

Q. Now, Miss Moore, did you observe at any time a change in the religious opinions of Mr. Tilton? A. I never thought he had very confirmed religious opinions at any time that I knew him.

Q. Well, what did you know of his changing his religious opinions, or what his wife termed a change of religious sentiment in Mr. Tilton? A. He gradually—he gradually went off from what we considered evangelical ideas, but she did not—she didn't notice it so much as I did, but she finally came to notice it very much, and was troubled about it.

Q. When did you observe that change—that he began to go off? A. The first I ever noticed particularly about it was when we were in State-st., the first of his expressing disbelief in Bible truth. The third year, I think, I knew him.

Q. The third year you knew him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, what did he say? A. He said he didn't believe the statements as they were given in the Bible.

Q. Well? A. And then when he moved to Oxford-st., the first of my knowing them there, he said he didn't believe in the atonement at all.

Q. Well? A. His expression was: "I do not believe one word of it."

Q. Did not believe one word of it—What did he—did he say that in the presence of his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What effect did this expression of his religious sentiments have upon his wife? A. She felt very badly. Shall I tell you what she said?

Q. Yes, if she said it in his presence. A. She said, "Oh. Dory, you don't mean what you say?" He says, "I do; I do not believe it as she does at least," he says.

Q. What further did you observe in her conduct in regard to it? A. Well, I do not remember anything else.

Q. Well, do you remember whether or not it was frequently the subject of conversation between himself and his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether or not it caused great sorrow to Mrs. Tilton, this? A. It caused great sorrow to her—it did, certainly, and she would cry to me sometimes—

Q. Repeat that. A. It made her weep and cry and feel very sorry.

Q. Do you know whether there came a time when family prayers were discontinued entirely by Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; while I was there they were discontinued.

Q. Well, when was that—when did you first observe that he had entirely discontinued family worship? A. He discontinued it—I had not been there a fortnight when I went to board in his family, when he discontinued it for all that year.

Q. Well, when was that? A. That was the second year I knew him.

Q. That was when he was residing at what? A. When he was keeping house at 48 Livingston-st. Then, when we moved, we moved right from there to 102 State-st., and he started it again at his wife's request, and he kept it up for two days; that was the last that ever I knew of his doing it.

Q. Well, was it continued by any one in the family after he discontinued it? A. His wife did.

Q. She used to conduct family worship herself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Asked the blessing at the table, did she? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was that always her habit so long as you knew the family? A. It was, I think; I did not board in the family very much more, so that I would not be there mornings very much, but when I was I would see her do it.

Q. Well, do you remember on any occasion his wife taking the Bible to him—carrying it to him and requesting him to read? A. I do, Sir.

Q. What occurred; do you remember what occurred on that occasion? A. He made some little joke—some pleasant joke, I do not know what, and snapped his fingers so, and turned it off, and she took the Bible away, and I never saw her after that ask him, not while she was keeping house then.

Q. Do you remember whether or not at any stage of his history—your acquaintance with him—he discontinued going to church? A. He didn't entirely discontinue at all while I knew him, but he was very irregular always.

Q. Well, at what time did you observe that first—his irregularity?

Mr. Morris—"Always," she said.

The Witness—Always observed it.

Q. Always irregular? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, was that the subject of conversation between himself and his wife? A. Yes, Sir. Oh! I cannot swear to that; I do not remember particularly to that; it was between him and me.

Q. It was between you and him—in the presence of his wife? A. I do not know—I do not remember that.

Q. Well, what transpired between you and him on the subject of his attending church? A. I told him he ought to go to church, instead of staying home and writing his articles for the week.

Q. Well. A. He said "No, he felt"—his inspiration—I do not know what his words were, but that he could write better, and that he stayed at home to do so, and thought that I ought to do so too.

Q. Well, state—was it his habit of working on Sunday? A. It was; so far as I know, it was.

Q. Do you know whether he was in the habit, also, of going away from home Sundays, and being absent from home Sundays? A. I think he was; I know he was for short times, and when he would come in he said on one occasion, I think—I think two occasions, that he had been rolling balls in some billiard room, I think, and I spoke to him about that. I told him I didn't think that was right for a Sunday-School—he was engaged in he said day-School then—he was not gambling, you know, but throwing them for exercise.

Q. Said he had been playing billiards on Sunday? A. No; rolling balls in the—

Q. Well, what kind of balls? A. I don't know; exercising in a billiard-room, the idea that I took was.

Q. Well, did he mention the billiard-room in connection with the exercise that he had been taking? A. He did.

Q. Rolling balls; you understood that it was a billiard-table, didn't you—a billiard-room? A. I understood it was a billiard-room; that is all I thought about it.

Q. Well, what did you say to him about that? A. I told him I didn't think it was right, and asked him what he thought they would say if they knew it down at the Sunday-School.

Q. What did he say to that? A. He joked about it; I cannot remember what he did say; he didn't think—

Q. Was he engaged in the Sunday-School at this time—Plymouth Church? A. Yes sir.

Q. For how many years after you knew him was he connected with the Sunday-School? A. Four or five years; five years, I think.

Q. When did he cease his connection with the Sunday-School? A. I don't know when he ceased it.

Q. Well, did he, do you know the fact that he did? A. Yes, Sir, he did.

Q. When did you first learn that he had sundered his relations with the Sunday-School? A. It was in 1869 that I first knew it, I think; certainly.

Q. Well, what time did they remove from Oxford-st., do you know? A. I cannot tell the year they moved from Oxford-st.; they went back to Livingston-st., but I don't know whether they went straight into their own house or not—I think not. I think they were awhile at Judre Moree's.

Q. Were you with them all the time that they were in Oxford-st., more or less? A. I was for<sup>2</sup>—I was all the time—was there one Summer and the whole of one Winter, and after that I was there occasionally as a visitor.

Q. How long did you remain on those occasions? A. I would stay a day and a night; never stayed more than two days, I think.

Q. Mr. Tilton at home at the time? A. Sometimes, and sometimes not.

Q. You observed Mr. Tilton and his wife together on these occasions? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON'S UNKIND WORDS TO HIS WIFE.

Q. Then after they moved into their house, what is now called 174 Livingston-st., were you then with them at any time? A. Only as visitor: never was there long.

Q. How much have you visited there? A. I don't know how much; I always visited them when I was in the city; I would be there a day and a night at a time.

Q. How frequently should you say? A. But he very seldom was at home when I was there then.

Q. At any time, Miss Moore, did you hear Mr. Tilton make any remark concerning his wife's ability, or her use of the English language? A. I cannot tell you distinctly any remark of that sort, but I have an impression that he treated her disrespectfully in these regards; I know he did that; I can tell you of particular things he said.

Q. Do you remember his making a remark at any time in regard to or about his looking down upon her mother? A. That I cannot tell, whether I heard or not; I know that—

Mr. Fullerton—You cannot tell, Miss Moore; that is enough.

The Witness—But I know that in consequence of—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, Miss Moore.

Q. Now, at any time during your acquaintance, did you notice a change in Mr. Tilton's treatment of his wife or his conduct towards her? A. His treatment of his wife was always very changeable; sometimes he would be very affectionate and kind in his language, and in his manner toward her, and perhaps in a few hours he would be very gruff and unpleasant, and say things that were very disagreeable before her. I myself have heard him say these kind of things; tell her that such and such a woman was a wife worth having—speak in that way; I have heard him say that.

Q. How often have you heard him make a remark of that kind? A. I cannot tell you how often, but I have heard it two or three times—enough so that I remember it distinctly.

Q. Did he name the person at the time, do you remember? A. I remember he did once.

Q. Where was this said? A. This was said in Oxford-st.

Q. I mean whereabouts, at what time of the day, meal-time or —. A. It was just after dinner—lunch—in the middle of the day.

Q. In the presence of the family? A. In the presence of himself and wife—me and wife.

Q. How did Mrs. Tilton receive that remark? A. Pleasantly; she turned right to me and she said: "If I was only worthy of him, he would be a good man;" she said, moreover; "Gussie, I wish you had had him; you would know how to manage him." Said I: "What do you want to wish such a curse as that on me for?"

MR. TILTON'S LOOSE IDEAS ABOUT THE MARRIAGE RELATION.

Q. Well, did you at any time observe any expression of Mr. Tilton concerning the marriage relation? A. Yes, Sir, I did.

Q. When did you first begin to observe that—when did he first make that a subject of conversation? A. He said that in Livingston-st.—not in his own house; before he bought his house; he said he didn't think a man and wife should live together a month after they had ceased to take pleasure in each other.

Q. Where was that? A. That was in 48 Livingston-st., I think it was now; I don't know certainly whether that was in 48 Livingston-st. or in Oxford-st., but it was in the middle room of one of these houses.

Q. Was it said at meal time or —. A. No, Sir.

Q. Who was present when it was said? A. Only his wife and myself—in the room where the piano was.

Q. Well, at other times have you heard him make similar remarks, remarks upon that subject—the subject of the marriage relation? A. I have heard him talk in that way, but I cannot tell any other special thing that I have heard him say about it.

Q. How often was that a subject of conversation, when you were present—the marriage relation? A. Not very often.

MR. TILTON'S BAD COMPANY.

Q. Did you, at any time, notice a change in the friends and associates of Mr. Tilton, that he brought with him at his house? A. Yes, Sir; I did—a change in the sense that they were more—

Q. When did you first begin to notice that change? A. The year that I boarded there, the first year, in 1886, I think it was, he brought people there to the house; he brought Stephen Pearl Andrews and women that he had with him there to the house. The second year I boarded with them—the first year I boarded with them—the second year I was in the house at 48 Livingston-st.; these were the only ones I remember that Winter. Afterwards more of that kind came.

Q. Well, where, more of that kind? A. In Oxford-st.—Oxford and Livingston.

Q. What was the subject of their conversation when Stephen Pearl Andrews was there? A. I could not understand a word they said; I don't know; they were talking all the time; they talked to midnight.

Q. Well, didn't you hear anything that was said? A. I can't remember; it was all about "congenial spirits," and "spheres," and, I don't know—that kind of talk. I don't remember what it was at all.

Q. Well, what else was said besides "congenial spirits" and "spheres?" A. I couldn't tell you, Mr. Tracy, at all.

Q. Anything about "affinities;" did you hear that? A. Yes, about affinities—and a woman that was with Mr. Andrews sat on the sofa beside Mr. Tilton and fixed his hair, and she rubbed over his face, and she would turn around and peek up at him and tell him what a lovely sphere he had—something of that kind—[laughter]—atmosphere, I guess it was. [Renewed laughter.]

Q. Well, where were they sitting when she was rubbing her hand over his face? A. Sitting beside of each other on the sofa.

Q. How long did that continue? A. From seven or eight o'clock until twelve.

Q. Do you know who that woman was? A. I don't; I don't even remember her name.

Q. Who was present at this time—do you remember? A. Mrs. Morse and Mrs. Freeland, and Mrs. Tilton and myself; I don't know but Belle Oakley was—Miss Oakley; I don't know certain.

Q. Whether she was there or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember when that was? A. It was in the Winter, the second Winter that I knew them. I can't give you dates with any certainty.

Q. Well, after that, did you hear more of a similar conversation? A. I did, somewhat; nothing that attracted my attention, or remained on my mind as that has.

Q. As that did? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well. A. I was afraid for him then, and I told his wife so.

Mr. Fullerton—No; never mind; never mind, please.

Mr. Tracy—That is what you told his wife in his presence? A. Well, I told—well, I don't know as I did in his presence.

Q. Well, did you have a talk with Mr. Tilton about it yourself afterwards? A. Oh! I have talked to him a good many times.

Q. What did you say to him about it? A. Told him he would go to ruin if he kept such company, and I didn't want him for his wife's sake, and for his own, too.

Q. You remonstrated with him, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—Well, you had better let her tell.

Q. What did he say to your remonstrance? A. He would laugh at me, make fun; never could get him serious.

Q. How long did that continue? A. Always; as long as I knew him.

Q. As long as you knew him—well, afterwards did you notice a continuation of this same class of people visiting his house? A. I didn't; not so much myself. Can't I tell what I told Mrs. Tilton about it?

Q. Not in his absence, not when he is absent. A. Can I tell what she did?

Q. Yes, you can tell what she did.

Mr. Fullerton—Not exactly; not unless you are very anxious. The Witness—Well, I am.

Mr. Tracy—Anything that Mrs. Tilton did, I submit, in consequence of Mr. Tilton's associates or his conduct there is admissible.

Judge Neilson—I hardly think it, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Q. Do you know whether she talked to her husband about it? A. I don't know that, but she went to the door—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Mr. Tracy—In his presence? A. I don't know.

MR. TILTON'S BAD COMPANY ORDERED AWAY BY MRS. TILTON.

Q. Do you know of Mrs. Tilton's refusing the house to people of this class? A. That is what I wish to say; that she followed them to the door and told them—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness [continuing]—she wished they would not come.

Mr. Fullerton—No; one moment.

Mr. Tracy—We offer to show that Mrs. Tilton forbade her house to those people, and told them that she wished they would not visit her house any more.

Judge Neilson—That was in Mr. Tilton's absence?

The Witness—In his absence—well, I am not sure it was in his absence.

Judge Neilson—Well, the main point is, are you sure he was present.

The Witness—No; I am not sure he was present.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it is part of the domestic relations, part of the history of the family.

Mr. Everts—The action of the wife towards a certain class of people, the husband's action towards which has been given in evidence.

Judge Neilson—Her action in this particular instance may have been precisely what he would have done there for aught we know.

The Witness—He liked their acquaintance.

Mr. Tracy—It proves her view and her feelings towards this class of visitors who were accustomed to—

Judge Neilson—You may show it if it relates to this same woman who has been described as being there on a certain occasion.

Mr. Tracy—I don't know how that is.

Mr. Everts—Just inquire.

Mr. Tracy—Do you know who came to the door on the occasion you refer to? A. It was after they had been in the house and were going out.

Q. After they had been in the house and were going out? A. She followed them to the door, and spoke to the woman.

Judge Neilson—That is giving the conversation.

Q. Do you know who they were? A. Only that it was Stephen Pearl Andrews's friend; that is all I know.

Q. Was it this same woman you have been speaking of? A. I do not know certainly whether it was this same woman; there were two; I do not know certainly that it was the same woman.

Q. Well, did you see Stephen Pearl Andrews there again with another lady? A. No, Sir; I did not see him.

Q. Well, you were present on an occasion you told about and heard what Mrs. Tilton said to those parties? A. I only heard what she said.

Q. Had you seen these parties in the house before that? A. No, Sir; the time I spoke of I had seen them all the evening.

Q. All the evening? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had Mr. Tilton been in the house that evening? A. The first—which do you mean?

Q. I mean the evening when Mrs. Tilton went to the door with some parties and said something to them which the Court has not—? A. Well, that I can't remember; I can't tell you distinctly about that—whether he was in the house or anything; the only thing I remember about it is that.

Q. And do you remember distinctly whether it was the same evening that this lady placed her hand upon Mr. Tilton's face? A. I remember distinctly that it was not; that it was not that same evening.

Q. It was not that same evening? A. No, it was not that same evening.

Q. Well, do you know who had been in the house that evening—do you know who they were that were there? A. No, Sir; I don't.

Q. Had you ever seen these parties at the house before associating with Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir; I had not seen them, and I don't think they ever had come before that first night that I speak of.

Q. Where was this; in Oxford-st. or Livingston? A. That was in 48 Oxford-st—48 Livingston-st.

Q. 48 Livingston-st? A. Yes, Sir; first night they came.

Q. Were they males or females—I mean men or women? A. Why, Mr. Andrews and a woman.

Q. It was Mr. Andrews and a woman? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—No, not the second time.

Mr. Tracy—Now, I submit, your Honor, that having identified Mr. Andrews, who was one of the parties on that evening, referred to there, with a lady—

The Witness—Oh! no, Sir, it is all a mistake; I only can swear to Mr. Andrews being there one night—the night that they were there all the evening, and I watched them, and all I knew about—I do not know only that she told me—

Mr. Tracy—The question I desire to put—

The Witness—All I know is what Mrs. Tilton told me. I told Mrs. Tilton that she should not have such people in the house, and she told me—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, madam; will you? When you are requested, please stop.

Mr. Tracy—I am not seeking to get what Mrs. Tilton told her.

Mr. Morris—Well, she says she has made a grand mistake; what she has been saying she heard from Mrs. Tilton.

The Witness—I did not say that I had, did I?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

The Witness—Well, I mean there was a grand mistake going on; I do not mean that I made the mistake at all. I had only seen them one evening. You understood that I saw Mr. Andrews a second time, but I did not.

Q. I understand you were at Mr. Tilton's house one evening when Mrs. Tilton accompanied some persons to the door, and requested them not to come again? A. No, Sir; I did not mean to be so understood.

Mr. Tracy—Well, you were so understood by me.

Mr. Everts—It appears, now, that her knowledge was derived from what Mrs. Tilton communicated to her afterwards, and that, of course, we don't offer.

The Witness—What I was intending to say was her answer to me when I told her.

Mr. Tracy—Well, that we don't ask for; that is not admissible. [To the witness]: Now, coming back to Mr. Tilton's religious views: do you know what precise form he finally settled upon in regard to his religious doctrines? A. I don't know; it did not seem to me to be any form.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment—you don't know, and that is enough.

Mr. Tracy—Do you know whether or not he came to deny the divinity of Christ? A. I don't know of my own knowledge that; never heard him say that to me.

Q. Miss Moore, did you observe in the association of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton what Mrs. Tilton's manner was towards her husband? A. Kind and good always.

Q. And whether she was self-depreciating or self-asserting? A. She was.

Q. What? A. She was self-depreciating; too much so always.

Q. What evidence did she present in regard to her affection for her husband? A. Every possible evidence that a woman could give, always.

MR. TILTON'S MOODINESS.

Q. Did you observe whether or not Mr. Tilton was a man of moods? A. Dreadfully moody.

Q. Well, describe them. How did his moods vary from time to time? A. Well, one time he would be down on his knees, and his arms around her, and say she was lovely and beautiful, and "Isn't she beautiful, Augusta?"; and another time he would not be willing to even order a load of coal, or to do anything, the most necessary thing about the house, when she was sick and could not do it, perhaps, and even not talk to her, and if he did talk, he would speak crossly, and then he would go off, and she would not know where he was, and he would be gone to midnight or morning, and it seems to me he was all night repeatedly, when she would not know where he was at all, and she would worry and cry about it.

Q. Well, how frequently did that happen? A. That used to happen very frequently. That happened even that very first Winter that I boarded with them at all, when they boarded with Mrs. Richards, the mother-in-law, and it used to fret her most unspeakably. She would wake up in the night to know when he came in. I knew that myself, because I slept with her.

Q. Well, did that continue as long as you knew them? A. It did so far—yes, as long as I had opportunity to know about it.

Q. Do you remember what excuse he used to give her for his absence? A. I don't remember.

Q. That is all—one word—down to how late a period did your acquaintance with the family continue? A. Down to 1868; I have always been acquainted with them, but that is—

Q. You continued to see them more or less in their house down to 1868? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Since then? A. Since then I have seen them, too, in their house when I have been in the city, but not frequently; I would not be in the city more than every year, perhaps, or year-and-a-half, and I would not see him, then, always.

Q. Now, what continued to be the conduct of Mrs. Tilton towards her husband all the time you knew them?

Mr. Beach—Well, I object to that question.

The Witness—Always kind and good.

Mr. Beach—The question should be what the conduct was.

The Witness—Well, her conduct was always perfectly exemplary; the only fault you could find with it was that she made a fool of her husband with her affection and idolatry; that is all the fault I ever saw in her conduct towards him; I think it was bad for him; it would have been better for her to have been different.

Mr. Everts—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MISS MOORE.

Mr. Fullerton—When was this conversation which you have related, where Mrs. Tilton, or when Mrs. Tilton wished that you had been Mr. Tilton's wife? A. That was in the dining-room, in Oxford-st.

Q. In what year? A. I cannot tell you; I am not certain about years; I very seldom am. It may have been 1863 or 1864; not later than 1863.

Q. Did she say it in a joke or was she in earnest? A. Well, a joke, of course; but she was in earnest this far, that she thought it must be all her own fault if he did anything wrong, and she wished somebody that had known how to be a worthy wife to him could have had him. She was in earnest so far.

Q. Do you think she meant to express a regret that she had ever married him? A. No, not on her own account.

Q. You meant it was on his account? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you in earnest in the reply that you made? A. Indeed I was. [Laughter.]

Q. You didn't like him then? A. I did like him in this way: he was her husband, and I wished him well, and tried as hard as I knew how to have him go in the right way always.

Q. And your reply was: "Why do you want to put such a curse on me?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you were in earnest in that? A. I was in earnest so far as he was—I considered—

Q. Did you speak earnestly? A. I suppose I did.

Q. Emphatically? A. Probably.

Q. How? A. Probably I did.

Q. Did you call out any reply from Mr. Tilton? A. I don't remember; I don't remember that he said anything.

Q. Are you quite sure? A. I cannot think of anything that he said.

Q. Now, wasn't it all a joke, Miss Moore, and didn't you indulge in a hearty laugh at its close? A. No, Sir; I did not. Of course I didn't really mean that the man was a curse, but I considered it a dreadful thing for any one to have a husband that was so unreliable and impossible to do anything with.

Q. Yes? A. Yes, that was what I meant.

Q. Can you tell us when the instance was that he would not order a load of coal when she was sick? A. The instance was the first year he kept house in 48 Livingston-st., what day of the month or the year I cannot tell.

Q. You heard him refuse to order a load of coal, did you? A. I merely heard him go out of the house without saying he would.

Q. Did you hear him refuse to order a load of coal? A. No, I didn't hear him refuse.

Q. You know he did not go— A. I know he didn't do it

Q. One moment. A. Because the fire went out, and we were cold.

Q. And therefore he could not have ordered it? A. He didn't say he did when he came back.

Q. I am not asking what he said. Now, do you know of your own knowledge that he did not order the coal? A. I can't say that I followed him and saw whether he did or not, of course.

Q. Then can you say that he did not order it? A. When he came back—

Q. One moment. A. She asked him if he had ordered it and he didn't say he did, and he said he did not, I think, but I cannot swear certainly about it.

Q. Then if you cannot swear certainly what do you swear anything about it for? Did you hear him say that he did not order the coal? A. I did not hear him say so, and I haven't said that I heard him say so.

Q. That is the reason I asked you, because you haven't said it. You didn't hear him say it, did you? A. Why, no, of course I didn't hear him say so.

Q. And you don't know but that he did order the coal, do you? A. I know he didn't; when he came home she asked him why he didn't, and he gave some reason why he didn't; I don't know what—he didn't go to the right place, or couldn't take the trouble, or something.

Q. Which was it? A. I could not tell sure.

Q. Did he go to the wrong place to order it? A. He didn't say, "I am sorry I didn't order it; I meant to;" but he just turned her off.

Q. You have told us what he didn't say; I want you to tell me what he did say. A. Well, I cannot.

Q. You cannot remember what he did say? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you remember anything that he said? A. I cannot remember anything about it.

Q. Then he didn't refuse to order the coal, did he? A. Neglect, perhaps I ought to say instead of refuse. Did I say refuse to order it?

Q. You did, Madam. A. Well, then, I suppose I ought to have said neglected.

Q. Very well, then, we will take that. He neglected to order coal? A. He neglected to, and didn't do it.

THE WITNESS HELPS THE COUNSEL.

Q. Did he say he went to the wrong place? A. No, Sir; he didn't; and he didn't regret it in any way or shape.

Q. One moment; I am not asking about his emotions. A. You want to find out just how he acted and felt, don't you? [Laughter.]

Q. I want you to tell just what he said. Didn't you say he went to the wrong place? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you say so a moment ago? A. I say I don't know whether he said so; I don't know, of course.

Q. Do you know now that he did not say so, that he went to the wrong place? A. I could not tell you certainly. I don't think he told me that, Sir. I know that he didn't say anything that looked like an excuse—

Q. One moment. A. A legitimate excuse.

Q. No, no! You can't get that in, now, at all. A. Well, that is the fact any way.

Q. It is a fact. You might as well put up with it first as last. You will answer my question, and you won't interject anything else. Can you say that he did not, when he came back, say that he had made a mistake and gone to the wrong place? A. He did not.

Q. Didn't you say— A. I can say that I don't remember.

Q. What did you use the term for a moment ago when you said that he went to the wrong place or something of that kind? A. No, I didn't say so; I said this—

Q. That is an answer? A. Let me tell you what he did say.

Q. That is an answer? A. I say I don't know whether he said he forgot it or went to the wrong place, or what he said. That is what I say.

Q. Can you say that he did not say that he went to the wrong place? A. He did not.

Q. He didn't say anything like that? A. No.

Q. If he didn't say anything like that, why did you use that phrase? A. Perhaps I ought not to have used it. I was trying to think just what he did say.

Q. In trying to state just what he did say you said something else? A. I didn't say so; I said I didn't know whether he said so and so or not. That is not saying that he did say it.

Q. You don't remember what he said, then? A. No, Sir; I do not. I remember this—

Q. You cannot recall anything, can you, that you did say? A. No, Sir.

Q. On his return? A. No, Sir.

Q. Very well. That is the way we will leave it. A. Well, only don't try to make me say what I didn't say.

Q. No; I am only trying to make you say what is right, if I can. What other instance do you recollect where he refused to do something he was asked to do? A. I don't suppose I can give you chapter and verse of any of those things, if that is what you want.

Q. Can you give us a volume of it? A. It was constant, his disobliging spirit.

Q. Give us an instance now if you can of this constant disobliging. A. Well, when she would want him to take her to places of amusement.

Q. One moment! Tell us the instance, where it was and when it was? A. I cannot tell you where it was, but I know I was there with her repeatedly.

Q. I don't want "repeatedly;" I want the instance. A. Well, then you can't get it, because I can't give it to you. [Laughter.]

Q. Very well; I think I cannot get it because you haven't got it. A. I know I have brought her home quite late, at midnight, from places where he would not bring her home.

Q. Places of amusement? A. Lectures.

Q. You were with her then? A. I happened to find her and bring her home, and he was there.

Q. Didn't you go with her? A. I don't remember.

Q. Can't you remember whether you went with her or not? A. I remember going with her once.

Q. He did not go? A. He did not go.

Q. Did he go with you? A. No, Sir, he did not go with me.

Q. Did you go with Mrs. Tilton? A. I only remember going with Mrs. Tilton once.

Q. That once I am talking about. On one occasion you went with Mrs. Tilton, and Mr. Tilton did not go with you? A. I don't know whether he went or not.

Q. Didn't you tell us a moment ago that he refused to go to places of amusement, and give that as an illustration? A. You didn't let me tell what I was going to about it.

Q. No, no; time is too precious for that. Did you not a moment ago say that he refused to go to places of amusement, and give that as an instance? A. I was going to say that he refused to see her home from places of amusement; neglected to, and left her to get along the best way—I didn't mean amusements, either; I meant lectures, public entertainments; but I was going to give you two instances where I myself found her and brought her home. Once, I believe, I went with her, but I don't remember about it.

Q. Tell us about that one before you go to the other; where was it you went? A. That was to hear a lecture.

Q. Where? A. I think it was to hear Wendell Phillips, but I can't be certain about it.

Q. You went with Mrs. Tilton? A. I went with her once, on one occasion.

Q. That one occasion I am talking about. Where was Mr. Tilton when you started? A. I don't know where he was; I know he never used to go with her hardly.

Q. Was he at home at that time? A. I don't know.

Q. If he was not at home, then why do you blame him for not going with her? A. Because he was there, and could have been home.

Q. If he was not home when you and Mrs. Tilton started, how do you hold him responsible for not going with her? A. Because he was around home and could have been home.

Q. What do you mean by around home? A. Near; and because he was there at the lecture, and didn't go home with her—went with somebody else.

Q. I am talking about going to the lecture? A. He always knew when she was going.

Q. Did he know that you and Mrs. Tilton were going to the lecture? A. He knew that Mrs. Tilton was going.

Q. How did he know it? A. Because they had planned it before.

Q. Was he home? A. He had been home that day.

Q. Planned it? A. She had planned it; she always told him where she was going.

Q. Did she tell him that day? A. Well, I don't know. You want to find out the spirit of things.

Q. Yes, I know. You can't say that you knew that she wanted to go to the lecture, can you? A. I know that she did.

Q. Please stop right there, and tell us how you know? A. That is just what I can't tell you certainly how; I know he did know she used to want to go.

Q. Used to want to go to that one lecture? A. Always.

TESTIMONY FORCED ON THE COUNSEL.

Q. I am talking about that one instance; you generalize too much. That is all you know about it, is it? A. I know that she would be there, and if—

Q. No, no! A. And he would not go home with her; and didn't go home with her.

Q. That won't do. I can talk as loud as you can; you can't force testimony on me in that way. A. You asked me what I knew about it.

Q. I asked you if you knew anything more about that single instance of a lecture which you had spoken of, than you have told? A. I know that he was there on the platform.

Q. I am talking about going to the lecture? A. Well, that is the lecture I am telling you about.

Q. Going to. You were speaking of his being there, and I am asking you about going to the lecture. A. I don't remember about going there; but I remember being there.

Q. Well, that is enough now; did any one go with you? A. I don't know certain; I can't tell you certainly.

Q. Did it occur to you that he didn't want to go with her because you were along? A. No, Sir; it didn't occur to me, anything of the sort; because I never depended on him in any way or shape.

Q. You didn't want to be a curse to him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, wasn't he on the platform at that lecture? A. Yes, Sir; he was.

Q. And didn't Wendell Phillips lecture? A. I didn't swear certain that it was Wendell Phillips's lecture. I said that I didn't know but it might have been; but it was some public lecture, and he was there on the platform, and he saw his wife.

Q. On the platform, wasn't he? A. Yes, Sir, he was on the platform, and so were we.

Q. You were on the platform? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was there some occasion for his remaining after the lecture was over? A. He wanted to; there were people there that he wanted to see, and he run right by her and never asked her if she had got anybody to go home with her.

Q. She had you, didn't she? A. He didn't know I was going home with her.

Q. Didn't he know you went with her? A. I don't think he did; I don't know how he could.

Q. How do you find out that fact? A. I don't find that out certain.

Q. You went from the house with her, didn't you? A. I don't know; I suppose I did; it was not very near.

Q. How far were you from home? A. A good ways.

Q. How far was the lecture-room from home? A. I think it was down here at the Music Hall.

Q. Where is that? A. At the Academy of Music.

Q. Here on Montague-st? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many minutes' walk is that to Mrs. Tilton's? A. It was not very far.

Q. How many minutes' walk? A. It was not very far, but it was night and she was lame and sick.

Q. How many minutes' walk? A. I never counted it. [Laughter.] What's the odds of that?

Q. How many minutes' walk is it, do you think? A. I don't know; ten or fifteen, aint it?

Q. Is it as much as that? A. I don't know; I never counted it.

Q. Is it five minutes' walk? A. Why, I should think so, certainly.

Q. Very well; if you think so, you ought to say so. A. It was late at night, and a little lame woman, and he ran right by her and almost upset her that night to get to some women that were on the stage, that were public speakers. I don't know one of them.

Q. To get to some women on the stage? A. Yes, Sir; and he shook hands with them, and he left her and didn't know more than the deed whether she was going to have any one to go home with her or not.

Q. You saw all that? A. Yes, Sir, I saw it myself.
Q. Do you know who lectured that night? A. I don't know whether it was Wendell Phillips or Anna Dickinson; Anna Dickinson, I think.

Q. Cannot you recall who delivered that lecture? A. No, Sir.

Q. Cannot even tell the sex of the lecturer? A. I cannot; I used to go to a great many lectures in those times.

Q. Yes, but you remember some things very particularly? A. Certainly, but I can't remember that.

Q. Cannot you remember what the subject of the lecture was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or who the lecturer was? A. I think instead of being Wendell Phillips it was Anna Dickinson, but I am not sure.

Q. You cannot tell anything more about it? A. No, Sir; not about that lecture; but what I have told you I can tell.

Q. Well, that is enough now. Were you there when the lecture commenced? A. I suppose so; all through.

Q. Did not Mr. Tilton introduce that lecturer? A. I don't remember that he did.

Q. Can you say that he did not? A. I cannot say that he did not.

Q. Do you know whether he was on the Committee of Arrangements? A. I don't know anything about it.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS'S CALL AT THE TILTONS.

Q. I come now to that meeting at Mr. Tilton's house when Stephen Pearl Andrews was there. What time did he come there? A. He came there between seven and eight o'clock, I think; I am not certain.

Q. What time did he leave? A. But I know—

Q. What time did he leave, madam? A. He didn't leave until after the clock struck 12, for I remember that distinctly.

Q. Of course you do, or you wouldn't say so. A. But I don't remember distinctly just the time he came.

Q. Who came with him? A. A woman.

Q. Anybody else? A. No, Sir.

Q. Sure? A. I am sure.

Q. Didn't Deacon Freeland come with him? A. I didn't see Deacon Freeland when he came in with him; he may have come with him.

Q. You don't know but what he did come with him? A. I didn't see them when they were let in the front door. It may be possible that he came with them.

Q. Didn't Deacon Freeland's son come with him? A. No, Sir.

Q. Wasn't he there that night? Q. I never saw his son to my knowledge.

Q. Well, Deacon Freeland was there that night? A. Yes, Sir; Deacon Freeland was there; I don't think he was there all the time.

Q. Was Stephen Pearl Andrews there in the parlor when you came down? A. That I can't tell.

Q. Wasn't Mr. Andrews and Mr. Freeland in the parlor together when you came down? A. I can't tell you.

Q. You don't know but what they were, do you? A. I don't know but what they were; I can't tell certain.

Q. That is enough; this woman, as you style her, was she there when you came down? A. Yes, Sir; they were all—

Q. Was she there when you came down? A. I don't know; I don't know whether I came first and whether they came in while I was sitting there.

Q. You can't tell? A. No, Sir; I know I was there.

Q. Will you name all of the people that were present in the parlor? A. Stephen Pearl Andrews, a woman whose name I don't remember, Mrs. Morse, Mr. Freeland, Theodore Tilton and myself.

Q. You have named all, have you? A. It may be that Miss Oakley was there, but I don't know certain.

Q. You can't tell us the subject of the conversation that night? A. The subject of the conversation I can tell you was spheres, spiritual influences, and things of that sort, but the talk I can't repeat, for it was beyond me altogether, or beneath me, somehow.

Q. Or above you? A. I said beyond me or beneath me, some way.

Q. Somewhere around. Did they talk about spiritualism? A. They didn't use the word "spiritualism." They talked about spheres and atmospheres, and then a great many things; I don't know what they talked about; they talked steadily and just talked right along.

Q. Who did? A. Stephen Pearl Andrews, hour after hour, and I can't remember a solitary sentence the creature said, not one.

Q. Did he do all the talking? A. He talked all the time and when others talked they had to talk right along with him. Nobody else said much.

Q. Wasn't you mistaken—wasn't it Mrs. Andrews? A. No, Sir; it wasn't, it was Mister.

Q. Any reply made to anything he said? A. I don't remember.

Q. Did you talk any that night? A. I did not.

Q. Not a word? A. No, Sir; I don't remember speaking hardly at all that evening. Mr. Tilton himself hardly spoke.

Q. How? A. Mr. Tilton hardly spoke; he sat very still.

Q. Very quiet, did he? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether he invited those people there that night or not, of your own knowledge? A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you know whether or not they were intruders in that house that night? A. There was no appearance—not the slightest of their being intruders.

Q. I ask you if you know, of your own knowledge, whether they were intruders or not? A. Now, can I tell you what I do really know in my heart?

Q. I ask you what you know of your own knowledge. A. I know they were not intruders; I never heard anybody complain of it.

Q. You found it out in some spiritual way, I suppose? A. I could not tell you; I know Mr. Tilton was very cordial and very kind and pleasant to them, and seemed very much pleased with their being there.

Q. Mrs. Tilton was not unpleasant, was she, to them? A. Let me tell you how she was; may I?

Q. Was she unpleasant? A. You can judge yourself when I tell you how she was.

Q. Well, tell us how she was? A. She sat down between the doors and sat there like a dumb child, and looked up right at them all the time in perfect amazement, and there was hardly a smile on her face, and she would look from one to another, just as if she didn't know what kind of creatures they were.

Q. Yes? A. Yes.

Q. Did you do the same? A. I did, I suppose, but I felt different from what she felt; I felt angry.

Q. You felt angry? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you angry because Andrews talked all the while and didn't give you a chance? A. I was angry because he stood there and talked in that kind of a way, and suppose we had sense enough to think it was reasonable.

DEACON FREELAND PLEASED WITH MR. ANDREWS'S SPEECH.

Q. Did you know that Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews lectured at the house of Henry Ward Beecher? A. I didn't know anything about it.

Q. Didn't you ever hear that? A. I never heard anything about it.

Q. You never heard that? A. No, Sir, not to my knowledge; I do not remember it.

Q. Don't you know that this woman, as you term her, that was there, was Stephen Pearl Andrews's wife? A. I do not know anything about it.

Q. You never heard that? A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Pray tell us how Deacon Freeland looked all that time. A. He sat so I could not see much of him; he was back there; he looked pleasant as he always does. [Laughter.]

Q. He didn't take any offense at Andrews talking all the while, did he? A. I never heard him say.

Q. He was a deacon of Plymouth Church, wasn't he? A. I don't know; I believe he has been sometime.

Q. He is a member of Plymouth Church, isn't he? A. I believe he is.

Q. Do you know how Deacon Freeland came there that night? A. I do not; I suppose he was invited there, like the rest of them.

Q. He stayed? A. He stayed, I think, until they went.

Q. Was this talk offensive to you? A. No, not so offensive; the way she acted with Mr. Tilton was offensive.

Q. If it was offensive why didn't you get up and go up stairs? A. Because I wanted to see it out. [Laughter.]

Q. Oh! you did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Mrs. Tilton didn't get offended and go up stairs. She stayed there, she wanted to see it out? A. We all stayed there.

Q. And wanted to see it out? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did you see it out? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I want to know whether that woman said: "What a sphere you have got," or "What an atmosphere you have got;" what was it; what kind of a sphere was it? A. What a lovely, pleasant sphere—atmosphere, or something, I can't tell certainly what it was, but something of that sort; as if it was very pleasant indeed to her.

Q. Was the atmosphere pleasant that night? A. I didn't seem to feel—you know she sat there—

Q. No; I want to know if the atmosphere was pleasant? A. It didn't seem so to me.

Q. What was there wrong about the atmosphere? A. I didn't like the way she was doing.

Q. Wasn't the room well ventilated? A. I do not know; it ought to be, both doors were open.

Q. Both doors were open? A. Yes, Sir.

MR. TILTON AWAY FROM HOME NIGHTS.

Q. You have told us that he would stay out all night some nights? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you know it because you slept with her? A. I said I thought he would be out all night, and I knew that he would be out until after midnight, and until after two in the morning, because I slept with Mrs. Morse, who was on the floor just above where he came in, and we could hear his night-key when it rattled, and always hear him come in.

THE MOTHER-IN-LAW'S WATCHFULNESS.

Q. Did you always hear him come in? A. I didn't always, but Mrs. Morse did, for she was awake listening for him.

Q. You was also awake, wasn't you? A. I did not lie awake, but she would wake me up.

Q. Always? A. Sometimes.

Q. Did you get up and see what time it was? A. We didn't have to, the clock was there. She would say, "Look at that; it is two o'clock in the morning;" and she would sit on the side of the bed, and she would write him a note.

Q. That was mother Morse? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She is an amiable lady? A. Yes; she tried to be.

Q. How does she make out? A. Very well, sometimes.

Q. Not always? A. She feels tried sometimes, and has good reason to.

Q. No doubt; you think so? A. She has; any one would that saw it.

Q. Didn't you tell us that you slept with Mrs. Tilton? A. No, Sir; with Mrs. Morse.

Q. How far was Mrs. Tilton's room? A. Mrs. Tilton's room was down stairs, I think; I don't know exactly how far. A part of the time she slept down stairs, and a part of the time she slept on the same floor; but Mrs. Morse's room was right at the head of the stairs—was about midway of the house, and where we could always hear when the doors opened and shut.

Q. Always hear? A. Always hear when we were awake, and she was awake when he was not at home at night.

Q. Mrs. Morse? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She wanted to know what time he got home? A. She wanted to know what time he got home; she could not sleep, I suppose.

Q. She was very anxious about him? A. She was anxious for her daughter's sake, for her daughter would cry and be unhappy.

Q. Did you see her daughter cry? A. I have seen her cry repeatedly; yes, I have.

Q. At twelve o'clock at night, when Mr. Tilton came home? A. No, I didn't see her cry at twelve o'clock at night, but I have seen her cry about his irregular ways.

Q. When was this? A. This was the second year I was with them in 48 Livingston-st., I think is the number; may be I have got the number wrong all the time, but 48 Livingston-st. is the number, I think.

Q. That is before they moved? A. Before they ever moved to Oxford-st. at all.

Q. Now, tell us the year, please? A. It was 1859 or '60; it might possibly have been 1861, but not later.

Q. And all this took place, then, before 1861—at the close of 1861, at all events, did it? A. All what—about Stephen Pearl Andrews, and his coming there late?

Q. No; all this staying out late at night? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was Theodore Tilton engaged out at night? A. He was on The Independent, I think.

Q. The editor of The Independent? A. He was an under editor then; one of the editors of The Independent.

Q. Anything else? A. No; not that I know of; I don't know that he had any other employment.

MRS. TILTON'S GREATEST FAULT.

Q. Well, you think her great fault was this idolatry to her husband, do you? A. I do, indeed.

Q. A woman of strong affections, is she not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Governed by them a good deal? A. Well, she was as regarded him, too much altogether.

Q. Too much? A. Too much, I thought.

Q. You don't believe in a woman thinking so much of her husband? A. I do believe in a woman thinking a great deal of her husband, but not trying to excuse and cover his faults where it is only going to increase those faults.

Q. You asserted the faults, did you, and she excused them? A. Sometimes I would.

Q. What had you to do with asserting his faults? A. Because I wanted her to do different from what she did, because I thought she was injuring him.

Q. You didn't want her to excuse him, did you? A. I didn't want her to say that wrong was right, even for the sake of her husband, and I told her that that was no way to help him, or to get God to answer her prayers for him.

Q. What did you want her to do? A. That she ought to stand on what she knew was the best always, and right.

Q. Take him to task? A. No, Sir.

Q. That is not what you wanted? A. No.

Q. Call him to account? A. When he wanted her to let her children play on the Sabbath day that she should be firm about that.

Q. And not let them play? A. And not let them play.

Q. What did she want the children to do on the Sabbath day? A. She wanted them to know that the Sabbath was different from some other days—make a difference—and he didn't wish her to.

Q. What kind of play was prohibited? A. I cannot tell you specially; she wanted they should have a regard for the Sabbath day.

Q. What kind of play did he want them to indulge in? A. He told them to get out their playthings, and not have any difference made between days; he didn't wish them to have any difference made between days.

Q. How old were these children at the time? A. Well, after his children came—first, when I first knew him, he only had one, and then I knew them, you know, after the others were born. He began that talk about the Sabbath the very second year that I knew them.

Q. When was that? A. It was in 1860 or 1861, I told you.

Q. What children had they then? A. I said about the Sabbath—talking about the Sabbath, not to make any difference.

Q. What children had they then? A. He had Florence first.

Q. How old was she? A. She was only a year old when I first knew her.

Q. And she didn't want Florence to have out her playthings? A. She began right away, as soon as Florence knew anything at all, to try and teach her to remember the Sabbath.

Q. Now, if you please, I want to know what children they had, and their respective ages, when this controversy was got up about playthings? A. They had two.

Q. Two children? A. Alice and Florence.

Q. How old was Alice? A. Alice was a little bit of a thing; I don't know.

Q. How old was she? A. Old enough to have some idea—

Q. I want you to tell me how old she was? A. I cannot tell you how old she was.

Q. About how old? A. About running around, I guess; big enough to have playthings.

Q. Two years? A. Perhaps two years, or two and a half.

Q. How old was Florence? A. I don't know. She was a year older than Alice, or a year and a half older, I suppose.

Q. Then there was a child three years old, and one two years old, was there? A. I don't know their ages exactly, but about that perhaps.

Q. And the controversy was whether these two little children should have out their playthings on Sunday? A. The controversy was had in a general way—

Q. I am talking about this controversy there that time. Was that the subject of the controversy—whether one child two years and one two and a half or three years should have out their playthings? A. I suppose so.

Q. Very well. Are you a member of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you been such member? A. Sixteen years, I guess; about the time I first knew them.

Q. You have taken a strong interest in this controversy? A. I should if I had not been tormented to death with my own affairs.

Q. That is the only thing that prevented you, is it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You haven't taken any interest then in the controversy?

A. Yes, Sir; I have taken an interest.

Q. A strong interest? A. As strong as I could.

Q. You did your best, did you? A. Yes, I did.

Q. And have kept it up to the present time? When did you see Mrs. Tilton last? A. I saw her Monday night, I think—last night—Saturday night.

Q. How often have you seen her in the last three months? A. I have seen her once a week, perhaps; once in two weeks, certainly.

Q. At Mr. Ovington's? A. Yes, Sir; at Mrs. Ovington's.

Q. Have you stayed there all night since she has been there? A. No, Sir; only just a few minutes at a time.

Q. How often have you seen Mrs. Morse? A. Often.

Q. How often? A. Oh, often; I was there in the house with her for some time.

Q. How long? A. Six weeks, I guess.

Q. When? A. This Winter. From December till about a month ago, off and on, I was there; I boarded there. I boarded when I was in the city. I have been away in the country a good deal.

Q. How often, if at all, have you seen Beattie Turner? A. I used to see her there every day when I was there; nearly every day; I would not see her every day.

Q. Where was she when you saw her? A. She was there in the same house.

Q. Did you talk with her about this case? A. Not much. I had one conversation with her when she and I happened to meet in the same room.

Q. And you talked about it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you have a talk with Mrs. Morse about it? A. Oh, dozens of times!

Q. A long conversation? A. Not very long, because she could not—I would not have very long conversations with her.

Q. You did talk to Mrs. Tilton about it, I suppose? A. Some; not much.

Q. And you have talked to other people about it? A. Not much.

Q. Talk to any of the lawyers about it? A. Not a word, I believe, to any one.

Q. How? A. I think I have not talked a word to anybody, except to say—I talked with Mr. Hill a little about it; that is, I didn't talk with him.

Q. But he talked to you? A. He talked to me some.

Q. Well, that was a good thing to do. Have you seen Mr. Beecher about it? A. No, not a time.

Q. And did not talk with him about it? A. Not a word.

Mr. Fullerton—I believe that is all.

Mr. Tracy—One word.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MISS MOORE

Mr. Tracy—You say that one morning Mrs. Tilton requested Mr. Tilton to order a load of coal? A. She said to him this. She said, "The coal is all out, and you have forgotten it," two or three times, or have not got it when we wanted it; I cannot give the exact words, but "if you don't order it to-day, the fires will be all out." That is all I remember about it. It was not ordered.

Q. What was said?

Mr. Fullerton—That has been all gone over.

Judge Nelson—Let her answer. A. He would not say that he would do it. He would be busy, and went off and then it was not ordered.

Q. Did the fires go out? A. I think they went out that night. They were very low, and we were cold, and that is the way I remember it.

Q. When he returned that night, what was said between himself and his wife about the coal? A. I cannot remember distinctly now. He gave no satisfaction, and didn't seem to care; that is all I can remember about it.

Q. Now, you spoke of your finding Mrs. Tilton at places of amusement and going home with her? A. Lectures they would be; we didn't go to places of amusement much.

THE WITNESS INTRACTABLE.

Q. There is another instance you didn't name. You said there were two instances, and you named one of them. When was the other instance? A. I cannot remember distinctly.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

The Witness—But it was—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. Can you not stop, possibly?

The Witness—I wanted to finish that sentence.

Mr. Fullerton—I know you wanted to, and that is the reason you should not do it. I object to their going back over this ground again, if your Honor please.

Mr. Tracy—It is new matter.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not new matter. I cross-examined in regard to what the witness testified on the direct, and I confined her attention, as well as any human effort could confine her, to one particular occasion when they went to a lecture. I did my best, as your Honor knows, and with what success you witnessed; but, at all events, although she broke out at every pore with regard to the other occasions, yet I inquired as to but one, and that one was spoken of on the direct. Now, they ought not to be permitted to go over it again.

Mr. Tracy—There was nothing called out on the direct examination in regard to neglect to attend her (Mrs. Tilton), either to or from places of amusement. That is entirely new matter, called out on the cross-examination. He (Mr. Fullerton) referred to some instances, and I propose to pursue the inquiry into other instances, not only as to the instance he inquired of, but as to others.

Mr. Fullerton—On the direct they called out the fact that she requested him to order coal, and he refused to do it, and refused to do other things.

Mr. Tracy—I am now speaking of places of amusement.

Judge Nelson—Counsel has interrogated her in regard to one occasion, and only one.

Mr. Tracy—He has interrogated her as to his neglect to attend her to and from places of amusement, and she said she remembered two instances. He inquired particularly as to one. Now, I propose to inquire not only as to that one, but as to the other.

Judge Neilson—That would be new matter. He interrogated her particularly as to one. Did he by a question call out a reference to the other?

Mr. Tracy—He did. That is my recollection. Certainly I did not. There was not a word said on the direct examination about places of amusement. Everything that has been said on the subject has been called out on cross-examination, and he asked for instances, and she said there were two.

OTHER INSTANCES WHERE MR. TILTON SLIGHTED HIS WIFE.

Judge Neilson—You may interrogate her as to the other one, but do not go beyond that.

Q. What other instance do you remember of finding Mrs. Tilton at a lecture, and going home with her? A. I remember distinctly finding her twice, and bringing her home myself, and one instance I remember distinctly of his neglecting her and running by her in a very marked manner, so that others besides myself noticed it.

Q. That was at the Academy of Music? A. Yes, Sir; and I think there were more than two occasions, but I could not swear to them.

Q. Where was the other case? A. One was over in New-York, away up at Steinway Hall, I think, but I am at fault there again; I cannot swear as to the places; only circumstances I remember.

Q. It was in New-York? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What were the circumstances of that case? A. Only that we were there, and he saw her, and knew she was there, and he didn't come for her or to see her home, or provide any one else to see her home, and I brought her home.

Q. Did you go for her? A. I went with her home.

Q. Did you go to the lecture with her? A. No, Sir.

Q. You found her there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And he not having provided any way to bring her home you took her and brought her home? A. Yes, Sir; this is my best recollection, the best of my knowledge and belief.

Q. Do you know when that was? A. No, Sir, I don't; but it was as much as ten years ago.

Q. Where did they live? A. They lived in Livingston-st., I think, in the house where they live now.

Q. In their present house? A. I think so.

Q. You think they were living in their present house at that time? A. I think so, but I cannot be sure.

Q. At the time in the Academy of Music you say Miss Anna Dickinson was the lecturer there? A. Here in Brooklyn she was present, and it seems to me as if she was the lecturer, but I could not be certain about it.

Q. And you say Mr. Tilton rushed by very rapidly to speak to Miss Dickinson? A. To speak to Miss Dickinson, or to some ladies, and she was among them.

Q. She was among the ladies that he was going to speak to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did he speak to his wife? A. He didn't speak to her; he ran right by her, and almost upset her.

Q. Now, at the time that Stephen Pearl Andrews was at the house with this woman, and you said this woman looked up into Mr. Tilton's face and said, "What a beautiful sphere or atmosphere you have," what was the woman doing at the time she said that?

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—That general subject you have been over.

Mr. Tracy—I have been over the subject generally, but not that particular phase of it.

Mr. Beach—You have been over the subject fully, and the witness said "sphere" or "atmosphere."

Mr. Fullerton—The counsel got it out as an atmosphere, and not in general terms.

Mr. Tracy—You have forgotten.

Mr. Beach—I have not forgotten.

Mr. Tracy—You went into that. I only ask what she was doing at that particular time, when they say she said "sphere" or "atmosphere."

Mr. Fullerton—No; you called that out on the direct examination.

Mr. Tracy—I did not.

Mr. Fullerton—And I only asked what kind of a sphere it was.

Judge Neilson—I think we have got all the witness can give us.

Mr. Tracy—I don't know about that. I will pass that subject. [To the witness.] Don't you know Florence Tilton was born in 1856? A. I don't know.

Q. You don't know when she was born? A. No, Sir.

Q. If Florence Tilton was born in 1856, then she was three or four years old when you went there? A. She was—

Mr. Fullerton—She could not have been.

The Witness—She—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, if you please. There is no more swearing to the arithmetic.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Tracy.] You have the age and the date of the occasion, and that gives you the answer.

Mr. Tracy—Now, you were familiar with the family in Oxford-st. Where were they living at the time you remember this dispute or discussion between Mr. Tilton and his wife in regard to his children playing on Sunday?

Mr. Fullerton—That they have been all over.

Mr. Tracy—We have not brought that out at all. There is nothing on the direct examination on that subject.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] You may answer it.

The Witness—I think that was before they moved into Oxford-st. I think it was after Alice's birth, before they had any other children but that first one.

Q. Did you ever hear any discussion between them more than once? A. I never heard any more discussion about it, but I noticed that Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind.

The Witness—gave way.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Q. Did you notice that after that, as long as you knew the family, the children were permitted to play on Sunday as on any other day of the week?

Mr. Fullerton—Does your Honor permit that?

Judge Neilson—No. [To Mr. Tracy.] Besides, that is not the way to examine your witness.

Mr. Tracy—What is the objection to the question—that it is leading?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Judge Neilson—It is something more than leading; it is very suggestive, and takes her judgment as to a lapse of time, which is very vague and very general.

Mr. Tracy—She has fixed a particular day when she remembers it.

Judge Neilson—As to that you examined her.

Mr. Morris—And she has answered.

Mr. Tracy—I want to ask the witness whether after that she observed the conduct of the children on Sundays.

Judge Neilson—That is not a re-direct; that is new matter.

Mr. Tracy—All there is on the subject of the children playing on the Sabbath was called out by the plaintiff.

Judge Neilson—On one particular occasion.

Mr. Tracy—At any time.

Mr. Beach—We didn't ask about their playing on the Sabbath. We asked only as to the discussion between Mr. Tilton and his wife.

Mr. Tracy—All I have to say is that all there is in this examination touching the Sabbath was called out by the plaintiff.

Judge Neilson—It related to a particular occasion.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, Sir; and now I desire to ask the witness whether it was confined to that one occasion, or whether it was continued after.

Judge Neilson—That is not a re-direct. That is going to a subject upon which he didn't ask.

Mr. Tracy—I am only asking a question concerning the same subject. He has gone into the subject.

Judge Neilson—Therefore it is a new matter.

Mr. Tracy—It is new matter brought out by them, and not by us.

Mr. Fullerton—It is new matter touching this issue.

Mr. Beach—The matter we brought out was in regard to the discussion between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton as to the propriety of the children playing upon Sundays upon a particular occasion, and now they ask the question whether, subsequent to that, the children were in the habit of playing on Sundays altogether—a new and distinct subject.

Judge Neilson—So I understand. I think we have all the witness can tell us about it.

The Witness—You have not, by a good deal.

Q. I ask you whether you ever heard this question of the children playing on the Sabbath discussed or referred to between Mr. and Mrs. Tilton after they removed to Oxford-st.

Mr. Beach—She answered that that she did not, except upon this one occasion.

Mr. Tracy—I ask this question.

Mr. Fullerton—That is objected to, as being a mere repetition.

Judge Neilson—I will let them ask that question.

The Witness—I never heard them discussing it together any more.

Q. And that, you think, was before they moved to Oxford-st.?

A. Yes, Sir; I think so.

Mr. Morris—And one was a year and a half old, and the other two years and a half old?

The Witness—She would not discuss much with him.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

The Witness—She gave way to him.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, madam?

Mr. Beach—That is all.

Judge Neilson [To Mr. Shearman]: Mr. Shearman, call your next witness.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, we will consume the time by reading a couple of papers that were put in as Exhibits, but have not been read. They were marked, but not read. Those were the Exhibits put in by Mr. Ovington as to the receipt and expenditure of the money received by him.

Judge Neilson—It is not necessary to read those papers.

Mr. Shearman—Then how are they evidence? Then I move that they be struck out.

Judge Neilson—They are in the case the same as if read. They relate to items of dollars and cents.

Mr. Shearman—How are the jury to know they are in evidence?

Mr. Evarts—Have they been marked as Exhibits?

Mr. Morris—Yes, Sir; they are our Exhibits.

Mr. Fullerton—Either party can read them on the summing up.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir. Call your witness, Mr. Shearman.

Mr. Shearman—Miss Oakley.

THE JUROR JEFFREYS STILL SICK.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, Mr. Jeffrey sends me word that he is not feeling very well.

Judge Neilson—We will omit calling the witness, then, until the morning.

Mr. Evarts—Let the witness be sworn.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Morris—One moment, before this witness is sworn. We would like to have Mrs. Ovington here to-morrow, to cross-examine her a little further. [To Mr. Evarts]: Will you have her here in the morning?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—We will now adjourn until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court then adjourned until Tuesday at 11 o'clock.

FORTIETH DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

VARIED EVIDENCE FROM FOUR WITNESSES.

THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE WINSTED SCANDAL
 SIFTED—TESTIMONY OF THE HOTEL-KEEPER AND
 A GUEST AT THE HOUSE—SAMUEL E. BELCHER
 EXAMINED AND CROSS-EXAMINED—MR. TILTON'S
 STATEMENTS TO HIM CONCERNING THE CHARGE
 AGAINST MR. BEECHER—THE EXAMINATION OF ST.
 CLAIR M'KELWAY BEGUN.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1875.

The trial was resumed promptly at 11 o'clock this morning. All the persons directly interested in the case were present with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Beecher and Mr. Porter, and they came into the court-room a few minutes after the beginning of the day's work. Two witnesses were examined and cross-examined during the first half hour. They both testified in regard to the Winsted scandal. The first was George W. Lincoln, who was the proprietor of the Beardsley House in Winsted, where Mr. Tilton, accompanied by a lady, was a guest in 1869. Mr. Lincoln's testimony substantially agreed with that already given on this subject. The next witness, Albert F. Norton, appeared to find some difficulty in taking the usual oath, and it required several minutes to induce him to kiss the book. In reply to Judge Neilson's question, the witness said that he considered the oath binding, and the questioning proceeded. Mr. Norton testified that he had boarded at the Beardsley House at Winsted in 1869, and had seen a lady partly dressed in Mr. Tilton's room at an early hour one morning. The cross-examination of this witness elicited nothing new.

Samuel E. Belcher, a former deacon and member of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church, was next called by the defense. He appeared to be a grave, dignified gentleman, with an intelligent, strongly marked face. He gave his evidence, in reply to Mr. Hill's questions, in a positive and almost business-like manner. Mr. Belcher testified to meeting and conversing with Mr. Tilton—with whom he was well acquainted—a short time after the publication of the Woodhull scandal. Mr. Tilton, the witness said, at first told him that "there was nothing in it," but immediately afterward said that there might be "a modicum of truth in the scandal, as a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff." The witness then asked Mr. Tilton for that grain of truth, and Mr. Tilton took Mr. Belcher to his house and read to him extracts from a large roll of manuscript and showed him some printed papers. These papers, Mr. Tilton said, would be forwarded to Mr. Bowen, and would compel the latter to settle the contract with Mr. Tilton. Mr. Tilton read to the witness what purported to be a copy of a letter from Mrs. Tilton, in which she said that Mr. Beecher had asked her to be a wife to him in all that the name implied. Mr. Tilton told Mr. Belcher that Mr. Moulton had the original of the letter. Mr. Belcher also testified that Mr. Tilton had told him that Mr. Beecher had denied the charge mentioned, and had said that the woman must be crazy, but had afterwards confessed and apologized. Mr. Tilton asserted that the apology was in the keeping of Mr. Moulton. The witness stated that at the close of this conversation he had asked Mr. Tilton whether Mr. Beecher had committed adultery with Mrs. Tilton, and that Mr. Tilton had replied, raising his hand above his head, "No, my wife is as pure as an angel in Heaven."

The cross-examination of Mr. Belcher by Mr. Fullerton was long as compared with the duration of the direct examination, and the questions were very searching. In the main Mr. Fullerton's inquiries were about the testimony of Mr. Belcher before the Church Investigating Committee, about his knowledge of the West charges, and other matters of Plymouth Church history, with which, as a deacon and prominent member of the church, the witness might be acquainted. Mr. Belcher admitted that in his testimony before the Investigating Committee he had omitted to state that he had heard read Mrs. Tilton's letter to her husband, in which she said that Mr. Beecher had asked her to become a wife to him. The witness said that he had not volunteered testimony, as he did not think his pastor needed any vindication from him. To many of Mr. Fullerton's questions Mr. Belcher answered that he did not remember. This reply was made to a great variety of interrogatories as to statements made before the Investigating Committee, as to the conversations Mr. Belcher had had in reference to Mr. Tilton's statement to him, and as to the events of the evening when the report of the Investigating Committee was adopted by Plymouth Church. At the opening of the afternoon session Mr. Belcher stated in regard to some questions which he had answered just previous to the recess at noon, that he did not remember what he had then said.

At the conclusion of Mr. Belcher's testimony, at 8½ o'clock, Mr. Tracy called upon the next witness, St. Clair McKelway, who testified that he had called upon Mr. Tilton soon after the publication of the Woodhull scandal. Mr. Tilton had told the witness that he could not talk to him as a journalist, but that he would tell him in the form of an allegory a story, which would place matters in a different light from that of the Woodhull publication. The witness then gave in his own language the story that Mr. Tilton had told him. In substance it was like other statements alleged to have been made by Mr. Tilton concerning improper advances made by Mr. Beecher to Mrs. Tilton, except that no names were mentioned. The witness told the story in full, deliberate tones, and was listened to with unusual attention by all in the court-room. Mr. McKelway had not concluded his testimony at the adjournment of the Court.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE W. LINCOLN.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment. George W. Lincoln, called on behalf of the defendant, was duly sworn, and testified as follows:

ANOTHER HISTORY OF THE WINSTED SCANDAL.

Mr. Hill—Where do you reside? A. Fulton, New-York, Sir.

Q. Where did you reside in the month of December, 1899? A. Winsted, Connecticut.

Q. What was your business there? A. Hotel keeper.

Q. Keeper of what hotel? A. The Beardsley House.

Q. Do you recollect when Theodore Tilton came there to lecture in December, 1899? A. I do, Sir.

Q. Who received him at that hotel? A. I received him, Sir.

Q. Have to speak a little louder. A. I received him myself, Sir.

Q. About what hour of the day? A. About half-past 1 in the afternoon.

Q. Please state what occurred when he came in? A. First, he went to dinner, Sir.

Q. Well, did he register? A. He did; yes, Sir.

Q. Very well; any one with him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who? A. A lady.

Q. How did he register?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Mr. Fullerton—One moment.

Mr. Beach—The register should be produced.

Judge Neilson—Do you mean how did he write it in the book?

That is the meaning of the word "register," I suppose.

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir; it refers to the hotel register.

Judge Neilson—Have you got it there?

Mr. Hill—No, Sir; the register is lost.

Judge Neilson—Prove that.

Mr. Hill—Do you know where that hotel register is? A. I do not Sir.

Q. How long since you have seen it? A. I left there the 1st of April, 1871; not seen it since.

Q. Haven't seen it since? A. Not seen it since.

Q. Now, please state how he registered?

Mr. Morris—No, no; they haven't proved it yet.

Mr. Beach—Did you leave it in the house? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Continued as the register of the house? A. I could not say as to that, Sir.

Q. Who succeeded you? A. A gentleman by the name of Reid, Sir.

Q. You left it with him? A. I did, Sir.

Mr. Beach—That is all, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Well, you say he registered—he entered his name upon the register, at all events? A. He did, Sir.

Q. Now, what occurred just there at the time of registering? Give the conversation between you and Mr. Tilton. A. He called for two rooms adjoining.

Q. Yes. What else? A. With a fire in his room.

Q. Did he ask to have a fire in the other room? A. No, Sir; he said one fire would be sufficient.

Q. Now, did you furnish him rooms adjoining one another—opening into one another? A. No, Sir; I did not.

Q. Why not? A. I looked over my—

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Mr. Hill—Well, I don't care for it. [To the witness.] What did you tell him? Go on. A. I told him I could give him a front room and the lady a room just across the hall, opposite, or nearly opposite.

Q. Now, did you do that? A. I did, Sir.

Q. On what floor? A. On the third floor, Sir.

Q. Now, please state, Mr. Lincoln, if there was a public parlor in your hotel? A. There was, Sir.

Q. A commodious and comfortable place? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For ladies? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. As well as gentlemen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That comfortably furnished with sofas, and fire, and chairs? A. Yes, Sir, always during cold weather.

Q. Now, please tell if you had occasion to go to that room, in the afternoon, of Mr. Tilton—I mean this front room which you assigned to him? A. I did, Sir.

Q. How did you come to go there?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Well, he went; that is sufficient.

Mr. Hill—Very well; you went to the door; what did you do? A. I rapped at the door.

Q. Well, go on; tell what else—you rapped at the door? A. I heard no response, and turned to go back to the office again, and got a few steps away from the door, and the door opened and I returned.

Q. You returned to the door? A. Returned to the door.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tilton? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What was his condition as to dress? A. His coat and jacket—his coat and vest were off, and in his stocking feet.

Q. Well, did you see the lady? A. I did, Sir.

Q. Where was she? A. She was lying upon the bed.
 Q. Which side? A. The front side of the bed.
 Q. Did you rap twice or only once, Mr. Lincoln, at the door?
 A. I could not answer, Sir, positively about that.
 Q. How long did you wait before the door was opened? A. Oh, a moment or so, Sir.
 Q. Had you started to go away, do you recollect? A. Yes, Sir; I started to go away.
 Q. All quiet at first, and then a man came to the door as you turned to go away? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Now, how old a person was this lady?
 Mr. Morris—We object.
 Mr. Hill—Well, in appearance?
 Mr. Fullerton—Well, we object to that.
 Judge Neilson—We will take the answer; about how old.
 Mr. Hill—About how old, Mr. Lincoln? A. I should judge her to be about twenty-five years, Sir.
 Q. How large a person? A. She was above the average of ladies in size.
 Q. Weigh about how much?
 Judge Neilson—I hardly think he can answer that. [Laughter.]
 Mr. Hill—Perhaps not; it may be important to ascertain how large and how old this child was that we have been talking about.
 Mr. Morris—We can tell you; she is twenty-three now, and that is six years ago.
 Mr. Hill—Did you observe their conduct while they were at the table, Mr. Lincoln, dining, or at breakfast? A. I did, Sir.
 Q. Well, what was it towards each other? A. Very courteous, Sir; familiar.
 Q. Anything more than ordinary?
 Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.
 Judge Neilson—The question is what he observed. [To the witness.] Describe it in your own way.
 The Witness—Well, they were very familiar, very courteous towards each other.
 Mr. Hill—Now, what time did they leave the hotel? A. A few minutes before seven o'clock in the morning, Sir.
 Q. Do you know what depot they went to? A. To the Nautuck depot; there was but one road then running into town, Sir.
 Q. Do you recollect whether they called for cider or not at the dining-table? A. They did, Sir.
 Q. Had you anything of that kind? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Why not?
 Mr. Beach—Objected to.
 Mr. Hill—Well, I will ask you this, Sir: Was yours a temperance hotel? A. It was, Sir.
 Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. LINCOLN.

Mr. Fullerton—What time did you go to the door, Mr. Lincoln? A. Not long after dinner, Sir.
 Q. Well, now, if you will tell me what time you had dinner, then I will make the calculation? A. Well, I—it was very soon after they arrived; between half-past one and two o'clock, probably; in the neighborhood of two o'clock.

 Q. That you had dinner? A. I had dinner for them, Sir.
 Q. For them? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Your regular dinner over? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Well, about how long after dinner was it that you went to the room? A. Well, I could not recollect, Sir; perhaps an hour or so; could not swear positively with regard to that, Sir.
 Q. What season of the year was it? A. It was in the Winter season, Sir.
 Q. What month? A. In the month of December.
 Q. The month of December? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. You are sure of that? A. I am quite sure, Sir.
 Q. What year? A. 1869.
 Q. In the year 1869, and in the month of December? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. Did Mr. Tilton lecture in that place that night? A. He did, Sir.
 Q. At what hour? A. I could not swear, Sir; about—
 Q. Mr. Tilton and the lady there at tea? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Took tea out, did they? A. I believe; yes, Sir.
 Q. Did he return to the house again? A. I think he did, Sir; I am not sure about that.
 Q. What time did he return? A. I could not tell you about that, Sir.
 Q. Remain all night? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. What time did he leave the next day? A. He left in the morning, on the seven o'clock train.
 Q. At seven o'clock, next morning? A. The train went at, I think, seven in the morning.
 Q. How? A. The train left about seven in the morning. He left the house in season to get the train.
 Q. When you knocked at the door you heard no noise? A. No, Sir.
 Q. You turned to go away? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. What arrested your steps? A. The door being opened.
 Q. Opened by whom? A. I returned; Mr. Tilton was at the door, Sir.
 Q. At the door? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. You would not have known who were inside if you hadn't had the door opened for you? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Was it wide open? A. Yes, Sir; thrown open as you usually throw doors open.
 Q. It had to be thrown wide open so that you could see the bed, hadn't it? A. Yes, Sir; the door was within, perhaps three feet of the partition that divided it from the next room.
 Q. Was the bed in the next room? A. No, Sir; in the same room.
 Q. In the same room? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. The door, then, was thrown wide open so that the bed was in full view? A. Yes, Sir.
 Q. It was not concealed from you at all? A. No, Sir.
 Q. No effort at concealment? A. No, Sir.
 Q. Not the slightest? A. No, Sir; not that I noticed.
 Q. What? A. Not that I noticed.
 Q. Did you go to the lecture? A. I did; yes, Sir.

Q. Take your family? A. Some of them were there, Sir; I could not say how many of them.

Q. Well, about how many? A. I could not say, Sir, how many of them went.

Q. Males or females? A. Both, I think, Sir.

Q. Your wife? A. I think she went; yes, Sir.

Q. Your daughters? A. No, Sir; my daughters were quite young.

Q. How? A. My daughters were quite young then.

Q. You are sure none of them went? A. I am very sure they did not.

Q. But Mrs. Lincoln went? A. I think she did, Sir.

Q. Take any friends with her? A. I do not remember about that, Sir.

Q. Who purchased the tickets for them? A. I could not tell you, Sir.

Q. You don't remember of doing it? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all, Mr. Lincoln.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. LINCOLN.

Mr. Hill—Do you recollect the subject of that lecture? A. I do, Sir.

Q. What was it?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment, just one moment; I haven't asked anything about the lecture, except the fact of the lecture.

Judge Neilson—True; you are not strictly entitled to it, Mr. Hill. Why do you ask for it at all?

Mr. Hill—Because I forgot it. Mr. Shearman has just suggested it.

Judge Neilson—If it was a mere inadvertence, you may ask it.

Mr. Fullerton—It may be necessary for us to produce the lecture probably, and refresh his recollection.

Judge Neilson—He can state the general subject.

Mr. Hill—I wish you would.

Mr. Morrie—We object to it as immaterial.

Mr. Pryor—What has that to do with this issue?

Mr. Evarts—The question has been allowed.

Mr. Morris—What materiality has it? What does it tend to prove?

Judge Neilson—None at all, of course.

Mr. Beach—It leads, of course, into a further examination on our part into an immaterial matter.

Mr. Hill—Does your Honor rule it out?

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir; on the general ground.

Mr. Hill—We except. [To the witness.] Now, did you see any books lying around in that room?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that, Sir; there must be an end to some things.

Mr. Hill—That is all. Wait; a juror wants to ask you.

A Juror—I would like to know whether that scene in the bedroom was before dinner, or after dinner?

Judge Neilson—Was that before dinner, or after?

Mr. Beach—That you went to the room?

The Witness—After dinner.

Judge Neilson—About how long did you say? A. I think about an hour, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He thinks about an hour after.

The Witness—I, of course, can't swear positively, but that is my impression.

TESTIMONY OF ALBERT F. NORTON.

Albert F. Norton was next called, and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

The Officer—Give us the book.

The Witness—What?

The Clerk—Give us the name.

The Witness—I don't understand the Court.

The Officer—Give us the book, Sir. [Taking the book.] That is all. Now, tell me your full name? A. Albert F. Norton.

Judge Neilson—This oath that you have just taken—do you consider it binding on your conscience?

The Witness—I do, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Well, take a seat, Sir.

WHAT ANOTHER MAN SAW AT THE WINSTED HOTEL.

Mr. Hill—Where do you reside? A. New-Britain, Connecticut.

Q. What is your business? A. I am a mechanic, in the employ of the Stanley Rule and Level Co.

Q. Of New-Britain? A. Of New-Britain.

Q. Where did you reside in December, 1869? A. Winsted.

Q. What was your business then? A. I was contractor for the Winsted Hoe Company.

Q. Did you board at the Beardsley House at the time that Theodore Tilton came there and delivered his lecture upon the subject of "The True Woman?" A. I did.

Q. Do you know what room he occupied in the hotel? A. I know what room it was; I don't recollect the number.

Q. Did you occupy that room yourself at any time? A. I did before he came there, and afterwards.

Q. State whether or not it was on the same floor with yourself? A. It was on the same floor.

Q. As you came down from your room in the morning, did you have to pass by Mr. Tilton's room? A. I did.

Q. State what you saw upon that morning while Tilton was in the hotel, in passing that room? A. That morning, as I came down, his room—the door was about half open, and there was a lady partially dressed in the room. I saw them—I saw her standing there as I came down.

Q. Can you state what time in the morning this was? A. Oh, it was a little after six; may-be about half-past six.

Q. State whether or not she was so far dressed as to have concealed her skirts—whether she was in white, or not? A. She was in white, Sir.

Q. That is all. Wait a single moment. It is suggested—did you attend the lecture that night? A. I did.

Q. Do you know whether this lady whom you saw in the room was the same one who was in company with Mr. Tilton at the lecture? A. She was.

Q. Were you at the breakfast table where they were in the morning? A. I was.

Q. Was the same person there? A. She was.
Q. Did you see any book, "Paradise Lost," or anything, lying about the room? A. I did not.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. NORTON.

Mr. Fullerton—Were you a guest of the hotel at that time? A. I was a regular boarder there.

Q. A regular boarder. What business were you engaged in at that time? A. I was a contractor for the Winsted Hoe Co.—was running a contract at that time.

Q. How? A. I was running a contract at that time of one of their shops.

Q. A contract for what? A. In manufacturing wrenches.

Q. Wrenches? A. Wrenches.

Q. Were you ever in the employ of the proprietor of the hotel? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not in his employ at all? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect who the proprietor was at that time? A. Mr. Lincoln.

Q. And who managed that manufactory that you speak of? A. T. M. Clark.

Q. You were in his employ? A. I were; he was agent of the Company.

Q. How long did you remain in his employ? A. A little over two years.

Q. Then where did you go? A. I went to New-Britain.

Q. And where is that? A. In Connecticut.

Q. Engaged in business there? A. In the employ of the Stanley Rule and Level Co.

Q. There still? A. There still.

Q. Before you went into the employment of Mr. Clark what were you engaged in? A. I was superintendent of the Clifton Mill Co.

Q. Where was that? A. That was in Winsted. The wrench shop was a portion of the property of the Clifton Mill Co., which was bought by Mr. Clark.

Q. Whilst you were in the employ of Mr. Clark were you engaged in any legal controversy? A. Not any, Sir.

Q. Ever charged with any offense? A. Not any, Sir.

Q. Didn't you compromise a litigation at one time? A. No, Sir.

Q. In no legal trouble at all? A. Not any, Sir.

Q. Charged with no violation of law? A. Not that I know of.

Q. No controversy, no suit of any kind? A. No law suit of any kind.

Q. And did not compromise any legal difficulty? A. No, Sir.

Q. No claim that was made upon you? A. No, Sir.

Q. By any person? A. No, Sir.

Q. Or persons? A. No, Sir.

Q. Whomsoever? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Sir.

TESTIMONY OF SAMUEL E. BELCHER.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Belcher, will you take the stand?

Samuel E. Belcher was called and affirmed on behalf of the defendant.

THE WITNESS'S INTIMACY WITH THE TILTONS.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Belcher, where do you reside? A. I reside at 113 North Oxford-st.

Q. And how long have you lived there? A. I have lived there, I think, since 1866.

Q. How long have you been a resident of Brooklyn? A. About twenty-three years.

Q. And in what business are you engaged? A. Insurance business.

Q. In what capacity? A. I am President of a company.

Q. What company is it? A. Jefferson Insurance Company.

Q. Of New-York or Brooklyn? A. Of New-York.

Q. Where is your office? A. 111 Broadway.

Q. How long have you been President of that Company? A. I have been President six or seven years.

Q. And what were you engaged in prior to that? A. I was Secretary of the same Company.

Q. For how long? A. About ten years.

Judge Neilson—The reporters request that you speak a little louder, if you can. A. I will do that, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Are you a member of Plymouth Church? A. I am.

Q. How long have you been a member? A. Since 1853.

Q. Have you been an officer of that church? A. I have.

Q. What offices have you filled—have you occupied? A. I have been a member of the Examining Committee, and a member of the Music Committee, a deacon of the church.

Q. Held any other office? A. I think that is all, Sir.

Q. Now, Sir, do you know Mr. Tilton, this plaintiff? A. I do.

Q. How long have you been acquainted with him? A. I think twenty years or more.

Q. Were you associated with him at all in any official capacity in Plymouth Church; if so, state what it was? A. I was a teacher in the Sabbath-School at the same time that he was. I was a member of the Music Committee at the same time that he was.

Q. For how long were you members of the Music Committee together? A. I cannot say, Sir. The members of the Music Committee are elected for three years; I may not have been elected at the same time that Mr. Tilton was; I cannot say.

Q. How long were you in the Sunday-School together? A. But a very short time, Sir. I was but a very short time in the Sunday-School myself.

Q. Now, how intimate have you been with Theodore Tilton? A. We have been intimate friends.

Q. Lived near each other? A. Lived neighbors.

Q. How near? A. Adjoining; adjoining buildings.

Q. Adjoining houses? A. Adjoining houses.

Q. Please state whether, and to what extent, your families were friendly or intimate with one another whilst you were living in adjoining houses? A. They were very intimate; so much so as to visit each other daily—members of the family.

Q. How long were you living together in adjoining houses?

A. I don't remember positively; I think two or three years.

Q. And how near have you lived to Mr. Tilton during the balance of your acquaintance with him? A. Well, our intimacy has not continued, but we have always been friendly when we have met, and we have interchanged visits.

Q. You don't quite answer my question, Mr. Belcher. How near have you lived to him at other times than the few years when you were living in adjoining houses? A. I don't know that I get your question exactly.

Q. Well, you lived in adjoining houses for two or three years? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, where did he live? A. Since that he has lived in Livingston-st., as I understand, and I have remained at the—across the street from where I lived when he lived in that street.

Q. You moved across the street? A. I moved across the street.

Q. And he moved to Livingston-st.? A. And he moved down to Livingston-st., as I understand.

Q. I think you stated that you had been friends, although your intimacy had not continued? A. That is so.

Q. After you separated from Oxford-st.? A. That is so.

HOW MR. BELCHER BECAME AN ARBITRATOR.

Q. Do you recollect whether Mr. Tilton invited you to become one of his arbitrators in the Bowen difficulty? A. He did.

Q. State what occurred then. A. I met Mr. Tilton on Broadway near Cedar-st., and he stated that his difficulty with Mr. Bowen would probably be left to arbitrators, and asked if I would act as one of his arbitrators on that occasion, in case he wanted me.

Q. Well, what was the conclusion? A. I declined, or rather stated that I did not wish to act as an arbitrator, and would prefer that he would select somebody else, and suggested that he should do so.

Q. What else was there of that conversation? A. I don't remember anything else.

Q. Was there anything said about what should be done in case he did not find another man? A. Oh! I stated in case he could not find a suitable person—any one else that would answer his purpose—I would act for him.

MR. TILTON'S WORDS ABOUT THE WOODHULL SCANDAL.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, do you remember the occasion of the Woodhull—the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal in Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly? A. I do.

Q. Did you meet, and have a conversation with, Mr. Tilton soon after that? A. I did.

Q. Please state where you met him? A. I met Mr. Tilton while passing on the ferry-boat at Wall-st. Ferry.

Q. About what time of day? A. In the evening, between five and six o'clock.

Q. Give me the time in the month, if you can? A. Well, it was a short time; I should think two or three weeks after the Woodhull scandal.

Q. In the month of November? A. In the month of November; possibly it might have been as late as the first of December.

Q. Well, what is your recollection about it? A. My recollection is that it was in the month of November, a few weeks after the Woodhull scandal was first published. It was the first interview that I had had with Mr. Tilton since the election.

Q. You met him at the ferry-boat as he was going on, and you were going on. Please state what occurred? A. I met Mr. Tilton, and we passed on towards the ladies' cabin of the boat, when he said to me, "Don't go in there; come out here; I want to talk with you."

Q. Well, where did you go? A. We walked through the carriage passage-way of the ferry-boat to the front part of the boat, under the overhanging place.

Q. What occurred there? A. I said to Mr. Tilton, "This terrible story of the Woodhulls oppresses me, and I am glad that I met you," hoping that he might have something to say to set my mind at rest on that subject.

Q. Well, what did he say in reply? Give us the conversation that occurred there, as nearly as you can. A. I am not stating the exact language, of course, that was used. I am giving my best recollection of it. Mr. Tilton said, at first—the first thing that was said after the remark that I made was that there was nothing in it. I replied: "There must be something in it, Theodore, or these women, shameless as they are, would not dare to publish a thing of that kind without having some authority to fall back upon."

Q. Well, what did he say then? A. He said that—well, he said there might be a modicum of truth, a base, so much as a grain of wheat to a bushel of chaff. Well, I recollect. "Give me the grain of wheat about the matter; I don't want anything else but that; give me the grain of wheat."

Q. Speak a little louder. Well, Sir, what next occurred? A. Mr. Tilton spoke generally of his opinion of the propriety of silence, not saying anything about it, and of letting it pass. The conversation was general; I don't remember any specific conversation. We crossed the ferry together. We talked on that and on general topics.

Q. Do you remember if he stated anything there with reference to the newspapers—what they were saying about it? A. He said that the newspapers were calling upon him to come out, and he thought it was very strange that they did not call upon Mr. Bowen or Mr. Beecher to come out; why they should pitch into him so strongly.

Q. Did you make any reply to that; if so, state it? A. No, Sir; I don't remember any reply.

Q. You cannot. Now, after leaving the ferry-boat, where did you go? Just describe your trip as nearly as you can without waiting for questions? A. We walked up to the foot of the stairway at the arch at the foot of Montague-st., and at the foot of the stairway he said, "Come up this way." We went up the stairway to Montague-terrace, and there he said, "Come round to Remsen-st., I want to see Frank Moulton a moment." We walked around to Remsen-st. to Mr. Moulton's house; I didn't know where Moulton's house was, but Tilton left me on the sidewalk, and ran up the step and rang the bell, and some one then came to the door, I don't know who; but Mr. Tilton returned to me and we went on. I didn't hear what the question and answer was at the door.

Q. Well, Sir? A. We walked through Remsen-st. and crossed Court-st. into the City Hall Park, and through the City Hall Park to the other side of the park, on Fulton-st., and then I said to Mr. Tilton, "You go up Fulton-ave., and I go up Myrtle-ave. We will have to separate here." He said, "It is not much out of your way to walk up to my corner. Suppose you walk up to my corner." I walked up with him to his corner.

Q. Did you have any conversation by the way? A. Of course, there was some conversation. I don't know that I remember what it was, but there was general conversation on the way. I recollect we talked something about the election that had passed—that had previously taken place.

Q. A friendly and cordial conversation? A. The whole interview with Mr. Tilton was friendly on both sides.

Q. Now, you came up to the corner of Gallatin-place and Fulton-ave., his corner, as he called it. Please state what occurred there? A. I was about to leave Mr. Tilton; I said to him, "Before leaving, I think, Mr. Tilton, you should know what your oldest and best friends say of you in this matter. I hope you will not think ill or hardly of me for saying it." Mr. Tilton said no; that nothing I may say would destroy our friendship. I then said to him that his friends say that if he had a spark of manhood—if Theodore Tilton had a spark of manhood left in him, he would not allow his wife to remain under the charges in that paper twenty-four hours without denying them if they were untrue.

Q. Well, Sir, proceed. What did Mr. Tilton say to that? A. Mr. Tilton said: "Now, Sam Belcher, you shall go home with me. I have something to show you." I said that I could not well go, because I was expected at home; my family would not know where I was. But he urged me to go. He said: "I insist upon it; you shall go home with me." I then went from the corner of Fulton-ave., through Gallatin-place to Mr. Tilton's house.

MR. BOWEN'S CHARGES RETRACTED.

Q. Well, Sir, what occurred there? Give the narrative as fully as you can. A. I went to Mr. Tilton's house with him, and we took a light tea there. After that tea was over he invited me to the back parlor, gave me a comfortable seat before a pleasant fire, drew the folding doors from both the rooms—from the dining-room, or the supper-room, and the front parlor—closed both these doors, and then brought forward a roll of papers.

Q. How large a roll? A. I should think six or eight inches in diameter.

Q. Then what occurred, Mr. Belcher? You mean as they were rolled up? A. I mean as they were rolled up. Mr. Tilton commenced reading the papers and commenting upon them; but he did not read all of the papers.

Q. Well, just— A. He turned them over, and part he read, and part he did not read; he stated that— When I saw the roll of papers, and when they were being unrolled, I noticed that part of the matter was printed, and I asked Mr. Tilton why this matter was in type, or what this matter was that was in type. He said that it had been printed and was forwarded to Mr. Bowen with an intimation that unless a settlement was made for his broken contracts that this would be published.

Q. Well, Sir, what occurred after that? Do you recollect what this printed matter was, Mr. Belcher? Did you read any part of it? A. I didn't read any of the papers, Sir.

Q. Did he read it to you? A. He read a portion of it to me; I am not sure but that he may have read the whole of it; but it had reference to a letter said to have been written by Mr. Bowen to Mr. Tilton from Woodstock, Conn.

Q. Do you recollect whether any part of it consisted of a letter from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen? A. I think it did, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect what letter it was—what the date of it was? A. No, Sir; I don't recollect the date; I have—

Q. A single moment, Mr. Belcher. [Handing a paper to witness.] Just look at the printed part of this paper, Exhibit D, &c. A. That appears to be the paper that I recollect, or a part of it.

Q. He didn't read you the whole of it, do you say? A. I don't remember that he read me the whole of it; I only recollect portions of it now.

Mr. Hill—This is the printed paper which is appended to the "Tripartite Covenant." A copy of it.

Mr. Shearman—Already given in evidence.

Mr. Hill—Already given in evidence.

Mr. Shearman—And known as The Golden Age article.

Mr. Hill—And known as the The Golden Age article.

Mr. Shearman—The article containing the letter from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen, dated January 1st.

Mr. Hill—Headed, "The Personal Statement."

Q. Do you remember, Mr. Belcher, whether the printed matter which you saw was a proof, or printer's proof, or galley proof? A. Mr. Tilton told me it was a galley proof, I think.

Q. He told you that when he said it had been sent to Mr. Bowen with an intimation that unless—

Mr. Fullerton—One moment. That is not a repetition in the very words of the witness. We understand what has been said.

Mr. Hill—Well, Sir, in what connection did he tell you it was a galley proof? A. I noticed in the bundle of papers, as they were turned over, this printed matter. I asked him why this was in type; he stated that it had been put in type and was forwarded to Mr. Bowen, with an intimation that unless a settlement was made for the broken contract that it would be published.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, was anything said, either by you or Mr. Tilton, with reference to this letter which Mr. Tilton had written to Mr. Bowen, and which he showed you in type? A. I said to Mr. Tilton that I did not think that the world would accept those charges—the charges contained in that letter as against Mr. Beecher—coming from Mr. Bowen. Mr. Tilton's reply was: "I don't see how you could very well believe them, as Mr. Bowen has retracted those charges;" and I then asked him to—. I asked him to see the retraction.

Q. What did he say or do then? A. He then read me what purported to be a retraction from Mr. Bowen.

Q. Reading it from among this roll of papers? A. Yes, Sir; reading it from among the roll of papers.

Q. Very well; what was then said between you after he read or stated to you that Mr. Bowen had retracted it? Do you recollect the language he used in reading the retraction of Mr. Beecher? A. I do not.

Q. Well, can you recollect the substance of it? A. I don't remember it now, Sir.

Q. Do you remember whether anything was said with reference to his Christian—to extending to him Christian fellowship? A. I recollect that Mr.—that the article—the retraction of Mr. Bowen stated that Mr.—[The witness evidently meant Mr. Bowen.]—retracted the statements that he had made against Mr. Beecher, and that he knew of nothing which would interfere with his accepting him, or interfere with Mr. Beecher's Christian character, or something to that effect.

Q. That is, that was the contents of the retraction as he read it to you? A. That was the contents of the retraction as he read it to me; or like that.

Q. You mean, Mr. Belcher, that you recollect that as a part of the paper which he read? A. I recollect that as part of the paper which he read—as Mr. Bowen's retraction of his charges against Mr. Beecher.

MR. TILTON'S STORY TO MR. BELCHER.

Q. Well, Sir, what next occurred between you and Mr. Tilton that you recollect of? A. Mr. Tilton came to a—read me what purported to be a note from his wife—a letter from his wife to him, in which he stated that Mr. Beecher had made a proposition to her during Mr. Tilton's absence, to become a wife to him, and all that that implied.

Q. Well, Sir? A. And I said to Mr. Tilton when he read the paper, "Is that paper in Mrs. Tilton's handwriting," and he says, "No, it is a copy." I asked where the original was, and he said that Frank Moulton had it.

Q. Proceed with the narrative, Mr. Belcher, and state what occurred then, after he stated that the original was in Frank Moulton's hands. Do you recollect whether he stated whether he had read that paper or not to Mr. Beecher? A. I asked him, when he read that letter coming from Mrs. Tilton—said I, "How did Mrs. Tilton receive the propositions from Mr. Beecher?" Mr. Tilton said she indignantly repelled them. I then asked what he did when he received that letter from Mrs. Tilton; he stated that he had seen Frank Moulton the next morning, and arranged an interview with Mr. Beecher; that he had an interview with Mr. Beecher at Mr. Moulton's house, and that at that interview he charged Mr. Beecher with the act, and read him this letter—Mrs. Tilton's letter. I then asked him how Mr. Beecher acted on the occasion; he said he was confounded,—astonished and confounded, and said that it was false, and that the woman must be crazy.

Q. You will have to speak a little louder, Mr. Belcher, please; we cannot very well hear. Repeat what you just said when you asked Mr. Tilton how Mr. Beecher acted? A. I asked Mr. Tilton how Mr. Beecher acted when he charged him with this act, and read him Mrs. Tilton's letter.

Q. Yes. A. He said that Mr. Beecher appeared astonished and confounded, and said that it was false, and that the woman must be crazy.

Q. Do you recollect what next occurred between you and Mr. Tilton; if so, proceed without further questioning? A. He said—I understood him to say—that Mr. Beecher slipped out of the house, and went down, and when Mr. Tilton got home that night, Mrs. Tilton informed him that Mr. Beecher had been there, and that she had given him a retraction of the letter.

MR. BELCHER MYSTIFIED BY THE CHARGES AND RETRACTIONS.

Q. Well, the next thing, Mr. Belcher? A. I remarked—I remarked that I thought it was a very strange thing that Mr. Bowen should make a charge against Mr. Beecher and retract it—that Mrs. Tilton should make a charge against Mr. Beecher, and then take that back, and said I, "Theodore, I don't see any evidence here; where is that grain of wheat?"

Q. Well, Sir, was the paper shown to you which Mrs. Tilton had given her husband? A. The paper was not shown to me; none of these papers was shown to me. Mr. Tilton sat a distance of several feet—four or five feet—from me while he was reading the papers. The papers were never in my hands. The papers were in Mr. Tilton's hands. I didn't see the papers to scrutinize them; I can only identify them as I remember them being read.

Q. Mr. Belcher, you said that Mr. Tilton said that Mr. Beecher had slipped out of the house and gone to his, and when he came home Mrs. Tilton informed him that Mr. Beecher had been there and got a paper. Did he read to you the paper which Mrs. Tilton had given to Mr. Beecher, or a copy of it? A. He read to me what purported to be a retraction from Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Very well; now, can you remember the contents of that paper? A. I cannot, Sir; I cannot recollect the words—the language; I can recollect the general—[Exhibit No. 5 from the printed records was shown to the witness.] A. I recollect that, Sir.

Q. Is that the paper which he read to you as Mrs. Tilton's retraction given to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the paper.

Mr. Hill—Yes, Sir; that is the paper. It is on page 15.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, what next occurred after the reading of this letter, after this retraction, if you remember saying anything about Mrs. Tilton having withdrawn the paper which she had given to Mr. Beecher? A. He stated that notwithstanding the retraction of Mrs. Tilton, that Mrs. Tilton had withdrawn—had retracted the retraction, and that Mr. Beecher had confessed and apologized.

Q. Very well; now, did you ask him to see Mrs. Tilton's retraction of the recantation, or retraction of the retraction? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, now, the next thing that occurred in the order of the story, as near as you recollect it? A. I asked him where Mr.

Beecher's confession and retraction was—the confession and apology was.

Q. Apology; yes. A. He stated that the confession was a verbal one, made to him, Mr. Tilton, and the apology was in writing, and in the hands of Frank Moulton.

Q. Well, how did he say that it got there? A. He stated that Mr. Beecher had given to Mr. Moulton the apology, to be kept by Mr. Moulton in connection with Mrs. Tilton's letter making the charge, as Mr. Beecher's protection in case anything should arise from it in future.

Q. Was anything stated, Mr. Belcher, by Mr. Tilton as to the circumstances under which Mr. Moulton obtained the retraction from Mr. Beecher—the paper I mean? A. I asked him in relation to the "pistol scene," so called, and he stated that there was no foundation, in fact, for the pistol scene, as stated by the Woodhulls; that Mr. Moulton might possibly have had a pistol with him, as he was in the habit of carrying one, but that he didn't make any demonstration with it.

Q. Do you mean to be understood, Mr. Belcher, as stating that Mr. Moulton was to keep the paper making the charge, and the apology?

TIME WASTED IN TRYING TO SAVE IT.

Mr. Fullerton—We object to that.

Mr. Hill—As Mr. Beecher's protection.

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Mr. Hill—If you will wait until the question is put you will probably understand the question.

Mr. Fullerton—You have got one question out, and that is enough at a time.

Mr. Hill—I had not finished it when you began to object.

Mr. Fullerton—It is time enough to object when I have heard half of it.

Mr. Hill—That may be your method of doing it, but it is not mine.

Mr. Fullerton—No, yours is worse than mine.

Mr. Hill—You asked him whether he meant something different from what the language imparted, that is the objection. [To the witness.] I desire to call your attention to the statement which you made about the apology. Was the apology and the letter of Mrs. Tilton making the charge to be kept, or was the retraction and the letter making the charge to be kept?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to it as a leading question.

Judge Neilson—The practical way would be to ask the witness if anything was said upon that subject.

Mr. Beach—The witness has expressly stated that Mr. Tilton stated to him that this apology of Mr. Beecher was to be kept by Frank Moulton, in connection with the charge or the confession of Mrs. Tilton, as the protection of Mr. Beecher.

Judge Neilson—Yes, he said that.

Mr. Beach—Yes, he said that in distinct language.

Mr. Spearman—He did not.

Mr. Beach—Yes, he did say precisely what I represent.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, let us see about that. It was the apology he spoke of; I think he spoke of it as being read in connection with the retraction.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, we will see.

Judge Neilson—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Refer to that; turn back to it, and read it.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer then read the answer as follows: "He stated that Mr. Beecher had given to Mr. Moulton the apology, to be kept by Mr. Moulton, in connection with Mrs. Tilton's letter making the charge, as Mr. Beecher's protection, in case anything should arise from it in future."

Mr. Hill—Now, I ask you if it was the apology that was given to be kept in connection with the letter, or was it the retraction that she gave to be kept in connection with the letter?

Mr. Fullerton—I object to that.

Mr. Hill—Well, which two papers were to be kept for Mr. Beecher's protection?

Mr. Fullerton—He has stated.

Mr. Hill—I propose to ask him again.

Judge Neilson—You can ask him what further, if anything, was said about the paper.

Mr. Hill—I don't want to ask the witness what was meant; I want to ask him what was done in regard to that.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Repeat what was said.

Mr. Hill—What was said in regard to the two papers that were to be kept together as Mr. Beecher's protection? A. Whatever I may have said before, my answer is this.

Judge Neilson—No, your recollection. A. My recollection—the best of my recollection is that it was the retraction of Mrs. Tilton and the apology of Mr. Beecher that were to be retained by Mr. Moulton for Mr. Beecher's protection in case any question should arise.

MR. TILTON AND MR. MOULTON REPROACH MR. BEECHER.

Q. Was anything said in regard to Mr. Moulton's and Mr. Tilton's estimate of the character and the act of Mr. Beecher in going to get this retraction? A. Mr. Tilton said to me that Mr. Moulton himself considered that Mr. Beecher had acted very meanly and with great duplicity in getting a retraction from Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Did he state any reason why that was so? A. That it made him appear—made the husband appear as in antagonism with his wife, and made Mr. Tilton appear as though he had been making a false charge.

Q. Can you recollect every occurrence—every statement by Mr. Tilton during the conversation; if so, state them, such as you recollect, and speak a little louder. There is so much noise in the court-room that the jury cannot hear you.

Mr. Everts—Wait until the clock stops striking.

The Witness—There was something said in relation to—

Judge Neilson—That noise is outside of the court-room.

Mr. Hill—I suggest that your Honor make an order to stop it.

Judge Neilson—That has been done in a nuisance case, you recollect. The Court issued an injunction enjoining the use of the bell.

Mr. Hill—I should be glad that such an order could be made for a little while.

Judge Neilson—Now, we will hear you.

Mr. Hill—Proceed with what you were going to say.

The Witness—There was some conversation in relation to Mr.

Beecher's portrait. He said the story of the Woodhulls was not true, that the portrait had been lent by him to Frank Moulton to grace Frank Moulton's walls, as there was to be some reception at his house. I think he stated Mr. Moulton had got into his new house, and he let him have it in order to grace his walls.

Q. On some reception? A. On some reception.

MR. TILTON DENIES BEING THE AUTHOR OF THE WOODHULL STORY.

Q. Anything said about the Woodhull and Claflin women? A. Yes, Sir, there was.

Q. Please state it? A. I asked Mr. Tilton in relation to the Woodhull & Claflin women, what sort of women they were. He spoke of them in good terms, spoke of their character and capacity, and spoke of them well—said nothing against them. I don't remember the exact language he used.

Q. Spoke of them in praise rather than in condemnation.

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

Judge Nelson—He has answered. He spoke of them well—spoke nothing against them.

Mr. Fullerton—He (Mr. Hill) was not satisfied with the answer.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, please state whether or not anything was said as to the opinion of people about Mr. Tilton being responsible for the publication? A. I asked—I said to Mr. Tilton that a great many people believed that he was the real author of the Woodhull story. Mr. Tilton's reply was: "You see," he says, "that could not be, because Mrs. Woodhull herself in the paper states that she gave me the first information of the fact."

Q. Did he say anything there about that, if you recollect? A. Not that I remember now.

Q. Made no other answer to it than that? A. No other.

Q. How long an interview was this, Mr. Belcher? A. Well, from the time I got on the ferry-boat, between 5 and 6 o'clock, probably in the neighborhood of half-past 5 or 6 o'clock; it must have been midnight nearly before I left Mr. Tilton's house. It was quite midnight before I got home.

MRS. TILTON PURE AS AN ANGEL.

Q. Now, let me ask you this. Did you ask Mr. Tilton, during that conversation, whether or not his wife had been guilty of adultery or sexual intercourse with Mr. Beecher? A. I did.

Q. What did he say in reply to that question? A. If you will allow me I will state.

Q. Just give me what occurred in response to the question?

Judge Nelson—[To the witness.] What question you put, and what answer he made to you.

Mr. Hill—Well, state it any way you please. A. I asked Mr. Tilton whether Mr. Beecher had committed adultery, or, rather, had had sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton. We were shaking hands at that time, about to part, when Mr. Tilton dropped my hand and lifted his over his head in this manner [illustrating] and said: "No, my wife is as pure as an angel in Heaven."

DR. STORRS SUGGESTED AS AN ADVISER.

Q. Mr. Belcher, was anything said relative to persons with whom Mr. Tilton should advise in regard to the course to be pursued in view of the publication? A. There was.

Q. What was said upon that subject? A. Mr. Tilton asked me if I could not name some person to advise with him in that matter, and I suggested to him the name of Dr. Storrs.

Q. Well, what did he say to that? A. He said he thought well of it; he did not say that he would do it; he said he thought well of it.

Q. Did you suggest any other name? A. I mentioned at the time that Dr. Storrs was a prominent gentleman of the clergymen of the city, and well acquainted with Mr. Beecher, and had recently taken part in the 25th anniversary of the church, and suggested Dr. Storrs's name to him.

Mr. Hill—[To the juror, Mr. Jeffreys.] Mr. Jeffreys, are you feeling well?

Mr. Jeffreys—Very well.

Mr. Hill—Shall we proceed?

Mr. Jeffreys—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Belcher, I want to call your attention again to the statement which you made to Mr. Tilton during the conversation, in substance to this effect, that "Mrs. Tilton writes a letter and retracts it. Mr. Bowen wrote a letter and retracted it. I see no evidence here. Where is that grain of wheat?" What did Mr. Tilton say in reply to that, do you recollect? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Do you recollect whether he made any reply, or not, at all? A. I do not.

Q. The interview continued, as you have given it? A. The interview continued.

Q. Mr. Belcher, let me ask you this question: What have been your relations with Mr. Tilton from the time of that conversation on to the present time? A. They have been friendly. We have not had many interviews since that time.

Q. But your friendly relations have continued since that time? A. They have never ceased, Sir.

Mr. Hill—That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF SAMUEL E. BELCHER.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Belcher, I want you to fix the date of that interview, as near as you can. A. I cannot fix it any nearer than I have already, Sir. It was two or three weeks—possibly at the close of November or the first of December; I cannot fix the time.

Q. Or it may have been a little later in December than the first, may it not? A. I think not. My impression is it was two or three weeks after the Woodhull scandal was first published.

Q. Have you any circumstances in your mind by which you can fix it within two or three weeks after the publication of the Woodhull scandal? A. No, Sir; I have not.

Q. Now, was there any talk between you and Mr. Tilton at that interview about getting Christmas presents for the children? A. Not that I remember, Sir. No, Sir; I don't remember it.

Q. Don't you recollect, now that I call your attention to it, that it was just before the Christmas holiday? A. No, Sir; I do not; I have no recollection of it being just before the holidays.

Q. Can you say it was not just before the Christmas holiday? A. I cannot say anything about it, Sir, other than what I have stated here, that it was, in my opinion—

Q. Not your opinion. A. My recollection is that it was two or three weeks after the Woodhull scandal.

Q. It may have been more? A. It might possibly have been as late as the first of December, but I think not later than that; I don't think it was as late as that, but it might possibly have been as late as the first of December.

Q. You are depending entirely upon your recollection? A. Entirely.

Q. In that regard? A. Entirely.

Q. There is no event that occurred at that time that enables you to fix it at all, is there? A. No, Sir, only in a general way, that it was the first interview that I had with Mr. Tilton after the election, shortly after the Woodhull scandal.

Q. And you recollect no conversation about Christmas presents at that time? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, this roll of paper which he had, and from which he read, was it tied together? A. I don't think it was. My recollection of that paper is that it was brought into the room by Mr. Tilton just before closing the folding doors, that he brought it in, rather.

Q. In loose sheets? A. Not in loose sheets, but rolls, but not tied; I don't think it was tied.

Q. When he opened it, the sheets were loose, not tied together? A. No, Sir; I think not; I cannot say whether they were tied or not.

Q. It was quite a long story, was it not—very lengthy? A. The roll of paper, I should think, was about six or eight inches in diameter.

Q. Did he read it all to you, or nearly all? A. I should think not, Sir.

Q. How long was he occupied in reading what he did read? A. Pretty much the whole evening in reading portions. He would turn over some—would read some, and turn over some, and pass parts apparently.

Q. Was anything said about the title of the article? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it not called "The True Story?" A. No, Sir; not that I recollect.

Q. May it not have been termed "The True Story" and you not now recollect it? A. I don't know how to answer that question. I don't recollect anything of that kind. I don't recollect it being called "The True Story."

PURPOSE OF THE INTERVIEW AT MR. TILTON'S.

Q. I will ask in another form. Do you pretend to recollect all that was said that evening? A. I do not.

Q. Some may have escaped your recollection? A. Certainly.

Q. The title of the paper would not probably impress itself upon your mind? It was the paper itself, and its contents, that you were looking at, was it not? A. If you allow me to explain. I went with Mr. Tilton, at his request, to hear something that would satisfy me personally in relation to the charge that had been made against Mr. Beecher, and it was simply and only for that that I went.

Q. Can you repeat any part of that paper that was read to you? How did it commence? A. The first paper, I think, as far as my memory will serve me, was the printed matter, because my attention was called to that first. On unrolling the papers I noticed they were partly written and partly printed. I said to Mr. Tilton: "Why is this in type?"

Mr. Evans—The witness might stop while the windows are being opened.

The Witness—My attention was first called to the printed matter, and the printed matter was the first that was read, or portions of it.

Q. Then he didn't read the commencement of the article which he had folded up? A. I don't know that there was any commencement to it. They were promiscuous papers, and Mr. Tilton read what he chose to read to me.

Q. Was there a great deal of manuscript there with the printed papers? A. Yes, Sir, there was a large bundle of papers, six or eight inches in diameter.

Q. Didn't the manuscript precede the printed papers? A. I cannot tell that.

Q. You didn't notice? A. I didn't notice. I will state that I sat some little distance from Mr. Tilton.

Q. Yes; I understand that. A. I didn't have any of the papers in my hands.

Q. Didn't he read a part of the manuscript? A. I don't know.

Q. Was there enough printed matter there to occupy the time he spent in reading? A. Mr. Tilton must have read some from the manuscript, or I understood it to have been read from the manuscript certainly.

Q. Was there not a connection between the manuscript and the printed matter, making up a narration of some kind? A. I think not, Sir; I think it was more like detached matter that was read to me.

Q. But when he brought it all out it was in a roll? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Printed matter? A. Yes, Sir, printed matter, and when he unrolled it I noticed the printed matter; I noticed that first, and asked why it was in type.

THE MANUSCRIPT WHICH WAS READ FROM.

Q. What did he read from the manuscript, as near as you can recollect it? A. Well, he read what purported to be a letter from Mrs. Tilton to him in the house; as I understood it, the letter had passed to him in the house.

Q. How? A. I understood the letter was written by Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Tilton, and handed to him in the house.

Q. [Handing a paper to the witness.] Look at "Exhibit No. 57" and say whether that is the one he read to you? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. "Exhibit No. 57" is not the one he read to you? A. No, Sir; I think not. My impression is that the one he read to me was very short; it would not occupy more than four or five, or half a dozen lines.

Q. A letter written by Mrs. Tilton to her husband. [Referring to the letter.] Now, look at the first paragraph of that letter and say whether it is what he read to you?

Mr. Hill—Which one are you showing him?

Mr. Fullerton—"Exhibit No. 57."

Mr. Hill—The same one you have just shown him?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Shearman—Which one is this?

Mr. Hill—Mr. Storra.

The Witness—My recollection is that a part of that—"Mr. Beecher had solicited me to be a wife to him, together with all this implies;" I recollect that portion, and that is all I do recollect.

Q. Can you say that the first sentence in "Exhibit 57" was not what he read to you on that occasion? A. I don't think it was what he read to me.

Mr. Beach—Can you swear that it was not?

Mr. Fullerton—That is the question.

A. I can swear to the best of my knowledge and belief it was not.

Mr. Beach—Very well; that is all.

Mr. Fullerton—Did he read any other letter that evening to you? A. He read Mrs. Tilton's letter, and he read Mrs. Tilton's retraction of that letter.

Q. Any other letter did he read? A. I say Mrs. Tilton's retraction.

Q. Any other than this? A. I think no other.

Q. Did he read a letter from Mrs. Stanton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nor from Mrs. Davis? A. No, Sir.

Q. Nothing said about those letters? A. No, Sir; not that I recollect; not a word said about them.

Q. Did you hear him read that night the letter addressed to Mr. Beecher by Mr. Tilton, dated the 26th of December, 1870: "I demand that, for reasons which you explicitly understand, you immediately cease from the ministry of Plymouth Church, and that you quit the City of Brooklyn as a residence?" A. No, Sir; I do not; I don't remember that.

Q. Did you hear anything like this read: "One day last month, when I was in the north of New-Hampshire, a scandalous publication burst like a cloud over my house in Brooklyn, and shed a sudden shadow on my wife's good name?" A. No, Sir; I don't recollect it.

Q. Anything like this: "About ten or eleven years ago, Henry C. Bowen, for whom I was then working as a subordinate in The Independent office, told me one evening, while crossing the Fulton ferry, that Henry Ward Beecher was guilty of adultery, a practice begun in Indianapolis and continued in Brooklyn?" A. I think I heard something like that.

Q. You heard something like that? A. I think I did.

Mr. Morris—Mr. Shearman, will you let us have the manuscript from which Mr. Evarts read in cross-examining Mr. Tilton?

Mr. Shearman—I have not got it. It was only a copy.

Mr. Morris—Well, the copy. I would like to have that.

Q. Now, did you hear anything like this read that night: "Between the years 1860 and 1870, Mr. Bowen repeated the accusation not less than a hundred times, frequently exhibiting the deep sense of a personal injury, and sometimes saying that if he were so minded he could drive Mr. Beecher from his pulpit?" A. No, Sir, I do not.

Q. Anything like this did you hear: "As a further statement still more unwillingly opened, yet necessary to an explanation of the subsequent complication of circumstances, I must say that in the Summer of 1870, a few months after I had undertaken, in addition to editing The Independent, to edit also The Brooklyn Union, Mrs. Elizabeth R. Tilton, my wife, made to me a communication concerning Mr. Beecher, which, to use her own words, lest I should wrong him by using mine she afterwards noted down in a memorandum as follows: Mr. H. W. Beecher, my friend and pastor, solicited me to be a wife to him, together with all that that implies?" A. I do not remember anything except the words that I have before quoted.

Q. Don't you recollect those words which you say you do remember? A. I don't recollect anything.

Q. One moment. A. Well, go on.

Q. Don't you remember those words, which you say you can recall, were used in connection with the language I have just read? A. I do not.

Q. Was it read in connection with anything? A. I do not know that it was.

Q. Was anything said about a memorandum in connection with it? A. No, Sir; the letter purported to be a letter written by Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Beecher. It was on a piece of paper like a sheet of note paper, and it was interleaved with the larger paper.

Mr. Hill—"By Mrs. Tilton?"

Mr. Fullerton—Wait one moment.

The Witness—"By Mrs. Tilton"—by Mr. Beecher, I meant to say.

Mr. Beach—It is rather unfortunate, if your Honor please, that the gentlemen will not allow us to prove it without interruption in this examination.

Judge Neilson—There should be no interruption.

Mr. Beach—They are frequently giving monitions to the witness as he proceeds.

Judge Neilson—There should be no interruption whatever, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you make any memorandum of this conversation? A. No, Sir.

Q. It all rests, then, in memory only? A. Yes, Sir.

WHAT MR. TILTON DID READ.

Q. Now, will you proceed and tell this jury, as well as you can, and as consecutively as you can, all that Mr. Tilton read to you that night, either from manuscript or printed matter? A. All that he read to me at that house that night? I wish to state, before doing so, that the whole time was not occupied with reading. There was conversation on the part of Mr. Tilton and myself, and explanation, but Mr. Tilton read to me what purported to be—

Mr. Beach—No, no; that is not the question put to you; what it purported.

Q. What did he read? A. He read to me a letter; he read t me a part of the printed matter; that, I think, was the first that was read. That printed matter had reference—

Mr. Beach—No.

The Witness—Well, will you be good enough to state how I shall state it?

Mr. Fullerton—If I were under oath and in your place, I would try.

The Witness—I am trying, but the gentleman says "No," and stops me, and shakes his head, and wants me to state it in his words, I suppose.

Q. If you state what was read to you that night there will be no difficulty. A. I have stated that part of the printed matter was read to me that night; I have stated that on my direct examination and I have stated that part of the printed matter consisted of what I understood to be the Woodstock letter.

Q. It is not what you understood. What did he read? I don't want to know what you understood. A. He read a portion of the printed matter, referring to a letter which he was stated to have received from Mr. Bowen from Woodstock, detailing some charges against Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well? A. He read that portion, to the best of my recollection; he read also a letter from Mrs. Tilton to himself.

Mr. Beach—Now, will you be good enough to repeat all that you remember that he read of that paper? A. All that I can remember is this: "During your absence Mr. Beecher proposed to me to become as a wife to him, with all that that implies;" that is all that I can recollect of that letter. I recollect thinking it strange that the—

Mr. Beach—Never mind.

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind what you thought. Did you see the letter? A. I saw the paper.

Q. Did you have it in your hand? A. No, Sir; I had no paper in my hand.

Q. You did not read it? A. I did not read it.

Q. Do you recollect the date of it? A. I do not know that there was any date.

Q. Do you know how it was addressed? A. No, Sir, I don't remember that there was any date.

Q. You don't remember anything about it? A. I don't remember anything about it, except that Mr. Tilton read to me.

Q. Go on, and state what else he read? A. He read to me a letter of Mrs. Tilton, or a copy of the letter of Mrs. Tilton, given to Mr. Beecher retracting that charge.

Q. What was that? Repeat it? A. I cannot repeat it for I don't know.

Q. Well, do the best you can? A. Well, I can do nothing, except my recollection is that it was a retraction of the charge.

Q. Can you not repeat that as well as the other? A. I cannot.

Q. Why not? A. I cannot tell you why.

Q. Can you give any part of that letter—any of the language used? A. I cannot.

Q. Not a word of it? A. I cannot.

Q. Not a single word of it? A. Not a single word of it; not now: I do not recall it.

Q. Can you account for the fact that you are able to give what you say is a part of the language of the other, and fall entirely to give any word of this? A. I suppose I can account for it, because I can remember that, and don't this.

Q. Ah! that is it. Well, we will go a step farther. Can you account for remembering one, and not remembering the other? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose I could account for that.

Q. Well, try. A. I would account for that, because one was a specific charge of improper proposals on the part of Mr. Beecher, and the other was a retraction, and I recollect the charge, and I simply recollect the fact that it was retracted, and that is all.

Q. Without recollecting the terms of the retraction? A. Without recollecting the terms.

Q. One made more of an impression than the other upon your mind? A. One made more of an impression on my mind; that is the only way I can account for recollecting it.

Q. Was there a letter read to you that night from Mrs. Tilton to Mr. Moulton? A. No, Sir; not that I recollect.

Q. Let me read; see if you recollect it? [Reading]:

MR. MOULTON.—My Dear Friend: For my husband's sake and my children's, I hereby testify with all my woman's soul, that I am innocent of the crime of impure conduct alleged against me.

A. I don't recollect.

Q. Nothing of that kind? A. No, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect a letter of Mr. Beecher being read that night to Mr. Moulton? [Reading]:

I promptly comply with your suggestion of giving an explicit denial of the stories which connect my name criminally with Mrs. Tilton.

A. No, Sir; I don't recollect it.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, did you understand from Mr. Tilton that this whole article that he had there was to be published? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; I did not.

Q. Did you understand the manuscript that he read to you was to be published? A. No, Sir; I did not. The only matter I understood to be published was the printed matter in case—under certain circumstances.

Q. Yes; did you have that printed matter in your hand? A. Didn't have any papers in my hand, Sir.

Q. You have stated something that took place at the time that you parted with Mr. Tilton; where did you part with him? A. At the time that this conversation took place it was in the back parlor, in the same room.

Q. No; but where did you part with him? A. I left him at his house.

Q. Where did you part with him, in the house or out upon the sidewalk? A. Well, I think Mr. Tilton went with me to the door, because I think the family had all retired, although I don't know positively.

Q. Where did this scene take place at parting? A. This scene that I have related?

Q. Yes. A. Took place in the parlor; in the back—

Q. When he said that his wife was as pure as an angel in Heaven? A. Yes, Sir; in the back parlor.

MR. TILTON'S WORDS VINDICATORY OF HIS WIFE.

Q. And what question did you put to him that called out that reply? A. I asked him whether Mr. Beecher had committed—had had sexual intercourse with Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Yes. A. He says: "No; my wife is as pure as an angel in Heaven."

Q. Well, did you put that question to him more than once that evening? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. And that was at the close of the conversation? A. That was at the close of the conversation.

Q. Were you prompted to put that question by what had taken place between you and Mr. Tilton that evening? A. Nothing more than the general fact that I went there at Mr. Tilton's request, and wanted to know the facts of the case; that is all.

Q. Yes, well, he hadn't charged Mr. Beecher with adultery that night, did he? A. No, he did not.

Q. He did not—hadn't he spoken highly of his wife that night before this parting scene? A. I don't know that he had any reference; I don't remember any reference to his wife specially.

Q. No reference to his wife specially that whole evening? A. No, Sir, I think not.

Q. Didn't he say in plain terms that she was not guilty of adultery that evening? A. No; he didn't say it in plain terms; he said: "My wife is as pure as an angel in Heaven."

Q. No, before that, during the evening? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't he read something from a paper which implied that she was guiltless of the charge? A. I don't recollect it, Sir.

Q. Didn't it appear to be his object to impress upon you that evening that Mrs. Tilton was guiltless of the charge? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. Well, didn't he impress upon you by what he said and did that she was guiltless before you stated that question? A. No, Sir.

Q. You got no impression, then, one way or the other? A. The only impression with regard to Mrs. Tilton—

Q. A little louder. A. The only impression that I got was in relation to the charge of improper proposals, when I asked Mr. Tilton how Mrs. Tilton received the proposition of Mr. Beecher.

Q. Yes. A. Mr. Tilton replied that she indignantly repelled it so far as that charge went.

Q. That was vindictory of her? A. That was vindictory of her at that time.

Q. And didn't he say, during the course of a long conversation, other things of the same import? A. I don't remember anything else.

Q. Well, now, Mr. Belcher, why should you put a question to him of that character at the close of that long interview, unless you got the impression from what was said that night that there might have been adultery committed? A. I said it because he—I should put that question and would—I should have put that question because the papers, the public papers, were charging that fact, and I wanted to get the information from Mr. Tilton direct.

MR. TILTON'S CHARGE NOT ADULTERY.

Q. Well, hadn't Mr. Tilton already told you that the charge was less than adultery, and that it was indignantly rejected? A. He told me at first that there was nothing in the charge whatever.

Q. I am talking about that evening when you were in his house. A. Well, that was that evening.

Q. Very well; he told you there was nothing in it? A. He told me there was nothing in it.

Q. Then he told you the charge was less than adultery? A. Then he told me there was a modicum of truth in it, a base, as much as a grain of wheat to a bushel of chaff; and I asked him for the grain of wheat, and then he came up with the charge of impure proposals, which was retracted. Then, the last thing before my leaving him, or about the last thing, I asked him that question direct, in order to satisfy myself as to the truth of the charge made against Mr. Beecher and his wife.

Q. Well, weren't you satisfied when he told you that the charge was less than adultery, and that it was indignantly rejected; didn't that satisfy you? A. It satisfied me of the truth of that charge.

Q. How? A. It satisfied me as to that charge.

Q. But you thought there might be another? A. No; I didn't.

Q. Then, why did you ask the question? A. I never thought Mr. Beecher was guilty of adultery with Mrs. —

Q. No; why did you ask the question? A. I asked the question in order to answer the Woodhull charges.

THE WITNESS NOT A BLIND FRIEND OF MR. BEECHER.

Q. Mr. Belcher, have you ever said that you would stand by Mr. Beecher whether he was guilty or not guilty? A. I have not. I have said to the contrary.

Q. Didn't you say this: "If Mr. Beecher is guilty of anything, I don't want to know it?" Did you say that? A. I don't remember saying that.

Q. And did you add, "If he is, I shall stand by him at all hazards?" A. I did not, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. You never told Mr. Tilton so? A. I never did.

HOW MR. BELCHER TREATED THE CONFIDENCE.

Q. Mr. Belcher, to whom did you tell this story first? A. I don't remember.

Q. Well, how soon after this interview with Mr. Tilton did you tell it? A. I don't know that I have ever told it before in full, as I have told it here.

Q. Well, whether it was in full or in part, to whom did you communicate it first? A. Well, I have communicated—I communicated the fact of Mr. Tilton's general denial of the adultery of his wife, or the sexual intercourse between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton; I have communicated that to a number of different persons.

Q. A little louder? A. To a number of different persons.

Q. Now, my question is to whom you first communicated it? A. I can't tell you that, Sir; I don't remember.

Q. How? A. I can't tell you; I don't remember.

Q. Did you see Mr. Beecher about it? A. I have never seen Mr. Beecher about it.

Q. You didn't go to Mr. Beecher and tell him? A. I never did go to Mr. Beecher, at any time, about it.

Q. Were you an officer of the church at that time? A. I was.

Q. What office did you hold? A. At that time?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I wasn't an officer at that time; excuse me.

Q. How soon after did you become an officer? A. I became an officer in the following month—December.

Q. At what time in December? A. At the annual meeting; I cannot give you the date.

Q. About what time was it? A. I should judge the latter part of December.

Q. Between the holidays? A. I cannot remember, Sir.

Q. Have you held office ever since? A. I have.

Q. During all the excitement? A. I am holding office now, Sir.

Q. During all the excitement of this scandal and of the investigation, you have held office in the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A deacon? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A deacon of the church? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that is one of the principal offices, isn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, will you go back again to the question already put: Can you tell me to whom you communicated this story first, that you have related here to-day? A. I don't think I have communicated this story to anybody until to-day.

Q. Until to-day? A. No, Sir.

Q. Kept it locked up in your own mind? A. Not fully.

Q. Now, when did you first attempt a narrative of what occurred there? A. I never have attempted any narrative.

Q. Well, do you mean to say that you have kept this as a secret within your own breast? A. No, Sir; I mean to say that I have talked about it in different parts and sections with different people, as I have met them; I never have undertaken to tell a continuous or direct story in this case at all, that I remember.

Q. You haven't talked, then, with any counsel upon the other side about it? A. Oh, I have.

Q. And communicated the story? A. Well, parts of it.

Q. Did you communicate substantially the whole of it? A. Well, probably, substantially the whole of it.

Q. Then why did you tell me that you never had communicated it to any one? A. Because I haven't communicated it to any one.

Q. Well, that passes my comprehension: you have communicated it to the counsel, and you have not communicated it to any one! A. Well, it does not pass my comprehension; I doubt very much whether a person could repeat the story twice exactly alike.

Q. "Substantially," I said. Have you repeated this story substantially to any one since that conversation with Theodore Tilton? A. I have.

Q. When first? A. The first—the first that I ever stated this story substantially as I have stated it here was to Mr. Hill, the attorney in this case.

Q. When? A. About—I can't tell.

Q. About how long ago? A. About a week ago, I think.

Q. How? A. About a week ago, I think.

Q. Not more than a week ago? A. I don't think it is more than a week ago.

Q. Now, that is the first person, then, to whom you substantially related what Mr. Tilton told you on the night of the interview, is it? A. The whole story. I have told parts of this to a great many different people.

Q. Well, when did you tell the first part of it that you did tell? A. I told it within a few days afterward, I think.

Q. To whom? A. Well, I cannot—I cannot call—I cannot remember.

Q. Well, when did you tell any other part of it? A. I have told it at different times.

Q. And to whom? A. To different people that I have met, that—to different people that I have met.

Q. Never told the whole of it? A. I don't think I have ever told the whole of it until I have told it here.

Q. Can you tell me to whom you have told the story, or any part of it, at any time, excepting Mr. Hill a week ago? A. Yes, Sir; I think I told it to Deacon Hawkins; part of it.

Q. And when did you tell him? A. I do not remember.

Q. What part of it did you tell him? A. I told him that Mr. Tilton told me there was nothing in it, and told me that his wife had not been guilty of adultery, and that there was—told him that part of it, and that I had Mr. Tilton's assurance of that fact.

Q. That is what you told him? A. Yes; I remember that.

MR. BELCHER BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, where were you when the Committee was appointed to investigate this scandal? A. Where was I when the Committee was appointed—what Committee do you have reference to?

Q. The Plymouth Church Committee? A. Do you mean last Summer's Committee?

Q. Well, there wasn't but one. A. Well, I do not know what you have reference to.

Q. I have reference to the appointment of the Plymouth Church Committee to investigate this scandal. The thing is as notorious as this City Hall, or Court-house, whatever it is. A. I do not know whether I was in town, or not, when that Committee was appointed; I think I was here in Brooklyn.

Q. You think you were here in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir; I think I was here in Brooklyn.

Q. Were you here in Brooklyn during the sittings of that Committee? A. Not all the time.

Q. Where were you? A. I was up in the country.

Q. Where? A. Up in the village of Sing Sing, about two miles back.

Q. And how much of your time did you spend there? A. I was there—I think I spent two nights in the week at home; the balance was in New-York and in the country.

Q. Then you were accessible at all times? A. Yes, Sir.
Q. You didn't go before that Committee, did you? A. I did.

Q. And give your evidence? A. I didn't; I gave evidence before that Committee.

Q. You gave evidence before that Committee? A. Yes; I did.

Q. Do you recollect on what night you gave evidence before that Committee? A. I do not.

Q. Who were present when you gave the evidence? A. The Committee were present.

Q. The whole of them? A. I think so.

Q. Was your testimony taken down? A. I don't know.

Q. Was there a short-hand writer there? A. I think there was.

Q. Well, didn't he appear to be taking it down? A. I didn't notice; I know he was there.

Q. Wasn't he at work? A. I only noticed that he was there; I don't know that he took anything down.

Q. You can't tell what evening you gave testimony before the Committee? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. How long did it take you to give it? A. Well, I suppose five minutes.

Q. Five minutes? A. Not very—a very short time; I can't remember the exact time.

Q. And who examined you? A. I think Mr. Hill examined me; I won't be positive.

Q. Did you see Mr. Hill before you went before the Committee? A. I won't be positive about it; Mr. Hill, I did see him before I went before the Committee.

Q. Where? A. He came to my house for me.

Q. By appointment? A. No, Sir; he came there on a search to find me.

Q. Did you tell him what you knew? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have any conversation with him about your testimony? A. I think I had some conversation with him before I testified at the house.

Q. At your house? A. No; at the house of—where the Committee met.

Q. That same evening that you gave your testimony? A. Just a moment or two; yes, Sir; that same evening.

Q. Where did the conversation take place? A. In the parlors of that house.

Q. Did you state to him substantially what you could testify to? A. No; I don't think I did; I may have stated a part, a portion of it.

Q. Did you state a part? A. I did state a part; yes, Sir.

Q. Of what you could testify to? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, was it substantially this story that you have told here that you stated to Mr. Hill? A. Parts of it were.

Q. Parts of it were? A. Yes, Sir; I don't remember any testimony in relation to the—

Q. I don't ask for your testimony, I am asking what you stated to Mr. Hill. A. Well, that is—I stated to—

Q. Didn't you remember a moment ago, when I asked you to whom you communicated this story, or any part of it, that you told Mr. Hill last Summer? A. I didn't think of it at all.

Q. Didn't think of it; it didn't occur to you? A. It didn't occur to me, because I looked upon Mr. Hill as a counsel in the case.

Q. Not as a person? A. Not as a person entirely.

Q. Well, I am sorry he loses that character because he becomes a counsel; I thought he was a little more than a person.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher you did not state, when I asked you to whom you had communicated this story substantially, in whole or in part, that you stated it before the Committee, last Summer, did you? A. I didn't state the whole of the interview as I have stated it here.

Q. A little louder, please? A. I did not state the whole of the interview as I have stated it here.

Q. Before the Committee, you did not? A. I did not.

Q. You stated a part of it, didn't you? A. I don't know that I did as I have stated it here.

Q. No, and it was for that reason that you did not name the Committee as a body to whom you had communicated this story in reply to my question asking you to whom you had communicated it. Is that the reason? A. No, Sir; I did not state—you asked me if I had made this statement in full.

Q. No, no, substantially—in whole or in part, was my question? A. Well, I stated that I had, and cited one gentleman to whom I had told it in part.

Q. Well, I asked you to name any other person or persons to whom you had communicated it? A. Well, I communicated it to the Committee in part.

Q. Well, you didn't answer my question, by naming the Committee; did you forget that? A. It didn't occur to me.

Q. You forgot that? A. No, I didn't forget it; it didn't occur to me.

Q. It did not occur to you at the time. Now, did you state before the Committee substantially what you have stated here to-day? A. In whole?

Mr. Beach—Yes.

The Witness—No, Sir.

Q. You did not? A. No, Sir, not in whole.

Q. What did you omit in this statement when you made the statement to the Committee? A. I omitted any reference to any printed matter; I omitted any reference to Mrs. Tilton's letter to Mr. Tilton, stating improper solicitations. I stated that Mr. Tilton had denied the fact of his wife's adultery. That part of it, to the best of my recollection, I stated.

Q. I am asking you what you omitted? A. Well, I cannot recollect anything more than I have stated.

Q. How? A. I cannot recollect now what I have omitted, any further than—

THE COMMITTEE'S WAY OF EXAMINATION.

Q. Were you sworn before the Committee? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not sworn? A. No, Sir.

Q. What were you requested to do when you went before the Committee? A. I was requested to state my interview with Mr. Tilton in brief, and I did so.

Q. Now, did they request you to state what you knew in regard to this scandal, and what Mr. Tilton had told you? A. Well, I don't recollect.

Q. Didn't you know the Committee wanted you to state all that you had within your knowledge in regard to the scandal, and anything that would throw light on the subject? A. I don't know how I could know that.

Q. How? A. I don't know how I could know what the Committee wanted.

Q. Didn't you suppose they wanted it? You can suppose? A. Well, I suppose I can suppose.

Q. Well, please suppose, and tell me what you did suppose. When you went before that Committee, didn't you suppose that they wanted to know all that you could tell them in respect to that Committee, as you learned it from Theodore Tilton?

Mr. Beach—In respect to that scandal.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, in respect to the scandal.

The Witnesses—I don't know how I can answer that question.

Q. Why can't you answer it? A. Because I don't recollect that I recollect now that I supposed anything then.

Q. Were you not under the impression when you went before that Committee that they desired you to tell everything within your knowledge? A. I believe they expected me to tell all—to tell nothing but what was true at that Committee.

Q. That is not what I asked you? A. I don't know that they expected me to tell all that I knew about it, because I was there but a very short time—in the Committee room.

Q. The length of time that you were there won't determine the impression that you had when you went there. Now, answer me this question, did you not go before that Committee under the impression that they wanted to know from you everything that you knew that would throw any light upon the scandal, that was then the subject of investigation? A. I went there with this distinct impression, that I was to tell all that I knew in the matter, if called upon.

Q. If called upon? A. Yes, Sir; that I was not to keep anything back at any rate.

Q. And unless you were called upon, you didn't expect to tell anything? A. I didn't propose to volunteer anything at all.

MR. BEECHER NOT IN NEED OF VINDICATION.

Q. Well, why not? It was your pastor, was it, who was on trial in a measure? A. I didn't think he was.

Q. You didn't think he was? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you know the Committee was appointed by him? A. Yes, I knew it by—the same as the public knew it. I didn't know it personally.

Q. And didn't you know that it was for the purpose of vindicating him? A. I knew that in a general way that it was, I suppose.

Q. Then why didn't you give all the evidence within your knowledge that would tend to vindicate him? A. I gave such as I was called—

Q. Why didn't you do that? I am asking you a question. A. Because, as I said before, I didn't volunteer any testimony. I answered the questions—the talk that was put to me.

Q. You would not even volunteer to give information which you had received from Theodore Tilton to exculpate or vindicate your pastor unless it was asked of you? A. My pastor did not need any vindication from me.

Q. You didn't think it was necessary to appoint the Committee, did you? A. I didn't think he needed—well, I didn't care whether he did or not, so far as I was concerned.

Q. Didn't you think it was unnecessary to appoint the Committee? A. I don't know that I had any thought about it.

Q. If you thought he didn't need any vindication from you, what did you go there for that night? A. I went there at the request of the Committee through Mr. Hill.

Q. For what purpose? A. To state what I knew, if I knew anything.

Q. Why didn't you state what you knew? A. I answered every question that was put to me.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, were you not asked substantially this question that night: "Did you have an interview with Theodore Tilton in the Autumn or Winter of 1872?" A. I can't recollect now, Sir, what questions were put to me.

Q. Was not a question put to you calling your attention to the interview which you had with Theodore Tilton in 1872? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. Can you state that that question was not put to you? A. No, Sir; I cannot state that it was not; I don't remember.

Q. Now, then, will you tell me what questions were put to you? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Can you tell any one question that was put to you? A. No, Sir.

Q. Not a single one? A. Not a single one.

Q. Can you testify positively that any questions were put to you? A. No, Sir; I cannot.

Q. Then if you only answered questions that were put to you and can't state whether any questions were put to you—A. I am giving the best of my recollection; I believe questions were put to me, but I cannot remember what they were.

Q. The purport of them—you can't give that? A. I can't remember; no, Sir.

Q. They did not impress themselves upon your mind? A. No, Sir; it did not impress itself on my mind at all, because I was there but a very few minutes.

Q. Was any question put to you which led you to give any part of this interview? A. I don't recollect it if it were.

Q. Can you tell us, then, how you happened to give any part of the interview between you and Mr. Tilton? A. I cannot.

Q. Haven't you stated, Sir, since you have been on the stand, that you were requested to give that interview between you and Mr. Tilton? A. Well, the record will show whether I have or not.

Q. Well, I want you to show; you are the record that I am after? A. What—state what?

Q. Haven't you stated since you were upon that stand that you were requested before the Committee to give the interview between yourself and Theodore Tilton? A. Haven't I so stated?

Q. Yes. A. I don't recollect.

Q. Whether you have so stated? A. No; I do not.

Q. Even forgotten that? A. I don't even recollect whether I have so stated.

Q. Now, will you tell this jury how you happened to give any of that interview? A. I don't know that I understand your question, Sir.

Q. How did it happen that you gave any part of the interview before the Committee between you and Tilton? A. I don't know that I understand how I came to do it.

MR. BELCHER A VOLUNTARY WITNESS.

Q. You went down there voluntarily, didn't you?

A. No, Sir, I did not; Mr. Hill came for me in a carriage, and took me down there, and I went before the Committee.

Q. Was not that voluntary? A. You might call it voluntary if you choose.

Q. What do you call it? A. I did not volunteer to go before the Committee.

Q. He didn't compel you to go, did he? A. No, Sir; I didn't volunteer to go.

Q. But you went voluntarily? A. The gentleman came for me and I went with him.

Q. Because he requested it? A. Because he requested it.

Q. And to give testimony? A. I did not go under duress; I was not carried there by force of arms.

A. You went there to give evidence before the Committee? A. I went there to go before the Committee; yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, you have told us that you did not volunteer any testimony before the Committee; that is so, is it? A. If I said so, it is so.

Q. Well, didn't you say so? A. I think I did.

Q. Then you answered questions that were put to you, didn't you? A. I think I did; yes, Sir; to the best of my recollection I did.

Q. And in answer to one or more of those questions you told a part of the interview which occurred between you and Mr. Tilton at his house? A. I did.

Q. Then it was in answer to a question relating to that interview, was it? A. Possibly.

Q. Possibly; well, isn't it a little more than possibly? A. I don't undertake to recollect, or give only from recollection what the interview was. The Committee were there, and the conversation was going on in relation to this matter. I was not questioned there as I have been here, Sir, at all; not in that style.

Q. Weren't you deeply interested in the question that was involved before that Committee? A. Well; I had a general interest of course, the same as any one would have.

Q. How? A. I had a general interest, of course.

Q. You regretted that this story had gone abroad in regard to Mr. Beecher, did you not? A. I did, of course.

Q. You felt indignant, did you not? A. At first; yes, Sir.

Q. When did you get over your indignation? A. I got over my indignation when Mr. Tilton informed me that Mr. Beecher had not seduced his wife—had not sexual intercourse with his wife.

Q. Didn't you encounter a great many people who did believe the truth of this charge? A. Yes, Sir; and I stated to them as I state to you, different people, that Mr. Tilton had denied the matter entirely.

Q. Didn't you suppose that there were a great many people whom you had not met who believed in the scandal? A. Oh! I suppose so; yes, Sir; there are a great many, no doubt.

Q. Didn't you think, then, it was proper to have that investigation, and clear it all up, and remove this cloud from Mr. Beecher's name? A. Will you allow me to state?

Q. I will allow you to answer. Didn't you think that was necessary? A. I thought that was a matter for Mr. Beecher more than for me. I was satisfied with Mr. Beecher.

Q. One moment. A matter for Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. To vindicate himself? A. And personal to him.

Q. To vindicate himself; was that it? A. That was my idea of it.

Q. How would he do that except through the intervention of his friends who were in possession of facts which would tend to accomplish that end? A. Sometimes silence is the best indication.

Q. Did you think he had better be silent? A. I thought I would leave that to him.

Q. And inasmuch as he had determined not to be silent, and appointed a Committee of Investigation, then why didn't you fall in and state what you knew about it? A. I answered all the requirements as I understood them. I had no disposition to conceal anything, or to tell anything wrong.

Q. But you had a disposition not to state all that you knew? A. No, I don't know that I had.

Q. Well, you did not state all that you knew, you say? A. Very well; I don't always do that.

Q. Have you done it now? A. I don't know that I have.

Q. State what else you know, then, upon this subject? A. I don't know now that I do remember anything.

Q. Very well.

Mr. Morris—It is one o'clock.

Judge Neilson—Will you suspend now?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—The Jury will get ready to retire. Gentlemen will keep their seats a moment. Return at two o'clock, gentlemen.

The Court then took a recess until two o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Court met at 2 p. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, if you had delayed coming until five minutes ago, I should have found fault with you; but now it is too late to find fault. Mr. Hill, will you go on, please?

Mr. Fullerton—I was looking after Mr. Everts, Sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. Everts—And I, if your Honor please, came after Mr. Fullerton. [Laughter.]

Samuel E. Belcher was re-called and his cross-examination resumed.

THE WITNESS SUFFERS FROM A BAD MEMORY.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. Belcher, when you were before that Committee did you state to them that Mr. Tilton read to you a letter written by Mrs. Tilton, or a paper written by Mrs. Tilton, in which she charged improper solicitations? A. I don't recollect, Sir.

Q. You don't recollect whether you stated it before the Committee or not? A. I don't recollect; no, Sir.

Q. Didn't you, just before the adjournment, state most distinctly, that that was one of the parts that you omitted? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Well, if you so stated before adjournment that that was one of the parts that you omitted, was it true? A. I don't recollect whether it was true or not.

Q. You cannot now recollect what you have testified to on the stand? A. I cannot now recollect whether I made that statement.

Q. I will ask you the question again: Will you now repeat to the Jury what you omitted, in your testimony before the Committee, of the statement which Theodore Tilton made to you at his house? A. I don't know what I omitted to state.

Q. Can you name anything that you omitted? A. No; if you ask me that, what I omitted; I can recollect what I stated; some of it.

Q. You cannot recollect anything that you omitted? A. No; I can recollect what I stated.

Q. It would be well enough for you to recollect that when I ask you what you stated. I am asking you now what you omitted to state. You cannot recollect? A. I cannot recollect.

Q. Can you recollect any one thing that you omitted to state, before the Committee of that conversation? A. I cannot.

Q. Didn't you, before the adjournment, state distinctly the different heads that you omitted to state before the Committee? A. I don't recollect.

Q. You don't recollect whether you so testified or not? A. I do not.

Q. Well, don't you now recollect that you omitted to state before the Committee anything about this improper solicitation to be a wife and all that it implies, as a charge made by Mrs. Tilton against Mr. Beecher? A. I don't now recollect.

Q. Do you recollect of talking to Mr. Hill, before you went before the Committee, about that charge of improper solicitations? A. No, Sir.

Q. Didn't you state to Mr. Hill that that was the charge contained in the papers that you saw of Mr. Tilton? A. I don't recollect any conversation with Mr. Hill before going into that Committee.

Q. Don't you recollect of seeing him at all, before you went in before the Committee? A. He came for me in his carriage.

Q. Didn't he tell you what he wanted? A. Simply to go before the Committee.

Q. Didn't he tell you the purpose for which he wished you to go before the Committee? A. Not at all; no, Sir.

Q. He didn't tell you that he wanted you to give a statement?

Q. Or evidence? A. No, Sir.

Q. And did you know what he wanted? A. Yes; I knew what he wanted as soon as he stated that he came for me to take me before that Committee.

Q. Did you suppose that he wanted you to go before the Committee? A. Yes, Sir, I presumed so.

Q. Did you suppose he wanted you to say anything when you got there? A. I don't know what he wanted.

Q. What did you think at the time? A. I supposed that I should go before the Committee.

Q. Yes; I have got past that. What did you suppose that you would be required to do, or asked to do, when you got before the Committee? A. I could not tell until I was asked.

Q. Had you any impression about it? A. I had no impression, except that I was there to state what I knew of the matter; that is all.

Q. Oh, then, you had an impression that you were to state what you knew about the matter? A. Certainly.

Q. But you did not state what you knew about the matter, I understand you—the whole of it? A. I didn't state all I knew about it; I hadn't time to have done that.

Q. You hadn't time? A. I hadn't the time; no, Sir.

Q. Was that the reason you didn't state it? A. Not necessarily so; I wasn't there long enough.

Q. You were not turned out, were you? A. No.

Q. You staid as long as you chose, didn't you? A. Not as long as I chose.

Q. You wanted to stay longer and couldn't? A. No; I don't mean that.

Q. What do you mean? A. I mean that I staid there—that the time of examination was short; that is all I mean.

Q. And did you go away as soon as you were examined? A. I did.

Q. Left the room and went home? A. Left the room and went home; yes, Sir.

Q. You were not prohibited from stating anything that you wanted to state, were you? A. No, Sir.

MR. BELCHER'S TALK WITH THE COUNSEL OF THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Before you went in before the Committee did you have any talk with anybody about the matter? A. Before I went to the house, do you mean?

Q. After you got to the house where the Committee were sitting, and before you went before the Committee, did you have any conversation with any one in regard to the matter? A. I had a conversation with Mr. Hill.

Q. What was that conversation; did you state to him then what you knew? A. I had a general conversation with him.

Q. Well, in that general conversation, did you state what you knew about the matter? A. I must have stated some things that I knew about it, but not, probably, all that I have stated here.

Q. Did you state anything that you knew? A. I must have stated it; I don't remember what I stated.

Q. You don't remember whether you stated it or not? A. No, Sir.

Q. Whether you stated anything to him or not? A. I simply remember that there was a conversation with Mr. Hill before I went before the Committee, but what the nature of that conversation was, or what the particulars were, I cannot give.

Q. You don't know whether it was about the weather, or whether it was about the scandal? A. I don't know that it was about the weather; I think it was about the matter that the Committee was called to investigate.

Q. Now, do you remember what the subject of that conversation was? A. I do not.

Q. Didn't Mr. Hill ask you what you could testify to? A. He may have done so.

Q. Don't you remember? A. I don't remember; no, Sir.

Q. Don't you remember that he asked you what facts were within your knowledge? A. I do not remember, Sir.

Q. You can't give us any idea, then, of the conversation between yourself and Mr. Hill? A. I have no recollection of the conversation that took place, except that there was a conversation, and that I went before the Committee, and—and—

Q. And what? I thought you hadn't finished the sentence. A. I don't know how you would like to have me finish that sentence. If you would like to have me finish it in my own way, I will say—

Q. Well, have you been interfered with in finishing it in your own way? A. No.

Q. Then why don't you finish it in your own way, without regard to me? A. Because I had it finished and you asked me to go on.

Q. Oh you had! A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You finished it with "and," and, therefore, I supposed there was something to follow. A. Well, I don't choose to.

MR. BEECHER'S OMISSIONS WHILE WITH THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Very well, you don't choose; therefore let it stand. Now, didn't you purposely omit to state before that Committee that a charge was made by Mrs. Tilton, as you learned from Mr. Tilton, against Mr. Beecher, of improper solicitations? A. I did not.

Q. You did not purposely? A. I did not purposely omit anything; no, Sir.

Q. Then how came you to omit that important part of it? A. I can't tell you how I came to omit any part of it.

Q. How? A. I can't tell you how I came to omit any part of it.

Q. You only stated then what Theodore Tilton said in vindication of his wife and Mr. Beecher, but did not state the charge? A. I didn't state that I had stated anything before the Committee.

Q. How? A. I didn't state that; I didn't say anything of that kind, that I know of, before the Committee.

Q. Well, I say, you only stated before them what was vindictory of Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, without stating the charge, as you understood it, that had been made against Mr. Beecher? A. I don't remember what I stated before the Committee; I haven't the remotest idea.

Q. You haven't the remotest idea? A. None.

Q. Of what you said before the Committee. Didn't you tell me a moment ago that you could say what you stated before the Committee? A. In relation to the vindication of Mr. Beecher.

Q. What you said before the Committee? A. I want to answer your question correctly, Sir, and I don't want to state anything that is not true.

Q. Haven't you stated since recess— A. I have stated here that I remembered stating to the Committee something in relation to the printed matter.

Q. Didn't you state now here, within the last five minutes, when I asked you what you omitted to state before the Committee, that you couldn't tell me that— A. I—

Q. One moment. But that you could tell me what you did state? A. Yes.

Q. Now you tell me that you have not the remotest idea what you did state, do you? A. In that respect that you asked me.

Q. In what respect? A. In the respect that you asked me as to the vindication of Mr. Beecher, and that that did not sustain Mr. Tilton, as I understood your question.

Q. I ask you this question, then, remembering what you did state, whether it was not all in vindication of Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton, and nothing implying a charge against them? A. Against them?

Q. Yes; or either of them. A. That is my understanding, for I knew of nothing against Mr. Beecher.

Q. You knew that Mrs. Tilton had made a charge against him, didn't you? A. I knew that Mr. Tilton—which charge do you mean?

Q. That Mr. Tilton told you of; the charge that Mr. Tilton told you of? A. I knew that, certainly.

Q. You knew that that was a charge against Mr. Beecher of improper solicitations? A. Yes, Sir; which Mr. Tilton had retracted.

Q. And why didn't you state that charge before the Committee? A. I cannot tell you; I don't know that I did state it; I don't know what I stated fully.

Q. Now, didn't you know that Mrs. Tilton had reaffirmed that charge? A. No, I did not.

Q. Didn't you know that Mrs. Tilton, or hadn't you been informed that Mrs. Tilton wrote to her husband the same night of the retraction that it had been gotten from her by Mr. Beecher for a purpose of his own? A. No, Sir.

Q. And not for— A. No, Sir; I had simply had the information from Mr. Tilton that his wife had retracted the retraction, but he did not read it to me, that I know of. I don't remember his reading it to me.

Q. Retracted the retraction; that you heard? A. That I stated.

Q. Then didn't you understand that the original charge would stand, in a measure? A. No, I did not.

Q. How? A. I did not understand so.

Q. Not if the retraction was recalled and retracted; didn't you think that that would give some force to the original charge? A. It didn't strike me that way, Sir.

Q. No. Very well. Now, did you see any one else before you that went before that Committee that night? A. No, Sir.

Q. Had no conversation with any one else? A. No, Sir; I was alone in my house.

Q. Well, you were not alone in your house when you were before the Committee after you got to the building? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, I am asking about the time that intervened between the time that you left your house and the time that you went into the Committee-room; did you see and talk with any other persons than Mr. Hill? A. I saw other persons; but I don't remember talking with any other person.

Q. Whom did you see before you went in before the Committee? A. I saw—the gentlemen of the Committee were there when I arrived there.

Q. Whom else did you see? A. I don't recollect of anybody else.

Q. Did you see Mr. Tracy? A. Mr. Tracy, I think, was there; I saw him, I think.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him? A. I don't remember any conversation with him.

Q. Well, if you had a conversation with him, wouldn't you remember it? A. I don't think it possible for a man to control altogether his memory, Sir. I don't remember having any conversation with Mr. Tracy.

Q. Can you say positively that you did not have a conversation with Mr. Tracy, and that you told him what you could testify to? I cannot say positively that I had any conversation with Mr. Tracy. I have stated to the best of my recollection that I had no conversation with Mr. Tracy. I don't recollect any conversation.

Q. Can you say positively that you had no conversation with him? A. No, Sir; I cannot say positively.

WHAT MR. BELCHER DID TELL THE COMMITTEE.

Q. Now, did you testify in substance as follows, before that Committee? [Referring to printed book.] "Mr. Tilton was at first mysterious and non-committal." Did you state that? A. I don't remember, Sir.

Q. "But on their way home in Brooklyn Tilton invited him into his house?" A. I might have said that, for that is true.

Q. "Where the 'True Story' was exhibited to him?" A. I have no recollection of any such testimony.

Q. You don't recollect of testifying that? A. No, Sir.

Q. Will you swear that you did not state to the Committee that the "True Story" was exhibited to you at that conversation? A. I will swear that I don't recollect it; that is the best I can say.

Q. Will you swear that it is not so? A. I will swear that I don't recollect it, Sir.

Q. Is that all you swear to? A. That is all I will swear to.

Q. Then you will not swear that it did not take place? A. I will swear that I do not recollect that it took place.

Mr. Everts—What page are you reading from, Mr. Fullerton?

Mr. Fullerton—Page 202 in this.

Mr. Everts—Of the Committee's Report?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Hill—They don't report Belcher.

Mr. Fullerton—They do report Belcher.

Mr. Morris—They do report him.

Mr. Everts—It is the Committee's Report which we have before us.

Mr. Beach—What of that, we are asking him a question.

Mr. Everts—I agree that you have a perfect right to.

Mr. Beach—It is not necessary for you to explain to the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—The assertion on the other side is that the Committee did not say anything about Mr. Belcher. [To the witness.] Will you swear positively that you did not state before the Committee that "the True Story" was exhibited to you? A. I cannot swear positively. To the best of my recollection, I did not so swear that "the True Story" —

Q. Well, that you have said before. Did you say that a prolonged conversation was had, which lasted until midnight? A. Very likely I did, for that is true.

Q. Do you recollect whether you stated it or not? A. I don't recollect what I stated; I think very likely I did.

Q. Did you state that he asserted his confidence in his wife's purity, and complained only of improper solicitations? A. I don't recollect.

Q. Don't recollect anything about it, do you? A. I don't recollect whether I answered such a—whether I made such a statement before that Committee or not.

THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT TO THE CHURCH.

Q. Were you present when the report of the Committee was read in the church? A. I was.

Q. Did you hear it read? A. The report of the Committee read in the church?

Q. Yes? A. Can you tell me when that was?

Q. Oh, I don't belong to Plymouth Church; you do. You can tell me, if you were there, when it was, better than I can. A. I think I was present.

Q. Then you heard the report read, didn't you? A. I think very likely I did.

Q. Didn't you hear the report read that "Mr. Belcher testifies that he met Tilton on the ferry-boat about two weeks after the publication of the Woodhull scandal, and they talked the matter over;" did you hear that? A. I don't recollect hearing it.

Q. Did you hear this read: "He says that Tilton was at first mysterious and non-committal, but on their way home in Brooklyn, Tilton invited him into his house, where the 'True Story' was exhibited to Mr. Belcher." Did you hear that read? A. I don't remember hearing it.

Q. Didn't you hear the whole of the report read that night? A. I don't remember whether I did or not hear the whole of it.

Q. Were you there when it was read? A. I don't remember whether I was there; I don't remember the report; I think I was present at the meeting, if I recollect the right meeting.

Q. And you don't remember the reading of the report, do you? A. I don't remember what the report contained at all.

Q. Do you remember the reading of it? A. I don't recall it now; no, Sir.

Q. Do you remember who read it? A. No, I do not. I was trying to recall who read it.

Q. Do you remember what took place after it was read? A. I am trying to remember the night.

Q. Never mind the night; the event is what you are swearing to. Did not Mr. Raymond read the report? A. I don't remember who read the report.

Q. Do you remember what occurred after the report was read? A. I remember some things that took place that night, if that is the night that I have reference to—the evening.

Q. Do you remember when the thing was put to vote—the question upon the acceptance of the report and its adoption? A. My recollection of that meeting is very indistinct, Sir.

Q. Do you remember that there was one vote in the negative? A. No, unless it was Mr. Moulton's.

Q. Well? A. I think Mr. Moulton voted no.

Q. Then you were present, were you, when he voted no? A. I think I was present.

Q. Don't you know whether you were present? A. I said I thought I was present at that meeting.

Q. I know you said that you thought you were, but I want to know whether you don't know that you were there? A. I only want to be sure of the meeting; that is all. I only want to be sure of the time. If that was the night that Mr. Moulton—

Q. I don't care about the time. Were you there when Francis D. Moulton voted no upon the question of the adoption of that report? A. I was present at the time Francis D. Moulton voted no on something.

Q. But you don't recollect what it was? A. I don't recollect what it was.

Q. You don't recollect what the subject of the note was? A. I do not.

Q. And when was this? A. I don't remember the time.

Q. Can you tell what year it was in? A. My impression is that it was last year.

Q. In 1874, was it not? A. I think it was in 1874.

Q. What time in 1874? A. I cannot remember the time.

Q. Was it not late in the season? A. I don't remember the time, Sir, at all.

Q. And not remembering it, you are enabled to remember what took place between you and Mr. Tilton in 1873? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. So as to retail the whole conversation? A. Yes, Sir, all that I have retailed.

Q. Your memory, then, of old events is better a good deal than of new events?

Mr. Evarts—You ought not to argue with the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask him if that is not so.

The Witness—Did you want an answer to that? You asked me if my memory of old events is better than my memory of new ones; you asked that question.

Q. Well, I did. A. Well, I was going to say that a man is not responsible for his memory. He can remember certain things that impress him, on his memory, while he may forget other things that did not so impress him, whether they were new or old.

Q. Then the report of the Committee vindicating your pastor from a terrible charge, was not an event that made an impression upon you? A. It did not make any impression materially upon me. I did not require it.

Q. How? A. I did not require that report to vindicate him.

Q. No. Did you vote on the report? A. I don't remember.

SEVERE STRICTURES ON THE WITNESS'S MEMORY.

Q. Do you remember whether anybody else was there besides yourself? [Laughter.] A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You are sure of that? A. Yes, Sir; I think I would be positively willing to swear that some gentleman was there besides me.

Q. Well, I am happy to hear that you are positive about one thing. Have you ever read that report since it was read that night? A. Not that I recollect; no, Sir.

Q. Have you ever had a book in which it was printed? A. Not that I know of; no, Sir.

Q. Did you read it in the newspapers after it was published? A. I may have; I don't remember.

Q. You don't remember that? A. I don't remember that I have; no, Sir.

Q. Now, at that meeting, do you recollect who presided? A. I think Mr. Freeland presided.

Q. Wasn't it Deacon Freeland? A. I think Mr. Freeland; yes, Sir.

Q. Sure of it, are you not? A. Well, I am as sure of that as I can be of anything.

Q. Were you not, in 1874, a member of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church? A. Yes, Sir; no, Sir.

Q. Well, now, which was it? A. No, Sir; not 1874.

Q. Not last year? A. No, Sir; I think that my term of office as a member of the Examining Committee expired on the first of January, 1874, I think.

Q. Well, don't you know? A. No, I don't know positively, Sir. If I was a member of the Examining Committee at all that year it was by virtue of my holding the office of deacon.

Q. You are ex officio, are you not, a member of the Examining Committee? A. That is the point I am trying to get at, Sir. There has been a change in the rule; when that change was made I don't recollect—separating the Examining Committee from the—separating the Deacons from the Examining Committee.

Q. Now, wasn't the report of this Investigating Committee submitted to the Examining Committee of the church of which you were one— A. I think it was.

Q. One moment. A. I think it was; yes, Sir.

Q. Well. A. And I think I was there when that was submitted.

Q. And didn't you pass upon it? A. I think so; yes, Sir.

Q. And approve of it? A. I think so.

Q. Wasn't it read? A. I think it was.

Q. In your hearing? A. I think so.

Q. Well, did you hear that part of the report read which purports to give your testimony before the Committee? A. I think it must have, although I don't recollect it.

Q. Don't you now recollect having heard that read, the part of it in which you are made to state that the "True Story" was exhibited to you? A. I don't recollect it; no, Sir.

Q. Well, then the Committee's report must have been read to you twice, or in your hearing twice, was it not, once before the Examining Committee, and once before the body of the church? A. I think so.

Q. How? A. Very likely.

Q. Well, as a member of the Examining Committee, you approved of the report, whatever it was, didn't you? A. I voted in favor of it; yes, Sir.

THE WEST CHARGES.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, as a member of the Examining Committee, didn't the West charges come before you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Who presented them before the Committee? A. The West charges?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I think West presented them—Deacon West.

Q. Where was the meeting of the Examining Committee when those charges were presented? A. The meeting that I attended—the first meeting that I heard anything of the charges was, I think, at Mr. Halliday's house.

Q. Didn't you attend more than one meeting of the Examining Committee when the West charges were presented? A. They were never presented, I think, but to one meeting, at which I was present.

Q. And Mr. West presented them himself? A. He did.

Q. Were they discussed? A. There was some discussion.

Q. Were they read? A. I think they were.

Q. Who read them? A. I think Mr. West read them himself.

Q. You remember of the charge there against Mr. Tilton for slandering Mr. Beecher, in saying that he had had criminal intercourse with his wife, Mrs. Tilton? A. Criminal intimacy, wasn't it?

Q. Well, whatever the charge was you remember it? A. I remember it; yes, Sir.

Q. I will call your attention to them. You may state now, if you please, who else was present when the West charges were made? A. I don't recollect now, Sir, who was there.

Q. Was any member of the Committee present besides yourself? A. There must have been; I can give you my best recollection of who were present if you wish.

Q. Now, I will read from Exhibit No. 29, and we will see whether the word that you suggested was used instead of the word incorporated in my question. [Reading]: "At an interview with Mrs. Andrew Bradshaw, in Thompson's dining-rooms, in Clinton-st., on or about the 3d of August, 1870, Theodore Tilton said that he had discovered that a criminal intimacy"—you are right—"existed between his wife and Mr. Beecher. Afterwards, in November, 1872, in referring to the above remark, Mr. Tilton said to Mrs. Bradshaw that he retracted none of the accusations which he had formerly made against Mr. Beecher." That was the language of the charge, was it? A. I think so.

Q. You thought that that charge embraced something more than improper solicitations, did you not? A. I did not.

Q. You didn't? A. No, Sir; I did not.

THE BASIS OF THE WEST CHARGE INTERPRETED.

Q. You thought a criminal intimacy was the same as improper solicitations? A. I did think so at that time.

Q. How? A. I did think so.

Q. Do you think so still? A. Well, I think so—I thought so then.

Q. Well, do you think so now? A. I thought that the words criminal intimacy were words used to convey about the same idea as—

Q. About the same idea? A. As improper proposals.

Q. Do you think so now? A. Well, I am somewhat in doubt now, because I have heard persons say that "criminal" meant different from what I supposed it did.

Q. Well, what do you think intimacy meant? A. Well, I thought that any person that was more intimate with another person than they should be was criminally intimate.

Q. Well, suppose that other person repelled them with indignation, would you call that an intimacy? A. It would depend upon circumstances whether I believed the repelling.

Q. You think that when two persons are together, one of them can be intimate with the other and not the first? A. No, I don't know that I could take that definition.

Q. Well, didn't you understand criminal intimacy as implying a criminality—a mutual criminality of the two persons? A. Yes, Sir; I suppose so.

Q. Very well. Then if the intimacy was criminal, didn't you understand that it was something more than an improper solicitation upon the one hand, which was rejected by the other person? A. If there had been any criminal intimacy I should have so thought.

Q. I am talking about the charge of criminal intimacy. Do you now, Mr. Belcher, think that where a criminal intimacy was charged between two persons named, that that charge could be satisfied if one person made an improper proposal and the other rejected it? A. I didn't believe there had been any criminal intimacy.

Q. I am not talking about the fact; I am talking about the charge, Mr. Belcher. Now, you are an intelligent gentleman; you can distinguish between the two? A. Will you please state your question again?

THE TRIBUNE stenographer repeated the question.

The Witness—No.

Q. It would not meet the charge? A. No; I should not think so.

Q. A criminal intimacy, then, in your judgment, would have been something more than an improper solicitation by one person which was rejected by the other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, now, you understood very distinctly, as I understand you, you understood that they proposed Mrs. Bradshaw as a witness, did you not, to prove that Theodore Tilton said that there was a criminal intimacy existing between Mr. Beecher and his wife? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. I understood that.

Q. And didn't you understand that that was intended to charge criminality upon both? A. No, Sir; Mr. Tilton had told me that there had been no difficulty between them.

Q. No, never mind; I am talking about the West charge, please? A. I understand you are asking me what I believe, and I am telling what—I did not believe it.

Q. I am talking about the West charge that was made and read in your presence. A. I did not accept the West charge at all, because Mr. Tilton had told me himself there had been no crime committed between him and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Did that alter the character of the charge? A. It didn't alter my belief.

Q. Did it alter the character of the charge. A. Not that I know.

Q. I am talking about the character of the charge, whether it was true or untrue; didn't you regard the charge made as implicating both parties in criminality? A. Probably; yes, Sir.

Q. And that charge was made in 1872, was it not? A. 1873.

Q. The West charge, you understood, was made in 1873?

A. Yes, Sir; I understand; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, then, we may go a step further. Did you not understand the charge that he made, however true or however false it was of the criminal intimacy, as involving a charge of adultery? A. I did not.

Q. Well, what did you understand by criminal intimacy. Didn't you understand that it was a delicate way of charging adultery. A. I did not.

Q. Well, give us, if you please, your definition of criminal intimacy as you understood it? A. I understood criminal intimacy, for instance, a gentleman visiting the wife of another gentleman, at unsuitable hours, when the other gentleman was not aware of it, and a surreptitious acquaintance of that kind, kept up, would be criminal in my estimation. That was the opinion that I had formed of it, and that was the view I held of it as criminal intimacy.

Q. And you did not regard, then, the West charges as involving adultery at all? A. I did not; no, Sir.

Q. Well, was that discussed before the Committee? A. I am not aware that it was. It was discussed between Mr. West and myself, I think.

Q. Well, what was said between you and Mr. West about it? A. Well, very much the same as you and I have discussed it, Sir.

Mr. Beach—What was he saying?

Mr. Fullerton—"Very much as you and I have discussed it—"

The Witness—I expressed the opinion that—

Q. Did Mr. West put questions to you that you could not answer; is that what you mean? A. Oh! no.

Q. Well, then, explain it? A. I expressed the opinion to Mr. West the same as I have expressed it here. That I did not consider his—the fact that Mr. Tilton had stated to Mrs. Bradshaw that he might prove criminal intimacy between Mr. Beecher and his wife as necessarily meaning adultery.

Q. Now, what did Mr. West say? A. Mr. West took the contrary view.

Q. Yes, that it was a charge of adultery? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. He made the charge, didn't he? A. He made the charge of criminal intimacy—he made the charge of slander against Mr. Tilton.

Q. Exactly, with charging criminal intimacy? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Which he construed to be adultery? A. I don't know that he did construe it in that way.

Q. Didn't he tell you so? A. He differed with me from my statement.

MR. WEST THINKS THE TILTON CHARGE THAT OF ADULTERY.

Q. Didn't he tell you so—didn't he tell you he considered it as a charge of adultery? A. I don't know that he used those words.

Q. Well, didn't you just tell me that he so considered it? A. He considered it differently from what I did, Sir.

Q. In what respect was it different in his judgment? A. Well, I think he considered it more—more in the light of adultery than I should.

Q. More in the light of adultery? A. More in the light of—a different kind of an intimacy from what I would.

Q. Well, what kind of a different kind of intimacy? A. Yes, Sir; a kind of a different kind of an intimacy.

Q. Well, what did you say upon the subject of the kind or character of the intimacy; didn't he say he thought it was adultery? A. It was a simple passing remark upon—I stated to Mr. West that I didn't consider the words "criminal intimacy" necessarily meant adultery; and he said he thought they did; and that's all there is about it.

Q. Very well; that is what I have been trying to get out of you for the last fifteen minutes. A. Well, I am trying to get it out for the last fifteen minutes.

Q. It is hard work. A. It is hard work.

Q. He said he considered it did then—you understood, at last, that in the opinion of Deacon West the charge was adultery; did you not? A. Very likely; but I didn't consider it so.

Q. I understand that. A. Yes.

Q. You didn't mean to consider it so, did you? A. No, I did not; not after what Mr. Tilton told me himself.

Q. No; not at all. Did you hear this part of the report read: Without now considering the weight of credit to which the respective parties are entitled where there is a conflict between them, we believe and propose to show from the evidence that the original charge was improper advances, and that, as time passed, and as the conspiracy deepened, it was changed into adultery.

Did you hear that read? A. I don't remember; I can't remember that report at all, Sir.

Q. Have you any doubt that you heard that part of it read? A. Well, I can't remember any part of that report,

Q. Have you any doubt that that part of it was read in your hearing? A. I don't recollect it, Sir.

Q. Have you any doubt about it; that it was read in your hearing? A. Well, as long as I can recollect it, I must say I have a doubt; I suppose that is a proper way to answer that question.

MILD MEASURES ADOPTED.

Q. What was done with the West charges when they were brought before the Examining Committee? A. Well, they were—I think they were accepted at first; and I asked Deacon West myself (I think I was chairman of that meeting), I asked Deacon West myself if he had called on Mr. Tilton personally, as a member of the church, and expostulated with him in relation to the charges, before he brought his charges before the Committee; that is, if he had exhausted the remedy that is laid down in the New Testament before bringing charges against a brother in the Church, to go and see him and talk with him; and if he won't pay any attention to him, take another brother and go—

Mr. Evarts—Speak a little louder.

The Witness—I say that I asked Brother West, when he presented his charges—after the charges had been presented to the Committee—whether he had exhausted the remedy laid down in the New Testament for a person having sught against another brother, a member of the Church. He stated that he had not. Then I proposed that there should be a committee of three to wait upon Mr. Tilton, and before the formal charges should be sent to him; that is my best recollection now.

Q. Was that Committee appointed? A. It was.

Q. Were you one of it? A. I was.

Q. Did you go to him? A. I did.

Q. To Mr. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. When did you go? A. I don't remember the day, Sir.

Q. Did you receive a letter from Mr. Tilton? A. Not at that time, Sir.

Q. Well, very soon after? A. Well, that was—must have been months afterwards; must have been months afterwards.

Q. Look at that, page 77, Exhibit 72, and say whether that is the letter you received from him? A. I think it is, Sir.

Q. That is it? A. I think it is, Sir.

Q. Now, you went to see Mr. Tilton, did you? A. I did.

Q. Who went with you? A. Captain Duncan and Deacon Garbutt.

Q. You had a conversation with him? A. We did.

Q. Now, when was that? A. Well, I don't remember; it was prior to the serving the written charges upon Mr. Tilton.

Q. Where did you see him? A. Saw him at the office of The Golden Age.

Q. Yes; now, what took place? A. I think the conversation with Mr. Tilton was carried on through Captain Duncan, as near as my memory serves me—the main conversation—Captain Duncan stated that he had called upon Mr. — that the Committee had called upon Mr. Tilton in relation to charges that had been presented, before those charges had been formally served upon him—before the written charges should be served on him.

Mr. Evarts—Served upon Mr. Tilton? A. Served upon Mr. Tilton—Mr. Tilton said that he was not a member of the Church; hadn't been for some three or four years; that he was not amenable to its discipline, and that he should not come before the Committee; and he used an expression, that I remember, like this: "that forty yoke of oxen could not draw him before that Committee."

Q. What Committee? A. Before this Examining Committee.

Q. Yes; well, is that what you went there for, to get him to go before the Examining Committee? A. No; we went there—the Committee went there—to converse with him in relation to these charges before, and I stated the fact that charges had been preferred against him, and to ask him what he had to say in the matter, and what course he proposed to take.

Q. Well, did you expostulate with him? A. I don't know what you mean by "expostulate."

Q. Well, you used the word a little while ago; what do you mean by it? I mean the same as you do. A. Well, I don't know in what sense I used it; I don't remember.

Q. Well, I don't know in what sense you used it, except by its context. A. We went there to converse with Mr. Tilton, and in advance to report to the Committee Mr. Tilton's views and state of mind before the formal charges were forwarded.

Q. Well, what did he say about the charge that he had made against Mr. Beecher? A. He didn't say anything about the charge, only that he was not a member of the church, and would not go before this tribunal; he was not amenable to its jurisdiction.

Q. Well, did you ask him to go before the tribunal? A. No, we did not, but we told him that charges had been preferred against him.

Q. Did you ask him whether the charge was true or false? A. No, I did not.

Q. Did you take him to task in any way, in a Christian spirit, for having made this charge? A. I did not, because Mr. —

Q. Did anybody? A. I don't know; not in my presence.

Q. How? A. Not in my presence.

Q. Well, this Committee, as I understand you, was appointed and sent there to do what Mr. West, you think, according to Scripture, should have done? A. That was the ostensible reason.

Q. Well, then, why didn't the Committee perform their service; perform their work? A. Well, the Committee—Mr. Tilton met the Committee with—

Q. Or did you think it was unscriptural because there were three?

Mr. Evarts—Oh, let him answer.

Q. Let us have the answer. A. What is the question?

Mr. Evarts—The question is, Why didn't you proceed to talk with him as a member of the church?

Mr. Fullerton—No; I haven't asked you that

Mr. Evarts—You asked him if he did according to the rules of the New Testament.

Mr. Fullerton—That is different from the rules of Plymouth Church, I take it.

The Witness—The Committee was appointed on motion of mine.

Q. I understand it; you have got the Committee appointed; have got down to Mr. Tilton; now, I want to know why you didn't expostulate with him? A. The Committee went there for the purpose of talking to Mr. Tilton, and hearing any explanation that he had to make before the formal charges were served upon Mr. Tilton.

Q. Why didn't you do it when you went there? A. I think we did it.

Q. Now, tell us how you did it? A. Well, I say that Captain Duncan was the spokesman, the principal spokesman; that he stated to Mr. Tilton that these charges were presented, and that they were presented in writing before the Committee; and that before the church would take any action—before the Committee would take any action—any further action on it, they had appointed a Committee of three to wait upon him. That is as near as I can remember.

Q. Yes, to wait upon him? A. Yes, Sir; to wait upon him.

MR. TILTON'S POSITION TOWARDS THE WEST CHARGES.

Q. What for? A. To hear what he had to say in relation to these charges before they were presented to him in writing.

Q. Yes, Sir; and then what was his reply? A. Well, his reply was that he was not a member of the Church, nor had not been for three or four years; that he was not amenable to the Church discipline jurisdiction, and that he should not appear before the Committee.

Q. Well, you didn't agree with that, did you? A. What do you mean—agree?

Q. You didn't agree with him in his opinion? A. I don't know that I agreed or disagreed in his opinion.

Q. What was your opinion about it at the time? A. I don't know that I had any.

Q. Any opinion expressed? A. I don't know that I expressed any at that time.

Q. Was there any opinion expressed either at that time by any member of that Committee as to his amenability to the discipline of the Church? A. I think not.

Q. How? A. I think not.

Q. Well, he was held amenable, wasn't he, afterwards, was he not? A. I considered him amenable to the jurisdiction of the Church myself.

Q. Then, why didn't you, if you considered him amenable, say something to him — A. I did say something to him myself.

Q. What did you say upon that subject? A. But not at that time.

Q. But at some other time? A. After this Committee had retired, and on the way home.

Q. Then it was you said something to him? A. Yes, Sir, it was; I said something to him.

Q. Why were not the West charges then prosecuted? A. I do not understand you; they were forwarded to Mr. Tilton, I think; as far as my memory serves me they were forwarded to him afterwards.

Q. Do you call that prosecuting them? A. That is the commencement of prosecution, I suppose.

Q. Well, was there anything else done towards prosecuting the charges? A. Yes, Sir; Mr. Tilton was cited to appear before the Committee, and he wrote a letter, I think—he wrote a letter declining to come before the Committee, I think.

Q. Well, that didn't prevent them trying him, did it? A. No.

Q. Well, go on. A. Well, do you want to know—now, do I understand that you want my view of the matter—my individual view?

Q. I want to know why the West charges were not prosecuted.

Mr. Evarts—Any more than they were?

The Witness—Well, my action in that matter was in order to help Mr. Tilton as much as anybody else.

Q. Oh! you wanted to help Mr. Tilton, did you? A. I did in that matter just as much as possible.

Q. How were you going to help Mr. Tilton? A. I—my idea was this, I stated it to Mr. Tilton on the way over that night, Mr. Tilton, after the Committee had left The Golden Age office.

Q. Now, see, here, won't you be kind enough to tell me why the West charges were not prosecuted?

Mr. Shearman—He is trying to give it to you.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he has not made it out.

Mr. Shearman—Because you interrupted him with another question.

Mr. Fullerton—No, he has gone off on the tangent.

Mr. Shearman—You don't know where he has gone, until he has given you the answer; he is proceeding to give the answer.

Mr. Beach—On the contrary, he is proceeding to give a subsequent conversation with Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—It was his mode of stating his reason.

Mr. Beach—It is not a mode that we shall submit to, then.

Mr. Evarts—Counsel ask witnesses to state reasons why this or that thing was done, but do not want to take the reasons that the witness's mind furnishes.

Mr. Fullerton—The witness's mind was not furnishing any reason at all.

Mr. Evarts—That is to be adjudged of after he has given it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, that is to be adjudged now.

Judge Neilson—Repeat that question.

Mr. Fullerton—Why were not the West charges prosecuted to the conclusion? A. Well, I cannot tell you why.

Q. You know of no reason, do you? A. I know of no reason.

Q. Did you have any interview — A. I know of no reason other than the fact that Mr. Tilton had put in a plea of not being responsible to the church.

Q. Now, let me read the letter to you, "Ex. No. 17."

MR. SAMUEL E. BEECHER:

My Dear Sir: As you are a mutual friend of Mr. Beecher and myself, and as you are likewise a member of the Examining Committee of Plymouth Church, now occupied with an unhappy scandal, I desire to put into your hands, to be used publicly or privately at your discretion, the following statement, namely: I wrote a few days ago to your Committee stating that I had not for four years held any communication whatever with Plymouth Church, and therefore could not with propriety act the part of a member in any proceedings; but since writing that note I learn from the public papers that because my name still appears on the church books, I am, therefore, still considered a member, sufficiently so, at least, to be indicted by one of the members for slandering the pastor. A hint is also thrown out that I am thus refusing to submit myself to the Church tribunal in order to escape the responsibility of my slanderous words. I therefore say, first, I have never spoken against Mr. Beecher falsely, and, second, if either he or the Church Committee shall request me to waive my non-membership, to take my position once again, I will do so as a member long enough to appear this evening at the meeting to answer, before the assembled congregation or the Committee, the following question, either from Mr. Beecher or the Committee, namely: "Have you, Theodore Tilton, ever spoken against Henry Ward Beecher falsely?" I request you to show this letter to Mr. Beecher before the action of the Committee to-night. Let me add that my explicitness in this matter is solely to protect myself against any unjust suspicion in the future that I have ever sought to evade any just responsibility of mine to Plymouth Church. I retain a copy of this letter, to be used hereafter as I shall see fit.

Fraternally yours, THEODORE TILTON.

Now, after that letter, why didn't you prosecute the West charges? A. They had already been prosecuted and ended before the letter was written.

Q. Prosecuted? A. They had already been terminated, and the action of the Committee taken before I received that letter.

Q. What was the action of the Committee? A. The action of the Committee was to accept Mr. Tilton's statement, that he was not a member of the church, and his name dropped from the roll.

Q. Wasn't there some action taken by the church, as a body, after that? A. That night?

Q. What? A. The same night that letter was written?

Q. Same night that letter was written? A. I think so.

Q. Well, do you recollect what took place at the church that night? A. I probably recollect something of what took place there; I don't know that I recollect all.

Q. Do you recollect that there was a resolution offered "that the name of Theodore Tilton be dropped from the roll of membership of this church?" A. I don't remember; possibly that was so.

Q. Wasn't that the very resolution that was offered that night? A. I presume it was; I don't remember; you ask me if I recollect.

Q. And do you recollect that Mr. Tilton was there and made a speech? A. I do.

Q. Wasn't Mr. Beecher present? A. I think he was; yes, Sir, he was present, I believe.

Q. Didn't Mr. Tilton wind up his speech by saying: "If, therefore, the minister of this church has anything whereof to accuse me, let him now speak, and I shall answer as God is my judge?" A. I think he did.

Q. And what did Mr. Beecher reply? A. Mr. Beecher replied that he had no charges to make against Mr. Tilton.

Q. And you didn't prosecute the West charges? A. I think we did; yes, Sir.

Q. How? A. I understand that we took up the West charges and settled them.

Q. Settled them? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. By throwing them out, as it were, because he was not amenable to your jurisdiction; is that it? A. No, Sir; there were two views to be taken in that matter, as I told Mr. Tilton that night, after the meeting at The Golden Age office.

Q. Never mind; tell us the two views? A. I am going to say that I stated those views to Mr. Tilton.

Q. I didn't ask you to say that you stated them to Mr. Tilton; I want you to tell what two views you took? A. Well, I can't tell you what two views were taken—I don't know what came up in the Committee at all. I will state it to you as I told Mr. Tilton, if you wish me.

Q. Well, I don't see that I can help it. Go on. A. I will stop here if you say so; I am entirely at your service. Mr. Tilton asked me this question, if you would like to hear—Mr. Tilton asked me what the action of the Committee would be on the report of this sub-committee of three.

Q. I don't ask you for it; I would like to get an answer to my question, if I can? A. I am willing to answer your question, if you will state what it is.

Q. Let me ask you another question; let me read you something here, and I want you to tell me whether it was the report of the Committee that night. [Reading]:

Whereas, Charges were preferred to this Committee by William F. West against Theodore Tilton; and

Whereas, A Special Committee having been appointed by this Committee to wait upon said Tilton in reference to said charges, said Tilton on the evening of the 6th of October, instant, made answer to that Special Committee in these words: "I have not, for nearly four years past, been an attendant of Plymouth Church, nor have I considered myself a member of it, and I do not now, nor does the pastor of the church consider me a member, and I do not hold myself amenable to its jurisdiction in any manner whatever;" and

Whereas, Theodore Tilton, in a reply to a communication addressed to him by the Clerk of this Committee, and which communication, with a copy of the charges preferred against him by William F. West, were put into the hands of said Tilton on the 17th day of October inst., and a request made of him that he should answer the same by the 23d day of October inst., says in a letter addressed to the Clerk of this Committee, under date of October 22d, 1878: "It is about four years since I terminated all connection with the church, and am not now a member thereof; therefore, the document addressed to me in that capacity I cannot receive;" and

Whereas, It thus appears that Theodore Tilton, a member of this church, has abandoned his connection with the church by prolonged absence from all its services and ordinances; therefore

Resolved, That this Committee recommend to the church that the name of Theodore Tilton be dropped from the roll of membership of the church as provided by Rule No. 7.

Brother White moved to amend the resolution, so as to recommend to the church to excommunicate Mr. Tilton, in place of dropping from the roll. The amendment was lost.

Do you remember that as having taken place that night? A. What night is that, Sir?

Q. The night that you speak of, when the report of the Committee was made? A. No, Sir; I don't understand that to be at that night.

THE CHURCH'S ACTION ON THE CHARGES.

Q. When was it? A. It must have been a previous meeting.

Q. Were you present at a previous meeting when that was offered? A. I was present at a number of meetings previous to that.

Q. Now, Mr. Belcher, will you tell me whether you were present at a previous meeting when that resolution was offered? A. I think so; I think so; but not the night of the action taken in the Church.

Q. What resolution was offered that night? A. That report or a similar one to that; a report similar to that that you have just read.

Q. Well, similar to it, or that report? A. I don't know whether it is that report or not.

Q. But one you think very similar? A. A report had been adopted by the Examining Committee and was read at the Church that night.

Q. What? A. There had been a report previously adopted by the Examining Committee, and which had been read to the Church that night, and that report, as nearly as my memory serves, is about the same as you have it there.

Q. Now, this report was adopted by the Examining Committee before the meeting of the Church, wasn't it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long before; how many days? A. Well, I don't remember; it might not have been more than a day or two, but I don't remember.

Q. Now, on what day did you receive this letter addressed to you by Theodore Tilton? A. I received it from Mr. Tilton's hands on the morning of the—morning that the Church took action on it.

Q. Then, before the Church took action, and before they adopted this resolution, Mr. Tilton submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Church, didn't he, by that letter? A. No, Sir; I don't think he did by that letter.

Q. You don't think he did? A. No, Sir; the action had already been taken so far as the Examining Committee was concerned.

Q. So far as the Examining Committee was concerned, but not so far as the Church was concerned; is that it? A. That is it.

Q. And before the Church, as a body, took that action, Mr. Tilton wrote that letter to you? A. He did.

Q. Did you show it to Mr. Beecher as he requested you? A. I did.

Q. When did you show it to him? A. Same night.

Q. Did you show it to the Committee? A. No, I did not.

Q. You did not think this was submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the Church? A. I did not.

Q. "If either he or the Church Committee shall request me to waive my non-membership and take my position once again I will do so, as a member, long enough to appear this evening at the meeting to answer before the assembled congregation or the Committee the following question, etc., etc." You thought that was a willingness on his part to appear, didn't you? A. Yes, Sir, it may have been a willingness, but the conversation—

Q. But, didn't you consider it as being a willingness on his part? A. The conversation—

Q. One moment. A. I want to be right.

Q. You have a very wrong way of doing it then? A. That may be, but I want to be right.

Q. Answer my question: did you not consider that as a willingness on his part? A. I did not.

Q. You didn't? A. I did not.

Q. You considered that language as an unwillingness on his part? A. I considered that language as a sort of waiving the position—according to the conversation and talk that I had had with Mr. Tilton previously, was postponing, or getting rid of the emergency that had then arose.

Q. Well, he did appear at the Church, did he? A. He did appear at the Church; yes.

Q. And no charges were made against him? A. How is that? There were no charges that I know of; I did not hear of any.

Q. He offered to meet the charges that night, didn't he? A. There were no charges presented that night.

Q. He offered to meet any charges that might be presented. A. He offered to meet any charges that might be presented by the pastor of that Church, and no charges had ever been presented by the pastor of that Church, as I understood it.

Q. Now, did you give a copy of this letter, addressed to you by Mr. Tilton, to Mr. Talmadge? A. I did not.

Q. Do you know whether he had a copy of it? A. Well, I don't know how I could know that positively; I presume he had a copy.

Q. You didn't give it to him? A. I didn't give it to him; no.

Q. Wasn't the letter of Mr. Tilton read before the Committee—Tilton to you? A. I think it was—no, not my letter; not the letter that was to me; not the copy that I had was not read.

Q. Well, a copy of that letter? A. A copy of that letter was read.

Q. To the Committee? A. I think, Sir.

Q. Do you recollect who read it? A. I think Mr. Talmadge read it.

Q. That is the clerk? A. The clerk.

Q. He was the clerk of the church, wasn't he? A. No, Sir; clerk of the Examining Committee. Mr. Tilton informed me that he had sent a letter to the clerk of the church, but instead of that he meant the clerk of the Examining Committee, I suppose.

Q. Now, I understand you on the evening when you had this long talk with Mr. Tilton, that you advised him to go and consult Dr. Storrs? A. No; I won't put it that way, Sir, not that I advised him to go—he asked me what course he should take, and speaking of consulting with some persons, I suggested the name of Dr. Storrs as being a good man for him to consult; not that I advised him to go and consult with Dr. Storrs.

Q. Very well; you supposed that he would consult Dr. Storrs in consequence of that suggestion? A. I didn't know whether he would or not.

Q. Well, you thought it more than probable, didn't you? A. I didn't have any thought about it.

Q. Well, you thought Dr. Storrs was a good man to consult? A. I did.

Q. Do you know whether or not he went to see Dr. Storrs in regard to it, soon after? A. I don't know; no, Sir.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. BELCHER.

Mr. Hill—Mr. Belcher, you began to state an interview, or state what occurred at an interview between yourself and Mr. Tilton as you were coming away from The Golden Age office, on the day when the Committee went to see him about the West charges, and you were interrupted by the counsel. Please take up that interview and state it to his Honor and the jury? A. When the Committee left The Golden Age office, between there and the ferry—Mr. Tilton walked with me, and Captain Duncan and Mr. Garbutt walked together.

Mr. Evarts—A little louder.

The Witness—Captain Duncan and Deacon Garbutt walked together, and Mr. Tilton and myself. At or near the ferry—at the ferry Mr. Tilton says: "I want to talk to you, and here will be a good place to lose these gentlemen."

Q. Here would be a good place to what? A. Here would be a good place to lose these other gentlemen. We crossed the ferry, and we did lose them; we didn't see them again; I didn't see them again not until evening. After we had got across the ferry we walked up Fulton-st. to Myrtle-ave., and I think we walked down Myrtle-ave. to the corner of Lawrence-st., and there the interview—there we separated. During that interview Mr. Tilton asked me what I thought would be the action of the Examining Committee upon the report of this Committee of Three. I told him I could not say what the action of the Examining Committee would be, but that so far as I was concerned, as one of the members of that Committee, I could see but one of two courses for the Committee to take; one of those courses was to expel him as a contumacious member of the church, and the other was to accept his view, that he was not a member of the church by reason of his long absence, and to recommend the church to drop his name from the roll.

Q. Well, what did he say to that? A. Mr. Tilton was not—expressed himself as not satisfied altogether with that view; he wanted to have the Church simply recognize the fact of his non-membership, and pass some resolution in Committee, or by the Church, to have the roll corrected; he did not like the idea of having his name dropped from the roll.

Q. The roll corrected by omitting his name? A. By omitting his name.

Q. Well, that was in substance what you said was one of the two causes? A. No; that was not—

Q. Very well; now, Mr. Belcher, a letter has been referred to as having been received by you from Mr. Tilton upon the day when the meeting was held, or the day before the meeting was held at the church; in the evening, at which the resolution was finally adopted, dropping his name from the roll? A. The morning of that day.

Q. Very well; the morning of that day; now please state whether or not the action of the Committee had then been taken in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. Tilton? A. It had, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Not of the sub-committee—the action of the Committee, I mean, had then been taken? A. It had, to the best of my recollection.

Q. So that the Committee were then fully committed to the dropping of the name, at the time that letter was received?

Mr. Beach—Well, I object to that.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all in evidence, Sir.

Mr. Hill—If the fact is conceded I don't want to go any further with it.

Mr. Fullerton—The fact is conceded that the Committee had taken their action, whatever it was, and that is in evidence.

Mr. Beach—I don't know that; it has not appeared certainly that they had taken their action on the day before.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, but the Church had not taken its action.

Mr. Beach—No.

Q. State, Mr. Belcher, whether this sub-committee of three made a report to the Examining Committee, of their interview with Mr. Tilton? A. I don't recollect; I don't recollect their report.

Q. Did they state what had occurred, either formally or informally? A. I have no doubt they did, but I don't—I don't remember.

Q. Were you present? A. I don't remember; these meetings were held, a great many of them, during the Summer time, and I was away a great deal that Summer.

Mr. Hill—That is all, Mr. Belcher.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ST. CLAIR McKELWAY.

St. Clair McKelway was next called by the defendant, and having made affirmation, was examined as follows:

General Tracy—Mr. McKelway, you reside in Brooklyn? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long have you resided in Brooklyn? A. Since the 15th of April, 1865.

Q. What is your business? A. A journalist.

A. Where are you now employed? A. In The Brooklyn Eagle.

Q. What capacity? A. Associate editor.

Q. How long have you been employed on The Brooklyn Eagle? A. From the first until the present time, I think it is about five years; there is a period of eight months—eight months or nine, in which I was away from the paper, and at the expiration of which I returned to it.

Q. Were you employed on The Brooklyn Eagle in November, 1872—October and November, 1872? A. I was.

Q. In what capacity? A. In the same capacity I have already stated.

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I have that pleasure, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. Personally, I think I have known Mr. Tilton since before he took—either just before he took hold of The Brooklyn Union, or some time not long thereafter.

Q. That was in 1870? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you remember the occasion of the publication of what is known as the Woodhull scandal? A. Very distinctly.

Q. Did you at any time, soon after that, have an interview with Mr. Tilton on the subject of that scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Do you also know John W. Harman, of this city? A. I have known him for some years; yes, Sir.

Q. And you knew him in 1872? A. I did; I think I had not long known him then.

Q. Had the subject of this scandal—had this publication of this scandal been a subject of conversation between yourself and Harman prior to your interview with Mrs. Tilton? I don't ask you what was said now. A. I understand; it had.

Q. Was it in consequence of your conversation with Harman that you had an interview with Mr. Tilton? A. So far as I was concerned, it was in consequence of that.

Q. Where did that interview between yourself and Mr. Tilton occur? A. In Mr. Tilton's residence—present residence.

Q. In Livingston-st.? A. Yes, Sir; at the head of Gallatin place on Livingston-st.

Q. When was it? A. Well, fixing it by an event, I cannot give the date of the month, Sir; but it was the day after the fire in the stores of Woodruff & Robinson, the stores situated near South Ferry.

Q. Well? A. I think it was in November, 18th or 19th —

Q. That your interview occurred? A. Yes, Sir; more likely the 19th.

Q. 1872? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. The Woodhull scandal had been published about how long? A. Well, I am not able to be certain about that. It had been published since the 28th day of October preceding.

Q. About three weeks, then? A. Well, the thing makes itself.

A FRIENDLY TALK WITH MR. TILTON.

Q. Well, did you call, at Mr. Tilton's house in pursuance of an appointment which he had made with you, through Mr. Harman? A. I called there, so far as my own mind was concerned, in pursuance of an appointment, or as a means of access to Mr. Tilton on this subject, which Mr. Harman had engaged to make for me.

Q. Now, what did you say to Mr. Tilton at the beginning of that interview? Who was present at the interview at the beginning of it? A. When I first went to Mr. Tilton's house the servant came to the door and took me into the front parlor, announced me, and then the folding-doors between the two rooms, if I remember correctly, were pushed aside, and Mr. Tilton coming forward took me into that room. There were two ladies present at the time, Mr. Tilton and myself.

Q. Well, what became of the ladies? A. I was introduced to one of them; the lady remained for a very short period and departed from the room. She had on her things as if she was going out—as if she called. The other lady, Mrs. Tilton, I think I had previously met, but I think I was introduced to her, and at the suggestion of Mr. Tilton, that we might desire to talk alone, I think Mrs. Tilton went up stairs.

Q. Then what occurred? A. I said to Mr. Tilton that I had called in pursuance of a conversation which I had had with Mr. Harman on the day previous, and that I had also, before calling, spoken to the editor of The Eagle, the Hon. Thomas W. Kinsella, upon the subject, and had come with his consent, and that I had come in the capacity of a journalist to speak with him upon that subject.

Q. Well? A. Mr. Tilton was very cordial, but at once informed me that in my capacity as a journalist I could hardly be at liberty to talk with him upon that subject, but as gentlemen and friends we could converse together on the matter.

Q. What matter was that? A. Well, the Woodhull publication matter; I think that was the first definition of it.

Q. Well, go right on. A. And then, if I remember correctly, Sir, I spoke to Mr. Tilton in a general way upon the subject, in such a way as induced him to ask me what my knowledge at that time on the subject was. I told him of a conversation that I had previously had with Mr. Beecher upon the matter; the fact of the conversation I told him, whether I told him the details of it or not I cannot swear; my impression is that I did; I am not certain that I did, and then we spoke, I should say, about Mr. Harman; I think I told him how Mr. Harman and I came to talk about it, and what facts Mr. Harman told me—the words I said with reference to what Mr. Harman said. We talked in a general way in reference to Mr. Harman speaking to me upon the subject.

Q. Repeat what you said to him—to Mr. Tilton? A. I think I told Mr. Tilton that I met Mr. Harman down at the fire at Woodruff & Robinson's; that we saw the fire partially—partly saw it—and that when we came upon the street together it was getting on towards dark, and we walked slowly. We came up Atlantic-ave. My house was then on Pacific-st., between Bond and Hoyt, and that our walk from the ferry to the corner of Bond-st. made a long distance, and made a long conversation possible. I told Mr. Tilton that I told Mr. Harman that I had seen Mr. Beecher, and what had been said upon that subject.

Q. What did you tell him had passed between you and Mr. Beecher on the subject? A. I think I told him this: that on the morning of the 28th of October, at twelve o'clock at noon, about twelve o'clock, in The Eagle office, there were received papers—the Woodhull papers—with the article now known as the Woodhull publication, marked in blue pencil, in editor's style, all round and round and round, so as to attract my attention. I got one of those papers and took them out of the box; and if it had not been for the blue mark I don't think my attention would have been attracted to the thing at all, for it was his paper, and it had no news in it, only discussions and theories.

Mr. Beach—This was what you told Mr. Tilton? A. I was telling Mr. Tilton what I said to Mr. Harman, and what I said to Mr. Harman, part of that was an occurrence between Mr. Beecher and myself on the 28th of October.

Mr. Tracy—Go on. A. I then told Mr. Harman that I went to see Mr. Beecher upon the subject; that we conversed upon the matter during that day, and that I had imbibed from Mr. Beecher certain impressions on the subject, and had received from him certain statements.

MR. BEECHER DENIES THE WOODHULL STORY.

Q. What statements did you say to him you had received from Mr. Beecher? A. I don't think I went into them with very great detail. I think the substance of what I said was that Mr. Beecher denied the story.

Q. The Woodhull story? A. Yes, Sir; and the other part of it was that he had nothing to say of it in public. He denied the story; he was quiet about it; he was silent about it, and thought the thing would die out by silence.

Q. Did you tell him that Mr. Beecher stated he would not enter into any public discussion with the author?

Mr. Beach—That is entirely inadmissible, a question of that kind.

Q. Did you say anything to him upon that subject? A. He said to Mr. Harman—Whether I said these words to Mr. Tilton I cannot remember.

Judge Neilson—This inquiry is expressly what you said to Mr. Tilton. It is only admissible in that point of view.

The Witness—Well, Sir, I know that I spoke more of results at this time to Mr. Harman than of the details. I also know that my conversation with Mr. Tilton upon what I said to Mr. Harman was much shorter than it had been with Mr. Harman upon what I had said to Mr. Beecher. It was a mere introductory.

Q. If you remember what you stated to Mr. Tilton about what Mr. Beecher said in regard to a public discussion with the authority of this story, you may state it; if not, you may pass on? A. I think you had better pass on, for I am not certain I went into it with such particularity.

PUBLIC OPINION ABOUT THE WOODHULL STORY.

Q. Go on with your conversation with Mr. Tilton?

A. Mr. Tilton, as I remember—I am giving the substance, and not the words—asked me what was the general impression with regard to the Woodhull story. I told him the general impression, so far as I received it, was that it was a plan between him and the Woodhull woman to destroy his wife, and pull down Mr. Beecher, and he said that was a very unjust conclusion to come to, and that such was not in any case the fact. I then said to him, that the public had very little to go on any way upon which to form a conclusion; that there were so few facts known in the case, and that all parties seemed indisposed to say anything upon the subject at all, and that I didn't think that inferences of anybody, founded upon such meagre information, would be very correct, but that nevertheless, such were the impressions; something like that.

Q. Well? A. Mr. Tilton further disclaimed any such thing being the case, and he said that there was a story that could be told in this matter which would put a new face upon it, and which would materially change that public impression of which I had spoken. I asked him what that story was, and he said that he did not think that he was at liberty to tell me what it was. He said that he would like to be able to, that he felt some freedom in conversing with me as a friend, but as a journalist he could not converse with me upon the subject; and then he asked me, with some abruptness, if I remembered the occasion of his leaving The Brooklyn Union, and I said that I remembered the fact that he left; I remembered the time when it was announced that he left, and he asked me what were the opinions upon that fact, what people thought of his leaving, why it was he left. I think he said, "What did the boys in The Eagle office think?" And I said that having nothing to go on, we didn't think intelligently in the matter at all—didn't think very much about it.

THE STORY TOLD IN ALLEGORY.

Q. Well? A. Well, he then said that he thought he would tell me some things in this matter, and that he would tell me in confidence, particularly not for publication; he wished that understood; he said that he would state the matter in the form of an allegory, and that that form would be essential to convey the purposes he had in view. He said that he chose that form for two reasons. It named no names. It allowed him to imagine scenes and personages, and that it would be a form which would make upon my mind that impression which he desired to be made upon it.

Q. Well, how did he proceed in the form of an allegory to repeat the story? A. He then proceeded, in the form of an allegory, to tell me a very interesting story, and it was—it preserved the story form all the way through.

Q. Will you repeat it? A. I don't think I can repeat it with anything like justice to the original, or with very much detail. I should think that my repetition would be more the form without the substance.

Q. The substance without the form, you mean? A. Yes, Sir; well, no, Sir; I think I would have the story formed, but I could not inform the form with that vividness with which the gentleman spoke.

Q. Well, repeat it as near as you can. A. I think it was something like this: That once upon a time there was a man, and that there was another man, and that the first man spoken of was young and rising and hopeful, and that he had largely had for an example, and a friend and a guide, the other second man spoken of, who was the older. He said that the young man was pleasantly situated in his domestic relations, and that he was engaged in such duties as took him away for a considerable part of his time from his home, and that once upon his return he was surprised by a statement from his wife that the other man of whom he had previously spoken had made to that wife improper proposals. He said that those were two in their number; that the first time it was between a word and a demonstration which the lady supposed she might have either understood or misunderstood, but that fearing she had misunderstood it she simply became a little more cautious in her demeanor and said nothing, and let it pass. That on the other occasion the meaning was unmistakable, and she repelled it with indignation and scorn, and withdrawing from the room went up stairs towards the top of the—went up stairs for the purpose of calling a servant; that while she was on the stairs the gentleman himself came out from the parlor, went to the hat-rack, and, taking his hat, opened the door. Meantime the servant had come up upon the Upper landing, and the gentleman below spoke to the lady, who was midway of the stairs at that time, and made a casual remark, as if to give the servant no cause for suspicion, and went away. That the lady pointed the man out to the servant as he was departing, and told the servant not to admit that man any more unless he came in company with her husband. That some time after, taking a walk with her children and returning in the afternoon, this lady found this gentleman sitting in the parlor; that he had come in in spite of what she had said to the servant; and that he then renewed those proposals, and was repelled with a great deal of energy and scorn. That after that the lady thought it became incumbent upon her to tell her husband, and that she did tell him. That her husband appointed with a friend an interview, to be held between himself and this person who had made improper proposals, at the house of that friend. That at that interview he charged him with this crime of improper proposals. That the friend—that the man to whom the accusation was made broke out with saying: "You are all crazy," or words to that effect, I remember; I remember more the adjective "crazy" than anything else, and went away. That this young man and his friend, in whose house he was, talked the matter over until late at night, and that when the young man returned to his home he found that in his absence this person whom he had accused had been there, and had coerced out of his wife, who was then sick, a retraction of the statement which she had made to her husband. That upon that this young man consulted with the friend, and that the friend went to the man who had secured this retraction and told him to return it; that he compelled him, by argument only; and that receiving this retraction he returned with it to the husband of this lady from whom it had been coerced. I think that at about this part of the story the allegorical form was dropped. I think it was dropped at my suggestion, because I discerned, from what I had read in the Woodhull story, the drift of the allegory, and that we fell to talking, without this allegorical form intervening between us, upon the story itself.

THE PISTOL SCENE DECLARED FICTION.

Q. Now, go right on? A. I remember, I think, at this point, and with reference to the getting of the retraction from the gentleman spoken of, asking Mr. Tilton what truth there was in the pistol scene as reported in this publication. He told me that there was no substantial truth in it; that the gentleman referred to carried a pistol, and generally carried it in the outside of a loose overcoat; that his reason for carrying it at that time was this: he had many calls in business along the shore; that strikes were prevalent, and disturbances sometimes either occurred, or were threatened, and that for his own protection he took it, more than for any other reason, and that when he was arguing for the return of the retraction his hand went to his pocket, and that he almost, as if with a gesture, pledged protection if the retraction was returned, and said that he would protect him with his pistol, or even to that extent of something like that.

Q. Protect what with his pistol? A. Would protect the gentlemen whom he induced to give up the retraction.

Q. Well, was there anything at this point said about the promise to preserve the retraction? A. No, Sir; I recall nothing of that sort. I wish to remark here that I have been in court almost every day during the trial; it has been my duty to listen to the evidence, and to transcribe it in some respects; I am trying very hard not to get what I have heard mixed up with what I remember, but it is not a very easy thing.

THE AFFAIRS BETWEEN MR. BOWEN AND MR. TILTON.

Q. Well, go on. A. I think that at this point in the narrative Mr. Tilton said to me that now would appear the reasons why he asked me with regard to The Brooklyn Union, and he said that he had certain data which all the public had—a part of which all the public had—and that some of them would throw some light on the case, and would show why he had asked me about The Union. He then asked me if I remembered his retirement from The Independent as editor and his engagement as an outside contributor—that is, a contributor on the first page. I told him I remembered it distinctly, and he showed me an Independent of December 22d, 1870, if I remember the date correctly. It contained a notice very flattering to Mr. Tilton. He then said that there were other things that bore upon this, and there were shown to me two letters, (I do not know whether they were originals, or whether they were copied because I am not familiar with the handwriting of the gentleman) of Mr. Bowen's. Both of them were complimentary to Mr. Tilton, and one was stronger than the other. I think the strongest one was the one written last. He then showed me a letter on a galley proof of The Golden Age.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] I hand you now what is known as the "tripartite agreement." A. I never saw that before.

Q. Look at that printed matter and say if that is the printed galley proof he showed you on that occasion.

Mr. Shearman—"Exhibit D, No. 45."

A. I remember, Mr. Tracy, at the time recognizing The Golden Age proof sheet, and I see that this is a proof sheet of the same paper.

Q. Yes. A. I have no doubt —

Q. You afterwards became acquainted with the substance of what is shown you there, did you not? A. I afterwards became acquainted with the whole thing, more or less.

Q. Go on. A. I said—

Q. Is this a duplicate of it? A. That is a Golden Age proof sheet. I didn't keep it long enough to look at the substance of it.

Q. [Handing paper to witness.] Look at the substance of it, and say if that is the same thing he showed you on that occasion. Read enough of it to satisfy yourself on that subject. See if that is not another proof of the same article that he then at that time exhibited to you. Is that not the imprint of the same article that he showed you? A. All that is in my memory at the present time about this is down to there—the signature.

I remember the preface to it, but I don't remember the appendix. That is, when I say the signature, I mean to say all between the preface and the signature of Theodore Tilton, I don't remember the appendix to it, commencing "in consequence of the above," &c.

Q. You mean that you recognize the letter which is included in this article, dated January 21st, 1871, and what precedes it? A. Yes, Sir; and much more distinctly the letter than what precedes it. I would not be absolutely certain I saw what precedes it. I have a strong impression that I did.

Q. Well, go on. What was said about it? A. I took and read the letter, if I remember correctly, without speaking on the subject, until I had got through. I think I said that this was a Golden Age proof-sheet. Mr. Tilton said "yes," and then we fell to talking about The Golden Age. He asked me how I liked it. I told him that I thought it did look too much like The New-York Churchman; he said it did look like it, but it was not like it. He talked about the headings of the paper, the headings of the departments, and the editorial caption, title, and so on, and said he selected them with a great deal of care and deliberation; he made them home, and he thought they were like, and he had studied the matter out in his own house to a considerable extent. I said to Mr. Tilton: "Mr. Tilton, why don't you let me have this Golden Age letter, this letter of Mr. Bowen, and the article in The Independent to publish? It would put a new face upon this scandal." He said that he knew that. I said that it would put a new face upon it; that it would show that, instead of his being the author of it, others were the authors of it; and he said that he knew that, but that he was obligated, honorably bound not to publish it—not to have it published of his own action or procuring—not to have his name appear in connection with it.

HOW MR. McKELWAY GOT MR. TILTON'S PAPERS.

Q. Did he state how he was bound? A. No, Sir. I told him that I thought the matter ought to be published, that it was due to what was true and right that it should be published. He said no—he said perhaps it was, but that he could not move in the matter, that he could not honorably do so, he was honorably bound not to do so, and then I said, "What are you going to do with these things?" Well, he said, I think, that Mr. Harman had seen them, but that he wanted to see them again; that there was a person for whom he had requested them, but that he would probably leave them with Mr. Harman. He intimated to me that among his very particular friends he had not been loth to show these things among them, but only among them had it been circulated or seen, and, said I: "If you leave that with Mr. Harman I think Mr. Harman would give it to me, if he thought it was right." I said that we were friends, that we had conversed about this matter, and he was very warm on the subject in his views, and I thought this thing should be published, and, says I, "When are you going to Mr. Harman's?" He said he didn't know. Said I, "Let us go up now."

Q. How was Mr. Harman—warm? Did you tell him? A. No, Sir; I didn't tell him, if I remember, in detail.

Q. Warm in his views about the publication? A. No, Sir; he was warm in his conviction that Mr. Tilton had been greatly wronged in this whole case.

Q. Well, go on. A. Said I: "Let us go up to Mr. Harman's now." Well, we did go up to Mr. Harman's house. Mr. Harman lived in Cumberland-st., between DeKalb-ave. and Myrtle-ave., opposite Fort Greene. We got up there in the dark, about half-past six o'clock. We called for Mr. Harman and he was not home. We went into Mr. Harman's back room. Mr. Tilton left these things for Mr. Harman. I wanted him to give them to me. He said no, he promised to give them to Mr. Harman, and he should give them to him, and he wrote a note to Mr. Harman there, and left it, and read me the note, and the note, as near as I can remember it, is: "Mr. Harman, here are the things which you requested"—the substance is just this: "I wish you to keep them in safe custody and return them to me;" and then when he had written this note we came away; and we left the statement with Miss Harman, who opened the door for us on our departure, that Mr. Tilton and Mr. McKelway had called upon her father. That ends my interview with Mr. Tilton upon that subject, except this, as I sit here and think, I remember that a part of a prolonged conversation we had that afternoon related to the Woodhull matter, to the Woodhull women, to the efforts taken to keep them on their good behavior, and to Mr. Tilton for dealing with them, his explanation of those dealings, of the motives which influenced him, of the success and final failure that marked them. We talked very much upon that Woodhull matter as Mr. Tilton has talked upon it from the stand, and as I have been here in court and have heard what he said, it would be very nearly a repetition if I were to go over it myself.

Q. As to his relations with the Woodhulls, you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I understand you to say that you told Mr. Tilton that Mr. Harman, you thought, would give you those papers for publication? A. Yes, Sir, I said I thought he would give them to me for publication, because he was so warm. He said the matter was in Mr. Harman's discretion, that he was in the hands of his friends on that subject, but that he himself could not move honorably, and would not, and if they were given for publication, on no account should that publication proceed from him, or be with his consent.

Q. Now, did those papers afterwards come into your hands? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. From whom? A. From Mr. Harman.

Q. How soon after this interview with Mr. Tilton? A. I went to Mr. Harman's house later in the evening. In consequence of a conversation I had with him he lent me the papers to hold for a certain period, and to return, either to him or to Mr. Tilton.

Q. So you got the papers into your possession the same evening that you and Mr. Tilton were at Mr. Harman's? A. Yes, Sir, I think I did.

Mr. Tracy—[To Judge Neilson.] It is now after 4 o'clock, if your Honor please.

Mr. Morris—[To Mr. Tracy.] Can you not finish the direct examination to-night?

Mr. Tracy—No, Sir.

Judge Neilson—[To the jurors.] Get ready to retire, gentlemen. Please be in your seats to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court thereupon adjourned until 11 o'clock on Wednesday.

FORTY-FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THREE WITNESSES FOR THE DEFENSE.

MORE TESTIMONY RELATIVE TO MR. TILTON'S UNHAPPY FAMILY RELATIONS—HIS ALLEGED INDELICATE CONDUCT WITH VARIOUS LADIES—THE HEROINE OF THE WINSTED EPISODE NAMED FOR THE FIRST TIME—THE NAME ALLOWED TO STAND ON THE RECORD.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1875.

The trial began promptly at 11 o'clock to-day, all the counsel and persons interested in the case being in their places rather earlier than usual. The juror Mr. Jeffreys was still looking ill, but on being called by Judge Neilson to a seat with the Judge on the bench said, in response to the questions of the Judge, that he thought he would be able to continue with the case without further interruption. St. Clair McKelway then took the stand and concluded his testimony, adding an important part to the allegory told by Mr. Tilton. The cross-examination of the witness occupied only a few minutes and developed nothing new. Gen. Tracy then called Oliver Johnson. Mr. Johnson gave his evidence on his affirmation. After some account of his journalistic relations with Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen, the witness testified that in an interview with the plaintiff in the suit he had told Mr. Tilton of a letter which Mr. Bowen had shown to him. In this letter Mr. Tilton was charged with making an improper assault upon a young lady whom Mr. Johnson knew. The witness stated that he had mentioned to Mr. Tilton other scandalous stories that were in circulation concerning him. Mr. Tilton replied that the stories were essentially false, but admitted that he knew who was the young lady who had made the charge of an assault, and that he had been very intimate with her at his own house. Mr. Johnson denied that he had ever had criminal relations with the young woman.

Mr. Johnson declared that Mr. Tilton told him that the Winsted story was susceptible of an explanation; that the young lady who went to Winsted went at the request of Mrs. Tilton in order to hear Mr. Tilton lecture. Here Mr. Johnson mentioned the name of the young lady referred to, and a stir was excited among the counsel. Both sides attempted to stop Mr. Johnson, but too late, and then fell to quarreling as to which side was responsible for dragging in the name. The plaintiff's counsel finally insisted that the name should stand. Mr. Johnson testified that he had expostulated with Mr. Tilton for writing his Life of Victoria Woodhull, and that Mr. Tilton had answered, "Oliver, that is one of the best pieces of literary work I ever did," and had eulogized Victoria Woodhull highly; that Mr. Tilton gave his high opinion of Victoria Woodhull and his pride in his work as the motives for writing the life. But at another interview in 1872 Mr. Johnson testified that Mr. Tilton had assigned a different motive for his preparation of that biography.

The defense afterward questioned Mr. Johnson as to Mr. Beecher's directions to the editors of The Christian Union in regard to the attitude of that journal toward The Golden Age. Mr. Evarts tried to get the evidence admitted as an action of Mr. Beecher, after it had been ruled out on other grounds, and the efforts of Mr. Morris to stop the discussion produced a spirited argument among the counsel. Mr. Beach insisted that the continuation of the argument was according to the pleasure of the Court. Mr. Evarts replied that the argument had ceased to be a pleasure, and the dispute was amicably settled by Mr. Beach's reply, that it was always a pleasure to listen to Mr. Evarts.

The cross-examination of Mr. Johnson by Mr. Fullerton was directed almost exclusively to the past life of the witness and to his views on religious topics. Mr. Evarts objected to the question whether the religious belief of Mr. Johnson conformed to that of The Christian Union. Judge Neilson inquired if there would be any objection to asking the witness if his religious views agreed with those of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly. Mr. Evarts replied that the Court must be speaking sarcastically when it alluded to the religious views of that sheet. The inquiry into Mr. Johnson's religious opinions was allowed to proceed. The witness admitted that he now believed in the doctrine of universal salvation, although The Christian Union did not support that doctrine. Mr. Johnson also stated that he had once edited a paper called The Christian Soldier, which was devoted to fighting Universalism. The examination developed the fact that the witness had been a member of various religious societies at different times, and that he had once been expelled from a church in Middlebury, Vt.; "but," interposed Mr. Johnson, hastily, "I left first. In response to the question, "Are you a Spiritualist?" the witness caused some amusement by replying energetically, "I must make the answer of a friend of mine. I am a Spiritualist, but I am not a d—d fool." Further questioning brought out the fact that the witness had visited "mediums," and believed that he had received communications from dear friends in the other world.

Mr. Johnson's testimony was concluded at 2:45 p. m., and the defense called Miss Isabella G. Oakley. She had been an inmate of the Tilton family while they were living at No. 48 Livingston-st., and she testified to Mr. Tilton's relations with his wife. Miss Oakley stated that these relations were generally pleasant; but after the family went to live at No. 136 Livingston-st. Mr. Tilton became more moody; was critical of his wife and often neglectful of her. The witness had observed, too, a change in Mr. Tilton's friends. Miss Oakley testified that Mr. Beecher had made friendly calls while she was visiting the Tilton family. On such occasions Mr. Beecher played with the children and appeared very friendly to the family. On her cross-examination, Miss Oakley admitted that she had written to Florence Tilton, when she had heard that Florence might be called as a witness for her father, and had advised her to be quiet and support her mother. Mr. Fullerton here tried to get the witness to admit that she did not know of her own knowledge anything about Mr. Tilton's change of his acquaintance, and this occasioned a discussion which had not ended at 4:10 p. m. Judge Neilson wished the examination to continue so that it could be concluded then, but the jury united in requesting an adjournment, and the further cross-examination was accordingly postponed to the next day.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. ST. CLAIR McKELWAY RECALLED.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were continued, as follows:

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tracy, will you proceed?

St. Clair McKelway was recalled, and the direct examination continued.

HOW MR. BOWEN WAS BROUGHT TO TERMS.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. McKelway, while you and Mr. Tilton were speaking of this Golden Age article, the press copy, and the letter which it contained, his letter to Bowen of January 1, 1871, recounting the slanders which he said Bowen had uttered against Mr. Beecher, was there anything said by Mr. Tilton in regard to that letter's having been efficacious in securing a settlement with Mr. Bowen? A. He said that when Mr. Bowen came to see the exhibit in that letter of what he had said about Mr. Beecher, that he was willing and disposed to agree to Mr. Tilton's claims upon him, the claims which were founded upon contracts, and that, after a period, those claims were paid and a truce or a peace was made between the persons and that part of that truce or peace was the—were letters complimentary to Mr. Bowen, and Mr. Tilton, I think, exchanged between them, and there was also something said about the statements which had been published in The Christian Union and The Independent, showing that peace had been made up between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Bowen. He said that one of the—the first letter of an exculpatory kind which Mr. Bowen gave to Mr. Tilton was not, in Mr. Tilton's opinion, strong enough, and that he insisted upon and procured from Mr. Bowen a second letter, and I think those are the two letters of which I spoke last night, and of which I said that one was stronger than the other, and that the latter was the stronger.

Q. Did he say in speaking of this letter that when it was shown to Mr. Bowen it was accompanied by a threat to publish in case—, or by a statement that it would be published—

Mr. Morris—That is objected to.

Mr. Beach—These questions are entirely inadmissible.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tracy, you ought to ask him what further was said, and exhaust his recollection.

Mr. Beach—It has been a constant series of leading questions to this witness, putting language in his mouth.

Mr. Tracy—This is the third or fourth question I have put to this witness in his examination. I have gone through the rule, and now I am calling his attention to specific subjects, asking him what was said of them, if anything.

Judge Neilson—You should not do that until you have exhausted his general recollection; then ask him.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor, I have, and finished his general recollection last night; went through and closed this subject.

Judge Neilson—I do not understand him to say now that he recalls nothing more. When he does, then you can ask whether anything was said on this subject or that.

Mr. Tracy—I will exhaust his recollection. [To the witness.] I will ask you if there is anything further of this narrative, that you can relate, that you have not related? A. There is.

ANOTHER CHAPTER FROM THE ALLEGORICAL STORY.

Q. Very well; proceed. A. Last night, in speaking of the part of the statement which Mr. Tilton made to me in an allegorical form, I forgot to mention a part in which he referred to Mr. Henry C. Bowen and to Mr. Bowen's employment of him; I ought to have stated it, at the time, but it passed my mind. It came in at about this part of the allegorical story, as I remember—after he had said that the lady, to whom improper proposals had been made, felt it incumbent on her to tell her husband, he added: "And this young man was, at the time, in the employment of another man, in whose service he had been for a long period; and he had received from that man, in whose service he was, from time to time, intimations against the person who was accused of making the improper proposals." He said that, at a certain period, the relations of service between the young man and his employer changed; and that, in a conversation between them, the employer suggested to this young man that he should pay more attention to the older friend, the person who was accused of making improper proposals, and that he had told him that he could not do so, that he was not so situated to do so, with proper sensibility to himself; and then his employer pressed him for the reasons; and he said that he gave him the reasons—the young man gave his employer the reasons in outline, whereupon the employer himself developed an extraordinary amount of animosity towards the same person and made many direct charges against him, and that these charges made a strong impression upon the young man, and that it was agreed between him and his employer that a letter should be written to this man demanding his retirement from service, and that the letter was written; that it was borne to the man by the employer of this young man, and that, suddenly, the employer instead of remaining adverse to the man to whom the letter was written, turned, as it were, upon his employé, and warned him not on any account to tell to any person any of the charges which had been made. He answered with spirit that he should hold himself at liberty to tell what he pleased, and to whom he pleased; at least, that he would not suffer or submit to dictation in that matter from his employer, or from anybody else, and that, thereupon, suddenly to him, his contracts of new services with that employer were abrogated by the employer, and that that was the reason why his retirement from The Brooklyn Union was significant, and why he had spoken to me upon the subject. I intended to have brought this in last night, Sir, but it went out of my mind because my mind ran from the moment when Mrs.—when the lady made her statement to her husband—to the next moment in order of logic, when that statement was brought home against the man upon whom it reflected.

Q. Now, is there anything further that you can relate in the order of the narrative? A. I don't know that I can, Sir; but I think that with questions my mind would be brought to matters, and I could tell, by those questions, whether I had exhausted or had left unfinished the statement between us.

Q. Well, was there anything said in the course of that conversation with regard to his being under an obligation not to publish his grievances against Mr. Beecher or Mr. Bowen? A. The object of my call was at first in a general way to get out all I could with reference to the scandal itself; that object changed upon the presentation of the proof-sheet letter to a desire to secure that; our conversation from that point related almost exclusively to that letter. Mr. Tilton's statement that he was inhibited honorably from publishing this matter, or from appearing as at all publishing it, related, as I remember, entirely to the proof-sheet letter. I do not think that the statement of his grievances against Mr. Beecher, from the moment that this Golden Age letter developed to my mind, became a very particular subject of conversation between us.

Q. State whether or not, in the course of that conversation, you said to him there were ways enough—

Mr. Pryor—That is objected to; he is going to ask him if he said so.

Q. State whether or not, during that conversation, there was anything said by you to him in regard to there being ways enough in which that letter could be published without directly implicating him in its publication? A. My mind at once recurred to the ways in which such things are done in journalism, and I said to him that I could either interview Mr. Harman, if Mr. Harman was willing, over his own name; or could interview him, if he was willing—Mr. Harman—as a friend of Mr. Tilton's; or could interview a hypothetical person. Mr. Tilton did not oppose or approve of any of those propositions. He simply insisted that he could not appear or be a party, directly or indirectly, to the publication of the proof-sheet letter and the other matters which I was seeking.

Q. Now, after you got the papers, what was done with them? A. After I got the papers I took them to The Eagle office; I read them off to a gentleman, who took down as I read what I read, in short-hand; that is all—

Q. Well, who was he? A. McLean, then and now on The Eagle.

Q. An employé of The Eagle? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In what capacity? A. He was then attached to the city department; he is now managing editor of the paper.

Q. Then, after you had taken short-hand copies of the papers, what was done with them? A. I know nothing beyond that.

Q. The papers themselves, I mean? A. Oh, the originals?

Q. The originals, yes? A. I took them and wrapped them up very carefully, and returned them, as I remember, to Mr. Harman, to whom I had promised to return them, and left them with the cashier of The Eagle office, subject to Mr. Harman's call.

Q. Do you know the fact, Mr. McKelway, whether this paper that you thus obtained from Mr. Harman was subsequently published in a Brooklyn paper? A. I know the fact that a letter from Mr. Tilton to Mr. Bowen, of the date of January first, 1871, being the letter to which I testified yesterday, was published in a Sunday paper in this city, I think, in the month of April, in the year 1878.

Q. Well, was it also accompanied by what is known now as the "Personal Statement," or "The Golden Age article," which included that letter? A. I don't remember that.

Q. Was it subsequently republished—was the publication made in the Sunday paper afterwards republished in The Eagle? A. From memory, I can testify that the letter, the epistle itself, was published in The Eagle from reprint taken in the Sunday paper—as reprint taken from that Sunday paper.

Q. Well, do you remember whether the balance of the article, what is known as “The Golden Age” article,” which preceded that letter was published with it? A. No, Sir; I don’t.

Q. Or what followed it? A. I do not.

Q. You mean to say you do not remember whether it was or not? A. Yes, Sir; that is what I mean to say.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. McKELWAY.

Mr. Fullerton—Mr. McKelway, I understood you to say yesterday that you called upon Mr. Beecher soon after the publication of the Woodhull scandal? A. I did.

Q. Do you recollect the day of the call? A. I recollect, Sir, that the Woodhull paper bore date of November 2 on the title page of the paper. I recollect that, according to the habit of weekly papers, that date was not correct, that the thing was dated ahead, and that it was really, as I have reason to believe, on the 28th of October.

Q. Was it on that day that you went to see Mr. Beecher, the 28th of October? A. It was.

Q. And where did you find him? A. I found him at his residence.

Q. Did you take the article with you? A. I did not.

Q. Did you state to him that the article had been published? A. I did. I can state what occurred between Mr. Beecher and myself, if you wish it.

Q. No. Where did you and Mr. Beecher go then, if anywhere? A. We went from his residence to the office of The Eagle.

Q. And how long did you and Mr. Beecher remain at the office of The Eagle? A. Well, I should think from fifteen minutes to twenty-five minutes.

Q. With whom did Mr. Beecher confer, whilst at that office, besides yourself? A. With Mr. Kinsella.

Q. The editor of the paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Privately or in your presence? A. Right in my presence.

Q. During the whole period? A. Yes, Sir; during that whole period.

Q. During that day did he have any private conference with Mr. Kinsella, that you know of? A. No, Sir; and I think I know we had not.

Q. How? A. I know that he had not, by other things that I could state.

Q. Where did Mr. Beecher go, if you know, when he left the office of The Brooklyn Eagle on that day? A. He went with me to New-York, to the office of Mr. Moulton.

Q. How long was he at the office of Mr. Moulton? A. Well, we arrived there, I think, about a quarter to three o’clock, and left at five minutes before or after four o’clock.

Q. With whom did Mr. Beecher converse during that stay at Mr. Moulton’s office? A. With Mr. Moulton.

Q. Privately or in your presence? A. Privately and in my presence; because the room was large, and they were talking remote from me, and I sat over in the part of the office nearer to the door than they were; and I neither heard nor desired to hear what they were saying. It was both privately and in my presence.

Q. But you could not overhear what was said? A. No, Sir.

Q. Mr. Beecher called Mr. Moulton to one side? A. Mr. Moulton, as I remember, was sitting at a desk in a corner of the office, and the desk was fenced around with a little iron fence, about waist high to a man. He rose at Mr. Beecher’s approach, and they talked together for some time, I, in a chair at the other part of the office, sitting.

Q. How far distant from them? A. I think as far as I am from Mr. Beecher at the present moment; perhaps not quite as much.

Q. Twenty or twenty-five feet? A. Well, I really don’t recollect the size of the room, Mr. Fullerton, but whatever the size of the room is, Mr. Beecher and Mr. Moulton were at one extreme and I was at the other. It is an ordinary office in Coenties Slip.

Q. Did you and Mr. Beecher leave Mr. Moulton’s office together? A. Mr. Beecher, Mr. Moulton and myself left the office together.

Q. And where did you go? A. I went over Fulton Ferry, and they went off with the expressed intention of going over Wall-st. Ferry.

Q. No matter. They went in another direction? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Separate from you? A. Yes, Sir. They went together, and I went over Fulton Ferry and went home.

Mr. Evans—He said he went over Fulton Ferry, and they went off with the expressed intention of going over Wall-st. Ferry.

The Witness—I said: “I am going over Fulton Ferry,” and they said they would go over Wall-st. Ferry; it was in their way, and Fulton Ferry was in mine.

Q. You were waiting to get something to publish in The Eagle that day? A. No, Sir; I was not waiting to get something to publish in The Eagle that day.

Q. Well, some other day? A. Well, I was waiting for whatever turned up. [Laughter.]

Q. And nothing turned up that you could publish, I believe?

A. Well, nothing turned up that was published, or ever was published by my procurement.

Q. How? A. Nothing was ever published by any act of mine.

Q. I understand that. Do you know of Mr. Beecher’s visiting Mr. Kinsella at any other time than what you have stated? A. I do not.

Q. Have you never seen him at the office except on this 28th of October, if that was the date? A. I never have.

Q. What paper was this letter of Mr. Bowen’s, of January 1st, 1871, published in first? A. It was published in a paper which has since gone the way of a majority of papers, and is dead, called The Sunday Press.

Q. Published in The Sunday Press? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. A paper known then as The Sunday Press? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Had you any connection with that paper? A. Not the slightest.

Q. And this publication in that paper was not through your connivance in any way? A. Not in the slightest degree. I was as much surprised at it as any gentleman could be.

Q. And you published it in the paper that you were connected with after this publication in the other paper, and in consequence of that? A. No, Sir, some one else did. The paper published it, and I did not. It was not in my department.

Q. At all events it was published in the paper with which you were connected? A. Yes, Sir, it was published in The Eagle to the extent I have testified to.

Q. And after the publication in The Sunday Press? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It had become public then? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Public property? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How long was that after the interview which you had with Mr. Tilton, and after you procured a copy, through Mr. Harman, of that letter? A. Well, since I have been here in Court, I have become aware, by the evidence, that the date of The Sunday Press publication was about the 20th of April, in 1873; and I stated yesterday that the date of my communication with Mr. Tilton was the day after Woodruff & Robinson's fire, which would make it November 19th, 1872, so it must have been from November to April, a little over half a year.

Q. Little over six months? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—A little less than six months.

Mr. Evarts—A little less than six months.

Mr. Fullerton—November, December, January, February, March, April—it is a little more. It is a matter of arithmetic.

The Witness—Yes, Sir; it is a matter of arithmetic. The almanac will show.

Mr. Tracy—Just five months.

Mr. Beach—Well, a very simple arithmetic will show it.

Mr. Evarts—Of course.

Q. You don't know how it came to be published in this Sunday Press, I understand you? A. I do not know how it became published in The Sunday Press.

Q. The publication of that Sunday Press was what day in April? A. I heard it said while I was sitting in the Court-room it was the 20th of April? It was a Sunday in April, if that came on the 20th.

Mr. Fullerton—It lacks eight days, that is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MR. MCKELWAY.

Mr. Tracy—Who was the editor of The Sunday Press at the time of this publication? A. Mr. James McDermott.

Q. Was he also an employé of The Eagle at the same time? A. I think not.

Q. Had he not been? A. I do not remember that he ever had been at that period.

Q. Is he now? A. Not in my judgment. I think that when Mr. McDermott—

Q. Has he never been connected with The Eagle?

Mr. Morris—We object. What has that to do with it?

The Witness—I think—

Mr. Morris—One moment. We object.

The Witness—I beg your pardon, Mr. Morris.

Mr. Tracy—We desire to follow it up by showing he had been connected with The Eagle.

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to as immaterial.

Judge Neilson—I don't see how it is material.

Mr. Tracy—It is for the purpose of showing how this publication came to be made; it is a fact.

Mr. Morris—The witness says at that time he had not been connected with The Eagle.

Mr. Tracy—We may refresh his memory if we are permitted to ask a question or two.

Mr. Beach—Of what consequence is it?

Judge Neilson—Not the slightest.

Mr. Evarts—Will my learned friends admit he was connected with The Eagle? Then we will determine whether it is material or not. If my learned friends admit he was connected with The Eagle, very well.

Mr. Fullerton—We don't admit it, when the evidence is to the contrary.

Mr. Evarts—Then we will go on and prove it, if it is a subject of proof.

Mr. Beach—Of course you will, but we object.

Mr. Evarts—The fact that the witness says that he was not connected with The Eagle at a certain time does not prevent us from offering to prove the fact, and through this same witness, that he was—

Judge Neilson—Of what avail will it be? You won't be able to prove what McDermott did. It is with a third person.

Mr. Tracy—Suppose we could show McDermott got his copy from this copy that was taken in short-hand by McKelway?

Mr. Morris—Well, what of that.

Judge Neilson—I don't see how that is material; I don't see how you could show that.

Mr. Evarts—We might show it by Mr. McDermott.

Judge Neilson—If you could show that, you could show anything else Mr. McDermott ever did in his life. I don't think it is material.

The Witness—It would be a very large volume, that would.

Mr. Evarts—Well, we will take our exception. [To Mr. Tracy.] Has he ever been connected with The Eagle at any time between November 18th, 1872, and the present time?

Mr. Tracy—Between November, 1872, and the present time, has Mr. McDermott been connected with The Eagle?

Judge Neilson—The present time?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir; that is our question.

Mr. Fullerton—Objected to.

Mr. Beach—That falls within your Honor's ruling, bringing it up to the present time. We object to it as immaterial.

Judge Neilson—You may ask him whether he was connected with The Eagle between the time Mr. McKelway got this paper and the time it was published in The Sunday Press.

Mr. Tracy—That is the question I did ask originally.

Mr. Beach—That he answered.

Judge Neilson—[To the witness.] Had he during that lapse of time been connected with The Eagle? A. To my judgment he had not. As a seller of news he might at one time or another have brought articles to The Eagle, and those articles may have been purchased and published. He was not on the city staff.

Mr. Morris—We don't want any speculation.

Mr. Tracy—Was he a newspaper reporter? A. I knew him at that period as editor of The Sunday Press.

Q. Was he a newspaper reporter? A. I didn't know him in that capacity at all. He had been previously editor of a newspaper in New-York, and his was an editorial character, and in his editorial character I was acquainted with him or knew of him.

Q. Was he a regular reporter of The Eagle or a communicator of news to The Eagle, at that time? A. No, Sir; not to my knowledge.

Q. Was he at that time, to your knowledge, acquainted with Mr. McLean, who took the short-hand notes?

Mr. Morris—We object to the question.

Judge Neilson—I think you have gone far enough.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

Judge Neilson—No doubt all these newspaper gentlemen know each other.

TESTIMONY OF MR. OLIVER JOHNSON.

Oliver Johnson was then called, and affirmed on behalf of the defendant.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Johnson, where do you reside? A. In New-York—in the City of New-York.

Q. What is your business? A. I am a journalist by profession.

Q. How long have you been so engaged? A. About forty years.

Q. Do you know Theodore Tilton? A. I do, Sir, or I formerly did.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I think it will be twenty-one years in April next since I first knew him.

Q. You know Henry C. Bowen? A. I do, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him by sight and by chance acquaintance nearly the same length of time.

Q. As you have Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And do you know Henry Ward Beecher? A. I do, Sir.

Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him since his first—since he first settled in Brooklyn, whenever that was; I don't remember exactly the date.

Q. Where have you been employed, Mr. Johnson, as journalist, since your acquaintance with Mr. Tilton? A. I was employed, when I first made his acquaintance, upon The National Anti-Slavery Standard.

Q. How long did you continue to be there employed? A. I was there about eleven years; perhaps longer; I am not sure as to the time.

Q. Where were you next employed? A. On The Independent from—

Q. When did you go on The Independent? A. In June, 1865.

Q. How long did you remain on The Independent? A. I remained there until the end of December, 1870—about five years and a half.

Q. And where did you go then? A. I went to THE TRIBUNE; became the editor of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE.

Q. And how long were you thus employed? A. Two years, within a few days.

Q. And where did you go then? A. On The Christian Union.

Q. And are you still on The Christian Union? A. I am, Sir.

Q. In what capacity? A. I am usually called managing editor; I don't know whether that is the precise designation or not.

Q. During the time you were on The Independent, was Mr. Tilton also employed on that paper? A. Mr. Tilton was editor-in-chief, and I was managing editor during that time.

Q. During all that time? A. Yes, Sir; perhaps I should not say precisely all that time, because he left a week or ten days before I did.

Q. With that exception, you held those respective relations to each other? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And who was publisher of that paper during all that time? A. Henry C. Bowen.

Q. Do you know who caused you to be employed on The Independent? A. Yes, Sir; it was Mr. Tilton.

Q. Tilton? A. I went on to The Independent by his very earnest solicitation, and with some hesitancy and regret.

Q. You had known him then some five or six years? A. Oh, I had known him longer, Sir.

Q. Ah, longer than that? A. I had known him from 1855 or 1854, I am not this moment certain which, until 1865, when I went in—about ten years.

Q. Were you on terms of intimate friendship with him at the time you went on The Independent? A. I was, Sir.

Q. And had been for what number of years previous? A. Well, from the time of my first acquaintance with him.

Q. You became intimate friends on becoming acquainted—soon after, did you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And how long did that intimacy continue between you and Mr. Tilton? A. It continued until—the intimacy continued, I should say, until perhaps some time in 1873; from that time afterwards I saw less of him.

Q. Did there at any time come to be a break in your acquaintance; and, if so, when did that occur? A. I don't remember the last time that I saw Mr. Tilton, but I think it was about—it was about a year ago. I mean the last time that I met him to hold any conversation with him, I think, was at the house of Deacon Jeremiah Curtis in New-York, and I believe it was about the time, perhaps at about the close of the Council; I may possibly, however, have met him by chance somewhere else; afterwards, I am not quite sure about that.

HOW MR. JOHNSON BECAME AN EDITOR OF MR. BEECHER'S PAPER.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, will you give us the history of your employment on The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—We object to that, Sir, as immaterial.

Mr. Evans—It is a part of your testimony that Mr. Tilton got him a place on The Christian Union.

Mr. Beach—Well, that is not important, Sir, at any rate.

Mr. Tracy—You gave it great importance.

Mr. Evarts—You thought it was important.

Judge Neilson—I think we will have to take it, inasmuch as the subject has been opened by the plaintiff in a very general form.

Mr. Evarts—We will be very short.

Judge Neilson—Don't be very minute.

The Witness—I am not quite sure whether it was in the Autumn of 1871 or the Spring of 1872, but at one or the other of those times, walking down Broadway, near the Park, one morning, I met my friend, Mr. Samuel Wilkeson, whom I knew as a stockholder in The Christian Union. We stopped to greet each other for a moment, and he said—

Mr. Beach—This is objected to.

The Witness—"I am very glad"—

Mr. Beach—Wait a moment.

The Witness—Oh!

Judge Neilson—You cannot give a conversation with a third person.

Mr. Evarts—That, if your Honor please, is the very point, that it is Mr. Wilkeson that got him on The Christian Union.

Judge Neilson—You need not inquire into this conversation.

Mr. Evarts—We don't want to go into detail.

Judge Neilson—Then ask him the general fact.

The Witness—Mr. Wilkeson asked me at that time if I was open—

Mr. Beach—[To the witness.] No, you are asked to stop, Sir.

The Witness—Excuse me; I beg pardon.

Judge Neilson—The rule is not to take a conversation of a third person. You may ask the general fact of how he came to be—

Mr. Evarts—And then the statement that Wilkeson, being a stockholder in The Christian Union, proposed the matter.

Mr. Tracy—I propose to show that Mr. Wilkeson proposed the matter to Mr. Johnson, and that that led to a negotiation between Mr. Johnson and Mr. Beecher by which Mr. Johnson was employed on The Christian Union.

Judge Neilson—Now, the fact that you spoke to Mr. Wilkeson, and then saw Mr. Beecher, and afterwards the arrangement was made, is that the way?

The Witness—That is the fact.

Mr. Tracy—We will make it as brief as we can.

Judge Neilson—You can make it very brief that way.

Mr. Tracy—Was your employment on The Christian Union the subject of conversation between yourself and Mr. Wilkeson? A. It was.

Q. At that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. In consequence of what he said to you, did you subsequently see, and have an interview with, Mr. Beecher? A. No, Sir.

Q. Well, how came you to have an interview with Mr. Beecher? A. I heard no more of the subject from Mr. Wilkeson, or from any proprietor or any one connected with The Christian Union, until in—I think it must have been the last of November, 1872, when I received from Mr. Beecher himself a request for an interview with me, stating that his object was

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—Don't state what he said; he requested an interview?

The Witness—Yes; he stated the purpose for which he wanted an interview.

Judge Neilson—Thereupon you did have an interview with him? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Did you have an interview with Mr. Beecher? A. I did.

Q. What was the result of that interview?

Judge Neilson—Not the conversation, but the result. A. The result of the interview was my engagement; that is, the result of that and subsequent interviews; there were several between us.

Q. Well, what was the result of it? A. The result of it was my engagement on The Christian Union.

Q. As what? A. As editor—as managing editor.

Q. And you have continued on it from that time until the present? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that the whole source of your employment on The Christian Union, so far as you know of? A. So far as I know, it is.

THE INTIMACY OF MR. TILTON AND MR. JOHNSON.

Q. Now, during your acquaintance with Mr. Tilton, Mr. Johnson, do you know whether or not he regarded you as among his most intimate friends? A. He has said to me a great many times that he regarded me as his most intimate and best friend.

Q. Your intimacy was great, was it? A. Yes, Sir; we were very close friends indeed.

MR. BOWEN'S WARNING TO MR. TILTON.

Q. In December, 1870, Mr. Johnson, did Mr. Tilton come to you at any time with a letter which he had received from Bowen in regard to his editorship of The Independent—in December, 1870? A. I don't quite understand the question.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton come to you at any time and state that he had received a letter from Mr. Bowen concerning his editorship of The Independent, or the continuance of his editorship?

Mr. Pryor—We object to that.

Mr. Beach—It is very obviously a leading question.

Mr. Evarts—It is only introductory.

Mr. Beach—Oh! introductory.

The Witness—Yes, Sir, he did.

Q. What was said at that interview between yourself and Mr. Tilton? A. He showed me a letter from Mr. Bowen, giving him notice that at the end of six months their contract—Mr. Bowen's contract with him as editor-in-chief of The Independent, would terminate.

Q. When was that? A. I think it must have been about the 1st of December; it may possibly have been one of the latter days of November, but I am not sure as to the date; at any rate, it was towards the end of the year.

MR. TILTON MAKES USE OF THE POSITION.

Q. Now, thereupon, did you and Mr. Tilton enter into a conversation; and if so, repeat it? A. Mr. Tilton said to me at that time that he would have out of Mr. Bowen a better contract than the one which he then held. He said, furthermore, that he knew that Mr. Bowen wished to make his new departure for his paper with a new editor, on the first of January, at the beginning of the new volume; that it would be a very disagreeable position for him to be editing the paper with that six months' notice over him, and therefore he proposed to resign at once. If Mr. Bowen would do the right thing by him, and he had no doubt that he would; he said he would probably be able to make a better contract with him than the one which he then held. That is about the substance of it as near as I can recollect.

Q. Afterwards did you learn from Mr. Tilton whether he had made contracts with Mr. Bowen? A. I did.

Q. What were they, as you learned from Mr. Tilton? A. He informed me that Mr. Bowen had engaged him as a special contributor to The Independent, for $100 a week or $100 an article, I am not sure which, which he regarded as better than his—on the whole for him, as he was situated—better for him than to be the editor of it.

Q. At the same time did he say anything about a contract that he had made with him in regard to The Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What? A. He said that he had made a contract with The Union, but I do not remember its terms any further than he regarded it as a very eligible contract.

THE SCANDALS ABOUT MR. TILTON.

Q. Now, soon after that conversation with Mr. Tilton, in which he stated to you the making of these contracts, did you have a conversation with Mr. Bowen in regard to Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How many days after the conversation that you had had with Mr. Tilton, do you think? A. Well, it may have been a week; I am not quite sure of the number of days, but it may have been a little more than a week, or a little less.

Q. In consequence of that conversation that you had with Mr. Bowen, did you see Mr. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. When did you see him? A. I saw him, I think, at his house on Sunday, the 25th of December.

Q. What did you say to him? A. I told him that Mr. Bowen wanted to have an interview with him, in my presence, in regard to certain stories that had come to him in regard to Mr. Tilton's character—injurious reports.

Q. Well, what further was said? A. I informed him that Mr. Bowen had fixed upon the next day, Monday—Monday forenoon, I think, as a time for such a meeting between himself and me. Mr. Tilton inquired of me pretty closely what Mr. Bowen's stories were. I told him that Mr. Bowen had communicated the stories to me in confidence—that I was not at liberty, therefore, to talk with him freely about it.

Q. Well? A. I did feel at liberty, however, to give him some hints, without mentioning names; I gave him some hints of the character of the stories, and of their source.

Q. What did you say? A. What did I say?

Q. Yes. A. I told him that Mr. Bowen had shown me a letter which he had received from a lady, whose name I did not mention, and whom I identified only by saying generally that she was a lady whom I knew well, charging him with an assault upon her chastity.

Q. Well? A. I told him also, I think, that Mr. Bowen had shown me a letter from Winsted, Conn., and that charged him with some improprieties at the hotel there, where he had been lecturing at some time before; I told him also that Mr. Bowen said these were not by any means all that he had heard; that his stories were awful; that they were coming in to him; that a great many had come to him; indeed, Mr. Bowen had himself told me that; but Mr. Tilton said that all these stories were essentially false, that they could be readily explained. He said he knew who the lady was to whom Mr. Bowen had referred, who was the writer of that letter; he knew who she was, and mentioned her name to me.

Q. Was it the same person to which Mr. Bowen had referred? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Go on; what did Mr. Tilton say in regard to the story concerning this lady? A. Mr. Tilton admitted to me that he had had very familiar relations with that woman, but denied that he had had any criminal conversation with her.

Q. You mean sexual intercourse? A. Sexual intercourse; yes, Sir.

Q. How far did he state that his familiarities had gone? A. He said that he had been in bed with her in his own house.

Q. Well, in regard to the Winsted matter, what did he say, if anything, about how he and the person—the lady to whom he referred in the Winsted matter—went to Winsted when they left and where they stayed, if they stayed anywhere, overnight on their way to Winsted? A. I am a little embarrassed as to just how to answer your question, because—

MR. TILTON'S COMPANION AT WINSTED.

Mr. Tracy—Wait a moment until the clock stops striking. What did Mr. Tilton say to you, if anything, in regard to the person who accompanied him to Winsted, when they left home and where they stayed overnight? A. Oh, he told me—he told me, as he had told me before—he told me on that occasion as he had told me before—that the Winsted story was susceptible of an explanation; that Miss Lovejoy had accompanied him.

Mr. Tracy—You need not mention her name.

The Witness—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Pryor—Let it stand.

Mr. Morris—Oh, they have brought it out before.

Mr. Beach—Oh, it has been out before.

Mr. Morris—They have brought it out before.

Mr. Evans—We did not.

Mr. Beach—Oh, yes; you have.

Mr. Morris—I say you have.

Mr. Tracy—It is very well to say so; there are a great many things that are not true.

Mr. Morris—You can deny a great many things that are true.

Mr. Tracy—I say it is not true that we have introduced this lady's name before.

Mr. Morris—I say her name has been brought out on your examination.

Mr. Tracy—It is a mistake.

Judge Neilson—You have it now; go on, Mr. Tracy.

The Witness—He said she had accompanied him to Winsted, when he went there to lecture, by the particular desire of his wife; that his wife had at first intended to go with him, but that she was unable to do so; and the lady had greatly desired to hear him lecture; had never heard him lecture; and so it was agreed that she should go with him; and so to avoid the liability of being detained by fog or any other obstruction on the river between here and New-York, they went over the night beforehand and took lodgings at the St. Denis Hotel.

Q. Did he state further how they went on to Winsted? If so, repeat it. A. No; I know nothing about that.

THE BREAKING OF THE CONTRACTS.

Q. Now, after the 26th of December, 1870, did you have a further conversation with Mr. Tilton, in which he informed you touching his discharge from the employment of Mr. Bowen? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When was it? A. I can't fix the date absolutely, but it was some time within—it must have been within two or three days after. Let me see; the 26th of December was on Monday. It may possibly have been a week—I can't be certain of the precise day when he informed me that Mr. Bowen had very peremptorily and indignantly ended his contracts.

Q. Well, do you know whether or not it was before the first of January that he so informed you? Remember, the 1st of January was on Sunday, that year? A. Yes, Sir; I am not quite sure about that.

Q. Well? A. I am not quite certain.

THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, did you ever have any talk with Mr. Tilton on the subject of his acquaintance with the Woodhull women or woman? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And touching the writing of her biography by him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Can you tell us when and where that conversation was? A. I think it was in the office of The Golden Age.

Q. About when was it? A. Well, it was very shortly after the appearance of the memoir, whenever that was; I am not sure of the date.

Q. Well? A. I saw him very soon after that—as soon as I could.

Mr. Tracy—It is proved here to have been in September, 1871? A. Yes, Sir; well, I saw him very shortly after that.

Q. Well, did you have a talk with him about it? A. I did.

Q. State the conversation that occurred between you? A.

Well, I talked very sharply to him, with something of a tone of rebuke for being acquainted with such a woman, and above all writing such a biography of her as he had written. He said to me: "Oliver, that is one of the best pieces of literary work that I ever did, and I am proud of it, and I shall not permit you in my presence to say anything against that woman; I regard her as one of the best and purest women that I ever knew—a great woman; a woman bound to be the leader in a great reform."

Q. Did he at that time say anything to you that he had written this life of Woodhull in order to keep her quiet?

Mr. Fullerton—Now, one moment.

Mr. Tracy—Touching any scandal?

Mr. Fullerton—One moment; this is all out of order, Sir. They insist upon putting absolutely leading questions.

Mr. Tracy—Well, I will change the form of the question, if that is the objection to it.

Q. Did he say anything to you touching his motives for writing that work?

Judge Neilson—That is the same thing. I should think you should ask this witness to give the whole conversation as he remembers it, what was said, and what further was said. When you exhaust him, then ask him whether anything was said on such a subject, without pointing to a motive.

Mr. Everts—The difficulty, if your Honor please, with that method of inquiry, may be a conversation, may include matters that have no connection with the topics in consideration; but if it is understood that only what relates to the matter in hand is to be repeated, on this particular occasion, I have no doubt the whole conversation would probably come in.

Judge Neilson—That should be understood. [To the witness]: You hear that suggestion, Mr. Johnson.

Q. Was anything further said between you and him touching this work, the writing of this book—at that conversation? A. He assigned no motive to me whatever, except the motive of his very high opinion of her, his pride in her, and his pride in his work. He suggested to me neither then, nor at any other time, any other motive. I beg pardon, I made a wrong expression; I said, "nor at any other time."

Mr. Beach—I noticed it, Sir.

The Witness—I was wrong in saying that.

Mr. Beach—You were.

The Witness—At other times he did.

Judge Neilson—You were only interrogated as to that occasion.

The Witness—Nothing was said on that occasion except what I have stated.

MR. TILTON ANXIOUS TO HOLD TRIBUNE SHARES.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, did you ever have any talk with Mr. Tilton about THE TRIBUNE stock that stood in his name? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What conversation did you have with him on that subject? A. I have had a great many conversations with him about that.

Q. Well, at the time of the purchase of the stock I allude to, or just previous? A. Well, it was through my agency, in a certain sense, that Mr. Tilton got his stock on THE TRIBUNE, or rather got his father's stock on THE TRIBUNE. Mr. Tilton expressed to me more than once, as I was a stockholder in THE TRIBUNE—expressed to me a strong desire to be a stockholder, but said he had no money to invest, and could not, therefore, purchase a share for himself; repeatedly that had passed between us, when one day—I don't remember just when it was, I cannot fix dates in regard to this transaction, I suppose the stock books of THE TRIBUNE office would show when he made the purchase and all that; I don't know anything about that.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! don't bring in the stock book.

The Witness—I merely say that Mr. Tilton came to me and informed me that his father had a certain sum of money, enough to purchase a share of THE TRIBUNE at the then market price, and he wanted me, if possible, to so—to engineer his way, so that he might go into THE TRIBUNE Board and represent that share, while it should really belong to his father. I accordingly saw Mr. Greeley about it, though I confess I did not tell Mr. Greeley all the circumstances.

Judge Neilson—They don't ask you about that.

The Witness—No. Well, I only want to—this is my second appearance in court as a witness, and if I don't understand the ways, you must pardon me.

Mr. Tracy—Go on and state what transpired between your self and Tilton in regard to the purchase of that stock? A. His father purchased the stock through Mr. Tilton—through his son, the stock standing in Mr. Tilton's name, the father furnishing the money.

Q. Do you know who had the dividends on that stock? A. I know Mr. Tilton told me that the dividends were all to his father, that he should never—and afterwards he told me that he had never taken any portion of them. I once wished myself to purchase—

Mr. Morris—Never mind what you wished.

Mr. Fullerton—Is there a question before you, Mr. Johnson?

The Witness—I beg your pardon.

Mr. Fullerton—I will forgive you if you won't repeat it.

The Witness—You don't need to rebuke me. You only need to tell me what is proper, and I will obey it.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, answer questions.

ANOTHER PURPOSE ASSIGNED FOR THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Mr. Tracy—Now, you stated that at this conversation which you referred to, in which he spoke of writing the life of Mrs. Woodhull, he assigned no other motive than that you have stated. Did he afterwards assign to you a different motive? A. He did.

Q. How long after? I don't ask you what it was; I only want to fix the date. How long after was it—that conversation that he assigned another motive? A. You have fixed the date of the Woodhull memoir in September, 1871, I take it?

Q. 1871? A. After or about the time of the Presidential election of 1872.

Q. Well, can you fix it? A. I cannot fix the day, Sir.

Q. During the Presidential campaign? A. But it was after the time when their acquaintance, as I understood it, ceased.

Q. As you understood from Tilton? A. Yes.

Q. How long after that? A. Well, it was shortly after the publication of the Woodhull paper.

Q. Of the Woodhull scandal? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was not then until after the publication of the Woodhull scandal? A. I think not.

MR. BEECHER'S PAPER AND THE GOLDEN AGE.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, state whether or not, at any time after you went on to The Christian Union, you received any instructions from Mr. Beecher touching the manner in which you should treat The Golden Age in The Christian Union?

WARM DISCUSSION OVER THE TESTIMONY.

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir.

Judge Neilson—How is that material? You can't take charge of all these publications.

Mr. Tracy—It is made material by the evidence of the plaintiff in the case, your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Tilton testified in this way. I read from page 417 of this pamphlet book:

"I told him I thought he was allowing"—[that is, "I told Mr. Beecher I thought he was allowing"]—"one danger to grow up that he might suppress, and I mentioned to him that his newspaper, The Christian Union, had shown certain signs of unfriendliness to me. I said, 'I don't care for the criticism of your paper, but I don't think it will conduce to the public regard of our harmony to have your paper criticize me.' 'Well,' said he, 'Theodore, the people in my office are rather inimical to you, and I wish I might get some one here to whom I might intrust our secret, so that that paper might assume a more friendly face to the public.' "

Then he goes on and says that he introduced Mr. Johnson.

Judge Neilson—Well, go on, Mr. Tracy.

Mr. Beach—That does not authorize the instructions given by Mr. Beecher to the attachés of that press. The question would be whether the articles in The Christian Union were indeed hostile to Mr. Tilton. Proving a conversation between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher, in which Mr. Tilton imputed hostility in those articles, and the want of proper exertion on the part of Mr. Beecher to change their character, by no means authorizes private instructions given by Mr. Beecher to the managers of that press. We have given nothing in evidence which authorizes those instructions to be given. We say we made a certain declaration to Mr. Beecher, that Mr. Beecher admitted the imputation which we made against him of a want of proper exertion to control the character of the articles in The Christian Union with regard to The Golden Age. Now, how does that bring in, Sir, in any way, the exertions which Mr. Beecher may have made with the officers or attachés of that publication, to change its character, or to give it a different character? The simple question is whether this conversation occurred between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher. Suppose Mr. Beecher admitted upon that occasion a false fact, or a false imputation, it does not authorize him, because we give in evidence that conversation, to prove that the admission he made was inaccurate upon that occasion—to prove his own acts, at which we were not present, or his own instructions given to others, of which we knew nothing.

ng. Our conversation with Mr. Beecher was founded upon the character of the articles which appeared in his paper, The Christian Union. We alleged them to be hostile and unfriendly, and we asserted to Mr. Beecher that he did not make proper exertions to control the character of those publications. Now, I submit to your Honor, in what way does that authorize Mr. Beecher to prove conversations between himself and others, or directions given by him to others, at which we were not present. I object to it, Sir, as incompetent.

Mr. Evans—My learned friend, with great respect, seems to me to miss the point. It is not in regard to anything that occurred between Mr. Tilton and Mr. Beecher in the way of contradicting Mr. Tilton's statements that we offer this evidence. We offer it in the same line of operations in which they offered that evidence. They undertake to say that Mr. Tilton attracted Mr. Beecher's attention to the danger that might arise from hostility created by the tone and manner in which The Golden Age was treated by his newspaper, and that Mr. Beecher said: "Why, the people there are rather hostile to you, and I wish that I could get somebody that I could intrust the secret to, and that could manage the matter prudently and safely." That is the object of that testimony. He said he suggested Oliver Johnson, and got him there, as a part of this machinery which Mr. Beecher was working, under his admonition—Tilton's admonition; and we meet that point by showing that Oliver Johnson got there otherwise. Now, we propose to show by this witness what his instructions were from Mr. Beecher as matter of fact concerning his treatment of The Golden Age, discrediting, contradicting any such action, at least, as is made the basis, and the only basis, and the useful basis for them to introduce this as a part of the machinery of confession and suppression to which Mr. Beecher resorted, and in which he concurred with Mr. Tilton's suggestion. Our object is to show by this witness that no instructions of any such kind, or intimation, ever proceeded from Mr. Beecher at all, but that the instructions were of the character that he will state.

Judge Neilson—Now, Mr. Stenographer, read that question, please.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the last question, as follows:

Now, Mr. Johnson, state whether or not at any time after you went on to The Christian Union you received instructions from Mr. Beecher touching the manner in which you should treat The Golden Age in The Christian Union?

Judge Neilson—Ruled out, Sir. Go on, Mr. Tracy.

Q. At the time of your employment on The Christian Union, and as a part of that transaction, were any instructions given to you by Mr. Beecher as to the manner in which you should treat The Golden Age in that paper?

Mr. Beach—That comes within the ruling.

Judge Neilson—The same ruling.

Mr. Tracy—Or Mr. Tilton—

Judge Neilson—The same ruling.

Mr. Evans—To both of these rulings, your Honor, we except, of course, and I now state our views. We offer to prove by this witness that there were no instructions ever given by Mr. Beecher, either in the employment of Mr. Johnson, in the negotiations that preceded it, or in the conduct of that newspaper after Mr. Johnson's employment, that limited him or controlled him or the newspaper, in regard to the public treatment by that newspaper of Mr. Tilton or of The Golden Age, in any way, in respect to any private relations between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, but that affirmative instructions were given to deal with The Golden Age, in the conduct of this Christian Union newspaper, as with any other paper that was published.

Mr. Beach—Objected to, Sir.

Mr. Evans—Your Honor sees the point of view in which we present it. Our learned friends have introduced a line of insinuating evidence carrying imports or—

Mr. Morris—One moment. I object to the counsel arguing a question now which your Honor has decided. He has made his offer, and your Honor has ruled upon it.

Mr. Evans—I don't understand so.

Mr. Morris—And now this is an irregular way of arguing an appeal from your Honor's decision. They asked a question; your Honor ruled upon it; he has made his proposition and his Honor has ruled upon that.

Judge Neilson—The counsel don't understand that I have ruled upon this last offer.

Mr. Evans—No.

Mr. Morris—You have ruled upon it.

Mr. Evans—I have not heard a word from his Honor, but only from Mr. Morris.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Morris's view is, of course, that the question involved the same thing.

Mr. Evans—That may be.

Mr. Morris—I say, after making the proposition, he has no right, your Honor, having ruled upon the matter—he has no right to proceed and argue it again. He put the question; your Honor has ruled upon it; he makes his proposition; your Honor has ruled upon that. Now, I say it is out of order to proceed and argue the question further.

Mr. Beach—Permit me to say, Sir, that for the purpose of presenting this question, the counsel addressed to the witness two questions involving this very proposition. Your Honor ruled upon them excluding the evidence. The gentleman now submits the same matter in the form of a proposition, and seeks that as an occasion upon which to make a new argument upon the same question to your Honor. I do not perceive, Sir, that we have any special right to make an objection. If your Honor is pleased to hear the counsel, why of course, although it is irregular thus to debate a question over and over again, we must submit to the exercise of your Honor's discretion and to the disposition of the counsel.

Mr. Evans—If your Honor please, it is a matter of pleasure that has been long ago outlived on the part of all concerned in this trial.

Mr. Beach—Never, Sir, of listening to the counsel; it is always a delight.

Mr. Evans—But it is a matter of serious duty, and I do not propose to insist or enlarge in abuse of your Honor's patience and kindness on this proposition, but I am strictly regular in it I submit. The questions having been ruled upon, I now make the offer which is proper, and that offer discloses not the question, but the nature of the proof sought to be evoked, and in that connection I say—and I was proceeding to say when interrupted, not by your Honor, but by Mr. Morris—to say that the plaintiff's counsel introduced a line of insinuating evidence to which they expected to give import and weight by argument, and then when we are in possession of counter proof that puts the action imputed to Mr. Beecher upon an entirely opposite footing, with an entirely different character from that which their mode of stating it has sought to envelope him in, we submit that it is within the line of countervailing proof to remove that position that they think they have planted in the cause, and we stand there, either upon our possession of the proof and its introduction, or our possession of the proof and the law's exclusion of it, one or the other. That is all we can do, and your Honor will dispose of this, if it is the same question that you have disposed of, we shall hear it from your Honor's mouth and not from the counsel's.

Mr. Morris—I shall take occasion to object whenever I see fit.

Mr. Evarts—I have not the slightest objection to your objecting, but you must not substitute your objection for his Honor's statement.

Mr. Morris—I have substituted no objection of mine for his Honor's statement. I say your Honor distinctly ruled upon the question, and then the counsel simply puts the question in the shape of a proposition, and I say that your Honor's ruling covers that, and it presents no new question for the consideration of the Court at all; and the counsel makes a speech in the form of a proposition, and then proceeds to argue the speech, and claims the right to make an argument upon the speech, because he has made a speech in the shape of a proposition. Now, I say again, and repeat, that the proceeding of the counsel was out of order; it was not a regular proceeding. Your Honor had ruled upon the question, and putting it in the form of a proposition did not give the counsel a right to pursue the argument. It was, in effect, decided by your Honor, and the counsel was proceeding out of order, and I shall take occasion whenever I see proper to object to the counsel in that way, and I will not be catechized by the counsel for doing it.

Judge Neilson—The testimony we had, as given on the part of the plaintiff, was as to the conversation between him and the defendant, simply in reference to The Union and its treatment of himself, and of The Golden Age, his newspaper. That has been produced on the part of the plaintiff; that is all. That was admissible because it was a conversation between the parties to this action. The proposition now is of a very different character, to wit, to give in evidence instructions or conversation had by Mr. Beecher with his employes or coöperatives in the paper—co-editors—touching the manner in which The Union should treat The Golden Age, or treat the plaintiff; and, unfortunately, there is no rule of law existing, to be found anywhere, that would enable the Court, if the Court were disposed to do it, to receive evidence of ex parte conversation between Mr. Beecher and the persons employed on The Union, or intrusted with its editing, and I have no power on the subject. It is not a question of discretion or of inclination. There is no rule of evidence that would justify me in receiving this conversation, which took place in the absence of the plaintiff, in respect to which the plaintiff's counsel have made no inquiry; and therefore it is necessarily ruled out.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will please allow me to observe that we do not propose it as a conversation, but as an action of Mr. Beecher. For instance, supposing it had been imputed to Mr. Beecher that he had said he would suppress a publication.

Judge Neilson—Well, even then.

Mr. Evarts—And we prove that he went off and published.

Judge Neilson—Did the contrary, yes, even then—suppose a party to the action says "I will do thus and so." He has changed his mind and does the contrary.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it is so stated by the witness, that he said that he would suppress, and the point is that suppression is confession. Now, is it to be said that we could not prove that he promulgated?

Mr. Morris—Is the counsel in order now, I will inquire of the Court?

Judge Neilson—Yes, I will hear him. I mean to say that there is no rule of evidence known that would justify me in receiving this evidence, either evidence of conversations or of what took place in the absence of the plaintiff between the defendant and other persons, even if the defendant had promised to shape the tone and temper of The Union favorably to The Golden Age, and had changed his mind or failed to do it or given contrary instructions, that ex parte action or conversation could not be given in evidence.

Mr. Evarts—The action I submit, if your Honor please, could be given in evidence—to show what his action was. Because he had said his action would be otherwise it would not preclude anybody from showing what the action was—if the action itself was a proper subject of evidence I mean. Your Honor does not bring this within that rule.

Judge Neilson—Well, I have decided the point.

Mr. Evarts—We except to the exclusion of our offer.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Tracy, you will proceed.

Mr. Tracy—You have stated when you went upon The Union, and that you are still there as managing editor; now I ask you whether the course of The Union was in fact conducted with reference to any difficulty between Mr. Beecher and Mr. Tilton, or otherwise?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to, Sir, upon two grounds: first, your Honor has ruled that that action was not admissible; and in the second place, the evidence calls for the judgment or opinion of the witness in regard to the manner in which it was conducted. No matter if he was the manager, we ain't to take his judgment.

Judge Neilson—Can't receive it.

Mr. Tracy—Does your Honor overrule it?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—Now, I ask you, Mr. Johnson, how The Union has in fact treated The Golden Age during your management of it?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Same ruling.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor will please note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Q. I ask you now to state whether or not The Union has treated The Golden Age in any different manner from what it has treated all other newspapers or exchanges?

Mr. Morris—Same objection.

Judge Neilson—We have no interest in that.

Mr. Tracy—Your Honor excludes that?

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Tracy—And we except. That is all.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. JOHNSON.

Mr. Fullerton—How long have you resided in Brooklyn or New-York? A. In New-York, Sir, 25 years.

Q. Have you ever resided in this city? A. Never.

Q. Previous to your acquiring a residence in New-York where did you reside? A. I came from Philadelphia here.

Q. And what was your occupation in Philadelphia? A. My occupation in Philadelphia was as a journalist.

Q. How long did you reside in Philadelphia? A. Two years.

Q. What journal were you connected with? A. The Pennsylvania Freeman.

Q. A religious or a secular paper? A. An Anti-Slavery paper.

Mr. Tracy—We can't hear, Mr. Johnson, you will have to speak a little louder; there is so much noise in the court-room.
A. An Anti-Slavery paper.

Mr. Fullerton—Was it a religious or secular paper? A. I have answered truly—I hold Anti-Slavery to be religious; it was Anti-Slavery; it was the organ of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society.

Q. And before you went to Philadelphia where did you reside? A. I went from Columbiana County, Ohio, to Philadelphia, or with a little interregnum in New-York City, between the two places.

Q. How long did you live in that County in Ohio? A. I lived there two years.

Q. What was your occupation there? A. A journalist.

Q. What journal were you connected with? A. The Anti-Slavery Bugle.

Q. And how long did that bugle blow—how many years? A. I am unable to answer you, Sir.

Q. And before you went to Ohio, where did you reside? A. I resided the last before then in Massachusetts.

Q. In what part of Massachusetts? A. In Worcester County.

Q. And when was that? A. That was in 1848 and 1849.

Q. Were you connected with any journal there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What journal? A. Blackstone Chronicle.

Q. How long had you a connection with that paper? A. Six months.

Q. And prior to that where did you reside? A. In New-York City.

Q. How long? A. Four years, continuously.

Q. And what was your occupation during those four years? A. Assistant editor of THE TRIBUNE.

Q. In what, the weekly, or the— A. No; the daily.

Q. The daily? A. And weekly.

Q. During what year? A. From 1844 until 1848.

Q. And prior to that connection with THE TRIBUNE where was your residence, and what was your occupation? A. I came from Boston to THE TRIBUNE.

Q. How long had you resided in Boston? A. I am not quite sure how long; it was several years.

Q. About how long? A. Several years.

Q. Were you a journalist there? A. Only part of the time.

Q. What journal were you connected with? A. I was connected a portion of the time with The Liberator, Mr. Garrison's Liberator.

Q. About how long were you connected with that paper there at that time? A. I can't tell you without consulting documents that I have not present.

Q. Well, give us some idea of the— A. Well, my connection with The Liberator was mainly during times when Mr. Garrison was absent; I conducted The Liberator on two occasions while he was absent in Europe—gone perhaps several months at a time.

Q. Well, Sir, prior to that, where did you reside? A. Prior to that I was in Providence, Rhode Island, as General Agent and Corresponding Secretary of the Rhode Island Anti-Slavery Society.

Q. And how long did you reside there and fill that position? A. About two years, I think.

Q. And previous to that where did you reside? A. Previous to that, I was traveling agent, for about a year, of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and lecturing agent.

Q. Through what district of country did you travel to lecture? A. Well, in Pennsylvania, and in Rhode Island, and in Massachusetts.

Q. Well, prior to becoming a traveling lecturer, where did you reside? A. I lived two years at Middlebury, Vermont.

Q. And what was your occupation there? A. Printer and editor.

Q. Of what paper? A. Middlebury Free Press.

Q. How long were you connected with that paper? A. I was connected with the office, not exactly with the paper, during the whole of the time, as I say, about two years; I lived there about two years.

Q. What place in Vermont was that? A. Middlebury.

Q. Did you reside at any other place in Vermont? A. I was born in Vermont, Sir, and lived there until I was sixteen years old—until I was twenty-one, in fact.

Q. I didn't hear your answer. A. I say I was born in Vermont, and lived there until I was about—until I was twenty years of age.

Q. Were you ever connected with any other paper in Vermont than the one that you have named? A. Not as editor.

Q. Did you reside at any time at Montpelier? A. I served my apprenticeship as printer at Montpelier.

Q. During what year? A. Well, from 1826, I think, to 1829; or 1829 to 1839, I think; I am not quite sure of dates; I could verify them, if I had time.

Q. And you are now connected with The Christian Union?

A. I am, Sir.

MR. JOHNSON'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

Q. Are your religious sentiments in harmony with those promulgated by that paper?

MR. JOHNSON'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS OBJECTED TO.

Mr. Evarts—We object to that, if your Honor please.

Judge Neilson—They have a right to inquire as to his religious sentiments. Whether that is the proper standard, or not, I don't know.

Mr. Evarts—In what respect have they a right to inquire?

Judge Neilson—In respect to credibility.

Mr. Evarts—He calls for his religious sentiments.

Judge Neilson—Yes; to see if he has got any religion, and what kind it is.

Mr. Evarts—They have a right within a certain range, to inquire whether he believes in a God, and whether he believes in a system of rewards and punishments, with a view to impeachment.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir; that is with a view to competency. The other inquiry is with a view to credibility.

Mr. Evarts—That is to competency; it must be before he is sworn.

Judge Neilson—The only objection is to the standard of comparison; that is the only objection.

Mr. Evarts—It is not, as I understand it, a subject of inquiry about a man's religion except as bearing upon that question, obligation of an oath.

Judge Neilson—I don't know what view they offer it in. It seems to be admissible in some form.

Mr. Evarts—But that is not the form of it. He says: "Do you agree in religious opinion with The Christian Union?"

Judge Neilson—The only objection is as to the form of the question, I think.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if religious opinions are to be inquired into as matter of personal impeachment, except as bearing on the question of the credibility of an oath, why, we shall have all sorts of sectarian prejudices aroused.

Judge Neilson—Well, now, without assuming that it won't be offensive to the witness, suppose that it were Clapin's Weekly, would not you permit the question whether your religious sentiments accorded with the views of that paper?

Mr. Evarts—Whether his religious sentiments accorded with the religious sentiments of that paper.

Judge Neilson—With the views of that paper.

Mr. Evarts—Well, your Honor has put—

Judge Neilson—Put an extreme illustration, I submit. [Laughter.]

Mr. Evarts—Put an illustration where the allusion could only be sarcastic.

Judge Neilson—No; I don't think that.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, I am serious about the question. I don't think they have a right to the general proposition; I should dislike very much to have it recognized as a proposition that you can ask witnesses about religious opinions.

Mr. Beach—If the gentleman has that dislike to it, it is very unfortunate that it did not prevail when they were examining Mr. Moulton.

Mr. Evarts—That is in regard to the very matter.

Mr. Beach—It was in regard to his religious sentiments.

Mr. Evarts—Being an actor in the transaction.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Johnson is an actor.

Mr. Evarts—He is not an actor in the—

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir; he is an actor in the transaction.

Judge Neilson—You had better modify your question.

Mr. Fullerton—I beg your Honor's pardon; I don't mean to modify it unless you think it is wrong; I don't mean to do it to please the other side.

Judge Neilson—I think this question of comparison is too comprehensive.

Mr. Evarts—Your Honor will see it opens all avenues to sectarian prejudices on the jury. There is nothing about this gentleman that I know of, but, as a general proposition, when witnesses are examined their religious opinions not bearing on credibility are not the subject of inquiry.

Mr. Fullerton—Isn't it bearing on the subject of credibility?

Judge Neilson—I don't know whether it does or not.

Mr. Fullerton—The gentleman takes that for granted, and argues upon the views; he thinks that is my object. Have not I a right to show that this gentleman is editing a paper and promulgating doctrines that he don't believe in.

Judge Neilson—Well, if he writes the articles himself, yes.

Mr. Fullerton—I am approaching it in a proper way.

Judge Neilson—If he has written something that affects his moral character, it will involve the same question that was up when Mr. Tilton was under examination.

Mr. Fullerton—Precisely the same question, and no other.

Judge Neilson—In respect to his articles in The Golden Age. But then you must call his attention to the specific article.

MR. JOHNSON'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS RECEIVED.

Mr. Fullerton—I am going to do so if it becomes necessary. Now will you answer the question, Mr. Johnson?

Judge Neilson—I don't think you can put the question in that comprehensive form.

Mr. Fullerton—What are your religious views?

Mr. Evarts—That we object to.

Judge Neilson—We will take that, go on.

Mr. Evarts—Note our exception.

The Witness—I call myself a Christian.

Mr. Fullerton—As distinguished from a Jew; is that it?

A. No, Sir; I call myself a Christian according to the New Testament.

Q. Yes; do you advocate the doctrine of the Universalists?

A. Well, I don't—I do perhaps, Sir, in some respects.

Q. Don't you in all respects? A. I am not very well acquainted with the Universalist denomination; know very little about them. I believe that all human beings will be eventually saved.

Q. Isn't that the very essence of the doctrine of Universalism?

A. Well, I only know that a good many people who—

Judge Neilson—That is Dr. Chapin's theory.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, Dr. Chapin is not on the stand; if he were I would ask him. [Laughter.]

Judge Neilson—Will the audience be quiet please?

Mr. Fullerton—Don't you understand that to be the essence of the belief of the Universalists? A. No, I don't. From what I know of the creeds of the Universalists I should say that that was only one item in their creed. I differ from them in various respects.

Q. One moment; that is only one item in their creed? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But that is an item in their creed? A. Yes, Sir; I understand it so.

Q. And so far as that item is concerned you subscribe to it, and believe in it? A. Well, I have already stated that I believe that every child of God will be finally made happy.

Judge Neilson—Do you apply that to every child of Adam? A. Yes, Sir; every child of Adam.

Judge Neilson—The other proposition is very plain.

Mr. Fullerton—How long have you entertained that opinion, Mr. Johnson? A. Well, really, I can't say, Sir.

Q. About how long? A. Well, I can't tell you even that.

Q. Oh! give us some approximate estimate of the time. A. Because not expecting to be asked any such question I have not even thought of it, and I should have to stop to make a calculation, and perhaps it would take me half an hour to answer the question.

Q. Well, I don't ask you to tell me exactly the day or the hour, whether you were inspired— A. Well, I will say that I have believed it for a number of years.

Q. About how many years? A. Well, perhaps I have believed it for ten or a dozen years.

Q. Not more than that? A. I can't say whether I have or not, until I have further time for reflection.

Q. When did your religious convictions undergo a change? A. My religious convictions have been undergoing a change from the time I was a boy.

Q. Gradually? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Up to the present moment? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And still undergoing a change? A. Yes, Sir; I hope so.

Q. In what direction? A. In the direction of truth.

Q. Oh! in the direction of truth.

Mr. Everts—And there you stop.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you once edit The Christian Soldier? A. I had forgotten that when you were questioning me a little while ago about my life—entirely forgotten it.

Q. Well, can you tell me what the religious views of The Christian Soldier were? A. The Christian Soldier was a paper established for the purpose of fighting Universalism.

Q. And did you through that paper fight Universalism? A. I did with all my heart.

Q. And you believed, then, in the justice of your cause did you? A. I did with all my heart.

Q. And since that you have become in some respects like the Universalists in your belief? A. Yes; I have changed my views entirely; I have—

Q. Well, did you convince yourself that you were wrong while editing that paper? A. No; long afterwards.

Q. Now, have you ever edited a paper that promulgated Universalist doctrines? A. No; I have not.

Q. Have you ever written any articles of that import for any newspaper? A. Well, I am not quite sure about that; I may possibly have written an article somewhere, but I don't—I am not able to tell you at this moment whether I ever have or not.

Q. Have you taken any paper that advocated Universalist doctrines? A. I have taken no Universalist paper in my life.

Q. Now, answer my question. A. Well, I don't—I really hesitate to answer one, because I want to answer truthfully.

Q. Well, I ask if you have ever taken any paper that advocated the Universalist doctrine? A. Well, I don't think I have.

Q. Do you know of any such paper? A. Oh yes! a great many; see them every week.

Q. Have you not been a subscriber for any one of them? A. No, Sir.

Q. Have you ever written communications for any one of them? A. Not that I recollect.

Q. Did you read these papers every week? A. They came in exchange at The Christian Union office.

Q. With The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. You exchanged with papers of a Universalist character? A. We did, and with Catholic and all kinds of papers.

Q. And you have never written any communication for any of these Universalist papers? A. No, Sir; not that I recollect.

Q. Did you ever express your views in regard to the universal salvation of mankind through any organ? A. I am not sure whether I did or not. Now, really, I don't think I could tell you.

Q. Don't you recollect whether you did or not? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. You are a writer for a journal? A. I am, but I have not been a writer upon such topics.

Q. Do you write for The Christian Union? A. I do.

Q. Religious articles? A. Sometimes a religious article.

Q. Contrary to your own faith? A. Never.

Q. In harmony with your own faith? A. In harmony with my own faith.

Q. Have you ever written articles for The Christian Union vindicating the Universalist doctrine? A. I have not, because The Christian Union does not proclaim that doctrine. The editorial pages of it are revised by Mr. Beecher.

Q. What do you do in connection with that paper—what are your duties? A. My duties are as general manager of it.

Q. General manager? A. General manager; that is to say, I correspond with our contributors. I write, for instance, to A, B, C and D, asking them to send us articles.

Q. On what subject? A. On religious subjects, and on other subjects—on any subject that I may wish to have discussed.

Q. And you write yourself, do you? A. I do occasionally.

Q. Well, The Christian Union is not a believer in universal salvation, I believe, is it? A. I believe not; I never have understood that it was.

Q. Then your religious notions are not in harmony with the paper you are connected with? A. Mainly they are in harmony with it.

Q. Altogether they are not? A. No, Sir.

Q. But, on the vital question of Universalist salvation, you are in variance with it?

Mr. Evarts—He does not say that is a vital question.

Mr. Beach—I call it a vital question.

Mr. Evarts—[To Mr. Fullerton]: You called it a vital question in your question.

Mr. Fullerton—[To Mr. Evarts]: I don't know of any more vital question for you or for me.

Mr. Evarts—That depends upon a variety of opinions upon what is vital and what is not vital.

Mr. Beach—We have a right to characterize it as we please, I suppose.

Q. Do you not regard the salvation of men after death as a vital question to be discussed and entertained in this world? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then, upon that vital question you are at variance with the doctrines of The Christian Union, I understand you? A. I am.

Q. Did you ever express your religious convictions in that respect to Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir, often.

Q. He knows what they are? A. He knows what they are.

Q. And he still retains you in connection with his paper? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you ever connected as a member with any church? A. Oh! yes.

Q. What churches? A. I first united with the Congregational church, in Montpelier, Vermont, when I was a young man; afterwards I was for some years connected with the Bowdoin-st church, of Boston, of which the Rev. Lyman Beecher was pastor, and after that, I was for a time connected with the Congregational church in Middlebury, Vermont.

Q. Ever been connected with any other religious denominations since that time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where? A. I have been connected with the Society of Progressive Friends.

Q. Where was that? A. That was in Chester County, Pennsylvania.

Q. And what were their religious tenets? A. Their society was not founded on religious tenets at all. It had no creed whatever.

Q. It had no creed? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was it a religious society? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And had no creed. They believed in something, didn't they? A. Yes, Sir; they didn't put their belief as the basis of their organization. They left belief free to every individual. I didn't make any inquiry as to the belief of the persons composing the body whatever. Orthodox and heterodox people, Unitarians and Presbyterians formed part of it, on equal terms.

Q. What was the object of the society? A. Practically, the object of it was reformatory; that is, to promote temperance, to promote the Anti-Slavery question, and to help people to be better and purer without going into theological questions.

Q. Did you ever connect yourself with any other religious organization? A. I think not. I was, though. Let me see; I was for a little while a member of the Society of Friends.

Q. Then you were a Quaker at one time, were you? When was that? A. Well, that was in 1849-'50.

Q. And where was that? A. In Ohio.

Q. How long did you remain a member of that organization? A. While I remained in the place.

Q. And how long was that? A. About two years.

Q. Now, did you ever connect yourself with any other organization of a religious character? A. No, Sir.

Q. How? A. No, Sir.

Q. Was that the last one? A. No; the Progressive Friends was the last. That is a Society I helped make.

Q. You founded it, did you not? A. It is the one I believed in peculiarly.

Q. A kind of omnibus church, was it not? A. [Excitedly.] Well, Sir, you may characterize it as you please.

Q. I should think it was. A. I don't call it that.

Q. It was a church which admitted all classes and kinds of people? A. It invited all persons who desired to do good to their fellow-men, and to elevate himself and make himself morally pure. It invited all such persons, without reference to their theological sentiments, to unite with it.

Q. What is the last organization you were connected with? A. I am connected with it now.

Mr. Evarts—The witness has not said it was a church. You put it in your question—"church."

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I beg pardon of the church, and call it an organization.

Q. You are connected with it now? A. I am.

Q. Were you ever connected with Plymouth Church? A. Never.

Q. Ever attended service there? A. Yes, Sir, I attended service there five years in succession.

Q. Constantly? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Without becoming a member? A. Without becoming a member.

Q. Did you ever take the communion there? A. Yes, Sir, frequently.

Q. How frequently? A. Well, probably ten or a dozen times in the course of my life.

Q. When? A. The last time was about six months ago, I believe.

Q. And the first time when? A. I cannot say.

Q. About when? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. About what time? A. I cannot tell you about the time.

Q. As near as you can? A. I cannot.

Q. You will have to? A. I say it is impossible for me to tell you what time.

Q. Give us some idea of the time you commenced? A. I began to go to Plymouth Church, as near as I can recollect, somewhere about 1853, and attended Plymouth Church pretty constantly until 1859.

Q. How long after you commenced going to Plymouth

Church did you commence to take the communion there? A. Well, I cannot tell you.

Q. About how long? A. I cannot tell you about how long.

Q. Within one year? A. I am not sure whether it was within one, two, three or four years.

Q. Was it within four years after you commenced? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Was it within five? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Was it within six? A. I cannot tell you, Sir.

Q. Was it within seven? A. I presume it was, but I cannot tell you; I don't know anything about it.

Q. Was it within eight? A. It must have been within the time I went there, but I cannot specify the time any more definitely than I have done. I would gladly give you the day, but I cannot.

Q. What was your occupation at the time you commenced taking communion in that church? A. I was editor of The Anti-Slavery Standard.

Q. Published where? A. Published in New-York.

Q. And while editor of that paper you commenced taking the communion in Plymouth Church, did you? A. I think it must have been during my connection with it.

Q. When did you cease to be the editor of that paper? A. In 1865, immediately before Mr. Tilton invited me into The Independent.

Q. Never mind Mr. Tilton now. You ceased to be editor in 1865, did you? A. Yes, Sir; about 1865.

Q. And it was prior to that you commenced taking communion from the church? A. I didn't in any proper sense of the word commence taking communion; I don't wish to be understood as using any such phrase as that.

Q. Was there not a first time when you did it? A. There was, but I don't recollect the precise time. I would gladly tell you every single time if I could recall it, but I cannot.

Q. When did you become connected with The Independent? A. In the Spring of 1865—in June, 1865, the first of the Summer.

Q. When did you cease that connection? A. At the end of 1870.

Q. When did you become connected with The Christian Union? A. At the beginning, or rather at the end of 1872.

Q. Now, did you ever take the communion at Plymouth Church until you became connected, or thought of becoming connected, with The Christian Union? A. Yes, Sir; long before—long before; half a dozen times at least.

Q. Your memory is getting better as to the times, is it not? A. No, Sir; but I cannot give you the precise times. I tell you I was in the habit of—Mr. Beecher's invitation was so broad as to include me, and whenever I was there I united with him in communion with all my heart, and shall do it again if I have an opportunity to do so.

The Court here took a recess until 3 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

After recess, Mr. Johnson was recalled, and his cross-examination continued, as follows:

MR. JOHNSON ON THE DEITY OF CHRIST.

Mr. Fullerton—I understand you to say, Mr. Johnson, that you became a communicant in Plymouth Church in consequence of some invitation that was given by Mr. Beecher? A. Yes. I object, however, to the phrase "became a communicant." I am not what would technically be called a communicant in Mr. Beecher's church.

Judge Neilson—Well, you mean that you did commune? A. I mean that I did commune; yes, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, with that amendment, then—did you commune in Plymouth Church in consequence of an invitation of Mr. Beecher? A. Not a private invitation; a public invitation.

Q. A public invitation? A. Which he made to every one.

Q. From the pulpit? A. From the pulpit.

Q. Well, what was the nature of the invitation? A. That all those—as near as I can recollect it, his usual method is, "All those who love Christ, and who wish to fulfil his commands, are invited to commune with us."

Q. Well, are you a believer in the Divinity of Christ? A. Yes, in my own sense of the Divinity of Christ.

Q. What is your sense? A. I don't believe in the Deity of Christ, Sir; I believe in his Divinity, but not in his—

Q. Not in his Deity? A. No, Sir.

Q. You don't believe in the Trinity, then? A. No, Sir.

Q. In what respect do you consider him as Divine? A. In that he was specially commissioned of God to do a great work for the world, a Divine teacher, a Divine messenger from God.

Q. In the sense, then, only that he performed a Divine commission? A. That is all; yes.

Q. You regard him, then, as no more Divine than you do the Apostles, do you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, they performed a Divine consummation, didn't they? A. Well, I don't think they did, in the same sense.

Q. Very well. A. That is my opinion.

Q. Now, then, as to the early prophets; do you regard Christ as any more Divine than the early prophets who performed a Divine mission? A. Well, Sir, I know so little about the early prophets that I could not undertake to say.

Mr. Fullerton—Ah, well, then, I won't question you. Do you believe in the inspiration of the Old Testament? A. That depends, Sir, upon what you mean by the word "inspiration." I want your definition of that first, and then I will tell you.

Q. Do you believe in the inspiration of the Old Testament, according to your own definition of it? A. Yes, I do.

Q. And what is your definition of inspiration? A. My definition of inspiration is, men writing honestly under serious and earnest conviction that what they are saying is true.

Q. Yes, but not infallible? A. No, not infallible.

Q. Not under the Divine guidance so as to prevent error? A. No.

Q. In that respect only you regard it as inspired, is that so? A. I regard some parts of it as inspired in the highest sense, but others I have doubts about, whether they are so or not.

Q. Well, in the highest sense of inspiration according to your definition of it, you mean? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And other parts of it you have doubts about? A. Yes, Sir.

THE OLD ANTI-MASONIC STRUGGLE.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, didn't you omit to state that you were once the editor of an Anti-Mason paper? A. No, Sir; I didn't.

Q. Well, were you the editor of an Anti-Mason paper? A. Never.

Q. Never? A. Never; the Anti-Mason conflict was settled before I became an editor.

Q. Well, I believe you prepared something like a biography of yourself, have you not? A. Yes, I did.

Q. [Paper handed to witness.] Will you be kind enough to look there and see whether you were ever the editor of an Anti-Masonic paper? A. Well, I find that in memoranda—

Q. Now, I don't care what you find; I want to ask you now, whether that refreshes your recollection as to whether you were ever the editor of an Anti-Masonic paper? A. No. It was a mistake to have written so.

Q. Yes, one moment? A. It don't refresh my recollection in the least.

Q. You never were an Anti-Mason? A. No; the Anti-Mason question was settled before I became the editor of that paper; that paper was started—

Q. Don't talk about it. A. Well, all right.

Q. Now, did you ever write anything like this [reading] "Then went to Middlebury, Vermont, where he remained two years, during part of which time he was editor of the Free Press, an Anti-Masonic paper"—referring to yourself? A. Yes, Sir, I wrote it.

Q. You did write it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Was it true or false? A. Well, it was not precisely accurate.

Q. Well, was it true or false?

Mr. Tracy—He answers.

The Witness—Well, I answer that it is not accurate—that I did not state so accurately as I have here to-day under oath. That is all.

Q. Well, in what does the inaccuracy consist? A. It consists in this, that the paper, The Middlebury Free Press, was started as an Anti-Masonic paper, and that at the time when I had charge of it the question of Masonry was no longer before the country, and it was therefore a question between other parties; that is all.

Q. Why, it was in 1833, wasn't it? A. Yes—in '34.

Q. '34? A. '34.

Q. Well, Sir, was the Anti-Masonic question then obsolete? A. Certainly it was, if my recollection serves me.

Q. Entirely so? A. Yes, Sir. It was there at any rate.

Q. Didn't it enter to a greater or less extent into politics? A. Yes, Sir; before that time it had.

Q. At that time, didn't it enter into politics? A. I think not, Sir.

Q. Were not men held responsible for their sentiments on that subject at that time in political controversies? A. I am not aware of it.

Q. You cannot tell us? A. I cannot give you the precise dates. I was with The Middlebury Free Press.

Q. I know that you said that; we are saying something also. Now, were not there Mason and Anti-Masonic candidates for office at that time? A. I think not.

Q. Are you sure? A. My impression is that there were not, but I may be wrong—I don't know.

Mr. Evarts—We raise the objection that this is immaterial. Judge Nelson—I think he has exhausted it.

Mr. Evarts—The witness on his examination said for two years he edited this paper in Middlebury. Now they ask him if it was not an Anti-Masonic paper.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, he says now it was not; then he altered the first statement and said it was. [To the witness.] Well, did you ever belong to the Hopedale Community? A. Yes—no, not properly speaking to the Hopedale Community; I never did—I resided a Winter, or part of a Winter at Hopedale, but I didn't belong to the Community.

Q. What was the Hopedale Community? A. Well, the Hopedale Community was an association formed by the Rev. Adrian Ballou, a Unitarian clergyman, or, perhaps, more strictly speaking, a Restorationist clergyman.

Q. A Restorationist? A. A Restorationist clergyman—an association for—well, I don't know as I can characterize it exactly, because I don't recollect distinctly enough what its characteristics were; it was a socialistic community—that is, a religiously socialistic community—it was a religious community.

Q. Had they any service? A. Oh, yes, Sir!

Q. Didn't you participate in them that Winter? A. I did at times.

Q. The Winter that you spent there? A. The Winter that I spent there, Sir, I often spoke on Sunday in their chapel.

Q. Practically united with them, didn't you? A. No, Sir; no, Sir; I belonged to what was called the Practical Christian Ministry that was connected with the Association, or that grew out of it, but had no official relations with the Association itself.

Q. You say it was connected with it and grew out of it, but had no official connection with it? A. I mean to say that a part of the persons who constituted that Community—some of the persons in it—formed what they called the Practical Christian Ministry, and that I belonged to that; not to the Community, but to that.

Q. This is an offshoot of it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, how long did you belong to the Practical Christian Ministry? A. Well, I was there, as I said, a Winter.

Q. And did you belong to the Practical Christian Ministry after you left there that Winter? A. No, no—of course it was a local affair; it was a local affair entirely.

Q. That is, a local Christianity, is it? A. No, Sir; I didn't say it was a local Christianity; I said the society was local; the Practical Christian Ministry as an association was local.

Q. Well, how did you make your livelihood there that Winter? A. I made it by editing The Practical Christian, as it was called.

Q. There? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Your connection with it commenced when? A. Well, it was during the Winter that I was there; that is to say, it must have been begun some time in January, probably 1849, and continued along on until the next April some time.

Q. Well, I believe you didn't mention your editorship of The Practical Christian? A. I did not; I had entirely forgotten it.

Q. You had forgotten that? A. Not expecting to be interrogated I had forgotten it at the moment.

Q. A man should be always prepared in regard to his religion. Now, will you be kind enough to tell me what were the particular tenets of this Practical Christian Society and this Practical Christian Ministry? A. Well, I could not know at this distance of time how to formulate their creed. If you will give me opportunity and time I will find the documents and show them to you.

Q. When do you think you would get this in readiness to answer the question as to the religious tenets of a society to which you belonged? A. Well, I think its name suggested it, "Practical Christian"—practical Christianity, that was the idea.

Q. Now, you have spoken of your connection with a paper or with a Church in Montpelier. What Church was that? A. The Congregational Church, as I said before. That was in the evidence.

Q. Were you ever excommunicated from that Church? A. No, Sir.

Q. You were not? A. I was not.

Q. Did you write anything like this: "The Church subsequently enacted the farce of excommunicating me?" A. I did not; not the Church at Montpelier.

Q. Where was that? A. Middlebury, Vermont.

Q. Well, I believe I was mistaken? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Then that Church did excommunicate you? A. After I had withdrawn from it it did.

Q. After you had withdrawn from it you were excommunicated? A. After I had withdrawn from it it did go through the farce of excommunicating me, as I say there.

MR. JOHNSON A SPIRITUALIST.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, have you ever been a Spiritualist? A. Well, Sir, I will answer that question—I could not answer that question honestly by yes or no.

Q. Then answer it in your own way. A. Well, Sir, I will answer it in the way that a friend of mine answered it. I asked my friend once if he was a Spiritualist. He said "Yes," but he "was not a damned fool." [Laughter.] I am in a sense a spiritualist; that is to say, I believe there have been such occurrences as communications from the other world.

Q. But in your judgment you don't think you are the other thing? A. I don't think I am the other thing. [Laughter.]

Q. Do you believe in spiritualism? A. I don't know what you mean by it. You will have to explain the question.

Q. Do you believe in spiritualism, as you understand it, and not as I understand it? A. Yes, Sir; I do as I understand it.

Q. Have you been in the habit of attending what they call the seances? A. No, Sir; I have not, not as a habit; I have been, say several times in the course of my life.

Q. How many times? A. Perhaps a dozen or twenty in the course of the last twenty or twenty-five years.

Q. Very frequently? A. No; not very frequently.

Q. Do you profess to have communicated with the spirits in the other world? A. I believe sincerely I have received communications from dear friends in the other world.

Q. How recently have you received any such communication? A. Well, I don't remember; it may be eight months perhaps, or a year possibly, I don't remember; since I attended—saw a spiritual medium.

Q. You spoke of the other world. Will you tell me what other world it was from. A. I don't know what other world it was from. That was not for me to say.

Q. The spirits didn't communicate that night to you? A. What is that?

Q. The spirits didn't communicate that fact to you? A. I merely said I believed I had had communications from spirits in the spiritual world—the other world. I supposed you understood what was meant.

Q. You said the other world? A. I did say the other world; that is the common phrase for designating the spiritual world.

Q. Have you been in the habit of visiting spiritualists in the City of New-York? No, Sir.

Q. Did you form the habit of communicating with spirits in the other world? A. No, Sir; I never formed that habit.

Q. Have you done it more or less often? A. I have occasionally gone to a spiritual mediums.

Q. Have you not written articles upon spiritualism? A. Possibly I may have done so.

Q. Don't you know? A. I cannot tell you whether I did or not at this moment; very likely I may have done so.

Q. Can you not recall the fact whether you have written articles on spiritualism, and had them published? A. I think very likely I may have done so, but I cannot recall any particular instance.

Q. I don't want you to do that; I ask you the general fact if you have not written such articles? A. I cannot say positively whether I did or not.

Q. What is your best judgment or recollection on that subject? A. I should think, very likely, if I was to examine closely I should find I had at some time or other written something in favor of spiritualism.

Q. Do you know where it is published? A. No, Sir; I don't.

Q. No idea at all? A. No, Sir; I have not any recollection whatever.

Q. Have you ever been connected with Mr. Frothingham's church in New-York? A. I have. I am connected with it now.

Q. Hold an office there now? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you ever hold an office there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When? A. Well, two years ago.

Q. What office did you hold? A. Trustee.

Q. Are you an attendant upon that church now? A. Yes, Sir. Very constantly.

Q. Well, how did it happen that you came over to Brooklyn so often to partake of the communion in Plymouth Church? A. I didn't come over to partake of the communion. I don't say that.

Q. How did it happen that you partook of the communion in Plymouth Church? A. Because I was, for six years, a very constant attendant, from 1853 to 1859, of Mr. Beecher's church, going generally twice a day. I was there on communion days, and very often under the general invitation, which was broad enough, as I thought, to include me; as a Christian I communed in Mr. Beecher's Church; have been in the habit of doing so occasionally when I have been there, from the first of my acquaintance with the church.

Q. Do your religious views correspond with the Rev. Mr. Frothingham's views? A. Not entirely; I differ very materially from Mr. Frothingham on some subjects, as I do with Mr. Beecher, and did with Mr. Beecher when I went to his church.

MR. JOHNSON NOT A TEACHER OF INFIDELITY.

Q. That is bad for Mr. Beecher. We won't stop to inquire about it now. Were you ever taken to task by any one for indoctrinating Mr. Tilton with infidel notions? A. Oh, yes; I don't know that I should say that I have been taken to task for it, I think that is rather a strong expression.

Q. Well, called to account; would that do better?

Mr. Beach—Expostulated.

Q. Were you ever called to account? A. No, I don't think I was ever called to an account.

Q. Were you ever expostulated with? A. No, Sir; I don't think I was.

Q. Were you ever spoken to on the subject? A. Yes, Sir; but I think I was the first to speak of it.

Q. You spoke to yourself? A. Shall I tell you the whole truth about it?

Q. Answer my question, and if I don't get the whole truth out it will be my loss. A. Very well. What is your question?

Q. My question is whether Mrs. Tilton ever accused you, or expostulated with you in any way, for having indoctrinated her husband with infidel notions? A. No, never in the world; never said anything of the kind to me.

Q. Never said a word to you upon that subject? A. Not until I introduced it.

Q. I didn't ask you who introduced it. A. I mean to say, in answer to your question, that Mrs. Tilton never volunteered a word to me on that subject in any shape, and she never charged me with leading her husband into infidelity, never; and never intimated to me in any way that she was uneasy in that regard—in regard to my influence over Mr. Tilton.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, do you recollect who drew up your contract for your employment with The Christian Union? A. I drew it myself.

Q. Wholly? A. It is possible that a paper written by Mr. Tilton and before me, at the time when I drew it, may have suggested some of its phrases.

Q. Didn't Mr. Tilton prepare the draft of your contract? A. No, Sir, he did not.

Q. And didn't Mr. Tilton and Mr. Moulton fix upon your salary? A. No, Sir; not that I know of. I never heard of it if they did. I never heard that they had any agency in it.

Q. Didn't Mr. Tilton prepare a draft of that contract? A. Mr. Tilton did volunteer—volunteered without any request of mine—to prepare a contract saying he professed to be friendly with me; glad that I had got a place on The Christian Union, and he said: "Now, you ought to go in under a contract." I said to him that I had never had a contract with anybody whom I had served. "Well," he said, "you ought to have a contract with Mr. Beecher, and I will draw you one," and he sat down to his desk and drew one, and I took it and put it into my pocket, and some days afterwards when I had occasion to draw the contract, which was afterwards signed by Mr. Beecher and myself, I took it out of my pocket and looked at it, and, perhaps, some of its phrases may have gone into the real document.

Q. He first suggested the contract? A. He suggested that I ought to go in under a contract.

Q. He suggested the contract, did he not? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And you adopted that suggestion, did you not? A. I had previously thought I should have it before.

Q. You had never had one before? A. No.

Q. With anybody? A. No, Sir.

Q. And when he suggested it you told him you never had one before? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Then didn't he suggest the idea to you? A. Yes, Sir; he did.

Q. Do you know whether, or not, Mr. Tilton had not an agency in securing you that place before you obtained it? A. I can only say I have no knowledge—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Evans—Why should he not answer it in the way he was going to answer it?

Mr. Fullerton—Because it is wrong.

Judge Nelson—He asked him if he knew.

Mr. Fullerton—Of his own knowledge.

Mr. Evans—You didn't put that in.

The Witness—I do not know.

Mr. Fullerton—That settles it.

Mr. Fullerton—You don't know, of your own knowledge, that he didn't have an agency in it? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF OLIVER JOHNSON.

Mr. Tracy—I desire to call your attention, Mr. Johnson, to the conversation that I omitted in the first of my direct examination. Did you have a conversation with Mr. Tilton soon after the Steinway Hall meeting—Mrs. Woodhull's Steinway Hall meeting—about his presiding there and his relations to the Woodhull woman? A. I did, Sir.

Q. What transpired between you and him upon that occasion? A. It was a few days—it may have been the next day, or a little longer; I don't remember precisely when, but I asked Mr. Tilton to take a lunch with me in a restaurant near The Express office, on Park-row, with the purpose in my own mind—

Mr. Fullerton—Never mind your purpose.

The Witness—I beg your pardon, I want to—

Mr. Fullerton—I know you want to; I don't want you to.

Mr. Tracy—What did you do when you were lunching, when you came to conversation? A. I remonstrated very seriously with Mr. Tilton for presiding at the meeting of such a woman, whom I regarded as a very bad one; and he said to me that he belonged in reality with her; that she represented a cause in which he had the deepest interest; that to preside at her meeting was simply to have the courage of his opinions.

Q. Referring again to this lady who was spoken of in your direct examination, I want to ask you if that lady was a member of Mr. Tilton's household at any time? A. I am not sure that she was; I don't think she ever was. No, Sir, I am not aware that she ever was.

Q. Not a member of his family? A. No, Sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Johnson, I understood you to say, in answer to the counsel, that you didn't know but Mr. Tilton had an agency in procuring your employment on The Christian Union. Do you know that he did? A. No, Sir, I do not; I have no reason to suppose—

Mr. Beach—Wait, Sir.

Q. From any information you ever received from him, have you any reason to suppose that he had?

Mr. Beach—That is objectionable, Sir.

Judge Neilson—He has answered that question, that he does not know that he ever did.

Mr. Everts—The question is, if you ever heard from Mr. Tilton that Mr. Tilton had any agency in it.

Mr. Beach—Put that question.

Q. Did you ever hear from Tilton that he had any agency in procuring your employment? A. No, Sir; I never did.

Q. Now, you have referred to a suggestion of Mr. Tilton's that your contract with The Christian Union should be in writing; was that after your contract with Mr. Beecher had been made—your engagement with Mr. Beecher had been made? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you actually enter upon your employment at that time? A. No, Sir.

Q. But the engagement had been made? A. The engagement had been made; yes, Sir.

Q. Did you request Mr. Tilton to draw the contract for you? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was a thing he volunteered to do? A. Yes, Sir; he volunteered to do it; I assented, however, to his doing it.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton give you any reason why you should have a written contract with Mr. Beecher? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What reason did he say—what reason did he give? A. He said he would cheat me, if I didn't.

Q. Who would cheat you? A. Mr. Beecher.

Q. Well; Mr. Beecher would cheat you? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is all, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Morris—Wait a moment, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Beach—There is no question, Sir; you can go.

Mr. Everts—That is all, Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Tracy—Wait a moment.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh! I beg your pardon.

MR. JOHNSON MAKES A CORRECTION.

The Witness—I wish, on recollection, to correct my testimony in one respect; in regard to the Middlebury paper. It was not in 1834 that I was connected with it; it was in 1835 or 1836. I remember now distinctly, since I spoke the last time; I can fix it absolutely, it was in 1836. It was at the time of the presidential election of 1836—the time preceding that election.

RE CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. JOHNSON.

Mr. Fullerton—When do you say, this conversation was with Mr. Tilton in respect to his presiding at Steinway Hall? A. I say, after he had done it; after that meeting.

Q. Yes; probably it was? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. But how long after? A. It may have been the next day, or it may not have been until two or three days afterwards; I am not quite sure.

Q. Are you sure it was within two or three days? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Positive? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How do you fix the time? A. Well, I could not fix it beyond the possibility of mistake.

Q. Well, then, when might it have been? A. I think it must have been within a very few days of the time.

Q. How are you enabled to fix it within a few days after that meeting? A. Well, it connects itself with the act itself, and I recall my statement of disappointment and regret at his having done it, and my desire to see him as soon as I could.

Q. Never mind your desire. A. I am answering your question, Sir.

Q. That is the way you fix the time? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, are you aware that Theodore Tilton left on the seven o'clock train on the morning following the Steinway Hall meeting, on a lecturing tour, and was gone for a long time out of New-York? A. No, I do not; it is barely possible it may be so; I would not undertake to fix positively the time, I only know it was a time not a great while afterwards; whether it was well—if it were a fortnight or even three weeks, it would not surprise me very much; I don't remember.

Q. It may have been longer than that? A. It is hardly likely to have been longer than that I think.

Mr. Fullerton—That is all.

Mr. Everts—That is all, Mr. Johnson.

TESTIMONY OF ISABELLA G. OAKLEY.

Miss Isabella G. Oakley was next called and sworn on behalf of the defendant.

By Mr. Tracy—You reside in Brooklyn, I believe, Miss Oakley? A. I do.

Q. And are engaged in teaching? A. I am.

Q. Do you know Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. I know them.

Q. How long have you known Mr. and Mrs. Tilton? A. Since before their marriage.

Q. Since before their marriage. How long before? A. I should think a year, perhaps.

Q. Can you speak conveniently a little louder, so that the further juryman can hear you? A. I will try.

Q. Were you at any time an inmate of the same house with them? A. I was. Shall I state when?

Q. How soon after their marriage? A. When Florence was eighteen months old during several months.

Q. Since Florence was about eighteen months old? Shall I repeat the answer, or the stenographer?

Judge Neilson—You had better repeat it; it will save time.

Mr. Tracy—You became an inmate of the same house with them when Florence was about eighteen months old. Can you tell us about when that was, Miss Oakley? A. It was about sixteen or seventeen years ago.

Q. Sixteen or seventeen years ago. Where were they residing at that time? A. At 48 Livingston-st.

Q. With whom? A. With Mrs. Richards.

Q. The mother of Mrs. Tilton? A. I was Mrs. Richards's guest.

Q. How long did you reside there with Mrs. Richards when they were boarding with Mrs. Richards on that occasion? A. If they were then boarding, it was perhaps four or five months that I was with them.

Q. You were with them four or five months. Then when were you with them again at any time? A. I spent a part of the summer vacation several years subsequent to that, once at Keyport, once at Cornwall up the Hudson, and at various times, for a week or two, perhaps, in their home in Brooklyn.

Q. Can you state when it was that you spent the summer with them at Keyport? A. I was with them twice at Keyport.

Q. Well? A. Once very early in their married life, and once several years after that; I don't know whether I could recall the year; I fear not.

Q. How many years afterwards, should you say? A. It was at the time Carroll was a baby; it was during Carroll's infancy.

Q. The last time you spent at Keyport was during Carroll's infancy? A. He was then two years old; perhaps the second Summer.

Q. When did you spend the Summer with them at Cornwall? A. That, I think, must have been the Summer before that; Carroll was then a little baby.

Q. At any other place? A. Perhaps they both occurred that Summer; I cannot say.

Q. At any other place have you spent the Summer vacation together? A. We were together at Mr. Moses Beach's, at Poughkeepsie, for a week or two one Summer.

Q. When was that? A. I could not say exactly; it was previous to 1866.

Q. Well, have you spent any time with them in any other place in Brooklyn than 48 Livingston-st.? A. I don't think that I have spent more than to or three days at a time in their other house, but I have been a visitor there.

Q. How frequently were you a visitor at their house while they were residing in Oxford-st.? A. No, Sir; I was not in Brooklyn at that time.

Q. You left Brooklyn? A. I was away from Brooklyn.

Q. When did you leave Brooklyn and return? A. I came and went repeatedly, as a teacher, but I was not out of town all the time. I never saw them at their home in Oxford-st.

Q. Well, where did you see them next after they moved from Oxford-st. in their home? A. I suppose at 48 Livingston-st. again before they moved down.

Q. Have you seen them in their present home in Livingston-st.? A. In their former home?

Q. 174 Livingston-st.? A. I have.

Q. How much time have you spent in their family during their residence at 174 Livingston-st.? A. Not a great deal; I was at one time, when Mr. and Mrs. Tilton were absent with their children for a few days—a week perhaps; I don't remember.

Q. Well? A. I have not spent much time under that roof; very little.

Q. Well, how often have you visited there? A. During the first year and a half of their residence there quite frequently I was—

Q. Spending about how much time at a visit? A. Oh, not very long; an hour or two; they were calls chiefly; I was very busy with school; I could not be there very much.

Q. Well? A. In the year 1867 I discontinued my visits there very largely.

Q. After 1867? A. Excepting during Mr. Tilton's absence from home.

THE TILTONS' EARLY MARRIED LIFE.

Q. Now, Miss Oakley, will you tell us how Mr. and Mrs. Tilton lived together during the first years of their married life, whether pleasantly or otherwise? A. In general their relations were pleasant.

Q. Did you at any time, on visiting their house or being with them, observe a change in his treatment of Mrs. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. What was it? A. After their removal to their home at 176 Livingston-st.—or 186.

Mr. Shearman—Then 186.

The Witness—Mr. Tilton was less agreeable in his family less at home, probably, and when there he was more moody than formerly. He was sometimes openly critical of his wife in my presence; was negligent of her frequently.

Q. Have you heard him reproach his wife for anything at any time in your presence? A. I have heard him disparage her for using the English language incorrectly.

Q. Well, what did he say? A. I heard him at table one time say openly to his children that he hoped they would never use such English as their mother did.

Q. In her presence? A. In her presence at the table.

Q. What else did he say on that subject? A. I don't remember anything else in that connection.

Q. Did you observe at any time—I will put another question. In your early acquaintance with them, were you acquainted also with the friends and associates of Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, to a degree.

Q. You knew with whom he associated, who visited him at his house, did you? A. To a certain degree, I did.

Q. Did you at any time, observe a change in those friends and associates?

Mr. Beach—Well, one moment, I object to his calling for a judgment or opinion of the witness. They can ask who the persons were, could ask her judgment as to whether they were a different class of people.

Mr. Tracy—I didn't ask whether they were a different class of people; I asked whether she had observed a change in his friends and associates.

Mr. Morris—We object to the question.

Mr. Evarts—She can say yes or no.

Mr. Morris—I know she can say yes or no.

Mr. Tracy—Then we will find out what the change was, if she did observe a change. If she says she did not, that will be an end of the inquiry.

Judge Neilson—I think she may answer yes or no.

The Witness—I did observe a change.

Q. When did you first observe that change, Miss Oakley? A. I cannot say when; I suppose it was gradual; my observation of it was gradual, probably.

Q. When do you recollect of observing it—during what years, if you can state? A. Why, I would say after the year 1866, when I came to live in Brooklyn; I knew of various visitors at the house whom I would rather not meet—

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—Strike that out.

Mr. Beach—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Strike that out; yes Sir. [To Mr. Tracy]. Here is an appeal that you repeat the answers.

Mr. Tracy—I will try and observe that, your Honor.

Q. Did you observe friends and associates visiting the house who had not visited during your prior acquaintance with the family? A. Certainly.

Mr. Tracy—She says certainly, she didn't observe that change.

Mr. Beach—No, she didn't say that; she said certainly.

Mr. Tracy—That answers the question.

Mr. Beach—I beg you not to add it to the question.

Q. Who were these friends and associates that visited the house in 1866 or 1867?

Mr. Beach—She has not said they were associates, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—The first question included friends and associates—the first question did and the second one, and she answered—

Judge Neilson—Ask her simply who they were.

Mr. Tracy—Who were they? A. Those persons who were acquainted with him.

Mr. Beach—That calls for names.

Mr. Fullerton—And personal knowledge, also.

Judge Neilson—The question is, Who were they. If you know, say so; and if you don't, say so.

The witness—I can recollect Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton.

Q. You can recollect Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton. Who else do you recollect? A. I know of Mr. Stephen Andrews being there.

Q. Stephen Pearl Andrews? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Any one else that you remember? A. I don't recall any other names now.

Q. You don't recall any other names now. Did you observe, at or about this time, a change in Mr. Tilton's views on the subject of the marriage relation? A. I heard him openly express views upon that subject.

Q. What views did you hear him express upon that subject? A. I would perhaps better modify what I said last. I heard him openly say that he no longer held such views as he formerly held on that subject.

Q. You heard him say he no longer held such views as he formerly held on the subject of the married relation. When did you hear him say that? A. I heard him say that at the table.

Q. At the table. Who was present at the table? I think Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton were there on that occasion.

Q. You think Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton were there on that occasion. Was Mrs. Tilton present? A. She was.

Q. Mrs. Tilton was also present. Were the other members of the family present? A. The children.

Q. The children were also present. Did he say anything more on that occasion than that? A. I have forgotten any further conversation than that. It left an impression on me.

Q. You have forgotten any further conversation at that time? A. At that time.

Q. Did you observe what effect, if any, that produced upon Mrs. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. What effect did it produce? A. It grieved her and brought tears to her eyes.

Q. Her eyes filled with tears?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir.

Q. Brought tears to her eyes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What did she do? A. I don't recollect that she did anything.

Q. You don't recollect that she did anything? A. I have part of an impression that she left the table, but I could not say that she did.

Q. You have a recollection that she left the table, but could not say she did?

Mr. Morris—She did not say so. She said "part of an impression."

Mr. Tracy—You have a part of an impression that she left the table, but cannot say certainly? A. No, Sir.

Q. At any other time, did you hear him discuss the marriage relation? A. No time that I can definitely recall, but I have heard him talk a great deal, and had a great deal of conversation with him on many topics.

Q. On the subject of the marriage relation? A. I cannot say precisely.

MR. TILTON'S SHIFTING RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

Q. Now, did you at any time observe a change in his religious sentiments also? A. I did.

Q. You did. At what time did you observe this change in his religious views? A. That change was very gradual, running along through all the years, perhaps, from 1860 to 1870, during which I saw him more or less.

Q. That change was gradual from the year 1860 to 1870? A. To 1867 or 1868.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer—She said 1870.

The Witness—I did say so, a general statement, but I saw very little of Mr. Tilton after 1867. I doubt if I had much conversation with him on any subject during 1868 and 1867. On the contrary, I can say certainly I did not in 1870.

Q. You saw but little of him after 1867? A. Very little; I hardly ever saw him.

Q. So you fix the time—the period of this change within your knowledge from 1860 to 1870? A. Ten years previous to that; about that.

Q. What was that change? A. A change from what were considered the orthodox views.

Mr. Beach—I beg pardon.

Judge Neilson—The question is what he said. The question is what did Mr. Tilton say on that subject?

The Witness—I understand, I am recalling it; I heard Mr. Tilton declare that his belief in the atonement was no longer what it had been, for one thing.

Q. You heard him declare that his belief in the atonement was no longer what it had been, for one thing? A. It was no longer the accepted view of the atonement—the orthodox view.

Q. What else? A. I cannot recollect any definite statement of his. Having had many conversations, I am confident that they included all sorts of subjects.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Q. Did you hear him say anything on the subject of his belief in the divinity of the Scriptures? A. The inspiration of the Scriptures? I have; I am sure we talked of it.

Q. What were his views of the inspiration of the Scriptures? Judge Neilson—What did he say? A. I cannot say; I cannot recall the conversation.

Q. Can you recall the substance of it? A. Yes, Sir; I can swear Mr. Tilton no longer held our old fashioned belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures.

Mr. Morris—[To Judge Neilson]—Is that proper testimony?

Judge Neilson—No.

Mr. Morris—I move to strike it out.

Judge Neilson—It is struck out. It is an inference or deduction of the witness.

Q. What did he say on that subject? A. I could not possibly recall our conversations; I have talked a great deal with him on these topics, and I have talked on the orthodox side, and he on the opposing side; that is all I can say.

Q. Can you say whether or not, in substance, he said he believed in the inspiration of the Scriptures?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—That is answering for the witness.

Q. Now, can you say, Miss Oakley, whether he, in substance, said he did not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures?

Mr. Beach—Objected to.

Judge Neilson—That is leading and improper, and ruled out

It calls for the opinion of the witness. What did he say, in substance, on the subject of his belief in the inspirations of the Scriptures?

Mr. Beach—What he said.

Mr. Tracy—In substance.

The Witness—I understand.

Q. Well, what is your answer? A. That he did not believe in their inspiration.

Q. He said that he did not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures?

Mr. Beach—Does she say so?

The Witness—I answered so.

MRS. TILTON'S GRIEF AT HER HUSBAND'S UNBELIEF.

Q. Now, did you observe, Miss Oakley, the effect that this change in his religious sentiments had upon Mrs. Tilton? A. I did.

Q. What effect did it have? A. It was a constant source of trouble to her; she often solicited me to talk with her husband—Mr. Beach—That is not proper, madam.

Q. Did you talk with him in pursuance of the suggestion or request of Mrs. Tilton? A. It is those conversations I tried to give the result of, but the facts of the conversation I could not recall, with the one exception I swore to.

Q. Those conversations you say you had with him at the request of Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—That is not proper.

Mr. Tracy—Why not?

Mr. Beach—Simply because it is not. I have no particular objection to it.

Mr. Tracy—I was repeating the substance of her answer.

Mr. Beach—I objected to it at the time.

Mr. Tracy—I did not understand it.

Mr. Beach—It is not of any importance.

Q. State whether or not this request of Mrs. Tilton upon you to talk with Mr. Tilton on the subject of his religious opinions was frequent? A. It was frequent.

Q. Did you frequently talk with him on that subject? A. We often had talks on that subject.

Q. At the request of his wife? A. Yes, Sir; and with her—mutual conversations: they were not lectures.

Q. To what degree did this change in his religious sentiments affect Mrs. Tilton? A. It depressed her constantly.

Q. How did she manifest that depression? A. By telling me—

Mr. Beach—I don't think it is proper.

Q. How did she manifest it in his presence, or to you; not by what she said, but by her acts and conduct? A. I don't think I inferred from that—

Mr. Morris—One moment.

The Witness—But from things she said—from her words.

Q. I will ask you this question: Did you or not ever see her weeping when the subject of his religious opinions was the subject of conversation?

Mr. Beach—Between whom?

Mr. Tracy—[To the witness.] Between yourself, Mrs. Tilton and her husband? A. I cannot recollect that she ever wept.

MRS. TILTON AS A WIFE AND MOTHER.

Q. You cannot recollect that. Now, Miss Oakley, did you observe the character of Mrs. Tilton as a wife and mother? A. I did.

Q. What was it? A. As a mother, tender and wise; as a wife, passionately devoted to her husband.

Q. As a mother, tender and wise; as a wife, passionately devoted to her husband. How long did this continue? A. Since I knew her; since I knew them together up till now.

Q. Since you knew them together? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, how long has your acquaintance continued with Mrs. Tilton? A. Up to the present time.

Q. Up to the present time. Were you at the house in Livingston-st. in the Winter of 1869—in the Winter of 1869-70? A. I think I was there the February of that Winter once, for a short call on Mrs. Tilton.

Q. How long did you remain? A. Oh! not half an hour. I think I can identify it as that Winter. It was after her trouble.

Q. How often did you visit Mrs. Tilton after 1867? From that until the year 1872, when I left the city, not very frequently; during the absence of her husband, perhaps once a week or once in two weeks.

Q. You continued your visits once a week, or once in two weeks, down to what time? A. Down to 1872.

Mr. Morris—She says during the absence of her husband.

Mr. Tracy—Yes, during the absence of her husband.

The Witness—Down to 1872.

Q. Did this devotion of Mrs. Tilton to her husband continue as long as you knew her? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I object to that. She has not shown any capacity to judge between the husband and the wife after 1867.

Mr. Tracy—She has shown that she has known the wife continuously, visiting her house once a week, or once in two weeks, down to 1872.

Mr. Morris—During the absence of the husband, she says.

Mr. Tracy—I don't see that that makes any difference. She has a right to judge of the conduct of the two in the home and family, what she said and did on the subject. The correspondence has been introduced as a mere statement of the wife and the husband towards each other.

Judge Neilson—You may ask what she observed, if anything.

Mr. Tracy—That is what I do ask.

Judge Neilson—No. Did she observe anything?

Mr. Morris—Those were communications between themselves.

Judge Neilson—One moment, gentlemen. This is too plain to be the subject of any trouble. Did you notice anything in their intercourse bearing on her regard for her husband, and if so, what, I think might be the question.

Q. Did you introduce anything in her intercourse at the time you visited her?

Mr. Beach—After 1867.

Mr. Tracy—After 1867, bearing upon her affection for her husband? A. She read me his letters during the Autumn.

Judge Neilson—Say yes or no, Madam.

The Witness—Yes.

Judge Neilson—She did observe something.

Mr. Tracy—What did you observe? A. I have heard extracts from the letters that were written when he was away. He was always spoken of—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment. I object to what she said.

Mr. Tracy—Well, we insist upon what she said as legal evidence and competent evidence. What she said concerning her affection and devotion to her husband is competent evidence.

Judge Neilson—Well, let her answer.

Mr. Beach—Note our exception.

The Witness—I have heard her speak of him—

Mr. Tracy—Go on, Miss Oakley.

The Witness—And always in the same tone.

Mr. Beach—No, Madam, please say what she said. A. I don't remember it.

Mr. Tracy—Can you not remember the substance of what she said? A. Why, yes, in substance she spoke of him always as before that with the same admiration and devotion, never in any other way. We didn't talk of him as much, though, as we used to; I don't think so. That was the reason.

Q. You observed no change in her feelings towards her husband?

Mr. Beach—That is objected to.

Judge Neilson—I think she has answered all she can on that subject. She has virtually said she saw no change.

MR. BEECHER'S CALLS ON THE TILTONS.

Q. While acquainted with the family, did you see Mr. Beecher at Mr. Tilton's house? A. I have.

Q. Making calls upon the family? A. Making calls.

Q. How often have you seen him there? A. Not more than half a dozen times; I should think that was all; perhaps not so often.

Q. Did you see him in the presence of the family and Mrs. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir, I have seen him with the children on one occasion—up stairs with the children, and my call was up stairs also. In Livingston-st. I recollect one social call when I was there—I mean at 48, and I can recollect two or three times at 176 Livingston-st. meeting Mr. Beecher either in the house or coming from there, and I think once I met him at the gate; in all, I should say half a dozen times, and once I recollect on stated occasions, when he was invited there in the evening—

Q. You mean to say you have seen him half a dozen times calling on Mrs. Tilton and the children—seen them together at the two houses.

Mr. Beach—She does not say she saw them together half a dozen times.

Mr. Tracy—That is what I asked her. [To the witness.] What do you say to that, Miss Oakley? A. I recollect once meeting Mr. Beecher at the gate.

Q. I know. A. He had just come from the house. I would include that in the half dozen times. On the other occasions I saw him with the family; I don't remember exactly who was there. It would be impossible to remember.

Q. What did you observe in his intercourse with Mrs. Tilton?
A. I observed only that he was friendly with the children, and acting as a friend; nothing more.

Q. Did you observe anything that indicated an unusual affection between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton?

Mr. Beach—It is objected to.

Mr. Morris—That calls for an objection.

Mr. Beach—She can state what she observed.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—That is a question upon which we have a right to the opinion of the witness.

Mr. Fullerton—Is she an expert?

Mr. Tracy—I don't call her an expert. That is a question where a witness who has seen them together is entitled to give an opinion under all the rules of evidence.

Mr. Beach—We object to it.

Judge Neilson—[To Mr. Tracy.] You can ask her what she observed.

Mr. Tracy—I understand.

Judge Neilson—I don't know whether you do or not.

Mr. Tracy—I asked her if she saw anything which indicated an unusual affection between Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton.

Judge Neilson—It is not for you to frame your question so as to indicate the answer you want. Ask her if she observed anything as to their intercourse.

Mr. Tracy—I will take your Honor's ruling on my question as I put it.

Judge Neilson—It is ruled out as you put it. It is easily modified.

Mr. Tracy—Now, what did you observe upon those calls of Mr. Beecher touching his intercourse with Mrs. Tilton? A. I observed friendliness and good nature on his part, and friendliness on hers.

Q. Anything more? A. No, Sir; no more; what I observed in Mr. Beecher in other houses, friendly calls simply, when we were all together.

Q. Did you observe anything more than a mere friendly call? A. Nothing more.

Q. At the time of these calls, did or did not Mr. Beecher spend his time with the children, more or less? A. On two such occasions I recollect that the children were the chief objects of attention. They are the only two occasions of which I have a very distinct recollection; the others were informal.

Q. Describe how he spent the time with the children, Miss Oakley? A. I don't believe I can.

Q. What his intercourse with the children was? A. I don't believe I can. I recollect his playing with Carroll when he was a baby on one of those occasions; on the other I could not describe anything. I know we were together in the second story front room, which was the sitting and reception room for intimate friends, and I recollect the picture of Mr. Beecher sitting there, and the children playing about; nothing further.

Q. Do you recollect the children being on his lap? A. I don't know that I do.

Q. What time of day were these visits usually made, so far as you observed? A. I could not possibly tell. It was during daylight.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MISS OAKLEY.

Mr. Fullerton—Miss Oakley, I did not understand you to tell us how often you visited the house after 1867? A. Do I understand you to ask me a question?

Q. Yes. Please state. A. How often I visited the house after 1867?

Q. Yes. A. From that until 1872; not as frequently as before, and yet perhaps as often as once a fortnight.

Q. Since the Autumn of 1870, how often have you visited the house—up to the time that Mrs. Tilton left? A. I was away from Brooklyn from the Autumn of 1872 until within a few months; I have been living in Connecticut, and from 1870 to 1872 I was there—well, I suppose perhaps once a month; may be a little oftener; perhaps not as often. I don't think less than once a month.

Q. Well, you heard of this scandal, did you not? A. I have heard of it from the publications. When do you refer to?

Q. When did you first hear of it? A. You mean the public scandal, as it now exists, as it stands before the public?

Q. Well, not with all its accumulations, but when it first started did you not hear of it? A. When it first became public here?

Q. Yes. A. I heard of it in New Haven.

Q. When first? A. In the Fall of 1872, I think it was; after the Woodhull publication.

Q. Have you been excited, somewhat, upon the subject from that time to this? A. I have taken a deep interest; I could not be said to have been excited.

Q. You took sides, did you not? A. Oh, decidedly!

MISS OAKLEY'S INFLUENCE ON FLORENCE TILTON.

Q. Did you ever make an effort to have any other person take the same side that you did in regard to it? A. Not of my own pushing of the case before others, but when it has been put to me I have always expressed my opinion.

Q. Connections? A. My connections.

Q. Did you ever undertake to influence the eldest daughter of Mr. Tilton upon that subject? A. No, I never had a word with her upon the subject that I can remember, if I can except having written her once this Winter some words—a few words in respect to her own course; never before that, that I can remember.

Q. Then you communicated with her in writing? A. This Winter I have written her once.

Q. In that letter did you attempt to influence her upon the one side or the other of this controversy?

Mr. Evarts—We object to that.

Mr. Shearman—You need not answer that.

Judge Neilson—Well, the letter will prove.

Mr. Fullerton—I believe it will.

The Witness—I should be willing it should be read if it all may be read.

Mr. Beach—Can't we ask her whether she wrote upon her tain occasion, a certain sentiment, without producing the letter, on cross-examination?

Judge Neilson—If she wrote upon a certain subject.

Mr. Beach—It is the constant course pursued here, and I submit is admissible in law, to ask her whether she did not say, either by words or writing, upon a certain occasion, to a certain person, a certain thing.

Mr. Tracy—That is not the question that counsel put. The question was whether she did not attempt to influence her.

Mr. Beach—That we can ask her on cross-examination.

Judge Neilson—I think you can, on cross-examination.

Mr. Shearman—If your Honor please, that question was settled fifty years ago in the House of Lords, in the Queen's case.

Mr. Fullerton—That is too long ago.

Mr. Shearman—It is older than most of us here. It was there settled that before they could even ask whether a person had made representations on a certain subject, and that on cross-examination that they were bound to show whether it was in writing or verbal, and if it was in writing to show the letter.

Mr. Beach—And our Court of Appeals have settled that when we ask the witness the question whether or not a certain declaration was made, if it appears to be in writing we can hand the writing to the witness, but we still can insist upon an answer to the question which is put.

Mr. Fullerton—That is better than the House of Lords, a good deal.

Mr. Beach—Yes; and it is a little more recent.

Mr. Tracy—It is exactly the same thing, if your Honor please; they have not shown the letter.

Mr. Beach—That is not the question. We have not insisted upon that at all, and we are perfectly willing the lady should see the letter.

Mr. Everts—There is no doubt you may show a letter or any other paper to a witness, and take the answer after seeing the paper.

Mr. Beach—That ain't the decision in Queen Caroline's case, as Shearman reports it.

Judge Neilson—Now, then, Mr. Fullerton, you have got the letter there?

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, Sir.

Judge Neilson—Go on.

Mr. Fullerton—How did you send that letter, Miss Oakley? A. I have forgotten; I think I sent it to the school at which the young lady was teaching.

Q. Where was she teaching at the time? A. I think in the public school No. 4.

Q. And where were you when you wrote the letter? A. I was on Grand-ave.

Q. In this city? A. In this city.

Q. Did any one suggest to you to write that letter? A. I don't recollect it.

Q. Task your recollection as well as you can, Miss Oakley; didn't somebody suggest to you to write that letter? A. As to the letter in question I think I can say no; as to the subject of having some conversation with Florence, I think it was spoken of between me and others of her friends.

Q. Ah! about having a communication with Florence. Did you write that letter until you heard that Florence might be a witness for her father on the trial of this case? A. I think it was with reference to that that the letter was written.

Q. Yes; that is a candid answer. And who suggested to you, pray, that Florence might be a witness for her father? A. That was a matter that I probably heard from several.

Q. Please name them? A. It was a matter of conversation between me and several of those who knew the course of the trial.

Q. Name them, please? A. I think Miss Moore may have spoken of it to me. I think Mrs. Morse may have.

Q. Miss Augusta Moore, the witness who testified yesterday? A. Yes, Sir. Mrs. Morse, I think, spoke of it.

Q. That is the mother of Mrs. Tilton, I believe? A. That is Mrs. Tilton's mother.

Q. Please name a third, if you can? A. I don't think—unless Mrs. Ovington may have mentioned it to me.

Q. Did Mr. Ovington? A. Mrs. Ovington.

Q. Mrs. Ovington? A. I cannot say; I know it was spoken of as between me and those interested in the trial as a possibility, and deprecated as such.

Mr. Beach—We don't ask for that.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes.

Mr. Beach—Oh, no!

Mr. Fullerton—Yes; they deprecated it. [To the witness.] Do you think, according to your best recollection, that Mrs. Ovington was one of the persons who spoke to you upon the subject? A. Oh, I don't know. I have had a good many—not a good many, but several communications with her in respect to the trial.

Q. Well, your best recollection upon that subject please give me, Miss Oakley. A. I couldn't say truly; perhaps not.

Q. I don't quite understand what you mean by your answer. "Perhaps not" is not an answer to my question. A. I think, perhaps, Mrs. Ovington was not one; yet she may have been.

Q. Well, have you any recollection upon the subject that will enable you to state whether she was or was not one of the persons? A. I couldn't say distinctly who mentioned to me that Florence—that Mr. Tilton's eldest daughter—might be called to the witness stand; but that I knew that it was anticipated, I can say; and it was the result of conversations with several of those who were interested in the trial.

CLOSE QUESTIONING.

Q. Now, my question is whether Mrs. Ovington was one of those several persons who thus talked to you on the subject? A. I felt that she may have been. I cannot say, certain.

Q. What is your best recollection upon the subject? A. Why, I don't know that I can improve it.

Q. Well, give it to me without being improved, then. A. Then you have had my best recollection.

Q. No; I beg your pardon. You have not given me your best recollection. You say she might have been one of them. Now, I want to know whether, according to your best recollection, she actually was one of them? A. Well, I feel that I gave you my best recollection when I first answered you.

Q. When you said she might have been one? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, I know she might be one, and so any other person might be one who was not one? A. I included her with the several with whom I have talked who were interested in the subject, and it is possible that she was one of them; it is possible that she was not. I am not sure that Miss Moore was; I think she was. I think it has been spoken of between several of us.

Q. Well, do you think that Mrs. Ovington talked with you about the possibility of Florence becoming a witness for her father? That I understand you to say. A. I feel that it is possible that I have talked with her, but I have not had many conversations with her—but two or three times.

Q. Now, can you name any other person than those you have named? A. I think it was spoken of between me and Mrs. Tilton.

Q. Yes, Ma'am. How often? A. I don't think often. I have not seen Mrs. Tilton often; probably once.

Q. Do you recollect more than one occasion when Mrs. Tilton spoke to you about it? A. No; I do not positively recollect an occasion, but I know it has been spoken of by some of those of us who have talked together about it.

Q. Now, can you name any one else who spoke to you upon that subject—with whom you have conversed upon the subject of the possibility or probability of Florence becoming a witness in this case? A. I cannot think of any one else.

Q. Well, what was the purport of the talk as to how you should communicate with her? A. I don't know. I don't understand that I was requested to communicate with her. Do you wish me to say that?

Q. You told me that you were not requested to write to her, and I inferred, probably, from that that you were requested to communicate with her in some other way? A. No, I have not been acting as any one's agent in the matter. I wrote the outflow of my own feelings towards the child; I am sure of that.

Q. Was not the suggestion made that it better be done by some one, and that it ought to be done? A. I could not certainly say.

Q. Was not the suggestion that it better be done, or ought to be done, without requesting or intimating that there was any desire that you should do it? A. I could not tell you that. I don't fairly remember what I wrote, but I recollect writing.

Q. It is not in reference to what you wrote, Miss Oakley; it is in reference to what was the subject of the conversation with you before you wrote. Now, was it suggested that Florence ought to be communicated with in some way, without suggesting that you should do it? A. It may be so. I could not deny that nor assert it.

Q. Is it your recollection that it was so? A. Why, I suppose it was, although I cannot fairly recollect the occasion, nor the statement.

Q. By whom did you send that letter? A. That I forget; but I know I did not send it by post, because I did not know precisely where the school was. Oh, yes, I did, too. I don't know fairly now. I recollect not knowing where the school was, and I think I asked somebody to ascertain where the school was and post it for me—my niece, who did many errands for me in the Winter.

Q. You think she carried the letter? A. No; I think she found the address of the school and posted it for me.

Q. Now, before writing that letter, Miss Oakley, had it come to your ears in any way what Florence would probably testify to if she were put upon the stand as a witness? A. No.

Q. Did not a rumor reach your ears as to what she might testify to? A. No, it was a matter of speculation as between me and those who talked about it, but as to there being any rumor as to what she would testify to, I cannot say that there was.

Q. What was the extent of the speculation upon that subject? Mr. Tracy—We object to that, your Honor.

Mr. Evarts—Any action of this witness-bearing upon her attitude towards the cause or towards the parties is legitimate evidence, of course.

Mr. Fullerton—That is the reason I put the question.

Mr. Evarts—The speculations of other people are not.

Judge Neilson—I think you have it sufficiently, Mr. Fullerton.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, if your Honor will permit me to try in another way.

Judge Neilson—Well.

Mr. Fullerton—At the time of writing that letter, had you a fear, however faint, that Florence might testify to something against her mother? A. I think I can fairly say that in writing that letter—I can barely recall what is in it now.

Q. Well, I didn't ask you about writing the letter, any further than— A. I want to make my own statement.

Judge Neilson—The word "no" answered the question.

The Witness—All right; no, then.

Mr. Fullerton—You had no apprehension, however faint, that her testimony might mitigate against her mother in any degree? A. I had no apprehension on any ground of my own knowledge.

Q. That is not what I asked you, Miss Oakley. [To the Stenographer.] Please read the question.

THE TRIBUNE stenographer read the last question.

Mr. Evarts—Is not that within our last objection?

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir; that is personal to the witness. I changed my question so as to avoid your objection.

Mr. Evarts—Ah!

Judge Neilson—I think it goes to the quality of the witness's mind.

Mr. Evarts—The question is whether when she wrote the letter she had apprehensions.

Mr. Fullerton—In answer to that question, I want to know what was the prevailing or guiding influence of apprehension at the time.

Judge Neilson—I think it goes to the mind of the witness.

Mr. Evarts—Very well.

Mr. Fullerton—What is your answer, Miss Oakley? A. I have answered, I believe. I had no apprehension from any reasons of my own.

Q. Now, Miss Oakley, pardon me, I did not ask you if you had any apprehension from any reason of your own; I asked you whether you had any apprehensions, whatever they may have grown out of, that Florence might give evidence that would militate in some degree against her mother, when you wrote that letter? A. Can I be said to have had apprehensions which were—when I may have had thoughts that were the result of the communications of other people? If it had been—

Q. I refer to apprehensions in your own mind, whatever may have been the origin of them.

Mr. Beach—Or any expectations? A. I am puzzled to know how to answer it. I do not feel that I can say that I had apprehensions that Florence would give testimony against her mother.

Q. Not in the slightest degree? A. Yes; I think I can say—I had no reasonable grounds for such apprehensions.

Q. That is not the question, Miss Oakley? A. I do not believe I can be said to have had apprehensions.

Q. Whether reasonable or unreasonable, did you have any apprehensions, however slight, that Florence might go upon the stand as a witness in this case, and give evidence that possibly might militate against her mother? A. I feared that she might be called to the witness stand. I knew that it was a matter of deprecation among all of us as towards her; beyond that I cannot say that I had apprehensions as to what would be the result of any testimony she would give.

Q. Didn't it enter into your consideration at all—the result of her testimony? A. I don't think it did, not as far as the evidence she could give was concerned, but her presence as a witness—I think I felt that.

Q. Would militate against her mother? A. It would be unfortunate. I think I had that feeling.

Q. Did you think it would militate? A. Oh, as to anything she would say; I don't think I had any feeling of that sort.

Q. Had no rumor reached you at all as to what she might say? A. No, I don't think that I felt that any apprehension—

Q. No, no. Had no rumor reached your ears as to what she might say? A. That I cannot say.

Q. I want you to reflect a moment. A. Well, then, I cannot say that none had reached my ears; I cannot remember to have heard anything—

Q. How? A. I cannot remember to have heard anything that she would or would not say, but that she might be called to the stand.

Q. Was not there a rumor afloat that she might be called and might say something? A. There was a rumor afloat that she might be called on the side of the plaintiff, and we presumed that she would be asked to say things on that side, and that, I suppose, was the animus of my writing that letter.

Q. That she might say things on that side? A. If she was called on that side, it would be presumed that she was expected to. I know nothing further.

Q. You say that was the animus? A. That, I suppose—I suppose that was the reason. I should like to know what I wrote; I have forgotten.

Q. Well, I will show you in a moment. We want to get at the motives first. A. I should remember my motive better if I could see what I wrote. Can I not see it?

Q. Not now. Let me ask you one more question. If I understand you correctly then, you say that you heard that Florence might be called as a witness for her father, and that she might say things that would be in aid of his cause? A. No, I didn't say that.

Mr. Evarts—No, she has not said that.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, Mr. Reporter, will you repeat what she has said.

The Witness—I said it was presumable—I said it was to be presumed, as being called by that side, that she might.

Mr. Fullerton—Yes, and that was your animus in writing the letter.

Mr. Evarts—The present question is whether she had not heard that she would say something.

Mr. Fullerton—No, no.

Mr. Evarts—It is exactly the distinction that the witness has drawn, that what she knew was that she was to be called, and presumably a witness would not be called unless she could say something.

Mr. Fullerton—I ask to have the reporter read what she said upon that subject.

The Witness—I was unfortunate in using the word “animus,” I suppose.

Mr. Fullerton—Perhaps it was unfortunate.

The Witness—I do not feel that it was the result of reflection or perhaps the proper word to use.

Mr. Fullerton—[To the stenographer.] Well, if you don't find it I will go on. [To the witness.] You had an object in writing Miss Florence a letter, had you not? A. I had.

THE OBJECT OF THE LETTER TO KEEP MISS FLORENCE FROM THE STAND.

Q. What was that object? A. Well, I will have to think a moment. It was undoubtedly to influence her to determine to be called by neither side. I have the impression that in the letter I begged her, as far as it was in her power, to keep quiet and not to allow herself to be called forward as a witness in the case.

Q. Miss Oakley, did you apprehend— A. I think that my feeling in writing that letter was a feeling of pity for the poor girl. I was sorry that she was in any way to be called.

Mr. Beach—[To Mr. Fullerton.] Now, don't let her run on.

Mr. Fullerton—Did you apprehend that Miss Florence would be called as a witness for her mother? A. I don't know whether that had been mentioned. The apprehension—

Q. Or for Mr. Beecher, rather, I should say.

Mr. Evarts—Let us hear what the apprehension was. She began to tell you what the apprehension was.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, she will finish it in her own way. [To the witness.] Did you fear, after your talk with Mrs. Tilton, that Florence would be called as a witness for the defense in this case? A. I cannot say positively that I did. I deprecated her being called.

Q. Now, that is the answer to the question? A. Very well, you have my answer; I cannot remember.

Q. You cannot remember whether you did or not? A. Very well, Mr. Fullerton; I think I can say that I felt it would be a very cruel thing to call the young lady.

Q. No, that is not the question. No, no; that is not the question. You make me do a cruel thing to interrupt you so often.

A. You want to know why I wrote the letter, do you?

Q. I want to know this— A. I can say why.

Q. Whether when you wrote your letter you apprehended that Florence might be called as a witness for the defense in this case? A. I cannot say that I did.

Q. Now, then, I will put another question to you. Didn't you apprehend that she might be called as a witness on the part of the plaintiff? A. I think it was a matter of public advertisement, that had been mentioned in the letters or somewhere, in the newspapers. It was not a mere apprehension; it was an expectation.

Q. Then was it not to prevent that that you wrote the letter?

A. I suppose it was.

MISS OAKLEY'S LETTERS.

Q. [Paper handed to witness]. Now, is that the letter which you wrote to Florence? A. It is my handwriting.

Q. Very well; Madam won't you please answer the question?

A. It is my handwriting.

Q. It is the letter; isn't it? A. It is.

Q. And is that the envelope which contained it? A. It is.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I fulfilled my promise to show it to you. [Paper handed to defendant's counsel]. I will ask you this question while they are looking at it. Did you show this letter to any one after you wrote it and before sending it? A. No; I did not.

Q. Did you write more than one letter to Florence? A. I believe not.

Q. Did you have any conversation with her? A. No.

Q. Before or after writing this letter? A. No; I have not seen her; have not seen her since October.

Mr. Fullerton—[Reading]:

426 GRAND-ST., Jan. 4. 1875.

MY DEAR FLORENCE: All the Autumn and Winter, so full of new cares and trials to you, I have been moved many times to come to see you, and offer my sympathy and counsel, if there were need of counsel, for I know the trials of a young life struggling with the irksome daily toll of the schoolroom, and facing all the necessities of life with unaided hands. No doubt there are sweet uses of sweet adversity, but the hardness of the yoke borne by the young merits more of pity and regret than of congratulation. But you have had sorrows to bear that I never knew, for you have been called to judge between your parents, and to mourn over a broken home. I was very glad you had been able to slip along quietly at Mrs. Bradshaw's, where, under the shelter of a friendly roof, you were protected from the public gaze; and I fear you will regret leaving her. You know Mattie and I both loved you in infancy, and through many years when your mother was my dearest and ideal friend, the most devoted wife, the most tender, wise, and sacrificing mother I have seen and known—"I have seen—wise and sacrificing mother"—perhaps that is a period—"I have seen and known a great many women, seen a great many mothers; as a teacher of children I have been intimate with mothers, but I have known few like yours. Her soul is bound up in her children now more than ever, even though if she had been widowed, and all the happiness life can bring her will come through them. Do my dear Flora, consider well her claims on your fidelity and love, and in this extremity hold up her heart and hands. None knows better than I that it is she, and not your father, who now deserves loyalty and service, if any is able to serve her alone, after the fullness of a mother's life with every tie rent, she stands bleeding at all her life's arteries, and for no fault, but too weak a fondness for her husband. Your mother has been true to every one but herself, but her blind sacrifice of self to save him has led only to disaster. Do you not, dear Flora, take up that wretched role. Do not persuade yourself that you can help him. He it is who, in the vigor of his years and with the accumulated experience of a life, should protect and advance your woman's hands. If you have service to render and if you care to keep the best blessing of your future, cherish your mother. I hoped most earnestly that you would be spared any open avowal of your feelings and position towards your parents. I hope so still. May it not be forced on you by the selfish hand that has robbed every one to maintain his wretched case. But let no one persuade you to act in any way that will compromise your mother, before that shortsighted and hasty public, whom he studies to deceive. I do not want to say to you what I think of your father; but I cannot say anything without admitting my horror of his conduct, both towards his family and the public, debauched by his publications. I only want to plead with you for your loving suffering, mute and patient mother.

Lovingly, your friend,

ISABELLA G. OAKLEY.

[Marked Exhibit 112.]

Q. After writing that letter, did you tell any one that you had written it? A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Did you not tell Mrs. Tilton that you wrote it? A. Yes; I think I did; I recollect mentioning that I had written it—

Q. Did you tell Mrs. Ovington that you had written it? A. I don't know—no; I suppose not.

Q. Did you tell Mrs. Morse that you had written it? A. I presume I did.

Q. Does it rest only in presumption? A. No; I am sure that I did—I think I recollect mentioning to Mrs. Tilton that I had written to Florence; I had received no answer; and that is why I spoke of it to her.

MR. TILTON'S DISGUST WITH HIS WIFE'S ENGLISH.

Q. Well, I didn't ask for the conversation between you at all. Now, Miss Oakley, you were present once when Mr. Tilton called your attention, or the attention of the family, to the fact that his wife had spoken bad English? A. Yes; I remember.

Q. And observed to the children that he hoped they would not speak such English; was that all that was said upon the subject at that time. A. I cannot remember anything further.

Q. Well, did you hear what Mrs. Tilton said? A. Oh, she probably said nothing.

Q. Well? A. She usually did not reply—

Q. Well, one moment.

The Witness—To sarcastic observations.

Mr. Fullerton—Oh, Miss Oakley!

Mr. Evans—That is proper testimony.

Mr. Fullerton—It is not proper testimony, and yours was not a proper observation either. I didn't ask you that at all.

The Witness—She said nothing that I remember.

Mr. Fullerton—Now, I beg of you, don't make any occasion for bad blood here. I ask if you heard what Mrs. Tilton said when Mr. Tilton accused her of speaking bad English?

Mr. Evarts—That assumes that she said something. Does not that answer you?

Mr. Beach—She must have said something, if she spoke bad English.

The Witness—Oh! she said something—she made no reply.

Mr. Fullerton—I didn't ask what reply she made.

The Witness—I did not understand your question.

Q. Very well. A. No, I don't recollect what she said.

Q. Do you recollect whether bad English had been used? A. Her error in English would not have made any impression upon me, but her husband's rebuke made an impression upon me.

Q. You don't remember what the bad English was, if there was any? A. No; I suppose there was some to merit such a rebuke; I remember the rebuke very well.

Q. The rebuke was in saying to the children, "I hope you won't use such English as your mother does?" A. As well as the manner of saying it; the words and the manner together made the rebuke.

MR. TILTON'S SOCIALISTIC FRIENDS.

Q. Now, you have spoken of the acquaintances of Mr. Tilton; how early did you know of Miss Anthony's call there? A. I can't tell you.

Q. A little louder. A. I said I could not tell you—I recollect seeing both Miss Anthony—I recollect seeing Miss Anthony there more than once after I returned to live in Brooklyn. Previous to that, my coming and going from Brooklyn was merely as a matter of Summer vacation; in 1866 I came to live in Brooklyn.

Q. When did you come to live here in Brooklyn? A. In 1866; was here in 1872.

Q. When did you see Miss Anthony before that at Mr. Tilton's? A. I don't remember.

Q. Did you see her after that? A. I did, I suppose, after that; I can't place when.

Q. Well, can you state positively that it was not before 1866 that you saw her there first? A. Well, I should say positively that my recollection of her and Mrs. Stanton and other visitors whom I did not like to meet, was after 1866.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not speaking of anybody but Miss Anthony; don't drag in an army of other people; I am going to the others in due time.

The Witness—You mentioned all the visitors—

Q. No, I beg your pardon, I asked you when you first saw Miss Anthony there? A. I can't tell you when first.

Q. Well, I repeat my question: Can you say that it was not prior to 1866 that you saw her there first? A. I should say probably not; that is the best I could tell you.

Q. But you are not certain upon the subject? A. Not very certain—pretty certain that it was between that and 1872 that I saw her there.

Q. How soon after you moved to Brooklyn in 1866 did you see her there? A. I presume, if during that year, it was between 1866 and 1867, between the dates—in which I was there repeatedly.

Q. In what house did you first see her? A. My first recollection of her is at 170—180 it was then—I recollect seeing her there more than once.

Q. More than once? A. It was certainly subsequent to 1866, because they didn't move there until 1866.

Q. She was an equal rights woman, wasn't she? A. I don't know that; I can't say.

Q. How? A. I can't say of my own—her public attitude is understood; I understand her to be as others have understood her—I believe she is a woman suffragist.

Q. Well, was that the objection you had to her, because she was a woman suffragist? A. I objected to all that party.

Q. To all that party? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, were you aware that Mrs. Tilton was one of that party, and the Chairman of the Executive Committee for some years? A. I can't say that I was.

Q. Were you ever present at the house when there were gatherings of people there? A. No, never; I always stood on the other side, but I don't recollect her—don't recollect Mrs. Tilton as President; I think I did know that she was dragged in to some extent.

Q. You knew that she was dragged in? A. I believe that was my feeling about it at the time.

Q. You don't think she went in voluntarily. Why, don't you know that in the absence of her husband on lecturing tours, that she presided at the meetings of the Executive Committee, and that the account was given in all the newspapers in Brooklyn? A. I can't say that I—I could not tell you directly that I knew that—I did know that she was in some way mixed up in it as a result of it—

Q. Did you ever inquire to know whether she was dragged in, or whether she went in?

Mr. Evarts—Inquire from whom?

Mr. Fullerton—Of anybody. How is that, Miss Oakley? A. Why, I have assumed as—

Q. No, I don't ask you to assume. A. Well, then, I never inquired about—

Q. Then what information have you got to enable you to say that she was dragged in, as you understood, or as you thought? A. Information I cannot point to; inference from my knowledge of her.

Q. I am not talking about inferences. A. I want to justify myself in saying what I did.

Q. I know you do, and I think there is some need of it after using the word "dragged;" but will you tell me why you used the word "dragged."

The Witness—Some what? did I understand you, "some" "in some" did you say.

Mr. Fullerton—Some, what?

The Witness—Your last remark I didn't understand about the word "drag."

Mr. Fullerton—You used the word "dragged" in speaking of the manner in which Mrs. Tilton got into the suffrage movement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Now, I ask you if you had any information from any quarter which led you to think that she went in by being dragged, as distinguished from going into it voluntarily and from principle? A. Information?

Q. Yes. A. No.

Q. Very well, then; we will stop there. Now, don't you know that Mrs. Tilton claimed the credit of having brought Mr. Tilton into that movement? A. I don't know that.

Q. Now, when did you see Mrs. Stanton there first? A. O, first and last, probably not over twice, I think; I can recollect seeing her there twice; I know I was there at breakfast once, but when, I can't tell you.

Q. I beg your pardon. Do you remember the question I put to you? A. When I saw Mrs. Stanton?

Q. No, I beg your pardon. A. When I first saw her?

Q. Yes. Now, if you will keep in mind the question—when did you first see Mrs. Stanton at Mr. Tilton's house? A. I could not tell you any more than that probably when I saw Miss Anthony there.

Q. Did you see her there prior to 1866? A. Don't recollect ever seeing either of them in any other house than at 136, and I know they moved there in 1866.

Q. In 1866? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Very well. Now, what was the matter with Mrs. Stanton; was she a suffragist too? A. Why, I believe so—Woman's Rights leader and the head and front of the general movement.

Q. Was that the objection you had to her; was that the reason you didn't like to meet her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. That was the reason; very well. Now, then, as to Stephen Pearl Andrews, when did you see him there? A. I don't recollect.

Q. How? A. I couldn't tell you.

Q. Did you ever see him there? A. I can't tell you positively that I ever did.

Q. Well, if you did, it didn't make any impression on you? A. I have met a great many of Mr. Tilton's guests from time to time.

Q. I know. I am talking about Mr. Andrews's visits. Now, have you any recollection now of ever having seen Stephen Pearl Andrews at the house of Mr. Tilton? A. I can't fix any point. I have a general impression that I have seen him there.

Q. How? A. I have a general impression that I have seen him there. I could not say anything more.

Q. Is that all you can say? A. That is all I can say.

Q. Do you recollect no circumstance connected with his visit, if he made one? A. Simply in regard to this—

Q. Nothing that was said? A. No.

Q. And nothing that was done when he was there, if he was there? A. I can't recall any particulars.

Q. Was it in the day time or night time when you think you have an impression that he was there? A. I have an impression I saw him there one evening.

Q. And that is all you can say about it? A. That is all I can say; yes, Sir.

Q. And can you tell me when you think that was? A. No; I can't tell anything more definite about that.

Q. Now, those are the only persons, then, whom you can name in connection with this change in the associates or the visitors of Mr. Tilton, are they? A. I suppose I could name others if I think a good while; I have a very imperfect memory.

Q. Well, if you can name any more I wish you would do it? A. I knew that Mrs. Woodhull went to the house.

Q. How? A. After I had ceased to go there—I knew that Mrs. Woodhull went and came from the house after I had ceased to go there.

Q. Did you see her there? A. No, I never went—

Q. Did you ever see her there? A. No.

Mr. Fullerton—I move to strike that out.

Judge Neilson—Yes.

Mr. Fullerton—We are speaking of your knowledge.

The Witness—And I say that I know that she went there. Can't I know a thing that I have not seen?

Mr. Fullerton—Not of your own knowledge; that is hearsay?

Mr. Evarts—If she heard it from Mr. Tilton, that is her knowledge?

Mr. Fullerton—She has not seen Mr. Tilton, fortunately or unfortunately.

Mr. Evarts—Since 1867?

HARD LABOR TO GET ANSWERS.

Mr. Fullerton—No, Sir [To the Witness]; Now can you name anybody whom you have seen at Mr. Tilton's while he was undergoing a change of companions or associates, or visitors? A. No, I cannot name any others for I avoided going to the house.

Q. Cannot name any others? A. Not that I have seen there.

Q. And when did this change take place that you have spoken of? A. Oh! It was gradual; I believe I testified before that it was a gradual change of associates.

Q. Well, one moment. If these three persons, if you saw three there, and you cannot tell when they were there, how can you say that change of associates was gradual? A. But then I knew many things that I didn't see. I knew from conversations with Mrs. Tilton, and from other friends.

Q. Well, one moment. I don't ask for these conversations; then you don't know of your own knowledge that there was any change? A. Oh! yes, I still say I know of my own knowledge, but not by my seeing it.

Q. Do you know that these three persons—Miss Anthony, Mrs. Stanton and Stephen Pearl Andrews—did not call there before 1866? A. Did I know that they did not?

Q. Yes? A. No; I don't know that they did not.

Q. Then, how can you say that there was a change in his associates, of your own knowledge? A. I knew a great deal—

Q. No. A. Well, you want to know how I can say?—

Q. You say you knew a great deal, but I don't want you to tell it all. This is my question now, Miss Oakley—you don't know, as I understand you, but what these three persons, Miss Anthony, Mrs. Stanton and Mr. Andrews, called to see Mr. Tilton, prior to 1866, when you saw them there, if that were the date, do you? A. But that they came prior?

Q. Yes? A. No, I don't know but that they came prior.

Q. Very well. If you don't know that, then how do you know that there was a change in respect to his visitors, because there three persons called in 1866? A. I know because I knew the affairs of the household through Mrs. Tilton.

Q. I speak of your own knowledge? A. I assume that to be my own knowledge. Don't I know anything but what I see in respect to the domestic relations of other friends?

Q. You don't know anything about that, except what you saw? A. I think that what friends told me was as good as what I saw.

Q. Miss Oakley, that question was settled before you and I were born, and let it be settled. Now, of your own knowledge and of your own observation, do you know that any change took place in the visitors of that house before or after 1866—now, laying aside what you have heard? A. Further than what I have mentioned; I cannot now recollect individuals.

Q. That is not my question. It is not an answer to it. I shall not be able to get through with you to-day, Miss Oakley, unless you answer my questions. Of your own knowledge, or what you have seen, and not what you have heard—not judging by what you have heard, can you state that there was a change in his associates before or after 1866. It is a very simple question? A. Further than what I have said—if my own knowledge is to be only of what I saw, I cannot recollect other individuals.

Q. That is not my question whether you could recollect other individuals if your knowledge was to be confined to what you saw. A. You limit my knowledge to what I saw. I base my knowledge upon various other things I have to testify.

Q. Basing your knowledge upon what you saw, and not upon what you heard, do you know that there was any change in the visitors of that house? A. I answered that point; I answered that.

Q. What is your answer, yes or no? A. Further than what I have stated?

Q. Yes; but it is just what you have stated that I am overturning by the cross-examination, if possible.

Mr. Tracy—I submit that is not a proper remark.

Mr. Fullerton—Your opinion is not worth much upon that subject.

Q. Now, will you tell me, judging from what you know, what you have observed yourself; and not taking into account what you have heard, can you state that the visitors to Mr. Tilton's house before or after 1866 were not about the same? A. I recollect a long visit there during the Summer of a young lady whom I didn't care to meet there.

Q. Well, is that an answer to my question? A. That is after 1866; it is included; it is one other observation of my own knowledge.

Q. Do you know that that lady didn't go there before 1866, of your knowledge? A. Oh, yes, Sir.

Q. Of your own knowledge? A. Well, I think I do.

Q. You think you do—were you at Mr. Tilton's prior to 1866 all the time? A. No.

Q. How? A. Oh, no.

Q. Then you don't know who called there before 1866, do you? A. I know that this lady came from a farm—

Mr. Evarts—There is some limit to this reasoning with the witness.

Judge Neilson—The witness ought to answer.

Mr. Evarts—That may be.

Judge Neilson—Well, she does not do it. She does not answer the question.

The Witness—Haven't you the examples I have mentioned?

Mr. Evarts—But it does not give the counsel a right to reason with the witness, or your Honor a right to criticize her demeanor.

Judge Neilson—I am not criticising the witness's demeanor at all. I am simply saying that I do not understand the witness to have answered the question—perhaps it is the inexperience of the witness. I think she ought to answer.

Mr. Evarts—That does not give him a right to say that he is overturning her testimony by his cross-examination.

Mr. Morris—He said that he was trying to do that.

Judge Neilson—I think that was improper; I would like to have this lady answer the question; perhaps that would close the examination.

The Witness—I have recalled another instance.

Mr. Fullerton—I am not talking about instances; there is a question before you to answer.

The Witness—Well, put the question again, please—the last question.

Q. Do you know from your own knowledge—what you have seen as distinguished from what you have heard—whether the visitors at Mr. Tilton's house were not about the same before and after 1866? A. I know that they were not.

Q. You know that they were not? A. Putting 1866 as a—yes.

Q. How? A. Yes.

Q. Can you say that Miss Anthony did not visit there before 1866? A. It is the first I recollect meeting her there.

Q. That is not my question. A. Well, I can't say that certainly.

Mr. Tracy—That is the only answer the lady can give.

Mr. Morris—No; it is not.

Mr. Tracy—I submit it is.

Mr. Evarts—The counsel has instructed her that she only knows what she saw.

Mr. Fullerton—That is good instruction.

Mr. Tracy—Now, the witness says: "I didn't see her before."

Mr. Evarts—That is a good answer.

Mr. Fullerton—Do you know that she was not a constant visitor there before 1866? I can tell the gentlemen that she was, if they want to know the object of my question.

Mr. Evarts—You are not on the stand, and that is an improper observation.

Judge Neilson—Both observations are improper.

Mr. Evarts—Now, if your Honor please, it cannot be both right to instruct this witness that she knows nothing but what she saw, and then, when he has asked whether she don't know whether Miss Anthony was there, and she says she never saw her there, then to press the inquiry whether she don't know she was there, otherwise.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I shall press the inquiry until I explode this whole thing.

Mr. Everts—You cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Fullerton—Well, I will have it one way, any way.

Mr. Everts—Now, I suppose people do know things that they do not see.

Judge Neilson—Well, I do not.

Mr. Fullerton—Nobody but the counsel for the defense knows that.

Mr. Everts—There are many things known that are not seen.

Mr. Fullerton—Not to be sworn to on the stand.

Mr. Everts—Yes; to be sworn to.

Judge Neilson—The counsel put the question with great care, unusual care, to get the answer of this witness, as far as she has personal knowledge from what she saw apart from what she had heard, and it struck me the witness might answer yes or no.

Mr. Everts—She has answered that she never saw her there. Then he pressed her, didn't she know.

Mr. Fullerton—I propose to press it to-morrow morning now.

Judge Neilson—He has the right to ask whether she can say she did not see her there.

Mr. Everts—She has answered that she did not see her there.

THE JURORS ASK INDULGENCE.

Judge Neilson—Mr. Fullerton, go on. If the jury will signify that they want to be relieved we will adjourn, but if they will have the kindness and patience to stay if they can until this witness's examination is closed, I think it is important to finish it.

Mr. Carpenter [Foreman of the Jury]: The jurors are very feeble; they say they would like to adjourn.

Judge Neilson—Very well. [To the witness]: You will have to be here in the morning, Miss Oakley. [To the Jury]: Gentlemen, please be in your seats to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The Court here adjourned until 11 o'clock on Thursday.

FORTY-SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

THE PLAINTIFF'S RELATIONS WITH MRS. WOODHULL.

CONCLUSION OF THE TESTIMONY OF MISS OAKLEY—

A LOWELL LAWYER ON BEHALF OF THE DEFENDANT—FAMILIAR AND LOVING CONDUCT OF MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL DESCRIBED—SPECIMEN CONVERSATIONS AT THE LADY'S HOUSE—THE WOODHULL SCANDAL DISCUSSED IN MR. TILTON'S PRESENCE BEFORE ITS PUBLICATION.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1875.

The evidence submitted to-day was devoted mainly to the point of showing that Mr. Tilton was responsible for the publication of the Woodhull scandal. Other matters were, of course, included, but the evident object of the defense was to show that Mr. Tilton knew what Mrs. Woodhull meant to publish, and that when it was talked of in his presence he did not deny its truth.

The main witness who testified to this was Charles Cowley of Lowell, Mass., but he was preceded for a few minutes by Oliver Johnson in an explanation and by Miss Oakley in completion of her cross-examination.

Miss Oakley admitted that since testifying the day before, she had talked about her evidence with Mr. Shearman, Mr. Hill, Mr. Porter and Mrs. Tilton. Mr. Beach then went back to the disputed point of the day before. The witness had testified to a change in the associates of Mr. Tilton after 1866, and mentioned Miss Anthony and Mrs. H. B. Stanton as visitors at his house after that year. Mr. Fullerton at the adjournment on Wednesday was trying to get the witness to admit that she did not know of her own knowledge that these ladies had not visited at Mr. Tilton's previous to that time, and consequently did not know of her own knowledge of the change of Mr. Tilton's associates. The witness finally admitted her lack of personal knowledge on these points, but the admission was only obtained after repeated questions from Mr. Beach and the admonition of Judge Neilson.

Mr. Cowley's testimony was very curious, and as a lawyer he gave it in a straightforward manner. He stated that he met Mr. Tilton at Victoria Woodhull's house in New-York, where he passed an evening in company with Victoria Woodhull, Col. Blood, Miss Claflin, and others. The conversation during the evening adverted to the subject, among other matters, of Spiritualism, and Mr. Tilton told the remarkable story that on one occasion when a long distance from home, and about to cut loose from civilization, he had heard a voice saying to him, "Theodore, go home." He had done so to find one of his children at the point of death. The conversation then turned to what Mrs. Woodhull called the "new revolution in respect to the marriage relation," of which she declared Mr. Beecher to be the champion. She stated, when Mr. Cowley expressed doubts that Mr. Beecher would be forced to come forward in that character, that his practices made it necessary for him to do this or be a hypocrite. She added that "there were a dozen of Mr. Beecher's mistresses among his congregation," and when the incredulous

Mr. Cowley again shook his head doubtfully, she appealed to Mr. Tilton, who confirmed her by placing the number at the liberal figure of 40. Mrs. Woodhull, the witness said, mentioned some of the names of these mistresses, among them that of Miss Edna Dean Proctor. Mr. Cowley in reply advanced the unique theory that this could not be true because it was illogical, inasmuch as if Mr. Beecher had more than one mistress, there would be contention among them, and each would expose the others.

Mrs. Woodhull had also stated that Mrs. Tilton was in favor of free love, and that she had confessed that Mr. Beecher had been intimate with her; that Mr. Beecher had obtained a retraction of this confession, and that Mr. Moulton had got this from Mr. Beecher "at the point of a pistol," and that the confession had been destroyed. Whereupon Mr. Cowley suggested that this was improbable, because Mrs. Tilton was still alive and could write other confessions and retractions to protect Mr. Beecher.

Mr. Cowley further said that there had been conversation about the marriage relation during the evening, and quoted Mr. Tilton as remarking that "all laws on that subject were infringements of reserved rights." During the evening Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull appeared to the witness like persons enamored of each other. Mr. Tilton had called her "Victoria," and she had addressed him as "Theodore." There was some talk about the proposed public meeting at which Mrs. Woodhull was to speak, and Mr. Tilton said that Mr. Beecher would introduce Mrs. Woodhull. Again Mr. Cowley doubted, when Mr. Tilton added that Mr. Beecher was to make a few remarks declaring he thought her topic was one for public discussion, but without approving her views.

Mr. Beach conducted the cross-examination of Mr. Cowley, and in reply to his questions the witness repeated very much of his evidence relative to the conversation held during the evening spent at Mrs. Woodhull's. The witness recalled several discussions which he had forgotten to mention on the direct examination, and occupied the greater part of the afternoon session in giving an account of what was said by Mrs. Woodhull and himself. During this recital, which was considered rather monotonous, his questioner, Mr. Beach, seated himself on his table and listened patiently, but with the air of a man who had to endure a tedious narrative in order to reach something more interesting. The witness was next questioned rather closely as to the bearing of Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull toward each other. The witness said that he noticed "no love in their words, but he detected amorous glances." The question then was, what were amorous glances? The witness could not give a description of them, except that they were not sheepish. In answer to another question, the witness replied that he had himself indulged in amorous glances. "Then can you not give us one now?" asked Mr. Beach. "No, I could not," answered the witness, amid general laughter. The questions about Mrs. Woodhull's attitude toward Mr. Tilton brought out that she had once said to Mr. Cowley, "Theodore Tilton is the nearest approach to my ideal of a man that I have ever met." Mr. Beach's questions were then turned to the past life of the witness, and elicited the fact that he had twice had the misfortune to be an unsuccessful candidate for the Attorney-Generalship of Massachusetts. "Why were you not elected?" asked Mr. Beach. "Because," replied the witness, "in Massachusetts they don't elect the man having the lowest number of votes." Mr. Cowley frankly admitted that he had had legal difficulties, and had been under an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses. The indictment, however, had not been prosecuted, but was dismissed by the District-Attorney. In answer to another question he replied, "I was never arrested except for libel, and that was by Lawrence McLaughlin, the man who sent you that paper," alluding to a document in Mr. Beach's hand, which was understood to be a copy of the indictment for false pretenses. In answer to other questions of a like nature, the witness returned negative answers, and on his re-direct examination by Mr. Evarts was allowed to give full explanations of the charge of false pretenses. Mr. Cowley's testimony was concluded just as the time for adjournment arrived.

THE PROCEEDINGS—VERBATIM.

MR. FULLERTON SICK AT HOME.

The Court met at 11 a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Beach—If your Honor please, Mr. Fullerton is disabled from attending Court this morning in consequence of sickness. His difficulty appears to be a determination of blood to the head, resulting in dizziness and vertigo. I hope it will be but temporary, Sir, and with your Honor's permission, I will endeavor to supply his place.

Judge Neilson—Yes; I regret very much to hear of his illness, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I think it will not be serious, Sir. I would be glad to put a question or two to Miss Oakley.

Mr. Tracy—Is Miss Oakley in Court? She appears not to have come in, Sir.

Mr. Beach—I do not consider her further cross-examination, Sir, as very essential or important, and am perfectly willing any other witness should take the stand, and I can put the few questions I desire to her at any time when she comes in.

Mr. Tracy—She probably will be in, Mr. Beach, in a moment or two.

Mr. Beach—Well, Sir.

Mr. Evans—She will not delay long, if your Honor please, and it will probably be a convenience to her to be relieved as soon as possible.

MR. OLIVER JOHNSON MAKES SOME CORRECTIONS.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Johnson desires to make one or two corrections in his testimony of yesterday.

Judge Neilson—Come forward.

Oliver Johnson recalled.

Mr. Tracy—Mr. Johnson, do you desire to make any correction of your testimony in regard to when you last saw or conversed with Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir; I had forgotten yesterday. I stated yesterday that I believed the last interview with Mr. Tilton was at Deacon Curtis's house. I had forgotten at the moment that he had called at my own house, in company with a friend, later than that, and that he had also dined with me, upon my own invitation, at a later time.

Q. And is there any other correction of your reported evidence that you desire to make? A. Yes, Sir; I find by the report in THE TRIBUNE this morning that I was asked on cross-examination yesterday whether I were an Anti-Mason. I did not so understand the question at the time. I thought the question related solely to whether I had edited an Anti-Slavery paper—or Anti-Mason paper.

Q. And answered with reference to that? A. Yes, Sir. If I had understood the question whether I were an Anti-Mason, I should have answered differently.

Mr. Evans—Well, was he asked that?

Mr. Tracy—Well, he thinks not; I don't know whether he was or not. He is so reported in THE TRIBUNE.

Mr. Beach—He was not asked if he was an Anti-Mason.

Mr. Tracy—I thought that he was not. I understood it as he did. It referred to his editing an Anti-Mason paper.

The Witness—There is still one more point, if it is of any consequence. I was asked yesterday when was the last time that I had attended a spiritual seance; I can answer now that it was in September last, in Boston.

Mr. Tracy—One further question I want to ask, as you are on the stand. The lady that you mentioned yesterday in your testimony, and whom Mr. Tilton referred to as having been with in his own house—I ask you whether that was Beale Turner—that lady? A. No, Sir.

Q. It was a different lady? A. A different lady; yes, Sir.

RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. OLIVER JOHNSON.

Mr. Beach—When was it, Sir, that Mr. Tilton dined with you? A. I think it was in May, some time in May, probably towards the latter part; I am not sure of the date.

Q. Of what year? A. This past year, Sir; 1874.

Q. Where was it that he dined with you? A. At 344 East 18th-st., New-York.

Q. Had you other friends with you? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It was at your house, I understand? A. Yes, Sir; it was.

Q. Who were present? A. Prof. Tyler, now of Michigan University, and his wife, and I am not quite sure who else; I don't remember if there was anybody.

Q. Did you have wine upon your table? A. I am not sure; it is possible that I might have had wine on the table; I am not sure that I did or did not.

Q. Well, you are accustomed to present your guests with wine, are you? A. No, Sir; I am not.

Q. What? A. No, Sir; it is not my custom.

Q. Have you not very often done so when Mr. Tilton was your guest heretofore? A. No, Sir; I don't think—I think if I did on that occasion it was the first time and only time that I ever did, and my impression now is that I did not then, but still I cannot say, I have no recollection about it.

Q. I understand you to say, then, if you did it upon this occasion in May it was the first time you had done it? A. I think so; I am not confident; I am not in the habit of offering wine to guests, Sir.

Q. You do occasionally? A. Once in a while, Sir; yes, Sir.

Q. You are not a total prohibitionist, then? A. No, Sir; I am not.

Q. You don't advocate that in your temperance lectures or sermons? A. I have not delivered any temperance lectures of late, or sermons either. My views are well known, Sir, by all my friends.

Q. How recently? A. Well, it must be a dozen years at least.

Q. I understood that one of the doctrines, tenets or teachings of this society which you founded, or to which you was attached, of Progressive Friends, I think, was temperance? A. Yes, Sir; but it embraced all views of the temperance question.

Q. You did not advocate total prohibition, then? A. The society itself has again and again advocated total prohibition, but I have differed from it in that particular.

Q. You have differed from it? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Although an ardent adherent of the society— A. Yes, Sir; an ardent adherent; but I have differed with the society on that question.

Q. You believe in the temperate use of it, then? A. Yes, Sir; I do.

REFLECTIONS ON THE WITNESS.

Q. Did you attend, during the Greeley campaign, as it is called, a speech made—hear a speech made at the Academy of Music by Mr. Tilton, in New-York? A. No, Sir.

Q. In Brooklyn? A. In Brooklyn, I did; yes, Sir.

Q. When was that? A. I cannot tell you, Sir. It was just before the Presidential election; I think a very short time before, but I could not fix the date.

Q. Who did you accompany to that address? A. I don't at this time remember, Sir, who it was, but I think it was the lady with whom I boarded, Mrs. Sabine.

Q. Mrs. who? A. Mrs. Sabine of New-York, the lady with whom I have lived for 15 years. I think it was her, and yet I am not sure; it may have been some one else. I have no recollection now, while I am here, as to whom it was.

Q. Do you recollect of meeting Mr. Wilcox there? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Do you know him? A. I don't know; I know more than one Mr. Wilcox, Sir. You will have to identify him.

Q. Residing here in Brooklyn? A. How?

Q. Do you know more than one residing here in the city? A. In the City of Brooklyn?

Q. Yes, Sir. A. I don't know of any one residing here in Brooklyn, Sir.

Q. Do you know Stillman Wilcox? A. No, Sir; I do not.

Q. Do you know Mr. Stillman, of New York? A. I don't remember any man of that name, Sir.

Q. And you don't remember of meeting Mr. Stillman after that lecture in New-York? A. No, Sir; I do not. I do not at all identify, from your question, any person whatever.

Q. Did you leave that lecture, or the place where it was delivered, in company with any one? A. I am not quite sure, Sir, whether I did or not.

Q. Is there no recollection in your mind upon that subject? A. No, Sir, I have not.

Q. How? A. No, Sir, I have not at this moment any recollection.

Q. By tasking your recollection could you not recall any circumstance which occurred after the delivery of that speech? A. I do not know that I could, Sir; it was to me so ordinary an affair; there was nothing very marked about it.

Q. The speech was ordinary, you mean? A. No, Sir, I don't mean that; it was a very able speech. I mean that my going to a political meeting was a very ordinary affair.

Q. Yes, but there might be an extraordinary circumstance connected with it? A. Yes, Sir; but I don't remember any.

Q. And you cannot recall now any person in whose company you left the place where that speech was delivered? A. I cannot. I remember meeting Mrs. Tilton there and speaking with her, in the Academy.

Q. That I am not asking about, Sir. Well, do you recollect now where you went from that place? A. My impression is that I went directly home to New-York, but still I may have gone somewhere for a little while. I may have made a call; I cannot tell you.

Q. And you have no recollection of any person whom you met after you left the place where the speech was delivered? A. I have not, at this moment; no, Sir. My recollection might be refreshed, perhaps, if names were mentioned.

Q. Well, perhaps it will refresh your recollection if I ask you if you recollect going to Canal-st. on that evening after the speech? A. No, Sir.

Mr. Evans—In New-York?

Mr. Beach—Yes, Sir.

The Witness—I do not.

Q. You don't recollect it? A. No, Sir; I must have passed Canal-st. on the way home, I presume.

Q. Crossed, you mean? A. Crossed it; yes, Sir.

Q. Well, are you able to say whether or not you went to any place in Canal-st. on that evening? A. Yes, Sir, I am able to say that I did not.

Q. Are you able to say that you did not go to Mercer-st. on that evening, after the speech? A. Yes, Sir, I am able to say so.

Q. And you have no recollection now of meeting any person, whom you can name, that evening after that speech? A. No, Sir, I have not.

ISABELLA G. OAKLEY RECALLED.

Isabella G. Oakley was then recalled, and her cross-examination continued.

WITNESS'S CONVERSATIONS ABOUT HER TESTIMONY.

Mr. Beach—Since the adjournment of the Court last evening, Miss Oakley, have you conversed with any persons in regard to your testimony? A. I have.

Q. Who? A. With Mr. Shearman.

Q. With Mr. Shearman; who else? A. With Mr. HILL.

Q. Who? A. With Mr. HILL.

Q. Who else? A. With Mrs. Tilton.

Q. With Mrs. Tilton; who else? A. A gentleman with Mr. Shearman, whose name I do not recollect.

Q. Was it a gentleman whom you have seen before? A. Don't recollect ever seeing him before.

Q. Was it Mr. Porter; do you recognize him? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. It is singular you should forget him? A. I never saw him before, Sir; I never heard his name before, to my knowledge.

Q. With anybody else? A. With no one else.

Q. Did you converse with those parties together, all of them? A. No.

Q. Well, did you converse with each of them separately? A. No; some were together.

Q. Please name who were together at the time of the conversation? A. I saw Mr. Hill for a moment alone.

Q. Where? A. At his office.

Q. At his office—when? A. This morning.

Q. This morning; well? A. I saw Mrs. Tilton a few moments, and while I was there Mr. Shearman came in, and I walked up from Mrs. Tilton's house with Mr. Shearman and with that other gentleman, Mr. Porter; that was the extent of my communing.

Q. Oh! there was Mr. Porter? A. I say, with the other gentleman.

ANOTHER HARD STRUGGLE FOR PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE.

Q. Oh! with the other gentleman. Miss Oakley, you will permit me to pursue, for a moment, the line of examination which was addressed to you last evening by Mr. Fullerton. Are you able, from your own knowledge and observation, without regard to what you have heard from others, to say whether or not the persons whom you observed as visitors at Mr. Tilton's after the year 1866, were or were not visitors at his house prior to that date? A. I am able to say—

Q. Please answer my question, Madam; I don't want you to answer any other. A. I will answer you directly.

Q. I ask you whether you are able to say, from your personal knowledge and observation, independently of what you have heard from others, whether the visitors you saw at the house of Mr. Tilton or associating with him after 1866, were or were not, prior to that year, visitors at his house or associates of his? A. I am able to say they were not, of my knowledge.

Q. Of your knowledge; now, name the persons whom you saw, either as visitors at his house or associating with him after 1866, whom you say you know were not visitors or associates prior to that year? A. Whom I had not seen there before?

Mr. Beach—I did not ask you that, Madam.

Mr. Evarts—That is answered.

Mr. Beach—It is not what she answered.

Mr. Evarts—Well, the answer is down.

The Witness—Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony were the ones I recollect.

Q. Do you recollect any others? A. I cannot mention any others.

Q. Are you able to swear from your personal knowledge, independently of what you have heard, that Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton were not visitors at Mr. Tilton's house prior to 1866? A. Does that mean did I ever see them there before?

Q. You know what personal knowledge is—independent of what you have heard—do you not? A. If that is the question, I would like to answer that.

Q. Well, you understand that, do you not, Madam? A. As I have been instructed here—

Q. What? A. As I have been instructed here.

Q. Very well; then I ask you if from your personal knowledge, independently of what you have heard from others, you are able to swear that Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony were not visitors at Mr. Tilton's house prior to the year 1866? A. I have never seen them there before; can't recollect ever seeing them there before 1866.

Q. Then you have no knowledge whether they were there prior to that time or not; have you personal knowledge? A. Not by seeing them.

Q. Have you any personal knowledge upon that subject, independently of what you have heard? A. Then I have not.

Q. Then are you able to say from personal knowledge, independently of what you have heard, that there was any change in the visitors at Mr. Tilton's house as between—before the year 1866, and subsequent to that year? A. I am.

Q. From your personal knowledge? A. From my personal knowledge.

Q. What personal knowledge had you upon that subject? A. That before that period I had not seen these persons, and after that I had.

Q. Then you swear that they were not there prior to 1866 because you had not seen them there? A. That is all the personal knowledge you will admit.

Q. What? A. That is all the personal knowledge you will admit.

Q. Do you mean to swear that they were not visitors to his house prior to 1866? A. From my personal knowledge?

Q. Yes. A. I do.

Q. What? A. I do.

Q. You mean to swear from your personal knowledge that they were not visitors prior to 1866? A. As you limit me.

Q. What? A. As you limit me, I understand you.

Q. You mean to swear that from personal knowledge? A. As I recollect—from my recollection—I did not see them there before.

Mr. Evarts—What do you mean by her personal knowledge?

Mr. Beach—As I limit—I limit her personal knowledge to what she knows independently of what she has heard.

The Witness—To having seen them—do you limit me to having seen them there?

Mr. Beach—No, I don't.

The Witness—I thought you did.

Mr. Beach—No.

The Witness—What other personal knowledge may I have?

Mr. Beach—I don't know; it is for you to say.

The Witness—I thought I had been limited.

Mr. Beach—I limit you to personal knowledge; I have not said anything about seeing.

The Witness—I told you. I asked you if I could answer as I had been instructed.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. Fullerton instructed her.

Mr. Beach—Well, these gentlemen keep interrupting me.

Judge Neilson—I think they ought to keep quiet, and I think the witness ought to pay more attention to the question—a very intelligent lady, who could answer this question.

The Witness—I am doing my best, if your Honor please, to answer it.

Mr. Evarts—I submit she has answered a great many times.

Judge Neilson—No; she has not answered.

Mr. Evarts—What?

Judge Neilson—No, Sir; I understand this lady to indicate that there was a change in the visitors and society there.

Mr. Evarts—And she has given the whole basis of it that she did not see them before, but did see them after.

The Witness—I think that is all I can say.

Judge Neilson—But then her answer that there was a change stands unqualified.

Mr. Evarts—No doubt of it.

Judge Neilson—The counsel has a right to that portion of it.

Mr. Evarts—How far; how many times is he to ask the same question and receive an answer?

Judge Neilson—He has a right to receive an answer.

Mr. Evarts—How many times after he has received an answer?

Judge Neilson—He has not had an answer yet.

Mr. Beach—I answer the gentleman, as many times as I think necessary to exhibit the disposition and character of this witness.

Judge Neilson—You have a right to an answer, Sir; you will proceed.

The Witness—I thought I had answered you directly, as you asked me; I designed to do so.

Mr. Beach—Can you state to me what years Mr. Tilton resided in Oxford-st.? A. No; I never saw him at his house in Oxford-st.

Q. I don't ask you that; I shall presently. A. I could not tell the years.

Q. Cannot you tell me about what time he resided in Oxford-st.? A. Excepting that it was previous to 1866.

Q. How long previous to 1866? A. I could not tell you.

Q. Well, about how long, Madam? A. Well, within three or four years; probably previous to that.

Q. Then, between 1860 and 1866 he had resided in Oxford-st.? A. I think so; could not say certainly.

Q. And had you ever visited him there? A. No.

Q. Do you know from personal knowledge whether or not Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony had visited Mr. and Mrs. Tilton at Oxford-st.? A. No.

Q. You don't; then you cannot say from personal knowledge that they were not visitors of Mr. and Mrs. Tilton prior to 1866, can you? A. Between 1860 and 1866?

Q. Yes? A. I cannot in those limits.

MR. TILTON'S TALKS ABOUT RELIGION.

Q. Now, Madam, you spoke of some change in the religious sentiments of Mr. Tilton, yesterday, and I understood it was gradual; how early did you first notice any departure of that kind from his previous opinions? A. Well, I think as early as 1860—in that neighborhood—in that neighborhood of time.

Q. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 1860? A. There were three—there were two years in which I was entirely away from the city between 1860 and 1866, but I don't know what two they were. Previous to that I recollect having some conversation with Mr. Tilton.

Q. Well, I understood you to say that you had frequent discussions upon that character of topic with him? A. I have had, from time to time.

Q. In which you maintained one set of views and he an adverse set of opinions? A. I did.

Q. Well, they were somewhat animated discussions? A. Oh, I don't know, I cannot recollect that.

Q. Well, you maintained as well as you could in argument, your views, I suppose? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Evarts—If your Honor please, we have had all this before.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, we haven't had all this before.

Mr. Evarts—I think so.

Mr. Beach—Well, I think differently.

Mr. Evarts—I submit it to the recollection of his Honor, the Judge.

Mr. Beach—Certainly; I recollect very well the questions which were put by Mr. Fullerton on this subject, Sir, and I desire to put another range of inquiry.

Judge Neilson—Well, I think we will have to take it.

Mr. Beach—You answered, I think, that you maintained, as well as you were able, the views you entertained upon those topics? A. I did.

Q. And were those discussions of some length sometimes? A. Yes, Sir; probably.

Q. Now, upon the doctrine of atonement, can you state to me, either in words or in substance, anything which Mr. Beecher said upon that subject—not the impressions which you received, but anything that he said? A. In substance I think I can; it is a long time ago.

Mr. Beach—I know that.

The Witness—I have forgotten the particulars, but in substance; in substance I think I can.

Mr. Evarts—A little louder, please.

Mr. Beach—She said it was a long time ago, but in substance she could.

The Witness—That Mr. Tilton no longer believed in the atoning sacrifice of Christ—in the sacrifice as being an atonement for the sins of humanity.

Q. Well, he said, then, in substance, that he no longer believed that the death of Christ was an atoning sacrifice? A. An atonement for human sin.

Q. Was an atonement for human sins. Well, is that all he said upon that subject that you now recollect? A. It was not.

Q. What? A. That was doubtless the substance of it, inasmuch as his was the pressing—

Q. Never mind; I am asking what he said, not for any reasoning? A. That, as far as I can remember, is the substance.

Q. What? A. That is the substance as far as I can remember.

Q. Well, your view of it was opposite to that, I understand? A. It was.

Q. And you maintained that that sacrifice was a complete and absolute atonement? A. I did.

Q. You did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that, of itself, it worked a remission of sin? A. By faith in the—

Q. Oh! by faith. Well, now, what did Mr. Tilton say about that faith? A. I don't remember.

Q. What? A. I don't remember.

Q. Now, do you positively recollect that he used the word "believe"—that he did not believe? Can you now remember that he used that precise word? A. Oh, no; I couldn't possibly remember a word.

Q. Well, you don't remember that he used that precise word; can you remember any language which he used in those discussions which will enable us to judge whether he was maintaining opposite views to you for the purpose of argument and discussion, or whether he was expressing his own convictions? Can you give me any language which he used? A. I cannot remember a phrase of mine or his conversation, but the conversation and its subject I recollect.

Q. You can only remember the impression produced on you? A. I remember the conversation and the subject.

Q. You have given me the substance? A. The drift of the answer.

Q. The point to which I wished to address your mind was, whether you can give me any form of expression, either in words or substance, which he used, by which you can judge whether or not he was arguing with you for the sake of argument, or whether he was expressing his real convictions? It is sometimes pleasant to conduct an argument, you know. A. I suppose I could not satisfy you with any recollected statement of the case.

Q. No; you can only give me the impression which the conversation produced upon your mind, I suppose? A. There was more than one conversation, however.

Q. Yes, there were several? A. In relation to these topics.

Q. The point is whether you are speaking from the impression which you received, or whether you are giving the language by which we can judge? A. I understand you. I cannot put into any form the discussion so that it would satisfy you, I presume.

MR. TILTON ON MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Q. Now, you also had some conversation with him upon the subject of marriage and divorce? A. I cannot remember having had any conversation on that subject. I believe I didn't testify to that.

Q. What? A. I don't think I testified to that, did I?

Q. You testified to an expression which he used. A. I recollect hearing him make some remarks.

Q. Do you recollect hearing him make remarks upon that subject upon more than one occasion? A. I only recollect one occasion.

Q. Now, will you please state to me all that you recollect of that occasion and what occurred? A. I recollect that it was at table—breakfast, I think; I believe there were guests; the children were at table, and Mrs. Tilton was at table.

Q. And who were the guests? A. Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton were there, I believe. That is the best of my recollection.

Q. Well, was the remark to which you refer uttered by Mr. Tilton in the course of a discussion with his guest, or conversation with his guests? A. That I— I don't recollect any further words, any further conversation.

Q. There must have been something said on the subject? A. So there must; I don't recollect any reply.

Q. There was a conversation upon the subject? A. Probably—

Q. Which you don't recollect? A. Probably; I could not swear that there was.

Q. Do you recollect what immediately preceded this remark of Mr. Tilton? A. No, I do not; it stands alone as an impression of that breakfast—

Q. Now, will you as near as you can— A. As a recollection, I should say I recollect it distinctly.

Q. Very well, if you recollect it distinctly, then give it to us. A. I recollect Mr. Tilton said: "I no longer believe—think of the marriage relation as I once did."

Q. "I no longer believe—think of the marriage relation"— A. No. "I no longer think of the marriage relation."

Q. "As I once did?" A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Is that all you recollect that he said? A. That is all I recollect distinctly enough to quote.

Q. Had you ever had any conversation or heard any remarks of his upon that subject previously? A. I have no doubt but I had.

Q. No; that you recollect? A. I cannot identify any conversation, but I knew his sentiments, from conversations with him.

Q. What? A. I knew his sentiments from various conversations, but I cannot identify any distinct conversation.

Q. No; but can you state anything he had previously said upon the subject of marriage? A. No; I cannot state anything he said now. His opinions were before the public, and well known to us all at that time.

Q. You mean in his public writings? A. I knew as a matter—I have had conversations with him on those topics, but I cannot identify them.

Q. I want to know whether you recollect anything of what was said in those previous conversations with him? A. I cannot recollect a single sentence.

Q. Can you recollect the substance of anything that was said in those conversations? A. No, not enough—I could not frame it in a few words.

Q. What? A. I don't think I could frame an answer; I suppose I do not recollect the substance of them.

Q. If you say you don't recollect the substance then, I will be satisfied. A. All right.

Q. You do not recollect the substance; then all the knowledge which, according to your present recollection, you had of his previous opinions upon the subject of marriage is derived from his public writings? A. I should think—

Q. Is it so or not, Madam? A. Yes, Sir; all the knowledge that I now recall.

Q. Yes, all the knowledge that you now recall, of course; and you are not able, then, to state what were his opinions upon the subject of marriage prior to this remark which he made, excepting from his public productions? A. I am not able to state; I cannot recollect.

Q. Well, you are not able to state from anything that was said at that time what his opinions upon the subject of marriage were at that time? A. No; I don't recollect the conversation being pursued into an expression of his opinion.

Q. Well, you are not able to say; that is enough. Do you recollect of his, at any time, or at that time rather, or previously, saying anything in regard to the law of divorce? A. I cannot recollect anything that he said to me.

Q. Although not specially addressed to you, but in your hearing, do you recollect of his at any time saying anything at or prior to that time upon the subject of the law of divorce? A. No, I have no recollection.

Q. You have no recollection? A. No, Sir, of any words used.

Q. Do you not recall when you first noticed anything that was published by Mr. Tilton upon the subject of marriage? A. Oh, I could not possibly say when.

Q. Cannot you locate the period with reference to some event? A. No.

Q. What? A. No; I read the articles in The Independent as they were published, and I have since—I have re-read them—I read The Independent during the years in which he was the editor of it.

Q. Well, can you name any year in which anything appeared in The Independent upon that subject? A. No; it is impossible.

Q. Cannot you with reference to some fact, either private or public? A. No, I cannot recollect any particular event. I cannot recollect what I read even.

Q. Well, do you recollect of any publication of Mr. Tilton's opinion, or of his strictures upon that subject, prior to the marriage of Mr. Richardson to Mrs. McFarland by Mr. Beecher? A. I don't know. I could not connect Mr. Tilton's publications with any special event, more than to say that it was probably within ten years.

Q. Are you a professor of religion? A. I have been throughout my life. I have withdrawn my letter from the Plymouth Church within the past two years, and have not presented it to any other.

Q. You were, then, a member of Plymouth Church? A. For many years.

Q. And in the habit of attending the ministrations of that Church while here? A. I was, while in Brooklyn.

Q. And of communing there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And two years ago you withdrew your letter? A. Yes, Sir; two and a half years ago.

Q. Soon afterward—what was the occasion of that? A. I left the city.

Q. There was no other motive than that? A. No other.

Mr. Beach—That is all, Madam.

RE-DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MISS OAKLEY.

Mr. Tracy—Was Florence Tilton ever a pupil of yours? A. Florence was two years in school when I was teaching school in Clinton-st.

Q. Where? A. On Clinton-st.

Q. On Clinton-st. Was it a private school? A. It was.

Q. How large a school? A. Well, Florence was with me—the school was from thirty to forty in number perhaps; she was with me during the first of my opening, and probably it was a little less than that—from twenty-five to forty.

Q. From your intimacy with Mr. Tilton's family and your visits there, you came to know generally who their friends were that were in the habit of visiting at their house, did you not?

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Judge Neilson—You have been over that.

Mr. Tracy—This is a re-examination, your Honor.

Mr. Beach—That is a matter of argument, whether her intimacy was sufficient to enable her to know; she can state what her intimacy was, and we can then judge.

Mr. Everts—We submit the question is a proper one, and would like an answer.

Mr. Beach—We object to the question, and ask your Honor to disallow it.

The TRIBUNE stenographer read the question as follows:

“Q. From your intimacy with Mr. Tilton's family, and your visits there, you came to know generally who their friends were that were in the habit of visiting at their house, did you not?”

Mr. Beach—I submit that that calls for the opinion or judgment of the witness.

Judge Neilson—Simply ruled out, Sir.

Mr. Everts—Your Honor will note our exception.

Judge Neilson—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Did you know more or less people who were in the habit of visiting them at their house? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Did you know of Miss Anthony and Mrs. Stanton visiting them at their house prior to 1866? A. I did not see them there; I don't recollect ever seeing them there.

Q. Did you know of their visiting there—

Mr. Beach—Well!

Mr. Tracy—In any way.

Mr. Beach—I object to that.

Judge Neilson—She didn't say that.

Mr. Everts—If your Honor please, if she had been in the next room and heard them talk it, that would be a mode of knowing.

Judge Neilson—That is so.

Mr. Tracy—We ask her if, in any way, she knows.

Judge Neilson—No, that involves hearsay.

Mr. Everts—We suppose the question is proper and would like an answer.

Judge Neilson—Well, the question that way clearly admits of hearsay. It is excluded.

Mr. Everts—So that, we think, we have a right to except. The question is as to knowledge.

Judge Neilson—Examine her as to her knowledge.

Mr. Everts—The question is solely the knowledge in any view. The law imports knowledge as excluding hearsay. The question, therefore, excludes hearsay. The question is put and we suppose we are entitled to an answer.

Mr. Beach—Will your Honor instruct the witness that she must not speak from hearsay in answering the question.

Mr. Everts—Is the question allowed?

Judge Neilson—Yes, with that instruction.

The Witness—[To THE TRIBUNE stenographer.] Won't you read the question?

The question was then read by THE TRIBUNE stenographer.

The Witness—I have no recollection of their visiting there previous to that.

Q. Did you ever hear Mr. and Mrs. Tilton speak of the friends who were in the habit of visiting them in their house?

Mr. Beach—So far as the question calls for any remarks of Mrs. Tilton in the absence of Mr. Tilton, we object to it, Sir.

Mr. Tracy—Did you frequently hear Mr. and Mrs. Tilton speak of the friends who were in the habit of visiting them at their house? A. I cannot recollect that very much was said about it.

Q. Did you ever hear from Mr. Tilton in any way that Mrs. Stanton and Miss Anthony were friends who visited him at his house prior to 1866? A. No, Sir; I cannot say that I recollect that.

Judge Neilson—Well, that is all, Miss Oakley.

Mr. Tracy—One word, Miss Oakley.

MISS OAKLEY MAKES AN EXPLANATION.

The Witness—Can I not state to you what my opportunities of observation of the family were previous to 1866, and during the two years, from 1866 to 1868, which may put what I have said in a better light as regards myself?

Mr. Tracy—Yes.

The Witness—I came and went as a visitor, in the Summer vacations, for ten years previous to 1866, and my friendship for the family and intercourse with them in that relation, and during two or three of those years was absent from the city, but by correspondence and by always visiting when I did come, I knew them, and knew them well. In the Fall of 1866 I came to Brooklyn to live, and lived near them. During the first month of that time I was with Mrs. Morse, at her house, and I think before they moved to 176; and during the eighteen months subsequent to that I saw much more of the family and its relations and friends than I had seen before for ten years.

Mr. Tracy—That is all.

Judge Neilson—That is all, Miss Oakley.

MRS. PUTNAM'S LETTER PRODUCED.

Mr. Shearman—I desire to say I have the original of that letter, of which, by courtesy, we put in a copy—from Mrs. Tilton to Mrs. Putnam. It was substituted; and there was a single mistake in the copy. It reads in the copy: "How beautiful your growing love for Theodore!" and in the original it is: "How beautiful your yearning love for Theodore!" I don't know whether it is of any importance.

Judge Neilson—It is well enough to correct it.

Mr. Shearman—We will have it marked. [Marked Exhibit D, 112.]

TESTIMONY OF MR. CHARLES COWLEY.

Charles Cowley was here called and sworn on behalf of the defendant, and examined, as follows:

MR. TILTON AND MRS. WOODHULL ON THE EQUALITY OF THE SEXES.

Mr. Evarts—Where do you reside? A. Lowell, Mass.

Q. How long have you lived there? A. Since 1848; since I was a boy ten years old.

Q. What is your profession? A. I am a lawyer by profession.

Q. Where have you practiced it, and how long? A. I have practiced in Lowell and Boston nineteen years, counting out two years that I was in the South, in the navy, during the war.

Q. In the volunteer force? A. In the volunteer force; yes, Sir.

Q. Were you, in the year 1871, acting in or connected with a political movement in Massachusetts? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Were you a candidate of a political party there? A. I was, two years previous, but not in 1871.

Q. Not in 1871? A. I didn't accept the candidature that year.

Q. What had been the office for which you were a candidate? A. I was a candidate for the office of Attorney-General of Massachusetts.

Q. Now, Sir, in connection with any political movement with which you were interested, did you come to the City of New-York in the Fall of 1871? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. Did you come for the purpose of seeing any particular persons? A. Not for that purpose; but, being here, I did see certain persons.

Q. Very well; you were here in connection with a political movement; and, being here, you saw certain persons? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Among these persons was Mr. Theodore Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Where?

Mr. Evarts—We will wait until the clock stops striking.

Judge Neilson—Now, you may take your order to have the bell stop.

Mr. Beach—It don't obey.

Mr. Evarts—It is over now.

Q. Where and by whom were you introduced to him? A. I was introduced to him in the—at the residence of Mrs. Woodhull, by Mrs. Woodhull.

Q. Where was this residence? A. I am unable to state positively; I think it was in Thirty-eighth-st.

Q. It was up town? A. Yes; up town.

Q. In this city? A. In New-York.

Q. I mean in New-York; excuse me.

Mr. Beach—Does he say he was introduced by Mrs. Woodhull?

Mr. Evarts—Introduced to Mr. Tilton by Mrs. Woodhull, at her residence up town.

Q. There was a considerable number of persons there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Of both sexes? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the first occurrence in Mr. Tilton's presence and Mrs. Woodhull's that attracted your attention? A. The first that I now remember was some conversation between Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton and myself in relation to Lowell and its institutions, and its industries, and certain regulations there in relation to the factory girls of the city.

Q. With reference to their morality? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, Sir, will you state that conversation? A. Well, it is impossible for me to give the conversation in detail; I can only give a general recollection of it.

Q. The substance of it, as you recollect it? A. I remember it arose in this way: Mrs. Woodhull had presented me that morning—I saw her the morning before—with a volume of her speeches, and I presented to her that evening—I called by invitation to meet Mr. Tilton—with a copy of a book published by me, a history of Lowell, and that introduced the subject of Lowell. There was some general remark, which passed from my mind; and I remember Mrs. Woodhull spoke of something she had seen shortly before that in relation to the regulations.

Q. Of the factory girls? A. Of the factory girls, requiring them to reside in certain boarding-houses and to keep certain hours; were not to be out after nine o'clock evenings, except by permission; and she spoke of it as being tyrannical; and Mr. Tilton, in connection with that, made some remark about those regulations being a part of the general system of the treatment of women.

Q. Yes. A. As dependent and subordinate; and Mrs. Woodhull said she rejoiced that that was the way women were treated, as having no capacity to take care of themselves. I said that those regulations were intended to preserve them from temptations, and I supposed that the virtue of the majority of people was depending largely upon their being exempt from temptations. Mrs. Woodhull said that the only true course was to train people, or let people become accustomed to take care of themselves; they would have some troubles, but would learn self-reliance, self-dependence and self-respect.

Q. Was this in connection with the factory girl regulations? A. Yes, Sir; this bore on the subject.

Q. And what did Mr. Tilton say on that subject, if anything? A. I don't recollect anything beyond the general remark that this was part of the general system of treating women and holding them in subjection as incapable of taking care of themselves.

Q. Did he use any expression of approval or disapproval of that general system?

Mr. Beach—Let the witness state what he said.

The Witness—I could not recall the language he used beyond what I have stated.

A "MEDIUM'S" DISCOURSE ON THE OTHER WORLD.

Q. What was the next thing that occurred there that attracted your attention? A. The next thing that occurred was this: there was a gentleman, whose name I cannot recall—I think it was Doctor something; he put himself into the mediumistic state, as he said, whatever that may be.

Q. How did he get himself into that state? A. I don't know that either.

Q. You saw him— A. I saw that he stood up and commenced giving an address.

Q. Well. A. Purporting to come from the spirit of some deceased literary character, the precise person—the name I do not now recall, and Mr. Tilton took out some paper and made some minutes of it phonographically.

Q. Made a phonographic report you mean? A. He phonographically reported it. When he used up the paper which he had, Mrs. Woodhull brought a bunch of paper, and he went on for some little time, noting down phonographically the address of this gentleman; and I remember, on its being completed, that he made the remark that he had not done so much phonographic reporting before for ten years.

Q. Was that speech made the subject of discussion? A. After it was finished it was. Several of those persons present spoke of it. I do not now recall a great deal of what was said. I remember Mr. Tilton made this remark: "If this was published as a discourse, or an essay, it would attract very great admiration;" and Mrs. Woodhull asked me for my opinion; I smiled in reply, and she said, "you needn't hesitate; the Doctor," or whatever his name was, "does not know what he has been saying; he is perfectly unconscious of what he has been delivering;" and thereupon I expressed my opinion that I didn't see anything in it beyond a jingle of musical words and poor turned thoughts; there was no body of thought; there was no argument carried on; a dreamy speculation on the condition of those in the future state, or in the spirit state, whatever that may be.

Q. Did you observe how the medium took your criticism? A. I thought he took it a little unpleasantly, and I didn't carry my criticism any further. [Laughter.]

MR. TILTON IN COMMUNICATION WITH THE SPIRITS.

Q. Now, was there a further conversation on any subject in which you and Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull were the parties? A. The next to that that I now recall—there is much that I cannot recall—the next was a conversation on the subject of the possibility and actuality of communication between the spirits of deceased persons and those living; I can remember but very little that was said on that subject except an anecdote that Mr. Tilton related, that some time before that he was gone away from home, and had got to some place where he was about to be detached from all means of communication with his family, and that he there heard a voice, inaudible except to himself, as he supposed, saying: "Theodore, go home." And he said that it impressed him so much that he did go home, and arrived home just in time to find his oldest daughter, I think that it was the oldest daughter, lying almost at the point of death. That is the only thing in that discussion on that subject that I remember.

MR. BEECHER TALKED ABOUT.

Q. Then, subsequently, did you have another conversation? A. Yes, Sir; there was a good deal. The next that I remember was a conversation which was started by Mr. Brisbane—Albert Brisbane, who was present, on the project of a pneumatic tube between Washington and New-York.

Q. Well, we will pass that. A. And that led to a conversation between Mr. Tilton and myself on its effect on journalism if it should be introduced.

Q. Now, later on, was there a conversation? A. There was a conversation later on in relation to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Very well. A. That conversation, there was but very little of it between Mr. Tilton and myself, but between Mr. Tilton and myself and Mrs. Woodhull, and Mrs. Woodhull proceeded to— She introduced this by some general remark on the great revolution that was impending, and she didn't know whether I realized it or not, but we were, she said, right on the eve of one of the greatest revolutions that ever happened in the social system, and that was in reference to the marriage relation; and, right in connection with that, she said that Mr. Beecher was coming out as the champion of this social revolution, and I told her that I thought not, and she said that he certainly was, that he had entertained those theories himself privately, and he had practiced them, and he would come out publicly as the advocate of them. I told her I didn't believe anything of the kind; that I didn't believe that he would, and she said that he would have to; that his own habits and the habits of others in his congregation were such that he would have to or be exposed; his hypocrisy would be exposed if he continued to profess or hold himself out as professing and maintaining one theory while practicing and believing another.

Q. Well, did she give you any instance or expression about it? A. She talked rapidly and in a very animated manner on that subject; I could not undertake to give but only a very small part of what she did say. I remember she said—I followed up the thought, and she said it had been said that there were a dozen of Mr. Beecher's mistresses in his congregation. I said to Mrs. Woodhull, "If you put your logic to work on that you will see that that could not be; that no ordinary woman of that stamp would be likely to have a liaison with a man of the eminence of Mr. Beecher, without being proud of it, and letting it be known in some way, and if there were two such, one would find out the other and expose her." I said: "The thing is utterly impossible." Thereupon she made some appeal to Mr. Tilton, and called Mr. Tilton's attention to it, and either Mr. Tilton or Mrs. Woodhull then stated the number as forty, that there were forty mistresses of his in his congregation. I am not able to swear whether it was Mr. Tilton or Mrs. Woodhull stated that number. The best of my recollection is that it was Mr. Tilton stated that number.

Q. Who put the number at forty? A. At forty.

Q. Well, how did the conversation proceed further? A. She gave some names, but I don't recall any name except one of the ladies.

Q. Is that a name that has been mentioned here? A. It has been mentioned here; I have seen it in the reports.

Q. What name was that? A. The name of Miss Proctor. That is the only one that I recall, but I remember the fact that she did mention others.

Q. Now, how were the parties seated at this time, yourself, Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton, as regards proximity? A. Mrs. Tilton sat beside me, separated from me by a small table—

Q. Mrs. Woodhull, you mean? A. Mrs. Woodhull; I beg your pardon for using her name. Separated from me by a little stand, such as ladies have to put their work-basket on, a very thin, narrow, light stand. Mr. Tilton sat opposite me upon a lounge or sofa; I have forgotten which.

Q. How many feet, about? A. Five or six feet; about as far as he is now from me, I should think.

Q. Was the tone of conversation such as to be heard? A. Yes, Sir; a great deal of it he could not help but hear, because Mrs. Woodhull oftentimes spoke with great animation; she could be heard throughout the parlor, and her voice changed from time to time. I think there were some remarks she made which he didn't hear, that she didn't intend him to hear—some remark that related personally to himself.

MRS. TILTON'S NAME ASSOCIATED WITH MR. BEECHER'S.

Q. As a part of that conversation, did Mrs. Tilton's name come in? A. Yes, Sir; she mentioned Mrs. Tilton as one with whom Mr. Beecher had been very much enamored for a long time.

Q. What was said on that subject, and in what connection? A. Well, she stated to me that Mrs. Tilton—

Mr. Pryor—Is that one of the remarks heard by Mr. Tilton? A. I think so.

Q. You said some of the remarks were heard by him and some not? A. Yes, Sir; I know she made one or two remarks in a lower tone of voice in relation to him.

Q. The remark you are now going to relate—is that one of those that were heard by Mr. Tilton? A. I could not swear about his hearing it, but I think he might have heard it.

Mr. Everts—It was said in a tone in which he could hear it? A. There was but one or two remarks she made in a tone which, apparently, she didn't intend for his ears.

Q. What was that about—himself? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. She dropped her voice at that point, and you suppose he didn't hear that? A. I don't know but he might have heard that, but I suppose not.

Q. What did Mrs. Woodhull say in regard to Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Beecher? A. Well, I remember her general statement, that Mr. Beecher had been enamored of Mrs. Tilton, and she of him, for some time, and there were a number of remarks made, but I could not begin to recall them all. One I recall is, that there was some doubt whether Mr. Beecher or Mr. Tilton was the father of one of the children; I don't know whether she gave any name, or not, of the child.

Q. Now, was there anything said about a letter? A. She spoke—she said that Mrs. Tilton had those views, also of the marriage relation and free love, and that Mrs. Tilton had regretted the deception which she had practiced upon her husband, and had written a letter stating what her relations with Mr. Beecher had been; and that Mr. Beecher had got hold of that letter, and that a friend of Mr. Tilton's had made him give it up—had extorted it at the point of the pistol. I remember she used that expression, and I think she mentioned the name of Mr. Moulton in that connection, but I am not positive in my recollection about that. I pool-pooched that; I said: "That don't seem credible," and said: "I think Mr. Cummings told me"—Mr. Cummings was a gentleman who had introduced me to her, and he had related to me very much the same story—

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Everts—About the pistol.

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment.

Mr. Everts—I have waited a moment.

Mr. Beach—Unless it was in Mr. Tilton's presence.

The Witness—I never saw Mr. Cummings in Mr. Tilton's presence.

Mr. Beach—Very well; don't state the conversation.

The Witness—I mentioned Mrs. Woodhull—

Mr. Beach—If that was in the hearing of Mr. Tilton you can state it.

Mr. Everts—It is of no importance.

The Witness—I remember making this remark. I said Mrs. Tilton is living; if she wrote one confession she can write another; there would not be any occasion for anything of that kind, and thereupon I remember Mrs. Woodhull said—this was one of the remarks that lodged in my memory—that probably, or perhaps, or probably, Mrs. Tilton would not give another; that this letter was written at the time that Mr. Tilton was involved in some business dispute.

THE IMAGINED SOCIAL REVOLUTION.

Q. In that conversation was there anything further said that you recall as connected with this doctrine? A. I don't recall anything in relation to Mrs. Tilton now at this moment.

Q. Now, in regard to this revolution; did the conversation proceed in comparing it with the Reformation, or freedom of thought, or anything of that kind? A. Yes, Sir; on that subject there was something further said which I remember. I remember Mr. Tilton spoke of the great revolution effected by the Reformation, in respect to freedom of thought, freedom for the thinking faculties.

Q. You mean the Luther Reformation? A. The Protestant Reformation; the name of Luther was mentioned, and that this reformation in the world was one which would free the sentiments from the tyranny of either Church or State; I remember he made that remark, and Mrs. Woodhull followed that up with some remark of hers, then one which I now recall, which was, that the oppression incident to any law repressing freedom of thought was of very small weight—was a very small weight compared with the oppression of those laws which regulated and repressed the sentiments, the affections and the emotions; that one's life, home and happiness depended ten times more on the healthy action of the sentiments and the emotions, the natural affections, than upon the action of the will, or the logic upon any dogmas.

Q. In this connection, was anything said about wives and children and marriage? A. Yes, Sir; in connection with that Mr. Tilton made a remark that all laws on this subject were an invasion of the reserved rights of the individual; I remember he used that expression, the invasion of the reserved rights of the individual, and were—I followed up on that, making some observations, that I had known of a great deal of hardship in connection with these laws, but I stated I thought, on the whole, that there was a preponderance of advantage in their favor, that they protected the weak. I knew that they did furnish the occasion for a great deal of oppression, and a great deal of suffering, and a great many frauds, and I remember there relating an occurrence which the late Chief-Justice Chapman had told me a short time before, that when in practice in Springfield he was employed by a lady to look up a divorce which had been obtained from her without her knowledge in Albany, New-York, and he stated that he there found, on looking up the record, twenty-six cases in succession, running on the same docket, entered by the same lawyer, referred to the same Referee, supported by two depositions of the same deponent, all on the ground of adultery, sustaining the allegation, all entered on the same day by the same Judge, and that he supposed probably two-thirds of those were frauds—gross frauds upon faded and worn out wives whom the husbands wished to repudiate, and the rest were collusive. Thereupon Mrs. Tilton remarked in a—

Q. Mrs. Tilton? A. Mrs. Woodhull I mean; Mrs. Tilton was not present. I never met Mrs. Tilton at all. Mrs. Woodhull remarked—she said: "I don't think that I ever heard an argument so strong as that against the whole accursed system." "Well," said I, "yet, after all, there are probably thousands and hundreds of thousands of wives who are now supported by their husbands, and their husbands contented to support them in consequence of that law and the public opinion which maintains it, who might be abandoned within a year if there was nothing of that kind to sustain them, and she differed from me there; she demurred entirely, and Mr. Tilton also.

Q. He differed from you? A. Yes, Sir; he said there was no right—there was no proper social theory on which such laws could be supported; that the marriage relation should be regulated, like all others, by contract; whether in its commencement or in its dissolution, it should be by contract.

Q. Did you say anything about that to Mr. Tilton? A. I did; I said I thought that if that were the case—if that were made the rule, the stronger party in every case would dictate the terms of the contract, and the weaker party would be at the mercy of the stronger, and divorce would be at the option of either party, and that that would expose women, who were the defendant party, to all the evils of the system, from which they are now protected, and that Mrs. Tilton rejected—

Q. Mrs. Woodhull? A. Mrs. Woodhull rejected that. She said, "The whole system comes of this false theory, that women are inferior to men, that they cannot take care of themselves," and stated that they must be taught to take care of themselves; "they must be trained to support themselves and look after themselves, and then they will be equals and make their contracts on equal terms with men."

Q. Was anything said in regard to the care of families under the two systems? A. Yes, Sir. I spoke of that; that I thought the advantages of the present system were altogether in favor of the weaker party, and talked about what would be the effect of divorce upon the children; and she said that she would have the State take care of the children; and they would take care of the children, and that the whole system, which now obtains, of segregated families, the wife doing the washing and cooking in a separate establishment, involved a great waste of labor and a great waste of time, and a great waste of power, all of which could be saved if they were brought up on the system of the Communists.

Q. If the children were? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. If the children were all brought up by the State? A. In institutions supported by the State. I made the remark that at one time that had been tried in Sparta, and society had existed under it, and I supposed could exist again, but while certain very noble traits were developed in the Spartan character, other traits, of ferocity and savageness, had been developed, from which society was now exempt.

Q. Did Mr. Tilton say anything on this particular point of the case of the children and the families? A. I am unable to recall any particular remark that Mr. Tilton made on that subject.

Q. Now, did you observe the manner of Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton towards each other during that interview? A. Yes, Sir; I did.

Q. What was it? A. The manner of a lady and gentleman who were enamored of each other; there was no mistaking that.

Q. How did they address each other? A. He addressed her always as "Victoria," and she addressed him always as "Theodore."

Q. Did you observe anything in Mr. Tilton's manner while his wife was the subject of the conversation? A. I do not recall anything.

Q. Now, at what hour did you leave? A. I did not leave there until a good deal past 10 o'clock, towards 11 o'clock.

Q. Had Mr. Tilton left before you did, or did you leave him there? A. He had not left, to my knowledge. He was there in the house—I feel very confident that Mr. Tilton was there when I left. I remember there were some others that had left; I think Mr. Tilton was there at the time I left.

Q. Now, when was this; what part of the year? A. It was, as near as I can fix it, in the month of September, 1871. The only means I have of fixing the event is this, that the Convention—a Convention was held at Framingham, on the 12th of September, I think.

Q. Where? A. Framingham, Mass. I was not at the Convention, but I remember the fact, and Mrs. Woodhull introduced to me a gentleman on this occasion who was at the Convention, and introduced a resolution in favor of Woman's Suffrage. That is the only fact by which I fix it.

Q. That is, you fix it as being after the 12th of September? A. And recently after that.

Q. After the 12th of September? A. After that Convention. That Convention may have been on the 6th, but I think it was on the 12th. It was either the 6th or the 12th, and I think it was the 12th.

Q. Can you fix that it was not after a certain date in that year by any subsequent occurrence? A. Well, I know that it was—oh, it could not have been later than September, because I was there again at the house once after that, in October, and there was an interval of several weeks between the two visits.

Q. Between the two visits? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And then, in October, were you going on to Washington? A. Yes, Sir; I was going on to Washington.

Q. To argue a case in the Supreme Court? A. Yes, Sir; there was a matter there.

Q. You can fix the date of that argument; what was the case? A. That was the case of the United States—the case of the steamer Siren, in prize.

Q. Prize cause? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And that you argued for the— A. Argued for the claimants, on appeal from the District Court of the District of Massachusetts.

THE AUTHOR'S OPINION OF THE WOODHULL BIOGRAPHY.

Q. On this interview, or this visit, did you receive a copy of Mr. Tilton's Life of Mrs. Woodhull? A. That was spoken of there, but I think I did not receive it there. I think I obtained that afterwards from Mrs. Woodhull. I am not absolutely certain about that, but that is my impression.

Q. Was there any conversation in which Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton and yourself took part respecting that life? A. That was spoken of, but what was said about it I don't now recall; that is, anything said by the three in concert. I remember Mrs. Woodhull making a remark—

Q. Well, no matter. A. —which Mr. Tilton may or may not have heard.

Q. Well, if it was within the range of his hearing? A. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Beach—He does not say that it was.

Mr. Evarts—I say if it was within the range.

Mr. Beach—He says he may, or may not, have heard it.

Mr. Evarts—If it was within the range.

The Witness—Well, this conversation occurred, that I have spoken of—occurred when we were in the same positions that I described. Of course I could not state whether Mr. Tilton heard a particular remark.

Q. Well, that we understand. Now, what was the observation? A. She made the observation that Mr. Tilton regarded it as one of his—one of the best things that he had ever written.

Q. Now, after this did you ever see Mr. Tilton and Mrs. Woodhull together, and where? A. I saw them together at the same place, but only for a very short time on that occasion.

Q. When was that, and how came you to go to the place? A. That was on the Sunday evening, as near as I now remember—the Sunday evening that I passed through New-York on my way to Washington to argue the case that I have just spoken of; that is as near as I can fix it. I remember calling there early in the evening, and leaving early in the evening, and I think the object of my leaving was to go to the ferry to take the 9 o'clock train to Washington, but I am—I have been thinking that matter over since I spoke to you yesterday, and it may have been that visit was earlier than that a little. I was in New-York here two or three times before that. That is the best recollection I can give on the subject.

Q. And you say that call was a casual one? A. Well, Mrs. Tilton had written a note to me.

Q. Mrs. Woodhull. A. Mrs. Woodhull, I beg your pardon for the continued—

Q. It was not a call in consequence with Mr. Tilton? A. Not at all, Sir.

Q. You called there in consequence of a note from Mrs. Woodhull? A. I afterwards became counsel for Mrs. Woodhull in several matters that she had in Boston.

Q. You went there to see Mrs. Woodhull? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And not on any appointment with Mr. Tilton? A. No, Sir.

Q. Did you find Mr. Tilton there? A. Mr. Tilton — I am not certain whether he was there when I called or came in there while I was in the house. I remember that Col.

Mood took me into a rear chamber to show some materializations, and my present impression is that while I was gone in the chamber Mr. Tilton came in, so that when I came out back into the parlor he was there.

Q. With Mrs. Woodhull? A. With Mrs. Woodhull; yes, Sir, and Miss Claflin.

ARRANGING FOR THE STEINWAY HALL MEETING.

Q. Well, at this interview was there conversation—this interview or any interview between that one in September and this interview—was there a conversation between Mrs. Woodhull, Mr. Tilton and yourself in regard to Mr. Beecher's presiding at some meeting? A. I think that it was at this second meeting; I think that was the time, yet it is impossible for me to say with certainty.

Q. Well, at one or the other? A. At one or the other Mrs. Woodhull said that Mr. Beecher was going to preside at a meeting at which she was to deliver an address on this subject; and she had the address—I received a copy of the address, I remember, in advance—whether it was given to me at the time, or sent to me by mail, I don't remember—on what printers call galley proofs.

Q. Well, what was said, if anything, further? A. I said that I didn't believe Mr. Beecher would do that, and she said he would do it, that Mr. Tilton was arranging that, and I told her, says I: "I don't believe Mr. Beecher will preside at a meeting where you are to attack one of the established institutions of society, and which is so mixed up with the religion of the country." And Mr. Tilton made the remark there, that Mr. Beecher would not say anything to indorse her theory; that he had not the courage for that, but that he would introduce her with some remarks indicating that he held this to be a legitimate subject of public discussion, and that she had the right to discuss it in the exercise of her free speech.

Q. When you expressed this doubt, whether Mr. Beecher would so appear, was anything said as to the means or influences by which he would be brought? A. Nothing, except that Mr. Tilton was in negotiation with him on that subject, that Mr. Tilton would bring him there, and I cannot recollect the words in which that was used, but that was the substance of the remark.

Q. Are you otherwise acquainted with the parties to this suit than as you have mentioned the acquaintance you formed with Mr. Tilton? A. I met Mr. Tilton in Charleston, South Carolina the day after Mr. Beecher delivered his Fort Sumter oration at the African Presbyterian Church.

Q. You were in that party, then? A. I was stationed there; I was attached to the staff of Admiral Dahlgren.

Q. You were in the navy at that time? A. I was in the navy at that time, and Mr. Tilton came down, and he made a speech in that church, and I met him there; but I don't remember any conversation with him there.

Q. And since have you continued your acquaintance? A. I never met him except on these two occasions at Mrs. Beecher's—Mrs. Woodhull's.

Q. And with Mr. Beecher have you any acquaintance? A. I never met Mr. Beecher but once in my life, and that was the same day that I met Mr. Tilton at Charleston; the day after he delivered his oration I met him in Charleston, and had five or ten minutes conversation with him.

Q. And you never have seen Mrs. Tilton? A. I have never seen her at all, until she was pointed out to me in Court yesterday.

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF MR. COWLEY.

Mr. Beach—I understand, Sir, your first acquaintance with Mr. Tilton was through an introduction by Mrs. Woodhull? A. Except that I met him in this casual way at Charleston, South Carolina.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him there? A. At Charleston; no, Sir; none that I recall.

Q. Was you introduced to him there? A. I think I was, and some mere remark—

Q. Well, do you recollect it; do you recollect being introduced to him? A. Oh! I remember we were there together, and he made a speech at the meeting, and I made a few remarks.

Q. I understand that. I ask you if you was introduced to him at Charleston? A. I think I was.

Q. How? A. I think I was.

Q. Do you remember who introduced you? A. I think it was Major Delaney; Major Delaney presided at the meeting.

Q. When was it? A. That was the day after Mr. —

Q. Well, when; the day—the year? A. It was in April, 1865, the 14th or 15th.

Q. In April, 1865? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. What was the occasion of that assembly? A. It was a meeting of colored people to hear the gentlemen who had come down—the Beecher party from the North. Mr. Beecher came down with a party, and delivered an oration at the raising of the flag over Fort Sumter, and Mr. Tilton was with him, or with the party, and Mr. Garrison, Judge Kelley, if I remember right, and some others were there, and made addresses at that meeting.

Q. You did not recognize Mr. Tilton, then, until the introduction of Mrs. Woodhull, when you met him at her house in 1871? A. Well, our meeting in Charleston was so casual I didn't —

Q. Well, you were introduced? A. I think so.

Q. And had a conversation? A. Nothing of any consequence.

Q. You were fellow-spokesmen upon that occasion? A. Well, my remarks were very short, because I was there for some time, and they were only there for that day, and I excused myself.

Q. You were introduced to him and know him? A. I would not swear positively that I was introduced to him, but my impression is that Major Delaney did introduce me to Mr. Tilton, and to Judge Kelley and to Mr. Garrison. I know he introduced me to quite a number of them, and I —

Q. I don't want all this. A. I state it because I am not certain. There was quite a number of introductions.

Q. What is your recollection whether you was or not? A. I am not certain whether I was or not.

Q. What? A. I am not certain whether I was or not.

Q. Do you still think you was? A. I think I was; yes, Sir.

Q. You think you was; then it is true that although you think you was introduced to him at Charleston, in 1865, you did not recognize him upon that introduction when you met him at Mrs. Woodhull's? A. Recognise him? Yes, Sir; I recognised him, and I referred to having met him in Charleston, in conversation with him. I didn't understand you—your use of the word "recognition" there—at first.

Q. Sir! A. I didn't at first understand your use of the word "recognition;" the moment I saw him I recognised him as Mr. Tilton.

THE GATHERING AT THE WOODHULLS'.

Q. Whereabouts in the house were you introduced to Mr. Tilton? A. In the parlor.

Q. Were there other persons there? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. When you arrived? A. Yes, Sir; a large number, or a considerable number.

Q. A considerable number; about what number? A. I should think a dozen.

Q. Any lady guests among them? A. Yes, Sir; quite a number.

Q. Who were they? A. Mrs. Anna Middlebrook—she has a middle name, but I have forgotten it—of Connecticut, I think Bridgeport, was the only lady whose name I can now recall. I recall her because I had a conversation with her.

Q. You were introduced to other ladies? A. Introduced to quite a number of them; yes, Sir; but there is not one whose name I can recall; and to quite a number of the gentlemen also.

Q. Can you give me the names of any of the gentlemen who were there? A. Yes, Sir; Albert Brisbane, Stephen Pearl Andrews and Mr. Bacon—I think his name was Bacon, of Worcester; I am not certain about his name, but I remember he was the one that Mrs. Woodhull introduced me to as being the gentleman who had introduced the Woman's Suffrage resolution at the Framingham Convention. There were others there whose names have passed from my mind. They were from different parts of the country.

Q. What time did you reach the house of Mrs. Woodhull on that occasion? A. Between eight and nine o'clock; nearer eight than nine, I should think.

Q. And you left shortly after ten? A. Some time between ten and eleven; it was later than I was aware of when I—

Q. And you had been there in the morning preceding that evening? A. No; I met Mrs. Woodhull first at her office, then in Broadway. It was there that I was introduced to her by Mr. Cummings.

Q. You never had been at her house before this evening? A. No, Sir.

Q. And had never been introduced to her until that evening? A. Never met her before at all.

Q. Had you noticed anything of her public career at that time? A. Not much.

Q. Anything, I said. A. Oh, yes; yes, Sir; something.

Q. You knew her position upon the question of woman's suffrage? A. I knew that she was a woman's suffragist; yes, Sir, and the head of the New-York—or, as I understood, the head of the New-York party, as distinguished—

Q. The New-York party? A. The New-York party, as distinguished from the Boston party.

Q. Of suffragists? A. Of suffragists; yes, Sir.

Q. Had you read any of her publications prior to that? A. I don't think I had. She gave me a volume of her speeches, and I have it now, but—

Q. I didn't ask you for that, Sir. Had you heard any of her addresses prior to that? A. No, nor since.

Q. And then you knew nothing of her special tenets prior to that upon these subjects? A. Oh, yes, from what I had seen in the papers about her I had an idea.

Q. I didn't ask you that.

Mr. Evarts—Well, I think you did.

Mr. Beach—No, I did not.

The Witness—I understood your question to cover that. Very well.

Q. I asked you if you knew anything in regard to the particular tenets prior to that? A. Nothing of my own knowledge—nothing except by hearsay and through the prints.

MR. COWLEY'S MISSION IN THE CITY.

Q. What was the occasion of your coming to New-York at that time? A. My impression is that—well, I was here several times during the Summer.

Q. I didn't ask you about that. A. It is too vague—

Q. Now, my dear Sir, please answer me as a lawyer; what was the occasion of your coming to New-York at that time? A. I could not tell you with absolute certainty.

Q. I understood you to answer Mr. Evarts that it was in connection with some political movement. A. No; but having occasion to come here—

Q. No, no! Didn't I understand you to say that? A. You did not; you may have misunderstood me if you did.

Q. I don't think I did. That we will determine.

Mr. Evarts—He said "having occasion to come here."

Mr. Beach—Wait one moment, Mr. Evarts. [To the witness.] You did not say then to Mr. Evarts—in answer to Mr. Evarts that you came here in connection with any political movement? A. No, Sir, I said that—

Q. Well, wait. I didn't ask you what you said. You did not say so? A. I did not say that I came here—

Q. Then you did not come here in connection with any political movement? A. I did come in connection with it, but not special in connection with it, not expressly for it.

Q. Well, you came in connection with what political movement? A. Well, what was called the Labor Reform Movement, in Massachusetts.

Q. How did you come here in connection with it; for what purpose? A. I will tell you. Before the Convention was held I had told Mr. Cummings, who was Chairman of the State Committee, and some others, that I did not propose to take any active part further in the movement, as I had done during the preceding years. After the Convention was held, Mr. Cum-advice proposed to me and Mr. Phillips—Mr. Wendell Phillips, who was the candidate for Governor the previous year on that ticket—proposed to bring on Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton to make public addresses in Massachusetts in behalf of the movement. He thought that he could get them on and that they would produce—

Q. In behalf of the labor movement? A. The labor movement. He thought they would produce a very great effect if they came to Massachusetts. Mr. Phillips demurred to that and the matter was left, as the result of that conversation, for me, as I was coming from New-York—I had forgotten the particular occasion—I was coming to New-York pretty soon, and Mr. Cummings was to be here, and says I: "I will call in and see Mrs. Tilton—Mrs. Woodhull, and perhaps see Mr. Tilton, too, and see what the result of a personal interview with them may be."

Q. Then a portion of your design in coming to New-York was to see Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton in regard to their advocacy in Massachusetts of this labor movement? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. How came you to be introduced by Mr. Cummings to Mrs. Woodhull? A. Because Mr. Cummings— He was the Chairman of the Committee, and it was with him that I made this appointment.

Q. Then you met him here by appointment? A. Well, we were both here on other matters. He was connected—

Q. I don't ask that. A. Being here, we met there by appointment.

Q. And you went with him to Mrs. Woodhull upon this subject? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. For the purpose of an introduction to her? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. And she invited you to visit her house the following evening, when she said she would have Mr. Tilton there? A. She said that Mr. Tilton would be there, and she would like to introduce him to me. She said that there was to be— There was a gathering there in her office of some Directors or Trustees or Managing Committee of the American Association of Spiritualists, of which she was President, and they were to be there at the house.

Q. Of which who was President? A. Mrs. Woodhull was President; I may have given the name of the Association wrong, but it was some Association that either had held, or was about to hold a Convention in Chicago, and these ladies and gentlemen were there.

Q. I haven't asked anything about that, Sir; I am perfectly willing to take it. While you were that evening at the house of Mrs. Woodhull did you have conversation with others besides her and Mr. Tilton? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. With whom? A. Mr. Brisbane.

Q. What was the topic of that conversation? A. Finance.

Q. What? A. Finance. Mr. Brisbane had—I elicited his views on finance and gave him mine, Sir.

Q. Well, what were his views? A. Well, it is more difficult to answer that question than it is the other one.

Q. I suppose so. A. He gave his views at very considerable—

Q. I don't ask that—I ask what they were? A. I could not remember what they were; I know they struck me as being very fanciful at the time.

Q. I don't ask that.

Mr. Everts—He is entitled to make that answer, I submit.

Mr. Beach—No, Sir, he is not entitled to make that answer. [To the witness]: Can you give me anything that he said on that subject? A. Oh, yes, I remember.

Q. Very well, let us have it? A. He was for having a general system of loans upon the public credit; that is about the only idea left—the only recollection left on my memory of that conversation.

Q. Can you give me some of the forms of his expression in making that, communicating that idea? A. No; I cannot.

Q. How long did you have a conversation with him? A. Oh, that occupied perhaps ten minutes or perhaps fifteen.

Q. Yes, and in fifteen minutes you received his views upon that subject and communicated yours? A. So far as they bore upon his views.

Q. That you think occupied fifteen minutes? A. Well, might have done, or might not so much.

Q. Well, did you converse with any other gentleman? A. Yes.

Q. Who? A. I conversed with this Worcester gentleman whose name, I think, was Bacon, in regard to Massachusetts politics.

Q. Well, what was the substance of that conversation? A. The Woman Suffrage movement; he had introduced the Woman Suffrage resolution at Framingham.

Q. You have told me that several times; I asked you what the conversation was? A. It was on that subject.

Q. I ask you what it was? A. I am giving it to you as fast as I can; the first and principal point was that, by introducing that, he thought the vote would be run up many thousands; and I told him, I thought it very doubtful whether the vote would run up or run down.

Q. Yes; what else passed between you and him on that subject? A. Well, we had some conversation in regard to candidates.

Q. Well, what was it? A. Mr. Chamberlin, who had been nominated for Governor; the question of his candidature; whether he would draw. I told him that I thought the very fact that Chamberlin run once two years before and got 1,400 votes, would be a drawback on the ticket this time—that he would not get as many this time.

Q. What else? A. I don't recollect anything particular, except I know that there were other things said.

Q. Well, did you converse with any one else? A. Miss Claflin, I remember—I had some conversation with her.

Q. What was that? A. I don't remember anything, any talk, except the subject of the regiment or which she was then colonel, or had been colonel, or was about to be colonel; she was in the military movement, I know that.

Q. Well, what was said, I am asking? A. I don't recollect much of that except I remember referring to one or two historical precedents for women.

Q. Well, who? A. I referred to Ellenora.

Q. To whom? A. Queen Ellenora; says I: "She went to Palestine with a band of troops called Queen Elenora's Guards;" I indulged in some jocular remarks on that.

Q. Well, I want the benefit of them, if I can get them? A. I can't recall them all; I give you that.

Q. Is that all you recollect of that conversation with Miss Cladin? A. Yes; I don't recollect anything else.

Q. Well, do you recollect any conversation with any one else except Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton upon that evening? A. I had some conversation with Col. Blood.

Q. Well, what was that? A. I don't remember.

Q. Don't remember? A. Don't remember a thing that passed between us.

Q. Well, any conversation with any one else? A. I had very little conversation with Col. Blood.

Q. Did you have any conversation with any one else, I ask you? A. No one but Mrs. Woodhull, that I recollect. Yes; I did have some conversation with Mrs. Middlebrook.

Q. What was that? A. I spoke of a lecture which I had seen of hers; that was all.

Q. Well, what was said about it? A. That I don't recall, some complimentary allusion to the lecture.

Q. I ask what was said? A. I don't recollect.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE GATHERING.

Q. Well, let that answer suffice. Now, will you give me again, the position occupied by yourself, Mrs. Woodhull, and Mr. Tilton, at the time of the conversation which you have related on your direct examination? A. Mr. Tilton sat upon a lounge or sofa, directly opposite to where I sat, and where Mrs. Woodhull sat, directly opposite to us in the parlor.

Q. Did you sit in a chair or upon a lounge? A. I sat in a chair.

Q. Mrs. Woodhull in a chair? A. In a chair; yes, Sir.

Q. With a small lady's table between you? A. Yes, Sir; one or two books on it.

Q. What? A. One or two books on the table, I remember.

Q. One or two books on it—was Mrs. Woodhull nearer to you than to Mr. Tilton, or about equi-distant? A. She was—we were—she and I were separated only by the table; we were not a foot apart.

Q. Well, was Mr. Tilton further from her than you? A. Just about the same distance, or might be, perhaps—

Q. Well, that could scarcely be. A. Well, Sir, if anything, perhaps she might be slightly further from him than from me, but it would not differ a foot.

Q. It wouldn't? A. No.

Q. She was a foot from you? A. From me, yes, we were both—

Q. Wait a minute. I understood you to say that Mr. Tilton was about the same distance from you that he is now, during the conversation? A. Not more than that, I should think not—

Q. And Mrs. Woodhull being within a foot of you, she was as near to Mr. Tilton as to you? A. Yes, Sir, we were both—she was on the side of me.

Mr. Beach—Mr. Evarts suggests that you misunderstand me, and he repeats that you do.

The Witness—What is the question?

Mr. Evarts—The question, as I understand it, that you were asking him whether Mr. Tilton was nearer to you or to Mrs. Woodhull?

The Witness—Nearer to me—

Mr. Beach—No; you understood me to ask you whether Mrs. Woodhull was as near to Mr. Tilton as to you, did you not? A. That is what I understood. Yes, I think she was; I think she was just about; there could not be but very trifling difference in the distance between—

Q. That is Mr. Tilton.

Mr. Evarts—Listen to the answer.

The Witness—There was but very slight difference, if any, in the distance between Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton on one hand, and the distance between Mr. Tilton and myself on the other.

Mr. Beach—You understood me to ask you the question whether Mrs. Woodhull was nearer to you than she was to Mr. Tilton, didn't you? A. That was a question some distance back; you asked me that question I know.

Q. Well, that is the question, and the only question that I have asked you. A. Oh! no; I understood you.

Q. Well, now, how is it, Sir, was Mrs. Woodhull sitting nearer to you than to Mr. Tilton? A. Very much nearer to me.

Q. Very much nearer to you? A. Yes, that is what I understood you before.

Mr. Beach—No you didn't.

Mr. Evarts—Well, it was a misunderstanding.

Mr. Beach—Well, it is all very well; we can see it without your aid, Mr. Evarts. [To the witness.] Was any one sitting with Mr. Tilton upon the lounge where he sat? A. I think that at the first part of the conversation Mrs. Middlebrook sat in a chair near the end of the lounge—not on the lounge, but near the end of the lounge, very near Mr. Tilton.

Q. Was Mr. Tilton near the end of the lounge? A. Near one end of it; yes, Sir.

Q. Now, did any one else, if you will please answer my question, sit on the lounge occupied by Mr. Tilton? A. Not that I remember.

Q. Well, is your memory so accurate that you can say there was none? A. I would not swear to that.

Q. What? A. I could not—that is, that there was no one there at no time during the conversation; I could not say that.

Q. Yes; and did Mr. Tilton, yourself and Mrs. Woodhull occupy your relative positions during your conversation which you have related on your direct examination? A. During the conversation to which Mr. Evarts interrogated me?

Q. During the conversation you related on direct examination? A. Yes, Sir, but not during the whole evening, by any means.

Q. Well, during the whole of the conversations which you have given? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. On your direct examination? A. Well, I gave parts of—I gave parts of different conversations there; the company divided repeatedly into small groups, for instance.

Q. I suppose so, Sir. The point I want to know is whether, during the conversations which you gave between yourself, Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton, which you suppose were heard by Mr. Tilton, those parties occupied the respective positions you have now given? A. Well, during the conversations that related to Mrs. Tilton or Mr. Beecher we did.

Q. You did? A. Yes, Sir.

Q. Well, did you— A. The other part, the first conversation that I spoke of, that in relation to Lowell and its institutions, that was at an earlier part of the evening, and I am pretty certain that between that and the other that followed later in the evening, there were one or two separations and mixing up into—breaking up into smaller coteries.

Q. Well, what were the relative positions of the three parties I have mentioned during the conversation in regard to Lowell? A. Mr. Tilton—take them one at a time—Mr. Tilton occupied very much of the evening in the same position; Mrs. Woodhull moved about a good deal; she was at this table a good deal, and then going away a good deal, and then coming back.

Q. Did you understand me to ask you that, Sir? A. I am coming at it.

Q. I wish you would get at it a little more directly. I am asking what was the position of yourself, Mrs. Woodhull and Mr. Tilton at the time of this conversation concerning Lowell? A. Mrs. Woodhull then sat in a chair, a little away from the table, that is—a little distant from the position which I have described—that is, as having been occupied by her later in the evening, but still nearer than in another chair on the other side, in very much the position that I occupied during the conversation that related to Mr. Beecher.

Q. Where were you? A. And I was at the end of the table. I think I stood there when that conversation first began and then took a seat.

THE CONVERSATIONS AGAIN REPEATED.

Q. Now, relate that conversation, all the conversation; all the conversation that occurred between you there while you occupied that position, so far as you are able. A. I could not do that.

Q. Can't do it as far as you are able? A. Oh, I can do it as far as I am able, but then I can't tell—

Q. I don't want you to declaim, but answer my question? A. I will, Sir.

Q. Very well; proceed? A. I remember handing her the book.

Q. What book? A. The History of Lowell.

Q. Well? A. And she said that she was very much interested in Lowell, and she expected to go there to lecture—she would like to come there and lecture; and she said that she had seen, a few days before that, a paragraph in the newspaper in relation to the regulations in the mills of Lowell, in relation to the factory girls; and she wondered that any girls of spirit would submit to such regulations as required them to be in their house at a given hour, and depriving them of the control of their own movements outside of the mills; I remember that was the way it began.

Q. Well, I want you to tell me how it progressed and ended? A. Well, I can only give you fragments of it.

Q. Very well; if that is the best we can get we will take that. A. Well, that is the best I can give; I remember inquiring in that connection of Mr. Tilton whether he had ever lectured in Lowell, and he answered that he had not, according to my recollection of it; and there—about that time—I made some remark about Mr. Tilton which led Mrs.—I don't remember what it was; the exact language—but it led Mrs.—

Q. No; the substance of it? A. Well, I can't give you that either: but all I remember about it, is, that it was some remark which I made that led Mrs. Woodhull to correct the misapprehension that the remark led her to infer that Mr. Tilton had ever been a clergyman. I had been under the impression up to that time—

Mr. Beach—Never mind.

The Witness—continuing—that Mr. Tilton was or had been a clergyman.
